The $1,200 now being allowed in the purchase of land is not allowed by way of a grant. Rather it becomes part of the loan, and only 33⅓ per cent of it is written off. This makes a difference of about $920 in the equity a soldier would have in his land. It was the intention of the government, as stated at that time, to see that the soldier had a real equity in his land. I maintain that this $1,200, which can be used for the purchase of land, should be a grant, the same as it would be if he used it for the purchase of stock and equipment.

In my view, many failures which took place under the old soldier settlement scheme could be traced to the fact that the soldier did not have enough capital with which to work an economic farming unit. Surveys which have been made in Canada by various agricultural colleges as to what is required by way of capital to operate a successful farming unit show, in almost every instance, that up to a certain amount, the more capital one has invested, the greater are his chances of successful operation. As a matter of fact, it is recognized to-day that a successful farming operation cannot be carried on without a capital investment of at least $10,000, and that there is a much greater likelihood of success if the investment is about $15,000. With the greater investment one stands a much better chance of success than with the smaller one.

Again, that greater investment gives the farmer a better chance to educate his children and to enjoy some of those amenities of life to which, in my view, the farm population are entitled, just as much as are people living in the cities and towns. To enjoy these amenities the farmer must have a capital investment sufficient to enable him to operate an economic unit. In my view $6,000 is not enough nor do I think it is enough to establish a returned man on a unit on which he would have a chance of success, or of educating his children, or of giving them the proper medical attention or of those other amenities of life to which we in Canada believe we are entitled, and which some cannot have.

I have some suggestions which I offer for the consideration of the committee. In the first place, I believe that payments under the act should be made on a parity basis. When the act was before the committee in 1942 I suggested the insertion of the following section:

> In any year during which the selling price of the commodities produced by the veteran falls relatively to the cost price of the goods and services purchased by him as compared with the similar selling and cost prices which prevailed during the year in which this act will have come into force—to be known as the base year—the payments due shall be reduced by an amount proportionate to the decrease in the purchasing power of the agricultural products in that year as compared with the base year.

Those payments would be considered payment in full for such year. I feel sure that, if some such section were in the act, the settlers who would come under its operation would have a much better chance of success than they have at the present time. After experience, it is my belief that, had the old soldier settlement scheme under which the settlers were placed had a section such as the one I have suggested, there would not have been constant applications to Ottawa during the years for revisions of the act for the purpose of making it possible for soldier settlers to remain on their lands. Even with all the concessions that have been granted, of over 25,000 who settled on the land only a little more than 4,000 have been able to complete their payments up to date. Unless we introduce some parity clause in the present land act we shall find ourselves again facing the same difficulty. Delegations of soldier organizations will be coming to Ottawa in five or ten years trying to get some revision made to the act. The soldier does not want charity; all he wants is justice and a fair chance in our Canadian economy. He can get that only if we have some such clause in the act.

The second thing which I believe should be done is to make more capital available to the settler. As I stated before, I believe it takes at least $10,000 to operate an economically equipped unit, and that much capital should be made available to the settler under the act. It need not necessarily be a grant; it might be a loan. With the way in which payments now operate we could increase the total loan to $10,000, so that an economical unit could be obtained by the settler. He would then be able to get sufficient stock and equipment to work it in the way in which it should be worked if it is to be a success.

The third thing which I believe should be done is to try to make more land available to the settlers. The board is having a great deal of difficulty in getting land which it wants. We were told in the committee in 1942 that in all probability there would be 100,000 applications under this act for permanent farm holdings during the first three years after the completion of the war. I believe that to date we have had some 35,000 applications for small and permanent holdings, but as yet we have settled only a small number because we have not the land available.

In certain parts of Canada large areas of land are being held by different companies. Originally this land was given to these companies as grants. Such grants were made to the railroads, to the Hudson's Bay company and to others. Some of this land is still unsettled; it is still in the raw state, but it is fairly close to railroads, schools and various other amenities of life. The government should try to obtain land from these companies and make it available to our returned men. These men should not have to go back thirty, forty or fifty miles from a railroad to settle on provincial land unless they wish to do so. In many cases these men would prefer to have land closer to railroad facilities, closer to markets and in places where they could receive better medical attention and have better school facilities for their children.

The fourth thing which I suggest the government should do is to permit a settler to use the $1,200 which he receives under the act for stock and equipment cooperatively with other settlers. Anyone who has had anything to do with farming knows how far $1,200 will go to-day in buying stock and equipment; it will just not go anywhere. The average farm in eastern Canada has at least $3,000 to $4,000 worth of stock and equipment. The average grain farm in western Canada has from $5,000 to $7,000 worth of equipment. If four or five returned men were allowed to pool their $1,200 cooperatively to buy equipment they could then purchase a reasonably economic unit with which to operate their holdings.

It was suggested in the committee that this could be done by each one buying his own equipment and then lending it to the others. Anyone who has been on a farm knows that that would not work out. There is much heavier upkeep on one piece of equipment than on another. A man may have a seed drill costing $400 and the upkeep would be quite small. Another man would have a binder upon which the upkeep would be higher. A third man might have an engine upon which the upkeep would be still higher. The only successful way to pool the use of equipment is cooperatively, to have the equipment owned and operated by the group.

Another way in which the settler could be assisted would be to make available tools, trucks or other equipment which are now under the control of War Assets Corporation. These should be made available to the settler direct without having to go through two or three hands with the consequent commissions having to be paid. When the Minister of Munitions and Supply was before the committee he stated that the Department of Veterans Affairs would be given an opportunity to purchase this equipment. I suggest that the branch having to do with the Veterans' Land Act appoint a purchasing agent who could go to War Assets Corporation and obtain such equipment as may be used on the farm.

I know something of what it is to try to operate a farm with poor equipment. I tried to repair machinery which I had obtained under the old soldier settler board for the first four or five years I was on the land; I tried to work with a monkey-wrench and a piece of baling wire, but I found it discouraging. There are millions of dollars worth of tools and equipment now in the various camps and air force depots across Canada which could be used to good effect by the settlers who will be settled under this act. I strongly urge the minister to appoint a purchasing agent who could make out a list of what would be a reasonable set of tools for a settler. Then purchases could be made from War Assets Corporation and these tools made available to settlers who may want them.

Mr. REID: He could not carry on without baling wire.

Mr. WRIGHT: He will probably need a lot of baling wire as well. A farmer to-day has to be a jack of all trades. He has to be a motor mechanic; he has to be a blacksmith; he has to be a carpenter; he has to be a tinsmith, and he has to be many other things. He would find things much more pleasant and helpful if he had the necessary equipment to do the job.

Many of these settlers are coming to the local offices set up under the Veterans' Land Act where they are shown what land is available. This land may not be in the district in which they want to settle. They are then told to go out, secure a suitable piece of land and report to the office. If the price is suitable, if the land is found to be reasonably good, the application will be considered. But it costs the returned man money to go out and look for land. I would suggest that some facilities be provided for settlers who are going out to look for land. At least a car should be placed at their disposal so that they can go out and select their land. Most of these boys have not too much money, and they will have to pay ten per cent of the cost and meet other expenses until they become established.

With respect to the small holdings, perhaps at the present time it cannot be avoided, but most of the building on these small holdings is being done by large contractors, who will put up twenty or thirty or forty or a hundred or two hundred houses, which are then sold to the returned men. Perhaps that is the only way in which this scheme can be operated at the present time. But just as soon as that method can be changed I would suggest to the minister that the veteran be given an opportunity and assisted to build his own home. With most of the successful cooperative housing schemes that we have in Canada, the measure of their success has largely been the measure in which the individual himself took part in the building of his own home. In cooperative housing schemes in the mining and fishing centres of Nova Scotia, for instance, groups of men would get together, study their own housing problems and then plan and build their own homes. In that way they built a home that was much cheaper and much more satisfactory to them as individuals than any house built by a large contractor could have been.

There are a large number of men returning this winter, and many of them will be out of a job. I would suggest that the department organize them where they want to go on small holdings and have study groups to study their housing problems and plans for their homes or small businesses which they wish to establish, and then get them to work on these things themselves. In that way you would find a much better satisfied group of people than if you put them into houses built for them by large contractors. There would be more personal satisfaction for the men themselves who had helped to build their homes with their own hands and more satisfaction for their wives who had helped to plan their own homes. There is nothing which gives more stability to a community or to a country than the ownership of a piece of land and the building of your own home. When you have planned and built your home yourself you do not leave it lightly. You will find a job in that community and remain there in all probability for the rest of your life. If such a plan were adopted I believe that it would stabilize, to some extent, at least, the fluctuations of population, the travelling from place to place by men looking for jobs.

These are just a few suggestion which we believe should be incorporated in the present act. We feel that when the house next meets we must be given an opportunity to review this act once more to study some of the suggestions that have been brought forward and to bring them to the attention of the government perhaps in the form of resolutions from the committee so that we can get action upon them.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I wish to express my pleasure at having been on the veterans affairs committee. It has been an interesting experience to me. I have been interested to notice the non-partisan way in which the committee faced its problems and I hope it is a good omen for the future. I am sure of this: when we come to deal with the difficult problems that will face us, if we face them in the spirit of the committee, I have no fear for the future.

I wish personally to express my thanks to the minister, and to the officials of his department for their excellent cooperation in dealing with veterans and related questions in my own constituency. I am particularly interested in this amending bill that has been brought down, and for this reason particularly, that a large number of returned men in British Columbia will welcome the legislative powers given in section 6. That is the section which makes it possible to make capital grants to veterans settling on provincial lands. I believe that this section will prove to be one of the most successful of the whole act. I have on several occasions heard people minimize this form of settlement, but I think the future will prove that a greater percentage of men have been settled satisfactorily under this section than any other section of the Act.

In my own district we have large numbers of men who are interested in part-time farming in association with lumbering, mining, trapping and, in some cases, prospecting. I am not pleading the case of the capitalist farmer who requires a $10,000 starting investment, but the case of the proletarian farmer, as I am a socialist. We have large numbers of these in the interior of British Columbia who would like to have a small acreage of land and keep a cow, a pig or two and cultivate a few acres of fruit and hay and who, having some other occupation, will be able to make a satisfactory living. I am pleased to see this section incorporated in the act. I would ask the minister to do everything possible to see that an agreement is reached with the government of British Columbia, so that men wishing to settle under this section may be able to do so at the first opportunity. I have heard mentioned on one or two occasions that the settlement of these men would have to wait until the dominion-provincial conference had concluded. I do not see why that should be necessary, and I hope that the minister will do what he can to see that an agreement is reached with British Columbia, so that the men who are waiting to take advantage of this section can go on provincial land in the near future.

Mr. FARQUHAR: May I ask the minister whether the grants work out equally for the man who pays $6,000 for his farm and for the man who pays $5,000?

Mr. TUCKER: It depends upon whether he puts it all into land or part into machinery. If he puts it all into land he does not get as much as if he also buys machinery. The entire cost of machinery up to $1,200 is ultimately cancelled if the veteran carries out his contract. If none is put into machinery he does not get cancellation in regard to the machinery. It all depends on the amount invested in machinery.

Mr. FARQUHAR: He gets it all in land or land and machinery?

Mr. TUCKER: He could put $1,000 of it into machinery and $5,000 into land, and then he would get a cancellation of the machinery in addition to cancellation on the land.

Mr. FARQUHAR: It does not work out in the same way?

Mr. TUCKER: No.

Mr. JOHNSTON: How would that apply to soldiers who are taking advantage of provincial legislation and getting their farms free after living on them for ten years? Take, for example, the plan in Alberta, where they have agreed to set aside a certain amount of land, and after the soldier has lived there for ten years, with no taxes to pay on it or anything, he is given free title to that land; would the soldier there be entitled to this grant for buying machinery, cattle and equipment?

Mr. TUCKER: Under the terms of the agreement he can get up to $2,320, and of course that can be used for the purposes set out in the act.

Mr. JOHNSTON: That is the direct grant? That is what the hon. member called a while ago the free grant?

Mr. TUCKER: That is the maximum he could get if he were using the assistance to buy machinery and land, and if he goes under the agreement with a province he can get the maximum amount of $2,320 for such purposes as clearing the land, purchase of buildings, purchase of live stock, machinery and so on, as set out in section 6 of the bill.

Mr. PROBE: While the hon. member to my left has been putting in a silent plug for the province of Alberta.

Mr. JOHNSTON: They took the lead.

Mr. PROBE: —would it be possible for the parliamentary assistant to indicate the provinces which already have agreements with the Department of Veterans Affairs?

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. TUCKER: As I remember it, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): And British Columbia?

Mr. TUCKER: British Columbia, as I remember, is not yet included in those with an agreement, but they are negotiating.

Mr. McKAY: Just a few words in support of what the hon. member for Melfort has said about what he regards as the inadequacy of some provisions of the Veterans' Land Act. He has stated the views of this particular group, and it is not my purpose to supplement his remarks in that connection. But I would say this in so far as the activities of the committee on veterans' affairs are concerned: I feel that that committee has done an excellent job, not because I was one of them—

An hon. MEMBER: Partly because—?

Mr. McKAY: Yes, partly. I do not think I have worked on any committee which has done such excellent work in such a short space of time. I believe I am right in saying that some thirty meetings or more were held, most of them of two hours' or more duration; they were conducted on a non-partisan basis, and the debates were more or less cutting across party lines every day. I would commend to the minister the suggestion that it would be an excellent thing if that committee, or one just as nearly like it as possible, could continue the work on behalf of the veteran, because I do not think there is any legislation before the house to-day or likely to come before the house in the near future which will be more important.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We will appoint the same committee.

Mr. McKAY: One of the most commendable amendments of the Veterans Land Act is that which has to do with the extension of the provisions of the act to our Indian veterans of this war. Some of these Indian boys served in two wars, and they did an excellent job; they fought for our democratic principles; and I believe that this amendment which extends the provisions of the act to the Indian veteran is a step in the direction of granting full rights of citizenship to this fine body of people. By failing to provide for them we were guilty of a certain discrimination against a people who have always sacrificed for Canada when they were required to do so. They have been called to the colours at least three times in not a great many years, and they have acquitted themselves most commendably. I feel that by removing that act of discrimination against them, in so far at least as the Veterans' Land Act is concerned, we are doing something for which this country will acclaim the work of the veterans affairs committee and this house of parliament. Not only is it a fair and just thing to do, but it is a step to eliminate as much as we can this thorn in our flesh which we call racial discrimination. I hope that the work of committees of this kind will be extended and will bear fruit along the same lines in other sessions.

Mr. MUTCH: Most of those who have spoken on this bill this afternoon have been people on the opposition side of the house; but since in this committee the question of opposition does not arise, perhaps I should not have used that word. I think everyone who has spoken this afternoon has referred in complimentary terms to the cooperation of the committee and its lack of partisanship; indeed, most of them have spoken in complimentary terms of the cooperation received from the minister, the chairman, and the officials of the department. I know that both the minister and the chairman are much too modest to acknowledge even these compliments in the committee of the house. But as one of the supporters of the government, one who by the way, has sat on all or most of these committees since 1936, I would say that the debate this afternoon has been truly indicative of the interest of that committee in the veterans themselves and of the uniform desire of the members of that committee to really accomplish something.

However, it is not primarily of the things which we have jointly accomplished that I wish to speak at the moment. I should like to suggest to the minister and the committee what, it seems to me, remains to be done. One of the most important things which this committee will have to do when we meet again, as I understand we shall do, is to define, more accurately than we have been able to do in any except the first bill which they brought in this year, what amounts to a dishonourable discharge from the service, and to make sure that the application of that particular discharge does not diminish the benefits which are available. For instance, I am told that at the present time it is impossible, or most unlikely, for anyone who has been dishonourably discharged from the service to be established under the Veterans' Land Act, and yet I am pretty sure that there are worse disqualifications than dishonourable discharge. It might be that a man is dishonourably discharged for an act of insubordination, beating up the sergeant-major, or something of that description, which from a military point of view might justify dishonourable dismissal from the service in order to make an example and to preserve discipline. The same pugnacious tendencies might not be any handicap to a man who is attempting to reestablish himself on a prairie farm. I think the word should go out to the interested veterans across the country that the committee are seriously concerned about that particular phase of rehabilitation and reestablishment, that it is not a dead issue, that we are united in the committee to see that when we meet again it will have further consideration, and that we shall more definitely define this provision in all the various enactments on the subject in this parliament.

Mr. REID: A few minutes ago the hon. member for Kootenay West mentioned a few things about the government of British Columbia and the dominion government coming to an agreement with regard to lands offered by the dominion government. Could the minister give us a statement regarding the matter, because I have taken exception to the conditions put in the offers of grants by the British Columbia government, and I have predicted that the plan will not be a success, owing to the regulations or the requirements for entry on the million acres which they are providing. One of the requirements is that any returned soldier taking advantage of the scheme must have enlisted from the province of British Columbia.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I objected to that.

Mr. REID: I think a protest should be made against it. At the present time there are being discharged in Vancouver greater numbers of soldiers than originally enlisted from the Pacific coast. I feel sure that many of these men would like to take advantage of that offer; and I can say this without fear of successful contradiction, that those who have been raised in Vancouver and in the Fraser valley will not be very keen to go up into that district where the million acres which have been offered are located. They will not go there, and those who come to the province and would like to go there are debarred by these regulations of the provincial government. This can be said in fairness. The men who offered their lives did not offer them solely for British Columbia but for the whole of Canada, and yet they cannot take advantage of the regulations if they did not enlist from that province. I do not know whether the minister cares to explain it, but it is my information that that is one reason why the agreement has not been completed between the provincial government and the dominion. If so, steps should be taken and every argument used to persuade the provincial government to amend the regulation, because I think it is deplorable.

Mr. JOHNSTON: The minister should also consider doing the same thing under federal legislation that the province has been trying to do by provincial statute in the effort to assist returned men. The federal government could easily give land to the soldiers without compelling them to buy it. They could make a grant of the land. Surely if the provincial government can so arrange its affairs as to give land outright to a soldier after he has lived on it for ten years, without an accumulation of taxes, and without one cent of debt; if the province in its small way can do that, the federal government can certainly do the same throughout Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am in entire agreement with the suggestion of the hon. member for New Westminster. I do not think there should be any regional limitation upon any land settlement of veterans in Canada. The whole question is one of suitability of the soil, economic availability of it, and suitability of the settler. We have gone through all this land very carefully, and it is going to cost the settler a great deal of money for the clearing of much of the land, so that I fear that in a great deal of this land there may be placed on the settler a burden such as was imposed upon him in 1919 and 1920, when too high prices were paid for land. If any agency or government were prepared to have it cleared, giving the benefit of the clearing to the settler, it would be a different question. I may tell my hon. friend that we have reviewed all that land. There are areas there that can be developed of course, but in many cases, I fear, unless one government or another assumes the cost of clearing the land itself it will be an impossible burden on the settler.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Surely the minister knows that Alberta has suggested an arrangement between the federal government and the government of that province to do the very thing he asks. Why cannot the federal government come and assist the government of Alberta? It would not cost the returned man one cent, because the proposal is for the federal and provincial governments to take that responsibility. If Alberta can do it, I am sure the other provinces can do it, and I do not see why the federal government cannot render such assistance.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We have gone very far with Alberta, as the agreement which has been signed will indicate.

[Mr. Reid.]

Mr. JOHNSTON: But they are a progressive province and you should follow their lead.

Mr. GREEN: I had not intended to say anything about the situation in British Columbia until section 6 of the bill came up for discussion, but seeing that other members have already brought up the matter and that the minister has dealt with it I should like to say a few words. I am convinced that both the dominion government and the government of British Columbia are trying to do their utmost to help the veteran to get on the land. Some suggestion has been made in the remarks we have heard that the provincial government is not doing the fair thing.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I did not suggest that at all.

Mr. GREEN: Certainly there is something wrong somewhere, and perhaps both governments are to be condemned for not getting together and entering into an agreement. The provincial government over two years ago set aside a million acres, which, as I understand, was to be given free to the veterans. The provincial government, rightly or wrongly, restricted that to veterans who had enlisted in British Columbia. I think they should have asked for some provision such as priority to the men who enlisted in British Columbia. One reason they took that position was that so many men kept moving into the province who had not enlisted from British Columbia, although we have the highest enlistment record in Canada. I believe that Prince Edward Island and British Columbia are equal. I do not doubt that some change could now be made, that the provincial government would be willing to alter their provisions, but the British Columbia legislature is meeting in another two months and time is of the greatest importance. This disagreement must not be allowed to go on; the two governments must get together without further delay. The provincial government is hoping to have these lands opened up. I believe the idea is to open up frontier lands. The dominion government do not want to put veterans on frontier lands, and there is a difference of opinion there. Why would it not be possible to make some arrangement whereby the provincial government would help with the clearing of the land? That would obviate one of the difficulties.

In the committee I formed the opinion that perhaps the director and his staff had given up too soon. This scheme has now become largely, or at any rate partly, a housing scheme, whereas it was intended originally to be a scheme for settling veterans on farms. But the figures given by the director show that there are far more veterans being settled on small holdings in the suburbs of the large cities than are being settled on the farms, and it may be that the attention of the director and his staff is concentrated too much on these small holdings, beneficial as they are. Mind you, they mean a lot of work. They bring up all sorts of problems, and I imagine they are causing the director far more concern than settlement on farms.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Quite true.

Mr. GREEN: The situation in British Columbia may be caused by the fact that the director is paying too much attention to the small holdings on the outskirts of cities and not enough to the settling of veterans on farms. According to the figures he has given, and they are illuminating—they will be found at page 624 of the proceedings of the veterans affairs committee—he estimates that up to the end of 1946, that is after the war will have been over for a year and half, there will be settled under the Veterans' Land Act across the whole of Canada only 6,420 farmers, as against 10,225 small holders settling in the suburbs of cities and 825 as commercial fishermen, or a total of 17,470. That is less than half the number of men who, it is estimated, will have applied for help under this act. He gave the figures for the applicants. It is indicated that the numbers who have applied already are 14,276 for farming establishments, and just over 6,400 will be settled up to the end of 1946; 20,040 have applied for small holdings, and about half that number will have been settled by the end of next year. Veterans to the number of 1,464 have applied for help as commercial fishermen, and only 825 will have been settled by the end of next year, so that the whole scheme is in danger of bogging down and of becoming a housing scheme.

The minister himself suggested in the committee the other day that he thought there should be one housing authority in Canada to look after all the problem of housing and not have it divided up between his Department of Veterans Affairs working under the Veterans' Land Act in connection with those small holdings, the Department of Reconstruction, working under Wartime Housing, and the Department of Finance working under the National Housing Act. I think he was quite right; but in any event the government must not overlook the fact that this is primarily an act to settle veterans on the farms. So far as the situation in British Columbia is concerned that objective has not been met at the present time, and it will not be met until the two governments reach some sort of agreement. I am hopeful that the airing of this difficulty first in the committee, and then in the house—I am sure it will be aired in the press—will assist the governments to get together. Only in that way can they bring to the veterans the benefits that have been earned.

Mr. TUCKER: There are one or two things I wish to mention. In regard to the governments which have made agreements, I forgot to mention that the government of Manitoba has also made an agreement. In regard to British Columbia, I would point out that our department is pressing for an agreement but is handicapped by the fact that this provision which has been mentioned by the hon. member for New Westminster is part of the statute law of British Columbia and they cannot do anything until they have that law changed. That has been the difficulty, but our department is pressing for an agreement as hard as it can.

While I am on my feet I should like to express deep and sincere appreciation to those who have made constructive speeches this afternoon; also to those who, while having strong opinions about various matters, have refrained from speaking so that we might hope to get these two bills through this afternoon. It has been a great privilege to me to sit on the veterans affairs committee, and I wish to thank those who cooperated on the committee and also those who cooperated in the house in order that these two bills might go through as they have this afternoon.

Mr. BRACKEN: I was one of those who refrained from speaking, and perhaps I may have an opportunity to ask one or two elementary questions now. The parliamentary assistant to the minister referred to an agreement with Manitoba. Could he outline that agreement in a minute or two? Then I have another question with respect to the numbers who have settled on the farm.

Mr. TUCKER: The agreement with the province of Manitoba is found on page 647 of the proceedings and evidence of the special committee. It is a legal agreement and takes up five printed pages. I could indicate the effect of it to the committee except for the fact that it would take more time than we have available.

Mr. BRACKEN: If the parliamentary assistant cannot do it in a minute I can read it myself. I thought he could abbreviate it. Do I understand that only 14,000 soldiers have applied for farms under this scheme?

Mr. TUCKER: The number of applications received under the Veterans' Land Act in the month of October and from the inception of operations to date, as I have them here, is 18,705; applications dealt with, 11,260; those qualified, 8,267; that is, received qualification certificates.

Mr. BRACKEN: Is that for farms?

Mr. TUCKER: That is for farms.

Mr. BRACKEN: Not small holdings?

Mr. TUCKER: It includes small holdings and farms.

Mr. BRACKEN: Has the parliamentary assistant any idea how many more may come forward asking for those rights?

Mr. TUCKER: An estimate of that is based upon the statements of those who gave statements to the in-service counsellors. I have not the exact figures at my finger-tips. My recollection is that it was about double the number that have already applied.

Mr. BRACKEN: How does that compare with the numbers who accepted land after the last war?

Mr. TUCKER: That was something like 25,000 as I remember it; that did not include small holdings.

Mr. BRACKEN: They are not entering into this proposition in the same way as they did under soldier settlement after the last war?

Mr. TUCKER: I think it is expected that before we are through we shall have applications from about 10,000 more.

Mr. BRACKEN: That is not based on the figures you have just given.

Mr. TUCKER: They are not all discharged yet. These figures take us only up to the end of October.

Mr. BRACKEN: I asked for an estimate of those who might apply later on.

Mr. TUCKER: My recollection is that the number that they expected to apply before December 31, 1946, under the act was somewhere around 35,000.

Mr. GREEN: No, 14,000; it is found on page 624 of the proceedings of the committee.

Mr. BRACKEN: If the minister has not the figures at hand I can get them from the record of the committee.

Mr. TUCKER: I think it was 35,000 in all.

Mr. BRACKEN: That does not agree with the figures just quoted to me.

[Mr. Bracken.]

Mr. GREEN: May I read from page 624 of the proceedings of the committee. The director was giving evidence and he said:

Under the heading of farming establishments we have a total estimate of 14,276 applications.

That is to the end of next year, 1946. A few moments ago I said that number had already applied. Apparently I was wrong; that was the estimate to the end of 1946.

He goes on:

For small holdings, 20,050; for commercial fishing, 1,464, or a total of 35,780 for the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. BRACKEN: The parliamentary assistant was including those small holdings.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

On section 7—Grant to Indian veteran.

Mr. MacNICOL: An hon. member to my left made some reference to the Indians of the great war. Does this bill apply to the Indian veterans of the great war?

Mr. TUCKER: No; it applies only to an Indian who was in this war.

Mr. MacNICOL: Why not to the great war?

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is a different act. This is the Veterans' Land Act. It was mentioned in the committee, as I remember, and it is one suggestion that will probably come up next session.

Mr. BROOKS: I think it was on account of the age, the length of time it would take to pay for it.

Section agreed to.

Sections 8 and 9 agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT: I have one question I should like to ask the minister before the bill is reported. What has been done between his department and War Assets Corporation with respect to purchasing some of the spare equipment which they have at this time. Has anything been done?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes; we are in communication with that department now, and we have been in communication with them.

Mr. WRIGHT: We have been in communication with them with respect to this matter for a long time. I should like to see some action taken with regard to it. This is not just good enough. This is the last opportunity we shall have to discuss this matter, and I should like some assurance from the minister that something will be done.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I can assure my hon. friend I shall pursue it vigorously.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Third and final report of the standing committee on external affairs.—Mr. Bradette.

TRADE AND COMMERCE

330. Departmental administration, $167,000.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Chairman, on Saturday evening when my departmental estimates were called a few moments before closing time the hon. member for Humboldt asked me if I would make a statement on the reorganization work in connection with the Department of Trade and Commerce for the last year or two. He asked that I refer specially to the trade representatives that we have in the various countries, where they are located and the general developments within the Department of Trade and Commerce looking to Canada's trade position in the post-war period. In submitting the estimates for my department I am therefore making a brief statement on some of the more important aspects of the work which was carried out by the department last year and on its plans to help maintain Canada's place as one of the world's great trading nations.

To meet the new problems which face us in world trade, the division in the department formerly known as the commercial intelligence service has been reorganized and is now known as the foreign trade service. It is under the direction of the new deputy minister of the department, Mr. M. W. Mackenzie. It has six main branches, the trade commissioners service, the export division, the import division, the commercial relations and foreign tariffs division, the trade publicity division, and the wheat and grain division. I should like to comment briefly on the duties of each of these divisions.

We intend to have trade commissioners stationed in every major trading centre in the world where the appointment of such a representative will contribute to the enlargement of Canadian commerce. The offices in Paris and Brussels were reopened some months ago and trade commissioners have been assigned to the Netherlands and to Norway. An office will also be opened in the near future in Stockholm, and a trade commissioner is being sent to Greece to be attached to the embassy there and to supervise our trade relations in Turkey and the Balkan countries as well. Following the resumption of private trade with French North and West Africa, a trade commissioner has been sent to Algiers on a special mission to explore trading opportunities there and to establish sound trade connections for Canadian exporters interested in that market. An office will be opened in Venezuela early in 1946.

A senior trade commissioner has been assigned to Australia and an additional officer appointed in New Zealand. A special representative is to proceed to the Netherlands East Indies to assist in reopening our trade with that area. We are sending a senior officer to South Africa early next year to strengthen our representation there. Specialist trade commissioners in agricultural and forestry products have also been appointed, and they will have duties not only in the United Kingdom but in Europe and elsewhere.

Then, we have been fortunate in securing the services of some excellent young men from the armed forces as assistant trade commissioners. In conformity with government policy, applications were considered only from men with overseas service. We have been highly gratified with the number and calibre of these young men who wish to continue to serve Canada abroad. Six assistant trade commissioners and one specialist trade commissioner have already proceeded to foreign posts; two more are leaving shortly; fourteen additional assistant trade commissioners are now in training. Nine additional assistants will join the department in March or April. This makes a total of thirty new assistant trade commissioners who are now at work or will join the trade commissioner service shortly. This indicates the importance we attach to having a strong body of commercial representatives abroad.

Before the war we had thirty-four offices abroad, manned by thirty-five trade commissioners and twenty-five assistant trade commissioners. During the war the number of offices declined, of course, by the enforced closing of those in Berlin, Oslo, Rotterdam, Brussels, Paris, Milan, Singapore, Hong Kong, Shanghai and Tokyo. To-day we have thirty-one offices located abroad, with forty trade commissioners and seven assistant trade commissioners assigned to them. As I have just said, we intend to establish offices almost immediately in Sweden, Greece, Venezuela and the Netherlands East Indies; we shall have representation in Italy as soon as practicable, and our offices in Singapore, Hong Kong and Shanghai will be reopened as soon as the trading position permits.

We have had only two specialist trade commissioners in London for some time past. This phase of our work abroad will be expanded; in addition to those officers who have devoted their attention to animal products and fruit, we will send a timber trade commissioner to the United Kingdom, and it is our intention to appoint a fisheries products trade commissioner at a later date. We are also selecting officers with agricultural training to be assigned to other countries, including north Europe, Argentina and Australia.

Our trade commissioners will be responsible not only for the sale of Canadian goods in the territories in which they are stationed, but also for the encouragement of imports into Canada in recognition of the principle that trade can flourish only if it is mutually profitable and is being conducted on a two-way basis. The promotion of exports abroad will, of course, remain the primary responsibility of our trade commissioners, but their new and enlarged duties give them greater opportunities for rendering service to Canada and in helping to establish a sound balance between our export and our import policies.

We have recently held a special conference of our trade commissioners of Latin-America. Despite the restrictions on normal trade imposed by war conditions, Canada's trade with Latin-America has shown a seventy per cent increase in exports and a 400 per cent increase in imports. It should be emphasized that this remarkable increase in imports has taken place because the Latin-American countries have provided many essential raw materials for Canada's manufacturing industries during the war. Our exports for the first nine months of this year are nearly double our total exports for all of 1939. Our export trade with the countries in Latin-America I visited in 1941 as head of a special Canadian trade mission, that is Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Ecuador, Peru and Uruguay, has more than doubled. For the first nine months ending September 1945, our export trade with these countries amounted to nearly $24,000,000 as compared with $10,000,000 for a similar period in 1939. We hope soon to reestablish direct shipping routes to the Latin-American countries instead of routing our goods through the United States, and this should increase our trade with Latin-American countries to a substantial degree.

[Mr. MacKinnon.]

The figures as shown in the return in connection with our imports from Latin-American countries are misleading inasmuch as no record is shown of the very large quantities of imports that come to us through United States channels. From one country alone, Colombia, a most important volume of merchandise is imported to Canada which does not show in our ordinary Canadian figures.

Our trade with Latin America was perhaps not given as much attention in the past as this great market merited. We believe that Canada is destined to enjoy a steadily growing trade with these nations. It may not be too optimistic to believe that our export trade with Latin America can reach $200 million a year in the immediate future, provided that Canadian exporters pay the attention to this market which its potential importance warrants. Our export trade with Mexico alone, for example, we hope will rise to $60 million a year.

The export planning division was organized in August, 1943, under the direction of one of the department's senior trade commissioners recalled from overseas duty for this purpose. The principal function of the export planning division has been to prepare a programme, in cooperation, where necessary, with the combined planning authorities in Washington, of exports from Canada of essential commodities required by overseas countries to maintain their national economies. The division also arranged that even where goods were in short supply there at least was a movement of merchandise to our old markets, so that Canada could maintain at least token trade with our old customers during the prevailing period of scarcity. The results of this policy are already evident in the pattern of our post-war trade. This division in 1945 prepared some seventy commodity and country programmes. This work involved close cooperation with the appropriate combined board in Washington and with the external trade advisory committee in Ottawa on which various departments are represented.

With the organization of a foreign trade service in the department effective November 1, 1945, the export planning division ceased to exist. The work of the division will largely be absorbed in the new export division which will have special responsibilities in the planning of our trade with the British empire, the West Indies, Europe, France, the far east and Latin America.

Since the import division was established last year, more than 1,700 Canadian agents and import houses have registered with it. The division received numerous inquiries from Canadian importers for information on foreign supply conditions, foreign export controls, shipping regulations, foreign price levels and currency exchange restrictions. The import division has been working in close cooperation with the various foreign government trade representatives in Canada, and much business as a result has come to this country which might otherwise have been lost.

The division of commercial relations and that of foreign tariffs have recently been combined to perform the work that was formerly done by each division separately or in various other parts of the department. The primary duty of the foreign tariffs section is to promote Canadian export trade by furnishing information on customs tariffs and other trade regulations as they prevail in the world with particular reference to Canadian trade. In the negotiation of trade treaties the commercial relations division bears special responsibilities. It has been most active in studying our trade with the United Kingdom, the United States, the sterling area and Latin-America. The results of this long preparatory work will be evident in the very near future.

We are planning a notable expansion in our trade publicity programme including the work of the exhibitions branch, which has necessarily been curtailed during the war years.

While Canada's Mutual Aid programme commenced in September, 1943, the 1944-45 fiscal year was the first full fiscal year of operation for the wheat and grain division.

Mutual Aid operations for the division began with the shipment of wheat and flour to the United Kingdom. The imported cereals division of the United Kingdom ministry of food continued their purchases as agents of the department, while this division undertook responsibility for the disbursement of Mutual Aid and United Kingdom cash funds in settlement of deliveries against ministry of food contracts.

In August, 1943, flour was first shipped to the U.S.S.R. under a Soviet credit agreement. Upon the exhaustion of these funds in January, 1944, shipments were made under Mutual Aid, and toward the end of that year wheat cargoes were added to the Russian programme.

Beginning in November, 1944, as part of Canada's military relief contribution, a substantial volume of wheat moved overseas. Here again the division assumed responsibility for disbursement of military occupation relief funds.

The shipment of gift wheat to Greece for relief commenced in August, 1942, at a rate of approximately 15,000 long tons a month. Grain accounts were approved for payment by the division from funds set up under the War Appropriation Act. Relief wheat shipments continued up until April 1, 1945, when UNRRA assumed full financial responsibility for the distribution of relief supplies in Greece. I had the privilege of mentioning once before the reception which Canada's gift of wheat to Greece received in that country at the time of her great necessity. People in high government circles in Greece informed us that the shipment of Canadian wheat to Greece actually saved hundreds of thousands of lives.

Relief wheat loadings were resumed as part of Canada's contribution to UNRRA. In addition to wheat, substantial quantities of Canadian flour were also included in the UNRRA programme. Flour contracts were placed directly with the mills against UNRRA purchase orders, with the division also handling disbursement of funds for UNRRA account.

The Exports Credits Insurance Act which was passed on August 15, 1944—in my reference to this act I shall deal only with that part which comes directly under the Department of Trade and Commerce, namely, part I—provided for the setting up of a corporation to insure exporters against the main risks of loss involved in foreign trade. This corporation, called the Exports Credits Insurance Corporation, was proclaimed on November 21, 1944. Two of the senior officers of the corporation visited the United Kingdom this summer to study the operations and experience of the export credits guarantee department which functions there under the board of trade—a government department—and which has operated successfully for the past twenty-six years. The results of this long British experience are being incorporated in the policy and practice of the Exports Credits Insurance Corporation. Canadian exporters from all parts of Canada have taken out policies with the corporation and these include small business houses as well as large concerns. Individual annual sales volumes covered by the insurance range from $50,000 to $3,000,000. Commodities covered by the policies already written include raw materials, agricultural products and manufactured goods.

During the last fiscal year the dominion bureau of statistics, in addition to carrying out its normal duties, had to discharge heavy responsibilities in preparing statistical information required by the various branches of government service engaged in our war effort. In addition it carried out detailed studies to meet the needs of post-war reconstruction.

An important item of the bureau's programme is the development of improved service to Canadian business. It is planned to issue monthly statistical tables showing the production, shipments and stocks of the more important commodities. This new practice will result in the early publication of current statistics required by Canadian business. At the same time this up-to-date statistical service will enable various departments of the government to have special data to assist them in the formulation of policy.

It will be recalled that the government white paper of April, 1945, on employment and income set up as a practical and desirable target for our post-war exports the figure of one and three-quarter billion dollars annually at current prices for merchandise exports and non-monetary gold. This would be about sixty per cent above the pre-war level in dollar value but only about fifteen per cent higher in the amount of goods exported. We believe, on the strength of our present trading relationships and future trends in our trade which we can now define, that this objective will be realized. The promotion of our trade is in the very forefront of the government's entire programme of reconstruction, and the Department of Trade and Commerce is discharging direct responsibilities in helping to realize the objectives of this programme.

Mr. Chairman, I have covered some of the reorganization work which has been taking place in the Department of Trade and Commerce in the last year or two, so that it will be in a position to promote Canada's trade, which we feel is wholly necessary to the maintenance of our national prosperity.

Mr. BURTON: Mr. Chairman, it is indeed a pleasure to have an opportunity of thanking the minister for the comprehensive statement he has made in connection with the affairs of his department. I was thinking, during the time that he was giving us that interesting resume, that it is too bad he stopped me as soon as he did on Saturday evening after I had put a few questions on the record as to what we would be interested in, because if he had waited a little while longer he would have had so much subject material that he would have made a record speech this evening, if he had done with the rest of it as he did with the questions I put to him.

While I am in the mood for passing compliments I will continue in the same strain for a little while. Some weeks ago I had the pleasure of complimenting the Minister of Agriculture in connection with a little booklet which his department was putting out and which is of great service and information to those of us who are interested in the production of live stock. To-night, first, because I do not want to be accused of playing favourites, and, second, because I really do appreciate what the department has done in this direction, I wish to mention the booklet, which is called the "Monthly Review of the Wheat Situation," put out by the department under the authority of the minister. I thank the minister and the officials of his department for the work which is connected with it and for the comprehensive information which it contains. But in that connection I would say that there is one criticism I have to offer. As the government through the agency of the Canadian wheat board has handled the product of the labour, one might say the sweat, of the people who produced that wheat, there should be included in this book or a similar book, at least once a year, a full accounting of the activities of the wheat board. I make that suggestion to the minister, because it is of great importance to the people who produce Canada's wheat. The book is of real value to those of us farmers who have an opportunity to peruse it from time to time.

The department is also issuing other booklets and information. The minister referred to certain statistics concerning other dealings, especially those relating to Canadian business. I would suggest that the minister and his department prepare in summarized form for the information of members as well as the public generally, a sort of over-all summary of the business of the country. While I appreciate his view that some of us are especially interested in wheat, we want him to understand that we are also much interested in the business of Canada as a whole, and would value an opportunity of seeing such an over-all picture from time to time.

I listened with great attention and a considerable amount of pleasure to the minister's statement in connection with our trade representatives in different parts of the world. It is an evidence that the government recognizes its responsibility and the necessity of preparing and being prepared for the years in the immediate future. Especially was I pleased to observe the note which crept into the minister's report where he stated that the duties of these men would also now include matters respecting importations into Canada as well as the exportations. I was pleased with that, because we have known for a long time that if we are to have a healthy condition of trade it must be a trade which will balance. If it does not balance, eventually we shall find ourselves confronted with a condition in which it has become so unbalanced as to be unwieldy and unmanageable.

But I would suggest that, as much as we as a nation are concerned with the exporting of our surplus goods and with importations for our requirements, we must not forget that part of the trade which is of vital concern to every Canadian, namely, the trade within the boundaries of our own country. We have in this dominion a tremendous consuming power. I am sure I am speaking not only for myself but for every member of this house when I say that never again do we want a condition to develop in this country whereby apples in British Columbia are rotting and children in the prairie provinces cannot get apples; where people in the central provinces of Ontario and Quebec have their factories closed because they cannot dispose of the goods which they produce, while in other parts of the country there are people whose supply of those goods is most meagre, the least that they can get along with. We do not want to have a return of that condition in Canada, and consequently trade within our own country is of the greatest importance. I suggest that the proper approach to that question is, first of all, the recognition of the importance of a little planning. I do not want hon. members to be frightened when we use that term. We must use a little ordinary common sense and business judgment. In arriving at what the requirements of the people are, we must be able to plan how to supply those requirements. I suggest, therefore, that planning is not something to run away from, but something that is simply good, plain, ordinary business judgment.

We need to find out, in the first place, how much the people need of the various products we can produce, how much they need of the various things we can manufacture, and then proceed as far as possible to supply our own home market and to see to it that the people within the boundaries of this country have an opportunity to consume to the fullest extent. Then, when that is accomplished, it devolves upon the Department of Trade and Commerce to provide us with markets to which we can export our surpluses and, in return for those surpluses, we must be prepared to channel back into the country, by means of exchange in one way or another, the things that we cannot economically produce in Canada and which we need here in order to round out a full and high standard of living.

I contend that within the boundaries of a country like Canada the standard of living that the people will have depends entirely upon the productive ability of the nation. It is true that we cannot consume all our wheat, but we can certainly use other things for which wheat can be exchanged. We can use things that are not easily produced in this country, and that is where trade will help our people to make the fullest possible use of the things they produce.

As we go on we find ourselves sometimes in a peculiar position, and I would suggest that in planning production and distribution of the goods we require within the country we must again use a little more common sense than was used in the thirties when there existed the condition to which I referred a moment ago. Even now we are in the midst of another difficult situation. Hon. members will recall, for instance, a statement which was made in the house that in the neighbourhood of eighty per cent of the lumber of the country was being exported.

An hon. MEMBER: Forty-two per cent.

Mr. BURTON: I am corrected by one of my colleagues who says it was forty-two per cent. I thought it was higher; but, even so, forty-two per cent is a considerable amount. We were given an explanation of that, but we find ourselves in this position to-day. There are in Canada thousands of people who are urgently in need of suitable living quarters, and yet at the same time a vast amount of our timber is being exported. In one of the explanations given to us we were told that we cannot very well cut down on the export of that timber because we need the dollar to balance our trade or to carry on our trade. Here is the ironical situation. At the same time we are importing coal from the same country to which we are exporting lumber. We are importing coal to help our people to keep warm in houses which they do not have—a queer contradiction. There is a strange situation for you. It certainly would help to balance our trade a little better if we used some more Alberta coal on the one side and a little more Nova Scotia coal on the other. It would help to keep our people in useful production and keep down the number of United States dollars that we need. If we did that, then possibly we might have a few more sticks of lumber which we need in order to put up a few more houses to accommodate our people.

We must remember that the first call on the productive ability of our people is a decent standard of living. I do not want hon. members to misunderstand me when I make that statement. I was exceedingly pleased when the minister mentioned the quantity of foodstuffs that had been shipped through Mutual Aid to other countries and he referred to Greece. The thought came to me that this is truly a modern exemplification of casting one's bread upon the waters.

I submit that the people of Canada are all not only prepared but anxious to give all the assistance they can to those who are in such dire need. In passing, I would remind the minister and hon. members that while our farmers are proud of the fact that they can play some little part in helping to make the provision of that food possible for people who need it so urgently, we farmers should not be asked to carry the entire load of these gifts.

The minister referred to the continuous expansion now taking place and mentioned the trade representatives to other countries. Again, I am pleased that he has taken such early action. It occurred to me that while going along in this way, there is still something lacking, and I hope the minister will not hold it against me too much for having that feeling. But there was something that I could not make click, and finally it struck me that possibly some branch of the department was lagging behind.

Let me put it in this way. I remember years ago when I was a small boy—possibly I should have been going to school at the time if there had been a school nearby—when I was helping to break open my father's homestead which is part of the farm I am now on. I was driving a yoke of oxen hitched to the plough. We went down one side and laid over a furrow and came back the other side and laid another furrow. In fact, Mr. Chairman, I am sometimes reminded of my early experience when we want to get a little work done in this house. It is a slow process; but we kept plodding along and we got the furrows laid together.

Later on, in the middle twenties, I believe I was the first farmer east of Saskatoon who had a one-way plough that cut a strip eight and a half feet wide and would travel along at three and a half to four miles an hour. Later on, I again was the first farmer in my community to have a rubber-tired tractor and a rubber-tired combine. People used to come for miles around to see that rubber-tired tractor work, and they would say: "Well, Joe, it is working all right now, but wait until we get a little shower of rain and you will be hollering for someone with a lug tractor to come and pull you out." There are very few tractors going out into that part of the country to-day or were in the years gone by which are not equipped with rubber tires. The point I wish to drive home to the minister is that at this time when he is preparing to send trade envoys to different parts of the world he could send them in planes, if necessary, travelling at 500 miles an hour. We have those modern means of transportation and communication, and yet there is too much of that old oxen-day psychology left in our trading.

I should like the minister to give consideration to bringing his department up to date. I ask him to bring it up to date where it will meet the requirements and our ability to make use of the modern means which are now at our disposal. I should like to see our trade representatives in different parts of the world advertising our goods. They should be looked upon as salesmen; they should also encourage trade coming the other way. I wish to bring to his attention and to the attention of the members of the committee that we have reached a different position in the commerce of the world. We have now come to a time where we find nation after nation abandoning the idea of the different people interested in trade running here and there trying to sell their wares. They now sell as a nation. In other words, they sell to you and they buy from you in bulk quantities through a government board. I have no hesitation in asking the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the members of this committee to consider seriously if the time has not come—in fact in the opinion of some of us it is long overdue—when we should have import and export boards which will in an intelligent and businesslike manner help the people who produce the wealth of the nation to export their surpluses and in return import the things they need over and above the things they can produce.

Mr. FARQUHAR: I did not want to interrupt the hon. member while he was speaking, but he spoke of the export of timber and mentioned forty-two per cent. Did that include the export of pulpwood?

Mr. BURTON: That is marketable timber. There is no doubt that I gave a higher figure, and I was corrected by my colleague, but the figure I gave was marketable timber.

Mr. MacNICOL: Before I commence my brief remarks—and they will be brief, although if it were earlier in the session I would make a longer speech—I should like to say a few words of appreciation to the minister. For many years sales promotion has been my middle name, or at least it was my middle name when I was in business. First of all, I wish to express my own appreciation of the minister's great courtesy and civility to people I have had occasion to take to see the minister on the question of sales promotion. On the occasions I have gone to see him I have found him a perfect gentleman, most courteous and considerate. Those whom I took to see him have on more than one occasion written to me and asked me to convey their personal appreciation to him. I do not know whether he was ever in big business, as I was, but if he were not in big business in his earlier days, I can tell him that he would have made an excellent sales manager. I always look upon a minister of trade and commerce as the sales manager for the country in a big way. Anything I say to-night will be said with the hope that I may be of some slight help to him in his sales promotion work.

Mr. MacNICOL: He has a big job in looking after all the various matters in which we Canadians are engaged. I am not going to touch upon the problem which was mentioned by the hon. member for Melfort; I am going to confine my brief remarks to machinery. Machinery has many ramifications and lines as have other lines of manufacturing. Because Canadian industry has expanded its productive capacity so tremendously during the war, the minister now has an extra job placed on his shoulders in assisting and disposing of what can be made in this greatly expanded machinery productive capacity of Canada. I do not refer to plants that were engaged in the making of munitions, many of which are now being dismantled. I refer to the old-line companies which have a reputation throughout the world and which, as a result of the war, have vastly expanded their capabilities to produce.

When I heard the minister speak about more trade commissioners I said to myself, that is a good thing, that is a real step in the right direction. I turned up the list of trade commissioners in the back of the estimates and I counted forty-nine. I should like to see the department have many times that number of trade commissioners. I believe that is what the minister has in mind. If the minister is able to obtain the services of a large number of capable men in all lines of our country's productive activity, men who are not only experts in their lines of production, but who have all the other necessary qualifications that the department insists on, education, ability to talk, and so forth, I am sure that a great job can be done. In that regard I, too, am convinced that we have an opportunity to expand greatly our efforts in South America. Of course we are up against, and will be up against the greatest manufacturing nation in the world. I mean, of course, the great and friendly republic to the south, for whom all hon. members have a warm feeling in their hearts. They are most capable of handling this work, through their many brilliant salesmen, many of whom I have met. We, too, shall have to select the best we can.

I have been thinking that perhaps the Department of Trade and Commerce, through some of the universities, might be able to persuade our universities to institute classes in Spanish.

Mr. MacKINNON: That is being done.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am glad to hear that.

Mr. MacKINNON: In many places.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then, I would extend the possibilities along that line, taking in the university of Toronto, and universities in Montreal and Winnipeg.

Mr. MacKINNON: And Alberta.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes, Alberta.

Mr. MacKINNON: These universities, I believe, are all giving lessons in Spanish.

Mr. MacNICOL: And Saskatchewan, too, because I like to say what I can to help any development in Saskatchewan. We do not think of them as often as we should.

That is a step in the right direction, because there is great business to be had in South America. Now, in my day I was a sales promoter. It is one of the joys of my life that I had so much to do with creating a large and honest business, the largest of its kind in the British empire, from a small beginning. That was the result of sales promotion. I do not for one moment claim that credit, myself; far from it. But we were able to select the most capable engineers of our time and in our line of business. I always found that if we sent the most capable engineers we could to Russia—as we did—and to Germany, and to France, and to the other countries in Europe, as well as to those in South America and South Africa, that we were able to dispose of large quantities of goods.

In Ontario, of which I wish to speak for a few minutes, we have many great manufacturing cities. They will need every ounce of assistance—and perhaps that is not the right word, but if we take it collectively, and then add it all up, one will get the right idea—that the department can give.

For instance, let us consider the city of our chairman, Brantford. I believe it is the fourth or fifth greatest manufacturing city in this country. That is a great thing to be said about a city in western Ontario with a population of perhaps less than 40,000.

Then I think of the city of my hon. friend the member for Peterborough West, who sits behind me. Peterborough is one of the finest cities in Canada, one in which there is very rarely any degree of unemployment. It is more or less self-contained, with an area of fine country surrounding it.

I could go on throughout Ontario, and mention Stratford, Chatham—

Mr. CROLL: Windsor.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am thinking of the big cities; yes, Windsor. Then Welland, St. Catharines—

Mr. CASSELMAN: Prescott.

Mr. MacNICOL: I said I was speaking about the big cities. But that is no reflection on Prescott, because I can tell my hon. friend I used to live in Prescott, when I was a boy, and I have seen some fine plants there. In fact, I got my own start in the business life of Canada, in the town of Prescott. I got it in a company which at that time made disc harrows. I believe it was the first company in Canada to make disc harrows, and it was a very fine firm which came in from the United States. Perhaps my hon. friend will remember the Corbin Disc Harrow Company. Now that I have mentioned the name of his town, perhaps my hon. friend will not mind if I proceed. However, I do not think I shall mention any other names of towns.

The country is full of them. I might refer, too, to the province of Quebec, and to places like Sherbrooke, St. Hyacinthe, Three Rivers, and the city of Hull, which is just across the river from this fine city of Ottawa. Plants in all those cities will be grateful for any assistance the department can give.

I have been wondering what programme the department will follow. I understand that there are trade commissioners in Rio de Janeiro. Have we only one, or have we a dozen? That is a city of perhaps a million and a half or two million people.

Mr. MacKINNON: About two million.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes; and then there is Buenos Aires, with a population of several millions. I look at pictures of these fine cities with their magnificant buildings and institutions, universities and halls, and I at once think of their requirements in the matter of vacuum cleaners, elevators, and all those things which enter into the construction of big buildings. There are multitudes of articles of that kind in the manufacture of which Canadians are expert. I have been wondering, myself, in what way our trade commissioners have been able to promote these various lines of sales.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Our American cousins can do it—and do do it. I hope we have been making some of those sales, and have followed the same methods.

We have Canadian manufacturers for a thousand and one lines of these goods which we could sell in other countries, including the people in South America, and I am wondering how we proceed to make those sales. Do we operate through trade commissioners? If so, are they qualified to lay out blue-prints as to how this or that equipment is to be installed. In my day that was the type of man I engaged. All the company engineers who went throughout Europe and America took their direction from me. They were qualified experts in their line, and they were able to get big orders. And of course big orders mean employment. That is what I am thinking about. I am thinking of the thousands of men back in Davenport riding, a great manufacturing riding, who make their living through the manufacture of goods. I am thinking of providing orders for factories in that and in all other manufacturing ridings, so that the men engaged in them can have jobs. That is going to be our great problem from now on. I have been thinking of that, and I hope the department will consider this matter.

Looking through the records only a few minutes ago, I found that in 1944 we made about a billion and a half dollars worth of machinery alone machinery made from iron and steel. That was tremendous production, but I am sure that to-day, with our enormously expanded production equipment in our great plants, we can surpass even that amount.

I have in mind one great plant in the constituency of Wentworth. That is one of the finest institutions in the world. I refer to the John Bertram Machinery company. That may not be the modern name for it, but that was what it was called when I used to be in business. Perhaps to-day it is called the Bertram Machinery company. They have a staff of about 4,000 and they are by far the largest permanent old-line machine tool industry in Canada.

That is only one of a dozen I could name. Only a few days ago I had occasion to go to a plant. I go to as many plants as I can, because I like visiting them. When I smell the oil and smell the steel curling from the lathes, I feel that I am back home again, where I used to be years ago. That plant had an order for 200 big machines for shipment to Europe.

That is only one company. Do our trade commissioners interest themselves in matters of that kind? I am sure they do. Are they trying to get some of that new business with France? Are they getting business with Garmany—because it has to be rebuilt? I am not one of those who wish to see Germany forever crushed. I cannot bring myself to a decision of that kind. They were our enemies, but we defeated them, and we are told to forgive our enemies.

Germany, Belgium, France and all those other countries in Europe that have been destroyed will have to be rebuilt. There is big business over there. Their plants are destroyed. One of the nations—and I am not mentioning which one—has dismantled many of their plants and taken them to its own country. But plants will have to be reestablished, and we can get some of that business.

In what way are our trade commissioners in Canada qualified to describe these things to purchasers in Germany, France, Russia, Belgium, Holland, Italy or wherever they may go; will they have the qualifications to be able to explain just how these machines operate, what it will mean to them if they buy them, how much faster they go, how much more they can produce and how much they will cut down their cost of production? Mr. Chairman, you know that it was the ability to operate at a low cost of production that has enabled the many fine manufacturing plants in your city to expand. The same applies to my riding where there are many manufacturing institutions.

We hear a lot about foreign affairs and the foreign affairs committee; everybody wants to be on the foreign affairs committee. In my judgment the time has come to have a home affairs committee, and the bigger it is the better. After all, Canada is in the manufacturing business and it must sell at home seventy-five to eighty per cent of the goods produced in Canada. Canada is our greatest market. We want all the foreign business we can get, but our big market is the home market. When I was studying commerce at the university in the United States we were taught that the United States had to export only ten per cent of what it produced. That meant that it consumed the other ninety per cent at home. I got it into my mind at that time that home affairs were of vast importance, of much more importance than foreign affairs.

Of course I know that if we cannot sell our surplus products it cuts down the price and increases unemployment here at home. I am strong for foreign exports, but I am also strong for home exports to the various provinces in Canada. I should like the minister to tell us what his department is doing to promote sales in Canada. We must remember that every manufacturing country is going to send its salesmen here—I have met them in the last two days—to place on the markets of Canada that which is being produced elsewhere. How are we to compete with them? Is this to be done through the Canadian manufacturers' association, that wonderful body of men which, despite everything that is said about them, has done so much to build up this country. I love those men who have done such great things for Canada and who have provided employment for so many hundreds of thousands of men. I am not going to enter into any argument on that phase, but I know that if you treat your men as they should be treated, and as I always treated them, they will produce more for you. If the workmen like the people they are working for they will do more work for them. After all, malingering and staying off the job does not cut down costs, and that is the main thing. You do not cut costs by cutting down your rate of wages in employment. You must keep men on the job working with earnest hearts so that the company they work for can make the best goods in the shortest time. When the minister speaks again I should like him to tell us what the department intends to do to promote sales in Canada. We must not forget that we shall be up against the ablest men that can be sent from other manufacturing countries, including the United States. They will be out to get a market in Canada. We cannot blame them, but we want to keep our own home market if we can, because that is the best for us.

Mr. FRASER: Mr. Chairman, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Davenport upon what he has just said, because I agree with him that we have to keep our home market. After the last war we lost the home market and we did not have exports. When the Minister of Trade and Commerce read his statement he referred to the fact that Canada is to have a direct route to South and Central America. I am glad to know that, because I am familiar with the difficulties that Canada has been having in the movement of goods back and forth between this country and South and Central America.

I should like to suggest to the minister that in the advertising in South and Central America he have some design which would show Canada as part of the Americas. Canada could be shown as being linked with the South and Central American countries by means of the Alaska highway and the Pan-American highway which runs down into Mexico, Guatemala, then down through the Central American countries of Guatemala, El Salvador, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Panama, Colombia, Peru and Chile, and then there is the fine paved highway from Chile across to Buenos Aires.

There are many people in South America who still think of Canada as a land of ice and snow. I know a little about the people in South and Central America. I would suggest that in the not too distant future the minister make another trip to South America. I should like to go down there with him.

An hon. MEMBER: So would I.

Mr. FRASER: I travelled many miles in South and Central America and I enjoyed every one of them. The minister did not spend enough time the last time he was there; he did not stay long enough in each place he visited. I know that, because I have had reports on the minister's trip down there.

An hon. MEMBER: Tell us some more.

Mr. FRASER: The minister behaved himself. What I am getting at is the fact that the South American people are highly cultured. This is especially true of Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Peru, Colombia and also the Central American countries. Those people like a person to come to their country and stay there, not for a week but for two or three weeks or more; you cannot know the people of South America in a week. The minister knows that you cannot go to South America and sell a bill of goods in a day. You cannot go to a man down there and say, "I have a machine here that is better than anything you ever saw before and I want to sell it to you." You do not do business like that down there; you have to get to know the people.

An hon. MEMBER: There are good looking women there.

Mr. FRASER: Yes; there are good looking women there, some of the best in the world. I have seen them down there. They are fine women.

The CHAIRMAN: I must remind the hon. member that we are discussing the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. FRASER: If by any chance I have been side-tracked, it has been with good intentions. When hon. members have a chance to have a holiday again—we have not had one since 1939—they should go to South and Central America to see the country and to get to know the people.

As I was saying, it takes time to sell them goods. The Canadian trade commissioners should know their way around down there. They know how difficult it is to get to know the men who do the buying, and it takes almost a month and perhaps longer to gain the confidence of the people. Hon. members may smile, but I have a great love for the people of South America, and if the minister takes another trip down there he should spend more time in each country and also visit every country in Central America. The Pan-American highway is nearly completed except for the section in Panama, and that is coming along. The rest of the highway is for the most part paved or all-weather road, except for a few spots, but with the help of the United States government that highway is coming along, and I feel sure that Canada can not only hold the market she now has in South and Central America, but increase her imports and exports, because trade is, of course, a two-way business. My own city of Peterborough and the workmen there depend a great deal upon export trade. We have to have it. Most of our factories are American owned factories and they export their products to the different parts of the empire. I am very much interested in developing that trade, but if we had also a direct shipping route to Central and South America I am sure that it would help our factories in Peterborough.

I should like to compliment the minister upon putting in the Commercial Intelligence —I do not know whether he is doing it or those in his department—the resources of the different countries. In the December 8 issue, for instance, the resources and trade of Ecuador are given, and in another issue the resources and trade of another South American country. I think it is an excellent idea to cover all the South American countries in this way. But there is one thing that I have missed in the Commercial Intelligence, which is issued every week by the department. In the back there used to be a page or so of articles that are required by certain countries. It would say: Inquiries have been made from such and such a country for such and such articles. I have not seen that feature in Commercial Intelligence lately, and I always thought it was a very good idea.

Mr. HODGSON: Mr. Chairman, after strolling around through Bretton Woods and looking back at Dumbarton Oaks, if I were not an experienced lumberman I might have got lost in the bush. I hope that what I shall say will be brief, constructive and cooperative.

I notice by this blue book that the costs of nearly every department are up, and in several instances trade is down. When you hire a man to do a job for you, you expect him to do a little better job if you give him a little more money, so that with these increased expenditures we shall expect some good work and more efficiency in the days to come.

I should like to speak of lumber particularly. I do not want to discuss agriculture, because the hon. member for Humboldt has spoken of the agricultural industry and I do not want to repeat what he said. When he ploughed that wide furrow and that narrow furrow he reminded me of my own political ancestors ploughing the straight and narrow furrow back in 1934. But I do not want to go back to the bad years of the 1930's.

In the provinces of Ontario and Quebec the subsidies were taken off cordwood last fall, at a time when I think they should have been kept on, because at that period of the year we need to take out large quantities of cordwood which would help our trade balance with the United States and be an off-set to our coal imports and such like.

It has been said that the returned men are not going back to the bush. I want to contradict that, because I have ten boys back from overseas who are working in my bush operations at the present time.

The lumbermen are going ahead and taking out a certain amount of lumber. They produced lumber all through the war period and we can produce lumber in the peace period; in fact I am sure that a lot more can be produced in the future than in the past if the prices are right. You remember, sir, what happened in 1929 after the last war to practically all the lumber business in Canada. We have ceiling prices on lumber, and if you want the lumbermen to go ahead, floor prices should be set because the lumbermen are fearful of what happened before. But if you set floor prices and readjust your ceiling prices I am sure we can produce more lumber than before.

So far as soft woods are concerned, which are used in the building trades, there is very little of that for export. I would speak especially of hemlock. It costs more to produce hemlock than spruce or pine, and at the same time the price is lower. Hemlock, practically ninety-five per cent of which is used in the building trades for home consumption, should have better prices set, a price that would at least allow a man to take it out at cost. In the past few years we lumbermen have taken out hemlock more or less from patriotic motives. But the war is over and the same feeling does not exist. If you want lumber taken out for the building trades in Canada, raise the price of hemlock by two or three dollars a thousand and put in floor prices.

So far as building up our export trade is concerned, the higher grades of No. 1 common and better are the grades of hardwood we export. I would say that you should throw the quota system into the waste-paper basket and let us export our higher grades of hardwood. The lower grades of hardwood go to our flooring plants in Canada. Our largest business has been and will be with Great Britain. That trade with Great Britain was built up after the empire economic conference which was held here in Ottawa, and I think it would be a good thing if this government called such another empire conference. That was the turning point in the depression before. We are not saying that we have a depression now or that we are going to have one, but if it was good in the time of the depression it would be that much better now.

In his statement the minister did not clarify the matter of trading or exports with Great Britain and other nations and areas of the sterling bloc. Articles have been written on it, to the effect that a certain amount of our exports are being blocked by failure to obtain import permits into these countries. I should like the minister to clarify that before this debate ends.

As regards Canada's domestic exports, in October of this year they were valued at $228 million, as against approximately $314 million in October, 1944, a decrease of a little over twenty-seven per cent. Exports to the United States in October were $88½ million in round figures; in October of last year they were $123 million, which is a decrease of approximately 24½ per cent. That trend cannot go on; things must be straightened out. I know it is hardly in order to pick out any particular month in a year like 1945. However, to straighten this out, I shall quote from an article which appeared in Saturday Night of December 1. I shall not read it all:

> Meantime British refusal to grant permits to Canadian exporters of certain lines has caused considerable concern in commercial circles and the Department of Trade and Commerce has been getting anxious appeals for help.
> Certain manufacturers have stated publicly that they are prepared to adopt what they think is the only sure way of obtaining a share of the British and empire market, namely, erect plants in the United Kingdom. Others, which do not find this feasible, have temporarily given up hope of sales to the United Kingdom and are pointing out that this means unemployment in the Canadian export industries.
> This is the first major threat to Canada's post-war trade programme, under which a target of $1,750 million exports of Canadian produce was set, a figure said to be the minimum at which we can hope to maintain full employment in Canada. The frustration of our exporters has led in some quarters to sharp criticism of British policy. Some critics contend that the refusal to take Canadian goods is a deliberate action on the part of a socialist or "planned economy" government, which aims to make Britain as self-supporting as possible in order that there be a minimum interference of their plans in the form of fluctuations in international conditions.

The following references appear to statements of Premier Attlee while he was in Canada:

Premier Attlee was asked two or three pointed questions on trade policy at his press conference at Ottawa last week. He made a specific denial that the British authorities had told Canadian exporters they must come over and build plants if they hope to obtain part of the British market (a statement which was challenged later in the week, on the ground that, whether the British authorities had said as much in so many words, their attitude left Canadian exporters no alternative), but that was the only specific and clear-cut part of his answers. For the rest he contented himself with a very cautious and not very newsworthy reply that Britain's dollar position was a difficult one, and that they were trying to do something about it by expansion of exports.

Yet in all fairness to Britain it must be added that an examination of its current and prospective supply of Canadian dollars (like that of virtually all forms of foreign exchange) shows a very tight situation. The figures are well known in official circles at Ottawa and it seems that much of the current criticism could have been forestalled by the publication of a few tables and a page or so of comment on them . . .

Even before the war Britain was buying from two to three times from Canada what we were buying from Britain, and the balance of international payments between the two countries made a pattern like the following . . .

I am not going to quote all the figures mentioned in the article, but here are two principal items:

	(millions of dollars)
A Current credits—with the United Kingdom merchandise exports after adjustment	385	337
B Current debits—with the United Kingdom merchandise imports after adjustment	148	119

It will be seen that in 1937 Britain had to find $135 millions in Canadian dollars elsewhere to balance the account, and in 1938, $127 millions. In order to balance the account without requiring Britain to obtain Canadian exchange elsewhere, we should have had to buy additional British goods or services to that amount each year . . .

Not much, perhaps, can be learned about the situation from the transactions of 1945, because this is not a typical year, and war transactions cannot be completely segregated from civilian transfers. But there is enough to go on to show how Britain's problem has been gravely intensified.

It states further:

Canadian civilian imports from Britain are running currently at a figure which will come to $108 millions for the year. The interest and dividend item (Canadian dollar payments for British investments here) will be about 25 millions down from the pre-war level, and shipping perhaps another ten millions lower. On these three items, which before the war constituted the chief direct sources of Canadian dollars for Britain, her 1945 receipts will be of the order of $200 million (compared with $276 million in 1937).

What will they be in 1946? Unless our purchases from Britain rise quickly and substantially (and there are grave obstacles ,such as shortage of British goods, prices above Canadian ceilings, etc., to overcome) Britain's direct acquisition of Canadian dollars from sale of her goods and services to us will not be far above $200 million.

On the other side of the balance sheet is the blunt fact that Britain needs from this country, in 1946, perhaps $500 million in food alone. Under such circumstances how can Britain spare dollars to finance imports of Canadian manufactured goods and items which, in their own list of priorities, appear rather far down the scale?

On the most optimistic forecast it would seem that Britain will be short 300 millions in Canadian dollars in 1946, probably much more. It would be a service all around if the two governments would publish a budget showing what the situation will be. Then, instead of engaging in exchanges of critical generalities back and forth, Canadian exporters and other interested parties will be able to look the problem square in the face and see what can be done about it.

Mr. REID: I wonder whether the hon. member would answer a question. It relates to the price of lumber. A few minutes ago he quoted the price for hemlock as being not sufficient to pay for the charges. Would he tell the committee what they are getting for hemlock in his district?

Mr. HODGSON: An average of $40 per thousand f.o.b. cars.

Mr. REID: Because the freight rate for British Columbia is $29.25 per thousand, and the hotel Vancouver is flooded with dealers from the hon. member's district and other districts, buying up our hemlock and cedar.

Mr. HODGSON: Back in the war days when you were building this air training scheme clear across Canada, the first order came out, "Don't accept anything but spruce and pine to build these camps." Everyone knows that hemlock is just as good as and a little better than low-grade pine or spruce to build the framework of any of these air training camps. But they did not want hemlock; at the same time we had quite a bit of hemlock on our hands. I do not know the reason for that, but this might be the reason. At that time the timber controller happened to be a big lumber king from British Columbia.

Mr. REID: We know it.

Mr. HODGSON: And a dollar a year man at Ottawa.

Mr. REID: We know it. I protested, but it was no good.

Mr. HODGSON: Whether that had anything to do with it or not I am not prepared to say, but after they got all the low-grade pine and spruce out of British Columbia and drifted across Canada they were getting short of lumber and they said, "We will take hemlock".

Mr. REID: Of course Nicholson did not do any better.

Mr. HODGSON: I am not finding fault with the government. You started finding fault.

Mr. REID: No, no.

Mr. HODGSON: I am trying to be constructive unless you drive me into criticism. I can do that too, if I have to.

Mr. REID: No; I was looking for information.

Mr. HODGSON: But I say to the minister, try to raise the price of that hemlock when you are building up industry in Canada. Throw away your quota as far as exportation of hardwood to the United States is concerned and you will help industry and help trade with the United States. As far as the lumber industry is concerned, we can produce the lumber if the government just gives us a chance.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: On September 19 the minister tabled order in council P.C. 6122 setting the export price of wheat at $1.55, and he referred at that time to the obligation of Canada not to take advantage of the allies in time of need; he referred also to the matter of building good will in Europe. The result has been the pegging of the price of wheat in Canada for export. Along with that is coupled the guaranteed floor price of $1 a bushel on authorized deliveries of wheat in Canada up to 1945, with $1.25 remaining for the present year; that is, until July, 1946. The question I wish to ask the minister is this. Since the producer in Canada is the one who is compelled to take the lower price on account of the pegging, to create good will for all Canada, is that policy being followed in any other department with respect to any other commodity that is being sold abroad? For instance, with bacon, do you peg the price to Canada Packers regardless of the price of bacon in the export market and compel the packer to take a lower price, or do you allow the packer to get the top price, sell it abroad at the lower price, and then pay a subsidy? And what about lumber and other products in Canada?

As a result of this action, a good many wheat growers feel that the primary producer takes the rap, whereas, where you have manufactured products, such as lumber, the people who have monopolies are guaranteed the top price; the people of Canada pay it, and the taxpayers make up the difference. Why not treat one the same as the other?

Another point arises out of a report that appeared in the evening Citizen, and the minister will either deny it or let us know what the situation is. It was charged in the other house that the Ottawa empire agreements had been violated by refusal on the part of Great Britain of import licences, calling upon Canada to look after her own interests. The report states: "He criticized Britain last night for what he called a brazen violation of the Ottawa empire agreements." Will the minister state whether or not—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member is not in order in referring in this house to debates that take place in the other house.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I was referring to a report in the newspaper.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member was referring to a debate, and I must rule him out of order.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I wish to direct two or three questions to the minister, and particularly the matter that arose recently in Washington where the statement was made that by reason of loan arrangements between Great Britain and the United States the British preference on many commodities would be done away with in whole or in part. That is a matter which affects the welfare of this country to a large extent, and we on this side of the house, His Majesty's opposition, have always believed that one of the most important considerations for assuring the trade of this country was the maintenance of the British preferences.

I feel that on this subject the minister should give a complete statement to the house. I was very much impressed by the remarks of the hon. member for Victoria, Ontario. He pointed out that Britain had bought before the war two or three times the quantity of stuff that was shipped to Canada, and that the importance of trade with Britain cannot be exaggerated. We believe, therefore, that we have the right to know whether or not—and I appropriate the words without reference to the speaker—there has been any brazen interference with the British preference, whether such is contemplated, and what is being done by the minister in order to prevent a breach in the British preference, the maintenance of which is so necessary to our future prosperity.

Much is made of the necessity of maintaining our agricultural markets in Britain and on the continent, and all of us feel that is important. We also believe that everything should be done in the way of export of agricultural products to relieve Britain's monotonous ration that has prevailed during the war.

What is being done by this country to maintain these markets abroad, in agricultural products other than wheat? I realize that in part this does not come under the minister, but it is impossible to discuss any of these subjects without occasionally encroaching upon some other department. Are Canadians to-day permitted to ship from Canada parcels of agricultural products such as butter and cheese, tongue and bacon and the like? The reason I ask that is that within the last three or four weeks, while the Department of Trade and Commerce is allegedly, and I believe in fact, engaged in securing markets, a very strong campaign is being waged all over Canada to induce Canadians to send overseas Danish products which will come into competition sooner or later with Canadian products. I have before me an advertisement in a recent issue of the Regina Leader that shows the extent to which this matter is being followed up in parts of the country. I will not refer to the name of the company; I will send the advertisement over to the minister. It reads:

> Choice of two Christmas parcels for British isles: Renowned Danish quality products packed in Copenhagen and sent by airmail, delivered within sixteen days of order. Order now. Package No. 1: two pounds butter, one pound cheese, one and seven-eighths pounds canned meat, $7.

Then package No. 2:

> Two pounds butter, one pound cheese, one and seven-eighths pounds tongue.

It is the same as the other order, with this added, "Two pounds bacon" and the total is $9.45. In other words, Canadians are asked to buy Danish products to be sent to Britain to relieve the situation over there, and for two pounds bacon, including cost of transportation, one pays $2.45. Does that indicate the type of prices that are being paid to-day on the continent, profiteering that is taking place in this country by companies engaged in this kind of work?

Mr. MacKINNON: Will the hon. member permit me a question?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. MacKINNON: I have not seen the advertisement referred to, but I would not want the impression to go out that anybody in Canada is asking that these shipments be made from Canada to the United Kingdom, and that is the way the hon. gentleman's statement sounds to me.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Chairman, I have the minister on his feet anyway now. We have not heard from him for quite a while. We are endangering our agricultural markets in connection with these products by Canadians being asked to send or permit companies to send Danish farm products into Britain, and I am asking whether or not a concerted effort is being made by the department to permit of Canadians sending Canadian farm products over there to relieve the ration situation. There are other parcels indicated which can be sent to Czechoslovakia, Finland, Holland and Scandinavia and the prices are on a par with those I have mentioned. There are still other types of parcels for transmission to Belgium, France and Holland. This has become a racket across the country, and I am surprised that the minister has not seen them because they can be found in the papers all across the country.

Mr. MacKINNON: Who is responsible for the advertising?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The companies that are going to make money at the expense of Canadians in Canada and probably at the expense of future Canadian trade abroad. Surely something can be done to prevent this kind of thing. I believe it was stopped once before and I think it should be stopped now. It is a serious thing if we in Canada send Canadian dollars abroad for the purpose of buying Danish farm products to be sent into Britain in competition with, or in substitution of Canadian products. I suggest that the minister should do something at once with regard to this matter.

I pass to one other matter, namely, British markets being closed to-day because of the requirements of the government of Great Britain that import licences be taken out or that Canadian industries establish themselves in the old country. That is a serious blow at empire unity, at commonwealth unity, at commonwealth trade, and to British preferences. The minister should give a statement as to what the Canadian government is doing with reference to the plan being adopted by the British government. If this policy is followed, to what extent during the next year or two will it mean a reduction in exports from Canada to Great Britain of the products of the companies which will be required to establish themselves in the United Kingdom under this policy? What types of manufacturers are precluded from establishing in Britain? What type of companies in Canada will have to establish their factories over there, and to what extent will production in Canada be reduced by the denial of the British market? It is a serious matter when one part of the British commonwealth establishes, during the existence of British preference regulations, laws or orders which prevent imports from another part of the empire subject to the British preference.

Mr. MacINNIS: May I say a few words before the minister replies to the many questions that have been raised. The question of trade is a thorny one. It is a subject that has been the theme of debate in many political battles in the Dominion of Canada. To-night some hon. members referred to their younger days. Although I am not very old, I can well remember when free trade versus protection was the stock issue in every political fight all across Canada. In these days, that issue has given place to unemployment, family allowances, unemployment insurance, health insurance, and all that sort of thing. My feeling in regard to trade and the tariff question is that the Conservatives believed in a high tariff that was not too high, and the Liberals believed in a low tariff that was not too low: but generally the tariff remained the same, no matter which party was in office. In a recent issue of the Commercial Intelligence Journal I was glad to note how quickly the trade of Canada had picked up on the ending of hostilities. There is a reason for that, and I believe it is one that Canadians must keep in mind in our trade and commercial relations with peoples in other parts of the world. The reason, of course, is that Canada and the United States, of the great trading nations of the world, were the only two countries that came out of this war with their productive facilities greatly enlarged over what they had been when they went into the war.

At the moment we are at an advantage in getting our exports into the markets of the world. We should not be too greedy in taking advantage of that. The hon. member for Davenport, who is not at the moment in his seat, asked the minister what he was doing to combat imports into this country. Surely, if we expect to sell, and if we expect the people of Canada to benefit from our export trade, we must buy. It is only in that way that we can raise our standard of living.

Mr. REID: I bet his leader would not raise that question.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not going into that. Let us remember, too, that as we find markets, and particularly markets for industrial machinery, in other parts of the world, we are paving the way for a reduction in our export trade as soon as these countries became self-sufficient. They will not stop there; they, too, will begin looking for trade in other parts of the world and they will become our competitors. Therefore there is only one solution of our problem—cooperation in the matter of trade.

A question was raised in regard to the action of the British government in imposing licences on imports from Canada. It has been said that that is a blow at the Ottawa agreements or trade preferences. Surely we should keep in mind that Britain lost almost all her export trade during the war. She put everything she had into the war. If they are now brought to the point where they have to impose restrictions on imports it amounts to this, that to-day Great Britain has to choose between imports that are essential to the life of her people and luxury imports. If she must have steel, oil, or certain essential metals, then she is going to have those instead of fur coats, diamonds, and that sort of thing. Is there any man in this house who will blame her for doing that? Is there any man in this house who would say that Canada would not do the same thing if she were in the same position? These are matters that we should keep in mind.

With the successful negotiation of the loan from the United States and perhaps another loan from the Dominion of Canada, maybe the United Kingdom can get her trade on a normal basis within a short period of time. We should continually keep in mind the condition to which the trade of the United Kingdom was reduced during six years of war, and the necessity for the government of that country being concerned with the import of those things that are essential to the life of the people, before exporters in other parts of the world proceed to dump on them anything they may have to sell.

Mr. MacKINNON: I think it is a pity that anyone should get the impression that I got from the reading, by the hon. member for Lake Centre, of an advertisement he has taken from what appears to be a Winnipeg paper. I may be wrong in that; however, it is a Canadian paper.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The Regina Leader.

Mr. MacKINNON: The hon. member for Lake Centre has sent me over a copy of the advertisement. This is an advertisement inserted by a firm known as Western Overseas Packages, and located at 348 Main street, Winnipeg. It is endeavouring to get Canadians to place orders in Copenhagen for shipments of goods from Denmark to England. It is possible that some action might be taken in Canada to prevent an advertisement of that kind, but the impression I got from the hon. member's speech and from his reference to the advertisement was one which, I believe, is different from that which he would want to give the country at large. I do not believe any Canadian authority is to blame in this connection.

The hon. member for Lake Centre referred to the British preference, and asked that a full statement be made on the matter. I anticipated that when my estimates would be under consideration questions would be asked about the British preference, Bretton Woods, trade and kindred matters. But may I point out that for a considerable length of time in the house these matters have been under discussion as a result of bills introduced by the Minister of Finance, the minister directly responsible. There has been an attempt in Canada—not to-night—to make the negotiations recently concluded in Washington appear to have been trade discussions or trade agreements. The fact is that the discussions at Washington, in which delegations from the United Kingdom and the United States took part, were financial. Trade conversations were only incidental; and they were conversations only, and not negotiations. Canada is not bound in that connection by anything that took place at Washington, and, besides this, these preliminary negotiations are confidential.

The next step in connection with Great Britain's efforts to put her economy on a sound basis will be, I should imagine, the loan discussions with Canada which, I may say, will proceed shortly, and will be followed at a later date by trade discussions between Canada and the United Kingdom, possibly in Ottawa and London. It may be a matter of weeks—possibly a few months—before those trade discussions can take place. Meantime I am urging that steps be taken to make some temporary arrangements with the United Kingdom to be effective until our trade negotiations can take place. It is impossible for me to give any prolonged statement respecting negotiations and discussions between Canada and the United Kingdom, as suggested by the hon. member for Lake Centre, because, as I have said, they are only starting.

Reference was made by the hon. member, and also by the hon. member for Yorkton, to an article which appeared in one of the Ottawa papers this evening in which reference was made to violations—

[Mr. MacKinnon.]

The CHAIRMAN: I hope the minister is not about to refer to the debate which took place in another place.

Mr. MacKINNON: I have not read closely the article referred to, although I glanced quickly at the headline, and only hurriedly through the article. No matter how much study I gave to the point raised by the hon. member for Yorkton, I could not do better than place again before the committee the statement made to the house a week or so ago when I dealt with import permits to the United Kingdom.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Would the minister give the committee the assurance that, as far as he knows, the Ottawa agreements have not been violated by Great Britain at this time?

Mr. MacKINNON: I shall put it in this way: I certainly do not know that they have.

The hon. member for Lake Centre also spoke about our shipping bacon and butter and other parcels to the United Kingdom. This matter was dealt with to some extent when the estimates for the Department of Agriculture were before the committee. As far as bacon is concerned, may I point out that we are finding it impossible to maintain the bacon shipments for which we have contracted with the United Kingdom. However, there is nothing to stop any Canadian in Canada from sending a parcel of Canadian bacon to the United Kingdom.

The hon. member for Peterborough West spoke from his knowledge, and in a kindly and constructive way, with respect to Latin-America. He has visited those countries, and knows the attitude of the people toward Canada. He will know that the people of Latin-America are anxious to trade with us, and that we stand very highly in those countries. Our goods have a reputation for high quality, reliability and dependability.

While we have not nearly as large a representation in those countries from my department or from the Department of External Affairs as have the United States or the United Kingdom, man for man I would put our trade commissioners up against those of the representatives of those other two countries.

The hon. member for Peterborough West referred to the fact that trade inquiries had been dropped from the Commercial Intelligence Journal. He is right, but I may say that a decision was arrived at recently to resume the publication of those figures and they will appear in the next issue, or very shortly in any event.

The hon. member for Victoria, Ontario, referred to some matters in an interesting manner and with personal knowledge, but I think these are largely outside the Department of Trade and Commerce. They referred principally to timber control and the operations of the wartime prices and trade board during the war period.

I do not know whether the hon. member for Yorkton wants me to go farther into the announcements on wheat prices; that is the $1.55 price. It is not a ceiling price because there is no such thing as that; it is the price of our export wheat.

At the present time the wheat board are offering wheat for export at $1.55 a bushel. At the present time and for this crop year the floor under that price will be $1.25, but for the next five years the price of wheat to the producer cannot drop below $1 a bushel, Fort William or Vancouver. The hon. member for Yorkton referred also to the matter of authorized deliveries. The wheat programme and the wheat policy for next year will not be announced until after the New Year, following the usual custom. At that time the policy of the department and of the government will be made public. Personally, I do not think that with present prospects we need worry about being able to deliver the wheat that will be grown in western Canada during the next crop year.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is it not true that order in council, P.C. 6122, stated that wheat would not be sold abroad by the Canadian wheat board at over $1.55; is that not the order in council?

Mr. MacKINNON: The order in council carrying out the decision of the cabinet stated that wheat would be offered for the time being at $1.55 a bushel.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Not more than $1.55.

Mr. MacKINNON: At $1.55. It is not what the hon. member for Yorkton states; it is what I have just stated, at $1.55.

Mr. BRYCE: Does that refer to shipments to Britain only?

Mr. MacKINNON: That is the price at which we are selling wheat for export at the present time, $1.55.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is there any time limit during which that price will be maintained?

Mr. MacKINNON: There is no time limit.

Mr. BRYCE: Can any other country buy at $1.55?

Mr. MacKINNON: The Department of Trade and Commerce and the government are endeavouring to treat all ordinary wheat importing countries on as fair a basis as possible, based on their imports during prewar years. We have given No. 1 priority to the United Kingdom and secondary priorities to our allies in the overrun countries of Europe. The great bulk of our wheat shipments is going to these countries, but a small amount of wheat and flour has been sold to Latin-American countries which were regular customers of ours during the peace years.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The minister stated, as reported at page 289 of Hansard:

> Accordingly the government, by order in council, has instructed the Canadian wheat board to offer wheat for sale for export overseas at prices not higher than the current export price of $1.55 per bushel, basis No. 1 Northern, in store Fort William/Port Arthur or Vancouver.

That is, that Canadian wheat shall not be sold by the Canadian wheat board at a price higher than $1.55, which would be the ceiling on the export price of wheat.

Mr. MacKINNON: That is not my undertanding of it. The intent of the department was that wheat should be offered at $1.55.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Not more than.

Mr. MacKINNON: At $1.55 for the time being. It does not say that the government, under a certain set of circumstances, might not find it necessary to raise that price at a later date.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Has any wheat been sold by the Canadian wheat board at more than $1.55?

Mr. MacKINNON: Not that I know of.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The United States is getting more than that for its wheat.

Mr. MacKINNON: We are getting $1.70 at seaboard as against the United States seaboard price of $2. However, Canada is selling twice as much wheat for export as is the United States at the present time. As I have explained, the people of Canada, if they saw fit, could demand and get from certain countries in their extremity just about what we wanted to ask for wheat; but looking at it from the long-range view and from many points of view beside those of dollars and cents, although they are most important, the government decided that for the time being they would offer wheat to those countries at $1.55.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: In order to create good will and future markets?

Mr. MacKINNON: Partly.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: And partly on humanitarian grounds?

Mr. MacKINNON: Partly.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: If the Canadian people see fit to do that—and I think it is a fine gesture and one which we all support—the Canadian people as a whole should pay for it. The Canadian producer should receive the difference of thirty cents that exists between the Canadian seaboard price and the United States seaboard price. The Canadian people as a whole are going to benefit, because the people of these other countries will be sending goods to Canada. I contend that the government should make up this difference and pay a subsidy to the Canadian producer to cover the difference in price.

Mr. MacKINNON: Bound up with that price of $1.55, f.o.b. Fort William, and $1.70 seaboard, is a matter of the guarantee of a minimum of $1 a bushel for a period of five years.

Mr. PROBE: Is this wheat offered to the governments of the countries which are importing it? Is the agreement made between the wheat board and the government direct, between the importer and exporter in this country or between the wheat board and the importer?

Mr. MacKINNON: The sale of Canadian wheat is from the Canadian wheat board to governments or government buying agencies in all countries, with the exception of small amounts that we sell to a few of the Latin-American countries which have been customers of ours in peace time.

Mr. PROBE: And the price to Latin-American countries may or may not be $1.55 if they are in extremity?

Mr. MacKINNON: I do not know any that are in extremity. They have the money to pay for it and they are paying in hard cash. Small quantities are sold commensurate with their imports before the war.

Mr. PROBE: Is this wheat being used by these Latin-American countries internally, or is it being re-exported?

Mr. MacKINNON: We are thoroughly satisfied that it is being used internally. There are people in Ottawa right to-day from these Latin-American countries wanting to buy wheat from us, and there are other countries not represented in Canada to-day who are in great need of wheat and are anxious to buy from us, but for whom we have no supplies if we are to supply the United Kingdom and our former allies overseas.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Are you selling through commission houses or direct from the wheat board to other governments? Is any commission paid to commission agents on the sale of this wheat?

Mr. MacKINNON: None whatever.

Mr. SINNOTT: I would ask the hon. member for Yorkton if it would not be a better business proposition to sell 400,000,000 bushels of wheat at $1.55 rather than 200,000,000 bushels at $2?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I think we should sell wheat at the price we can get for it. What is being done to-day is in the interests of all Canada, and all the people should bear their share of the load. The farmer alone should not have to bear the brunt of having to take a lower price for his grain.

Mr. FAIR: The minister said a few moments ago that tied up with the present export price of $1.55 is a guarantee that wheat will not be sold below $1 a bushel for the next five years, but he forgot to tell us that since the war for quite a while we have taken seventy cents f.o.b. Fort William for the best grain grown in the world. By so doing, the farmers suffered a distinct loss during all those years until 1942, when we were given an initial price of ninety cents a bushel. The minister also forgot to tell us that during those years the farmers of Canada had to stand the expense of interest on the money borrowed to advance to the farmers on the grain sold and also vast amounts in storage, for the elevators all over the country were full. All those charges were piled on the Canadian farmers and should properly have been a charge on the Canadian people as a whole. If the government wants to treat the farmers at least half fairly that price of $1 a bushel up to the end of July, 1950, should be increased to $1.25, the present initial price. If these charges were laid on the Canadian people as a whole it would give the farmers a chance to become reestablished and encourage them to work with a little more heart and courage even under present conditions.

Mr. MacKINNON: Just to supplement what the hon. member has said, participation certificates have also been paid or will be paid to the wheat producers ever since 1940.

Mr. FAIR: The value of the participation certificates will be off-set by storage and interest charges against the wheat.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am not hard to satisfy, but I do not think I got a very good answer; indeed I got no answer to the question I asked, which was a simple one, arising out of the negotiations at Washington between representatives of the British and the United States governments relative to a loan or credit to be extended by the United States to Britain. That credit of some $4 billion has been extended, and press reports both in the United States and in our own country indicated that the United States government demanded that as a condition precedent to the credit, reductions or changes be made in the British preferences. The minister has stated that Canada had no part in the negotiations that took place in Washington. That is perfectly true, but Canada is to be greatly affected by what took place there if the British preferences are to be reduced as between Canada and Great Britain. My question is simply this: Did the minister receive any information from either the British or the United States government that as a condition precedent to that credit reductions or changes were to be made in the British preferences as between Canada and Great Britain? I submit that that is a question which should be answered.

Mr. MacKINNON: I can answer it very simply. No such information has been received by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. FRASER: I have been handed a copy of the Canadian Geographic Journal, and I notice it says that Canadian trade with Latin-America is to be determined by the Department of Trade and Commerce. That was stated by the trade commissioner or the acting trade commissioner at Santiago, Chile. Would it not be advisable for the trade commissioner in Chile to have an office in Valparaiso, which is a seaport and also because his trade commissionership takes in Bolivia? I think it would help if there were an office in Valparaiso.

Has the minister any information on the agricultural implement requirements of Brazil? I understand that it was stated in the British House of Commons that Brazil will require 55 million pounds worth of agricultural machinery within the next ten years.

Mr. MacKINNON: In our Santiago office we have a senior trade commissioner and a junior trade commissioner in addition to the other members of the staff. Either one or the other makes regular visits to Valparaiso. As the hon. member knows, Valparaiso is just about a couple of hours' run from Santiago. They also make periodical visits to Bolivia.

Mr. FRASER: The whole point is, if somebody wanted to see the trade commissioner, and he had a hotel room in Valparaiso, he might not want to take the trip to Santiago.

Mr. MacKINNON: I shall see that attention is paid by the departmental officials to the suggestions of the hon. member for Peterborough. May I add this in a general way on all these matters, that it is my intention and the intention of the officials of the department carefully to peruse everything which has been said on these estimates to-night, because I know that a number of suggestions are helpful, and that most of the suggestions, at least, are given with that purpose.

Mr. BROOKS: I wish to ask the minister a question with reference to the British West Indies trade agreements. When will there be a revision of them? I might say that they have had a serious effect on trade from the maritime provinces, and the people of those provinces are anxious to know when those agreements are coming up again for revision.

Mr. MacKINNON: The matter of the renewal or otherwise of the West Indies-Canada trade treaty has simply been at a standstill, on account of the war. It is now impossible to proceed with a consideration of a renewal of that trade treaty, although our friends of the West Indies are exceedingly anxious for a renewal, until we have our trade talks with the United Kingdom. That will have to come first, as it will have a very great deal to do with our negotiations with the West Indies.

Mr. BROOKS: It is not anticipated that there will be any revision within the next year?

Mr. MacKINNON: It will be done just as early as possible, and I fully recognize the importance of that treaty, to the maritime provinces particularly.

337. Exhibitions, $91,622.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I should like a statement with regard to what is required in respect of the London exhibition.

Mr. MacKINNON: There is nothing for this year. There may be preparations.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Was there any expenditure last year?

Mr. MacKINNON: No, except a small maintenance charge. We have an exhibition warehouse in London where certain things are stored. But the reorganization of the exhibition department is receiving attention right now.

Dominion bureau of statistics—

338. Administration, $111,635.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I recently had an inquiry from a railway employee who required proof of age, because at the time that he was born statistics were not recorded very carefully, and my information from the bureau is that proof of age is given for old age pensioners, blind pensioners and veterans, but no provision is made for other persons who require proof of age for pension. Could some consideration be given to a revision of the act, so that any person who requires proof of age for pension could have that proof established by the bureau of statistics?

Mr. MacKINNON: That is a matter which comes before us, I was going to say daily, but very frequently—people writing in to see if they can get some proof of age through the bureau of statistics. Now, except for government purposes, and according to the legislation under which we are acting, it is impossible for us to furnish that information. I shall take into consideration the necessary amendment to the act which would enable us to do that.

Mr. MacNICOL: As one who has received much help and information from time to time from the bureau of statistics, and has marvelled at the ability of the officials to give complete answers, and answers in accordance with the information desired, I wish to express my appreciation to the minister—and I know I speak for many others in this house—for all the services we have received from the bureau of statistics.

Mr. MacKINNON: Thank you.

339. Statistics, including contribution of $2,530 to the Inter-American Statistical Institute, $1,608,600.

Mr. PROBE: In the public accounts for 1944, on pages Y-10 and Y-11, there appears an item of $66,977.46 for rentals of machines, and the larger part of those payments went to International Business Machines company. This year I see that there is approximately $64,000 estimated for machine rentals. Might I have from the minister a statement whether these machines must be rented from machine companies, or what is the policy of the government with respect to buying the machines which are included in this item.

Mr. MacKINNON: I am sure that the department would purchase these machines rather than pay the rentals if it were possible to do so, but we can obtain the use of the machines only by renting them, not by purchase.

[Mr. MacKinnon.]

Mr. PROBE: Is that due to the patent rights these companies hold?

Mr. MacKINNON: I imagine it is.

Item agreed to.

340. Census of population, $371,700.

Mr. COCKERAM: Can the minister explain what census services, outside the $250,000 are covered by this item?

Mr. MacKINNON: These figures deal with the expense of the finishing up of the last decennial census.

Item agreed to.

Mail subsidies and steamship subventions—

Western local services—

344. Prince Rupert, B.C., and Queen Charlotte islands, service between, $22,000.

Vancouver and northern ports of British Columbia, service between, $15,000.

Victoria, Vancouver, way ports and Skagway, service between, $10,000.

Victoria and west coast Vancouver island, service between, $10,000.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I wish to say a few words with reference to the coastwise service on the British Columbia coast, especially from Vancouver north. I should like to see the department take an interest in trying to promote a better mail service to many of the points up the coast. I can give one example, of the village of Bella Coola, which is a good farming centre, but it has only one boat a week from Vancouver; if it could have a better service I am sure that that valley would grow, because there are great possibilities, especially in the future when it becomes hooked up with the interior.

I should also like the department to take an interest in seeing that better boats are provided for the service to the Queen Charlotte islands. The boats used now by the Union Steamship company are nothing more than perambulating junk-heaps, and it is no pleasure to ride on them. I have worked on them, and I pity the sailor who works on them. Quite often the passengers have to swim around for their shoes. That is actually what is happening. It does not make for the growth of Queen Charlotte islands settlements such as Massett and Queen Charlotte city.

I wish to bring another matter to the attention of the minister now, so that it may be on the record and I can criticize him in future years if needs be. In 1939, by order in council 1280, dated May 31, the government allowed a subsidy of $6,750 per sailing for two boats, for experimental sailings out of the port of Prince Rupert. That was cancelled owing to the imminence of the war. Now that the war is over, the port is in far better condition to handle these boats because of increased facilities there consequent upon the growth that took place during the war. I should like to see the government promote that actively as soon as possible. Ships will be released from the pools in the near future, and when normal shipping relations are established once more I should like to see the port get a start as peace-time trade increases. We are looking for action from the government in the near future, because the whole north has to depend upon this. It is part of the general hook-up of the railway situation all through that country, and this subsidizing and supporting of deep-sea sailings out of the port of Prince Rupert will have its effect on the whole north. We know that in the past trade has been able to start by itself, but we recognize now that the state has to interfere actively and to take the lead in sponsoring such things, and Prince Rupert is looking to the department to do this for them.

Mr. MacKINNON: I do not wish to delay the passing of this item, but I think it is only fair to give the hon. member the information on the points he has raised. The department at the present time is negotiating with the Union Steamship company for a new boat to serve the Queen Charlotte islands and two new boats to serve the northern British Columbia ports. The matter of a shipping service from Prince Rupert to the United Kingdom was about to be taken up when the war broke out, but it is now again receiving the attention of the department.

Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia, service between, $37,000.

Quebec, Natashquan and Harrington, service between, $127,500.

Quebec or Montreal and Gaspe, calling at way ports, service between, $90,000.

Rimouski and Matane and points on the north shore of the St. Lawrence, service between, $75,000.

Riviere-du-Loup and St. Simeon and/or Tadoussac, service between, $21,000.

Saint John and Minas basin ports, service between, $5,000.

Saint John, Westport and Yarmouth and other way ports, service between, $13,500.

Sydney and bay St. Lawrence, calling at way ports, service between, $25,000.

Sydney and Bras d'Or lake ports, west coast of Cape Breton, and Prince Edward Island, service between, $22,500.

Sydney and Whycocomagh, calling at way ports, service between, $18,000—$961,783.

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not see anything in any of these items for a mail service from Waterways north down the Mackenzie valley to Aklavik. Perhaps a subsidy to any service there would help to speed up the traffic, because the trouble is that the traffic is slow. Will the minister consider next session an item to promote the speeding up of traffic on the Mackenzie river by means of a subsidy?

Mr. MacKINNON: I shall be anxious to look into the matter. At present these subsidies are arranged through the Post Office Department.

Mr. BROOKS: I wish to ask a question with regard to the Grand Manan-mainland service in New Brunswick. The service has been very unsatisfactory there for the last number of years. Is there any provision for a new boat to be used there? I should like the minister to say something regarding the mail service in connection with Grand Manan. I had heard that there were many complaints.

Mr. MacKINNON: The contractors on that service have just purchased a new boat, and negotiations are being carried on now with regard to subsidies.

Item agreed to.

Canada Grain Act—

346. Administration, $101,834.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Earlier this evening the minister stated that order in council P.C. 6122 did not prohibit the government from selling grain in excess of $1.55. I have a copy of the order in council, the last paragraph of which reads:

Regulations. The Canadian wheat board shall not sell wheat for export to overseas destinations at a price in excess of $1.55 per bushel—

Is that not placing a ceiling?

—for number 1 Manitoba northern, basis in store Fort William/Port Arthur or Vancouver, and in the case of each other grade of wheat at prices in excess of such prices as in the opinion of the said board brings each of such grades into proper prices relationship with number 1 Manitoba northern.

Does the minister say that with this order in council in effect they can sell wheat at more than $1.55 for export purposes?

Mr. MacKINNON: My understanding is that the $1.55 f.o.b. Port Arthur or Vancouver is the price at which wheat is being offered for sale at the present time. Further, I understand that circumstances might arise that might lead the wheat board to offer wheat at a higher price.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The order in council makes a definite statement.

Mr. MacKINNON: I shall have to look into that.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: One other matter. The minister stated that the present export price of $1.55 had a relationship to the $1 floor price guaranteed the farmers for a number of years. If we were getting $1.30, if we were getting the extra thirty cents, either through a government subsidy or by selling at the export price, would that not make it possible for the government to guarantee a price for a longer period? There would be more money in the wheat board and you could guarantee a better price. The producer is the ultimate loser, no matter how you look at it.

Mr. MacKINNON: I am afraid I did not follow the hon. member. Would he mind repeating that.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The minister said that the $1.55 was tied up with the fact that there was a floor of $1 a bushel for the next five years, and my question was this. If we were selling wheat at the present time at thirty cents a bushel more, secured either in the form of a subsidy from the Canadian government or at that price, would that not mean more money in the treasury of the wheat board, so that the $1 price could be maintained for a longer period?

Mr. MacKINNON: That money would not be left there. It would be distributed to the producers immediately under participation certificates.

[Mr. Castleden.]

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Without that, the farmer loses. He is the man that takes the loss at the lower price.

Item agreed to.

Canada Grain Act—

347. Operation and maintenance including inspection and weighing, registration, et cetera, $1,820,047.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Why is there this substantial increase?

Mr. MacKINNON: I am told there is a larger volume of wheat being handled.

Item agreed to.

Canada Grain Act—

348. Canadian government elevators, including equipment, $429,991.

Mr. BRYCE: Is this for new equipment, or does it represent a deficit in the operation of the government elevator?

Mr. MacKINNON: The largest item in the increases is $29,750 for salaries.

Mr. BRYCE: For what?

Mr. MacKINNON: Increased employees.

Mr. BRYCE: Rental for these elevators must be in that. Government elevators are rented out, are they not?

Mr. MacKINNON: All elevators except one are operated by the board of grain commissioners. One elevator at Port Arthur is rented.

Mr. TOWNLEY-SMITH: Are they revenue-producing? If so, can the minister tell us what the receipts were in the last year?

Mr. MacKINNON: I am informed that the revenue goes into the consolidated revenue fund and the money is voted by parliament each year for the operations.

Mr. MOORE: I note that the amount asked for Canadian government elevators is approximately $430,000. How much of that money was spent last year on the terminal elevator at Churchill, Mantioba? How much does the department intend to spend on that elevator in 1946? Is it the purpose of the department to restore the stockyards at that point in the near future? I understand that they were torn down during the late war.

Mr. MacKINNON: The elevator at Churchill does not come under the Department of Trade and Commerce. I am not sure whether it comes under the Department of Transport or the national harbours board.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I notice there is an increase in this item and we are told it is for salaries. In the last item there was a large increase, and we are told it was for handling more grain. I wonder whether those answers are accurate. Why should there be more grain handled in 1945-46 than in 1944-45, when there was more grain to handle?

Mr. MacKINNON: From the figures before him, the hon. member is quite right in asking these questions; but I am advised by the official that it is necessary to ask for a further amount in the supplementary estimates which will be brought down at a later date, to help take care of the 1944-45 operations.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Before this item passes I should like to ask the minister a question in regard to subsidies and the re-establishment of the ferry service in Nova Scotia, Parrsboro, Kingsport and Wolfville, which was carried on for over forty years, I believe, and in recent years by the ferry boat Kipawo, which was taken over by the Department of National Defence for the Naval Services.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. The item we are now on is "Canadian government elevators, including equipment, $429,991."

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I know this is the last item, but I have been attending a meeting of the banking and commerce committee. I ask the privilege to revert to a previous item. I will not be very long. The minister is willing.

An hon. MEMBER: Make it short.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): This service was discontinued. A subsidy of $4.500 was paid by the provincial government and also some by the federal government. When the service was discontinued motorists had to cover about 150 miles extra when gasoline and tires were rationed. The was is over; people of the section served, and the general public are anxious to have this service reestablished. I do not expect it to be in these estimates, but I ask the minister whether he is able to make any announcement with regard to the plans of the department for the ensuing fiscal year. I have been advised that some of the responsible citizens in the communities directly served are prepared to assume the responsibility for securing, if possible, the old boat Kipawo or a new boat and operating it, provided that the government will restore the subsidies previously paid. Will the minister make a short statement?

Mr. MacKINNON: I am familiar with the matter brought up by the hon. member for Cumberland. As he knows, the service was discontinued in the early days of the war. I shall be very glad to have my officials look into the matter again and see if it would be justifiable to resume the service.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I wish to thank the minister.

Item agreed to.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): If the hon. members will turn to page 15 of the estimates—

Mr. MacKINNON: Mr. Chairman, I did not hear you call item 229.

Mr. JACKMAN: While the chairman is turning up this item, may I refer to a matter? For many years the Department of Trade and Commerce put out a most useful handbook giving an abstract of the "Canada Year Book." I believe the charge to educational institutions and members was ten cents. During the period when certain economy measures were put into force, certain false economies were also put into force and the price of this booklet was raised to twenty-five cents. I know that great use was found for it among students in commercial classes in my riding. It would greatly facilitate the distribution of this booklet if the department could see fit to make it available once more for educational purposes and for distribution to members of the house at the old rate of ten cents. I hope that the minister will give consideration to this request.

Mr. MacKINNON: I shall be very glad to do so. I may say that I know how much interested the hon. member for Rosedale is in that particular publication, because at his own expense he has given quite a wide distribution to it, and has been helpful to us in the improvement which has been brought about in that publication.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Item 229 comes under National War Services.

Mr. MacKINNON: It is transferred to this department.

229. Canadian travel bureau service, $77,950.

Mr. GREEN: Can the minister give us a short statement with regard to the activities of the bureau and what plans he has for the future?

Mr. MacKINNON: I possibly could get something from my officials, but I am not in a position to give any long detailed statement on the plans that we have in the Department of Trade and Commerce for the Canadian travel bureau which has just been taken over from the Department of National War Services. We are now dealing with the ordinary estimates. There will be items in the supplementary estimates for the extension of this service in the first year after the war. It is recognized that the work of this branch, which was dropped during the war, will have to be brought back again in an enlarged way, and studies are being given to that objective at the present time.

Mr. GREEN: Are there no plans made for the work that is to be done by the travel bureau? This is the organization which is responsible for the promotion of tourist business.

Mr. MacKINNON: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: I have no doubt that a great deal of consideration has been given to plans for the post-war period. I would suggest to the minister that he give us more detail as to what plans have been made. This is one of the most important industries in Canada.

Mr. MacKINNON: What the hon. member for Vancouver South has just said is well understood by the department. I am quite sure he will realize, however, that, this matter having just come into the department, I am not now in a position to make an extended statement. As I intimated, there will be some supplementary estimates brought down, at which time I would be ready to make a statement.

However, I can say now that the regular work of the branch has been proceeded with and preparations made for extensive advertising throughout foreign countries, particularly the United States and Latin-American countries, respecting the great tourist attractions we have in Canada. Money has been appropriated for the preparation of literature advertising those resources.

We are also planning a campaign which will have for its purpose that of making the people of Canada individually realize the importance of this tourist business, so that when people come to Canada they may be taken care of properly and courteously, in order that they may be good travelling ambassadors for Canadian scenery.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister make a detailed statement when his supplementary estimates come up?

Mr. MacKINNON: I shall, if opportunity permits.

[Mr. MacKinnon.]

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I have one severe criticism—and it is not of the minister. This amount is not nearly large enough. He reassures me, however, by the statement that substantial supplementary estimates are to be brought in. I take it for granted that they will be properly expended and, so far as I am concerned, I am going to support the minister in advance.

This is one of the most important services in Canada, one which is extremely important to the maritime provinces. I hope the minister will see that there is an appropriation amply sufficient to administer this very important service.

Item agreed to.

230. National film board, including the motion picture bureau, $810,965.

Mr. FLEMING: This item appears under the Department of National War Services, but it was my understanding that recently the administration had been transferred to the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. MacKINNON: That is correct.

Mr. FLEMING: It seems to me this might more properly be dealt with when the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare are before us.

Mr. MacKINNON: That is when they will be dealt with. We are not attempting to deal with them to-night.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

91. Departmental administration, $170,499.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is one matter concerning which I should like to ask the minister a few questions. It has to do with the recent action in Windsor, Ontario, where a convicted robber was given the test by a lie detector. That, I believe, is the first time in the history of this country that anything along that line has been attempted, or that it has been used for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not those convicted have been in fact guilty of any offence.

In this connection I would ask the minister the circumstances under which the test was made upon the convict, and whether or not tests by lie detectors have now become sufficiently scientifically advanced as to be reasonably infallible.

The convict in question had been sentenced to a period of twelve years in prison. He appealed, and his appeal was dismissed. He escaped from gaol while awaiting the hearing of the appeal, and returned to custody under an arrangement whereby he was to have applied to him the lie detector with a view to ascertaining whether or not he had in fact committed the offence of which he had denied commission.

Having read of this case, I looked up as well as I could some of the methods being used in this connection, to ascertain whether there was any foundation for what was done in this case. I find that there are several appliances being used, more particularly in Michigan, which adjoins the city of Windsor. There, many innocent persons who have been sentenced to imprisonment have been cleared, as a result of the examinations which have taken place through the use of what is known as a polygraph machine. It is known as the Keeler polygraph.

I am referring now to the London Spectator wherein it is stated that this machine is seventy-five per cent accurate, and that another machine known as the Summers pathometer, which it is claimed demonstrates a lie by means of a variation in the electrical resistance of the skin to an electric current, is supposed to detect ninety-eight per cent of guilty persons and 100 per cent of the innocent.

I know of no advance made in recent years that could be more important than this one.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Does the hon. member believe in it?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is not for me to say. After all, the law is always far behind scientific development. It took many years before finger-printing was accepted, and many years before criminology would permit of the taking of evidence in connection with firearms, the identification of cartridges, and the like.

Whether I believe in it or not, this was actually tried out in the Windsor case. According to press reports the man was found to have been innocent of the offence for which he had been sentenced and was about to serve a long term of imprisonment.

Is this system to be applied generally throughout the country, and in particular in penitentiaries where there are men who claim they are innocent and have been wrongly convicted? Of course one finds that in all penal institutions. The principle has been accepted in this case.

I should like to ask the minister these questions before dealing with the matter any further. First, did that examination take place with the knowledge or consent of the Department of Justice? Did it take place after consideration had been given to the whole question of the reliability of the lie detector device?

This is important because, if there has been no evidence to support the accuracy of the lie detector, then it should not have been used in that case, because it leads people to believe that this man is wrongfully serving a sentence. If, on the other hand, it has been accepted by the Department of Justice as a result of examination as being reasonably infallible, then I submit that the time has come when it should be generally applied throughout the penal institutions of this country.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The answer to the first question is, no. The answer to the second question is that the Department of Justice does not know anything at all about it. The answer to the third question is that the Department of Justice does not attempt in the penitentiaries to ascertain whether convictions pronounced in the courts charged with the administration of justice are proper or not.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Why then was this examination allowed of a man who had received a sentence to the penitentiary?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member will have to address his question to the attorney general of Ontario who has to do with the administration of justice in this province. The Department of Justice had nothing whatsoever to do with the incident to which the hon. member refers.

The house met at eleven o'clock.

TRADE AND EMPLOYMENT

PROPOSALS FOR CONSIDERATION BY INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE IN 1946

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table copies of proposals for expansion of world trade and employment which were communicated by the United States government, together with the text of a financial agreement between the United Kingdom and the United States, as signed at Washington on December 6, 1945, and related documents. These are in printed forms.

In connection with the tabling of these documents there is a brief statement I should like to make.

These proposals have been prepared for consideration by an international conference on trade and employment, which the United States government suggests should be convened by the united nations organization for the summer of 1946.

The government of the United States has proposed that all countries should concert their efforts in the sphere of their international economic relations, with a view to expanding the volume of world trade and maintaining high and stable levels of national employment. The specific suggestions for achieving these ends, set forth in the document which is now being tabled for the consideration of members of parliament, deserve our most careful study, for no country has a greater interest than Canada in the realization of these objectives.

Members of the house will recall that in withdrawing, on November 12 last, such tariff changes as had been incorporated in the budget resolutions the Minister of Finance stated that "within the last few days we have been given substantial ground for believing that the prospects of early international action for the reduction of tariffs and other barriers to world trade are considerably improved." The documents I am tabling to-day indicate that in the four weeks that have intervened, material progress has been made and that what was then a mere hope or expectation has become, to quote from the joint statement by President Truman and Prime Minister Attlee, "agreement on the broad principles of commercial policy for which the two governments will seek international support."

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE AT FORD MOTOR PLANT, WINDSOR

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I have just dispatched the following wire to the management and employees of the Ford Motor Company of Canada, also to Mr. Addes, international secretary treasurer of the union at Detroit:

The reply of the Ford Motor Company to the formula proposed by the union was received this morning. I have asked Mr. Greig to furnish a copy to Mr. Burt at Windsor this morning. In its reply the company pointed out the difficulties in the way of adopting the formula presented by the union including the fact that it would be impossible to find an arbitrator who could accept the responsibility on a time limit basis and particularly when it is the company's view that the selection should be made from the membership of the Supreme Court of Canada. Both the Honourable Mr. Daley and myself do believe that it would be difficult to bring about arbitration on a time limit basis and after giving the situation very serious consideration and because of the urgent and imperative necessity of getting the employees back to work we urge that the proposal made by the Honourable Mr. Daley and myself in our letter of November 27 be again put before your membership by referendum vote.

Both sides have now agreed that in calling men back to work seniority rules shall prevail as far as this is possible under the circumstances. If the Departments of Labour of the dominion and Ontario governments can be of assistance in the supervision of such vote we shall be very willing to arrange such assistance.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

AGRICULTURE DEPARTMENT—EMPLOYEES WITH UNIVERSITY DEGREES

Mr. NICHOLSON:

How many employees of the Department of Agriculture holding: (a) Bachelor's degree; (b) Master's degree; (c) Ph.D., are found in each of the following salary classifications—(1) less than $1,000; (2) $1,000-$2,000; (3) $2,000-$3,000; (4) over $3,000?

Mr. GARDINER:

(a) Bachelor's degree—1. Less than $1,000, 1; 2. $1,000-$2,000, 287; 3. $2,000-$3,000, 358; 4. Over $3,000, 96.

(b) Master's degree—1. Less than $1,000, nil; 2. $1,000-$2,000, 60; 3. $2,000-$3,000, 113; 4. Over $3,000, 47.

(c) Ph.D.—1. Less than $1,000, nil; 2. $1,000-$2,000, 10; 3. $2,000-$3,000, 41; 4. Over $3,000, 62.

CO-OP IMPLEMENT COMPANY—RAW MATERIALS FOR MANUFACTURE OF FARM MACHINERY

Mr. THATCHER:

1. Has the wartime prices and trade board received a request from the Co-Op Implement Company, Winnipeg, for an allotment of raw materials to allow it to commence manufacture of farm machinery?

2. If so, what action has been taken?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. Yes.

2. During the period that raw materials were under strict control all farm machinery manufacturers submitted their requirements of iron and steel to the administrator of farm and road machinery and municipal service equipment who in turn arranged with the steel controller of the Department of Munitions and Supply to approve the orders on the steel producers. Under this arrangement all requests for allotments of iron and steel made by Co-operative Implement Company Ltd., Winnipeg, were pro-rated along with all other implement manufacturers and supplied by the steel producers.

With the termination of the war certain restrictions were removed and the steel controller was no longer obliged to approve steel mill schedules.

Malleable castings are currently produced for the farm implement industry under the direction of the priorities officer of the Department of Munitions and Supply on recommendation of the administrator of farm and road machinery and municipal service equipment of the wartime prices and trade board. Requests made by the Co-operative Implement company are pro-rated on an equitable basis with all other implement manufacturers and are being produced and delivered.

COAL SUBSIDIES

Mr. GILLIS:

1. Were any subsidies paid by the government on imported coal consumed at the Globe and Mail Newspaper Publishing Company of Toronto from 1940 to the end of 1944?

2. If so, to what amount?

3. Were any such payments stopped, and why?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. Under the definition of "consumer goods", authorized by wartime prices and trade board during the period from April 1, 1943 to April 30, 1945, imports of United States bituminous coal and coke used for the heating of buildings or to provide customary and necessary service for such buildings (with certain exceptions) were eligible for subsidy consideration. As subsidies were paid to the dealer importing the coal and not to the end-user, Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation Ltd. has no record as to what subsidies were paid on coal consumed by individual concerns. Furthermore, were the information available, it would necessarily be withheld on the grounds that, in accordance with government policy as stated from time to time in the House of Commons by the Minister of Finance, it is not considered to be in the public interest to give information as to subsidies paid by Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation Ltd. to individual concerns. (Ref. House of Commons Debates No. 47, dated April 24, 1944, page 2281.)

2 and 3. Answered in one above.

PURCHASE OF TORONTO PROPERTY

Mr. FLEMING:

1. Has the government purchased property on or near Summit drive immediately north of Loretto abbey and east of Yonge boulevard, just outside the city of Toronto?

2. If so, from whom was the property purchased?

3. What is the area of the property and what buildings are located on it?

4. What price was paid for the property?

5. What use is intended for the property?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Purchase has been authorized and is now being completed.

2. A. L. Ellsworth, Esq., Toronto, Ontario.

3. (a) 23 acres. (b) Buildings on property comprise one large, three-storey, brick and stone residence; one "H" shaped, two-storey structure used for classrooms, offices and staff accommodation; greenhouse; one small summer house; and one pumphouse.

4. $100,000.

5. Permanent R.C.A.F. staff college.

PARLIAMENT HILL—ROADS AND SIDEWALKS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What is being done to clear the sidewalks and roads on parliament grounds this winter, and who is responsible for this work?

2. How many men and inspectors were engaged daily in snow removal during the recent snowstorms?

3. Does the government clear the snow from in front of all government buildings and crown property in Ottawa?

4. What modern equipment and plant have they for this work?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. (a) Ploughing, shovelling and hauling of snow; (b) federal district commission.

2. One hundred and one.

3. No.

4. Five motor truck ploughs, three tractor ploughs, two power graders, one bulldozer and five sanding and snow-hauling motor trucks. During large storms, five additional snow-hauling motor trucks are hired.

VETERANS' LAND ACT—PURCHASE OF LAND IN ONTARIO TOWNSHIPS

Mr. MENARY:

1. How many farms did the government purchase for the Veterans' Land Act in the townships of Minto, Maryborough, Peel, Arthur, West Luther, East Luther, West Garafraxa, Erin?

2. What was the average purchase price in each township?

3. When will these farms be available to veterans?

Mr. TUCKER:

1. Purchase completed of 9 farms.

2. Minto, $4,500; Maryborough, $4,800; Peel, $4,025; Arthur, —; West Luther, $4,800; East Luther, —; West Garafraxa, —; Erin, $3,800.

3. Five of the farms have already been disposed of to veterans. The balance are available now.

BRITISH COLUMBIA SECURITY COMMISSION—
C. W. VOLGER

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. Has C. W. Volger at anytime been employed by the British Columbia Security Commission?

2. If so, how long was he so employed?

3. What were his duties with this commission?

4. Is he still in the employ of such commission?

5. If not, when and how were his services terminated, and for what reason?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. Yes.

2. From April 1, 1942, to October 16, 1945.

3. April 1, 1942—carpenter, Hastings Park Centre. August 1, 1942—construction foreman, Slocan Project. November 16, 1942—construction foreman, Tashme Project. October 1, 1943—log scaler on wood fuel operations, Tashme Project.

4. No.

5. Employment was terminated by written notice of October 9, 1945, under authority of the commissioner of Japanese placement and effective October 16, 1945. Services were dispensed with upon the recommendation of the supervisor of the Tashme Project, Department of Labour.

INTERNATIONAL MILITARY TRIBUNAL

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Has the government of Canada signified its adherence to the agreement setting up the international military tribunal, which was signed by the representatives of United States, France, the United Kingdom and the Soviet Union, on August 8, 1945?

2. If not, under what conditions will the trials of persons accused of military atrocities against Canadian nationals be conducted?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. No.

2. Trials of persons accused of violations of the recognized laws and usages of war are being conducted in the European theatre by Canadian military courts convened pursuant to the War Crimes Regulations (Canada) by the general officer commanding the Canadian occupation force in Germany. Cases against particular accused are presented to the United Nations War Crimes commission, and if a prima facie case is found to exist, the accused is placed by the commission on the list of war criminals. Moreover, before trial the charges are required to be approved by the Judge Advocate General or his representative.

[Mr. Tucker.]

A military court has been so convened for the trial of Brigadefuhrer (Major General) Kurt Meyer, former commander of the 12th SS Panzer division (Hitler-Jugend). Meyer will stand trial on seven charges having to do with murder of forty-eight Canadian prisoners of war during the fighting in Normandy in June, July and August, 1944. Meyer's trial began at Aurich, Germany, on December 10, 1945.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

NATIONALIZATION

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. How many naturalization certificates have been revoked in the period September 10, 1939 to August 15, 1945?

2. What was the nationality of the persons whose naturalization certificates were revoked?

3. Has any action been taken to deport such persons to their country of origin?

4. If so, how many such persons are to be deported and what is the nationality in each case?

CIVIL SERVICE—MERCHANT SEAMEN

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Do merchant seamen have preference in the civil service?

2. If so, since when, and what is such preference?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT—ALIEN ENEMY PROPERTY—
SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. BURTON:

For a copy of all correspondence, bills of sale, applications and other documents in the possession of the Department of the Secretary of State, the custodian of enemy alien property and the soldier settlement board, received since the beginning of the war to date, in connection with the sale of N.W. ¼, section 2, T.P. 41, range 24, W. 2nd, in the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. MARTIN: Mr. Speaker, in acceding to this motion it is understood that it is done with the usual reservations.

Return tabled.

DOMINION ELECTIONS—MELVILLE, SASK.

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

For a copy of the evidence given at the public inquiry into the alleged irregularities of poll 50 in Melville constituency during the 1945 general election.

SERVICE PERSONNEL

QUESTION AS TO CANADIAN PRESS CORRESPONDENTS BOARDING TROOP SHIPS IN NEW YORK HARBOUR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I had a question which I wished to direct to the Minister of National Defence, but in his absence I saw the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) just before entering the house and he thought that he could answer it. In view of the fact that representatives of Canadian newspapers were not permitted to board the Queen Elizabeth when she docked in New York harbour last week, with thousands of returning Canadian soldiers and airmen aboard, will the government take steps to gain permission for representatives of Canadian newspapers to board ships arriving in New York harbour with returning Canadian service personnel aboard?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Obviously I am not in a position to state that Canadian correspondents were not permitted to go aboard the ship. Certainly if others were permitted to go aboard, Canadian correspondents should have been granted the same permission. There may be some important regulations that govern in this matter. The government will look into the matter at once and I shall ask the Minister of National Defence to make a reply later.

Mr. BRACKEN: That is satisfactory.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CANADIAN FLAG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I have a question to ask with respect to unfinished business at this late date in the session. One has to do with the Canadian flag. I understand that when a reference is made to a committee and the committee's work is not finished, the reference lapses. Is it the intention of the government to reorganize the flag committee next year in conformity with the recommendation of the committee?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The answer is yes.

EXTRADITION—ARRANGEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): There is one other item of unfinished business about which I wish to ask a question, namely, the extradition treaty. Is it the intention of the government to give the house an opportunity to discuss the report of the committee dealing with the extradition treaty. Perhaps the Minister of Justice can answer.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I understand that the committee has heard evidence and is reporting the evidence and recommending that the government give further consideration to the treaty and protocol, but that has not yet been done. There will not be, I understand from the report, an opportunity for the house to discuss the matter at this session, but the evidence taken and the recommendations of the committee will, in accordance with what I understand to be the practice, be considered by the government, whose decision will be announced as soon as it can be reached if the house happens to be then in session.

Mr. BRACKEN: There is no thought of making provision for discussing the report at this session?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, I do not think there will be any opportunity for doing that this session. I think it desirable that consideration be given to the recommendation of the committee before making it the subject of discussion leading to a decision.

Mr. HACKETT: May I ask the Minister of Justice if it is not the policy of the government to afford to the house an opportunity for discussion of the subject matter of a treaty before it is made? I shall not read into the record the attitude of the Prime Minister as set forth in Hansard of February 8, 1932, volume 1, page 46, in which he stated most emphatically that it was the position of the government—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The question of the hon. gentleman should be brief and to the point.

Mr. HACKETT: I will ask the minister if it is not the intention of the government to afford an opportunity to discuss the question of this treaty before it is renegotiated.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The policy of the government has been exhibited by its conduct in connection with this treaty. The protocol was signed and then the treaty and protocol were submitted to the house for its consideration before ratification. Then the matter was referred to the committee on external affairs, where evidence was taken. As I said a few moments ago, a decision has not yet been made by the government on the report of the committee. As soon as a decision is reached on the report of the committee, it will be announced.

WAR EXPENDITURES COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): May I follow the question asked by the leader of the opposition with a supplementary question. The War Expenditures committee has met very seldom and has not proceeded very far with its inquiry into public expenditures and the activities of the War Assets Corporation. Is it the intention of the government that the committee shall die, or is it to be continued during the recess? I understand that that would have to be done by the issue of a royal commission, but I am not sure.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I cannot say of my own knowledge, but I am informed that the committee intends to recommend that it be permitted to sit again next session. If that recommendation is made by the committee it will be carefully considered by the government.

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister? There has been a motion standing on the order paper for several weeks having to do with one of the earlier reports received from the committee on external affairs. Could the Prime Minister say whether an opportunity will be given to conclude that debate? It will take a very short time and it is, I think, of great importance to the future successful functioning of the committee.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I should think an opportunity ought to be given, but I imagine it will be the part of prudence to reserve the opportunity until towards the latter part of the session.

91. Departmental administration, $170,499.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I wish to call to the attention of the minister a situation which exists, I think, peculiarly in Alberta and which I think should be remedied, certainly not later than the next session. Out there, still being under the Northwest Territories Act, on a charge of murder the defence is allowed but six challenges. The crown on the other hand have six challenges and—I forget the number—it is thirty or forty "stand asides", at least that is the expression which has come to be used. The net position is just this, that if a man is charged with murder and a jury is being selected he can object to only six people, while the crown on the other hand is able to eliminate about fifty. Now it may be said that both have an equal number of challenges, but as the minister well knows, a "stand aside" is equivalent to a challenge so far as the person on the panel acting on that jury is concerned. I have had personal experience of this within the last six weeks or twelve months. In the case of a man charged with murder I used my six challenges, and then the crown simply went ahead and selected those jurors that they sought. I am not suggesting that there was anything wrong in what crown counsel did; he is an able man and a close personal friend; but I do say that that is a situation which in my judgment is simply crying for a remedy. I do not think that any member of the committee, knowing the seriousness of the crime with which such a man is charged, would wish to put him at any disadvantage whatever. The whole scheme of our administration of justice is that every consideration should be given to an accused person.

It may be that this is something in respect of which the provincial government should be consulted, although I do not think so. It is something over which they have no jurisdiction. I know they would expect to be consulted with respect to numbers of jurors and things of that kind, but I can think of no reason why they should expect to be consulted with respect to the number of challenges. In short, I am asking that we be put in just the same position as the other provinces and come under the criminal code with respect to challenges and selection of jurors in general.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I can assure the hon. member of my full sympathy with the object he has in view in the remarks he has made this morning. I give him the further assurance that his suggestion will be carefully considered, and if it is found that it is something we can do at once it will be attended to. If it should be felt that the attorney general of his province should be consulted, we will do that.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Thank you.

Mr. REID: Some short time ago the Minister of Justice made a statement regarding penitentiaries, to the effect that when a riot or disturbance took place in a penitentiary the request had been made to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation not to broadcast the information throughout the country. Anyone who has had to do with penitentiaries or has made visits to them realizes that in the various penitentiaries there are radios; these men are listening to what is going on, and the report of a disturbance or riot in one penitentiary does affect or might affect others. But it was reported in the press the other day that the new appointee to the head of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation had said: Despite what the Minister of Justice or the department has requested, we will broadcast any riot that takes place throughout the country. I know there is a tendency to set up bureaucratic bodies and say to parliament: Hands off; no political interference. That is all right, but to my way of thinking there is a new danger arising in this country, of setting up dictators in charge of boards and bureaux who are defying the very will of the people. Here is the first that has arisen, and I am asking the Minister of Justice to take note of the statement of the chairman of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, who says in effect that whether it is in the public interest or not, he as chairman will broadcast these things, and the Minister of Justice can go to the dickens. It is time this parliament, which is the voice of the people, resolved that this new dictatorship should not be allowed to go much farther than it has gone.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think the hon. member is under a misapprehension as to this "new dictatorship." Mr. Dunton was appointed chairman of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and he communicated with me the other day to inform me that at a meeting of the governors a resolution had been passed to the effect that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation could not refrain from broadcasting all news which was available to the newspapers and to the other broadcasting corporations. The resolution of the governors has been received, and there has been no opportunity as yet to give it consideration. But I should not like the impression to go out that this is a one-man decision of the new chairman of the board; and I can assure the hon. member that the resolution of the board of governors will be given careful consideration.

Mr. MacNICOL: With reference to the reclamation of prisoners sent to penitentiaries in Canada, a year ago I had an experience with a young man who had been committed to one of these institutions. I will not say which one, because that is neither here nor there; they are all in the same boat as far as that is concerned. Before being sent to prison he had worked in a butcher shop, and his mother was anxious that he should learn something more about butchering while in the penitentiary. I wrote to the warden conveying that request to him. Later I read an article in one of the publications put out in Toronto —I believe it was Hush. At any rate, it was one of those publications that do some good. I do not know how Hush got hold of the information, but there was an article about this young man not having been given an opportunity to learn the butchering trade in the penitentiary. That was the first I had heard about his having been turned down.

I remember well some years ago the minister's predecessor, the Hon. Ernest Lapointe, brought in a bill, and he said that without penitentiary reform he could not remain minister of justice. He said the situation was intolerable. Following that speech I myself went over to England to study prison reform, particularly with reference to the Borstal system. I studied the system as it existed in the prison near Leeds. I believe it was at Leeds that the Borstal system was organized. I learned that the system had done fine work. I should like to find out what programme we have for prison reform or for the reclaiming of prisoners in our penitentiaries. I am not one of those who believe that prisoners should be released indiscriminately. Possibly there are some who cannot be reclaimed, but I believe that there are many who can. What is the department doing along the Borstal line or in any other direction looking to the reclaiming of prisoners?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Apparently, in spite of the fact that the hon. member is a constant attendant at debates in the house, he must have nodded when the amendment to the Penitentiaries Act was being debated and when it was passed in this house a couple of weeks ago. On that occasion the matter was gone into fully—

Mr. MacNICOL: I remember that.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: —and an amendment to the Penitentiaries Act was put through to enable the government to appoint at once one commissioner to do the preparatory work of implementing as far as possible the Archambault report under the jurisdiction of the federal parliament. I said then that it was hoped there might be an opportunity during the dominion-provincial conference to discuss carrying it even farther than could be done under the jurisdiction the dominion now has over penitentiaries.

With respect to the case the hon. member mentions, I am sorry I am not a reader of Hush, and I do not know anything about it. But even under the present set-up it is the aim of wardens to see that training as effective and appropriate as possible is provided for those who are interned under their charge. I should be glad if the hon. member would give me the particulars in the case he mentions, because it would appear from what he says that something has gone wrong. I should like to have the case investigated and brought to the attention not only of the warden of the penitentiary in question but of the wardens of all penitentiaries in order to make them more careful in applying the policy, namely, of doing the best we can in the way of training and rehabilitation for convicted persons.

I hope that ere long there will have been selected a competent person to take on the job of going as far as possible with the implementing of the recommendations of the Archambault commission. It was not possible to do that during the war because of the shortage both of material and of man-power, but we have now reached the point where I hope both competent man-power and building material required for the purpose of carrying out these very commendable recommendations will be available.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do these recommendations envisage some such programme as the Borstal system?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The Borstal system could not properly be installed by the federal government, with the limited jurisdiction it has over penitentiaries. One of the purposes in trying to get a proper person as chairman of the commission is to have someone who will visit the attorneys general and discuss the situation in each of the provinces with a view to having all the governments do, in that direction, that which will be of benefit to the Canadian public by more effective rehabilitation programmes in dealing with persons who happen to fall by the wayside.

Mr. FLEMING: The matter I wish to refer to arises out of the observations of the hon. member for New Westminster. There is another side to the question he has raised. He complains of some display of dictatorship on the part of the general manager of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation with regard to the broadcasting of information relating to riots and other troubles in the penitentiaries. The other aspect of the matter is this. Although this sort of news has been appearing in the press regularly, and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, through its facilities, arranges with the Canadian Press to carry that kind of news along with other news, apparently some directive was issued by the Department of Justice to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation instructing them to discontinue broadcasts of the kind. I would respectfully invite the Minister of Justice to state what form of directive or instruction was issued by his department to the broadcasting corporation in connection with the discontinuance of broadcasts of news of that sort. I should like later to make a comment on it, but that information is due the house and the Canadian people because there has been some misunderstanding and a good many questions are being asked by the public as to the circumstances under which such directive or instruction was issued by the Department of Justice, to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No directive or instruction was issued by the department to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. It so happened that when the matter arose I took it up with the manager of the corporation. For the reasons that I put before him I obtained his compliance with a request that he ask the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to refrain from broadcasting that kind of news at the hours when the news broadcasts are allowed to be received in the penitentiaries. There was no directive; there were no instructions; there is no ground for alarm. It was a request that was made, and at the time they considered that the reasons for it were sufficient to justify the granting of the request. The board of governors have come to a different conclusion and the matter has not been further discussed.

When the request was made the staffs of the penitentiaries were as much restricted as it had been possible to make them because we had given leave of absence to large numbers of guards and others who wished to enlist in the armed forces. At that time I felt that it was a reasonable request to make, and the then manager of the broadcasting corporation felt that it was a reasonable request to accede to. The matter was mentioned here the other day when we were discussing the penitentiaries bill. It immediately raised a hue and cry and a storm of protest about the censorship that was to be exercised over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The governors in solemn session passed a resolution that they would not submit to that. That resolution has been received and has not yet been considered. That is the whole story so far.

Mr. FLEMING: Would the minister indicate what the policy of the department is likely to be now in view of the stand taken by the board of governors of the broadcasting corporation? I am not pressing this in any carping way, but since the matter has implications that may be more far-reaching than one is inclined to realize the committee might properly ask the minister for some indication of policy in the matter. It is indicated that the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation have asserted their right to continue these broadcasts notwithstanding the request from the minister. What policy does the minister propose to follow with reference to this matter and similar broadcasts of information?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The minister and the department propose to do their best to maintain order in the penitentiaries. The minister and the department know from experience that when news of trouble in one penitentiary penetrates into another it is disturbing. Now, as to what measures we shall have to adopt to prevent that cause of disturbance, no decision has yet been reached. It may be that we shall have to have some kind of filtering or monitoring system to prevent news that would be the cause of disturbances in the penitentiaries from getting in there. The simplest way seemed to be to prevent it from going on the air, but apparently there is strong objection to that method being adopted. We are certainly going to try to find some method of preventing that cause of disturbance in the penitentiaries.

Mr. FLEMING: I do not want to pursue the matter further, but I hope that some method can be worked out by the Department of Justice for doing what is necessary to preserve proper discipline within the penitentiaries without its becoming necesary to ask the broadcasting corporation to refrain from putting over the air waves information that is circulating freely in the press. I do not agree with the view expressed by the hon. member for New Westminster that it is evidence of dictatorship on the part of the C.B.C. when they assert the right to put over the air waves information that is published freely in the press. I rather think that in a situation of this kind the board of governors are to be commended for their determination to see that the same freedom exists on the air waves as exists in the press in the matter of the distribution of news. It is not evidence of dictatorship on the part of the C.B.C.; it is evidence that the C.B.C. appreciates its full responsibility to the public, regardless of whatever request may be received from the government. I think it is evidence of independent judgment in these matters on the part of the C.B.C. and an unwillingness to yield meekly to a request from a minister of the crown. It is highly important that in the broadcasting of news that the freedom of the C.B.C. be preserved, just as we want the freedom of the press to be preserved in regard to the printing of news.

Mr. REID: In answer to the hon. member (Mr. Fleming) may I say my chief reason for bringing the matter before the committee at this time was not to show that the C.B.C. or the manager was not attending to any directive or not paying attention to any directive, because I know that that body has been set up as a body independent of parliament. What I was objecting to was the request itself and what lay behind it. If the governors of the C.B.C. would investigate and speak to the wardens of the penitentiaries they would find out the truth. The warden in New Westminster told me that every time the news of a disturbance in a penitentiary comes over the air he has to put on extra guards. He can sense the feeling of the convicts and has to take extra precautions against trouble that may arise because that news has come over the radio. If the C.B.C. had looked into that matter and made an inquiry they might have taken this stand. While the minister has no right to give any direction to us and no right to expect that we will take it, the matter is worthy of attention.

When I mentioned the word "dictatorship," what I had in mind, and what I was objecting to, was this. I do not know whether the hon. member is aware of what we have been up against. We have many boards to-day, and when we think we have a real injustice and go to them they say: "We do not care about that; parliament has set us up as an independent body." When we go to the minister and mention these things he says: "Do not speak to me; I have nothing at all to do with that; parliament has set up that particular body"; and so we are drifting and losing our democracy and freedom. There are hundreds of other instances of the kind. I shall have something to say about the C.B.C. and what they are doing when we come to the appropriate item.

I just want to draw the attention of the committee to the fact that in this country we are drifting away from democracy and losing our freedom. The members who represent the people are being ruthlessly shoved to one side by members of these boards.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There were two or three questions I wanted to ask the minister, but with regard to the last matter just mentioned I think the minister acted somewhat indiscreetly in communicating with the general manager. He could have achieved the purpose he had in mind by filtering out those portions of the broadcast which might cause disturbances in other penitentiaries. I was glad to hear the hon. member for New Westminster speaking as he did. He simply reiterated what we on this side of the house have been saying for a long while—that surely the only risk that some of those bureaucrats run is your welfare and mine in some of the decisions which they make independently of parliament. Their decisions affect one's goings and comings, his spendings and earnings, and parliament continues to sit on matters of supply.

What I rose to speak about was something that the minister mentioned the other day. I realize the difficulties. In Canada to-day we have a definite crime wave, as they have in the United States.

Mr. MITCHELL: And in Great Britain, too.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In Great Britain, too, as my hon. friend says. It is becoming very serious. The multiplication of robberies with violence by men who commit murder warrants serious consideration. When men carry revolvers, pistols and the like they go out prepared to commit murder. I was surprised when I read the other day the extent to which revolvers and pistols are legally held by Canadians. The extent of what I call an evil—excepting where the carrying of guns is absolutely necessary—is appalling. According to the last registration there are over 222,000 revolvers legally owned in this dominion. This means there is a great bank available for thugs and desperadoes to be able to put themselves, by means of theft, in possession of the instruments of their profession. While I am far from advocating the use of unfair or strong-arm methods, I for one cannot see the need for that number of revolvers in this dominion, available, as I said a moment ago, as a bank to potential wrongdoers.

What consideration, I ask the minister, has been given to ostracizing the revolver and pistol in this country, removing them from the hands of all except those who require them and will properly guard their possession?

[Mr. Reid.]

The prospect facing us is fearful, when week by week, in spite of heavier sentences, robbery with violence is so much on the increase. These men cannot operate without revolvers and pistols. Shotguns are of no use to them at all because they are too easily seen. The only order in council I know anything about in this connection, and I obtained this information from the Department of Justice, is the one that was passed on July 23 last having to do with the regulation of weapons being brought back to Canada as war weapons, mementoes and war trophies. Has the minister given consideration to stringent legislation, or, if we have not time to pass such legislation at this session, an order in council, to banish the revolver as an instrument in the hands of people in this country, other than those who require it?

The situation in the old country, as the Minister of Labour stated, is most serious. The same can be said of the United States where, though their position is different from ours because of state rights, they are contemplating measures to take away from potential murderers their instruments and the insignia of their profession, as it were. I should like very much to hear the minister speak on this. I realize that he has given a great deal of thought to it, and anything he might propose I am sure would receive support right across this country. We do not want to see anything approaching regimentation; we are all in agreement on that, but this is not a case of regimentation. It is a case of the safety of the state in time of peace.

Mr. HACKETT: Poison in the hands of babies!

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes. It is really regulation necessary for the protection of society. A situation such as we face to-day demands drastic action. Punishment will not keep these people from the commission of crimes of violence and murder. Possibly the heavier the punishment, the more inclined they will be to commit murder when cornered, with the instruments at hand. I ask the minister what consideration has been given by his law officers to drastic interference with private rights, if you will, in the interests of the state.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The speech the hon. member has made and the answer I am going to make will bring to the department an increase in the flood of protestations against legislation to confiscate all small arms, coming from a very large number of perfectly respectable Canadian citizens. Some weeks ago the matter was mentioned in the house, and the impression got abroad, possibly not erroneously, that the law officers of the Department of Justice were preparing a draft for an order in council to be in effect until the end of the present session of parliament, to be accompanied by legislation introduced in the house to make such provision permanent. While I do not want to refer to the previous debate we had on the emergency powers bill, and perhaps I should not have mentioned it at all, I can at least say that the tone of the discussion in this house has been such that I think it is wise to abstain from the exercise of powers under the War Measures Act or similar legislation as much as may be compatible with a proper regard for the real interests of the Canadian people. The rumours that got about were to the effect that an order in council was being prepared to come into effect at once, and to be followed by legislation, the order in council to have no continuing effect if parliament did not enact the legislation.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Put it on the statute book immediately.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That gave rise to a flood of letters and telegrams from respectable people against that kind of violation of their freedom and property rights. The matter was given consideration, and the information I received was that before the war there were some 222,000 registered small arms and that there must be all of twice that many in the country at the present time. Some of these are held for perfectly legitimate purposes, in the hands of banks, trust companies, messenger companies and the like, and a very large proportion of them are war souvenirs and trophies. It was felt that an order of this kind would mean confiscating things having a value of some millions of dollars, according to present market values, for such arms, and that it would not do to go that far at this time.

I can say to the hon. member that the commissioner of the mounted police is much disturbed over the situation and, as I had occasion to say here the other day, his officers are discussing the matter with officers of the attorneys general of all the provinces. The criminal code calls for registration, and that registration is a matter of joint federal and provincial administration. That series of discussions is going on and an endeavour is being made to find some practical method that would appear to be acceptable to the majority and that would not be so drastic as to confiscate, from a large number of men who have risked their lives for this country and have been fortunate enough to return, things to which they attach considerable sentimental value. The situation is a difficult one, and I hope to have a recommendation not for council but for this parliament at as early a day as possible. It was found that it would not be possible to bring in a bill to amend the criminal code at this session, with any hope that it might be dealt with as it would deserve to be dealt with. I hope to have one at an early day, and to be able then to give the house the results of these discussions that are going on now in various parts of Canada as to what seems to be the reasonable thing to do for the protection of the public. No one will quarrel with the hon. member's suggestion that we should remove from the custody of potential murderers any small arms they may have, but that is perhaps a little like trying to remove from the penitentiaries the danger of disturbances arising of news about other disturbances elsewhere by preventing such news from being broadcast to the rest of the Canadian citizens. That may be too drastic a way to achieve the result that is sought.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the alternative to expropriation, say with compensation?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: One thing that is being considered, which is really not an alternative, is the tightening up of the registration and then making subject to confiscation everything that is not registered.

Mr. HACKETT: Could the owners of these weapons be called upon to deposit them for a period of five years?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That suggestion has not been considered, and I do not know that it would be looked upon as being much more satisfactory to the returned men than taking them away altogether. As I say, we are considering tightening up the registration system and making it obligatory to notify the police at once, if a small arm gets out of the possession of the registered owner. It would then be subject to confiscation. That would be easier as it would be quite proper to regard anyone who had a small arm which was not registered as not being the right kind of person to retain it. I would see no objection to confiscating everything that had not been so registered within a relatively short time. You could say to the individual: You were given an opportunity to keep this thing by complying with the law; you did not do it, and you are being punished individually for having committed an offence in failing to comply with the requirements of the law. To go out at once and pick up all these things regardless of the character of the person having them, regardless of how he acquired them, without any personal regard at all, would seem to me a pretty harsh procedure affecting a number of good Canadian citizens. It may be that the situation will develop in such a way that it will have to be done, but it would be regrettable to have to do it. We hope it may be possible to arrange something that will be reasonably efficient without going that far.

Mr. McKAY: Mr. Chairman, I have several observations to make on our penal system, and I think this is as good a time as any to make them. I notice there is another items on branch administration, but I had proposed to give this talk some time ago, and I feel that what I shall put before the committee is worthy of some consideration at this time. I have no apologies to make for taking up the time of the committee, because penal reform is a matter of major importance.

There is no doubt that the most effective method of dealing with young offenders, and we have plenty of them, is the application of the Borstal system which is used in the United Kingdom. The Archambault royal commission report advocated the adoption in Canada of the principles of this system. During the war years no attempt was made to implement many of these recommendations, especially the one with regard to Borstal institutions. The war was generally accepted as an adequate reason for inaction on the part of the government. However, now that the war is over I submit that there is no further reason for delay. A careful examination of the 1945-46 estimates under the services enumerated for the penitentiaries branch does not disclose any item that indicates any real attempt to implement the important recommendations made in the report of the royal commission, especially those with regard to Borstal schools. It has been suggested, and rightly so, that this federal capital has a high rating as a last resting place of royal commission reports.

The royal commission to investigate penal reform in Canada cost this country $108,719. It is the opinion of sincere students of penology, men who are not cranks but scientists and practical sociologists, that that report is one of the most noteworthy pronouncements on penal matters ever made by a responsible body in this country. The work was thorough, the calibre of the men on the commission was of the highest order, and the cost was not excessive provided that something is done about reforming our prison inmates. Otherwise the public may rightly assume that this expenditure was a waste of public money.

I submit that for every day that this nation delays in making the necessary reforms for the proper rehabilitation of the convicts in our prisons, it is paying dearly in wasted dollars, repeated crimes and unredeemed human life. The failure to modernize and to humanize our penal institutions is poor business. This country spends millions to perpetuate a system of crime schools. Because of their very nature our prisons fail to rehabilitate and reform the young offender. We are creating a criminal class by schooling them in the practice and technique of crime. Institutions such as we have fail to correct or cure; they are an expensive liability. According to United Kingdom and Canada year books, the rate of crime in this country as compared with England and Wales is four to one. Our crime convictions increased three hundred per cent between 1901 and 1935, and they are still increasing. Adult convictions per hundred thousand in Canada in 1900 were 109, but by 1940 they had increased to 452 per hundred thousand.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Are those convictions for crime, or do they cover convictions for violations of traffic laws and so on?

Mr. McKAY: Those are penitentiary offences.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Does the hon. member assert that those are convictions to penitentiary terms?

Mr. McKAY: They are major convictions. If the sentence exceeds two years the man goes to the penitentiary, but these are still major crimes. Most of these are recidivists.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Is the hon. member sure he is correct?

Mr. McKAY: Absolutely correct.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Is the hon. member saying that the statistics he is giving are of persons convicted to serve terms in the penitentiary?

Mr. McKAY: This information is taken from "Penal Institutions", by Topping. That is the statement made by Mr. Topping, who is a much greater expert in this field than I am. Most convicts are repeaters or, as they are called, recidivists. Three out of four males admitted to our penal institutions in 1943 and 1944, according to this same authority, had been previously convicted of crime. That is roughly seventy-five per cent.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has the hon. member figures pertaining to the results of the inquiry into the Borstal system of preventing repeaters?

Mr. McKAY: Yes, and I will give that information as I go along. Obviously, if these figures are accurate, and there is no reason to believe they are not, we are failing to reform our criminals. In 1925, 1,702 of the inmates in our penal institutions had been convicted three or more times, but by 1936 this figure had risen to 8,060, an alarming increase of almost 500 per cent. This should be a matter of serious concern. It does not matter whether they went to gaol or to a major penal institution under federal jurisdiction; the fact remains that the increase has been 500 per cent.

Penologists are alarmed, too, at the increase in the number of youths who are committed for breaches of the law. In 1931 there were 1,324 offenders between the ages of sixteen and twenty-one convicted for indictable offences, just five times the number in the United Kingdom, with four times our population. In 1943 according to the Canada Year Book, 53·3 per cent of our prison inmates were under thirty years of age.

Our penal institutions are costing this country millions of dollars. Apprehending the criminal and the maintenance of police and law courts cost many millions more. Tables have been compiled to show the cost to the country of 188 repeaters, selected from a group of 8,000 of these unfortunates. The number of convictions against these 188 was 3,434, or an average of 19 per person; 2,636 were major convictions, which cost an estimated $18,005 per prisoner. There were 798 minor convictions registered, which cost an average of $948 per person. The average cost of keeping each prisoner was $1,463 for gaol and reformatories, and $5,984 for penitentiaries. Without reckoning the loss to citizens occasioned by the crimes committed or the funds devoted to the relief of dependents or the economic loss to the nation because of the incarceration of these individuals, these 188 repeaters cost the country in gaol and reformatory costs, $264,876; penitentiary maintenance, $1,083,254; and cost of convictions, $3,258,960, or a total of $4,607,090, which amounts to an average cost of $25,453 per repeater, and at the same time prevention and welfare agencies spent $10 per head to aid or redeem these unfortunates. Surely we are penny wise and pound foolish.

Furthermore, costs are increasing; for according to the 1942 report of the superintendent of penitentiaries it cost $1.98 per day in 1941 for the maintenance of each prison inmate, and in the next year, 1942, the cost had risen to $2.18 per day. Last year the estimates of this government show that in the province of Ontario alone, for the maintenance of judges and law courts, which are a part of the machinery of justice for the handling of criminal cases we spent $5½ million.

Why do we have repeaters? One of the main reasons is that inmates are still permitted to mingle with one another—the youthful offender with the seasoned criminal. Furthermore the opportunity of educating and training these inmates is denied because they are unable to take that training under the conditions prevailing in our institutions at the present time. And the result is that when these young people come out of our penitentiaries they are not equipped to maintain themselves. Much of the training that is required is denied because of the inadequacy of accommodation in our prison institutions. I suggest further that it may be because of the lack of trained personnel to train and advise these young people.

In reply to a question which I put on the order paper the Minister of Justice replied on October 31 to the effect that 137 changes as recommended by the royal commission had been implemented. But these changes were mostly of a minor nature and to ease the hardships of some prisoners does not change the punitive and repressive nature of our prison regime. One major recommendation, the installation of the Borstal system, has not been acted upon.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: And cannot be acted upon until there is some change in our constitution.

Mr. McKAY: The failure to act promptly on this particular recommendation means that young people are still leaving our prisons worse members of society than when they entered. This is a severe indictment of our system but wholly justified by the results.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): They were not very good members of society when they went into those institutions.

Mr. McKAY: No, they were not. To permit the young offender to associate with the hardened criminal has brought disastrous consequences. This is well illustrated in an editorial which appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune on July 23, 1944. I shall not take time to read it, but the editorial refers to a young girl who was convicted of a minor offence, driving a motor car at an excessive rate of speed. When she got out of prison she made the charge that the gaol was a school of crime, and she claimed that from the knowledge she acquired while there she is now acquainted with the hang-out of criminals in Winnipeg and could get in touch with half a dozen dope addicts in twenty minutes.

An hon. MEMBER: Did she give that information to the police?

Mr. McKAY: Yes, and the police are investigating.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What institution was that? Was it Portage la Prairie?

Mr. McKAY: I believe it was. It takes a lot of time to answer questions, Mr. Chairman, and I do not wish to take up too much of the time of the committee.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am backing you in what you just said.

Mr. McKAY: The hope of preventing the repetition of an offence is not only the main object but the sole permissible object of inflicting criminal punishment. I ask the hon. members if they believe that the herding of young offenders into institutions along with experienced criminals is the way to accomplish this aim.

Burgoyne, president of the Prisoners' Aid and Welfare Association of Montreal, and a penologist of note, writes in his booklet "Some Tragic Defects in Canadian Court and Prison Systems":

> An attempt has been made to segregate young offenders but the English Borstal system has not been applied anywhere.

In Collins Bay, which a number of us from this house visited not very long ago, we found that some young offenders are sent out to the prison farm, but there is still no attempt at segregation so far as we could ascertain, because they are still allowed to work along with seasoned criminals; and if they do choose to go to the prison farm they are deprived of access to the prison workships, where they might learn a trade, because they cannot do both things at the same time.

The failure to rehabilitate these young offenders is a costly business, and our penal institutions fail to deter. In the United Kingdom, before the inception of the Borstal institutions, 64 per cent of the male and 87 per cent of the female convicts had been previously convicted, and 53·3 per cent had been convicted before the age of sixteen. Our institutions do not deter, because in the first place they destroy initiative. In some of our penal institutions, certainly at Portsmouth, we allow an inmate five cents a day no matter whether he happens to be a head pressman, a floor cleaner, or a loafer. An inmate should have work fitted to his ability, his capacity and his interests. There should be some sort of wage schedule, not with payments as large as one finds in normal life, but with some remuneration. A man's personality is suppressed; regimentation causes a loss of identity. The worker and the loafer go together, the young and the old, the youthful offender and the practised criminal are on the same plane. There is a certain deterioration of memory; monotony will do that to anyone, and the man loses all social contact because of the lack of desirable association. The net result is that the inmate is divorced from the world. Therefore the adjustment to society which we enjoy is almost impossible. When freedom is resumed, what does he do? There is very little opportunity but to follow the line of least resistance, so he continues a career of crime. He becomes an outcast and a social derelict.

We must approach this major problem of moral ill health as we approach physical or mental illness. We should seek to cure the criminal by personal treatment, and first we should endeavour to remove the social and economic causes of crime by preventive measures. Crime must be treated scientifically and not emotionally. Failure to do so will result in an increasing number of criminals and an enormous waste of public funds. Failure to reform these young people will result in our society being castigated by posterity. A French scientist has said, "Every society has the criminals it deserves", and we are getting just that.

Removal of causes of crime is fundamental, and therefore we must look to our economic system, which tolerates depressions and unemployment and therefore reaps the harvest of crime. Every depression thrusts thousands into a condition of destitution. People become destitute not as a result of bad character but owing to the failure of society to organize its economic life scientifically. The unemployed man who steals for his hungry family is regarded as a criminal. We have not advanced very far since the days of Victor Hugo's Jean Valjean. There are people, however, who consider that a society which tolerates unemployment is the real criminal, and from that attitude springs hope for the future. We should not overlook the fact that boys and girls who cannot find work are not wholly to blame for their wasted lives. Society—and that includes all of us—is the real culprit.

Let us not forget that serious offences increased in the United Kingdom during the great depression from 2,819 in 1920 to 11,638 in 1928, an increase of 400 per cent. The prison commission of the United Kingdom has stated that in its opinion the major cause of crime is unemployment. Doctor Devon, who is the Scottish prison commissioner, makes this statement:

> My personal view is that poverty and destitution are at the root of most offences against the law.

While we have conditions of poverty and bad housing we may expect a certain amount of delinquency. I have not time to discuss these factors at length, but it is a matter which we can discuss on a later occasion. I would say that in so far as we allow bad housing, inadequate education, the increasing consumption of liquor, and a steadily mounting divorce rate from year to year, and the physical and mental abnormalities to exist which normally cause juvenile delinquency, we are not doing very much to relieve this menace to our society.

But despite economic and social conditions which need correction, the Borstal institutions could make a substantial contribution to the reform and rehabilitation of young offenders. It has proven its worth in Britain. Borstal institutions are primarily for the purpose of reforming young people who run foul of the law. There are many of them. In one great Canadian city with which I am familiar there has been an increase of forty-five per cent in juvenile delinquency during the war years. Crime begins early. Doctor Goring of the United Kingdom states that 53·3 per cent of habitual offenders were convicted in the United Kingdom before they were sixteen years of age.

Borstal institutions treat young offenders between the ages of 16 and 23. They are committed to Borstal for three years for a training programme. They are never considered as convicts and are not stigmatized as such. A study of the releases from Borstal schools reveals that seventy per cent of the offenders made good on return to normal life after the first term, and that after a second term most of the remainder made good. In all over eighty-five per cent of these young people, who might have become a serious problem and a menace to society, became respectable citizens.

Experiments in self-government are conducted in Borstal institutions. The honour system is employed as in the boy scout organization. Trades are taught. Competitions are held between houses of the institution, which create a pride in accomplishment. Citizenship and morality are taught. The boys are studied individually and are treated as equals, not as outcasts. This training programme has produced amazing results. Young people leave these schools with a new outlook on life and a new goal to attain. Life takes on a new meaning for them. Most of them are never reconvicted. That is good business. Britain, because of this enlightened approach to the serious problem of the young offender, has cut in two her prison population.

I submit that now is the time to establish Borstal schools in Canada. We have vacant military, naval and air force establishments which are available. No longer can the government excuse inaction by stating that materials and space are not procurable. Whatever explanations may be given for any further delay in implementing the recommendations of this commission report, especially with reference to Borstal schools, on the ground of inability to get the provinces and the dominion together will be no longer tolerated by the public. Further delay will only aggravate an already deplorable situation, which is most costly and wasteful. I suggest that now is the time to staff adequately a board of prison commissioners and clothe this board with sufficient power to make the recommended changes in our penal system. I say "commissioners", and I mean just that. There should be at least three members on that commission.

I further suggest that an adult probation system should be inaugurated at the earliest possible day, and that the training of personnel for such a system be embarked upon right now.

Lastly, it would appear advisable to place the administration of the penitentiaries branch under the Department of National Health and Welfare. The reform and rehabilitation of convicts is unquestionably a social problem and should therefore be administered by a department concerned with the physical, mental and social welfare of our nation.

Let us set out to rehabilitate the criminal and build for him a new world of truth, justice and brotherhood in keeping with our obligations to other members of the community. May I close by invoking an enlightened attitude towards this subject as well as a common-sense business approach. I hope our actions in this house will result in the modern equivalent of, "I was in prison and ye came unto me."

Mr. HACKETT: I preface the few remarks I wish to make with regard to the occupation of judges by asking the minister if he is in a position to say how many judges appointed by federal authority are at present engaged in work on commissions or in any other work outside the pursuit of their ordinary judicial duties, and if he can also give the same information for the past five years.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I have not that information. I know there are some judges who have been appointed to commissions. Some of them have completed the work they were asked to do and some have not. I presume I could get the information, but I am sorry to say I have not got it here.

Mr. HACKETT: I would like to suggest to the committee that the practice of appointing judges to commissions where the questions at issue are not judicial—they are sometimes social and frequently tinged with politics—has been indulged in not only by the present administration or by the one which preceded it. Both major parties have resorted to this practice, and it is because I believe that the practice is an improper one that I wish to draw it in a particular way to the attention of the minister.

This morning we heard the Minister of Labour refer to the possibility of appointing a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada to compose a conflict between capital and labour which for several months has baffled all agencies which have attempted to compose it. It is true that the Canadian people have great confidence in their judiciary, and it is well that it should be thus. But I submit that the continuation of this practice will undermine, and I am sorry to say that in my opinion it is already undermining, the respect that our people have for our judiciary. I shall refrain from mentioning particular instances, but there is no man who is familiar with the administration of justice in Canada who cannot, within his own personal experience of the last few years, pick out instances in which the judiciary has been drawn into controversies which were far from being judicial, controversies which in the result have tagged this judge as one favourable to capital, this judge as one favourable to labour, this judge as favourable to one political party and this judge to another, this judge as favourable to one fiscal or financial theory and this other judge as favourable to an opposite theory. This I think is highly reprehensible and regrettable. We have a number of institutions in the country of which we are very proud, and of none are the Canadian people more proud and more justly proud than of its judiciary. The practice of taking men away from their judicial functions to hold a semi-political problem in abeyance, pending the formation of a policy which may prove a solvent for it, is highly unfortunate. It not only results in the deterioration of the respect that Canadians have for their judges; it delays the administration of justice. Judges taken away from their duties are not replaced and the administration of justice frequently suffers.

I am confident that the minister is aware of many such instances, and it is quite probable they have been drawn to his attention. Judges are frequently not unwilling to accept these additional tasks because it sometimes affords them an opportunity for increasing a remuneration which in my opinion is entirely inadequate. If our judges received a compensation which enabled them to live on a plane commensurate with the importance of duties they perform, it is quite possible that the temptation to take on this additional extra judicial work would not be as great, and it might enable the members of the judiciary to resist the temptation to augment in this way their totally insufficient salaries.

I therefore ask the minister if it is not possible to put an end to this practice, which has, as a direct result, the slowing down of the administration of justice in all jurisdictions and the exposure of the judiciary to a loss of reputation for impartiality which is so essential to the maintenance of the administration of justice on the high plane on which it has always been in Canada.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): In a moment I am going to disagree with many of the things that the hon. member for Stanstead has said. You see, there is some independence in this group over here. First I want to make a suggestion to the minister in connection with this revolver and pistol business. It may be foolish, but it may have some merit. Can we not help the situation by having complete restrictions, or at least tightly drawn restrictions, on the sale of ammunition? We have all these guns in the country, and it seems reasonable to suppose that in a comparatively short length of time the ammunition that a man brought back in his pocket will be exhausted through target practice, shooting sparrows, or something of the kind. Unfortunately some of it may be used on ourselves. But in any event within a limited time surely it will be exhausted. My information is that revolver ammunition is of a specialized kind. I take it the idea is that a man who has some crows on his farm may have a shot gun or a rifle, but he does not need something that he can pack in his pocket and probably use on his neighbour. I think that is at the bottom of the whole business. A revolver is not much good if you have nothing to shoot from it.

May I now come to the views expressed by the hon. member for Stanstead. He seems to take issue with something I said in this house some time ago, when we were dealing with labour. I want to make it plain that my views in that connection are based on this broad principle, namely, the rule of law. Everything that we have in the way of protection of the individual has been obtained by enforcing honesty in business transactions. After all, laws are nothing more than the codification of good sense and good morals. That is all they are at any time, and all that this country has accomplished, at least socially. What does it rest on? It rests broad-based on the rule of law. That is the main reason why in labour matters I did suggest an appeal by either party from a board of conciliation to a judge of the supreme court. I go further. Do not worry; I give my hon. friend credit for the finest intentions in the world. He is a man of great capacities and long experience. I know quite a number of judges, and I say that in my view they do not accept these assignments with any idea of an increase in income, because all they get is a living allowance. Let me put it in this way: in the province from which I come that is the situation. Why do they do these things? I do not think they like these assignments. but they do accept them as a matter of public duty. Say the hon. member for Stanstead and I have a lawsuit, and I go before the hon. member for Lake Centre who some day will be the chief justice of an important part of this country. Suppose I lose my lawsuit to my friend over here; my first reaction will be to damn gently the hon. member for Lake Centre. That is just human nature. We think he is no good. But we get over that after the first blush on losing, because no one likes to lose; after that passes the thing goes on.

What is the great value of a court of law in civil business? It is this. We hope that the judgments are right, but we know that, the judgment having been given, the business of the country can proceed. It seems to me that that is a consideration which is not given sufficient attention.

On the political side I want to say this. We will assume that in another election, were I to run, which I am not going to do, I was beaten and dissatisfied, and I had the opportunity of picking my judge. I would accept the judge who before he was appointed to the bench was of a political persuasion other than my own. Why? For this very good reason, that I know of nothing to which judges are so sensitive as the suggestion that they may have political bias. My experience, and it is somewhat broad, is that rather than have anybody think anything of the kind, and in order to be perfectly straight, they will lean backwards in the other direction. May I go with the hon. member, though, and go with him a long way in this? We do not pay our judges nearly enough. What is the result? We will say that there are a number of people who would accept an appointment to the bench, but many of them simply cannot do it. Why not? They have a scale of living to which they have become accustomed, a family to clothe, educate and so on, and they simply cannot do it—they cannot make a quick reduction in income; let me put it in that way. I refer to that scale of living as something which grew normally from the money they earned, and they cannot just drop down in that scale and carry on their ordinary duties to their family and friends.

I am happy to say that I had the opportunity of a chat with the Minister of Justice on this question the other day. I know he is in entire agreement with the views I have expressed. He had expressed them before in this house on two occasions.

Mr. MacINNIS: I intended to say a few words on the matter that was spoken to by the hon. member for Lake Centre, namely, the crime wave and how to control it. I am not going to deal with the control of firearms. I realize that it is a difficult problem, because the firearms which are generally used in crimes are, I suppose, those which are not registered. The department knows where the registered firearms are and can confiscate them, but it does not know where the firearms are that are not registered.

The crime wave which has struck this country in the last year or two is not peculiar to Canada. I notice from the press that it is world-wide. In the press yesterday I saw that Scotland Yard had made an appeal to the people of Britain to assist. A few days ago I read that Moscow was in pretty much the same position, and the same is true of the United States. We must conclude therefore that this crime wave has developed out of the way of life of so many people during the past five or six years. This being so I do not think we can remedy the situation by statutes or laws or regulations. It can be overcome ultimately only by leading our people into more constructive ways of life, giving them obligations and opportunities to carry out those obligations, and in this way building up their responsibilities. In my opinion we can never eliminate crimes of violence or any other sort of crimes against society by laws and penitentiaries and prisons and police and all that sort of thing. We can do it only by building up in our people a sense of obligation to the community. In the past I think we have placed too much emphasis on our rights without at the same time emphasizing our obligations. But it follows that if we are to put people in a position to lead constructive and useful lives, they must feel that others consider them to be useful and decent members of society. I know of nothing that will help a person have greater regard for his honour and integrity than to feel that other people believe in him. That is all I want to say on this point.

In regard to the controversy between the hon. member for Calgary West and the hon. member for Stanstead in the matter of judges acting in labour disputes—

Mr. HACKETT: Not only labour disputes; all extra-judicial work.

Mr. MacINNIS: I will deal with the labour dispute point, because it is the one with which I am most familiar. I think that generally speaking, organized labour has more confidence in a court or board presided over by an eminent judge than in a board presided over by anyone else, and we should have such courts and boards where the judges are chosen with great care. But I do not believe it would be a good policy to allow appeals from boards of that kind to any judge or court. These cases should be confined to labour courts only, and these decisions should not be referred to any judge outside that court.

Mr. PEARKES: I can readily understand the desire of a man to retain as a souvenir a weapon he had used or had captured on the battlefield, but seldom would he wish to use that weapon after obtaining it. I suggest that such weapons could be made ineffective by any armourer or gunsmith at the time of registration, which might possibly prevent them from falling into the hands of criminals.

Mr. McMASTER: Some weeks ago I took part in the discussion on the penitentiary bill, but at that time I did not say exactly what I intended to say in regard to the enforcement of law. I intended to say that if the law is adequately enforced and the sentences sufficiently severe, ultimately this crime wave will wear itself out. I did not like to say to the minister at that time that everything of that kind must come from the top, that it must emanate from the Minister of Justice to the extent that the dominion government has power. I realize, of course, that a great deal of the administration is in the hands of the provinces, and that the responsibility is theirs perhaps more than it is that of the Minister of Justice. But in the last twenty years a tendency has grown up to have a sort of maudlin sympathy for criminals, which I think is partly responsible for this crime wave. I remember a few years ago reading in the newspapers that in Turkey they desired to do something which would distinguish the criminal from the non-criminal, and decided the way to do it was to brand the criminal. I was fearful lest some suggestion of the kind might be made in Canada, because I was afraid many people would not want to brand the criminal and would prefer to brand the non-criminals, as I thought I might come within that class and be disfigured. However, I believe if the laws are adequately enforced this crime wave finally will wear itself out.

There is an old saying that it is better for a hundred guilty men to go free than for one innocent man to be punished wrongfully. I believe that is a bad maxim, because a great many guilty men do go free because of the fact that judges and even juries are loath to convict a man unless they are completely satisfied of his guilt. Incidentally in some jurisdictions the court of appeal seems to be the least willing to convict anyone if there is even a technical deviation from the enforcement of justice.

There is one matter about which I have always felt rather strongly, that is, the mental examination of men who come up for trial in connection with these crimes. I am satisfied that a great many criminals and potential criminals are suffering from schizophrenia or dementia praecox, and these men will never be any better because as far as I know there has never been much of an attempt made to cure these diseases, nor has a great deal of attention been paid to them either by the medical profession or by those enforcing the law. I know one man who has just been acquitted on a charge of forgery. I am certain he was guilty, and he is suffering from one of these diseases. We were hoping that when he was brought before the court he would be given a mental examination, but no such examination was made and it seems impossible for any authority to go into that home and compel that man to submit to an examination. Yet if an examination were made it might show that he should be incarcerated and thus prevented from committing other crimes, as he surely will in the near future.

On the question of revolvers, the only reason for taking them away from those who have them and who may need them to protect their lives and property is that such revolvers may be stolen by people who will use them in the commission of crime. I do not think it is possible to withhold revolvers from potential criminals. They get them in many different ways, and it would seem inadvisable that 222,000 people should be deprived of revolvers lest someone should steal them. I do not read stories of crimes in the newspapers as a matter of interest, but if I read the news aright it is not only revolvers that are used by these criminals. To-day they are using much more deadly weapons, so I believe it would be foolish to take from law-abiding men their only weapon of defence, when criminals and potential criminals are able to obtain much more deadly weapons.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There was one matter I wanted to bring to the attention of the minister in connection with the administration of justice in Saskatchewan. A six man jury system was brought into effect in that province about 1932 as a result of a request by the then Saskatchewan government. This change was made with a view to saving money through a reduction in jury fees. The same system was adopted in one or more other provinces in the middle west. I think it is generally agreed that the six men jury system has not worked out as satisfactorily as the traditional twelve men jury. There is something about the twelve men jury that is lacking in a jury with lesser numbers. The exercise of control by a judge is more definite in the case of the smaller jury. Tradition and experience have shown that a jury of twelve men is the ideal number. Has the minister had under consideration the amendment of the criminal code to enable Saskatchewan to return to the old system of twelve men juries? Representations were made at the last two meetings of the Saskatchewan Bar Association, but I am not certain whether those have been transmitted to the minister with a view to an amendment of the criminal code.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Dealing only with the last question of the hon. member for Lake Centre, may I say that I have no knowledge of any representations having been received from the government or the attorney general of Saskatchewan. I should not like to initiate any change that was not suggested by the attorney general, who is of course primarily responsible for the administration of justice in his province. If I may be permitted, I would suggest that the resolutions of the Saskatchewan Bar Association be brought to the attention of the attorney general of the province. I can assure my hon. friend that if the attorney general will in turn bring them to our attention and suggest that he would like to have them dealt with, careful consideration will be given to them.

If it is not the wish of the committee that this item should carry now, I shall have to ask that it be allowed to stand, because there is a matter of great urgency that requires my presence elsewhere. I shall endeavour to be back in the committee as quickly as possible, when I shall deal with the questions which were raised this morning and with such others as may require attention.

Item stands.

MINES AND RESOURCES

Lands, parks and forests branch—

137. Branch administration, $20.000.

Mr. BROOKS: Before the war provision was made for national parks in practically every province but New Brunswick. I understand that at that time there was some difficulty with the provincial government over the selection of a site. Has there been any consultation with the provincial government regarding a site, and are steps being taken to establish a national park in New Brunswick?

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources): The matter is under consideration. The provincial government have two or three sites in view but they have not decided which one they will offer to the dominion government.

Mr. BROOKS: That has been the situation for the last six or seven years. Before the war there were two or three sites under consideration, but nothing has been done as yet. Are they still considering two or three different sites, or has the matter been allowed to stand all this time without anything being done?

Mr. GLEN: At the present time the provincial government is considering two or three sites. As soon as they have settled the matter we will then consider the formation of a national park.

Mr. BROOKS: Can the minister give the location of the different sites in New Brunswick which are under consideration at the present time?

Mr. GLEN: I have not that information at the moment, but I can get it and give it to the hon. member.

Mr. BRACKEN: Under what item would aids to road construction be taken up?

Mr. GLEN: That would come under the surveys and engineering branch, item 150.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Are permits being issued to settlers near Riding Mountain national park to cut timber for lumber purposes, and if so, what price is being charged them per thousand?

Mr. GLEN: The timber in Riding Mountain national park is budgeted each year. Certain areas are set aside and for these permits are granted.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: What price is charged to the settlers per thousand?

Mr. GLEN: I have not that figure here, but I can supply it later.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Is there a uniform price charged to all who cut timber in Riding Mountain national park, or is there one price for large contractors who take a timber berth and a different price for the ordinary settler who wishes to get a permit to cut timber in the park?

Mr. GLEN: As the hon. member knows, there have been two timber limits in that park area for many years. But the price to the settlers is uniform.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: This is important, Mr. Chairman, because it involves a matter of policy. According to a return that I received from the minister's department on September 11, 1945, there were in the park two timber berths, Nos. 571 and 551D, which have been contracted for by the Northern Trust company. They have taken out since 1940, according to the figures I have here, a total of over 7,000,000 board feet of lumber at a price slightly over $7,000, which works out at one dollar per thousand. At the same time the settlers and people living around the park who wish to take out lumber in smaller lots pay considerably more than that. Why is there this tremendous difference? In the first place I do not think that one dollar per thousand for lumber is very good business on the part of the government. The lumber is worth considerably more than that. I should like to know why there should be any difference in the price charged to the settler who cuts lumber for himself and the price charged to the Northern Trust company.

Mr. GLEN: There are two limits there that were granted long before the park came into being, and the contractors are taking off that timber. As soon as it is cleared, those areas will be taken over by the park. That is the reason for the discrimination. We cannot interfere with what is already a contract with those who purchased these limits prior to the establishment of the park.

[Mr. Bracken.]

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Do I understand the minister to say that the department has no power to alter a contract that was entered into before the area became a park? If that is so, it is strange, to say the least.

Mr. GLEN: That is so; we cannot alter the contract.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): Is there any movement to take some provincial parks and bring them under federal jurisdiction? I have in mind Kenosee park. There has been some talk of its being made a national park. Have recommendations to that effect been made to the department?

Mr. GLEN: No recommendations have been made as such. A national park can be established only on land given by the province to the dominion for the purpose.

Mr. MacNICOL: How far does Wood Buffalo park extend into the Northwest Territories? You start passing the park on the Slave river south of Fort Fitzgerald, which is in northern Alberta. Does the park extend into the Northwest Territories?

Mr. GLEN: There are nearly 14,000 square miles of it in the province of Alberta, 3,625 square miles in the Northwest Territories.

Mr. MacNICOL: That park in Alberta comes under this department?

Mr. GLEN: Yes.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Has any discussion taken place with British Columbia with regard to taking over Forbidden Plateau as a national park?

Mr. GLEN: Some proposals have been made, but no conclusion has been arrived at. The provincial government is considering the matter and will submit a proposal.

Item agreed to.

Government of the Northwest Territories—

139. Eastern Arctic expedition, $75,000.

Mr. BROOKS: I presume this is the expedition which leaves Nova Scotia every year to take supplies to the northern country?

Mr. GLEN: It leaves from Montreal.

Mr. BROOKS: The details show $200 for supplies and materials, and $65,000 for freight, express, telegrams, postage, and so forth. Do other departments supply the materials and goods sent to the northern country, or does it all come under this department?

Mr. GLEN: The supplies are purchased from other votes for the different departments. This item covers chiefly the freight.

Mr. GREEN: Can the minister tell us what plans the government have in mind for checking up and developing the resources in the Northwest Territories? There was a small vote under the war appropriation bill, "Report on resources, etc., of Canada's northwest region, $5,000," which will be found at page 554 of Hansard. One of the most important jobs which the Canadian government has, I think, is to assist in opening up the Northwest Territories. I would ask the minister to let us know what is being done in that connection.

Mr. GLEN: While the vote for general administration shows a decrease of $75,000, the actual expenditures for the year 1944-45 were $372,689. It should be pointed out that there will be included in the supplementary estimates for the current year an item of $553,800 for the Northwest Territories, which will bring the appropriations to $933,485. I mention this for the purpose of informing the members that the government is making provision for increased facilities of many kinds in the territories. The moneys in the supplementary vote are being used for the following purposes:

Yellowknife Airport	$245,000
Administration and staff buildings	140,000
Additional forest protection	140,000
Other improvements and facilities	28,800

Mr. GREEN: Are these in the Yellowknife area?

Mr. GLEN: Yes, chiefly. In addition to these expenditures, considerable moneys from other votes of the department are being expended in developing the resources of the territories. An extensive geological field survey programme has been carried out in the Northwest Territories during the last three years, and this was enlarged during the past season. In addition several topographical parties were in the field, and every effort is being made to have the most important areas properly mapped. As well, the hydrographic service did considerable charting work on the Mackenzie river route to improve water transportation, and also completed the charting of the Yellowknife bay area in Great Slave lake. Other geodetic and legal survey parties were also in the area during the past summer. The Dominion Water and Power Bureau also carried out reconnaissance and field investigations of the power possibilities in the vicinity of Yellowknife and established a number of gauging stations on certain important rivers and streams. Hon. members will be interested in knowing that to provide for the increase in population at Yellowknife a new townsite has been surveyed.

Mr. MacNICOL: And that is adjacent to the island?

Mr. GLEN: Adjacent to the island, on the road to the airport. It will be appreciated that the two votes mentioned do not cover all the dominion expenditures being made to open up this part of Canada. The Department of Public Works has appropriated a considerable sum to construct a portage road from the St. Charles rapids to Great Bear lake. The construction of this road will be completed in the near future.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is on the Great Bear river?

Mr. GLEN: On the Great Bear river, yes. Other funds have been provided by the same department to improve the Mackenzie river waterway which at present is a principal medium of transportation. An active programme of dredging was carried out last summer on the Clearwater and Athabaska rivers. The construction of a special dredge is now under way which will be used in deepening the channel in the Athabaska delta and will be ready for use next year. Other expenditures are being made for the purpose of improving the wharfage facilities at Fort Smith, and investigations are being carried out for the purpose of bringing about improvements in similar facilities at the principal points along the river route.

Every effort is being made by the government to lower the transportation costs into the territories. This is perhaps the most important problem that has to be dealt with. The members will recall that jurisdiction has now been given to the board of transport commissioners in reference to the water transportation in the Mackenzie river area.

Mr. MacNICOL: They will have to cut down the freight rates.

Mr. GLEN: That is the idea. This will permit a proper investigation of the existing water rates. In order to provide other means of transportation, an agreement has now been reached with the Alberta government for the construction of an all-weather road from Grimshaw, Alberta, to Hay river settlement on Great Slave lake.

Mr. MacNICOL: Are they not going to run on to Mill's lake? My information is that at Hay river falls one route goes to the mouth of the Hay river and the other goes to Mill's lake, forty miles west of Fort Providence.

Mr. GLEN: Of course that may be a matter which will be followed up later.

Mr. MacNICOL: I know where that Grimshaw road is.

Mr. GLEN: Surveys are being made at the present time, and they will be able to start in next year. Approximately 300 miles of this road is in Alberta, and 80 miles in the Northwest Territories. Under the terms of the agreement the dominion and the province will share jointly the cost of construction of the provincial section, the dominion will contribute an amount not exceeding two-thirds of the cost, and the province will contribute not less than one-third. The section of the highway in the Northwest Territories will be built entirely at the cost of the dominion.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is north of the 60th parallel.

Mr. GLEN: Three hundred miles is in Alberta and eighty miles in the Northwest Territories. It is expected that the province will be calling for tenders for the provincial section in a few weeks and active construction work will commence early next year. It is anticipated that the road will be completed by the end of the year 1947.

Mr. GREEN: Has there been any increase in the population of the Northwest Territories? Perhaps the minister can tell us what the possibilities are of employment in that area for men who are being demobilized from the forces. Is any information available for these young men about their chances in the territory? I feel sure that Canada is not doing what she could do to develop that country. One has only to observe what is going on the other side of the north pole to learn that Russia is building large cities in an area which, I believe, has about the same climate and much the same resources as the Northwest Territories. Is the government taking any steps to try to develop northern Canada in the same way that Russia has developed northern Siberia?

Mr. GLEN: The hon. member asked with regard to the increase of population. There is an increase, and it is likely to be greater in the near future.

Mr. GREEN: About what increase has there been?

Mr. GLEN: About 1,500 people more in the Yellowknife district. That may be increased considerably elsewhere. However, that is the increase reported at this time, and it is expected that there will be considerably more in the near future. So far as employment is concerned, the companies operating there are in touch with the department for the employment of men. The employment of returned soldiers is of course part of the rehabilitation plan and they will get the preference. There are many projects to be dealt with so far as the Northwest Territories are concerned. I realize, as the hon. member has said, that Canada is looking to the territory as one of the great hinterlands which must take care of many of our problems in the future, more especially in connection with employment. All of these matters are being dealt with in the dominion-provincial conference. Our department realizes the seriousness and significance of development of the Northwest Territories from the point of view of all Canada. If I am strong enough to get a larger vote for next year I shall provide more funds in the next estimates for these particular purposes.

Mr. GREEN: Have any steps been taken to find out the type of development which Russia has been carrying on in Siberia?

Mr. GLEN: I do not wish to say anything which might be misconstrued elsewhere. Our department has been making inquiries with regard to the matters of which the hon. member speaks, with not very great success in getting information.

Mr. MacNICOL: Before the item carries I want to compliment the minister on what he has said. It will give a great deal of hope to the people up in that country. A few days ago I received a copy of the Blade a Yellowknife newspaper. I am sure that when I send the editor of that newspaper the copy of Hansard containing what the minister has just said it will help to allay the fears of the people in that country. The population of the Northwest Territories is now about 10,000 in the whole area around Yellowknife, Fort Smith, and the territory north from Fort Smith and down to Norman Wells and Aklavik. The paper is called the Blade. It is published by a vigorous editor, and I hope he gives the minister praise for his programme. Here is what the Blade says on its first page, November 20, 1945:

Northwest Territories Association

As announced last Saturday, the Northwest Territories Association is in process of formation.

This is potentially a great and growing section of Canada but its present potentialities and all hopes for its future may be destroyed if the Ottawa administration is not aroused from its comatose condition.

We must show those swivel-chair northerners-by-proxy that we must have a say in our own affairs.

I am sure that when the editor, John Murray McMeekan reads the Hansard which I will send him by air mail, he will see that Ottawa is now alive to the situation.

I think, perhaps, to keep Hansard right, I should add something to what the minister stated about the Grimshaw road. I have been over it, from Grimshaw to Notakewin, so I know what I am talking about. The end of the present hard gravelled road is Notakewin. From Notakewin up to Hay river, or rather to Alexandra Falls on Hay river, is a winter road, a tractor road made during the last two or three years, thanks mostly to the Alberta government. They will be pleased, I know, that this government is now going to cooperate with them in making that a hard surface road, as it should be. At Alexandra Falls the road will divide like a V; one goes off to the right to the mouth of the Hay river, from which point, in the winter time, tractor trains will go across the Great Slave lake to Yellowknife. That is the reason it is being built. The other part of the V will go to Mackenzie river, to Mill's lake on the Mackenzie river and across the Mackenzie river on down to the town of Norman Wells. I hope the minister will keep before him the Norman Wells area too, because that is part of the Northwest Territories. I am sure he is interested in the welfare of that part of the country and in making winter transportation possible where there is none now. His participation in any such effort will allay the feelings of the people there about separation, or whatever it may be called, because I could read further articles out of this paper referring to the time of the American revolution and suggestions about this being the time for them to organize and get busy.

The reason for that road from Grimshaw is the fact that the Great Slave lake freezes solid, so much so that after the Mackenzie river opens in the spring there is no steamer transportation through Great Slave lake for two and three weeks later, because the boats cannot get through Great Slave lake into the Mackenzie river. It is felt that when the road is completed, tractor trains going north from Grimshaw will take large quantities of supplies to Mill's lake on the Mackenzie river, and in the spring the Mackenzie river boats will take freight down the river perhaps a month earlier than they otherwise could if they had to go through Great Slave lake. The same would apply in the fall of the year. When the boats are coming up the river they cannot go through Great Slave lake because of the ice, but they could unload at Mill's lake and ship by tractor train through to Grimshaw on the Peace River road.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I wish to ask the minister a question in regard to Yellowknife, but before doing so I think I ought to make this observation. After listening to the member for Davenport, and in view of the experience he has had and the knowledge which he has brought to the discussions in this house, I suggest that there are many people across this country who have been awarded a fellowship in the Royal Topographical Society for much less than the hon. gentleman has done in the interests of developing the natural resources of Canada. What I had in mind was this. Yellowknife is becoming one of the large centres in the north. The people there were disfranchised in the last general election. As I understand the situation, by reason of their location they are being denied the right to exercise their vote. I know that strong objection has been raised by the people, and I trust that between now and some time in the next few months when electoral changes are being made the minister will bring to the attention of the appropriate department the necessity of doing something to remove the unfairness that now exists.

Mr. GLEN: The hon. gentleman is referring to electoral representation?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes.

Mr. GLEN: A townsite has been formed in that district and they have a council, three of whom are elected by the people and three appointed by the commission of the Northwest Territories and council. The whole matter of representation will have to be taken care of in the very near future rather than over a long period, because it is expected that there will be a large inflow of people as that area develops. Naturally the whole question will have to be considered in the light of government policy.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the population?

Mr. COCKERAM: About three thousand.

Mr. GLEN: In Yellowknife settlement itself there are about 1,500, and in the remainder of the Mackenzie district, there are about 2,500 white people. But people are coming in and are likely to come in in much greater numbers in the future. The original townsite of Yellowknife was built upon rock, there being no ready facility for sewage disposal, but there happens to be a piece of land, near the present site, which is covered with good earth, and we have been able to create a townsite which has been surveyed. The people will live there in a reasonable degree of comfort. Altogether we are fully aware of the situation. We are seized of the fact that considerable expense will be involved in the future development of that district. All encouragement must be given by the department for the development of that district, because if one believes all the fairy tales one hears, it is apparently an Eldorado.

Mr. MacNICOL: The population of Norman Wells, Fort Smith and intervening points should be included, because they are all in that northwest area.

Mr. ADAMSON: If the minister were a betting man I would wager that the population in the next few years will be quadrupled.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I do not wish to retard the progress of these estimates, but I want to go back to the question of the national park at Riding Mountain, because it involves policy and is a matter of great importance. It involves the handling of the natural resources of the country. I think the minister should make a better statement than he has given us. He is familiar with the situation, since the park happens to be in his own riding and next to mine, so we both have a great interest in it. I would ask him why it was that the Northern Trust company could get a contract for two timber berths wherein they could cut lumber at a price of $1 per thousand, while settlers living around the park, if they could get a permit, which is difficult, had to pay a higher price. I do not know what the exact price is at the present time, but we have some indication from a return here which gives the names of two persons who received contracts. These were Mr. Dewitt and Mr. Proskin of Sandy lake, and the contracts were entered into in 1940. They paid $4.35 for the lumber they cut, while the Northern Trust company has cut over seven million feet of lumber at a price of $1 a thousand.

Before this item carries I would like to know when these timber berths were contracted for originally and for what period of time. The minister has told the committee that the contracts were made before the area became a park and therefore nothing can be done about it now. I do not want to criticize him. He is new in the department, and no doubt there are some things which he intends to straighten out when he can. But I would point out to him that this is certainly one of the things that should be straightened out very soon, and the reply that nothing can be done about it is not at all satisfactory. After all, the forest is contained in a national park and is the property of the people of Canada. There is therefore no reason why a contract made some years ago at the ridiculous price of $1 a thousand for lumber should continue in perpetuity. I do not know how long the contract has still to run, but I suggest that the minister should move immediately to make an adjustment. If the local settlers who need the lumber badly—and they need it worst of all—cannot get a permit in some cases to cut for their requirements, why should some big corporation have the privilege of moving into a national park and taking out seven million feet of lumber in the last five years which they sold at a very handsome price for the building of airports near Dauphin.

Some of it was probably exported. They got it for $1 a thousand. Because I think it is important and pertinent to the argument I should like to put on the record some of the figures. To make it perfectly clear I shall quote some of the figures which were given to me in the return dated September 11 of this year. I shall include only one of the timber berths, No. 571. This berth was contracted for by the Northern Trust company. The figures are as follows: In 1940-41 they took out 2,889,606 feet at a price of $2,852.26. The committee will note that that works out at $1 a thousand feet. In 1941-42 they took out 1,185,510 feet at a price of $1,187.16. In 1942-43 they took out 421,781 feet at $415.79. I wonder how many people tried to buy lumber in those years and what price they paid for it. In 1943-44 they took out 507,900 feet at $507.90. In 1944-45 they took 908,839 feet at $908.82. The other berth is 551-D, and it ran at the same price.

In August 1945 I had occasion to write to the Department of Mines and Resources in behalf of some farmers who came to see me. They were seeking a permit to cut timber in an area described as Buck lake. I have the reply of the minister here and I shall put on the record that part of it which is pertinent to this discussion. He replied as follows:

> I have your letter of the 4th instant, to which was attached a petition from farmers in the vicinity of Gilbert Plains, asking that some 200 acres of mature timber southeast of Buck Lake be opened up for cutting.
> This matter is being taken up with Superintendent Heaslip, and as soon as a report has been received from him I will advise you further.

I would assume that the report was not favourable and this area was not opened up. There may have been some reason for that, but in view of the fact that this company has been taking out timber for many years—I know for five years—at $1 a thousand, timber which belongs to the people of this country, and the settlers who live alongside of the park have not been able to get any. I think that a great injustice has been done. I do not think that the reply of the minister that this contract was entered into before the area became a park is good enough. The farmers who applied to get a few thousand feet of lumber will not be satisfied with that answer. We cannot shrug it off and pass the buck, even though it is in connection with Buck lake.

Does the Minister of Mines and Resources approve the contracts which were made with the Northern Trust company? It is important that we know whether this same policy will be followed in the future. Does the minister approve selling the resources of this country at $1 a thousand feet to large corporations at a time when the farmers who are living next to the resources cannot get permits to cut timber at all?

Mr. PROBE: A contract is a sacred thing, is it not?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Another thing that should be brought to the attention of the committee is that the Northern Trust company do not cut the timber themselves. They have not set up a saw mill; they have sublet this contract to a saw mill which is doing the cutting, and there you see again the whole operation that has taken place repeatedly in connection with our natural resources, especially the forests. Some big concern comes along and takes out a contract on a large berth of timber at a ridiculous price compared with what people have to pay for lumber. A dollar a thousand is a ridiculous price. It is throwing our resources away.

Even then they do not go to the trouble to employ people directly to do the work, to to bring the timber out. They sublet it to saw mills. They let them do the work. They let the local people go in and get the timber out of the woods and bring it to the saw mill, and then those same people have to go to the lumber yard to buy it. A great injustice is done there.

Does the Minister of Mines and Resources intend to make an adjustment in this contract? If not, does he intend to give this committee a statement as to how long this contract with the Northern Trust company has been in force? What is the total amount that has been taken out of the national park at Riding Mountain? Will that contract be continued for any considerable length of time? I feel strongly about this; I feel sure that a great many members of this committee feel as I do. The resources of this country belong to the people, and where we cannot share them all equally we can at least give fair and equal treatment to all in making use of them. If there is any preference at all it should be given to the farmers and settlers who live next to the park and who wish to go in and take out the timber under their own power. It is a crying injustice to allow a big corporation to go in and take out timber at $1 a thousand when local people are denied the cutting of a few thousand feet for their own use.

Mr. GLEN: The hon. member must understand that these contracts were entered into prior to the taking over of the national resources by the province some time before 1930. I have not the exact date. The terms of those contracts are stated. As a dominion we are bound to maintain and uphold the terms of the contract, and there is nothing we can do about it.

Mr. PROBE: Why not cancel it?

Mr. GLEN: We do not intend to cancel a contract which has been entered into, and when the cutting of timber has continued under the terms of the contract. As soon as the cutting is completed on any part of the area, that land is taken over by the dominion and becomes part of the park, but it is not possible at this moment for us to cancel contracts which have been solemnly entered into and on which the company has been working for those years. The contract will expire as soon as the cutting by the berth holder is finished.

The price that they may charge and the price that they obtain for it are matters on which we cannot regulate the company. I have every sympathy with the hon. member, and I have had the same complaints made by residents around there with regard to timber in the park. The timber in the park is budgeted as to what can be cut. The price is as stated by the hon. member; but so far as the timber berth contracts are concerned we are in this position; we have either to live up to the terms of the contract, or repudiate it. I do not think the government wishes to do that.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I am very sorry to have to differ from the minister. I cannot be satisfied with that kind of answer. In the first place the questions I asked were not answered. I want to know how long this contract has been in force, when it was entered into, and how long it has still to run. That was not answered. I also wanted to know whether the minister approved this type of contract, and whether it will be his policy in the future to continue to enter into such contracts in other places. If I may say so, with all due respect, the reply that we have to live up to our contracts, though it sounds all right, is not good enough. If we were to go back and live up to every contract that was made since the inception of this dominion we would find ourselves in a peculiar position.

Mr. GLEN: I have not the exact date when this contract was entered into, but I think I told the hon. member that it was entered into prior to the taking over of the natural resources by Manitoba, before 1930, and thereafter they must live up to the terms of the contract. As soon as the cutting is done the contract expires. When they are finished their cutting in any portion, then that portion is included in the park, and only after all the cutting is finished will the contract be concluded.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: There is a great weakness in that reply, which is in effect that the contract may run as long as there is any cutting to be done. Offhand I do not know the size of these timber berths, and I do not know whether the minister knows it, but just let us suppose that this trust company decided to divide these berths into sections and cut only so much each year. It would be quite possible for them, through the natural growth of the forest, to continue this contract for the next fifty or one hundred years at $1 a thousand. I do not know whether the minister approves of that, but I most definitely disapprove of it; I do not think that is the way our natural resources should be handled. If the government find that the contract which has been entered into was not a wise one and is not now an equitable one, in comparison with the treatment given others, then it should cancel the contract and enter into a new one, or else give the settlers the right to use the forests for their own benefit.

Mr. FRASER: Is the minister's department doing any reforestation in these sections or these cuttings? The minister did not mention that.

Mr. GLEN: No; that comes under another vote.

Mr. FRASER: But is that being done? The minister can answer that. I just wondered if the department were doing any reforestation after this cutting is done. Is slashing permitted, or is only the mature timber being taken?

Mr. GLEN: Of course all the cutting is done under the supervision of trained foresters. There is no reforestation in that particular portion, though some is being done in other sections of the park.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Did I understand from the minister's reply to the hon. member for Dauphin that the contract under which the Northern Trust company is taking timber out of this park lasts as long as there is timber to be cut?

Mr. GLEN: Yes.

[Mr. Zaplitny.]

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is the agreement?

Mr. GLEN: Yes. The contract provides that as soon as the cut has been finished that portion of the park will come back under the park administration.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Does that contract cover all the park?

Mr. GLEN: Oh, no.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Just the berths that have been referred to?

Mr. GLEN: Yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: And they hold these contracts in perpetuity until all the cutting they wish to do is finished, or until all the timber is cut?

Mr. GLEN: I would not say in perpetuity, because the park officials are very careful to see that they live up to the terms of their contract, and also to see that the work is being done in accordance with the regulations.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Was this contract entered into between the trust company and the federal government, or trust company and the province of Manitoba?

Mr. GLEN: I understand they are acting for some estate.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: And they entered into a contract with whom?

Mr. GLEN: The dominion government.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Then it was this federal government that entered into the contract?

Mr. GLEN: Yes, prior to 1930. Then in 1930, when the natural resources were taken over by the province, of course it belonged to the park, subject to the timber berth licences.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: The minister mentioned the terms of the contract and said the park officials were anxious to see that they were carried out. I am not going to ask the minister to tell us the terms of the contract. I realize that would not be fair, and possibly he would not have that information on hand, but perhaps he can tell us this much. Is the contract only for the cutting of timber, or can they take out anything they wish from those timber berths? In other words, may they cut firewood and pulpwood, or anything else they wish?

Mr. GLEN: I am told that it covers merchantable timber, subject to the terms of the contract.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: And what does that involve—anything that can be sold as timber?

Mr. GLEN: Surely, but in accordance with the terms of the contract and regulations.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: If that is the case it is even worse than I thought, because it means that as long as there is anything of value to cut in these two berths the trust company has a complete monopoly for as long as they wish. That is the most iniquitous type of contract that could be conceived. I cannot imagine the minister, with his ability and his evident progressiveness, wishing to continue or even tolerating that sort of contract. It should be repudiated.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What consideration did the federal government get for the granting of a contract of this type to the Northern Trust company?

Mr. GLEN: I have no doubt it was put up for tender at that time, though I have not the particulars with me, nor have I a copy of the agreement. But a bonus would be paid, I presume. I shall get that information and inform the hon. member.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): I should like to ask a question in connection with the granting of a timber permit. What qualifications must be possessed by a person or a corporation in order to get a permit? It seems preposterous that a company without any saw-mill equipment, for instance, should receive a contract to cut timber. I think some qualifications should be set out by the department before such a contract is given to anyone who wishes to obtain a timber permit.

Mr. GLEN: The only permits now issued are settlers' permits for the parks; we are not issuing any more of the others. In reply to the hon. member for Dauphin, we are not likely to enter into contracts to give privileges to any company to carry on lumbering in the park.

Mr. BENTLEY: I want to ask a question following that asked by the hon. member for Dauphin. Is that $1 a thousand typical of all the contracts being let in connection with the timber resources of this dominion?

Mr. GLEN: This contract was made over twenty years ago, and these were the terms then agreed upon.

Mr. BENTLEY: That does not quite answer the question. Is it typical of the contracts now in force, whenever made? Are there any lower than that or any higher than that, and if so how much lower or how much higher?

Mr. GLEN: I have no knowledge of any lower or higher. All I know is that we are not issuing such permits now in our national parks.

Mr. FRASER: Should it not be the policy of the department to do reforestation work in all cuttings in the national parks?

Mr. GLEN: I agree.

Mr. FRASER: I know around Dauphin the land is very sandy. I do not know how it is in the park itself, but unless reforestation work is carried on there it will be waste land in no time.

Mr. GLEN: That is part of the policy of the parks branch, to carry out reforestation where there is no regeneration.

Mr. KNIGHT: Is there any provision in the contract requiring the company to do reforestation work in that section, or is it simply a case of the company taking all the profit and then turning the stumps and sandy land back to the state, putting the state to the expense of carrying on the reforestation, as has happened in connection with many of our natural resources? I am surprised that the minister should defend this type of contract. If this is the method by which the natural resources of the country have been disposed of, I am prepared to say it is a crying shame.

Mr. GLEN: The hon. member suggests I am trying to support such a thing. The very contrary is the fact. I would be against it; it is not done, and I would never be a party to it.

Mr. KNIGHT: I am glad to hear that.

Item agreed to.

141. Dominion forest service—
General scientific, economic and administrative services, $139,895.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain this item? Has his department any plans for the extension of the forestry service in Canada?

Mr. LOCKHART: Is any concerted effort being made to have men just returning from overseas take up this type of service? We hear the usual excuse that men have not had university training and that sort of thing. I brought to the attention of the government the case of a young man who had been interned overseas for years. During that time he made a close study of German reforestation work, and became intensely interested in the subject. When inquiries were made if he could be employed in this type of work in Canada he was told to apply to the provincial government. If we are to provide employment we must direct men into channels in which they are interested.

Mr. GLEN: The three votes for forestry in this year's estimates, totalling $438,330, cover the restricted activities of the forest service and are on a slightly higher level than the expenditures during the preceding war years. The estimates were prepared many months ago when the war was in progress. These sums do not reflect all of the expenditures, as considerable war work was done in our forest laboratories and experimental stations and paid for from the war appropriation. I should also point out that there is included in the war appropriation for this year an item of $132,000 for the forest service in connection with expenditures relating to the post-war reconstruction programme.

Canada is a forest country. With a population of only twelve million people it stands in third place amongst the nations of the world in output of forest products. As an exporter of the products of forest industry Canada stands first, and her lumber, newsprint paper, and allied products are consumed in more than sixty different countries.

The forest resources of Canada are immense in size and diversified in character. If Canadians are to reap the full value of their heritage, our forest lands must be brought into a state of continuous production. Widespread destruction by forest fires, injurious insects and tree diseases must be controlled and the productivity of the forest soils fully realized.

Administration and protection of the crown forests lying within provincial boundaries is, and will continue to be, a responsibilty of the provncial authorities. There is, however, a strong national interest in the welfare of this important resource. Forest industries have played a major role in sustaining Canada's available balance of commodity trade. Being on an export basis they have always been subject to the violent fluctuations of world markets. They must be placed in as strong a competitive position as possible. The permanence of forest industries depends on the continuing availability of raw materials. The nation cannot afford to see forests, as a source of raw materials, dissipated. Neither can it afford to lose other forest benefits, including opportunities for recreation for our own people, the attraction of foreign tourists, the protection of watersheds, which vitally affects the hydro-electric industry and the protection they afford to agricultural lands.

It is believed that the dominion could properly assist the orderly development of the national forest resources in two directions: first, by expanding activities for which it would be fully responsible and, second, by assisting, through provision of funds, to raise provincial standards in respect of the conservation, protection and development of the provincial forest resources. Such assistance might be considered with respect to the raising of provincial standards, in protection of forests from damage by fire, insects and disease; to provide assistance in the construction of new forest roads, stream improvements and other works needed to facilitate improved forest management and the extraction of forest products; and assistance to develop recreational and other facilities for the enjoyment of the public and the well-being of our fish, fur and game resources.

The dominion forest service is already engaged in the broad fields of research, in silviculture, forest protection, utilization of forest products and forest economics. It has been proposed that these normal functions should be expanded so as more clearly to fulfil the actual requirements of the times. Discussions are in progress with respect to functions the dominion forest service might properly fulfil with respect to the protection of forested watersheds of interprovincial importance and where the protection of heavy dominion investments along other lines may be involved.

It is hoped that the estimates for the next fiscal year will make provision for expanded activities of the dominion forest service which will be necessary in the post-war years. It will be appreciated by the members of the house that pending decisions being reached at the dominion-provincial conference, it is impossible to make any statement now as to the details of increased dominion assistance towards the conservation and development of our forest resources.

In connection with what the hon. member said in regard to directing the activities of young men toward this field of service in Canada, we will, and I think everyone would desire that this should be done, direct their activities toward it; because here is an area which has been sparsely populated in the past and which I think offers a promising field for young men. I am hoping that the universities will take this into consideration.

Mr. LOCKHART: Will the minister indicate whether a young man with only secondary school education would have any hope at all? That was definitely indicated to me by the department only three weeks ago.

Mr. GLEN: The provinces are training young men for their own forest services. I do not think the question of academic qualifications would enter into it so much as the specialized education that a man might obtain in the school or college.

Mr. LOCKHART: I must have been misinformed.

Mr. TOWNLEY-SMITH: What service do forestry engineers perform? Would this service include pathologists and entomologists, men who study and prevent diseases in trees and the control of insect pests?

Mr. GLEN: I am inforced that pathologists and entomologists are employed in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. TOWNLEY-SMITH: Do they come under this vote?

Mr. GLEN: No.

Mr. TOWNLEY-SMITH: What is an office engineer?

Mr. GLEN: He is a man doing office work with engineering experience and background.

Mr. BRACKEN: I understood the minister to say that the total appropriations for this year for this service approximate $438,000, with an additional $132,000 being provided under the war appropriations. I wish to ask what proportion of forest acreage in Canada is directly under the administration of the dominion government and what proportion is under the provinces? In other words, what is the total forestry acreage of Canada and how much falls directly under the responsibility of the federal government?

Mr. GLEN: I have not the exact figures at the moment.

Mr. BRACKEN: I am sure they will be found somewhere in the records of the department. Perhaps I should have got them myself. If the minister could get them for me, I should like to have them. I should like to ask a question also with respect to the forests that are under provincial jurisdiction. Will the minister outline briefly the federal policy with respect to aiding the provinces in the development and conservation of forestry resources?

Mr. GLEN: The hon. leader of the opposition knows that one of the questions under discussion by the dominion-provincial conference is federal assistance in the protection of forests. What the dominion can do depends upon the conclusions arrived at by the conferences. We realize that assistance must be given to the provinces, and that there must be coordination of dominion and provincial effort in forest conservation, but I am not in a position to say what will be the contribution by the dominion until decisions have been made by the conference.

Mr. BRACKEN: The minister ought to be able to tell us what is included in the estimates. What I wish to know is the relationship between the dominion and the provinces with respect to that portion of the resources that falls under provincial jurisdiction. I know there have been continual efforts to cooperate. However, I will not press the minister further if he has not the answer immediately available.

May I ask what is the size of the federal staff in the forestry service?

Mr. GLEN: This vote, No. 141, is for the advancement of forest conservation in Canada generally. It includes cooperative undertakings in an inventory of the forest resources, investigations of forest conditions, and determination of rates of growth. In the economic fields, analyses are made of statistics secured from the bureau of statistics, provincial authorities and other sources in order that the trends of development of forest industries and of domestic and foreign markets and prices may be closely followed.

Considerable assistance has been rendered in the war effort by the personnel and services of the dominion forest service, in addition to personnel seconded to war departments.

Forest fire statistics for Canada show that for 1944 the total number of fires, 5,820, was almost 300 more than the previous ten-year average. Although the quantity of merchantable timber destroyed closely approximated the average figure, the value of the timber, young growth and other property lost in forest fires was fifty-three per cent higher than the previous ten-year average. The total damage and costs, $7,413,055, was over $2,620,000 greater, and fire-fighting costs, $1,328,338—the highest on record—were over one-half million dollars greater than the previous ten-year average. Human agencies continue to be the greatest cause of forest fires, with forty-six per cent compared with the ten-year average of fifty per cent; railways with fourteen per cent are much higher than the average five per cent, probably due to the wartime increase in traffic, defective equipment and shortage of personnel.

The shortage of forest products has been impressed upon the general public as never before, owing to the demands for war material. This urgent demand, and especially the shortage of fuel wood, have focused attention on farm wood lots. As a result, farmers are interested in securing information on how they should manage their wood lots to make them pay and keep them in continuous production. In cooperation with the Department of Agriculture surveys of wood lots on experimental farms and illustration stations were begun in the maritimes during 1944 and it is proposed to continue and extend these surveys in eastern Canada during 1945-46.

In general the importance of proper protection and management of woodlands has been continuously urged by the forest service. There is urgent need for a continuity of action in directing the policy and methods of forest conservation.

Much valuable data gathered at considerable expense by field survey parties has accumulated, but owing to lack of staff for compiling purposes, the results of these surveys are still unknown. Forest surveys are of value only if the resultant data gathered are compiled promptly and the findings made known. To compile data at present in arrears, and that to be collected in field work during the coming year, eight full-time compilers will be required.

The increase mainly comprises annual salary increases for permanent and temporary employees and some reclassifications of junior employees, already made, approximately $2,400; the return of one forestry engineer previously lent to Department of Munitions and Supply, $2,700; temporary appointments to vacant positions, $12,900, includes seven compilers, $7,560, replenishing of exhausted stationery supplies and necessary renewal of instruments and field survey equipment $3,400, cost of living bonus and unemployment insurance, $2,600, and $1,200 for increased cost of travelling, transportation and sundries. The gross increase is approximately $25,200 which is reduced by a reduction of about $1,600 in wages and allowances due to changes in establishment.

The leader of the opposition asked as to the size of the staff. There are at present on the staff, as of September 3, eighty-five permanent and 49 temporary employees, or a total of 134.

Mr. BRACKEN: Just one other question. The minister has told us of the huge losses of our forestry resources from fire and other causes, a matter that I am sure is of concern to him as it is to everybody else who is interested in the conservation of Canada's forest resources. It emphasizes the need for both provincial and federal authorities giving attention to this problem.

The minister has given us his estimates under three main headings: General scientific, economic, and administrative services, which is pretty general; forest experiment stations, which is more specific, and forest products laboratories. The losses in our forest resources fall largely under two heads, fire and disease, but chiefly fire. Restoration comes largely through natural reforestation and artificial planting. Can the minister tell us how much money the department is spending on reforestation, how much on fire prevention and how much on disease prevention? The estimates may not be set up in that way, but these are the things which I think we should be concerned about.

Mr. GLEN: The leader of the opposition may not have noticed a release from the Department of Reconstruction regarding the newly created forest insects control board which the Minister of Reconstruction issued on November 25 last, warning of the destruction of Canadian forests by insect life, particularly the spruce bud-worm, which destruction, the release stated, has already reached the proportions of a national disaster. The release goes on to say:

> The present epidemic, unless controlled, may result in the loss of 35 years' supply of raw material for paper products representing an export value of some eight billion dollars.
> The new board is headed by E. Menard, formerly chief forest inspector for Quebec province. On it are J. J. de Gryse, chief, division of forest insects, agriculture department, and D. A. Macdonald, acting dominion forester, mines and resources department. The other members, whose appointment is announced today, are:
> J. A. Brodie, division of forest protection, Ontario Department of Lands and Forests; Doctor Lionel Daviault, chief, Quebec Bureau of Entomology; Major-General Howard Kennedy of Montreal, vice-president, Ontario Paper Company; C. D. Orchard, British Columbia deputy minister of forests; and Doctor G. H. Prince, New Brunswick deputy minister of lands and mines.
> "The presence on this board of government representatives from the provinces most seriously affected by the insect epidemic augurs well for successful cooperation between the federal and provincial governments," said Mr. Howe. "This is the first instance in which the dominion has taken the lead in trying to organize an effective joint attack on a serious forestry problem. In view of the importance of our forest industries, it must not be the last."
> The minister stated that the first task of the forest insects control board will be to gather as quickly as possible all pertinent information in connection with the budworm plague, which has already devastated some 22,000 square miles of forest and is present in a total of about 250,000 square miles, or roughly one-third of the accessible productive forest area of the nation. "The board will prepare a comprehensive programme and then will endeavour to have as much as possible of the actual work done by permanent government departments, both federal and provincial," he said. "The government will underwrite research work both here and abroad. As soon as possible, research experts will be sent to the timber countries of Europe to investigate the possibility of securing natural enemies of comparable European insect species which may prove effective in control measures in this country."

The leader of the opposition had another question?

Mr. BRACKEN: It may be that the minister cannot answer me now, but the statement he has just made prompts me to ask another question. At the opening of my remarks I added the two figures the minister gave to show how much this department is spending in forest services, but apparently not all the forestry activities of the government are confined to this department. Could the minister inform the committee some time within the next day or two what is the total of the funds which are being spent by the dominion government, in whatever department, with respect to forestry? I understand that some of it is in the Department of Agriculture. It is possible that certain lines of forestry should fall there. The minister has just said that there is another item in the Department of Reconstruction for research work in connection with forestry. A question occurred to me at the time this last item was mentioned was why should a forestry item be in reconstruction; why should it not be in the forestry branch of mines and resources? But at the moment what I should like the minister to give us is the total expenditure on forestry by the government, in whatever department, perhaps by main details in agriculture, forestry branch, reconstruction. Then, I am sure, the minister could have his officials tell us later, if not now, how much the dominion spends on reforestation, on fire prevention, and on disease prevention, in whatever department.

Mr. GLEN: I shall be glad to get that information and give it later.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I may be under the wrong heading, but if I am I would ask Mr. Chairman, the indulgence of yourself, of the minister and of the committee in the question which I intend to ask.

All of us here in the last month have received full-page advertisements from the Toronto newspapers with respect to coal resources. In fact a newspaper prepared an address which might have been delivered by the Minister of Reconstruction to both houses of parliament—I am not suggesting that he did it, but they prepared something which he might have done. I think that was the last advertisement I saw. What I want to ask the minister is whether his department have made investigations as to the truth of the allegations in these advertisements. They are in short these: that in Alberta, on the Sheep river, there are immense deposits of coal. We do not need to worry about the truth of that; I have seen them myself. The deposits are amazing. Some time ago they called this coal "anthracite". I notice that in their advertisements they have dropped the use of that word and are now calling it a very hard coal, and I think that that latter may be a more nearly accurate description than the one which they formerly used. The main thing I have in my mind is this. Here in Ontario you are paying for anthracite in the neighbourhood of $16 to $17 a ton, and these people say that once they get a railroad built of some sixty miles they can lay the coal down in the Ontario area at $12.50 a ton. If that be so, it seems to me that to do this would mean a very great deal to the eastern provinces of Ontario and Quebec and also to the Dominion of Canada. I realize of course that at present a royal commission is sitting and examining the subject of coal, and perhaps it will take this into account. But all hon. members, I am sure, have received letters with advertisements from this newspaper, and I thought the minister might be able to give us some information. May I, to assist him, say that I myself have heard that from between Kentucky and West Virginia there is a very good quality of bituminous coal which can be laid down in places like Toronto and Hamilton at $9.50 per ton. If that be so there should not be a great deal of worry about the anthracite situation here.

Will the minister, now or at some convenient time while his estimates are being discussed, give the members generally the story of this coal situation?

As I say, I may be speaking at the wrong moment; and I am not asking him to reply extemporaneously; but would he give us some little discussion of Canada's coal position?—granted that that is in his department: I may be wrong.

Mr. GLEN: No representations have been made to my department, nor have we been interested at the moment, in that coal question, because of the fact that a coal commission is now sitting. I did see the statement which was in the newspaper, a whole page of it, dealing with the question of coal. I am very glad to see that the Minister of Reconstruction, who knows all about this coal question, is in the chamber, and I think I will leave it to him to answer that question.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Then perhaps the Minister of Reconstruction can tell me. Perhaps he can also tell me the distinction between very hard coal and anthracite coal. I do not know what it is. I thought that anthracite was merely a very hard coal. Surely the minister and his department must have analyses of these various coals. What we buy coal for is to get heat from it and we do not want to pack water and ashes long distances, which is what we are doing now. Our old friend Mr. B.T.U. is very prominent in this connection. Perhaps the minister could tell us if the department has analyses of these various coals, including the deposits I have mentioned.

Mr. HOWE: The coal referred to in the advertisement is what is called in most circles a low-volatile bituminous coal. It has a B.T.U. content of about 14,000.

Mr. ADAMSON: What is the content of good anthracite?

Mr. HOWE: As I remember it, good anthracite is 18,000.

Mr. LOCKHART: 17,500 to 18,000.

Mr. HOWE: The coal in question is a deposit in Alberta. I suggest that the purpose of the advertisements—perhaps I should not impute motives—is to bring pressure on the government to develop a mine by the use of government funds. All the coal mines of the west have been developed by private funds. The government feels that there is no reason why it should develop one particular mine at government expense, particularly in view of the fact that the area served by the mine is adequately taken care of by the existing industry.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Would the minister mind repeating the last sentence?

Mr. HOWE: I say that the coal mines of the west have been developed by private industry, and in ordinary times there is a surplus of coal produced in western Canada to take care of the requirements of western Canada. It is felt that for the government to finance the development of a coal mine at this time would not be warranted by the existing situation, or the future prospects of the coal industry.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I have been told that this coal can be laid down here at $12.50, but I do not know whether any examination has been made to determine the correctness of that statement. I met a gentleman in Toronto and he wrote down the figures on a piece of paper for me, but coal is not mined simply by writing down figures on paper. There is a good deal more than that to it. I thought the Department of Mines was the proper place to look to, but I should like to know if someone somewhere cannot give us an amplified statement on the whole fuel problem in Canada. I am not going to join those who suggest that the government should build sixty miles of railway or give any other assistance unless there is a sure market and that market is not going to displace some other Canadian product. I would not for a moment advocate anything of the kind. But if it be a fact that the coal can be laid down here at $12.50, then it is a matter of considerable interest, particularly to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. There is a new field opening up in Kentucky, and if they can lay the coal down at $9.50, we are wasting our time talking about it. But in the minister's department there must be someone who knows all the facts. I am sure Mr. Frank Neate, if he is consulted, will have pretty much at his fingertips the answers to the questions I have been asking.

Mr. HANSELL: Mr. Chairman, I have risen before—

Mr. GLEN: We are dealing with vote 141, which is forestry and not coal. I would not wish to have a discussion on coal now.

Mr. HANSELL: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Will the hon. gentleman pardon me for just a second? May I ask when I may have the information I am looking for? I knew I was out of turn, but I do not know where to get my oar in.

Mr. HOWE: The position is that over fifty per cent of Canada's coal is imported, and imported coal is used largely in Ontario and western Quebec. Previously coal moved from the maritime provinces westward as far as the city of Toronto and on the north line as far as Sudbury. Additional demands for coal in eastern Canada, and particularly the reduction in output, due largely to loss of man-power in the mines, have curtailed the area of markets for Nova Scotia coal so that last winter we were actually railing United States coal into Truro, Nova Scotia. That market will undoubtedly expand again. There is a subvention for the rail movement of coal, but not for coal moved by water, which ordinarily does not need a subvention. For coal moving by rail there is a rail subvention that amounts to $2.50 a ton for coal delivered in Toronto. On the movement of western coal there is also a subvention. It is my recollection, subject to correction, that a subvention of $6 a ton is required to move coal from Alberta to Toronto. Larger quantities might have been moved had a rail movement been physically possible, because domestic coal in Ontario has been exceedingly short. It has been necessary to use substitutes, providing a proportion of anthracite and a proportion of lower grade fuels for the ordinary household. The difficulty during the war years has been that the railways were so heavily burdened with freight that they could not handle extra traffic in coal. This winter there has been a larger movement than in previous years, which has been due to a slackening in the movement of wheat, but unfortunately the movement of coal from Alberta east is in the same direction as the heavy movement of wheat. If it were the reverse, the movement could be handled more efficiently. The movement to Ontario has been limited owing to the fact that the railways could not handle the volume of coal which we should have liked to bring into the province, even with the higher subvention.

The position of coal is one of acute shortage on this continent and in fact all over the world. Lack of coal on the continent is a serious threat to the well-being of the people, and its production is stepping up very slowly indeed. There is a demand for every pound of coal mined at this particular time. The long-range prospects are not such as would indicate the desirability of opening up large new sources of production in Alberta, considering the fact that it can be marketed only in Ontario on the $6 a ton subvention, which I need not remind my hon. friend is more than twice the cost of mining the coal. I suggest that the $12 rate that he saw advertised as the price for coal in Toronto would be after the government subvention had been applied to the movement.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Only $2. I do not act for these people. I do not even know them.

Mr. HOWE: Surely my hon. friend was in Medicine Hat in the old days.

Mr. MACKENZIE: And the old nights.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): And we met at the Brown Derby. Does that mean anything? As a matter of fact I have read these advertisements.

Now that we are dealing with coal we are faced with another problem. The minister knows that during the war years more Alberta coal went west than ever. A good deal was used for bunkering and a good deal was used in manufacturing establishments out there. With United States coal used to haul engines on the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific, the use of Alberta coal was being pushed clear back almost to the Alberta border in some instances, and beyond Winnipeg on both lines. We know perfectly well that we cannot hold the position on the Pacific coast because the demand is not there and is not going to be there. The chief worry is to get back on these railways coming east. We worked hard for twenty years to get where we did instead of having the coal come to Fort William by water, pushing us back again. The minister appreciates my having given him an opportunity to deliver that speech to both houses of parliament—I am sure they will read it in the other place—but we should have a statement from him.

Mr. HANSELL: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. BRACKEN: Will the hon. member pardon me for a moment? We are considering the estimates of the Department of Mines. Is there any branch of the minister's department which assumes responsibility for coal?

Mr. GLEN: Only so far as testing is concerned, not so far as general policy goes.

Mr. HANSELL: I am a kind man and I like to give my friends every advantage—

An hon. MEMBER: And how!

Mr. HANSELL: —and Howe too. However, to follow along the line of discussion of the hon. member for Calgary West, the minister replied that those people who are interested in this particular coal mining area had made no representation to the government. Perhaps the Minister of Mines and Resources is trusting to his memory as applied to his own term of office. This subject is not a new one. I am quite certain that interested people have made representation over the years. I believe my hon. friend's question can be answered by the Canadian fuel board; I am sure they have all the data on this particular coal.

With respect to the campaign that is being carried on, I doubt whether the minister's reply was just 100 per cent accurate. I do not think the campaign that is being carried on is an attempt to have the government finance the mining of this coal. The problem is that there is no railroad running into this particular district. As the hon. member has already said, there is a distance of about sixty miles without a railroad. I fancy the people interested do not think they are the ones who are particularly responsible to put in a railroad. The campaign is put on to arouse public opinion in respect of this coal. It is an exceptionally good coal. It compares most favourably with anthracite. I do not know all the technical and chemistry terms which may be used in the analysis of the coal, but there is no doubt that it compares favourably with anthracite coal. If Canadian people knew that they could get in their own country coal which is just as good as any coal they can get outside this country, it would be an admirable thing if some steps were taken, perhaps by way of some assistance from the government, in the matter of building a railroad so that the coal could be made available to the rest of Canada.

The minister is right when he says that this item should be under forestry. There was a time when there was a considerable appropriation to be voted for subventions on coal.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is in another item.

Mr. HANSELL: Not in this department?

Mr. MacNICOL: Not in this department at all.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not quite hear my hon. friend.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is not in this department at all; it is in another department.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not think so.

Mr. MacNICOL: Subventions? Of course it is.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not think so; I think it is missing from the book. However, I may stand corrected. We used to discuss subventions on coal under the Department of Mines and Resources. If it is shifted, all right, but it does not appear in these estimates.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Before this item passes I desire to say a few words. I can assure the minister that I will not delay this item, but when the proper time comes I intend to say a few more words on it.

There has been quite an advertising campaign put on with regard to this coal. I have a whole stack of them here. It was my intention to speak at length on them, but I do not think I shall do so at this session because the session is drawing to a close. Quite a pressure campaign is being put on in advertising this coal. What steps are the government taking to see that the quality referred to in the advertisement is correct? If the government does not come to the assistance of this organization when they take up this venture and go into a selling campaign to sell shares in this mine, it may very well be that the shares will not be worth very much because of the difficulties that have been indicated.

I think this matter only goes to prove what has been said on several occasions, namely, the necessity of establishing a national fuel policy. Certainly what the hon. member for Macleod and the hon. member for Calgary West have said, is true. It is high time that we began to devise a national fuel policy for this country so that we could use our own coal in Canada. If we have the coal here we should be using it. My understanding is that this coal could be loaded at a cheap price which would enable it to compete with Pennsylvania coal coming from the United States. It is advertised as a high-quality anthracite, comparable with any anthracite coal we are getting in Canada.

We have endeavoured to capture a good deal of the Ontario market. Since the war we have lost a large part of that market. It is going to be quite a fight to regain it. If there is any possibility of our regaining the eastern markets by the development of this coal every assistance should be given to that end. Because of its peculiar chemical qualities, low ash content and high B.T.U.s it is said to be a good coal. If we can develop a market in eastern Canada for this coal we should go out and do so, and develop a national fuel policy for Canada.

The CHAIRMAN: May I remind the committee that the mining, transportation, advertising and selling of coal does not properly come under this item. A limited discussion on advertising was unanimously agreed upon by the committee. I think we have now reached the limit, and I would suggest that we stay with the item under discussion.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I did not hear what the minister said when he made his statement with respect to the forests of Canada. I do not know whether he gave any estimate as to the annual depletion of the forests and the annual replacement. It will be interesting to know what the position is. What is the estimated loss by cutting, by disease and by fire each year?

Mr. GLEN: I think the hon. member was not in his seat when the leader of the opposition asked a somewhat similar question to that which he is now asking. I believe his question was covered by the questions that the leader of the opposition asked, and I have promised to have that information brought down.

Mr. JOHNSTON: When the item comes up, will the minister make a statement about the particular venture to which I have referred?

Mr. GLEN: I rather think that is a matter which will be taken up by the Minister of Reconstruction. It is in his department and has been there during the war. I was speaking to him a few moments ago, and he says that there is an item in his estimates which will have to come before the committee when it may be properly discussed. It does not come within the purview of the Department of Mines and Resources.

Mr. STANFIELD: I did not hear the minister when he spoke about the spruce budworm which I understand is attacking the spruce forests of the country. Fortunately in that part of the country from which I come I do not think it has yet arrived. Has any step been taken to control the spruce bud-worm?

Mr. GLEN: I do not believe the hon. member was here when I was speaking of the control board which had been set up for that very purpose of which the hon. member is speaking. An intense study is being made with regard to it, and, of course, the results are not yet known.

Mr. ADAMSON: What methods are being used? Are they using a D.D.T. spray from aircraft, lead spraying or arsenic spraying?

Mr. GLEN: They are exploring every avenue. As a matter of fact in the statement I read the Minister of Reconstruction stated that some of the officers of the department may be sent to Europe to look over the situation and find out the methods wherewith to combat this disease.

Mr. ADAMSON: Has the minister any idea how many square miles are affected by the spruce bud-worm? I understand the condition is a serious one.

Mr. GLEN: I am informed we have not yet any full information as to the extent.

Mr. STANFIELD: Have any of the areas been infested in the maritime provinces.

Mr. GLEN: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Land, parks and forests branch—

145. Land registry—Land registry, seed grain collections, administration of ordnance, admiralty and public lands, $55,394.

Mr. McCUAIG: I should like the minister to give a summary of the amounts outstanding in connection with seed grains, which I understand covers the period from 1914 to 1920.

Mr. GLEN: The explanation of this vote is that it has to do with the conduct of a central office of record for lands owned or otherwise controlled by the Dominion of Canada; the administration of ordnance and admiralty lands, dominion owned public lands, timber and grazing on soldier settlement lands and on military reserves; the adjustment of seed grain, fodder and relief indebtedness, and the issuing of letters patent. The over-all increase of $2,879 is due to an additional amount required for cost of living bonus, annual increases, replacement of depleted stationery stocks, together with a small amount for surveys which have been postponed from year to year and are now urgently required.

Mr. McCUAIG: I should like to know the amount outstanding in connection with seed grains, particularly in Saskatchewan.

Mr. GLEN: As at March 31 last the amount outstanding in principal was $2,525,263.99, and in interest, $3,613,841.15, or a total of $6,139,105.14.

Mr. McCUAIG: These debts go back to 1914-20, and I would say that eighty per cent of the people originally concerned have either died or left the country; yet these advances remain registered against the land. In many cases it has gone back to preemptions and rough lands, and I think this is detrimental to the progress of the country. I would take it that it costs more to keep the records than probably will ever be collected under this head, so that I strongly urge that these amounts be cancelled, because they are of long standing.

Mr. WRIGHT: What have the collections been during the last two or three years, and what has been the cost to the government? I was going to ask those questions in order that we might have the picture. I believe these advances have been cancelled for some years. I should like to know for what years these debts have been cancelled; for what years they have not been cancelled, and the reason for cancelling in connection with certain years and not cancelling in connection with certain other years.

Mr. GLEN: I could not answer that question now without a good deal of research. The net revenue in 1944-45 for seed grain relief was $111,577.85. As to the other particulars, I shall have to get a statement from the records and give it to the hon. member.

Mr. BENTLEY: I believe the minister said that the collections amounted to some $111,000, while the amounts owing total in the neighbourhood of $6,000,000, of which, if I followed him accurately, more than fifty per cent was accumulated interest. As the hon. member for Maple Creek has just mentioned, the government has liens against a good deal of land occupied by people who had no connection with the conditions from which the liens arose. The small amounts that have been collected were, I believe, paid simply because the people now occupying the land are in a little better shape, due to the war and war prices, and want to get rid of those liens on their land in order to dispose of it. The statement by the minister would indicate that it is going to be difficult to recover the entire $6,000,000, and like the hon. member for Maple Creek and the hon. member for Melfort I would urge the minister to give serious consideration to cancelling at least the interest. I believe the whole thing should be cancelled, but perhaps, that is asking too much. I would, however, ask him to give serious consideration to the cancellation of the accumulated interest, because it is a great handicap for people who think they have paid all their debts to find, when they ask for clear title, that the dominion government has a lien registered against their land.

Mr. GLEN: I shall be glad to consider that question.

Mr. FAIR: May I ask what it cost the government during the fiscal year 1944-45 to collect that total of $111,000?

Mr. GLEN: The services of two clerks only.

Item agreed to.

Lands, parks and forest branch—
146. National parks bureau—national parks and historic sites services, $1,050,000.

Mr. McGARRY: Is there anything in the estimates this year to provide for the extension of Louisburg national park?

Mr. GLEN: There is nothing in these estimates in that connection. As the hon. gentleman knows, these estimates were prepared some time ago. I have had representations made to me, and in fact met a delegation, asking that some assistance be given in connection with the maintenance and extension of this park. The matter is being considered, and I hope there may be a favourable reply to the request of the hon. member.

Mr. PROBE: When most of the departmental estimates are being considered here, my province of Saskatchewan usually is honoured more in the breach than in the observance in connection with any large expenditures. The matter of collections, however, comes up quite frequently. At this time I wish to pay a tribute to the Prime Minister of Canada for the interest he has taken in the Prince Albert national park, the only one in our province. We are less endowed with beauty spots than are the other provinces, but the Prince Albert national park, which is situated approximately in the geographical centre of our province, experienced reasonably good development during the period the Prime Minister was member for the constituency of Prince Albert. I am hoping, of course, that though he has moved from Saskatchewan to the constituency of Glengarry, his interest and that of the department in our national park will remain commensurate with the recreational needs of our people. In this park we have quite a chain of lakes naturally well stocked with fish, which I believe are replenished to some extent by the department, though how extensive that work may be I do not know. I am sure it would delight even the hon. member for Calgary West to come and do a spot of fishing in Waskesiu lake, and we also have good golfing and beautiful motor drives. At page 319 of the public accounts for 1944 I notice that in 1942-43 expenditures in relation to the Prince Albert national park amounted to $93,636, while in 1943-44 they totalled $67,797. Since the public accounts for the fiscal year just ended have not yet been published, I should like the minister to tell me the expenditures and also the revenues in connection with that park for the year ending March 31, 1945, and also an estimate of revenues and expenditures for the current year. Would the minister indicate also what expansions are contemplated for this year under the headings of forest protection, fish propagation, tourist advertising, highways, clearings and buildings?

Mr. GLEN: The estimate of the amounts to be spent in Prince Albert national park are:

Management and clerical	$15,900
Public services	25,300
Stores and equipment	11,100
Recreation	4,900
Forest and game	22,800
	$80,000

Mr. PROBE: Those are the current estimates?

Mr. GLEN: Yes.

Mr. PROBE: What were the expenditures last year?

Mr. GLEN: I am informed that more than that will be spent because of fire fighting that is taking place. I have not the particulars for 1944-45 that the hon. member asks for, but I can supply them to him later.

Mr. PROBE: They will be tabled?

Mr. GLEN: Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON: I should like to say a few words with regard to national parks generally, but in particular with regard to the great belt of national parks generally known as the Rocky mountain national parks, which include Banff, Jasper, Yoho, Kootenay, Assiniboine, all that great string of parks that run along the central mountain backbone of the rockies. It may be surprising to some hon. members to know that these parks comprise an area nearly half as great as that of all Switzerland. I am one of those eastern Canadians who unfortunately did not know their own country until a few years before the war. I had travelled widely in most other parts of the world, but I had not been to my own mountains until 1936.

I speak in humility; but having had some experience with mountains elsewhere in the world, I think I can say without fear of contradiction that we have the greatest potential mountain playground in the world. If we will develop them we have possibilities that will rival the great Swiss Alpine resorts. I do not speak with a lack of knowledge, because I have stayed at many of those great Swiss national resorts. Therefore I should like to see this vote multiplied many times, and this should be done by next session.

In the normal pre-war winter the great resorts of Switzerland were visited by more Americans than by the people of any other country. The Palace hotel at St. Moritz at one time had sixty per cent of its guest list made up of Americans. These people had the money to spend and they went there because they could get the service they wanted. The other winter sports resorts of Switzerland were filled with Americans, British and a great number of Canadian tourists. With the Atlantic closed to ordinary tourist traffic, in fact with all Europe being closed to transocean pleasure tourist traffic from this continent, we have an opportunity of getting that business for our national parks. It is significant that Switzerland's whole economy was dependent on the tourist and hotel business.

We have a magnificent opportunity if we only act now. It will be necessary for the government to carry on most of the activities, but they should start soon. If I may speak in particular of our mountain national parks, up to the present they have been developed for two classes of people, the very rich easterner and the overnight cabin tourist. It is all very well to build de luxe hotels such as Banff Springs, Chateau Lake Louise and Jasper Park Lodge, which must charge $20 to $25 per day, but that is not the way to open up our national parks. That is not the way to provide an opportunity to the people who own these national parks to see them.

It is not enough to build a series of motor roads through our national parks. In fact it would be a hideous thing to do. The whole beauty and charm, the amazing variety of our Canadian Rocky mountains are seen only when you get off the main highways and really get into them. With all due respect to our railroads, you do not see the mountains from the Canadian National or the Canadian Pacific. You see a little more, but not very much more, from the Banff-Jasper highway. But to really see the Rockies you have to get into them, and the only way to get into them is by horse or on your own two feet.

At the present time the facilities for getting into our national parks available to the ordinary and common garden variety of human being, whether he be Canadian, American or any one else, are extremely limited. If you go in in the summer you must go to the expense of providing yourself with a train of pack animals; you must provide yourself with a place to sleep, a tent or teepe, and with fodder; this is an expensive business. If you go in in the winter there are at the most only four chalets where you can go to enjoy the skiing.

I suggest that this government should do what the Swiss and Austrian governments did to develop the Bermese Oberland and Tyrol. This government should start in the near future; in fact they should have started already, to erect a number of shelter huts on or near the main passes, for instance north and south of the Bow river and in the vicinity of the Jasper-Banff highway and in time the Yoho district. In that way a great territory could be opened up. There is one hut in the Mount Assiniboine area, but it is difficult to get at, also the Alpine Club Hut in the Little Yoho. There is also one chalet Sunshine Lodge above Banff and Mount Temple and Skoki in the Slate mountains near lake Louise; four small chalets in the world's greatest accessible ski terrain. Mr. Chairman, the challenge is terrific. We must develop this priceless heritage. Huts should be placed close enough together, so that the average tourist or skier or mountaineer could get from one to the other without too much exertion or without undergoing tremendous expense in getting an expedition together.

What has been done on the continent of Europe is this. Huts are built within easy distance of each other. They are built in many instances with government help or with the help of some national mountaineering club or national ski club, who run the huts and take responsibility for them. I do not say that the government should go into the business of catering to tourists by providing food and shelter, but they should see to it that these huts are built so that a great number of tourists can go into the mountains.

What are the conditions at the present time? I have received word in the last week that every room available for tourists in the Banff national park is already booked not only for the summer but for the winter season too. You cannot even get the most modest accommodation for next year. It is all completely booked. I am not speaking of the Banff Springs hotel, which I understand is to be opened next summer, but of places where the average man, not the millionaire, can go. All these are booked solid for the next year. That shows the tremendous demand for holiday accommodation by people on the American continent, arising very largely in eastern America, who go out to the Rockies and spend a great deal of time there. The demand is there; it is an extremely valuable demand; it is a demand from people who know the world and many of whom have seen the Rockies and have found there some of the best mountaineering and the best skiing the world has to offer.

I want to talk about skiing for just a moment. Skiing has become the great Canadian national sport. As a matter of fact it is a world-wide sport. I think most hon. members would find that there are vast numbers of the coming generation who now ski rather than skate. Many of them do. We used to think of skating and hockey as the great Canadian national sports, but now I think it has come to be skiing. Certainly that is so in the United States and on the continent of Europe.

We have within easy distance of lake Louise an area which for downhill running compares very favourably with the famous Parsenn country near Davos in Switzerland. When I say that it compares very favourably I mean that you have from several of the peaks surrounding lake Louise a vertical descent of from four to five thousand feet. That is essential for mountaineering skiing. The Laurentians are excellent in their way, but when you can get a run down through vertical descent of between four and five thousand feet that, Mr. Chairman, is really skiing. I assure you, sir, that once a human being has enjoyed the thrill of mountaineering skiing, nothing else will ever satisfy him to the same extent.

To develop this area several things are required. The first thing is adequate trails cut through the timber. That is not an easy thing to do. The trails, not narrow trails but twenty feet wide would have to be cut so that they remained in good condition. You cannot cut a trail straight down a mountain. You have to cut them so that the average skier can get down without breaking his neck. That is one thing that is required. The timberline runs at about 6,500 feet, and the main Bow river is at about 5,000 feet. So that there will have to be a number of ski trails cut through the lower slopes of these mountains.

The next thing to be done to develop a real skiing resort is to provide some type of ski tow. I say this with a degree of sorrow because I thought that the average skier was an energetic person and I find that that is not so. There are energetic skiers and there are those who are not. The average human being is lazy, and if he can be lifted to the top of the mountain by a ski tow, not only does he get there with little effort and arrive without being tired, but he can get in a great deal more of downhill running and there is more time to improve his technique. In that way he gets a great deal more enjoyment out of a week or two weeks' holiday. The construction of a funicular or ski tow is essential and there are many places where it could be constructed within easy distance of the main railway line.

Once you establish that type of ski resort, you will have an opportunity to rival the great ski resorts of the world. You will have a gold mine that will make many of our gold mines, even the big ones, look awfully poor pickings. I am not speaking about something I do not know. I have seen what the Swiss did at St. Mauritz and at Davos. I have seen what the Austrians did at St. Anton am Arlberg and Kitzbuhel. I have seen how they made skiing almost pay the national debt of Austria, and how they established the famous ski school of Hannes Schneider. They attracted people from all over the world to ski on those mountains. If they can do that at St. Anton in the Arlberg, which is difficult to get to, we can do the same thing; we can attract skiers to lake Louise, but only if we provide the facilities. I suggest that we are missing one of the greatest opportunities, particularly at this time, because the continent of Europe is closed; the Americans want to go somewhere in winter and we have just the country for them.

One word more. Before we can adequately develop our mountain resorts we must have a well-trained corps of mountain guides. We are doing nothing now to train mountain guides. Hon. members who may not have skied or climbed mountains like I have may not appreciate the necessity of having a well-trained corps of mountain guides. A mountain guide is not just a man who hauls you up a mountain at the end of a rope. He is an extremely skilled technician and has to know a great number of things. On the continent of Europe a mountain guide takes three to five years to train. He knows his mountain technique; he knows his glazier technique; he knows his skiing, and he also knows his mountains. But I wish to make this very clear, that because you have a guide trained on the continent of Europe—a Swiss guide or an Austrian guide—it does not automatically follow that he will know Canadian conditions. Our conditions are different in many ways from those of Europe. You have to train our young men. Certainly we have to borrow from the great wealth of experience of Europe, including Switzerland, Austria and northern Italy, but we have also to see to it that there are produced in Canada every year a number of guides who know not only the summer technique and the winter technique, but who also can do the things which are peculiar to our conditions, who can take a pack train into the mountains, who know about feeding and living in the mountains; and this can only be learned in the Rockies.

It is no good to go over and get a Swiss guide, admirably trained as a mountaineer though he may be. We must have a new technique, and I suggest to the minister that one of the first things we must do is to establish a school for the training of mountain guides. Why do I emphasize this so much? If you bring tourists from the plains and cities into the mountains they are going to get into trouble. A mountain is wonderful but it is also dangerous. You can fall down it; you can fall off it, and you can have parts of it fall on you. If we allow untrained and unacclimatized tourists to start off into the mountains we shall have a lot of casualties; not only that, but our tourists are not going to enjoy themselves. Living in the mountains is a science, and unless we have men who are able to take these tourists—I do not like the word "dudes", because they are not dudes who go into the mountains, but they are untrained, even though they are accustomed to European methods—they are going to get into trouble; we shall have men lost on mountains, lost in glaciers, falling down, hurting themselves, and we shall make life a misery for our park rangers who have to go out and look for them. I suggest that the government should give serious consideration at the earliest possible opportunity to the establishment of a school for Rocky mountain guides.

We have an opportunity now to develop our national parks both for winter and for summer, to build them into an asset which will rival the great Alpine resorts of the world. Europe is closed and may remain closed to the Americans for possibly two or three years. We have not much time. We should start at once to see to it that our Rocky mountains are developed both for the people to whom they belong and for the people who will come to them and will mean so much to the economy of Canada.

Mr. McLURE: Before hearing the remarks of the hon. member for York West, I was going to say something on the tourist trade in connection with the park attractions we have in Canada. I shall now content myself with asking the minister one question, about the beautiful national park on Prince Edward Island. Is his department considering building a highway so that tourists can reach that national park? I understood that when the park was laid out the idea of the department was to build a highway to provide easy access to that beautiful national park.

Mr. GLEN: The aim of the department is to have all possible roads built which will provide access to the national parks. But at the moment I have again to give the same statement, that these matters are the subject of discussion between the dominion and the provinces as to the contributions which will be made for these roads. From a departmental point of view we are anxious that every facility and every necessary road shall be provided; it is an aim with which we are entirely in sympathy.

Mr. HARKNESS: I most heartily endorse what has been said by the hon. member for York West, and I should like to elaborate briefly on one point. The greatest need of our national parks—at least the ones in Alberta, and I believe the same is true of other parts of Canada—is low-priced accommodation. The people for whom the parks were primarily designed, that is the people of Canada, are for the most part not able to use them as national playgrounds because of the high cost of accommodation.

I took up this matter to a slight extent with some of the officials of the department and was told that it is impossible at the present time to provide any further accommodation there because of the shortage of building materials of all sorts. I should like to urge on the government, however, that at the earliest moment—and I think it could be started quite readily next spring—low-priced accommodation, put up either by the government themselves or by private individuals, should be developed to the utmost. If ordinary building materials are not available a considerable start could be made with the logs which are obtainable right there. Unless this is done, most of the people who would like to visit our national parks and enjoy them will be unable to do so.

I wish to direct one question to the minister. Some two or three weeks ago in the veterans affairs committee we passed a resolution requesting the Department of Mines and Resources to change the regulations governing the letting of leases in order that veterans may have priority. As I understand the matter, at the present time, under the provisions of the law, any lands which become available for building sites or business sites are let by tender to the highest bidder. This places the returned man at a serious disadvantage as compared with men having more money; and the tenor of our resolution was a request that those regulations be changed, for the meantime at any rate, and lands which are available or are made available for either house building or business purposes be offered to veterans before being put up to tender. Will the minister tell us whether that recommendation from the veterans' committee has received favourable consideration.

Mr. GLEN: I have heard of the communication to which the hon. gentleman refers, and we are dealing with it now. We are considering what shall be done. There are some investigations to be made with regard to it, and in the very near future some decision will be arrived at.

Mr. McGARRY: Have any submissions been made to the department regarding the extension of the Cape Breton national park? If so, are they under consideration?

Mr. GLEN: Yes. That matter has been referred to the department and is being taken up with the province now.

Mr. FAIR: What is the intention of the government in connection with Wainwright buffalo national park? This was a national park until the early years of the war, and at that time the animals were all slaughtered. The park is at present populated by prisoners of war. Can the minister give any information as to what will be done in the near future as regards the use of the park?

Mr. GLEN: The park is under the control of the army, and until they relinquish it to us we are not in a position to know what to do. After they have got out and it has been returned to our control, we shall decide what is to be done with it.

Mr. FAIR: Will it be returned to the Department of Mines and Resources?

Mr. GLEN: Yes; it is a national park.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Could the minister not be more definite and direct in his answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Calgary East? Banff is the place where I live and where some people occasionally vote, and both those who vote and those who do not vote are anxious to know where the veterans will stand in that community. The minister has been kind enough to see me on two occasions and his officials have treated me generously in the matter of information, but we have a situation there where, broadly speaking, there is no land available. The only thing we have is the odd lot which for some reason is put up for sale. The present method is to sell it by tender. The people are so anxious to get places that prices are paid much beyond anything we have ever known, which means that the returned man has not a chance. There is a unanimous recommendation from the largest committee in this house and certainly the one that has sat longest and given the greatest attention to the problem submitted to it. I do not know why the minister cannot give us a little more encouragement than to say that certain investigations have to be made and that the matter will be given consideration. That is, may I say, scarcely treating this grand committee with the deference due to the distinguished members of it—and that remark has no reference to myself. I am not on the committee. I personally know Banff men who are trying to stay at home and do something and they cannot do it. The department might give us a little more encouragement in that regard.

Mr. GLEN: I should like to give the hon. gentleman the encouragement he desires, but it is not just as easy as he says. I understand that there are only a few lots which have become vacant. There is hope that we may get a piece of land from the Canadian Pacific, who are not using it now. A resolution was passed by the committee on veterans affairs, but the question is, what shall be done in order that the veterans may be protected? The first thought in my mind, as it is in all our minds, is that the veterans shall have the preference where it is possible to give it. When it comes to a question of private leasing, if the land were taken and released at an increased price we would be subject to criticism of all kinds with respect to such increased prices. So that it is not just as easy as it seems. However, I can assure hon. members that the matter will be dealt with equitably, having in mind of course the preference that will be given veterans, because none of us would get away from that.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): You could cover that without trouble by a restrictive covenant of sale.

Mr. GLEN: That is one feature which has to be considered. We are not neglecting the position. The hon. member may rest assured that I shall treat it in the manner that he would wish me to.

Mr. ADAMSON: Does all the land surrounding Banff belong to the Canadian Pacific?

Mr. GLEN: No.

Mr. ADAMSON: I understand that the Banff townsite cannot be increased.

Lands, parks and forests branch—

147. Administration of Migratory Birds Convention Act, $50,750.

Mr. MacNICOL: What I have to say on this pertains also to the next two votes. I notice in the details on page 116 of the estimates that the staff that has to do with the Migratory Birds Convention Act is small. I know that the members of that staff are capable men. The ones I have met are thoroughly qualified, but their salaries are very small, the highest being $4,020 a year. I have been wondering if the next vote 148, for which there are no details, is for an extension of the work under vote 147. In this connection I wish to refer for a moment to vote 149. I have been wondering why something was not taken off vote 148 and added to vote 149, but perhaps the minister has in mind increasing the vote for the Jack Miner foundation. The whole committee knows that he was the one man in Canada who initiated this whole business. I was glad to know that the Prime Minister of this country, before the death of that distinguished gentleman, had conferred upon him, through His Majesty the King, the O.B.E. That was highly commendable and it was as it should be. I hope the department will give to the late Mr. Miner's three fine sons, Manley, Edward and Jasper, more assistance than was given to Mr. Miner in his lifetime. They are a family who have consecrated their lives and their farms to this great work and they do not get the credit they deserve. There has been opposition to them from one place and another, and I am not referring to the government. I suggest that they should be given the unstinted support of the people of this country.

Jack Miner was a wonderful man. His three sons are doing a great work. When I think of the small vote being given to them after what they have contributed I am amazed. They contribute 14,000 bushels of corn a year for feeding these birds. I have seen as many as 30,000 there at one time. A grant like this, and the very small amount that they get from the Ontario government, does not begin to give them anything in return for the time they have contributed. I know for a fact that the eldest son, Mr. Manley Miner, has on several occasions refused $15,000 a year to go to the United States to set up what they have done in Canada. I know the minister is warmly disposed toward the Jack Miner foundation. Personally I shall support him in every effort he makes to see that they get fair treatment.

Mr. CROLL: I support what the hon. member has just said. I did not hear the minister say that he would increase the grant to $5,000. That was the amount of money that the Miner foundation anticipated they would get from the department. Does the minister intend to increase that grant?

Mr. GLEN: We are dealing with item 147. I intended to say a few words on items 148 and 149, but perhaps we can take them all together. I was very much interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Davenport with regard to the grant to the Jack Miner foundation. I have had more letters from all sides of the house in connection with that matter than with regard to any other single item in the department. Every hon. member is imbued with the idea that this vote should be increased to where it was some time ago. As the committee knows, it was reduced during the war years. The representations that have been made to me are in entire accord with my own thought. When this vote comes up next year I am hoping that I shall be able to impress the treasury board to put it back to where it formerly was, namely, $5,000. I realize, apart from any question in regard to the work that is being done, that it is a source of attraction, none greater in the Dominion of Canada. I shall certainly use all the force that I have at my command to see that the amount is increased to $5,000.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The enforcement of the Migratory Birds Convention Act comes under whom?

Mr. GLEN: It is under the jurisdiction of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Since we are taking the three items together, what is the $40,000 for?

Mr. GLEN: To provide for control and suppression of forest fires in the national parks, and for carrying on those activities.

Mr. ADAMSON: When the minister is making his submission to the treasury board next year, will he consider restoring the grant to the Alpine club?

Surveys and engineering branch—

152. Dominion astrophysical observatory, Victoria, B.C., $24,552.

Mr. MacNICOL: Any hon. member who has visited the Labelle building must have been alarmed at what terrific damage fire could do to this country's vast treasure house of plans, specifications, maps and reports in connection with all our lands all over Canada. I urge the minister to request the Minister of Public Works, and through him, the government, to put up a fireproof building of steel and concrete to house the map treasures of this country so that they cannot be destroyed by fire. They are precious. They have maps and drawings there that are simply priceless. I hope that something will be done in that direction.

Mr. GLEN: As a matter of fact we have that on our post-war reconstruction plans.

Surveys and engineering branch—

153. Dominion water and power bureau, including the administration of the Dominion Water Power and Irrigation Acts, $251,000.

Mr. COCKERAM: What is being done regarding the development of power in the Yellowknife district?

Mr. GLEN: There are power sites there, and we have had two surveys in the field for the last two years making investigations with regard to power.

Item agreed to.

Surveys and engineering branch—

162. Legal surveys and map service, including grant of $350 to assist in printing the publication of the Canadian institute of surveying, $290,082.

Mr. MacNICOL: In the geographers and the people in the building to which I referred a few minutes ago, and in other buildings, the department has many men of great ability who deserve more than just "carried". This department is well blest with the officials that it has in charge of the preparation of all the reports pertaining to the topography and geography of the country. They deserve the thanks of all the members. All of us obtain many fine maps. I do not believe any country in the world has better maps of its territory than Canada has. They are now issuing maps taken from the air. I met quite a number of their men up near the Arctic ocean in the summer of 1944. These men are doing a wonderful service. I hope the minister will convey to these geographers, geologists, draughtsmen, and the men in charge of the maps, the treasured maps of the country—I do not mean money, but in the work that has been done on them—the appreciation of this house for their great service.

Mr. GLEN: I shall be glad to.

Mr. HARKNESS: When the estimates of the Minister of National Defence for Air were up I asked a question in connection with aerial mapping, and as I remember it he said that the aerial mapping which was being done was being done under the Department of Mines and Resources. I cannot see any details showing where anything is provided for aerial mapping. What provision has been made for aerial mapping, and what sections of the country, if any, are to be mapped in that way?

Mr. GLEN: That was in the war vote. The sum of $650,000 was provided for aerial mapping, and it was passed by the house. Of course that is a feature of the work of the department which will have to be taken account of in the near future. As a matter of fact, at the present time negotiations are going on under the auspices of the R.C.A.F. with regard to aerial photography. They and the equipment which they have, and which they claim is probably the best in the world, will be utilized as far as they possibly can. The whole subject of aerial photography is receiving the best consideration not only of our department but of the Minister of Reconstruction as well.

163. To provide for the payment of fees of the board of examiners for dominion land surveyors, of the secretary and of the sub-examiners and for travelling expenses, stationery, printing, rent, etc. (the fees of F. H. Peters, J. E. R. Ross and R. H. Montgomery, members of the board, and A. W. W. Cole, secretary, are to be paid out of this sum), $950.

Mr. McMASTER: I should like to say a word about surveyors. In the province of Ontario north of Toronto and south of North Bay, as far as I know there are only two dominion land surveyors. The people are beginning to feel the want of these men. In the whole city of Toronto I do not believe there are more than ten, and I suggest that the minister take up with the Minister of Veterans Affairs the question of whether some of the younger returned men could not be directed into this work. If something is not done there will be a serious shortage, and this is a profession which should appeal to men who have been in the army.

Mr. CASE: I should like to go on record as endorsing what the hon. gentleman has said, because I know the desperate situation we face in our own community. It is now almost impossible to get a land surveyor anywhere.

Item agreed to.

Indian Affairs branch—

165. Indian agencies, $898,266.

Mr. HARKNESS: I should like to make a few brief remarks in connection with the Indian affairs branch generally. Some time ago the minister indicated in the house that the Indian Act would be revised at the next session, or at least that he wished to have it revised then, probably by a committee of this house. For some considerable time the Indians of Canada have been pressing for a revision of the act by a royal commission, and personally I think that would be preferable to having it revised by a committee of the house. In any event, I presume one course or the other will be followed, and the Indian Act will be revised at the coming session.

In the past the Indians have suffered under a number of injustices. I should like to mention particularly education and medical attention. When treaties were entered into with the Indians they were promised that their children would be educated, but unfortunately the dominion government has not lived up to that promise, in that adequate educational facilities in the form of schools have not been provided to look after the Indian child population of school age. On the Stoney Indian reserve at Morley, Alberta, for example, there are something like 165 children of school age. At the residential school there, with children sleeping on cots in the corridors, there is accommodation for only one hundred. I imagine the minister will state that additional accommodation is available at the residential school in the Edmonton area. This, however, is some 250 miles away; and if children were sent there they would be completely away from their families for some ten months of the year and, in addition, would be among a different kind of Indians, speaking a different language and so forth. The Indians themselves believe that the time has come when on most of the reserves they would be much better off with day schools instead of residential schools, and for some considerable time they have been pressing for the establishment of day schools. I do not know why the department has not acceded to their request in this regard, because in most cases it would be considerably less expensive than maintaining residential schools.

Another difficulty as far as residential schools are concerned is that the grant is not sufficient, I believe amounting to something like $175 per child per year. I am sure all hon. members will realize that approximately $17 per month is not enough to feed, clothe and educate a child in a residential school. As a result, the religious institutions which operate these schools have to try to scratch up the remainder of the money required, which in many cases they are not able to do, and the children do not receive the education they should.

From the medical point of view, on several of these reserves there are no hospitals. I would refer particularly to the reserve at Hobbema, Alberta, where there is not now and never has been a hospital. If the Indians there become ill they have to wait a week until the doctor, who comes from Wetaskiwin, makes his appearance. If he has a considerable number of Indians to look after he deals with as many as he can, as they stand in the queue. When his time is exhausted he goes back and those he has not seen have to wait for another week. If it is a serious case the Indian has to be taken to the hospital at Wetaskiwin, but no conveyance is provided for that purpose. In this connection I would recommend to the minister that something in the nature of a jeep ambulance, such as was used overseas so successfully, be provided for each reserve on which there are not good roads and from which the evacuation of seriously ill Indians at the present time is a difficult problem. The provision of such a vehicle on most of the reserves in Alberta would make it possible to save many lives which otherwise might be lost. The government has large numbers of these vehicles at the present time, and I should think it would be a comparatively simple matter to have some of them transferred from the Department of National Defence to the Department of Mines and Resources and apportioned for this purpose.

On many reserves where some hospital accommodation does exist, there is no medical officer, and that is particularly the case since the beginning of the war. I should like the minister to tell us what provision it is anticipated will be made in connection with medical officers now that the war is over and that medical men will be in much greater supply than has been the case in recent years.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of bill No. 237, to amend the Special War Revenue Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Tax on certain insurance companies upon net premiums.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Could the minister give a word of explanation on this first section?

Mr. ILSLEY: The explanatory note reads:

The tax under section 14 is based on the place of payment of the premium regardless of the residence or location of the persons or property insured; in some other jurisdictions, such as some of the states of the United States, the basis is the place of residence or location of the persons or property insured regardless of the place of payment of the premium. It follows that in some cases a premium may be taxed both in the state of origin and in Canada and, in that event, the amendment provides that the premium be exempt from tax in Canada.

The new section will deny the said exemption if the premium taxed elsewhere than in Canada is paid in respect of a policy covering a person resident, or property situate, in Canada at the time the policy was effected or renewed.

If a person is resident in the United States and pays a tax in the United States in respect of a premium, this provides that it shall not be taxed in Canada. It is to obviate double taxation of premiums.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): That was my understanding. There is a strong view that it might be desirable to have the tax on premiums paid by persons resident in Canada. I do not wish to take up time on this if there is a principle involved and the department has reached a conclusion, but it seems to me that this might be a matter which could be considered when the next budget is brought down.

Mr. ILSLEY: We had quite an argument with the life insurance companies on that very point because they have been accustomed to having the tax on premiums paid by residents of Canada alone. They were disturbed when they found that the section really taxed payments received in Canada by persons resident in the United States. We thought they were right to the extent that there should not be double taxation. There have been many discussions between the superintendent of insurance and the life insurance companies, and there was a conference or two by myself with the life insurance companies. The amounts involved are not very great, but the superintendent of insurance is firm in the opinion that premiums received in Canada should all be taxed, subject to the elimination of the double taxation feature. Therefore we decided to do that. That has been explained to the life insurance companies and, while it may not be satisfactory to them, the main reason it is not satisfactory is that it means a change in the system they have been following over a period of years.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): In view of the fact that the department has met them in regard to double taxation, it is not immediately apparent why the department felt it was necessary to make a specific change in the procedure if there was no question of revenue involved. There may be a deep-seated principle involved, or the minister may have felt he had to support his superintendent of insurance. I do not press the matter if the minister says there is no principle involved.

Mr. ILSLEY: Some premiums may escape taxation entirely unless we take this course.

Mr. BRACKEN: These five bills are based on the budget resolutions?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BRACKEN: There has not been much discussion of these bills on the resolution stage.

Mr. ILSLEY: Quite a lot.

Mr. BRACKEN: There was none on the second reading of this bill because we are now in committee. I was going to suggest that on each one of these bills the minister make a general statement of what is contained in the bill. We have now reached a particular section and are discussing a more or less technical matter, but perhaps the minister could tell us what is in each of these bills as they are reached.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it would be better to give an explanation on the sections. The bills follow the resolutions, but there will be additional sections which were not covered by the resolutions because those sections can be enacted without being preceded by a resolution. I will call attention to those sections as they are reached and give an explanation. If I were to go over the sections in each of these bills at the beginning there would be details of a lot of miscellaneous provisions which would have to be repeated.

Mr. BRACKEN: If the minister could indicate the main purpose of each bill as it is reached.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will do that.

Mr. BRACKEN: That would be for the information of the laymen among us.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Furs.

Mr. ILSLEY: This matter of the tax on furs was gone into at length on the resolution. It is a complicated matter and this bill simply carries out the resolution. I went into it one Saturday afternoon when the resolution was being discussed. What is happening here is that the 25 per cent tax on furs is being reduced to 10 per cent, but an 8 per cent tax is being imposed on fur garments. The law heretofore has been that on fur-trimmed garments there has been an 8 per cent tax as well as a 25 per cent tax on the furs. Hereafter the tax will be 10 per cent on the furs and 8 per cent on the fur-trimmed garment.

The situation heretofore with regard to fur garments has been that there has been a twenty-five per cent tax on the fur going into the garment but no sales tax on the garment. Hereafter there will be a ten per cent tax on the fur going into the garment and an eight per cent tax on the garment, which will be somewhat less, but not much less, than the tax exacted heretofore. That is the general effect of this section.

Mr. BRACKEN: The purpose being what?

Mr. ILSLEY: There has been much complaint by manufacturers of fur-trimmed garments that there was a discrimination against them. We have argued that there was not, certainly not as much as they alleged. Nevertheless this seems to be perfectly fair. There can be no argument as to the justice of it so far as I can see. There is a comparatively low tax on the furs, ten per cent, and a tax of eight per cent on the completed garment. It seems to mark the end of the controversy at any rate that there had been between the manufacturer of fur-trimmed cloth garments and the department, and perhaps to a certain extent between the two branches of the fur-garment trade.

Mr. BRACKEN: This is thought to be more equitable, is it?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, and it is quite a reduction too, a fairly substantial reduction so far as the furs which go into fur-trimmed garments are concerned.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): The minister indicated that this was a difficult and complicated subject; but coming from the land of Evangeline, where his province is now producing a great quantity of furs—during the last two decades the production of furs has increased by leaps and bounds—perhaps he is in a position to know more about the fur industry than those of us who come from other parts of the country where the fur industry is not so important. I am thinking of the silver fox.

There is something more in this than merely straightening out the twenty-five per cent excise tax versus the eight per cent sales tax; and to give us a complete statement I think the minister should tell us how much less revenue will flow into the treasury of Canada through reducing the excise tax from twenty-five to ten per cent, and also give us some idea of what benefits will inure to those who are in the fox fur industry and the fur industry generally. The benefit to them will be measured on the one hand by the lesser revenue which goes into the treasury of Canada through this reduction of the excise tax from twenty-five to ten per cent, versus the addition of the eight per cent sales tax on the other hand, versus also clause 3 which has an effect on the balance sheet on the other side.

But first will the minister give us an idea of how much less revenue will come into the treasury?

While I am on my feet, might I make this observation? This is just one little industry in the entire economy of Canada which has been singled out in this short session to receive some consideration. I am of the opinion, and the minister will agree with me, that many scores of industries of all kinds, whether engaged in the production of furs or something else, have been asking for consideration in their own particular line. Why, then, in this short session, when we were not expecting many changes in our budget but rather thought perhaps that Canada would wait to see what the world picture would be before we brought down a real budget, should this particular industry have been singled out?

But first let us have the facts. What will be the loss in revenue by this change in taxation?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not the figures and I do not think it is possible to get them. With regard to the furs that are worn as furs or go into fur garments the reduction is slight. There is a ten per cent tax on furs, plus an eight per cent tax on the fur coat, which amounts to about the same thing as the twenty-five per cent tax on the furs alone. When we were on the resolution one hon. member argued that we had made the tax higher, that we had raised the twenty-five per cent. I denied that because the officials of the Department of National Revenue say that on the whole the tax is slightly reduced. But it adds up to about the same thing.

With regard to the furs that go into cloth coats trimmed with fur, there is a reduction. It is not possible to find out what the loss in revenue would be, but it would not be a large amount. The hon. gentleman assumes that this reduction, whatever it is, goes to the primary producer. I do not know whether it does or not. When we put on the twenty-five per cent tax we intended it to be borne by the consumer. I do not know whether that was the effect, but we fully expected it to be.

Although I have discussed this tax on furs at length, I have never yet been given satisfactory evidence that it was borne by the consumer or by the producer or partly by one and partly by the other. That is something which it is impossible to establish. It is true that producers of foxes argued strongly for the reduction in this tax, and they suggested something very much more substantial than this, but for the reason stated by the hon. gentleman, that we should not be singling out furs for substantial tax reductions at this time when we are leaving taxes alone on other products, we felt we could not do what we were requested to do, and we were not satisfied that the benefit would go to the primary producer even if we reduced the tax. I do not know that it will. I do not know who pays the tax. We intended the consumer to pay the tax. I hope that this reduction such as it is goes to the primary producer, but I do not know whether it will or not.

I think the general principle which the hon. gentleman has stated is right, and I do not want him to get the idea that something pretty handsome is being done for the fur industry.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): May I close my observations by making this one. Half a loaf is better than no bread, and I am hopeful that the primary producer of the furs will get the whole benefit of anything that is in this rather small item because, after all, the business is a small business or the reduction is small; but happily it goes down to that part of the world which needs a little assistance in this day and generation, namely, the maritime provinces, and I am very happy to see any little benefit going there. I hope it all goes to the primary producers in the fur industry in the maritime provinces.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the industry is spread pretty well over Canada. I am informed that it is.

Mr. ADAMSON: Does this include a fur known as "mouton", which is sheared sheep; that is, it is really wool; or is this confined to fur-bearing animals? I inquire because there is a large industry in my constituency, a tannery which makes this new fur known as "mouton"; that is, sheared lambskin. It makes an excellent fur, I am told.

Mr. JACKMAN: It is very popular in my district.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is covered by this item.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. ADAMSON: That would get the benefit?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; that is fur.

Mr. McLURE: I cannot yet understand this tax. I was the member who said the other night that we are paying a higher tax in this case than we were paying before; and I used the expression, referring to the payer of the tax, that the last state of that man was worse than the first. Let us look at it in the way I see it. Raw furs of a value of, say $200, go into a certain garment. On that $200 we pay ten per cent, or $20.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. McLURE: When those $200 worth of furs are made into a garment, that garment, from the wholesale man to the retailer, will be worth at least, putting it low, $500. On that $500 you place $40 tax.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. McLURE: That $40 is a tax on the same furs on which you have already collected $20. Therefore we are paying $60, instead of $50 payable under the old tax. As I said the other day, the tax is raised over one per cent instead of being reduced at all. If I am wrong in that statement I should like to have the Minister of Finance tell me.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman is wrong in that he has made too high a jump from $200 to $500.

Mr. JACKMAN: It depends on who made it up.

Mr. ILSLEY: His figures depend on whether the spread is too great or not, and I am told that that is not a typical spread, and that the normal spread is such that a combination of ten and eight works out to less than $25.

Mr. McLURE: Well, it cannot work out, because a manufacturer must get at least 125 per cent for manufacturing. Take the raw product of a suit of clothes. The manufactured price of the suit is always over 100 per cent more. Let us consider one item. Supposing silver foxes are to be manufactured into a fur coat. The manufacturer pays $200 for the raw material, plus ten per cent; he has to pay that tax, or somebody has had to pay it if it is imposed. He cannot afford to put the coat on the market at less than $500, to which the retailer adds his profit afterwards. You can figure it whichever way you like, but if you give the manufacturer a profit for his work you have increased the tax instead of lowering it.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am told that the normal price of that coat if the fur cost $200 would be $350 to $375.

Mr. McLURE: If the source from which the minister has got that information is disclosed, that man will be flooded out of business as a manufacturer inside of two days, because it is not possible.

Mr. MacNICOL: Of course it is not possible.

Mr. McLURE: You could not have obtained that information from the manufacturer, unless perhaps he is manufacturing boots and shoes.

Mr. ILSLEY: The officials got that information from the fur administrator. I have not gone over all these figures myself, but naturally I made many efforts to find out what the new tax would amount to as related to the old tax, and I was assured by officials in whom I have confidence that it was somewhat less than the old. It all depends on whether the hon. gentleman is right about his $500 in relation to his $200. I am told he is wrong.

Mr. LENNARD: I should like to ask if the fur administrator was in the fur business before he became the administrator.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. That is why he knew.

Mr. LENNARD: Is the minister sure of that?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. LENNARD: He was in the fur business?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. McLURE: Before this clause carries, would it not be worth while checking up on this manufacturer's prices? If I am too high and if the minister is too low, even if it comes in between he is still raising the tax. I did not desire to argue the point the other night; all I said was that the tax was increased. There is not a producer of furs but will state also that the tax is increased.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not agree with that. The hon. gentleman is speaking of furs at what stage? The other day he was talking about raw furs.

Mr. McLURE: The tax is on the raw fur.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, it is not; it is on the dressed and dyed furs. They are just ready to put right into the fur garment.

Mr. McLURE: Well, that is a raw fur.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. McLURE: The tax is on the raw fur to start with; that is, 10 per cent. Is that not so?

Mr. ILSLEY: No—after dressing.

Mr. McLURE: It cannot be anything else, because it is a dressing tax and a dyeing tax. That fur is taken in the raw state to the dresser, the dyer, or whatever you want to call him. Then the first tax goes on.

Mr. ILSLEY: After it is dressed and dyed.

Mr. McLURE: Yes; but it is still a raw fur, because they take it there to be dressed. Very well, it is of the same value; the value has not increased. Supposing it was $200 in the raw state and you took it to the dresser; when you took it away from the dresser it would be $220.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, certainly; there are dressing and dyeing charges which enhance its value, and it is to the dressed and dyed fur that the tax attaches.

Mr. McLURE: The dressing and dyeing of these $200 furs would cost about $20. Then your tax goes on the $220, which is $22. I was leaving that out because it is only small. Then it is not a finished fur; it is a dressed fur. Then it goes to the manufacturer as a dressed fur, and when it goes to him there is no tax until he has manufactured that fur. As I said before, he manufactures it into a $500 garment, and that makes your tax that much worse, because you are taxing on the 20 per cent as well, which would make it $2 more.

Section agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: May I ask for the wishes of the committee in connection with these bills? I understand that the minister proposes to introduce a number of bills based on resolutions which were discussed in this committee quite recently. I understood the leader of the opposition to suggest that when each bill comes before the committee the Minister of Finance would make a general statement on the whole bill, not that the minister would make a statement on each section. I think the leader of the opposition thought it would facilitate the passing of the bills if all members of the committee were familiar with the general content of each bill.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will make that under section 1. It will be all right to make it under the first section?

The CHAIRMAN: I think so.

Mr. BRACKEN: I do not think there was any understanding. I did not want the minister to do more than outline the purposes of the main sections of the bill.

Sections 3 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On section 6—Further articles exempted.

Mr. JACKMAN: Would the minister explain in a few words exactly what is allowed under this $100 exemption to Canadians returning from the United States. This refers to tariff item 703. I suppose it excludes tobacco and certain luxury articles.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does the hon. gentleman want item 703?

Mr. JACKMAN: I should like to know what it excludes.

Mr. ILSLEY: Some years ago—I remember the occasion very well; I believe it was before the war—we provided for the admission duty free of goods purchased by Canadians going to the United States and staying there for at least forty-eight hours, and the limit was $100. I believe it covered practically everything.

Mr. JACKMAN: Tobacco?

Mr. ILSLEY: What this does is to provide for the exemption of the goods from the payment of the retail purchase tax.

Mr. JACKMAN: That is not the section I am thinking of.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, section 6. People were coming back and bringing jewellery or things of that kind which were subject to the retail purchase tax. They found that they had to pay a retail purchase tax of twenty-five per cent, a heavy tax which they felt was annoying. This provides for the exemption of such goods from that retail tax. They also paid a war exchange tax, which is repealed by another section.

Mr. JACKMAN: There is no limit to the amount they may bring back on their person?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; it is $100.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It means that on purchases up to $100 no charge whatsoever is paid when the goods are brought across the line?

Mr. ILSLEY: This deals only with the retail purchase tax. The section before deals with the war exchange tax.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Does it mean that there would be no tax on the goods a citizen might bring in up to the amount of $100?

Mr. ILSLEY: This means that there will be no retail purchase or war exchange tax.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Is there any other tax left?

Mr. MacINNIS: Customs tax?

[Mr. Bracken.]

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no customs duty. There were, in respect of certain articles—I believe just tobacco and liquor—some war taxes which are not affected by this.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Schedule I repealed and new.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I suggest, with regard to section 7, which incorporates schedule I, having in it a great many items, that the minister might go through schedule I and point out any substantial changes.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will give a general explanation first. The reductions in the excise tax referred to were made by order in council and are now being incorporated in the schedule to the act. While the schedule was being rewritten, it was thought advisable to bring its wording, so far as automobiles are concerned, into conformity with that appearing in the act affecting sales tax, but it was not thought that these changes would affect the construction in any way. It is intended to put the matter beyond doubt. The main point is that just as soon as the war with Germany ended, namely, on or about May 10, 1945, we felt it was necessary, in order that producers of a large number of items here might make plans for the manufacturing and pricing of certain goods, to effect certain reductions in excise taxes. Most of these taxes were put on for the purpose of discouraging production and, as well, the purchase of these goods. For instance, the excise tax on automobiles was a graded tax running from twenty-five per cent to eighty per cent. We reduced that by order in council on May 10 to ten per cent, so that automobile manufacturers could make plans with some assurance for the production and pricing of their automobiles. The first change, then, was with reference to automobiles. I have here a copy of the order in council of May 10, 1945, and the act carries out the order in council. I could read the order in council, and perhaps that would be the best course.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Possibly it might be enough for the minister to give us the rates that obtained before the reductions were made, and the present reductions.

Mr. ILSLEY: The rates which obtained on automobiles, before this change, were as follows, for excise taxes: automobiles adapted or adaptable for passenger use, with seating capacity for not more than ten persons, valued at $900 or less, twenty-five per cent; over $900 but not more than $1,200, twenty-five per cent on $900 plus forty per cent on the amount in excess of $900; over $1,200, twenty-five per cent on $900, plus forty per cent on $300, plus eighty per cent on the amount in excess of $1,200. That schedule of very high excise taxes is changed so that they are all reduced to a flat ten per cent. That is on automobiles.

Take next cameras. The former rate on cameras, before this change, was: photographic films and plates, projectors for slides, films or pictures except those designed exclusively for industrial or professional photographers' use, twenty-five per cent. That is reduced to ten per cent for the same reason. The rate on phonographs, record playing devices, radio broadcast receiving sets and tubes therefor was twenty-five per cent, and that is reduced to ten per cent. Now, for a slightly different reason, a change was made at the top of page 5 of the schedule, as the hon. member will see. The underlined words are the new words. There was a change in the tax on:

Coin, disc or token operated slot machines and vending machines; coin, disc or token operated games or amusement devices of all kinds, twenty-five per cent.

It was found that the tax was being imposed on a range of articles greater than originally intended; therefore, this proviso was added. I think it may have been added by order in council; it certainly is added by this bill:

Provided that the tax hereby imposed shall not apply to coin collectors used on pay telephones, turnstiles for collecting tolls or charges, coin operated locking devices, nor gas, electric or parking meters.

That is all the schedule covered by section 7.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I do not quite follow one point there. There are a good many other items in schedule I. Do you not intend to refer to these?

Mr. ILSLEY: Schedule I is a reprint or a reenactment of schedule I as it heretofore existed. The changes in the schedule are those which are underlined; the rest of the schedule is unchanged.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): To what extent is it contemplated that these taxes which the minister has just outlined are permanent? Are they as permanent as anything else in our tax structure? Are they in accordance with the practice which we were following earlier? I do not mean in exact details, but in a general way.

Mr. ILSLEY: We have not any plans for changing them. You never can tell when you will change something in the budget; but we have not any plans for changing them. These were the occasion of a lot of thought as to what rate of tax should apply to this class of articles for the time being, at least in this reconstruction period, so that we had to give them something they could count on for a reasonable period of time.

Mr. GREEN: Is this the explanation of the section? There has been quite a large group of articles exempted altogether from the excise tax.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, not in section 7.

Mr. GREEN: But apart from those in the schedule, there were many items that were completely exempted from this tax by the same order in council. What group of articles is that?

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman is right. That would not appear from the schedule. There were excise taxes which were removed entirely. The order in council makes it clear. The order in council reads as follows:

1. The excise tax on electrical or gas fixtures and appliances imposed by section 80 and by section 7 of schedule I of the Special War Revenue Act, as amended, is hereby rescinded.

There are a lot of these; it is a very long list; it reads as follows:

Electric or gas light fixtures, lamps and shades, globes and reflectors therefor, twenty-five per cent. The following electrical or gas appliances adapted to household use: stoves, ranges and heaters, water heaters; refrigerators, including coils, condensing units, cabinets, boxes, evaporators and expansion valves therefor, twenty-five per cent; the following electrical appliances adapted to household use: food choppers and grinders; irons and ironers; washing machines; vacuum cleaners and attachments therefor; garbage disposal units; floor waxers and polishers, twenty-five per cent.

Mr. GREEN: These are all exempt?

Mr. ILSLEY: All free of excise tax now. I continue:

The following electrical appliances: grills, waffle irons; hot plates; roasters; kettles; chafing dishes; food or drink mixers; juice extractors; coffee makers; toasters of all kinds; portable humidifiers; curling irons or tongs; hair dryers; permanent waving machines and spacers or clamps, rods and heaters therefor; razors and shavers, twenty-five per cent.

Now I shall proceed with the order in council:

2. The excise tax on automobiles adapted or adaptable for passenger use, with a seating capacity for not more than ten persons each, imposed by section 80 and by section 1 (a) of schedule I of the Special War Revenue Act, as amended, is hereby reduced to ten per cent.

That is the point I covered in answering the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario. The order in council continues:

3. The excise tax on cameras, photographic films and plates, projectors for slides, films or pictures, except those designed exclusively for industrial or professional photographers' use, imposed by section 80 and by section 5 of schedule I of the Special War Revenue Act, as amended, is hereby reduced to ten per cent.

I also mentioned that. I go on:

4. The excise tax on phonographs, record-playing devices, radio broadcast receiving sets and tubes therefor, imposed by section 80 and by section 6 of schedule I of the Special War Revenue Act, as amended, is hereby reduced to ten per cent.

I think I mentioned that as well. Here is one I did not mention:

5. The following building materials are hereby exempted from the consumption or sales tax imposed by section 86 of the Special War Revenue Act as amended.

Then follows a long list of building materials which were freed from sales tax on that date. Then section 6 reads as follows:

6. The war exchange tax on the building materials enumerated in the preceding paragraph, imposed by section 88A of the Special War Revenue Act, as amended, is hereby rescinded.

That is not important now, because the war exchange tax comes off generally. That covers the changes, the removal or reduction of excise tax and sales tax.

Mr. GREEN: Why is the tax retained at thirty-five per cent on trunks, suitcases and so forth? That is a very heavy tax. There is the same tax on pipes, cigar and cigarette holders, fountain pens, propelling pencils, also thirty per cent on chocolate, candy and confectionery. That is still thirty per cent. Those are very high excise taxes. What is the reason for retaining them?

Mr. ILSLEY: As nearly as I can recall it, the tax on jewellery, which is a retail tax, was started in one of our budgets when we imposed a retail purchase tax on a lot of articles, and we were backed off that position by representations from the trade who said that it would be much better to put the tax on some goods at the manufacturer's level than at the retail level, which we did, but we left it at the retail level on some. The object of those taxes was not to prevent the purchase of those articles. We knew that they would be purchased in large quantities. It was to get revenue. Generally speaking, the object of the taxes which I have read here was not revenue; it was to prevent the use of materials for these purposes. The articles in the list I have read used materials which were required for war purposes. I do not think we got much revenue from these things; as a matter of fact we got practically none. These taxes were designed to be almost prohibitive; but if they brought in any revenue at all of course we got the benefit of it. The manufacture of these articles went down to very low dimensions.

That did not apply, however, to the class of articles about which the hon. gentleman is speaking. In that case it is a revenue tax, and we are not taking it off; we still need the revenue. The factories are becoming reconverted and are starting once more to manufacture the articles in the list I read; and it is pretty unsettling for them to look ahead to a reduction of the tax, perhaps a big reduction, in the next budget. It is a case where they are starting from scratch after the war, and we thought we should put this particular tax down. The matter was very carefully considered as to just what we should do there. There was not much revenue in those cases. A great deal of revenue is lost in the removal of the sales tax from building materials, but that is not so in regard to these excise taxes. For instance, the excise tax on automobiles amounts to nothing as a source of revenue. When the time came for people to start making automobiles again, however, you would not let them start under a very high tax, because by doing so you would make all sorts of complications for yourself in a year or so.

Mr. GREEN: There is also a twenty-five per cent tax on toilet articles, preparations and cosmetics. Is that retained as a disciplinary measure, as an austerity measure or for revenue?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is a revenue tax. I think that is a proper subject of taxation. Some are necessaries, but a great many are not.

Mr. McMASTER: Has the minister considered the case of the young boy who has been given five cents and then has to humiliate himself by trying to raise another penny before he can buy a soft drink or chocolate bar. This afternoon we heard a great deal about juvenile delinquency, and it may be that the problem of raising the extra penny has something to do with that. It seems to me the government of Canada could get along without that extra cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, it yields $19,000,000.

Mr. McMASTER: I am speaking now of the tax on fruit juices, chocolate and candy. As I understand it, the chocolate bar which formerly sold for five cents now costs six cents; the soft drink which formerly cost five cents now costs six cents. This is a serious thing for the youth of Canada.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Schedule III repealed and new.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Would the minister make some comment on section 8 and the schedule concerned?

Mr. ILSLEY: The explanation can best be made by reference to schedule III on page 6. The changes begin to appear on page 8; the words are underlined. The first change is just a correction in the name of the Department of National Health and Welfare. The second change is in respect of memorials or monuments erected in memory of members of the armed forces who lost their lives in the service of their country.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Might I refer the minister to the explanatory note facing page 2, which I do not quite understand in reference to schedule III and the effect of it. It says:

Schedule III of the act is amended to bring into effect the exemption provided for machinery and apparatus to be used directly in the process of manufacture or production of goods . . .

Mr. ILSLEY: The explanatory note is not complete, but it deals with the main changes in the schedule. The main changes are not those on page 8; everyone would agree with those. The main changes are on page 9 and succeeding pages. For instance, the first change on page 9 relates to articles imported or purchased by certain diplomatic personages.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): What about pages 6 and 7; are there no changes there?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no change on pages 6 and 7; the important changes begin to appear on page 9. The building materials included in the list of exemptions appear there, and on page 10 is the very important change, the exemption of machinery and apparatus and complete parts thereof to be used directly in the process of the manufacture or production of goods. That is a thirty or forty million dollar change.

Mr. GILLIS: I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue a question on this. I understand that this section brings in a new schedule III to replace the schedule in the old act. I had some correspondence, as the minister will remember, in reference to the establishment of a health centre or recreational centre or sports centre, whatever you like to call it, in connection with which it was necessary to import from the United States some $800 worth of sports material that could not be purchased in Canada. In view of the fact that this was to be used exclusively as a recreational centre, and incidentally as a memorial to the boys from that parish who died during this war, the department was asked if that importation could not be made exempt from tax. The minister informed me that under the old act that could not be done. I should like to ask if under this new schedule that type of equipment might be brought in under the exemption. On page 8 are specifically mentioned, among the articles that can be brought in, memorials or monuments erected to members of the armed forces, and so forth. Could that request be dealt with under the new schedule?

Mr. McCANN: No provision is made for that. At the present time there is an exemption for hospitals, and I understand that the hon. gentleman's request is that this exemption be widened to include equipment for recreational centres. As a matter of fact that was what was taken up in the correspondence to which he made reference, but the answer to his question is that what he has enumerated is not included in this amendment.

Mr. GILLIS: Then what is meant when it is said on page 8, "memorials or monuments erected in memory of members of the armed forces who lost their lives in the service of their country"? Does that just mean stone memorials? There was quite a lengthy discussion in this house in regard to setting up machinery to legalize all charitable organizations across the country who put on drives for the purpose of collecting funds to establish memorials to service personnel who lost their lives in this war. I think one of the greatest memorials one could establish would be to take the children, brothers and sisters of those who made the supreme sacrifice, out of the ashes and give them a place to play. I know my conception and, I think, the conception of the general public of a memorial is that it is not just a piece of granite; I think of it as something more tangible than that. I believe that efforts being made in different communities to establish something along this line should be given consideration under the interpretation of "memorials."

Mr. McCANN: It reads:

Memorials or monuments erected in memory of members of the armed forces who lost their lives in the service of their country.

A memorial would include a window in a church, bells or an organ. I think the whole matter would be dealt with under the amendments to the War Charities Act which were passed at this session and which will come into effect when the bill receives royal assent. Under those new provisions the definition of a war memorial is pretty broad. Either in the bill itself or by regulation it will be indicated in detail just what constitutes a memorial. That is as full an answer as I can give at this time, but I think it should meet the inquiry of the hon. member.

Mr. GILLIS: Provided that it is retroactive.

Mrs. STRUM: Artificial eyes and artificial limbs are included, and I should like to know whether it would be possible to include artificial hearing aids. Many people are terribly handicapped by loss of hearing, and these devices are expensive to buy. If they could be included under this clause it would be most helpful to these people.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Last year provision was made to put hearing aids in the same category as the other appliances mentioned by the hon. member.

Mr. ILSLEY: That was for duty purposes, but they are still subject to sales tax.

Mr. MACKENZIE: They are produced in Canada at the same cost as in the United States.

Mrs. STRUM: Do I understand that the other appliances are free from sales tax in Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. JACKMAN: Has the minister any objection to including hearing aids under this clause. I do not imagine that people wear them unless they have to, and it would seem to be putting an additional burden on them.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not wish to make an amendment to the bill now, but the matter can be looked into before the next budget is brought down. I do not know just why they have not been exempted. The only reason I can think of is that we did not believe the consumer would get the benefit. There is a tremendous mark-up on some of them, and I do not think the consumer would ever see this exemption.

Mr. JACKMAN: Where is the sales tax applied?

Mr. ILSLEY: The manufacturer pays it.

Mr. JACKMAN: If the person who bought it did not get it, the government probably would.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Is the exemption being extended to the diplomatic corps reciprocal in every case? I notice it benefits counsellors, secretaries, attaches, trade commissioners and consuls general of various nations. The exemption is applied to automobiles, cigars, cigarettes, manufactured tobacco, ale, beer, stout, wines, spirits and electricity purchased in Canada. Those are quite wide exemptions, and I should like to know if Canadians get the same exemptions in countries where we have ambassadors and trade commissioners?

Mr. ILSLEY: They do in the main, but this is not strictly reciprocal. It was proposed at first to make it strictly reciprocal, but it was found to be almost impossible to do that. There might be two or three taxes to which our people would be subject in some foreign country, and we could not just chase around to find out about these things. We would have had to apply a different rule to every minister or ambassador in Ottawa, and the last time I counted them there were twenty-three ambassadors, ministers and trade commissioners located here. We did not want to be bothered by having to apply a different taxation rule to each one of them. In the main we get the same treatment abroad, but it is not consistent in all countries. One country will tax certain things and not tax others, but I think it is true that every country makes some tax concessions.

Mr. GREEN: Does this mean that a secretary or a trade commissioner or a consul general can walk into a store anywhere in Canada and buy his cigars, cigarettes and spirits without having to pay this tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: The word "secretary" does not mean a stenographer; it refers to a person with some diplomatic status.

Mr. JACKMAN: Would this section apply to those persons who were subject to diplomatic immunity? That is a much narrower classification than stenographers and clerks in an embassy.

Mr. ILSLEY: Relatively speaking, there are not very many of these people.

Mr. GREEN: Could one of these persons walk into a store anywhere in Canada and buy these articles without paying this tax? It says "purchased in Canada by any of the foregoing."

Mr. ILSLEY: He has to buy from the manufacturer in order to get the benefit of this, except in the case of the retail purchase tax. In that case he must get a certificate to show he is entitled to the exemption.

Mr. ADAMSON: Does this apply to trade commissioners as well?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, to trade commissioners representing other of His Majesty's governments.

Mr. ADAMSON: United Kingdom trade commissioners would get the benefit of this?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. MANROSS: I have been present in another committee, and I should like to ask if schedule I has been passed?

The CHAIRMAN: It has been passed, but I think the committee will agree to revert to it for a moment.

Mr. MANROSS: I wish to ask if the discrimination in taxation against soft drinks as compared with other five-cent commodities is to be removed?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not admit that there is discrimination. In effect, the hon. member is asking whether there is to be a revision in the soft drink tax provided by this bill. There is not.

Mr. MANROSS: There is definite discrimination because soft drinks have to sell at seven cents, while other commodities in that market sell for six cents. This difference is due to taxation discrimination.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I did not hear what the minister said about hearing aids. Are they to be exempt from the tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: They are not exempt from the sales tax.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Hearing aids are a very important thing to a great many people. The Zenith machine is good for certain people, but it is not suitable for all deaf people and they have to buy a machine that may run anywhere from $250 to $500. Not only that, but there is the expense of the necessary batteries. A person who is very deaf uses up a good many dollars worth of batteries in a year. It is no fault of their own that they are deaf, and these hearing aids should be exempt from the sales tax. I am sure that the buyer would get the benefit if these aids were tax exempt, because the interests of the deaf are being looked after just now by a society which is closely allied to the Canadian National Institute for the Blind. The Canadian National Institute for the Hard of Hearing have found that a cheap hearing aid does not suit everybody, and that those who are very deaf cannot hear with the cheaper machine; they have to have an expensive one. I speak feelingly, because I use one of these machines myself and the tax will run anywhere from eight or nine or ten up to forty dollars.

Mr. McCANN: My understanding of the matter is that by arrangement a hearing apparatus is admitted into this country duty free on the understanding that it be retailed in Canada at the same price at which it is retailed in the United States. Sales tax is not payable in the United States, and if the sales tax were removed here there would be no advantage to the consumer whatever.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): There are other articles on this list which are in the same category as hearing aids which are made exempt from the tax. Why take advantage of a person who cannot hear and tax them? They do not wear these machines for fun. They certainly give them no pleasure, but they are a necessity for lots of people to enable them to continue at their work and be economically efficient. I notice in this list other articles which are in the same category as hearing aids, for instance, artificial eyes, artificial limbs, liver extract and so forth, which are exempt. Why these should be exempt and not hearing aids I do not know.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know that I need add anything to what my colleague has said. But in the case of the hearing aid which the hon. member mentioned, the Zenith, the removal of the sales tax would not reduce the price to the consumer by one cent. I know that because I went into the matter. There was an application to enable the persons who are handling it in Canada to sustain their proper position, and it was admitted that there would not be any reduction in the price to the consumer. It may be that the tax ought to be removed to help those who are handling the article, but that would not help the consumer at all. Therefore I do not think I can recommend taking it off.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I am not talking particularly about the instrument the minister mentioned.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the one the hon. member mentioned.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Yes, and others, but not to help those who are handling them. We have in the city of Toronto this movement on behalf of the deaf. The minister probably knows about it. It is a society closely allied to the Institute for the Blind. The people who need assistance are those deaf people who need a far better apparatus than the Zenith machine, which sells for about $40. The tax on that would not be so expensive; but that machine does not suit everybody; it does not do some people any good, and the apparatus that will do them real good runs anywhere from $200 to $500. A person who uses these scientific instruments also has to spend a tremendous amount on batteries each year. The battery charges alone sometime run as high as $75 to $100 a year. There is no reason why such persons should have to pay the sales tax on these things because their deafness is not their own fault.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

EXCESS PROFITS TAX ACT, 1940

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of bill No. 235, to amend the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—"Excess profits".

Mr. ILSLEY: It was agreed that I should say something about the purpose of the bill on clause 1 in committee.

The purpose of the bill is to carry out the very important changes in the excess profits tax which were mentioned in the budget and in the budget resolutions. It is a little difficult to go into the matter in detail unless we take up the sections one by one. On the resolution I explained, and I think most hon. members understand, that by this budget beginning with the 1st day of January next the 100 per cent excess profits tax with 20 per cent refundable is reduced to 60 per cent. That is a short and simple way of stating it. But if it were to be stated accurately I would have to go into decimals and figures as I did on the resolution. That is what I would call the main change in the Excess Profits Tax Act.

There is a change in the taxation of sole proprietorships and partnerships. The 15 per cent excess profits tax is removed entirely; and what was 100 per cent tax, with 20 per cent refundable, becomes a 60 per cent tax in the case of proprietors and partnerships. Then a very important change is the raising of the minimum standard profits for small businesses. It was formerly provided that $5,000 was the minimum standard profit. That is, even if a small business had before the war profits of, say $2,000 or $3,000, we would consider for excess profits tax purposes that its standard profit was $5,000. That had the effect of cutting down the excess which was subject to taxation. Now, that $5,000 is raised. The formula is this, that on the profits of 1946 and the subsequent years the minimum standard profits of taxpayers be increased from $5,000 to $15,000, and that where a taxpayer's standard profits are on January 1, 1946, in excess of $5,000 but less than $25,000, they be increased by one-half the difference between their present amount and $25,000. That is an important change which is provided for by this bill.

The only other change of substance is the renewal of the exemption from excess profits tax of the profits of certain mines. Heretofore that has been applied to base metal mines and strategic mineral mines: it is being extended in this bill to precious metal mines and to industrial mineral mines. All that is provided for in this bill. I will explain the bill section by section as best I can.

Mr. BRACKEN: These bills are to carry out the announcements made in the minister's budget speech?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BRACKEN: Which were amplified or stated more specifically in the appendix to that speech?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that is right.

Mr. BRACKEN: I understand from the minister that there is something more in these bills than was included in the resolution. Is that correct?

Mr. ILSLEY: Well—

Mr. BRACKEN: All I want to say is that if there is, perhaps the minister will point out the additional features as he comes to them.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I will point them out.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Persons liable to tax.

Mr. ILSLEY: Here is where I yielded.

Mr. GREEN: We had a good case.

Mr. ILSLEY: I hope I was right; that is all I can say.

Mr. GREEN: We are sure you were right.

Mr. ILSLEY: I know that in yielding I have allowed a lot of taxpayers to get away with a good deal they should not have got away with, and possibly made a lot of discrimination. I have just gone on the assumption that in this case retroactivity is worse than discrimination and tax avoidance—

Mr. JACKMAN: Correct.

Mr. ILSLEY: —because tax avoidance and discrimination take place here on quite a substantial scale. I have subscribed to the principle that retroactivity is worse than that, but I am not sure that it is. I have done it anyway.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain just how the section as changed will work?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): When the minister is doing that will he say something on this point, which I take it is dealing with the future? We have now created a situation, due to the removal of the excess profits tax against individuals, where, certainly in the smaller-scale businesses, it is much cheaper now to carry on as an individual than to incorporate. The individual pays substantially less tax. That appears to have an unfortunate bearing in one way, because, as I think the minister will agree, it is often desirable for a business to be incorporated, and there is a substantial penalty on it. I mention that, not because I want to enter into a long debate to-night, but so that it may be considered between now and the time of the next budget.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. Proprietorships and partnerships have been claiming for years that they have been discriminated against, and I cannot tell who is getting the worst of it.

Mr. JACKMAN: They were discriminated against as partnerships as compared with individuals, not as compared with corporations.

Mr. ILSLEY: No. Perhaps it is idle to go into this, but these persons who were in partnership were carrying on business as individuals, would get out their pencils and show that by the time they paid their excess profits tax, and their income tax as individuals, all of which had to be paid, they were far worse off than the man who incorporated himself and who paid just the corporation tax and on such salary as he chose to draw from the incorporated company, and they made quite a case. Now, if they are getting the breaks here the other way we shall hear from the incorporated people: that is all.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I do not propose to take the minister's time or the time of the committee. I have had calculations made, but I think it will be undesirable to go into the matter now. I suggest, however, that this is a matter which should be seriously considered before the next session.

Mr. ILSLEY: I thank the hon. member for bringing it to my attention, and it will be considered.

Mr. GREEN: The minister has not yet explained how this change will operate. As I understand it, anyone who is exempt under the law as it stood before will remain exempt; but from the date of the budget, which was October 12, 1945, there will be a more strict way of interpreting what is new business. Is that the sum and substance of the present provision?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that is correct.

Mr. GREEN: Before the minister answers that I would like to point this out to him. While he may know cases where there has been evasion under the law as it was enacted last year, I know of cases where people were genuinely and perfectly honest in making their change in business, believing that they would come under the provision as passed last year. Perhaps cases of that kind would not come to the minister's attention so frequently as cases where there had been evasion. But I do not think he need have any pangs of conscience for fear he is letting evaders off by changing his legislation so that this provision is not retroactive for eighteen months.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not think much of the case the hon. gentleman showed me. It may have impressed him; it did not impress me. I was sorry to see that fellow let off.

Mr. GREEN: In the particular case to which I referred the person was certainly innocent. Although he might have been wrongly advised by the ministers' own officers, he did what he thought it was perfectly right for him to do. I suggest that the minister should not get the idea that the majority of business people in Canada, or even a large group, are trying to evade the laws of the country, because I am convinced that the group who do that are small in number. Will the minister explain how the provision will work now?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a good stiff test applied to business in determining whether it is a new business, and that is found toward the bottom of page 20. The preceding words are that the tax is not applicable to the profits of the first fiscal period of the new business or to the profits of the first fiscal period in which the said subsection 4 becomes applicable—

. . . as the case may be, unless in the case of a person who has commenced business after the twelfth day of October, nineteen hundred and forty-five, a person or persons who have a substantial interest in the business either by ownership of shares in the company that operates the business or by being members of the partnership that operates the business or otherwise, had, in the opinion of the minister, either by ownership of shares in the company that operated the business or by being members of the partnership that operated the business or otherwise, a substantial interest in a previous business of which the new business is, in the opinion of the minister, a continuation.

If that set of circumstances applies he does not get the benefit of the forty per cent in the first year of operations.

Mr. GREEN: Suppose a man branches out into a new type of business while he still carries on his old business. Would he get the benefit in connection with that second business?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is very difficult to give a general ruling on that. That is what we were talking about the other night. It is almost impossible to make a satisfactory application of these words, but we could not think of any better words. There comes a point when a person is in a new business and we have a different set-up to consider. We have to take these cases and form the very best judgment we can on them, and some are turned down.

Mr. GREEN: Each case will be considered on its merits?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: If there is a change of ownership, if another person takes over the majority of the shares in the company, he will get the benefit, as I read the provision?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that is right.

Mr. MANROSS: In the opinion of the minister, is there any standard interpretation of what a "substantial interest" in a small corporation or private business is? Take a small business that comes within a couple of thousand dollars of making excess profits. They decide that the manager holds a substantial interest, and so they add his wages to the profits of the company so as to put the company in the excess profits class. Is there any standard by which it is decided whether the interest is substantial?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, there is not. There is no fixed percentage.

Mr. MANROSS: On what basis, then, do they interpret it? I know a business where the manager owned nineteen per cent of the stock. The company was within two thousand dollars of excess profits, and the manager's salary was added to the profits, putting the company in the excess class. In other words, the company would have been better off if it had fired that manager and hired one who did not own any stock.

Mr. ILSLEY: That has nothing to do with the amount of tax. It has nothing to do with the profits or the tax on profits.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I should like to make one observation. I think I dislike tax evasion as much as any man living, but I hate to see another of those cases where we have resort to the opinion of the minister, which of course does not mean the minister but his officials, since obviously the minister cannot personally do it. It means some more inquisition, and I earnestly suggest that when these questions are being considered we do not assume first of all that there is a very large number of people who are trying to defraud the tax collector, though of course I know there are some. Second, I suggest that practical considerations and what I venture, without any offence, to call considerations of common sense, should enter into this matter. Perhaps a certain amount of tax does escape in the first instance; the minister lies in wait with the personal income tax and he does a pretty good job on that. I really feel that if you balanced things up and could trace it to the end—and the trail is sometimes a long one—you would be amazed to discover how little the treasury does lose, even assuming that there are some improper practices, which we might all dislike, at the outset. We would gain a great deal in the way of getting rid of these everlasting trips to Ottawa with discussions and delays, and more discussions and further delays, which really impede the conduct of business. I sometimes wonder if the department realizes the extent to which this goes on. I am not going to labour the point further. I suppose it is out of the question to ask if this could be omitted. The minister would probably say that the resolution we approved demands that it be in. Is that correct?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know that the resolution demands that it be in.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): If it were possible to persuade the minister to leave it out I would go on talking for a couple of hours more.

Mr. MACKENZIE: A good reason for leaving it in.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Seriously, if it could be left out, I think the minister would start something good. If the minister could get away from this business of having to sit in judgment on this man or that man it would be all to the good. I earnestly suggest that in the long run you get the money one way or another. As a matter of fact, I think there would be a good check on these fellows because, if they are really successful enough, they will get into such high personal brackets that they would suffer more in the end, which would be an end to a lot of our troubles.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would not mind so much if they distributed their profits.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The minister is getting after that too. He has not forgotten many things.

Mr. ILSLEY: There has always been a provision under which the minister could direct distribution of profits, but it is sparingly used, if that is what the hon. gentleman means.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I think the lot of the wrongdoer is a very hard one. Does the minister think what has been happening and what he is trying to correct in what is before us now will be a lesson to the people who try to beat him by retaining surpluses here and waiting for tax reduction to come? I think they will be awfully sick of that. I ask the minister to make a beginning now. It would be a memorable day if we started to do away with these inquisitions. That is what they are. I am sure the minister does not like being an inquisitor, even a grand inquisitor. That is what it is coming to.

Mr. ILSLEY: I wish to say something about this exercise of the minister's discretion. You have two sets of representations being made to the Department of National Revenue and to the Department of Finance; one is that the minister should not have a discretion; that the matter should be spelled out in the act; that it should be all covered by the law, and that there should be no discretion in the minister to deal with cases; that it should be for the courts. On the other hand—and this happens time after time—if a taxpayer comes in and finds that by the letter of the law something really harsh is to happen to him he says: "Surely there ought to be a little leeway; there ought to be a chance for common sense on the part of the minister; there ought to be some discretionary powers in the minister." Time after time the very same people who complain about discretionary powers in the minister want discretionary powers in the minister, because they say: "It is not sensible to have the law so rigid that common sense cannot be applied."

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Perhaps I am one of the people about whom the minister is talking. I am not suggesting that the minister should not have discretion. I think there has to be someone. I am suggesting that we have as few as possible to-day. I am asking if we could not lessen them. There are well over one hundred now. I am wondering whether we could not have one less. Let us clean them up. I am only suggesting that there should be as few as possible. We should try to relieve the minister and the business world of as much as possible. If I am not estopped from moving an amendment I should like to move that the inquisition be left out and that you do not have to inquire into that.

Mr. ILSLEY: Just what is the position if we left it out? Let us look at that and see. It would read in this way:

> Unless, in the case of a person who has commenced business after the twelfth day of October, nineteen hundred and forty-five, a person or persons who have a substantial interest in the business either by ownership of shares in the company that operates the business or by being members of the partnership that operates the business or otherwise, had, either by ownership of shares in the company that operated the business or by being members of the partnership that operated the business or otherwise, a substantial interest in a previous business of which the new business is, in the opinion of the minister, a continuation.

It would be necessary for us to define "substantial", because the courts would have nothing to go by and nobody would know. There would be no finality to that. One court would say one thing was substantial and another would say something else was substantial. We would have to define "substantial". We should do that and we should—

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I did not make myself clear. I was suggesting something more than the removal of the discretion. I was suggesting that the whole of the last part of the clause be left out and that the minister do not discriminate but that he allow the business to be considered a new business for the first year and to have the 40 per cent tax allowed. I was suggesting you go back to the original clause, but I shall drop the matter now.

Mr. ILSLEY: It would be evasion; it would be an avoidance; it is very discriminatory. A bright man finds out that by changing a partnership into an incorporated company he can save himself a lot of taxes, or by changing a company into a partnership. And they did it both ways. They could save themselves a lot in taxes, and they are doing the same thing. They are carrying on the same business, dealing with the same customers, no change in the interest of the business at all, but by a legal form they can save themselves a whole lot in taxes. It is true they could do it under the law. Numerous taxpayers inquired around, found out they could do it, and they did it. They moved in clever circles among well-informed friends and they did it. But the other chap across the road who did not have as good an education or did not move in the same circle of friends, did not find out about it; he went on paying high taxes. That is not right.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am not going to press the matter any further. I am going to raise one more point which may be only a question of administration. There is a feeling that under the act where certain professional people were defined and, I think, more or less set out in the act, they are not subject in any way to excess profits tax to which certain others are. For instance, I have letters from brokers who suggest that their whole income comes purely from commissions; that they do not buy and sell; that their reward is purely for services rendered. They think they should be regarded as in the same category as professional men. I do not think it has anything to do with the legislation. It may be a matter of administration and regulation. I wish to raise that point so that the minister will have it before him.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall take note of that.

Mr. McMASTER: Is the effect of the act as drawn that you can go back to all changes in business since June 26, 1944, and unless they live up to the specifications the minister can decide that in future they will be taxable and that they will only miss the first year's taxes?

Mr. ILSLEY: We have changed that.

Mr. McMASTER: Have the people who have escaped so far finally escaped for all time, or are they to be caught now?

Mr. ILSLEY: It applied only to the first year's taxes.

Mr. McMASTER: That is last year's taxes?

Mr. ILSLEY: The first year.

Mr. McMASTER: The minister can go over their cases and under the present legislation decide whether they are taxable or not? If it has been decided that they escaped the tax, are they out for all time? Suppose a company or a partnership, or whatever you like, changed their business. Because that change was made when a certain law was in force, has the minister the right now to review it? Suppose the change took place before October 12 last, but since June 26, 1944, can the minister review all these different changes?

Mr. ILSLEY: The more restricted section which is being passed now applies to businesses coming into operation or substantially changing their character after October 12 of this year.

Mr. McMASTER: They have escaped, then? The minister has not introduced retroactive legislation?

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. ILSLEY: No, it is not retroactive legislation.

Mr. McMASTER: They have escaped?

Mr. ILSLEY: For one year.

Mr. McMASTER: Just for one year?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: It applied only for one year, anyway.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. McMASTER: They have a status now which will make people go back and seek the right to return to their status as it existed in June, 1944. I am not so sure that they may not accomplish their purpose.

Mr. ILSLEY: No. Under the legislation they only had the right to the forty per cent rate for the one year, the first year of their operation. After that, they had to pay taxes just like anyone else.

Mr. McMASTER: They escaped for only one year?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON: Would the minister explain the proviso in the new section 3 under which a person acting in the capacity of a trustee whose income is derived from the operation of a gas or oil well is considered a corporation. That is the basis of the proviso. What is the reason for that proviso, and how does that section function?

Mr. ILSLEY: These royalty companies, so-called, were never subject to more than forty per cent tax, and this simply continues that situation. It is a reenactment of a section which made them taxable. Years ago trustees were taxable as though they were corporations, but only to the extent of the minimum corporation tax, which is forty per cent; and this is just a re-enactment of that.

Mr. ADAMSON: I presume this refers to the oil royalty type of business?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON: Then an oil royalty company is now subject to the full forty per cent tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, it has been for the last two or three years.

Mr. ADAMSON: And this merely confirms the status quo, as it were?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right. It is just in here for drafting purposes. It is just a repetition.

Mr. JACKMAN: In connection with the drafting of these sections, ordinarily I can read any book or paragraph I pick up, but I find that the first sentence in section 3 consists of eleven lines, and if you go beyond the colon you add another six, making seventeen lines in all. I find it very hard to understand language of that description. Then I go on to the next sentence, and with nothing intervening at all it contains thirty-five lines. I cannot read English like that; it is too hard to understand. How the government expects the ordinary Canadian citizen to read such drafting as its brought before this committee I fail to understand. Surely something can be done to make it easier; surely this can be broken up into shorter sentences with less length given to every statement of fact. I believe it is an intolerable burden to ask the Canadian public to try to understand language like that. It is not English at all; it is a conglomeration of words.

That is the first point. The second point I wish to make is that although on page 2 there is only one resolution, or one section of the act, despite what we tried to get across to the government the last time these resolutions were being considered; despite what the senate committee on the working of the income tax law has said, in no less than three places I see the words "in the opinion of the minister". The first is in line 26; the next is in line 44, and finally in line 49. The minister said that taxpayers would object strenuously if the law were rigid and occasionally there was some hardship suffered. I believe they will holler more loudly than ever if they do not know what the law actually is. The other day my colleague the hon. member for Calgary West quoted an old maxim, that it is better that nine guilty men should go free than that one innocent man should suffer. May I suggest to the minister another legal maxim which I think has great bearing here; it is better that the law should be certain than just. That is an old common law maxim, the reasons for which he will find in any good textbooks on legal maxims, such as Broome or any other writer. Business men will refuse to enter into transactions if they do not know exactly how their profits will be dealt with. That happens almost every day in the life of a business man. Personally I find very often that there is no time to find out from Ottawa what will happen if you are successful in your transaction, whether or not your profits will be all taxed away, and, as a result, frequently do not enter into the transaction. Therefore, often employment is not created. So I suggest to the minister that he give consideration to the maxim that it is better that the law should be certain than just. Frankly I do not know what these sections mean; I have had no connection with them in business practice, and I fail to understand exactly what is meant by that type of English.

On section 5—Repeal. Base metal and strategic mineral mines.

Mr. ADAMSON: I think we should have some clarification of this section. I understood from the budget that all metalliferous mines were to be included, which would take in the precious metals mines. Here again the act is complicated and difficult to understand. Are the precious metals mines included under this section, and why is the new phrase "bedded deposits" used, when I do not believe it was in the original section? Would the minister give a general explanation in language that can be understood by a layman?

Mr. ILSLEY: This section applies to metalliferous mines and industrial mineral mines.

Mr. ADAMSON: All metalliferous mines?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, including gold and silver.

Mr. ADAMSON: It does not say so.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; "metalliferous".

Mr. GREEN: Change your marginal note.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; the marginal note is wrong, but the section is right. Look at line 44:

> . . . the profits of any corporation or joint stock company derived from the operation of any metalliferous or industrial mineral mine which comes into production on or after the first day of January, one thousand nine hundred and forty-six. The minister, having regard to the production of ore in reasonable commercial quantities, shall determine which mines, whether new or old, qualify under this paragraph, and shall issue a certificate stating the date upon which any mine is deemed to have come into production. In this paragraph, "industrial mineral mine" means an industrial mineral mine that has been certified by the Minister of Mines and Resources to be operating on mineral deposits other than bedded deposits, and for this purpose "bedded deposits" include deposits of building stone.

That is the definition of an industrial mineral mine. The hon. member is interested in metalliferous mines and he need not worry about this question of bedded deposits. Bedded deposits are excluded, and bedded deposits include deposits of building stone. I understand that there are certain mines which are rather easy to start, and taking out building stone would not be the kind of operation that one would need to encourage by exempting the operator from excess profits taxes. There would be no need of it. That extends to bedded deposits generally.

Mr. ADAMSON: I understood by the resolution that there was a regulation by the department covering what is known as the tuning-up period, and that that tuning-up period for a mill would vary with the mine. I understand from this section that the minister is given discretion to say when the tuning-up period ends and the mine starts production. As the minister may know, when a metalliferous mill starts into production the circuit absorbs a great deal of the metal. This is particularly true in a gold mining circuit where metal would be absorbed for periods extending up to months. Apparently this gives the minister discretion, or it is in his opinion to say that on such-and-such a date an operation began and the period of the three-year exemption will commence from such and such a date? That is how I interpret this clause.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not catch the question.

Mr. ADAMSON: The section states:

> The minister, having regard to the production of ore in reasonable commercial quantities, shall determine which mines, whether new or old, qualify under this paragraph and shall issue a certificate stating the date upon which any mine is deemed to have come into production.

That seems to be vague. I am sure the minister will administer the act in the best possible way, but this seems rather a loose way to administer an act which primarily has to do with mining. It would seem to me that instead of having a time period we should consider the return of capital. To base an exemption on the return of capital would be simpler and much more just to the operation. I may be wrong about this section, but apparently the words "deemed to have come into production" and "the minister shall determine" give the minister and his department the power to say on what date a mine shall have started commercial production. Is that so?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. ADAMSON: Then there are excluded materials such as gypsum and those which can be dug out from the surface, as it were, without requiring the sinking of a shaft.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not quite the place where the line is drawn.

Mr. ADAMSON: Could the minister say where the line is drawn?

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. ILSLEY: We do not say that an industrial mineral mine shall be such mine as the minister in his opinion considers is an industrial mineral mine. We tried to define it a little more than that. The best that could be done after a great deal of consideration was to say that an industrial mineral mine is one that has been certified by the Minister of Mines and Resources to be operating on mineral deposits other than bedded deposits, and for this purpose "bedded deposits" include deposits of building stone. I cannot tell the committee what bedded deposits are. Coal is a bedded deposit and therefore coal does not qualify.

Mr. ADAMSON: Yet coal is definitely a mineral.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes, and it would be an industrial mineral if it were not excluded by the use of the words "bedded deposits".

Mr. ADAMSON: I think it might clarify matters if the bill contained a definition of "bedded deposits". It seems to me that there is ambiguity in this clause which will lead to heart-burnings as time goes on. In the minister's own province there is a mine producing barite, a mineral used in the sinking of oil wells. I understand that it is dug from the surface, and if this is not defined there will be a lot of heart-burnings.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is nothing that creates heart-burnings like the paying of taxes. I do not know whether barite is a bedded deposit, but they would know over at the Department of Mines and Resources. I know that barite was discussed. The barite mine in Nova Scotia is in commercial production now, and industrial mineral mines that came into production before this date are not relieved. Every consideration was given as to how to define this. If hon. gentlemen could go through some of the long sessions where an effort is made to get definitions and put the law in an exact state where it can be both clear and administerable, they would see the effort that is made to overcome the use of discretionary power once in a while.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I have only one question to ask which is not as stupid as it may look to be on the surface. Does this section apply to oil wells? The section reads:

> The profits of any corporation or joint stock company derived from the operation of any metalliferous or industrial mineral mine which comes into production on or after the first day of January, one thousand nine hundred and forty-six.

The privy council has held that oil is a mineral, and there is no doubt at all that the drilling of an oil well is a mining operation. So that we are with you up to that point, but the next sentence refers to ore. Could the minister tell us whether the use of the word "ore" would take an oil well out of the purview of this section?

Mr. ILSLEY: I hope so because we did not intend to have it in. We never thought we were including oil.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): "Hope deferred maketh the heart sick." Cannot the minister weaken on that and help us out?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no intention in the world of having oil included.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I did not think so. I just called it to the minister's attention.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman has me worried now for fear it is in there, and that I may have to move an amendment.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Perhaps I should have kept quiet. I would have been much better off.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it is quite clear. I do not think the Minister of Mines and Resources would certify that the mineral deposits are being operated—

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The privy council held that ore is a mineral; there is no question about that. That is the only reason we have those rights in this country under the old leases. I was only trying to be helpful, but apparently I have knocked my own people.

Mr. ILSLEY: No one ever expected the oil operators to apply this to oil wells.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): No; it was my own thought.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not intended to apply to oil wells and I wish to make it clear now that it will not apply to oil wells, even if we have to amend the act next session if any question is raised. But I think it is clear enough. Industrial minerals were never intended to apply to oil wells.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Then I am sorry that I spoke.

Mr. McMASTER: Would this apply to large corporations like International Nickel, McIntyre Mines, Falconbridge Nickel and others who are constantly looking for new mines? If they found a new one, would they come under this? They might find a mine paying 5,000 per cent in dividends. Would they come under this, and for how long?

Mr. ILSLEY: It applies to a new mine whether owned by an existing corporation or not. The profits of that corporation have to be ascertained with reference to that separate operation.

Mr. McMASTER: I am thinking perhaps that there was some merit in the suggestion of the hon. member for York West that the amount should be limited to 100 per cent and for a certain period. A mine that may become exhausted in a short time might yield very large dividends, and as the section stands it might apply for an unlimited time.

Mr. ILSLEY: Just during the life of the excess profits tax unless it is terminated in the meantime by parliament.

Mr. GREEN: The section provides that the minister may make any regulations deemed necessary for carrying this paragraph (h) into effect. Will there be separate regulations for the metal mines and for the industrial mines? There are many differences between the two types of mines, and I do not see how they can both be covered by the same set of regulations.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think there would have to be separate regulations. Perhaps some of the regulations would apply to both classes of mines. Regulations will have to be evolved to cover the various types of mines.

Mr. GREEN: Is there to be a tuning-up period provided for the metal mines?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Of what length of time?

Mr. ILSLEY: It would depend on the kind of mine. There might possibly be some kind of industrial mineral mine where they would start right in. The experience which the department has had with base metal mines and gold mines has enabled them to prescribe the tuning-up period.

Mr. GREEN: Six months?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister change the marginal note which reads "Base metal and strategic mineral mines"? It should be broadened to cover gold mines.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. I will see that that is changed, but I think it is not necessary to move an amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It can be done by instructions to the clerk.

On section 8—Where profits before deductions are $5,000 or less.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I would ask the minister if steps have been taken or are proposed to put electric energy developed under private enterprise on the same basis as regards federal taxation as electric energy developed by public utilities operating under a provincial commission? I raised this question in a previous session and pointed out to the minister the inequity, which I think he recognized, that at present exists. In Nova Scotia we are taxed by the federal government about $1,000,000 on the use of electrical energy. In the city of Montreal users of electrical energy are exempted $6,000,000 or more a year because the utility has been taken over by the province. That also applies to other places in Canada. Let me give a few figures.

The federal tax on privately operated companies amounted in the case of the Canada Electric Company Limited in 1944 to $61,087.47. I do not believe that this included income tax or excess profits tax. In the city of Halifax the Nova Scotia Light & Power company paid $558,519.86 in 1944. In the minister's own constituency the Kentville electric commission, operated under provincial commission, did not pay one cent. There is no fairness or justice in that. Private enterprise is certainly being penalized, and I feel strongly that steps should be taken also to exempt private enterprise and put it on the same basis. It is not the companies but the users of the electricity that pay this inequitable tax. Why should users of electricity in the county of Cumberland or in the county of Halifax have to pay these very heavy federal taxes when users of electricity produced by a commission operating under the province are exempt? There is nothing fair or just in that.

I might also point out unfairness with respect to telephone services. In provinces where the telephone service is operated as a public utility by the province no federal tax is paid. In Nova Scotia and New Brunswick where the telephone service is operated by private enterprise the tax applies. I have seen recent figures showing that the telephone service in Manitoba would have paid $3,939,656 more in 1944 if the telephone service had been carried on by private enterprise, and the telephone service in Alberta, $4,063,228, but they are relieved from that taxation because the telephone service is operated as a public utility in those provinces and is exempt from taxation. But in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick they have to pay the tax. I point out again, as I have done in previous sessions, that it is most unfair. There is cheaper capital cost when it has been supplied by the provinces on public credit.

In similar undertakings which have been built up by private enterprise, as a matter of course the capital cost is larger, because they are not able to secure capital funds to develop these generating plants as cheaply as they do where the security of the province is behind these industries. I ask the minister if it is proposed to take steps, and, if so, when, to equalize the taxes on users of electricity. In my constituency we have three private enterprise companies, and their patrons should not be subjected to these very heavy taxes.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is a very big question.

Mr. JACKMAN: And very acute.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not germane to this bill particularly. It is something on which I cannot give any satisfactory answer to-night. If I were announcing a policy like that there would be plenty of space devoted to it in the papers to-morrow, I can assure the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I brought the grievance before the minister in the house a year or two years ago.

Mr. JACKMAN: May I ask the minister whether the matter was brought up at the dominion-provincial relations steering committee conference?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, not so far. It probably will be.

Mr. JACKMAN: May I ask the minister what his attitude was with regard to those special rebates of earnings—which is really what they were—given by certain companies in Canada to their customers, when they forgave them a month's electric light bill, because it all came out of the excess profits tax? What came out of that? That was a very odd thing to see done.

Mr. ILSLEY: We just could not help it; that was all.

Mr. JACKMAN: Was that a breach of agreement with the provinces?

Mr. ILSLEY: I doubt it. I should in making a statement like that, add the words "without prejudice", but I very much doubt whether it was a breach. I do not think that in making these agreements we covered ourselves against a contingency like that.

Mr. JACKMAN: Are they still doing it?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think so.

Mr. JACKMAN: May I just say to the minister, in regard to the whole matter of the taxation of corporations, privately owned and publicly owned, in the same field of business, that I think it is time we had some clarification and perhaps rectification of a matter which is serious. It is not just in one part of the country but in all parts of the country. It is not because the publicly owned plant can operate so much more cheaply, but because there is no contribution toward all the public services which must be maintained by the general taxpayer, or else because the cooperative finds that it is not subject to taxation, in competition with privately owned tax paying enterprise, it has happened this year, and it has happened for a number of years, particularly when the rates of taxation became so high, that the private company—creamery, or dairy, or bread company—had no alternative than to sell out to the cooperative; or, in the case of utilities, it very often had to sell out to the municipality. I have no objection to public ownership, and I am all for public ownership where it is more economical and where the public can get better and cheaper service than can be rendered by private enterprise. But when private enterprise has to start with a handicap such as is imposed by taxation, the other competitor in the race having no such handicap, the race is unequal, and the result is that the revenue act is driving a great many private enterprises into the hands of either public bodies or cooperatives. The minister must find that already there has been an appreciable reduction in the tax base, because he loses a taxpaying customer, and this means that those who are still able to run in the private enterprise race must bear a heavier and undue share of the whole tax burden.

I hope the minister in the next budget will give some consideration to this matter, because I can tell him again, private enterprises all through the country are being forced out of business, having to adopt the cooperative garment or else sell out to some political body which will operate free of taxation. I think it is to his interest and to that of the Minister of National Revenue, as the tax-gatherer, that there should be some certainty in regard to this, and that the people who are endeavouring to carry on business should know they are competing on a fair basis. Let us have, on the one hand, private enterprise and, on the other, public ownership, and let the better man win.

On section 10—Application of sections 1, 2, 3, 4, subsection 1 of sec. 5, and sections 6 and 8.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): As I read the section, it is proposed to prorate the effect of the bill according to the time when the fiscal year of the companies ends. It has been pointed out to me—I have not examined this, but this is what I am told—that when the excess profits tax came into effect in 1940, if a company's fiscal year ended after the tax came in force, the effect of the tax came down on it for the whole year, and it is now suggested that the only fair thing would be that the opposite principle should be applied. I notice that in the section as it now stands there is an attempt to prorate it, but it does not meet the situation as represented to me.

Mr. ILSLEY: It was apportioned when the act came in, and it is being apportioned when the taxes are reduced, so that the companies are treated fairly.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): If the minister is satisfied on that, my information is wrong, and there is nothing more to say.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

DOMINION SUCCESSION DUTY ACT

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of bill No. 236, to amend the Dominion Succession Duty Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1.—Valuation in cases of quick successions.

Mr. ILSLEY: The committee will observe that the bill to amend the succession duty act does not contain the provision giving effect to the first resolution under the Dominion Succession Duty Act as proposed in the budget. The proposal, which has been dropped, was to provide that no duty shall be leviable on the value of any pension or portion thereof which is receivable as taxable income within the meaning of the Income War Tax Act. Since introducing this proposal I have given further consideration to the implications of the proposed exemption, and I am withdrawing the proposal with a view to giving the problem further study. I might indicate to the committee the questions which have caused me some concern.

The proposal was that taxable pensions should be exempt from succession duty. This gave rise to the question of the treatment of non-taxable pensions. Also, if taxable pension annuities were to be exempt, the further question of whether the ordinary annuity which did not arise from a pension scheme as such should not have similar treatment, such as for example, an annuity left by a will presented itself. Furthermore, the question of life interests and their status for succession duty purposes raises itself once the question of granting exemption in respect of taxable pensions is under consideration.

In view of the far-reaching implications of the proposal to exempt taxable pensions from succession duty, I decided to withdraw this item at the present time and to review it further. I trust the committee will regard this action as reasonable in the light of the points I have raised. The bill, therefore, simply gives effect to the second resolution, which provides relief against what are called quick successions. That is the entire bill.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The minister has stated the objections, and certainly they do not seem negligible; but it might be worth while to know what the considerations were, and presumably they were weighty, which prompted him to bring the resolution forward and have it passed.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. It was the recommendation of the Ives commission that we do just this, exempt from succession duty at the date of death the value of taxable pensions. It was clear from the recommendation that they meant pensions payable under employer-employee plans, pensions in the narrow sense; that they did not mean it to apply to an annuity left by will or a fortiori to life interest, real property, an apartment house left by a man to his wife for life. They did not mean to cover all those. They based this recommendation apparently upon the theory that the pension did not really come to the widow from the husband, that it was part of the husband's pay which he took in this way. He gets a pension during his lifetime, and she continues to draw a pension until she dies. It came from a fund built up by contributions by employer and employee, and therefore there was no real succession at all.

If that is the theory on which it is based, that theory applies, of course, to non-taxable pensions as well as to taxable pensions. Let us say that we adopted that theory and applied it to non-taxable pensions as well as to those that are taxable. Then the test of taxability flies out the window; and yet the test of taxability is the test which the ordinary person would apply in his own mind. That is, the ordinary person would say, "If you tax the income why tax the principal? Why put a succession duty on if you tax the income?" That is the test which most people would apply in their minds. But if that is the test it is so far-reaching that it appals me. What about life interests? The result is, I suggest with deference to the Ives commission, that their reasoning is faulty, and I do not think that the premises lead to the conclusion to which they came. I took their recommendation and thought about it a long time, discussing it with the officials, and I made up my mind that it was not very logical, but that, since they had recommended it, perhaps I would recommend it also to the house. However, when I began to think of all the implications I decided that I would not go on with it this session and I am not proposing to do so.

Mr. ADAMSON: Does the minister distinguish between contributory and non-contributory pensions in this?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. The recommendation here applied apparently to contributory pensions, employees' pensions, pensions payable to employees who have worked for an employer and have built up a fund while doing so. They say that what the widow gets she does not get from her husband but from a fund to which both employer and husband contributed and that therefore it is not true succession and should not be taxed. But they limit that to taxable pensions and I brought it in on that basis.

Mr. ADAMSON: I do not entirely agree with the minister. I understand that a differential is made between the pension that is a contributory one, namely, a pension in which the employer and the employee have contributed over a period of years and a straight pension that is given to an old employee on account of good service, or a retiring allowance to which he has not contributed at all.

Mr. ILSLEY: We are not taking any action, so that the question does not arise.

Mr. McMASTER: Suppose a person gets a lump sum of $50,000. It does not matter how he gets the money or where it comes from, if it passes on on the death of the taxpayer. That is the position the minister takes. It does not matter how it originates if it passes, because of the death of a person it is taxable.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; that is the principle of the succession duty act.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): This is a very important matter. May I ask what steps the minister proposes to take to deal with it?

Mr. ILSLEY: Give it consideration before the next budget; that is all.

Mr. GREEN: As I understand it, I think there is some question as to whether or not that would be a succession. Suppose the husband dies and the pension continues to the widow and she has to pay income tax on that pension?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. GREEN: In effect, she steps into the shoes of the husband. In addition to paying that income tax, she now has to pay succession duty. I think there is good reason for doubting whether or not there is anything passing, whether there is a succession that should be taxed. Is that not the basis of the recommendation in the report? The widow steps into the shoes of the husband?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, if I understand my hon. friend correctly, if I understand what he means by that phrase, "stepping into the shoes", that is the basis of that recommendation. The reasoning is found on page 43 of the Ives commission report, and it certainly would lead to the conclusion that we should not apply the test of taxability.

Mr. JACKMAN: It just strikes me that where the estate passes within five years for a second time our rates are still pretty high. I know of one case where an old gentleman and his wife drew a holograph will; both were copies of the same thing. The husband died and within two years the wife also passed away, and while the succession duty on the second party passing is going to be 90 per cent of what it otherwise would have been except for the small relief afforded by this bill, may I ask the minister what similar provision as to percentage obtained, let us say, in Great Britain, or in the United States?

Mr. ILSLEY: In Great Britain the relief against quick succession is confined to property consisting of land or of business, such business not being carried on by a company. The rates are as follows: The estate duty is reduced by 50 per cent when a second death occurs within one year, and so on.

Mr. JACKMAN: The same schedule.

Mr. ILSLEY: Just the same as ours; we took the British schedule. There is no consideration for the degree of relationship. The hon. member for Kindersley suggested that probably it would be better if we limited it to class A and class B beneficiaries; that is, to those who were related. We looked into it and decided against that, decided to leave the legislation as proposed in the resolution so that it might be left by a deceased to a stranger or by him to another stranger and still be eligible for relief. I will not go into the reasons for that, but I think they make no such distinction in Great Britain, and the rates are a lot higher. of course, in those cases. Sometimes a stranger is really as close to a person who dies as a relative. He may not have any relatives, and so on. While I thought the suggestion of the hon. member for Kindersley was a very good one, I did not think we should carry it out.

Mr. ADAMSON: The rates may be higher in Great Britain, but they do not have the double taxation of dominion and provincial succession duties.

Mr. ILSLEY: I meant the rates for strangers are higher than for succession to relatives. In the United States full credit is allowed against the taxes imposed on the second estate for the tax paid by the first estate on an amount equal to the value of the property when such property can be identified as having been received from the first estate or can be identified as having been substituted for property having been received from the first estate within five years. There is no consideration for the degree of relationship.

Mr. JACKMAN: Does that mean the amount of the tax deducted from the value of the estate on the second passing?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that is what it does mean. Saskatchewan and New Brunswick are the only two provinces which have provisions of this kind granting relief with respect of quick succession.

Mr. JACKMAN: The only reason I raised this question is that the people who know how to handle their estates and get proper legal advice do not, as a rule, find themselves subject to two sets of succession duty taxes within five or ten years. A life interest is passed on to the widow by a man who may have done very well in a certain form of business, but yet has not the necessary legal experience or does not retain a good lawyer in the drafting of his will. Perhaps he leaves all of his estate to his widow, and the widow gives it to the children in a few more years. Because they are careless or have not used any care in the drawing of their will they will fall foul of double taxation at a high rate. I feel it is almost unfair to trap them like this. They should be given some consideration because, as I say, it is easy to circumvent unfair double taxation if you seek proper legal advice.

Mr. PROBE: Do you think they should circumvent it?

Mr. JACKMAN: Certainly.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am seeking some advice since I have the minister here, an excellent lawyer, and his advisers. A simple person like myself, who knows nothing about succession duties, has only one will. It was made a long time ago, leaving everything to my wife, assuming that she would be fair to my children who are now grown up. Obviously I should not leave myself in that position. We happen to be of the same age. Either one of us is apt to conk out within one, two or three years of each other. When we get that eighty per cent in the third year, is it not an invitation to alter a situation of that kind which is based on love and affection, which most marriages are and should be? Are we not rather driven to changes which perhaps are not natural? I do not know whether I express myself very well, but I believe the minister understands what I mean.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have never given it much thought, and I should like to get a little advice myself on what to do in a case of that kind. That is, you leave a life interest so that there will be only one succession?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That is right. You could avoid it in that way, could you not?

Mr. JACKMAN: Why not make the law fair, so that it will not catch people who are just careless?

Mr. ILSLEY: This makes it less harsh than it was, and, I think probably goes as far as it should go at the moment.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: To-morrow morning at eleven o'clock the Prime Minister will ask the house to consider No. 7 on the order paper of to-day, in regard to allowances to members of parliament for expenses incidental to the discharge of their duties. I believe the Prime Minister will ask that the present order be discharged and a resolution relating to both houses substituted therefor.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Thursday, December 13, 1945.

The house met at eleven o'clock.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

SEVENTH AND FINAL REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Seventh and final report of special committee on Veterans Affairs.—Mr. Tucker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ATTITUDE OF CANADA AT THE OUTBREAK OF HOSTILITIES, 1938-39

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table parliamentary return reference No. 33, moved by the hon. member for St. John-Albert:

> For a copy of all correspondence, letters, cables and other documents exchanged between His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom and His Majesty's government in Canada from September 1, 1938, to September 15, 1939, relating to the attitude of Canada in the event of an outbreak of hostilities between His Majesty and any other power.

When the motion was adopted the order was extended to cover a period subsequent to September 15 sufficient to complete the correspondence in reference to the particular matters referred to.

I would say that the reason for the delay in bringing down this return is that the consent of the government of the United Kingdom and the consent of the government of Australia and New Zealand had to be obtained before we felt at liberty to table the correspondence. That consent has now been obtained, and the return which I have just made includes all the correspondence.

Previous to September 1, 1939, the government of Canada was kept informed of international developments in the usual manner. As the crisis approached in the summer of 1939 there were consultations between the United Kingdom and Canadian authorities through the United Kingdom high commissioner at Ottawa and the Canadian high commissioner in the United Kingdom.

I think hon. members will find this return most interesting and of historic interest, inasmuch as it relates to the attitude of Canada at the outbreak of hostilities between His Majesty and the German Reich. There are only eight telegrams in all; they are not very lengthy, and I believe it would meet the convenience of hon. members if they were printed in the Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons. I ask that instructions be given accordingly.

SERVICE PERSONNEL

On the order for motions:

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): Yesterday in my absence the leader of the opposition asked, in view of the fact that press representatives were not allowed on the Queen Elizabeth at her recent visit at New York, whether steps would be taken to allow such representatives to board ships arriving in future in New York with returning Canadian service personnel. Perhaps I can best answer that by explaining what steps were taken to have them allowed on board this time. I was advised two or three days before the ship was due that the regulations at New York did not permit of press representatives being allowed on board. They had been, of course, when the ship called at Halifax. I asked the quartermaster-general to endeavour to get that ruling changed. He was not successful. We then took it up through our minister at Washington. He discussed it with the war department and with the department of state. The United States war department and state department said that they would waive their objections: they had no objection to the rule being changed so far as Canadian press men were concerned, although it might involve some difficulty with United States newspaper men who were not allowed on their transports. However, the owners of the ship, the Cunard-White Star line, were not prepared to allow the regulation to be changed, and therefore it was not possible for Canadian newsmen to go on board.

CANADIAN AND BRITISH INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT, 1932

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance) moved the first reading of bill No. 241 (from the senate) to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. MAYHEW moved the second reading of the bill.

Mr. BRACKEN: Mr. Speaker, before the bill receives its second reading perhaps the Minister of Veterans Affairs will say something with respect to procedure on the second reading of senate bills. It was indicated a day or two ago that the procedure that had been followed was not to have discussion on second reading of these bills. It seems to me we should have an explanation at some stage of these bills before giving them second reading.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE: (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I believe the practice of the house in days gone by has been that these senate bills should go first of all to the committee for discussion and then come back to the house. Personally I think there should be an explanation of any senate bill before it passes this house.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

FOREIGN INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT, 1932

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance) moved the first reading of bill No. 242, to amend the Foreign Insurance Companies Act, 1932.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. MAYHEW moved the second reading of the bill.

Mr. BRACKEN: A day or two ago, Mr. Speaker, you made a ruling that it was not the ordinary procedure to have any explanation on the second reading of these bills. If that is the rule of the house, we will all accede to it, but the Minister of Veterans Affairs agrees with me that there should be some explanation before giving the second reading to the bill. We know nothing about it.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think I said that there could be no debate on the second reading of a bill coming from the senate. I said that it was not usual to have a debate on the second reading, though the motion is debatable.

Mr. BRACKEN: Then I have a suggestion to make with regard to such bills coming to us in the future. I do not ask for any long explanation, but I think the house should be informed as to the general character of any such measure that is laid before us.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am in complete agreement with my hon. friend.

Mr. MAYHEW: I regret that I am unable to give any more extended explanation than is to be found in the bill itself. The minister is not in the house and I was not able to discuss it with him. A general explanation appears in the bill as follows:

This amendment will make available to foreign companies for the purpose of vesting assets in trust as security for Canadian policyholders a class of security in which Canadian companies are permitted to invest under paragraph (b) of subsection one of section 60, of The Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932, as amended. The subparagraph inserted recognizes a statutory charge upon assets and a record of continuous payment of interest on the obligations secured thereby as equivalent to the forms of security set forth in the preceding subparagraphs of the paragraph.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

USED BEER BOTTLES

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. How many empty or used beer bottles have been collected in Nova Scotia by the wartime prices and trade board, or under its authority, yearly to November 1, 1945, and sold: (a) in Nova Scotia; (b) elsewhere?

2. By what individuals or firms were sales and deliveries made, and what was the quantity and cost to each buyer?

Mr. MAYHEW: Yearly figures regarding the number of empty or used beer bottles collected in Nova Scotia under authority of the wartime prices and trade board are not readily available. The following information covers the period beginning December 11, 1942 (effective date of wartime prices and trade board order A-505 restricting the sale and distribution of used beer bottles in the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick) and ending May 10, 1945 (the date on which the order was rescinded):

1. (a) Sold in Nova Scotia—352,303 dozen pints, 1,356,038 dozen quarts; *(b) Sold elsewhere—255,272 dozen pints, 1,088,447 dozen quarts.

2. Name of Buyer	Doz. Pts. Purchased	Price	Purchased Doz. Qts.	Price
Olands	166,402	$46,592	677,058	$304,676
Keiths	185,901	52,052	678,980	305,541

BONUS OR SUBSIDY ON WOOD FUEL

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

1. When was payment by the government of bonus or subsidy on wood fuel in Canada commenced?
2. During what period was it paid?
3. What department of government made such payments?
4. At what rate was it paid?
5. What was the total amount so paid to wood dealers in Yukon?
6. Up until what date will amounts so earned be paid?
7. What proceedings is an applicant required to take to obtain such payments as yet not made?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. Subsidies authorized by P.C. 3465, April 29, 1943, and subsequent orders in council have been payable, subject to varying conditions on wood fuel delivered to a dealer or held for his account on and after March 5, 1943. (By P.C. 7802 dated Oct. 6, 1944 subsequent payments of subsidy were restricted to wood fuel delivered to or held for a dealer's accounts after Sept. 30, 1945.)

2. Subsidies have been payable, subject to varying conditions, since the passage of P.C. 3465, April 29, 1943, and continue to be payable.

3. Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation Ltd. on the directions of the timber controller (originally the coal controller, followed by the wood fuel controller during the successive periods in which wood fuel was under their respective jurisdictions.)

4. Subject to certain limitations, subsidy was payable at the rate of $1.00 per standard cord of 128 cubic feet on wood fuel contracted for and cut on or before Dec. 31, 1944, and delivered to a dealer or held for his account on and after March 5, 1943. (By P.C. 7802 dated Oct. 6, 1944 subsequent payments of subsidy were restricted to wood fuel delivered to or held for a dealer's accounts after Sept. 30, 1945.)

Subject to certain limitations, subsidy was payable on wood fuel as described above covering such portion of the wood fuel dealers' transportation costs as the timber controller might specify.

Subject to certain limitations, subsidy is payable to wood fuel dealers on the certification of the timber controller on such transactions and in such localities where, in the judgment of the timber controller, a subsidy or bonus is necessary, having regard to the costs of production and transportation, to get the necessary quantity of wood fuel produced and transported. The rate at which such subsidy is payable is specified by the timber controller in each individual case.

5. To Sept. 30, 1945, subsidy amounting to $2,158.45 has been paid to wood fuel dealers in the Yukon.

6. No final date for the discontinuance of subsidies on wood fuel has yet been established.

7. To obtain a subsidy a dealer must apply to the regional wood fuel officer, Vancouver (British Columbia and Yukon) for an eligibility, giving full particulars of his anticipated costs of purchase and of handling the particular lot of wood in question. If, in the opinion of the regional wood fuel officer, such wood is really required and a subsidy is necessary, the eligibility will be granted. Then when the dealer has bought and moved that wood to his yard or delivered it to his customers, he must apply for the agreed subsidy stating the exact costs incurred and attaching to his application evidence in the shape of receipts that such expenditures were actually made. The necessary forms are supplied by the regional wood fuel officer.

Subsidies, varying according to the needs in each particular instance, are payable to licensed wood fuel dealers:

(a) in the discretion of the timber controller;

(b) where there are definite shortages of wood fuel in consuming centres;

(c) where, without such subsidies, dealers are unable to obtain wood, bring it to such consuming centres and sell it to consumers there within the price orders.

CHALK RIVER ATOMIC ENERGY PROJECT

Mr. BRUCE:

1. What has been the total expenditure in connection with the atomic energy project at Chalk River, up to the 31st of October last?

2. Has any amount been appropriated for the next fiscal year?

3. If so, how much?

Mr. HOWE: Stand.

Mr. BRUCE: May I ask if it is possible to have a reply, if not to-day at least to-morrow? This question has been standing on the order paper for fifteen days.

Mr. HOWE: I will make inquiries, and if it is possible to give an answer to-morrow I will give it.

J. G. FOGO, K.C.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. What positions has J. G. Fogo, K.C., held with the Department of Munitions and Supply and the Department of Reconstruction?

2. At what dates was he appointed to such positions and when did he retire?

3. What was the total: (a) remuneration; (b) expenses; (c) other allowances paid him in each such position?

4. Has he been appointed a director or to any position in a wartime shipping or other crown company, and if so what positions?

5. Is this a full time job, if not what proportion of his time will be required?

6. What remuneration and expenses are payable?

7. Who are the solicitors for the crown companies in Halifax and what fees have been paid for legal services and expenses?

8. What is the name of the legal firm with which Mr. Fogo is associated in Halifax?

Mr. HOWE:

1. The positions held by J. G. Fogo, K.C., are as follows:—(a) With the Department of Munitions and Supply,—associate co-ordinator of controls. (b) With the Department of Reconstruction—None.

2. (a) He was appointed October 31, 1942 by order in council P.C. 4/11491. (b) He resigned on May 31, 1944.

3. (a) None. (b) $183.98. Travelling expenses during the term of his employment with the department. (c) Living allowance, when absent from Halifax on departmental business, paid to Mr. Fogo; 1942, $1,225; 1943, $4,825.

Reimbursed the firm of Messrs. Burchell Smith Parker and Fogo to cover living allowance; 1943, $3,575; 1944, $3,425.

4. Yes, a director of Wartime Shipbuilding Limited.

5. No; required to attend meetings.

6. No remuneration. Travelling expenses only.

7. There are no solicitors for crown companies in Halifax.

8. Burchell, Smith, Parker and Fogo.

TRAVELLERS BUILDING, WINNIPEG

Mr. ZAPLITNY:

1. Has the government acquired or leased the Travellers building, Winnipeg?

2. If so, from whom?

3. What was the total cost to the government for alterations in connection with this building?

4. What rent, if any, is the unemployment insurance commission paying (or has paid) for this building?

5. When is this building to be occupied, and by whom?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull):

1. The Travellers building was leased for the accommodation of the unemployment insurance commission.

2. Republic Investments Limited, Winnipeg.

3. $36,580.76.

4. $26,984.00 per annum.

5. The two upper floors were temporarily occupied by the Department of National Health and Welfare since March 26, 1945, but this department is now being moved out and the unemployment insurance commission is in the course of moving into the whole building.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROL—CANADIANS GRANTED UNITED STATES RESIDENTIAL STATUS

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario):

1. How many residents of Canada have been granted a change of residential status from Canada to the United States by the Foreign Exchange Control board in the months of September, October and November, 1945?

2. What is the aggregate amount of money which has been so authorized to be taken out of Canada by such persons?

3. How many applications and for what aggregate amounts have been granted in the following categories: (a) $25,000 and under; (b) over $25,000 and under $50,000; (c) over $50,000 and under $100,000; (d) over $100,000?

Mr. MAYHEW: The following information relates to changes of residential status from Canada to all other non-sterling area countries, the large majority of which were, however, to the United States. The figures for November do nc include a relatively small number of cases dealt with by the board's Vancouver office, details of which are not yet available.

1. September, 1945—1,186; October, 1945—1,492; November, 1945—1,255; total—3,933.

Note: No permit from the foreign exchange control board is required by a resident leaving Canada with not more the $50 and the above figures do not include residents who may have left Canada for permanent residence in the United States or elsewhere but took with them not more than $50 each.

2. The values and type of assets declared by the persons referred to in paragraph 1 above and authorized to be withdrawn from Canada is given below. Information is not available as to the funds and other property actually withdrawn from Canada by such persons:

1945	Cash and bank balances	Securities	Real estate, personal effects and other assets	Total
September	$1,183,369	$ 954,720	$1,061,377	$3,199,466
October	1,390,964	712,641	1,101,746	3,205,351
November	1,037,435	762,826	1,210,090	3,010,351
	$3,611,768	$2,430,187	$3,373,213	$9,415,168

3.	No.	Cash and bank balances	Securities	Real estate, personal effects and other assets	Total
Under $25,000	3,930	$3,582,308	$2,212,187	$3,322,123	$9,116,618
$25,000 – $50,000	1	460	8,000	23,090	31,550
$50,000 – $100,000	—	—	—	—	—
Over $100,000	2	29,000	210,000	28,000	267,000

RURAL MAIL CARRIERS—WAR BONUSES

Mr. BREITHAUPT:

1. What steps have been taken by the Post Office Department to continue payment of war-time bonuses to rural mail carriers?

2. Is any action being taken by the department to embody such bonus in the regular contract of these carriers?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier):

1. Wartime bonuses to rural mail carriers have been paid under the authority of the War Measures Act, where the courier establishes the fact that operating costs have increased due to conditions which could not have been foreseen when he entered into his contract.

[Mr. A. Fournier.]

With the termination of the War Measures Act, these wartime bonuses must cease, but provision will be made to invite public tenders in each case where the courier is not satisfied to continue at his original contract price.

2. No. Any action to this end would be contrary to the terms of the Post Office Act.

FEED WHEAT

Mr. McCUAIG:

1. How many bushels of feed wheat were shipped from western Canada to eastern Canada in each of the years, 1941 to 1945?

2. What was the price paid per bushel by the eastern farmer in each of the above years?

Mr. GARDINER:

1.	Bushels
1941 (Oct. 20 to Dec. 31)	2,659,020
1942 (Jan. 1 to Dec. 31)	15,062,591
1943 (Jan. 1 to Dec. 31)	23,709,366
1944 (Jan. 1 to Dec. 31)	22,524,602
1945 (Jan. 1 to Nov. 30)	18,908,138

2. Because of different conditions of sale, grades of wheat—whether whole, ground, bagged, et cetera, the price paid per bushel by all eastern farmers is not assessable.

The cash price for wheat of official feed grade in store Fort William-Port Arthur showed the following range:

	High per bushel
1941	.65½
1942	.80⅜
1943	1.04
1944	1.04
1945	1.04

	Low per bushel
1941	57½
1942	64
1943	74¼
1944	1.04
1945	1.04

From September 11, 1942, wheat used exclusively as feed for live stock in eastern Canada was subject to a rebate of 8 cents a bushel. This rebate was increased on November 11, 1943, to 25 cents a bushel.

EGLINTON HUNT CLUB PROPERTY, TORONTO

Mr. FLEMING:

1. What use is being made of No. 1 I.T.S. property, formerly known as Eglinton Hunt club, Toronto?

2. What use or disposal of the property is intended for the future?

3. Is the property for sale?

4. If so: (a) in block or in parcels; (b) at what price and on what terms; (c) through what agency, if any, has it been listed for sale?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West):

1. No. 1 Composite training school and the Institute of aviation medicine are located at this site. Spare accommodation is used to handle any overflow of R.C.A.F. personnel in Toronto area. Air cadet squadrons have the use of the facilities at this unit in the evenings.

2. Present plans call for the retention of this site for the continuance of the Institute of aviation medicine and also to serve as a urban headquarters for Toronto auxiliary squadrons.

3. No.

4. N.A.

CAPE ISLAND, SHELBURNE COUNTY, N.S., BRIDGE

Mr. GILLIS:

1. What surveys were made in past years, and what reports are on record in connection with a bridge from Cape Island, Shelburne county, Nova Scotia, to the mainland?

2. How much did the government spend on the construction of this bridge, and in what years was the expenditure made?

3. Was work actually begun on piers or abutments?

4. If so, are these still standing?

5. When and why was the work discontinued?

6. What action is the government taking towards building this bridge as a post-war project, or on any other basis?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull):

1. This matter has been investigated and given consideration, and it has been definitely established that the project is in connection with highway communication within the province and is therefore a matter for the attention of the provincial government.

2, 3, 4, 5 and 6. Answered by No. 1.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS

ALLOWANCE OF $2,000 TO MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT FOR INCIDENTAL EXPENSES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution.

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act to provide for payment of an allowance to every member of the Senate and House of Commons for expenses incidental to his duties as a member at the rate of two thousand dollars per annum for the period during which he is a member, payable at the end of each calendar year and subject to a deduction equal to one-half of the amount of deductions, if any, from the member's allowances in respect of sittings of the house of which he is a member during such year, and to provide that in the case of ministers of the crown, of the Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons, and of members of the Senate the amount of such allowance shall be deemed to be taxable income; and to provide further that such measure shall be deemed to have come into effect on the sixth day of September, one thousand nine hundred and forty-five.

He said: As my colleague the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie), in leading the house last night, announced at the close of the session, in bringing forward this particular motion I desire to substitute it for one which is already on the order paper as order No. 7. Hon. members will notice that order No. 7 relates only to members of the House of Commons. The resolution now presented is in more complete form and has reference to members of the Senate as well as members of the House of Commons.

May I say a word with respect to the circumstance that the resolution should have appeared on the order paper in the first instance with reference only to members of the House of Commons.

When the resolution was placed on the order paper in the form in which it was it represented the only decision which had been arrived at by the government up to that time with respect to allowances to members of parliament for expenses incidental to their duties as members of parliament.

It was obviously desirable that there should be discussion with members of the senate before deciding on what should appear in resolution form with respect to members of that house. I did not have any opportunity to have a discussion with members of the upper house before leaving for England, and subsequently visiting the United States. When my colleagues in the government saw that I would be returning sooner than was expected at the time I left, it was decided by them to leave over discussion with representatives of the senate until after my return. When I returned I found a great many matters demanding urgent attention, and it was not possible for me to arrange to see representative members of the senate immediately. I took the first chance I had to discuss with some of the senators the position of members in the other house in respect to the expenses incidental to the discharge of their duties, and I have since gone more fully into the matter with representative members of that house. The measure which I now bring before the house is one which in its more complete form will, I think, commend itself to members of both houses of parliament—at any rate, I sincerely hope that that may be so.

At this late stage of the session, Mr. Speaker, I may have to ask the house for its unanimous consent to allow me to proceed a little more rapidly with consideration of the motion now before us than might otherwise be the case. When the orders of the day are reached I shall ask that the house allow the motion No. 7, which is now in its possession, to be withdrawn and the order to be discharged. I make that intention known immediately so that we may be in a position to discuss the resolution that now appears under government notices of motion.

With respect to this notice of motion I would say that His Excellency the Governor General, having been informed of the subject matter of this resolution, is pleased to recommend it to the consideration of the house.

With the permission of the house, I would now ask that the necessary steps be taken to proceed at once in committee with the resolution in order that I may have an opportunity of introducing the bill immediately. I should think that all the discussion that may be necessary can be had on the second reading of the bill. If the house will give its unanimous consent to this procedure, I shall see that the bill is introduced this morning with the understanding that discussion upon it will not take place before to-morrow.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the remarks of the Prime Minister in regard to the discharge of item No. 7 on the order paper, may I say that this party will be very glad to approve of its being done. With respect to the further procedure regarding this new resolution, may I ask the Prime Minister if he desires to proceed further to-day than reaching second reading?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have just indicated that we would go on with second reading of the bill to-morrow. All I desire to do now is to introduce the bill and have it given first reading.

Mr. BRACKEN: Then, Mr. Speaker, I understand the Prime Minister desires that we should get past the several stages of this resolution this morning and up to second reading of the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. BRACKEN: In the event that the house approves that procedure, and since the members have not seen a copy of this bill, I respectfully suggest that we might proceed up to second reading without being expected to take part in any debate.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I say that I approve the procedure outlined by the Prime Minister and by the Leader of the Opposition. So far as we are concerned there will be no objection to facilitating the progress of the bill, provided that there is some discussion on the second reading.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I do not agree with that. I take the position that anything I have to say on the resolution itself I am going to say, but I shall not hold it up.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Speaking for this group I will say that we are prepared to facilitate the discharge of No. 7 from the order paper and to allow this resolution to be substituted therefor. We have no desire to hold up the proceedings at this stage.

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): I take the same position as the hon. member for Vancouver East. Anything I have to say I shall say on the resolution.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. MacINNIS: I rise just for a moment to say that I am opposed to this measure. I cannot conceive of anything more unwise for this parliament to do at a time when the affairs of the country are in such a state as they are, and when this house has failed to take any action which would relieve the present distress of the great mass of the people of the country, than to pass this resolution. The distress is increasing daily, and we have done nothing in the house to alleviate it. We have failed to deal with old age pensions and with increasing unemployment. Veterans in my own city of Vancouver are unemployed by the thousands. I consider therefore that this action by this House of Commons is a colossal impudence.

Mr. COLDWELL: In view of what has just been said I too feel that I must say something, although I did not intend to do so. I fully appreciate the remarks made by my colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver East. All of us in this group at least, and I think throughout the house, feel exactly the same way about the condition of the people generally in the country, and if I thought that the defeat of this resolution would bring relief to these people I would support the opposition to it. But obviously their condition will not be helped by members of parliament remaining in the position in which they have found themselves over a period of years. Some members of parliament I know are moving into further debt and having their work made ineffective by the care that has been put upon them in that respect. In the early days of our parliamentary history the House of Commons was looked upon as a place where gentlemen met; as the best club in London, and perhaps—I do not know about Canada—as the best club in Ottawa. Fortunately for democracy that day has gone, and there are members in this House of Commons now who of necessity must give all their time to the business of the country, meet unusual expenses, and who are expected to get by on an amount which in the past has been altogether inadequate. That, I think, is particularly true of some of us in this group.

Mr. POULIOT: In the old times members of parliament were elected by rotten boroughs.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes. In view of what my hon. friend has just said I should like to point out that I am not only speaking for this group in this house. One year ago there was a national convention of my party to which was forwarded a resolution from quite a small local, where there are no members of parliament, no members of our national executive, and no elected representatives of that constituency sitting in this group. I should like to place that resolution before the house. It read:

> Whereas it is desirable and necessary that our elected representatives be sufficiently remunerated by the receipt of an income adequate to the calls made upon them;
> Therefore be it resolved that this convention declare itself in favour of a higher indemnity than allowed by the present government after the payment of income taxes.

That was not prompted by any member of parliament; it came from a district which is quite out of touch with our members. So when I speak here this morning I feel that I am speaking not only for a majority of my colleagues but for the rank and file of the movement as expressed in a resolution passed at the national convention held last December in the city of Montreal.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I just want to say that I am opposed to this resolution, because the allowance is not taxable, and because of its being extended to members of the other place. I will deal with these matters at greater length when we come to second reading.

Mr. POULIOT: I respect the views of my colleague. Some may differ with us; they are not many, but it is their view and they have a right to it. But they are wrong, because the indemnity received by members goes back to their constituents; it goes to hotels and transportation companies for trips for which we pay from our own pockets, though they are for the benefit of our constituents. A member who does not touch the pork barrel cannot possibly live on an indemnity which by taxation has been reduced to $2,800. It is not now a question of ethics. The real question is obvious: shall it be possible for poor men to remain in politics, or shall politics become only the realm of the rich? The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, the leader of the C.C.F. party, spoke very well, but perhaps he did not catch my remark when I said that in olden times members of parliament were elected by rotten boroughs. That was before the reform bill. At that time they were elected by a handful of people, and the common people had not the right to say who should be their member. That member apparently was the tool of a marquis or a duke or the owner of a large property, and the common man was ignored until the reform bill came along. But surprisingly enough in that land of contrasts, those were the top days of parliament. Precisely when members of parliament were elected by rotten boroughs, parliament reached its peak in England.

Well, this does not reflect Canadian conditions of to-day. I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that some hon. members have been incurring debts while in politics. It is a fine gesture to say we will not touch it or that it should not be exempt from income tax. I remember the first lady who was elected to this house. In a very indignant mood, the first time she received $4,000 she went to her bank and obtained a certified cheque for $2,000 to the order of the Receiver General of Canada and said, "We are paid too much; $2,000 is enough. I will return $2,000 to the exchequer." She did that only once. At the time it was a fine gesture, giving money back to the exchequer. Why should we do that when we have to borrow more money from the bank? Let us be sensible, sir. The constituents of every member of this committee of the whole know very well what a member has to pay for: all sorts of celebrations; bazaars; wreaths; wedding gifts, and so on. They expect it; they think each member of parliament is a press making money.

Mr. MacINNIS: Baloney!

Mr. POULIOT: I wonder why my hon. friend calls it baloney. Perhaps he does not give anything to his electors, but that is his own business.

Mr. MacINNIS: I give them service, not presents.

Mr. POULIOT: I respect my hon. friend's views, but let him also respect mine; otherwise I will say something to him. I am not speaking for the gallery; I am stating my case. I remember that once when I was sitting in the other corner there and we were discussing certain matters affecting ourselves, I spoke of members who were poor. Some gentlemen who are now in the senate, and who are very dear friends of mine, did not object to that; it was true. But another hon. gentleman who was my deskmate did object. He thought we should not say anything like that, that we should keep up appearances and never admit we were poor. Why pose as wealthy when we are not? And if we are not, it is precisely because we have done our duty. We have not touched the pork barrel; we have gone into debt just to serve our constituents.

The indemnity is not a salary; it is just a compensation for what we lose by sitting here for such long periods of time. I will not labour the question, Mr. Chairman, though there is much more I could say. Let us be sensible; let us be honest with the people. I am sure no hon. member will receive letters of protest, except from perhaps one or two of his constituents who are not familiar with the conditions that exist to-day.

Mr. COCKERAM: I am in complete agreement with this increase, but at the same time I should like the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance to agree that industry should be allowed to increase the wages of their salaried employees, which they have not been permitted to do for some time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I had not intended to speak on the resolution but since others have made some comments perhaps I should say a word as to the obligation I have felt in the matter of introducing this resolution. I speak now more particularly to hon. members who have come into the house since the last session, the last parliament in fact. Hon. members who were present at that time will remember that before the end of the session I stated that I thought the allowance paid to members of parliament was wholly inadequate, having regard to their increased obligations, the changed situation in the world, and the corresponding enlargement of their duties since the allowance had been previously fixed.

It was twenty-five years ago that parliament sanctioned its last increase in allowances to members of parliament. In the last session of the last parliament I said I should like to see an increase made at once, before the close of the session. I gave as a reason something which I since have had reason to believe was sound indeed. I pointed out that it was necessary to have in parliament, in these days, men of wide experience, men of known character and ability, men who were prepared to give a considerable portion of their time to the study of questions, as well as to speaking upon them. I pointed out further that, with the obligations of the members being what they are, it was becoming increasingly difficult to get the desirable type of persons to stand as candidates for the different parties. When I say this I am not referring to any one party, but to all parties.

I said at that time that I did not know what the fortunes of the political parties might be in the general election. I was not at all sure at that session that I would be standing where I am at the present time. I was not sure at that time that to-day I would even be where my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) now sits. But I said that, in parliament or out of parliament, I would publicly advocate an increase in the allowances to be paid to members of parliament, and that this would be done for the sake of parliament itself and for the independence of individual members of parliament. I am now fulfilling that undertaking. May I add that the undertaking was made before the general election, and that during the campaign I repeated what I had said. I did so because I have a very high opinion of the institution of parliament. It is the most important of all the institutions in our country; no other is comparable with it. Those who come to parliament as members have not only the obligations of legislators, but also of trustees of the financial and other resources of the country.

When the allowance was last increased the total appropriations of parliament were $568,939,431. In the last three sessions the appropriations were not in millions but in billions and were as follows: In 1942-43, $4,343,738,428; 1943-44, $5,540,668,592, and in 1944-45, $5,179,483,114. In addition to that, at the time the allowance to members was last decided upon, in 1919-20, discussions in parliament related almost completely to matters of domestic concern. They dealt only to a limited extent with international affairs. That condition is not comparable at all with what we have to-day. In these days the whole of the discussions in parliament are on a very much vaster scale than anything known hitherto. And they are not going to become less. I venture to say that every question of real importance to-day has an international bearing and cannot be considered apart from its international bearing. I go further and say that our discussions already have demonstrated that we are dealing in large part with world problems. Every member in the house has been considering or discussing questions relating not to Canada alone, but to the world situation; and we are not going to go back, so far as discussions of the kind are concerned. New problems will become increasingly difficult and complex, and will require more in the way of careful study and application of conscience on the part of all who are entrusted by the country with the discharge of public affairs.

Mr. POULIOT: And time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes; my hon. friend has referred to time. I had occasion to look into the amount of time hon. members sat when the indemnity was last increased. I find that in 1920 the house sat 86 days, as compared with the session 1940-42, when it sat 105 days; that of 1942-43, when it sat 124 days; 1943-44, 120 days, and 1944-45, 135 days. It will be noted that these are much longer periods of time than were customary when the last change was made.

Sometimes one hears comparisons made between the amounts received by members of parliament and salaries received by men in industry, wages paid, and the like. We heard a suggestion, very well intentioned, of one such comparison this morning. If I were to go back to my college days in search of an appropriate expression to meet any comparison I believe I would say that a member of parliament is in a position sui generis, that is to say, is in a position of his own; is in a class by himself. From the point of view of responsibility and opportunity combined, there is, or should be, no position held by any person in the country that can be compared with that of a member of parliament, whether he or she be in the House of Commons or in the Senate. I say that we belittle this greatest of all institutions for the preservation of liberty if in any way we seek to detract from the importance of parliament or if we do not afford to members of parliament that which will help to preserve their independence, or cause the best men in the country to enter its halls.

There are only a few members of the house who have not some business of their own, some professional or business obligations. These interests, to a considerable extent, to say nothing of family obligations, they must sacrifice while attending to the business of parliament. In these callings and professions they meet with difficulties which have to be met as if they were not serving as well the interests of the country as a whole.

I repeat, I believe the institution of parliament is the great palladium of liberty; it is the one institution above all others which can preserve freedom, it is more needed to-day than it has ever been in the world's history. A member of parliament, whether a member of the House of Commons or of the Senate, carries a burden upon his soul the like of which has never been placed upon the souls of men at any time heretofore, because it involves, as must now be clear to all hon. members, the question whether in the future we are to have life or death for mankind.

Mr. Speaker, I leave the matter there.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Mackenzie King thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 243, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

WITHDRAWAL OF ORDER NO. 7 ON THIS DAY'S ORDER PAPER

On the order being called:

In committee of the whole—the following resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to present a measure to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act, to provide for payment of an allowance to each member of the House of Commons for expenses incidental to the discharge of his duties as a member of the House of Commons at the rate of two thousand dollars per year for the period when he is a member, and to provide further that such measure shall be deemed to have come into effect on the sixth day of September, one thousand nine hundred and forty-five.—The Prime Minister.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is the order to which I referred a minute or two ago. I move:

That order No. 7 on the order paper be withdrawn and the order be discharged.

Motion agreed to and order discharged.

RECONSTRUCTION AND SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT TO ASSUME FUNCTIONS OF RECONSTRUCTION AND MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to bill No. 173, respecting the Department of Reconstruction and Supply.

He said: Mr. Speaker, several amendments have been made to the bill. They fall into three classes. The first amendment is purely a revision of wording and makes no material change. The second class of amendments—there are several of them—make it clear that there is an appeal to the exchequer court from any decision of the minister. A recent judgment of the court had made that somewhat doubtful, and so the bill has been rewritten to make it clear that all decisions of the minister with reference to matters in the renegotiation section are subject to an appeal to the exchequer court.

There are two further amendments the purpose of which is to put a termination date to the period during which contracts are subject to renegotiation. A contract to be subject to renegotiation must have been entered into before the second day of September, 1945, and any bulk termination of contracts cannot be for any year later than the fiscal year that includes September 2, 1945.

That is the purpose of the amendments to the bill. Its provisions have not been weakened in any way, and I have no hesitation in moving concurrence in the amendments made by the other house.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

The house having reverted to orders of the day:

SHIPPING ACCOMMODATION

TRANSPORTATION TO CANADA OF WIVES OF SERVICE PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. A. CROLL (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence? It was reported in the press yesterday that after December 15, the Lady Nelson would be used for transporting to this country the wives and other dependents of soldiers. Has the minister a statement to make on that matter?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): Yes. My hon. friend told me that he was going to ask this question, and I am glad that he has done so because the session will be over in a day or two and it might be well for me to state just what the position now is.

The basic policy governing the repatriation of soldiers and war brides from the United Kingdom remains unchanged. Very briefly this policy, as hon. members are already aware, is that no major movement of dependents will be undertaken until all troops who are available for repatriation, and have priority rights, have been returned to Canada. However, recent developments have now placed us in a more favourable position than was previously anticipated.

By the end of this month we shall have repatriated since V-E day slightly more than 180,000 soldiers in addition to Royal Canadian Navy and Royal Canadian Air Force personnel, leaving approximately 100,000 soldiers to return from overseas. This latter figure includes the occupation force of 25,000 and repatriation and other controlling staffs in the United Kingdom. This position is sufficiently favourable to justify our planning to allot in the latter part of January, and thereafter, an increased amount of shipping to repatriation of dependents without prejudice to the early repatriation of servicemen still abroad. The ships we propose employing for the return of dependents are our two hospital ships, the Lady Nelson and the Letitia. The Lady Nelson arrives in Canada on December 15 on its last trip with battle casualties. There will be, of course, a small number of casualties to service personnel resulting from accidents and sickness, and these will continue to be returned to Canada by hospital ship; the remaining space will be made available to dependents. It is estimated that the Lady Nelson is capable of carrying between 200 and 300 dependents and can make about three round trips every two months.

The Letitia is at present in Vancouver where she is undergoing normal maintenance. She will return to England, via the Panama canal, and be dry-docked for necessary repairs and it is anticipated will be available for transatlantic runs about the end of January. We plan on employing this hospital ship in the same manner as the Lady Nelson. The Letitia can accommodate approximately 400 dependents, and can also do about three round trips in two months.

At the moment a strong possibility exists that in addition to these two ships at an early day we will be able to divert the Lady Rodney to carrying dependents. This ship was recently taken off the Newfoundland run and is now employed on troop carrying. The Lady Rodney has a capacity for approximately 250 to 300 dependents.

I wish to point out here that the carrying of dependents presents different problems from those incurred in the carrying of troops, and only certain ships are suitable for repatriating war brides with any economy of carrying capacity. Ships which carry dependents must have additional stewardesses and other ship staffs. They must be stocked with crockery and have suitable dining facilities; and in addition have different sanitary arrangements from those provided on our troopships.

The government is, and always has been, fully aware of the desirability of returning to Canada the dependents of Canadian soldiers at the earliest possible moment consistent with the rights of service personnel having repatriation priority. It therefore affords me no little pleasure to be able to inform the house of this shipping which is being made available at an earlier day than had hitherto been considered possible.

Mr. LOCKHART: May I ask a supplementary question? There is no particular delay, I hope, in repatriating compassionate cases?

Mr. ABBOTT: None whatever. They are being handled exactly as in the past. We have been continually bringing over a certain number in this class.

Mr. LOCKHART: I asked the question because I understood that there was some hold-up of compassionate cases.

Mr. ABBOTT: None whatever.

TRADE AND EMPLOYMENT

CANADIAN REPRESENTATION AT INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE IN 1946

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I had wished to direct a question to the Prime Minister, and I am sorry that he has gone, but perhaps the Minister of Veterans Affairs will bring the question to his attention?

It arises out of the statement made by the Prime Minister yesterday morning in tabling certain documents, one relating to the loan made by the United States to the United Kingdom, and I think also a white paper issued by the United States government containing among other things, a proposal for an international trade conference likely to be called in the coming summer. Has the government of Canada received an invitation from the United States government to attend such a conference; and whether or not it has received such an invitation, should such an invitation be received will the government give favourable consideration to making its delegation to the proposed conference a non-partisan delegation rather than one representing only the government itself?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I shall be very glad to direct the Prime Minister's attention to the question of my hon. friend, and possibly it may be answered later in the day.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of bill No. 234, to amend the Income War Tax Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Contractual annuities.

Mr. ILSLEY: I should like to make a statement to the house regarding this proposed amendment relating to the taxation of annuities. The committee may recall that when we were discussing the resolution on which the amendment is based I stated that the question of defining the capital element to be excluded from annuity payments for tax purposes was a very complicated one. The amendment I am now proposing to the bill which is before the committee is simpler and, at the same time, more generous to the taxpayer than the existing provision in the bill.

The amendment which I am now submitting provides that the capital element to be excluded from annuity payments shall be based on either the commuted value of the annuity at the time it begins or the amount which the annuitant could, under the contract, have chosen to receive in lieu of the annuity if this amount is stated in the contract.

I should like to point out that the main problem that has had to be faced in connection with annuities is the possibility in certain cases of tax avoidance if the commuted value or optional lump sum payment is used, as is proposed in this amendment, as the basis for excluding the capital element in annuities. The possibility of abuse is in connection with deferred annuities where a large lump sum payment is made for an annuity to begin many years in the future, and the annuity may be an annuity certain for a very few years. Under such an arrangement a person would, in effect, secure tax exemption on the interest earnings of this large amount of capital which would have accumulated over the period of deferment. Possibly I have in my own mind exaggerated the importance of this danger, but I did not feel justified in presenting to the house legislation which would be subject to criticism along the lines I have just suggested. I think, however, that the proviso at the end of the amendment I have just moved will be a sufficient safeguard against the tax avoidance possibilities in the device I have just mentioned. The proviso states that notwithstanding this provision (meaning the provision relating to the exclusion of the capital element from annuity payments) the minister may, in any case in which he considers it proper to do so, exercise the powers conferred on him by subsection 2 of this section.

Subsection 2 just referred to states as follows:

"Where, under any existing or future contract or arrangement for the payment of money, the minister is of the opinion

(a) that payments of principal money and interest are blended, or

(b) payment is made pursuant to a plan which involves an allowance of interest,

Whether or not there is any provision for payment of interest at a nominal rate or at all, the minister shall have the power to determine what part of any such payment is interest, and the part so determined to be interest shall be deemed to be income for the purposes of this act."

This section gives the minister power to deal effectively with any tax evasion which might be prompted through the somewhat generous provision with respect to the taxation of the interest element in annuities.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

I had better read the amendment and send copies to those who are interested in the bill. The amendment is:

That the following be substituted for paragraph (b) in lines 9 to 30, page 1:

(b) annuities received under a contract (other than payments described in paragraph (c) of this subsection) except a portion of each amount received thereunder that bears the same relation to the whole amount as the amount that the annuitant could, under the the contract, have chosen to receive in lieu of the annuity or, if no such choice is provided by the contract, the present value (computed in such manner as the minister may by regulation prescribe) of the annuity at the time of commencement thereof, bears to the aggregate computed in the case of an annuity for life on the assumption that the annuitant will live during the period of his normal expectation of life (calculated in accordance with mortality tables approved by the minister) of the annuity for which the contract provides:

Provided that this provision shall not be construed to prejudice the operation of subsection 2 of this section.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I move accordingly, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is a further explanation desired for this?

Mr. JACKMAN: No—a further understanding.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Am I correct in understanding that this is really designed to meet a difficulty which some people thought existed in the original subparagraph (ii) of paragraph (b) of subsection 1, particularly relating to the words "the amounts paid exclusively for the annuity", and that the words here, "the amount the annuitant could, under the contract, have chosen to receive in lieu" are now put in as applying both to annuities received in case of death and annuities received not in the case of death? In other words, those words are now considered to apply to both cases?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct; and the amendment goes further than that, because the people that the hon. gentleman is referring to are interested in their own annuities that they are selling, and their suggestions of a change would have meant that annuities sold by insurance companies, which always have the option of a lump sum payment, would have received one kind of tax treatment and annuities sold by the government would have received a less favourable one because there is no such option. I did not think that that was right, and so now we have gone the whole way and we have said that, whether there is a choice or not, you take the commuted value of the annuity as the capital element; and if you do that and just stop there you have opened the door pretty wide to a danger which I outlined in the remarks I made a while ago.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Would the minister say a word as to the proviso in the last three lines? I am not sure that I fully appreciate that.

Mr. ILSLEY: I read the proviso. The proviso enables the minister to deem certain payments interest, even though they are not called interest, and treat them as taxable income.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Where is the minister reading from?

Mr. ILSLEY: Subsection 2 of section 3 of the Income War Tax Act, inserted a few years ago, provides:

"Where under any existing or future contract or arrangement for the payment of money, the minister is of the opinion

(a) that payments of principal money and interest are blended, or

(b) payment is made pursuant to a plan which involves an allowance of interest; whether or not there is any provision for payment of interest at a nominal rate or at all, the minister shall have the power to determine what part of any such payment is interest and the part so determined to be interest shall be deemed to be income for the purposes of this act."

Is that sufficient?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: How will the section be administered? How is the individual to be able to file the tax return in the usual period allowed for that purpose?

Mr. ILSLEY: Is the hon. gentleman speaking about the annuitant beginning to receive the annuity?

Mr. JACKMAN: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: He will doubtless be advised by the company or the government that is paying the annuity of the rules that will apply, because he will have to be advised of the part of the annuity which is capital.

Mr. JACKMAN: The grantors will send out notices?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am sure they will. That would be the normal mode of operation.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I wish to raise a question in regard to subparagraph (g) at the top of page 2, which reads:

All annuities and other annual payments received under the provisions of a will or trust ...

What I wish to draw particular attention to is line ten:

... except a payment or portion thereof which can be established by the recipient not to have been paid out of the income of the estate or trust.

I am questioning the words "can be established", because I think they may go a very long way, and I have an alternative to suggest. Perhaps it is familiar to the minister, but I want to make this comment, which I think is a valid one. This is in aid not of the big man, but of the small man, because the small annuitant can never go to the expense of trying to have the question determined, since the amount involved is not large enough. I will read the alternative so that the minister can decide whether it is satisfactory. It seems to me to be proper, and I press strongly the significance of those words "which can be established by the recipient". They put all the onus on the recipient, and that involves a great deal of difficulty. The alternative I have to suggest is this:

except that portion of the annuity payment or other annual payments received under the provisions of any will or trust which is derived from the income of the estate or trust irrespective of the date on which the will or trust became effective, whether the same is received in periods longer than or shorter than one year.

In other words, the only change is to remove the onus from the recipient. That onus can be a very heavy one.

Mr. ILSLEY: The onus was put on the recipient to cover a case something like this. Suppose there is an estate, the income from which is $10,000. The testator does not know exactly what the income of his estate is going to be, but probably he assumes that the income will be more than that. He leaves eleven annuities of $1,000 each. Now each annuitant will claim that his $1,000 came, not out of the $10,000 but out of capital. They will all claim that their annuities came out of capital. There is $1,000 there that has to be accounted for.

Mr. JACKMAN: Somewhere.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. There are eleven annuities, and, as I say, each will claim that his annuity comes out of capital. That has to be settled among themselves or by the executor or someone else. It cannot be left to the minister, because it will mean that the minister would have power to decide the question. If you gave the minister discretion he would apportion it, and say that a small portion came out of capital with reference to each annuity. It has to be left to the people themselves, the trustee or the executor of the estate to say where that extra $1,000 came from, whether from capital or income. It must be settled by them. The minister cannot run around trying to prove that it came out of income rather than out of capital. It was to cover a case such as that that the burden was put on the recipient, and it is not a heavy burden.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): In the first place, I think the minister will agree that the case he mentions is not a usual one. In fact it is fairly remote. In the second place, after all, the wording I suggest simply means that the people themselves will have to establish what the truth is. They cannot simply make a statement without evidence. "That portion of the annuity payment or other annual payments received under the provisions of any will or trust which is derived from the income of the estate or trust" is a matter of fact. I am satisfied that the minister, as a lawyer, or a reformed lawyer, will agree with me that when you put that onus on the recipient it can create a very substantial additional burden. It is not a case of hair-splitting. I submit that what it does do is to put a substantial additional burden on those who already have a heavy burden to carry. They would just come along and say that it is from the income without giving any reason to substantiate it. They are taxed with this heavy onus which can be established by the recipient.

Mr. ILSLEY: Unless we have a clause like this the executor does not need to say anything, does he? He has an estate out of which he has to pay $11,000 a year. He just pays $11,000 a year. The income there might be $1,000 a year, but if he says nothing and does not need to say anything, who in the world can say which annuitant drew the money out of capital? This makes him say, and he must say. In the absence of this he does not need to say anything at all; he just pays out the $11,000 a year and he leaves it to the minister. The minister starts to tax somebody because it came out of income, and each one he starts to tax says, "No, mine came out of capital." The minister says, "Why do you say it came out of capital?" The man says, "I do not need to say anything about it; you have to show it came out of income." You cannot show it came out of income because there was not enough income. That is the position we are trying to avoid. It is not a great burden for any of those people. All they need to do is to show that they got the annuities out of income. Where the annuities are greater than the income I suppose they will arrange it so that the person with the largest income got the annuities out of capital, because they save more taxes that way.

Mr. McMASTER: This is a case that will arise often. Either it should be made definite here or it should be left to the minister, because the executor has no power to deal with it. The only occasion I know of on which power like that is given to an executor is where a trust company have power under a will to allocate certain amounts paid for repairs between the life tenant and the reversioners, but they have no power to do anything except pay out money in the case of an annuity. This question will arise in the first instance in every case when the executor files the form which is prepared a month before the other forms are filed. He will say that so much income came from the estate, and on the back he has to show where it is allocated. He has to say that so much went to John Jones and so much to William Smith, and so forth. After he does that he lists the total amount of the income, and if he shows less than the total amount of the income the department immediately gets after them and makes somebody else pay the difference. He will have to do it in some way or other, or simply make a statement as to how it is paid. I submit that the executor must be helped by appropriate legislation. In the case of a deficiency it will be allocated against the different people who are interested in it, because you cannot get them all together to agree to it. Some of them may be in California, some in Vancouver, some in Toronto. They will not agree to it. The executors have no power. I believe this either can be covered by legislation or can be left to the minister.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think they will agree to it. If they do not agree, they will have to pay taxes on the whole thing.

Mr. McMASTER: That seems an easy way out of it.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not an easy way out of it to give the minister power to allocate.

Mr. McMASTER: We are willing to do that.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think the hon. member's colleagues are willing.

Mr. McMASTER: I think so.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is giving another discretion to the minister.

Mr. McMASTER: The people who are handling estates have enough trouble without throwing this additional burden on the executors. It could be covered by an appropriate clause or by leaving it to the minister.

Mr. ILSLEY: We believe this is the best way to get at it. It avoids giving the minister another discretion, and it really puts some responsibility on the beneficiaries in these rare cases. There will not be very many of them. They will come to some agreement, because if it is not established the whole thing is taxable.

Mr. McMASTER: I really think the minister should meet these objections. Thousands of such cases are coming up every day. Surely we can assist the executors and everybody else. In the long run it would be assisting the minister. Why not put in a clause covering that? We have never found the taxing officers anything but fair; at least I have not. By appropriate legislation we should assist the executor when he makes out the original form. We could do it here in five minutes.

Mr. ILSLEY: No; it is an invidious sort of power to invest in the minister, to ask him to choose certain persons or to say that the annuity comes out of income and they are fully taxable. We should not be asked to say to one individual that his comes out of income and to another that his does not. The burden to establish that should be on the people who are seeking tax relief. At the present time these annuities are fully taxable. They are being relieved of taxation to the extent that they come out of capital. Year after year we have had representations, if not in this House of Commons, outside of it, that it is wrong to tax annuities if they come out of capital. We have said: In those numerous cases how can we tell whether they come out of capital or not? That was just the trouble. In these cases we can let them find out and establish that it came out of capital, and then it is not taxed. I think it is perfectly fair.

Mr. JACKMAN: I hesitate to raise this question again, but this is my first opportunity to do it. I refer to certain government annuities which, under this section, will be subjected to tax to which I believe they should not be subjected. Annuities were sold by the Department of Labour and its representatives to Canadian citizens. The number who purchased them, according to the Ives commission report, totalled something over 100,000. Of that number those who are interested in the particular aspect of the case to which I wish to draw attention probably number some 40,000 of our citizens, who with their families undoubtedly number over 100,000 Canadian people.

These government annuities were sold prior to June 25, 1940. In some cases they may have been paid for in full up to the maximum amount of $1,200. In other cases the agents for the Department of Labour said: You may take out whatever amount is convenient for you now. The amounts stipulated ran from $100 to $600, as the case may be. They were told that they had the right at any time to enlarge the contract up to $1,200, and that the annuity would be tax free. When I said the other evening that the representatives of the Department of Labour made such statements the minister challenged my words. I find that there can be no contradiction of my remarks because these agents of the Department of Labour did go about the country and sold 100,000 or more annuities on that assumption. In proof of that statement I shall point to a booklet which was put out prior to June 25, 1940, called "An Old Age of Comfort and Happiness." On page 12 of this booklet, printed by the king's printer, I find the following:

> The advantages of Canadian government annuities. A Canadian government annuity is the safest investment you can make. The security of the whole dominion is behind your purchase. It is free from dominion government taxation. It is payable for life.

And so forth. This is the printed evidence on which these annuities were sold. What evidence is there that one has the right to enlarge the annuity? If one looks at the contract, for instance, he finds that there are certain conditions printed on it. It says:

> If desired this contract may be matured at an earlier date than specified therein on any anniversary of the date of issue, the amount of annuity being adjusted accordingly, provided that the minimum annuity of $10 a year has been purchased.

I may say that that bears relation not so much to enlarging the annuity to $1,200 as to maturing it at an earlier date than originally suggested in the contract. However, there can be no doubt that the applicant for the annuity was given the right to enlarge that annuity under the same terms and conditions as those to which he originally subscribed. I will read again from an application form on which I see the wording in ink "June 16, 1936," and the address of the agent of the Canadian government annuities branch. It says:

> ... and with the understanding that such an annuity will in any event be granted to me as the total amount paid in by me improved at four per cent compounded yearly will purchase at the rates in effect at the date of this application, the same not to exceed $1,200.

I mention that as tying the government down to the rates, and again I refer to the government publication, printed by the king's printer, in which these annuities are stated to be free from dominion government taxation. In 1940, however, the matter undoubtedly came to the attention of the income tax department. I think it may have come to its attention before that, because I believe one agent in Winnipeg sold some of these contracts on representations which were not desirable and had a great many people subscribe to them with nominal payments, though the practice probably was not as general as the minister may have believed. So in 1940, when the income tax rates became very high and it might have been possible for certain people who held these contracts for small amounts to enlarge them and thereby obtain a substantial advantage, much greater than they had ever contemplated prior to the war because no one foresaw that within a few short years the income tax rates of this country would be about equal to those in Great Britain, section 5(k) was passed by this house. At the time I drew the attention of the minister to this matter, and I thought I had made a blunt statement, though I did not speak with any fervour at all, when I said the minister had broken the word of the Dominion of Canada. At that time I understood him to agree, as Hansard for that day records; I quoted the sentence the other evening. The minister now claims he did not understand it, and even challenges my suggestion that the agents of the Department of Labour had made these representations in regard to annuities being tax free, which undoubtedly was the case. Section 5(k) went on to say:

> ... provided that such exemption shall not extend to that portion of the income which exceeds the amount of the annuity actually specified in the contract before the 25th day of June, 1940 ...

That is to say, if you had subscribed for a $600 annuity, you could not enlarge it to $1,200. Then quoting again from the act:

> ... where such excess amount arises by reason of any option or contractual right to enlarge the annuity income by the payment of additional sums or premiums, unless such additional sums or premiums have actually been paid before the said date;

In order to break the warranty or the contract of the government with the citizens of the country it was necessary that this house actually say, in the budget brought down at that time by the minister, that notwithstanding any option or contractual right we would do so and so. Well, surely if you have a contract to purchase 160 acres for a farm, and have an option to purchase the adjoining 160 acres, the option is as much a part of the contract as is the original purchase; there is no question about that. However, I did not want to make very much of the point at the time. In the first place the country needed the revenue, and in the second place I had no doubt at that time where the equity lay. I thought it lay primarily with the government, because people had taken out annuities for small amounts, and with the great increase in income tax rates there was a tremendous unexpected advantage to the annuity holder. Nevertheless I say as solemnly as I can that it is my belief that the Minister of Finance, or whoever was responsible for it, did break the word of the dominion government in that regard to a great many of our people.

That is the first matter I wish to speak about, having to do with the enlargement of these annuities taken out prior to 1940, which right was taken away and the contract and word of the government broken in 1940. Now, however, I come to a matter which to me has much greater contractual significance, and where the equity lies not with the government but surely with the annuity holder. There were many, I estimate around forty thousand, annuity holders who took out these contracts, let us say, for the maximum of $1,200 prior to 1940, to mature perhaps twenty or thirty years later. Now, or some time in the near future, they wish to mature those contracts by paying in a sufficient amount of capital to enable them to draw their $1,200, which according to the terms of the contract were to be at the same rates, and according to the representations made and well understood by everyone, to some extent so well understood that they are protected as to the amount paid in by the government in its legislation; that is, they were sold on the understanding that the income was to be free from dominion government taxation.

Well, after that legislation came down in 1940 some people had doubts as to whether they would be entirely free of tax in connection with these annuities taken out prior to 1940, even though they had stipulated for $1,200. Letters were written to the annuities branch of the Department of Labour asking whether or not these contracts had been prejudicially affected. The replies came back that the contracts which stipulated for $1,200, taken out prior to 1940, were in no way prejudicially affected. Letters to that effect will be found in the files of the annuities branch; and, if I am correctly informed, at that time an opinion was given by the Department of National Revenue that such annuities which stipulated for the maximum of $1,200 would not be taxed if they were made immediate. Section 5 (k) speaks of "enlargement" and the question apparently was whether or not making an annuity immediate, the maturing of it, was an enlargement. From what I can understand, the first opinion given was that it was not an enlargement, and that any person holding a $1,200 annuity could pay it up in full. Then apparently there was a change of heart, probably because income tax rates were becoming steeper and apparently necessity knows no law, even when the dominion government is concerned in the case. So we find that the annuities branch issued a ruling in regard to income tax concerning these annuities, under date of July 10, 1944, in which they said:

> However, exemption from income tax, shall not extend to that portion of the income which exceeds the amount of annuity—

I emphasize the word "amount" because it is the point at issue.

> —actually specified in the contract—

There is only one amount specified in the contract, and that is $1,200.

> —before the 25th of June, 1940, where such excess amount of annuity arises by reason of any option or contractual right to enlarge the annuity income by the payment of additional sums or premiums unless such additional sums or premiums have actually been paid before the said date.

That ruling referred to the amount actually specified in the contract. That surely can mean only one thing; that is, as set out on the face of the contract. This announcement by the superintendent of annuities on July 10, 1944, was followed by one from the same branch of government on September 1, 1944, which was changed in wording and which did not make the same reference to the amount stipulated on the face of the contract.

Correspondence has also been had as to the contract, and such statements as these were made:

> The contract may be converted into an immediate annuity to begin at an earlier anniversary date of the contract. Deposits may be made irregularly, and if a sufficient amount is deposited the date of maturity of the contract would be automatically brought forward.

In respect to the whole matter the holder of the annuity gained only one impression, and that was that contracts prior to 1940 were tax tree as to the stipulated amount, and that they could be matured at an earlier date if so desired.

I do not wish to say much more on the matter. The minister did not seem to be too familiar with all the details in connection with annuities when he spoke the other evening. A document which he recommended is, I find, a most interesting one—and I hope he has read it himself. I would refer to the first page of part I of the royal commission on the taxation of annuities and family corporations, 1945. It states:

> The complaints and criticism of a considerable number who had purchased government annuity contracts prior to 25th June, 1940, when the present section 5 (k) of the act came into force, and who had contractual rights therein to increase their annuities as their savings permitted, were strong and severe. They contend that they had no knowledge of the proposed change in time to protect themselves, but a much greater number complained that they purchased their annuities from the crown on the assurance of the department and its salesmen, and upon the statements in literature distributed by the government that the annuities they were invited to purchase would be exempt from all federal taxation.

Mr. NICHOLSON: For all time?

Mr. JACKMAN: Until the annuities expired. They were sold on a distinct basis, and people who bought these bought them instead of other investments. That is why I say the dominion government has broken its bond, that it has broken the word of the Dominion of Canada in this regard. I do not believe there can be any contention to the contrary.

Since I made certain statements the last occasion the matter was before the committee, friends of mine and those with whom I have been associated, who have the utmost confidence in the word and integrity of the Minister of Finance—and perhaps also in my word —cannot believe that both the minister and I can be right in this matter. The responsible minister states on the one hand that the dominion government has not broken its word, while I contend that it has. And yet we find in the report of this royal commission the very proposition I am now putting before the committee.

Let me read the final sentence in the report of the royal commission, which I believe is as strong as any words I could use. That final sentence is this: "They feel that they have been betrayed by their government."

Mr. ILSLEY: But the commission does not say so.

Mr. JACKMAN: I am reading from the summary of the evidence, and I should like to correct any wrong impression I might have created. This is the summary of evidence compiled by the commissioners, the evidence upon which the commission has reported. These are the complaints and criticisms of the holders of the annuities.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Did the commission say that?

Mr. JACKMAN: They have not said anything about it, because it was not within the sphere of their reference. They say that they took evidence. There are a great many citizens in Canada, for whom I speak at the present time, who feel that their government has betrayed them.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, I deny, as I did before, that the government has broken its word in this matter. I deny that there has been any betrayal. I can understand that there were certain purchasers of options—because that is really what they were—to increase annuities if they wished. The government was bound, but they were not bound to increase. I can understand that. These purchasers of options, when they found that this would be a very desirable form of investment into which they could put their money, felt that they would take up these options and put their moneys into annuities which would be totally free of taxation. Then they found that there had been a change in the law, so that they could not do that. But surely we carry out our contract with them when we permit them to enlarge their annuities. That was our contract.

Mr. JACKMAN: It is not the same annuity at all.

Mr. ILSLEY: Our contract with them was to sell them an enlarged annuity. The contract had nothing in it about taxation. But surely if a person who is not bound at all, but who merely has an option to put his money into an enlarged annuity, chooses later to enlarge his annuity, he must take that enlarged annuity subject to the taxation prevailing at the time he enlarges it.

Mr. JACKMAN: Whether they were fully paid annuities, or annuities with contractual rights, makes no difference. Surely it makes no difference whether a contract is a contract for a sale of goods, or a contract expressing an option or a right in the future. Both are valid in law. There is no question as to whether one has value and the other has not value. The option has just as much value as any contract in business. Will the minister say that these contracts, or options—call them what you like—were not sold by representatives of the government with the clear understanding that they, and their enlargements, if you wish, would be free from dominion government taxation? Does the minister deny that this is a booklet issued by the dominion government? I point out that it bears the king's printer's imprimatur. They were sold under warranty; there is no question about that.

[Mr. Jackman.]

Mr. NICHOLSON: The hon. member for Rosedale has laboured this point for some time. He did so when the resolutions were before us, and has done it again to-day.

Mr. JACKMAN: And I will labour it again.

Mr. NICHOLSON: If the hon. member were minister and if he were introducing the legislation he is now advocating, would that be his plan? Even though there were salesmen who gave certain undertakings with those who entered into this contract, certainly the government did not assure those persons who made purchases that there never would be any change in the income tax laws. I think the hon. member for Rosedale was right when, during the war, he did not press his point.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

Mr. JACKMAN: No. The minister has not said whether what I have said is or is not true. He said the other night that he would not let me off easily, after I had made my charge. I never expected to be let off easily, and I intend to stick to this matter until justice is done—even if I have to labour it from now until kingdom come. I will call it one o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. member does not call it one o'clock; the chairman does that.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. JACKMAN: Just before the committee took recess we were discussing the taxation of dominion government annuities. I believe the principle at stake to be a very important one, first because there are so many of our citizens who hold these annuity contracts, something over 100,000, I believe, and second, because the Dominion of Canada has had a record for integrity which is unblemished. As we have seen, the dominion government at this session has gone to considerable lengths to reinstate the credit of one of our provinces which, owing to dire circumstances, had to make an adjustment on its bonds.

The minister still does not admit that there was a breaking of the government's word. Should it be shown that there was a breaking of the government's word, as I have endeavoured to indicate on several occasions by presenting the facts of the case; if the government is free to break its word in regard to contracts of its own making, it is quite free to break contracts in connection with government bonds and arbitrarily lower the rate of interest or otherwise do what it will. If that should come about, or the impression should gain ground that the dominion government is not to be relied upon, the credit of our country would suffer, and the cost to the country of its financing in the future would be very great.

To bring this matter to a head I would ask the Minister of Finance three simple questions which I think go to the heart of the matter. If he answers them as I think the facts indicate they should be answered, I will rest the case there for the present. Will the minister, having regard to the evidence which I have brought before the committee, admit that in the result these government annuities were bought through misrepresentation by the agents of the dominion government in regard to the future of government taxation?

Mr. ILSLEY: The answer is no.

Mr. JACKMAN: The minister will not admit that, notwithstanding the fact that the government booklet has it in printed evidence, that the annuities branch of the Department of Labour admits that its members went about advertising these annuities as free of tax, and that the contractual element in regard to the option is also as valid in law and as binding on the dominion government as is the main part of the contract itself. The minister apparently does not admit that there was any misrepresentation in the sale of these annuities. I have already placed before the committee the report of the evidence tendered to the royal commission known as the Ives commission.

May I ask the minister a second question? Was there sufficient evidence of the existence of an optional or contractual right on the part of the holders of these annuities or annuity contracts purchased prior to 1940 to make him feel that it was necessary to pass section 5 (1) (k) of the Income War Tax Act of 1940, whereby the rights of annuity holders were done away with, even though the act itself says:

> . . . provided that such exemption shall not extend to that portion of the income which exceeds the amount of the annuity actually specified in the contract before the twenty-fifth day of June, 1940, where such excess amount arises by reason of any option or contractual right to enlarge the annuity income by the payment of additional sums or premiums, unless such additional sums or premiums, have actually been paid before the said date.

It is strange that parliament, exercising its sovereign power to do what it will, found it necessary to say that even though there might have been an optional or contractual right, that right no longer existed so far as this act was concerned.

Mr. ILSLEY: It did not say that.

Mr. JACKMAN: Why was that put in, may I ask?

Mr. ILSLEY: That simply said that if the right to take up the option was exercised after the passing of that act, the option would have to be taken up in the light of the new dominion conditions. It did not deny the right to take it up.

Mr. JACKMAN: No notice was given to the holders of the option or contractual right to take up their option. The minister was just saying that there was an option or contractual right under certain conditions; he said the element of taxation did not apply to it. Yet I have shown him the government's literature in connection with this matter, which clearly shows that the government agents in their own printed matter held out the representation that it is free of tax. The minister still refuses to admit it. I submit the evidence, Mr. Chairman.

The third point is this: Where there are two rulings given by the Department of National Revenue in regard, not to the enlargement of the contract from a smaller amount to the maximum of $1,200 but to the amount of the contract for whatever sum is stated—perhaps six, perhaps twelve hundred dollars. After section 5(1)(k) was passed in 1940 stating that these contracts could be matured at an earlier date than that specified on the face of the contract through the annuitant using his right under the option clause which is embodied in the contract, was there a ruling to the effect that the maturing could not be subject to tax? Then was there later a ruling given that any maturing of the contract beyond the amount stated on the face of the contract would be taxable? If so, have there been two rulings? And what is the position of those who matured their contracts subsequent to June 25, 1940, up to the present time? Some people operated under the first ruling, and now a second ruling of the Department of National Revenue, I understand, has been given. Will the minister clarify that situation?

Mr. McCANN: The answer to the hon. gentleman's question is no. The rulings in the main have been consistent. There may have been some slight adjustment or variation, and it is possible that some official may have written a letter which was not in consonance with the ruling of the department.

Mr. JACKMAN: What the Minister of National Revenue has stated is not quite good enough. I asked a simple question; was there a ruling by the department that the maturing of a contract even subsequent to June 24, 1940 was not taxable, and then at some subsequent time another ruling that a maturing of such a contract was taxable? There are two questions to which the minister may answer yes or no.

Mr. McCANN: I do not think that I can enlarge on the answer which I have given the hon. gentleman. It would be utterly impossible to examine into letters which have been written by any or every employee of the department. But the answer still holds, that in the main the ruling has not been changed, but it may have been subject to some minor adjustment.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 2—Reciprocal shipping and aircraft income tax exemptions.

Mr. FLEMING: With regard to the amendments appearing at the top of page 3, and being a part of section 2, I take it that these have reference to definitions which have not yet been adopted by the house but will be submitted in connection with the bill to amend the National Housing Act. Is that correct? I have in mind paragraphs 3 and 4.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right. The National Housing Act amendments have not yet been passed. There was an order in council using these terms and making clear exactly what they mean, and the same definitions will be carried into the National Housing Act of 1944.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Deductions for superannuation or pension fund.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I wish to ask the minister a question with regard to the hardship—I think it is a great hardship—wrought by these amendments, if I understand them correctly, with regard to a considerable number of pension funds which have been set up pursuant to the rights reserved in section 5, subsection 1, paragraph (h) of the act. As I understand it, the effect of this is that in a good many pension funds which have been in effect, and where payments have been made, the rights to receive a pension tax-free are now being drastically cut down. I should like the minister to tell me if I am stating the fact correctly, and whether he does not agree that in a large number of funds which have been in operation for a considerable period of time, this drastic cutting down of rights is causing serious injury to the funds. If so, is it in his opinion necessary that this be done?

[Mr. Jackman.]

Mr. ILSLEY: With regard to persons who have been contributing to funds under the existing provisions of the law, their position, at the time when they receive their pensions, is changed by this legislation, in respect of taxation. In some cases it is improved and in some cases it is made worse. I think that the treatment, subject to something which I am about to say with reference to the whole question of apportionment on a cash basis, is perfectly fair. But it would be idle for me to deny that it is changed.

Take the case of a pension fund which elected to receive its investment income free of tax. That is the class of cases under the subsection which the hon. gentleman mentions. The consequences flowing from that in the past have been these. The contributor, the employee, is not entitled to deduct his contributions to the fund from his income for taxation purposes, but when the time comes for him to receive his pension he gets his pension free of income tax. That is being changed. In the future it will not be possible to set up funds like that at all. The income of the fund will be free of tax, but the pensioner, the contributor, in every case will be entitled to deduct his contributions from his income for tax purposes and he will be taxed in full on his pension. That will be the case with regard to pension funds which are set up in the future. With regard to the past there is apportionment, and the question is, on what basis the apportionment should be made. Now, the basis laid down in the act is this. We take the proportion of the total contributions to the fund which were paid in during the period when the contributions were not deductible by the employee, and the proportion which those payments in bear to the total payments in is the proportion which will be applied to the pension for tax purposes. So when the pension comes out, that proportion is applied and part of the pension is free from tax and part is taxable.

Various alternative plans have been suggested. One was to make the apportionment on a time basis rather than on a cash basis. That has much against it. Another plan was to give some weight to interest payments, which would involve actuarial calculations, and that would be the fairest basis. I have prepared a statement to deliver to the committee on these problems, and perhaps I should read it.

The purpose of paragraph (h) under subsection 1 of the section, on page 4 of the bill, is to define "a portion", or more strictly "a proportion" of a pension which shall be tax-free in the hands of the recipient employee or his dependents, because the employee, in making contributions to the pension scheme, has not been permitted to deduct some or all of his contributions from his income for tax purposes. Such deduction of contributions from income could not be made in the case of pension funds where the trustee or corporation in charge of such funds has elected in the past to have the income from the investment of the funds exempt from taxation. In other words, under paragraph (h) of the act as it has been up to date, there have been some pension funds where the contributor was taxed on the contribution when it went in, and in return was allowed to receive a portion of his pension free from tax.

We are now changing the law in accordance with the recommendations of the royal commission to make all contributions to the pension plan deductible from income for tax purposes and to provide in general that pension payments shall be subject to tax. In order to be equitable, however, it is necessary to make an allowance for pensions which the employees have earned through contributions which could not be deducted from income, and to allow them a corresponding proportion of the pension free from taxation. This paragraph in the bill is intended to do that. The proportion of the pension which is to be free of tax is defined as equal to the proportion which the aggregate of the amounts of the contributions paid by the employee, which he was not entitled to deduct from his income, forms of the total contributions paid by the employee.

This basing of the proportion on the amounts paid under the one system and the other is the same principle which has been in the law for some time in paragraph (h) of subsection 1 of section 5 of the act. It has been necessary for some time to have a principle of this kind to cover cases where the status of contributions is changed by reason of the pension plan coming under the section after some period on the other basis.

My attention has been called to the fact that the principle on which this apportionment has been made and will be made under the law as we propose to amend it, while relatively favourable to older employees, who will be retiring shortly, is relatively unfavourable to younger employees who will have some period under the new system before retiring. The reason for this is that the formula we have been using, and which we propose for the time being to continue to use, includes accumulation of interest on contributions made to the fund and therefore weights all contributions equally in determining the tax-free portion of the pensions; whereas, strictly speaking, the earlier contributions are of more importance in earning the pension rights for the employee, because they accumulate an interest over a considerable period.

It has been suggested that we should offer an alternative formula which would take this factor into account. Such a formula, however, involves the introduction of certain actuarial principles and in its administration would require some actuarial investigations in connection with funds and payments out of them.

I have not been prepared to introduce this alternative system at this stage, but I am prepared to consider an alternative of this kind in the future. I understand that the present proposal would not work unfairly in the immediate future and therefore there will be an opportunity for further consideration of the appropriate formula and preparation for its administration.

I am told I said that the actuarial-calculation method would be the fairest. I do not think I should admit that. It is alleged by some that it would be fairer than the application of the straight apportionment on a cash contribution basis. Certainly it would be preferred by many to the present arrangement. I do not know whether the point the hon. gentleman has in mind is the one I have covered.

There are pensions in connection with which employers have made by far the largest part of the contribution to the fund and where employees have been contributing perhaps for only a year or two. If the trustees of the fund made the election provided for in the law as it is at present, those employees would be entitled to receive their entire pension tax free, provided their contributions were all made after that election.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): And they pay the taxes.

Mr. ILSLEY: They pay the taxes themselves. If we are talking on the basis of fairness, however, that arrangement is not fair to the crown, because the employer may have made a very large contribution to cover fifteen or twenty years in the past. If the employer is a taxpaper he is allowed to deduct that contribution from his income for his tax purposes and it goes into the fund without any cost to the employee, because the employee did not pay it. That is not a case of the employee making contributions over that period and nevertheless paying income tax on them. After a certain date, all he needs to do under the law as it stands at present is to make one contribution. So long as he makes one contribution he is entitled to draw his pension. If he makes one contribution after the date of election he is entitled to draw a pension for the rest of his life and not pay income tax on it, although he never suffered any deduction except one during his lifetime in respect of his payments in. But he gets that income free of tax on the way out.

My hon. friend will say, Well, that is what the law gives him at the present time, and you must not take away from him anything that the law gives him. But if we cannot alter the expectations of pensioners in respect of those plans, we cannot do any of this. Take the case of a certain bank. I shall not mention any particular one, but the employees of the bank that I have in mind have been paying income tax on the entire amount of their incomes without the deduction. They had the expectation that they would receive their pension tax free. From now on we are going to tax at least part of their pension. That is an alteration of their expectations; it is an alteration of what might be called their rights; it is an alteration of what would be their rights if we did not change the law, but I do not think that we can ever put this on an optional basis.

Mr. HOMUTH: They did not think that the law would be changed.

Mr. ILSLEY: We cannot put this on an optional basis for every employee in Canada. It is a change in the tax system which on the whole is fairer than the old arrangement, and is recommended by the Ives commission as a good thing to do. Take the case that I put a while ago. It is entirely indefensible from the standpoint of the treasury and the taxpayers as a whole.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): That was exceptional.

Mr. ILSLEY: What has been brought to my attention is the case where there have been about fifteen years of contribution covered by the employer and two years contribution by the employee, resulting in a hundred per cent exemption of tax of the employee in expectation. That expectation is being frustrated by this change, but the employee is being treated perfectly fairly. For the years that he did make a contribution he will get credit during the pension period, but for the years during which he did not make a contribution he will be taxed on his pension.

Mr. HOMUTH: His contribution was in labour.

Mr. ILSLEY: No. If it had been represented in money he would have paid taxation on it. The whole reason why he is tax free on his pension is that he pays taxes on his contribution.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): If we are considering now what would be fair, as the minister has fairly stated many people will be deprived of what might be called their expectations, or, but he added, "what might be called their rights." That is a fair way to put it.

Mr. ILSLEY: I said, what would, but for this change in the law, have been their rights.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I think the minister said, "what might be called their rights." I wrote down what the minister said.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman did not take down the rest of it. I said, "what would be their rights if the law had not been changed.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Actually this means a grievous change in the expectations of a substantial number of people. Instead of getting tax free the pension which represents, as the minister has so fairly pointed out, not only their own payments but the payments of the employer, they are going to get only the exemption in respect of their own payments.

Mr. ILSLEY: And the employer's contribution during those years in which they make payment. It must be borne in mind that they get the benefit of that as well.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Let us face the facts. So far as these people are concerned there was a firm commitment that is now being taken away. I am not arguing that there must never be a change; I am not arguing that governments must never change their tax system because it is going to hurt people's expectations. But surely you must have regard to the existing situation. I admit that there is a certain regard being had for the proportion which is allowed here, but let us take a case similar to that which the minister mentioned. A pension has been set up for older employees. The firm makes substantial contributions to take care of the past, and the employees begin to put in their own contribution. They pay income taxes on their own contributions and look forward to the time when their pensions fall due, believing that they will be tax free. This makes a drastic change in their set-up and alters the whole picture. In order to accept this new situation, must we work this grievous change on these people? Can we not accept the situation which has existed and make a sort of easement out?

I am not referring to individual cases; what I have in mind is making such provision that those pension funds which have existed can run on and be eased out in some manner other than the one suggested here. The easement the minister is suggesting is practically no easement at all. There is a hardship. I suppose the minister will argue that when there is a change in the tax system there is always a hardship. I earnestly suggest that here there is a terrific hardship on a large number of people who are coming to the time of retirement, and their whole expectation, their whole future, will be turned upside down. Nothing less than that is happening to them, because a man who is just coming to his retirement age and who has been figuring on getting an income which is probably none too large to begin with, will find himself in a difficult position. He will have to do some close figuring anyway. His pension may be $1,800, $2,000 or $2,500. If that is taxed at the present rate it upsets his whole expectation in the future. The minister has agreed that the expectation is a legitimate one. These men have been working toward it for years. Can the minister say that such a drastic and grievous upset in the expectation cannot be avoided?

Mr. ILSLEY: Certainly there is nothing unfair about the method of taxation that is being imposed, except to the extent that perhaps something other than a cash basis should be considered, what is called an actuarial basis; but that does not meet the point of the hon. member.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Surely the minister will agree that when this was set up it was no doubt argued, perhaps even by him, that that arrangement was a fair one, and people have acted on it for many years.

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot do any more in this bill than I have done. There has been endless discussion about this from everybody who gets worse treatment. The ones who get better treatment as a result of this are not heard from. It is a fair way of treating them, subject to the qualifications I mentioned, that perhaps weighting should be given to the interest. Between now and the next budget I should be willing to give consideration to this. I cannot make any change in this bill.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Is the minister saying that he intends to give consideration to putting in the qualifications, which will be comparatively small, or is he saying that he will give consideration to the broader point which I have raised?

Mr. ILSLEY: Divide it on the basis of employer contributions as well as employee contributions.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I mean consideration of the fairness of bringing to an end the arrangement whereby the pensions were to be enjoyed tax free. That is what I am suggesting; in other words, 5 (1) (h).

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I should be willing to give consideration to that between now and the next budget. I do not know what we can do. I would not offer much hope that we can make any change except in the one respect I have mentioned, but I am willing to give it consideration. I do not see what we can do except go the whole length of giving every employer an option.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I appreciate the difficulty. I also appreciate the minister saying that he will give it consideration.

Mr. JACKMAN: Certain companies really do not have a tax bracket; they are merely trustees, as it were, and therefore there is no substantial exemption if they are allowed to make contributions. The minister may know certain classes of companies of that sort, financial companies and so on. If both the employer and the employee make contributions to the fund, and both pay tax on their respective contributions, when the money is drawn out by the beneficiary is it taxable or non-taxable?

Mr. ILSLEY: The employer never pays tax on his contribution, as far as I know.

Mr. JACKMAN: The employee would be the ultimate beneficiary, but the whole fund is built up by contributions from both the employer and the employee on which tax has been paid. Ultimately the employee benefits. Under these resolutions would that be taxable or non-taxable? The fund is created from tax-paid moneys on the part of both contributors.

Mr. ABBOTT: Moneys which have not been claimed as a deduction for tax purposes.

Mr. JACKMAN: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: It always is claimed as a deduction by the employer. It is a cost of doing business.

Mr. JACKMAN: It is in connection with an approved plan, but I am thinking of one case in particular. Possibly it is not worth while claiming the exemption because it is such a small part of the total cost of operation. The fund is built up entirely of tax-paid contributions. When the beneficiary gets the benefit under the retirement plan is the amount taxable or non-taxable?

Mr. ILSLEY: Is the hon. gentleman talking about plans that are not approved?

Mr. JACKMAN: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: If it is an approved plan the employee pays on the whole thing; he pays on the whole income without the deduction, or he should. On the other hand the employer could claim it as a deduction, could he not? I should think the employer would make that deduction as a cost of doing business.

Mr. JACKMAN: Suppose he does not care whether or not he gets it. I am only interested in the beneficiary.

Mr. ILSLEY: Then the question is what happens to the pension when it is paid. It is fully taxable, is it not?

Mr. JACKMAN: Suppose he has gone through the formality of obtaining approval from the minister, but without any request for tax deduction on the part of the employer, and certainly none on the part of the employee. Would there be any freedom from taxation on the amount ultimately going to the beneficiary?

Mr. ILSLEY: If he obtained the approval?

Mr. JACKMAN: Yes. I do not know what good the approval would do except to qualify it under some section.

Mr. ILSLEY: The approval has this effect, that the employee may deduct the contributions from his income for tax purposes.

Mr. JACKMAN: But when he gets the money it is taxable?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is taxable in any case, any money he receives, apart from these apportionment cases. You are talking about a fund that starts now, and pensions are all taxable from now on.

Mr. McMASTER: I should like to call the attention of the minister to something which may result in hardship to employees many years from now. A man may have paid in to a pension fund for ten years; he may not get his pension for another thirty years. Unless there is something in the rules and regulations which will enable him to get a statement up to date, he will not know how much was paid in before this new act came into force. It is the employee who will have to deal with the department, and unless he knows what he has paid in up to now he will never be able to make a statement. In the past it has not been important to keep track of what he has paid, but some regulation should be passed now providing that employers will have to give statements as to the contributions to date of the different employees.

Mr. ILSLEY: Surely he could get a statement from the trustees of the fund. The fund has to know how much he has paid in order to know how much to pay him in the way of pension. I do not think there would be any trouble about getting that information.

Mr. PROBE: Assume that an employee has contributed to a regular employees' pension fund for a period of years and then leaves the employment under which he was eligible to contribute that superannuation money; but the terms of the agreement between employer and employee were such that he could continue to pay into that fund. Up to the present his payments have been tax free. Would they continue to be tax free up to the amount of $900?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; unless there is something peculiar about the case that I do not understand, that normally would be so. The whole scheme of this new legislation is that the contributions are tax free.

Mr. PROBE: But he is no longer in that employment.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would not like to be too final about that if he does not continue to be an employee. I shall have to give the hon. gentleman an answer later.

Mr. PROBE: He is still eligible to obtain superannuation under that plan.

Mr. ILSLEY: That would be a matter of agreement between the employer and the fund.

Mr. FLEMING: Under section 14 of the bill the increase in the deduction to $900 becomes effective only with the 1946 income and has no relation to the 1945 income. I am thinking of some large pension schemes under which the employee has the right to make greater payments than stipulated, for the purpose of increasing the pension he may receive on retirement. That is a valuable right for older employees who may be not far from the retirement age, especially in connection with pension funds which have been in existence for only a short time. I am thinking of one very good example, the civic pension fund of the city of Toronto. About 2,500 employees are affected by this particular proposal. The principle being sound of increasing the deduc-tion to $900 per annum, would not the minister consider making this provision effective with say the last quarter of 1945, instead of delaying its effectiveness until the 1946 income?

Mr. ILSLEY: It would mean an apportionment of the year, that an employee could pay in up to $300 a year for the first nine months and $900 for the last three months. I think we are doing pretty well by bringing that in as of January 1, 1946. We are making a big extension of the right of deduction from income here. There are large numbers of these pensioners all over Canada, and it would be a most difficult administrative task to make all these apportionments. I do not think I should like to make a change during the year.

Mr. FLEMING: Could not some formula be worked out for the apportionment without making the calculation too complicated? This affects many employees who are rapidly approaching the age of retirement.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think we had better change that.

Mr. FLEMING: Then I should like to direct a question to the minister in regard to the unusual medical expenses section, in connection with which I should like to bring two matters to his attention. The first has to do with the deduction from salary or wages referred to at line 40 on page 4, where it says:

—including the salary or wages paid to one full-time attendant upon the taxpayer, his spouse or any such dependent, who was throughout the whole of the taxation period necessarily confined—

In other words, in respect of a person confined by reason of illness to a wheel chair or bed, the right to deduct wages or salary paid to a full-time attendant applies only where the person is ill throughout the entire taxation period. I take it that that means the calendar year. As for the person who is totally blind, at any time in the taxation period there is permission in the section to deduct the salary or wages paid to one full-time attendant upon the taxpayer. If the principle is sound that the person incapacitated by total blindness at any time during the taxation year shall be entitled to deduct salary or wages of a full-time attendant, why should not the principle be applied also to the person who for reasons other than blindness is incapacitated? I suggest, Mr. Chairman, the principle is sound that expense incurred in respect of the wages or salary of a full-time attendant made necessary by any form of physical or mental incapacitation ought to be included within the scope of the medical expenses to be calculated under this section.

Mr. ILSLEY: At a later time I shall give consideration to the hon. member's suggestion, but I should not like to make an amendment to this bill. Many blind people have incomes, and need attendants with them pretty steadily. On the other hand, if we allowed persons to add to their medical expenses the costs, salaries or wages paid to full-time attendants for, let us say, a month, during an illness, I believe the section would be impossible of administration. Checking would be very difficult. There would be a great opportunity to have an attendant who might be considered unnecessary. On the other hand, if the person is bedridden, or is confined to a wheel chair for a full year, there is not the same opportunity. This was intended to cover cripples, or other persons who might be permanently incapacitated.

Mr. FLEMING: If it is a sound principle to allow a deduction in respect of the wages or salary of a full-time attendant who attends a person incapacitated throughout the year, I suggest the principle should apply equally to incapacitation for part of the year. As to the matter of proof, let me point out there are many other expenses permissible under the section, and its predecessor, which are just as capable of being misused as this one might be, or as a section such as I have suggested might be. I believe methods could be found to establish proof, which would satisfy the administrative requirements of the department. I respectfully urge upon the minister that he give consideration to that matter.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does the hon. member take it that it would apply to the same attendants for the whole year?

Mr. FLEMING: No; it is a matter of incapacitation throughout the whole year. At present the patient must be incapacitated throughout the entire year before the salary or wages of a full-time attendant can be deducted. If that principle be sound, then it ought to apply to incapacitation for part of the year, because the whole purpose of the section would seem to be that of cushioning the burden of unusual medical expenses.

Mr. ILSLEY: Correct.

Mr. FLEMING: It is certainly unusual in respect of persons completely incapacitated for part of the year. That is more unusual than it would be in connection with a preson permanently incapacitated—let us say a paralytic. The principle is recognized as being sound and I suggest it ought not to be confined to the one group. It is recognized in respect of persons incapacitated throughout the whole year and in respect of those who are blind, whether for part of a year or for a whole year. Should it not apply to those who are completely incapacitated in ways other than by blindness for part of the year?

Mr. ILSLEY: Nursing expenses are allowed.

Mr. FLEMING: Yes; but we know that often full-time attendants are required by families who cannot afford to pay for nurses. Under present rates of pay for nurses it is often necessary to retain the services of a full-time attendant who will work for a rate lower than that paid a nurse.

Let us consider the extreme case of a person who, by reason of an accident, is incapacitated for eleven months of the year, and for that time requires the full-time services of an attendant. Under this section the payment of wages to that full-time attendant would be disallowed. But if the person is incapacitated for twelve months he is allowed the full amount for those twelve months. Putting it in the mildest form, certainly that is an anomalous situation. The principle having been recognized, it ought to be made applicable to incapacitation for shorter periods, subject to proper proof to the need for a full-time attendant. I believe my suggestion is eminently fair, and I would ask the minister to consider it.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall take note of what the hon. member has said. This section was drawn carefully some years ago. The provision was introduced by myself, and in the beginning we limited the allowances to payments made to registered nurses. We then decided that perhaps that was too narrow an interpretation, and that it should be extended to practical nurses. The question at once arose as to who might be a practical nurse. There are many degrees of nursing. For instance, one might find a domestic servant who could do something in addition to what would be considered pure domestic service, and might to some extent look after a patient. There was so little opportunity to check that that we finally decided the test would be that of having a full-time attendant throughout the entire taxation period, and that that would be a fairly good indication the person in attendance was needed for something equivalent to nursing services.

I believe the provision with respect to blind persons speaks for itself. There can be no doubt that a blind person needs the services of an attendant, and it does not make any difference whether such attendance is for a short or for a long period of time. I cannot remember exactly the considerations which were in our minds at the time, but I do know that the matter was carefully considered. I should not like to make any amendment at this time.

What happens is that hon. members will make suggestions when these matters are being considered, and then when we are preparing the next budget we have them in mind. We will remember what has been so strongly urged by the hon. member for Eglinton, and, after talking it over, we will decide whether or not a change should be made. However I would not care to do so at this time unless the matter were extremely urgent—and I do not think it is. I shall give it consideration before the next budget is brought down.

Mr. FLEMING: I should like to thank the minister. I would draw to his attention another point which arises from the last two lines at the bottom of page 4 of the bill. This permits the inclusion of an amount expended on an artificial limb, a spinal brace, a brace for a limb or an aid to hearing for the taxpayer, his spouse or any such dependent. I draw attention specially to the words "artificial limb, a spinal brace, a brace for a limb, or an aid to hearing", and I would refer briefly to aids to seeing. Under rulings given by the Department of National Revenue, persons purchasing spectacles are allowed to deduct that portion of the amount which they pay to the optometrist which represents his professional services, but nothing is allowed on the glasses which may be prescribed as necessary as a result of his examination. I fail to see why there should be any distinction made in principle between aids to seeing and aids to hearing. If you permit the deduction of the expenditure made by a taxpayer on a hearing aid, why in principle do you deny him the right to deduct what he has paid on an aid to vision?

Mr. ILSLEY: For two reasons—much more unusual and much more expensive.

Mr. FLEMING: Those may be matters that affect administration. But you have this anomalous situation. A man goes to an optometrist for an examination, who prescribes the kind of lens required to correct some defect in vision. The prescription is filled by an optician. The department permits the deduction of that portion of the taxpayer's expenditure which represents the optometrist's fee for his examination, but no deduction is allowed on the cost of the lenses, which would certainly correspond to the purchase of medicine in the case of a person requiring medicine, or an artificial limb or splint.

I do not happen to wear glasses myself, but I see that the minister does, and he has had more personal experience. I know however from experience that the prices paid for some lenses are very high indeed, and their purchase bears heavily on families who may have inherited some eye weakness necessitating spectacles for perhaps three or four or five children in the family. No deduction is allowed, and my humble submission is that it is not fair to make this distinction which discriminates against those who require to purchase these aids to vision. Will the minister give consideration to that point? I would not raise it if I did not consider it important and a hardship to many people.

Mr. ILSLEY: So many people wear glasses that it is hardly an unusual medical expense at all. Glasses are one of those things that nearly all of us have to buy. The question has been raised many times in this house, and the deduction has never been allowed. I could mention many more articles for which just as good a case could be made out as for glasses. You could egg yourself on step by step until you included nearly everything except food and clothing, and perhaps then it would be urged that some kind of food should be included.

Mr. JACKMAN: May I make a suggestion and perhaps convey some little information to the minister in connection with this relief for unusual medical expenses? I believe that the four per cent is based on the total income before tax. When the section was first passed I remember bringing to the attention of the minister that this might result in hardship because some people with large earning power and not very much capital already have a very difficult situation to meet, particularly if while continuing to earn their large salary, with the embarrassment of income tax, they had severe sickness in the family. I suggest that the four per cent be applied on the net rather than on the gross income. When I brought this question up before, the minister replied that people with substantial incomes had usually something set aside. But I would point out that the heavy income tax and the necessity of maintaining one's way of life has exhausted the little capital which many people had. Would the minister give consideration to a change in departmental administration whereby the four per cent would be applied to the net rather than to the gross income?

Mr. ILSLEY: It could not be changed by departmental regulation.

Mr. JACKMAN: It depends on how you interpret four per cent of the income.

Mr. ILSLEY: Income is income, and I think four per cent is pretty good. It was five per cent, and we have brought it down to four; I think that is low enough.

Section agreed to.

Sections 5 and 6 agreed to.

On section 7—Amount refundable.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have an amendment to move, Mr. Chairman, that the word "less" in line 7 on page 8 of the bill be deleted and the word "before" be substituted therefor. The necessity for this is obvious. It is hardly more than the correction of an obvious error.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I move accordingly, Mr. Chairman.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 8.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): There are two points I should like to raise in the interest of clarification—I hope it is clarification. I suggest that the word "taxable" be inserted before the word "income" in line 32 of page 8 of the bill. If I understand it aright, the income referred to would be taxable income, but as it reads now, it refers to the income of the company calculated in accordance with this act. That may have no other meaning than taxable income, but if I am right the insertion of the word "taxable" would make it clear. The next paragraph reads:

(ii) the income of the company in each of the said periods that was not liable to taxation under this act.

It has been suggested to me that that might in certain cases include capital gains, and I cannot believe that that was intended. Therefore I suggest that after the word "Act" in line 40 the following words be added: "other than income arising out of the sale or other disposition of a capital asset." That would make it clear. My suggestion is that although that is not taxable income, in certain circumstances it might be deemed income and therefore the addition of these words could only be in the interest of clarification.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall have to take time to look at this amendment. I could not settle it one way or the other in a minute. Does the hon. gentleman want to let the section stand, and go on?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): That is quite satisfactory to me.

Mr. ILSLEY: If this is going on again after eight o'clock we can look at it in the meantime. But we had better just let the part headed "94" stand.

Mr. JACKMAN: What is the position with regard to earned surplus before 1917?

Mr. ILSLEY: As we propose it, the earned surplus before 1917 comes out free of tax on a winding up.

Mr. JACKMAN: Under the present law, does it?

Mr. ILSLEY: Under the interpretation of the present law. That is the way it has always been interpreted. Capital surplus of course comes out free on a winding up. Earned income, the surplus accumulated prior to 1917, if it comes out in the form of dividends, is taxable and remains taxable; and the surplus between 1917 and 1939 can come out, under the provisions of the Ives report, at these limited rates of taxation.

Mr. JACKMAN: What type of surplus will come out free on winding up? All surpluses?

Mr. ILSLEY: All capital surplus comes out free on winding up, no matter when it was accumulated.

Mr. JACKMAN: Earned surplus?

Mr. ILSLEY: Earned surplus prior to 1917 comes out free on winding up. All surplus up to date, both capital and income, has been taxable if taken out in the form of dividends. That is, the administration have not gone behind the dividend, to see where it came from; they have just taxed the dividend. Now it is proposed to change that in respect of the period from 1917 to 1939, and that is all it is proposed to do at this stage.

Mr. JACKMAN: It is fair that the surplus prior to 1917, when there were no taxes on income, should come out free on winding up; when the principal proprietor dies we do not want to wind up the company and create unemployment. The whole purpose of this new provision is to make it possible for the chief proprietor to pay his succession duties, or the estate to pay them for him. It may be that the company was largely built up prior to 1917; it may be that new developments in the industry which other competitors did not have had resulted in not very large accumulations since that time. Would it make any difference to the minister if permission at least were given to include the pre-1917 surplus under the provision of the section we are now discussing? If there is any equity attaching to the equitable distribution of post-1917 surpluses, surely it applies a fortiori to pre-1917 surpluses. Could the option not be given to the corporation to distribute pre-1917 on the same basis as post-1917?

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the argument which the hon. gentleman advanced the other night when the resolution was up: and it is hard to answer, there is no doubt about that. But we are meeting a situation, and I do not want to open the door too wide or go too far. This whole problem arose from the fact that, not from the pre-1917 surplus at all, everybody I think was quite willing to wind up and start with a new company or something of the kind if he could get his surplus out tax free. They can always get their pre-1917 out tax free. What they were worrying about was their surpluses after 1917. The surpluses after 1939 are going to present another problem, which is not dealt with in this bill at all. But we are just dealing with one period here, from 1917 to 1939. For the great majority of companies, at any rate, this I think solves their problems.

Mr. JACKMAN: I am trying to collect a little revenue for the minister in this case. If they wind a company up free, the minister goes on record to this effect; he gives them the option, if they agree to do it, to include the pre-1917 surplus. Under the provisions of this act they are going to pay some tax, some extra money to the crown. Has the minister any objection if the opposition tries to swell his revenues and give that option to people? How can any harm come from it?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The minister thinks that maybe the hon. member is trying to sell him a pup.

Mr. ILSLEY: I suggested that in the discussions. I was told that nobody would do it. He would not pay taxes on that pre-1917 surplus; he would find that he did not have to. All he has to do is to wind up and get out. I was told that.

Mr. JACKMAN: The question has been asked in a number of cases.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): It may be just a question of interpretation, but I should like to ask about something on page 9, reading from the old section 95:

> A dividend received from a private company is not taxable under this act if—

So and so. The question arises, if a shareholder should be in an estate or trust, whether it can be argued—I think it would be a close legal point—that the dividend would still be free from tax in the hands of the beneficiary. It seems to me that the tail should go with the hide, but if there is any doubt about it perhaps it could be made clear. It may be that a statement to that effect, if it were made now, would be sufficient.

Mr. ILSLEY: The fear is that on the second transfer it might attract the tax?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I was not ingenious enough to think of this myself, but it has been suggested, perhaps because of the great respect in which the ingenuity of the department is held.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, the departmental officials are here and they say they do not intend to raise that point.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): All right.

Mr. GREEN: Section 8 of the bill has been allowed to stand until this evening?

The CHAIRMAN: I think it was agreed that just the section numbered 94, subsection 1, under section 8, would stand, but that the remainder of the clause will carry.

Mr. GREEN: I had two questions to ask the minister. They deal with the new section 96 of the Income War Tax Act. Provision is made in subsection 3 of that section for the manner in which the tax is to be paid: (a) provides that the tax shall be paid on or before December 31, 1946 although the right of election to take advantage of the amendment does not expire until the end of 1947, and (b) provides a second way of paying, namely, by four equal annual instalments, commencing December 31, 1947, together with interest at the rate of four per cent per annum on each instalment from the 31st day of December, 1946 to the date of payment. What is the objection to allowing a company that has not paid by December 31, 1946, to come under the alternative plan and prepay? Suppose in 1948 they are in a position to pay everything? Why should they not be allowed to prepay with interest up to the date of prepayment? The way the provision reads, they are absolutely bound to pay in four equal annual instalments, with interest, and I do not see that there is any harm done by giving them the right to prepay with interest up to the date of prepayment.

Mr. ILSLEY: It may be that is the meaning of the section as drawn, that they cannot prepay. But I am informed by the officials that the standard practice in situations of this kind is to accept prepayment with interest up to the date when they are paid, and that is what they will do in this case.

Mr. GREEN: I think that this could be read by an officer of the department, having to meet the situation, in such a way that he could at least demand payment of interest up to the end of the fourth year. I suggest it would be wise to make it clear that there is a right of prepayment. It states that a private company that has elected to pay the tax under this section either "shall"' pay the tax up to December 31, 1946 or "shall" pay in four equal annual instalments. If words were inserted there giving them the right to prepay it would do away with any uncertainty.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have no objection; we can draft something.

Mr. GREEN: There is another point in connection with this section. There is a question whether or not the net amount of surplus available after the tax is paid can be retained by the company as a tax-free fund. The position may be such that the company cannot finance payment out by way of dividend at that particular time and would have to hold the net amount of surplus. Would it be permissible to hold that net amount as a tax-free fund?

Mr. ILSLEY: They can hold that part of the surplus as long as they wish. It is tax-free. They do not have to pay taxes on it again.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): On the top of page 10 reference is made to regulations. A private company may elect in such manner as may be prescribed by regulations. Can these regulations be got out as soon as possible? It would be a great convenience for those who have to make a decision if they could have the regulations at the earliest possible day.

Mr. ILSLEY: My colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, has duly noted that request.

Mr. JACKMAN: It would save trouble in the future if the committee took a moment or two longer to consider a practical example that has been sent to me. The matter may be simple enough under the regulations, but for the sake of clarity I should like to have the minister's opinion. I quote:

> It should be set forth in the amendment that disbursements made in 1940 and subsequent years shall not be deducted from the surplus balance as at December 1, 1939, unless distributions from 1940 onwards were not earned.

That is satisfactorily answered in the section, I believe, that if deductions from earned surplus were made since December 31, 1939, for various corporate reasons those deductions will not serve to reduce for purposes of this section the total amount of earned surplus at balance December 31, 1939, unless they were earned.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is that clear from the section.

Mr. JACKMAN: I have not had a chance to give it much consideration. It is a long and complicated section and the experts should be able to advise us

Mr. ILSLEY: If the surplus or part of it is gone, it is not there to base an election on.

Mr. JACKMAN: There has been an arbitrary deduction in the corporate accounting from earned surplus but not through the income accounting. Corporate books are not necessarily kept from the income tax people's point of view of earnings or lack of earnings. You do what you like with your own books, but when it comes to income tax there are certain rules which are laid down and which you have to follow in paying your taxes. But you might have had a certain amount of earned surplus on December 31, 1939 and taken a capital of $10,000 and written it off, because you do not want a capital deficit showing on your balance sheet. It is done all the time. If you operate under this section, are you going to be prejudiced because of your own arbitrary action. or is your earned surplus what it was really, the earned surplus of 1939? Perhaps the minister will answer that question.

Mr. ILSLEY: Let me read over 96 (1):

A private company may elect in such manner as may be prescribed by regulations, on or before the 31st day of December, nineteen hundred and forty-seven, to be assessed and pay a tax, computed in the manner set out in subsection two of this section, on an amount equal to its undistributed income on hand at the end of its nineteen hundred and thirty-nine fiscal period or its undistributed income on hand at the end of the fiscal period that terminates nearest the time when it so elects, whichever is the lesser.

If the undistributed income has been reduced after the end of the fiscal period of 1939 then it is the lesser sum and only that which is subject to the election. Is that not correct? I do not quite understand it.

Mr. JACKMAN: I understand the way the minister read it. The point is that the amount of undistributed income may be something entirely different from earned surplus. I put the proposition that there was an arbitrary deduction from the earned surplus allowed for capital deficit in order that the books would look right to the shareholders. The people who want to get their money out under this section should not be prejudicially affected by that arbitrary action on their part. Perhaps consideration might be given to the question and an answer brought down at eight o'clock.

I should like to present another case that was put to me. The earned surplus of this company in January, 1917, was $5,000. I understand that that remains exactly where it stood and cannot be brought in under the operation of this section. The earned profits between 1917 and 1939 were $38,000. Capital losses were realized to the amount of $8,000, and for the purposes of the company itself the earned surpluses show a net of $30,000. Then capital profits of $5,000 were realized. Whether or not they were actually added to earned surplus I do not know; they ought to have been. That gives an amount of $40,000, which could be distributed although not necessarily distributed under this section. The questions asked are these: To operate under the bill would the company be permitted to distribute first $40,000, which is the total of the pre-1917 earned surplus and the surplus arising in between and the result of the capital gains and losses; second, $38,000 being the earned profits between 1917 and 1939, or only $30,000 which represents the actual earnings less capital losses and not the capital gains? We might have an answer to these questions at eight o'clock.

Mr. ILSLEY: This is the same example that was given when the resolution was before us.

Mr. JACKMAN: That is right.

Mr. ILSLEY: The company in question had an earned surplus of $38,000 built up in the period 1917 to 1939. In the same period the company had a capital loss of $8,000. In a subsequent period, presumably after 1939. the company realized a capital profit of $5,000.

Mr. JACKMAN: The time is not stated. Does it make any difference?

Mr. ILSLEY: I took it from what the hon. gentleman said just now that the capital—

Mr. JACKMAN: Perhaps we might have it both ways, if it is not too much trouble.

Mr. ILSLEY: The capital profit was before 1939? I do not see how it could be because there was a capital loss of $8,000 between 1917 and 1939.

Mr. JACKMAN: We will assume it was after.

Mr. ILSLEY: The pre-1917 surplus was $5,000. The question is, what amount would the company pay taxes on? According to the present proposals the company would pay taxes on $30,000; that is, the $38,000 earned in the period 1917 to 1939, less any capital losses in the same period, which in this case were $8,000, leaving $30,000 surplus. The capital profit realized after the period 1917 to 1939 will not be applied in a reduction of the capital losses made in that period.

Mr. JACKMAN: If the capital profit had been realized prior to 1939 the amount distributable would be $35,000. Then you would be able to add it back to offset the $8,000 capital loss.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right, $38,000 less $3,000, leaving $35,000.

Mr. JACKMAN: The first letter I read raised the whole question of capital losses being deducted from earned surpluses. That is also involved in this question, although it is not quite the same.

Mr. ILSLEY: Did the hon. gentleman get a full answer?

Mr. JACKMAN: Yes. The answer is that $30,000 are distributable and $5,000 is not allowed to be counted, because it is presumed it is after the deadline date.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. The other $5,000 is prior to 1917. That does not come into it either.

Mr. McMASTER: What is the implication of this phrase:

—at the end of its nineteen hundred and thirty-nine fiscal period or its undistributed income on hand at the end of the fiscal period that terminates nearest the time when it so elects.

Does that mean that this company can elect which time it will come under this section, either 1939 or 1945?

Mr. IILSLEY: No. This only applies to the earned surplus during the period 1917 to 1939, and this section makes the termination period the termination of the fiscal period of the company in 1939.

Mr. McMASTER: If the minister had not told me I should not have read it in that way. It does not say so. It says nearest to the year 1939.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Line 7 explains it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. That is a case where they have lost some of their surplus after 1939 and they have a lesser sum to distribute.

Mr. McMASTER: What about the profits they have added since then?

Mr. ILSLEY: Profits are not added. That would be surplus accumulated after 1939.

Mr. McMASTER: From the way I read it, it would look as though they could elect either the January, 1939, period or the last period.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is whichever amount is the lesser.

The CHAIRMAN: Do I understand that it is the wish of the committee that section 95 of part XVIII carries, and that sections 94 and 96 stand?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): May I ask one question to clear up the point raised by the hon. member for High Park? This is an addition to the resolution which was before the committee some time ago? Now that the point has been raised, I am wondering whether it is in accordance with the spirit of the resolution.

Mr. ILSLEY: A resolution is always couched in general language, and there are many refinements—

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): But it was up to 1939?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, it was; the earned surplus accumulated by the company from the beginning of its 1917 fiscal period to the end of its 1939 fiscal period.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Then this is a substantial change; if there have been any losses since, then you practically say they have to be taken into account. Is that the effect of it?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. McMASTER: But suppose there were immense profits since then. Apparently a company can take the lesser one, which would be to the end of the year 1939. Are they not supposed to pay taxes on what they have made since then?

Mr. ILSLEY: If they lost money after 1939 they have to take it off their surplus.

Mr. McMASTER: But suppose they had a profit?

Mr. ILSLEY: They do not add it on, because we are not dealing with the disposition of surpluses accumulated after 1939.

Mr. McMASTER: It does not say so here.

Mr. ILSLEY: But we are not dealing with it; that is the whole idea.

Mr. McMASTER: It is this act that will have to be interpreted, not just what is said in this committee. I do not see where it says that it only deals with profits up to that time. If it does say so, I should like the minister to let me know.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I do not want to labour the point, but it does seem to me that this is introducing something quite foreign to the Ives report. Am I right in that?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I do not think so.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): And it seems to me it is going beyond the resolution. I should like to be clear on that.

Resolution 8 says, "accumulated by the company from the beginning of its 1917 to the end of its 1939 fiscal period."

Mr. ILSLEY: Where are they to get this money to distribute?

Mr. JACKMAN: Don't you worry.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not enough knowledge of business to understand where they will get it. This is to facilitate the distribution of earned surplus during that period.

Mr. JACKMAN: The surpluses have lost their identity. They are in bricks and mortar and working capital. There is no identity of surpluses in a company.

Mr. ILSLEY: You cannot put your finger on any part of the assets that you can say represents surplus, but you know the amount of the surplus at the end of the 1939 fiscal period. If they have a smaller surplus at the time they elect, that is all there is to distribute as a result of that 1917-39 period.

Mr. JACKMAN: Surpluses are pretty arbitrary things. They have to do largely with taxation, not with the actualities of business.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I want to be sure I understand this. We are now in the year 1945. When this measure comes into operation some time subsequent to this a company will elect. As I understood the resolution, we were allowing them to elect to take certain action in respect of the earned surplus accumulated by the company from the beginning of its 1917 fiscal period to the end of its 1939 fiscal period. Now, apparently the result is that if it has had any losses since 1939, then the distributable surplus, which under resolution 8 was a certain sum at the end of 1939, is now a lesser sum.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): It is still not clear to me why it was thought necessary, because this is a substantial change in the recommendation of the Ives commission, is it not? It is not clear to me why this is put in.

Mr. ILSLEY: Part of it is gone; that is all.

Mr. McMASTER: I am a new member of the house, and I have no doubt everyone who has spoken on this, except myself, has some knowledge of companies and what is intended. I have not that knowledge, but I have enough imagination to believe that during the years some companies have kept undistributed surpluses on which they have not paid income tax. Now they find that the income taxes are to be very considerable for years to come, and they are trying to get an easy way out to distribute these surpluses. The minister must have knowledge of some of these companies, and I should like his statement that this is a fair amount that is being charged these companies under this section.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am just taking the recommendation of the Ives commission. It is impossible to say whether it is a fair amount; it is just a matter of judgment.

Mr. JACKMAN: The minister will admit that some cases cried out for relief, as he said himself one session.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: I put the case to him once and he said I had put it somewhat modestly, because these companies cried to heaven for relief.

Mr. ILSLEY: Something had to be done. I am satisfied that the treasury will gain substantially by passing this legislation, because otherwise these companies will not pay the taxes; they will do something else, sell their shares to the public or something and we shall not get any revenue at all if the tax is too heavy. The combination of succession duty and high income tax was such that it made it impossible in some cases for people to pay the taxes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I do not want to persist further in this, but for the sake of clarity would the minister allow this section to stand over until eight o'clock, and perhaps let us have another word on it then?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. I was to answer that question concerning section 96 (1) then.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): That is right.

Mr. ILSLEY: Then I think the situation is that section 95 is carried and sections 94 and 96 stand.

Section stands.

On section 9—Family allowances.

Mr. McMASTER: Perhaps this might be allowed to stand also, because I should like to speak to some of the minister's officials in regard to it. I have taken some figures at random and made some computations, and it strikes me that the amounts you are taking back under this arbitrary formula do not anywhere approach what should be taken back if it is worked out finely. That is, in some of the lower brackets you are taking back perhaps too little, but in some of the higher brackets you are not taking back too much. It all arises from the fact that a man may have three children between the ages of eight and sixteen, for whom he would be receiving $8 a month each, while another man with three children under the age of five would receive only $6 a month each. I have worked out figures concerning both extremes, and in no case do they nearly approximate the amount that should be recovered from the taxpayer. In almost every case the difference is against the taxpayer.

Mr. ILSLEY: Against the treasury, do you mean?

Mr. McMASTER: Take the man with an income of $2,790; the amount you will recover from him will be $330 instead of $318.80, if my figures are correct. That is a man with young children. A man with older children will pay $411 when he should pay only $382, if my figures are correct. The man with an income of $2,810 will pay $349.70 when he should pay only $323.60. The man with the older family will pay $441.50; and should pay only $389.20. Of course, as all understand, by fixing an arbitrary amount such as $2,800 to make the breaking point, the man who makes $2,810 will actually lose the $20 he would have earned over and above $2,790 and also something extra. He is contributing more to the treasury.

There is this discrepancy which I have mentioned, and in some cases it amounts to $30 or $40. If I am wrong in this I should like to be corrected.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think that is so. There might be a few cases where there is over-recovery. In most cases, however, under these tables—in fact, in practically all cases—there is under-recovery.

Mr. McMASTER: My figures might be wrong. Let us consider the amount of $2,500. The same applies there. A recovery of $254.60 is made, where the tax should be only $228. Then, in respect of the older family there is a recovery of $324 where the tax should be only $282.

Mr. ILSLEY: I should like to let the hon. member have an opportunity to discuss it. However, this is an endless job. Nothing has taken more time, in proportion to the space occupied by the result, than has this. We spent weeks in an effort to have these tables as fair as possible. To get the tax value for each child is a most difficult task, because it varies with the number of dependents over eighteen, as well as with those under eighteen. It is different just over $1,200 from what it is higher up in the scale. This is a highly complicated and baffling task.

Then, of course, the family allowance value of children varies, depending upon the age and to a certain extent upon the size of the family. All those variations have to be taken into consideration, and the table evolved must be as fair as possible. However, both these tables lean heavily to the side of the taxpayer and against the treasury.

Mr. McMASTER: I did not think so, but I am ready to be convinced by one of the officers in the department.

Mr. LESAGE: This whole question in connection with the relationship between the deduction for children and family allowances is most complicated. As a matter of fact, the whole income tax system at the present time is too complicated, and it is hoped that after the dominion-provincial conference has reached an agreement the system will be simplified.

In connection with the matter of deductions for children, may I draw the attention of the committee to the fact that under the present system of deductions from the tax rather than from income the taxpayer with a family is placed in an unfair position. For every married man with children and every married man without children the net non-taxable or non-compressible income is $1,200. This, of course, is true, except for the normal tax.

I submit with respect that the rate of taxation should be imposed only over and above the minimum necessary to each one, according to his family responsibilities or, if we put it in this way, according to the number of dependents for whom he has a right to claim deduction. It is a false principle to set the same non-compressible and non-taxable income of $1,200 for all married men, and then to impose equal rates for what is earned over and above that $1,200, with only an arbitrary deduction of $108 for each dependent.

What is strictly necessary to rear a child should not be taxable. If it is taxable the father of a family must then accept a lower standard of living. After a little calculation, we arrive at the conclusion that the more children a man has, the higher his rate of income tax with respect to the strict necessities of life. For fathers with children in colleges or universities the situation is unbearable. I, for one, would not be here to-day if the present system of deductions had existed before the war. I would not be here, nor would I be a lawyer, because I could not have gone to university. My father received only an average salary, on which he educated five sons, and it was only after great sacrifice that on his income he was able to give the five of us college and university degrees. But to-day that would be completely impossible.

Has any thought been given to the possibility of going back to the system of deductions from income instead of deductions from the tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, a great deal of thought has been given to it, and may I say that I agree that that system is more desirable than the present one—with certain modifications. Before bringing down the budget this year, we worked out a new tax structure, and considered carefully the question whether that new structure should be introduced at this session. However, for the reasons I stated when the budget was presented, we thought we should introduce an interim budget having straight percentage deductions.

I think that when a new tax system is introduced that principle, fundamentally, will be adopted, although there will be modifications to take into account the necessary interrelationship between allowances to children and family allowances. However, I know at the present time—and of course I cannot make it public just now—the lines along which I intend to proceed. There will be much difference of opinion as to whether that is the proper one. However, we have had continual trouble with this system of tax credits for children because, time after time, hon. members have argued that the tax credit per child was not sufficient for its support. The answer is that it was never intended to be sufficient to support a child.

The principle enunciated just now by the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet is much nearer the proper principle; that is, that the deduction from income which is fixed should be sufficient to support the child. And it has been argued, I believe correctly, that the tax credit we allow is, at the rate of our taxes, greater for most children than a $400 deduction from income. For a good many children that is so. It is hard to get the public to understand why, if you are allowing a tax credit to a parent in respect of a child, you should not allow a tax credit high enough for him to support a child on that tax credit. Of course, when a person looks into it, that is ridiculous. It would mean that if you had a two per cent income tax instead of a forty per cent income tax, the tax credit would perhaps be only ten dollars and yet the parent would be much better off. The principle that was originally incorporated in our Income War Tax Act was an exemption of $400 for each child. Whether the tax rates were high or low that $400 exemption was always there, and people argued about that $400 just as they argue about the $108. The fact was that that $400 was taken from income and the $108 is a deduction from the tax. But I am glad to have the hon. member's observations, and they will be given full consideration when we make changes in our income tax system. At the moment at least, I am disposed to agree with the general principle that deduction from income should be taken as the basis of the allowances for children.

Mr. LESAGE: In the lower income brackets the deduction of $108 from the tax amounts to more than the $400 deduction from income. I have not the exact figures, but I know that around $2,500 and higher incomes the $108 amounts to less than the $400 exemption per child, and I was drawing the attention of the committee to salary incomes of over $2,500, to those fathers of families who are sending their sons to college and university.

Mr. ILSLEY: When I say that I accept the principle I wish to emphasize that it will be with qualifications, because I would not feel like going back to a system under which people with high incomes got an unqualified deduction from their income of so much per child for income tax purposes.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I should like to reiterate the stand which this group has always taken in connection with income tax exemption levels before the income tax is applied. We believe that the present exemptions are too low. We believe that for married persons the exemption should be at least $2,000 and, for single persons, $1,000. I do not think we need to consider very long to realize the necessity for that. Only this afternoon we had the Prime Minister telling us how necessary it is that members of this house should have their income raised. The rest of the people of the country are in no more fortunate position than we are, and the post-war years will, I think, show our greatest danger to be deflation; that is, sufficient purchasing power may not be in the hands of the people who need it most. One of the surest ways of increasing purchasing power would be to reduce the amount taken away from them in taxation; in other words, to leave more spending power in the hands of the people. Therefore I would urge upon the minister the desirability of raising the exemption levels to at least $2,000 for married people and $1,000 for single.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman's representations will be given consideration. The revenue loss would be simply enormous, as my hon. friend perhaps will appreciate, if we were to do that.

Mr. BROOKS: With regard to the refundable portion, does this mean that the situation with reference to mortgages and agreements for sale under 7A of sections 93 and 94 is now cancelled?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is still in the act, but no refundable taxes are collected. Therefore this kind of off-set against taxes is dead.

Mr. BROOKS: So that it simply means nothing? It is in the act but has no effect?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

On section 12—Deduction in respect of 1945.

Mr. McMASTER: Has the minister given consideration to the fact that 16⅔ per cent is easier to calculate than 16 per cent, being exactly one-sixth?

On section 13—Certain transactions in province of Alberta bonds.

Mr. JACKMAN: This is the first time that we have had incorporated in our taxation system a tax on capital gains. There may have been tax losses in this period on these securities. Does the minister say that the rule works both ways?

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

INCREASE IN APPROPRIATION FOR LOANS AND GUARANTEES

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of bill No. 239, to amend the National Housing Act, 1944.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—"Cooperative housing project".

Mr. NICHOLSON: Would the minister make some explanation of this section?

Mr. ILSLEY: This is a new definition. Subsection 3 of section 4 of the main act enables loans to be made for the construction of a cooperative housing project on the same terms as loans are made to home owners. Subsection 3 provides that each shareholder of a corporation or beneficiary under a trust deed shall have possession of a housing unit. The subsection does not, however, specify the percentage of the units which must be owned by shareholders or beneficiaries under a trust deed. The new definition covers this omission and provides that at least seventy-five per cent of the units are to be leased to shareholders or beneficiaries, as the case may be.

Mr. BRUCE: I wish to take advantage of this amendment to put in a plea with the minister to assist the university of Toronto to get what is known as the Eglinton Hunt club quarters for housing for student veterans of this war who will enter for the next session, 1946. We are very short of housing in the city of Toronto. If these buildings could be obtained it would relieve living accommodation for other citizens. Therefore I ask the minister if he will use his best efforts to have the air force who are now occupying this building, in part only, give it up for the purposes of the university.

Mr. MacNICOL: That will be for students?

Mr. BRUCE: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Is the hon. member personally satisfied that the Eglinton club quarters would be all right for the purpose?

Mr. BRUCE: Yes. It has been investigated by the superintendent of buildings of the university who has reported that it would suit admirably for housing a large number of returned veteran students.

Mr. MACKENZIE: How many?

Mr. BRUCE: I think it would take about 400, perhaps 450 who otherwise would have no place to live. A thorough canvas has been made of possible living quarters without success. We have had to take Ajax, as the minister probably knows, and this will be filled to capacity next year. I urge upon the government to vacate this building and make it available for veteran students.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the students have individual rooms, or would there be large community rooms, dormitories, to accommodate them?

Mr. BRUCE: I think there are both, but it does not matter much. The crying need is accommodation for our students, and this building is near the university where they attend lectures.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will look into that situation. I do not know the terms under which the government has the premises, whether they have a lease—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: —or how long a lease it is.

Mr. BRUCE: My recollection is that it was purchased by the government. The government has control.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the government has purchased it, when the department using it find it no longer necessary for their purposes they declare it surplus, and then War Assets Corporation disposes of it. I was going to say that that was the situation at Ajax, but I am not right about that, because I do not think one of the service departments had that development at Ajax. I think that was an arrangement made by the Department of Munitions and Supply or the Department of Reconstruction with the university of Toronto.

Mr. BRUCE: I hope a similar arrangement may be made with respect to the use of this building as was made by the Minister of Munitions and Supply with the university for the use of the Ajax building near Pickering. There should be no difficulty in that regard. I do not think it would come under the classification to which the minister refers.

Mr. MACKENZIE: At the present time a committee of the various presidents of Canadian universities is studying the very problem which the hon. member has just mentioned, and I am sure that they will make recommendations along these lines to the government.

Mr. FLEMING: I think the committee ought to be aware of the fact that certain answers on this subject were tabled to-day in reply to questions I had asked with regard to the intended disposal of these buildings. I happen to know the situation well, because I live a matter of only half a dozen blocks from this No. 1 I.T.S. property. It is the old Eglinton Hunt club. It was purchased by the government in the early days of the war, and the buildings were gradually extended, particularly the dormitory accommodation; but in the answers tabled to-day the Minister of National Defence for Air made it quite clear that it was the government's intention to retain the buildings and not dispose of any part of them, because they had several uses for them. I have not the answers before me now, but there was not any hope held out there for their disposal.

A number of organizations in North Toronto and elsewhere have been greatly interested in this building because among other things it is highly suitable for a community centre, and there is great need in our city for community centres. I do not believe, even if the government found it surplus, it should be hastily, disposed of. There are a number of people who would be interested in bidding on it for worthy community purposes. In any event, the answers made to-day by the Minister of National Defence for Air did not leave any hope that the buildings or the property would not be required for government use.

Mr. FERGUSON: There are any number of buildings at Camp Borden which are not being used by the air force and are now vacant. They formerly accommodated personnel of the air force, but the troops have moved from there. I would suggest that the government might use those buildings and vacate quite easily the building in Toronto. They would be welcomed back to Camp Borden.

Mrs. STRUM: Before this section is carried there are a few remarks I should like to make about the whole subject of housing. In this country we have not taken advantage of the whole situation in regard to the construction of homes. Other countries have done much better than we have in the field of housing. I refer particularly to New Zealand, where in 1939 I saw houses built by the government. To me it was a most shameful thing that we would allow our lumber to stand in piles in the mills of British Columbia; while the termites were eating our lumber there, we had people unemployed; we had slums; we had stagnation and social decay. Yet in New Zealand they were able to build new homes by the thousand with our timber, and they did so because they really attacked the problem of housing in the manner in which it deserves to be attacked. I sat in the office of the minister of housing, who at that time was Mr. Armstrong, and he told me he was the happiest man in the cabinet because he had more money than he could spend. They had set up a separate department, and the appropriation was so generous that they were able to absorb all the labour available for the building of homes in New Zealand.

At the time I visited there early in 1939 they had just brought over 200 workmen from Australia, because they had exhausted all the available labour supply for building homes in New Zealand. They had brought these 200 carpenters in to assist in the housing project. I had forgotten a few of the details because it is five or six years since I was there; but consulting with the high commissioner to-day, I found that their money was provided at one and a half per cent. They were given an appropriation from their central bank and their housing corporation undertook the construction of houses. These were not considered to be temporary structures but good for sixty years. Only the best materials were used.

The corporation buys a piece of land and undertakes housing development, and on the basis of town planning these houses are laid out in blocks. There are no two alike in a block. They avoid monotony in design and material, and the houses are planned in relation to the whole development. They consider that they can afford to charge low rentals, because over a period of sixty years these houses will have paid for themselves and replaced the money invested in them.

The houses were a joy to behold from the outside, and on the inside they were very well planned. I found, in discussing the project with the minister, that they had invited all the architects of New Zealand to submit plans and had chosen a number of designs in units of one, two or three bedrooms. At that time they did not undertake anything larger than three-bedroom units, but since then they have undertaken the construction of apartment blocks for single business people and for married couples without children as well as for old age and blind pensioners. They are putting up these apartments for the convenience of people who need limited housing. But they are also, in their larger houses, continuing to build the larger units with the idea of giving a priority to families with children.

There are two fields here where there is a great need. It is criminal that we should penalize the mother with children. It is a dreadful thing that the mother, who is making the biggest contribution of all to her country, should find it so difficult to get a roof under which to shelter her children. Yet one has only to try to find living accommodation to discover to what an extent children are feared and abhorred and what a penalty we put upon the mother with children.

Last year in the city of Regina I started to look for living accommodation. My family had a high school girl, a child already in grade ten. I found that even children in high school are considered a menace if you are looking for a place in which to live. I do not know what would have happened if I had had a child in a perambulator.

In this country we should definitely give priority to all the mothers who have young children. We should definitely build homes and subsidize rentals for widows with children and for old age pensioners. These are two features which will remain part of our economy. We have started to pay pensions and will continue to do so. We have started to pay mother's allowances to take care of widowed mothers who have children to bring up. These are two groups who, because of their lack of income, cannot pay the rentals that will give them decent homes. These are two fields in which we should definitely subsidize rentals, so that those people who are in such an unfavourable bargaining position may have decent homes.

When I was in New Zealand people said to me, "I suppose everyone in Canada has a lovely home?" I wondered why they assumed that we all had lovely homes, and they said, "Well, this is your timber; we are building our homes with your timber." We in this country, who have so much timber, who have metals and all the things that go into the making of plumbing and fixtures, furniture, draperies and floor coverings, we, who can build and equip and furnish homes from our own resources, have no excuse for having so many of our people living under the wretched conditions in which we find them.

I wish we would show the same concern for the living accommodation of others that we show when it comes to our own incomes. I wish I could hear a howl of welcome going up in this house to any suggestion about improving the living conditions of our people comparable with the one we heard this morning over the bill for increasing our own indemnity. I wish we would be as enthusiastic about our mothers and children, about our old age pensioners and about people whose condition is so desperate, as we are in regard to people who have some money to put into annuities. If we did that we would never be content until we had a separate department of housing and a generous appropriation that would enable us to embark upon the construction of homes, using the materials of which we have such a generous supply and the workmen who need employment.

Mr. REID: Will the hon. member be good enough to tell the committee what these houses in New Zealand rent at and what wages are paid to the workmen who build them?

Mrs. STRUM: Yes. May I quote briefly from an address given last night by Mr. Syd Tasker of New Zealand:

New Zealand has "thousands" of houses which are owned by the state and rented at an average of $20 a month, Syd Tasker of the New Zealand War Supply Mission told members of the Gyro Club, Wednesday night.

Mr. REID: But will the hon. member tell us what the size of the house is? When I quote from a newspaper I am challenged. I should like to know the size of the house and the wages.

Mrs. STRUM: I have a report on housing by the department of housing construction, which I would recommend to the hon. member for New Westminster.

Mr. REID: I will recommend some to my hon. friend too.

Mrs. STRUM: This gives a survey of the whole problem. There is something else I was very much interested in, and that was the plan that the New Zealand government has for training returned men in the building trades. In a little booklet called "Korero", on page 23 there appears an outline of a programme for reconstruction and training under which servicemen are paid and trained in the building trades. While they learn their trade, they are paid wages and are building homes for themselves. This booklet gives a survey of the whole undertaking.

Mr. REID: What are the wages paid?

Mrs. STRUM: I quote from page 21:

During training each man is paid £5 5s. a week for the first eight months, and thereafter £5 7s. 6d. a week. A basic kit of tools supplied by the department is paid off by the trainee by small weekly instalments out of his wages over the first period of his training.

It goes into the whole scheme. These people are learning to build houses. They build a completed house during their course of training. At the end of their training period they go into the building industry, join a trade union and go on the standard rate.

Mr. REID: I do not want to enter into this debate, but as one who takes more pride in this country than in any other, I wish to remind the hon. member that the wages paid work out to $50 a month, and when you pay $20 a month rent that is a pretty high rental to pay on such low wages.

Mr. BENTLEY: I should like to remind the hon. minister for New Westminster—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. REID: It does not make any difference what I am called.

[Mr. Reid.]

Mr. BENTLEY: That is right. I should like to remind the hon. member for New Westminster that we have passed a measure in this house and have under consideration now certain definite arrangements to pay $50 a month to some people in this country during the process of rehabilitation. These are heroes; some of them will likely wear medals. Therefore I think the hon. member was ill-advised to bring up the question of wages.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I ask the hon. member one question? Is there one country in the world which pays as much for rehabilitation benefits as we do?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The hon. member did not want the country to know that.

Mr. BENTLEY: I should like to advise the committee that I was replying to a question of the hon. member—

Mr. MACKENZIE: I ask you another one.

Mr. BENTLEY: Not yet. The hon. member for New Westminster was dealing with wages, and I am pointing out that wages is an important form of income for a lot of people.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I repeat my question? Does the hon. member know of any country in the world that pays as much for out-of-work benefits or rehabilitation benefits as Canada?

Mr. BENTLEY: I shall answer that question after a while. I have the floor at the present time. The matter of wages does not enter into that. The hon. member for New Westminster asked the hon. member for Qu'Appelle whether the wages over there were over $50 a month. I wish to point out that a large section of our population will be asked to live on and pay rent with that amount of money. That has nothing to do with whether it is comparable or not with what is paid to veterans in other countries and here.

Mrs. STRUM: I should like to say that it is £5. 5s. a week for the first eight months and thereafter £5. 7s. 6d. a week.

Mr. MACKENZIE: In New Zealand currency.

Mrs. STRUM: Yes.

Mr. BENTLEY: That buys bread and butter in New Zealand.

Mrs. STRUM: In comparing the economy of New Zealand there are two or three things that many of us have not yet grasped. New Zealand is about the size of Saskatchewan. It is a country of a million and a half people. They lack minerals; they have not a drop of oil; they must import all of their oil products; they import their metals; they have very little coal and very little timber. They live on the export market. When you compare the economy of Canada with that of New Zealand you are comparing two things that are not comparable because we have so much more than they have. We should be able to do so much more than they are doing because their economy is necessarily limited by their resources.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I wish to say just one word. As one who is proud to be a Canadian, may I say I am sick and tired of hearing hon. members quoting New Zealand and saying that it has so much more virtue than Canada. As a matter of fact, we are far ahead of New Zealand in many respects. I am reminded of George Canning's famous phrase:

A sturdy patriot of the world, alone friend of every country but his own.

Mrs. STRUM: I do not want to be misunderstood or to give the impression that I think Canada is not a good country.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The very best in the world.

Mrs. STRUM: But I do say this, that in the commonwealth of nations New Zealand has pioneered as a legislative laboratory. New Zealand was the first country in the world to pay old age pensions. New Zealand was the first country to give women the vote—that may or may not have been a good thing. If there is anything that any part of the commonwealth has done that we can profit from we should be big enough to admit that and use its experience to our own advantage. We have so much more here than New Zealand can ever have that I think we would be well advised to use it as they have done.

Mr. REID: My name has been mentioned in the discussion and I think I have the right to reply in order to keep the record straight. My chief reason in rising to ask a question about wages in New Zealand was that if a man pays $20 a month rent for a home and receives only $80 a month in wages, one wonders how he can carry on. My sole reason in asking about wages was to draw a comparison between what they are charged for rent and what they earn.

The CHAIRMAN: May I remind the committee that we are considering a bill to amend the National Housing Act. I have given considerable latitude in discussion, but I think the committee should now confine itself to a discussion of this bill.

Mr. FLEMING: Section 1 of the bill introduces a definition of cooperative housing projects. What I am interested in is, what substantive provisions in the act are contemplated with reference to cooperative housing projects? A new definition is introduced here, and I do not find in the other sections of the bill any detailed provision for what is to happen with regard to cooperative housing projects.

Mr. ILSLEY: Cooperative housing projects qualify, at the present time, for home ownership loans under the National Housing Act. This is just to define what a cooperative housing project is.

Mr. FLEMING: There is no word about it in the other section of this bill, no detailed provision.

Mr. ILSLEY: No; this is an amendment to the housing act.

Mr. FLEMING: That is what I am speaking of.

Mr. ILSLEY: The National Housing Act refers to it. Section 4, subsection 3, of the National Housing Act reads:

Notwithstanding anything contained in the two last preceding subsections, a joint loan may be made by His Majesty and an approved lending institution with which His Majesty has entered into a contract under this section to a trustee or corporation constituted or incorporated for the purpose of constructing and managing a cooperative housing project if—

Certain conditions are complied with. There is no definition of a cooperative housing project. This gives a definition of it.

Mr. FLEMING: There is no other provision in the new bill with reference to a cooperative housing project.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. FLEMING: The amendment is simply to define the existing terms of the old act?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. NICHOLSON: This does not make sense to me. The bill says:

Section 2 of the National Housing Act, 1944, chapter 46 of the statutes of 1944-45, is amended by adding thereto after paragraph 5 the following paragraph.

I cannot see where this fits into the present act.

Mr. ILSLEY: Section 2 is the interpretation section of the National Housing Act. Subsection 5 defines contractor and section 5 (a) will define cooperative housing project. It is put in alphabetical order; that is all.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Can the minister give us any information as to what will happen when this section comes into force? Are we likely to get some action in the field of housing?

Mr. ILSLEY: Cooperative housing projects may borrow under the housing act. They are expected to do so. I am told that one loan has been made, to one project.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Would the minister say where it is?

Mr. ILSLEY: In Ottawa.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Would the minister indicate whether a cooperative farm, for example, wishing to embark on a cooperative housing programme, would be eligible for a loan under the act now that this section has been added?

Mr. ILSLEY: Is this a cooperative farm with a number of houses on it?

Mr. NICHOLSON: We will say there are to be ten houses on the cooperative farm which they wish built as a unit, where they might have central heating and lighting.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that would be eligible.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What would be the procedure; how would they go about securing the loan?

Mr. ILSLEY: They apply to a lending institution, and the national housing administration contributes its share when the plans are passed and the loan is made, the same as with other loans under the act. Instead of lending to an individual, you lend to this group.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Without this section it would not have been possible, would it?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, it would have been possible, but this section defines cooperative housing projects. It was already possible under the act to lend to cooperative housing projects, but there was no definition of them.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Did I understand the minister to say that one such loan had been made in the city of Ottawa?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. GILLIS: Does this measure supersede or interfere with already established provincial acts in the field of housing?

Mr. ILSLEY: It does not interfere with them.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—"Cost of construction."

Mr. FLEMING: This section is designed apparently to put into statutory form one of the amendments provided by P.C. 392. We see introduced the words "and carrying charges", but there is no definition in the amending bill or the present act in regard to carrying charges. It seems to me that in a situation of this kind it is highly desirable that there should be a clear definition of the items which enter into carrying charges.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is generally understood to be the interest on money tied up during the period of construction. I am told that the question of preparing a definition was considered, but it was thought to be unnecessary since the term is so well understood.

Mr. FLEMING: With great respect I think there could be room for considerable disagreement as to what should be included under carrying charges. We all think of interest on borrowed money, but one also thinks of insurance, taxes and so on. Then there is depreciation; and what about amortization and so on? With respect I would suggest that this is one term which should be defined. A number of terms are defined in this act; we are introducing one new definition already, and I would urge that this term be also defined.

Mr. ILSLEY: These are the carrying charges during the period of construction, the charges necessary to complete the housing project. What could they be apart from interest on the money?

Mr. FLEMING: What about taxes? What about insurance?

Mr. ILSLEY: It would include that, I think.

Mr. NICHOLSON: In this section reference is made to farm housing. Could the minister give us some information as to just what the present procedure is in making housing available to farm dwellers under the act? I had an inquiry of this kind last summer; a family had their house destroyed by fire. I took up the matter with the department, who advised the family to secure the loan from the local bank, but the local bank did not have any information and was not interested in negotiating a loan. That was in Saskatchewan. What is the machinery through which farmers will work in securing loans for the construction of housing?

Mr. ILSLEY: Under the National Housing Act?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: Just the same as anyone else building a house; the application is made to a lending institution. There have not been many loans to farmers under the National Housing Act. However, the act is available to them if they wish to make such application.

Mr. NICHOLSON: In Saskatchewan, for example, we have no lending institutions which have been handling national housing loans; at least that is the case in my constituency. What provision have we for farmers in the constituency of Mackenzie, we will say, to negotiate loans? Apparently there are no people nearby to inspect the site or to supervise the construction. Will it be possible for people in those areas to obtain loans for the construction of houses?

Mr. ILSLEY: Up to November 30 ninety-two loans had been made in Saskatchewan.

Mr. NICHOLSON: To farmers?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know how many have been made to farmers. The lending has not been large in Saskatchewan, but it is increasing.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Could the minister say whether any loans have been made to farmers?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not that information.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Even apart from farmers the situation last fall was that people in villages of a thousand or fifteen hundred people could not come under this legislation. The lending institutions refused to operate outside the large centres. I know people who were keen to act as agents for some of these companies, people who wanted to build homes themselves and who could have obtained materials for the construction of ten or a dozen houses in towns of eight hundred to a thousand people. They interviewed a number of insurance companies and other lending institutions, who all claimed they would not operate outside large centres. Has anything been done in recent weeks to make money available under this scheme in towns or villages, outside the larger centres, quite apart from farm operations?

Mr. ILSLEY: In the past they have operated to some extent outside the large centres, and there are special inducements under the National Housing Act to encourage them to do so. The assumption of risk by the government is greater in such areas. But the situation is susceptible of much improvement; I will put it in that way. This corporation we are setting up, the central housing and mortgage corporation, has as one of its main functions extending the benefits of the National Housing Act to all areas right across the country. If it is not working; if it is too concentrated in these benefits, I will expect this corporation to make recommendations to me for such steps as may be necessary to remedy the situation. When the bill was before the house previously I think I said that in order to make it work—I was going to say for our own satisfaction but certainly for our own peace of mind—we shall see to it that the benefits of the National Housing Act are not too greatly concentrated in cities.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That is just the point I wished to make, because they simply have not been operating outside the larger centres. That has been the case on the prairies, at any rate, and I was wondering if you were moving to do something about it. I am not blaming anyone because the machinery is not available, but the finance people themselves have refused to operate under it in towns and villages, at least on the prairies, and I am wondering if something could be done to make it available to them.

Mr. ILSLEY: We will do everything we can.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Can the minister tell us how many loans, if any, have been made under the act to farmers in any part of Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: I will try to get that information; I do not have it here.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3 and 4 agreed to.

On section 5—"Low-rental housing project."

Mr. FLEMING: I notice that the words which have been introduced to give the minister power to admit others than families with low incomes to this form of housing do not make any reference to economic rental or lower rental. In other words, in view of the underlined words in the last four lines of this section, apparently it is not open to the minister to rent to veterans' families at anything less than the economic rental. If the minister will refer to the earlier words he will see that the provision calls for leasing to families of low income at the economic rental therefor, or at a lower rental; and then the section goes on to say "or to such other persons", and so on.

Mr. ILSLEY: What was the first provision the hon. member read?

Mr. FLEMING: I am dealing with the underlined words as they appear in the last four lines of section 5, and I am pointing out that at the place they are introduced they follow these words:

at the economic rental therefor, or at a lower rental.

If the minister introduced the new words before those it would have been possible to rent to families of veterans at less than economic rentals. Is it the purpose of the minister under this section not to permit rentals to veterans at less than economic rates? I believe that is the only interpretation the section bears, in its present form.

Mr. ILSLEY: This is a definition of low rentals. It is a definition of "low-rental housing project". That is, it is a housing project undertaken to provide decent, safe and sanitary housing accommodation, and so on.

Mr. LOCKHART: By a municipality.

Mr. FLEMING: It might be a limited dividend housing corporation.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, the section states:

"Low rental housing project" means a housing project undertaken to provide decent, safe and sanitary housing accommodation complying with standards not exceeding those approved by the minister, to be leased to families of low income at the economic rental therefor or at a lower rental or to such other persons as the minister under agreement with the owner may designate, having regard to the existence of a condition of shortage, overcrowding or congestion of housing.

It is to enable him to rent premises to persons not in the low income group, if he considers it necessary to do so. It is designed to enable the leasing to veterans, even though they are not of low income.

Mr. FLEMING: I understand that; but I take it that the purpose of the section is to make it clear that in the case of rentals to veterans' families, they do not qualify as families of low income, as the section now stands.

Mr. ILSLEY: They do not have to be families of low income in order to qualify for these premises.

Mr. FLEMING: All will agree that we want to see every benefit of the act extended to veterans' families. The note makes reference to veterans' families. It may be that the minister intends to pass orders in council or to make regulations which will place that interpretation on the new section. I would point out that if it is intended to make this accommodation available now to veterans' families who are not within the low income group, the statute should make that provision, instead of its being left to become a matter of regulation on the part of the minister. If that is the clear intention, then it should be so expressed.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think that would be too restrictive. It can be provided for in agreements with limited dividend corporations, or other owners. This simply gives the minister some latitude.

Mr. PROBE: It appears to me that the minister, through his holding company, is going to condone a lowering of housing standards, as it is now permitted by progressive municipal bodies. Under such conditions he would permit lower standards of construction?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, that is not so. The object is to see that luxury housing does not qualify for benefits under this section. That is, we say that very heavy loans of dominion government money are to be made, and that the housing cannot be too expensive.

Mr. PROBE: I agree with that explanation. The second point is this: Does the minister foresee a considerable use by the low-rental group of citizens of the housing programme to be facilitated by this measure, or is he making provision that the low-rental group may perhaps be superseded by a moderate income group who could pay the economic rentals of these buildings? Has the minister any statistics respecting rentals under this project?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I have not. But I may as well say that, under present costs, economic rentals are not low rentals. We hope they will be at a later date, and it is possible that they may be. But at the present time costs are so great that all we can honestly say is that the rents will be kept down as low as costs will justify. I cannot give a figure; but they will not be what are ordinarily known as low rentals.

Mr. MacINNIS: If houses are rented at something lower than an economic rental, then obviously something will have to be made up. Who will make it up?

Mr. ILSLEY: "Economic rental" is a technical term, defined in this way:

"Economic rental of a family housing unit" means a rental at the rate of 12 per centum per annum of the cost of construction of the family housing unit.

With the financial assistance we can give, probably 12 per cent will not be necessary. It will not be economic rental within the meaning of the definition; nevertheless it will be a return on the money.

Section stands.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

The house resumed consideration in committee of bill No. 234, to amend the Income War Tax Act—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 8—"Accumulated undistributed income."

Mr. ILSLEY: I suggest that section 94(1)(c)(i) be amended so that it will read: "the income of the company that was liable to taxation under this act." I suggest also that there be no addition to the next subparagraph (ii). The amendment proposed by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario was that the words "other than income arising out of the sale or other disposition of a capital asset" be added at the end of the paragraph. That is not income and never has been regarded as income, and it would be unwise to toy with the idea of its being income at all by suggesting an amendment to the act.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The only comment I would make is that my suggestion was that, while it is not income liable to taxation it might be deemed to be such, but if the minister is satisfied after consideration that there is no danger of that contingency arising, I am satisfied to let it go as it is.

Mr. ILSLEY: The kinds of income not liable to taxation are listed in the act. Profit on a capital asset is not income at all and we should not admit the possibility of its ever being considered as income. I will ask my colleague to move the amendment to paragraph (i).

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I move, Mr. Chairman:

That the words "calculated in accordance with this act" in lines 31 and 32 on page 8 of the bill be deleted and the following substituted therefor: "that was liable to taxation under this act."

Mr. JACKMAN: Does that refer to paragraphs (i) and (ii)?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; just paragraph (i) is amended. The other remains as it is.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps we can consider clause 94 carried, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. McLURE: Mr. Chairman, with your permission I should like to make a few general remarks with reference to this clause. I have listened to the arguments pro and con with reference to income tax and other things that we have been discussing all day to-day, and let me say that I do not believe there are any two words in our vocabulary that are more hated than the words "income tax". These words are not despised because men do not want to pay taxes, but because of the regulations and the way the act is enforced. I think I am safe in saying that I have not met a man yet who could make out an income tax return 100 per cent correctly unless it is some man who understands these words, "the discretion of the minister". I know that I myself have paid penalties in interest at excessive rates on revisions going back as far as six years. When one goes over this and pays some of these bills and sees what he has left, he is bound to exclaim, "O Hades; I am working for the government at a dollar a year and finding myself."

The Minister of Finance has conceded from time to time in his remarks that the system of levying personal tax needs revision badly; I think those were his words. I would go one further and say that it needs revision very badly. But he has decided to hold out some hope to us that while it is unwise to tackle the revision at this time we shall have a simplified system, without legislation, in 1946. That is a wonderful hope. What has been attempted this session by the minister is admittedly a makeshift for the present time to offset the harmful effects that taxation is having on private enterprise and thus helping to produce unemployment throughout Canada. However, the minister has said to the burdened taxpayer the old saying, "Live, horse, till the grass grows next summer." Let us hope that we shall have some redress then.

I now want to deal with a few phases of the income tax and the excess profits tax. When I came here in September I sent and got copies of these two acts.

The CHAIRMAN: I would remind the hon. gentleman—

Mr. McLURE: These are just generalities. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: The Excess Profits Tax Act was passed some time ago and it is improper to refer to it now. May I remind the hon. member that we are dealing with section 8, new section 94, which deals with private companies.

Mr. McLURE: Yes. Well, that is what I want to deal with.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member will be in order when he is dealing with income tax on private companies; otherwise he will not be in order.

Mr. McLURE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I assure you that I shall be in order. Running through these two acts as I perused them, I found these words outstanding, "discretion of the minister", for instance, under the deductions from income not allowed as depreciation—

Mr. LESAGE: On a point of order, I submit that the hon. member is completely out of order.

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member is dealing with anything other than income tax on private companies he is out of order. I think it is the wish of the committee at this stage that we should be in order with respect to the various items. There is a rule which I have quoted from time to time, that discussion in committee must be relevant to the clause under consideration. One hon. member says, "Why at this stage?" That rule has been observed through all the sittings of this committee. It has been the custom in the sittings of the committee to have a general discussion under clause 1. We had that discussion on this bill. Of course I am in the hands of the committee, but I understood it was their wish that general discussion should take place under the first clause and that after that all discussion must be relevant to the clause under consideration. I must therefore ask the hon. member to keep his remarks within the meaning of section 8.

Mr. McLURE: Well, Mr. Chairman, you stated that you were in the hands of the committee. All I can say is that I am under your hands; if you thumb me down, I am down. I have some suggestions to offer here, and even if I may not be strictly in order I believe the suggestions are worth considering. In the amendments to the acts last night I noticed on every occasion the words "discretion of the minister" were omitted, and placed therein—

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, I think my hon. friend realizes that he is not in order. I do not like to take advantage of rules of order, but at this stage he should not be making a speech on the general principle of the Income War Tax Act. It is entirely at variance with what we should be doing. We should be examining these sections one by one to see if they can be improved and what further amendments are desired. We are dealing with a highly technical section relating to the taxation of private companies' income which is undistributed, and I feel that hon. members should confine themselves specifically to that section.

Mr. McLURE: I will try to do so.

The CHAIRMAN: I must insist, as it is the wish of the committee, that reference must not be made to the acts which were passed last night. They have been completely passed; they have gone through all the procedure required in this chamber to put them into effect. Therefore they should not be referred to now.

Mr. McLURE: Well, Mr. Chairman, I was referring to them only to show the amendments they had made in leaving out the words "discretion of the minister" and inserting therein "in the opinion of the minister." I could not see any difference. However, I will not deal with that any further. I wish to offer this suggestion with regard to appeals in the case of income tax on private—

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, I am trying to be patient, but I do not like to see an hon. member repeatedly called to order, and, when he is called to order, say, "Mr. Chairman, I will now deal with private companies" and then proceed with his manuscript to make a general speech when he knows he is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN: I am forced to rule that the hon. member is out of order. Does section 8 carry?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I wish to ask a further question with regard to this undistributed income. I am sorry to do so, but frankly I am perplexed about this calculation, and I should be glad if the minister would say what is the basis of these tests which are here, and which do not immediately make themselves clear to me. I should like to know whether this is in accordance with the practice which has been followed in the past, whether there is the validity of long practice behind it; and also, I believe, it is based or supposed to be based on certain recommendations made in the Ives report. I was trying to find them but I could not do so. May I have the reference to the Ives report?

Mr. ILSLEY: "Undistributed income" has not been defined in the past, although it is used in the Income War Tax Act. I am not aware that the Ives commission made any recommendation as to definition, but there was evidence before the commission as to what is "undistributed income... on hand". Those are the words. It was considered that the phrase was a little too loose and was susceptible of various interpretations, so that a definition was drawn up which is in accordance with the practice of the department in the past.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Then might we have a short explanation of the additions and the subtractions? There are two additions and six subtractions, and I think it would be better if we could understand the basis.

Mr. ILSLEY: The additions are, all the income of the company which was liable to taxation or was not liable to taxation. You start with that. That is inclusive; it covers all the income of the company.

Mr. JACKMAN: Shall I ask one question now?

Mr. ILSLEY: All right.

Mr. JACKMAN: Just in connection with subparagraph (ii), "the income of the company in each of the said periods that was not liable to taxation under this act:" I assume that "the income of the company" will have a technical definition in the interpretation clause of the act.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, it is defined in the act.

Mr. JACKMAN: Just for clarification: it will not include capital profits or capital losses?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. JACKMAN: It would include dividends from other Canadian corporations?

Mr. ILSLEY: It would, yes, but those are non-taxable.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario) Would the minister run through the six subtractions too?

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, the subtractions are:

(iii) all operating losses sustained by the company during the said periods,

(iv) the amount by which all capital losses sustained in the said periods by the company exceeds all capital profits of the company in the said periods.

Mr. JACKMAN: May we pause there? The minister said just five minutes ago that the last thing he wanted to do was to import the idea of capital gains or capital losses into our income tax system; yet here is a net deduction from the amount of earned surplus to be available for distribution under the new section which will be lessened by the excess of capital losses over capital gains.

Mr. ILSLEY: This shows the necessity of definition. Capital losses may be used to reduce a surplus, even an income surplus.

Mr. JACKMAN: But no capital gains to increase it?

Mr. ILSLEY: This is the amount by which all capital losses exceed capital profits. The profits do not augment it, but the losses diminish it. You strike a balance between capital losses and capital profits. If the profits are greater they are not added. If the losses are greater they are subtracted.

Mr. JACKMAN: But surely the point is, in order to do substantial justice to the owners of the company, the larger the earned surplus is—in fairness to the crown—the better for them, the more justice is done; and now, under this subparagraph (iv) earned surplus is reduced by the amount of the capital losses. There may have been a capital loss which would wipe away all your earned surplus, and that would mean that there would be much less available for distribution under this relatively favourable section than otherwise. I think I am clear in my thinking on that. It would be unfavourable to the shareholders of the company if that were to be the case. You obviously cannot add capital gains to swell your surplus, and I do not see why you should deduct capital losses to diminish your surplus, from the point of view of taxation. On a balance sheet you might do it for appearances' sake, but that is the arbitrary act of a board of directors and has nothing to do with the taxation. I do not know why you import a capital profit or loss element into this at all. Why not leave it where it was? It may bring up the question we discussed before the dinner recess: if there were capital losses and they were taken off the earned surplus there is not that earned surplus to distribute; but I submit it is just a legal technicality. If you have cash available, or can come to the treasury and borrow it, you can pay off the full earned surplus. It is just a technical accounting figure.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not understand that argument. I think a surplus is a surplus; I do not think it is a fiction at all; and if a company had an earned surplus of a million dollars over a certain period and a capital loss of five hundred thousand dollars, it has only five hundred thousand dollars left there. Because these income tax rates may appear attractive, we could not let them distribute a million dollars and then get the money by borrowing on future earnings and distributing them on these rates.

Mr. JACKMAN: Not to the extent of impairing capital, but there are three or four ways of dealing with it; for instance, it could be made an earned surplus account, or a capital surplus account. There need be no impairment of capital at all. If the assets are valued in the market place, even though there may be technically an earned deficit on the balance sheet you may still be able to distribute earned surplus or even part of capital without running into a technical distribution of capital. I do not understand why the minister brings in the capital element at all as a subtraction from earned surplus, because we certainly could not put it in as an addition.

Mr. ILSLEY: It has always been the practice.

Mr. JACKMAN: Well, some of us do not know why. It is, I think, a fair question.

Mr. ILSLEY: Shall I run over the rest of them? The next is:

(v) the dividends paid by the company during the said periods except dividends that were paid exclusively out of a surplus or accumulated profits on hand prior to the first day of January, nineteen hundred and seventeen and that were not taxable as income of the shareholder.

Is there anything wrong with that one?

Mr. JACKMAN: No.

Mr. ILSLEY: The next is:

(vi) all income tax, business profits tax and excess profits tax paid by the company in respect of the said periods.

That is clear is it not? The next is:

(vii) expenses incurred or disbursements made by the company during the said periods but not allowed as a deduction from income under this act.

Mr. JACKMAN: I do not understand that one.

Mr. ILSLEY: There are some expenses which are not allowed as deductions. For instance, if a company were to pay an allied company excessive amounts for some goods or services it might be disallowed; or, charitable contributions in excess of the amount permitted, if that ever happened, and I think it has happened, and so forth. But there are expenses which were actually incurred which are not allowed as deductions. The next is:

(viii) that part of the income of the company for the said fiscal periods that has been taxed in the hands of its shareholders under section twenty-one of this act and has not been paid out by way of dividends during the said periods.

Those are personal corporations.

Mr. JACKMAN: I do not understand why; that is all.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is deemed to be distributed. It has already borne the tax. If it is not in the hands of the shareholder, and you cannot get it in the hands of the shareholder, they have paid the tax on it, and it is deemed to be distributed.

Mr. GREEN: Has the minister given any consideration to the suggestion that subsection 3 of section 96 of the act should be—

Mr. ILSLEY: We are still on section 94. Can we pass 94?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I think we are perfectly clear on all except subparagraph (iv), and I do not think we are as clear as we should like to be on that. Will the minister say that that is part of the recognized practice which has been used?

Mr. ILSLEY: The answer is, yes.

The CHAIRMAN: We now revert under section 8 to new section 96.

Mr. ILSLEY: There are two points about section 96. The first is the point raised by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario. This section—I am referring now to subsection 1—in my judgment is correct as drafted. The point was raised that the resolution was broader than the section, and perhaps it is. But resolutions are loose things; they are general and lacking in refinement and so on, and the statute is much more precise. But on page 73 of the report of the royal commission on the taxation of annuities and family corporations—the Ives commission—is found this passage:

We recommend that any private company having accumulated undistributed income on hand may, to the extent that such income was earned prior to the end of its 1939 fiscal year, apply for permission to settle the income tax liability that would arise on the distribution of such income to its shareholders.

The rest of it is irrelevant. The meaning of that we took to be—and we think that whatever it meant, this is what we should do—that we take the undistributed income on hand at the date of election, if it was earned prior to the end of the 1939 fiscal year. It is the undistributed income earned between 1917 and 1939 which is on hand at the date of the election, and this clause is clearly based on that.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): But that is the thing that I questioned. The report covers the income earned between 1917 and 1939. Let us assume that between 1939 and the date of election there has been a loss of income. Let us further assume that before the time for distribution actually comes there might be a turn of affairs and the company would make earnings to recoup itself. Why is there any fairness in saying that the amount which is on hand in 1939 and which would have been distributed but for the loss intervening since 1939; if that loss is recouped, why should you cut off the company from chance of having an opportunity to distribute the amount which was on hand in 1939? It does seem to me it is pressing those two words in the report "on hand", rather hard. Looking at the fairness of the situation and what I understand to be the intent and scope of the terms of reference of that report, it seems to me that the act steps in and undertakes to alter, by reason of something which happens after 1939, a situation which existed in 1939, and which I understood was the situation with which the Ives report was called upon to deal. I am not assuming that parliament cannot deal differently from the Ives report if it wishes to do so, but the minister is quoting the Ives report, and I think he is pressing much too hard on those words "on hand".

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know that we can get very much farther by arguing the matter. I do not think it was anybody's intention to take the earnings that the company elects to distribute and allow those earnings to be paid out under this schedule of rates. That is what is being argued for here. Why stop at the date of paying out? Why not go away into the future? It was not the intention to take income that would be earned in 1946, 1947 and 1948 and allow it to be paid out under this favourable schedule of rates.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Nor was it the intention to take what was earned in 1939 and to worsen the situation which existed in 1939.

Mr. ILSLEY: We cannot run away into the future. We take the situation at the time they elect. They can elect on their 1939 surplus and they can distribute it.

Mr. JACKMAN: I cannot help feeling that the drafters of this section were frightfully legalistic and not very practical. Undistributed income on hand does not mean that there is so much money or so many liquid resources in the company representing that amount. It may be that the company has assets in the form of cash, in which case its capital and all the surplus balance is an amount of cash. It may be that a company has no cash, that it has only bricks and mortar, and all the capital and all the surplus and capital surplus, or anything else must offset only bricks or mortar. But that does not say that the company cannot get working capital or cannot have earned surplus which is distributable. The words "on hand" used in the Ives report is a loose expression if one gets down to legal terminology. What is your earned surplus on hand at the end of the year? It is simply the amount showing in your balance sheet. Take the earned surplus of a company and the liabilities; there is no identity on the asset side representing the exact amount in the earned surplus on the liability side. It is just on the one side, on the asset side, and as long as the two sides of the sheet balance under the double entry system, it is all right.

I see no significance in the words "on hand." What is likely to happen if a company finds that it had an earned surplus in 1939 which was greater than its earned surplus at the time it elects to operate under this section of the new act? Either the company have been doing so poorly that they have had losses, or they have been doing rather poorly but have paid out more in dividends. If they have paid out more in dividends I think the minister will be satisfied that the government will get its share; that is, if they paid out more in dividends than they earned and thereby reduced the earned surplus. There should be no hesitation on his part to allow the company to take its 1939 earned surplus as the basis for distribution. I do not see that there can be any very favourable position for a company that has reduced its earned surplus, that has had either a loss or has paid out more money than it has earned. The government gets a higher rate of taxation on it, and it could not be prejudicially affected by that action under this section whereby the 1939 earned surplus is reduced.

Mr. ILSLEY: I should just like to hear what my hon. friend would say if the Department of National Revenue exercised its powers under the Income War Tax Act to compel the payment of surplus out in dividends and then refused to permit a deduction of capital loss. I know my hon. friend would say that there was no surplus then to the extent of the capital loss.

Mr. GREEN: What about the other suggestion?

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member for Vancouver South, whom I always wish to accommodate, made a suggestion.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Why can you not extend that to us?

Mr. ILSLEY: This section 96 (3) (b) is all right as it stands, but there is no reason why these words should not be added, and I will move accordingly:

That the following be added at the end of subparagraph (b) of subsection 3 of section 96 at line 51 on page 10 of the bill:

"Provided that any instalment or part thereof may be paid before the date on which it becomes payable, interest thereon ceasing as from the date of payment."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I wish to make one more last appeal to the flinty heart of the minister, pointing out to him that in the recommendations of the Ives report the following is found:

That capitalization or distribution of surpluses earned prior to the end of the 1939 fiscal year be permitted . . .

There is a definite recommendation in the report.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is merely a summary of the recommendations.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

INCREASE IN APPROPRIATION FOR LOANS AND GUARANTEES

The house resumed consideration in committee of bill No. 239, to amend the National Housing Act, 1944—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 5—"low-rental housing project."

Mr. NICHOLSON: Would the minister define what he has in mind when reference is made to families of low incomes? What groups would be included?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not defined.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Although it may not be defined, I think it would be well to have some statement from the minister as to what income ranges might be included. Who could hope to get under the wire?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is defined in a kind of way, but that does not mean much.

Mr. FLEMING: Paragraph (11) of section 2 of the act defines it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but that does not lead to much. It is defined in this way:

"family of low income" means a family which receives a total family income less than five times the economic rental of a family housing unit required to provide sufficient accommodation for the said family.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

Mr. NICHOLSON: In the report on reconstruction, dealing with housing and community planning, at pages 110 and 111 we have some interesting paragraphs regarding tenant families in the lower third of the income bracket. It points out that in the twelve metropolitan areas the average family earnings would be $703 a year. On that basis, accepting the definition the minister has given, people living in those areas should pay rent of about $12 a month. In some of these cities the average is a great deal less than $703. In Saint John, New Brunswick, for example, the average annual family earning is $595. In Windsor it is a good deal higher, $943. I understand that about 177,000 families in Canada fall within this range, with an average of $703, and as I have pointed out on previous occasions it is very difficult for people in that income group to find places to live. Those who are being discharged from the services are finding it almost impossible to secure living quarters right across the country, and I think at this session the minister should give some indication as to what the administration has in mind to make housing available for people getting less than $1,000. I do not think the legislation now on the statute books will make it possible for life insurance companies or any builders to provide suitable units that can be rented at $12 a month. I believe some authority, either municipal, provincial or federal, must be prepared to bridge the gap between what these families can afford to pay and what might be regarded as an economic rent; and in my opinion the federal government should take that responsibility. We are all very proud of the performance of the minister during the last several years, when a difficult job had to be undertaken. We were told that if it is physically possible somehow or another it will be made financially posible.

Mr. ILSLEY: But it is not physically possible.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I think it is physically possible to build houses such as they have built in Boston, or Philadelphia, or New York, or Chicago, so that people who are getting less than $1,000 a year can have running water, electric lights and steam heat. It is true they cannot be built next week or next month—

Mr. ILSLEY: That is what I mean.

Mr. NICHOLSON: —but I think we must have legislation that will get the work started immediately. We still have not any legislation that will provide any units of any consequence for people getting less than $1,000 a year.

Again in this report we have a section on Philadelphia. At page 202 we are told that in the low-rental projects in that city a family getting $525 a year rents a one-bedroom apartment at $11.25 a month. A family getting from $526 to $700 will pay $14 for the same accommodation. A family getting from $700 to $900 will pay $17.50, and a family receiving from $900 to $1,200 will pay $22. Hon. members might assume there would be some friction when people living in the same apartment block find that one family is paying twice as much as another, but a good socialist principle has been accepted, that they should give according to their ability, and those who are getting twice the income of the others do not complain because they have to pay twice the rent for exactly the same quarters. If you have a larger family and require four bedrooms, and are getting less than $525 a year, you pay $12.75 for a modern apartment. If in the United States in the ten years before the war they were able to appropriate funds to build houses for their people in these low income brackets, it does seem to me that in the closing hours of 1945 we in Canada at least should be prepared to pass legislation that will provide a bridge between what people in the lower income brackets can pay and what must be paid, so that housing may be made available to this very large group in the dominion.

Mr. ILSLEY: To begin with, the figures of incomes for Canadians are for the year 1941, are they not?

Mr. NICHOLSON: That is true.

Mr. ILSLEY: The average would be much higher at the present time.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am sure it is, but if we could count on maintaining the 1941 income for the next ten years I think the majority of the Canadian people would consider that we had passed through the period of transition quite successfully. Some of the provisions of this bill would indicate that the minister's own department does not anticipate that we are going to maintain the 1941 income level for the next five years.

Mr. ILSLEY: 1941?

Mr. NICHOLSON: One of the later clauses assumes, I take it, that we are going into a depression, that we are not going to maintain an income level as high as that of 1941.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not think there was any assumption in the National Housing Act or anywhere else that we were going into a depression.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Later on you provide that the federal government will take up fifteen per cent of the losses. I have not the section before me at the moment, but as I understand it we have not had any losses in the administration of the National Housing Act to date. If for the future we are going to plan on losses of fifteen per cent it will mean that one person out of every six or seven can expect to have his home foreclosed, or to be unable to meet the payments; otherwise I cannot see any sense in making provision for the federal government to assume losses of that proportion. But we will discuss that later on.

Mr. ILSLEY: Because we make such provision does not mean that we expect losses of that kind. We get lower rates of interest, better terms, and so on, if we give a guarantee. The hon. gentleman is urging subsidized housing at the present time, is he not?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes; otherwise I do not see any chance of returned soldiers who are coming back and looking for jobs finding anywhere to live, under the legislation we have, or in the houses the life insurance companies are going to build.

I did not have the Financial Post with me yesterday, but in the issue of November 3 a front page article states, "$40 to $55 rents for insurance housing seen." Unless there is some subsidized housing, a large group of Canadians will not be able to take advantage of the new houses which have been built.

Section agreed to.

Sections 6 and 7 agreed to.

On section 8—Institutional holding company.

Mr. PROBE: Before we pass section 8 I should like to draw once again to the attention of the minister his statement of August 5, 1944, as reported in Hansard, to the effect that the government does not believe that a building programme invoking the assistance of municipal or provincial bodies is necessary, and that this legislation is framed accordingly.

When discussing section 5 before recess the minister indicated that in all probability housing accommodation would be made available to other than those in low income groups. I foresee a situation in which all the housing we will provide under this measure will be made available to people of moderate rather than of low incomes.

The minister has definitely stated that housing corporations sponsored by provincial governments or municipalities are not to be considered in any way under this measure. My home city of Regina has been forced during the fall and winter to build about a hundred temporary shelters to look after part of the requirements of our citizens. These are certainly no more than shelters, because most of the amenities of living do not exist there. At a cost of something over $100,000 only a roof is supplied, and in two years that money will be wasted. That, it is considered, is the approximate life of the buildings being erected. Certainly these cannot be called homes.

Under present financial arrangements it is possible that the minister will secure a maximum of about 100,000 homes. This number of homes at $4,000 would amount to $400 million, which is to be made available through the use of five per cent of the assets of the insurance companies, plus guarantees by the dominion government. That would provide 100,000 homes or, according to the Curtis report, about one-seventh of our present shortage. In any event, our municipalities or private owners must supplement what the minister is prepared to do, by the terms of the various housing acts. He has said that free enterprise will be permitted to handle this emergency, and yet in answer to the hon. member for Mackenzie he said that it was physically impossible to build these houses.

Mr. ILSLEY: I should have added "in the near future".

Mr. PROBE: I had a communication just this week from the carpenters and joiners union of my city, in which they point out that they have seven carpenters unemployed. That may not seem like a large number, but those seven carpenters are unemployed because there are no materials to work with.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is what I mean.

Mr. PROBE: I point out to the minister that he has not taken positive steps to secure materials. In the first place, we are turning over large sums of government money to the mortgage and investment companies, and, by this measure, we are guaranteeing profits on their commitments to the extent of two and one-half per cent of their invested capital. Then we are not taking adequate steps to make sure that the materials produced in Canada remain here.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member has been talking about keeping materials in Canada. Would he use the same analogy, so far as wheat is concerned? He would have a great time eating all our wheat.

Mr. PROBE: In Canada we have ample wheat for the needs of our people and we are very happy to dispose of our surplus at prices below the world market. The minister has not heard those who represent agricultural communities complaining about the fact that we are selling under the world market. We feel in duty bound to assist world needs to that extent. But when one hears our lumber merchants talking about the price of hemlock—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): We are dealing with housing.

Mr. PROBE: I was trying to answer the Minister of Labour.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member was just trying.

Mr. PROBE: He was drawing a red herring across my argument.

The point is that we are exporting lumber. People in Europe are not eating it, and it is not being exported only to the devastated countries of Europe, as I have pointed out before, from figures provided to me by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Why does not the minister keep those supplies at home, so that carpenters can go to work? Why does he not give some impetus to apprenticeship, or to a training plan to have more carpenters on the job? We were told a few days ago that money was not the difficulty, and that it would not be a limitation in the building programme. Pour in the money; heaven knows we have been doing it for five years in connection with the war. We did not stint, because we had to get the materials.

We have those materials in Canada. We may need a little more coordination and, for a time, we may have to place an embargo on exports of building materials. We may have to train more builders. Those builders in the prairie provinces who are unemployed during winter months, because materials are not available, under proper planning could be working on housing.

We have the money; we can get the materials; we can train the men. There are all sorts of men still in the services who would be glad to assist in this programme. Why in heaven's name can we not go to work on it? This is a national emergency, and still we are fiddling around, guaranteeing mortgage companies two and one-half per cent on their investments in connection with the building of houses. Then the minister tells us it is likely these will not be low-rental houses anyway, and that they will be taken by those in the middle-income group. The low-income people cannot afford to rent houses costing $4,000.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know to how much of what the hon. member has said I should reply. He has made an earnest and sincere appeal to increase the supply of materials.

The chief shortage is not that of lumber. The bottle-neck is in connection with soil pipe and brick.

Mr. MacNICOL: And plumbing fixtures.

Mr. ILSLEY: Plumbing fixtures of some kinds, yes. Those are the chief shortages. The hon. member has asked why in heaven's name we do not keep our lumber in Canada, and suggests that we should not send it to the United States.

Mr. PROBE: Keep enough of it—all of it is likely not needed.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is a pretty delicate matter. We have to keep up a certain flow of lumber to the United States if we are to rely on the flow of articles from the United States which we must have to live. Therefore we cannot tamper unrestrainedly with the flow of lumber to the United States. Lumber is not the bottle-neck anyway. It is these other things.

Mr. PROBE: Could not our trade commissioners arrange for builders supplies, such as plumbing and electrical equipment, which are in plentiful supply in the United States to be sent to this country?

Mr. MITCHELL: They are just as badly off there as we are.

Mr. PROBE: I would ask the minister to reconsider his definition of "approved lending institutions" to make it possible for corporations like my own city to go into this business. They have spent money in the past on temporary shelter and it has just gone down the drain. I should like to see the definition of lending institution amended so that any housing corporation established by a provincial or municipal government or by an otherwise approved lending institution will be given a chance to meet this housing emergency.

Mr. ILSLEY: Suppose I were disposed to do exactly what my hon. friend wants; I think the form that my approval would take would be to approve municipally or provincially owned limited dividend corporations. I think that would be the practical approach within the framework of the act.

Mr. PROBE: Does the act now permit of their doing just that very thing?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, it permits it.

Mr. PROBE: And would the minister give it his blessing and make it easier for them to get loans? In my own city, for instance?

Mr. ILSLEY: There has been no suggestion that the municipality of Regina would form a limited dividend corporation and take advantage of the loans on the very favourable terms provided by the act. Some municipalities might. I am not sure. There has been a suggestion or two which would come under that description and one is under consideration at the present time. But for the reasons which the hon. gentleman has stated we are fighting shy of these arrangements under which a junior government puts up a very small sum of money and the federal government puts up 90 per cent of the money because, as I stated at the time, business relations between the federal government and junior governments are sometimes a little difficult, and one can never tell when the difficulty is going to crop up because there is a general feeling that the federal government is fair game; that if you can get what you want out of the federal government, you do. That is one reason.

Another reason is that a great many municipalities are not properly set to give independent and proper management to this business. The time may come, and before very long, when that type of corporation will be approved. Each would be examined on its own merits to see if it qualified. There is nothing in the act which excludes such projects if they are in the form of limited dividend housing corporations. Some municipalities would not wish to undertake that. Housing is an important business with all sorts of difficulties and embarrassments that are not to be lightly undertaken. Some of the municipalities had an unfortunate experience following the war of 1914-18 which they do not wish to repeat.

Mr. PROBE: The experience of continental countries is that public housing is the only solution for the housing situation. I am speaking of capitalist countries too, not only socialist countries. Capitalist Britain had to go into a scheme of housing under public housing authorities, and they put up over one million houses from 1919 to 1939. That scheme was a success. They put up houses which rented for eight shillings a week. That was the average rental for a four to five-roomed house. In answer to the hon. member for New Westminster, who queried the hon. member for Qu'Appelle this afternoon about rentals, let me say that in New Zealand the rentals for accommodation in a four-roomed house averaged $3.60 a week and for a six-roomed house $5 a week. We have to do the thing along these lines sooner or later, and why not now? There is one other restriction which the Minister of Finance might remove if he will give this his blessing. That is, that the municipal housing corporations are to-day paying too high a rate of interest. I think he will have to lop that rate of interest to encourage them to go into low-rental housing.

Mr. NICHOLSON: In support of what the hon. member for Regina City has said, I might remind the minister that following the housing experiment after the last war we went into a serious depression, but we had the minister's assurance a few minutes ago that we shall not have a depression of that sort.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. NICHOLSON: We now have the National Housing Act, and having had more experience than we had after the last war I think municipal housing might turn out differently now from what it did then. I would ask the minister, if the government of Saskatchewan desired to negotiate a contract with the federal government, could they expect to get the money on similar terms to those enjoyed by the life insurance companies? I asked the minister for the number of units which have been approved in Saskatchewan. Can he give that information now?

Mr. ILSLEY: For farmers?

Mr. NICHOLSON: For both groups.

Mr. ILSLEY: There have been ninety-two loans under the new housing act in Saskatchewan.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Would it be possible for the government of Saskatchewan to get money for housing under similar terms to those given to the life insurance companies? While there are sometimes differences between Ottawa and the provinces, I understand that the minister had his own way in the seed grain dispute, and I do not think there will be any insurmountable difficulties in connection with housing.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no provision for guaranteeing the two and a half per cent return except in the case of life insurance companies, and that is done to protect the policy holders and to enable the companies to invest trust funds. Loans could be granted to a limited dividend corporation, and the question whether a limited dividend corporation the shares of which were owned by a provincial government would be approved is one to which I would give consideration. We certainly never contemplated anything like that when we set up the act, but it is a matter that could be given consideration.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Our Saskatchewan citizens have been paying life insurance for a great many years, and these premiums have gone outside the province in the past to Toronto, Montreal and Waterloo. Unfortunately we now find that these companies which we have been supporting generously are not prepared to negotiate loans to encourage housing development in Saskatchewan. That being the case, I think the federal government might consider making federal funds available to a corporation that would be completely publicly owned in Saskatchewan, and in view of the fact that our housing needs are possibly greater in Saskatchewan than in any other province, a particularly good case might be made by taking all the factors into consideration. We have had very few war industries there; many of our service people are going back, and I regard housing as one of the undertakings that might provide a great impetus to business all along the line. That was the experience of Great Britain during the depression years. When the United States and Canada seemed to be severely paralysed industrially, in Great Britain, because they undertook building projects such as the hon. member for Regina City has mentioned, they were able to bring prosperity to the hardware merchants, the plumbers, the tinsmiths and the carpenters. In Saskatchewan we would have a special case to get funds on conditions similar to those on which the insurance companies are getting them in other parts of the province.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—Joint loan losses.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I referred to this section before, and I would ask the minister to explain why he has suggested fifteen per cent in view of the excellent performance of National Housing ever since it was set up. I understand, from one of the minister's recent reports, that we have lost less than $100. I think this should be lower.

Mr. FLEMING: The act has not been used.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes; it has been used.

Mr. MacNICOL: If it had been used we would not be in the condition we are in to-day.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I may say to the Progressive Conservatives that it did not get under way while they were in office. We did have a National Housing Act, and on page 327 of this report we have some statistics on the number of housing units built.

Mr. FLEMING: This is a different act to-day.

Mr. NICHOLSON: That was a national housing act. However, the point is that less than $100 has been lost on the operations of the National Housing Act, 1938. That being so, I should think that five per cent as a guarantee from His Majesty would be a satisfactory arrangement, if we are not going to have another depression.

Mr. ILSLEY: If we are not going to have another depression?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I do not see that any guarantee should be given that one out of every six or seven is not to be foreclosed, or that there are not to be losses, and I say that in view of the past performances of national housing. In view of those performances I do not see why fifteen per cent is suggested.

Mr. ILSLEY: This section 10 is a clarification. Under the act the crown puts up to twenty-five per cent of the housing loan and the lending institution seventy-five per cent. In the first instance, therefore, twenty-five per cent of any loss in respect of a housing loan is assumed by the crown. In addition, this clause authorizes the government to pay losses suffered by a lending institution on its share of the loan up to fifteen per cent of the total investments by the institution. Actually the guarantees vary in accordance with the size of loans and the location of the houses, varying inversely with the size of loan and directly with the remoteness of the locality. In other words, special encouragement is given the building of small homes located in outlying areas in which lending institutions would not ordinarily invest. The hon. gentleman says that fifteen per cent is unnecessarily high having regard to the experiences of the past. But the National Housing Act began to operate about 1935 or 1936; there has been a rising real estate market from that time to this, and it is the most favourable period in the world to take. There naturally would not be any losses when values are getting a little higher all the time. It is not necessary to draw the conclusion that we shall have a depression from the apprehension that perhaps real estate values will not continue to rise from now on. They may even decline somewhat.

An hon. MEMBER: They should not rise.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I should not think so; but if they declined somewhat, then we are not going to have the same favourable experiences; that is, the lending institutions will not have the same favourable experiences as they have had in the past.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The minister has mentioned one factor that interests me, namely, the activities in the remote areas. If he can give an assurance that the act will be made operative in those areas I withdraw my objection, but previously he did not give any satisfactory answer to indicate that on the frontiers our citizens will be able to take advantage of the privilege. I realize that the cost of administration is a good deal higher as one gets into the northern countries. A great deal has been said about the possibilities in northern Ontario, Quebec and Manitoba. National Housing was not very much interested in going into those northern areas; and if the minister would give the committee some assurance that from now on the operations will be carried on in those remote areas, I can understand that the loss factor might be altered considerably in comparison with operations in the large centres in the older parts of Canada. Can the minister give us that assurance, that operations will be carried on effectively in the remote places?

Mr. ILSLEY: The only assurance I can give is the assurance I gave this afternoon, that we are determined to get a wide distribution of the loans, and I shall certainly rely on this central housing and mortgage corporation to recommend measures and, if necessary, to have legislation that will bring about that result. As I said this afternoon, we recognize the responsibility of seeing that the loans are not concentrated in the big cities.

An hon. MEMBER: They have been.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is said they have been. If we are to make the National Housing Act a real success—it has been a success in the past in the sense that there were a very large number of houses built under it, and it has been a financial success so far as the government is concerned—but if we are to make it a social success and from that point of view a national success, then we have to see that there is a wide distribution of benefits.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Can the minister be more specific than that?

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot be more specific.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I represent 57,000 people in parliament, and in the past we have not been in a position to take advantage of the housing administration. The life insurance companies have no large offices in that area, certainly not within several hundred miles, and what assurance can we have that houses can be built in an area like Mackenzie, under the legislation we now have on the statute books?

Mr. ILSLEY: Only what I have given; that is all.

Section agreed to.

Sections 11 to 15 inclusive agreed to.

On section 16—Life insurance companies may form institutional holding company or housing corporation.

Mr. FLEMING: In this new subsection 1A at the top of page 6, between clauses (a) and (b) the word "or" appears. I wonder why it is made alternative. Why should it not be an institutional holding company and an institutional housing corporation? Why is it confined to one or the other?

Mr. ILSLEY: I certainly took it to mean both. They may cause to be formed an institutional holding company or an institutional housing corporation. That does not mean that they exhaust their choice, that they have to make a choice between the two. Certainly I did not understand that.

Mr. FLEMING: May I say with respect, I should have thought that clause as it stands means that the company can form either an institutional housing company or an institutional housing corporation, but not both. If it is intended to be both, why not let us use the word "and"?

Mr. ILSLEY: If there is anything in the contention, the defect goes further than the extent which the hon. gentleman has pointed out, because it is intended that they may form more than one of either. The intention was that they might form more than one institutional holding company and more than one institutional housing corporation. Perhaps, therefore, we can amend the section so as to make it clear. I suggest that we let the section stand for the time being and go on to something else. If we use "and", then they have to form one of each.

Mr. FLEMING: Make it "and/or".

Mr. ILSLEY: The justice department will not permit that.

Mr. FLEMING: Get a new department.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall have to let that stand a little while.

Section stands.

On section 17—Conditions of investments.

Mr. FLEMING: Under section 17 there are phrases used which, taken with part V of the act which relates to community planning, call for some comment. It will be observed that lines 26 to 28 provide that "the project shall in the discretion of the minister be constructed with or in harmony with an official community plan satisfactory to him"; and in a later part of the act we have provision for research into community planning, and the general stipulation that in matters relating to community planning, so far as housing is concerned, under the provisions of the act everything must be satisfactory to the minister. In addition, the planning bureau—I believe it is so called—within the housing administration, at the present time has embarked on a pretty broad scale of consultation with the municipalities across the country. The point I wish to make in this connection is that in efforts to assist in this respect—that is, to assist communities with their planning so far as housing is concerned, and I mean houses that are being built under the provisions of the act—there has been too much interference on the part of the planning bureau, within the housing administration, in the affairs of the local municipalities. I have myself seen evidence of it. These municipalities are not all badly governed. The minister indicated in his remarks a few minutes ago that some municipalities were not to be entrusted with the formation of limiting housing dividend corporations because they would not give efficient management. I urge that many municipalities are efficiently operated and are thoroughly capable of running their own affairs in matters in relation to the planning of their communities, and so far as my observation goes, there has been on the part of the housing administration, in the course of its administration of the act, too much interference with the planning in the local municipalities and the local communities.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is all to the good.

Mr. FLEMING: Instead of help there has very often been downright interference. I do not think the minister wishes that the dominion authority, under the powers given by this act, should begin to manhandle or interfere with the efforts of the local municipalities and communities in the planning of their own communities. There is a great deal of good work being done in the matter of planning in Canada at the present time. I speak with knowledge of what is going on in Ontario. Great impetus has been given to local community planning, but too often the contribution of the housing administration—that is, this federal housing administration—has been one of arbitrary interference and dictation rather than assistance. I call that to the attention of the minister, because I am sure that is not the sort of thing he would wish to see practised under his jurisdiction.

Mr. ILSLEY: The main change is to make the requirement of official community plans permissive rather than mandatory. This will enable projects to be built prior to the adoption of community plans. It is an important change, but it is considered necessary at the present time. Many municipalities have no community plans and it would take considerable time to prepare them. Because of the emergency of the housing problem, the main emphasis must now be on building houses and nothing must be allowed to stand in the way. It is hoped that within a reasonable time—a year or two—the emergency will have passed and the minister will be able to insist on satisfactory plans being prepared before he gives a guarantee under the section. The hon. member thinks that perhaps we should not insist on that; that the dominion should not interfere in the matter of community planning. But one of his colleagues the other night, when the other bill was up, made a sustained plea for dominion assistance, and upon adequate community planning as a national policy as something that the dominion must insist upon. Otherwise we would have haphazard, unplanned towns and cities and we could not take the position, therefore, that it is none of our business because we are a federal government. The fact is that it is our business. The hon. gentleman says that there has been arbitrary interference by the national housing administration with municipalities. I do not know whether there has been; I am not familiar with the details. But it was all well meant. Administrative insistence on higher rather than on lower standards of planning has been all to the good. It would be news to me to find that the housing administration was relaxing in any way its watchfulness over planning. It must have been in the other direction; otherwise there would not have been complaints about its being arbitrary.

Mr. FLEMING: With respect, the minister has rather misapprehended the point I was making. I should be the last person in the world to say that the administration of this act should be such as to discourage proper community planning. I have been working too long on community planning to take that position. I heartily share the point of view taken by the hon. member to whom the minister refers. It was the hon. member for York West.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. FLEMING: I entirely agree with him, but my point is that instead of assisting community planning, as I think it should be assisted under this act, there has been, on too many occasions, interference. I can point to cases where intervention of the representatives of the housing administration has not been confined at all to planning with respect to housing. It has been a case of going right in and trying to revamp the community plan in well organized and well operated municipalities where there was no necessity for doing so. These government officials are going in and throwing their weight around. I am sure the minister does not wish that sort of thing to be going on in connection with the housing administration.

Sections 18 to 23 inclusive agreed to.

On section 24—Minister may enter into contract.

Mr. PROBE: In answer to a query of mine a few moments ago the minister indicated that certain specialized types of housing material are in very short supply. There are perhaps two ways in which the minister might solve this shortage. I understand that plumbing and electrical supplies in this country are under what almost amounts to cartel control.

Mr. MacNICOL: You are wrong there.

Mr. PROBE: The report of the royal commission on price spreads stated in their report that requests for investigations into the fields of electrical and plumbing supplies were made to the commission in 1936, but considerations of time prevented the commission from acceding to those requests. It may be that the minister may be able to pep up these manufacturers, and I wish he would give us an assurance at this stage that he will do that. During war time when munitions were needed the government set up certain crown companies to build the sinews of war which private manufacturers could not supply. Here is an identical situation facing our own people and the boys coming back from the front. Why not set up a crown company or two and use the buildings which the Minister of Reconstruction will be only too glad to get rid of and produce these plumbing and electrical supplies?

Mr. ILSLEY: I agree that everything should be done that can be done. We are much concerned about the situation and have given it a great deal of attention. Perhaps some special measures will have to be taken.

Mr. FRASER: The minister said that brick is in short supply. During the last year I understand that many brickyards have tried to get priorities for tires for yard wagons and for mechanical shovels. If the minister's office would help in the securing of this equipment, they will do the manufacturing.

Sections 25 to 27 inclusive agreed to.

On section 28—If no security.

Mr. FLEMING: This is an amendment to a section in part IV of the act. Has that part of the act been proclaimed? It has been on the statute books for the last year and a half.

Mr. ILSLEY: It has not been proclaimed. It was thought advisable to amend section 32 of the act, which amendment is being proposed a little later in the bill, before we proclaimed that part. There may be a proviso that such proclamation may limit the type of loan to be made under any part or the areas in which such loans may be made.

Mr. FLEMING: Could the minister tell us when part IV of the act is to be proclaimed? This is the part which deals with home extension loans.

Mr. ILSLEY: There has been a good reason for not proclaiming it up to this moment. There was a possibility that materials might be used in home improvements which might better go into new buildings. But the time is coming when home extensions are probably advisable in some places. The main act has been proclaimed, except part IV which is the part dealing with home improvement loans and home extension loans. At this time, when there is an emergency shelter problem and a shortage of building materials and skilled labour in the construction industry, it is not considered desirable to guarantee loans for home improvement purposes. It is desirable, however, to permit loans to be made for home extension purposes, that is, for purposes which will provide more housing accommodation. A later section will permit part IV to be proclaimed and be effective as regards home extension loans.

Mr. FLEMING: I take it that we can expect that part IV will be proclaimed as to home extension loans at an early day?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. CASE: I cannot just understand why this exception is being made in connection with a one-family dwelling, or does this section provide an advantage to owners of one-family dwellings as compared with owners of multiple dwellings?

Mr. ILSLEY: This is not a new amendment; the section to which my hon. friend has referred has been there right along. I shall try to find out just why the section was drafted in those terms. I find I cannot get the information, but there is a good reason. We are not changing anything.

Mr. CASE: There is no intention to give the owner of a multiple family dwelling a disadvantage in favour of the owner of a single house? It says, "one-family dwelling," and further on in the bill provision is made to encourage the development of multiple housing units.

Section agreed to.

On section 29—Payments out of C.R.F.

Mr. FLEMING: Sections 25, 26 and 29 of the bill are the real meat of the bill; the other sections have to do principally with routine amendments. We have substantial increases in appropriation recommended in these sections; and in view of the fact that the appropriations made available under the original act of 1944 have not been tapped to any great extent I wonder if the minister would give the committee a statement on the plans his department has in view which contemplate putting to work these substantial increases. Under section 25 the aggregate principal amount of investments which may be guaranteed by the minister is raised to $125,000,000. Under section 26 the minister may make loans and pay losses up to $150,000,000. These two provisions are in lieu of the previous provision of $50,000,000 for these combined purposes. Then in section 29 there is provision for an expenditure of $5,000,000 to carry on the functions under part V of the act in connection with housing research and community planning. Would the minister favour the committee with a statement as to what plans his department has in view for putting these substantial amounts of money really to work for the purpose of having houses built.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman has asked for a pretty far-reaching statement in regard to plans and expenditures. These amendments were rendered necessary by the proposed insurance company projects, but I am not prepared to make a statement as to just how we are going to use this money or when we are going to use it. When I introduced the housing act in August, 1944, I made a statement. The amounts have been selected possibly not exactly arbitrarily but by the exercise of judgment rather than by estimating, and all I can say is that we shall try very greatly to improve the administration of the National Housing Act, as I said when I introduced the bill setting up the central housing and mortgage corporation; to get as able a board of directors as we possibly can; to get as able a president, vice-president and other officials as we can, and to try to do what the hon. gentleman urged in one of his speeches, when I think he said that we should "put some drive" into it. If we do so, we shall need this money sooner or later. It will last us for a while. Apart from that, I am not now prepared to make a comprehensive statement.

Mr. FLEMING: Would the minister indicate to the committee over what period he is planning this programme? A substantial amount of money is involved, $275,000,000 instead of the present $50,000,000, and up to October 5 only $1,500,000 had been actually used out of the $50,000,000 provided. This substantial amount of money has not just been selected from thin air; surely some plans have been prepared.

Mr. ILSLEY: Plans were prepared last spring. After canvassing the material situation we felt there would be enough material and labour to build fifty thousand houses in a year, and that is all; that is as far as we have gone. We are stepping up the production of materials; it is increasing. When we speak of there being a shortage of materials, in most cases more materials are being produced now than for a long, long time. The shortage is in relation to the terrific demand, and we have to concentrate on getting those materials. Until the material situation improves to a marked extent, we cannot make any definite plans as to when we are going to build houses under the National Housing Act, and to what extent. A great many are, of course, now being built.

Mr. FLEMING: The minister did not touch on the last point. Over that period of time is it expected that this $275,000,000 programme is to extend?

Mr. ILSLEY: Does the hon. gentleman say that there is a $275,000,000 programme?

Mr. FLEMING: I was putting the minister's two figures together. It is true one is investment and the other is provision for loans and payment of losses. These are substantial amounts, and one would have thought some plans must have been prepared. There must be some programme that has led the minister to ask the house to appropriate this substantial amount of money.

Mr. ILSLEY: The $125,000,000 is the theoretical limit of the possible life insurance company investments, that is all; it is five per cent of their assets in Canada. That is just put there for that purpose. I do not think they will spend that much; certainly they have not made plans to spend anything like that. The $150,000,000 is the amount of the loans we can make under part II of the act. The hon. gentleman asks within what time we expect to make this $150,000,000 in loans; is that it?

Mr. FLEMING: You are asking for a guarantee against losses and provision for the making of loans up to $150,000,000 under section 26, and provision for principal amount of investments up to $125,000,000 under section 25. There must be some programme back of these amounts that have been asked for.

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot be definite about it at all.

Mr. ADAMSON: Is there anything in the life insurance act which established five per cent as the limit of their investment in any one type of security?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; that is in the housing act.

Mr. ADAMSON: You just took the five per cent as an empirical figure?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right; just took five per cent.

Mr. CASE: The National Housing Act now has been in effect for some time, and I should like to ask the minister what has been the general experience in regard to it. That is to say, you have guaranteed certain loans, and so on. Have you had many defaulters, or has the enterprise been generally worth while, in the main? Has it prompted building; are people meeting their obligations, and has the government been called upon to make good any of its guarantees? Could the minister say that?

Mr. ILSLEY: We have lost less than $1,000 since the beginning of operations of the National Housing Act.

Mr. NICHOLSON: We have been short of technical personnel in Canada. Although the act has been in force for some time, I understand that very little has been done in this field. Could the minister state what has been spent under part V, and what are the plans for the future? I think it is unreasonable to expect each of the provinces to supply the necessary technical staff in the field of town planning and housing. However, that is one service the federal government should give, and at this time we should be picking up some people who are leaving the army and, in this way, we could build up a staff in Ottawa.

Mr. ILSLEY: Nothing has been spent because we have not had the appropriation until now.

Mr. FLEMING: How does the minister propose to use it?

Mr. ILSLEY: We shall have to get the recommendations of our corporation. It was one of the powers given to the central housing and mortgage corporation. It was to carry on this kind of research.

Mr. FLEMING: What programme has the minister under way in connection with planning research, community planning, or housing research?

Mr. ILSLEY: We have not yet a programme for the spending of this money, although there are many purposes for which it can be spent. For instance, I would refer particularly to sections 25 and 26, and particularly section 26 where it is stated that we may enter into contracts for the production or development of materials, equipment, or component parts for houses through the pilot-plant stage of production or development and for the testing of such materials, equipment, or component parts.

That is just one of the purposes, and there are a number of them. If they are gone into at all seriously it will require the expenditure of a considerable amount of money.

Section agreed to.

On section 30—coming into force.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to ask the minister a question as the result of an answer he made to the hon. member for Mackenzie. The minister referred to cartels, and I believe the committee got the impression that there must be a combine, or something of that kind in connection with plumbing supplies. In reply the minister intimated that he was aware of certain conditions which perhaps would have to be handled in some way or another.

Mr. ILSLEY: Shortages.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister had no reference to any misdealings?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. MacNICOL: Or misconduct by these companies?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, not at all.

Mr. MacNICOL: No suggestion of any combination from Halifax to Vancouver?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am glad to hear that.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not mean that at all.

Mr. MacNICOL: I thought the minister was falling in line with what had been said by the hon. member for Regina City. Knowing as I do, many of these companies from Halifax to Vancouver I can say that they are not composed of that type of men, or men who would enter into cartels for the prevention of business.

Mr. ILSLEY: Correct.

Mr. GILLIS: I am sure the minister has eased the anxiety of the hon. member for Davenport. With the insurance companies he is doing a good job under the National Housing Act. Might I point out that under the old act there was provision for a home improvement plan. That provision appeared in the new act, but remained inoperative until a couple of months ago. Is it the intention to restore that feature of the National Housing Act?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is provision for it in part IV of the act, but that part has not yet been proclaimed. We intend shortly to proclaim that part of it which relates to home extension. This will give more shelter and more accommodation, but it will not apply to the home improvement feature. That will have to wait awhile, because we consider it does not involve the best use to which materials could be put.

Section agreed to.

On section 16—life insurance companies may form institutional holding company or housing corporation.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have an amendment to this section which I shall ask to have moved.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I move that section 16 be amended by substituting therefor the following:

16. Section 11 of the said act is amended by adding thereto immediately after subsection 1, the following subsection:

"(1A) Notwithstanding any restrictions or limitations on its powers contained in any other statute or law, any life insurance company subject to the jurisdiction of parliament may cause to be formed one or more institutional holding companies and one or more institutional housing corporations and may invest its funds in shares or debentures of the said companies or in shares of the said corporations to an aggregate amount, which, when added to the aggregate amount invested by the said life insurance company under subsection 1 of this section does not exceed five per centum of its total assets in Canada allowed by the superintendent of insurance under section 73 of the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know just what to do about this amendment. The section as drafted has been shown to the life insurance companies, and the tentative agreement is based on the section exactly as drafted. I do not know whether we are spoiling it by offering this amendment. Perhaps I had better withdraw the amendment and ask the committee to put it through in its original form.

Mr. FLEMING: What objection could there be to the suggested amendment on the part of the insurance companies? The minister is simply broadening their powers and obviously he is carrying out his own understanding of the intent of the section. If the section stands in its original form I consider it means that a life insurance company may cause to be formed either an institutional holding company or an institutional housing corporation, but not both, and not more than one of each. With respect, I do not see what objection there can be to the amendment as proposed by the minister. I believe it meets the needs of the situation, and simply broadens the powers of the life insurance companies. They could have no possible objection to this amendment.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, I shall leave the amendment, then.

Mr. FLEMING: May I offer a suggestion to the minister, in the hope that he may think it constructive. On October 25, introducing certain legislation in respect of housing, the minister said something about the present freezing of tenancies. We know the freezing is necessary in the present situation, but we also know that the drastic freezing order has had the effect of discouraging many people from renting surplus accommodation. One can find many cases, some even in the city of Ottawa where, to meet the needs of the situation, people would be prepared to rent some of their own housing space, if they did not feel that if they brought someone in they might not be able to get him out, no matter whether he proved difficult or not.

Mr. MacNICOL: There are thousands of cases like that.

Mr. FLEMING: Yes, many of them. It was one thing to freeze existing tenancies, but it is another thing to freeze tenancies of people who become tenants from that time forward. I offer that suggestion to the minister as one that I hope he will find worthy of consideration. I believe that harm rather than good will be done by extending the freezing provisions to tenancies hereafter created. Will the minister give that consideration?

Mr. ILSLEY: I will give consideration to that suggestion.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUSPENSION OF ELEVEN O'CLOCK RULE

Mr. MACKENZIE: Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the house may I say that I have had consultations with the leaders of the various parties, and we thought that possibly we might sit for one hour after eleven o'clock. If there is no objection I would move that the house be not adjourned at eleven o'clock p.m. this day.

Mr. BRACKEN: We will offer no objection to sitting until twelve o'clock.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I should like to have some idea of what the government will try to put through in that extra hour.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Only supply.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: One department only?

Mr. MACKENZIE: It will depend on the progress we are able to make. First of all, justice, then mines and resources, and then fisheries.

Mr. MacNICOL: So long as you do not make a farce of voting supply.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It seems to me that this motion is an indication of the need for a revision of the conduct of the business of this house. Early in the session we sit for twenty-four hours in the week and have a prolonged debate on the speech from the throne. Then in the dying days of the session important legislation is brought down; millions of dollars of supply has to be voted, and we are asked to sit from eleven o'clock in the morning until twelve o'clock at night and to do that six days in the week. It is just a little bit too much.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is a farce.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Farce is right. But if the government will indicate that no more than two departments will be taken in supply, and indicate which two departments they will be, so that members who have matters to raise in connection with other departments will not need to remain after eleven o'clock I shall raise no further objection. I agree on the understanding that not more than two departments will be taken up between eleven o'clock and the adjournment.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Might I inform the house that it can only be done by unanimous consent? I got in touch this afternoon with the leader of my hon. friend's group and with the leaders of the other groups and got their consent. I am following exactly the programme I indicated last night and there will be no departure from the programme as outlined. We are only trying to get through, by cooperation if possible, on Saturday night.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Seventh report of the standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Cleaver.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

91. Departmental administration, $170,499.

Mr. KNIGHT: We were on this item the other day when the minister was called away from the chamber while I was on my feet, and I think what I have to say I might say now on this item. I wish to say a word or two about the use of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police on certain occasions. Practically all the members of this group have gone on record at various times in maintaining that the police are too readily used by the government, in the case of the strike, for instance, at Windsor. I object strongly to the use of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police at Windsor and—

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member will have to wait until we reach the vote for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. While the Minister of Justice is responsible to the house for the administration of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Department of Justice has nothing to do with it. It is something that is quite separate and for which there are separate estimates, which will be called in their turn.

Mr. COTE (Matapedia-Matane): Would the Minister of Justice say why James Franceschini, a wealthy contractor of Toronto, after being interned when Italy became our enemy was released before the end of the war?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member informed me that he was going to ask some question about the internment and release of James Franceschini. I think the information has already been made public. I wrote a letter to his solicitor on May 24, 1943, of which copious extracts were published in the Montreal Daily Star of June 15, 1943. This letter, as I say, was addressed to the solicitor. He wrote me on May 25 thanking me for the letter, and then wrote me again on May 31, asking me if he would be free to give reasonable publicity to the terms of my letter. I wrote him back that I had his letter of May 31, and that "the letter I wrote you on May 24 was not intended to be a personal communication to you but a letter in the ordinary course of business correspondence addressed to you as Mr. Franceschini's solicitor." After receiving that letter of June 10, the solicitor evidently communicated a portion of the letter of May 24 to the Montreal Daily Star, which published it, and the following is an extract:

> In the case of James Franceschini I have no objection to stating to you now that Mr. Justice Hyndman, after full inquiry into all the circumstances which had prompted the intermnent of this man and careful consideration of the case as a whole, had reported he was satisfied and convinced that he (Franceschini) was not disloyal to Canada and would not act in any manner prejudicial to the public safety or the safety of the state, and that it would be quite safe and proper to order his release from internment.
> My predecessor . . . still had this report before him for his final decision when he was informed that Mr. James Franceschini had become seriously ill; he then came to the conclusion that, in view of this illness, it was necessary that he make a decision immediately and his decision was that the releasing of Mr. James Franceschini at that time would not be likely to involve any danger to the state, and he therefore ordered his unconditional release.
> I have myself examined the files, and I am satisfied that that was a proper conclusion to reach.

That is the opinion I gave the solicitor for Mr. Franceschini after making a personal examination of the file, and I do not think there is anything more that I can add to it.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would he be entitled to compensation for having been interned without any reason?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Certainly not. He was not interned without any reason. The reason he was interned was that this country was at war with Italy and there were regulations in force which empowered the then minister of justice, my predecessor, to order the internment of such people as he felt might be a danger to the state. He had at that time information of a confidential nature that an organization had been prepared to carry out sabotage in this country, and from the information he had he was not convinced that this man had done anything wrong but he was fearful that he might do something which would be injurious to the safety of the state; and because we were at war, and because, when we are at war, it is necessary to do some things which may be injurious to individuals for the safety of the whole community, he had him interned.

The hon. member has done what I have done on a good many occasions; he has taken an umbrella out in the morning because it looked like rain, and he has not come to the conclusion that he was wrong because it did not rain. This man was interned because, to the then minister of justice, it looked as if he might be dangerous. After the facts were fully investigated he came to the conclusion that he would not be dangerous and ordered his unconditional release.

I do not think that under these conditions there is any reason for compensation. It is unfortunate for the individual, but a very large number have been interned. Internment is not punishment, it is merely a precaution which is taken under extraordinary conditions.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am not rising to defend the gentleman in any way. I do know that after war broke out, in the city in which I live, many Italians were interned, and one of them was the gentleman referred to, whom I had known, I suppose, from twenty to twenty-five years. The late minister of justice of course, had his reasons for interning him. It is not for me to find fault with his judgment, whether in interning him or in releasing him; I merely rise to express my feeling that many Italians whom I have known for years in that end of the city of Toronto, merely because we were at war with Italy, were interned, although they were men who in the previous war had supported our cause, and maybe James Franceschini had in the Great War done his part in supporting the allies. I know some, living where he lived—for quite a long time he resided on Dufferin street, Toronto—who did their part in the first great war, but who, on account of the scare when the recent war broke out and we became involved with Italy, were unjustly interned; and I have often said to myself, if it is now found out that any of them were interned unjustly the least we can do is, perhaps, to apologize to them for having done so. I am not saying for a moment that this man was interned unjustly; I do not know. I have read, of course, that many of our own people were interned in Italy. They, too, may have been interned unjustly, and if we apologize to those Italians here, perhaps our nationals should be apologized to in Italy. All I wish to point out is that many things have been done which should have not been done.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member remembers, of course, that what happened during the first great war as to the conduct of Italians would not have any effect upon what they might be likely to do in the second great war. The first time they were on our side.

Mr. FLEMING: What progress, if any, is being made in the department with reference to the matter of petitions of right? It has been such a sore point for so long, and I think the courts and the bar are looking for some leadership in this matter. I know the Minister of Justice has had this matter brought actively before him for a long time. When may we look for some action in the direction of elimination of petitions of right in actions against the crown?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Not while I am Minister of Justice.

Mr. FLEMING: Does the Minister of Justice not contemplate any relaxation of the present requirements? Is the crown, in an era like this, when the activities of government are expanding farther and farther into almost every realm of business and industry, going just to hide under the protection which it enjoys at the present time?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, the crown does not hide under the protection it enjoys at the present time. I do not know of any refusal of a petition of right in the four years that I have been in the department, and I think I have arranged to have the petitions considered with due expedition. They are granted, and when they are granted the case goes to the court. What would be involved in abandoning that position would be an acceptance of the jurisdiction of the provincial courts in claims against the crown.

This matter was seriously considered when the Exchequer Court Act was amended to make the position here better than it is, from the information I have, in the United States or in any other British dominion. We have now stated that the crown is responsible for the acts of its servants and that men in the armed forces are to be regarded as servants of the crown. I do not think you will find that paralleled in any other British dominion. The question whether or not there should be an abandonment of the Exchequer Court Act and acceptance of the jurisdiction of the provincial courts in claims against the crown was considered, and it was decided after full consideration that it would not be done, that it was desirable to have claims against the people of Canada—because the crown, after all, is nothing but the representative of the people of Canada—whether those claims arose in one province or another, decided according to some uniform system and on the same basis, and that it would not be desirable to have motor accidents, for example, dealt with by the local courts in the several provinces and in the several jurisdictions of each province.

That was gone into fully. A decision was arrived at and I accepted it. I will not raise the question again with my colleagues.

Mr. FLEMING: It ought to be possible to confine jurisdiction in claims against the crown to the exchequer court without maintaining the position of the crown with respect to petition of right. It is one thing to confine jurisdiction to the exchequer court and another matter to insist that claimants against the crown first obtain permission to sue the crown.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It may be humiliating to claimants to have to ask for permission, but they do get it and go before the court and have their cases tried. That has been going on for a very long time, and I do not see that the fact of having to resort to that form is any serious impediment in the obtaining of justice. It would be otherwise if hon. members were asserting that petitions filed were improperly dealt with, that fiats were improperly withheld, but I do not think any hon. member would suggest that that is being done.

Mr. MacNICOL: Perhaps I am wrong in asking the minister this question but when I was home last, a young man who had been released from a prison in Ontario came to my house. He had been out for two weeks and everywhere he went he would be asked, when he made application for employment, "Were you in the army?" He had not been in the army becase he had been in gaol for two years or more; I do not know how long. I am wondering how society will take care of such a young man, and there are many like him. They had nothing. They will not be able to show a registration card because the card is taken from them when they go to gaol. Now they are out they cannot say they were in the army and they have no card. What will society do for them?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Their registration cards are returned to them when they are released from penitentiaries. I cannot say what is done in the administration of provincial gaols. If they go to a penitentiary, however, their registration card is returned upon their release. There is nothing that we can do to wash out the fact that they have been convicted and have undergone sentence. It is perhaps unfortunate that there are a good many employers who do not wish to take someone who has been in gaol, but we cannot pass a law to force them to do so. That would not be within the federal jurisdiction.

Mr. MacNICOL: I heartily agree.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think that all we can do is to try to foster throughout the country the spirit that those who have had the misfortune to have done something wrong and who may have reformed should be assisted in getting back into the ordinary channels of our social life. That, I think, is a matter of education and moral viewpoint that we should all endeavour to foster, because I believe there are a great many who do fall by the wayside and who can come back. Whenever anyone does something to help such an unfortunate person to come back he is doing a service not only to that person but to society at large.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is there not an association of chiefs of police, or some such body, that tries to provide something for these men? One day I met the chief of police of Toronto, Brigadier-General Draper, in Ottawa, and he told me that he had been to the justice department and had been in consultation with other chiefs of police and departmental officials in an effort to place such young men. Personally I think that is a very good programme, and I have been wondering if such a programme would not come under the new set-up the minister has in his reclamation service.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I hope it will develop from that, but I must point out to the committee that this would be something along the lines of the Borstal societies that look after those who have had the training of Borstal institutions. It was urged the other day very forcibly that we should institute a Borstal system in Canada; but I am sure the hon. member for Weyburn, who urged that, did so for the purpose of having the matter before the public and not because he felt it could be done here, although he did say he deplored the fact that there was nothing in these estimates for a Borstal system. He wished to see a commission set up clothed with sufficient powers to implement all the recommendations of the Archambault commission. That may be very desirable, but this parliament could not do it. This parliament would not have the jurisdiction to do it. The Archambault report clearly sets out that the Borstal system cannot be worked out under our penitentiary system or with the jurisdiction we at present have. Members of that commission well knew what was the constitutional distribution of powers under our system of provinces and central authority, and they recommended, at page 354 of their report, centralized control. They state that a Canadian penal system should be centralized under the control of the government of Canada, with the federal authorities taking charge of all the prisons in Canada, the provinces retaining only a sufficient number to provide for offenders against provincial statutes, prisoners on remand and those serving short sentences.

That is a matter which I hope will be developed in the course of this present dominion-provincial conference, but it will require a constitutional amendment. The federal authority has jurisdiction only over penitentiaries, and the commission pointed out expressly on pages 199, 200 and 209, that the Borstal system could not be adopted without centralized control of our penal institutions. I quote from page 199:

> Your commissioners are of the opinion that any satisfactory adaptation of the Borstal system is impossible in penitentiary institutions, either in its essential features or in its principles.

And on page 200 they said:

> Although your commissioners are of the opinion that the English Borstal system cannot successfully be introduced into the penitentiaries or reformatories of Canada, their inspection of institutions for the treatment of young offenders . . .

That caused them to report that it is a very good system. They finally recommended that the necessary changes be made to make it possible to have a system along the lines of the Borstal system. The Borstal system is a system of education, and education is the responsibility of the provinces. It is one of the things which I think the provinces would be reluctant to have subjected to any federal interference. It may be possible to arrive at a line of demarcation between what would be educational and what might be done to relieve them of the responsibility and burden of taking care of offenders who are not condemned to a penitentiary sentence.

That is something that I hope will be gone into at the dominion-provincial conference, although I do not expect that anything final will be decided at once. When the Penitentiary Act was amended the other day I told the house that I hoped to be able to find someone who could take all these recommendations and go about and interview separately the representatives of the provinces and see what could be done to bring about the kind of change which would enable some authority—I am not anxious to have it done by a centralized authority; I am not anxious to have the federal government dealing with things which perhaps can be better dealt with locally—to handle this. It may be that something desirable can be achieved through cooperative action. It may be possible to have the necessary things done, but I do not anticipate that at any early day when the estimates of the Department of Justice are before the committee there will be any substantial sum in them for the administration of a Borstal system. There may be some contribution to some joint action by the federal and provincial authorities along those lines.

I hope that even before that may be achieved there will be a possibility of segregating in the penitentiaries the young offenders from the hardened criminals, but that is not sufficient. It is not so much in the penitentiaries as in the provincial gaols that these contacts take place between young offenders who have received sentences of three or six months and the hardened criminals. That is something which under our system cannot be dealt with by one authority alone; there will have to be cooperative action between the federal and provincial authorities in that regard.

Mr. MacNICOL: I welcome what the minister has said, and this whole committee should support him in whatever he finds necessary to do to bring about the reclamation of our offenders in cooperation with the provinces. I said the other night that I had made quite an investigation into the operation of the Borstal system in the old country, and if anyone else has done the same thing I am sure he will corroborate what I say. It was started in a small place called Borstal, and that is how it got its name. It was instituted, I believe, by Sir Samuel Hoare. I listened to him make an address in the British house, and I then went to Leeds where the school was located.

My hon. friend here spoke about Borstal schools, but as far as I can find out there was just the one at that time, although there may be more now. That was in Wakefield prison, just outside Leeds. They sent me from there to Barlinnie prison outside Glasgow to continue my studies.

I was in that prison for a day so that I could survey the operations of the Borstal programme. The guards and prisoners are dressed alike; no one wears a uniform, not even the warden. They were all dressed just as I am. I went out into the prison with a guard who might have been one of the prisoners for all I knew. I went from one part of the prison to the other to study the different trades that were taught. Contrary to what my hon. friend has said, they had not only first offenders but prisoners who had been sentenced to death, but not in the same wing. I was taken into a chapel in the prison where I heard a man who had been sentenced to death playing the most beautiful music I have ever heard played on an organ; he was playing "Nearer my God to Thee". The guard or warden, or whoever it was with me said, "That is good music, because he is going to die shortly," I think it would occur after three Sundays had passed. It appeared to me to be good reclamation when they had got him that far in so short a time. I hope the minister will use every effort to introduce into our prisons a system similar to the Borstal system in England.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Can the minister say anything further with regard to the remission of the sentences of the navy and army personnel who were convicted as a result of their activities at Halifax?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am not in a position to say exactly how many are left. There were several who received relatively long sentences who will be dealt with in the Christmas releases. Those who received short sentences have already been released. Those who had no previous criminal record will have their cases considered in the Christmas releases. I could not tell the hon. member whether or not notifications have gone out, but a distribution has been made as between those who could be dealt with for Christmas and those who could not. Some who had previous criminal records and who were not armed forces personnel were involved in the disturbance, and their records make it appear that they are not deserving of any special consideration. Those regarded as deserving of special consideration have been or will be dealt with in the Christmas releases. As the hon. member knows, at Christmas and Easter the releases are much more numerous than at any other season of the year. I can repeat to the hon. member the assurance I gave previously that they are being dealt with as special cases; and I do not think there will be any who had no criminal records who will not be home for Christmas.

Mr. GILLIS: I wish to ask the Minister of Justice a question and this might be as good a time as any for it. I am glad the Minister of Transport is in his seat, because it also involves his department. It has to do with Canadian nationals serving during the war on British merchant ships registered in the United Kingdom. In this case, which I have tried to iron out with the Minister of Transport, a man lost his life when his ship was torpedoed and he left some small estate consisting of back wages, personal belongings and so forth. It is necessary for the next of kin in Canada to go through a great many legal formalities in the old country, to the extent of hiring a lawyer and so on, and I was wondering if in the legal machinery of the government, which comes within the purview of the Minister of Justice, there is not some way we in this country could settle the estates of Canadian nationals who gave their lives for us, without waiting for a year or two years and spending in legal fees practically the entire amount of the estate in the old country.

I took up the matter with the Minister of Transport, who passed it back to me. He was quite prepared to do anything he could, but evidently within his department there is no legal machinery to handle the matter. This case has been in the slings for more than two years, and is still unsettled. It has gone through the probate court, but the next of kin still has to go to the old country and hire a lawyer in order to settle up the estate, and in doing so the legal fees will almost amount to the value of the estate.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not think the case raised by the hon. member is any different from that of a Canadian citizen who died and left property in the United States of America.

Mr. GILLIS: All the difference in the world.

Mr. CHEVRIER: No, there is not all the difference in the world. The merchant shipping act of the United Kingdom says that the estate must be wound up in accordance with the laws of the United Kingdom. The Canada Shipping Act contains a section similar to that in the United Kingdom act, having to do with British seamen in Canada. It is clearly set out in the British act, as it is in the Canadian act, that the estate must be wound up in accordance with the laws of the domicile at the time of death. I presume the case to which the hon. gentleman refers is that of the Reid Pool, and the circumstances are that section 176 of the merchant shipping act of the United Kingdom clearly sets out that when the estate amounts to more than £100, then probate of the estate must be obtained in the British courts. If it is less than £100, probate is not necessary, but some ordinary form of claim must be submitted and subscribed to before a notary.

The Department of Transport will act as intermediary between the British authorities and residents of Canada in order to facilitate matters. We are willing to do that, and we do it continually; but I have to point out to the hon. gentleman that the position in the United Kingdom is no different from the position in Canada. It is a legal matter. When a person dies in another country his estate must be wound up in accordance with the laws of that country. My hon. friend shakes his head and says, no.

Mr. GILLIS: This man died on the ocean.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That may be.

Mr. GILLIS: He was domiciled in Canada.

Mr. CHEVRIER: He was not domiciled in Canada. He was on a British ship, registered in Britain; and in accordance with the merchant shipping act of the United Kingdom his estate must be wound up in accordance with the law of the United Kingdom. We cannot change that. All we can do in the Department of Transport is to assist the heirs in this country in filing a claim, and that we are prepared to do.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not a lawyer, and I am not going to argue with the minister, who is; but I heard this matter of domicile argued pretty thoroughly in the veterans affairs committee. The case of a man leaving an estate in the United States is not analogous at all to the question we are discussing. This man lived in Canada all his life. He shipped out through a Canadian shipping office. He went on the ship in Canada, and his ship was torpedoed in the Atlantic ocean. The estate under discussion consists merely of the wages and personal belongings of that individual. He was domiciled in this country, according to the definition of "domicile" I heard given by the legal adviser of the Department of Veterans Affairs. He had no domicile in Britain; he lost his life in the Atlantic ocean; he was a Canadian citizen; he signed up through a Canadian shipping office and sailed from a Canadian port. So that the point at issue is that the next of kin in this country have conformed to all the Canadian laws, has gone through Canadian probate, and now finds it necessary to spend practically the amount of the estate for legal fees in the old country. He consulted a lawyer in Canada and was advised to hire another lawyer in the old country, that the solicitor in Canada could not go farther.

I think it is an obligation the Canadian government owes to the next of kin of merchant seamen who gave their lives for this country at least to accept the responsibility of dealing with the British authorities in settling these estates, without expense to the next of kin in this country. I am not blaming the Minister of Transport, who is hemmed in by red tape. I am now asking the Minister of Justice, who presides over the administration of justice in this country, to be kind enough to confer with some of the legal fraternity who surround government departments, to see if he cannot work out some means of settling these matters with the least possible expense and anxiety to the next of kin of those who made the supreme sacrifice during this war. After all, there are only a few of these cases, but an injustice is being done.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Under ordinary circumstances the Department of Justice would have nothing whatever to do with property and civil rights. It may be that the Department of Transport, because of its control of merchant shipping, under the particular circumstances to which the hon. member refers should assume the responsibility of retaining this English solicitor; but that is quite outside anything the Department of Justice has jurisdiction to deal with. The Department of Transport can attempt to help a merchant seaman, or the Department of External Affairs can attempt to help a Canadian citizen. The Department of Justice has absolutely nothing to do with it. If the hon. member were to ask if the Department of Justice would make some of its officials available to conduct correspondence, such could no doubt be attempted under the special circumstances mentioned by the hon. member. But it would be doing something not at all within our jurisdiction, no more than if I, personally, as a practicing lawyer, attempted to do it as a favour to a fellow Canadian. There should not be the idea—and it does exist quite broadly—that the Minister of Justice should attempt to deal with anything that anybody considers is unjust. Fortunately for the Minister of Justice, that is not the role which has been provided for him by the constitution or by parliament.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I believe the hon. member for Cape Breton South has brought up a matter which could be settled in a simple manner. Overseas to-day, so far as the army is concerned, there is an estates branch to which a number of lawyers are attached. Possibly the Minister of Transport could see his way clear to have an order in council passed. I do not think he would be averse to one more. Such order in council could provide that soldiers overseas would look after this matter, in order to assure relatives of men who have given their lives for their country that at least a reasonable share of the estate would be paid to them. That would be a simple matter, and it would be appreciated.

Mr. GILLIS: But you would run into another technicality.

Item agreed to.

95. Annual contribution to the Canadian law library, London, England, $500.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What I have to say at this time applies to the judicial committee of the privy council. A judgment has been held back during the period of the war with respect to the question as to whether or not the Canadian parliament has the authority or the legislative capacity to abolish appeals to the privy council. When may that judgment be expected?

Then, I would ask the minister a question arising from a press dispatch by Mr. J. A. Hume, writing for the Ottawa Citizen, who, referring to the abolition of appeals to the privy council, said, in part, that certain provinces are desirous of retaining the right of certain types of civil case appeals being taken to the privy council. What provinces are desirous of retaining the right of appeal? I shall not ask the minister what attitude he takes in the matter.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There was an attempt made this autumn to have the case put on the autumn list. I believe there are three provinces which have appeared in support of the appeal, and they were not ready to proceed. The dominion government is anxious to have the case put on the list for hearing at the earliest possible moment. However, this is one of the matters where we do not wish to force the issue. Counsel for the department, Mr. Aime Geoffrion, has instructions to bring it on as soon as possible, and he has been told by the others that they would be ready for the next summer sitting. I am still hopeful that he may persuade them to have it placed on the Easter list.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What are the three provinces which are joining in support of the power of the dominion?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I should not like to answer that, from memory. The case was dealt with in the supreme court before I became minister. I shall find out the names of the provinces which have filed appearances, but I am not in a position to make the statement at the present time.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What provinces are opposed?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: This matter was discussed in very general terms at the last meeting of the coordinating committee of the dominion-provincial conference, attended by the premiers of the provinces; there the statement was made that it would not be looked upon as proper for us to try to force the issue, and that it was hoped that a date could be selected or fixed which would be acceptable to all. There were no views expressed by the premiers generally at that meeting as to their attitude with respect to the issue. The issue is one as to whether parliament alone can abolish appeals, or whether it would require as well the action of the provincial legislatures. One of the premiers stated that his province wished to retain the appeal but, in view of the fact that the meeting was held in camera, I do not think it would be fair to say which province it was.

Mr. FLEMING: The subject of judges' salaries is by no means a new one in this chamber.

The CHAIRMAN: We are considering vote 95, which deals with the annual contribution to the Canadian law library in London.

Mr. FLEMING: The statutory items follow; we have just discussed one of them. I thought this would be the proper time to mention this subject, because it relates to three or four of the statutory items appearing in the minister's estimates.

This morning a first step was taken to provide increased indemnities for those who are serving the public in one important realm, namely parliament. I wonder if the time has not come to extend a similar measure of justice to those who are serving the public in another equally important realm, namely those connected with the administration of justice in the superior courts of our country. I speak not only of the two federal courts, namely the Supreme Court of Canada and the Exchequer Court, but of the superior courts of the provinces.

Notwithstanding the relatively low salaries paid to judges in the superior courts of this country, we have been exceedingly fortunate in attracting able men to the bench. This is a matter, however, which I think requires attention. As I have said, it is not a new question, because I am sure it has been discussed at every session but surely the time has now come for action. When one compares the salaries paid to judges of the superior courts of this country with those paid in the United Kingdom and the United States, the comparison reflects most unfavourably on this country.

The independence of the bench is the most vitally important factor in the administration of justice. Nothing is more important, and in that I believe the Minister of Justice will support me. If we are to attract to the bench the most capable persons practising at the bar, and if we are to accord to our judges that measure of independence so necessary to the administration of justice, then I urge upon the minister that the time has come when some action should be taken in respect of the scale of salaries paid to members of the superior courts of the dominion and the provinces.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member will know that until there has been some indication that the ceiling on salaries and wages can be further loosened or removed, it would be difficult to make any general move toward adjusting salaries in the public service..

Mr. FLEMING: I quite agree.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I hope to have a bill dealing with that matter at the next session, to come into force at a later day, not upon adoption. I hope to have it for consideration of parliament at the next session, with the proviso in it that it will come into operation on a day that would appear to be a reasonable one to fix, hoping that the ceilings on salaries would by then have been greatly loosened or removed.

Mr. FLEMING: I thank the minister for his statement.

Item agreed to.

99. Payments of gratuities to the widows or other dependents of judges who die while in office, $15,000.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is the minister in a position to say to what extent judges have taken advantage of the legislation passed last session enabling them to assign or transfer one-third of their annuities on retirement to their widows?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Very generally. There are a few, but very few, who did not take the option within the time that had been fixed. I think that over ninety-five per cent have availed themselves of the provision that parliament made.

Penitentiaries branch—
100. Branch administration, $122,344.

Mr. BRYCE: Mr. Chairman, I wished to speak at some length on this item, but to comply with the wishes of the rest of the house I shall take only a few minutes. As I happen to come from a constituency that has a penitentiary and a lot of my constituents are officers in the penitentiary, I am naturally quite interested in this vote.

I would draw the minister's attention to order in council P.C. 8/1751. In the operation of that order it has been found that the guard who had reached his old maximum salary, instead of receiving the new maximum at once, approached it only by annual increases of $60, or $5 a month, so that he reaches the new maximum only at the end of three years, while the officer recently engaged goes in at the new maximum right away.

I would suggest to the minister that all grades of penitentiary officers be granted an increase of $240 per annum. I consider that an increase in salary is justified in order to bring the salaries of penitentiary officers more in line with salaries that are paid to officers employed by other law-enforcement agencies throughout the dominion. The recent increase in salaries granted to penitentiary officers did little to improve their financial position, because the officer who was receiving the old maximum for his position has to wait for a period of years before being eligible to receive the maximum of the new salary range, which he reaches by annual increases, in most cases, of $60 a year. In that connection I should like to quote from the report of the royal commission investigating the penal system of Canada. The commission say in their report:

> It is also imperative that the pay of officers should be raised somewhat comparable to the rates prevailing in other similar services. It is hopeless to expect to get competent penitentiary officers at salaries that are considerably less than the wages paid to street cleaners in the large cities of Canada.

I wish to speak about the housing at Stony Mountain. Stony Mountain is a congested area and the housing is in bad shape. The houses on the reserve, with the exception of two, were condemned years ago. If the staff is to be enlarged, houses will have to be provided. The housing situation should have been remedied long ago. It cannot be expected that the morale of the staff can be maintained at a high level when they are compelled to live in houses that would not be tolerated in any urban centre. To back up that statement I shall quote again from the report of the royal commission investigating the penal system. The commission have this to say at page 317:

> The accommodation for the staff is inadequate. It is unreasonable and unnecessarily humiliating to ask the members of the staff to live under the conditions that now exist in the officers' tenements belonging to the institution. These houses were built fifty years ago; they are without sanitary conveniences, and prisoners themselves are much more comfortably housed in their cells than the officers in the penitentiary tenements.
> Your commissioners are of the opinion that this state of affairs is destructive of the morale of the officers and that immediate steps should be taken to provide the staff and their families with respectable accommodation. In a large metropolitan centre the homes which are provided for the staff would, indeed, be condemned by the medical authorities.

A great many of the penitentiary officers live in Winnipeg because of lack of accommodation at the penitentiary. At Headingley provincial gaol a bus service is provided for the transportation of the officers, and I would ask that a bus service be provided for the officers at Stony Mountain. I think that is a reasonable and feasible suggestion. Because of the deplorable condition of the houses in which they have to live some provision of that kind is an immediate and urgent necessity. It is recognized that security demands that a proportion of the staff reside within call of the institution, so that it would be the wise and economic course to establish a reasonable means of transportation for the officers between the penitentiary and Winnipeg. A bus should be put on to take these men back and forth. That would help to solve the problem until proper housing accommodation is provided.

I have visited Stony Mountain penitentiary and Kingston penitentiary, and I find that at both the officers are allotted according to the number of convicts. There is something wrong with that system because a penitentiary is something like a huge liner, something like the Queen Elizabeth, and requires a full crew to operate it efficiently. But by the officers being allotted on a quota basis, so many officers to so many convicts, if one of the officers is taken sick another officer has to work that extra time, and at Stony Mountain it is some time before he gets that time repaid. I do not think any man should be asked to work for more than forty-four hours a week, and if he works overtime he should be allowed time off at some time in the future or be paid overtime, whichever you like, but I know that the government does not like to pay overtime.

At both Stony Mountain and Kingston penitentiaries the officers are compelled to take their food in the prison, food which is cooked by convicts in the cookhouse. I am sure the minister must realize that the whole prison could be put out of commission by the food being poisoned. In the report on penitentiary reform it is recommended that an officer be employed to cook for the officers in the institution. As matters are, you are playing with dynamite. Men going out to work in the fields can pick up poison and bring it in and drop it in the food. It may be that a trusty is doing the cooking and that pressure would be brought to bear on him, with the result that forty or fifty officers may be made very sick.

[Mr. Bryce.]

I also suggest to the minister that vacancies in any penitentiary should be open to staff applicants all over Canada; that is, if there should be a vacancy at Kingston or at Stony Mountain it should be advertised in every penitentiary in the dominion. This would give an opportunity to men experienced in the work to secure transfers to other locations, with advantage not only to themselves but to the system at large.

My final suggestion to the minister is that the rate of superannuation should be based on the average of the last five years of service, not the last ten years.

I had a number of other things to say, but to help things along I will reserve them for some other time.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The situation with respect to housing at Stony Mountain has been investigated, and plans and specifications have been submitted to the Department of Reconstruction for fifteen new houses there just as soon as the Department of Reconstruction will allow them to be proceeded with.

With respect to the other remarks made by the hon. member, I can assure him that these matters are under active consideration and that it is hoped that, now that the man-power situation in Canada is changing, there will be considerable improvement.

Mr. BRYCE: I thank the minister.

Item agreed to.

Penitentiaries branch—

101. Operation and maintenance of penitentiaries, including administration, construction, purchase of land, supplies, equipment and live stock; maintenance, discharge and transfer of convicts; compensation to discharged convicts permanently disabled while in penitentiaries, $3,512,683.

Mr. FRASER: I should like to ask the minister about medical examinations of the men in these different penitentiaries. I understand that they have penitentiary physicians who are medical men, but are any specialists in mental diseases or any psychiatrists employed to check on the men in these penitentiaries?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Psychiatrists are called in as and when required, and at Kingston there is a part-time psychiatrist who is regularly retained and regularly visits the institution.

Mr. FULTON: Could the minister give us some information, perhaps by way of a general statement, to cover the particular points I have in mind which are of interest to those who are concerned with conditions affecting members of the armed forces serving terms of penal servitude as a result of sentences which have been imposed on them? In particular, could the minister state how many persons in the armed forces are serving in penitentiaries, and whether any are serving in civil penal institutions overseas, in England or on the continent; and, when such persons are discharged, is any distinction made in the terms of their discharge; is there anything they can show when they go back to civil life by way of making a distinction between purely military offences and the civil offences for which other prisoners have served in penitentiaries, so that they can show that their confinement to a penitentiary was the result of their service in the armed forces as distinct from a purely civil offence?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The Minister of Justice does not in practice advise with respect to sentences imposed by courts martial. That is not something which in the practice of the departments is dealt with by the Minister of Justice or by the Solicitor-General; it is dealt with in the Department of National Defence or in one other of the service departments.

On March 31, 1945, there were about 400 persons who had been convicted while in the service and sentenced to terms in the penitentiaries. They are treated as though they had been ordinary civilians convicted by the ordinary courts of justice, and are dealt with just like any other convict convicted in the ordinary courts of justice.

As to those convicted by courts martial the situation is quite different. I am informed that there are about eighty members of the forces convicted by courts martial overseas who have been returned to Canada and who are serving in penitentiaries the terms imposed on them by these courts.

Mr. FULTON: And no distinction is made when they are discharged or have completed their terms, no document given to them by which they can show that their penitentiary service was the result of some military offence rather than a civil offence? What I have in mind is that certain offences which carry sentences of penal servitude may be purely military.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would assume they could easily obtain from the service departments a copy of the sentence imposed by a court martial. All we have is a commitment from the court martial, but I would imagine that it would be possible for them to get some kind of certificate from the warden that they had served the sentence imposed upon them by a court martial on such a date.

Mr. FULTON: Will the minister give consideration to seeing that that will be done as a matter of course?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, I will see if it would not be possible to arrange that, with respect to those who are confined under commitments issued by courts martial, upon discharge they be given a certificate that they have served such a term as a result of the sentence imposed by that kind of court.

Mr. MacINNIS: May I ask for some information on the details of judges' pensions and the other benefits set out in the details on pages 94 and 95? I notice that under the heading of "judges' pensions" there is the name of the judge and then the name of a woman who appears to be the judge's wife. How does that happen?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Under an amendment to the Judges' Act made by the last parliament it was provided that a judge might make an option of getting, instead of the pension provided by the act in his favour, two-thirds of it in his own name and one-third in the name of his wife. Most of the judges made that option, so that it now happens that some have retired and have been given in their own name two-thirds of the pension to which they would otherwise have been entitled, the other third being granted to the wife.

Mr. MacINNIS: Does that pension continue for the last survivor?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They are life pensions.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: When a judge retires and takes on some other position in the pay of the government, does he continue to receive his pension as well as the salary of the new position?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No. The Judges' Act provides that if he is in receipt of a salary from the crown the pension shall be abated by the amount of the salary or vice versa. Whichever is the larger is paid and the other is not.

Mr. BROOKS: Are widows of judges entitled to a gratuity as of right, or is a means test applied?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They are paid under a vote that goes back a great many years. The amount is equal to two months' salary.

Mr. BROOKS: That is, all widows?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: All widows of judges receive two months' salary from the date of the judge's death.

Mr. MacNICOL: Annually?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No. Once and for all.

Item agreed to.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police—
312. General administration, $264,261.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There are a number of questions I should like to ask the minister in regard to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and in doing so I know I speak for all hon. members in complimenting the force on the magnificent work done during the war under Commissioner Wood. It has been one of the most creditable records of any department in that no sabotage took place in Canada in that period. What I have in mind particularly has reference to the men who enlisted from the force after their discharge. There was quite a large number of men who, instead of signing on for a further period, decided at the expiry of their terms to join the armed forces. They are now returning from overseas, and they find they are denied an opportunity of joining the mounted police except after medical examination, and subject to not being placed in the same position in which they were at the time of enlistment. I could refer to a number of cases where men who had been in the force for a period of years and had attained the rank of corporal or sergeant decided that their services would be more valuable in the armed forces. They joined up and are now returning, and if they were incapacitated in any way they have no opportunity of joining the mounted police to-day. I suggest in the first place that there should be available to these men clerical positions and the like which they might be able to fill so that their service may be continued; and, second, that, when they rejoin, the period of time they were in the armed forces be taken into account as far as pension is concerned. I consider that there would be no serious disagreement if they were permitted to have the period served in the armed forces reckoned as part of the pension period.

Another point has to do with the question of service stars. My information is that by an amendment to a rule, passed in April of this year and published in the Canada Gazette, members of the force are entitled to wear stars only when they have had continuous, unbroken service. In other words, when they are reengaged they are entitled to no stars at all. I have before me the names and records of men who gave distinguished service in the mounted police. If they are now fit for reengagement, they are being reengaged in lower ranks and are denied continuity of pension and also their service rights. These are matters that should be given consideration.

I believe that it would meet with general approval if the necessary changes were made to enable the carrying into effect of the suggestions I have offered in this regard.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I thank the hon. member for the congratulations he has offered the Royal Canadian Mounted Police on the efficient work they did, which, to say the least, coincides with there having been no sabotage in Canada during the war. I think that is due to the efficient work which they performed. At the outbreak of the war there was a feeling of anxiety and unrest and an appeal was made to the members of the force to stay with the force. It was pointed out to them that their services in the force would be of exceedingly great value to the nation. As to those who wished to go overseas, an opportunity would be afforded them to go as members of the provost corps, which almost at once proceeded with the troops. There were some who preferred at the expiry of their engagement to take positions in the armed forces where there were greater advantages in the ranks or pay or allowances they obtained. Now it is felt that they should not be treated, when they come back, on the same footing as those who heeded the appeal and stayed with the force on conditions that were less favourable to them than they could have obtained by joining the armed forces. It is considered that these men, having exercised their right, terminated their connection with the R.C.M.P. at the expiry of their engagement and should not be on a par with those who heeded the appeal, remained with the force and served with it in Canada or in the provost corps overseas.

That is a matter which has been seriously considered, and the decision has been made by the commissioner and his advisers that it would not be fair to allow those who chose to take the advantages that they were able to have during that period to come back and be on absolute equality with persons who did not do so but stayed with the force.

I think that covers the various matters the hon. member has mentioned. They have been offered reengagement, but they do not get the same seniority rights as those who remained with the force. The matter of whether time spent with the armed forces should count for pension purposes with respect to those who are reengaged is under consideration. This has always been done for time served with some other branch. While the matter has not been settled finally, it is under consideration, and from what has been done in the past I think it is fair to assume that the decision will be that those years will be counted. With respect to the other matters we consider that we must give preference to those who stayed with us; I do not mean necessarily those who stayed in Canada, but who stayed with the R.C.M.P., either in Canada or with the provost corps that went overseas.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: While it may have been necessary to have these men, I consider that once their period of service terminated it is unfair to penalize them for having decided to go overseas in the service of their country.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is not penalizing them; they could have gone with the provost corps, but they chose to do otherwise.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister says that they could have gone with the provost corps, but I think of the Prince Albert division where fourteen members applied for enlistment in No. 1 provost corps, but only one was chosen. The others were told that the provost corps could not absorb anything like the number who desired to serve overseas with the corps. Of the thirteen who were not chosen, two or three decided that they must get overseas in the service of their country, and, when their period of enlistment terminated, they went overseas. I know of men in other parts of Saskatchewan, who have had distinguished service for twelve, fifteen or eighteen years. When their periods of service terminated they decided that consistent with their conscience they could not continue on in the mounted police when other men who were desirous of taking their place could carry on the work they had done. They went overseas; they came back and they now find themselves in the position of being denied, I think unfairly, their rights. I am glad to hear from the minister that their pension rights will most likely be preserved for the period they served. I feel that no harm would be done if they were granted the right to their service stars which they so much appreciate and which shows their service to their country. Surely the period that these men served overseas should count when they are reinstated.

Mr. MacINNIS: Perhaps there will be an item in the supplementary estimates, but could the minister state if it is the intention of the R.C.M.P. to take over certain naval ships and aeroplanes?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There will be a supplementary estimate of $1,300,000 to cover an amount paid by the R.C.M.P. to War Assets Corporation for ships that have been acquired. Payment was provided out of the war appropriations on the understanding that it would be included in the estimates to be reimbursed to war appropriations.

Mr. BROOKS: I was glad to hear the hon. member for Lake Centre pay a tribute to the R.C.M.P., particularly in connection with the work of the provost corps in the different military centres. They carried out a very difficult task. In recruiting for the R.C.M.P. is preference being given to men who have returned from overseas?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The commissioner informs me that he is recruiting only those who have returned from overseas.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I should like to support the statement made by the hon. member for Lake Centre, and I must say I was surprised at the statement by the Minister of Justice. Our banks and other institutions have been severely criticized at times, but they have set a good example in the tribute they have paid to their employees who enlisted. When they come back they receive their seniority rights and all increases in pay to which they are entitled. I would think a member of the R.C.M.P. who enlisted should be entitled to the same recognition. I should like to ask about pensions paid by the R.C.M.P. A man who retires is entitled to a pension, but no provision is made for his widow or family. Has any consideration been given to that phase of the matter?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The matter of pensions to the R.C.M.P. and the military forces has been under consideration for some time by an interdepartmental committee. That committee is preparing a statute which will provide substantially the same system of pensions for the militia and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The hon. member made a comparison between the banks and the R.C.M.P. Rightly or wrongly, we consider that the war service of the R.C.M.P. in Canada or in the provost corps was of a different character to service in the banks. It was something that was as essential to the war effort, to the fighting effort of the Canadian people as was service in other branches of the armed forces. It was because the appeal was made along those lines that we feel in duty bound to give some preference now as to seniority to those who heeded the appeal over those who chose to go to another branch of the armed services.

Mr. GREEN: Has consideration been given to providing that men who have retired from the mounted police can obtain treatment in the hospitals of the Department of Veterans Affairs. I know of several of these men in Vancouver, and I believe that at the present time there is no such regulation, that they have no treatment privileges in the hospitals of the other department. I think it would be a very fair move if some such provision could be made. In any event I would ask that the two ministers give some consideration to providing treatment of that kind.

The second question I should like to ask has to do with the security guards. Quite a few men, getting on in years, were recruited as security guards serving under the mounted police, and I believe they rendered excellent service. Would it be possible to provide that they should get some badge or something to show that they had rendered this service to the country during the war? Perhaps the Minister of National Defence would have to come into this picture, but I believe something should be done to accord these men that recognition. It may be that something has already been done, but as far as I know they are not eligible for any badge or medal or any sort of award.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They get a certficate of service, and consideration will be given to the suggestion that they be given some form of decoration which they can wear on their tunics or coats.

With respect to treatment in the hospitals of the Department of Veterans Affairs, of course that is available to those who served in the provost corps overseas, but as yet no arrangement has been made to provide for the medical care of personnel discharged after service here in Canada.

Mr. GREEN: It was the latter group to which I was referring.

Mr. ISNOR: I wish to support the views that have been expressed by the hon. member for Vancouver South in regard to the men who served in the security branch of the R.C.M.P. I came in contact with them on the waterfront, and know what they went through. I could make this a long story, but I have placed their case before the Minister of Veterans Affairs with a view to having them enjoy the benefits enjoyed by others who endured hardships, because certainly they carried out their duties in an efficient manner during the war.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is a question which might well be considered by the committee on veterans affairs when we meet again, I hope at the end of February or early in March.

Mr. GREEN: Thank you very much.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: On the general matter of the mounted police, according to what I see on page 7 of the report notice is given of amendments to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act having to do with part IV. Under that act there seems to be a fund for payment of pensions to widows of non-commissioned officers and constables, and I understand that this is a fund which has been established since 1934. The commissioned officers of the mounted police also contribute to a pension fund, but to that fund assistance is given by the government. I quote what appears on page 7 of the annual report:

> The only pensions available for widows of non-commissioned officers and constables at the present time are those provided by part 4 of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, and which are purchased by them on a monthly contributory basis. The fund to which they contribute was opened in 1934, and is on a self-supporting basis. Contributions are compulsory for men who entered the force after the passing of the statute, but those men who were already in the force at that time were given an option in the matter.
> In the opinion of the writer, part 4 of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act as it stands to-day was only a beginning in the direction indicated, and he sees no valid reason why the non-commissioned officers and constables of this force should not receive assistance from the government in this matter, in the same way as commissioned officers in the force do, and practically all civil servants throughout the country.

There seems to be a bit of discrimination here for which I can see no reason. If the minister will indicate that he intends to bring in an amendment to the act shortly, or intends to take up this matter, I shall be satisfied with that. If not, I should like a statement from him.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: This is one of the things being considered by the interdepartmental committee, which is endeavouring to arrange a pension system that will be somewhat uniform for the R.C.M.P. and the permanent army, navy and air force.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: In the meantime, then, I understand that the fund as far as constables and non-commissioned officers are concerned is entirely contributory and has to be self-supporting, while on the other hand the fund for widows of commissioned officers receives contributions from the government. In other words, widows of commissioned officers will receive special treatment as compared with widows of constables and non-commissioned officers.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That was one of the things which necessitated the establishment of this interdepartmental committee. It was considered that there were discriminatory features in these superannuation provisions which the federal government makes for its civil servants, and the interdepartmental committee was set up to endeavour to bring about some condition which would not leave anyone feeling that he was being discriminated against as compared with the treatment accorded to others. It is to try to bring about some degree of uniformity that this interdepartmental committee has been constituted.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How long has it been functioning?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: For several months now.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It is not more than a year, then?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No. It commenced its work some time last summer and has been at it now for several months, investigating the situation with respect to all these various branches, trying to arrive at something which would not be discriminatory as against anyone concerned, and trying to harmonize the whole thing.

Mr. CROLL: Some time ago I asked the minister a question with respect to marriage regulations in the R.C.M.P. and was informed that prior to April of this year a man had to serve for seven years before he was permitted to marry, and that in April this was modified to five years. I wish to thank the minister for modifying that Jacobean principle of having to work for seven years for a wife; but now in view of the fine things that have been said here about what a splendid corps of men they are, and how vigorous and virile they are, is the minister justified in keeping them out of circulation for five years?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The duties which fall upon the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are such that there must be a certain proportion of the personnel unmarried. I am told that at present sixty-nine per cent of the members are married, and that is considered to be as high as the force can go and remain efficient and sufficiently mobile. There is the necessity of having a substantial portion of the force that can be moved about without regard to domestic obligations, and at present that is as high a proportion as the commissioner considers he can allow it to go and still have an efficient and mobile force.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is free discharge, or discharge by purchase now reinstated?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Discharge by purchase has been reinstated, but not free discharge, because it was considered that that is contrary to the maintenance of proper discipline.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: During recent months have there been a large number of applications for discharge by purchase from recruits who joined during war time? What is the position to-day, generally, as far as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is concerned? Does the minister intend to expand the numbers in order to meet the current crime wave, and what is the shortage that is to be filled by men coming back from overseas?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The strength is now about 200 below establishment, and it may be necessary to increase the establishment for the development of this coast service, and of the air service contemplated.

Mr. BROOKS: What is the establishment?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is 2,500.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is it a fact that there have been quite a large number of applications for discharge by purchase by recruits who joined during the war? I speak particularly about the western provinces. I understand that this is causing a serious situation.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The commissioner informs me that there has been no greater than average number of applications for discharge by purchase.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How many have there been since V-E day?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I shall have to get that information, but the commissioner tells me that it has not been larger than average.

Mr. ADAMSON: May I speak to a question which I have discussed before? There are large numbers of these highly trained and specially skilled men doing guard duty in dominion government buildings. When I raised the point at the last session the minister said that some consideration might be given to having the guards for dominion government buildings arranged through some service other than from among the highly skilled members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Inasmuch as the force is small, and as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police has tremendous responsibilities, I am wondering whether the minister might consider that some other force could be given the job, one which, while probably not ceremonial, is perhaps routine in nature.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not remember having made that declaration, but I do remember saying that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police had absorbed the dominion police force.

Mr. ADAMSON: The old dominion police?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, and that it was found it would be convenient to have the two forces under one administration, because it afforded opportunities for employing men who for one reason or another had become unfit for more strenuous duties. I am not suggesting that many of those who are doing guard work are not fit for more strenuous duties, but it has given some elasticity to the administration of the force, and the commissioner does not feel that it would be desirable to have the administration of those doing guard duty, and others, separated.

Item agreed to.

313. Land services—arising out of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, enforcement of federal statutes generally, and other incidental expenses, $6,984,147.40.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: What are the rates of pay for the various ranks in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The third-class constable, holding the lowest rank, receives $1,003.75 per annum. The second-class constable receives $1,095; the third-class, $1,277.50. Corporals receive $1,460; sergeants, $1,733.75; staff sergeants and sergeant-majors, from $1,825 to $2,007.50; surgeons, $4,056.25; sub-inspectors, $2,456.25; inspectors, from $2,596 to $2,996; superintendents, from $3,176 to $3,576; assistant commissioners, $4,056.25; deputy commissioners, $4,956.25.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Does that $1,003.75 for the third-class constable include the cost of living bonus?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. FERGUSON: Is a member of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police permitted to marry when he joins the force?

Mr. MACKENZIE: That was covered half an hour ago.

Item agreed to.

316. Pensions to families of members of the mounted police who have lost their lives while on duty:

Mrs. Mary Bossange, $456.25.
Mrs. Margaret Johnson Brooke, $821.25.
Mrs. Margaret Cox, $410.63.
Mrs. Georgina Harrison, $676.50.
Mrs. Letitia Kennedy, $423.50.
Mrs. Nora Jean Massan, $300.
Mrs. Mary Miller, $667.38.
Mrs. Margaret Nicholson, $547.50.
Mrs. Catherine Mildred Ralls, $675.25.
Mrs. Vera M. Ryder, $907.50.
Mrs. Doris Freda Sampson, $816.
Mrs. Amy Lillian Searle, $406.98.
Mrs. Madelaine Mary Shoebotham, $810.
Mrs. Eunice Wainwright, $602.50.

Mr. BROOKS: I notice that while in 1944-45 the compensation paid to Mrs. Vera M. Ryder was $1,993.01, this year it is reduced to $907.50. This lady is in my constituency. Why has there been this reduction of over $1,000? If the minister has not the information readily available I shall not insist upon holding up the item.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The former amount voted in the supplementary estimates was from the period January 20, 1943, to March 31, 1945, and the amount voted was $1,993.01. The amount provided this year is $847.50 for Mrs. Ryder and $60 for one child.

Item agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I wish to thank the committee for its courtesy and graciousness in sitting until twelve o'clock.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie the house adjourned at 12.05 a.m.

Friday, December 14, 1945.

The house met at eleven o'clock.

WAR EXPENDITURES

Third and final report of special committee on war expenditures.—Mr. Isnor.

POULTRY

EXPORTS TO THE UNITED KINGDOM AND THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LEWIS MENARY (Wellington North): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture; I have given him notice of it. How many pounds of dressed poultry were exported to the United Kingdom in the years 1944 and 1945 and how many pounds were exported to the United States during the same period?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): May I take that as a notice, and give the answer to-morrow.

SERVICE PERSONNEL

RELEASE FOR WORK ON FARMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): In view of the urgent need for agricultural production in Canada, will the Minister of National Defence give the house an assurance that soldiers now stationed in military camps throughout the country will be released for bona fide work on farms, particularly those soldiers and veterans returning from overseas?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): They always have been. That policy has been in effect for months. Any bona fide farmer applying for leave to work on a farm, if he is not eligible for discharge, is granted leave. I repeat, the policy has been in effect for months.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It is not working.

Mr. ABBOTT: Oh, yes, it is. Over 15,000 have been let out.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I will give cases.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of bill No. 243, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act.

He said: The principle of this bill is to provide an allowance of $2,000 a year to members of parliament to enable them to defray expenses incidental to their calling as members. It provides that deductions shall be made from this amount on the basis of non-attendance of members. It also provides in the case of ministers of the crown, senators, and the hon. the leader of the opposition, that the allowance shall be regarded as taxable income. That is the extent of the measure.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): On the resolution stage of this bill yesterday I stated briefly some objections that I had to it. If it is of interest to the members of the house I may say that it does not give me any pleasure to be in disagreement with so many members whom I like and respect. But when deep conviction conflicts with comfort, then in my opinion comfort must give way.

I wish first to refer to some points raised in the brief discussion yesterday. The Prime Minister in his remarks said that it is becoming increasingly difficult to attract the best type of men to public life. I do not think a statement such as that can be made unless we compare the present house with previous parliaments, and in my humble opinion the present house, which was elected when the indemnity was $4,000—and mind you, I never heard of anyone saying that he did not want to come here with that indemnity—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Several.

Mr. MacINNIS: The Minister of Veterans Affairs says there were several.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes, there were.

Mr. MacINNIS: Well, I am quite sure he himself was not one of them, nor did I hear candidates in British Columbia make that statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That doesn't matter.

Mr. MacINNIS: If we compare this house with any house since I came here first in 1930 I think we shall find that this house is away above former ones. If the Prime Minister will allow me to say so, all he has to do is to compare the present cabinet, the members of which came into this house with the indemnity at $4,000 a year, with former cabinets, and he will agree that the present cabinet is the best we have had since I came here first in 1930.

An hon. MEMBER: Take a bow.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not trying to curry favour with anyone. I realize their ability in large measure and I appreciate in most cases their integrity.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

An hon. MEMBER: Name them.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is not necessary to name them. All a person needs to do is to speak frankly. I have in my hand the editorial page of the Monetary Times for December, 1945, from which I would quote two sentences. The article is under the heading "Federal Affairs," with the subhead, "Higher M.P. I.Q." I quote:

> The new parliament goes on with its work with all the unhurried leisure—

That does not apply to the last few days.

> —that such bodies can display. There is an increasing illustration of the fact that this is a very decided improvement over the other in the intellectual average of its personnel.

The Prime Minister also referred yesterday to the greatness of the institution of parliament and to the necessity of preserving its character as such. I agree with him, and it is because I agree with him that I object to this measure at this time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacINNIS: My hon. friends murmur. I have noticed during the last few weeks a consistent demand from that corner of the house that this item should be called, and every time I have heard the murmurings and the poundings of desks for that purpose I have been reminded of a remark that is attributed to the Duke of Wellington when with his army in Spain. He looked them over and said, "I don't know what effect they will have on the enemy, but by God they scare me!" With the present state of world affairs hon. gentlemen opposite scare me.

Another member said that members of parliament should have a higher remuneration because they had to give to bazaars and wreaths and make wedding gifts. That a member of parliament should contribute to such things never, I am satisfied, occurred to my constituents, and so far as I am concerned I think it is not only improper but indecent for a member of parliament to inject himself into the intimate lives of his constituents. When they need him they can call on him, but it is not his business to go round as a father bountiful at the expense of the taxpayers of the country.

The point was made that refusal by the members of the $2,000 would not help the conditions of the poor. That may be a good argument, but in my opinion it is bad logic, because it means that if we cannot help the poor there is no reason why we should not help ourselves.

My objection to the proposed increase is not based solely on the fact that it is particularly unwise at the present moment because of the rising unemployment and distress. My opposition to raising the incomes of members of parliament before the incomes of the low income groups are raised is a basic one and of long standing. I do not believe that a member of parliament should be financially in a position above the average elector in his constituency. I do not believe that a member of parliament can understand the troubles and worries of his constituents unless he has felt these things in his very being.

An hon. MEMBER: And goes on relief.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes. I have seen members of parliament who came off relief right to this house, and they made excellent members of parliament. I would say that a member of parliament who came off relief would know more about the lives of the people in his constituency than a member of parliament who never experienced those conditions which his constituents meet every day in their lives.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. member has no monopoly on that.

Mr. MacINNIS: I wish to draw attention to—

Mr. LENNARD: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. MacINNIS: Certainly.

Mr. LENNARD: Will he accept the additional $2,000 if it is offered to him?

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. MacINNIS: The $2,000 is not offered to me. If this house approves this bill, then it becomes law—

Mr. LENNARD: Will the hon. member accept it?

Mr. MacINNIS: Then it becomes the law of the land, and I will accept the $2,000—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Very small argument.

Mr. MacINNIS: —and I can make just as good use of it as can my hon. friends. Remember that I am subject to all the laws that are passed by this house just the same as you are.

Mr. LENNARD: You do not have to take it.

Mr. MacINNIS: All that my hon. friends have to do is to square their conscience with their intellect.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We have as good a conscience as the hon. member.

Mr. MacINNIS: Then let them square their actions with the conditions that prevail in their various constituencies.

In March of last year I received a copy of a letter that was forwarded by a board of trade to the Prime Minister urging that steps be taken to raise the indemnity of members of parliament so as to attract a good type of man to the House of Commons. I want to read to the house the pertinent parts of my letter in reply to that communication. It is dated April 3, 1945. I am taking the same position to-day as I took in this letter, which I never thought would be made public. It reads as follows:

This is a most unusual resolution—

I was referring to the resolution favouring the raising of the indemnity of members of parliament.

—as I believe most people think the members of parliament are already overpaid. The situation has been a little difficult during the past few years because of the high income tax and the necessity of a member having to maintain two homes. If some consideration were given the expenses incurred while in Ottawa personally I do not consider the present indemnity too low.

About seventy-five per cent of the wage earners in Canada receive less than $1,000 per year, so a member of parliament with $4,000 is in the high income bracket. The thing we should set our mind to is to increase the national income so that there could be an increase in the income levels all round. Until that is done, I could not feel justified in arguing for a higher indemnity for members of parliament.

We have asked our young men to make great sacrifices even the sacrifice of life itself during the past few years. I do not believe that anyone is making a sacrifice who serves his country and receives the remuneration that a member of parliament now receives.

That was my position then; it is my position now. The thing I object to in regard to this increase in members' indemnities is that it is being camouflaged as an allowance, and an allowance that is free from income tax. It is a fifty per cent increase in the indemnities of the members, and nothing less; but worse than that, it is proposed to make it free of income tax while we are still collecting income tax from incomes as low as $660 for a single person and $1,200 for a married person. In effect we are asking these low paid income groups to pay our income tax in addition to their own.

I have here some figures in regard to wages and salaries; they are based on dominion bureau of statistics figures reached by a ten per cent sampling of the 1941 census. It gives the number and percentage of wage and salary earners in various categories. Those receiving over $3,000 a year in Canada numbered 54,600, or 1·9 per cent of the wage and salary earners. A member of parliament receives $4,000 a year, and therefore we would perhaps be in the 1·5 per cent of the higher income receivers. Those receiving $2,500 to $3,000 are even fewer, 1·3 per cent; $2,000 to $2,500, 3·5 per cent; $1,500 to $2,000, 9·4 per cent; $1,250 to $1,500, 6·6 per cent; $1,000 to $1,250, 13·1 per cent; $750 to $1,000, 12·6 per cent; $500 to $750, 15·7 per cent, and under $500, 35·9 per cent. Yet members of parliament feel that they are sacrificing something when they are serving this country at $4,000 a year.

There is another point that I wish to draw to the attention of this house. We have a wage control order in this country under which those who seek increases in their wages must go through the close scrutiny of different boards. Quite recently a board in British Columbia granted a group of workers, among other things, two weeks' holidays with pay. That had to be approved by the national war labour board, to which they sent a delegation representing the employing company and the workers, both of whom agreed with the recommendation of the original board. But when they came down here the national board would not allow the two weeks' holidays with pay. Well, they were just unfortunate. If they were in the position of members of parliament they would simply vote themselves two weeks' holidays with pay and a fifty per cent increase in their wages as well. Why should members of parliament be entitled to throw the wage control order into the ash can when they want to increase their own wages? Will someone please explain that?—not to me, or to this house, but to the people throughout the country who are compelled to travel this road in order to get a meagre increase in their wages. I cannot conceive of a worse time than this for members to raise their own salaries.

Mr. JOHNSTON: You don't have to take it.

Mr. MacINNIS: I don't have to take it, but you will get it. I say I cannot conceive of a worse time than this for members to raise their own salaries, a time when wages are toppling all over the country; a time when persons receiving unemployment insurance benefits are compelled to take jobs in some cases at less than half what they were receiving a few months ago; when old age pensioners are compelled to eke out an existence on $30 a month.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend stated that workers are compelled to take jobs at fifty per cent less than they received a few months ago. I should like some examples of that. Don't overdo it, but let us have it clarified.

Mr. MacINNIS: All right; I will give my hon. friend the number, the name, the old wage, the wage offered now, and the time on unemployment relief. No. G-45406, Theresa B. Ervin; old rate, $1; new rate offered, 46 cents; duration of unemployment, eight weeks and five days. Greta M. Nelson, A-432523; old rate, 80 cents; new rate offered, 49 cents; duration of unemployment, five weeks. Emma M. Satzborn, No. O-249615; former wage, 80 cents; wage offered, 41 cents; duration of unemployment, five weeks. If my hon. friend wants more I can give them to him, because I have several sheets of names from the unemployment insurance office.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend used the word "compelled".

Mr. MacINNIS: Well, wait a minute. I have here a report appearing in the Winnipeg Free Press, in which was quoted a letter from the deputy minister of labour. I am glad the minister gave me an opportunity to read this, but it does not make pleasant reading; I can tell you that. This is dated December 5, 1945:

> Winnipeg central labour council, O.B.U., at its general meeting Tuesday night, at the Jordan block, strongly condemned the letter issued November 22, 1945, by the federal deputy minister's office on jobs and selected jobs and advertising for 5,000 bushmen for saw logs and pulpwood.
> Vigorous protest against it will be forwarded to Prime Minister Mackenzie King by the council and its affiliated units.
> The strongest objection in the letter by the delegates who branded it as "fascism of the worst sort," was the following:

"We hear much these days about 'full employment'. That (if it is attainable at all, which we doubt), does not mean work for everybody at the jobs they like, or a home for everybody in the place they like. Full employment means that people must move to jobs, not jobs to people, and that there must be enough people willing to take all the sorts of jobs that are offered. In a collectivist state, towards which we seem to be moving, full employment may even mean that people must work at what they are told to work at, where they are told to work, and at what hours and wages."

That from the Department of Labour.

An hon. MEMBER: That is socialism.

Mr. MacINNIS: Socialism? Well, it is socialism under the Liberal government, which is not necessarily the same thing at all. Yesterday in the house the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said this increase was necessary in order that parliamentary institutions might maintain their high character in the eyes of the people. In my opinion nothing parliament could do would be more damaging to itself than to pass the bill now before us. Let me put the case in this way. When we were children we were told about the conduct expected of the officers of a ship overtaken by disaster at sea. The safety of the women and children, those weakest and most helpless, is considered the first responsibility of the ship's officers and crew. They are helped into the lifeboats first; then, if there is time, the crew, the officers and last of all the captain are saved. How different is the procedure we are asked to adopt here. The captain of the ship of state tells us that it is more important to save the officers than the passengers; more important, in times of rising unemployment and increased living costs, to see to it that members of parliament are put beyond the fear of insecurity and want, than to see that those existing on the miserable pittance of the old age pension or on lower wage scales are put in a position where they can at least keep their heads above water. What would we think of the officers of a ship who scrambled first for the boats? What would the passengers think? How can we expect the people of Canada to have faith in those who look after their own welfare first? I would urge this house not to do this thing, which will bring the great institution of parliament into disrepute.

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to express briefly my objections to this bill, though not quite on the same grounds as those put forward by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). The other day I listened quite attentively when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) introduced this measure, and I fully appreciate the difficulties surrounding it. I wish the bill had been drawn in a different form so that I would feel justified in supporting it.

I have given this matter a great deal of consideration, and have talked to a good many of the members of this house. I am fully conscious of the fact that I am a new member and have not had the experience that some hon. members have had with the costs involved in being a federal member. But after that consideration I have come to the conclusion that I cannot support this bill in its present form. Certainly I am of the opinion that a member of parliament requires more than $4,000 a year in order to maintain a satisfactory standard of living and carry out his or her duties efficiently. I would point out, however, that when hon. members accepted the nomination they did so with full knowledge of the indemnity that was being paid. As I understand it, parliamentary indemnities of the past were in the first place intended more as out-of-pocket expenses. The indemnity, as the word implies, was to reimburse people for out-of-pocket expenses. It was not considered a salary. Personally I think that is the ideal approach to the situation; but I do not consider it a sound principle if we are to assure a proper representation of the people in this parliament.

In my opinion the principle upon which payments should be made to members can be easily stated. I hold the view that they should receive sufficient to enable them to serve the nation satisfactorily, so that they shall not at the same time be in want. I am quite sure from investigations I have made that in the past hon. members have often suffered great financial stress. The indemnity should be sufficient to permit any man or any woman to enter parliament regardless of financial circumstances. In my view the member of parliament should receive for himself, or for herself, out-of-pocket expenses; and then after out-of-pocket expenses are paid he or she should receive not more than would be received by the average skilled workman, or the average successful farmer.

I have heard that principle advocated for years from labour platforms, socialist platforms, and from Liberal platforms. I accept it as a sound principle, and upon it I base my argument this morning. On that basis I am quite sure that the present $4,000 indemnity is not enough for a large number of the able men, and the able woman, in the house, or for men and women who may enter the house. Under present circumstances I am of opinion that the great majority of the Canadian people realize that a member of parliament requires at this time more than the present $4,000 per year indemnity. However, I have strong objections to the form of the bill.

In the first place I object to the $2,000 being considered as an allowance. The suggested allowance of $2,000 a year for expenses is, in my opinion, a device to indemnify members for the taxation of their $4,000 indemnity. To me this looks somewhat like expediency.

I hold the view that, in all fairness, a member of parliament cannot vote tax relief for himself, unless he sees to it that others get the same consideration. They are not getting it at the present time. I suggest the fair plan would be to increase the original indemnity to $6,000 a year. That would be a satisfactory sum, and would be in conformity with the plan I have just outlined.

Let me analyse that statement. The figures I am about to give would concern a member with no other income, and I believe they are not more than five per cent inaccurate. The average member would receive that much exemption through donations to charity, medical expenses, and the like.

With a sessional indemnity of $6,000. under present circumstances a single member would pay an income tax of $1,759.44, leaving a balance of $4,240.56. A married member would pay an income tax of $1,448.52, leaving a balance of $4,551.48. A member with one child would pay an income tax of $1,314.48, leaving a balance of $4,685.52, and a married member with two children would pay an income tax of $1,180.32, leaving a balance of $4,819.68. If we allow, out of the balance $1,800 per year for parliamentary expenses, after deductions for taxation the average member would receive what might be described as take-home pay—and that seems to be the general term—equal to that of the average skilled worker in Canada. That is why I oppose the present bill and offer the suggestion that the $2,000 should be taxable. It is far better that a member of parliament should feel the incidence of taxation on the whole amount of his remuneration. In that way I should think there would be no danger of his losing touch with public sentiment on matters concerning taxation.

There should be no special class of citizens in this country, and I suggest that, in passing the present bill, we are creating a situation under which members of parliament, in present circumstances, become a special class of citizens. I urge that hon. members do not, by supporting the principle of the bill, create a special class for themselves. That is my first objection to the bill.

I have a second objection, and it is this: I cannot support the bill as proposed to pay allowances to members of the other place. I accepted nomination on the basis of the platform drawn up in the Regina manifesto. I pointed it out strongly to the electorate of Kootenay West; and the Regina manifesto stands for the abolition of the other place. On the point it has this to say:

> The Canadian senate, which was originally created to protect provincial rights, but has failed even in this function, has developed into a bulwark of capitalist interests, as is illustrated by the large number of company directorships held by its aged members. In its peculiar composition of a fixed number of members appointed for life it is one of the most reactionary assemblies in the civilized world. It is a standing obstacle to all progressive legislation, and the only permanently satisfactory method of dealing with the constitutional difficulties it creates is to abolish it.

I am not so certain that to remedy the situation it is necessary completely to abolish the other place. Possibly we could learn something from the Soviet system, where they have two houses, one elected from the point of view of geography, the other being a house of nationalities. Those two houses work together and make the legislation of that country.

I have gone before the people of Kootenay West on that platform, as a supporter of the Regina manifesto. Therefore it would be most inconsistent on my part to support a bill which provides for additional allowances for members of an institution of which the platform I have supported advocates the abolition.

I shall not discuss the point further, more than to say this, that sentiment throughout the country favours at least great reforms in the other place. I heard dozens and dozens of people express themselves in similar fashion during my election campaign. As hon. members know, in recent months a prominent former member of this chamber was appointed to the other place, and comment on that appointment was neatly put by one young lady who said to me, "Mr. Herridge, I think it is a most unfortunate thing, a tragic thing, that a fine and capable man such as he is should be embalmed at such an early age."

These are my objections. I object in the first place because the allowance is not taxable and, in the second place because I do not feel I can consistently support extra allowances at this time to members in the other place.

In conclusion I would say this: I trust that when hon. members of this chamber have decided this matter to their satisfaction it will result in all of us pressing with ever-increasing vigour for increased incomes for the old age pensioners and other low income groups in this country—increased incomes they so sadly require.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, while the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) was speaking, I was trying to imagine what his logic would be if suddenly he were to find himself the father of six or more children. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that that would make a better man of him. And if he were married to a woman who rather than being a brilliant careerist, a member of the British Columbia legislature, was by circumstances—

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Speaker—

An hon. MEMBER: You cannot take it.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think that members of this house could have the decency to leave the wives of other members out of their debates. It so happens that my wife is not a member of the British Columbia legislature.

An hon. MEMBER: She was.

Mr. MacINNIS: She was; that is true. If my hon. friend did not marry a woman who had intelligence enough to get into the legislature, that—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LOW: I was not imputing any motives; I indicated I was trying to imagine—and perhaps that is difficult under the circumstances of the hon. member's speech; let us go a little farther—I have tried to imagine just what his logic would be if he found himself representing a constituency like Cariboo, which is represented by the hon. member beside me. If so, he would find that he would have to keep up an automobile and, believe me, that requires something up in that country. It is frontier country with few roads. You cannot just step on a street car and get to any other point in your constituency within fifteen minutes on payment of a nickel. Take my own constituency, that of Peace River. In order to reach one of the more inaccessible parts of that constituency I must get on a boat and travel more than a day. That requires the expenditure of considerable time and money. I have been thinking strongly of uniting my resources with those of the hon. member for Cariboo to purchase a helicopter so that we can get around. I have mentioned only two of the constituencies that might be referred to; I imagine there are a hundred or more in exactly the same position.

I was wondering also what the hon. member's logic would be if he felt that it was his vote that would decide whether this would be paid. He might act just the same, but it would be interesting to know.

Enough of that. I rose to say that I commend the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for keeping his word, and I support him in this move because I feel it is one that has been delayed too long. My judgment is that the members of this house are no less important to Canada than are the congressmen of the United States. I think it is well known that the congressmen of the United States are given an allowance of $10,000, plus an additional amount up to $10,000 for assistance in carrying on their work during the year. I have said on another occasion that one of the disabilities that the ordinary members of this house suffer is that they have little if any secretarial assistance to prepare the voluminous material necessary in studying the various matters that come before this house. They have to dig out the material themselves; they have to spend their own time and often their own money in getting material. If a member does his duty in this house he has very little if any opportunity outside of the period he is in Ottawa to do anything but prepare himself for the work and the duties of this assembly.

Six thousand dollars is not a very handsome sum to people who give their whole attention to the business of such an assembly as this, and who serve their constituencies. In supporting the Prime Minister's motion I have in mind the improvement in the democratic procedure in Canada. I have always taken the position that a member should visit his constituency at least twice a year. He should go to his people before the session to get their instructions. That is the only way in which the people can control the members of this house and get their will. To do that requires considerable money and considerable time. I think it is the duty of every member after a session of the House of Commons to visit his constituency and make a report—not just in one centre, but to go to the people and get their approval, we will say, of the things he has done. During the time I represented people in the legislature of Alberta I made it a point to cover my constituency twice each year. I visited every centre in the constituency and that is what I propose to do in the large Peace River constituency that I now represent. It would be impossible to do that on the indemnity that was set at $4,000.

Just one point further. The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) contended that the passage of this measure would create a special class of citizen which was not taxed. That is not so. The income tax act of this country makes provision for deduction from taxable income of certain sums of money spent in earning the income as necessary expenses. This applies to travelling salesmen or railroad workers, such as engineers, firemen and brakemen. Many of these men must maintain more than one domicile. They have their family domicile, and at the end of the line where they may have to spend a day or two they have another. They are allowed deductions from their taxable income to cover expenses paid in earning the income. I have taken the position on more than one occasion that this privilege ought to be extended to the members of this house. No one can deny that hon. members certainly spend a large portion of their indemnity of $4,000 in earning it, and they always have done so. Under the circumstances I must deny completely that it would be creating a special class in this country. It is merely extending to the members of parliament a principle that has been extended already to a large number of citizens engaged in other pursuits. Under the circumstances I must give my support to the measure.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I say just one word? Yesterday I placed the position of the majority of this group before the house when I said that we were prepared to support this measure. In doing so I drew attention to the fact that we were not only placing before the house the decision of the majority of my colleagues, but also the opinion of our own national convention. Our movement is based upon the discussion of national problems in local places, small and large, and it having come to this decision by resolution at a representative convention, as the leader of that movement in this house and in the country it is my duty to place that point of view before parliament. It coincides completely with my own view in the circumstances.

Yesterday I had intended, and this is my real reason for rising at this moment, to refer to the inclusion of the honourable gentlemen in the other place. As long as parliament consists of two houses I suppose it is proper that no distinction shall be made between the two houses. I say categorically that if I felt that by withholding this consideration from the other place we were going to shear it of its power I would oppose this resolution. But in my opinion the two questions are distinct and separate. We are dealing now with a resolution having to do with the indemnities or payments to members of parliament, including both houses. I reserve the right at all times to do what lies within my power to reform an institution which I regard as an anachronism in these modern times. I can see no place for a non-elective institution in this modern democracy. I notice that the Prime Minister is bringing in a good many policies which he advocated years ago, and I should like to remind him that one of the policies which still remains to be implemented is the reform of the other place. May we hope that that will be done in due course.

Mr. MacINNIS: It has been "reformed" by increasing its indemnity.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not want to argue with the hon. member for Vancouver East, but I want to say this to the house, that I have known the hon. member for a good many years, and I hope that no member of the house will impute to him a motive which I know is not his motive; for the hon. member for Vancouver East is one of the most sincere and honourable gentlemen in this house.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made a statement by way of introducing the second reading of this bill, he outlined briefly what he regarded as its principle. He stated that it was to provide $2,000 to meet the expenses of members of parliament, and that in addition it provided for a deduction from that item for non-attendance at this house, and provided also that that increased indemnity should be taxable when paid to members of the other place, to members of the cabinet, and to the leader of the opposition. I think that is a correct statement of the principle of this measure.

As I see it, the bill before us proposes, first, an increase in the indemnities of private members of the House of Commons of $2,000 that increase not to be taxed; second, an increase in the indemnities of the members of the other place, that increase to be subject to taxation; third, an increase in the indemnity paid to members of the cabinet and the leader of the opposition, that increase to be taxable.

The bill is based on a resolution which superseded a resolution introduced in this house some time ago, and for certain aspects of that change I commend the government. I could not have opposed the proposal to increase the indemnities of the private members of this house, but I could not have supported the proposal to increase the indemnities of the cabinet and the leader of the opposition without requiring that they be taxable. So I commend the government for this feature of its change in policy.

The question now before this house is whether the proposal is or is not a good one for this country. I suggest that the answer depends upon the point mentioned by the Prime Minister, namely, whether it is going to improve the contribution which members of parliament can make to this nation from this time forward. I am not going to take time to-day to discuss that. I wish to comment upon one thing, the question of what this measure means. I think there has been a wrong interpretation in several respects of what it does mean.

I understand that the last adjustment of indemnities was some twenty-five years ago. Since that time what has happened? The income of the Canadian people has doubled. The average wage and salary increases in ten of the leading industries of this country amount to one-third. Meanwhile, the time required of members of both houses in the pursuance of their duties has increased.

One thing which I think has always been wrong in connection with this matter is that the expenses of members of both houses have not been allowed as a deductible item in the income tax return. That, it seems to me, is the chief argument in favour of an adjustment of this kind at this time. Business people have it. Members of parliament should not be denied it.

I have had a rough calculation made to try to see exactly what the proposals in this bill mean, because they do not mean a net increase of $2,000 except to the private members of the House of Commons. The calculation I have here was made on the basis of an income tax payer with only one dependent, his wife, and no dependent children. The net income of a member of this house or the other from his indemnity in 1938 after paying income tax was $3,930; in 1944, a typical year during the war, it was $3,036; a reduction of $900.

Mr. REID: Is that for a married man or a single man?

Mr. BRACKEN: A married man with no dependents other than his wife. Should this measure go through, his income after paying the tax would be $5,190, or an increase of $1,260 over his pre-war net income from this source; that is, about a one-third increase. In the case of members of the other place the figures for the first two years are the same —1938, $3,930; 1944, $3,036. If this bill goes through, assuming they have no other income —which perhaps is not a correct assumption— their net income after paying the tax will be $4,475, an increase of $545 over pre-war.

But the interesting thing in this calculation is more with respect to the members of the cabinet and the leader of the opposition. Assuming they have no other income, their net income in 1938 would have been $12,980, and in 1944, $7,741, a reduction of five thousand dollars. That is the burden the members of the cabinet have been carrying during these years, and even with this adjustment now, it will bring their net income to $9,617, which represents a reduction of $3,300 in comparison with pre-war income from this source—a twenty-five per cent reduction even after this increase in indemnity is made.

I am not arguing on one side or the other in this matter at the present time. I have been trying to analyse the situation. I do not mind saying that personally this question is a bit embarrassing to me. I have been wondering what position to take, what position would be proper, and I have come to a conclusion, which I will summarize in a moment. But the question before us is this: What are we going to do? Here is this measure. We must support it or oppose it. I could criticize it in some respects. I could criticize it as being untimely. Members of this house to-day are not worth fifty per cent more than they were a year ago; but they were worth more a year ago than they got.

It may be untimely too in that there are other inequities that have not been corrected in this nation. The member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) has raised that point and he says he hesitates to approve this measure while other inequities remain uncorrected. For such measures as this government has taken to correct those inequities it deserves credit. For such omissions as it has been guilty of in not having corrected those inequities it must accept censure, and I shall be one—I believe there are many others—who will censure it for those things. But the question is, shall we deny a measure of justice simply because there are other inequities that have not been corrected?

As for myself, and every other member for that matter, we cannot blow hot and cold at the same time on the measure. We have either to accept it or to reject it. Personally I should prefer to have nothing to do with it. I have considered whether we should move an amendment. I have considered whether I should refuse to accept it myself. Briefly, this is my position. I think I should look like a piker trying to get some measure of public acclaim by opposing a bill which in some quarters will be unpopular. As I have said, the bill gives some degree of justice to private members of this house, even though I think it is untimely, and even though I am sure there are other inequities that call for correction in Canada at this time. Under all the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, this measure will receive no opposition from me, nor, I hope, will it receive opposition from any large section of the house.

Mr. FRED ROSE (Cartier): If I thought for a moment that by not accepting the increase proposed in this bill there would be no unemployment, an increase in wages for all workers in the country, and increased old age pensions, I would, and I believe many other hon. members would, gladly say we would do without it. But that is not the problem before the house. I suggest that we are setting a standard for Canada in the matter of salaries and wages, and that is something that is good for members and good for labour. If I were among the people in the city, addressing a gathering of workers, I would say to them, "Those fellows in Ottawa got themselves an increase and now our case is stronger, because if they can get an increase why can we not get a little more?" That in my opinion is the proper way of looking at the problem.

But there is another side, the practical side, that must be considered. Most members come from eastern Canada; very many of them go home over the week-end, and every trip over the week-end takes a few dollars. Moreover, at every week-end when a member is at home some people come to see him, wanting one thing or another. Members are human, and we cannot simply refuse to accede to any charitable request. We cannot say that we will have nothing to do with it but will leave it to parliament to do something. Anyone who is at all human will certainly give a few dollars here and a few dollars there and some more elsewhere, and if one can do that, why not do it?

Membership in the House of Commons involves other expenses. A member must have an office in his constituency. I do not know how members representing rural constituencies operate, but I know that in the city, if one is not a lawyer with a regular office, one has to have some place where his constituents can come to raise their problems. In short, he must have an office and a secretary, and where is the money to come from? The $4,000 paid until now, which actually meant to us or some of us $3,000, did not provide for an office in the constituency.

Again, for about six months when parliament is not sitting, members like to continue with their regular monthly radio broadcasts to keep the constituents informed on events and explain the special issues involved under all circumstances. That is necessary. There are also leaflets, copies of speeches in Parliament, all involving expenditure of money. When I came into this house for the present session I was $1,000 in debt. If there are members who have other means, other forms of income, they are the more fortunate ones. But for those of us who are less fortunate, who have no other income, this increase will help in making us more efficient in the service of those whom we represent and who need our help. If it has that effect, then the logical thing for us to do is to accept it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In view of the statements we have heard this morning from leaders of the several parties opposite, and in the light of what I said yesterday, I might possibly be expected to allow the matter to rest there. However, I feel that some statements have been made which ought to be considered a little further and I therefore propose to add to what has already been said on this question.

First, may I remind hon. members that there are 245 members in the house and of that number only three private members have spoken on the measure, of whom two have opposed it, the other having supported it. All the leaders of the different parties in the house have supported the measure and have given substantial reasons for doing so, reasons which are all related to the public interest. I wish to thank hon. gentlemen who lead the several parties for joining with me in helping to make clear to the country the reasons which actuate the government and parliament in taking this step at this time.

As regards the suggestion that its introduction at this time is "untimely", I do not agree with that at all. I think its introduction at this session is timely, and very timely. It is never too late to remedy a wrong or an injustice so long as that is possible, and personally I think the time has long since passed when this parliament should have had more consideration for those who are sent here by the people as their representatives to serve the country in the making of its laws and in protecting the financial, human and other resources of the nation. I say that it is better to do something, albeit late, than never at all. The measure is either right in itself or it is not. If it is right in itself, it is timely, and I for one am quite prepared to say that it is most timely at this particular moment.

That brings me to say a few words to the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) who has been, with one exception, the only one that has been critical of this measure. First of all may I say to him and to the house that he and I have known each other for a long time, and that like all who know him I think we will agree as to his sincerity and deep convictions, and I would hope that no one would question those in any particular. But may I say to my hon. friend that he too knows us, that when he talks about convictions he ought to be prepared to attribute to all other hon. members the same motives and the same convictions as he is crediting himself with. That he did not do. I was sorry when I heard him say that when it came to a choice between conviction and comfort that he preferred conviction. I think on reflection my hon. friend will regret that he made that remark. So far as I am concerned I propose to deal with him and with other hon. members in precisely the same way, namely, in the belief that each in his action at this time either in supporting this measure by word openly in the House of Commons, or in giving acquiescence in silence, is acting from honourable motives and profound conviction.

My hon. friend said this morning that I had mentioned yesterday that one of the purposes of the increased allowance to members was to attract the best type of member to parliament. He then looked over the House of Commons and said that he thought we had here the best house that had existed for some time. I agree with him in that. I believe the calibre of members of this house is as high as, if not higher than, that of any House of Commons in any of the other parliament of Canada. But may I say that that does not mean that we might not have had in this parliament to-day many other hon. members who would have been in an exceptional position to give of the benefit of their wide experience to the country at this time if before the last election took place there had been something more in the way of an allowance to members of parliament. I know of my own personal experience that I tried my best, but tried in vain, to have certain members of my own party who had served in parliament and who had had wide experience in public affairs to run again. I could not get them to run, not because they expected they would be defeated—they would have been elected beyond any doubt—but for the reason that they felt, knowing what their expenses had become, what it had cost them in their personal obligations, in their businesses or practice or the like, they could not afford in these circumstances to come back into parliament. I know what I am saying now is also true of the membership of other parties in this house. I know that their leaders have sought to get outstanding men, men of wide experience, to come into parliament, and they have met with exactly the same kind of situation as I was faced with myself.

May I say further that I know that there are members in this house to-day who came in with the belief that there was going to be an increased allowance and who are finding the situation very trying at the present time. Unless they do secure something more in the way of allowance some of them may be tempted to resign, thereby occasioning by-elections in the country. That is known to many hon. members, and it ought to be known to the country.

When my hon. friend says that members here expected to get only the same allowance as was given in the last parliament, he is not stating the situation correctly. I made an important statement in the last parliament, and repeated it during the election campaign, that if the present government were returned I would be among the first to support an increase in the indemnity of members, that if I were not in this House of Commons, I would support it anyway. Many of those who are in this house to-day accepted that statement at its face value, and came into the house expecting when they were here they would not have to serve with the allowance what it was before, but would receive an increased allowance.

Perhaps it might be as well if I were to read at once what I said in the last session of the last parliament so that no hon. member can say that I am overstating what I said or that I have in any way changed my attitude. I believe what I said at the time will go a long way toward answering much of what has been said by the two members who spoke in opposition to this measure this morning. My remarks will be found in Hansard of August 14, 1944, at page 6499. As I recall my remarks were made in the morning during the course of a debate on a number of financial matters. I said:

> I cannot say whether I shall be in this House of Commons in another parliament, but if I am I will certainly be prepared to agree with hon. members who deem it advisable that in the interests of the membership of the House of Commons, the indemnity should be regarded strictly as an indemnity and not as a salary, and, therefore, not be liable to taxation.

That statement was before this country in the last election. I was speaking then as a leader of a political party—the Liberal party—and if the people of the country had been opposed to the idea of an allowance to members being regarded as an indemnity and not taxable we would have heard about it on the platforms from one end of this country to the other. An effort would have been made to defeat myself and my party on that ground. I ask any hon. member in this house, did he hear any question of the kind raised by the electors in this country? I did not. I heard no opposition whatever to it, nor did they.

Mr. McIVOR: Just the other way round.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I continue:

I believe that the independence of parliament and the independence of the members of the House of Commons is something that we must seek to maintain at all costs. I regard the amount voted as an indemnity as something intended by parliament to help secure that independence. I have before me a copy of the debate in the British House of Commons on August 10, 1911, when a statement was made by the Prime Minister of that day that at the session following the general election he would arrange for members to be paid. I should like to quote what Mr. Lloyd George, who was chancellor of the exchequer at the time, had to say in reference thereto. I shall quote his words later, but in effect he said that he believed that the House of Commons should be as representative as possible of all classes in the community, not representative merely of certain classes. He said that the British House of Commons, as then constituted was made up in a large part of those who came from the learned professions or who were wealthy; he felt that the house should be more broadly representative, that it should have members returned in larger numbers from the working classes, as they are sometimes termed, from the agricultural communities, that there should be as members more persons of talent and ability though in humble circumstances financially.

I feel strongly that at this time of all times—

And may I say there in reference to the timeliness of the present bill that I made this statement last session before the general election. I was not afraid of the timeliness because there were some difficult problems to settle in the country, because some people were not as fortunate as others. I was stating then what I thought was timely at the time, and which I believe is even more timely to-day. I continue:

I feel strongly that at this time of all times we should seek to obtain the best possible representation in the House of Commons of Canada and have it broadened by having as many elements of the community represented as it is possible to have.

I was taking a step then, appealing to the electorate itself, if you wish to put it that way, because that is what it is when a man speaks as a leader in parliament. I was appealing to the people to find ways and means whereby we could get the best type of man in this country to serve in its halls of parliament. Knowing the circumstances of our day, the electors would appreciate very quickly what was involved. I continue:

The other evening I expressed the hope that, in a subsequent parliament, there would be not merely business and professional men, but members chosen from among those who are in the fighting forces to-day as well as a larger representation of labour, a larger rural representation and a larger representation of women, and representatives from no particular class but chosen because of their special gifts, talents and high character. To make that possible in times like the present—

There again is your "timely" reference.

—it will be necessary that those who are chosen as candidates shall feel that they will be in a position to exercise their duties in this House of Commons in a perfectly independent way, without fear and without favour. What was found in Britain when labour began to be represented in the house was that a string was tied to its representation; members came in as members of the labour party, but they were bound in advance to support only certain measures. They were not free agents representing the country as a whole, or even their constituencies as a whole, but representing a class. Nothing could be worse than that we should have in this country a membership composed of those who represent classes, whatever those classes may be. A member of parliament represents the people of the nation at large, all classes. The danger is this, that unless there is an indemnity that is sufficiently large to ensure independence on the part of members we are going to have this House of Commons composed increasingly of those who are so independent in means of their own, or because of their associations with powerful interests, that they will come to constitute, as compared with others, a very large section of the membership of the house. In other words, we shall have a privileged class here at a time when the world is doing the best it can—in perhaps the worst possible way—to get rid of a lot of privilege and to recognize that there is a certain equality in men regardless of the particular class to which they may belong, or their particular calling.

I would recommend those words to the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), who has spoken about the danger of establishing a privileged class here. If he reads over my remarks I think he will find that I have answered him on the point of creating privilege.

There is another danger, and that is that we shall have men elected to this House of Commons who, through the inability to secure a different type of candidate, would not be able to earn an income outside of parliament comparable with that which would be secured to them by an indemnity, or coming here, may I say, under obligation, some of them, to corporations, others to special interests, but not free agents.

I feel that that is a very dangerous thing for the independence of parliament. I look upon the payment made to members of parliament in the form of an indemnity, as I have said, as something to secure the independence of parliament and the independence of members of parliament, and if part of that is taken away in taxation, then the purpose for which the indemnity exists is to that extent defeated.

Mr. Lloyd George made the following statement:

"But even now, membership of this house is very largely confined to four classes, apart from the other classes I shall point out later on. Men of means who have got an unearned income, and barristers with their practice in the London courts are members.

"Then there are those in well-organized and well-established businesses who have efficient, and, what is even more important accommodating partners. Then there is another class who are 'something in the city.'

"The demand of the democracy is really for a free choice of doctors. Instead of confining as it were, those who were able to remedy their evils and cure them to a small class, they say, 'We want an unlimited choice in picking out the men who will suit us best.' It is the same argument we had last week. This demand can only be met in two ways. The first is by raising funds in connection with some great national agitation, or an agrarian agitation, or a labour agitation, which would enable members connected with the movement to be more or less adequately maintained during the time they are attending to the business of that movement. The second is by the organization of capital and labour whose business is liable to be affected by legislation. These are the only two classes outside the four I have mentioned who offer any source of opening for democratic representation in the house, and both of them, in my opinion, are open to serious objections. One objection is that when the fervour of the agitation dies down, and when you come to humdrum parliamentary work, it is difficult to keep up the funds. Another objection is that I do not think it is desirable—and I agree here with my hon. friend the member for Leicester (Mr. Ramsay Macdonald)—that any man should come here to represent any organization except his own constituency. I do not care whether it is a trade union organization or any other organization.

"A man ought to be here to represent the general interests of his constituents, and it is only the necessities of the case which drive a man as an expedient, as the only alternative, as the only opening, to utilize the other method in order to come here to fight for particular interests, and I do not mean to say that I have not seen some of my hon. friends representing trade unions rather than the general interests of labour. That has been my view. But there is one thing in connection with the payment of members—it makes them not merely trade representatives, but representatives of constituents as a whole."

Then he makes this important statement which I think is correct:

"When we offer £400 a year—"

That was away back in 1911.

"—as payment of members of parliament, it is not a recognition of the magnitude of the service, it is not a remuneration, it is not a recompense, it is not even a salary. It is just an allowance, and I think the minimum allowance, to enable men to come here, the men who would render incalculable service to the state, and who it is an incalculable loss to the state not to have here, but who cannot be here because their means do not allow it. It is purely an allowance to enable us to open the door to great and honourable public service to these men, for whom this country will be all the richer, all the greater, and all the stronger for the unknown vicissitudes which it has to face by having here to aid us by their counsel, by their courage and by their resource."

That is the end of the statement by Mr. Lloyd George. Then I continued, speaking in this house at the end of last session:

I have had some knowledge of this House of Commons for many years, and I wish to say that nothing causes me more anxiety at the moment than the risk which this country is running of losing from this House of Commons many of its present members at the next general election, not that they are going to be defeated, not that they would not be elected if they were to run again, but because they are unwilling again to become candidates and this only because they find that with the indemnity taxed along with the taxation on their incomes they cannot make ends meet; they cannot maintain their independence. I feel it my duty as a citizen of Canada, as a member of this House of Commons and as the leader of the government to say what I feel concerning the necessity of maintaining the independence of members, and how important it is to get into this House of Commons the best class of men and women constituencies can possibly secure as candidates, and to retain for the house what it has in the way of valuable experience on the part of members who have been here over a period of time.

May I just pause here to say that this is a consideration to which I think too much attention cannot be paid. Every member of parliament, as he sits in this house from session to session, gains something in the way of experience, experience and knowledge of public affairs; and that experience grows and grows as the years go by. Now to lose that experience from parliament just because members cannot see their way through inadequate indemnity and personal loss to run again, though they may be in every way the best equipped, is a great misfortune for the country as a whole. I say to hon. members that never was there such need in the world's history as at this time for men with the widest possible experience, men of deep and profound thought, in the parliament of the country. We have been losing some for the reason I have given. Now may I continue with what I said:

I say that regardless of party. What I am saying is as true of members of the parties opposed to the government as it is true of members on the government side.

I have already said that so far as the indemnity of members of this present parliament is concerned I think we have all been only too glad during the period of the war to have been able to make whatever in the way of financial sacrifice we could, realizing that it is small or as nothing compared with the sacrifices that are being made by those who are fighting the battles of our country at the front. But we shall hope that the war will be over before another parliament assembles. There will be great problems to be faced, much greater than the people of this country begin to realize, by the parliaments of the future. The problems from now on are not going to be local or mainly domestic problems. They are going to be increasingly world problems, and Canada is going to have a very difficult time indeed in doing its part to help solve these problems.

We shall require in parliament all the experience that we can have that is of value from the past. We shall need to have here the best representation that we can get of the men and women who are prepared to present themselves as candidates. And so, in the next parliament, should I continue to be a member of this House of Commons, I shall be glad to join with hon. members of the House of Commons who feel the same way, in recommending to the government of the day, whether I am a member of it or should be sitting opposite, that the indemnity of four thousand dollars should be regarded as a payment made by the country to enable members of parliament to be free from pecuniary embarrassment and to be perfectly independent in the discharge of their duties here, and I will advocate that. If I should not be in parliament but spared to speak my mind, I shall be only too happy to support from without on this matter any administration that will recommend the exemption of the indemnity from taxation as a means of helping to maintain the independence of members and the independence of parliament itself in the next parliament.

I could not give evidence stronger than that of the convictions I have, or of the integrity which prompts me to make this statement at the present time. It is repeating now, after the general election, after the people of this country have returned the present administration, what I said before we began our appeal to the people of Canada: The statement was on record in Hansard, and before the people of Canada throughout the campaign to be quoted against myself and the government if any person so desired.

Now may I say just a word about the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) —and I do this because I feel he has done himself an injustice in the way in which he spoke. Perhaps he did not realize that he has not been distinguishing between himself as an individual and himself as a representative of the people of this country as a whole. The hon. member used the expression: are we going to do this for ourselves, while other people are having hard and difficult times? He uses the words "for ourselves".

Mr. MACKENZIE: "Help ourselves".

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, are we going to "help ourselves". What does the hon. member mean by "ourselves"? Does he mean himself as an individual who is looking after himself, looking after his own private and personal interests; or does he mean himself as one who has been sent to parliament to speak for the people of Canada, and that in regard to any matter which may come up? If he wishes to preserve his independent—

Mr. MacINNIS: The Prime Minister is asking me a question and, if he wishes me to answer it, I will do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Very well, Proceed.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have listened to a great many discussions on this matter.

An hon. MEMBER: Answer, then.

Mr. MacINNIS: But I have never heard it discussed except from the personal point of view of the member. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) asked a minute ago what my logic would be if I had—

An hon. MEMBER: Don't make a speech.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacINNIS: Well, that is the answer.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member has only helped to emphasize his position, a position to which I am taking exception. He claims he is speaking as a person, and in relation to his own views as a person, his own affairs. I say every hon. member has to consider himself in two relationships, one as an individual who if he is to live has to earn an income, who has to support a family—if he is fortunate enough to have one—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And I say that designedly. I want hon. members to see that I am not thinking about myself at the present time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have very great sympathy for men who have families of sixteen or seventeen, like some of my friends here, but who nevertheless come to serve as members of the House of Commons. And may I say the House of Commons is all the better for having them here, those with large families, because they can speak with added authority on these questions. But the point I was seeking to emphasize is that when we speak of ourselves we have to make clear that distinction. Let me ask hon. members this question: If the men, and the lady, who are in this chamber to-day were thinking only of themselves as individuals, and were not thinking rather of themselves as representatives of the people in parliament, how many of them would be giving up what they are obliged to give up when they come to the House of Commons, which necessitates their being away from their homes, their businesses and their professions?

In large part the House of Commons is composed of hon. members who have important business interests and connections, who hold important positions in their professions and several avocations—and who, may I say, have not infrequently been chosen by the electorate for that very reason. Do not forget that. Members of the House of Commons are representing people who know them; and it is amongst other reasons because their constituents believe that their member is a person who will be prepared to make sacrifices for the public good, and because they believe he understands public questions that he is sent here. I say if those members stopped and said to themselves, "Would I be richer or better off at the end of the year if I stayed at home and attended to my practice as a physician or my profession as a lawyer, or if I attended to my business or calling, be it what it may, instead of being a member of parliament?" the answer would be that a large percentage of members of the House of Commons would not be here to-day—and the loss would be great to the nation.

This is a distinction I wish to make clear when the hon. member asks about our looking after ourselves. I say to him that in this matter of indemnities we should not be thinking about ourselves at all as individuals who have personal obligations. We should be thinking of ourselves primarily as members of parliament, as trustees of the nation, as persons shouldering the responsibility of spending billions of dollars of the country's money, and as persons who are anxious to place ourselves in a position where, whether we deal with questions affecting the rich, the poor, or any other class, we can speak our minds without fear and without favour.

I now come to another statement the hon. member made, and one which I believe ought to be cleared up. The hon. member said that we are not granting relief to others, and that it was colossal impudence for the government to bring forward this measure at the present time when nothing was being done for those who were in straitened circumstances. I say it is colossal impudence on the part of the hon. member to make a statement of the kind. Not only is it colossal impudence to address the government in those terms, but it is colossal impudence to impute to the House of Commons and to parliament the suggestion that parliament has been doing nothing to relieve distress during the time it has been here.

I ask the hon. member if the greater part of this session has not been devoted to considering ways and means whereby we can prevent—in addition to the necessity of relieving those of whom he has spoken—hundreds of thousands of people from getting into a position where they will require relief at all. The whole effort of parliament in supporting the government's policies has been to maintain a high level of employment, to maintain a national income of larger proportions, in order that we may not have to be seeking ways and means of relieving persons by the thousands, if not by the hundreds of thousands.

When we consider the policies that have been put forward, policies which have helped create in many countries throughout the world a demand for our goods, policies which have been giving employment which would not otherwise have existed; when one thinks of what has been done for families by distributing to every home where there is young children means whereby they will not feel the distress which otherwise they would feel; when one thinks of what parliament has done in preventing inflation; I say that when one considers these policies, apart from many others, one will see at once that the hon. member is wrong in what he says. I am not crediting the government with this; I am saying that that is what the parliament of Canada has done—and it was the parliament of Canada about which my hon. friend was talking when he spoke in terms of "colossal impudence". I say parliament has recognized its great obligation to the nation, and has recognized it in a magnificent way—and I am speaking irrespective of any party in the house, and giving credit to every representative in the two houses of parliament.

Perhaps I have spoken at sufficient length. Let me say this, however: When the hon. member says that this measure is camouflage, then I think he had better give second thought to that expression. I am not camouflaging in the words I am using, but when I saw my hon. friend having to read much of his speech, and look to his notes to give a list of the difficulties that he said people were experiencing, a lack of this and a lack of that, then refer to his papers to see what else he could bring up that would help to raise prejudice in the minds of many in this country, I began to think there was some camouflage in the speech which he had made.

May I say this one word in conclusion. My hon. friend has said that the men who come into this parliament would be better members if they themselves had suffered from privation or poverty. I take no issue with him on that whatever, provided that they come in with the wisdom that ought to be born of an experience of the kind, without bitterness or prejudice, and prepared thereby to help to make things better for others. But I ask myself: Is the desire to help others the monopoly of the very few? What is the motive that has brought into parliament ninety per cent, if not ninety-nine per cent, of the members that are in this house to-day. There doubtless are exceptions, but I would say that the motive above every other was a desire to help their fellow men and improve conditions for the great body of people in the country. I believe that with most men who go into public life that is the actuating motive, and I do not care whether a member is as well to do as Crœsus, or as poor as a mouse—

An hon. MEMBER: A church mouse.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend says "church mouse". I do believe that the motive in the hearts of most men here, men whose families have been willing to have them leave their homes to go to serve their country in parliament, is that they may help to improve conditions for others.

Somewhere along the path of life sacrifice has played its part in the making of men. I have been fortunate in having had parents who made sacrifices for me. I would not be here to-day; I would not be in public life to-day except for the sacrifices of others. This has made it possible for me to take the part I have taken in public life. I do not forget that before my parents, there were others of theirs who had experienced terrific hardships in seeking to defend freedom and the liberties of the people and to improve the lot of the great masses of the people. I believe it is true that there is not a member of this house who when he looks back into the past will not find that in his early days he has suffered something in the way of privation or distress or that those before him of his own had not known privation and in whose heart there is not as a consequence a desire to improve things for others. Love for and a readiness to help the poor is not a monopoly of a chosen few. We all come by it in one way or another. My mother's father, who himself had suffered exile and imprisonment for causes in which he believed, once said, speaking of the early experiences of his life:

> Well may I love the poor, greatly may I esteem the humble and the lowly, for poverty and adversity were my nurses, and in youth were want and misery my familiar friends; even now it yields a sweet satisfaction to my soul, that I can claim kindred with the obscure cottar, and the humble labourer, of my native, ever honoured ever loved Scotland.

Those words have gone deeply into my soul, more so than any other words I have ever heard or read. I have tried to be true to the trust they have imposed on me. In them will be found the motive which has kept me in public life and I believe a kindred motive has, to a greater or less extent, helped to bring into public life every man and woman in this house.

Motion agreed to; bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Expense allowance to members of the Senate and the House of Commons.

Mr. MacINNIS: When the hon. member for Peace River was speaking he said he was imagining things; he said he was imagining what my logic would be if I had a family of six children. I doubt if that is a matter of logic, but apparently the assumption is that I do not have responsibilities. I took the responsibility for my parents and brought them from my home in eastern Canada to western Canada when I left there. I assumed those responsibilities and the responsibility for other relatives and I am doing that still. No one has any business to ask what my logic would be under circumstances such as these. This follows up the answer I gave to the question of the Prime Minister a moment ago. The hon. member for Peace River wanted to know what my logic would be if my vote were to decide this measure. A man may have a mind which has come to the level where he considers whether he will cast a vote on the basis of whether a thing is going to carry or not carry, but I never had a mind like that, and I do not know just what to reply.

The leader of this group informed me a long time ago that he had discussed this matter with the Prime Minister. I told him then in no uncertain terms what my position would be. He told me that he had informed the Prime Minister that so far as this group was concerned we were not unanimous in our opinion.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is true.

Mr. MacINNIS: When men have minds, if you can call them minds, like the hon. member for Peace River, it does not matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HANSELL: When the resolution was before us I had occasion to talk the matter over with a number of hon. members and I found they were of the opinion that the increase should be paid on a monthly basis. I notice that this section reads:

This allowance shall be paid at the end of each calendar year—

I was wondering if the government had any particular reason for doing that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We considered that very carefully but we found it would be extremely difficult to make the payments on a monthly basis because we would not know until the end of the session what the attendance of members had been, and attendance on sessional duties is an important factor in payment of the allowance.

Section 2 agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. MacINNIS: On division.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Two against.

Motion agreed to on division and bill read the third time and passed.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1945-46

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting supplementary estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1946, was presented by Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

NATIONAL EMERGENCY

BILL TO CONFER CERTAIN POWERS ON THE GOVERNOR IN COUNCIL

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to bill No. 15, to confer certain transitional powers upon the governor in council during the national emergency arising out of the war.

He said: There were two amendments made to the emergency powers bill in the senate. One of them is a decided clarification which will be valuable in the interpretation of the act. It is to add at the end of the act the following:

In this act "war with Germany and Japan" means the war that commenced on the tenth day of September, 1939, against the German reich and subsequently against Italy, Finland, Hungary, Roumania and Japan.

This is for the purpose of making it apparent that when we speak of "the end of the war with Germany and Japan" we mean the end of the war with all those who were allied with them over the past years.

The other amendment, I thought, was not at all necessary but it certainly is not harmful. It is, to insert after the words "orders and regulations" in section 4 and before the words "made under the War Measures Act" the word "lawful". It read before:

the orders and regulations made under the War Measures Act or pursuant to authority created under the said act in force immediately before the day this act comes into force shall . . . continue in full force—

It was felt that there might be some suggestion that this was validating things which had not been lawfully made. My view was that if they had not been lawfully made they were not in force, because when the question goes before the courts, it is not to annul an order but it is to get a declaration that it never was validly made and therefore has no possible legal operation. But the insertion of the word "lawfully" cannot make any embarrassing change. Now it will read "orders and regulations lawfully made under the War Measures Act".

I think that this house could very well accept the amendments which have thus been made.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): We offer no objections to the proposed changes in the bill.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

TRUST COMPANIES ACT

LENDING AND INVESTMENT POWERS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee on bill No. 231, to amend the Trust Companies Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to.

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND—INTERNATIONAL BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee on bill No. 238, for carrying into effect the agreements for an international monetary fund and an international bank for reconstruction and development.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I believe there should be more careful investigation into this act than it has already had. Since we were last considering the bill in this house it has been in the hands of the banking and commerce committee where members have been examining two witnesses, namely, Mr. Rasminsky and to some extent Mr. Mackintosh.

A good deal of information was elicited in the committee, as a result of the consideration of which I think we shall probably be able to judge better what attitude we should take with respect to the bill.

One important thing has occurred since we were discussing the matter in the house and in the committee, namely, that the British house has accepted Bretton Woods. Hon. members will recall that I said at one stage in the discussion, in fact at several stages, that the British house was being clubbed into the acceptance of Bretton Woods. More than a few members have taken me to task for having made that statement. I believe that some of the recent pronouncements from Britain will have a bearing on the matter and I wonder therefore if hon. members will bear with me while I read into the record some of the recent utterances on the question.

The radio to-day, I am informed, carries several important statements, for instance:

Churchill asks the Conservatives to refrain from votes, as a heavy vote would hurt British interests in the United States.

This information is contained also in the Ottawa Journal of to-day.

May I examine that statement for a moment or two? Churchill asks the Conservatives to refrain from voting. May I ask hon. members if any one of them supposes that Churchill would have done that had he considered the Bretton Woods agreement to be in the interests of Great Britain, or of the British empire, or of the world? Would anyone suspect Winston Churchill, the great war prime minister, of having played politics to the extent of depriving the world of so great a benefit as some of the advocates of Bretton Woods have tried to make us believe is to be derived from the agreement?

There is another important aspect to that statement. Obviously the Conservatives in Great Britain, if they had voted on the measure, would have voted against the acceptance of Bretton Woods; for Mr. Churchill says that a heavy vote would have hurt British interests in the United States. Already there was a heavy enough vote. If this house succeeds in rolling up as heavy an adverse vote as the British house did, fifty voting actively against it, this house will do a good deal better than it has thus far shown signs of intending to do. If this house can have relatively as large a proportion of its members refraining from voting for Bretton Woods as refrained from voting in Britain, the results again will be impressive and much more optimistic for those who oppose Bretton Woods than I feel justified in expecting here.

There is another important implication in the statement, namely, that Churchill seems to suspect that in the United States administration there is an attitude which would cause that administration to take steps that would be retaliatory against Great Britain, adversely affecting the interests of Britain in the United States. As just one common member of this house trying to think his way through this whole thing, I ask sincerely, in the light of that statement, does anyone suppose that Britain was not clubbed into accepting Bretton Woods?

Right after Mr. Churchill made that remark a foreign minister said that the statement was a libel on the administration of the United States. This remark would tend to indicate that my interpretation of Churchill's statement is correct, namely, that in that statement he definitely implied that a heavy vote would adversely affect Great Britain's interest. By that remark he implied that certain people in the United States administration would take punitive measures against Great Britain's interest in the United States.

Another thing that came over the air greatly impressed me as worthy of the consideration of every member of this committee. In commenting the London papers said that the terms were harsh, but there was no alternative.

Mr. COLDWELL: Terms of what?—the Bretton Woods agreement or the new loan?

Mr. BLACKMORE: If the loan had not been bound up with the Bretton Woods agreement there could hardly have been any harshness in the terms of the loan. You must draw the conclusion that the Bretton Woods agreement, being tied up with the loan, was what constituted the harsh terms. I see no other conclusion.

Mr. COLDWELL: Oh, yes, certainly there is another conclusion.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The member for Rosetown-Biggar has the right to suggest what it is.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have suggested it before.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Suppose he suggest it now for the record, so that I can deal with it.

Mr. COLDWELL: Make your speech.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I expected that would be the answer.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Chairman, I can reply to it, but I am not going to prolong the hon. member's speech.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I expected that would be the rejoinder, too. I am getting so I can forecast the remarks of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is good.

Mr. WRIGHT: After they have been made.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. BLACKMORE: As further information bearing on this whole general question may I read into the record for the benefit of the future, if not for the benefit of any hon. members of the house, a report from London dated December 13, as found on page 2 of the Ottawa Citizen of the same date. This is a report by Basil Dean, a special Evening Citizen correspondent, and copyrighted by the Southam Press:

> The British parliament this evening will vote approval of the Washington loan agreement. But it will accept it in the grudging manner of a man who knows he is paying too much for something he desperately needs and can get from no other source. This much is clear from the attitude of government spokesmen, labour backbenchers, and Conservative opposition members in the commons debate which is now going on.
> The government obviously likes the terms of the agreement no better than anyone else—

That should be interesting to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. I continue:

> —but knows from records of Washington talks that they are the best that can be obtained. The Conservatives are not enamoured of them either, but in the absence of any alternative plan to ease the nation's desperate plight, are abstaining from to-night's division so that they will have their hands free to criticize if need be later on.

In the light of that statement we might conclude that they were going to play politics, but in the light of the statement which I have recently read they were not playing politics so much as would be indicated by this statement. I continue:

> Some labour members are bitterly opposed to the loan because they think it will hog-tie the socialist programme and they are being left to vote according to their consciences.
> Only Lord Beaverbrook has a plan all cut and dried. In his newspapers he is urging rejection of the loan so that Britain can retire into empire free trade—

I feel that the idea in mind there is the Bretton Woods proposals. The article goes on:

> —and use the immense internal commerce of the commonwealth as a bargaining weapon to exact liberal trading terms from foreign nations —including the United States.
> But Beaverbrook's cause is lost. It is not even getting the support of the Conservative party which negotiated the Ottawa agreements of 1932 and placed Britain's trading on a limited imperial preference basis. It is conceded that the Beaverbrook plan would be the only alternative to the American loan. But no party can bring itself to face the bleak prospect of prolongation and probable tightening of austerity living which must result if the loan is rejected.
> So, with a feeling that they are signing part of the nation's birthright away, Britain's legislators to-day are accepting the inevitable.

That hardly leaves any doubt as to whether or not Britain is being clubbed into accepting Bretton Woods. I believe that gives real reason to hon. members for reconsidering the whole question of Bretton Woods and the bill which is based upon it.

May I refer to two or three things which have occurred in this debate and in the country so that we might more successfully examine the bill and the Bretton Woods proposals now before us. In the minister's speech we were told that the issue involved in Bretton Woods, and presumably in the bill based upon it is this: Shall we have peace? May I read from the minister's remarks as they appear on page 3040 of Hansard:

That issue is: are we and other countries to organize and cooperate for peace, or is each nation going to use its strength and resources at the expense of others in a struggle for survival?

We have been told that the principle of this bill, which was given second reading by the house, was international cooperation to prevent us from getting into economic troubles in the future. Just to make sure that I am not misinterpreting, may I read from the words of the Minister of Finance in reply to a statement of the hon. member for Souris, as they appear on page 3218 of Hansard:

Yes. The principle would be international cooperation to prevent us from getting into economic troubles in the future.

Well, apparently Britain does not feel very confident that she is going to keep out of economic troubles through signing the thing, but that is the stand of the Minister of Finance, couched in his own words. The government's reason for supporting this bill I think is to be gathered from the white paper issued to the house in April, 1945, by the Minister of Reconstruction, on page 7 of which I find these words:

It would outlaw the discriminatory currency practices which turned trade into economic warfare.

This is the guidance and direction we have up to the present time in our study of the bill and the Bretton Woods proposal.

It seems to me highly desirable that we should define our terms with some accuracy at this point. Just what are the discriminatory practices, and what is economic war? It will be recalled by all hon. members, I believe, that President Wilson made a statement to the effect that military war always resulted from hot commercial rivalry or economic war. Consequently if by any means we could prevent economic war we might hope to rid ourselves of military war. So the statement in the government white paper on the face of it looks rather attractive. Let us see if we can determine for ourselves what economic warfare is and what are these discriminatory practices. May I read from the statement of the Minister of Finance again, because I thought he gave a good definition of these discriminatory practices at page 3041 of Hansard, referring to the depression:

The result was the stangulation of world trade and the mutual impoverishment of all countries. The characteristic features of world economic relationships before the war were high and discriminatory tariffs, import quotas, export subsidies, depreciated currencies of uncertain value, discriminatory clearing agreements, multiple currency practices.

It would appear, then, that the reason the government proposes to support Bretton Woods and is so desperately anxious for us to approve it is that it will render all such things as the minister has mentioned illegal, or at least will tend to eliminate them. Just to bolster up the minister's words, to some extent, by another authority, may I refer to the speech of Henry Morgenthau, Junior, delivered before the delegates to Bretton Woods, which appears on page 9 of the proceedings of the united nations monetary and financial conference, which I obtained from the House of Commons library. Referring to Bretton Woods he said:

This is the alternative to the desperate tactics of the past—competitive currency depreciation, excessive tariff barriers, uneconomic barter deals, multiple currency practices and unnecessary exchange restrictions—by which governments vainly sought to maintain employment and uphold living standards. In the final analysis these tactics only succeeded in contributing to world-wide depression and even war. The international fund agreed upon at Bretton Woods will help remedy this situation.

It will be noticed that Mr. Morgenthau's remarks are not quite so positive and far-reaching as the statement in the government white paper, and are probably just about the same as the remarks of the minister, as to certainty. I am desirous of being completely fair, because here I am endeavouring to conduct a cold-blooded, intellectual inquiry into this whole matter, entirely devoid of passion and strong feeling. We have the sort of things that are called trade restrictions. What is economic warfare? May I read to hon. members again the statement in the government white paper, which I fancy is of importance to us because I presume it was written by some of the officials, by Mr. Rasminsky, by Mr. Mackintosh, or perhaps Doctor Clark or perhaps several others. Referring to Bretton Woods it says:

It would outlaw the discriminatory currency practices which turned trade into economic war.

I desire to examine the truthfulness and accuracy of that statement. In order to do so I wish first to get an idea for us to work on as to what economic warfare is and while I do this I am going to ask hon. members to consider with me the relationships between Canada and the United States to see if we can find out what would constitute economic warfare between these two countries. There must be danger of it. If any hon. member deems that I go astray as I explore this matter I would really appreciate having my attention drawn to the fact. It is well known that Canada has used tariffs for generations. Why does Canada use tariffs against goods coming in from the United States? I think everyone would agree that we use these tariffs for two reasons, first in order to derive revenue therefrom, but perhaps mainly, though I will not be dogmatic on the matter, to keep out of the Canadian market goods from the United States. Canada realizes that if United States shoes, we will say, come into the Canadian market and are sold at a rate below that for which Canadian shoes can be sold, they are the shoes that will be bought and the Canadian product will be left unused; Canadian factories will be in danger of closing and Canadian workmen will be in danger of being thrown out of employment. I wonder if that is right. Then why did Canada raise tariffs against the United States? To protect Canada against United States industrial penetration into Canada. What was that United States industrial penetration? What was the United States doing when she sent goods into Canada to sell for less than the same goods could be produced for here? Was she engaging in economic warfare? If she was not will someone tell me to what extent she was not? If she were allowed to go on sending American goods of all kinds into Canada how long would it be before a vast percentage of the Canadian people would be unemployed, a vast percentage of Canadian wealth would be destroyed, and a vast amount of Canadian revenue would be lost? In other words, economically Canada would be conquered if she did not put up the tariff. May I ask hon. members if any one of them believes that Canada, when she raised the tariff against United States goods coming into Canada, was engaged in economic warfare? Will anyone assert that she was? Hardly. Canada was simply protecting herself against United States economic warfare, was she not?

Let us turn to one of the other trade restrictions, namely, foreign exchange control. As is well known, during the war Canada has used foreign exchange control with great wisdom and with great success. What for? It was to prevent too much of United States goods and services from coming into Canada during the war. If I am wrong, will someone tell me. There was a pressure for United States goods to enter Canada, even during the war, and if we had not used exchange control and tariffs during the war we would have emerged from it with Canadian industry virtually destroyed. In other words, we should have emerged economically conquered by the United States. Will anyone argue that the foreign exchange control which we exercised during the war was a species of economic warfare? Or, again, was it not a measure designed by Canada for protection from economic warfare?

Let me turn to one further point. In the discussions on this important question I have already referred to what Japan did in 1933 and 1934. She was able to sell for about $5.75 or $6 bicycles for which we would have charged $50 in Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. BLACKMORE: No wonder the hon. member feels like calling "carried", after that. It must be getting pretty hard to stand.

Mr. FOURNIER (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): You are right.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes, the truth is hard to stand, and especially under these circumstances.

Will anyone argue that Canada should have gone on permitting Japan to sell not only toys and many other things, but bicycles and every other kind of commodity she could produce on a rice standard of living? Would anyone argue that Canada should have allowed those goods to come into this country, thereby displacing Canadian goods and destroying Canadian industry? What did Canada use as a means of preventing any such mishap? She used the quota, did she not, which in effect was an embargo? When Canada used the quota, will anyone argue that she was engaging in economic warfare against Japan? Or was she merely protecting her economy against Japanese economic warfare? I suggest the answer is obvious. She was merely protecting her economy against Japanese economic warfare.

It becomes necessary for Canada from time to time to protect herself against United States economic warfare by means of quotas. There have been times when the United States has endeavoured to dump goods in Canada. I might refer in that connection to my own constituency, and give an example which hon. members will readily recognize. In the southern part of my constituency strawberries and other small fruits are produced. The growers depend upon the Canadian market. United States growers just across the boundary line, about a hundred miles away, are able to produce the same fruits about two weeks earlier. If we did not do something in the matter United States growers would send their berries into Canada, thereby supplying the Canadian market and filling cellars upon which Canadian producers depend for their market. Obviously that would be a most destructive procedure for Canadian growers. So what do we use? We use anti-dumping laws. What are they? They are a species of quota. Is that economic warfare against the United States?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Would a Social Credit government impose embargoes against imports of goods? Does the hon. member favour that method of preventing goods from coming in?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wonder if the hon. member would permit me to answer after I have finished my argument. I shall be happy to answer it, but just now I am examining the soundness of the government's statement in the white paper that trade restrictions turn trade into economic warfare. I am now asking whether an anti-dumping law, which is a species of quota, was a species of economic warfare, or whether it was a protection against economic warfare from another country. I think all must agree that it was a species of protection against economic warfare.

We have now dealt with three of those undesirable restrictions against trade. Is there any hon. member who would say that he would oppose Canada's use of any of these three restrictions as a means of protecting her economy? I doubt it. And yet apparently Bretton Woods, from the statement of Henry Morgenthau, the statement contained in the Canadian white paper, and the implications which can be drawn from the statement of the Minister of Finance as I have quoted it, is designed to render it less possible to use these protective devices against economic warfare. Would anyone vote for a measure which would render it impossible or less possible for Canada to use these trade restrictions?

It is well known to all hon. members that as soon as the trade balance between Canada and the United States becomes adverse to the extent that Canada is in real danger, the Canadian dollar, if allowed to fluctuate naturally in accordance with the law of supply and demand, will go down in relation to the United States dollar. That is, it will fall in value. What is that fall in value? It is currency depreciation, is it not? It is impossible to get the facts in connection with this matter, but I believe I am correct in saying that the government to-day is deliberately and designedly maintaining the Canadian dollar at a value lower than the United States dollar, largely to keep from having too much United States goods coming into Canada, and thereby disturbing the Canadian balance of trade position.

Will anyone argue that we should not be free to allow our dollar to fall in value, as compared with the United States dollar, to protect our economy against United States goods? Will anyone argue against the soundness of currency depreciation as a means of protecting our economy against economic warfare with the United States? I doubt very seriously whether anyone in the committee would do anything that would put Canada in a position in which she could not be free to use currency depreciation, in the event of its being necessary, in order to protect her economy against economic warfare. I do not think any hon. member would venture to say that in allowing that action to be taken Canada would be engaging in economic warfare against the United States. In the light of the four illustrations which I have used, namely, tariffs, foreign exchange control, quotas and currency devaluation; in the light of those four and of the four illustrations, would anyone in this house argue for a moment that Canada in using those four would be engaging in economic warfare?

Take the government's statement in this white paper, which I read once more:

> It would outlaw the discriminatory currency practices which turned trade into economic warfare.

It is true that all that is mentioned there is currency practices, and the devaluation of the dollar is only one of those. As I have read in Morgenthau's remarks, and in the minister's remarks in his introductory speech, other trade restrictions are intended; so perhaps I would be justified in reading that statement from the government paper in some such way as this: It would outlaw the discriminatory currency practices and other trade restrictions which turned trade into economic warfare. If I am doing too much violence to the sense of the statement, the minister will correct me, or Mr. Mackintosh, who I notice is in the chamber ready to assist the minister.

I wish to examine that statement in the light of the facts. Will anyone in the light of what I have said argue that trade restrictions such as tariffs, exchange control, depreciation of currency and quotas would turn trade into economic warfare? Would anyone in this chamber accept that for a moment? Is it not rather true that economic warfare brings on trade restrictions, tariffs, depreciation of currencies, quotas and exchange controls? From what I have said I think it must be clear that the statement made in the government white paper is an absolute economic fallacy. Apparently the government's policy with regard to Bretton Woods is based on an economic fallacy. Apparently that was not by accident, because the passage in the minister's speech to which I referred carries the same idea. May I read it again? He said:

> The result was the strangulation of world trade and the mutual impoverishment of all countries. The characteristic features of world economic relationships before the war were high and discriminatory tariffs, import quotas, export subsidies, depreciated currencies of uncertain value, discriminatory clearing agreements, multiple currency practices.

May I read the words following that statement where the minister continues:

> I am certain that in no quarter of the house is there a desire to see the world return to these pre-war practices. But if the nations of the world are left to their own devices and are not bound together in an association of mutual advantage which will set certain standards for its members, they will in my opinion inevitably revert to the practices I have described.

The minister will correct me if I draw a false conclusion. The conclusion I am drawing is that the minister was endeavouring to argue in favour of the adoption of Bretton Woods on the ground that it would prevent these practices. Does anyone in this house wish to see the nations tied to an agreement that will render it impossible for the various nations to use such measures as are at their disposal to protect their economy against economic warfare? We have been told time and again by certain men in this chamber that Canada will derive much benefit from Bretton Woods. I ask hon. members if they think Canada will derive much benefit from an agreement that would render her unable to keep up tariffs to protect her own industries, unable to adopt foreign exchange control in case of need, unable to apply quotas and anti-dumping duties, unable to allow her dollar to fall in relation to her neighbour's dollar; would anyone consider that a measure that prevented her from using those would be a measure in the interest of Canada, that from the application of such a measure Canada would derive any benefit?

Let us leave Canada for a while. Let us remember that Canada is just one of the weaker economies. As a result of her war effort, Britain has become another weaker economy. That is why it is of such desperate seriousness to Britain that the Bretton Woods agreement is forced upon her at the present time. Evidently Britain understands that when Bretton Woods is applied to her it will be impossible for her to use the tariff to keep out United States goods if she wishes to keep them out. impossible for her to use quotas, impossible for her to use foreign exchange control, and impossible for her to use depreciation of currency.

Mr. CLEAVER: Would the hon. member be good enough to read the portions of the Bretton Woods agreements which he claims substantiate his argument?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I can do that.

Mr. CLEAVER: I would say that there are no such provisions in the agreements.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Will the hon. member for Halton tell us why the government's white paper gives as one reason for supporting Bretton Woods the fact that it will do just that thing? Will the hon. member for Halton tell us why Henry Morgenthau advocated the acceptance of Bretton Woods because it would do that very thing? Will anyone tell me why the Minister of Finance in his speech opening the debate implied that the main reason for adopting Bretton Woods was that it would do that very thing?

Mr. CLEAVER: Does the hon. member wish me to answer?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes. We are here to get information.

Mr. CLEAVER: I do not want the hon. member to take offence at my answer, but he has asked so many questions on premises which he himself asserts but which in reality are not facts that I do not feel free to answer any of them.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Will the hon. member for Halton say that Henry Morgenthau did not say, in the passage I read from his speech to the delegates at Bretton Woods, that Bretton Woods would prevent or help to prevent these trade restrictions?

Mr. CLEAVER: The hon. member will have to put his own interpretation on that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. member is putting his interpretation on it and the hon. member for Halton finds it impossible to dispute his words.

Mr. CLEAVER: I thought it was quite a reasonable request, and I did not make it with the idea of stirring up any contentious discussion. I simply asked a plain question—if the hon. member would be good enough to read any term of the Bretton Woods agreements which would support the argument he has made to the committee.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. member has asked me to read from Bretton Woods. Will the hon. member tell the committee that the Bretton Woods agreement is not designed to prevent these trade restrictions?

Mr. CLEAVER: I will say this, and say it quite frankly to my hon. friend: I have read the agreements carefully. Will the members of the Social Credit party point to any term of either of these agreements which would lead to such a conclusion? I have yet to hear any member of the party point to any provision in either of these agreements as substantiating the charges he has now made.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Then I suppose hon. members of all parties, except perhaps the Liberals, and probably half of them, realize that the hon. member for Halton's statement has convicted the Minister of Finance of misrepresenting Bretton Woods, and he has also convicted Henry Morgenthau of misrepresenting Bretton Woods, and further he has convicted the government white paper of misrepresenting Bretton Woods. You see what the government white paper says.

Mr. CLEAVER: But you do not answer the question.

Mr. KUHL: Neither do you.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The argument is so overwhelming that any ordinary man must see it.

Mr. CLEAVER: The hon. member has not answered me, because he cannot point to any item in the agreements which will lead to that conclusion.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If there is no term in the agreement—I am not saying whether there is or is not, but I have a reason for bringing this point out—it must be quite obvious to all hon. members that there is not a doubt in the world that the Minister of Finance endeavoured to convey to the members of this house the impression that Bretton Woods would tend to remove these trade restrictions.

Mr. CLEAVER: By mutual consultation between the nations, and the like.

Mr. HANSELL: What do you need the act for, then?

Mr. HLYNKA: Don't let him get you off the track.

Mr. BLACKMORE: He is not getting me off the track; the only person getting off the track is the hon. member for Halton himself. He will never succeed; he has tried that before. Let me read once more what is said in the government white paper, which was the first official government pronouncement after Bretton Woods:

> Having regard to the widespread character of our trade, the government attaches special importance also to the reconstitution of multilateral trade on a firm basis and arrangements under which the proceeds of our exports may be spent wherever we desire to obtain our imports.

I am reading these words so that no one will suppose I am taking the statement out of its context.

> It is with these objects in mind that the government has participated in the development of the plans for the international monetary fund and the united nations bank of reconstruction and development on which agreement among experts was reached at Bretton Woods in July last.
> The monetary fund plan would assure comparative stability of exchange rates and, where change was desirable, would substitute for competitive depreciation of exchanges an orderly process of change following international consultation. It would outlaw the discriminatory currency practices which turned trade into economic warfare. When it was fully in operation, it would assure the convertibility of the proceeds of our sales abroad into whatever currencies we required for our current needs.

I think I need read no more. Certainly the idea is definitely conveyed there that Bretton Woods would "outlaw" certain practices. I wonder if an agreement which is made by a number of people meeting together with their feet under the table can be called "outlawing". The word outlaw is a very strong word to use there. It refers to the kind of thing that a king may do when he is dealing with a citizen. We do not use the word commonly nowadays. I think the hon. member for Halton will have to confess that if there is not in the Bretton Woods agreement a stipulation or a collection of stipulations or an arrangement of stipulations, all through this highly complex and highly complicated affair, which would enable us to prevent these trade restrictions, then both Henry Morgenthau and the Minister of Finance have misrepresented Bretton Woods.

Mr. CLEAVER: That is not true.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I think all hon. members can quite clearly see that the administration is in a pretty awkward position if all these gentlemen who have advocated Bretton Woods—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I must remind the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. HANSELL: Mr. Chairman, I did not rise to speak upon this matter, but to make an observation only. The hon. member for Halton is, if I am not mistaken, a lawyer. I think he is in danger of looking at this agreement as though he were sitting on the bench, as though the agreement were in force and he had to make a decision. The difference between that attitude and that of parliament is this: when you are passing a bill you must look at it from a certain point of view; you must regard it in the light of all its possible results. So when we are considering a matter of this kind we are compelled to say: Now, if this measure passes will it have this result, or will it have some other result? This is exactly what we are doing; and we are contending that it will have certain results. Whether a thing is stipulated in a certain clause or not is not the point; and I think the hon. member's question is a very poor one indeed.

Mr. FRASER: As a member of the banking and commerce committee which studied these proposals I should like to say a few words. This committee sat in the railway room of the House of Commons, during what was zero weather outside and nearly zero inside. The committee sat about seven hours a day and really did good work trying to understand these proposals. But I do not think it had sufficient time to study them thoroughly and to examine enough witnesses, because we were told that this measure had to pass parliament before December 31. We called two witnesses; they were very good witnesses, but I believe we should have had more, and I am not satisfied that the committee got all the information that it should have had.

One thing which we were told in the committee and which, I think, we have to bear in mind when we are dealing with these proposals, is that their main object is to provide a healthier framework for better trading relations. That is a condition which we must have in this world if we are to have peace, and I hope and pray that we shall have peace for some years to come.

At the present time it looks as though Canada and other countries might have a depression, or perhaps a condition of unemployment, owing to the fact that it requires time to change over from war to peace. What is necessary is not only reconversion of industry but reconversion of our employees and readjustment of the plans that private industry has in Canada at the present time, with the throwing off of many of the controls which have been holding down industry during the war years. There is every possibility that within the next five years industry in Canada will spend at least $3,000 million of new money in expanding industries and establishing new ones, and I feel that these Bretton Woods agreements may assist in enabling Canada to dispose of the goods which these industries will produce.

After reading the final act and the bill which we have before us, I am going to be quite honest and say that I am still foggy on some of the articles of the bill and of the final act. I am quite sure, as I said yesterday morning in the banking and commerce committee, that there are probably not more than half a dozen members of this parliament who thoroughly understand these agreements and proposals. I also said that even if they said they did, I doubted it. We had two witnesses before the committee, both expert financial men, who gave excellent evidence. They knew their stuff. Even those witnesses had to be prompted a few times; one would have to inform the other on certain things. Nevertheless they were good, and they answered any questions that were put to them, or volunteered to get the information. The member for Lethbridge asked questions; the witnesses said they would get the information and hand it in, and I imagine they looked it up in the office. I asked questions, and one of the witnesses kindly passed them on to the chairman of the committee. The chairman, I may say, did a really good job; he never squeezed us out if we wanted to get information. But these experts, financial wizards I suppose one should call them, were not quite sure of themselves on some questions. I feel that even the Minister of Finance would not know all the answers to questions we could ask him.

Mr. ILSLEY: Do you think so?

Mr. FRASER: I do think so. At the same time I wish to give these witnesses the highest praise. They did a good job. The Bretton Woods agreement will help Canada. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: How?

Mr. FRASER: "How" and "why" are words we all use, and we like to get an answer when we use them. I feel that while the Bretton Woods agreement may not be a cure-all—

Mr. BLACKMORE: It does not cure anything.

Mr. FRASER: —there is not a man in this house who is not willing to accept it. There is not a man here who is not willing to go out and buy a ticket to help some society. He takes a chance on this, that, and the other thing, and here we have to take a chance too. Canada must take a chance on this.

An hon. MEMBER: It takes the rap on it.

Mr. FRASER: No. It is not taking the rap, but it has to take a chance.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is a pig in a poke.

Mr. FRASER: It is not a pig in a poke, because there is something solid behind it. It is the very best that the experts of all the countries had to offer.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Pretty bad best.

Mr. FRASER: Well, there is no alternative. We must try these things. Members should vote for it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Sight unseen.

Mr. FRASER: Members of parliament had a chance to read the agreement and try to understand the different phases of it, and to understand the bank. I did not interrupt the hon. gentleman—

Mr. BLACKMORE: I beg, the hon. member's pardon.

Mr. FRASER: —and I will add that he contributed a good deal to the discussion. I did not agree with everything he said, though there were many things he said that appealed to me. This afternoon again he has said many things with which I agree and others I do not agree with. And I am hard to convince; the chairman of the committee knows that. Last night there was one little phase of a question that I was trying to get straight in my mind, and the witness, Mr. Rasminsky, was kind enough to enlighten me.

I am going to vote for this measure because I see no alternative. I think it will help Canada. It appears to me to be partly on the gold standard, and if it is, it certainly will help the country. Anything that will help Canada I am for. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I am going to vote for it.

Mr. CASE: My contribution will be more in the form of an inquiry. We have not all had the advantage of listening to the experts in the committee, but I presume the matter was fully threshed out there and no one will expect me to have at my command a working knowledge of the subject. I notice that Canada's contribution to the fund will amount in the aggregate to $700 million. Is that $350 million to one part of the plan and $350 million to another?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is $325 million to the bank and $300 million to the fund in American dollars.

Mr. CASE: That possibly answers the question I had in mind as to what the form of the deposit was, how we would provide our deposit fund, and whether we would put up a substantial sum in gold.

Mr. ILSLEY: That was all explained. It is all in the agreement.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I wish to make a brief comment in rising to support the bill. We had an excellent explanation before the banking and commerce committee, and I think the situation is quite clear. No one tried to pretend that Bretton Woods was a magic, that it would do impossible things and solve all problems. On the other hand it was represented to us that it embodied the work of able men who had devoted much thought to the subject, and it is put forward now as the only means we have at the moment of trying to avert what might easily turn into financial chaos and the prevention of trade between countries.

The expert who gave most evidence referred to it as a breathing spell, and I was grateful to him for not having attempted to exaggerate.

What is the position? We have this agreement before us at the moment. It might have been improved, perhaps, and maybe if the experts sat down to-day they could improve it. But if we cast it aside, what do we do? We cast everything again into jeopardy, and it may be many months before another agreement can be arrived at, because it is not easy for forty-four experts to come to an understanding. It is hard enough for forty-four ordinary men to agree on any question, and all the harder for forty-four experts.

The whole thing is summed up in my mind in an illustration that I hope will not be regarded as trivial. Certainly it will come home to a great many men who lived during the first great war, which is a little outmoded now. One almost blushes to refer to it, but it did take place. Some of you will probably remember a cartoon that appeared at that time depicting two men in a shell hole, the shells bursting all round them. They were feeling quite unhappy, and evidently had been having a strenuous argument as to what to do. The legend below the picture was: "If you knows of a better 'ole, go to it!"

I hope, as I said, this will not be regarded as a trivial illustration, but if it is, then I offer another that will certainly not be received in that light. Whatever else it may be, it certainly is not trivial. I suggest that this is an act of faith. We are living in a dangerous world where we can live only by faith. Holy Writ tells us that the just shall live by faith, but in these days we must all live by faith, whether we are just or unjust. Indeed, in this dangerous world, I do not know that we have much else to live by.

Someone has pointed out, very truly, I think, that in the year from June, 1940, when the other nations collapsed, to June, 1941, when Russia came in, there was just no reason for us to believe that we were going to win the war; yet we did believe that we would win. I say therefore that this agreement before us represents an act of faith on our part. What do I mean? I mean that it is a beginning. But if we can begin in this way, other things will follow. If we can begin by some kind of financial cooperation, it will be a help. It is only a beginning; an understanding in trade is necessary. But we can begin with this act of faith, next summer we may have another act of faith. When trade arrangements are made they will be an act of faith for the moment too.

If the terms that have been granted to England are harsh to-day, let us work together, and have faith that they will be revised. If we can work together for a year or two years, then we can have faith that we shall strengthen our capacity to work together, and that we shall go on and on. That is why I say that it is an act of faith which I think we can all support.

Mr. LOW: I should like to sum up briefly the position which the Social Credit group takes with respect to this whole matter before section 1 is passed. I shall not take very much of the time of the committee, but I feel that I am duty bound to summarize our arguments in this way.

I listened carefully to every word that was said in this house, as well as in the banking and commerce committee, with respect to Bretton Woods. I have read everything that I could get my hands on that had anything to say for or against Bretton Woods. I listened with great care to the evidence that was given in the committee by Mr. Rasminsky and Doctor Mackintosh. I have not missed one single minute of the whole of the discussions that have taken place with respect to this measure.

In the banking and commerce committee I believe I listened to the finest discussion that I have ever heard on any subject, a debate in which mind met mind in a fair and comprehensive manner. I say without any equivocation that I enjoyed that discussion immensely, and only wish with all my heart that it could be carried on with other witnesses under examination—because in the committee we had only the witnesses who were involved in the building up of the Bretton Woods agreement for the government and not any others; therefore we had no opportunity whatever to listen to the other side of the question.

As a result of all that I have been able to read and hear, I feel that the contentions of the Social Credit group have been successfully maintained; that our major criticisms of Bretton Woods have been proved. At no stage of the procedure from the day the resolution was introduced into the house until now have I heard anything that would in any way argue successfully against these contentions.

In the first place it is still our sincere belief that the Bretton Woods agreement has a distinct pro-creditor-nation bias. Mr. Rasminsky's evidence showed conclusively that nowhere in the whole agreement is there any provision which will assure that creditor nations will receive imports of goods in payment for their exports to those debtor nations, which is the only way in which debtor nations may be able to avoid piling up huge burdens of interest-bearing and unpayable debt. On the other hand, sir, the Bretton Woods agreement does impose upon debtor nations the responsibility of abolishing the means by which they might protect themselves against economic invasion and warfare waged by the big industrial creditor nations. Therefore in our minds the scheme stands condemned because of this fundamental weakness.

In the second place the Social Credit claim that Bretton Woods establishes a form of gold standard has been successfully substantiated—not the gold standard of 1914 or 1925; nevertheless a form of gold standard as admitted by Mr. Rasminsky in his evidence, a form of gold standard in some ways worse than any hitherto used, in that it succeeds in removing from debtor nations their means of protection against economic warfare without in any way removing the causes of that war.

In the third place there has been no satisfactory attempt to refute the Social Credit claim that article XI of the agreement provides a boycott that can and must be invoked by member nations against non-member nations. Therefore in this respect our claim must stand as maintained.

In the fourth place it was the consensus of all who spoke, and of the witnesses heard in the committee, that it would require a change of heart within each nation if Bretton Woods were ever to be made to work successfully. Our contention is, and always has been, that if a change of heart occurs amongst the nations and within the nations, there will be no need for a Bretton Woods.

It has been argued here to-day, sir, that there is no alternative, that there is no "better 'ole". In our speeches and in our arguments on a number of occasions we have put forward what is a successful and a scientific alternative to Bretton Woods, and does not contain the weaknesses or the dangers of Bretton Woods. By that I mean the London chamber of commerce proposals, the Twentieth Century Economic System. I am satisfied that that is a better arrangement than Bretton Woods. I feel sure, Mr. Chairman, that if we had time we could prove that it is a satisfactory alternative to Bretton Woods. I am only sorry that there has been such evidence of indecent haste in trying to get this measure through, because I should like to have been able to present that alternative point by point. I understand, of course, that it would entail the necessity of convincing other nations; but, sir, that is no reason why we should not take time to examine the whole of any alternative proposal that is brought forward in the hope that we might be able to induce some of the other nations whose heart might change, as has been said, to adopt that alternative and not attach all of its faith to Bretton Woods.

My colleagues and I successfully have maintained that the whole of Bretton Woods is based upon fraudulent claims, and therefore it is not to be thought of as any mechanism for curing the world's ills.

It has been argued by some hon. members that we must live by faith. That is quite true; but I cannot look upon Bretton Woods as any act of faith. I do not like to feel that I am pinning my faith upon the same old system, the same old financial machinery that before this war brought us misery, destitution, breadlines, business stagnation, unemployment problems and all the suffering to humanity that it did. How in the name of common sense anybody can pin his faith upon that same old system under another face is beyond me. If they think, Mr. Chairman, that this will in any way change the complexion of things in the years to come, then their faith is certainly being pinned upon a shadow.

After weighing all the evidence and hearing all the arguments, my judgment is that our position has been adequately maintained, and therefore we can do no more than say we have served the interests of the people to the best of our ability. We have maintained our position right through, in spite of all efforts to hurry this up and cut us off. We have received wires and telephone calls from people all across this country asking us to continue to wage our battle, asking us to keep up the fight; they have numbered into the dozens during the course of an afternoon. But, sir, there is a limit to the endurance both of the members of this group and of this house, and I say to you that I feel we have discharged our responsibilities to the limit of our capabilities. For that reason I am going to close the case with this warning. The next few years will vindicate our judgment, and one day the Social Credit group in this house will be credited with having done something during this past week that might eventually save the British commonwealth of nations. I hope it will. However, in all seriousness I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that we had better look to these things which are around us; we had better examine them inside and out; we had better spare no effort in finding out exactly what we are doing. The next time any important measures like this comes up, I would suggest to the government that they get the measure into the house in plenty of time so that we may examine it thoroughly; and, having done so, make up our minds on the basis of the facts adduced and the evidence brought forward. The Social Credit members stand united in their opposition to Bretton Woods.

Mr. CLEAVER: I rise to offer a few remarks on this measure in the hope that I may be able to create just a little doubt in the minds of my Social Credit friends as to their fears, which I think are based largely upon misunderstanding and misgivings which have no reality in fact. I do not want to weary the committee in dealing with this subject. It would take many times forty minutes to attempt to outline to the committee what the agreements contain, to say nothing of how it is hoped they will operate.

The Bretton Woods agreements have to do with international exchange rates and international credits. For the moment I shall content myself with simply reading briefly the main object that is hoped to be attained through each agreement. I refer now to article I of the agreement with respect to the international monetary fund, which states that the object this fund hopes to attain is to promote international monetary cooperation through a permanent institution which will provide the machinery for consultation and collaboration on international monetary problems. The capital involved is $8,800 million; and just here I may say that in all these figures I am about to mention the dollars are given in relation to United States funds. Canada's contribution to the fund is $300 million, of which we are to furnish twenty-five per cent in gold and the balance in Canadian currency. So that Canada's quota works out to 3·41 per cent of the fund. Then, in regard to the bank the main object, according to article I of the agreement, is:

To assist in the reconstruction and development of territories of members by facilitating the investment of capital for productive purposes. . .

The authorized capital is $10,000 million and Canada's contribution is $325 million, of which only two per cent is to be paid in gold and eighteen per cent in Canadian currency, the remainder being subject to call. In this case our total contribution, if calls were made to the full extent provided for in the act, would be 3·5 per cent of the authorized capital.

Those who oppose this measure do so on the following grounds; I may not state them in exactly the language used by individual members, but I think I can fairly sum up the objections to the Bretton Woods agreements that we have heard from the Social Credit party. Their first criticism is that Canada has not given to these agreements the time and attention which the importance of the subject demands. The next objection is that we have acquired no substantial benefits, and that at the same time we have shackled ourselves in regard to future actions. As far as the agreements themselves are concerned their complaints are two-fold. They state the agreements will result in a return to the gold standard, and further that creditor nations are not compelled to accept payment in goods from debtor nations. I have carefully listened to all the discussion both in this house and in committee with regard to the agreements, and I believe that the objections and arguments I have just outlined are a fair resume of the position taken by the Social Credit party in opposition to these agreements. If I have erred in any way I shall thank any hon. member of that party to correct me, because I feel that if we are to get anywhere in any discussion we must at least be fair in outlining the position of our opponents.

Mr. LOW: That is fair enough.

Mr. CLEAVER: With respect to the first criticism, that Canada has rushed into these agreements and has not taken sufficient time to consider them, I wish to say that Canada did not rush into the agreements. As far back as 1943, and prior to that, the same financial experts who performed such a wonderful job for this country in financing our war effort were studying these post-war problems; and as early as 1943 they reduced to writing suggestions they had to make in regard to the approach to this problem of international exchange and international credits. Those recommendations or suggestions were reduced to writing and submitted to the experts of other countries for consideration long before the Bretton Woods conference. Then, when the conference came, Canada sent to it a distinguished delegation, composed of the best brains in this country in regard to financial and other matters, if I may be permitted to say so.

[Mr. Cleaver.]

Mr. HANSELL: We will not permit you to say so.

Mr. CLEAVER: Well, I do not hesitate to say that my hon. friend would have a great deal of difficulty in choosing a stronger delegation to attend that conference. Included in the delegation was our Minister of Finance, our Minister of Justice, the governor of the Bank of Canada, the deputy minister of finance, the chairman of the foreing exchange control board, and many other competent gentlemen. These men met with the delegates of more than forty other countries at that conference; and as a result of the conference we have the Bretton Woods agreement now before the house.

Mr. BLACKMORE: In twenty-one days.

Mr. CLEAVER: No, not twenty-one days ago. These agreements were printed in white-paper form in 1944. They were circulated among the members of the house, and if hon. members did not read, study and ponder them, whose fault is it? Is it the fault of the government?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Not the Bretton Woods agreement?

Mr. CLEAVER: Most assuredly. I hold in my hand a white paper printed by the king's printer under a date in 1944, giving the full text of the agreement, and considerable other material.

Mr. QUELCH: But no chance was provided for debate.

Mr. CLEAVER: That is a point I shall be glad to deal with. But I do say this, that so far as the government is concerned, the fullest possible information was made available to every hon. member. I received my copy months ago. I do not know when the hon. member for Lethbridge received his, but I believe he received it about the same time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I think the hon. member did not grasp the significance of what I said. I pointed out that these experts from forty-four nations arrived at their remarkable conclusions after twenty-one days of conference.

Mr. CLEAVER: That is true.

Mr. BLACKMORE: A wonderful thing!

Mr. CLEAVER: But I suggest to the hon. member that while the Bretton Woods conference lasted only from July 1 to July 22, 1944, the delegates who attended spent days, months and years in preparatory study, exchanging information back and forth, and in that way getting ready for the conference.

Bless you, you would not expect such a conference to be called without having all the spade-work and preparatory work done in advance.

Another hon. member has suggested that there has not been sufficient opportunity for debate in this matter, and that we did not have sufficient time in the committee on banking and commerce to discuss the measure. I should like to say a word or two in that connection.

In the committee on banking and commerce the hon. member for Lethbridge took the trouble to carry down to the committee room his copy of the proceedings of the banking and commerce committee which sat a year ago, in connection with the revision of the Bank Act. That is a revision which takes place only once in ten years, and in that instance it was long overdue. We spent day after day canvassing the advisability and wisdom of certain proposed revisions. I do not want hon. members to take offence, but I think we wasted a little time in that inquiry. I have a recollection of a few days, at least, when in my opinion we did not accomplish much.

I suggest to the hon. member that it is not fair to measure the time required in the banking and commerce committee for the study of the Bretton Woods agreement with the yardstick he proposes to use. In connection with Bretton Woods we had before us an agreement negotiated by experts, after years of study, an agreement which we had no power either to amend or to vary in any way.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We had power to reject it.

Mr. CLEAVER: Our sole task was to call before us expert witnesses so that we would, as far as it might be possible for laymen so to do, fully understand the contents of the agreement.

Mr. JAQUES: It was an ultimatum.

Mr. CLEAVER: As a result we called two men who attended the conference.

Mr. BLACKMORE: You called one.

Mr. CLEAVER: And every member on the committee had the fullest opportunity to question those men. I did not, as chairman, shut off any of the questions, so that there was the fullest opportunity to question those men.

Mr. LOW: Only one of them.

Mr. CLEAVER: The complaint has been made that we should have called witnesses who were opposed to the Bretton Woods agreement. I cannot understand that type of argument. We had before us an agreement which we had either to accept or to reject. Hon. members may have noticed a press release which appears in to-day's newspapers under a Washington date, which contains the announcement that it is now apparent that just over sixty-six per cent of the subscribed membership will take place with respect to the Bretton Woods agreement by the deadline date.

Mr. LOW: That is what is expected.

Mr. CLEAVER: And included among those accepting nations is Great Britain. Is Canada to be placed in a position where we decline to support Great Britain, and where we turn down the agreement and call in experts for the purpose of securing sufficient excuse to turn them down? If Canada's 3·17 per cent is taken from the available sixty-six per cent, the necessary subscription to the agreement will not take place by the deadline date.

Mr. HANSELL: Does the hon. member believe that a court should hear only witnesses for the defence?

Mr. CLEAVER: There you go! That shows the attitude of the Social Credit party. I do not want them to take offence, but I must say that if we are to acomplish anything we at least must be frank with each other.

Mr. HANSELL: And that is what I am doing.

Mr. CLEAVER: Who is the defence, and who is the prosecution in connection with the Bretton Woods agreement?

Mr. HANSELL: But the committee heard only one side of the question.

Mr. CLEAVER: Why does my hon. friend refer to the "defence"? It just shows the attitude.

Mr. HANSELL: Because the witnesses who came before the committee were defending their action.

Mr. CLEAVER: Not at all. But it does show clearly the suspicious frame of mind under which, I am sorry to say, my hon. friends are labouring in connection with this agreement.

Mr. QUELCH: In the past when certain bills have been referred to committees, has it not been customary to call witnesses who might be opposed to the passage of such bills? It has been done in every committee on which I have served.

Mr. HANSELL: That is the purpose of the committee.

Mr. CLEAVER: I would say this to my hon. friends, that if we had had two or three months to study this problem—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. QUELCH: Why hadn't we?

Mr. CLEAVER: —and if we had not been forced by the pressure of events—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CLEAVER: —it might well be—

Mr. QUELCH: We met in September.

Mr. CLEAVER: Please permit me to answer the question. It might well be that, even though the committee considered it unnecessary, rather than appear to act in any undemocratic fashion, my hon. friends would have been permitted to call witnesses, no matter how fantastic their evidence might have been.

Mr. QUELCH: Would you consider the evidence of Paul Einzig fantastic? That is one of the gentlemen we advocated calling.

Mr. CLEAVER: I come now to the next objection which my friends have raised. They argue that no substantial benefits will accrue to the members from this agreement and that if Canada joins we shall be shackled in our future actions. Such words as "blockade" and other words of that kind were used.

Mr. BLACKMORE: "Blockade" was never used.

Mr. CLEAVER: If any one expects that the millennium will come as a result of the Bretton Woods agreements, the Minister of Finance has indicated clearly that he has no such hope. I have not heard any one seriously suggest that the Bretton Woods agreements are intended to deal with more than just one segment of the post-world problem. True, it is an important part of the problem and, while world recovery cannot take place unless this part of the problem is adequately dealt with, it is equally true that the over-all success depends upon many other factors. If the world is to become contented and prosperous there are many other matters in addition to international exchange and international credit facilities to be dealt with. Those who believe that no substantial benefits will accrue to Canada and the world as a result of the operation of the new international monetary fund and the new international bank, I consider pessimists. I suggest to my opponents that they entirely underrate the importance of international cooperation. There are some individuals in the world who still believe that compulsion is the only way to get anything done. Happily for the world they can be wrong. In the majority, people do not like to be coerced. The operation of Bretton Woods is a cooperative approach as compared with dictatorship and compulsion. While the financial arrangements and facilities which are to become available through the operation of this fund may in the main appear to my hon. friend to be inadequate, I suggest that he and his colleagues have overlooked one feature which is quite important. Under these agreements, we are setting up an international forum to which nations with grievances can appeal. This conciliation board, as I would call it, will be of great advantage in further improving cooperative relations among the nations.

As to the argument that Canada is shackling herself by entering into this agreement, the agreement provides that any member can withdraw from the fund and from the bank on request.

Mr. QUELCH: Read article XI.

Mr. CLEAVER: The only thing which binds members to membership in this agreement are the mutual benefits which they will get as a result of that membership. Is there anything in that which shackles Canada? Personally I cannot find anything. My hon. friend asked me to read article XI. I have read article XI dozens of times to try to read into it the things which he suggests. I cannot read into article XI anything more than what it says. I ask hon. members to read it for themselves because it is a long article.

Mr. QUELCH: Explain what it means.

Mr. CLEAVER: The operative part is this:

Each member undertakes:

(i) not to engage in, nor to permit any of its fiscal agencies referred to in article V, section 1, to engage in any transactions with a non-member or with persons in a non-member's territory which would be contrary to the provisions of this agreement;

(ii) not to cooperate with a non-member . . . in practices which would be contrary to the provisions of this agreement . . .

Mr. QUELCH: The hon. member is not quoting it correctly; he left out the words "or the purposes of the fund".

Mr. CLEAVER: If I had the time I would be glad to read the whole article. I know the hon. member has read it and I know every hon. member of the committee has this document. I will leave it at that. I do not want to hold up this measure any longer, but I should like to suggest this one feature. Under these two measures Canada is obligated to a total expenditure of $625,000,000 to promote better cooperation internationally on exchanges and in regard to foreign credits.

When one considers the millions that we poured into winning this war, the millions we have given to UNRRA and the millions we have voted to finance export credits, would any member dare hesitate to support a measure, the total liability under which is only $625,000,000, to further international good will and international cooperation in regard to foreign exchange and international debts?

Mr. IRVINE: I do not suppose that much more light can be shed on this great subject. I notice that the representatives of the parties who were represented on the banking and commerce committee have had something to say on the bill and the provisions of the agreements, and I just wanted to take a few moments of the time of the committee to indicate that I am supporting this bill as a member of the committee. I should like at least to give an idea of why I am doing that. I think the bill has some meaning, and I think the agreement has a definite meaning and has possibilities of playing a part in the future economy of the world. I hope that the prophecy of my hon. friend to my left will be absolutely untrue. I hope he can be made to believe in the possibility that he may be wrong. I consider I have as great hopes for the future of this agreement as my hon. friends have grounds for believing in its complete failure.

Perhaps I should say here that the investigations in the committee were on a very high plane. The hon. gentlemen who opposed this bill in the resolution stage and on second reading and so forth did make a contribution to the discussion and to the inquiry. The hon. member for Acadia made an outstanding contribution. Many of the questions which he raised I wanted to raise myself, and I was glad to hear the discussion which was based on them. However, I think there is an undercurrent of suspicion on the part of these hon. gentlemen which in my opinion is hardly justified. My memory of the answers of the witnesses to the questions and to the fears which were expressed leads me to believe that those fears are groundless and that the dire effects which those hon. members anticipate as a possibility do not seem to have any basis in fact.

Someone has suggested that, in addition to being perhaps a little over-suspicious, my hon. friends to the left have not offered an alternative proposal.

Mr. LOW: We have not had the chance.

Mr. IRVINE: I am just going to say that. It is not clear how any group in this house could make an alternative proposal to an international agreement. That is one of the factors of this whole discussion which we ought to keep in view. This is an international agreement which, as the chairman of the banking and commerce committee has just explained, was carefully gone into and prepared for long in advance. It cannot be amended here, we cannot propose an alternative to it here. The only way we could have an alternative to an agreement of this kind is to go out and make another international agreement, which would take quite some time, and we do not have enough time to do that, so that is quite impossible. However, since that is so, and since we cannot amend the terms of the agreement or, at this session, create an alternative, I think it is only fair that those who oppose the agreement as it is should be able to set forth the general principles upon which it might be possible to arrive at a better agreement. I believe my hon. friends think they have done that. Some of us disagree; but I do not want to argue that point here; we shall have to differ on that point, for the moment at least, without taking time to go into the details of the difference.

I think, however, my hon. friends on the left should agree on this point. They have pointed out, more often and perhaps more effectively than most of us, the influence of international finance on international policy. If we are to prevent the evil influences of international finance, and if we are to obtain democratic control of the instruments of finance international, surely we must follow the projects of international finance into the international field. There is no possibility of preventing an international undertaking by any kind of national action, and if you are to have democratic control of international finance it can be had only by the creation of an international body to do the controlling. This agreement, with all the faults it may have—and I am quite prepared to say that from my point of view it has some faults—is, in my opinion, an outstanding agreement in this particular, that an international organization is about to make an experiment, and a very important one, in international financing. Provision is made in this agreement whereby at least some financing can be done without one having to go cap in hand to the international bankers. Although the finances which have been provided in this agreement may properly be regarded by hon. members as inadequate for what it may be called upon to do, and this may very well prove to be true, it is a beginning, and to the extent that it is the beginning of an international organization which provides funds for the use of nations without putting them at the mercy of international bankers, I think it is to be commended.

May I quote a passage or two from an article by Mr. Hugh Gaitskell, M.P. for South Leeds, and formerly lecturer in economics at London university. He is writing in the London Daily Herald of December 10, and his article is devoted entirely to the Bretton Woods plan. I might point out that he shows it to be what it really is, more or less of a middle-of-the-way plan between a proposal which was put forth originally by Britain, and the counterpart of it which was put forward by the United States of America; that when the conference met, the representatives of the forty-four nations present had an opportunity to go over the whole field, and this was the agreement which resulted. Speaking of the fund in its stabilization characteristics, he says:

> This free conversion of currencies does not, however, apply to capital transactions, which will continue to be rigidly controlled.
> On certain conditions members may obtain foreign currencies from the fund in exchange for their own. Thus, if we could not pay for our imports with the proceeds of our exports, we could go to the fund and get what really amounts to a loan.
> We should have to pay interest on it, and the amount which can be borrowed is limited—in our case—

That is to say, in the case of Great Britain.

> —to £83,000,000 a year and £330,000,000 in all. But it is a useful extra bit of credit.
> Suppose, however, a country—say America—exports more than it imports and does not lend the difference.
> Then fewer dollars would be offered than were wanted, and everybody would go to the fund to try to get them.
>
> But the fund itself would have only limited supplies and might not be able to meet the demand. In that case it would declare the currency in question "scarce."
> Other countries may then impose full exchange control over this particular currency—dollars. The result would be to cut off the demand for the surplus American exports.

I want the committee to notice this:

> There could hardly be a more drastic method of making a country realize that it cannot export more than it imports unless it lends the balance.

Mr. LOW: Or gives it away.

Mr. IRVINE: Or gives it away, yes. I think that phase of the agreement should be an excellent lesson in international economics; and I would say that in the practice of this, nations that have large surpluses to export and are tardy about permitting exchange of goods for their surpluses, will learn a great lesson.

May I say just a word or two in summing up some of the advantages, and then I shall have finished.

In the first place, I have emphasized the importance of the international effort. It is an international organization tackling a problem which is international in character and which no individual government could possibly solve. Second, one of its tasks is to stabilize exchange rates, and to make available for that purpose a fund which will be accessible to the nations that happen to get into difficulty; and this, without having to be at the mercy of international bankers.

Another feature of the bill or of the agreement is, of course, the international bank. That too, with its ten billions of capital, will be an important factor in the future economy of the world, and has great possibilities of extension. There are vast territories in the world which are backward and undeveloped; and if we are to increase our standard of living here and throughout the world, then those backward countries must be helped to develop their resources, so that they too, can raise their standards of living in order to consume more of our goods in exchange for those which they have to send to us. If private enterprise does not want to go into these countries alone for fear of losing something, we have an international fund which will be guaranteed by the country that does the borrowing which makes it possible to furnish investment capital in backward parts of the world, which may well play an important part in the postponing at least of the worst phases of a depression which may be upon us at any time.

The claim that this is the gold basis is both true and untrue—I was going to say false, and I do not know whether untrue is the same thing. What I mean is this. The witness, Mr. Rasminsky, said that it was a phase of the gold standard; that is to say, that the gold standard is used merely as a measuring stick, and it is just as good a measuring stick, he argues, as an index figure. I do not know whether that is true or not. I would rather have an index figure myself. I am not very much interested in gold measuring sticks. But it is used only as a means of making up trade balances between nations and the feature of the gold standard which most of us object to most strenuously means that you can, because of the gold standard, limit the currency and credit of your nation to such an extent as to practically starve your people in the midst of abundance. That has been very largely true in some instances. That feature of it is not in practice in this international agreement, so that it is really not true to say that we have the gold standard which figured in our contentions years ago.

The next point is that the agreement does not mean that Canada or any other country which ratifies the agreement must go on the gold basis. Canada is not on the gold basis, thank heaven, and I do not suppose it wants to be; and if it ever tries to be on that basis I for one will do my best to keep it off.

Here is the last point. If creditor nations do not accept goods in payment for their exports; if under this agreement they do not wish to do so, we shall be no worse off than we are now, not the slightest bit in the world. That is what they do now and what they have always done. On the other hand, the whole object of the agreement is to encourage those nations which adopt it to do just that; that is to say, to accept goods in exchange for their favourable balances.

May I call the attention of the committee to the proposal made between the United States government and the government of the United Kingdom for the expansion of world trade and employment. Here we have what might be said to be a necessary corollary of the agreement we are discussing, that if these trade agreements are not effected after this agreement, then of course it will prevent the Bretton Woods agreement from accomplishing its purpose.

I believe there are great possibilities in this agreement. If it fails, as my hon. friend thinks it will, I shall not be surprised but I shall be greatly disappointed. I am hoping that this undertaking, which we have started with such little enthusiasm, which seems to have no friends anywhere, may turn out to be the beginning of that world government which I believe is essential if we are to save the human race.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 4 inclusive agreed to.

On Section 5—Payment of subscriptions out of Consolidated Revenue fund.

The CHAIRMAN: This section has been amended by the committee by striking out the word "pay" in line twenty-one and inserting in place thereof the words "provide for payment of", so that the first line of section five will now read: "The Minister of Finance may provide for payment of the subscriptions".

Amendment agreed to.

Setion as amended agreed to.

Section 6 agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: A new section 7 has been added. Shall the section carry?

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND RESOURCES

Indian affairs branch—
165. Indian agencies, $898,266.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I wish to say with regard to this matter generally that we in the C.C.F. party have protested yearly against living conditions among the Indians, the want that has existed there, and in many cases the attitude of the government. We have protested also against injustices committed by the Indian affairs branch, in that many of the treaties signed with these people have apparently been broken. It is encouraging, then, to find that since the present minister has taken over the affairs of this department there has been a change in attitude, and that some of the reforms and changes we advocated in the past are apparently in process of being attended to.

One can scarcely be charged with speaking politically when he refers to Indian affairs, when it is remembered that the Indians have no vote. In my view one of the chief defects in the department has been that the Indians have had no way in which their voice could be heard by the federal authorities.

We note with a good deal of pleasure the fact that the government is apparently undertaking some revision of the Indian Act. Although thus far no action has been taken to place amendments before the house, I would expect that before his estimates are completed the minister would give us some information on the point and at that time possibly he would tell us when those changes might be expected to take the form of legislation.

Within the past year the Indians of Canada have undertaken to organize themselves in each of the provinces. They have gathered together in convention, and have been successful in sending delegates from all parts of Canada. Last September one of those conventions was held in Ottawa, at which time there were presented to the government briefs in which were set out certain complaints they had in connection with the administration of Indian affairs.

One of the suggestions had to do with a proposed amendment to the Indian Act, so as to give Indians some voice in the administration of their affairs. The Indian considers that he is treated too much as a child, and in my view the time has come when we should look upon the Indian population as humans, with rights to citizenship. They need not be treated entirely as wards. The policy under the Indian Act has been to keep them subdued to such an extent that their capacity and ability have been smothered. Surely this is not good.

New Zealand is one of the countries which in this connection has taken a forward step. The Maoris have been granted rights of citizenship to the extent that they now have representation in that part of the New Zealand system of government which would correspond to our House of Commons. Their representatives sit in that legislative body, and act in connection with the administration of Maori affairs.

Surely the time has come when a similar step should be taken in Canada so that an opportunity would be given to those thousands of Indians within our boundaries who might wish to have representation in the affairs of the country, and more particularly some voice in the administration of their own affairs.

I believe the minister will agree that the Indian organizations in Canada have shown that they have capacity and ability. Their attitude has been one of willingness and they have shown an anxiety to cooperate. I believe any assistance the government could give to help them organize would be appreciated, because they operate with only limited means. It is my understanding that the minister has seen fit to assist them to the extent of providing travelling expenses to their conventions. That is a new procedure, and one which is much appreciated by the Indian population. I believe they have written several letters to the minister expressing their appreciation of his attitude.

I suggest that in the revision of the act the government should consider the fact that until the Indians of Canada have representation in the Indian affairs branch, to which they must appeal for the settlement of their grievances, they will feel that they have not had proper representation, or proper opportunity for the redress of their grievances.

I note that this year there is an increase of about $1 million in expenditures for the health and welfare of Indians across Canada. This increase, which represents about sixteen per cent of the total, is all to the good, and is a step toward wiping out some of the prevailing wrongs. Conditions among many of the Indians are deplorable; I have never seen suffering such as I have seen in some of the Indian reserves.

The Indians have expressed a desire to have an over-all inquiry into their conditions across Canada, so that a study may be made of those conditions from which evils arise, with a view to effecting remedies. I believe the department has not seen its way clear to grant the request for an inquiry, but is considering changes in the act, without such an inquiry having been made. An inquiry of the kind suggested could do much good.

Within the past two weeks the executive of the North American Indian brotherhood met in Ottawa and, in the absence of an inquiry, they have made suggestions to the government respecting revisions to certain sections in the Indian Act. They direct attention first to section 18, which deals with the entitlement of a band to receive benefits. There is the feeling that their own Indian councils have the capacity to decide who should and who should not come within the band. Section 18 now reads.

> The superintendent general (minister) may, from time to time, upon the report of an officer, or other person specially appointed by him to make an inquiry, determine who is or who is not a member of any band of Indians entitled to share in the property and annuities of the band.
> 2. The decision of the superintendent general (minister) in any such matter shall be final and conclusive, subject to an appeal to the governor in council.

Then section 40 states:

> No person shall buy or otherwise acquire from any band or irregular band of Indians or from any Indian and no Indian shall sell or otherwise dispose of to any one other than a member of the band, any cattle or other animals of any kind from any reserve in the province of Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta or the Territories without the written consent of the Indian agent.

The band still feels that the Indian agent in this respect has been granted too much power. I believe that some years ago this section had merit, but to-day the Indians are in a position to give proper judgment as to who should sell cattle and materials off the reserves. In the early days there were occasions when drovers and other unscrupulous persons used to come to the reserves and practically steal cattle from the Indians. At that time this section was a proper safeguard. However, to-day I believe that the band should make decisions of this kind, and that under the present system the Indian should be given a full report of the sale price of his cattle, to whom they were sold and the date upon which they were sold.

Then, section 52 has to do with the power of the governor in council to remove any Indian band from the place in which it is at present situated. This gives absolute power to the minister, or the officials at his department, to move a band, if in the opinion of those officials the band is situated too close to a town or city. The Indian band has no say in the matter at all.

Section 93 contains particular powers. It reads:

> The governor in council may, with the consent of a band, authorize and direct the expenditure of any capital moneys standing at the credit of such band in the purchase of land as a reserve for the band or as an addition to its reserve, or the possessory rights of a member of the band in respect of any particular parcel of land on the reserve, or in the purchase of cattle, implements or machinery for the band, or in the construction of permanent improvements upon the reserve of the band, or such works thereon or in connection therewith as, in his opinion, will be of permanent value to the band, or will, when completed, properly represent capital, or in the making of loans to members of the band to promote progress, no such loan, however, to exceed in amount one-half of the appraised value of the interest of the borrower in the lands held by him.
> In the event of a band refusing a consent to the expenditure of such capital moneys as the superintendent general (minister) may consider advisable for any of the purposes mentioned in subsection one of this section, and it appearing to the superintendent general (minister) that such refusal is detrimental to the progress or welfare of the band, the governor in council may, without the consent of the band, authorize and direct the expenditure of such capital for such of the said purposes as may be considered reasonable and proper.

Recently there was passed by this house under the minister's guidance a bill taking away from an Indian reserve, I think it was the Stony Indian band in Alberta, certain water power rights. The minister stated that the arrangements with regard to that sale were carried on without the consent of the band. In view of the rights of these Indians, in view of the fact that this is their property, I think the band should have been consulted about the matter so that they would know what was being done. Section 99A gives considerable power to the agent. It reads:

> At meetings of the council the agent for the reserve, or his deputy appointed for the purpose with the consent of the superintendent general (minister), shall
> (a) preside, and record the proceedings;
> (b) control and regulate all matters of procedure and form, and adjourn the meeting to a time named or sine die.

Is it not time that the Indian band themselves were permitted to carry on their own business at these band meetings? They could go to the agent for advice instead of being constantly placed under the control of these persons.

Section 102 deals with taxation. The Indian considers that he is not getting the rights and privileges of his white brothers. Since he does not share in the benefits of taxation, he feels that there are certain taxes to which he should not be subject. The Indians have shown a willingness to cooperate with the government and I believe that if there were proper discussion between the officials of the department and the representatives of the North American Indian brotherhood executive an understanding could be reached.

I do not think they object to paying taxes on income earned off the reserve; but in some cases, Quebec for example, these Indians have homes on the reserve. Some of them have electricity in their houses and they must pay a special tax on that. They feel that being on a reserve they should not have to pay that. They consider that a single person should not be taxed on income less than $1,000 a year and that if married, he should be exempt up to $2,000. There are matters like this which require the consideration of the department and which should be modified.

The Indians have shown a tremendous willingness to cooperate. They appreciate what the minister has done, and they are willing to go all the way with him in an effort to have what they consider wrongs redressed. If the government will do these things I am sure it will have the support of all hon. members. A few weeks ago we had a discussion on a resolution which would have given the Indians the right to old age pensions. Hon. members on all sides and of every party supported that. Unfortunately some hon. members talked so long, whether deliberately or not I do not know, and it was impossible to have a vote. Surely the expressions of opinion given in this house are sufficient to let the minister know just how the representatives of the people of Canada feel in regard to this matter. If there is any possibility at all of carrying out the suggestions that have been made and giving these people who were first in our midst, the real Canadians, an opportunity to make a contribution to the Dominion of Canada, it should be done. We are voting millions for the welfare of the Indians, but let us give them an opportunity and they will take care of themselves. These people can take care of themselves; they can fend for themselves if given an opportunity.

The educational system for the Indian is wrong is several particulars. According to the latest report of the department, the number of Indians in Canada between the ages of seven and sixteen years is 26,000. The average attendance of Indians in schools, residential and day and others, is 13,257. Only one-half of the Indian children in Canada are receiving training. I realize that there is something to be said about the difficulties encountered in the far north with these people moving about, but the matter of education should receive special consideration in view of the fact that these people are not yet living under the same standards as the white people.

Go to some of these schools and you will find them teaching Indian girls how to cook on an electric plate or how to run an electric washing machine. When they go back to the reserve they are just discontented. These people have capacities as fishermen, as hunters and as woodsmen. I wish to compliment the department upon what they have done in the way of fur farming. These people have a great capacity to work and provide for themselves and they could make a contribution to our country. Early in life we should discover what capacities they have and then train them along those lines. If we do that we shall soon have doctors, nurses and missionaries who will go out among these people and help to lift them up. If the government will continue with this policy I am sure it will have the support of every party in this house. I have offered these few suggestions in the hope that the government will do something along these lines. I can assure the minister that he will receive the cooperation of every one here.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am not going to be long, because of the late stage of the session at which these estimates have come before the committee, and also because we know we must get them through promptly since the minister has an important engagement in the far west which it is imperative that he keep. But I wish to make one or two suggestions, particularly because he is a new minister in an old department. I am sure that all hon. members who have any experience as regards Indian affairs want to help him in his great task. I personally have strong hopes that he will do a fine job when he gets thoroughly accustomed to the work of the department.

First, I suggest that in his own good time he consider setting up a parliamentary committee, a special committee or otherwise, consisting of members of this house and of the senate, to inquire thoroughly into the whole problem of Indian affairs. It is quite a long time since this was last done, and I feel sure that everyone will admit that the time has come, owing to the real advance which the Indians have made, when new regulations could be prepared which would have much more beneficial consequences to them and to the country generally.

I further suggest to the minister that he urge on the government, contrary to the practice, to have his departmental estimates brought in early. During the sixteen years I have been here they have been introduced almost at the very last living hour of the session. My good friend the hon. member for Vancouver Centre puts estimates through rapidly. I am not finding any fault about that, but I recall that at the time he sat on this side of the house the estimates did not go through so fast. However, I give him credit for getting departmental estimates through; I am sure he would have made a good business manager.

In the discussion which would probably arise in such a committee as I have suggested, the matter of having Indian representatives in the house might well have a place. As the minister probably knows, the natives of South Africa, the Kaffir peoples, have either four or five representatives in the South African parliament. So, too, in New Zealand, the original native race is represented in the legislature as referred to by a previous hon. member. The native races of these dominions are no better than our own, and I am of opinion that the proposal would be well worth considering, although I have no definite suggestions as to how this should be put into effect. In South Africa the Kaffirs select their representatives in the house; whether they are represented by Kaffirs or whites I am unable to say at the moment, but in any event they are there, watching the interests of the millions of Kaffirs who live in South Africa. The problem of Indian representation is, I am sure, worth considering.

I myself have visited many reservations, perhaps twenty-five, and some in remote areas. I question whether any hon. member other than my leader has visited the two reservations on the Saskatchewan river, Chemahawin and Moose Lake. Probably he has visited both of them; they are remote and seldom visited by the white man. On lake Nipigon are three reserves. My suggestion to the minister is: when you visit them, go alone if you can, or take your secretary with you; you do not need anyone to tell you about this or that; when you get in a reservation there will be plenty of people to tell you all about it, and your conclusions will be your own, not what the agent or some other official tells you. I have made many surveys and I have seen a lot of reserves, but I am not going to take time to talk about them to-night.

A number of the reserves have fairs. One is the reservation of western Ontario, of the Delaware tribe, of which I am proud to be an honorary chief. They call themselves the grandfathers of Indian tribes. As the minister knows, their name is derived from Lord De la Warre, who settled on the Delaware river. They have a fair every year. A day or two ago I had a letter from their chief, Fred Stonefish, suggesting that I put up some prizes—which I am going to do—for the best-dressed folks in Indian regalia at the fair. I believe the time has come to encourage them to take pride in their past. If you do that they will have more pride in the country to which they now belong. There should also be an effort to encourage them to exhibit at their fairs those things they make which are the distinctive product of their culture, and steps should be taken to help them to dispose of these products.

When the minister again goes to northern Manitoba I suggest that he visit Moose lake. If he will notify Thomas Lamb, Mr. Lamb will bring his diesel engined boat to The Pas and take him down river. I urge him to go down the Saskatchewan river and have a chat with Mr. Lamb about fur production. He is the real father of the development of the fur business in the Saskatchewan delta. He spent his own money bringing in pumps from the United States and pumping the water into the dried-out marshes. I know that the government of Manitoba—and this government also —is now assisting in the production of furs in the Saskatchewan delta. But let the minister talk to the man who knows. I know Mr. Lamb intimately; he is the father of that business. I suggest to the minister, consult with him and talk to the officials after that, and you will get a new slant on the whole fur-production business.

A word or two more. The Indian educational system can be vastly improved. One day some estimates came in here relating to three reserves on lake Nipigon; and after what came out here I determined to go and see for myself. I engaged a diesel engine boat and went down the river from Willett. I visited the three reservations in that district, and I am bound to say that one of the schools was rather backward. I will not say which one, but there I saw a young girl teaching, a very nice and comely girl, but without the qualifications of a teacher. I found no child beyond the part second book in a school of twenty-eight. I will not elaborate on the question of Indian education except to say that in the Indian school on the Moravian reservation in Kent county the children have attained a high standard for a common school. The Indian schools are not all backward by any means, but some are not what they should be.

I am going to close with this comment. In Kent county on the reservation of the Moravian band of Indians it is proposed to have an international commemoration service in 1950 to which a good many eminent persons will be invited. The minister knows, or if he does not know personally he will have read in the history of western Ontario and particularly of Kent county, that the Delaware tribe came there in 1792, one of the largest branches of the whole Delaware Indian tribe in America to-day. They came with a missionary, the Reverend David Zeisberger, who was accompanied by a famous assistant Senseman. It is proposed to make 1950 an important year not only in the history of the Indians themselves but as commemorating the 137th anniversary of the death of the last and greatest of the Indian chiefs of those days, Tecumseh, who did so much to preserve Ontario as part of the British domain. To that international commemoration service we hope to invite the President of the United States, because one of his predecessors, General Harrison, was in command of the American army at the battle of the Thames, later becoming President of the United States. Several of the governors of states also commanded forces at that battle. We hope to have present at the commemoration the governors of Michigan, Kentucky, Ohio, Pennsylvania, states all represented at the Battle of the Thames. Later on, I will take the matter up with the minister.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. BRYCE: I will not detain the committee, but I simply want to concur in what my colleague said. I will not repeat it, but I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, that I am more hopeful of the Indian situation than I was a year ago and I wish to congratulate the minister. It may seem strange to congratulate ministers, hon. gentlemen sitting on that side—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Brother Scots.

Mr. BRYCE: I am reluctant to do so, but where praise is deserved I will not withhold it. I wish to congratulate also Mr. Hoey and Mr. Allan of the department, with whom I have been constantly in touch. On this occasion I have no grievances to bring before the committee, having already discussed matters with the department. I must say that they gave me wonderful cooperation.

There is one matter that my colleague omitted to bring before the minister. The residential schools are not up to the number they should be this year, for the reason that it pays the Indian better to keep his children at home and get the family allowance instead of sending them to school. That is a problem which will have to be solved in the near future. We may find it necessary to turn the residential schools into vocational schools, building little schools, and let the children stay at home.

I hope that in his negotiations with the provincial governments the minister will see to it that the Indians are protected. I would draw his attention to the situation in St. Peter's reserve. If the land is handed over to the provincial government it will be necessary to protect the rights of the Indians as far as their hay claim is concerned. The Indians with whom I come in contact on the reserve in my constituency insist upon the appointment of a royal commission, but perhaps if the department continues to move at the rate it is going now we may not need that royal commission. The extra money that has been voted for hospitals and the care of the sick is a step in the right direction. I would ask the minister to make some provision for the Indians at Norway House in the way of a muskrat conservation scheme. I have talked the matter over with his officials and I hope it will be given serious consideration.

Mr. GLEN: I should like to say a few words on this vote in view of the remarks made by hon. members. It is gratifying indeed to note the tone of the discussion on the Indian estimates, and it was also gratifying to me to find expressions of opinion of the type we heard when we were discussing old age pensions for Indians.

I think it can be said with a good deal of truth that at no time in many years have the affairs of Indians been so focused in the minds of the people of this country as they are to-day. I believe that members are expressing views which are being expressed throughout the whole country, that the affairs of the Indians must be attended to in a manner in which they have not hitherto been considered, and the aspirations and hopes of the Indians must be to some extent fulfilled.

I have had the pleasure of meeting the brotherhood of which the hon. member for Yorkton spoke, first in September when I addressed them and then again this week. They have made many proposals to which the hon. member himself has referred and of which I have a note. It was impressed upon me that they represent a particular part of the country and that that part of the country had its own particular problems, which they were expressing.

It may be that we shall find after investigation that these problems affecting individual bands are not general throughout the country, but I am convinced that, in order that Indian affairs should be properly conducted and, as it were, a charter prepared for Indians, something further will have to be done. I did indicate, when speaking in the debate on old age pensions, that we had under consideration a policy for dealing with Indian affairs, and I mentioned then the question of a royal commission. Ever since then I have regretted having referred to the subject, because I have had so many representations as to persons who might wish to act on the commission.

A suggestion was made by the hon. member for Davenport with regard to a special committee of the house to be constituted along with members of the senate. The suggestion is that we might be able to arrive at a conclusion whereby we could deal as far as possible with the problems of the Indians. I am satisfied that unless we get some united representation of the Indians throughout the country we shall not be very successful. I believe that the isolated expressions of opinion coming from the bands or groups of individual Indians will not meet the situation, and I have made the suggestion to those with whom I have been discussing the matter —this band of Indians and the brotherhood— that there should be provincial organization. In fact, I believe it was first indicated by one of the members of the delegation that, in his view, the only way in which these matters could be focused and brought forward in a more representative and concrete form would be by means of provincial organizations throughout the dominion.

In the course of the discussion it was illustrated that throughout Canada many organizations have started in the provincial field and could broaden out into the federal field. If it could be broadcast among the Indians that if they were to form, within each of the provinces, their own organizations composed of officers and men of integrity in whom they have confidence, in the evolution of time they may arrive at that date which the hon. member for Davenport spoke about when he said there might be Indians on the floor of this house representing that body of people in the Dominion of Canada. I am satisfied that we must have an expression of opinion from the Indians throughout the whole of the Indian population. It seems to me the best way in which it can be done, although I may change my mind after due consideration, is to have a special committee set up to which the Indians can make representation. I am satisfied that a body of men such as we have here, and a committee such as could be formed from members of this house who are deeply interested in the affairs of the Indians, would be able to arrive at an act which would largely embody the desires of the Indians.

I do not fail to recognize the great magnitude of the undertaking. Along with that charter for the Indians, as one may call it, there must also be intelligent administration. Upon the administration of an act depends its success. For that reason I am hopeful that at the next session of parliament we shall be able to introduce a draft bill, the details of which shall be subject to discussion, and to which I shall invite the best attention and consideration of the wisdom of the members of this house.

Item agreed to.

Indian affairs branch—medical—

167. Indian hospitals and general care of Indians, $2,425,000.

Mr. MacINNIS: We all know that the incidence of tuberculosis is extremely high among the Indians. It is not only high as compared with the white population, but it is very high in itself. I believe that about a year ago a committee was set up to make some investigations into this problem. Has that committee made any investigation or report, and what is the nature of the report?

Mr. GLEN: As the hon. member has said, an advisory committee was set up. They have made a report but have not yet completed their inquiries with regard to it. This vote is to provide more adequate treatment for Indians in the light of what the hon. member has said. There has been a general increase in the charges for hospitalization of Indians in non-department hospitals. The department has recently taken over two hospitals from the armed services, one near Prince Rupert and the other at the Pas in Manitoba. One of these hospitals is now in operation, and it is planned to put the other in operation within the next few months, and these estimates include the running expenses of these institutions. It is also planned to increase the nursing services and so forth. Another hospital has been taken over at Fort Norman, to which certain repairs are necessary to put it on an efficient operational basis. I may say that the matter is being considered very carefully by the department.

Indian affairs branch—

173. Grant to provide additional services to Indians of British Columbia, $100,000.

Mr. McMASTER: What is the particular reason for providing this $100,000 for the Indians who live in British Columbia?

Mr. GLEN: They never got treaty money; that was the reason why.

Before this item is passed, may I say a few words about fur conservation? The leader of the opposition probably knows more about one of the projects than I do. I do not wish to detain the committee with any lengthy statement, but I have a factual statement of the efforts that are being made with regard to fur conservation, and the great benefits that have been obtained by the Indians through that conservation. To save time, perhaps the committee will permit me to put it on Hansard. I think it would be of great interest to the committee.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does it cover northern Manitoba?

Mr. GLEN: Yes.

It will be recalled that the first real start was made in Manitoba about eight years ago when the dominion granted assistance to the province to develop certain marsh lands in the northern part of the province near The Pas, known as the Summerberry-Two Island muskrat rehabilitation project. A year later the dominion developed an adjoining area, and subsequently the two were joined together and were placed under provincial control subject to the advice of a special fur committee composed of one dominion and two provincial representatives.

It is interesting to note that while the total cost of the joint development did not exceed $350,000, to date more than $1,800,000 worth of fur has been taken off it. The actual value of the crop in 1944 was $469,000 and in 1945 the crop exceeded $500,000.

The following statement shows the manner in which the proceeds from this project were distributed:

(1) 5 cents per pelt until 1940 when 10 cents per pelt was collected.

(2) The province retains from the gross amount realized 20 per cent to cover development costs and management costs.

(3) This covers advances to trappers for transportation and purchase of equipment, traps, etc. This sum and the amount shown in the next column represent the total revenue received by the trappers.

In this project, the whole Indian community at the Pas, approximately 1,000 people, have substantially benefited.

In 1944, 248 Indian heads of families participated to the extent of $450.19 each for three weeks' actual work, which under the plan of management adopted was paid to them $85 in cash and the balance in monthly instalments of $25 for approximately fifteen months. As a result maintenance costs for these Indians have disappeared. With a proper steady diet, general health conditions have improved and hospitalization costs to the department have been reduced. Generally, the economic independence of this group of Indians has been largely restored to them. While the Indian benefits have been specially stressed, 542 half-breed and white families were also employed with similar benefits. In short, the project in 1944 gave 780 heads of families a monthly subsistence backlog of $25 for fifteen months from one crop. In 1945, 972 trappers—one-third of them Indian, participated and benefited likewise.

In cooperation with the province another area consisting of 520,000 acres is being developed at Fisher River at a cost to the dominion of $50,000. While its development contemplated an unproductive period of five years, its progress was so rapid that a small crop of $25,000 has been harvested already. The project is definitely a success and will be increasingly beneficial as the fur bearers increase in numbers. It might be mentioned that up to the time the development started it had not produced a fur crop of any consequence for over twenty years.

To complete the story in Manitoba, I am glad to be able to inform the Committee that an agreement was entered into with the provincial government to establish in the northern part of that province fourteen fur administrative units which take in practically all the northern part of Manitoba. In this way it is proposed to assist the province in the organization and the development of their fur resources as the Indians, whose welfare is a federal responsibility, will be the primary and chief beneficiaries. There are at present 6,000 resident Indians in northern Manitoba who will benefit from this conservative development programme. The plan contemplates an expenditure of $50,000 a year for ten years, a total of $500,000, of which the dominion's contribution will be approximately $300,000.

In Saskatchewan a board known as the northern Saskatchewan conservation board was created in 1939 and an agreement was entered into with the provincial government for the carrying out of a cooperative arrangement to restore the fur industry as a principal means of livelihood to the Indian and half-breed population. A number of small projects were carried out by the board and as well many other investigations were made. Unfortunately, the stress of war restricted the activities of the board and the programme of joint development was curtailed. I should mention, however, that the dominion is now developing one large area of over 500,000 acres in the north eastern part of the province which it secured under lease. The initial stages of the development have been completed at a cost of about $50,000 and the remainder of the work will be carried out in the next few years. I am informed that this is a very good area for muskrat development and it is hoped when completed that it will compare very favourably with the Summerberry-Two Island area at the Pas. Already the value of the crop of muskrats taken from it during the last two years has exceeded the expenditures to date.

In the province of Alberta our efforts have been directed along the lines of securing traplines for treaty Indians under the provincial trapline system. With the very generous cooperation of the provincial government we have obtained to date 1,000 registered traplines and many more applications are now being considered. The department is assuming for the Indian the yearly cost of the trapline until the fur catch is sufficient for the Indian to pay this cost himself. Negotiations are also under way with the province for the development of a substantial area for muskrats in the Athabaska river delta. This will be a joint project similar to the one in Manitoba and it is hoped that a start will be made in the construction of the works next spring.

In the provinces of Ontario and Quebec the development has been centred upon establishing a number of beaver and other fur preserves. The provincial governments have cooperated with us very generously. In the province of Quebec we now have under development the following areas:

Nottaway preserve. This is an area of approximately 8,000 square miles located at the southeast tip of James Bay. The area was secured under lease from the province in 1938 at which time the known beaver population was 255. This has now increased to 7,035 beaver. It is proposed that a crop of 970 beaver will be taken during the present season. This at present price levels will provide a cash revenue of nearly $39,000 to the Indians, and as well over 29,000 pounds of beaver meat. During the seven years which the area has been under protection it has cost the Department $3,000 annually in management costs.

Most of this money was paid to the Indians in wages. It will be noted that the first year's catch greatly exceeds the total expenditures.

Abitibi preserve. This has an area of 6,000 square miles located in the county of the same name in northwestern Quebec. It was established in 1943, having at that time an initial population of 2,012 beaver. This number has increased to 5,445 beaver. It is proposed to take this season an initial crop of 840 beaver with a market value of $33,600 at present price levels. The annual management costs have never exceeded $3,000.

Grand Lake Victoria hunting reserve. This is an area of 6,300 square miles located in the counties of Pontiac, Temiskaming, Abitibi and St. Maurice. While it has been under partial protection since 1928, it was brought under closer control in 1942. It now has a beaver population of 5,000 and produces 1,000 pelts annually.

Old Factory preserve. This is an area of 14,600 square miles located on the east coast of James bay and is designed to serve the needs of the 1,400 Indians at East Main, Factory River and Fort George. It was brought under management in 1942 when the initial count of beaver was 500. The beaver population is now 1,646.

Peribonca preserve. This is an area of approximately 12,600 square miles located in the lake St. John north shore section of Quebec and was established in 1941 for the benefit of the 1,400 Indians of the Bersimis and Pointe Bleue bands. The count in beaver in 1941 was 195 and this has now increased to 1,050 beaver.

In addition to the five projects mentioned, which are directly under the supervision of our department, we are cooperating with the provincial authorities in the creation of a system of trapline registrations. At present the system is in effect only in the Abitibi counties. Already sixty-nine Indians have been located on their own lines.

In the province of Ontario two substantial beaver preserves have been secured from the provincial government. Both are located in the James bay area. The Kesagami preserve, an area of 6,000 square miles, was first put under management in 1942 at which time the population of beaver was 560. This has increased to 2,950. The Albany preserve is an area of 7,600 square miles. It was placed under management in 1943 with a count of 55 beaver. The population has now increased to 735. In connection with these two preserves, it should be mentioned that we have agreed with the provincial government to restock the area with a certain number of live beaver. Up to date we have transplanted 210 live beaver into these two areas which will hasten the time when they can be brought into production.

It is interesting to note that the annual management costs for the seven beaver preserves to which I have referred have not in any year exceeded $3,000 a preserve, this sum including as well all administrative expenses. The most of this money is paid to the Indian talleymen who are selected to protect the preserve during the period of conservation, which, of course, reduces the expenditures for relief that we would otherwise have to make. I should mention that the Indians are cooperating wholeheartedly in the development of these areas and guard them very jealously.

I am sure the members of the committee will have been interested in the progress that has been made in our programme. Muskrat farming and the development of areas for beaver on a large scale is an industry of tremendous possibilities. There are millions of acres susceptible to this form of development. To search them out and develop them is a challenge that will be met. We have in mind a very considerable enlargement of our programme in the post-war years. Our experience of public development of rat and beaver projects in Canada has been along a road leading to the goal of material assistance and a better way of life to the humbler cross-section of our Canadian social order. While yet in their infancy, the developments have already brought higher incomes, an improved standard of living, and an added feeling of self-respect and self-reliance to many hundreds of Indian and half-breed families. They have been furnished an opportunity to engage in a vocation which they love and at which they are more adept than their white neighbours. These people have found themselves again and now have an entirely new outlook for the future of their families. We believe we are now on the way toward a goal where from her fur resources alone Canada can make the trapping Indian and his half-breed cousin wholly self-supporting and independent.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What is the policy of the department with regard to family allowances paid to Indians? Does the Indian agent get the family allowance cheque and administer it? Then, with regard to the Indians where there are residential schools, are the family allowances paid over to the schools for the Indian children who are attending the schools or do they go directly to the parents?

Mr. GLEN: We have appointed an officer, a returned soldier, who is dealing with that matter alone. In many cases payments are made direct, but a great many payments are made in kind, because we are endeavouring to see that there is no abuse of the money. Where the officer is satisfied that abuses might take place he is arranging for payments to be made in kind, and at the present time that obtains over the whole system.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I understand that in maternity cases Indians are not allowed to stay in hospital for more than five days. Is that so?

Mr. GLEN: I would imagine that would depend very much on the seriousness of the case. I cannot imagine that anyone who needed hospitalization for more than five days would not receive it, because it would be inhuman to do otherwise.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I understand that is what is happening.

Mr. GLEN: If the hon. member knows of any cases I should be very glad indeed to have the particulars of them and investigate them, because nothing could be more inhuman.

Mr. BRACKEN: The minister referred to the question of fur conservation and asked for the consent of the committee to put on the record the story of what has been done in that respect. I imagine he had reference to work that had been done in northern Manitoba. In that connection I wish to say a word as one who for many years had something to do with public life of that province. I want to thank the Department of Mines and Resources of the dominion government for the cooperation it has extended in one of the finest pieces of pioneering development work that I know of anywhere in Canada. I shall therefore look forward with interest to reading the statement the minister is putting on Hansard.

I should like to say that as a result of cooperation between the provincial government and this department of the federal government one great potential resource which was giving practically no return to the people of that province has, by the application of common sense and the use of a little money, been turned into a very great resource. Through that cooperation the province was able to take many people off the unemployment rolls where they were costing the state a great deal of money. Many of those affected have since become self-supporting and have brought a large source of revenue to the community. I am sorry that the minister did not have an opportunity to outline that project. I suggest therefore, that those who are seeking work for governments to do which will be self-liquidating will not find anything more interesting in any of the developments of Canada's natural resources than that little fur project in northern Manitoba.

I will not take time now to go farther with this matter, but I did wish to say that this is a splendid example of the result of cooperation between a provincial government and a department of the federal government.

Mr. McIVOR: All I desire to say is that the chapter on the socialization of the muskrat is a thrilling chapter, and well worth reading.

Mr. BRACKEN: I was not here part of the time when the minister was dealing with other items of his estimates, and I asked that one might be left on which I could ask a question in connection with road construction. Might I have permission to refer to that matter now?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): There will be supplementaries.

Mr. BRACKEN: It will not take any longer now, Mr. Chairman, than it would then, and I understood that we might raise these matters now without objection.

Mr. GLEN: Certainly.

Mr. BRACKEN: I should like to ask the minister whether his department is now concerned with road construction to pioneer mining areas and to Canada's national parks, or whether that work is now being dealt with by some other department of the government. A few years ago this department did aid in constructing roads to certain of the pioneer mining areas of this country. If it still deals with that matter I should like to ask a question.

Mr. GLEN: That is being discussed now between the Department of Mines and Resources and the Department of Reconstruction, and of course the projects will be worked out between those departments having in view the policy of the reconstruction department. Of course as the hon. gentleman knows, this department has always been trying to construct roads to make the national parks readily accessible, and we do not propose to relinquish that part of our duties in future, because we realize as well as anyone that the roads must be kept attractive to the tourists who wish to go to our parks, and we want as many tourists as we can get.

Mr. BRACKEN: From what the minister has said I know now he can answer my question. The dominion government cooperated with the province of Manitoba in building a road from the Pas in the direction of Flin Flon in the northwestern section of the province. That road was partly built. At one time early in the war the question came up of making use of the Japanese to help finish it. At that time there was an opportunity to have it finished, but for some reason it was thought unwise to have these men near the large mining project at Flin Flon. That is a little aside from the question at the moment. What I should like to ask now is whether the department has any plans for aiding the province in completing that road from the Pas to Flin Elon.

Mr. GLEN: The practice has been in the past and will continue to be in future that the recommendations of the provinces in regard to where roads are to be located will be given first consideration by the Department of Mines and Resources. As far as that particular road is concerned, at the moment I could not say just what will be done, or when.

Mr. BRACKEN: Is the department doing anything in the way of following up its previous policy of aiding in the construction of roads to pioneer mining areas?

Mr. GLEN: Yes, we have an extensive programme of roads in connection with reconstruction.

Mr. BRACKEN: Then I wish to put in a word with the department to provide funds to complete that road, which is now partly built. As it is now, Flin Flon has no highway connection with the outside. Unless this road is completed the money already spent will be largely wasted. I am referring to the road from the Pas to Flin Flon, Manitoba.

Since I am on that subject I should like to refer to another item. In dealing with the estimates concerning national parks, did the minister outline the policy of the department with respect to the establishment of new parks? Is the department proposing to do anything in the way of establishing new national parks?

Mr. GLEN: At the moment we have in mind several projects in different parts of the dominion. As the hon. gentleman knows, the first step is to have the province obtain the land. We have two or three projects just now in connection with which we are dealing with the respective provincial governments, who will provide the land, and when that time comes we shall be glad to cooperate in establishing national parks, for we believe in them.

Mr. BRACKEN: Has the minister under consideration the establishment of a national park at lake Athapupuskow in northwestern Manitoba?

[Mr. Bracken.]

Mr. GLEN: No, I have no word of that at all.

Mr. BRACKEN: Then I suggest that is one place the minister might have in mind for the establishment of a park. I know of no more acceptable natural site for a national park than that area, and I am surprised that the authorities of the progressive province of Manitoba have not brought it to the attention of the minister. I promise to stir them up and see that they do so.

Mr. GLEN: They will now, I am sure.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I should like to direct the attention of the minister to a matter concerning Indians, and I do not know whether or not I am in order in doing so. The Indians are wards of the government. When they leave the reservation to work, say for a fish packing concern, what supervision does the government maintain over them? I am thinking of the Skeena river and the awful conditions under which the Indians have to live when working there. They have fairly large families; the rooms in which they live are about ten by ten, and the sanitary conditions are such as to ruin their health. In the final analysis that comes back as an expense to this government. At the present time sanitary inspection is in the hands of the provincial government, and not very much is done about it. Could the Indian affairs branch not bring some pressure on these companies to have them supply decent houses for the Indians working in the fish packing plants?

Mr. GLEN: We have had no representations recently in regard to the conditions of which the hon. member speaks, but we shall be very glad indeed to cooperate with the companies concerned. I will make a note of the suggestion and see what can be done.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The other evening when we were on these estimates I asked the minister, and I think my leader also asked, what was the estimated annual fire loss, insect loss and cutting loss in our forests.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. This item has to do with grants to provide additional services to the Indians of British Columbia.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The only point is that the minister said that he would put those figures on record, and I should like to know if he has them ready now, before we finish his estimates.

Mr. GLEN: The question of the hon. member was noted; I think it was in conjunction with one asked by the leader of the opposition. We are now preparing a statement which will be sent to the hon. member as soon as it is completed, but it has taken some time to search out the information.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Shall we have that before parliament prorogues?

Mr. GLEN: I would hope so.

Item agreed to.

IMMIGRATION BRANCH

174. Administration of the Immigration Act and the Chinese Immigration Act, $182,524.

Mr. CROLL: In speaking to the question of immigration, I realize that the only immigration the Canadian people are interested in at the present time is the return of the service men and women from overseas as quickly as possible. When they are back in suitable jobs, again leading normal lives, this country can turn its attention to immigration. That seems a little closer at hand than would first appear, from the statement made, I think yesterday, by the Minister of National Defence, who gave us some information as to how quickly they are coming home. I am sorry he is not in his seat at the moment, because I want not only to thank him for what he was doing, but to let him know that a great number of people in this country, particularly the young women and the mothers, are not only glad that he is bringing the boys back home alive, but that he is bringing them home alone, too.

My particular purpose in rising—and I believe this is an important question—is to bring to the attention of the committee the needs of the country with respect to immigration, so that the question can be not only surveyed but studied, and assessments made in the light of our attributes, facilities and possibilities. I say that not only because this is a country of security, but because it is one of opportunity. We have now the time to plan what we are going to do to-morrow. We have perhaps six months, or possibly a little longer than that, so that we can carefully and ambitiously make our plans.

Those plans have to follow a view different from that formerly held in this country, because in former years the great source of immigrants has been the British isles. But anyone who knows anything about the British isles—and I could quote authorities to support me in this—knows that they will be able to absorb all their own man-power for the next five or ten years, and that they will have to keep everybody in Great Britain. We know, too, that Great Britain is suffering from a declining birthrate.

It is true that some of the Royal Air Force personnel who trained in this country will be anxious to return here, and that they will be welcomed. Some of them may be permitted to come to this country. But the great well which we formerly had in the British isles will be dried up for many years to come.

When we turn to the Scandinavian countries, none of us would for a moment suggest that Finland, Norway, or Sweden would be a source of immigrants for some considerable time in the future.

Turning once again to continental Europe, we must realize that, too, is of a doubtful nature, because Europe to-day is going through not only a sorting but also a settling process. They need all available man-power in Europe, first to keep what to some minds for the present seems to be a doubtful peace, and, second, to rebuild destroyed Europe. Many hon. members who were over there will know that when I say "destroyed" I mean just exactly that. That is going to be a long-time and a full-time job, we can depend upon it.

There has come about recently in this country a new realization, a new perspective and a new understanding on the question of immigation, and it has come from some rather unexpected places. I hold in my hand a report of the Imperial Bank of Canada, whose president, Mr. R. S. Waldie, says:

> It should be noted that the reduction of the general overhead expenses of our economy depend in large measure on an increase in the density of our population which lessens especially the transportation and administration charges per unit of production.

Then, Mr. McGowan, director of the Canadian National Railways, said on November 30:

> The admission of more people would increase Canada's prosperity and assist in its development. When the dominion's population is doubled, it will raise the standards of living.

I quote again from the Toronto Globe and Mail of December 5, in which Mr. J. S. Duncan, president of the Massey-Harris Company Limited, is reported to have said in a Montreal speech:

> Canada has to be realistic about the future economic position of the country and the necessity of expanding export trade as well as the home market for Canadian goods. He recommended adoption of a selective immigration policy to increase the population.

The general tenor of these press comments from different sources is that there is a need for more people in this country, and the approach is such that plans must be realistic, intelligent, and rational. From the economic point of view it will be said that we need purchasing power, and we need those with whom we may divide the national debt—unless someone will devise some method of getting rid of it otherwise.

I do not want to proceed further without expressing a word of thanks to the government of Canada which, in the midst of the war, offered not only sanctuary but a haven and hospitality to great numbers of people who were refugees, who came to this country from all nations, and who helped in our war effort. The government realized that, and in due time gave them permanent landing in Canada. In view of those landings, and in view of the services they have rendered the country, in due time they have earned the right to be joined by whatever remnants there may be of their families still remaining in continental Europe; and I hope the minister will put this high on his priority list.

Last week in the committee on veterans affairs some startling figures were revealed, and I believe they will prove of interest to hon. members. We have about 17,000 returned men training for various jobs, but of that number only 1,600 are training for the building trades. At the time these figures were revealed, I said that I thought it was a tragedy to find that we have not a larger number who are joining what might be described as the aristocrats of labour. Canadians are not soft; we proved that in this war, and even before the war. Our standard of living is fairly high, and we are striving to improve it.

Hon. members may interpret these figures as they wish, but it strikes me that we have about reached the stage in this country where we need some hired help on our farms. We need some others who will do the heavy work. In my short experience in public life I have had something to do with unemployment, and I know something of the hardships unemployed people have suffered. But in all my experience the people who, somehow, were always able to make a living were the carpenters, the bricklayers and the plumbers. We have always looked upon those trades as offering honourable and fine ways of earning a living. I think there is something sad when one considers the fact that young men are not entering these trades which offer good prospects in the immediate future, particularly for the next ten years.

My suggestion is that the government have both a short-term and a long-term policy. I would say that its short-term policy should be based first upon humanitarian principles. All that many citizens in this country have left is to be found somewhere in continental Europe, and I suggest that they should be given the first opportunity to come to this country. Next, not only must we open our doors, but we must open our hearts to the orphans of Europe—and there are thousands of them over there—who in the future will pay such great dividends. I do not know whether we have made any commitments during the war, but if we have we would in due course honour them.

Then, I think we should have a long-term policy. We must be able to assess our future needs, and our ability to absorb, because the post-war immigration problem will be a very heavy one. I think all hon. members agree with me when I say that we need people, and that we have to do something about it.

My suggestion to the minister is that he divorce immigration from agriculture and set up as quickly as possible after we come back next year an immigration committee to make a special study of this particular problem, to hear evidence, to make a survey and then to make recommendations. For instance, for a long time and up until quite recently labour has had a fear of immigration. I do not think they are of that view now, but they have held that view for too long. I think industry should be heard, and business, the church, veterans, economists, scientists, professional men and anyone who can contribute to the cause, so that the committee could form a broad plan for the general welfare of Canada. The committee could study the question of assimilation, so that we can bring in people who believe in our way of life. It could give consideration to the part that people had played in this war, to their physical attributes, to their character, skills, training, trades, commercial experience, business attributes and agricultural experience.

If we set up this committee we could have a plan ready long before the beginning of the following year. Not only could we have men in the field; we could be ready to take in whoever we could absorb. In the past our policy has been based on pressure by special groups. That method is now outmoded and outworn; the time for that has long passed. It does not fit into the present world. All our thoughts and all our legislation in the past were pointed toward exclusion and restriction; I think we have come to the time when we have not only to admit but to welcome people to our country. I am not suggesting an open door; I am not suggesting a closed door; I think the time has come for the door to be left ajar.

While I am on my feet I cannot help saying to the minister that we have on our statute books at the present time a great deal of racial nonsense. It is time to get it off the books. Racism is bad whether it comes from Canadians or Germans. The exponents of racism are now attending the Nuernberg rally and they do not like it. We are glad they do not like it. It is not our business to emulate them in any way at all.

We must plan our immigration policy of the future and we must not be afraid of planning. There is nothing wrong about democratic planning. We have to assess our needs and know our ability to absorb. We should budget for people the same way as we budget for everything else. We have reached that stage. Men and women in this country plan their families and sometimes they make mistakes. We may make mistakes too, but it is time that we started to plan our Canadian family.

Sometimes I wonder, with the world fighting for liebestraum, if we have a moral right to sit on half a continent which has the largest amount of arable land in all the continent and close the door to the rest of the peoples. I submit that we have arrived at a time when we can formulate a policy that will stand up. We can no longer afford to deal with immigration on the basis of expediency and prejudice. Our economy is undergoing a serious change and we have to change with it. We are no longer a frontier land; we are on the top of the heap of the middle powers. We have obligations and responsibilities and we must live up to them.

I suggest to the minister that he lose no time after we come back to set up an immigration committee to study and plan so that we can do something intelligent about it. I am not going to say anything about his department for the last four, five or six years. Let us agree that it was dormant; there was a war on, but there is no excuse for not doing anything now, because we have time on our hands. It will be April or May before we have everybody back in this country, although I hope it will be sooner. We should lay our plans and get our policy ready. We should have our agents where they are needed and be ready to take people into this country; we should have all the necessary machinery ready.

I said a few moments ago that the people of Europe will not be available. Do not be mistaken; the people of Europe want to come here but their governments will not permit them because they need them at home. The Minister of Fisheries will remember when we had to put up signs in Europe in Dutch or French, meaning immigration impossible. Otherwise those people kept bothering us. They were all anxious to leave the country, but the governments need them at home. I know very well that the Dutch government has its plans for its colonies, and so has the Belgian government. They have neglected their colonies for too long and so they have trouble on their hands. If there are to be people to export, they will send them out there. It seemed to be the desire of every boy I met to leave those countries. It will not be just as easy as it seems. We must be careful and make sure to have our plans ready. If we plan well we can make much of it.

Mr. WINTERS: The previous speaker, my sometimes seatmate, the hon. member for Spadina, has covered the general question of immigration, and very well indeed. I agree with what he has said, but just for a moment I would direct the attention of the committee to one specific phase of immigration. I refer to people who are already in Canada and who are a most desirable type of citizen. I could speak generally on that point, but for just a moment I should like to deal specifically with Norwegians.

In my constituency there is a sizable colony of Norwegians, and I understand there is a number of them in other constituencies across Canada. These Norwegians came to us under the trying conditions of warfare in Europe. Many of them were on the high seas when Norway fell, and many others escaped from under the very eyes of the Germans and reached Canada under conditions of the most extreme hardship. They have since played an important part in Canadian life. They have entered into community affairs, and they have taken an important part in Canada's war effort, both in the armed services and as civilians. They have shown themselves to be temperamentally equipped to be Canadian citizens.

In many cases these Norwegians have married Canadian girls and have children. It is quite understandable that both they and their families want to stay in Canada and I think we should want them to stay here. As I understand it, until recently the attitude of the department toward these Norwegians was not very clear, and there were grave doubts in their minds as to just what that attitude was. I have had many letters from these Norwegians and from their sympathizers, who are many, asking that every possible action be taken to see that they are encouraged to stay in Canada. I have referred these letters to the minister, and I must say that in every instance they have been given sympathetic consideration. These people are grateful for this cooperation. As I understand it, the present policy is that if a Norwegian is temporarily in Canada and has married a Canadian girl he is entitled to remain. The cases of the single men are judged on their individual merits. I believe that is correct; is that not so?

Mr. GLEN: Yes.

Mr. WINTERS: There is, as I say, this uncertainty in their minds. My desire to-night is to urge on the government that they show these Norwegians every encouragement. They have proved that they are desirable citizens, and the government should lose no time in making its attitude clear to them so that they will know exactly where they stand and that they are welcome here in Canada.

Mr. HLYNKA: It is quite obvious that the committee will not have much time to discuss Canada's immigration policy at any length in the remaining two days of this session.

Some hon. MEMBERS: One day.

Mr. HLYNKA: But this extremely important and urgent problem should receive proper consideration at the earliest opportunity during the next session. I should like to make one or two general references on the subject before dealing briefly with a specific aspect of immigration.

First, let me read one or two passages and observations of the Edmonton chamber of commerce report dated October 15, 1945, which indicates their stand on the subject of immigration, and with a good number of whose recommendations I agree. The report states:

> Your committee is definitely in favour of a national immigration policy designed to increase the population of Canada . . . It believes that an increase in population through immigration would improve Canada's position and influence in world affairs and would strengthen also the power of the British commonwealth of nations. It would enable this country particularly to adjust her domestic economy by providing more diversified and larger home markets, and it would also reduce the per capita expenses of the many government and other services which a modern nation is expected to provide for her citizens.
> Canada has tremendous assets in its resources of raw materials, in the strong foundation which has been established for an elaborate system of transportation, in its productive and industrial equipment, which has become increasingly strengthened during the war, and in the quality of its present population. This country has maintained its democratic institutions and has shown that it believes in a policy of voluntary cooperation, having regard and respect for a policy that individual freedom and personal initiative should be retained within the framework of a scheme of collective action and security.

[Mr. Winters.]

I should like to mention one or two other points raised in this report. I believe that they are presented in a most vivid and clear manner:

> That machinery should be set up immediately with a view to the formation of a policy designed to attract to Canada those elements in the population of Europe, and possibly of certain other countries who would best contribute to the economic stability and cultural growth of this dominion without imperilling the free institutions . . .

I agree wholeheartedly with the remark made to-night by the hon. member for Spadina that we should undertake to study this problem closely and carefully at the next session, and I believe that the question should be referred to a committee of this house and properly investigated and studied so that we may arrive at logical conclusions.

I find that the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of November 10, 1945, in discussing editorially the order in council of October 26, 1945, granting official admission to refugees who entered Canada during the war—and at this time I should like to compliment the minister and the government upon passing that order in council; I think it was the only stand they could properly take and I am glad they did take it—points out:

> In these circumstances the Canadian government has taken the wise course of permitting these people to remain indefinitely in Canada. No doubt arrangements will be made whereby those who desire to do so may acquire Canadian citizenship and proceed to build new lives in this country . . . But the point of the new regulation permitting these people to stay which will appeal to most Canadians is the recognition it takes of a serious human problem. Aside from any consideration of economic interests, Canada owes a duty to the unfortunates of Europe and should share its good things with as many as possible of these unfortunate people.

I agree wholeheartedly with that view; and to-night I should like to make reference to one specific phase of immigration policy which I believe the government should adopt.

I appeal to the minister to give first consideration to stateless or displaced persons who find themselves to-day in Europe. Regardless of racial origin, these groups of people, should, I believe, have priority over all others. Of course I understand that in the first place we should bring back the men of our armed forces and their families. But following these two group, the government, in my opinion, has a moral and a Christian obligation to these unfortunate people of Europe who to-day find themselves scattered in practically every country in the old land, without homes, without food, without shelter, and without hope. I want to make as strong a plea as I possibly can on behalf of these tormented and unfortunate people, who perhaps have during the war sacrificed much more for us then we would sacrifice for them.

May I point out that this group comprises the democratically-minded people who had to move on into western Europe when totalitarianism was advancing. I find that in the Edmonton chamber of commerce report the fear is expressed that it may be impossible for us, or perhaps too late, to get some of these people to come to Canada. The report continues:

> It is obvious therefore that, if we wish a national increment in population through immigration to Canada, the federal government, collaborating with the provincial governments and industry, labour and agriculture, must make plans at once before it becomes too late.

The Edmonton chamber of commerce, after studying this problem carefully, have come to the conclusion that it may not be so easy to get these people to come to Canada as we may think.

I should like to make one or two other references to the arguments that are being advanced by some government officials and other individuals against admitting people into Canada at this time. In the first place, they argue that there is no passenger accommodation on ships and that therefore this problem cannot be considered at the present time. In the second place, they argue that no immigration should be encouraged until our returned men are reestablished in peace-time occupations. I agree that that is the view which we should take. At the same time, however, I would point out that the immigrants who would come to Canada would not for the most part know the English language and therefore could not displace our returned men. In the third place—at least I gather this from some of the correspondence which I have received, as well as correspondence which has been handed to me by others—the government does not feel that immigration should be allowed until our economic system is adjusted. But, Mr. Chairman, some of these people in Europe will be dead by that time. They cannot wait until we adjust our economic system; and besides, the individuals who are interested in bringing these people to Canada are ready to guarantee and to provide a livelihood for their relatives. The fourth argument used is of course a weak one, that nothing can be done "at the present time". That argument does not answer any question; it is no argument. And the last argument that is used was that these people would have to present their passports before being allowed to come in.

May I point out that during this war hundreds of thousands of people were trying to save their very lives and had no chance of saving or of obtaining passports. I was glad to find that the British government took the only logical and humanitarian stand on the question. In spite of our desire to rush through our estimates and finish this session, I think I ought to put on the record an announcement which appeared in the Times of London, England, on November 14, 1945. The reason I wish to put it on the record is simply to show that the British isles, which are so crowded, where they have not even sufficient food for their own people and no housing accommodation, decided that anyone residing in Britain might bring in relatives, and not later on but now.

Perhaps I should not weary the committee by putting this on the record, but the essence of the point I wish to make is simply this. Despite the fact that they have no room for more immigration, that the returned men are not rehabilitated as yet, that their economic position is not stabilized, the British government is allowing these people to come in. I am happy to say that in spite of the fact that the government in Britain has changed recently, the people of Britain have not changed in their humanitarian attitude toward this problem.

I was disappointed that Canada was not the first nation to make that move. Canada should have been the country to make the announcement, to say. "We have these open spaces; we have natural wealth with which that of no other nation is comparable. Why, therefore, should we not welcome as many of these people as we can?" I know the argument is that there were no ships. But as the member for Spadina pointed out, our men will be brought back by the spring at the latest, and their families shortly after that. Surely it would take several months to issue permits of admission to these people. Why not undertake now to issue those permits and have them post-dated? The only request I make to-night on behalf of these displaced persons in particular is this—because the broader aspect of the immigration problem will be discussed at the next session, whether we desire an increase in our population—that we help these people by announcing that we are ready to accept a certain quota of them now and that we shall issue to them post-dated permits of admission. If this were done, those who are in Britain, or France, or in parts of Germany and elsewhere would know that there was something to look forward to. Surely we can do that.

May I make one or two other observations. I notice that in one of the orders in council passed in recent years there is a strict requirement of medical inspection. In a general immigration policy I agree that proper health safeguards should be maintained, but I hold that it is not reasonable to demand robust health of those who have undergone the suffering, privation and hunger and all the hardships that these people have experienced. We cannot expect any high standard of health from these displaced persons. That is hardly the thing for us to do. What we should do is to try to save some of these lives. We must remember that many of these people find themselves where they are to-day because they fought the battle on the battlefield. They are the ones who went through the privations and horrors of war, while we in Canada enjoyed perhaps the highest standard of living we ever had. There was not a single acre of land scorched in this country; there was not a single home bombed out at night; there was not a single family that did not have a roof over their heads; therefore I consider that we should consider this problem purely from the Christian and humanitarian viewpoint. I appeal to the minister and to the government to give most sympathetic consideration to the suggestions I have made.

Mr. SKEY: I had intended to speak for some time on this subject, but it has been so ably covered by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka) that I feel I can make my remarks very brief. I should like to support him in what he has said to-night and to add my word to the need for planning, the need for a committee on immigration, and to emphasize our moral duty to stateless and displaced persons.

I consider that our greatest need to-day is a committee on immigration. There are so many intricate problems coming up with regard to nationals of many countries that unless they can be brought before a committee to be discussed privately and the difficulties ironed out, I feel that in the next session the minister will have a tremendous task before him. I think we are all aware of the problems and difficulties that are facing the government to-day with respect to immigration and the problem of dealing fairly with the nationals of many countries. We know there are transportation difficulties in repatriating our soldiers, war brides, and their children. We know there is a critical shortage of housing, an unemployment problem and many other problems. But we have such tremendous resources in this country that we can absorb a moderate number of people and discharge this moral duty within the next few years.

I am one who is most anxious to do everything I can to further that great work. I should like to make one reference to the work of an eminent historian, Mr. Griffiths Taylor. I do not altogether share his opinion for in this work he analyses Canada's position and outlines the number of people who might be settled here. He says that Manitoba could support 63,000,000 people, that eastern Canada could support 96,000,000 people and that adjoining regions could support 30,000,000 people. That makes a total of 189,000,000. That is not my opinion but that of Mr. Griffiths Taylor, an eminent geographer and historian.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Where is he?

Mr. SKEY: University of Melbourne, Australia.

Mr. MARTIN: Professor Hurd of McMaster university has made a different analysis.

Mr. SKEY: Perhaps the Secretary of State is right. I have had other forecasts that go up to 100 million for Canada or fifty million for Ontario, and so on. I am only endeavouring to prove that there are estimations that this country has the land and supplies to support a much larger number of people than we have at the present time. At least we could support double our present population.

Mr. MACKENZIE: How long was he in Canada?

Mr. SKEY: I am sorry, but in the preface he does not give any indication.

I can give the committee another figure which may interest it. For the whole North American continent he estimates a total of 702 million; the eastern United States, 298 millions. That is based on natural resources; coal, iron, fertility, rainfall, electric power and many other things. It is an analytical treatise, not a work of fiction.

However, I shall not delay the committee any longer than to put on record a resolution recently passed in Toronto which shows how the citizens of that city feel toward the present situation in Europe. The first point is that the right of asylum should be granted to displaced persons in western Europe; second, that the displaced people should be provided with lodgings, food, clothing and medical care for such time until a way can be found to reestablish them permanently; third, that every effort should be made to reestablish displaced people in a country where they can live out their lives peaceably without fear of want or persecution. These are the resolutions of one committee. I have also a special request from one section of the community, which is in the form of a letter to the Prime Minister. It refers to the Polish people and says:

> As the Prime Minister of a mighty and most respected nation, and as one in whose power lies the granting of our wish . . . we beg you to admit into Canada discharged servicemen of the Polish forces who wish to settle here and give them the opportunity to love the freedom and heritage of a noble and democratic power, just as we value it beyond worldly expression.

These are just two quotations from the letters and resolutions which have come into my hands.

May I conclude my remarks with a word to the department. In my dealings with them I have been met with extreme courtesy and helpfulness. I know they have been tremendously overworked by the problems that have been thrust upon them. I am glad to see that there is some increase in their estimates to help them deal with the problems that are before them. I hope that in the future able men will not be so closely bound by a rigid Immigration Act which gives us practically no power to select and very little opportunity to bring good and loyal fighting men and their families to this country. I have served with a number of these men to whom I am referring, namely, Polish airmen. I know the tremendous loyalty, courage and powers of endurance which they possess. I know they would be good citizens; I know it is the feeling of the men in the armed forces of this country that they would like to welcome them to Canada and to have them as citizens. In the past we have accepted new Canadians, as they are called in many communities, without any attempt to nationalize them. I know the Secretary of State will be interested in the suggestion that when we bring new people to this country we do not cast them on the mercy of a community or make it necessary for a few friends or relatives to care for them. When we bring them to this country we should bring them into a nationalization centre where they can learn something of our institutions and the growth of a democratic state, where they can learn to appreciate the way of life which we live, and learn to love our country as we love it.

Mr. ROSE: What I wish to speak about now is not mass immigration, because we all agree that our first responsibility is to the men overseas. Until they are back and settled in jobs, and we know exactly what Canada's economic position will be, it would be very hard for anyone to say that we should open our doors wide and let everyone come in. I want to speak more specifically about the people who suffered most as a result of Hitler's barbarism; that is, the Jewish people. I do not believe any hon. member can speak with more feeling about this matter, because I was born in a city in Poland, and I know the exact spot where a million and a half Jews were murdered by the nazis; that is, at the Maidanek camp in Lublin. Therefore I feel much more strongly about this matter than most hon. members, who have only read about it.

The Ottawa Citizen of this evening, telling about the Nuernberg trial of the twenty-one top leaders of Hitler's gang, states that six million Jews were ruthlessly slaughtered in the nazi campaign of extermination, according to the figures of the German secret police. Some Jews saved themselves in almost miraculous ways. They escaped from the camps; they hid their identity; they were saved by non-Jews. In these ways some of them managed to remain alive. They are not in the best of health; as a matter of fact they are very weak, having gone through hell, and I cannot find any more polite word to describe it. Some are still kept in concentration camps in the American and British zones. The other day we heard Mrs. Lorna Wingate, the widow of General Orde Wingate of Wingate's raiders, who made a very strong plea on behalf of the Jewish people to about one hundred members of this house. She also spoke in the city of Toronto where, in referring to the Jews in camps in western Europe, she said:

> These Jews are living ghosts . . . They have gone through hell and have come out the other side. Their home is a concentration camp where the bones of their brothers and sisters lie buried in a few feet of earth. They are fenced in as they were when the Germans were their masters. Their food allotment is less than the Germans who stare at them from outside the fence.

I am not asking that we bring to Canada all those left alive in Europe, but I am appealing particularly on behalf of those who have in this country relatives who are willing to bring them here and look after them, without taking a single job away from anyone. I have here some appeals coming from such people in western Europe. Here is a letter from one who was a lieutenant in the Polish army. He was taken prisoner by the Germans in 1939 and liberated by the Americans. His parents live in Montreal and are citizens of this country. He writes to them in English, as follows:

> Six years captivity may achieve very, very much! I have got used to many things; above all to endure every injury, to submit to all decrees of fate, and to persevere in patience. But day goes after day, and the years are fleeting. . . . The most irritating and painful problem now is the open question—what to do, whither to go?

He concludes by appealing to his parents to bring him to Canada. A permit was issued to this man allowing him to come to this country in 1928, but now he is told that he may not come. He had a wife and child in Warsaw. They are dead. He has no one but his parents and other relatives who are in Montreal, but he cannot come here because the department tells us that there are no ships. I insist, however, that Portuguese ships would bring these people here if their relatives were permitted to arrange passage for them. Here is a letter from a girl eighteen years old, written through the Red Cross. She says:

I was five years in a concentration camp in Auschwitz—

And Auschwitz camp, according to the evidence reported from Nuernberg to-day, is the place where a million and a half people were murdered.

—and have nobody in the world only my uncle. I beg you very much for an answer.

Well, she can get no answer because under present conditions there is a strict ruling in effect even against these people who have lost their families in Europe and have relatives only in Canada. None of them ever helped Hitler; they were always his greatest opponents; they have suffered most at his hands; yet to-day they cannot come to this country.

I wish to make an appeal on their behalf. Even before the next session of this parliament something must be done to give a spark of hope to people who cannot think of returning to the places where their relatives lie dead as a result of barbarous treatment and murder. Our humanity should be such that we would give these people an affirmative answer and say, "You can come to Canada. We will do at least this much to make up for the suffering you have gone through."

Mrs. STRUM: I wish to say just a few words on behalf of a specialized group of those who have suffered from the dislocation of Europe. I believe some very fine ideas have been advanced to-night, but I also believe there are a few things which are quickly forgotten in connection with this whole situation. We have just finished a dreadful war. While that war was in progress we said to those people, "This is your war and ours, and it will be your victory and ours." Then the shooting stopped; the papers were signed, and we came to the parting of the ways. They went on to hunger, exposure and disease; we returned to warmth and prosperity. But I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this is our peace; this is our joint victory and our joint responsibility. We who are more prosperous now than we have ever been, because of war, cannot disown these brothers in arms who gave their lives, their children, their homes and everything they had in the cause we supported. These people who joined underground movements and deliberately destroyed their bridges, their shipping, their railways, their factories and their resources, believed that when peace came we would restore these things which they so cheerfully sacrificed. We whose national income was tripled during the war now grudgingly vote them one per cent of it. I think our contribution to UNRRA is shamefully small; and I believe that the attitude we have adopted so far in regard to the victims of this struggle is unworthy of this great country.

One group deserves special consideration, and for a moment I am going to talk about the children of Europe. Recently I had the pleasure of talking to several persons who came a short time ago from that unhappy continent. They tell us that there are various groups who need to be sorted out, before we shall know exactly how many there are. Then there are the orphans of Europe, those whose parents died in concentration camps, in slave labour camps, and those children who have been orphaned because their parents were actively engaged in the underground movement. Those children have given everything.

Then there are the unhappy children who are the result of the dislocation of war. A very fine Quaker lady told us a week or so ago that in Norway, alone, there are thousands of children born of German fathers, who are considered to be a blot and a reproach. They are the unwanted children, the result of the invasion, and Norway now would like someone to take them off their hands. These are the unhappy by-products flowing from the dislocation and upheaval of war. We cannot ignore them. We who gained so much cannot say now that the war is over, "this is Canada; this is our country, and we have no further obligation." We cannot do that sort of thing.

I am pleased that there are those in every group in the house who are prepared to rise in their places and say that they will not be a party to any action of that kind. The children of Europe to whom we could give shelter would not compete in our labour market, nor would they be a charge on the government. In a radio broadcast I delivered a few weeks ago I spoke to the people of my constituency, and the people in the surrounding area. This was a speech delivered in the "Report From Parliament Hill" series. In my broadcast I asked those people to write to me letting me know whether they knew German families who would take German children,

Polish families who would take Polish children, or people from other European countries who had come to Canada, who are now Canadians and who would be willing to accept children from various parts of Europe. I was delighted with the response. I have received letters every day from people who are only too anxious to help, and who are waiting for us to open the doors so that these children may be let in. I have here a letter from a young doctor and his wife, who is Scottish. They have a child of their own, and they ask now for a Polish child, because they say that the Polish people suffered more than any others.

Then, I have figures here to show what Great Britain has done. Let us remember that Great Britain has always been overcrowded, that it is one of the most heavily populated countries in the world, and that a third of her homes were either damaged or destroyed. But in the midst of scarcity, privation and overcrowding, this is what Britain did, as described in a speech by Mr. Anthony Eden in the British House of Commons in December, 1943:

> As regards our own country since May, 1940, all of it a difficult period for us, we have taken some 60,000 non-British refugees and they are still coming in at the rate of about 800 a month. Great Britain is continuing to give accommodation to displaced persons.

As was stated recently by the hon. member for Vegreville, they are allowing non-British people who are now resident in Great Britain to accept their relatives, and to give them homes in that country. I hope we shall not wait for the next session of parliament to set up a committee. I hope that we who are so comfortable, so callous and so smug will open our hearts and begin to make preparations, so that when these children are sorted out and are made available we shall be in a position gladly to accept thousands of them. Our Canadian homes are waiting to take them in.

Mr. JAQUES: I wish to make only two or three remarks. It seems to me there are two ways of looking at this question of immigration. One, of course, is from the point of view of relieving the distressed in Europe, and the other way is that of looking at the question from the point of view of benefiting Canada. I am not one who believes that merely by bringing in immigrants Canada automatically will be benefited. We have had a lesson of that in the past. If Canada is to benefit from bringing in more immigrants, then I feel that we shall have to make conditions in Canada such that the immigrants will be glad and willing to stay after they get here.

That cannot be said of the past. I have been in Canada since 1901. I do not know the number of people who have come here during that time—it would run into the millions, I suppose—but I do know that in the same time very nearly as many people have left Canada because they thought the United States and other countries offered greater opportunities.

Therefore it seems to me that apart altogether from the humanitarian point of view, if Canada is to benefit by having more immigrants, then we certainly shall have to see to it that after they get here they will be able to find opportunities and to maintain a standard of living which will induce them to stay here, and which will not encourage them to look abroad for somewhere else to go, as they have done in the past.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I do not wish to speak at length, but this is a matter of great importance and I should like to say a few words about it.

I want it to be clear that in approaching this question of immigration I am not unmindful of the fact that Canadian service personnel and war brides should receive first priority in the matter of entrance to this country. We do not ignore that necessity.

However, when that situation has been relieved to the point where some people can be allowed into Canada, may I point out that there are a few things requiring consideration. There are immediate problems, and long-range problems and policies.

The immediate problem seems to be that of finding ways and means of helping those millions of people in Europe who have been roaming up and down from one country to another, and who are classified as displaced and sometimes as stateless people.

About a week ago I attended a lecture in Ottawa addressed by Mr. Edward Cahill of Boston, Massachusetts. This gentleman was in Europe not long ago, and he had seen at first hand something of the problem of displaced persons. I am sure that any other hon. members who heard him must have felt much the same way as I did. Some of the experiences he described were sufficient to give one the creeps. Among other things he said that there were anywhere from 20,000,000 to 30,000,000 people in Europe to-day who could be classified as displaced. They find themselves in the position where they do not know how they are going to live through the winter. In fact, he predicted that unless something unforseen and almost miraculous is done there will be hundreds of thousands and perhaps several million who will not see the spring.

He pointed out also that malnutrition has advanced so far that there are hundreds of thousands of people in Europe who, even though they are fed the best of food for the rest of the winter, will still die of starvation. I am told by my medical friends that when malnutrition reaches a certain stage it becomes a sort of disease which mere food will not cure. In other words, there are thousands of people who are already doomed to death.

What about those who can still be saved? I believe we should be able to receive a certain number of these displaced persons or refugees. I say that because of what other speakers have said about Great Britain. We have a lesson to learn there. If a country like Great Britain, which has suffered far beyond anything that we can imagine, is still able to extend her hand to her neighbours and welcome them, surely we in this country who are so well off in proportion should be able to do a great deal more.

Let us not be afraid of accepting refugees. There has been a great deal of speculation in this country about that question. Let me refer again to Great Britain. One reason why Britain became great is the fact that she was always tolerant and broad-minded when it came to political refugees. She has always been ready to open her doors and allow freedom of expression for those from other countries. The Flemish weavers and the Huguenots and others brought new skills and a new outlook that helped to build Great Britain to what she is to-day. I believe there is room in Canada for new skills and new aptitudes and perhaps new points of view.

I wish to make this clear, because unfortunately I have been accused lately by certain people of advocating the bringing into this country of nazi collaborationists. Anyone who has heard what I have said in this chamber can say that is not true. Let me make it perfectly clear that I am not advocating and never have advocated the bringing into this country of nazi collaborationists. I am one of those who denounced Hitler and Mussolini publicly many years before the war, at a time when some of these accusers of mine thought they were pretty fine fellows. I wish to make it perfectly clear that I do not want nazi collaborators in this country. I make that statement definitely, emphatically and without reservation. I hope that will be clear enough.

I want to see people in this country, regardless of where they come from or what their nationality is, who believe in the principles of democratic freedom. I believe we shall find among the refugees of Europe some of the best democrats in the world. The fact that they have found it necessary to become refugees, to get away from totalitarian rule, proves that they have the principles of democracy and freedom so deeply in their hearts that they were willing to suffer privation in order to preserve them. So much for the immediate problem.

Then a word as to the long-range policy. I should like to point out that there definitely is room for expansion in this country, and I should like to give a few figures to illustrate what I mean. In 1851 there were in this country 2,312,919 people; in 1941 there were 11,506,665 people, an increase of about 9,000,000. Of that number, over 6,000,000 were immigrants. Roughly speaking, two-thirds of the increase between those two dates was made up of immigrants. I do not know what the target should be for the future; I do not know what we should aim at or what we want our population to be at any given date, but from those figures we can see that there is certainly room to carry on if we are to have an expansionist attitude in this country.

The attitude of labour and of the veterans on this question is quite clear. I wish to put that on the record, because it is important to make it clear that anything I may say to-night or at any time is not intended to clash with the views of organized labour. We in this group have always tried to look after the interests of labour. I should like to put on record the attitude of the Trades and Labour Congress and the Canadian Congress of Labour toward immigration. First, I should like to read a resolution adopted by the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada at their 1944 convention, reading as follows:

Whereas there is a demand in some quarters for a softening of the restrictions on immigration to this country;

And whereas the war in Europe has created a terrific refugee problem in connection with the mass flight of hundreds of thousands of innocent victims of the nazis;

Therefore be it resolved—that Canada's Immigration Act be revised to make it possible for Canada to do her share in granting refuge to her full quota of refugees;

And be it further resolved—that a policy of accepting immigrants into this country be pursued so long as such policy in no way adversely affects living standards or the welfare of our present Canadian population.

The following is a resolution passed by the Canadian Congress of Labour at its convention held in 1944:

Be it resolved that the Canadian Congress of Labour in convention assembled request the dominion government to institute a concrete plan of immigration during the post-war period, without any danger of displacement of present labour, and along the following plan:

(1) The selection of immigrants whose personal training and qualifications will permit them to be used in the development of the sections of Canada that are not being fully utilized, as well as in new developments of industry for which they are fitted.

(2) The acceptance of only those immigrants who are able to pass a reasonable health examination.

(3) Every possible assistance to be given them in developing and maintaining a standard of living comparable to that existing in the dominion at the time of their arrival.

I should like to place on the record the attitude of the veterans as outlined in the publication Canadian Veterans. This article reads:

One thing is certain: that no intelligent Canadian can possibly expect that the open spaces of this dominion are going to go unpopulated long in a world where people are starving for want of arable soil—a world in which all sections are neighbours within a day's journey of each other.

Sooner or later those spaces are going to be filled. It is up to us, just as soon as our veterans are settled, to eschew any dog-in-the-manger attitude that may exist, and to spread out arms —judiciously—to immigration.

The attitude of those three organizations is fairly similar; they are in favour of an immigration and expansionist policy as long as proper safeguards are taken to make sure that the interests of organized labour and the discharged veterans are not affected. That is the attitude I am taking to-night and that is the attitude of our group.

I agree with what the hon. members for Spadina and Trinity said about the necessity of having a committee on immigration. I should like to add to what they said by suggesting that when this committee is set up it should receive advice from representatives of labour and agriculture, and from the professional groups, so that it will receive the representations of all the different classifications and occupations in Canada.

I was interested in hearing what the hon. member for Wetaskiwin had to say about immigrants coming to Canada but not remaining here. That is true. I have figures here from the Canada Year Book which show that six out of ten persons who came to Canada as immigrants left for some other country, the greater part of them going to the United States. The reason for that is fairly obvious. If the people who come here cannot find what they are seeking; if they cannot find occupations that will give them a good standard of living, naturally they will go where they can find what they want. I believe that in that connection our immigration will be tied up with our economic system. If we adopt an economic system based on a policy of expansion, of making the greatest possible use of our natural resources, it will be possible for us not only to keep up a high standard of living for our people at present in Canada but also to admit thousands more. If, on the other hand, we adopt a policy of contraction; that is, if we allow ourselves to drift back to the system in the years of the dark thirties, then it will be a question not of immigration into this country, but of emigration to somewhere else.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I shall be brief in the remarks I have to make. May I say, at the outset, that the note I shall strike to-night will not be in complete harmony with the concert you have just heard in support of immigration.

Some hon. members advocate a fairly massive immigration, others would favour a less extensive immigration, and others still merely want this country to look with compassion upon those who have most suffered in all countries of Europe.

I must state at once that if sometimes certain members of this house are compelled to take a stand that appears somewhat radical on some matters, they do not do so because they hold radical views but quite often in order to oppose a theory implying the promotion of various projects which are not in keeping with our needs and especially with existing conditions.

As I said, if I am striking to-night a note which is not quite in harmony with those you have heard so far, it is not because I wish to ostracize any nation or race. Far from it. I have enough Christian feelings to sympathize with any people in their hardships, but my Canadian spirit is also sufficiently deep to prevent me from forgetting the plight, —if that word is not too strong—of my own country while commiserating with other unfortunate people.

It is true that in other countries hardships have been suffered, that children were massacred and that a number of men and women have spent months and years in concentration camps, but it is also true that Canada has done her share to alleviate all those hardships. It is true that hundreds of thousands of our soldiers have left Canada, whether in the air force, the army or the navy, in order to join in the fight against ideologies that were too wide-spread, not only in Europe but in many other countries, and which had become deeply-rooted in the minds of some people. It must be remembered, however, that Canada has sent overseas a large number of troops in addition to the billions which we have sent to the continent to help the people of those European countries. Further that we continue, through UNRRA, to help relieving the sufferings of those countries.

I understand that some families may wish to adopt young children who have suffered while they were in Europe, but we must remember that in our own country there are children who also have suffered and who are still suffering; some fathers have left their families to go to war and they have not returned, and their children are now orphans. Others went overseas and have returned seriously wounded or crippled for life; thus, their families, although they may not be in dire need, cannot live in the comfort which they had the right to expect.

We must not forget that we are also faced with the problem of our returned men. I was a member of the committee on veterans' affairs, and I have seen members of all the groups in this house take part in all the discussions and study, in a practical and intelligent manner, the problem of the Canadian veterans. And until this problem has been settled, and as long as our law makers refer to repatriation, relief for our veterans, land settlement, there can be no thought of adopting an immigration policy which would but add to our difficult and urgent problems and would complicate conditions in our country.

Hence, Mr. Chairman, even if I may appear somewhat radical—I have already been referred to as such, but this does not worry me—it is because I believe that any government, or any country whatsoever, must be possessed of a nationalist feeling, even if this word may shock some of the hon. members present, and I mean that we must think of our own country first.

I do not think that anyone could say that Canada has been guilty of selfishness during the war. I do not think we should open our doors wide to immigration for we already have enough important, urgent and difficult problems to solve.

An hon. member has suggested a committee on immigration. I would like to be a member of it so as to make a thorough, intelligent and appropriate study of the matter.

Those who are here to-night and who have studied world history, know that it is impossible to prevent, in any part of the world, the migration of populations from one country to another. This fact is generally recognized. However, no member of a legislature, whoever he may be, whatever group he may belong to, whatever school of thought he may follow, may abstain from requesting the government he supports or opposes, to be very careful in the selection of immigrants. The immigration officers can never be too strict, for it is only after an immigrant has lived in his adopted country, that it is possible to judge him on his merits.

[Mr. P. Gauthier.]

It may well be claimed, it is true, that the young refugees we may bring into our homes by thousands or hundreds of thousands, will not immediately become public charges. No immigrant, moving from one country to another is exempt, on his entry into his adopted country, from the supervision prescribed by the law of the land and from a special attention on the part of the authorities; by this fact, he plays a part in the shaping of social measures which become ever more numerous and more important.

This is the reason why I rise to my feet to-night. It is not that I wish to sound a false note in this debate, not that I wish the people of Canada to believe that I am irremediably opposed to any immigration policy, but rather that I wish to point out, before we throw our doors wide open to immigration, that we should give some thought to our own interests and to the settlement of our domestic problems, for we must prevent the recurrence of extensive unemployment, which might indeed well prevail after the war.

I therefore hold the view that we should first think of our young children, of our incapacitated soldiers and veterans. Once their case is settled, there will be nothing to prevent us from surveying the situation and implementing a policy not of the open-door but of restricted immigration, insisting on the most careful selection of the immigrants which are to be allowed to enter our beautiful Canada.

(Text)

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): How many refuges have been admitted to Canada since January 1, 1940?

Mr. GLEN: I cannot furnish the exact figures as refugees are not classified as such in immigration statistical compilations.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I am sorry, too, that I cannot get the information. I think that if we did get it I would find myself in disagreement with the hon. member for Spadina who congratulated the government on its large-heartedness and benevolence in bringing refugees to this country. I suspect that our record in that regard has been shameful. We did an extraordinarily poor job and not one which redounds to the credit of Canada. I have made my views on the immigration department known in the past and I will not reiterate them here. I have said that on the admission of the department itself immigration into this country was on the basis of race. I said then, and I repeat now, that that is a fascist conception, and at Nuernberg to-day we are trying men for their lives for practising those very things which we have practised in the past. I should like to have some assurance from the minister that this vicious system will stop and that whatever immigration there is into Canada will not be on the basis of the phobias of people but on the merits of those who desire to come into the country. I should like very much to get an assurance from the minister in that respect.

Mr. GLEN: The hon. member asks me to declare what may be the policy of the government with regard to immigration. There can be no announcement at this time of any long-range immigration policy. As has been stated by several hon. members, the first duty of the government is the repatriation of our service personnel with their dependents as well as their reestablishment. Whatever policy is evolved, I can assure the hon. member that the same will be subject to discussion in this house and the hon. member will have an opportunity then of expressing his point of view with regard to the same.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I am glad to have the minister's assurance that any rules and regulations which may be drawn up later will be discussed in the house. I should like him to understand that I do not hold him responsible or culpable for what has happened in the past. I simply wish to impress upon him that, on the admission of the department, entry into Canada has been on the basis of race, which I consider scandalous. I am not asking for a declaration of government policy when I ask a minister of the crown to say that such a wretched situation will not prevail in the future. This is a principle of democracy which must be preserved.

Item agreed to.

Indian Affairs Branch

178. Fur conservation and development of native crafts, and to authorize, subject to the approval of the governor in council, the appointment of such extra temporary officers, clerks and employees as may be necessary for the purpose of this item, $150,000.

Mr. McLURE: What is the extent of fur conservation?

Mr. GLEN: I have placed on Hansard a factual statement with regard to fur conservation throughout the country.

Item agreed to.

Mr. GLEN: There are supplementary estimates which have been distributed, and there are no new principles involved in them. They are simply amplifications of votes already discussed in the house. The votes were calculated during war time and since then have been amplified. With the consent of the committee we will go ahead with them.

Mines and Geology Branch

486. Bureau of geology and topography administration and miscellaneous services—further amount required, $2,400.

Mr. BRACKEN: I wonder if it is fair to ask us to deal with supplementary estimates now when they have just been tabled. Is there not ample opportunity to deal with other estimates, so that we may have a chance to look at these?

Mr. MACKENZIE: We are dealing now only with those of the Minister of Mines and Resources. He is leaving to-morrow for the west.

Mr. BRACKEN: I withdraw the objection.

Item agreed to.

Indian Affairs Branch

508. Grants to agricultural exhibitions and Indian fairs, in the amount detailed in the estimates—further amount required, $400.

Mr. BRACKEN: Can the minister explain this?

Mr. GLEN: There is an annual vote for a number of agricultural exhibitions, and this is one fair which was not included in these votes. This is for prize money given at that fair for Indian children.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

549. Departmental administration, $434,101.

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): There are several questions which were asked some days ago when my estimates were up. The hon. member for Lake Centre asked one or two, and there were others asked by some other hon. gentlemen. With the permission of the committee I will put the replies on Hansard. The hon. member for Lake Centre asked: How many permanent and temporary employees in the Department of Transport receive war duties supplements? The answer is, 708, including air services division. Another question was: How many employees were seconded by other departments to the Department of Transport? The answer is, four. Another question was: How many reclassifications have been made and what is the increase resulting therefrom? There was a total number of reclassifications of 1,327. The total cost per annum was $227,700, and the average annual increase to each employee was $171.

The hon. member then asked: What was the basis upon which decisions were made as to who shall be entitled to war duties supplements and reclassifications. War duties supplements in my department are paid to those employees who have assumed substantially increased duties and responsibilities directly related to the war effort and to those who assumed the full duties of higher classified employees on military leave.

To arrive at the amount of the supplement, the department reassesses the position in the light of the additional duties, and the amount of the supplement recommended is the difference between the employee's existing salary and the minimum salary rate of the class to which reclassification would normally be made. The recommendation with ministerial concurrence is then submitted to treasury board.

In the Department of Transport, including air services, a total of 708 employees were granted war duties supplements. Forty-nine recommendations were not approved.

Reclassifications in the Department of Transport fall into the following two categories:

1. Employees in classes of grade 1 or lower —office boys, clerks, typists, et cetera—when their names were reached on the civil service commission eligible lists as a result of competitive examinations, were recommended for reclassification to the next higher grade if their duties warranted same.

2. Employees in divisions of the department designated as war units by treasury board. Units so designated are merchant seamen manning pool, controller of transport, and war-time construction division of air services branch. These new divisions were subject to constant and rapid expansion and, as from time to time employees assumed duties greatly in excess of their original classification, they were recommended for higher classification.

The hon. member for Peterborough West asked a question about weeds in the Trent canal. The reply is that the department removes weeds in the main channel, but not opposite approaches to private docks.

Mr. BRACKEN: May I just say one word with respect to the estimates of the Department of Transport. I do not think we shall have to ask for much in the way of information, but in view of the absence of some of our members I would suggest that the first item be allowed to stand.

Mr. GREEN: There is one matter that I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. It has to do with the port of Vancouver. As the minister knows, the port is operated by the national harbours board. There seems to be some question in the city about the operation of the port. Of course it is on the Pacific and therefore presents problems quite different from those of the Atlantic ports. The suggestion is made that the interest on the bonds is too high. The minister will correct me if I am wrong, but I believe it is five per cent.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is right.

Mr. GREEN: Another suggestion is that arrangements could be made to have the bonds refunded locally at a much lower rate, so that the port would not be paying such a high rate of interest. It is also suggested that the capitalization is too high, and that the cargo rates which are levied, I believe, on all tonnage passing through the harbour are a drawback, at least at their present amount.

When these ports were taken over by the national harbours board some of us felt that there was a danger of getting too centralized control; that the ports would get away from the initiative and the great interest that would follow from some form of local supervision. I believe that we have now come to the time when the weaknesses in this centralized policy are beginning to appear. I would remind the minister that in 1931-32 a survey was made of the ports of Canada by Sir Alexander Gibb. With regard to having some local share in the operation of the port Sir Alexander Gibb had this to say, which is found at page 31 of his report:

> It is essential to avoid emasculating the local administration, since no centralized control can replace an efficient and active local administration, or the special knowledge and initiative of the local business community, both of which are vital to a port's prosperity. For this latter reason I strongly advocate a local advisory council.

So far as I am aware that recommendation was never carried out in any of the ports. I continue:

> There are very many aspects of port working which such a council can properly care for, such as the representation of the interests of private wharf owners, of local merchants and distributors, of local consignees and exporters, of the labour view and of the attitude of boards of trade, chambers of commerce, corn exchanges and other such trade organizations in addition to shipping.
>
> It serves very usefully to identify the community with the port; and to secure the support and interest of local members of parliament, the city council, or provincial government in schemes, and so anticipate and meet criticisms from any such quarters, or action that might be prejudicial to the port.
> It is invaluable in exploring the possibilities of local markets, in carrying out advertisement and propaganda and in cooperation with interests likely to promote industrial developments. Finally, a local council provides a useful check on the tendency of more or less permanent officials to become stereotyped or arbitrary.

The port manager would be ex-officio chairman of the council, which would meet regularly and be consulted on all such matters as proposed developments, alterations in rates, important changes in operation. The members of the council should have the right of initiating discussions on matters of policy affecting the port, on any complaints raised by users of the port, and on questions of rates, charges, et cetera; but not on any purely executive matters, and they would have no executive duties or powers.

The advisory council's proceedings and recommendations would be submitted to the central authority, and they should have the right of direct access to the central authority, but not to any other department of government.

There was no point in raising any of these questions while the war was on, but we are now facing a period of expansion, a period when there must be more interest taken in our ports. The fact that Vancouver is a port is the greatest asset of that city. It is the main Canadian port on the Pacific. There will be an immense trade across to the orient and to Australia and New Zealand if proper policies are followed. I suggest that within the next few months consideration should be given to the question of whether or not the port of Vancouver, and perhaps the other ports in Canada, are being handled in the most efficient and modern way.

The national harbours board have done good work; they have a very difficult job. But I suggest that the time has come to look over the whole situation and to stream-line the operation of our great ports. Would it be possible to have an investigation made with regard to the port of Vancouver? I suggest that the minister should go out there at the first opportunity. He has not been west since his appointment. Perhaps he could do so between the end of this session and the opening of the next.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. gentleman has raised four questions. I shall deal with them briefly. The first had to do with the rate of interest on the debenture debt. I am not prepared to disagree with him on the rate. I may tell him that the national harbours board is considering the revision of it. No decision has been arrived at, but as soon as it has been reached, it will be announced.

With reference to capitalization, that is another problem which is continually receiving the attention of the board. I am not in a position to make any announcement on that.

With reference to cargo rates, they are being studied at the moment, and they may or may not be revised in accordance with whether there is a reduction in the interest rate of the debenture debt. Sometimes it is the policy of the board and of the government to refund a series of debentures which come due at a certain date by borrowing the money on certificates of indebtedness and reducing the rate. Whether or not that will be done I am not in a position to say.

With reference to more local share in the operation of the port, I should say to the hon. gentleman that in large part that is the work of the port manager. Generally speaking, the port manager is a man who is taken from the community. He knows the circumstances; he is in contact with boards of trade, chambers of commerce and city councils. He has a local knowledge of the situation, and the national harbours board works with him. I am not prepared to say that what is suggested in the Gibb report is not a better conclusion, but at the moment that is the policy of the board. As far as a visit to Vancouver is concerned, I shall be happy to make one at the first possible opportunity.

Mr. GREEN: The minister perhaps has not recently studied the recommendations made by Sir Alexander Gibb—

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have read the report.

Mr. GREEN: —with regard to local advisory councils. We have a very good port manager in Vancouver; I am not for a moment complaining about his work; but Sir Alexander suggested that councils should be set up which would take a direct responsibility in the administration of the ports. It is not a matter of the port manager meeting people; he does that now, and is very good at it. It is a matter of giving some responsibility to the various groups who are interested in the operations of the port. I would suggest that between now and the opening of next session the minister give consideration to making provision for the setting up of some sort of local advisory council. I think it would result in more efficient and particularly more up-to-date and keener administration of the port. Local issues are coming up all the time and, particularly with a port as far removed from Ottawa as Vancouver, the men here cannot be expected to keep in touch with such developments. I suggest that there should be some local men who would have a direct responsibility for seeing that our port is used to the best advantage.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): I had not thought we would come to the national harbours board until later, but inasmuch as the hon. member for Vancouver South has brought up the question of our national ports I should like to say a few words. In the first place, I would invite the minister to come to Halifax and see a great port. He has been there before, I know, but not since becoming Minister of Transport, I was in Vancouver two or three weeks ago, and I told the hon. member for Vancouver South that I was very much impressed with the facilities I found out there and also with the development at Esquimalt. Recently in Halifax we had a visit from the chairman and another member of the national harbours board. The chairman had been there a few months previously, and at that time he told us that the work of the port of Halifax in war time had been outstanding and beyond the most optimistic hopes of the members of his board. He informed us that no less than 56,780 ships had entered and cleared the port during the war, which represented an average of twenty-six a day.

No doubt the members of the board have had their thoughts and energies directed to war activities, and for that reason during the war years very little was done in the way of modernizing or developing the port facilities at Halifax. This whole question was recently brought to the attention of the Canadian people when the owners of the Queen Elizabeth objected to Halifax and, instead, sent the ship to New York. Their objection was that an element of danger existed in wintertime if a southeasterly gale developed while the ship was lying at her dock in the harbour. Captain Bissett, the master of the ship, is a highly qualified master mariner, familiar for many years with conditions in the port of Halifax. It is true that the Canadian government made strenuous efforts to have the Queen Elizabeth go to Halifax, but the owners decided to accept the views of her master. Of course she is an exceptional ship; exceptional in size and draft and also in the very large area necessarily exposed to the wind. The owners decided to follow the advice of their experts. But experts give opinions, while facts are facts. Sometimes experts are wrong, and it would be very difficult to convince the people of Halifax that the experts were right in this case. They would be inclined to agree with the officials of the Department of Transport, who expressed the opinion that Halifax was quite a safe port for the ship to enter and dock. However, the British ministry of transport decided to accept the decision of the owners, and this decision has, I think, served a useful purpose in bringing to the attention of the people of Canada the necessity of modernizing the facilities of the port of Halifax, or perhaps I should say the necessity of creating the most modern facilities at that port, for I doubt if to-day it is sufficient to modernize facilities which were developed there at a time when no one contemplated ships the size of the Queen Elizabeth. It is not a case of constructing a new breakwater or extending an existing breakwater. I do not attempt to say what should be done, but Halifax must be a port where the largest British ship can lie in safety, and where no marine expert will be able to question the adequacy of the facilities.

The situation to-day is that, apart altogether from any developments made necessary by the action of the owners of the Queen Elizabeth, many other facilities have to be provided in order that Halifax will be able to compete on even terms with the great Atlantic ports of the United States. A few moments ago the hon. member for Vancouver South mentioned the Gibb report. It is true that this report contained a recommendation that advisory committees be set up at the national ports, and that this recommendation was never implemented by the government. Twenty years ago we had a famous report made on maritime rights, the Duncan report. The commission headed by Sir Andrew Duncan recognized that the development of a port was as much a matter of mechanical and technical equipment as was the development of any extensive manufacturing or industrial business; and in their report they recommended that port facilities at Halifax and Saint John should be developed on such a scale as to create channels through which trade could expand both winter and summer. They recognized that such developments were necessary if our maritime ports were to be able to compete on anything like equal terms with the ports of the United States.

I must say that central control of our national ports has not been wholly a success. One result of central management is that a national port such as Halifax is not able to go out after business in competition with another national port. That being so, I submit that it is the responsibility of the board and the government to see that business is directed to our national ports in something like fair proportions.

There is another consideration that should be kept in mind. In the house we have supported and approved proposals that our government extend credit to allied nations to enable them to purchase food and commodities in this country. We cannot control the movement of foreign ships, but I submit that we can at least insist that all goods shipped out of Canada for the relief of allied nations, or goods purchased in this country on the credit of Canada should go to our Atlantic national ports.

I do not wish to take up further time this evening, because the committee is anxious to finish the estimates. However I suggest that in respect of our national ports there are two considerations which should be kept in mind by the national harbours board and the government. One is that all Canadian products which are bound for Europe should be shipped in the wintertime, through our own Canadian ports, if they can be taken care of by those ports. The second is that full use should be made of the facilities of our maritime national ports in the summertime as well as in the winter. The government has the means as well as the obligation to see that these suggestions are carried out and this transitional period is the time to resolve that it will be done and to plan accordingly.

Mr. MACKENZIE: With the permission of the committee, and if there is no objection, with Mr. Speaker in the chair, I intend to ask consent of the house to do as we did last night; that is, to sit for an hour or so after eleven o'clock.

Mr. MacNICOL: From eleven o'clock to twelve o'clock.

Mr. COLDWELL: Until twelve o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Whatever the house feels like doing.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Mr. TOWNLEY-SMITH: Reference has already been made by the hon. member for the Battlefords and other hon. members from the northwestern part of the dominion to the fact that there are two incomplete railways, one from Cold Lake to St. Walburg, and the other from Heinsburg to Frenchman Butte in Saskatchewan. Since these incompleted parts or gaps are both in my constituency, I feel I should add my voice to their request for consideration for the completion of these lines. Apart from the uneconomic condition of having these incomplete railways, and the complete absurdity of railways with gaps in the centre of them, it becomes evident at this time of the year that when people in that country run into difficulties on account of accidents or ill health, and have to drive anywhere from forty to sixty miles to a railway, that the need for completion is most evident. I would ask the minister to give favourable consideration to the completion of these lines as soon as possible.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Might I point out that I dealt with this subject at some length when my estimates were under discussion some days ago, and I do not think it is necessary for me to repeat to-night what I said at that time, namely, that consideration was being given, and that a committee had been set up by the Canadian National Railways to review this situation. A report has not yet been received.

The hon. member for Halifax spoke about the difficulty in connection with the Queen Elizabeth. May I assure him that officers of the Department of Transport, as well as those of the national harbours board were strongly of the view that the Queen Elizabeth could dock safely at Halifax.

He, and the hon. member for Vancouver South, spoke about advisory committees. When the national harbours board was set up it was not thought necessary at that time to give consideration to advisory committees. There may come a time when that will be necessary, but thus far it has not been thought advisable. When that time comes consideration will be given to what has been said.

The hon. member for Halifax referred to two further matters, the first of which was that all Canadian products be shipped in winter through the port of Halifax or the port of Saint John. At the present time everything possible is being shipped in the winter months through those two ports. Consideration is being given to the second matter raised by him.

Mr. MacNICOL: In addition to what has been said, may I point out the importance of connecting up those two railway lines. It is that of having a through line from Prince Albert to Edmonton. At present, if one wishes to go to Edmonton from Prince Albert, he has to go to Saskatoon, board the train there, and go through to Edmonton. It is important that at least one of these lines be connected through at the earliest possible moment, so that a passenger can go straight through from Prince Albert to Edmonton.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I agree.

Mr. MacINNIS: There is a matter I should like to mention to the committee. I do not know if it comes under this item, but if the minister would hear it now I shall not take up his time on another occasion. I have before me copies of letters written to the minister by representatives of the British Colmbia seamen's union in regard to a large number of arrests of sailors on Park steamship boats on their arrival in Vancouver. I notice in one reply under date of November 6 the minister states that he has ordered an investigation to be made. Has that investigation been made and, if so, what is the result? Many of the sentences imposed have been severe, and the seamen's organization point to the fact that most of the arrests have been on ships with British masters, that very few have occurred on ships with Canadian masters. If the minister has any knowledge of that factor I should like to hear what he has to say. Before I sit down I wish to say that I cooperate with the hon. member for Vancouver South in his extension of an invitation to the minister to visit Vancouver.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I may be able to give the hon. member a reply in a few minutes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): There seems to be a general impression abroad, which may or may not be right, that since railway construction has ceased, the duties of the board of transport commissioners have been lessening rather than increasing. I confess that I am surprised at the size of the staff and at the increase, although it is slight in this case. I should like to have a brief answer as to whether the duties of this board are increasing or whether we have a situation where an organization has been built up when it had many duties to discharge and then just sticks at that level.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If the duties of the board of transport commissioners have lessened in any way it would be because of orders passed under the War Measures Act. Order 92 of the wartime prices and trade board has to do with rates and the like, and to some extent it has curtailed the activities of the board. On the other hand, the board's activities have increased in other ways. During the war years the board has dealt with all sorts of applications and complaints with reference to rates, but always of necessity subject to wartime orders and regulations. It has been working in close harmony and cooperation with the transport controller because of the ancillary powers which the transport controller had during the war years. It has had duties in connection with the regulation and supervision of the carriage of dangerous munitions and explosives, and it has had jurisdiction over railways, canals, shipping, telegraphs and telephones just as it normally had. Ninety per cent of the applications and complaints are disposed of without hearings; the other ten per cent are dealt with by hearings held in various parts of the country. While its activities may have been curtailed by the war orders, I think the duties of the board have been as important and as necessary in war time as they were in peace time.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I notice there is a director of traffic, two assistant directors of traffic and a director of operations. Would it be correct to infer that when the war-time controls come off their duties will lessen?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I would think their duties will increase rather than lessen.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is this the board to which would be presented the claims of the importers and mines in the Northwest Territories?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Since this matter was brought up in the house, I, and perhaps the minister and other hon. members, have been swamped with communications from gold mines and importers in the Mackenzie river valley. They are looking to the board for relief from the outrageous freight rates now being inflicted on the people trying to build up that country. Everybody there writes in complaining bitterly of what they have been up against. I would recommend to the minister that he instruct the transport commissioners to investigate this matter speedily. According to the Yellowknife Blade they are organizing up there and threatening more or less to set up their own government, which will see to it that they get fair play which they feel they are not getting now. As the minister himself stated a while ago, there is a freight rate of $30 a ton on oil. That is an outrageous rate, and even $20 a ton would be too much. Do not delay with this matter. There is no use in raising these people to a pitch where they cannot be calmed down easily. Some effort should be made to see that they are relieved of this condition so that this country can get along.

Item agreed to.

Marine Service—

356. Marine service administration, $15,542.

Mr. MacNICOL: There does not appear to be one item here to improve transportation facilities into the north country. I am in agreement with all these items, but I contend that the shipping facilities in the north should be improved.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not want to be too sure of this, but I think there is an item in the supplementary estimates, or, in fact, two items, dealing with improvements, replacements and repairs in the Northwest Territories.

Mr. MacNICOL: What are the numbers?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am informed now that what I said a moment ago has to do with the regular estimates also. In both the main estimates and the supplementary estimates are items having to do with the expenditure of money in the Northwest Territories.

Mr. MacNICOL: On the Mackenzie river and the Athabaska river and the Slave river?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am informed so, yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Where? I am looking and I cannot find them anywhere. I might say I have been importuned by many up there to speak for them, seeing that they have no representative here.

Mr. CHEVRIER: In vote 360, aids to navigation.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes. Now, where is there anything there pertaining to the Northwest Territories?

Mr. CHEVRIER: There is a substantial amount having to do with construction, maintenance and supervision of aids to navigation, including salaries and allowance to lighthouse keepers. That sum of money is broken down under administration, improvements, replacements and repairs, operation and maintenance. Under replacements and repairs there is the sum of $15,000 to be spent in the Northwest Territories and $4,000 to be spent in the Prince Rupert area; and under operation and maintenance, two other amounts, one for Prince Rupert, of $63,900, and the other in the Northwest Territories, of $7,388.

Mr. MacNICOL: I must inform the minister, first, that Prince Rupert is on the Pacific ocean and perhaps is not less than 700, perhaps 800 miles west.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I mentioned also the Northwest Territories.

Mr. MacNICOL: And secondly—I say this kindly; I am not finding any fault with the minister—the Northwest Territories start at parallel 60. One-half of the Slave river is south of parallel 60, South of Fort Smith, and the Athabaska river is wholly south of the Northwest Territories. I should like to know whereabouts in the Northwest Territories the minister has reference to. The item must refer to the Slave river north of parallel 60 and the Mackenzie river from northwest of Great Slave lake. Now, just where? I am sorry to be persistent, but I am swamped with letters from up there asking me please to try to do something for them. I want to help the minister; I do not want the people of that section of the country to come down on his head.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I cannot give the hon. gentleman the information now. I will try to get it in a moment or two.

Mr. BONNIER (Translation): Mr. Chairman, there is needed in my constituency an improvement which I have requested for a long time. When I was elected in 1938 the promise was made that a bridge spanning the Lachine canal would be replaced by a tunnel. The plans of that tunnel were even ready. The estimates had been prepared and they were voted for two years in succession, in 1938 and 1939. Then war came and the work was stopped. Now that the war is over, I hope that the government will bring relief to that population of over 100,000 who are trapped, as it were, and find it quite difficult on many occasions to cross the canal.

That bridge is the most difficult to cross of all those that span the Lachine canal, on account of the near-by locks.

When still at a distance of 300 or 400 feet boats signal for the opening of the bridge. The gates are then closed and traffic is quite often stopped for fifteen or twenty minutes. On one occasion, we even had to wait three or four days before being able to cross the bridge. It had been opened, but could not be closed because a boat had stopped alongside. Ice flows down in the canal from Lachine when the locks are opened. There is in the centre a pier that blocks the bridge, and the boat had stopped there. On that occasion we could not cross the bridge for three or four days.

It was because of those conditions that the government decided in 1938 to undertake that work. Mention has been made of another bridge, the Atwater bridge, where the traffic is, I admit, heavier than over our own bridge, but that bridge does not remain open as long as ours. There is no lock in the vicinity of the bridge; boats proceed at a good speed at that place and the traffic is not so congested as at Côte St. Paul.

I hope the minister will take all those facts into consideration.

We have even prepared a table showing the traffic on the bridge of Côte St. Paul. We have noted the number of vehicles, trucks, motor cars, pedestrians, bicycles which use that bridge. That was in 1938 and to-day the traffic is twice as heavy. That table shows the traffic from nine o'clock in the morning to four o'clock in the afternoon. It does not take into account the time when the traffic is quite heavy, as in the morning at eight o'clock and even at seven, and in the afternoon after four o'clock, when it is still heavier.

Here is that table:

Traffic survey—Côte St. Paul Bridge
May, 1938

	Going North	Going South	Total
25 Automobiles	1,299	1,266	2,565
Trucks	674	671	1,345
Horse-drawn vehicles	62	50	112
Street cars	113	118	231
Motorcycles	16	15	31
Bicycles	224	227	451
Pedestrians	593	609	1,002
28 Automobiles	1,624	1,514	3,238
Trucks	855	809	1,664
Horse-drawn vehicles	46	30	76
Street cars	128	127	255
Motorcycles	30	18	48
Bicycles	302	327	629
Pedestrians	812	831	1,643

A number of motor-busses also travel over this bridge.

The construction of this tunnel would bring a great deal of relief to one-third of the population of Verdun who would use it. There are also a large number of vehicles coming from the south shore via Mercier bridge and St. Patrick street, which cross over this bridge, and which greatly increase traffic. The construction of this tunnel would greatly improve conditions and would put an end to the congestion which takes place at this spot.

I hope that some means will be found to carry out this work. Plans had been prepared and tenders were to be called for when war broke out. We were told: "It is impossible to undertake this work now on account of the war." The people have understood but now that the war is over the electors of my constituency are desirous of having this improvement carried out. I hope that the department will find some means of relieving this part of my constituency where this tunnel is so badly needed.

I have here a letter which I forwarded to the minister last month. In order not to delay the debate, in view of the late hour, I am willing to place this letter on Hansard with the consent of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Very well, go ahead.

Mr. BONNIER: This letter reads as follows:

Ottawa, November 5, 1945.

The Honourable Lionel Chevrier, P.C., K.C., M.P., Minister of Transport,
Ottawa.

[Mr. Bonnier.]

My Dear Minister,

Re: Tunnel of Côte St. Paul, Lachine Canal, Que.

Plans for the construction of a tunnel under Lachine canal, between the locks and the Côte St. Paul bridge, were prepared and completed in 1939. As I stated in my letter of September 12 last, this bridge is the worst located of all those crossing Lachine canal, because of the locks which are only four or five hundred feet from the bridge. When ships are a thousand or fifteen hundred feet from the bridge, they whistle to have the bridge opened. The gates come down, the bridge opens and traffic stops; automobiles, trucks, motorcycles, bicycles and pedestrians are forced to wait on either side of the bridge for fifteen to twenty minutes and sometimes longer. Ships proceed very slowly and the same thing is repeated when they come out of the lock. Sometimes two ships meet near the lock and then traffic is at a standstill for half an hour. Frequently there are over 125 automobiles and other vehicles, as mentioned above, in addition to pedestrians, waiting to cross.

Attached please find the report of a traffic survey held in May, 1938, between eight in the morning and four in the afternoon. From four to six in the evening, it has been impossible to keep up the work, for during that period, there is a general confusion. It must not be forgotten that this survey was made in 1938 when unemployment was still extensive. You are aware that traffic has doubled in the course of the last six years.

On each side of this bridge, there are two permanent railway lines, that of the C.N.R., on the north, and that of the C.P.R., on the south. At this point, the Canadian Pacific has a large yard, starting at Church street, which runs from the entrance to St. Paul bridge in an easterly direction. East of the bridge are the switches over which both passenger and freight trains are made up and switched to the various sidings. Every time a train is transferred from one siding to another, the traffic is stopped on the bridge, a condition which prevails through the whole year.

Moreover, although I cannot be sure of the year, but it was in the fall of either 1935 or 1936, early in December, the bridge was completely closed to traffic for a period of four days. The ice that had jammed under the bridge prevented the passage of ships, six or seven of them being moored in the vicinity. Tugboats worked for three days, during which the bridge was open to traffic for only a few minutes. After all the ships had gone through, the ice was driven against the locks. We are threatened with the same condition each fall when the cold weather sets in and the ice begins to drift; then the bridge often remains open for half hours and sometimes longer, the ships stop facing the bridge and they have to be towed away.

The city of Montreal, as agreed, is still willing to give away the land necessary for the building of the tunnel.

I am convinced fifty per cent of the people of Verdun will be benefited by such a tunnel. Even a tramway line uses the bridge in its circuit from Verdun to the city. Another line goes through to Ville Emard.

At the last elections, Côte St. Paul and Ville Emard had 19,000 voters; if you multiply that number by four, representing the average family, you have a total population of 76,000. There is more: the traffic for Ville LaSalle, at the exit of Mercier bridge, is still routed by Côte St. Paul bridge, which increases congestion to a greater degree and is a further argument for the building of the tunnel which has been under consideration for about thirty years.

I could supply other detail, but I know you have them in your files concerning the proposed tunnel. As projects have been promised for the post-war period, I feel that none would be more essential than the building of the Côte St. Paul tunnel.

I will see my two colleagues of the House of Commons who are interested in the building of the Côte St. Paul tunnel and I am sure they will support my request by letters they will send you.

I hope, dear sir, that you will give my request the best possible consideration and that a favourable decision on this matter will be taken before the end of the present session.

Your devoted servant,

J. A. Bonnier,
Member of parliament for Montreal-St. Henry.

N.B. This tunnel was promised in 1938 and part of the money required was voted during the session of that year and re-voted in 1939.

J. A. B.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Is the minister prepared now to make a statement in regard to the Canso causeway or bridge, and the improvement of the grades and alignment on the railway? I will not discuss the matter at length because it was dealt with fairly fully at a previous sitting. The minister said that he was not prepared to answer at that time but would do so later in the session. If it is convenient to him I should like to have the statement now.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Before I reply to the hon. gentleman, there are two or three questions which I wish to answer. The hon. member for Vancouver East asked a question about the arrest of sailors on certain Park steamships in Vancouver. He said that most of the ships had British masters. I am informed that the men were charged under the Canada Shipping Act with offences against certain sections of the act having to do with refusal of duty and other serious breaches of discipline. The nationality of the captain had absolutely nothing to do with the charges that were laid. The seamen were members of the Westbank Park, Bridgeland Park and Cromwell Park. So far as the sentences are concerned, they would not be under the jurisdiction of the Department of Transport. They are subject, I presume, to the ordinary jurisdiction of the magistrate or the police court that tried them, and I would have nothing to do with that.

With regard to the question asked by the hon. member for Davenport, there are two amounts in the estimates covering expenditures for the Northwest Territories: $22,388 in the main estimates and $29,700 in the supplementaries all having to do with aids to navigation in that area. I have the details, but they are lengthy.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do they pertain to dredging?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Transport has absolutely nothing to do with dredging; that comes under Public Works. We provide the funds for aids to navigation, buoys and assistance to navigation, but we do not deepen or dredge the channel. I have no objection to giving the details but, as I say, they are lengthy.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is only a small amount in any event and it pertains to lights or buoys in the river.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It pertains to lights, channel buoys, flag markers, bell buoys and shore beacons and it concerns those in Great Bear lake, Mackenzie delta, east channel and Port Brabant, in the Mackenzie river, and in lake Athabaska and Great Slave lake. There is also part of the estimate that has to do with the purchase of a buoy boat at Fort Smith.

Mr. MacNICOL: I may inform the minister that these items do not amount to one, two or three as far as improvements are concerned. All the things he has mentioned are used every year. Every year they have to have buoys in the river and I have seen them myself.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There is far more in the estimates this year than in 1944.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the minister understand the significance of the items he has mentioned? You could not go down the river without the buoys and markers. I know what they are. But is there anything in the item for the improvement of the channel in the rivers?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No. As I have told the hon. gentleman, the improvement of the channel is a matter for the public works department. Transport has nothing to do with it. This department deals with aids to navigation, and this money is spent for betterments in connection with those aids.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then I suppose the only thing is to ask at the next session of parliament to have these two departments put together. It does not sound feasible that the Department of Transport is unable to recommend to the Department of Public Works what has to be done. What does the Department of Transport do? The Department of Public Works will have to wake up; in fact both departments will have to wake up. Let me read to the minister something from the Yellowknife Blade of November 20, written by John Murray McMeekan, a writer who is going to be heard from:

> Ottawa Fiddles. We, in the Northwest Territories in the Yellowknife district, . . . and scattered throughout the district of Mackenzie and through all that vast imperial domain of more than a million square miles in extent which lies north of the provinces—

That is, north of the 60th parallel, which is the northern boundary of Alberta and Saskatchewan.

> —are in a state of suppression comparable to that which aroused the fighting ire of the colonists of North America.

I can tell the minister that there are ten to twelve thousand people in that country, including vigorous young men who will not stand for the neglect that is going on there. They demand rapid transit. The Minister of Transport should see that they get it. I give him my own kindly and humble advice. I say to him: As Minister of Transport, look into this matter and see to it that, whatever the department does, these men get a square deal in the matter of transportation.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. member for Cumberland asked a question with regard to Canso, and I would preface my reply with this statement. In the estimate which is given here, any amount of money given is only an estimate, because the plans and the surveys are not yet complete and will not be complete for some time. Following discussion in the reconstruction committee of the House of Commons in 1944, the Minister of Reconstruction and the Premier of Nova Scotia arranged for an investigation of the existing situation. Mr. D. W. McLachlan, engineer of design and capital construction of my department, and Mr. L. H. Wheaton, engineer of the Department of Highways of Nova Scotia, were appointed to investigate and report on the same.

This report will not be completed until next year, one difficulty being inability to make a satisfactory arrangement with any contractor to undertake the work of borings in the strait of Canso. It is a difficult and expensive job, the water being 160 feet deep. A contractor has now been secured, but the work cannot be done until next spring.

I would have preferred not to make any pronouncement in the matter until the engineer's reports are in and the economic factors have been considered but, in view of the interest taken, I will make the following general statement as to the present situation based on the facts already developed.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

The present Canso ferry is far from adequate, and the grades on the railway lines between Truro and Mulgrave are severe, while those on the line between Tupper and Sydney are fair.

Four solutions of the problem have presented themselves and we are developing accurate plans and estimates of these proposals:

1. Bridge. The building of a low grade railway line from Sunnybrae to connect with the Antigonish-Mulgrave line, relocation of part of the Mulgrave line around the north coast from Lynwood and a bridge across the straits of Canso. Preliminary estimated cost, $26,000,000.

2. Causeway and lock. Build a low grade railway line from Sunnybrae to connect with the Antigonish-Mulgrave line, relocate part of the Mulgrave line around the north coast from Lynwood to Archie Cove on the gut of Canso and build a causeway across the strait of Canso. Preliminary estimated cost, $19,000,000.

3. New ferry. Build the same low grade railway line from Sunnybrae and relocate the Mulgrave line around the north coast to cape Porcupine on the gut of Canso, a tunnel between that point and Keaton point and establish new ferry terminals in that locality and build a large modern car ferry; also a corresponding new terminal on the opposite side of the strait. Preliminary estimated cost, $10,000,000.

4. Complete the Sunnybrae-Guysboro line and extend it around the south coast to Steep Creek on the strait of Canso, with a new terminal at Steep Creek and one on the opposite north shore. Preliminary estimated cost, $12,000,000.

The Department of Transport and the government are prepared to do anything within reason in the area. It realizes that something must be done both with reference to the railway and to the crossing. I have mentioned four possibilities. Before the department has complete data on these proposals, it is impossible to say which one will be adopted. All I can say at the moment is that whichever one of these is found by the engineers of the department to be economically sound will be recommended to the government.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): What is meant by "preliminary estimates"? How are they made up? Are they casual guesses, or are they based upon some calculation as to the quantities, and so on?

Mr. CHEVRIER: They are not guesses; rather they are based on quantities estimated by the engineers. These preliminary estimates were made by the engineer of design and capital construction of the department in conjunction with the engineer of the department of highways of Nova Scotia.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): The minister said that the engineers are still making surveys for estimates and that they will not be completed until next year. Will they be available early in 1946? I understand that they have been working on it for some considerable time.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is impossible to get a complete report until the borings in the strait have been made; and I am informed that it cannot be done at this time of the year.

Mr. MacNICOL: What are they boring for?

Mr. CHEVRIER: To find out what the bottom is like, whether clay, sand or rock.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do they propose to put piers on either side of the strait?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That would depend, of course, on the project that would be adopted; if it were a bridge or a causeway, yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: A bridge would require piers?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the minister know the depth of the water?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, 200 feet deep, and the tide—

Mr. MacNICOL: Near the shore?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No; it is 200 feet deep in about the middle of the gut.

Mr. MacNICOL: That would have nothing to do with the bridge. What is it near the shore?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is 100 feet near the shore, and in the gut the tide runs at five knots an hour.

Mr. MacNICOL: In other words, if a pier were erected on each side of the strait, as is done for the Quebec bridge, it would be 100 feet deep. That is not out of the way, as long as the pier rests on a solid base. Is it a rock foundation?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is what we do not know as yet. So far as the Quebec bridge is concerned, I am informed by the engineers that it would be impossible to build a structure of the nature of the Quebec bridge in the gut of Canso.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): During the war a munitions ship caught fire and was sunk by shell fire in Halifax harbour. The following year the cargo was removed, but the vessel herself is still lying in navigable waters, practically in mid-channel and is now a menace to navigation, particularly during storms when vessels may drag their anchors. She is a submerged wreck and her position is marked by two wreck buoys. The wreck should be removed because it is lying in good anchorage ground and, if damage to another ship were occasioned, it might prejudicially affect the port. I would ask the minister to have the proper officials of his department look into this matter.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Is my hon. friend referring to the Trongate?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): Yes.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That matter is being investigated at the moment.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): A situation similar to that mentioned by the minister obtained in Tasmania, which is at the lower tip of Australia. Perhaps the tide does not run at five knots an hour there, but there is a strong tide. I cannot say as to the distance of the transverse down there. The minister is considering four points of view. In Tasmania they found a depth of water of 130 feet at the shoreline. The centre of the gap which had to be transversed was a mile and a quarter. The depth ran beyond 200 feet, and it was necessary to transverse this area. The estimate which the minister gave strikes me as being extremely high. In the particular area to which I am referring they gave up the project, but a young Tasmanian engineer conceived the idea of building large concrete pontoons and floating them into position. That obviated the necessity of putting a bridge structure down to that great depth. They floated those pontoons into position against the current. The convex side of the pontoon was placed against the tide, and when the tide turned it held them in position. Then, by means of extremely heavy steel cables some eight inches in diameter and a mile and a quarter long, they floated these pontoons into position. Recesses were put in the top and bottom of these pontoons and on either side. By this means they constructed a structure at about one-fifth of the original cost. Even if Lloyds of London would not underwrite the structure in regard to the hazards it might undergo, the state of Tasmania took the responsibility and the structure has been completed. It is in use now, and has met with great success. The area which has to be traversed by navigation as well was overcome by taking the shallowest end in the 100 feet and putting in a lift bridge, which permitted navigation to go back and forth. Perhaps it is my duty to mention this, although no doubt the engineers of the department know of it since it is one of the world's great achievements. I should like this on record for the consideration of the department, in view of the fact that millions are included in these estimates and spent just like so much water. Frankly, this is an extremely expensive chore that has to be undertaken by the department.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): I am not sure whether the question I wish to ask comes under this particular item, but I have looked rather carefully through the estimates of the Department of Transport as well as those of the Department of Public Works, and I do not see any reference at all to money being expended for the removal of Ripple Rock.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That comes under Public Works.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): And it can still be dealt with?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. HAZEN: I had intended to speak this evening on the advantages that would be derived from the construction of a canal across the isthmus of Chignecto connecting Northumberland strait with the bay of Fundy, but in view of the lateness of the hour and the amount of work still before the house I will reserve my remarks for another occasion. However, I should like to ask the minister if any consideration has been given by the government to the construction of this canal, whether any investigations are being made and any reports have been prepared.

Mr. CHEVRIER: No investigation has been made by my department other than that referred to in the report of the Chignecto canal commission in July, 1931. The gist of that report can be summarized briefly in this quotation from it:

> Having regard to transportation facilities already available in the maritime area as a whole, we cannot see where any interest would suffer were the Chignecto canal project to be permitted to stand in abeyance until it can be further examined in the light of future developments in Canada's economic situation.

Since that time it has not been further examined.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): May I ask the minister what he has been reading from?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have been reading from the report of the Chignecto canal commission dated July, 1931, set up by order in council P.C. 1686.

[Mr. J. H. Harris.]

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I wish to support what has been said by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert. This is an important subject and I think it should be thoroughly discussed. I want to point out the possibility of a great hydro tidal power scheme in connection with the construction of this canal. The tide rises to a height of fifty-two feet in the bay of Fundy and to a maximum of about nine feet in bay Verte. This means that on the bay of Fundy side the mean sea level is about twenty-six feet below high tide, and on the bay Verte side on Northumberland strait the maximum would be about 4½ feet, which would give a difference of 21½ feet. On the bay of Fundy side the tide should not be confined by dams to that height, since it would flood the marshland. It should be reduced six feet anyway, which would be about the level of the marshlands below extreme high tide. That gives a great potential tidal power scheme that could be developed in connection with the Chignecto canal. It would also present the possibility of draining the marshlands into bay Verte rather than the bay of Fundy. The level of the marshlands would be about six feet below extreme high tide; that is about the maximum height of the dykes. That would mean about twenty feet above mean sea level on the bay Verte side, which would provide for ample drainage into bay Verte; and possibly this might be much more effective than the present system of draining into the bay of Fundy against the high tides which prevail there.

I am not going to discuss this further to-night, but it is an important matter as a commercial undertaking as well as from the point of view of the defence of this country. It is of interest to both Canada and the United States. It would have given greater protection in the war just ended as well as in the first great war, since it would have permitted ships to avoid going around Nova Scotia, and consequently avoid the danger of submarines. The loss of the Charlottetown ferry on the southwest coast of Nova Scotia would have been averted if this canal had been constructed, as it should have been, years ago. That ferry would have passed through the canal to Saint John for overnaul; it would not have been lost; Prince Edward Island would not have suffered in the intervening years because of interference with the movement of its traffic, and it would not have been necessary at this time to spend millions of dollars for the construction of a new ferry.

I do not wish to take up more of the time of the committee now, but this subject is worthy of general discussion and consideration by this house.

Mr. HAZEN: The minister stated that no investigations were being conducted by his department at the present time. I would ask him to give the matter further consideration, and to have further investigations made. I believe further study should be given this important proposal.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—
359. Marine service steamers, including icebreakers—maintenance, operation and repairs, $1,648,500.

Mr. MOORE: I should like to direct two questions to the minister in connection with this item, since I see it deals with icebreakers. Will it be the intention of the department to maintain an icebreaker in future for use at Port Churchill, with a view to extending the shipping season there? I have a letter from several residents of Churchill in which they stated that the ocean-going tug the Ocean Eagle, which was originally built for use in Churchill harbour, was removed during the war and taken to the east coast. I understand that insurance rates are dependent upon the presence of the tug at the port. Will the minister do what he can in the near future to have that tug returned to Churchill? I do not wish to discuss the item further, because I understand that most of the money has already been spent.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am informed that there is an icebreaker which goes to Hudson bay every season to open navigation. Then, so far as the tug is concerned, any ship entering the harbour is provided with a tug.

Mr. MacNICOL: Where does the icebreaker come from?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is the N. B. McLean. It comes from Quebec, and the east coast.

Mr. McLURE: Is the ferry system between Borden and Tormentine included in this vote? Does this include the expense of operating an icebreaking steamer between those points?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No; there is a special vote for that.

Mr. FERGUSON: Is it the intention of the present government to run the water up-hill from Newmarket to lake Ontario.

Mr. COLDWELL: I read the other day where one of our ships had been equipped with radar. What is contemplated by the department in this connection? How will radar assist in meeting the problems which arise in connection with navigation, for the avoidance of ice, and so on. This would have a considerable bearing on a route such as the Hudson bay route, or on navigation in the strait of Belle Isle.

Mr. CHEVRIER: We are experimenting with radar on departmental ships at the present time. We have that equipment on the Grenville, one of the supply vessels which operate in the St. Lawrence. That is the only departmental ship equipped with radar at the present time. However, we are continuing our experiments, and they have been most satisfactory. I am also informed that when the McLean goes to Hudson bay next year she will be equipped with radar.

Mr. MOORE: I understand that along the Hudson bay route the department is establishing several aids to navigation. Is it the intention to place land-based radar at some of those points for the direction of ships?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—
360. Construction, maintenance and supervision of aids to navigation, including salaries and allowances to lightkeepers, $2,043,400.

Mr. BRYCE: I received a telegram to-day respecting the light at Downing reef on Lake Winnipeg. What does the minister propose to do about this matter? Is it to be repaired and reestablished? I understand it has been demolished, and the people are anxious about it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am not in a position to give the hon. member a reply on that. However, I shall inquire and give a reply either to-night or to-morrow.

Mr. BRYCE: Then, can the minister give me any information about the work done at Warrens Landing?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No; I would have to make inquiries about it.

Mr. BRYCE: Will the minister give me his assurance that he will take up these matters?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, and I will give the hon. member a reply.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—
365. Life saving service, including rewards for saving life, $44,250.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Perhaps on this item I might also speak respecting the subject matter in item 369, because there seems to be some relation between the two. Hon. members will recall the tragedy which took place last summer when fire broke out on one of the passenger steamers, one of the luxury vessels on lake Huron. I would refer particularly to life saving service, and to the inspection which would be covered by item 369.

In this connection may I put this observation on record? Since the advent of war very little has been done to keep this equipment in first-class condition. Some ten years ago it was my privilege to discuss this matter in the house, and to point out that there were not nearly enough safety appliances, especially on our passenger steamers on the great lakes, right from the Saguenay and the St. Lawrence through to Fort William. I repeat that tonight.

The advent of war in the meantime has not helped the situation. I note that in the coming year we are to spend $248,410 for steamship inspection, and that we are spending something more than $44,000 for life saving services. It will be my hope that with the two votes the department will realize that it has a tremendous responsibility to carry out life saving services and the inspection of craft that are dilapidated and old, and some of which are unseaworthy, and which will be expected to cater to the tremendous traffic we may expect to have in the coming year from those who will be seeking pleasure. Many people will have money to spend, which in days gone by they did not have. They will be crowding these out-moded services operating on the great lakes, from the mouth of the St. Lawrence right through the system.

It would well behoove the minister to advise the officials of his department who are charged with responsibility for these inspection services to see to it that when they accept in the coming year almost a quarter of a million dollars they do a job, even if it becomes necessary to restrict travel on unseaworthy craft, which will be catering to the trade in the next year.

Please, do not let us have more tragedies on our great lakes. Tell your inspectors, and those charged with the responsibility to carry out their duties in this day and generation when so many of our Canadian citizens are anxious to enjoy themselves and, if necessary, to spend large amounts of money in doing so.

Mr. JACKMAN: Does the department still give medals for life saving? They used to give watches, too.

Mr. CHEVRIER: We do give awards. Sometimes they are made in cash, and sometimes medals are given.

Mr. JACKMAN: Have any been given in recent years? Is the practice still current?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, I have a list here.

[Mr. J. H. Harris.]

Mr. JACKMAN: The practice is still current.

M. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—

369. Steamship inspection and the carrying out of the provisions of the conventions for the safety of life at sea and load lines, $248,410.

Mr. MacINNIS: We ratified a convention in the house the other day having to do with the inspection of ships' tackle for loading and unloading. The committee on external affairs made a study of this convention and submitted certain recommendations for an increase in the number of tackle inspectors and an improvement in their remuneration. Will there be anything in the supplementary estimates for that, because I notice there is provision for only four tackle inspectors at a remuneration of $1,440 a year? We were told in the committee that there were only two in British Columbia, one at Vancouver and one at Port Alberni. There is a sizable port at Prince Rupert, another at New Westminster and another at Victoria. How are ships coming into those ports to be inspected? I should like to have something from the minister to indicate that conditions will be improved now that we have ratified the convention.

Mr. CHEVRIER: These estimates were prepared many months ago, and there could not possibly be any provision for additional inspectors of tackle, resulting from the signing of the convention, nor could there be such provision in the supplementary estimates which were prepared some weeks ago before the committee reported. I am informed that under the "temporary assistance" item there are three more inspectors of tackle than there were previously.

Mr. MacINNIS: Whether we ratified this convention or not, our obligation would still be as great to see that every safety was provided. Now that we have ratified the convention, there should be some improvement, not only here but in other countries which have also ratified the convention. At the moment I will take the word of the minister in regard to the temporaries that are provided for. We received the supplementary estimates only this morning. When the Minister of Finance was questioned about them the other day by the leader of the opposition he said that they were in preparation and that he expected to have them ready this week.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is right, but before they reach the hands of the Minister of Finance they must go through the department, and it takes some time to prepare them in the department.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—

371. River St. Lawrence ship channel—contract dredging in the St. Lawrence river and Montreal harbour, including cost of administration—capital, $989,500.

Mr. MacNICOL: I notice that the levels in Montreal harbour are higher than they have been for some time. Has the diversion from the Ogoki and Kenogami rivers which pour into lake Superior amounting to about 6,000 cubic feet per second had anything to do with the water level of Montreal harbour?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am informed that the level of the whole great lakes system has increased.

Mr. MacNICOL: I was asking if the diversion of 6,000 cubic feet per second from these rivers had any direct effect on Montreal harbour?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I could not say.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the minister know whether Chicago is taking more water through the drainage canal than previously?

Mr. CHEVRIER: My officers have no information.

Item agreed to.

Railway service—

374. Hudson Bay railway—construction and improvements—capital, $20,000.

Mr. McCUAIG: Has any consideration been given to the completion of the railroad between Mankota and Valmarie on the Canadian Pacific? There is a gap here of about thirty-seven miles. I understand that resolutions and petitions have been sent to the minister in connection with this matter by R.M.'s 18, 45, 46 and 72 and the villages of Climax, Orkney, Masefield and Valmarie. I wrote to the minister in connection with this, but I have not had a reply.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have received the petitions, and I shall be glad to give my hon. friend a reply in due course.

Railway service—

375. Hudson Bay railway—To provide for the difference between the expenditures for operation and maintenance, and revenue accruing from operations during the year ending March 31, 1946, not exceeding $500,000.

Mr. PROBE: I notice that the expenditures to provide for the deficits on the operation of the Hudson Bay railway are increased in this year's estimates by about $192,000. That might be accounted for in one of two ways; either the amount of the revenue is less, or the services have been considerably increased. I should like to have a statement as to the present status of the service being given during the current year. I notice that the figures on page Z-25 of the public accounts of last year show the operating expenditures for 1943-44 as $1,008,025, and the operating revenues as $660,000, giving a deficit of $347,872. The present deficit is considerably higher.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The manager of the railway appeared before the railways and shipping committee and gave evidence for some considerable time. The operating expenses for 1944-45 are $811,169.14; the revenue was $246,229.12, giving a net operating deficit of $564,940.02 as compared with $347,872.90. I have not the details here and I hesitate to go into it more fully. The manager gave these at great length before the committee, and I doubt whether this committee will want me to go over the matter again.

Mr. PROBE: I had not read the report of the committee, but I was interested in knowing why there was an increased deficit.

Mr. COLDWELL: Could this item stand until to-morrow? It is twelve o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think my hon. friend the leader of the C.C.F. made a reservation regarding twelve o'clock when he consented, and to sit after eleven o'clock is possible only by consent of the house. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I would move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. ADAMSON

REFERENCE TO REPORT IN TORONTO "DAILY STAR"

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a question of privilege. Quite by chance I came into possession of a copy of the Toronto Daily Star, which reports this morning's proceedings with the following headlines:

Takes house five minutes to pass $2,000 M.P. raise.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that this is symptomatic of the general distortion practised by this newspaper.

Mr. MARTIN: Oh, that is a good newspaper.

Mr. ADAMSON: I hope the Secretary of State was in the house this morning.

Mr. MARTIN: The Secretary of State is always in the house.

Mr. ADAMSON: I am delighted. Then he must have been listening to his leader, or perhaps he did not? The question of privilege I wish to raise is that the debate took the entire morning sitting of this house, not the five minutes as distorted by this newspaper, which seems to be jointly owned by Hearst and Stalin.

Mr. PROBE: The type slipped, I think.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie the house adjourned at 12.05 a.m.

Saturday, December 15, 1945.

The house met at eleven o'clock.

ARMY EXERCISES

EXPEDITION TO THE CANADIAN ARCTIC—"EXERCISE MUSK-OX"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence, of which I have given him notice. In view of certain newspaper comments regarding the military aspects of the proposed Canadian army expedition to the Canadian Arctic known, I understand, as "Exercise Musk-ox", will the minister be good enough to make some explanation to the house this morning.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): Yes. I am glad to do that because there has been some misunderstanding as to the nature and extent of these exercises. This is the fourth and last of the exercises. The first, known as Eskimo, took place in the winter of 1943-44 and it followed a request we received from the British government to train the Lovatt scouts for projected winter operations in Norway. At that time it was of course very secret but plans were being made for a broad scale invasion of Norway and we in Canada were asked to provide facilities for training the Lovatt scouts in this country for winter warfare and also to develop types of motor vehicles for operation under winter conditions. A battalion of the Lovatt scouts came and trained in northern Saskatchewan and in British Columbia.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Jasper.

[Mr. Martin.]

Mr. ABBOTT: Jasper, the Minister of Veterans Affairs reminds me. The first exercise, Eskimo, took place in the winter of 1943-44; the second, known as Polar Bear, took place in the same year; the third, known as Lemming, operated north through Churchill in the winter of 1944-45; and this is the final exercise to be known as Musk-ox. I do not know whether, if we kept them on long enough, we would run out of names of arctic animals. In any event, this one has been known as Musk-ox.

Mr. COLDWELL: You could use Canada Goose.

Mr. ABBOTT: The reason for these names is that at the time the exercises were initiated they were secret and reference had to be made to them by code. This particular expedition will cover very much greater territory than the preceding ones, which were only two or three hundred miles in each case. This will cover a total arc of 3,200 miles, starting from Churchill on February 14 and proceeding via Baker lake, Cambridge bay, over the top and down by Norman Wells, Nelson, and ending at Edmonton on May 5, all being well.

The house will appreciate that this will afford an opportunity of testing out these vehicles under extreme winter conditions and through the spring break-up, and that is one of the reasons for continuing it during that period of time. It will be carried out in conjunction with the Royal Canadian Air Force. The force will be supplied with gasoline, food and the like by the air force, and those supplies will be dropped from planes, not landed on air strips, because there are no air fields in the greater part of the area through which the force will pass. The force is not a large one. The moving party will consist of only forty-five all ranks, carried in twelve of these snowmobiles. The snowmobiles have been developed in Canada from an American type of vehicle. They are a full-track vehicle, and have proved very successful in previous operations. In this expedition they will be enclosed, and it is expected that they will provide interesting experimental data on how this type of vehicle will operate under severe weather conditions and in the course of the spring break-up.

There is nothing secret about this expedition; it is a very small one. For that reason, among others, no invitations have been issued to military representatives of other countries to go along on the expedition. I do not know whether they would want to take a long trip of the kind under those weather conditions. In any event they will be invited to go up to Churchill to examine the vehicles and see the start of the expedition if they want to do so, and the finish at Edmonton on May 5. I do want to emphasize the fact that there is nothing secret about the expedition. The benefits derived from it may well be of greater civilian value than military value, although it is hoped that they will be both. Technical and meteorological experts are going along. Briefly that is a picture of this exercise Musk-ox.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WINNIPEG STRIKE OF 1919—PENSION RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ALISTAIR STEWART (Winnipeg North): May I direct a question to the Minister of Labour, of which I have already given him notice? Has the officer of the Department of Labour reported yet on his investigation into the matter of the pension rights of Canadian Pacific employees who were involved in the general strike at Winnipeg in 1919? If not, when does the minister expect to receive the report?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the report of the officers of the department has just been received and at this moment is receiving the necessary study by the industrial relations branch of the department.

POULTRY

EXPORTS TO THE UNITED KINGDOM AND THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Yesterday on the orders of the day the hon. member for Wellington North (Mr. Menary) asked a question with regard to the shipment of poultry products to the United States and the United Kingdom. The answer is as follows:

Poultry Products Shipped to British Ministry of Food

	1944	1945
Dried egg powder 27,575,763 lb.	$33,970,555
Dressed poultry 1,973,089 lb.	774,007
Dried egg powder to Dec. 1/45 14,846,837 lb.		$16,916,842
Shell eggs "fresh" 27,635,670 doz.		10,689,787
Shell eggs storage 12,953,790 doz.		6,037,109
	$34,744,562	$33,643,738

Poultry Products Shipped to the United States

	1944	1945
Dressed poultry 24,233,418	$7,754,693
Live poultry 3,000,000	750,000
Dressed poultry 11,473,879 lb.		$3,671,641
Live poultry 2,000,000 lb.		500,000
Hatching eggs, 1,200,000 doz.		720,000
	$8,504,693	$4,891,641

To December 1, 1945.

TRADE AND EMPLOYMENT

CANADIAN REPRESENTATION AT INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE IN 1946

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Two days ago I directed a question to the Prime Minister or the Minister of Veterans Affairs. It had to do with the proposed international trade conference next summer. The question was whether an invitation had been received from the United States, and if so would the government give favourable consideration to the sending of a non-partisan delegation. May we have an answer to that question?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): May I be permitted to have an answer made at three o'clock this afternoon?

Mr. BRACKEN: Yes.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

ALLOWANCES FOR TEMPORARILY UNEMPLOYED —CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to bill No. 240, to provide rehabilitation allowances for veterans.

He said: If hon. gentlemen will look at page 490 of the Votes and Proceedings they will find the amendments. They are purely matters of clarification, and I think an improvement on the phraseology adopted by this house.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

398. Departmental administration, $835,856.

Mr. BROOKS: I had intended making extended remarks on the estimates of Veterans Affairs, but realizing the lateness of the session I am going to content myself with asking a number of questions.

May I say at the outset that I consider it unfortunate that the estimates of veterans affairs, which to my mind are the most important that the house has to consider, are brought down in the dying hours of the session. Not only in this session but in previous sessions the estimates of veterans affairs have been left to the last. It is not fair to those who are interested in the welfare of veterans, and that includes all hon. members of the house and the great majority of the people of the country. In future I hope that the minister will see that his estimates are brought down earlier. At the beginning of the sessions we spend a lot of our time discussing what to me are more or less unimportant matters, and at the end of the sessions these very important matters are given scant attention.

My first question is with reference to the old veterans, the members of the veterans guard, men who served in the two wars. We all know these men are getting well along in years. They average between fifty-five and sixty years of age. Anyone who saw the parade on Armistice day and the men of the last war who were parading realizes that today these men are too old to be thrown out into the labour markets of this country to compete with younger men.

It is true that we have what is known as the dual service pension plan, but it allows single men only $30 and married men $60 a month. Before these men receive any consideration they must be in more or less necessitous circumstances. I believe that upon demobilization these men should be granted a straight pension with no conditions whatever attached. A veteran should be allowed to seek employment without let or hindrance. As hon. members know, we have what is called the means test. That is, a man is allowed $125 casual earnings and $25 interest on bonds; if more than that, a deduction is made from his allowance. I think the means test should be done away with and these veterans should be granted a straight pension and permitted to earn as much as it is possible for them to earn My first question to the minister, then, is: what does the department intend to do in reference to these veterans?

I should like the minister to say also what he intends to do in regard to providing veterans' homes for the older men. We know that Canada is more or less a new country so far as wars are concerned, and up to the present it has not been necessary to establish veterans' homes in any part of this country.

[Mr. Brooks.]

In the United States they have had veterans' homes for years, because they are an older country and have been engaged in more wars. England, of course, has had veterans' homes for a great many years. In Canada we have not felt the necessity of such homes until the present time, when the veterans of the last war are getting on in years. I know also that in this country many benevolent citizens have donated property for veterans' homes, but as yet no definite policy has been established by the government in this connection. My second question to the minister is: what is the intention of the government with reference to establishing veterans homes?

I come now to the third matter with which I wish to deal, and as I stated a few moments ago I am just mentioning the bare facts with regard to these problems. Over a long period of years imperial veterans in this country have been seeking recognition, but there has been an unreasonable prejudice against them. Why that should be I do not know. The case of the imperial veterans has been brought up time and time again at meetings of the Canadian Legion. Resolutions have been passed at dominion conventions of the legion in favour of the extension of the war veterans' allowance to imperial ex-service men after a reasonable period of residence in Canada. I might quote a resolution which was passed at the legion convention in Winnipeg in 1942:

> That we urge upon the dominion government the expediency and necessity of making prompt, adequate provision for ex-service men of the imperial forces by the extension of war veterans allowance under the same conditions as to Canadian veterans, other than on the question of pre-war domicile, providing such imperial ex-service men were resident in Canada on September 1, 1930, and have since resided in Canada.

These imperial veterans fought side by side with Canadian troops during the first great war. Many of them have served in world war II. They came to this country; they have been paying taxes here for a great many years; they have brought up their families here; they have shared all the burdens of Canadian citizens, and in the war that is just over their sons served in our armed forces. I am asking the minister that the obnoxious domicile clause, which at present governs these matters so far as imperial veterans are concerned, be removed from the War Veterans Allowance Act, and that these imperial veterans be treated just as our own veterans are treated. That is the third matter I wish to bring to the attention of the minister. I could dwell on it for a considerable length of time, but I do not think that is necessary this morning.

To-day we are told that the cost of living has gone up about twenty per cent. That may be so on the average, Mr. Chairman, but I believe anyone who has to go out and buy food and clothing and pay rent in this country will agree that the cost of the necessities of life has increased more than twenty per cent. I want to point out to the minister that pensions have not kept pace with the increase in the cost of living. Throughout these long years of war the men receiving pensions have borne the extra expense of living pretty well in silence. They have received no increase, no cost of living bonus. I would ask the minister what is his intention in regard to increasing pensions so that they may measure up to the present cost of living.

Another class of pensioners who I consider are not receiving their just due are the widows of those who lost their lives overseas. Our service men are coming back by the thousands to be greeted by their loved ones. We are all happy to see them come back, but the dependents of other thousands of men are not welcoming them back; they lost their lives overseas and now lie in silent graves far away. Just what is our department doing for these dependents? Well, take the case of the widows of all ranks up to and including lieutenant. A widow receives $60 a month, and if she has one child she gets an additional $15, making a total of $75. In other words the widow of the man who gave his life overseas is asked to maintain a home, educate her child and bring it up as it should be brought up on $75 a month. I would point out to the minister that this is entirely inadequate, and would ask him to tell this committee just what his intention is concerning this very important matter.

I had intended to speak at some length on the insurance principle, but I shall content myself with asking the minister if it would not be possible again to place the insurance principle in the act to cover all cases. We have it now as far as overseas men are concerned, and it also meets certain cases of those who served in Canada, but there are other cases it does not meet. I think in fairness to all men who joined the army the insurance principle again should be incorporated in the Pension Act. I might call the minister's attention to a resolution which was passed at the legion convention reading as follows:

> Resolved that this convention endorse the insurance principle for pension entitlement in the case of all men and women voluntarily entering the armed forces of Canada, irrespective of whether or not they may serve in a theatre of actual war, and urge upon the government of Canada to restore this equitable principle to the Pension Act in the case of those who voluntarily enlist.

Perhaps the minister will make some pronouncement on this matter. I presume all these questions will be discussed by the veterans committee next session, but we do not want to wait that long before learning the intentions of the government. We are receiving letters continually asking just what is to be done.

The pre-enlistment condition always has been a bone of contention in the awarding of pensions in this country. We have had trouble from that source for the past twenty-five or thirty years, and I think it is time something was done so that these men, and there are many hundreds of them, might receive the measure of justice to which they are entitled. From my own experience in the army during this war I know there should be no question of a man's preenlistment condition. When he comes in for basic training he is examined by three or four doctors. He is not there two weeks before he is given another medical examination. When he leaves basic training for advanced training he has another medical examination. When he leaves advanced training for further training he also has a medical examination. Medical examinations of these men are going on all the time. If our medical profession has not discovered some inherent weakness in this man, with all these medical examinations, then the man must be considered to be what they say he is, namely in A-1 condition. And when he is out of the army, if he applies for pension for some disability it should be accepted as a matter of fact that he was in good physical condition when he joined the army and his present disability is due to his service.

Then, there is the matter of hospitalization. I shall not deal with this in detail, because I know there are other hon. members better qualified than I am to do so. However there is one phase of the matter I should like to discuss for a few moments, and that has to do with mental cases. The minister has told us that they are looking after mental cases from the last war and this one. Well, they have been looking after these cases, but they have not been receiving the attention they should receive. In some of the provinces the men are being cared for in provincial institutions, a condition which applies in my own province. I contend that separate mental institutions should be set apart for veterans of the last war and this one.

I know of a young flier stationed at Goose Bay, a boy eighteen years of age, who drank one night some lemon extract, became temporarily insane and tried to commit suicide. That boy was placed in a mental institution in Saint John, with other patients who were chronically insane. Instead of making improvement he gradually became worse. What was true in that case has been true in many others. It is not fair or right that those men who served overseas and who became temporarily demented because of the terrible hardships through which they lived should be placed among chronically insane people in institutions throughout the country. This is a matter to which I suggest the minister should give his most careful attention.

It is unfortunate that more time has not been left for the discussion of these matters, but I hope that even under these circumstances the minister will give us a clear picture of veterans affairs, and that he will state what he intends to do, not only with regard to the points I have raised, but with regard to other matters affecting veterans throughout the country.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Mr. Chairman, let me say at once that I find no fault whatsoever with the observations of the hon. member for Royal. I believe his suggestions have been helpful and constructive. There was, however, a touch of criticism in his first observations to the effect that the estimates of this department had been deferred until a late hour in the session. Let me remind the hon. member and the committee that no single department of government has received more consideration from the House of Commons and the members thereof, and no other department has received as much attention during this session of parliament as has the Department of Veterans Affairs. Not only that, sir; but we have an able committee on which the hon. member for Royal was a most distinguished member, a committee which considered all aspects of legislation affecting the soldiers, for the past, the present and the future. We have submitted to the unfettered judgment of the house three major measures, the discussion of which occupied several hours, and all of which were passed unanimously by the house. So I do not think his criticism respecting the limited time for the discussion of the estimates of this department is justified. I should have liked to bring them down earlier but, as he knows, there were reasons why that was not possible. So far as I am concerned, certainly I am not going to suggest any curtailment of debate or discussion of the estimates.

May I refer briefly to the several points the hon. member has made, the first of which was a reference to the old veterans. I find myself very much in sympathy with what he said, but may I say to him that that question will be before the committee next February or March, when parliament meets again, and both the means test under the Veterans Allowance Act and the matters affecting the imperials will be discussed at that time.

I am well aware of the sentiment contained in the arguments adduced and forwarded by veterans organizations in connection with the claims of imperial veterans in Canada. I happen to be one of the few members of the House of Commons who was born in the old land, and naturally to a great extent my sympathies flow in that direction. But as a Canadian I say to the committee, I say to parliament and to its committee on veterans affairs: look after the claims of the 78,000 Canadian soldiers who served only in the United Kingdom. Unless these pensioners are entitled to benefits under the Veterans Allowance Act, then I do not think the claims of imperial veterans should have precedence over those of our own Canadians who should be entitled to benefits.

The hon. member made the suggestion that we have not veterans homes in Canada. Surely he knows better than that.

Mr. BROOKS: I did not say there were no homes. I realize there are a few.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I accept the correction.

Mr. BROOKS: But I said they were not sufficient, and that in most cases they have been donated by the citizens of this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I agree entirely with the hon. member's observations in that regard. But we are going to have veterans homes in every province. I have been through some of those already completed, and I can say that those grand old soldiers, homeless men, will have the most wonderful homes that can possibly be provided, the best medical attention, and the most humane nursing service. They will have that.

Every single problem referred to by the hon. member will come before that splendid committee of the house which will meet at the next session, because the heart of this parliament has always beat true in regard to the problems of those who have served their country in two wars and who helped to save the freedom of the world. In this matter there have been no political considerations, and I believe there never will be. I am sure that is the judgment of parliament in connection with the problems of our ex-service men of both wars.

The hon. member referred to the rate of pension of $75 a month. Again this is a matter that can be considered by the committee. However, the fact is that the cost of living index was higher when the present rate of pension was established in Canada than it is even at the present time. This amount was the judgment of the parliament of that day; these are the rates fixed.

The hon. member referred to the insurance principle. This matter was thoroughly and ably debated in the pension committee of 1941. No country in the world to-day has accepted the insurance principle—not one. Canada, combining her present pensions system of administration with the additional elements set out in section 11 (3) of the act, has gone farther than any other country in the recognition of disabilities. If parliament, however, wishes to go farther, that will be a matter for its consideration at the session next year, and a matter to which the committee which will sit at that time can give careful consideration.

The hon. member referred to preenlistment disability, the most difficult question in the whole administration of veterans affairs. I have gone carefully into the reasons both for and against, and I find that no country in the world has given recognition to what might be described as the automatic operation of the non-recognition of preenlistment disability. It is a difficult question; it is a highly technical question; it is a medical question. What we shall recommend in this house will be a matter for this committee to determine in future days.

I want to thank the hon. member for his moderate, reasonable and constructive suggestions. I have no doubt that when the committee meets again it will traverse the entire gamut of his observations and make adequate, reasonable and sympathetic suggestions to this house.

Mr. CROLL: Mr. Chairman, what the minister has said about the veterans affairs committee is altogether too true. We did go over things with a fine comb. The members were most cooperative and most helpful and a great deal was accomplished. I think the house recognized that when it agreed to pass the bills with so very little discussion. But there was something we did not have time to deal with, a matter which may become difficult before we come back again.

When we reached the peace emergency with the sudden ending of the war there was considerable dislocation. There are some warnings showing up, now that a large number of veterans are out of work, particularly in Vancouver, Montreal and Windsor, and the signs are not as healthy as they would appear. Although the situation may not be grave at the moment, that is due I think to the wisdom of parliaments in the past, and this parliament particularly, because a cushion has been built up for the men.

A private in the Canadian army had a certain amount of money held back as deferred pay. In almost all instances that was invested in victory bonds, and most of these men had $400 to $500 when the war finished. In addition there were the gratuities which were augmented since the last war, the rehabilitation grants which permit the soldiers to purchase furniture and household utensils; there is the Veterans' Land Act, the small holdings, wartime housing, out of work benefits, unemployment insurance, technical and educational facilities. When all these matters are considered it will be realized that this parliament has taken more than ordinary precautions. In addition to that, what brought joy to most of us was the statement of the department that if changes had to be made, they were willing to make them, and on short notice.

As I say, there are some warning signals. The boat is being rocked. First, I should like to refer to an article which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of November 28. This is under a Vancouver date line and refers to Major General B. M. Hoffmeister, who was to have led the Canadian troops in the Pacific. He is reported to have said:

> Men who dug slit trenches for their lives in Europe do not want to dig ditches for their livelihood in Vancouver.

And again:

> If men saw fit to place their lives in my hands overseas, the least I can do is try to find an answer to their problems here.
> There are those fortunate enough to have stayed home and enjoyed good jobs and better living conditions. They are the ones who should be digging ditches.

Then I should like to refer to an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail of December 6, also under a Vancouver date line. It reads:

> Lewis McDonald, representing the Vancouver command of the Canadian legion, criticized trades unions for not giving full cooperation in veterans rehabilitation. He said veterans have been refused jobs because "the unions' own men were on the list ahead of them . . . and they (veterans) have no seniority."

The Ottawa Citizen of November 28 refers to a statement by Mr. J. C. G. Herwig, national legion secretary, who said:

> The legion feels that it is high time the dominion and provincial governments got together with a view to giving active, constructive leadership and direction to management and labour alike in order to avoid a repetition of the shocking conditions with which Canada's fighting men were faced at the conclusion of the first great war.

May I say that General Hoffmeister is a splendid gentleman and what I have to say is not applicable to him at all, nor is it applicable to the men of the legion. Perhaps they do not fully realize what those words may mean. I should like to quote from the Windsor Star of December 12, which contained the following under a Vancouver date line:

> Members of local 249, international packing-house workers (C.I.L.) have gone on record in favour of reducing their hours from forty-five to forty hours per week in order to give employment to veterans, William Symington, business agent of the union said yesterday.
> The local is composed of 300 employees of Burns and company in Vancouver. The reduction in hours would provide jobs for thirty-three veterans, he said.
> "This would mean a direct loss in wages for the members who voted in favour of reduction of hours," said Mr. Symington, "but they did it because there has been so much talk of veterans not getting a square deal from unionists."

I do not belong to the school that thinks that everything is going to be all right tomorrow. I am pointing out these things as a tip-off. I think it is some indication of how the wind is blowing. If there are people in this country who are dreaming of using the veteran in order to weaken and destroy the labour union, they are building castles in the air and I do not think they are pretty ones at that. I am not suggesting for one moment that any of these people are doing that, but I do think that anyone who attempts to divide the veteran and the worker is an enemy of the state.

I am glad both the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Veterans Affairs are in the chamber because it will not be necessary for hon. members to have to listen to me again when the labour estimates are up for consideration. In this country the seniority of the worker has become a property right in his job. My suggestion is that the government sit down around the table with organized labour and the legion to try to draw up a clause acceptable to everyone which would be a standard clause to be inserted in all collective bargaining agreements. We will have a great number of them in this country in the days to come.

The seniority of the veteran who was employed before he went into the forces is naturally recognized. That seniority includes accumulated time, the right to be rehired, pay increases, promotions, transfers from one department to another and guarantee against the disability of lay-offs. But there is one field that has not been covered, the veteran who was not employed before he joined the army because he was too young or the veteran who came back to find that his job no longer existed. In this round table discussion that type of veteran should be provided with a synthetic seniority. I would suggest that within six months or a year after he has been discharged, or within six months after he has completed his training, he should be given seniority on the same basis as though he had been employed in that shop.

Then there is the disabled veteran who by reason of his disability is unable to do the same job he had before. That veteran ought to have some right to any job in the plant that he can fill. I urge upon the two ministers that if that can be done it is most desirable, and if we do not do it we shall find that a lot of demagogues in this country will be having a holiday at the expense of the veterans and the workers. I have reason to believe that the legion and the unions are anxious to come to some agreement and to meet the problem, but I think that it has to be met at a very much higher level, and unless we reach some agreement in that respect we will find that the problem will break upon us and engulf us before we have fully appreciated it. It requires bold action; it requires something to be done before this house is in session again, and that is why I bring it up now.

I want to make it very clear again, lest I be misunderstood, that these agreements should be reached by consultation round the table. I think that they are all men of good will; I think that they are all anxious to solve the problem; and I ask the two ministers, who have done some preliminary work on the problem, as the house should know and I think does know, to continue with that work in the interval so that this situation may be well in hand before we come back here next session.

Mr. MITCHELL: I agree with my hon. friend in every detail of what he said on the question of seniority rights. We must remember that seniority means more to the average industrial worker than wages, and prior to the war—I am not speaking of since the war—more time was spent in negotiating the seniority clause contained in most industrial agreements than any other clause. That is a fact, and you cannot get around it.

In anticipation of what would develop at the conclusion of the war a committee was set up by the Department of Labour and the Department of Veterans Affairs to study the very matter to which my hon. friend has referred, but I think he will agree with me that it is far better to get agreement than for the government to give direction. I agree with him also that by no official action whatever should the trades unions and the veterans organizations in this country be pitted against each other. I think that wisdom must be exercised in that regard. I say with all the emphasis at my command that anyone in this nation, whether he be a member of the House of Commons or outside, would not be rendering a service to the Canadian people who advocated policies that might bring about disagreement between these two great forces within the four corners of this nation.

Might I say in a broad way with respect to the disabled veterans working in our industrial and commercial structure, a special division of the employment service of Canada has already been set up to deal with that matter. It has been found from our experience with workmen's compensation laws in this country that on the average a person with a disability has a better earning power after the disability than they had before. That is a matter of statistical record. I can say this to my hon. friend and to the committee, that no nation is better prepared than the Dominion of Canada to meet the problems of the post-war period, as we have built our organization on the experience of the past. After all is said and done, the man with a test tube is better than the man with a book, and we have had practical experience with demobilization following the last war. I think it can truthfully be said that building up that experience we have organized a machine which in the main should function with a degree of perfection that possibly cannot be imagined to-day.

I have said these one or two things, Mr. Chairman, just to indicate to the house and the country that the two matters which my hon. friend has raised have been and were being dealt with prior to his making what I consider very helpful suggestions.

Mr. CROLL: May I just say a word arising out of what the minister has said. I should not like the house to get the impression that I advocated compulsion. I never suggested that at all. I suggested that there should be consultation around the table.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is correct.

Mr. BRUCE: Mr. Chairman, as a member of the committee on veterans affairs I am conscious of the hard and painstaking work done by that committee to make sure that the interests of the veterans to whom we owe so much would be carefully safeguarded in the bill the provisions of which have already been approved by the house.

I wish to join the hon. member for Royal in regretting that the estimates of this important department have been opened so late; in fact, on what we hope will be the last day of the session, which means that we shall not have the advantage of having a free discussion participated in by a large number of the members of this house. I hope that next session the minister may find it possible to bring down his estimates at a much earlier stage.

Knowing that many of the provisions for our returning men who are now students were carefully considered by the committee, therefore I hesitate to refer to any of them here because I know that the members of the committee did the very best they could to provide adequate funds for students attending universities. In spite of that I am receiving many communications asking that the amount be increased because of the high cost of living, which makes it difficult for many students to eke out an existence on the amount that is paid to them.

May I call the minister's attention to the fact that single fare on the railways was provided for a period of thirty days to these men when they were in the armed forces during the war. Surely this concession should be extended to them now, and I ask the minister if he will take the matter up with the railways and try to get them to do it.

Although I approved entirely of the setting up of the Department of Veterans Affairs, I have always been of the opinion that the medical care and treatment of veterans could be better taken care of by the medical services already in existence. During the war we have had three distinct medical services connected with the three branches of the armed forces, as well as the medical services of the health department as well as those required for the civilian population. If this had been done the medical and surgical care of veterans could have been handled in such a way as to have ensured better care and at the same time have saved the taxpayer a great deal of money. I am supported in this opinion by the action of the Canadian Medical Association, which sent a letter to the Prime Minister on May 29, 1944, from which I should like to quote a few paragraphs. May I say that during the war the Canadian Medical Association supplied five of its ablest physicians to assist on a board known as the Canadian medical procurement and assignment board, which was set up by order in council in July, 1942. In their letter to the Prime Minister they made the following suggestions, which will be found at page 3824 of volume 4 of Hansard, 1944.

10. A great national plan for health care is being devised, and it may be assumed that when and if it comes into operation a large number of our people, consisting of the veterans who, with their dependents, will constitute twelve to fifteen per cent of our population, might reasonably expect to have access to these services.

11. Again, most respectfully, we would urge that in the interests of sound administration, careful consideration be given to placing all government health services in time of peace within one department.

The next paragraph is perhaps the most important and relevant to the position that I myself take in this matter.

12. In order to concentrate the expenditure for veterans' care within one department, the Department of Veterans Affairs could arrange to purchase the "medical care,"—using the term broadly—for this group of people from the department of national health.

13. We believe that if the health services were so organized, there would be a notable conservation of medical and technical personnel and equipment and that there would be provided a finer type of service to this very important group.

14. (b) That all federal health activities be incorporated in the Department of National Health, including the health and care of veterans.

With these opinions I am in hearty accord. I will not amplify this at the moment, seeing that my time is limited, but I would call the attention of the committee to an act put on the British statutes on March 1, 1944, known as the Disabled Persons (Employment) Act. The main purposes of the Tomlinson report were incorporated into this act, which makes rehabilitation and resettlement of the disabled after the war part of the nations social services. The state accepts its obligation towards the man or woman suffering any type of disability to recondition him mentally and physically as far as possible and to train him for a new occupation where necessary, to care for his family through his period of training, and to resettle him in suitable employment.

Another important provision requires all employers of twenty or more workers to employ a quota of registered disabled persons, the quota for each employer being a percentage of his total employees as decided after consultation between workers and employers organizations. The employer with less than his quota may not take on a non-registered person without a special ministerial permit, and a registered disabled person may not be discharged from his employment without reasonable cause if the discharge would bring the employer below his quota.

Moreover, certain occupations specially suitable for disabled persons may be earmarked so that vacancies occurring in them may be filled only by registered disabled. I think we might very well emulate the example of Great Britain in this regard. It will be interesting also to note that following the 1914-18 war Germany made it obligatory for all its industries to engage a certain quota of persons disabled by the war.

May I now refer to a change that has come about in the treatment of patients as a consequence of certain new developments in this war, namely, the use of sulpha drugs and penicillin where, because of their use, old infections in bones known as osteomyelitis no longer recur, and as a consequence the frequent operations for the removal of necrosed bone at intervals over months and years will no longer be necessary. We can therefore hope that we shall not require active surgical treatment hospitals for a very long period after all our veterans are home. In fact, as soon as all the cases returning from overseas have had the necessary operations performed in neurosurgery, orthopedics and plastic work as well as in nerve repair work they will be dismissed from hospitals and will not, I hope, have to return except of course for emergency work that might arise from time to time. It means, therefore, that we do not require to provide a large permanent building in which to do active treatment surgery.

I believe that three centres have been established in different parts of Canada for the care of these special cases to which I have referred, namely, first, the neurosurgical cases, secondly the orthopedic cases and thirdly those requiring plastic surgery. May I ask the minister where these centres are and whether they are connected with general hospitals or with hospitals under his own administration. I presume the determining factor in reaching decisions as to the location of these centres would be their accessibility to trained specialist personnel in the large centres.

This brings me to the point of asking the minister whether very soon it may not be well to consider what use he shall make of the large active treatment addition to the Sunnybrook hospital, the corner stone of which was laid in November last, and which will not be completed for another year. I suggest that when it is completed it might not be needed for the purpose for which it is being built. I have no doubt that it can be used for other purposes. If my suggestion has merit then the country might be saved the large amount of money which will be expended in providing numbers of operating rooms, pathological laboratories, X-ray rooms and other facilities which are needed in an active treatment hospital of that size. It might be well for the minister to ask a small committee, on which should sit one of the leading civilian surgeons of Toronto, along with some representatives from his own department, to look into the matter, to see whether something might be devised to meet the situation which will arise if what I believe turns out to be true, namely, that before this building is completed all the cases returning home will have been dealt with, except a few fragmentary ones, for which other accommodation will be accessible.

I do not intend to refer to-day to what I said a year ago, because anybody who wishes to read the record in regard to Christie street hospital can look back to Hansard. It would serve no useful purpose for me to refer to it again. Over one million dollars was spent on improvements and alterations to that hospital. I have not now, nor have I had at any time, any criticism to offer in regard to the splendid work that was done at Christie street and is being done there now in the medical, surgical and neurological departments.

Perhaps it is too late to make any change now, but if we have another war, and nobody can be sure that it may not come some day, a better way of providing accommodation for our returned men would be to build annexes to civilian hospitals already existing throughout Canada. In the large centres and in some of the smaller centres from coast to coast, where staffs are already available, and where these men will be assured of receiving the very best care and attention. Some hon. members will recall that this was refused Doctor Penfield when he asked that an addition be made to the Montreal Neurological institute, so that his staff of skilled personnel could be made available. When all of these cases are disposed of a few months after the end of the war the additional buildings would be useful as civilian hospitals. The committee will recall that at one time it was proposed that an addition be made to the Winnipeg civilian hospital, where the medical faculty of the Manitoba medical school of skilled specialists would be available. When the war is over and the cases are disposed of, this hospital would have additional accommodation to meet the civilian need, but instead of doing this Deer Lodge hospital was built outside Winnipeg. I am told that Winnipeg General hospital has a waiting list of over two hundred, which condition is duplicated all over Canada. I know that the same situation exists in Toronto. I want to commend the minister for the arrangements he made with the East General hospital to use the new wing, which was nearly completed at the time, for the care of some of these returned men. I believe they have taken care of some 250 returned men there and I am sure that he will be satisfied with the services which that hospital has rendered.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Simply excellent.

Mr. BRUCE: I wish to make it quite clear that in my opinion this method of handling our returned cases would be very much better than the method which was followed during this war, and which was perhaps a hangover from the last war. On a former occasion I made a plea for federal help for civilian hospitals throughout Canada, and I should like to repeat that plea to-day. Without that assistance and the assistance of the provincial governments the municipalities will not be able to provide adequate care for our civilian population. The federal government should give that assistance because through taxation they are taking away the sources of revenue of these hospitals.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I say at once that I am grateful to the hon. member for Parkdale for his remarks. Naturally he speaks with more high authority in regard to these medical problems than I could ever assume or aspire to reach.

The first observation my hon. friend made was in regard to the transportation of those who are taking educational courses. That matter was dealt with the other day by the Minister of Transport; his statement may be found at page 3210 of Hansard. Cogent reasons were advanced at that time as to why it would not be possible.

The second observation made by my hon. friend was in regard to the submission of the Canadian Medical Association with reference to the placing of the care of veterans under national health or some other organization. May I remind my hon. friend he is very well aware of this—that after the last war an attempt was made to have the services of national defence extended for the after-care of veterans. That policy was abandoned in about six or nine months' time. The Department of Veterans Affairs was created by a committee of this house largely so that all the services, including the medical services pertaining to veterans, would be under one department. I can assure my hon. friend that it would relieve me of much anxiety if these services were placed under another department, but I do know very definitely that the organized ex-service men of Canada want the medical after-care of service men to be under the Department of Veterans Affairs. That is the definite recommendation of the legion, the Canadian corps and all the major organizations in Canada.

Mr. BRUCE: I am well aware of that, but in spite of that fact, as a medical man I still hold the opinion which I have expressed.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have a great deal of respect for the advice and opinions of my hon. friend. He asked me about the neurological centres. There is one in Montreal, one in Toronto, one in Halifax, one in Winnipeg, one in Edmonton and one in Vancouver. We have also built wings on civic hospitals at Port Arthur, Edmonton—at the university hospital—Regina, Ottawa, Kingston, and now we are doing that in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. BRUCE: Are those in separate hospitals, or in connection with civic hospitals?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Those I mentioned last are in connection with civic hospitals. My hon. friend offered a suggestion in regard to the possible future uses of Sunnybrook hospital. It is a matter of some comfort to me, considering the angry comments of a year or two years ago, that I am now asked not further to increase the hospital accommodation for our men but to see what uses can be made of this accommodation for civilian purposes. The first use of Sunnybrook hospital will be, as my hon. friend advocated with a great deal of sincerity and eloquence two or three years ago, to move our patients there from Christie street; and I think the whole committee will agree that this should be done. But apart from all this acrimony, contention and controversy, we should be grateful to Providence that in the near future we are going to be overhospitalized, I think, as far as ex-service men are concerned.

There is one point, however, on which I do not agree with my hon. friend. He said the active treatment accommodation might be lessened. That was not the experience after the last war. Active treatment, recurring cases, increased up to 1939, and we might have the same experience now. But it is my honest opinion that we are going to have more accommodation than we will require, and I shall be glad indeed to take into very careful consideration the suggestion of my hon. friend in regard to a committee to consider the possibilities of future use, because Canada is definitely underhospitalized; no one knows that better than the hon. member for Parkdale. Proper hospital accommodation in Canada will be a great problem of the future, but I am sure with the active inspiration and keen direction of my hon. friend the Minister of National Health and Welfare the problem will not be neglected.

[Mr. Mackenzie.]

Mr. BRUCE: I think the minister misunderstood me. I am very happy to learn that he is moving the patients from Christie street to Sunnybrook. My comment was only in regard to the active treatment wing at Sunnybrook, where they are providing accommodation for doing a large amount of surgery. I gave reasons earlier why I thought much of this surgery would not be necessary when this wing is finished.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Thank you.

Mr. GILLIS: We had not intended to carry on any discussion concerning these estimates, for the simple reason that a committee of this house considered these matters during thirty-six meetings of two hours each since the opening of the session, and I thought veterans affairs had been pretty thoroughly discussed. In addition to bringing in some definite recommendations which were put in the form of bills, in our final report we also recognized that we did not have an opportunity in the committee to discuss many things because of the time factor. I also understood, however, that in the final report we provided that all the matters we had not time to deal with would be dealt with between now and the next session under the emergency powers given the government under bill 15, and that an interdepartmental committee would be set up to study actively everything we did not have time to study, with a suggestion from the committee that the government use its power through orders in council to extend benefits in all the cases with which we did not deal.

Having that in mind, and also having in mind that practically all the discussion we have heard this morning also took place in the committee, which in addition heard representation from outside bodies, I think the interdepartmental committee will be in a better position, after studying the evidence and the suggestions offered in that committee, as well as the opinions of the members of the committee, to deal more effectively with these matters than we could deal with them at this stage of the game, when everyone wants to get away. However, I should like to make one or two observations arising out of this discussion. I would not be on my feet now if no one else had risen, but every time someone gets up and gives a little talk, someone else gets about fifteen different ideas about which he wants to say something.

Mr. CASSELMAN: Can you not restrain yourself?

Mr. GILLIS: I have no intention of doing so. Personally I objected very strenuously to the removal of the insurance principle from the act in 1941, and would advocate its return if and when we have a government sympathetic on that point. We removed something else from the act in 1941 which I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. From the termination of the last war until 1941 one of the most objectionable features of the Canadian Pension Act was the right of the commission to decide that in its opinion a disability was of congenital origin. That provision opened the way to all sorts of abuses, and all kinds of interpretations were given under it. In 1941 the committee removed that section from the act, but in my opinion the commission got into the habit of deciding that a man's disability was inherited, under the congenital origin provision and their long experience in administering it, and I believe that has given rise to all the difficulties we are experiencing to-day in connection with preenlistment and post-discharge disabilities. That is something into which I believe the department should go thoroughly. We have a great many nervous cases; I believe some twenty-five per cent of all discharges from the service are because of nervous disability, and these men are not being pensioned. I am going to mention just one case on the point. A boy enlists, goes overseas, serves thirty-six months in Italy, goes all through the fighting, comes back to Canada and is discharged. He receives no disability; he is said to be just nervous and imagining things. That boy must have been A-1 to go through thirty-six months of combat service, but he has no right to anything to-day, no pension, no treatment or anything else, and he cannot work.

I am going to leave this suggestion with the minister, and I have given it to the commission on a good many occasions. I doubt very much whether many of the neurological centres that have been set up have adequate equipment and competent personnel to exactly determine the condition of these men.

In every case where there is a doubt, the man should be taken to a central clinic and given a thorough examination. There should be no doubt on that point. The centres being set up in the different provinces are new, and it will be some time before they find their feet and have proper equipment. Even so, there should be no doubt on that point. The present treatment of neurotic cases leaves much to be desired.

There is one further thought I should like to leave with the minister; I have spoken about it before on many occasions. The practice of having part-time medical representatives in these institutions should be abolished. I had the privilege of visiting Camp Hill hospital in Halifax in June of this year, and I found that in that hospital they were following and are still following the practice which had been in effect between the two wars. They had only two of a medical staff on full time, and one of those was crippled in both legs. He could not move from behind his desk. I talked to twelve service personnel who had come from the military district for eye, ear and throat examination before discharge. These men had their breakfast at seven o'clock in the morning. I was talking to them at five o'clock in the evening, and they told me that they had sat on a bench from nine o'clock until five o'clock waiting for a medical doctor to give them examination, and that they had had no lunch. That was the third day they had repeated the performance of waiting for an outside medical man.

If a medical representative is necessary, whether he be a specialist or a general practitioner, he should be in attendance on the staff full time, and should give full-time service to service personnel he is supposed to be looking after. One of the worst features of the departmental hospital set-up, is this practice of having a part-time medical representative. He is the man who rushes in for about fifteen minutes in the evening only to tell someone who has been waiting all day that he will have to come back the next day.

Mr. MacNICOL: And then rushes out.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes. May I say only a few words about the matter discussed by the hon. member for Spadina, that of seniority. Seniority is provided for the boy who had a job when he went into the armed services. There is no problem in that respect. There is no question of seniority for the boy who did not have a job before joining the services and who upon discharge has not secured a job. This is a straight unemployment problem. He did not have a job when he went in, and he has none when he comes out. There are some who believe that the man who served four or five years overseas should upon his return have the right to enter an industry and replace someone who has been working there for those four or five years. I say that if there are those who want to apply that principle to the industrial set-up of Canada, and who wish to change seniority and trade union agreements in that respect, they will have to extend the principle to bank managers, heads of companies, and those who are connected with every organization functioning in the country. If they are prepared to do that, I believe they will have no difficulty with the trade union movement when a request is made for a revision in agreements.

The fact of the matter is that employment in this country is not adequately planned. If a large percentage of our returning service personnel are unable to secure employment upon return, then there are just two questions we should ask ourselves. We must ask if we do not need anything. If we do not, and if production is at its highest peak, then the thing to do is to reduce the hours of labour. On the other hand, if that is not the situation —and certainly it is not—and if we require increased production in every field, the thing to do is to take hold of the problem and to put our people to work, producing those necessary commodities required. That is what we shall have to do.

We are faced with a further situation, which arises in the period of transition when retooling is being carried out, and when the men cannot be put to work as quickly as we would like. Provision must be made for that. As I have said on many occasions, displaced industrial workers and returning service personnel who have not jobs should be treated in this way: We should lay down a basic rate of at least $25 a week so that they will have purchasing power.

Mr. MacNICOL: Until they do get jobs.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes; until they are employed, that is the thing to do. I do not want the hon. member for Spadina or any other hon. member to have the opinion that the established trade unions in this country that have seniority rates written into their agreements are denying ex-service men seniority privileges. That is not being denied the man who goes back to his job and who is given credit for the time he spent in the armed services. The man who did not have a job, who went into the services, and who returns to civilian life without a job, is the responsibility of the state, and the state must look after him. Those who wish to extend trade union agreements on that point must extend it so that it will apply to everyone in the country. That must be the condition, if we are to set up a preferred class and drive a wedge between ordinary citizens and service personnel.

The attitude of returning service men in Nova Scotia is that they will not come back and try to wedge their way into industry, thereby displacing someone. Workers in that part of the country are unionized, and if a service man is asked to take a job and thereby replace someone else, his answer is: I am not a scab; that man has a job. The state owes me a job. I fought for it for five years. I have vocational training, out-of-work benefits, and things of that kind, so I am not going to throw someone out of employment on that basis.

I agree with what was said by the hon. member for Spadina, and regret deeply the statements made by the general whose words he quoted. Anyone who takes that attitude is sowing seeds of dissension and is an enemy of the state. Any man who has any understanding of the situation must realize that there can be no proper rehabilitation of our service personnel unless the whole economy of the country is utilized. It is not possible to segregate ex-service personnel and give them employment and a decent standard of living if we are to have on relief rolls a million and a half workers who produced the sinews of war.

There has to be a job for everyone, and that must be carried out all along the line. The whole economy must be made healthy. The man who says that the civilian population should dig ditches while the soldier is put to work is doing the soldier a disservice. The soldier did not dig ditches in Italy only to come back to Canada to put the civilian population at digging ditches. That is a throwback to 1939. Every last man who donned a uniform and left this country believed he was fighting fascism and to preserve liberty and democracy, and did not believe that he would come back to this country to establish fascism here, where everyone has a right to work, a right to live, a right to live a life worth living, and on a decent standard. He did not believe he was to come back here to put the civilian population out of work, and the man who makes any statement to the contrary is not thinking very much.

I am sorry I have had to occupy this much time, but I rose chiefly because of the statements by the hon. member for Spadina. This is a most pertinent question and one which requires thorough analysis. I believe his suggestion that the Minister of Labour, the Minister of Veterans Affairs, and representatives of the legion and other veterans' organizations should handle this matter carefully, is a good one. I am convinced that you will not have any difficulty with the trade union movement if your proposals are reasonable and fair.

I want to close by thanking the minister for something. I agree that every phase of the rehabilitation of our service personnel should be kept within the Department of Veterans Affairs. For some twenty years the end of the country from which I come has been pleading with the Department of Pensions and National Health for the establishment of a hospital in Cape Breton to take care of our service personnel and avoid having to drag them across the province. Such a hospital has been established within the past few months and I want to thank the minister. I am not going to say anything more, except that I shall let the minister know next session just how well this hospital is working out.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am not going to enter into any controversy with my hon. friend, because we are good friends, but I must take definite and positive exception to his calling one of the finest Canadians of all times an enemy of the state. There has not been a Canadian who trod in shoe leather who did more to save this state and save the freedom of this state than Peter Hoffmeister of Vancouver.

Mr. GILLIS: I did not call him an enemy of the state.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Oh, yes; I am afraid you did.

Mr. GILLIS: The hon. member for Spadina made that statement, and I said that I agreed with him. He said that anyone who tries to create that kind of psychology in this country is an enemy of the state.

Mr. CROLL: On a question of privilege, I certainly did not make that statement. My hon. friend need only look at Hansard to realize that he must have misunderstood what I said. I said that no matter what I read it would not be applicable. Those were the words of a very fine gentleman, one who has the veterans' confidence. I was dealing with words only, and I never suggested—

Mr. GILLIS: That is exactly what you said.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Much as I would have liked to be a member of the veterans' committee, I was not and, therefore, there are a number of suggestions I should like to make at this time. The first has to do with veterans who are in sanatoria in the different provinces. Section 20, subsections 4 to 8, of the Pensions Act provides that credits accumulated in the veteran's account in the Department of Veterans Affairs while he is receiving hospital treatment provided by the department shall not form part of his estate should he die, and the dependents and beneficiaries only may receive his credits, provided that the pensions commission feel disposed to order such action. In Saskatchewan alone there are a hundred of these cases. These men believe that this section results in a major injustice being done to them. They feel that their credits which have been justly and properly earned should become part of their estates should they pass away while in hospital. In other words, they feel they should have a legal right to the moneys that have been credited to their accounts, instead of having to depend upon the whim of any commission. I would ask the minister to give consideration to making a change in this regard. I have received a number of letters from veterans in hospitals who believe that they should have a legal right to these moneys.

Mr. MACKENZIE: They do; the accumulated allowances go to their dependents in case of their decease.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The statute does not so provide. The statute makes it discretionary, and I think that discretionary power should be removed, irrespective of the practice. I want the minister to understand that if we are critical of these matters, we are still non-partisan.

I should like to refer to the administration of the Veterans' Land Act. It is a good act, and if carried out properly would do a great deal of good. While the act itself is sympathetic, the administration of the act is unsympathetic. While the law is there, the spirit of the law is not being carried out. I find from the cases that have been brought to my attention that in the administration of the act there seems to be what I was going to term a callous disregard, but which is at least a cavalier disregard, of the necessity of administering that act in fairness to the veterans.

Let me give an example. Young service personnel who were on the farms when they went overseas are now coming back. I brought one or two of these cases to the attention of the house on a previous occasion. I have a letter here from a soldier who was three years overseas. He enlisted when he was seventeen years and eleven months old. He had lived on a farm all his life. He came back from overseas and now wants to take up land under the Veterans' Land Act. His application is refused because he was not on a farm for two years after he was eighteen years of age. In other words, he is not qualified.

I had another instance brought to my attention the other day, that of a boy in my own constituency who had won most of the prizes given in farm judging. He was turned down because he had not put in two years on a farm after his eighteenth birthday. That type of interpretation by the director, or whatever his title is, of the Veterans' Land Act is doing more to bring that act into disrepute than anything else. This man is told he is not qualified, that he must wait another two years. He is now twenty years of age.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think my hon. friend brought another case to my attention some months ago, and then there is this one this morning. I can assure my hon. friend that I intend to have that corrected at once.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I thank the minister. I wish to mention another case, that of a veteran who was married overseas. He finds that he cannot get land under the act because the board does not know whether his wife will be fitted mentally, or perhaps sentimentally, to be a farmer's wife. Many of these men are waiting for their wives. I have had two or three cases brought to my attention in which the wives are overseas. The men want to get them over here, but they do not expect them before April, May, June or July of next year. One of these men has been back nine months and he has pretty well succeeded in spending his gratuity waiting around until his wife gets back so that he can qualify if he has the necessary money available to start up under the act. As my hon. friend for Vancouver South says, they have to like the look of the wife when she finally arrives, otherwise he will not get the land.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think the idea is that the wife must like the land.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That will depend on the board deciding whether she is the kind that would like the land.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Which province is that in?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The three I have before me are in Saskatchewan, but I think there are many others. This is penalizing men who were married overseas. They are denied the opportunity to come under the act, and that kind of administration is not the kind of thing the minister wants in his department.

I come now to the third type of case, the man who does not want land but who would like to get machinery. I have before me three cases. One of them is that of a veteran who rose to the rank of squadron leader. He served three years overseas, his father is a big farmer. This young man returned and wants to start up for himself. He needs machinery. The answer is: You cannot get any priority on machinery unless you take up land. I have that answer here. That is the interpretation of the Veterans' Land Act in Saskatchewan.

Here is another case. A man applies for a tractor. There are tractors available, controlled by the administration of the Veterans' Land Act in Saskatchewan. Although this pool of tractors is available, and he needs one, he is advised that there is no way in which he can get one unless he takes up land. He already has the land, and he wants to farm it; yet he is denied the tractor necessary to do it.

I bring these cases to the attention of the minister to show that the administration of the Veterans' Land Act needs revamping, to say the least.

With regard to housing, I think the minister might well bring to the attention of the Minister of Finance the position of men returning from overseas who rented while they were overseas the houses they owned and now are prevented by the rental regulations from repossessing them. I think these men should be granted an exemption from the present rental regulations and enabled to get back into their own homes after a reasonable period.

There is also the matter of reestablishment in business. To-day all that is given to the returning soldier is a "hunting" licence, permitting him to hunt for stock and commodities for his store. All that is available to him is a twenty per cent quota. What is actually taking place is that the veteran who is seeking to establish himself in business cannot open a business at all. He has the power physically to do it, but there is no preference given to him to assure him of a reasonable share in the commodities he requires to go into business.

There is one other matter which was referred to by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, a matter we have not dealt with in this parliament but which may well develop into a serious problem within the next few months. I see the Minister of Labour in his place. I realize the tremendous responsibility that he carries with such urbanity. No matter how serious the problem, the minister always smiles.

Mr. MITCHELL: Enough crying when you are dead.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is the spirit, but I am afraid we shall be crying within a few months unless something is done about this problem. Men are coming back from overseas and unemployment is piling up. The statistics for December show that there was a reduction in employment in September last greater than at any time in the last twenty-five years. This indicates the seriousness of the problem. I should like to hear a statement from the Minister of Veterans Affairs and from the Minister of Labour generally on the question of what actual planning is being done to prevent unemployment and to assure jobs. The crucial problem that faces us in this parliament, as I see it, is the maintenance of full employment, the government and the people of Canada assuming responsibility for the provision of the machinery for providing jobs; because the mentality that prevailed before 1939, when alongside idle natural resources men roamed in idleness, will not be tolerated. The objective must be a level of industrial production, and markets available for that production, sufficiently high to assure a minimum of employment. Private enterprise must provide the jobs; the government must provide the markets. Many speak of an expanding market, and the necessity of maintaining ever-expanding markets. On the other hand I do not believe in paternalism, in an efficient economy propped up by government. That is why I come back to the question which I asked the other day and which has not yet been answered, with reference to the situation created by the recent loan arrangements made between the British and the United States governments. If under the trade arrangements made between the two governments—Canada was not present, and had no observer there—the British preference is done away with, industry in Canada will have been struck a blow that will have serious repercussions on employment. Even now, late as we are in this session, I think the government owes it to the people of this country to give us the assurance that the markets within the empire are to be maintained, or at least that the government intends to make efforts to ensure their maintenance. Without those markets, unemployment in this country, such as it is to-day, will be increased immeasurably, to the detriment of our men returning from overseas as well as of others within the next three months. I would ask the Minister for an assurance of jobs, because after all that is the first job of parliament—our job is to assure jobs. May we have a statement setting out in detail what is being done in this matter of jobs for the returning men, and what is being done to ensure trade and markets?—because we cannot let these men return once more to the unemployment that was prevalent before the war.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. SKEY: There are one or two questions I would like to put to the minister, but before I do so may I say that we appreciate the task which his department has at the present time, the excellent work that the committee have done, and the support they have had from all members. I have a few questions that have a bearing on those raised by the member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) just before we rose at one o'clock. First of all there is the question of interpretation which I brought up on December 11, as will be found at page 3300 of Hansard, in which I said that there was a certain uneasiness in the minds of hon. members that there might be unnecessary delay in granting benefits, narrow legal interpretations, tight rulings by the department, and close decisions by the treasury board. My only reason for rising at this late date is to call attention to one particular phase of the pension act which I think comes within one of these narrow interpretations.

On November 30, in committee, I asked a question of the chairman, reported at page 952 of the minutes of the veterans affairs committeee. I had received reports that when a pensioner went to hospital and came under hospital allowances, in some cases his net income is cut down to the point where he has insufficient money to keep him in cigarettes and small comforts. I said that some of them mentioned as little as $10 a month. Those were my words, and they were supplemented by the remark on the part of the member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch) that $8 was the amount they had left. Since then I have received a letter which I will give to the minister if he requests it, and it contains a reply to my question. Before I read the letter I should say that the reply of the deputy minister to my question in committee was that when a veteran is admitted to hospital for a condition which is not pensionable he is allowed compassionate treatment for this condition even although it has nothing to do with service. I have a letter from a pensioner in this category in which he says:

> These cases are admitted under another medical disability and then treated for their pensionable disability. By doing so, pay and allowances can be withheld.

I bring this to the minister's attention, because if a man is to be admitted to hospital for something like a common cold and then treated for some war disability, he loses the benefit of his pension.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No.

Mr. SKEY: The minister shakes his head, but this is the letter I have received from a pensioner in hospital. He says that there are cases in which the veteran is admitted to hospital for some non-pensionable disability, something that has happened to him since the war, and then when he is in hospital he is treated for a pensionable disability, which means that he should have the benefit of his pension and not have any deductions.

Mr. MACKENZIE: He does.

Mr. SKEY: Well, the reply of the minister—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Will my hon. friend be kind enough to send me the case privately—

Mr. SKEY: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE: —because I am sure it is not correct.

Mr. SKEY: I will not delay longer with that case, since the minister will deal with it.

May I now call the attention of the committee to the multiple disability pensions now in force. I refer to page 7 of the National Council of Veterans Association submission to the special committee on veterans affairs. In the case which they cite they show that a veteran who has multiple disabilities which in total amount to 170 per cent disability receives in reality, by the scheme now in force, only 89·2 per cent, because they assess his most serious disability first and then take a percentage—

Mr. MACKENZIE: I very much dislike interrupting the hon. member, but I would say for his information that the table of disabilities was amended last month and provides for multiple disabilities, but not to exceed 100 per cent.

Mr. SKEY: Thank you very much. I will not go further with that.

There is one other question I wish to ask the minister. It has reference to the nurses who have been employed by the Department of Veterans Affairs in various hospitals throughout the country. These nurses are not eligible for any service benefits. They were actually paid less than nurses who went into uniform and served either in Canada or overseas, and yet the nurses employed in the hospitals by the veterans affairs department applied on many occasions for release in order to join the services. They were under the same orders, the same restrictions, the same service as our ordinary nurses in the forces, and yet all the benefits of the veterans scheme are denied to them. May I ask the minister if any consideration is being given to their position.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Let me say at once to my hon. friend that there is a good deal of merit in what he says, but that applies also to all employees in the Department of Veterans Affairs throughout the country—doctors and staff. They are not members of the forces, and that is a matter that the committee might consider next year.

Mr. SKEY: I am pleased to have that answer, but in world war I the case of nurses was dealt with very differently, in that they were all put into uniform and all treated as members of the services.

Mr. MACKENZIE: But they were members of the service at that time. That is the only distinction between the last war and this one. They were not members of the forces as such in this war. We did not have a civilian department in the last war, and for a long time all these affairs were handled by the defence services and the military hospitals commission before the Department of Soldiers' Civil Reestablishment was formed. That is the distinction to which my hon. friend refers.

Mr. SKEY: I still feel that these nurses do have a prior claim to be treated in the way nurses were treated during the last war. If the minister assures me that the department will consider the matter, I will press the point no further at the present time.

There is one last question, and that is to ask the minister if the matter brought up by the member for Royal, regarding dependents of deceased personnel and their widows, has been considered and whether the minister will answer the question. He evidently overlooked it in his reply to the member for Royal.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That will be considered by the parliamentary committee next February or March.

Mr. PROBE: Last week the minister informed me that certain hospital equipment needed by the veterans' wing of the Regina general hospital for physiotherapeutic treatment of veterans was being secured from Dundurn. This morning the member for Saskatoon City (Mr. Knight)—I see he is in his place now; I did not think he would be here—mentioned to me that he has had the same problem in connection with Saskatoon veterans. Is the equipment that was in the Dundurn military hospital or other equipment now in the physiotherapy veterans' wings of the Saskatoon and Regina general hospitals?

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is in transit.

Mr. PROBE: In the war expenditures committee we discussed the place of the Department of Veterans Affairs in pushing the claims of veterans to surplus war assets. Would the minister care to give a statement as to the extent of the liaison being undertaken at the present time between the Department of Veterans Affairs and the surplus War Assets Corporation?

Mr. MACKENZIE: For some weeks past there has been an inter-departmental committee of veterans affairs and the War Assets Corporation dealing with that very point. We have not reached a final solution as yet, but my hon. friend can rest assured we are going to press for the claims of the veterans.

Mr. PROBE: I inferred from the minister's statement last week that he was opposed to the idea of the Veterans' Land Act being used as a solution to the housing problems of returned veterans. I thought that was what the minister implied in his statement, and I think I was right, since he nods in agreement. I take exception to that, and if the minister feels that his department should not be saddled with the housing problems of veterans, what further positive liaison is carried on with other federal departments? What is being done there?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I entirely agree with my hon. friend in regard to that, and I also agree with the hon. member for Melfort, who belongs to his own political philosophy group over there, that the basic idea of the Soldier Settlement Act and the Veterans' Land Act is settlement on land. The housing feature of it is really an ancillary feature which has developed as being the most popular view. Twenty-seven hundred houses are being constructed at the present time, and six thousand are projected for next year. While I agree with my hon. friend that these should be constructed, and must be constructed, the other question is, who should be in active direction of that policy? Speaking personally I feel strongly that all the housing activities of the administration should be coordinated under one central authority. I believe that is the most effective thing that could be done. So long as I am in charge of the small holdings policy the houses will go on, but I do say to my hon. friend that housing is not the essential feature of the Veterans' Land Act; it is settlement on farms.

Mr. PROBE: I agree with the minister, but the point I am trying to bring out is that someone in the cabinet must press for that coordination to be undertaken, and as I see it, it is his duty to do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think my hon. friend can trust me to that extent.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: With regard to small holdings, I know of a man who returned and wanted to get on some land. Because of his age he was not recommended; his application under the Veterans' Land Act was turned down. He then decided to make a second proposal, stating that he would like to settle himself at a filling station on one of the highways and take in a piece of land consisting of six or seven acres. Under the terms of the act would that be called a small holding?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes; under the small holdings provision of the act at it now stands, that could be done.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What qualifications is he required to have in order to obtain such a holding?

Mr. MACKENZIE: He would have to submit reasonable proof that he would be able to maintain a business successfully; that is about all.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: He made his application, and they turned him down on that account. They said, "Oh, well, you have not a permanent income."

Mr. MACKENZIE: If he had reasonable prospects of a reasonable income, that would be enough.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The letter I received from the soldier settlement board was to this effect—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Would my hon. friend be kind enough to submit the case to me privately?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Yes. He was told that if he cared to submit an application for a small holding which showed that he had permanent employment, it would be considered. It was ridiculous for him to get a permanent job and then ask for a small holding where he could not put in his time. What can be done about returned soldiers who have land of their own and have difficulty in getting machinery? I know that the veterans department had a large quantity of machinery placed on priority. A return which was brought down in the house showed that they must have turned back about seventy per cent of the machinery on which they had got priority. Many of those veterans do not come under the Veterans' Land Act because their parents own the farm and are giving the land to the veterans. When they go to the Veterans' Land Act people and say that they would like some assistance in obtaining farm machinery, they are told: "We have nothing to do with you; you do not come under this assistance at all." The result is they do not know where to go. Would the minister give us a statement to clear that up?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Is my hon. friend referring to actual settlers?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: These are returned veterans.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Settlers?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: They are going to settle on their father's farm, or on a quarter section which the father is giving them.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Do they get title to the property from the father; is it transferred?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Then of course they are entitled to all the benefits.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Under the Veterans' Land Act they do not qualify for any machinery.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am informed by the director that he is doing everything possible to give further priorities for machinery to veterans under the Veterans' Land Act.

Mr CASTLEDEN: They are told to go to the dealer, that a certificate will be given to the dealer and that the dealer will be asked to take care of them as soon as he can.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Would it not be a little more in accordance with our policy in trying to assist veterans if such men as these could be placed under the Veterans' Land Act and receive the benefits of that act in the matter of obtaining machinery?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Within the limits of the available machinery, the suggestion is quite prudent.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Was not seventy per cent of the machinery on which priority had been obtained in 1945 turned back because it could not be used?

Mr. MACKENZIE: It has not been turned over yet.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I think that machinery could have been used by the department to assist veterans who were not purchasing land under the Veterans' Land Act.

Mr. CASE: I realize that time is important, but this is an occasion on which most hon. members wish to add a word to the discussion. We are grateful to that group of men who have played such a tremendous part in the fight for our very existence. I can assure you, sir, that I shall be brief, but there are a few observations I should like to make and some information I should like to obtain from the minister.

I have information to the effect that even a boy born on a farm, who enlisted at eighteen or eighteen and a half years of age and now comes back seeking to acquire a farm homestead or other land, has not within the meaning of the act the necessary qualifications for the assistance that is granted under the act. Will the department give consideration to amendments to make it practicable for the farmer's son to come within the meaning of the act? I am not sure whether the minister's department is charged with this responsibility. I now refer to veterans who have married British girls overseas, and whose wives are still detained in the old land. There are some pathetic cases. I know it is very difficult to do anything about them, yet I do make an appeal on their behalf. I know of young veterans being returned to Canada for discharge from the army, whose wives in the old country are expecting children, and they are anxious that these children should be born in Canada. Yet under the act they cannot be moved except within a certain time limit. I do hope the department are giving consideration to this serious situation and will try to bring these wives to Canada in order that their children may be born here.

I should like to say a word with respect to the veterans guard, about which I believe there was some discussion this morning. I have a sympathetic feeling for these veterans of two wars who have made a tremendous contribution and now are too old to take advantage of many of the rehabilitation measures provided for their benefit. I should like the minister to say his department is giving serious consideration to some action that will satisfy the veterans of two wars who have been serving in internment camps or elsewhere but who now, at the age of fifty-five or more, do not care to take on obligations which will extend for another twenty years.

I do not think I would be fair if I did not take just a few minutes to say that I for one indeed appreciate the sympathetic and serious approach of the minister to these problems. I have had occasion to bring to his attention matters which I know do not come within his department, but he has always listened to me and sincerely tried to help. I believe we all appreciate his sympathetic understanding, and that is something the veterans will need possibly more than anything else in the world. After all, though there may be thousands of veterans, no two of them will have problems exactly the same. This afternoon we see how well the minister deals with these matters; he listens to our remarks and waits for any suggestions that may be made which will be of assistance to the returned men.

I want to refer to another matter, and in doing so I hope I shall not be misunderstood; for that happens so easily. For instance, I believe it was reported in a Canadian press dispatch that the members had voted themselves an additional indemnity of $2,000 for the session, and of course that is absolutely wide of the mark. I hope no deputation is waiting for me to collect mine when I get home, because actually we shall only get about $640 per annum above our expenses. I want to refer to the matter raised this morning by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, the relief allowance of $25 a week. We should all like to see the people of this country everywhere in receipt of $25 a week, but I want to take a realistic and practical view of this suggestion. I say to you, Mr. Chairman, and to this committee, that the moment we raise the allowance to such a level that a man has no desire to work, we are not doing him any good. In my opinion no man is happy unless he is employed. Employment is the greatest source of security, and I should like to see full employment at substantial wages. But I constantly ask myself whether we should offer a man a reward that will take away from him the desire to forage for himself. I suggest that to the committee as something to consider.

The last matter I have in mind has to do with the widows of service men; something I have brought up in the house on previous occasions. I should like to know from the minister whether anything has been done to see that a widow is given the reestablishment credit which her deceased husband would have received if he had come back. This is a very important matter, inasmuch as many of these soldiers married shortly before they went away, and some left small families. Many of these people are living in quarters that cannot be considered either comfortable or secure. I believe the reestablishment of a widow and her young family is just as important, in many ways, as the reestablishment of a soldier who has returned from overseas. I should like to know whether anything definite has been done with respect to granting the reestablishment credit to the widow of a member of the armed forces in order that she may be able to reestablish herself and her family.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I want to thank my hon. friend for his constructive observations, which I think I can deal with in a very few minutes.

In the first place he mentioned the boys on farms, and thought this limitation in regard to eighteen years of age was unfair. As the regulation now is being administered by the director I believe that if the lad has had two years of actual practical experience on a farm he can qualify under the provisions of the Veterans' Land Act. From my own memories I know that any lad who has been brought up on a farm and done the work of a farm is pretty well qualified to look after a farm himself after he gets older, so I agree in large part with my hon. friend in that regard.

The hon. gentleman dealt with the early return of the wives of veterans. A declaration in that connection was made yesterday or the day before by my colleague the Minister of National Defence, so I need not deal further with that point. The hon. gentleman went on to speak of the veterans of both wars, and made a most commendable suggestion in their behalf. May I tell him that we are now establishing a special directorate in the Department of Veterans Affairs to deal with the problem of the veterans of both wars.

Then my hon. friend went on to mention the reestablishment credit for widows. I am sorry that I am perhaps reactionary in regard to that matter. I remember when we had our committee dealing with this problem. Rightly or wrongly—it is a matter for the committee and the members of the house to decide later—we came to the conclusion that war service grants and gratuities are largely the expression of a nation's gratitude to the men who served the country in time of war. We treated the credits as a conjunct function combining in the first place the same ideas but essentially combining them over a ten-year period with reestablishment as such, and relating it to the national economy, and belonging particularly to the individual who had returned to Canada and was being reestablished. That may be the wrong idea, but it was the basic idea behind that provision. I doubt very much, and I say this without hesitation, the advisability of extending the reestablishment credit to anyone except the ex-service man who comes back to Canada and seeks to rebuild a home for himself or herself, because it applies also to women. I believe those were the main points raised by the hon. gentleman, and I thank him very much for them.

Mr. CASE: Will the minister pursue that matter a little farther? I know of some unfortunate instances.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It will come up for discussion when the Pension Act will be considered by the veterans affairs committee, I imagine about next March.

Mr. BAKER: I have been a member of this veterans committee and hope to be a member of the veterans committee next session. I spent a great many hours, time which perhaps I should have spent on my constituency, trying to solve these very matters. I appreciate all that has been said here by hon. members, and I know it has been said in all earnestness and true sincerity; but I wish hon. gentlemen would bear in mind the fact that on this committee there were sixty veterans of either the first or the second great war. I happen to be one of them. Please do give us time to work out these things. We have been doing our best to work out these matters, and we shall do the same next year. But do give us a break, and do not spend all this time discussing these matters here, because all you are doing is detracting from the hard work the committee has done. We will give you everything we have at the next session, and I am sure many of these matters will be dealt with satisfactorily then.

Mr. FERGUSON: As a veteran of the first great war I should like to make one observation. During the last war I corresponded with probably four hundred men overseas. All those men, without exception, had one desire: "Get me a job; give me a job." Mention has been made of General Hoffmeister's remarks to the effect that a veteran ought not to have to dig ditches. I say this: Veterans want jobs. No one should make a promise to keep a man from digging a ditch if he is properly fitted for that work and if he digs a good ditch. I would much rather dig a ditch and be paid for it than be a white collar man and starve to death.

I make the plea to get these men back and give them work. Do not make too many promises, because these young boys become confused. My young brother-in-law enlisted at the age of eighteen and served six years with the flying corps. He is now twenty-five years of age, and upon returning home he does not know which course to take. My advice to him was: Get to work, and have the other fellow pay you while you are looking the ground over.

Give these men jobs. Those who are maimed or have become physically defective because of the war should be looked after one hundred per cent. Move them out of that disgraceful Christie street hospital, for which both Conservative and Liberal governments are responsible, and put them into a hospital we can be proud of. Look after the blind and the maimed. But do not promise those boys the world with a fence around it. They have served a great purpose. Do not fill them with promises. Give them jobs, and they will prove themselves worthy, as they did during the war. When they enlisted as volunteers they did not need promises to show what they could do. They do not want promises now, with one exception, and that is that they have a job. Fulfil that promise of a job, so that they may do their work. They do not want to be keyed up with promises, take courses, and after getting half way through them, slip back and three or four months from now find their own levels. Give them jobs; and give those who are maimed the proper kind of treatment.

Mr. GREEN: During the present session there has been very little discussion of veterans affairs in the house. The main reason, of course, was that we had a special committee studying veterans affairs. I agree with other hon. members of that committee when they say it did good work, and I appreciated the privilege of serving on it. I believe every member who gave that service feels the same as I do, and I am sure we shall be able to do good work for the veterans in next session's committee.

The work of the special committee had to be limited to certain things; there was not time to cover everything. We recommended three bills which have now been passed by the house, one to amend The War Service Grants Act, another to amend The Veterans' Land Act and a third to provide rehabilitation allowances for veterans. That meant, of course, that we could not consider such vital questions as pensions, war veterans allowances and hospital treatment. It is true that some representations were made on those points, but there was no lengthy consideration of any of them by the committee. Now, of course there can be no further consideration until the next session.

The department submitted to the committee two draft bills, one proposing to amend the Pension Act and the other to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act. Those two bills show that departmental officials have in mind at the present time certain things in connection with those acts.

I have five questions I should like to ask the minister, which deal particularly with pensions and war veterans allowances. First of all, in respect of pensions, we have contended for a long time that a provision should be written into our Pension Act to the effect that a man's condition on admission to service shall be presumed to have been his actual condition, and that if subsequently there is any deterioration prior to his discharge, the onus shall be upon the state to show that such deterioration was not caused by his service. For some reason or other we have never been able to make much headway with that suggestion. The result out in the country where we meet the veterans is that time and again the pension commission holds that a man's condition was a preenlistment condition, and when they do that they may or or may not grant the applicant a partial pension on the ground that such preenlistment condition has been aggravated. But where the pension is based on an aggravated preenlistment condition it is always smaller than if it had been held that there was a straight disability.

I know of several cases where injustices have been done. These are not only men who served in Canada, but also men who served overseas.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It does not apply to overseas cases.

Mr. GREEN: Oh, yes. I know of cases where it has been found that a man's condition was a preenlistment condition, and he was allowed only an aggravation, and not an out-and-out disability pension. Sometimes I am tempted to blame the pension commission. If this goes on indefinitely there are going to be many veterans in Canada not receiving the pensions to which they are entitled.

Mr. MACKENZIE: In the event of aggravation of disability caused overseas, the applicant is entitled to the whole amount of the pension, unless the condition was obvious, recorded or wilfully concealed.

Mr. GREEN: The difficulty is this. A man is accepted by the army, after many examinations. He is found to be perfectly fit. He goes overseas and in two or three years comes back, receiving his discharge as being medically unfit or in a lower category. Then, if you please, the pension commission finds that he had some preenlistment condition. In other words, although he was accepted as fit, and although everybody thought he was fit, several years later the pension commission decides there was something the matter with him when he enlisted and that therefore he is not entitled to full compensation for his disability. I know of cases where that has been done.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The principle of fit-for-service fit-for-pension has never been accepted by any country in the world.

Mr. GREEN: I do not think the minister should emphasize so much Canada's having the best laws for veterans.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I was not referring to that.

Mr. GREEN: I hope it is true, but I know that in some respects it is not. However that is not the test. The test should be whether or not these laws could be improved, and here is an instance where they could be. I suggest there should be a section written into the Pension Act which will make the situation clear. I will suggest a section which the officials of the department and the minister might consider. It would read:

It shall be presumed—

And this is not something which takes place automatically; it is a presumption—

It shall be presumed that an applicant's condition as recorded on his admission to the service was in fact his condition at that time, and that any subsequent deterioration was due to his service.

In other words this sets up a presumption in favour of the applicant.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is the same as the British provision?

Mr. GREEN: Yes, it is practically the same as the provision in Great Britain.

Mr. MACKENZIE: My friend took this matter up last year in debate in this house. We made a thorough examination of the significance of the presumption which was embodied in the British amendments. My advisers, rightly or wrongly, say that under the existing conditions the provisions under our Pension Act are more generous.

Mr. GREEN: That is not the way the act works out with the disabled veteran. I know of cases in which the veteran is losing out.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We will study it between now and next session, and then it can be taken up by parliament.

Mr. GREEN: If a presumption of that kind were followed by the pension commission it would mean that this man could qualify for a pension. Further I think the minister would find that such a section would change the outlook of his pension commissioners.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I shall be glad to go into it fully.

Mr. GREEN: That is the first suggestion. It is important that the department should go into these matters before the next session. Do not let everything die now until the house meets again. It will be weeks later before the committee is set up and there will be no amending legislation until May, June, or perhaps even later.

My next suggestion has to do with the insurance principle. I am not going to go into this again, because the minister knows how we feel about it. We feel it should be restored to cover men who enlisted to fight, even though they were not able to get out of Canada. We do not want to protect the man who never had any intention of fighting, but these other men should be covered by the insurance principle. The minister has said that there has been a compromise section put in the act. He is quite right; that is section 11, subsection 3. It provides that if a man has been disabled and cannot qualify for a pension; if he is in difficult circumstances, then the pension commission may in their discretion award him whatever they feel like awarding. There is a means test to it, which of course is a bad feature. I notice in the submission of the National Council of Veterans' Associations, presented to the special committee this year, it was pointed out that not only is there a means test at the start before the man qualifies for a pension, but the commission can go back and back and means test the man. If his financial condition improves, his pension may be reduced or taken away altogether. They suggest that once a man qualifies he should be entitled to have his pension continue.

Then there is another serious difficulty. Under that section a man may have a pension granted by the pension commission—the minister will correct me if I am wrong—but he never gets the full amount according to his disability. Even though a man is 100 per cent disabled he can never get more than two-thirds of the total disability allowance under that section. That is so, is it not?

Mr. MACKENZIE: That may be correct; there was a feeling that there should be some distinction made between that type of case and the battle casualty overseas.

Mr. GREEN: That needs to be given further consideration. If a man is 100 per cent disabled and is entitled to pension under this section, he should get a pension corresponding to the amount of his disability. I would ask that further consideration be given to that. Then with regard to war veterans allowances, which have been mentioned briefly today; this act is to be changed as well. By the way, the changes that I have mentioned were not included in the draft bills the minister handed to the special committee this year, and that is why I am mentioning them here.

Mr. MACKENZIE: There is no such thing as a draft bill before this house.

Mr. GREEN: It was before the committee. The amendments that I am going to suggest to the War Veterans Allowance Act were not in the bill the minister put before the committee either. I think eventually the means test will have to be done away with under the War Veterans Allowance Act. The dominion government has proposed to the provinces that old age pensions will be paid at seventy years without a means test. The war veterans allowance was supposed to be a form of old age pension to the veteran who had been burned out. He was made eligible for allowance at sixty years of age instead of seventy. If the principle of automatic payment is put into the old age pension legislation, I think it will have to follow into the war veterans allowance legislation.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We are trying to be mutually helpful in regard to the pension situation. Out of over 40,000 pensions payment, more than 5,000 were awarded for service in Canada only.

Mr. GREEN: I think if the minister checked up on the other figures covering the applications for pension he would find that the percentage of those who can get over the hurdle in Canada is very small, unless it has jumped a lot since last year. There should be a widening of the right to earn without disqualifying one for a war veteran's allowance. The man who has been thrifty all through his life and put away a little savings cannot get a war veteran's allowance until he has spent practically all of his savings. He cannot have a proper home in the city without losing a portion of his war veteran's allowance. The restrictions are too severe and I suggest that they be studied carefully before the committee meets again.

The minister took a surprising stand this morning with regard to imperials. It is an old argument, it is a poor argument, but it sounds good. The minister said that we cannot allow any imperial to get a war veteran's allowance because there were thousands of Canadians who got to England but who are not eligible for war veterans' allowances unless they are pensioners; therefore why should anything be given to imperials? That sounded different from the speech made yesterday by his leader on the question of indemnities. There may be two wrongs here, but it is no answer to one to say that there is another wrong.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I will go this far with my hon. friend: cure the first one first, cure the Canadian one first.

Mr. GREEN: The qualification for a war veteran's allowance is based on service in a theatre of war, and the only request that has ever been made by an imperial for a war veteran's allowance was by an imperial who had served in a theatre of war.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is quite correct.

Mr. GREEN: That should not be confused with the Canadian who did not serve in a theatre of war. If the minister is correct in his stand, the Canadian who never served in a theatre of war would get a war veteran's allowance before the imperial who had served in a theatre of war.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The request made to us by the association was with reference to imperials who had come to this country up to 1930; it was asked that they be entitled to the benefits of the veterans' allowances. That would mean that the Canadian who had served in England would not have preference over the ex-imperial who came here in 1930.

Mr. GREEN: The minister is taking the two groups together, the one group who actually served under fire and the other group who did not. I think that is an unfair position to take. I am not trying to deprecate the claim of the Canadian who only got to England, but certainly that does not meet the situation of the imperial who was under fire and who came to Canada after the last war. That man gave up rights under the social security measures in Great Britain which were far greater than anything he would receive here. He became a Canadian citizen and has stood shoulder to shoulder with us ever since that time. He cannot qualify now simply because of an argument such as the minister has put up to-day.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am afraid I am being annoying, but may I say this to my hon. friend, that I know of no Canadian parliament—I am not speaking about parties or governments—that has yet accepted responsibility except for Canadians who left the shores of Canada.

Mr. GREEN: There were domiciled Canadians, men who left the shores of Canada some years before the fighting took place. I do not agree with the minister. He has gone this far, and I am glad to get him out in the open. When we get into power we shall meet the problem of these imperials; if I have anything to do with it, we certainly will.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I hope they do not have to wait that long.

Mr. GREEN: It may not be as long as the minister thinks. He is just whistling to keep his courage up.

Another question on which I should like some assurance has to do with what we call the non-pensioned widows. They are now entitled to a payment; what they really get is a war veteran's allowance, and they are getting that payment under an order in council. It has never been put in statutory form.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Is that not in the new bill my hon. friend has in front of him?

Mr. GREEN: The minister said a few moments ago that this is not a bill. Is it or is it not? I agree that it is in this hypothetical bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is to be considered by the committee.

Mr. GREEN: Is there any doubt that they are covered by the order in council in the meantime? That order in council will not be invalid in the meantime because of the termination of the War Measures Act?

Mr. MACKENZIE: They are covered this year by the appropriation act, and will thereafter be by the proposed measure to be considered by the select committee when it meets again.

Mr. GREEN: I suggest that the minister give consideration to putting it in statutory form if there is any doubt about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We have given that definite consideration, and we have no doubt whatever about their being covered.

Mr. GREEN: My final question has to do with the dual service pension. It is called a pension, but is really a war veteran's allowance. The submission has been made that the payment should be on the basis of a reward for service, in other words, a service pension for long service to the country. Most of these men were three or four years in the first great war and perhaps five years in the second. It is only fair that the payment should be based on that service rather than on a means test. I have no doubt that the department considered that aspect of it, but can the minister explain why it was not made an actual pension rather than a war veteran's allowance?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Because the request was definitely received from some of the leading veterans' organizations to have it considered not as a pension but rather as an allowance under the veterans' allowance act. I say with the utmost frankness that it is not a success as it is now, and I think it should be one of the duties of the committee next session to go into the matter thoroughly and make new recommendations in regard to it. I do not think that the dual service order is any good.

Mr. GREEN: I hope that the minister and his able officers will work out some suggestions for the committee by the time we meet next year.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We shall do that.

Mr. GREEN: I agree that it is a difficult question, but I suggest that the payment should be based on service rather than on a means test.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We shall be glad to consider that. I think we have had a very fine debate, Mr. Chairman, and I wonder if I might now ask the committee to make some progress with these estimates.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman: I must protest at the rushing through of important business at this time. This is the only opportunity the members have of getting the ministers before them to deal with matters of the kind, matters about which all members receive letters, telegrams and other communications with which we are bound to deal. Let us remember that we are now receiving overtime, and there is no reason why we should not work for it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think we are.

Mr. MacINNIS: So far as I am concerned I am going to deal with these matters now. I have never taken up the time of the house in dealing with veterans' affairs. It was not necessary for me to do it because the veterans have exceedingly capable representatives in this house who have been doing a good job for the veterans ever since I have been here.

Someone suggested this afternoon that we take a realistic view of this question. It was the hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Case) when he was referring to the point made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) that when veterans are unable to secure employment they should be given an adequate living allowance. I think we have established that principle too, and I do not see why the veterans should not have the benefit of it as well as members of parliament.

It was realized some time ago that the question what would happen to men of the armed services when they return from overseas was a very live one. It was an important question in the federal election campaign in May and June of this year, and all candidates took a considerable part of their time to deal with it. In everything that I had to say on this question, either at public meetings or in broadcasts, I made the point that so far as legislation was concerned Canada had good legislation for the returned men—perhaps, as the minister has said, the best legislation in the world. I think that is conceded. But I pointed out that if economic conditions in this country became depressed, no matter what special provision we had made for the veterans, the veterans nevertheless would suffer. Economic conditions now are becoming depressed, and a veteran who would not have difficulty under prosperous economic conditions will find himself in difficult circumstances as economic conditions become worse, and he will come to the government for relief. So the question that is confronting us to-day is not simply a question of dealing with legislation for the veteran; it is a question of dealing with the whole economy of Canada and the committee requires considerably more time with the Department of Labour, the Department of Veterans Affairs, the Department of Reconstruction, perhaps the Department of Agriculture, and the Department of Finance. All of these are interwoven and will have to coordinate their efforts before we can successfully cope with the problem of improving economic conditions. I put myself on record as supporting the proposal made by the member for Cape Breton South that the veterans should be granted an adequate living allowance if employment cannot be found for them.

I have another matter to bring to the attention of the minister and I bring it up because I promised to do it. The corps of Canadian fire fighters overseas has sent a brief to the minister which perhaps was discussed at the veterans committee. The gist of the brief is that these men should be given the same benefits as the men of the armed services. I asked some questions in regard to the number of Canadian fire fighters who went to the United Kingdom from Canada, the average length of service, and how many were killed, wounded or died of serious injuries or illness overseas. The answer was that 408 went overseas; the average length of service was two years, eight months and fourteen days; three were killed, five wounded, and five seriously injured.

Obviously these men were a part of the fighting forces. Is there any reason, therefore, particularly considering that the number is so small, why they should not be given all the benefits accruing to other returned veterans? Of twenty-two enlistment benefits for veterans, six benefits have been received; five benefits have been received with conditions attached, and to eleven benefits they have no entitlement at all.

I suggest to the minister that he put the fire fighting corps on the same basis, so far as benefits are concerned, as the men of the other armed services.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I thank my hon. friend for his remarks. Whether we were right or wrong, last year, when we passed the order in council, a distinction was made by the committee, on advice from various departments that there should be a differentiation between those who were members of the armed forces and those who were not; therefore it will be found that supervisors and some of the ancillary services, such as fire fighters, do not receive the entire amount of benefits that are received by members of the services. Whether that was right or wrong is a question I shall not debate now, but that was the dominant argument behind the decision made at that time. As a matter of fact, I remember very well receiving a delegation from the fire fighters in my office when the projected order in council was under discussion, and they appeared at that time to be satisfied with it, although since then there have been marked complaints. The whole question will come up before the committee of the house next March.

Mr. MacNICOL: I want to help the minister get through as quickly as possible; therefore I shall be brief. I know that he is one of the hardest working ministers of the crown; far be it from me, then, to detain him longer than is absolutely necessary. In the first place, I feel it my duty to compliment the minister on his programme, in reference to making the recommendations or regulations, or whatever they are called, having to do with non-pensionable widows, into a bill and making them statutory.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think my hon. friend deserves most of the credit for that.

Mr. MacNICOL: No. The minister deserves the credit, and I will give him all of it. I was just a humble worker following his programme. The minister really did a great service to the country, because non-pensionable widows were a part of the population who had not got a fair deal. The minister tackled the problem, and I happened to help him, and in due course these widows were looked after. I am glad to see that the matter will now be made statutory.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The vote is increased by $100,000 this year.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am glad to hear the minister say that, and again I compliment him. I wish to say a word with reference to fire fighters. The chairman is very humble and modest. He could have taken a great deal of credit for the fact that the chief of the fire fighters overseas came from his own fine city of Brantford. I am right in that, am I not? Yes, I am. A large number of these men came from Toronto, many from my own riding, but like many other members I have risen to bring up the problem of these men. I am not competent to say whether their work was comparable with the work of the soldiers, but a number of them were killed and others were wounded, as we have heard to-day. For my part I am satisfied to leave the matter in the hands of the minister. If he can do anything to give these men fair play I know he will.

I wish to bring up a couple of cases I have mentioned before, and again I am going to be brief. I want to be as kindly as I can, and therefore I begin by saying that personally I have always had the utmost courtesy and satisfaction from the minister and his staff. I have no complaints to make in reference to the way I have been treated. However, I was greatly concerned in reading, as other members have been in the last few days, about the shooting of Canadian soldiers overseas, as strikingly recorded in this morning's Globe and Mail of Toronto in the following article:

Lonely Walk of Canadians to Death Told. By Ralph Allen, staff correspondent of the Globe and Mail. Aurich, December 14.—A story of sadism and mental torture that sounded like an oriental horror tale entered the records of the Kurt Meyer trial to-day as one of Meyer's former soldiers described how a German officer stood in a monastery courtyard and hurled taunts at seven Canadian prisoners of war just before he sent them through a little ivied gateway, one at a time, to be shot dead by an SS corporal waiting for them on the other side.

That article recalls to my mind the case I brought up before of George Stevens, who lives on Salem avenue, Toronto, and whose number is 57727. What I fear is that Mr. Stevens, perhaps in bitter resentment of the fact that he has been unable to present his case so that it will be sympathetically heard, has written to the department letters which on being read were not at all favourably received. I do not blame Mr. Stevens, because he was a prisoner of the same type about whom I have just read. He and others were captured in a trench in Belgium and lined up against the wall. He understood a bit of German, and he heard the officer in charge of their captors saying, "We will shoot these Englishers." He called them all English, using that word. Just at that moment a German officer came along and, on being told what was about to take place, prevented the shooting. I can well imagine the horrible feeling that must have possessed these Canadian prisoners on being lined up to be shot.

I fear that the gentlemen of the department who have to do with such cases do not quite realize the effect which this has had on these men. I know Mr. Stevens very well. I have known him ever since the war ended. On many occasions I have seen him sitting on the edge of the sidewalk, helpless, unable to move. But when he is taken to hospital and put in a nice clean comfortable bed, with nurses to wait on him, after he has been there a day or two the doctors take his temperature and they pronounce him one hundred per cent fit. That does not sound to me like common sense. If I wanted to get the truth about such a man I would call in his neighbours. They are the people who see him daily. They meet him here, there and everywhere, and I would take their word in preference to the word of a staff of doctors from here to Jericho, because the doctors see him only after he has rested and his blood pressure and nervous energy have been restored. I brought this case up before. The minister kindly said that he would look into it and he did. I know that, but he took the reports from his staff. Forget all about the staff.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I cannot afford to do that.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is the unfortunate part of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: They are very efficient.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is what I say; they are honest and qualified. They get their reports from the doctors in the hospital who see the man after he has been there two or three days and has regained calm equilibrium. That is not the right basis to go on. I know a man whose condition was brought to the attention of the department. I did my best to get some consideration for him. I was told by the commission that he had no case, but he died. The man knew he was right, but the doctors thought they were right because they examined him after he was in the hospital for some time and had become shipshape.

I had another case brought to my attention the other day, that of Francis J. Rider, whose number is 455004. I have known Mr. Rider for twenty-five years. He used to be an employee of mine. I have seen him in all sorts of conditions. I have gone to his house and found him hardly able to breathe, with froth running out of his mouth and down over his breast. He is making a claim for bronchitis, which he claims he contracted due to his war service, and I believe it. I knew him before he went overseas. He was placed in the hospital and the doctors saw him a day or two after he was there. But it was after he had been attended by pleasant nurses, waited on, his meals brought to him three times a day. Naturally he regained a calm equilibrium, his breathing became all right and the doctors looked him over and pronounced him a hundred per cent. That does not mean very much to me.

I know of another case, a Scotsman, in whom I believe. He would not need to swear on a bible for me to believe him. I have seen him in an abject condition. His name is William Robertson, and his number is 534262. I took up his case with the department, and I really believe the department has tried to do something for Mr. Robertson. They made an investigation; they sent him to Christie street, and recently they sent him to Ste. Anne's. I have seen him in a pitiable condition many times in his own home, but when he gets into these fine warm beds with pretty nurses waiting on him, serving him meals three times a day, he makes a great improvement. Then the doctors come in, look him over and pronounce him a hundred per cent. I am going to leave that with the minister. I ask him not to take the medical report but to take the report of the neighbours on the street who have seen this man in the condition which I have described. If the minister does that, and I trust him, he will give these three returned soldiers a square deal.

Mr. KNIGHT: I should like to add my voice to that of the hon. member for Vancouver East. I prepared a long brief on this matter, and I agree with the hon. member when he says that he does not think sufficient time is given to these important problems. I am not going to threaten the minister with a forty minute speech, and what I say may be a little disjointed because it is difficult to boil down a forty minute speech into a five minute one.

Something should be added to the argument made on behalf of these fire fighters. They should be treated as ordinary veterans are treated. At the end of my five minute speech I know the minister is going to tell me that the committee is giving this matter earnest consideration and that he is quite sure that something will be done about it next year. But he has not stated definitely that a bill is to be brought down to put these men on an equal basis with the veterans. I presume at this stage the minister could not promise that in so many words.

In fairness to the Canadian fire fighters I say that in view of the conditions of their service and the terms of their employment they should be granted all the rights and privileges which have been granted to the military forces. In reply to the hon. member for Vancouver East the minister said that the differentiation is a matter of combat service. I should like to give from memory the words of the Minister of National Defence when he said very heatedly that so far as he was concerned the front lines were where the bombs were falling, irrespective of whether it was in England or on the continent. I am in full agreement with him there. These men were subject to military discipline and military pay. They suffered the risks of the actual veterans, and in some cases more risks, because they helped defend England at an important time in her history, when bombs were dropping on all sides. Evidence of that is given in the fact that several of them were killed.

I am not going into a long argument as to the benefits which have been denied these men. One of the most important, at least to the young men, is the denial of the right to have an education at the expense of the people of this country. These men are not all seasoned firemen coming back to their jobs. Some of them are young boys who left school to go into the fire fighting forces. I have a letter or two from several of them who complain that they cannot now complete their education. One or two of them have taken on liabilities in the form of wives, and they would like to get some further education, but they cannot do that. I shall read one short paragraph from one of the letters:

> In addition to the disappointment of every member of the corps, the omissions of this order in council have very far-reaching effects for me personally. I was married overseas, but due to the uncertainty of the available financial aid, my wife will not be able to join me until next spring. Prior to enlistment, I was a student at the university of Saskatchewan where I was enrolled in a type D arts course leading to theology. I am planning to return to university this next term, but am keenly disappointed that I shall have no financial assistance in the form of an educational grant. It may mean that now, with family responsibilities, I shall be unable to complete my chosen course.

These men have almost everything in common with the regular combat soldiers. They volunteered for the duration of the war; they offered life and limb. Like any other soldier, they accepted discipline. They accepted comparable pay and allowances; their term was like that of the soldiers. The carried Canadian army cards, and were medically checked and finger-printed by the Canadian army. Their conditions of eating and travelling and so forth were the same. I would say to all intents and purposes these men were simply Canadian soldiers who were defending Britain, just as the first division may have been said to be defending Britain all the time it was over there even though it had never fired a shot.

I believe the main argument which is motivating the government—I am not speaking for the government—is that there has to be a line drawn somewhere. I am guessing again when I say that the government may say that if we give it to these men, a great many other auxiliary services will say, "If they get it, we should get it," and so on. I think I have answered the argument that these men are not military personnel. I have shown that they carried different weapons, weapons of defence; that they suffered the hazards and the conditions of the war. They were subjected to the risks of fire and of war, of falling bombs. I have shown how they accepted pay and discipline comparable to that of the army.

The government may argue that to meet this demand might precipitate demands from other services. I do not think that argument is valid. These men were more nearly on a par with the military than with any of the other serivces, as I have shown. It is true, and I think this is a good argument, that these men did not receive as high a rate of pay as some of the other services; that is to say, they were restricted simply to military pay. It will be said, of course, that we cannot afford it. I am not going into that matter at the moment, but when millions of dollars are being voted here every day, the cost of meeting the claim of these men would be a mere drop in the bucket. You may say I am becoming financially as irresponsible as a Social Crediter, and that may be so. Personally I am not worrying very much about the national debt; so far as Britain is concerned, for instance, I do not think as yet she has paid back the money she borrowed to beat Napoleon in 1815, and I do not suppose our debt will be treated any differently.

There is just one other point I should mention. These men were never promised the full rehabilitation grants, but time and again they have said they understood they would receive them. I am not going to delay the committee longer, but I promised I would bring up this matter and I have done so to the best of my ability. I thought probably the minister would prefer to have me spend five minutes on it now than forty minutes when the item concerning fire fighters came up.

Item agreed to.

401. Treatment services, $11,066,516.

Mr. MOORE: I should like to ask one question with reference to veterans of the first world war, from whom I have had several letters concerning the difficulty they have experienced in obtaining pensions for wounds they received other than in an actual theatre of war. I should like to know if the minister contemplates any change in the present act which would enable these men to obtain the benefits of that measure.

Mr. MACKENZIE: At the moment I cannot make a definite declaration of policy, except to say that the Pension Act will be reviewed by a committee of this house, probably some time next March, and any complaints made by hon. members will receive sympathetic consideration at that time.

Item agreed to.

404. Veterans' bureau, $224,137.

Mr. GREEN: In the submission to the special committee by the National Council of Veterans' Associations in Canada there was a recommendation that the veterans bureau should be an independent commission having authority and freedom equivalent to that enjoyed by the Canadian pension commission. Then they went on to suggest that the chief pensions advocate should have powers suitable to his office and equal to those of the chairman of the pension commission. They further suggested that the office of travelling inspector of the veterans' bureau be filled by a full-time advocate, in order that he might exercise constant supervision over the work of preparing cases in the district offices of the bureau. I think the minister will agree that there always has been a feeling that because a pensions advocate was paid by the government he might not be working 100 per cent for the soldier. I am not saying that has been the case, but there always has been that reaction, so it does seem to me this suggestion is worthy of very serious consideration. It might be that if the bureau were given a higher status and made more independent the veteran would feel that he was getting stronger representation in presenting his case. What has the minister to say about this suggestion?

Mr. MACKENZIE: My hon. friend will agree that we have all been working day and night; I have not even had a chance to look over these representations, and neither have my officers. But I can promise that they will be carefully studied within the next two months.

Item agreed to.

405. War veterans' allowance board—administration, $191,577.

Mr. WRIGHT: I should like to ask if the department is giving any consideration at the present time to increasing the amount a veteran may earn and still receive his allowance. At the present time I believe it is only $125, which is ridiculously low.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am afraid this item has nothing to do with the actual benefits obtained by recipients of the allowance; it deals mainly with administration. The other question raised by my hon. friend will be considered by the committee, of which he himself is a very able member.

Mr. WRIGHT: That is not going to help the veteran out in the country at the present time. This has to do with the veterans' allowances, and certainly it comes under the minister. Under what item should that discussion take place?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think you will find it comes under item 408.

Mr. WRIGHT: Well, I will ask the minister to make some statement in respect to that matter. It is ridiculous that a veteran should be permitted to earn only $125, and that anything beyond that should be taken from his allowance. I believe the government might very well do something about this by regulation instead of waiting until next year when the committee may reconsider the whole matter. It means a great deal to these men. I have in mind a man who has been communicating with me, who took a small mail contract simply because they could not get anyone else to do it. Because he took that contract, which paid him something over $200 a year but less than $300, his allowance was cut off. When it is reinstated he will be fined the amount he overdrew, because he continued to receive his allowance for two or three months before they discovered that he had been getting this small amount of two or three hundred dollars, less whatever expenses were incidental to the work. I really think the department should give some consideration to changing that ruling immediately.

Mr. MACKENZIE: With all due respect to my hon. friend, this matter is going to be considered by the committee. Some unkind things have been said to the government in regard to regulations and orders in council, and the suggestion made by my hon. friend involves an entirely new principle. The present legislation was passed by this parliament, and I would not propose to take any action in connection with it until I had heard the representations made to the committee next year.

Mr. WRIGHT: That is all very well, but this government has passed plenty of orders in council which have affected other people and put money in their pockets. When we come to ask for a little bit for the veterans, however, it is not possible.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I object to that remark, Mr. Chairman; it is not fair. This parliament has done as much for veterans as any parliament in the world. There has been no niggardly policy of any kind, and there never will be.

Mr. WRIGHT: I do not want to get into an argument with the minister, but I ask him if that is not a niggardly policy.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I do not think so.

Mr. WRIGHT: Is it not niggardly to make a deduction from the pension of a veteran when he earns more than $125.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have been in this parliament since 1930, and I have heard nothing but commendation year after year in regard to the provisions of the War Veteran's Allowance Act and its administration. Can my hon. friend point to any act in any of the allied countries to-day that compares with the veterans' allowance act in Canada? If there is any hardship hon. members of this house, regardless of party, will give it every consideration; but when the hon. gentleman asks me to declare government policy at the present time in regard to this principle, I am not going to do it.

Mr. WRIGHT: I am not asking the minister to do that. We have already admitted the principle by allowing a man to earn up to $125. That is the principle now. What is the matter with increasing that amount to $300? You will not be changing the principle at all but simply increasing the amount the man may earn. That does not change the principle of the act.

Item agreed to.

406. Veterans insurance, $100,861.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): The minister may recall that when this bill was before the house a year ago the matter of income tax and succession duties in regard to the proceeds of an insurance policy was brought up. At that time I asked the minister if the proceeds of these policies would be subject to either income tax or succession duties, and the minister replied that he was not sure but would make inquiries. He also told me at that time that as far as he was concerned he thought they should be exempt from the payment of both income tax and succession duties. On Monday, March 26, 1945, in answer to a question I had placed on the order paper it is stated that the proceeds of a soldier's insurance policy are subject to succession duty, if the estate as a whole is above the succession duty exemptions. It is stated, secondly, that the proceeds of a policy payable as a life annuity are taxable.

If the minister has made inquiries as to these policies I should be very glad to hear his comment, and if it is still correct that the proceeds are subject to succession duty, and still taxable as annuities, perhaps he will tell us about the situation.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The situation is exactly as the hon. member has described it.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): Is there to be no change?

Mr. MACKENZIE: It will be considered.

Item agreed to.

407. Payments to or for veterans and dependents; European war pensions, $37,000,000.

Mr. GREEN: As I understand it, the present practice is that where a pension is awarded on the basis of any figure, say between forty-five per cent and fifty per cent, the disability is cut down to the nearest unit of five. For instance, if a man's disability is forty-eight per cent he receives a pension to the extent of only forty-five per cent?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes, that is correct; it is statutory.

Mr. GREEN: Why is that done? It seems to me that it is unfair, and that a man should receive at least his actual percentage of disability.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is in the act, schedule A.

Mr. GREEN: Why not give him the benefit of the doubt and increase it from forty-eight per cent to fifty per cent, rather than cut it to forty-five per cent.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is in the act now. However, the hon. member might make a suggestion when we meet again.

Mr. GREEN: When the minister was interrupting me a few minutes ago he gave the numbers of pensions awarded to men for service in Canada only. Can he now break down that figure into the number who receive pensions under section 11 (1) and those who have them under section 11 (3)?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I shall get that in a minute or two.

Mr. STIRLING: Is there any reason why the word "European" should be in here?

Mr. MACKENZIE: There is a separate item in the war appropriation estimates dealing with other pensions; this item refers to world war I.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): Does this include pensions paid to widows of deceased pensioners? If so, what percentage would a soldier have to receive so that on his death his widow would continue a pension?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Pension is $60 a month for the widow and additional allowances for the children.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): I think I did not make myself clear. I understood that a soldier had to have a disability of at least fifty per cent before, on his death, his widow would continue to receive a pension. I should like to know if the percentage has been reduced, because the minister must know that in many instances the widow of a soldier drawing a disability pension of even forty or forty-five per cent is often, on the soldier's death, more entitled to continue to receive that pension than the widow of the soldier who was receiving possibly sixty per cent or seventy per cent as a pension. It seems to me there has always been discrimination in this respect.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The widow would be entitled to a pension, regardless of the amount of disability, provided that death was caused from service. But I understand the hon. member is referring to a case where there would be fifty per cent disability or more, although death was not necessarily the result of war service.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): How does the department arrive at fifty per cent? Why not make it forty per cent or sixty per cent?

Mr. MACKENZIE: For many years it was eighty per cent. Then parliament in its good judgment reduced the amount to fifty per cent.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): Would the minister care to express his opinion as to why the widows of all pensioners should not continue to receive the same pensions after the deaths of their husbands? Does he not think they are entitled to those pensions?

Mr. MACKENZIE: The reason for the stipulation of fifty per cent—and I believe I was here when this change was made—was that there was a presumption that when disability was fifty per cent or more, war injuries or war disabilities might have been a contributing factor in the cause of death.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Stirling.]

409. Unemployment assistance, $100,000.

Mr. GREEN: Is the government accepting responsibility for all unemployed veterans? The minister will recall that after the depression there were repeated debates in the house as to whether or not the dominion should accept full responsibility for the unemployed veterans. Has a decision been made in this matter?

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. member will realize that this vote refers only to what we have had in the last twenty-five years. I believe he will know as well as I do the various policies declared and announced from time to time respecting measures to meet the problems of world war II. Many of those policies have been embodied in measures which received the consent of parliament at this session. They have dealt chiefly with vocational and educational training, and various other benefits under the post-discharge reestablishment order. Then, of course, there are the various benefits in connection with pensions and veterans allowances which will be dealt with next time we meet, when we shall also deal with war service grants and gratuities, and out-of-work benefits.

In connection with the temporary situation of unemployment—and I feel sure it is temporary—the department has certain advice to offer. There are 15,000 of these men who at the present time are taking training in our universities in Canada. Between 20,000 and 25,000 are taking vocational training. Then there are a few on out-of-work benefits.

Mr. GREEN: How many?

Mr. MACKENZIE: There are 5,000.

Mr. GREEN: Those benefits continue for only one year.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes, awaiting employment. Our advice would be that so far as possible the men should preserve and conserve their gratuities for the next three or four months, and accept these out-of-work benefits. Then they should avail themselves of the full value of the gratuities and rehabilitation benefits at a time when we believe that employment conditions will be greatly improved. That is the advice; whether it is sound or not, I am not in a position to say. However, I believe it is.

Mr. GREEN: I hope there will never be any unemployment problem among veterans in the future.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I hope so.

Mr. GREEN: It will be recalled that the provinces and municipalities took the stand that the unemployed veteran was the problem of the dominion government. My suggestion would be that sooner or later some consideration will have to be given to this matter by the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I agree.

Mr. GREEN: I take it that so far no decision has been reached, but that problem will have to be faced at some time.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is correct. That is one of the specific problems referred to in the proposals made to the dominion-provincial conference.

Mr. WRIGHT: I understand that this payment is just for veterans of the first war.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. WRIGHT: Has the minister any figures showing the number who are receiving payments?

Item agreed to.

410. Hospital and other allowances, $650,000.

Mr. BROOKS: This morning I asked the minister some questions respecting mental institutions for mental cases overseas. I believe he did not answer.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think that was the only point I missed when I replied. There are three or four different stages ranging from restlessness up to a definite mental condition. In the first class, as my hon. friend knows, are those who have lost a certain amount of confidence and have no desire for initiative in employment. We are building health and occupational centres where they are reconditioned and we are already having very good results. This is similar to the work carried on by the workmen's compensation board of Ontario. There is no discipline; everything is free and easy. I think my hon. friend was out with us to see the one here in Ottawa a few months ago.

The second class is that which was referred to by the hon. member for Parkdale, the neurosurgical and neurological. We have eight hospitals in Canada, and then we have adjoining wings in other hospitals where provision is made for operational cases of this nature. The third class is the neuropsychiatric cases. We have Scarborough Hall, fifteen miles from Toronto, which I have visited and where we are obtaining excellent results. It is foundationed on the pattern of Mill Hill in England, and Doctor Bailey in Toronto is having wonderful results.

The fourth class of cases are the definite mental cases. We have two hospitals of our own, St. Anne's near Montreal, and Westminster at London, but mainly we must rely upon the cooperation of the provincial authorities. They have been very cooperative in every regard.

Mr. BROOKS: Is it the intention of the department to remove these cases at some later day to institutions of our own? I would repeat what I pointed out this morning, that in New Brunswick a commission investigated the provincial hospitals and made a strong recommendation that all soldier cases be removed from that institution. I think they should be.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I agree.

Mr. BROOKS: I think the department should take some steps in this connection.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is the objective as soon as we can get the necessary accommodation.

Item agreed to.

412. Widows' compassionate allowances, $1,000,000.

Mr. WRIGHT: The minister was to give me the number of those receiving payment at the present time. I should also like to know the circumstances under which a person may receive these payments.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The number receiving unemployment assistance in October last was 102.

Mr. WRIGHT: What would be the circumstances that would qualify a man for this assistance?

Mr. MACKENZIE: A pensioner, out of work with no available income.

Item agreed to.

Soldier settlement and Veterans' Land Act—

419. Payment to the government of the United Kingdom on account of losses under the 3,000 British family agreement of August 20, 1924, and the New Brunswick 500 British family agreements of August 4, 1927, and August 27, 1935, $25,000.

Mr. BROOKS: How much money is still owing to the British government in connection with this matter?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I will find out in a moment. In the meantime I suggest that we resume the practice of last evening and call the supplementaries.

Item agreed to.

607. District administration—further amount required, $415,244.

Mr. GREEN: A recommendation was made by the special committee in connection with the shortage of space for the Department of Veterans Affairs, and I should like the minister to tell us what is being done in Vancouver. We have an anomalous situation there. The old hotel Vancouver, containing several hundred rooms, has been used as a barracks for some time and has housed many hundreds of soldiers. The building is now empty at a time when soldiers and their dependents are crying for housing. There are many other people trying to get office space, and we have the Department of Veterans Affairs shouting for a new building. Yet we have this large building right in the centre of the city completely empty. It is under lease to the government and, I understand, cannot be turned back to the Canadian Pacific before next March or April. Is there any possibility of bringing some of the government departments into that building or of using it to accommodate single veterans or married veterans with no children?

Mr. MACKENZIE: The last suggestion made by the hon. member has received definite consideration in the last two days. A conference has been going on between the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) and the mayor of Vancouver for the purpose of dealing with the Hotel Vancouver situation. There is a need for accommodation of ex-service men, especially those mentioned by my hon. friend, the single men or the married men without children, and I think that need is much greater than the need of our department. As my hon. friend knows, we have about twenty thousand feet in the old Hotel Vancouver, and I think arrangements are being made to transfer us to a building on Georgia street. We are examining it this week-end. As my hon. friend also knows, we are erecting a headquarters building near Robson street in the west end.

Mr. GREEN: The same situation must exist in other centres of Canada. Would it not be possible to have some of the other government departments give up space to the Department of Veterans Affairs? The war has been over for many months and yet the different defence departments have many buildings; surely some could be given up to the minister's department.

Mr. MACKENZIE: My hon. friend was never more friendly to me than he is at this moment. If he only knew of the misery we have gone through in trying to get space in Ottawa, Montreal, Vancouver, Toronto and Winnipeg! I can assure him that we have not rested one day, but we have not been conspicuously successful up to the present time. I wish the Minister of Public Works were here to hear what we are saying.

Mr. MacINNIS: I wish to associate myself with the hon. member for Vancouver South in his remarks about the need of living accommodation in Vancouver. I understand that strong representations have been made to the government in that regard, and I hope the minister will use his great influence to have the situation eased by using the hotel.

Mr. PROBE: I should like to lay a complaint before the minister at this time with respect to the payment of salaries to certain overseas personnel who were brought back to work in the district offices of the Department of Veterans Affairs. I happen to have exceedingly intimate knowledge of one veteran who was returned from overseas to work as an occupational counsellor. This application was solicited by a board which was overseas about a year and a half ago. This man stated on his application that he would expect to receive a salary of $3,600, which was the top salary in that category. On returning to this country he was rated No. 1 in the civil service examination and classified as the top of the list. Accordingly he was the first one returned. When he did return he received a salary of $3,000. Upon complaining to the civil service commission, which apparently had the onus of paying his salary, he was informed that that was the limit which could be paid to a man taking that post for the first time. After three or four months spent in writing back and forth, this particular man resigned. I consider that he should have redress and I would ask the minister to make a statement on that.

Mr. MACKENZIE: There is a civil service regulation that no more than the minimum can be paid if another candidate for the position is prepared to accept that minimum. My hon. friend's friend is apparently suffering from that regulation. Would he be good enough to send me the details of the case?

Mr. PROBE: I shall be pleased to.

Item agreed to.

Soldier Settlement and Veterans' Land Act—

616. Administration of soldier settlement, British family settlement, general land settlement, and Veterans' Land Act, including engineering and other investigational planning and subdivision expenses that do not add tangible value to real property—Further amount required, $1,578,430.

Mr. WRIGHT: I wish to say a few words with respect to the administration of the Veterans' Land Act. The administration, I believe, are endeavouring to do a good job in the selection of the land and in the selection of the men who are going on that land under the permanent farming scheme. But sometimes I think they are a little too careful. I should like to bring one series of cases to the attention of the minister.

The administration has a regulation which states that the man may not be settled under the act until such time as the board have met and discussed the matter with his wife. She must appear before the board and the board must be satisfied that she is a suitable person to go on the farm as the settler's wife. A lot of boys are coming back now whose wives are in England and will not be returning to Canada before next June or probably July. These boys want to obtain a piece of land now and to have a home ready for the wife when she returns. But the board say, no, we must see your wife first. The result is that a lot of these boys are very much dissatisfied. They consider it only right that when they have come from a farm and have always lived on a farm they should be allowed to obtain land, become settled and be able to receive their wives when they come to this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The practice is, if the prospective settler is a promising one likely to make good, to place him immediately on the land as a tenant only until his wife comes back from England. That is the practice now.

Mr. WRIGHT: As a tenant only. But he can occupy the land as a tenant?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes, and the chances are 100 per cent that if he is likely to make a good settler he will get title.

Mr. WRIGHT: There is one other class of cases I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. I have had letters from people who have bought small holdings in British Columbia but have been unable to get occupancy because those at present living on the property refuse to vacate. They feel they are suffering an injustice by reason of that. Is there no way of dealing with this class of case?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have not heard of it before but I shall take it up right away. I thank my hon. friend for bringing it to my attention.

Mr. FAIR: Has the minister seriously considered a suggestion that I have made here on four or five different occasions that a clause be inserted in the veteran's contract guaranteeing to-day's prices for the farm products he produces. That is a vital clause to insert in the contract, and if we do not do so I am afraid that in a few years time we shall have deflated prices for agricultural products which the veteran settler will have to accept, although he contracts to buy his land at prices obtaining to-day. If prices of farm products are not guaranteed to him I can see a number of veterans again becoming victims under the land settlement scheme.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That matter came up very strongly in the committee. My hon. friend took it up and the committee gave it consideration. It will be again considered when the Veterans' Land Act comes up next session.

Item agreed to.

425. To provide for protection of security—soldier settlement, $90,000.

Mr. BROOKS: The minister was going to answer two questions. The hon. member for Vancouver South had asked what was the number of ordinary pensioners under section 11, subsection 3, of the act.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Do I understand that his question was how many of the 5,000 pensions were for service in Canada; how many came under section 11, subsection 2, and how many under section 11, subsection 3?

Mr. BROOKS: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE: There were 1,124 under section 11, subsection 3, and the difference between that number and 5,000 would be under the other subsection.

Mr. BROOKS: I also asked in connection with item 419 dealing with the tripartite agreement between the government of the United Kingdom, the federal government and the New Brunswick government, how much was still due to the British government?

Mr. MACKENZIE: The amount owing to the British government under the 3,000 British family agreement cannot be determined until the families complete their settlement agreements. I am sorry that that is the best answer I can give.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Production Service—

438. Health of animals—To provide for payment of compensation to owners of animals affected with diseases coming under the operation of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, which have died or have been slaughtered under circumstances unprovided for under the above act and regulations thereunder, in the amounts detailed in the estimates, $348.

Mr. CHARLTON: I appreciate very much, Mr. Chairman, the opportunity of saying a few words on this item, having missed the item in the regular estimates. Although there has been considerable discussion regarding salaries of civil service employees, I believe the question to be so serious that I do not apologize for taking further time to discuss it here in committee to-day.

The figures I shall give are taken from the public accounts, 1944, and include only those whose salaries are $2,400 or more. Of these, I have figured out the percentage of the total employees in the various departments and branches listed below who are receiving $3,000 or better.

	No. of Employees	Percentage Receiving $3,000 or Better
Civilian army services, Department of National Defence	216	43·9
Administration, Department of Munitions and Supply	1,026	65·2
All branches of Department of Mines and Resources		61·4
All branches of Department of National Revenue		39·0
All branches of Department of Agriculture		30·9
Various branches, Department of Agriculture:
Botany and plant pathology		43·2
Entomology		37·9
Central experimental farm		59·5
Branch experimental farms		42·1
Live stock and poultry		40·0
Plant products		37·5
Dairy products		14·3
Health of animals	252	5·5

In view of these figures, Mr. Chairman, can you wonder why there have been approximately ninety resignations from the health of animals branch since January, 1943? The general public may not realize the serious consequences which may develop from this situation, but we of the profession do, and the minister was warned as far back as 1943 of the situation. What has been done regarding it? Several orders in council have been passed, of which I will give the numbers: P.C. 83161, of October 4, 1935; P.C. 6818 of April 6, 1939; P.C. 49417 of December 20, 1944; P.C. 215720 of August 24, 1945. All these orders in council were passed in an effort to increase in a small way the salaries of this branch of the civil service, but it had little effect. As late as September 28 of this year another order in council was passed, P.C. 86282, raising the salaries of this particular branch and making several reclassifications. At the present time there are five grades: junior veterinary inspector, grade 1, $1,800 to $2,400; grade 2, $2,400 to $2,700; grade 3, $2,700 to $3,000; senior veterinary inspector, grade 1, $3,000 to $3,300, senior veterinary inspector, grade 2, $3,300 to $3,600.

I have here file number 451690 O.G.F., competition No. 451690. Here is one little item which would seem in my opinion to be very misleading;

> While this examination will qualify for employment of veterinary inspector, grade 1, and assignments will be made in this class, persons so appointed, after a period of satisfactory service, may be considered for advancement to positions of veterinary inspector, grade 2, $2,400 to $2,700.

The point is, what period of satisfactory service does that mean? While all this was going on there were two orders in council passed on May 31, increasing the salary of the chairman of the civil service commission and that of the chairman of the pensions commission, $2,000 each. How can we expect maximum efficiency under such conditions? There is a great discrepancy apparently against the health of animals branch of the Department of Agriculture.

What are the rates in the corresponding department in the United States? I give them: Professional, class 1, starting, at $2,000 and, if satisfactory, rising to $2,600; class 2 from $2,600 to $3,200. Then the following classes:

Class 3	$3,200 to $3,800
Class 4	3,800 to 4,600
Class 5	4,600 to 5,600
Class 6	5,600 to 6,500
Class 7	6,500 up

To give hon. members some idea of the situation as it exists to-day at Canada Packers Toronto plant, in 1940 there were sixteen veterinarians. As of November 1 of this year there were six in charge of an even larger kill than in 1940. Not only can this situation affect the producers of live stock; but it may have its effect upon consumers as well if such inspection is not being carried on efficiently. Practically every available veterinary inspector has been taken from the field to take care of the excess in the packing plant. As a consequence, the work in the field has been more or less neglected. No further herds are being accepted for accreditation or listing. In so far as the restricted area plan is concerned, work is virtually at a stand-still. Thirty-eight counties or districts in Ontario have been tested, and of these there are only seventeen that can be declared accredited areas. In other words, there are twenty-one counties yet in the process of being tested, and very little work has been done in the last year. Nine counties which have applied for the test have not yet received it, and a similar situation exists throughout the rest of Canada.

If this condition is not corrected it will mean the loss of thousands of dollars to the farmers of the country, not only through the continued spread of the disease but by the probable dropping off of exports of our cattle to the United States. No compensation is paid under the restricted area plan and, if reactors are left in the areas, it will undoubtedly mean a set-back of the tuberculosis eradication plan because of further infection from the reactors left in the areas.

Bang's disease control in Canada is far behind that carried on in the United States. The plan in the state of Connecticut, as outlined by the hon. member for Lanark, at page 3097 of Hansard, is a very good one, with one exception as indicated by that hon. member, in that calves in the test and slaughtered herds, the equivalent to our listed herds in this country, were not bound to be vaccinated. That was in the original plan. This condition, however, has been changed within the last few weeks, and it is now required that every calf to be raised shall be vaccinated.

I should like to quote from the proceedings of the forty-eighth annual meeting of the United States Live Stock Sanitary Association:

It remains to outline, briefly, the bearing of the facts at hand on field vaccination in reducing immediate losses and on sanitary measures looking toward actual reduction of the incidence of brucellosis.

Brucellosis is the United States term for Bang's disease or contagious abortion.

Regarding the immediate reduction of losses, which with questionable accuracy is sometitmes designated "control," our results fully support the original claim that the vaccine provides valuable protection. Despite failures, which we should learn to expect even when fresh live vaccine is used, the vaccination prevents, delays or mitigates a high percentage of brucellosis.

At the bureau's animal disease station, Mingle and Manthei have conducted experiments in which they have proved that under conditions which should favour such a change, it has been impossible to increase the virulence of strain 19. They have also shown that when strain 19 is injected intravenously into pregnant cows in such large doses as to cause abortion the infection disappears before the next pregnancy, and that if normal pregnant cows have contact with them and are exposed to aborted fetuses, they fail to become infected.

In addition to these two experiments that were conducted under most exacting research procedures there are many other reports of work of a similar nature, and probably hundreds of instances in which calves have been vaccinated in negative herds without spreading infection to other animals. Indications are, therefore, that there is no danger of strain 19 reverting to an organism of increased virulence or that, in its present degree of stability, it can establish disease in vaccinated animals or spread disease to associating animals. So far as we know there is not a single case on record at present in which infection with strain 19 has occurred through contact with vaccinated animals.

That is the general opinion in this country, and that is probably why strain 19 has not been accepted here as it is in the United States.

Haring has mentioned several herds in which brucellosis has been controlled by whole-herd vaccination with the subsequent vaccination of calves. It appears, therefore, that whole-herd vaccination will have beneficial results in infected herds in suppressing infection and abortion.

In our control programme adult vaccination must obviously be restricted. We must not lose sight of the fact, however, that much more good than harm will result from whole-herd vaccination, that it is the most simple plan to adopt to inhibit the spread of infection and abortion, and, therefore, that it is better than a do-nothing policy.

Whole herd vaccination, with subsequent calf vaccination, in herds of the kind indicated, is a matter that justifies serious consideration by state officials. The bureau recognizes the fact that whole-herd vaccination is being performed in many states of the union without the sanction of the state authorities and in many instances in violation of state regulations. To permit the use of vaccine in animals other than calves, the restriction on labels of vaccine containers will be modified in the near future. It is believed that if adequate information can be made available on the advantages and disadvantages of adult vaccination to owners of infected herds it will result in closer cooperation between herd owners and regulatory officials, and will result in the suppression of infection and abortion in thousands of herds that would otherwise be untouchable so far as supervisory control is concerned.

It is our aim to eliminate brucellosis from our cattle population. To safeguard the progress we have made in the federal-state programme and to extend our services in this connection, we should make use of all methods available. Particularly should we concentrate on practices within the economy of time and man-power that will accomplish greatest results and of a kind that will adapt themselves to the post-war or normal continuation of this work.

Why is it then that there is a law in this country against the use of strain 19 for whole-herd vaccination? I have shown that in the United States they have proven satisfactory results can be achieved both in the case of calfhood vaccination and in whole-herd vaccination where the outbreak is of a serious nature.

It is my belief that this disease, commonly known as contagious abortion, has probably caused to cattle producers the greatest loss of any disease affecting cattle in this country. True, as the minister said the other day, a great many listed herds are annually tested free of charge by veterinary inspectors of the health of animals branch. It is, however, my sincere belief that these listed herds are by far the most vulnerable, having neither natural nor acquired immunity; and as long as the disease is present in the community or area, these listed herds are most susceptible to a severe outbreak of the disease, because it is practically impossible to protect them against infection by any or all of the accepted principles of sanitation.

It is true that strain 19 is not a cure for the disease, but used wisely it can be of great value as a protection against its occurrence. It is my belief that calfhood vaccination should be part of the listed herd plan. Otherwise we are only developing a herd which will tend to defeat the purpose, as evidenced by the number of outbreaks in listed herds across the country in the last couple of years.

Whole-herd vaccination should be legalized for accredited veterinarians, to be used only in the case of severe outbreaks of the disease. As was pointed out by my colleague, the hon. member for Lanark, this disease not only affects cattle, but causes a condition known as undulant fever in humans, making it doubly important that every possible method be adopted to inhibit or prevent its occurrence. But with the present staff in the health of animals branch it is practically impossible to carry on any further programme. Therefore, in order to do anything in this regard we must get the men first. Salary increases should be brought about in order to get men. We should then go on and complete the present tuberculosis eradication plan. Would the minister kindly consider recommending the vaccination of all calves to be raised in the listed herds? Whole-herd vaccination by accredited veterinarians in the case of severe outbreaks should be also recommended, and when an adequate staff is available we should follow in the accredited areas with a plan to vaccinate all calves to be raised, such as they have carried out in the state of Connecticut.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I was not clear whether the hon. member had in mind that in the department we were still following the practice that we followed up until about two years ago when we did not recommend the use of calfhood vaccination at all. As a matter of fact we recommended against it. I forget when our policy was changed, but during the last couple of years we have been encouraging the use of calf vaccination in this country.

In the discussion that I had with the hon. member for Lanark the other night I think I said that we were giving consideration to the application of somewhat the same principles to the treatment of Bang's disease as we have followed in the past in connection with tuberculosis. I hope to be able to discuss it at greater length next session when we bring down the estimates for next year, but at the moment our chief problem in connection with all these matters is the one which was raised by the hon. member for Brant at the beginning of what he had to say, namely, staffs to do the work. It is not altogether a matter of pay, although I admit that if we had higher pay or higher inducements to men to come into the veterinary profession a few years ago we would have more of them to-day. Up until about the time the war started our chief difficulty was that there was so little in live stock, because of the prices that were being paid at that time, that veterinarians were seldom called. As a result of their not being called they simply disappeared from the countryside. We have a great many of the veterinarians that could be found across the country working for the government at the present time. Many of them just had to leave the country districts. They were not able to make a living. That is probably the chief reason why there were not more men to take a veterinary course. Therefore our difficulty to-day is to find veterinary surgeons in many parts of Canada who have had considerable experience. For example, where I farm I have to go thirty-five miles to find a veterinarian. It takes a pretty good animal to pay a man to come thirty-five miles even in good times. In poor times most people just do the best they can in treating the animals and do not call in a veterinarian. That situation has changed to some extent, and it makes it a little more difficult for us. Men are called to-day and some are inclined to go out and establish their own practice in certain areas. On the other hand, we are trying to get back some of the men that we had before the war. Some of them are now coming back.

Some comparison was made between the numbers we had in certain places before the war and the numbers we have had within the last year. That is somewhat due to the fact that we have been at war. Many of them enlisted in some branch of the war services, and some of them are now coming back. So that we are gradually getting these men back into the service.

The other evening we discussed the question of the salaries of these men and the salaries of other technical men. At that time my hon. friend was not here, but I suggested that in the Department of Agriculture we had perhaps gone farther under the order in council which was passed last April, in having special cases checked and reclassified, than any other department. But we know we have not gone far enough, and we are all looking forward to a general reexamination of the staff now that the war is over, bringing together the allowances which were paid in lieu of cost of living during the war and the salaries listed in these votes, in order to improve the position of many officials of the department. I have no doubt that as time goes on, and without too much delay, many of the difficulties that have been complained about will be removed.

I would offer only one criticism with regard to the comparisons made in the early remarks of the hon. member, when he mentioned the Department of Munitions and Supply and the different war services. I think it is obvious that salaries in those branches would have to be better. To a certain extent they are temporary; people have to be induced to serve for short periods of time. The comparisons made by the civil service commission, and made by ourselves when we are checking, are rather with the established departments that continue right on through the years, whether we have war or not, and that will be with us all the time. I do not know whether we are on all fours with all other departments, but as I said in discussing the main estimates it is the job of the civil service commission to see that we are. I think we raise the question ourselves as often as any department in the service, and each time it is argued that our men are paid on the same basis as those of any other department. It is difficult to answer an argument of that kind put up by a commission which has been established by this house and which has authority to make these decisions. However, at all times we are working for a better standard of pay, although we have to take into consideration salaries paid in other departments and other services.

As between this country and the United States there are many reasons why at the present time it is difficult to keep our pay at the same rates as theirs. Their price standards and wage standards are out of line with ours all the way through, but whether they have a greater value than ours is another question. One would have to go much farther than just to compare salaries in order to arrive at a conclusion as to whether the lower rate of pay here carries with it the same purchasing power as the higher rate of pay in the United States. Just to quote the dollars does not give the whole answer, although I admit that salaries for this kind of service are and have been for some time much higher in the United States than in this country, and I agree that many of our good men leave Canada and go to the United States on that account.

Mr. CHARLTON: In the case of part-time veterinarians the pay now is $10 a day for a maximum of fifteen days a month. Does the minister find difficulty in obtaining veterinarians at this rate?

Mr. GARDINER: I could not say that we have had difficulty in getting them. On occasions men have said that they did not want to take on departmental work, because they had sufficient work of their own, but usually we have been able to get the part-time men who are available across the country at the rates we have been paying. I would not argue that they are paid enough.

Mr. CHARLTON: I asked that question because if there had been a heavy outbreak of cholera in western and southern Ontario counties last fall, I wondered whether men would have been available to look after it.

Item agreed to.

444. Special Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and water storage—further amount required, $350,000.

(An amount of $500,000 is available in the appropriation for reconstruction for the St. Mary and Milk rivers water development project.)

Mr. GARDINER: I should like to call attention to this item in connection with the discussion we had the other evening. This is a supplementary estimate to pay for the work already done this year, and hon. members will note the paragraph in regard to the St. Mary and Milk rivers water development project. That notification is inserted in order to call attention to the fact that this money has already been voted by the house in the amount appropriated for reconstruction, and an arrangement has been entered into between the reconstruction department and the prairie farm rehabilitation organization under which $500,000 is to be made available for that purpose.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the minister tell the committee whether or not this money is appropriated for the construction of the St. Mary river dam?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; that is exactly what it says, and it cannot be used for any other purpose. It is assigned to us from the other department for that purpose and cannot be used for any other work. I would take it that part of it might have to be revoted in the next estimates, because obviously it would be very difficult to spend the whole $500,000 between now and the end of March. However, we hope to put on the type of consulting engineer necessary in order to check construction of that kind, and to utilize part of this money to proceed with the calling for tenders and other preparations for the work.

Mr. BLACKMORE: May I express to the minister the appreciation of the citizens of the federal ridings of Lethbridge and Medicine Hat for his forward step in bringing this great project into existence.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I should like to ask the minister the total amount expended by his department or by the federal government in conjunction with the provincial governments and the property holders in looking after emergent repairs to dykes in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. If the minister has not the figures with him now, perhaps he could give them to me later.

Mr. GARDINER: I am sorry, but I do not have the figures before me. However, the total amount, as it runs in my mind, was $250,000. I have not the figures by provinces.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Perhaps the minister could give the figures to the committee or to me personally later, showing the different projects and the expenditures on each in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and giving the amounts spent by the proprietors and the provincial governments.

Mr. GARDINER: I think I can give that this evening.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

190. Departmental administration, $287,000.

Mr. FLEMING: In what I have to say with regard to these estimates I hope I may be both brief and constructive. In the first place, as a new member of the house I have been surprised at the meagre amount of time that has been devoted to the highly important subjects of health and welfare, although we have been sitting here for over three months. I believe there are reasons for that. Perhaps the house has foregone a discussion of these questions because the dominion-provincial conference has been in session. Those of us who sit in this part of the house have refrained from doing anything to muddy the waters of delicate negotiations between the dominion and the provinces. I believe the government will realize that we have deliberately refrained from doing anything to embarrass in any way the progress of negotiations, because there is no field in the whole realm of government in Canada in which it more vitally important that there be the closest possible cooperation between dominion and provincial governments than in the kindred fields of health and public welfare. One can only hope that whatever recommendations may come out of the dominion-provincial conference, or whatever its decisions may be, it will be possible to bring about closer cooperation in order that health and welfare measures may be forwarded to the general advantage of Canada. The health of all the citizens of Canada is and must be the concern of all the citizens of Canada, and similarly in regard to measures of necessary social security.

One matter of regret I have is that, in the framework of committee organization existing at the present time, there is not any provision for a standing committee on health, welfare and social security. For some years there has been an informal committee which meets at the call of the minister or the chairman. The committee consists of representatives from this house and the other place, but it has no official status and I believe, has met on only three occasions during the present session.

If I am not mistaken, the minister himself might welcome action on the part of the house toward setting up a permanent standing committee in the fields of health, welfare and social security. I can conceive that it would be of infinite advantage to the minister if there were such a standing committee. That would be the committee to which questions could be referred for close and detailed study which, unfortunately, the house when assembled either as a house or as a committee of the whole just cannot give.

The country is moving forward in these matters, and if there ever was a time when it was desirable that the committee structure of the House of Commons should be revised and brought up to date, surely that time has come. There is much in the committee organization that is archaic. Here is one situation where the need of a newly constituted standing committee has been abundantly proven.

For these reasons I hope the minister will forward, during the time between this session and the next, proposals for a revision of the rules of the house to provide for the appointment of a standing committee on health, welfare and social security. I would urge, further, that in the interval between this session and the next, the government should also give consideration to the inclusion within the scope of the Department of National Health and Welfare a subject which in my humble submission really belongs to that department. In Great Britain the subject of housing, and the responsibility for the administration of government housing policies, is vested in the ministry of health. At the present time in Canada under the present organization, much of the housing policy is administered by the Minister of Finance. To some extent there has been intrusion in this field by the minister of Reconstruction and Supply. The Minister of Finance is greatly overworked, and his department is a heavy one. The Minister of National Health and Welfare has recently shown his readiness to take on additional responsibilities while the house has been in session. There has been assigned to him general supervision over the national film board, and also over Canadian information service, the successor to the wartime information board. It may be that if given an opportunity the minister might be prepared to assume responsibility for supervision of the housing policy in this country, and I think such administration might logically be placed in the department which he heads.

I wish just to offer this concluding suggestion, that in the administration of his department, the minister should at all times endeavour to the utmost to use the existing social services provided by the provinces in the administration of whatever social measures are embarked upon by the federal government. There is no field in which it is more important that there be some attempt at unified administration; and with qualified bodies already in existence and trained to deal with social problems, I suggest that they should be used in the administration of whatever social measures are inaugurated by the federal authority.

The last thing we would want to encourage in Canada would be a multiplication of social and welfare services doing parallel work. It is very much better in these matters relating to health and welfare if we come down as close as possible to the people who are in need of the services; and the governments in closest contact with those needs are the municipal and provincial governments. I hope that the policy followed by this department will be one of trying to use existing srevices provided by provincial govenments, or under provincial legislation, and that there will not be any considerable amount of unnecessary duplication of services, a condition which can result only in wastefulness and chaos.

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Health and Welfare): May I say just a word in acknowledgment of the helpful suggestions made by the hon. member for Eglinton, and also by other hon. members who took part in the discussion of these estimates on December 3. We appreciate their encouraging and helpful suggestions, and I can assure all of them that their suggestions will receive the most serious consideration.

To-day the hon. member for Eglinton has referred to the importance of dominion-provincial cooperation. I can assure him that we have that very much in mind. As I said earlier, we were happy to be able to report that we have the closest of good relations with all provincial departments of health, their ministers and officers. I believe the committee would be interested to learn that, following the meeting of premiers who constituted the coordinating committee of the dominion-provincial conference, an economic committee on dominion-provincial relations was set up, and that I had the honour of presiding over it. We held meetings from December 4, and adjourned yesterday until January 8.

During the course of those meetings the health and welfare officers of the provinces came here, and we had some very useful discussions. I have been authorized by the conference to state that the discussions which dealt with the clarification and development of the dominion proposals, and matters arising from them, were carried on in a most cooperative spirit, and that substantial progress was made.

Mr. BLAIR: I should like to say a word about the shortage of nurses in Canada, although the training of nurses is a subject which comes more properly in the provincial field. However, if we are to go into the subject of health services we shall require many trained nurses. Many civilian hospitals do not train nurses, with the result that there is a marked scarcity. At the present time the government is disbanding young girls from the three services, but there has not been offered to them any special training along the line of nursing, into which vocation they could be readily absorbed.

I suggest that grants could be made to civilian hospitals and provincial hospitals by the government, to remedy this shortage. At the present time people are going to hospitals because they cannot obtain nursing services at home, or nurses who will take private duty. I know it is almost impossible at times to obtain nurses for people who are ill, and this shortage prevails both outside the hospitals and on hospital staffs. Has the minister any intention of making grants to public hospitals to facilitate the training of nurses in view of the fact that we are considering a programme of health services?

Mr. CLAXTON: That question was raised when the estimates were up before, on December 3. At that time I gave an account of the relations between the department and the Canadian nurses' association, and mentioned the grants made by the government to that association to stimulate the recruitment and training of nurses during the war, at a time when a shortage had been created because of war conditions and the heavy demand by the armed forces and the Department of Veterans Affairs. I said at that time that it was not the present intention of the federal government to continue this assistance into peace time. We do not consider we would be justified in continuing this assistance any more than we would be justified in granting assistance for the training of doctors, dentists or any other professional group for which there was a need in Canada but which ordinarily come completely within the jurisdiction of the provinces. I may add that we have not had any suggestion from any province that such a grant be given and that there have been discussions at which such a request would have been made had it been in the minds of the provinces to make it. At the present time I can only tell my hon. friend that it is not the intention of the government to make such grants, either for nurses or doctors, because that is regarded as a provincial responsibility.

National health branch—
191. Health branch administration, $58,732.

Mr. FLEMING: Has the government any plans for the extension of hospitalization facilities or services in the dominion?

Mr. CLAXTON: The proposals of the Dominion of Canada made to the provinces, which will be found at page 36 of the green book, provide for loans of money at cost or slightly over cost to the provinces or through the provinces to municipalities and other authorities for the provision of hospitals. That is the only proposal made so far. In addition, we have our own responsibilities with regard to the hospitalization of members of the armed forces, veterans, Indians, sick mariners, quarantine and the like, which come within federal jurisdiction. This proposal has been made and is now under consideration by the provinces.

Mr. FLEMING: Following up the minister's reply, I take it that there is no thought on the part of the federal government of launching into a programme of free hospitalization in the country.

Mr. CLAXTON: The proposals put before the conference include a nation-wide system of health insurance which would provide complete free hospitalization for every Canadian man, woman and child in every part of Canada. The details of this will be found on page 31 of the green book; the proposals are spelled out there. They provide for a basic grant by the federal government of one-fifth of the estimated cost of the services that are shown in the table and an additional one-half of the actual cost as shown in the table, within the limits set out in the table. Those costs are to be revised every three years. The federal contribution would be roughly, 60 per cent of the cost of providing these services. The services may be inaugurated by the provinces in stages, either with regard to the different services or with regard to different areas. They are very flexible and are designed to meet the criticism of the health bill that was made before the social security committee of the House of Commons which met in 1943 and 1944. These proposals are now under active consideration by the provinces; if they were accepted, after a term of years we would have a system of free hospitalization for every Canadian in every part of Canada.

Mr. BLAIR: It would be impossible to provide the benefits under any such scheme as the minister describes because of the shortage of hospital beds in Canada. There is a shortage in the case of general hospitals and in the case of hospitals for the chronically ill. There is a shortage of beds everywhere and there are whole areas without accommodation. There are whole provinces without convalescent hospitals; in fact I believe there are only two in Canada. There is a definite shortage of tuburculosis sanataria and a shortage of mental hospitals. I believe that in Ontario there is something like 5,000 waiting cases. One might say the present number of beds in use is 101,000 and the total present need is 143,000; the total estimated need in Canada in ten years is 161,000. Apart from these types of hospitals, there are only fifteen isolation hospitals in Canada. Is it the purpose of the minister to increase the grants for the building of hospitals in order to meet this shortage?

Mr. CLAXTON: The proposals made by the dominion government are designed to put the provinces in a position where they can discharge their responsibilities. No doubt the provinces in considering these proposals will have in mind the need of additional capital equipment, including hospitals, and they will make up their minds whether the proposals are adequate or not. What my hon. friend says about the shortage of hospital beds is quite true. We know his interest in this subject, both because of his profession and his interest in public health, and the facts are just as he states them. This matter is dealt with at length in the reference book on health, welfare and labour which was placed before the conference. At page 31 and following will be found elaborate tables dealing with hospital accommodation and needs in Canada.

The health insurance plan could not be introduced at once even if the provinces agreed and we passed the necessary legislation to bring it into effect on January 1, 1946. This would not be possible for a number of reasons. First, we would not have the necessary hospital accommodation, neither would we have the doctors and neither would the doctors be in the right places. Another reason is that we would not have the administrative experience and skills necessary to introduce the plan all at once on a nation-wide basis. From discussions with experts in this field one reaches the conclusion that if we go forward along the lines of this programme the best we could possibly hope to achieve is to have it in operation in four or five years. I know that most provinces are planning to do a good deal of hospital construction during that period just as soon as materials and labour become available.

In this connection I should say that we aim to have in the department a consultant architect on hospitals. The position has been advertised, and it brings with it a good salary so that we hope to attract a very high type of architect and equip him with a knowledge of hospital construction and planning throughout the world. He would be available to consult with the provinces, the municipalities and the local agencies. He would not draw the plans, because their own architects would do that, but he could offer skilled consultant services and submit typical plans, specifications and the like. We hope to supply that service, and it is being done to meet a resolution passed by the dominion council of health.

Mr. FLEMING: The other question arising out of the minister's answer had to do with the medical care being provided by the minister's department for returned veterans and their families. I am particularly interested in the care given by the doctor of the veteran or the family, and I should like to know what is the relationship of the services that are being administered by the department in that respect.

Mr. CLAXTON: As I understand the hon. member's question, he is referring to medical care given to veterans under the order in council that was passed.

Mr. FLEMING: The minister referred to the obligation of his department in the matter of providing medical services to veterans and their families. I am concerned with the relationship of that service to the normal relationship that these people would have with their own doctors.

Mr. CLAXTON: I was referring to the jurisdiction of the federal government. The hospitalization provided by the Department of National Health and Welfare has nothing to do with hospitalization or treatment given to veterans and their families. That is a matter for the Department of Veterans Affairs except that the Department of National Health and Welfare has to do with the furnishing of emergency services, inspection and the like, of veterans' families in transit back to Canada. That is done through the ordinary immigration medical service and quarantine service.

Mr. BLAIR: May I ask how it is proposed to achieve a common standard of treatment throughout the various provinces? Some provinces are much ahead of others in matters of public health. Saskatchewan has been doing a great deal in T.B. for years. Will there be some liaison between the provinces and will the federal Department of Health exercise some supervision to achieve a common standard for the whole country?

Mr. CLAXTON: That will remain to be worked out with the provinces if an agreement is arrived at. The draft bill which was attached to the report of the committee of the house on social security in 1944 provided for an advisory council at the federal level and for committees in each province which would work out just the kind of thing my hon. friend has in mind. We have had a good deal of discussion over this, and I consider that it would be relatively easy to work out, in cooperation, common standards and objectives. It is recognized, however, that we could not all go at the same pace. The needs of some of the provinces are quite different from those of other provinces and it would be necessary to institute certain services in some of the provinces to fill urgent needs, where other provinces already have such services and they would do something else. But the objective would be to achieve a nation-wide high standard of medical services for everyone within the shortest possible time.

Mr. BLAIR: What is being done in the matter of research, and what is set aside for research in maternal mortality, infant mortality, and such diseases as arthritis, infantile paralysis, cancer and tuberculosis, which are extremely important?

Mr. CLAXTON: The national research council is charged with responsibility for research in Canada, and medical research has been largely carried on under its auspices. It has a medical committee and a number of subcommittees which operate in different fields. A considerable amount of research has been done, largely by universities, hospitals, institutes and the like, with assistance from the national research council. The federal department of pensions and national health, as it was until last year, now the Department of National Health and Welfare, has not engaged in any extensive medical research. It is carrying on some research in various fields, such as nutrition, development of standards, public health, epidemiology and so forth, but not in medicine.

With regard to cancer research in Canada there is, as hon. members know, the King George V Silver Jubilee cancer fund which was raised in 1935 and amounts to approximately $500,000. In the years from 1937 to 1940, $14,000 was paid out of that fund each year to the cancer committee of the Canadian Medical Association. In 1940 it was agreed with the association that half of the grant would be paid by the association to the Canadian society for control of cancer. In 1942 the grant to the association was reduced to $7,000 which was turned over directly to the Canadian society for control of cancer, this reduction being made at the request of the association, which found it difficult to continue its educational work among the medical profession during war time. In May, 1945, at the request of the association the full amount of the grant was reinstated for this year, to be paid to the Canadian society for control of cancer, covering expanded activities of the society. We have just recently asked the cancer committee of the Canadian Medical Association to discuss with us plans whereby the whole fund, capital and interest, will be used for cancer research, and we hope to have very shortly something started in that direction.

Cancer research is being carried on in England and the United States on a very large scale, and if we are to do anything effective in cancer research in Canada we would have to do it on a pretty large scale. We do not want to duplicate the work that is already being done in other countries, and it will be necessary to coordinate our work with theirs and make the most effective use we can of the money. The payments made to the cancer committee of the Canadian Medical Association were used by it largely for education and information, bringing it home to people that they should take early steps to secure a diagnosis of cancer and treatment at the earliest possible day.

With regard to arthritis, I do not know of any work being done under the auspices of the national research council. With regard to maternal and child mortality, I would have to make inquiries to find out what research work was being done in those fields, if any.

As my hon. friend knows, research in Canada has been carried on very largely in institutes like the Banting institute, the Connaught laboratories, McGill university and other universities and hospitals. It has not been regarded up to now as a function of the federal government and not very much as a function of the provincial governments. We are reviewing that whole position; we are endeavouring to cooperate closely with the national research council and we hope to work out a policy which will coordinate all these activities and see that anything that should be done is done.

Mr. MacNICOL: When the house reassembles at eight o'clock I shall be asking a short question about the splendid work being carried on in Toronto under the auspices of Doctor Hincks. Perhaps the minister would refresh his memory and give the house some information on that after eight o'clock?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I should like to ask a question with regard to cancer clinics and what arrangements are made with the provinces. Is there some standing arrangement whereby the federal government will contribute on a fifty-fifty basis in raising the standard of health in a province which is prepared to take advantage of assistance of that kind? Saskatchewan is leading the field in this work at the present time, and I think other provinces should know, through this department, of the steps that can be taken to raise the general standard of health within their boundaries.

Mr. CLAXTON: If health insurance comes into effect, then cancer will be one of the conditions dealt with by hospitals administered under the provinces, and so would arthritis. They would be treated like any other condition, and there would be no need for special provision or assistance.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to mention the mental hygiene programme presided over by Doctor Hincks, of Toronto. In that city, and particularly in the section from which I come, large numbers of men joined the armed forces and went overseas. Many of them have become affected as a result of the war. I do not know that it is serious, but I had heard that the minister is initiating some new programme similar to that in which Doctor Hincks has pioneered. Would the minister give the committee some information about the programme?

Mr. CLAXTON: The veterans, of course, come under the Department of Veterans Affairs. Since 1918 there has been in Canada a national committee for mental hygiene and it has done useful work in this field. In 1944 and 1945 it conducted a number of surveys and generally assisted the provinces and the federal government in promotional work and in surveys. The federal government makes a grant of $10,000 to that organization, and it is covered in these estimates. It is an excellent committee of public-spirited people who are interested in this field. We hope that the work will be progressively developed. As regards veterans affairs, that is dealt with by the department and they have been taking an active part in this field.

195. Quarantine and leprosy, $187,647.

Mr. BLAIR: Would the minister give an account of the work carried on in the leper hospitals in Canada?

Mr. CLAXTON: I am glad to say that the situation regarding leprosy in Canada is one of continuous improvement. As the hon. member for Lanark knows, there is not a great number of lepers in Canada. At the present time there are two leper hospitals for the treatment of leprosy, one at Bentinck island, British Columbia, where, I am glad to say, there are only two patients; one is Chinese and the other, Japanese. Both cases are bacteriologically negative. We have another hospital at Tracadie, New Brunswick, where there are seven patients, of whom three are of French-Acadian origin, one of French and Scottish descent, two of Russian ancestry, and one, Chinese. There is no part of Canada where leprosy occurs among Canadians except in that particular neighbourhood of New Brunswick, and I am glad to say that it seems to be almost completely arrested. The operations of those two very small hospitals do not cost very much. Treatment is given, and we hope that before very long it will only be necessary to keep these hospitals to take care of any case of leprosy that should turn up on ships coming to the country.

198. Child and maternal hygiene, $45,381.

Mr. MacINNIS: This is an important subject. I note that the estimate has been reduced by $14,000 since last year. It was not a large one last year, considering the importance of the work. Will the minister explain the reduction?

Mr. CLAXTON: This amount is given to the division of maternal and infant hygiene to make available the distribution of literature and information on this subject. I am not sure of the actual reason for the decline. It does not mean that there will be any interruption or reduction in the amount of the work in this field. I should like to point out that there is a supplementary estimate of $47,584 under this head. That is the explanation I was seeking when the Minister of Justice pointed it out to me. That has enabled us to extend the work. I think most hon. members are familiar with the work of Doctor Couture. His book on "The Canadian Mother and Child" has probably had a greater circulation than any other book in Canada with the exception of the bible, and it must have contributed considerably to the substantial reduction in the maternal and infant mortality rates which have occurred since 1926. Since 1926 the reduction is almost fifty per cent, which shows that substantial progress is being made.

Mrs. STRUM: I have been impressed with the very good pre-natal care that the doctors are now giving, and also the post-natal advice which the young mothers get. In addition to the baby book, is any other work being done? The quality of the services has increased so much I suspect that the department is co-operating with the doctors in supplying the information.

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes, that is quite true. The results that have been achieved in the reduction of maternal and infant mortality have been due very largely to the information supplied, to the development of clinics and to the much greater percentage of mothers who receive pre-natal attention of one kind or another. The interesting thing, and in some way perhaps a most unfortunate thing, is that the improvement is reflected to a far greater extent in the cities than in the country districts. Our hope would be that with the institution of anything like a nation-wide system of health insurance, the benefits which now can be obtained in the cities by the mother for herself and her child, would be extended to the whole population. During the war a greater percentage of births took place in cities than previously, and that has largely contributed to the marked improvement in these figures. But while I say there is a marked improvement, Canada still is not registering nearly as high a record in these fields as she should, having regard to her high standard of living, and we hope to work with the provinces and other agencies to bring about a steady improvement.

National health branch—
200. Treatment of sick mariners, $329,488.

Mr. MacINNIS: For a moment I should like to discuss a matter connected with this item. I do not think the minister can do anything about it just now, but I hope he will give it some consideration between now and the opening of the next session. The fund for sick mariners and marine hospitals is provided for in section 305 of part V of the Canada Shipping Act, and is raised in two ways. In the first place, there is a levy on ships entering Canadian ports, and to the extent that this does not pay for the service given, the remainder comes out of the consolidated revenue fund. I have not the figures with me; perhaps the minister has, but I am not going to ask him to look into that matter. This year it was drawn to my attention that ships plying between ports in the same province did not pay into this fund and that consequently employees on such ships were not entitled to these benefits. For instance, a ship on the Pacific coast plying between Prince Rupert and Vancouver does not pay into the fund. Neither does a ship plying between Victoria and Vancouver, but a ship going from Vancouver to Seattle does pay into it, and so does a ship crossing the strait from Prince Edward Island to New Brunswick.

I had prepared a bill to rectify this omission from the shipping act and to bring all ships under the same provision, so that all would pay dues and all crews would be eligible for the benefits of the fund. I found that such a bill would not be in order, since it would impose a tax and could be introduced only by a member of the cabinet. I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare if between now and the next session of parliament he would look into this matter with a view to amending this section in order to meet the condition I have mentioned. I had quite a discussion on the matter with the Minister of Transport, who, I thought at first, would have control over it, but later on we found that he did not. I should like the minister's assurance that he will look into this, because I think such an amendment is desirable and would be quite equitable. I do not think I need say more, because I know there is nothing he can do now.

Mr. CLAXTON: I think I am right in saying that the only vessels which are exempt from the requirement that they should pay into this fund are those engaged in the coasting trade within one province.

Mr. MacINNIS: And between Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. CLAXTON: So that it is a matter of provincial jurisdiction. The other vessels, even though they may be engaged in the coasting trade, contribute on the basis of two cents per flat rate ton, I think, the same as ocean-going vessels. Whether or not additional vessels trading wholly within a certain province should be included would be a matter for discussion with the provinces.

This service is really extraordinary in extent. It provides emergency treatment and hospitalization for a period of up to a year. During the period under review the service actually treated 18,316 sick mariners. During the time Halifax was probably the greatest port in the world we had a boat of our own which would go through the convoys. If any ship in a convoy wanted the doctor to call, it would hoist the appropriate signal and our doctor would go aboard and give whatever treatment was required. In addition to that, sometimes we dealt with as many as three and four thousand cases each month in Halifax alone. The service was widely used and greatly appreciated. I shall be glad to discuss with the Minister of Transport the representation of the hon. member.

Mr. HAZEN: The largest expenditure under this item is $250,000 for professional and special services, and the estimate last year was for the same amount. Will the minister tell us whether the total amount was expended last year, and would he give us a break-down of the figures for this year?

Mr. CLAXTON: That is under the treatment of sick mariners?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes, in the details on page 135 of the main estimates.

Mr. CLAXTON: The expenditure during the period 1944-45 on professional and special services was $232,822.01; the unexpended balance was $17,177.99.

Mr. HAZEN: Could we get a break-down of the figures for this year?

Mr. CLAXTON: How would you want a break-down?

Mr. HAZEN: Well, you must have a break-down of some kind; you are spending approximately $250,000. To whom is it being paid, and where do these people live?

Mr. CLAXTON: I have lists here which I could give my hon. friend. It would take a long time to read them, because they are in great detail, showing payments to hospitals and to doctors in different localities in Canada. We pay hospitals at different rates for the hospitalization of sick mariners. Of course we have our own doctors at the major ports, who are in receipt of salaries, and in addition we pay other doctors on a fee basis. The lists run to five or six pages, and if my hon. friend would let me know in what way he would like a break-down I should be glad to send it to him.

Mr. HAZEN: I should like to see the five or six pages.

Mr. CLAXTON: I should be very glad to show them to my hon. friend.

Mr. HAZEN: I do not think it would be fair to ask the minister to read them just now.

Mr. CLAXTON: I shall be very glad to show them to the hon. member.

202. Medical investigation division, $22,385.

Mr. BENTLEY: I believe that a number of hon. members are keenly interested in the medical investigations being made by some people in connection with arthritis. We would be glad to have an assurance from the minister that this matter will receive serious attention. The amount appropriated for this investigation would not seem to be adequate for the purposes of investigating possible cures for the relief of suffering of people having this terrible affliction. From what we have heard I believe that the minister has most humane qualities and that he would not overlook this matter. I would plead with him to give it his attention.

Mr. CLAXTON: Perhaps I should make it clear that, in our concept, research into medical conditions in Canada can best be conducted by hospitals and by institutes actively operating in those fields. It has never been part of the federal function to do that research. However, the medical committee of the national research council has assisted in research projects along various lines. So far, we have not undertaken any of these matters ourselves, but it has been the policy of the government to coordinate all research under the national research council. As I said before the dinner recess, we are actively discussing with the national research council the possibilities of greater coordination and development. The hon. member's representations will certainly be considered.

National health branch—
201. Industrial hygiene, $8,665.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the relationship between this vote and the provincial departments of industrial hygiene? We have really only one official, who operates in this matter. What does he do? What does the medical officer do under the industrial hygiene vote?

Mr. CLAXTON: To a great extent the industrial hygiene division of the department has to do with the improvement of standards of health in war industries, in consequence of actual contractual obligations they incurred with the federal government to do such work. Our officers work very closely with provincial government officers in trying to improve industrial hygiene standards in war plants, and also in some other plants that are federal in character.

Gradually we have transferred to some of the provinces both the laboratories and the staff. I have in mind particularly British Columbia where that has been accomplished. However, we have worked closely not only with the provinces but with the medical officers of the major corporations engaged in the field of industry. I believe that the results achieved were good. We hope that in consequence of this work, the work will be continued under provincial auspices. It is our desire to keep a small division operating, to cooperate with the provinces, but not nearly to the same extent as was done during the war.

Mr. MacNICOL: Will the department have anything to do with medical industrial work in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon?

Mr. CLAXTON: If there is any industrial problem we certainly would be very glad to deal with it. However, so far as I know we have had no occasion to do so.

Mr. MacNICOL: That would be under federal authority, would it not?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes, we have a division which would be equipped to deal with a condition of that kind, if such arose.

Mr. REID: At this late stage of proceedings many of the most important items have to be glossed over on account of lack of time; and when one rises to speak he feels almost that he is guilty of wrongdoing. However, I rise at this time to suggest that the department might be well advised to take note of the medical investigations which have been carried out for some years by the United States in the Aleutian islands. It will take only a minute to tell the committee about this most important work. In 1911 a treaty was signed between the United States and various countries, including Canada, to protect the seals on the Pribyloff island. Following that year the United States took charge of the island and established there a colony or village. The colony consisted of Aleuts, as they are known, who are a group of people of Russian extraction.

Since those years following the establishment of the colony the United States has sent medical men, dentists and nurses each year. It was my privilege only a few months ago to hear Doctor Sexton in a private interview relate what had been discovered. I believe that the discoveries are well worthy of investigation by the medical men in the Department of National Health and Welfare. It was found that as soon as the natives of the Aleutian islands ate the same kind of food as we were eating they lost their teeth, with the result that there is not an Aleut on the island today of twenty years of age or under who has his teeth. Their forefathers who ate fish and blubber, who never had milk or any kind of vegetables, had fairly white teeth, until they changed their diet.

The United States sent medical investigators, including some dentists. For a number of years they have been investigating conditions among the natives, with a view to learning the cause of their losing their teeth. It has been discovered that there is a certain element in food which is closely related to sunlight, and which in fact is one of the vitamins. Vitamins are now being put into the food, and experiments are being conducted to see if they cannot at least preserve the children's teeth.

These experiments are of such a nature and of such importance that I suggest our medical officers would be well advised to find out what the Americans have discovered through the years. Here is a group of people who were not in touch with so-called civilization and who, since they have been supplied with food by that civilization, have lost their teeth. It is most important that we find out the causes.

[Mr. Claxton.]

I have been told that those who are conducting the investigations are going to be up against the dentists, because they think they have discovered why the natives have lost their teeth. It is pointed out that the dentists do not want to have the inquiries conducted any further.

Mr. MacNICOL: It would interfere with private enterprise.

Mr. MITCHELL: I lost my teeth—and not through private enterprise.

Mr. REID: In some countries the state, not private enterprise, looks after teeth. I believe that the department would be interested in this matter of the restoration or preservation of teeth.

It will be noted that Doctor Stefansson, one of our own medical men, has been conducting experiments along the same lines, and he has discovered that the Eskimos, who never tasted food as we understand it, and who have never had milk or vegetables, had good teeth.

I believe that this matter is serious enough to warrant our cooperating with the Americans who are making these investigations, learning the facts from them and, whether we tread on the toes of any of the professions, making that information public and available, so that, if possible, we may preserve the teeth of our children.

Mr. McKAY: What study has been made in connection with cancer? I believe this has been referred to by other hon. members. I am not quite sure what the nutrition service embraces, but perhaps the minister would give us some information about this disease.

Mr. CLAXTON: This nutrition service has provided the people of Canada since 1941 with information about sound nutritional practices. This is a small vote, as hon. members will see, but a great deal of work has been done, largely through the officers of the department working with local committees, local health officers and provincial officers. From time to time campaigns of education have been organized, and general promotional activities have been carried on to create interest in nutrition. I think it is within the knowledge of everyone that during the war, despite the shortages which existed, the nutritional habits of the Canadian people improved almost out of recognition, just as they did in England and in some other countries. We have distributed hundreds of thousands of posters and pamphlets and carried on all kinds of educational activities, all of which have borne fruit. This is primarily a promotional and educational activity, but in addition some research work is being done in conjunction with other government departments and other agencies and we hope that there will be some constructive results.

I should like to make just one observation on the comments of the hon. member for New Westminster with regard to diet. Mr. Stefansson, to whom he referred, used to be a Canadian. He had considerable experience in the far north, and in an article in the current number of the Atlantic Monthly he refers to the absence of caries in the mouths of people who live on a meat diet. However, he points out that it takes about seven pounds of meat a day to feed those people.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The thing that has attracted my attention is the small amount of this vote. It appears to me that the Department of National Health and Welfare should recognize some responsibility in establishing high national standards of industrial hygiene. I am thinking of the mining industry where silicosis is fairly common. I understand that the governments in the different provinces have passed certain regulations with regard to this, but in some cases they are not lived up to. I thought one of the functions of this department might be to carry on inspection work to see that high standards of national industrial hygiene are lived up to.

Mr. CLAXTON: We have no jurisdiction.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Could not one of the functions of the department be that of pointing out to provincial governments whether or not their standards are being lived up to?

Mr. CLAXTON: I do not know whether the hon. member has gone into this extensively, but I would think the provinces would consider that they were up to the job of dealing with their own functions in this field. The dominion council of health has on it representatives from the different provinces, and perhaps that body could bring the matter to their attention and secure their support for some concerted action. I think that would be the right way to proceed, but as a federal government we certainly could not set standards for the provinces to follow in the field in which they have exclusive jurisdiction. All we can do is to help with and supplement the work they are doing and meet the needs as they express them to us. As a department we have not done anything with regard to silicosis, but the national research council has carried on certain work. Major Blaisdell, in conjunction with the province of Ontario and Lake Shore mine and certain other industries, has carried on a good deal of work in this field, but that is a matter which is regarded as falling within the field of the workmen's compensation board of each province.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The health records of the different provinces show that there is a need for greater enforcement of health measures in factories and industry. To-day we are dealing more and more with chemical production; we are carrying on more spray painting, and our factory production generally has increased a great deal. There may be no place constitutionally for us to go to a province and tell them that they are not living up to certain standards, but I think a branch such as this could point out that the standards are very low in some provinces and assist those provinces to raise them. The department could act more in an advisory capacity than try to enforce something. I understand that there are limitations, but it would be a nice thing to be able to say that in Canada there are certain high standards which we are trying to maintain.

Mr. CLAXTON: I can only repeat that if we tried to step into provincial fields and told the provinces what they should do in matters of health, then the kind of cooperative activities that we want to carry on with them would be seriously jeopardized. We can get the provinces to sit down and discuss things in which we have a common interest, but I for one would not subscribe to any policy by which this government would dictate to the provinces what the standards should be. They have been dealing with industrial standards and the like for a great number of years; they have very good health departments, and while they may have varying standards, they also have varying needs. More and more they are working together and consulting with each other. We are very happy to work with them to do what we can to supplement their own work, but it is certainly no part of the role of this department to trespass on the proper functions of the provincial governments.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I am only advocating cooperation, not coercion. I think the standards are pretty low.

Mr. ADAMSON: The question of silicosis comes up periodically. Silicosis is an industrial disease which can be elminated completely. Doctor Robson and the late Mr. James Denny of the McIntyre-Porcupine mine have developed an aluminum therapy treatment which has proven to be a major step in the right direction. I understand that a foundation has been set up largely supported by the McIntyre-Porcupine mine and other mines in the district, as well as some in the Kirkland lake area. At one time silicosis was a problem in this industry, but with proper precautions and the use of aluminum therapy it can be completely eradicated. This is one of the great things that has been done by Canadian medicine in the last ten or fifteen years.

National health branch—
203. Nutrition service, $69,027.

Mr. FLEMING: Everything the department is doing in the way of promoting better nutritional standards is well done; the money that is being voted is money well spent. The minister has said that the efforts of his department in this direction are bearing fruit, but I thought the purpose was rather to promote consumption of fruit.

National health branch—
204. Combating venereal disease—administration, $24,678.

Mr. FLEMING: This and the next two items have to do with measures to combat venereal diseases. Would the minister make a statement as to the progress being made in combating this dread disease. In particular, I would ask him to say something concerning the cooperative basis on which the dominion and the provinces are uniting their efforts in this field. I think the new approach to this problem is commendable in so far as it urges a frank and realistic approach and insistence on sound standards of education. At the same time I am bound to say that I do not approve furthering the cause by subsidizing attacks on religion, which is the foundation of all morals.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I was going to ask the same question.

Mr. CLAXTON: For a number of years the federal government did give a considerable amount of assistance to the provinces, which was discontinued for some years and then was resumed in 1943. A venereal disease control division was established in the former department of pensions and national health, which was taken over by the new department. One of the first things I had to do as minister of the new department in October, 1944, was to approve a series of advertisements as part of a nation-wide campaign to develop interest in and direct constructive attention to this important subject. Hon. members will recall that this series of advertisements emphasized the four-sector front against V.D.—health, welfare, legal and moral. That was a four-pronged attack on this subject which was developed by this department. While the frankness of the advertisements and radio publicity and the motion pictures that were shown from one end of Canada to the other might have been alarming to some people, there was not a word of criticism of them from any quarter. The result undoubtedly was a much more frank discussion of the whole subject and a much stronger attack on it from all sides.

During the war there has been close cooperation between the armed services and the provincial and local authorities controlling the disease. That was made possible through our having seconded to this department or its predecessor Colonel Williams, who was V.D. control officer of the army. With him came other officers from the armed forces, and we were fortunate in being able to establish with all the provinces the closest kind of cooperation. One of the developments in that field which was interesting and new was the reporting of contacts, and a great deal of useful work was done there. The result in figures is indicated in the report of the department, which shows that in the armed forces, the only branch of the population for which there are any really reliable statistics, there was a considerable decrease in the incidence of syphilis, particularly between 1940 and 1944, whereas one might have expected that there would be an increase. The problem is receiving continuous attention, and the department's division will continue to cooperate in the way in which it has been doing with the provinces and municipalities in this field.

Mr. BLAIR: I have only one criticism of this item. The amount should be double, if necessary, and more.

Mr. BRACKEN: Might I ask the minister to outline the relative jurisdiction of the provinces and the dominion in this field and to state just what form of cooperation there is between the two?

Mr. CLAXTON: The provinces, of course, have primary jurisdiction in the field of health. Our cooperation in previous years has largely existed in two directions, first the providing of grants of money on a conditional grants-in-aid basis, and, second, the passing of criminal laws to try to stop the spreading of the disease. During the war, because there were over one million men and women in the armed forces, we had a definite interest at the dominion level, and we were fortunate in securing close cooperation from the provinces and the municipalities. Records were kept at Ottawa, and prosecutions were made in the provinces by provincial agencies. In several provinces there was a V.D. control officer who cooperated continuously with the provincial and municipal authorities in each province and there was, I am happy to say, the closest possible cooperation at every possible level.

National health branch—

206. Distribution of drugs under regulations approved by the governor in council, $50,000.

Mr. BLAIR: Will the minister give an explanation of this item? There are no details given.

Mr. CLAXTON: It is to provide for the purchase of recognized and approved medications for the treatment of venereal diseases and for their distribution to the provinces. That is done now in virtue of an order in council, P.C. 75/5045, of July 18, 1945. The expenditures have been: in 1943-44, $45,654.32, and in 1944-45, $43,533.92. It provides for the distribution of the medications for treatment in the provinces on a basis which is worked out in cooperation with them.

Mr. BLAIR: Suppose the provinces require more than that?

Mr. CHARLTON: Does this include the distribution of penicillin to the various provinces?

Mr. CLAXTON: In the first instance it provided only for the distribution of arsenicals. With regard to penicillin for the treatment of venereal disease, I will make inquiry and give the information.

207. Grants to institutions assisting sailors, in the amounts detailed in the estimates, $2,600.

Mr. HAZEN: If I am in order, Mr. Chairman, before this item carries, I would ask about an item that appears in the war appropriations at page 556 of Hansard, "Contribution towards health services at Halifax—total amount required from 1945-46, $30,000." What is that amount voted for and how is the money being used?

Mr. CLAXTON: That was a special vote given for health services in Halifax owing to the severe congestion there of troops and personnel of the navy and air force and merchant marine. This created a serious condition with possibilities of epidemics and so on, and this amount, which was a most unusual expenditure, the only one of its kind ever made by the federal government, was designed to help the municipalities and health agencies cope with conditions that were likely to give rise to an epidemic.

Mr. HAZEN: Was it paid to the city of Halifax or to the board of health?

Mr. CLAXTON: I shall have to get the answer to that.

Item agreed to.

Welfare branch—

209. Family allowance division—administration expenses, $2,392,070.

Mr. McMASTER: Is this vote of $2,392,000 the total amount paid in connection with family allowances? Is any money paid by any other department, and, if so, how much?

Mr. CLAXTON: This covers the cost of administration in connection with family allowances in the Department of National Health and Welfare. In addition, there are expenditures of the Department of Public Works, Post Office and treasury.

Mr. McMASTER: Does the minister know those amounts?

Mr. CLAXTON: No. I do not have them. The hon. member will have to get them from the appropriate ministers.

Mr. McMASTER: Perhaps the minister could let me have that afterwards.

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. BRACKEN: This is a service that covers the whole nation. Will the minister outline the way in which his organization is set up across Canada, and at the same time indicate what measure of cooperation there is with the provinces and to what extent, if any, departments of provincial governments are used in the administration of this service?

Mr. CLAXTON: With regard to the administrative set-up of family allowances, I should say we endeavoured from the start to have the most complete decentralization. Registrations were made at the office established by the family allowance administration in the capital of each province; from that office the payments are made, and with that office correspondence is ordinarily held. The extent of this can be readily understood when I inform hon. members—I hope it will surprise them—that we have engaged in the family allowance administration at Ottawa only seven persons, the rest of the work being done in the nine offices established in the provincial capitals.

Cooperation with the provinces takes several forms. In the first place, we have made an arrangement with every province whereby we provide a recordak equipment and train staff to make microfilm photographs of the records of births and deaths of children under sixteen. That work is well advanced, and the films are sent to Ottawa where information from them is put on cards by the dominion bureau of statistics. From these card registers are produced containing a list of the children in each province, by years. That index is sent to our provincial office and applications for family allowances are checked against it. In that way we have obviated the necessity of requiring individual applicants for family allowances to provide evidence of the birth and existence of children.

Second, the Family Allowances Act, as hon. members know, provides that the children in respect of whom allowances shall be paid shall be children who are attending school, and we have construed that to mean attending school in accordance with the provisions in force in each province. In every province we have received the most whole-hearted cooperation in the enforcement of that provision.

I can tell of one case recently brought to my attention where the regional director of family allowances told me that in a certain district in a province where ordinarily only about ten per cent of the children went to school in September, this year it is ninety-five per cent. The provinces have not only cooperated wholeheartedly in this respect, but they have been exceedingly glad to do so because it has, generally speaking, reinforced their own provisions with regard to school attendance.

The third respect in which we have had co-operation from the provinces is in ensuring that the allowances are properly spent. We do not propose to police the spending by investigating every home, but we hope to work out, either with the provinces or with agencies in each province, or by other means, arrangements whereby we shall have close co-operation in this direction. We have had conferences with child welfare organizations, children's aid societies and the like, and from those conferences we are gradually constructing the framework for relations with the provinces which we hope will secure complete cooperation in this respect.

Mr. BRACKEN: Will the minister indicate the number employed in the administration of the service and their distribution among the provinces throughout the dominion?

Mr. CLAXTON: I have handy the establishment but not the actual staff, broken down by provinces for family allowances alone. I shall have to get that information and give it to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. ADAMSON: Has the minister the amount paid to each province?

Mr. BRACKEN: Perhaps the minister would put on Hansard the information I have asked for.

Mr. CLAXTON: I shall be glad to give the distribution of staff by provinces and also to put on Hansard, if I may, the distribution of family allowance payments by provinces, together with the distribution of the number of children per family in each province, all for the month of October, 1945. These figures showing this kind of distribution are worked out for each quarter. We can show the totals for the provinces each month, but we have them broken down completely only once every quarter. I will put these tables on Hansard:

OTTAWA, 8th November, 1945.

Mr. BRACKEN: Did I understand the minister to say that he would give us information showing what expenditures for these services are chargeable to other departments?

Mr. CLAXTON: I shall be glad to get that. I have not it before me at the moment.

Mr. BRACKEN: Did the minister undertake a moment ago to do that?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I just wish to congratulate the minister and the officials of his department on the commendable way in which family allowances have been administered. When family allowances were first suggested many people said that it would result in the establishment of a bureaucracy. From every point in my constituency I have heard nothing but praise and commendation for the administration of this act.

I just wish to draw to the attention of the minister one case in my riding which I think should receive sympathetic consideration. It is that of a young girl who is within the age limit to receive the allowance. She is quite normal but suffers from a nervous affliction which requires her to attend a school in the United States, in Washington, I believe. It is the only school of its type in the western states. There is no school of the kind in Canada. Because this child has to go to that school and be absent from Canada over a certain period her parents are denied the allowance. I do wish the minister would give some consideration to cases of that kind.

[Mr. Claxton.]

Mr. CLAXTON: I am afraid that case would have to be dealt with by an amendment to the law. It certainly is excluded by the terms of the act to-day.

Mr. McMASTER: Could the minister give us some details of the item of $150,000 for publicity and information, and $150,000 for professional and special services? These items are to be found on page 137 of the estimates.

Mr. CLAXTON: With regard to the item for publicity and information, it will be readily understood by hon. members that one cannot deal with all the people of Canada, which virtually we are doing in family allowances, without a considerable amount of expenditure on information. We had to expend quite a large sum in order to secure the registration that was made in the form in which it was made. Had we not spent so much we would have spent more on clerical staff to secure corrections. The money paid in family allowances payments is good in itself, both from the point of view of both the children and the family, and the economy of the country, but we consider that it is not enough just to pay this money out. We should like to do what we can to develop interest on the part of the parents to spend it in the best possible way for the benefit of their children. Therefore, from time to time, in conjunction with provincial and local authorities, we intend to develop interest in various matters relating to the health and welfare of children. We believe that money spent in that way will prevent the necessity of so much money being spent in policing. We therefore put in this considerable amount with the thought that it would be spent on films, exhibits, and in various other promotional activities, to draw to the attention of Canadian parents the possibilities of spending the money in the best interests of their children.

Mr. McMASTER: The minister has perhaps partly answered the first question. Did I understand him to say that even now he is spending the money on a programme to assist the parents in bringing up their children? If that is not the case, will he tell us whether this money has been spent, when was it spent and what proportion was spent before August 1, 1945, or, if he prefers, before July 1, 1945?

Mr. CLAXTON: I shall have to get that information.

Mr. McMASTER: I also asked a question about the item of $150,000 for professional and special services. Perhaps the minister can tell us how much was spent, how it was spent and when it was spent?

Mr. CLAXTON: I shall have to get that information.

Mr. CASE: In dealing with social and welfare agencies an item has come to my attention which I think the minister really appreciates, since through me he has obtained some knowledge of it. I should now like to bring it to the attention of the committee. A Canadian soldier overseas married a British war widow who was the mother of children. In this particular instance the woman is the mother of three children born to a British father. She is now the mother of two children by the Canadian soldier. They are now living in my home city of Owen Sound. While the Family Allowances Act has made provision for the two children born of the Canadian father, who is still in the armed services overseas, it makes no provision for the three children born of the British father. As I have said before, the family allowances are intended for the welfare of the children of this nation. We hope to make them better citizens and give them greater opportunities than heretofore. While the act makes no provision for a case of this kind, I feel that it should be amended. I would urge the minister and his department to give serious consideration to that, because there must be many more similar cases where widows overseas with children born to a former marriage have married Canadian soldiers and have come to make their home in Canada. Some of them are now mothers of children born to Canadian soldiers, but there is no provision for the children of the first marriage. I am not going to say that these children are wards of Canada, but they will be future citizens of Canada. I would therefore urge the minister to give serious consideration to changing the act so that these children may be included.

Mr. CLAXTON: I have taken note of the suggestion made by the hon. member for Grey North. As he indicates, it would require an amendment to the act. We shall certainly give consideration to that.

I can now answer the further question by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert with regard to the payment to Halifax. That $30,000 was given to compensate the city of Halifax for the expanded war population of many, many thousands of people which required special health measures to be taken by the population, as I indicated.

With regard to the question of the hon. member for High Park, in reference to $150,000 for professional and special services, may I say that none of that was expended this year. He also wanted to know about $150,000 for publicity and information. The amount of $85,250.16 was expended to September 30, 1945.

Mr. HANSELL: This is the only item on which I can raise a little matter—

Mr. CASE: Would the hon. member for Macleod give way for a moment, until I ask one more question?

Mr. HANSELL: I am always willing to oblige my hon. friend.

Mr. CASE: Thank you very much. I should like to ask the minister if, in the illustration I gave, the foster father were to legally adopt the children, that would bring them within the framework of the present act.

Mr. CLAXTON: No, I am afraid not. They would have to reside here for three years before they become eligible.

Mr. HANSELL: I should like to congratulate the minister on something else. The hon. member for Kootenay West congratulated him upon the administration of his department, saying that he had received the highest compliments and no criticisms. I have no criticism to offer in connection with the administration of any department. There is one difference between the Department of National Health and Welfare and the other departments, and it is simply this. In this case the public are on the receiving end. Of course, when a lady goes to the post office and gets a cheque for $12 or $16, she likes this department. The others are not so fortunate.

I wish to congratulate the minister on being able to pilot his estimates through without any advisers sitting in front of him. This question has been in my mind a good deal. I have no objection to advisers coming in; they are very fine looking gentlemen who sit there trying to look as wise as possible. I do not suppose anything can be done about it, but I am going to suggest that when advisers come into the house and take their places in front of a minister, their names be recorded in Hansard as advising that minister. As I say, I have no objection to them, and of course the minister must take final responsibility for the answers he gives. I do not know that I am so much concerned with this in connection with the estimates as I am when a bill is being piloted through. I like to know the names of those who are putting the answers in the mouth of the minister. While I congratulate the minister on this, I know his department is not so complicated as some of the others, and I mean to cast no reflection on the other ministers.

Might I offer one suggestion to the ministers of the crown as they are putting through their estimates. I suggest that they do not attempt to make long speeches, which only hold up the house. If they sit there and look just as dumb as possible they will get their estimates through much more quickly.

Mr. BLAIR: This item shows an amount of $1,534,000 for temporary assistance in connection with administration. Does the minister anticipate that the cost of administration will be lowered? While I am on my feet I should like to ask a second question. What is the attitude of the minister toward children in public institutions, in regard to family allowances?

Mr. CLAXTON: In regard to the item for administration, we do not expect to spend the full amount provided in the estimates for this year, and we hope that the cost of administration may be even further cut down. When the bill was being debated in 1944 we estimated that the cost of administration might be from one to two per cent of the total outlay in respect of family allowance. I am happy to be able to say that the figure is certainly close to one per cent, and in another year we hope to be able to get it even lower. This item was provided on this basis, because we had to do a job which involved registering all children born during the past fifteen years; that is we had to achieve fifteen times our normal peak before we ever began, and that required a very large temporary force which we still have with us. The amount provided was $1,534,070. So far, up to September 30, 1945, we have spent $323,491.79, so that at that time we were still well within the amount budgeted for.

Mr. BLAIR: My second question was; what is the minister's attitude toward children in public institutions, in regard to family allowances?

Mr. CLAXTON: That is provided for in part by the act, under which payments are made to parents who are responsible for the care and control of children, and which states that an institution shall not be considered a parent. Then, in accordance with the act regulations were enacted, and the question put by my hon. friend is dealt with there. Perhaps I had better send him a copy of the regulations. There are a great many different types of institutions in the provinces of Canada, and generally speaking I think it can be said that we do not regard a child who is in an institution as a child in respect of whom an allowance is to be paid under the Family Allowances Act. That is in accordance with the act; but if the child is in a foster home and the cost of the child's care is contributed to by a children's aid society or some similar organization, then we shall regard that organization as a parent and make the payment to it.

Mr. McMASTER: Did I understand the minister to say that they do not make a payment where a child is in an institution?

Mr. CLAXTON: That is right.

Mr. McMASTER: Then arising out of my other two questions, the minister gave me the amount spent on publicity and information up to September 30. Apparently he has the details there. Could he tell us the amount spent on publicity up to July 1? At the same time could he tell us what kind of professional and special services are anticipated to be required for which the sum of $150,000 is provided?

Mr. CLAXTON: The professional assistance for which the amount of $150,000 is provided is in the form of investigations, supervision, welfare workers and similar work of that kind. We are beginning to make fairly heavy expenditures in this connection, but we have not come anywhere near the sum mentioned. That is the type of assistance we mean, social workers and the like.

Mr. McMASTER: And has the minister the amount spent on publicity up to July 1?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes. We spent on publicity and information up to July 1, the sum of $2,583.32.

Miscellaneous grants—
211. Grant to Canadian national committee for mental hygiene, $10,000.

Mr. ADAMSON: I wish to ask the minister a question not definitely related to this institution but in connection with mental hygiene generally. In the press to-day I saw the rather alarming statement that Canada had the highest incidence of insanity of any country in the world. I am merely saying what I saw in the press. I know it is extremely high; in fact it is one of the serious problems we have to face. Could the minister give us a statement as to the mental health of the nation? I know this is extremely difficult, but perhaps he could tell us the number of patients in these institutions, what is being done and some statistics in that connection.

I do not know whether this has been said before, but I should like to go on record as commending very strongly the deputy minister of national health and welfare. I believe the address given by General Chisholm before the Alanson White Foundation of Washington, D.C., was one of the finest pieces of original research that has ever been done. I wish to commend the minister and the department, and to say how extremely lucky we are in Canada in having in the public service of our country a man who is capable of such original and useful thought. I wanted to say that in the committee. I do not know whether it has been said before, but I should like to go on record in that way.

Could the minister make a brief statement in connection with the mental health situation?

Mr. CLAXTON: I am afraid I have not any definite information which I could give at this time. However, I should certainly doubt the accuracy of the news report to which the hon. member has referred.

Mr. ADAMSON: It was in to-day's issue of the Ottawa Journal.

Miscellaneous grants—
220. Grant to Canadian Red Cross Society, $10,000.

Mr. FLEMING: What are the minister's views respecting a request for a grant from the Canadian dental hygiene council? I understand that this organization has the endorsation of the minister and his department and, if I am not mistaken, was at one time in receipt of a grant from the old department of pensions and national health. It is the only voluntary body in the dental health field carrying on educational work.

We find here a number of grants provided for organizations doing exemplary work in the general field of health, but I find that none of these operate in the field of dental health. Would the minister indicate the attitude of the government in respect of the request by this organization for a grant? Perhaps having endorsed its work, the minister might have some views which would be of interest to the committee.

Mr. CLAXTON: As the hon. member for Eglinton implied, I feel that this organization is doing admirable work. It is one of a number of professional organizations with which, I am glad to say, the department has the closest possible relationship. I shall be very glad indeed to make representations to my colleagues with regard to a grant in the future.

National health branch—
527. Health insurance studies, $10,187.

Mr. FLEMING: What assistance did the department retain in this connection? I take it that the item has reference to studies in connection with proposals submitted to the dominion-provincial conference, and I believe that the committee would like to know what assistance outside the department was required in the preparation of those studies.

Mr. CLAXTON: In connection with preparation for the conference the department set up committees dealing with health matters and with welfare matters. Those two committees, over which the two deputy ministers presided, consisted exclusively of officers in the government from the Department of Finance, the bureau of statistics, and other departments concerned. They were entirely interdepartmental, and the department spent nothing on outside services when making preparations for the conference.

Mr. Alexander Skelton was secretary of the conference committee, set up under the cabinet. On the committee were a number of experts in various fields, chiefly financial, whose services we were able to obtain. However, the department spent nothing on any additional studies.

This item is to set up a new directorate which would have to do with health planning, particularly as it is related to health insurance. A position has been advertised and filled, and the officer is now engaged in his work.

Item agreed to.

National health branch—
529. Civil service health division, $145,750.

Mr. BRACKEN: What service is the department attempting to give under this item?

Mr. CLAXTON: Under the act which created the department there was a fairly important change from the previous legislation which defined the functions of the old department of pensions and national health. The change was made when the department was set up in 1944, and it gave the Department of National Health and Welfare positive responsibility for measures which might improve the health of the civil servants of Canada.

In May, 1945, I was authorized by the government to announce a programme involving an expenditure of $328,000 for the first year to provide a number of health services for civil servants. While they might be subdivided under many heads, I believe I can put them under a few.

In the first place the programme involved an examination before entrance into the civil service. This included X-ray examination for tuberculosis;

Second, periodic examinations;

Third, emergency service for people who suddenly became ill while at work;

Fourth, the development of educational activities so as to bring to the attention of the civil service of Canada the need for taking proper health measures;

Fifth, provision of advice with regard to health matters. Without giving actual continuous service, we would provide expert counsellors who could advise as to the kind of doctor to be consulted, and as to what should be done under certain conditions and,

Sixth, the establishment of sanitary standards, health standards, standards regarding working conditions, lighting, lavatory accommodation, rest rooms, and the like, and the assurance of cooperation with other government departments in giving this service.

In other words, this programme was designed to give the civil servants of Canada the kind of service which any good employer now gives his employees. That was announced in May of this year, and only last week we were fortunate enough to secure the services of Lieutenant-Colonel R. G. Ratz, to head this new division. This gentleman is experienced in public health work, has had experience along those lines in the army, and is now starting to get to work. Progress depends now on space and staff becoming available with which to proceed. I repeat that you have to give the civil service of Canada the same kind of health service which any good employer now gives to his employees.

[Mr. Claxton.]

Mr. BRACKEN: What is the total appropriation per year for this service? The minister mentioned the sum of $348,000, but I notice that this vote is for only $145,750.

Mr. CLAXTON: This was announced in May, and the estimate of the cost for a full year was $328,000. We realized that we could not institute the service this year until quite late, if at all, and then only partly, so that the supplementary is for a smaller amount. We shall not come near to spending the supplementary vote.

Item agreed to.

National health branch—
531. Mental health division, $16,232.

Mr. BRACKEN: Could the minister give the total number of civil servants now in the employ of the government?

Mr. MARTIN: The total is 143,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the relation between votes 531 and 211?

Mr. CLAXTON: Vote 211 provides for a grant to the national committee for mental hygiene, a voluntary association, and vote 531 provides for salaries and costs of administration of a new division of the department which has just been created to deal with mental health in the same way as the other divisions deal with their separate fields of tuberculosis, venereal diseases and so on.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am in favour of this new department because I believe it is a step in the right direction. How will it work with the organization of which Doctor Hincks is the head?

Mr. CLAXTON: I am certain that it will work very closely with him and also with the provinces. We find at the technical level of the department that there can be close cooperation with the experts in the various fields in the provinces and also that the federal government can exercise a useful function in just bringing them together and coordinating their work, exchanging information and getting them to establish new standards and the like. This is a field which uses more beds than any other and it is of vast importance to us all.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am sure that the Canadian national committee for mental hygiene, of which Doctor Hincks is head, will be able to assist the minister materially in his work in connection with this new division.

Mr. McKAY: Is any appropriation being made for prison welfare associations such as the John Howard societies, and in particular the prisoner aid and welfare association in Montreal? I understand that society has to do with certain aspects of mental hygiene.

Mr. CLAXTON: If there is such an appropriation it would come under the Department of Justice.

Item agreed to.

Welfare branch—
535. National council on physical fitness—administration expenses, $29,571.09.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. CLAXTON: This is an item of $53,005.27 to replace an amount paid to the provinces under the National Fitness Act from the national fitness fund totalling $23,434.18. When this amount is deposited in the open account the fund will be restored to its original amount of $225,000 for grants to the provinces in accordance with the act. It is also to provide $10,000 for publicity purposes and to replace an amount expended for administration purposes under the National Fitness Act from the national physical fitness fund of $19,571.09. When this amount is deposited in the open account the fund will be restored to the original amount of $25,000 for administration expenses. Those two sums of $25,000 and $225,000 will make up a total of $250,000 which is provided for under the National Fitness Act.

Mr. GREEN: I understood that we could discuss on the civil estimates any war appropriation estimate. I do not know whether the minister is proposing to call the old age pension item or not. I believe that now comes under his department although it is listed as being under the Minister of Finance. I have no intention this evening of dealing with the question of an increase in old age pensions or the lowering of the age limit, because those points were discussed earlier in the session. However, I should like to ask the minister whether his department is taking any steps to bring about a change in the regulations under the Old Age Pensions Act. I realize that the questions of an increased pension and the lowering of the age limit are being deferred until the conclusion of the dominion-provincial conference, but there is no reason why some steps should not be taken in the meantime to bring about a change in the regulations.

It takes time to do these things, and in the case of our older citizens, time means so much. They have to be seventy years of age to come under this act, and when one gets along to that age, every day counts. It is a tragedy that there has been such a long delay in getting these provisions through. The present regulations are too harsh; I think the minister will agree with me on that. The result is that in Canada many of these people are not able to establish their eligibility for pension. If the minister will refer to page 37 of the Dominion of Canada proposals made to the dominion-provincial conference he will see it is stated that only about forty per cent of all persons of seventy years of age and over are able to establish eligibility for old age pension. Doctor Marsh in his report of two years ago—and I refer the minister to page 70—states that in Great Britain about eighty per cent of the people over seventy years of age are able to qualify, either for old age pensions or similar assistance. He goes on to point out why there is this difference and traces the cause right back to the harshness of the regulations. This harshness is also dealt with in the proposals made by the dominion government to which I have referred; the minister will find this at page 38. The dominion is now proposing that for the ages sixty-five to sixty-nine there shall be a joint plan, the dominion paying half and the provinces paying half; it is admitted on page 38 that certain changes will be necessary, designed to liberalize the conditions under which the assistance is given.

Further down on the same page it is proposed that residence in Canada should be required only for a period of twenty years since the age of eighteen, including a period of three years immediately preceding the date of application for a pension. That, of course, is far more liberal than the present regulation.

It is also proposed that the maximum payment be reduced by the amount of the applicant's personal income, if any, in excess of $125 per annum, but the submission goes on to say:

> In computing the income of the recipient for purposes of this means-test, moneys received from other sources not for the recipient's own use to be excluded. The pension would only be reduced to the extent that the pensioner had outside sources of personal income for his or her own use.

I presume that would mean that there would not be such drastic restrictions as there are at the present time for example, that pensioners might be allowed to own their homes without having a reduction made in the pension on that account. It goes on to say:

> The existing requirement that payments made by way of old age pension must be recovered where possible from the estate of the recipient after his death would be abolished.

These proposals are contained in the dominion government's own brief. The minister is aware, by the way, that Doctor Marsh goes into much greater detail. Is there any reason why steps could not be taken now to work out an easing of the regulations? It will have to be done sooner or later. It is only a matter of delay and that delay will work a hardship on many of these older people. I suggest to the minister that one of the most useful undertakings which his department could handle now would be to bring about a revision of the regulations to ease their restrictiveness.

Mr. CLAXTON: I should like to make this comment with regard to the observation of the hon. member for Vancouver South that only forty per cent of Canadians who are within the age group qualify for pension on the means-test, while the percentage is very much higher in Britain. That might mean a greater stringency of regulations or it might mean that there is a very much higher average of savings on the part of the people of this country, or a higher degree of independence.

Mr. GREEN: The minister knows that the findings of Doctor Marsh are along the same line.

Mr. CLAXTON: Section 19. 2 of the Old Age Pensions Act provides:

No regulation by reference to which any agreement with a province has been made shall be altered except with the consent of such province or in accordance with the provisions of the regulations to which it has agreed.

So that any alteration of the regulations can only be made by agreement with the provinces. I am very glad to tell the hon. member, however, that we have already inaugurated discussions with the provinces alongside the work of the dominion-provincial conference, and their welfare officers have accepted our suggestion that early in the new year we should meet together to discuss administrative problems relative to old age pensions. We hope at that time to remedy some of the difficulties to which the hon. member has referred.

Mr. GREEN: That is very good. In view of the nature of the act the lead has to come from the dominion and I am very glad that that lead is being given.

Item agreed to.

230. National film board, including the motion picture bureau, $810,965.

Supplementary estimates, 1945-46

537. National film board, including the motion picture bureau, further amount required, $335,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: This is one branch of the department which I believe can do a great work for Canada, particularly if the films to be sent out of Canada in exchange for the films of other countries cover Canada from ocean to ocean and from the international boundary to the Arctic. There is no other country in the world that can rival Canada's scenery and resources all along the line. I am not going to delay the committee to talk about them because it is too late in the session. I hope that at another session this vote will come down early so that members from every part of Canada can tell of the wonders of their own part of the country, not only the natural wonders and its resources but also Canadian industries, all of which could be portrayed to the great advantage of Canada, as well as everything that enters into industry in this country by way of productive employment. I wish to register my strong support for this particular branch, and I hope that when reconstruction is under consideration the minister will persuade the Minister of Public Works, under whose department I presume it would come, to put up a modern up-to-date building to house this branch. I was in the film building, if it is still the same one, in which the records are kept, but what is required to-day is a steel and concrete fireproof building to contain and preserve these priceless films that have been taken of Canada from one end to the other.

Mr. ADAMSON: I am not going into detail at this stage. I have in the past been extremely critical of the national film board on account of their documentaries and the propaganda they contained, but I have not seen one in the last year, so that I am not going to say anything about them. What are the new functions of the national film board? Are they to make films, for instance, to assist the immigration department by showing life in Canada, so that people who wish to come here may have an idea of what life here is really like? Are documentaries to be provided for showing in other countries to attract tourists to Canada? It seems to me there is a tremendous opportunity in the film board to show Canada abroad in a way that no other media can do.

I said, Mr. Chairman, that if the national film board is going to undertake the production of major films as well as documentaries we should have more information as to what the board proposes to do. I suggest that if you are considering the production of films of major length it would be wiser for us to know what the policy is. Are you going to compete with the private producer of films, or are you going to cooperate with the commercial studios? And is it the intention of the national film board to establish, or is it thought possible to establish a moving-picture industry in Canada? If you are going to produce commercial films—and I hope you are not—then I suggest that you might consider the filming of "The White Tower", if the rights have not already been sold. That would afford us a wonderful opportunity to show our national parks in such a film, and Mount Assiniboine would suit very well as the locale for such a picture. Would the minister tell us what the forward policy of the film board is? I have had the report, but it does not say specifically.

Mr. HAZEN: If this supplementary estimate and the amount that is voted in the estimates are expended this year by the national film board the cost to the people of the country will be $1,145,965. That is a large amount of money, and the question I ask myself is: Is this expenditure worth while? The question I ask the minister is: Does he think this expenditure is worth while? Does the board play an important part in the lives of the people of this country? Does it play an important part in the lives of members of parliament? It plays no part in my life, and I do not think it plays much part in the lives of most of the members of this assembly. So far as I know it plays no part, or if it does it plays only a small part, in the lives of the people of my constituency. I doubt if the government can carry on a film business any better than it could carry on a weekly newspaper. I suggest, therefore, that the whole matter should be very carefully looked into before further expenditures are made. I understand that recently the Royal Canadian Air Force asked the national film board to make a film for its women's division dealing with hygiene, that the national film board made that film and charged the R.C.A.F. over $20,000 for it, and that when the R.C.A.F. got the film they were so dissatisfied with it that they refused to use it, although they had to pay the bill. They, therefore, went to a private concern in Montreal and got them to make a film which they found satisfactory and which cost them much less. Can the minister tell us something about the film prepared by the national film board for the R.C.A.F., whether or not it was used by the R.C.A.F., whether or not the R.C.A.F. refused to use it and afterwards got a film that was satisfactory from a private concern in Montreal.

Mr. MacNICOL: When I spoke I had in mind films sent outside Canada, not those shown within the country. On one of my last trips to the United States I saw some of these Canadian films shown there, and from what I saw I took it that the intention was to show our American cousins the marvellous tourist attractions we have, and to business people there the opportunities for investing money in Canada. I was not thinking of films shown here but of what it says, international, or outside the country.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I would say this about the national film board. I think it is more than an organization; it has now become an institution and one which I wish to see perpetuated and enlarged. The national film board has brought great credit to Canada outside this country and has been of great service to Canada within it. One hon. member asked, does it play an important part in our lives? I think it does, and I am speaking for our group when I say that it plays an important part in the rural areas of western Canada. It is an invaluable source of adult education, and from that point of view alone we should like to see it continued and, indeed, expanded. The hon. member said that it played no part in his life. I suggest to him respectfully that that is his own fault. It has played quite a large part in my life. I have gone frequently to the film board headquarters and rented films at the very reasonable rate of twenty-five cents a roll on all subjects under the sun, and have shown them in my constituency to all sorts of people. The board has a great part to play in this country, and I should like the minister to spare a few minutes to tell us what the future policy envisages for it.

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member for Davenport spoke of the desirability of our using films to spread knowledge of Canada abroad, a work in which he himself has been engaged for a great number of years. I venture to say that no agency of the Canadian government has done more to spread knowledge of Canada abroad as the film board. In the year under review it produced a total of 308 films, and I would ask hon. members who are interested in the subject to compare that production, from the point of view both of quality and of quantity, with the production of any other country on the face of the earth. If they do so they will find that we are second to none in any regard.

The national film board has come to have a reputation abroad which puts us virtually second to none in the documentary field. I have had the honour of representing Canada in some international conferences, for example, of UNRRA and the international labour organization, and at all these the national film board is there showing films to the representatives of other nations—films of Canada and films of their own countries which our film board is accumulating and knows how to show. On more than one occasion the national film board has been chosen as the agency, the sole agency, of the international authority itself, as being the best in the whole world to do the job. The national film board was engaged by UNNRA to do the job of producing a film about its work, and that film was shown throughout the world, just as most of the national film board's work is shown to-day.

These 308 films I have mentioned are divided into forty-six films of the national film programme, 153 in the war information programme, and 109 for other government departments. I do not suppose any agency of the government has so many connections with other government departments as the film board. It receives orders for films and produces them in cooperation with government departments. We think it produces them as well and perhaps better than any private agency could do it, and it makes a Canadian service continuously available to the government and to the people of Canada. It is with some pride that I speak of this service and the way in which its reputation has been built up through the years in consequence of the work that has been carried on, particularly under the leadership of John Grierson, who is known throughout the world as probably the leader in the field of documentary films, and who received the highest award, an Oscar, in the United States, a year ago.

The record is known to the people of every other country, and it is high time that it became known to the people of Canada. More and more people in Canada are beginning to recognize that here is one field of culture, one field of art in which we can take second place to no other country.

These pictures cover a great range of subjects. The most important series that was shown probably was that of "The World in Action". That series of films produced one each month and was shown as a commercial picture for which we received payment. It was shown in six thousand theatres in the United States and in a great number of theatres in the United Kingdom, in Central and South America as well as in Australia and South Africa. Another series "Canada Carries On", was perhaps the greatest single vehicle for carrying to the Canadian people and to others knowledge of what we ourselves were doing during the war. That was also shown in Canada, the United States and other countries. These two films were shown to an estimated audience in Canada of two million people a week. We get into very large figures in this field. That is the potential audience at the theatres in which these films are shown.

I have here, and if necessary and desirable, I shall put on Hansard a list of the 308 films produced during the period under review. A great number of these films are produced in both English and French. A great number were produced in Spanish and Portuguese. I venture to say they have been the greatest single vehicle for carrying knowledge and information of Canada to other countries.

As part of its work the national film board has also been the greatest single agency in Canada to produce still pictures, pictures of national events. It has had its own photographers on our battle fronts, and they have made available through the ordinary means of distributing information photographs and stills in a very large volume, up to 50,000 a year.

This activity also includes the preparation of graphics of all kinds, educational films, films for the Department of Agriculture and so forth. We have had a great number of rural circuits. They also show films on industrial circuits. The rural circuits and the industrial circuits are means whereby information about farm life and ways of improving the amenities of farm life and farm techniques as well as entertainment are made available to hundreds of thousands of our population. Similarly the industrial circuits make available films on industrial techniques. Some of them are just as practical as any employer could possibly introduce with regard to one element or another suitable to the audience. They also endeavour to spread from one group to another knowledge of the other group, how they are living, how they are working and that they are interdependent. That is all part of the effort to give Canadians information of their own country, a realization of what we are doing and what we aim to do. It is a great Canadian enterprise. On that account I hope that it will get the vote which is required here.

With regard to the question of the hon. member for Saint John-Albert, I must say that the only information I have is that the film to which he refers was probably produced for the air force by an agency other than the film board. If it was found unsuitable that was not their fault.

Mr. McIVOR: I should just like to express appreciation on behalf of the tourist bureau of Fort William of the splendid service rendered by the film board. We have a cave surrounded by hard rocks and pretty well covered by evergreens. On a summer evening several hundred people meet in that cave, tourists from all over the United States. One man expressed himself in words like these: We did not know that you had such a beautiful and gorgeous country as Canada.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): If the film board is to become really efficient and adequate a great deal will depend upon the number of projectors which are available for groups, clubs and associations. I offer this suggestion to the minister: Would it be possible for the film board to obtain from the services these projectors which are declared surplus, with a view to selling them to clubs and associations which will use them for the benefit of the people?

Mr. CLAXTON: I shall be indeed glad to call the hon. member's suggestion to the attention of War Assets Corporation and of the Minister of Reconstruction under whose department that matter falls. We have had a good deal of correspondence and discussion over this, and I shall be glad to see that the hon. member's representation in this regard is again called to the minister's attention.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the board itself not rent films?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes, but the hon. member for Winnipeg North was talking about projectors and making them available. The armed forces have a great number of projectors which they used for the job of instructing the forces with films that were prepared either by them or by us for them. Some of those projectors have become surplus. The question is, should they be made available for educational activities or to the film board, and how will they be disposed of? That is a matter for active discussion. I shall be glad to carry to the Minister of Reconstruction the representations of the hon. member.

Mr. PROBE: I should like to associate myself with the compliments that are being paid at the moment to the minister and to the national film board, but I have had brought to my attention a couple of criticisms which may not be justified. For that reason I should like the minister to comment on them. The first is that an undue number of films have been passed out in languages other than those which are considered official in Canada. Will the minister comment on the correctness or otherwise of that criticism?

Mr. CLAXTON: I understand that the only films distributed in Canada are distributed in English and French. The films that have been sent out in Spanish and Portuguese are sent to the countries where these languages would be useful.

Mr. PROBE: I understand that perfectly, but I understood that a considerable number of films were sent out in languages other than the four mentioned.

Mr. CLAXTON: Three years ago we made a film in Ukrainian for distribution in Canada.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is it still available?

Mr. CLAXTON: I think it would be.

Mrs. STRUM: I wish to compliment the minister on the imagination and sympathy which he has shown in dealing with this branch of education. I was pleased when I found that the film board came under his department, although I only became aware of that fact this week. Twice this week I have had the chance of seeing some films the board has produced, together with films produced in other countries, and I wish to say that what the minister said is quite true; the films our own board has made equalled or excelled in technique those from other countries, and I was very glad to see the skill that has gone into the making of those pictures.

In this country, where we have so much space, I believe geography is against us; and in the building of national understanding and unity I think the film is going to play a greater and greater part. I believe it is one of the matters about which we cannot afford to be niggardly, in which we must invest generously, because it is one of the greatest possible mediums for drawing this country together; and now educators are telling us that visual education is by far more effective than any other type. But I think our films can make their greatest contribution in promoting the sort of rural communities that will attract and hold our young people. We have seen those young people drift away from the country, leaving only those older people who perhaps have a greater vision of what life can mean. But if we are to attract these young people back to the farms; if we are to have the sort of culture that we deserve and that these young people are capable of developing in our rural communities, we must make much greater use of this effective medium.

Again I wish to compliment the minister on his sympathy and vision and on the very fine job this branch is doing.

Mr. McMASTER: It would seem that the realism of the east is now up against the idealism of the west. Perhaps we do not go to theatres in the east often enough to appreciate these things. I was glad to hear that the hon. member for Qu'Appelle was able to go to the theatre in Ottawa, because I really have never had time since coming here, and perhaps I have missed something. This is the position as we see it. We may not be interested in films, but we cannot understand why this amount should be increased by a million dollars. The minister has said that some 153 war pictures were produced, either this year or in preceding years, and no doubt those films were shown to the soldiers overseas. I do not know, but I would suppose that to be the case. What is his method of distribution here in eastern Canada? Are these films available to certain clubs and so on, or are they shown over regular circuits of moving-picture theatres? It strikes me that this amount, instead of getting larger, should be getting smaller, and that unless there is some method of distributing these pictures so that they are shown in the ordinary theatres they are not accomplishing the purpose intended, because my experience in the east has been that these private film shows receive very little attention.

Mr. HANSELL: I am afraid the minister has let me down a bit in the remarks I made a while ago; however, I imagine it is all right. I do not feel that I can wax quite as enthusiastic in support of the minister, with respect to the national film board, as some hon. members have done to-night. I have no particular objection to the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North, although I would not be quite so enthusiastic about it and personally I would have modified my remarks if I had thought along the same line. I agree more or less with the remarks of the hon. member for Saint John-Albert. It is said that the national film board can be a great institution for education. Well, I agree with that, but I do not agree that the educationalists are always right. There are some sciences in the realm of education that cannot be contradicted. Those sciences are always right, and I have in mind the science of mathematics and the science of chemistry, for instance. You do not go wrong in those sciences. But when it comes to such matters as political science, political economy and matters of economics, then the educationalists can be wrong, and they have been wrong.

I believe the national film board has a function to perform. I am not going to say that it should be done away with, or anything of the kind. During the war years I believe it did a good job along certain lines. I have seen some pictures, for instance, dealing with the matter of inflation, that were very good; they were needed at the time, and, I believe, did something in behalf of Canada by helping to curb a little spending and showing people what the dangers of inflation could be. If films are sent abroad in an effort to advertise our country, that is an admirable thing. But I am going to throw out a warning, and I do not want it to be suggested or thought that I have a suspicious mind. I am going to say that an institution such as the national film board can become a great power for propaganda. It does not make any difference that the officials in charge say, no, they are going to remain strictly neutral in matters relating to political issues. That is all right; I quite suppose they try to be neutral. But it does not necessarily follow that because certain propaganda does not have a party tinge, therefore it is not political. There are world issues of a highly political nature, not because they favour one party as above another, but because they are issues on which all do not agree. When a medium such as films is used for the purpose of propagandizing a certain view when quite a substantial body of opinion is against that view, then I say we need to sound a warning and suggest that the money of the taxpayers should not be used for that sort of thing.

There is another point to it. It is difficult to say where the line should be drawn between what might constitute government propaganda and what might constitute an educational programme. I have enjoyed the films "Canada Carries On". I am not going to say that the film board should not continue in that work. Personally, I do not think it affects me very much; but I will suggest that, no matter what government is in office, there are certain axioms of psychology which cannot be avoided, namely the psychology that when people see "Canada Carries On" there is left within their minds, even though it be their subconscious minds, the thought that the government is doing a great job. I say, therefore, that the national film board should be careful. I believe they are, and I am not going to criticize them harshly in this respect. But I do say that when they issue films of a nature to propagandize some particular policy, they are dealing with matters which I do not think are within their functions as a government film board.

I received through the mail the other day—and I have no doubt other hon. members received similar copies—a certain pamphlet. I do not intend criticizing its contents. This pamphlet is entitled "World or War", and I have read it with considerable interest. It contains the information that copies may be ordered from the United Nations Society in Canada, and that this pamphlet has been issued by the Canadian information service, and designed by the national film board at Ottawa.

On the inside I find some detailed information respecting the united nations organization which, it says, is open to all peace-loving nations. On its face it looks good. But who knows that the present policy of our government, in following along the lines of the united nations organization, is following along the right line. I am not going to say whether it is or not, whether that decision is the right one.

I suppose the national film board is just as safe under the present minister's administration as it would be under any other; but I do know this, that personally I do not agree with the minister's foreign policy. I see things in a different light, and perhaps it is only natural for me to suppose that while the film board is under the minister's administration, films which go out will not contradict the minister's views on foreign policy, and that perhaps in that regard they will follow along the lines of this pamphlet.

I would not expect it to be otherwise. However, I must repeat that there is a big danger in an institution of this kind. I have said the same about the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. There is a danger of institutions like these becoming powerful mediums of propaganda for certain things which in the end may prove detrimental to our country.

Concluding my remarks, I would make this suggestion, that institutions such as the national film board, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, or any other, should come under the closest scrutiny of parliament every year. I would suggest that the appropriate parliamentary committees be set up regularly, so that officials could make their annual reports, and so that those annual reports could be scrutinized from every angle.

This institution may be safe in the hands of the present officials; I do not know. But it may not be safe in the hands of others who may follow in their footsteps. That is the reason why institutions of this kind should come under the closest scrutiny.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I should like to say a few words about this, and I would begin by saying that I endorse everything the hon. member for Macleod has said. It is something we ought all to have constantly in our minds.

I am a believer in films, and I believe in them particularly because of what has been said by the hon. members for Qu'Appelle and Winnipeg North. Nevertheless I think there is great danger that in the schools we may overuse these new inventions. Teachers have pointed out certain of the dangers they face in schools. They say that their children spend most of their spare time either at the films or listening to the radio, and it is pointed out that neither of those entails the slightest degree of effort on the part of the child. I believe, therefore, that overuse of films could be a detriment in education.

As I said, I am a believer in films. But, like all new things, they can get the bit in their teeth, and run away with themselves. I cordially welcome what has been said by way of suggestion by the hon. member for Macleod. As a matter of fact, I was going to put forward something of the kind, but the hon. member has done it better than I could have done. However, I suggest earnestly to the minister that something of that kind should be done at the next session.

I am not going to take the time of the committee to discuss this in detail this evening, but I wish to make one other comment, which has to do with a great many things. Much as I believe in the films, I had thought that perhaps they would not be used to the same extent that might have been necessary in war time. I confess, therefore, I was surprised to find the expenses in this connection up by about $132,000 in the main estimates, and, reading the supplementary estimates, I am even more surprised to find an additional amount of $335,000 under this item. In other words, this service will cost about fifty per cent more during the next year than it did last year. Those are the figures as I understand them.

All this may be perfectly right, but in my opinion it has become far too easy to get a vote of hundreds of thousands of dollars without anyone spending five minutes to tell us what it is all about. In Muskoka-Ontario $500,000 is a lot of money, and I feel that before this passes in a perfunctory way, as it seems in danger of doing, we should know where this $500,000 is going.

As I understand it, Mr. Grierson has developed this thing in a big way. He was the pioneer, and was a man who had great ability along this line. As I say, he was the pioneer, and I am perfectly ready to believe—although perhaps I would not be as enthusiastic as the minister—that we have produced a good service. But I repeat that I hope the suggestion made by the hon. members to my left will be noted.

I have just one other thing to say. My suggestion to the minister would be that this item should be closely correlated with education—and when I say "education" I do not refer to it in its purely professional sense. But I do feel, as has been suggested, that this is a thing which requires the closest scrutiny, first of all by seeing that it is the instrument we understand it to be and not something else, and, second, that it does as much positive good as it ought to do, by being wisely used.

Mr. JACKMAN: May I endorse the remarks of the hon. member for Macleod. I should like to say in that connection that I believe the United States congress has recently passed a law under which a great many corporations and other governmental administrative bodies which formerly reported only to various ministers of the government of that country now report directly to congress or to a committee of congress.

The amount of money appropriated for the national film board has been mentioned. I think it is $1,140,000 for the year now rapidly passing out. The minister has said that some of these films have been exhibited commercially both here and in other countries, and I should like to know how much has been taken in by way of revenue so that we may get some idea of the scope of the activities of the national film board.

I must say that the films of the national film board that I have seen have not left a very favourable impression upon my mind. I have seen some of their documentary films; then, shortly after, I have seen corresponding productions of United States film companies, and certainly there is no comparison between the two. I remember one film put out by this board called "Balkan Powder Keg". That film outraged the sensibilities of thousands of my constituents to such an extent that it had not been showing for more than a day or two before my telephone was bombarded with demands that it be withdrawn. I immediately telephoned Mr. LaFleche, who was then in charge of this branch of government, and he said that an investigation would be made but that for the time being he did not see that the film need be withdrawn. This film, "Balkan Powder Keg", was definitely anti-British, not so much by direct picturization as by innuendo. It depicted that the worst wars always started in the Balkans, and it was distinctly pro-Russian and anti-British. It certainly engendered real opposition in the minds of the people of Toronto. I daresay the minister was flooded with other protests, and shortly afterward he wrote me a nice letter saying that this particular film product of the board, "Balkan Powder Keg", had been withdrawn from circulation. I hope it has stayed withdrawn.

While some of these films may be exhibited in the United States, I do not know exactly what object they are achieving to advertise our country there. We have an extremely able press, an illustrated press as well, and there are correspondents of the great United States journals in Ottawa and in other parts of Canada. These men can tell the United States public what we do in Canada. If the minister could do something to stop the flow of good Canadian citizens across the border from my own city and from other places in Canada he would be doing a greater service to our country than by trying to advertise Canada in foreign lands.

While some things may have an element of goodness in them, and this may be one of them, there is a limit to the amount of money that we can spend. Every time we spend money we not only take certain of our people out of productive service who would otherwise be producing other goods and services for Canadians, but we saddle on the backs of those of us who still remain producers an extra tax burden, a burden which is becoming so heavy that if it is not lightened we certainly shall see a diminution of the forward progress of this country and an increase in unemployment.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not rise to take part in this rambling discussion which has perhaps covered too much area already. I rise merely to indicate my agreement with certain remarks made by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario and the hon. member for Rosedale. It is not very often that I find myself in agreement with those hon. gentlemen, and I wish to make it known. It is time that we put a stop to this easy voting of money, and I came to that conclusion yesterday.

Mrs. STRUM: On every day of every week, every afternoon until perhaps eleven o'clock, the theatres of this country are open. You can go downtown in Ottawa or in any other city and you will see this process of education going on. The adult and juvenile mind is being exposed to this process. Thousands of films, largely made in other countries, are exhibited, and we have absolutely no control over their production or the ideas they represent or the sort of morals they hold up to us for emulation. They are moulding public opinion through a process of education in this country.

But here we have one agency upon which we spend a niggardly sum; comparatively speaking, it is nothing in our national budget. Here we have the means of putting out wholesome ideas to which we need to expose the people of this country. I do not play bridge, and therefore I do not slip out to have a game in the middle of the afternoon or evening, but I took an hour off twice this week and went to see a showing of two films.

One of these dealt with a community service in the form of a library on wheels in British Columbia. It was one of the finest things I have ever seen. I wish we had that service everywhere in Canada. I am sure that the showing of that film will promote interest in that sort of thing in other parts of Canada. People will begin to assume local responsibilities for taking part in that sort of thing. The other one dealt with day nurseries and it showed the details of a Toronto unit. It did credit to that city, to the department of education and to the department that had sponsored it.

These are things that the people need to know. They are wholesome things, and they are the sort of things that this government should take some responsibility for rather than to pass the whole field over to the United States commercial product which glorifies the broken home and glamourizes the things which we as a nation are trying to combat. These are the things that end quite frequently on the floor of this House of Commons in the form of a divorce bill; these are the things that we are importing into Canada. It is about time that we diluted that with a much more generous appropriation. I should like to double it, so that our people may get some of the wholesome things we want to release into the minds and into the homes of our people.

Mr. MacNICOL: I wish to say first that I disagree with my hon. friend to my left, and I disagree also with the hon. member for Rosedale and the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario. This shows that this party is composed of men who have their own opinions. I supported this vote, and I do so again. I would vote for double the amount. I was an industrialist and I am thinking of the working men in my riding. I wish to tell the minister that the industrial films which have been sent out by the department are the best films I have seen in that line.

I saw one dealing with the lumber industry in the province of the hon. member for Vancouver South. That film was shown in the United States and is bound to have the effect of bringing tourists to Canada and of creating a demand for Canadian lumber. I cannot understand men being opposed to films that encourage industry and tourists to come to Canada. I am not at all in accord with what the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario said. My whole life has been spent with workers in industry, and my whole life has been directed to providing jobs. You cannot provide jobs if you are going to look at a few dollars and oppose the showing of what industry does.

I should like to ask the department to make a film on Shipshaw and show the three-way trade that is created there. We should show people how we bring bauxite from British Guiana to Shipshaw, how we produce the power and aluminum, and then how we make paper at Chicoutimi and ship it to England on the same boats, permitting them to make the round trip. More power to the government—I am not speaking from a party point of view—when it says that it intends to show throughout the world what Canadians are doing. Do not hesitate to ask for a little more money. I will support anything that will build industry in this country.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Could the minister give us any idea as to who the new head of the film board will be and when it is likely he will be appointed.

Mr. CLAXTON: No; I am sorry that that information cannot be given. As the hon. member knows, the national film board is set up under the act, and the board has not yet had an opportunity of considering that question.

I should like to answer briefly requests that were made for specific information. The revenue from films as shown for 1944-45 in the annual report of the film board, which was tabled on November 14, 1945, was $72,088.57. That was asked for by the hon. member for Rosedale.

In reply to the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, the increases have included an extra $127,000 for the distribution of films in the rural communities in Canada; $110,000 for equipment, due to the fact that the present equipment has been worked exceedingly hard during the war years; $100,000 for the development of international circulation; and $125,000 for the ordinary national film programme circuits—that is distribution. In other words, the expenses, totalling about the amount mentioned, are for increased distribution rather than for increased production.

One final word in appreciation of what the hon. member for Davenport has said, and that is that when we are thinking of the distribution of films not only in our own country but in other countries we should think in terms of the possible gain, and if we have the gain in the tourist business in Canada that we expect, the tourist industry will become the greatest single industry in this country exclusive of agriculture. We can expect to have an annual income from this industry of something in the neighbourhood of $300,000,000 a year. The distribution of films, information and knowledge of our country abroad will help to bring that about.

Mr. ADAMSON: The film board does not intend to produce anything except documentary films, not the whole length film?

Mr. CLAXTON: No, we do not intend to compete with Hollywood.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I wish to thank the minister, and all I suggest is that next time we be given the information.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Will the minister give us the assurance, or can he work on his colleagues so that next session we shall have three days instead of three hours in which to discuss these matters?

Mr. CLAXTON: That is in the hands of the house. We have sat for seventy-four days, but I hope that it can be arranged.

May I correct the answer that I gave to the hon. member in the southwest corner? Penicillin does come within the range of vote 206, among the items covered there.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUSPENSION OF ELEVEN O'CLOCK RULE

Mr. MACKENZIE: Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the house I move that this house be not adjourned at eleven o'clock this day.

Mr. BRACKEN: I move in amendment that we shall not sit beyond 11.45 this day.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I will accept the amendment.

DEPARTMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE

241. Departmental administration, $40,716.

Mr. ADAMSON: May I ask when the returns of the chief electoral officer covering the election in June will be tabled?

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Secretary of State): They are now working on it, but I am afraid that it will not be ready for tabling this session unless we sit here for another two or three weeks.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I have had objections from printers and trade unions that the printing done for the government is not done in union shops and asking that the employees of the king's printer be unionized. Can the minister give us any information on that?

Mr. MARTIN: Most of the men who are employed by the king's printer are men who have belonged to printing organizations. Only quite recently the pay of the mechanical staff, the linotype operators and so on, was increased. The statute requires that the pay be the average of the wages paid in the various printing shops in the cities of Montreal and Toronto, and I am pleased to say that this was done. Possibly what my hon. friend has in mind is another type of complaint altogether, namely, that some of the men who are appointed are not themselves trained operators and consequently do not come within the ambit of trade union membership.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Yes, that was it.

Item agreed to.

243. Canada Gazette, $29,969.

Mr. MacINNIS: Shortly after the beginning of the war the Canada Gazette was not distributed as it formerly was. There was an effort made to save paper, for instance, but now that the war is over and materials are becoming available, may we expect that the Canada Gazette will be printed and distributed as it was before the war?

Mr. MARTIN: The whole question of the distribution of the Canada Gazette is now under consideration, and I think that by next session my hon. friend will have his wishes largely met.

Mr. BRACKEN: Might I ask the minister to give us a general outline of what branches of the service come within his jurisdiction as secretary of state or in any other capacity?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes, and I am glad that the leader of the opposition has asked that question because my colleagues do not always fully appreciate the office of Secretary of State. Incidentally it is the oldest portfolio in the history of the country other than that of the post of Prime Minister.

The office of Secretary of State has under it first of all the administration of the companies branch, dealing with the incorporation of companies under dominion charter, which in itself, as the hon. gentleman will well appreciate is an important matter. There is also the registration of trade marks and patents, the correspondence branch which includes registration under the Trades Union Act, the king's printer, an organization of well over 900 printers and others, in regard to whom I may take this opportunity of making this statement, that during the war they rendered as valuable a service to this country as any group of servants or any other body of workers, with the possible exception of the armed forces, who, of course, bore the primary responsibility of carrying on the war. The printers, the linotype operators and the pressmen work three shifts and even to-day, this staff is working almost beyond human endurance. They deserve the thanks of this house, which I take the liberty of conveying to them on behalf of the house.

Then there is the civil service commission. It does not by statute come under the ministry of the Secretary of State, but by tradition and by custom the Secretary of State has acted as the liaison between the commission and parliament, and the executive arm of government, and I have taken advantage of the opportunity of extending the scope of the minister's functions in that regard. The civil service commission, supervising a personnel now of a little over 143,000, makes the government the largest employer in Canada.

In addition, there is the transfer of a new branch from the Department of National War Services, the citizenship branch, to that of the Secretary of State. Naturalization and matters affecting the status of aliens and nationality have been dealt with by the office of the Secretary of State. It may interest the committee to know that that is not as perfunctory an organization as it might seem when one considers that no less than a million people who are now nationals in this country have become nationals as a result of the benefits and procedures afforded under the Naturalization Act, and the care of the records of naturalization entails in itself a tremendous task.

Now to that has been added the citizenship branch, a branch of government that was created at the beginning of the war and was intended largely as a means of keeping in contact with all foreign language newspapers in particular and furnishing them with news and the translation of events. That now has been transferred to the office of the Secretary of State, and the intention is to make active use of the citizenship branch, to make it an integral part of the operations, which I trust will come into being when the Citizenship Act is passed by this house.

That in a general way is a survey of the office of Secretary of State.

Then, of course, there is the archives. The archives is one of the oldest branches in the department. It has to do with the preservation of documents both precious and practical, and those that are intended to serve an historical purpose. A new function is being added to the work of the archives by the creation recently by the government of a committee on the conservation of public records. One of the greatest disasters, from the point of view of historical research at the end of the last war, was that the storage of important documents was not adequate, with the result that many documents were lost, so that the writing of history suffered. Consequently an interdepartmental committee, under the chairmanship of the Secretary of State, has been set up to decide what documents shall be destroyed, what documents shall be preserved, and where in any event they shall be distributed. While this may seem to be a minor ministerial act on the face of it, it is an extremely important matter. I would say to hon. gentlemen that possibly the most important job, outside the minister's liaison activities with the civil service, is the fact that the Secretary of State is the custodian of enemy alien property. At the present time the Secretary of State, as custodian, is the most important trustee in Canada, and administers the largest trust fund. He administers property of a greater value than that held by any other trustee in the country.

The whole question of reparations and all that sort of thing is, of course, tied in with the administration of the custodian's office. I know I have greatly impressed the leader of the opposition. I can only hope that I have impressed the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

Mr. BRACKEN: The minister always impresses me, as I am sure he impresses the house when he speaks, and I wish to thank him for outlining the work of the department, which appears to be distributed in pieces all round the place. That is the only reason I rose to ask the question. Is it the intention of the minister to deal now with these different services? They are to be found in different places.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes. We are on the printing bureau.

Item agreed to.

245. Distribution of official documents, $51,202.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Would the minister consider making Hansard available at a lower cost so as to encourage popular subscription throughout the country? Does that come under his supervision?

Mr. MARTIN: Perhaps my hon. friend will join me some day in paying a visit to the treasury board.

Item agreed to.

318. Departmental administration, $99,050.

Mr. HAZEN: Where do we find the custodian of enemy property?

Mr. MARTIN: The office is created by statute, and the administration of the funds has nothing to do with the consolidated revenue. I have taken the position, and I believe quite properly, that if at any time the house should ask for a statement of particulars I would consider it my duty to give it. That may seem strange. The custodian in the United States, and custodians in other parts of the British commonwealth, do not take that view. The custodian in this country, however, takes that position, but there are no special accounts, by way of formal estimates. We are administering trust funds that belong to other people, which funds may, at some time in some way, be used in connection with claims. I was about to say that the value of the property we are administering is very considerable.

Mr. HAZEN: Do you not get money voted to pay the officials?

Mr. MARTIN: Under the statutes, and ensuing regulations, we are allowed to charge a certain fee for administration of the trust. The people whose estates are thus administered have the right to question the charge imposed and to go before the courts as in the case of any trust company or trustee. The funds we are administering do not necessarily belong to the crown, although the custodian is a minister of the crown and has the responsibility, on request, of making a report to the house.

Mr. HAZEN: In what year was the statute passed to which the minister has reference?

Mr. MARTIN: It was passed at the beginning of the first great war and additional powers were at the beginning of the recent war conferred by order in council.

Mr. ADAMSON: What is done with the funds of such concerns as Bayer Aspirin?

Mr. MARTIN: They are part of a trust account and they must be accounted for the same as any other trust.

Mr. ADAMSON: Is there a trust account with the Bank of Canada?

Mr. MARTIN: The funds are converted into recognized trust investment channels.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Mr. ADAMSON: The trustee has the power to invest.

Mr. MARTIN: He has a limited power like any other trustee.

Mr. ADAMSON: He can invest them in dominion government bonds?

Mr. MARTIN: In safe and designated securities.

Mr. BURTON: Has the custodian of enemy alien property any farm lands under his care that he would be disposing of?

Mr. MARTIN: As the hon. gentleman knows from a return I made to him the other day, there is a limited amount of farm lands in Saskatchewan under the custodian's control. I cannot say how much. It was the case to which my hon. friend referred the other day, the return to which I thought satisfied him fully, and there are other properties.

Mr. BURTON: I appreciate receiving the return brought down in the way in which it was, in spite of the fact that there was a certain amount of reservation. I should like to make a suggestion to the minister. Instead of the department disposing of farm lands in the manner in which it has been done in the past, I suggest that it be done through the Department of Veterans Affairs under the Veterans' Land Act. I think that would be the proper way to deal with it.

Mr. MARTIN: As the hon. gentleman knows, that matter is now receiving careful attention.

Mr. BURTON: What I have in mind is other cases that may develop.

Mr. BRACKEN: Am I correct in my understanding that there is no estimate required for this particular branch of the service?

Mr. MARTIN: There is not.

Mr. BRACKEN: I also understand that the minister makes no report to the house.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes; an annual report is prepared by the auditors, Price, Waterhouse and Company. In fact it is more than an annual audit; it is almost a running audit of the administration of the trust. Since taking over the office of Secretary of State, I have felt that there should be a further audit. Arrangements are now being made with the auditor general to make a supervisory audit, which will be complementary to that of the auditor mentioned. If at any time hon. members wanted information I would consider that it would have to be given to this house. During the war there were occasions for security reasons, when some of this information could not be openly discussed. Generally speaking, I think that time has passed.

Mr. BRACKEN: Is there an auditor's report in the public accounts?

Mr. MARTIN: No, there is no auditor's report in the public accounts, but hereafter the auditor general will make a supplementary report or a survey, and I presume that will appear in the accounts in some form.

Mr. BRACKEN: In recent years there has been no report.

Mr. MARTIN: There is an annual report made by the auditor, but it has not been given to the house. Hon. members have requested that information, but it has not been given openly for security reasons.

Mr. BRACKEN: In the early years of the war certain properties owned by communists in certain sections of Canada were taken by the government.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes, and temples.

Mr. BRACKEN: And sold. Later, these people wanted to get the properties back, and they have had difficulties. Does that come under the minister's department?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. BRACKEN: I think he had better tell us about that.

Mr. MARTIN: It comes under the custodian. At the beginning of the war, before the present minister was Secretary of State—

Mr. JACKMAN: Before Russia was in the fight.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes, before the entrance into the war of one of the later allies of the united nations, certain organizations were banned for certain reasons. These properties were taken over by the custodian and sold. Three or four years later, last year to be specific, in some instances these properties were repurchased, and compensation was paid by the custodian on recommendation of the governor in council.

Mr. BRACKEN: I happened to have information on some of these instances, because representations were made to us while I was engaged in another capacity.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. BRACKEN: I have in mind certain properties that were taken over by the government and sold. The former owners wanted them back but could not get them back. Could the minister tell us if the former owners of those properties which were taken over have been satisfied by the compensation they have received, or whether the government has recompensed them for any losses which may have been incurred or whether the government is out as a result of taking over these properties and then trying to satisfy the owners later?

Mr. MARTIN: The government is not out at all. I believe I can say that to the extent the settlement has been made these parties are satisfied.

Mr. JACKMAN: The government must be out some money. If the government expropriated the properties of the first group of Ukrainians, and then had to make restitution because of the changed international situation, it is not likely that the rival group, who in most cases acquired the properties, would give them back. They were transferred, and surely the government must either have made restitution in kind, or else given them money which satisfied them.

Mr. MARTIN: That is right.

Mr. JACKMAN: There must have been some loss in connection with it.

Mr. MARTIN: Payments, if that is what the hon. member means.

Mr. JACKMAN: How much did it cost the government, because of the action in the first place and the restitution?

Mr. MARTIN: I shall have to give the particulars at a later date.

Mr. JACKMAN: Is the custodian of enemy property free to give the committee an account of the property which is under his jurisdiction in that connection?

Mr. MARTIN: As custodian?

Mr. JACKMAN: Yes.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: As I understand it, not only enemy property is in his custodianship but also property of nationals in enemy occupied countries. Can he give us the figure for the respective former occupied countries in that connection? We are now granting aid to many of these countries. Is it a fact that some of their nationals owned valuable securities either representing properties in Canada or the physical paper security in the custodianship of the minister? What is the amount of that? Has the government made any effort to make sure that Canada acquires the securities against aid which may be given to some of these formerly enemy occupied countries?

Mr. MARTIN: With regard to the value of the property under the custodian, the hon. member will understand that there is a difference between par and market value. I hesitate a little even to say this, but I would think that possibly the market value of the property—and this is a very rough estimate—might be close on to one billion dollars. That does not mean that that would be the actual value at the date of the sale or that it is the assessed value. It would all depend on contingencies which my hon. friend no doubt appreciates. I cannot tell him offhand the value of the property of nationals in enemy occupied territory. I was going to hazard a guess, but perhaps I had better not do that.

With regard to the general question that he raised, there is taking place in Paris at the moment—possibly the conference is over now—a sort of preparatory commission leading up to a more general reparations conference, at which conference presumably will be discussed the whole question of reparations arising out of direct damage to property as a result of the war, or as a result of the cost of the war to the countries participating in the conference. The problem would be whether Canada would make a claim for damage to property, which conceivably might be relatively slight, or whether she would simply make a claim for the cost of the war against the enemy. At the moment I can only say that those matters have not been decided. The conference which is now under way is a preliminary one, and we shall have to await the return to Canada of our representatives there, who include a representative of the custodian's office.

Mr. JACKMAN: That relates to enemy property. Could the minister say anything about the property owned by nationals of formerly occupied countries?

Mr. MARTIN: That would be all part of the claim. When we come to assess what Canada's reparation claim will be, circumstances of that nature will be borne in mind. The question then to consider will be the control which any individual country may be able to exercise over the assets of the enemy within the possession of the applicant country, in this case Canada; for instance, to what extent would Canada have control of these assets at the end of the war?

Mr. JACKMAN: The enemy assets of which we now have control undoubtedly will not go back to the enemy; certainly they will go to make up the reparations.

Mr. MARTIN: That would depend on the general united nations decision.

[Mr. Jackman.]

Mr. JACKMAN: In connection with the other class of assets, owned by nationals of enemy occupied countries, surely there will be no claims against them on the part of other countries. But we in Canada are advancing money to some of these countries by way of relief, and I submit that at the same time wealthy nationals of these countries should not be allowed to withdraw those securities for their own uses, while Canada, as it were, makes an outright gift. I wish to know if there are substantial assets owned by these nationals of formerly occupied countries, and what the present policy of the government is in regard to their disposition vis-a-vis the gifts or credits we are advancing to these countries.

Mr. MARTIN: There are assets, but I can only say that the matter has not reached a state of final decision. It depends upon the circumstances which I just mentioned in a general way.

Mr. JACKMAN: But you are not releasing the assets?

Mr. MARTIN: No.

Mr. BRACKEN: I wish to ask one further question. I am not clear with respect to the owners of properties which were taken over by the government early in the war under this arrangement, and some of which I know were sold at figures considered to be less than their value. I understood from the minister that the former owners had been satisfied in some way. I do not see how they could be satisfied under circumstances like that, unless somebody satisfied them, which would mean unless Canada assisted them. I am not asking the minister for an answer now, but it is a point on which I should like some information, if not now, at least some time. At the moment I am not criticizing the administration; it is just that we do not have the information we think we should have.

Mr. MARTIN: I can only say that to the best of my knowledge the parties involved seem to be satisfied. I am not aware that they are not. I had a discussion with them last week in respect of another matter, and some slight reference was made to the former arrangement. I could only assume from the discussion which took place in my office that there was no dissatisfaction.

Mr. MOORE: I have had several letters from Chinese residents of Vancouver who, prior to the outbreak of the Japanese war, bought bank drafts in favour of Chinese benevolent societies. These Chinese tell me that the bank drafts were never delivered in Hong Kong, owing to the fact that war broke out, and now they believe their money should be refunded. I understand that there have been some communications between the government and the banks in connection with this matter. Is there any possibility of these people having their money refunded in the near future?

Mr. MARTIN: This matter will be given the fullest attention and consideration.

Item agreed to.

319. Naturalization branch, $65,655.

Mr. GREEN: Have any changes been made in the naturalization procedure? I know he had in mind introducing more solemnity into the court ceremony, and there was also some talk of setting up schools at which applicants for naturalization could acquire some idea of Canadian history, the Canadian constitution, and the responsibilities of citizenship. Have any steps been taken in that direction?

Mr. MARTIN: I am quite aware of the hon. gentleman's interest in these matters and his participation in the discussions of the defence of Canada regulations committee on these very points. One or two of his suggestions have been borne in mind by myself and my officials ever since I have been in the ministry. As the hon. gentleman knows, there is now before parliament a new Citizenship Act, under which authority is given to make regulations in regard to the ceremony of naturalization, and later, under the new act, the ceremony of admission into citizenship, in order to make these much more impressive functions than hitherto has been the case. I can only say that after I became Secretary of State I took the position that some special attention ought to be paid to the delivery of these naturalization certificates, and a carefully prepared letter, a welcoming letter of warmth, of understanding and of cooperation has accompanied every certificate that has gone out. These letters are important, not because they bear my signature, but because they come from a minister of the crown. Last week I took part in a ceremony in Toronto, when some fifty new Canadians were admitted into citizenship. Judge Parker, the senior county court judge of the county of York, who has been perhaps one of the outstanding judges in seeing that these ceremonies have been conducted seriously and impressively, asked me to take part in the ceremonies; the daughters of the empire and other organizations participated and it is the intention of the Secretary of State in the course of the next year to go right across the country attending these ceremonies, with the idea of seeing if we cannot make them more impressive and more awe-inspiring not only for those becoming Canadian citizens but also for those participating in the ceremonies as sponsors.

It will be the job of this new citizenship branch to assist in doing that very thing. The naturalization branch deals with the issuing of certificates, the filing of certificates and other ministerial acts. Once that has been done, the job of making the ceremony more impressive will be up to the new branch, and that matter is being carefully considered along the general lines I have just indicated.

Mr. GREEN: What about the schools?

Mr. MARTIN: The new citizenship branch will work in cooperation with various organizations in the country, including some of the high schools. In the city of Toronto, for instance, night classes are held at certain times of the year by well-intentioned men and women who teach civics and history in these schools, to give the fundamentals of our way of life and our form of government to these new Canadians. The intention is to prepare a satisfactory manual, in collaboration with national organizations throughout the country, to give these people the essentials and to impress upon them not only the advantages but, as well, the responsibilities of the step they have taken. We are keeping in close touch with many of the organizations of new Canadians, through their publications and so on, and we hope to extend that work along the lines my hon. friend has indicated. I hope, by the end of the next session, after the new act has come into existence, to be able to indicate not only what we intend to do but what we have really succeeded in doing.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): The minister has paid tribute to Judge Parker for what he has done in connection with naturalization. I suggest that tribute should also be paid to Mr. Justice Dysart of Winnipeg, who has done excellent work along these lines.

Mr. MARTIN: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I am informed Mr. Justice Dysart sent the department a set of recommendations. Probably that was before the present minister took office. Can he tell us about them and whether the department has acted upon them in any way

Mr. MARTIN: I am glad that the hon. member mentioned Mr. Justice Dysart who, in his capacity as a supreme court judge, and also as one of the officers of the Winnipeg Canadian Club took upon himself the responsibility of giving this matter direction in that city. I am pleased to join with my hon. friend in paying tribute to Mr. Justice Dysart.

The recommendations he has sent have been carefully considered. Many of them cannot be implemented until the new act comes into being, but some of them have been implemented and, generally speaking, they meet with departmental approval.

Item agreed to.

320. Companies branch, $43,095.

Mr. JACKMAN: I understand that changes have been made in the British companies act, upon which ours is closely modeled. Has the minister given consideration to those recent changes, and does he propose at a subsequent session to incorporate any of them in our Companies Act?

Mr. MARTIN: I am hoping that at a subsequent session there will be some revision. I cannot say at this time whether those revisions will include any of the suggestions made in the British act. However, they are being carefully considered.

Item agreed to.

322. Bureau for translations, $423,870.

Mr. BRACKEN: Why is there an increase here?

Mr. MARTIN: There have been some increases as of two or three months ago, and there will be more. The task imposed upon the bureau for translation is simply tremendous. I am afraid we have overworked a good many of these translators during the war, particularly, and the job has not eased up. The creation of some of these new departments has placed upon the bureau for translations a heavy task, and I can only say that this increase is due to increased work.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): How many are in the bureau?

Mr. MacINNIS: The information states hat there are eighty-eight.

Mr. MARTIN: There are more than that now, about 180, including the temporaries.

Item agreed to.

325. Patent and copyright office; administration division, $35,375.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: What is the process followed in having an invention patented?

Mr. MARTIN: I hope my hon. friend will not misunderstand me when I say that the soundest procedure is to consult a good lawyer, and particularly one who has had experience in this type of work. However, the procedure, briefly, is that you send on your specifications or plans to the commissioner and to the department. They are dealt with and examined, in the light of prior claims, special attention being paid to the matter of encroachment. This procedure is technical, and depends upon the type of invention. However, the formula of approach is simple.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Why does the minister think the best approach is through a lawyer? What has a lawyer to do with the matter, when acting as go-between?

Mr. MARTIN: One would wish to make sure that his plan or device is clear and unequivocal. There are men in the legal profession who have had engineering training, and who have special qualifications for drawing plans and giving advice. They can carry on technical discussions with the examiners and other officers of the department.

However, there are hundreds of these applications concerning which no legal advice is given, nor am I suggesting that it should be sought in every case. But in an application which involves a complicated invention, let us say for industrial use, and that sort of thing, it is good advice to have the services of a competent lawyer. As I have said, there are many inventions which do not require that kind of assistance. But, as one goes to a doctor for an appendectomy, one should go to a person qualified to deal with patent applications, when he has a detailed device to be patented.

Mr. McMASTER: A very fine book has been issued by the department, which deals completely with the subject.

Mr. WRIGHT: I do not wish to hold up these estimates, but I must point out that in the last two or three years, in investigations in the United States and Canada an increasing amount of evidence has been brought out respecting the curtailment of trade through the holding of certain patent rights by various companies. I believe that the time has come when we should set up a committee of the house, probably at the next session, to go into this whole matter of patents, and our relationship in international agreements, as applied to patents.

It is time this matter was considered, because we are entering a period when we shall want to have freer trade relations with all parts of the world. From the evidence accumulated in the last few years there can be no doubt that the matter of patents has been restricting international trade—and not only international trade, but trade within our own boundaries. Would the minister consider setting up a special committee of the house at the next session to consider this whole matter of Canadian patents, and their relationship to international patent agreements?

Mr. MARTIN: The administration of this particular division would not, in itself, be concerned with the general problem discussed by the hon. member. Essentially we are a ministerial body carrying out a definite function. But to the extent that this does involve the broader policy may I say that my own sympathies in this matter are not dissimilar to those of the hon. member. I have already taken steps in this connection, and matters are now being studied in circles beyond my own department.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Are there any limitations, under the legislation as it now exists, respecting the length of time a patent can run? Does the department require when such patents shall be used, stipulating that otherwise they will lapse?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes, there are such conditions.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What is the length of time?

Mr. MARTIN: It would depend upon the circumstances. However, there are conditions of use.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Covering all patents?

Mr. MARTIN: Most patents, yes. It would not cover them all, but, generally speaking, that is correct.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Could the minister give an approximation of the number of patents now in his office?

Mr. MITCHELL: Call up on the telephone on Monday.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I will call on Tuesday, when the minister's estimates come up—or on Wednesday.

Mr. MARTIN: I will give that information to my hon. friend, although I have it with me at the present time.

Item agreed to.

579. Companies branch, further amount required, $5,200.

Mr. JACKMAN: Does this branch result in a net revenue, or after taking off the fees, is it an expense to the government?

Mr. MARTIN: The revenue far exceeds the expenditures, and that is true all through the years.

Mr. JACKMAN: I take it that the revenue goes directly to the consolidated fund.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

Departmental administration, $526,002.

Mr. MacINNIS: As far as certain phases of its work are concerned, the functions of the Department of Labour will become of increasing importance. We are now in a period of shortage of labour and are back again where we were before the war when we have more applicants for jobs than there are jobs. The latest official report that has come to my hand shows that the unemployment situation at the beginning of October was commencing to get bad. At that time there was a decline of 42,437 persons employed as compared with September 1. The employment situation in all but three of the twenty largest cities of Canada showed a decline in employment on October 1 as compared with September 1.

As far as Vancouver is concerned, employment has been on the decline since October 1, 1944. Some people may not realize this, but the payroll index from October 1, 1944, to October 1, 1945, shows a fall of 10·7 per cent. I am wondering what the policy of the department will be to take care of the unemployment situation and to stop this trend before it goes so far as to cause, not only distress but unrest in various centres of Canada. When we were discussing the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs figures were quoted to show that the situation in Vancouver was extremely critical and likely to cause trouble at any time. Before we adjourn, could the minister give a summary of what the department has in mind to meet this situation?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): As my hon. friend knows, the Department of Labour is a placement agency. My hon. friend had ample opportunity to discuss this matter when the estimates of the Department of Reconstruction were being reviewed. I think it will be freely admitted that the placement machinery we have to-day is far better than anything we have had before in the history of this country. I am amazed myself that conditions are somewhat better than some agents of gloom predicted a few months ago they would be. At that time we heard predictions of there being half a million people out of employment by the end of October. When we realize that during the last four months we have placed over 750,000 people in the employment stream it gives some idea of the resiliency of free institutions and the ability of our Canadian economy to absorb people into productive employment.

I am not underestimating the magnitude of the problem; but in view of the sudden collapse of Japan and the almost overnight stoppage of war production, the results achieved so far have been in my opinion—I am speaking as an individual who has watched this situation closely from day to day—much better than the most sanguine people imagined they would be. Let us get back to our machinery. This is a seasonal country. Many years ago my hon. friend and myself advocated the institution of unemployment insurance. That has been established and almost 2,500,000 people come within the orbit of that policy.

This is the time when we get a drop in employment which one looks for in a country of this description. We even had it last year. I remember some of the difficulties with which some of my hon. friends were confronted in the supply of man-power for many of our basic industries. I am not one of those who are fearful of the future. I believe that the Canadian economy is in as sound shape as any other economy I know of to face up to the inevitable situation. In Great Britain they still have close to 4,000,000 people in the armed forces, and at the moment they have an unemployment situation of about 100,000. It is what one might call a book item.

My. hon. friend spoke of Vancouver, and I should like to say this about that situation. Like all cities in which one does not experience the rigours of climate that we have in the central and northeastern parts of America, it is inevitable that there be a shift of population toward that city. I do not know what one can do about it when freedom of movement is guaranteed to any individual in this country. It is just one of those things that are done in every country where these extreme conditions exist. We had it in pre-war days, and we had it in considerable measure during the war period when people from the prairie provinces went to the coast, just as they do in the United States to get away from the rigours of the climate. I am not an alarmist. I do not take a negative attitude on questions of this kind. I have expressed this opinion before, that provided we can maintain a stable price level and get the cooperation of the people of this dominion and, of course, a reasonable stability in international trade which is of great importance to a country where two out of every five persons rely upon export trade for opportunities for employment—

Mr. MacNICOL: Two out of every five depending on exports?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, I think that is correct.

Mr. JACKMAN: Correct.

Mr. MITCHELL: Two out of every five, speaking from memory.

Mr. BRACKEN: I think it is three out of eight.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is approximately the same. When we get that and a proper distribution of labour in this country I am hopeful that some of the predictions of the calamity howlers will disappear. That is a prediction.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is a hope.

Mr. MITCHELL: Just wait a minute. You should not call me that.

Mr. MacINNIS: I did not call you anything. I said it is a hope, not a prediction.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is just like the speech the hon. member made the other day in regard to stabilizing the price level. If my hon. friend wants to discuss that I shall be glad to discuss it with him at some other time. The government should be given some credit for the contribution we have made in this war when the situation was very dark and we stood alone. We should be given credit for sincerity in our approach to the problems that faced us. My hon. friend in his speech only yesterday—paradoxical, it is true—said that this had been the ablest government in the country and that this was the ablest parliament in his memory. We are in the soup together, and that is why I like parliament. That is why I think there is nothing better. My hon. friend laughs.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am laughing because you like parliament because we are all in the soup together.

Mr. MITCHELL: A good bowl of soup would probably do my hon. friend no harm. I like parliament because you get criticism, which is the lifeblood of democracy, and notwithstanding all the good things my hon. friend said about the ability of the government I still think we can learn from the opposition and even from himself.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is rather remote.

Mr. MITCHELL: You said that; I did not.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE: Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the house I would move a motion which I have already discussed with the various groups. I move:

That when the house adjourns this day it stands adjourned until Monday next at eleven o'clock, and that the house do sit through Monday without recess until six p.m., and from eight p.m. until midnight or until such earlier time as the business of the house is concluded, and that standing orders 2, 6 and 7 be suspended in relation thereto.

Mr. NICHOLSON: At the rate at which we have been proceeding to-day and yesterday I hesitate to support the motion for fear that we might be here until Wednesday or Thursday. Could we not leave the motion over until Monday?

Mr. MACKENZIE: The only alteration it makes is that we sit during the luncheon recess.

Mr. MITCHELL: I thought the motion was to allow the house to carry on until three or four o'clock in the morning.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No, until midnight, if we do not conclude the business earlier.

Mr. BRACKEN: That is an invitation that we hurry up and get through early.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Since this motion means that we are going to sit without the noon recess, I think we should be given the order in which the various departments and other business will be taken up and that that schedule should be adhered to.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have that here and will give it when moving the adjournment of the house.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: At eleven o'clock on Monday morning the Prime Minister will proceed with the resolution in regard to atomic energy and then with his estimates on external affairs and the various other estimates in relation to the Prime Minister's departments. When we dispose of that we shall take up in this order; Fisheries, the Department of Labour, Post Office and Public Works, Finance, which includes the auditor general; Transport, Reconstruction and Munitions and Supply are all together to be handled by the Minister of Transport: National Defence; legislation, under the jurisdiction of Mr. Speaker; National Revenue. That is the order so far as it can be followed.

Mr. HANSELL: Might I suggest that if we proceed on this schedule there should be a wide discussion allowed on the items? We cannot sit all day without nourishment, and the result is that a member may come back and find that the item he is interested in has been passed.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think the various groups and parties can easily arrange relays of those who want to be in the house and the rest can have a lunch outside.

Mr. HANSELL: The trouble is that the other man cannot make my speech and I cannot make his.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I realize the impossibility of the situation.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 11.50 p.m.

Monday, December 17, 1945.

The house met at eleven o'clock.

THE PRIME MINISTER

CONGRATULATIONS ON ATTAINMENT OF HIS SEVENTY-FIRST BIRTHDAY

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on the order for motions I would crave the indulgence of the house to mention a matter which I think is of interest to all members. I see by the press this morning and by other evidences in this chamber that one among our number is celebrating an important event; and so before we begin this busy day, I should like to take this opportunity of complimenting the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) upon achieving another anniversary in a very active life.

I do not know whether the Prime Minister welcomes these recurring anniversaries any more than the rest of us, but I suppose there is nothing we can do about it, and so we have to accept them as they come. May I compliment the Prime Minister upon attaining the ripe age of seventy-one years. I am sure that all other hon. members of this house will wish him many happy returns of this day.

Some of us could have hoped that he might have made fewer mistakes in the last half of that busy life and have avoided some of the errors that have come his way; but on an occasion like this we forget those errors and overlook those mistakes, seeing only the bright spots and the attainments of a busy, happy and successful life.

I am pleased to join with others in wishing the Prime Minister many happy returns of the day; and I am sure we all trust that he will have buoyant health so that he may enjoy them all.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I am sure the group with which I am associated would wish to join with the leader of the opposition in congratulating the Prime Minister on the achievement of another birthday. It seems to me that we regard the coming years from three points of view. When we are young they do not come around fast enough; then we reach the stage where we feel they are coming too fast; then later we come to the stage where we boast about our old age. I am glad that the Prime Minister is still in the second stage, when he is enjoying life to the extent that he feels the years are going by too fast.

As regards the mistakes he has made in the past, without detracting from anything I have said, or anything that the leader of the opposition has said, I trust that the right hon. gentleman will avoid the opportunities for so many mistakes in the future.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, it gives us in this corner of the house great pleasure to associate ourselves with the congratulations which have been extended to the Prime Minister by the leader of the opposition. We have noted the recurrence of youthful appearance and the resurgence of spirit in the Prime Minister, and we wonder if his trip to the old country, to which we all cheerfully agreed, did not have something to do with it. Since he came back we have noted, sir, the resurgence of which I speak. Perhaps the best evidence of it that I could mention at this time would be the rousing speech he gave in the house the other day, when he upheld the dignity of this parliament and put forth his arguments in behalf of the independence of parliament. I thought it was a splendid speech, and I want to congratulate him upon it.

It is not often, I am sure, that a parliament has the opportunity to extend congratulations to a Prime Minister who has been in service so long as has the Prime Minister of Canada, and who has served with such great distinction. In the circumstances, sir, since he has reached the ripe age—I am not going to say "ripe old age" because I should hate to get into a tussle with him right now—of seventy-one in the service of his country, it seems to me that if anyone is entitled to what is known as the Canada Medal, the Prime Minister is entitled to it. I am just offering the suggestion that some action might be taken at this time to see that this medal is presented to the Prime Minister, and certainly I would concur in that recognition.

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): I am very happy to extend my personal congratulations to the Prime Minister on this event, and I am also happy to extend best wishes to the right hon. gentleman on behalf of my father, who has been a supporter of the Liberal party for seventy years.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Perhaps I might be permitted by my colleagues here, because for the moment we know no parties in this house, to join in these very happy expressions of congratulations to one of the greatest Canadians of all time. We who have worked with him, who know the great story of his life, who know the promise of the dawn, the fulfilment at noontide and the notable achievements of the mellow afternoon, wish for him, now that he is approaching the twilight, happiness, health, peace, and sweet content.

Hon. LOUIS S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all the hon. members of this house whose mother tongue is that one of the two official languages of this country which has not yet been used this morning for the purpose of congratulating the right honourable the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) are anxious that we should tell him in French how much we share in his joyous feelings on this anniversary, and with what sincerity and true affection we associate ourselves with the other hon. members of the house in complimenting him not only on having reached the age of 71, but also on having achieved the wonderful work which has marked his whole career, and in wishing that he may long continue to enjoy good health so that he may perform many other meritorious deeds in the interests of the Canadian nation.

(Text.)

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, Your Honour and other hon. members of the house will probably realize why I was so anxious that this house should get through its business in time to permit of prorogation on Saturday night. I do indeed feel at the moment that it is almost easier to endure criticism than to receive praise in public. However, I should be less than human were I not very deeply touched by the words of friendship and regard which have been expressed this morning by the leaders who have spoken on behalf of all parties and by the member for Kootenay West. I thank my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken); my hon. friend for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) who is leading the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation; my hon. friend the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low); and my very close friends, the minister of veterans affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) and the leader of my party in the province of Quebec (Mr. St. Laurent), and all here assembled, for the tributes so generously paid to me this morning.

May I take advantage of this opportunity not only to thank hon. members of this house for the good wishes they have extended but also members of the other house of parliament, my friends in the press gallery, officials of my own department and other departments of the service and many others for expressions of good will they have sent to me at this time. I am sorry that thus far I have not had, and I doubt if I shall have this week or perhaps at all, an opportunity to convey my thanks personally, but I shall be happy if this word might be regarded as a very sincere expression of thanks to those in my own country and those in other countries who have been kind enough to send me birthday greetings.

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition has said something about my mistakes in the past, and hopes that I will not make many more in the future. I think the hon. member for Vancouver East also made some reference to my mistakes. Well, I thank the Lord that I have not made as many mistakes as they have made. Though I have lived a longer time I feel pretty sure my mistakes have been fewer than theirs. However, I wish for them what they have wished for me, that they may make fewer mistakes in the future.

May I say a word about the references which have been made to what some have said seems to be an evidence of renewed youth and vigour and strength. I must confess that I do feel in better health than I have felt in many years, despite the fact that I am seventy-one years old to-day. If hon. members will reflect for a moment they will see immediately the reason for this. No man in the position of responsibility I have held during the past six or eight years could possibly expect to feel other than more than burdened by the load of responsibility he was carrying. All during the war I was very concious of the fact that much of my real self was being repressed, and necessarily so, because of an unwillingness to say a word or do any thing which might, however great the provocation, occasion the least strife or increase opposition between parties in this house and in the country. During the period of the war I often wished that I could let loose on some hon. gentlemen opposite, but at the time I realized that I was the leader of a party government and that there were other parties in this house, so that much I should like to have said in answer to what seemed to me most unfair criticisms of the administration, I felt I should refrain from saying, and endure in silence. Repression is not good for anyone, particularly in the matter of speaking one's own mind. I confess that not infrequently I felt a bit ahamed of myself sitting here and listening without retort to some of the very unfair and unjust criticisms which were made from time to time. But if it helped to get through that period as well as we did, then it was all to the good.

However, the real burden was not that. It was the thought that was shared by all hon. members and by the people of Canada generally of the terrible suffering being endured and the appalling loss of life incurred by our fellow countrymen and by men and women throughout the world. The burden of that thought was great indeed; to realize that to-day all that is in the past is to be freed of a load the like of which has not had to be borne at any other time.

May I say that the year immediately preceding the war was even harder to endure than the actual war years. Often I felt at that time that something terrible was coming, something in the nature of colossal catastrophe for mankind, that one would have to make decisions of a nature which might affect the course of events for centuries to come. In those days the load was much heavier than it was when, as between the contending forces of good and evil, came the opportunity to fight it out.

Now the war is over, and we have won. Canada has won a glorious place among the nations of the world, and the men and women of our armed services have fought a battle unsurpassed by the men and women of any other country. In this outcome one naturally feels great cause to rejoice.

I feel particularly happy when I think of what Canada accomplished during the period of the war and of what our country is doing in helping to relieve distress in the world to-day.

May I say to the members of my own party who have presented me with the beautiful flowers that are before me, that I deeply appreciate the sentiment to which they have given such generous expression in flowers, but which they have been too modest to express in words.

Just a word in conclusion. Looking to the future I feel more optimistic at this hour than I have at any time. Over the troubled waters of our day, I see on the horizon of the future the beginning of a new world order. There is much to cause alarm and concern; but I believe the heart of the world is more sensitive to the needs of mankind to-day than it has been at any previous time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

NATIONAL REVENUE—OTTAWA, MONTREAL AND QUEBEC—FRENCH SPEAKING EMPLOYEES AT $2,000 OR MORE

Mr. GAGNON:

1. What is the total staff employed in the offices of the Department of National Revenue at (a) Ottawa; (b) Montreal; (c) Quebec?
2. How many (a) French-speaking employees; (b) English-speaking employees are paid $2,000 or more per year in the said offices?

Mr. McCANN:

CIVIL SERVICE—REPLACEMENT AT AGE 65 BY VETERANS

Mr. THATCHER:

Has the government taken any steps since the end of the war to retire civil service employees aged 65 or over, and replace them with service veterans?

Mr. MARTIN: Perhaps I might be permitted to reply orally to this question. Steps are being taken in many instances to effect retirement so as to provide vacancies for veterans.

TAXES ON BEER AND SPIRITS

Mr. BLACK: (Yukon):

Of each dollar paid in purchase of alcoholic liquor and beer from provincial and territorial liquor vendors, how much of that dollar goes to (a) the dominion government in various imposts, taxes and duties; (b) the provincial and territorial governments; (c) the distiller, brewer or manufacturer of said liquor or beer?

Mr. McCANN: It is not possible to give a categorical answer to this question by reason of the variation which exists between the provinces.

A break-down of each dollar paid for the purchase of a well-known brand of spirits in one of the provinces discloses the following distribution, which may perhaps be taken as approximating the average:

(a) To the dominion government for duty and taxes.....41c
(b) To the provincial liquor control board 38c
(c) To the distiller.....21c

Beer is sold at such different prices and under such variable systems of distribution as to make it difficult to strike an average which would represent a fair statement.

SURPLUS WAR ASSETS—TRUCKS, ETC.

Mr. THATCHER:

1. Has the War Assets Corporation received a request from the city of Moose Jaw for fire trucks or other equipment now stored at No. 2 R.E.M.U.?
2. If so, on what date did it receive the request?
3. What action has been taken to date in regard to the request?

Mr. MACKENZIE:

1. Yes, a request has been received from the city of Moose Jaw for fire trucks stored at No. 2 R.E.M.U.
2. October 6, 1945.
3. This enquiry was acknowledged on October 13, 1945. The fire trucks have not been declared surplus to War Assets Corporation to date.

RAILWAY SIDINGS FOR STORAGE OF WAR MATERIALS

Mr. WHITE (Middlesex East):

1. Was any land in the east part of the city of London, or in the riding of East Middlesex acquired, bought or leased for the construction of Canadian Pacific Railway and Canadian National Railway sidings, for the purpose of storing of surplus or outdated war materials?
2. If so, what parcels of land and from whom were they purchased?
3. What price was paid for each?
4. What was the total cost to the government for land and construction?

Mr. MACKENZIE:

1. No. Various properties were leased by the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific Railways for storing Canadian government purchased material, and the railways were reimbursed by the Canadian government.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

4. The cost to the Canadian government was as follows:

Rent of leased property, C.P.R., $975.42; C.N.R., $1,795.00; total, $2,770.42.

Construction, C.P.R., $25,722.84; C.N.R., $45,437.71; total, $71,160.55.

SECOND CANADIAN DIVISION—N.M.R.A. PERSONNEL

Mr. GREEN:

What number and percentage of each unit of the Second Canadian Division returning to Canada were N.M.R.A. personnel?

Mr. ABBOTT:

PAMPHLET "CANADIAN AFFAIRS"

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North):

1. Has distribution of the pamphlet "Canadian Affairs" been withdrawn from civilian groups and individuals?

2. If so, what reason is given for this step?

3. How many copies of "Canadian Affairs" have been requested by civilian groups and individuals in the past three months?

Mr. CLAXTON:

1. Yes. A notice to this effect appeared in the issue of "Canadian Affairs" (Vol. 2 No. 16) dated October 1st, 1945.

2. P.C. 6300 of September 28, 1945, establishing the Canadian Information Service, authorized it "To provide means and facilities for distributing abroad information concerning Canada". Distribution of "Canadian Affairs" by the Canadian information service is only being made in Canada to civilian groups and individuals from the remaining stock of the former wartime information board. Distribution of current issues outside Canada is continuing.

3. From September 1 to December 11 the following quantities of "Canadian Affairs" have been supplied, on request, to civilian groups and individuals:

	Inside Canada	Abroad
Canadian Affairs.	52,226	6,701
Affaires Canadiennes.	11,103	274
	63,329	6,975

Most of this quantity has been supplied to Canadian groups and individuals who have wished to complete sets of the publication up to the time domestic distribution ceased or from groups wishing quantities of back numbers for winter study programmes.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT—MORTGAGE FORECLOSURES

Mr. FAIR:

1. Under the Soldier Settlement Board legislation, how many mortgages were secured on land owned by veterans at the time they purchased land from the board?

2. Since the inception of the scheme to date, how many foreclosures on the above-mentioned mortgages took place?

3. What is the name and address of those settlers against whom foreclosure proceedings were instituted and who finally were dispossessed of their land?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Answered by sessional paper 118B tabled on December 13, 1945.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

HOUSING—ADMINISTRATION CONVERSION PLAN

Mr. LENNARD:

1. Is the National Housing Administration Conversion plan being extended in Canada

2. If not, when did the extension cease, and why?

3. How many homes were converted in Canada under this plan to December 1, 1945?

4. How many in the area of Hamilton, Ontario?

5. What has been the cost of conversion of such houses in the Hamilton area?
6. How many inspectors, janitors and other persons are or have been employed in connection with the operation of this plan in the Hamilton area?
7. Who are they, and what amount is being or has been paid to each of them in salary and expenses?

FORESTRY ROADS

Mr. WHITE (Middlesex East):

1. Did the federal government make contributions towards the construction costs of provincial projects for construction of forestry roads for any of the years 1936 to 1940 inclusive?
2. If so, what were the total contributions for each year in each province?

CRUMLIN, ONT., AIRPORT

Mr. WHITE (Middlesex East):

1. What lands were acquired for the extension of R.C.A.F. air port at Crumlin, Ontario, other than the then existing London air port?
2. From whom were they purchased?
3. What was the acreage?
4. What was the price paid for the land?
5. Were any of the former owners extended an option of repurchase when not required further by the government?
6. Has any of this property, hangars, or buildings thereon been declared surplus?
7. What will be the ultimate disposal of these properties and buildings?
8. What township or county roads were closed in the extension of this air port?
9. Was reimbursement made (a) to the townships of West Nissouri, London, or the county of Middlesex for closing of roads; (b) to private individuals for damage or inconvenience?
10. If so, to whom?
11. What amounts were paid to each?
12. What properties were purchased for right of way for new road from the third concession, London township to second concession, West Nissouri?
13. From whom were these properties purchased?
14. What price was paid for each?
15. What was the total mileage of new road?
16. What was the total cost of construction?
17. Has the upkeep and maintenance of the new road been assumed by townships interested or by the county of Middlesex?

Mr. MARTIN: Return tabled.

ATOMIC ENERGY

APPROVAL OF AGREED DECLARATION SIGNED AT WASHINGTON, NOVEMBER 15, 1945

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the agreed declaration on atomic energy signed by the President of the United States, the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, and the Prime Minister of Canada, at Washington on November 15, 1945, and that this house do approve the same.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the House of Commons is being asked by the motion now before it to approve the agreed declaration on atomic energy which was signed at the White House, Washington, on the 15th of November of this year, by the President of the United States, the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and the Prime Minister of Canada.

The statement which embodies the declaration was read to hon. members of this house by my colleague, the Minister of Justice, on the afternoon of the day on which the declaration was made. Copies of the declaration in English and in French were tabled in pamphlet form on December 1. The declaration has received the widest publicity. I think it may be truly said that it has met with general approval.

As the declaration is one of far-reaching significance and historic interest, it is desirable that it should be formally approved by both houses of our parliament. Apart from other positive advantages, such approval should serve effectively to meet the criticism that the Prime Minister of Canada in joining with the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and the President of the United States in the discussions at Washington and in signing the declaration "either assumed that parliament and the Canadian people had no views on the atomic bomb question or that their views didn't matter; that it was within his sole right and power to determine what should be done." I am happy to say that this uncalled for criticism seems to have met only with the rebuke it so obviously deserves.

No discovery, in all time, has equalled in interest that of the release of atomic energy. No discovery has been fraught with possibilities which may prove to be either so baneful or so beneficial to mankind.

It may serve as a helpful introduction to an understanding of the problems which the discovery of atomic energy has created, if I say a word or two concerning the discovery itself, and the circumstances which led to the part the release of atomic energy came to have in military warfare. My introductory words may also help to give some idea of Canada's contribution to atomic research and processes, and to explain the strategic position which Canada, along with the United Kingdom and the United States, has come to hold in working towards a solution of problems to which the use of atomic energy has given rise.

All the world now knows that the sudden termination of the war against Japan was due to the appalling destruction of life and property wrought, in August of the present year, by the use of the atomic bomb against the cities of Hiroshima and Nagasaki.

Until recently the world believed that the atom was the ultimate indivisible particle of matter; a particle of matter so minute as to admit of no division. When the war began in 1939, scientists of many nations had come to recognize that the release of energy by the "splitting" of the atom, or what is scientifically referred to as "atomic fission" was a possibility. The war gave impetus to research into the means of releasing atomic energy and later to the production of atomic bombs.

At the outset, research was carried on mainly in the universities of the United Kingdom. During 1940 there was an interchange of information on war research between Britain, the United States and Canada. By the summer of 1941 such progress had been made in research in the application of atomic energy that it was felt that full use should be made of university and industrial laboratories in seeking to find, just as rapidly as possible, the means of producing atomic bombs. In October of 1941, upon the suggestion of President Roosevelt, there began a coordination and joint conduct of British and American efforts. In 1942 the United Kingdom authorities proposed that an important section of research into atomic energy should be carried on in Canada as a joint enterprise. The special Montreal laboratory of the national research council was thereafter organized, and staffed by over 300 workers. It was by far the largest organization ever created in Canada to carry out a single research project. Other research projects were undertaken at McMaster, Toronto and McGill universities, and at the national research laboratories in Ottawa.

Developments in the United States and Canada. By the summer of 1942, the expanded program of research seemed to justify a decision to proceed with the construction of large-scale production plants in the United States. The Americans alone were active in large-scale work.

At Quebec, in September 1943, an agreement was signed between Mr. Churchill and Mr. Roosevelt which bound their two countries to collaborate with the object of producing, as quickly as possible, a military weapon for use in the war. Under this agreement a combined policy committee was set up. Upon the invitation of Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill, in which I had concurred, Mr. Howe, the Minister of Munitions and Supply, was made a member of the combined policy committee as the representative of Canada.

Up to the present, uranium is the mineral that has been used as basic material for the atomic bomb process. Thorium is a probable second basic material for that purpose, although it is not as yet a proven material. The largest proved deposit of uranium ore is in the Belgian Congo, and the next largest is in Canada. As soon as the significant use of uranium in the atomic bomb process was disclosed to Mr. Howe and myself, we secured the approval of the cabinet of the purchase of the Eldorado uranium properties in the Great Bear lake area, and reserved for the government control of all such minerals as might be discovered in Canada in the future. This was a strategic factor of high importance, since this second largest known source of raw material thereby became accessible to the large manufacturing plants already built in the United States.

The work of the several research projects has been closely coordinated with the development of a pilot plant at Chalk River for the investigation of atomic energy processes. This work is of considerable importance. It includes the study of the utilization of thorium as a starting point for the production of "active material". This pilot plant is unique in character and is suitable for a field of research that has not been explored elsewhere.

Here may I quote from a statement prepared by Mr. Churchill while he was at the head of the coalition government. It was made public by his successor after Mr. Attlee's assumption of office.

Mr. Churchill's statement is as follows:

> In the United States the erection of the immense plants was placed under the responsibility of Mr. Stimson, United States Secretary of War, and the American army administration whose wonderful work and marvellous secrecy cannot be sufficiently admired. The main practical effort and virtually the whole of its prodigious cost now fell upon the United States authorities who were assisted by a number of British scientists.
>
> The relationship of the British and the American contributions was regulated by discussion between me and President Roosevelt, and a combined policy committee was set up. The Canadian government whose contribution was most valuable provided both indispensable raw material for the project as a whole, and also necessary facilities for the work of one section of the project which has been carried out in Canada by the three governments in partnership.

Elsewhere in his statement Mr. Churchill said:

> By God's mercy, British and American science outpaced all German efforts. These were on a considerable scale but far behind. The possession of these powers by the Germans, at any time, might have altered the result of the war.

It is worthy of notice that the determination to embark on large-scale undertakings for production of atomic bombs was agreed upon while some details of the project were still in the laboratory stage. The outcome was a most impressive demonstration of the collaboration of scientific skill and technical capacity conducted under conditions of the highest secrecy.

This aspect of the production of the atomic bomb was referred to by Mr. Churchill in the following words:

> The whole burden of execution including the setting up of the plants and many technical processes connected therewith in the practical sphere constitutes one of the greatest triumphs of American—or indeed human—genius of which there is record. Moreover, the decision to make these enormous expenditures upon a project which however hopefully established by American and British research remained nevertheless an awful uncertainty stands to the everlasting honour of President Roosevelt and his advisers.

What was aimed at in the combined efforts of the scientists was the development of methods for the release of atomic energy, either to produce an explosion, or as a source of power. The immediate purpose of the construction of large-scale production plants, and the work of the combined policy committee, was the use of atomic energy for military purposes.

It is now known that the release of atomic energy can be effected so rapidly that a few pounds of "active material" will produce an explosion equivalent to that of the setting off of several thousands of tons of TNT. On the other hand, the energy released can, it is believed, be so controlled as to produce a steady flow of heat obtainable at a temperature high enough to operate steamdriven electrical generating plants. One ton of "active material" used in this way would generate as much power as about three million tons of coal.

In a passage which will carry its appeal to every human heart, Mr. Churchill has vividly expressed the sentiments to which these amazing facts give rise:

> "This revelation of the secrets of nature long mercifully withheld from man should," he said, "arouse the most solemn reflections in the mind and conscience of every being capable of comprehension. We must indeed pray that these awful agencies will be made to conduce to peace among the nations and that, instead of wreaking measureless havoc upon the entire globe, they may become a perennial fountain of world prosperity."

This is the problem presented by the discovery of the release of atomic energy. Here is the challenge to our day and generation.

As to sharing information; up to a certain point the processes for releasing atomic energy are the same whether the purpose is an industrial, commercial or humanitarian use, or whether it is that of mass destruction. Up to this point of departure the processes are already quite widely known. The scientific knowledge upon which these processes are based has been shared by a number of nations.

Beyond this point of common development, the construction of atomic bombs consists of a series of highly technical manufacturing processes which are still very secret. Knowledge of these technical manufacturing processes is popularly referred to as the "know-how". It is this "know-how" which is possessed in whole or in part by Britain, the United States, and Canada, and which has not been made known to other nations. The reason for not imparting to other nations, without certain guarantees and controls, the "know-how" in the production of atomic bombs, is because of the potentialities of vast destruction involved.

It should not be supposed that the control of the raw materials presently enjoyed by Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States will, for any length of time, prevent developments in other countries. Neither should it be imagined that the processes in manufacturing atomic bombs—now secret—will prevent, indefinitely, similar developments in other countries. Even with international measures of supervision and control, it will be but a matter of time before all processes are known to practically all nations. Hence the need for immediate action to seek every available means to end all possibility of war itself.

I come now to the declaration on atomic energy signed at Washington, on November 15th last.

As hon. members are aware, I visited President Truman at the White House on September 30th, the day before I sailed from New York for England. During this visit, matters related to the atomic bomb were referred to in conversation between the President and myself. Mr. Truman invited me to visit him again on my return from abroad. He also told me that he was looking forward to a visit from Mr. Attlee, the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom.

Upon arrival in London, I learned from Mr. Attlee that, toward the end of September last, he had made known to the President his view on the vital importance to the world of the discovery of atomic energy. He had expressed the opinion that the application of atomic energy to warfare made it essential that those in responsible positions in the countries under whose auspices the development had taken place, should consider the problems to which it had given rise. In conveying to the President the tentative conclusions at which the British government had arrived, Mr. Attlee had suggested that personal discussion might follow.

On October 3, in a message to Congress, President Truman said:

> I therefore propose to initiate discussions, first with our associates in this discovery, Great Britain and Canada, and then with other nations in an effort to effect agreement on the conditions under which cooperation might replace rivalry in the field of atomic power.

While I was in London, communications were received from President Truman inviting Mr. Attlee and myself to come to Washington at as early a date as could be arranged to discuss with him the problems related to atomic energy.

In his Navy day speech on United States foreign policy, on October 27, President Truman, referring to his message to Congress, added that discussion of the atomic bomb with Great Britain and Canada, and later with other nations, could not wait upon the formal organization of the united nations.

Mr. Attlee and I arrived in Washington on the morning of Saturday, November 10th. Mr. Attlee had left London by plane on the afternoon of the previous day. I had left London on Saturday of the previous week to cross by ship. We arrived in Washington at the same hour. During our stay in Washington, every courtesy was extended to Mr. Attlee and myself by the President and the Secretary of State, Mr. Byrnes. From the hour of our arrival to the day of the signing of the declaration, meetings and conversations were held continuously.

In our consideration of the problems discussed, the President and Mr. Byrnes had the assistance of Dr. Vannevar Bush, director of the office of scientific research and development, and scientific adviser to the President's committee on atomic energy. Prime Minister Attlee was accompanied by Sir John Anderson, chairman of the advisory committee in the United Kingdom on atomic energy. Sir John Anderson is perhaps the best informed of anyone in the United Kingdom on the whole subject, and on the circumstances attending the work with the Americans and ourselves in the researches on atomic energy. Mr. Attlee was also assisted by Lord Halifax, the British ambassador. I was joined in Washington by Mr. Howe, the Canadian member of the combined policy committee, and Dr. C. J. Mackenzie, president of our national research council. I was also assisted while in Washington, by the Canadian Ambassador, Mr. L. B. Pearson; by Mr. Norman Robertson, the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, who had accompanied me to England, and by Mr. Hume Wrong, Associate Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, who joined Mr. Robertson and myself on our arrival in Washington.

I should like to acknowledge the invaluable assistance given me by all these gentlemen and by members of our embassy staff in Washington.

In asking hon. members to support the motion which is now before the house, approving the Washington declaration on atomic energy, I feel I cannot do better than to set forth essential features of the declaration itself and, in so doing, indicate governing considerations which were constantly in the minds of all who participated in the discussions.

There was recognition at the outset that the vast significance of the discovery of the release of atomic energy was not yet fully comprehended; that very few realized the far-reaching effect of the discovery upon the future of the world. It was agreed that the discovery had placed at the disposal of mankind means of destruction hitherto unknown, and against which there could be no adequate military defence, and in the employment of which no single nation could, in fact, have a monopoly. In a word, it was agreed that civilization could not survive an atomic war. It was also recognized that it was impossible to isolate the problem of the atomic bomb from the problem of the use of other weapons of destruction. The atomic bomb was seen as the latest word in destructiveness, but not necessarily the last.

The truth is that no system of safeguards that can be devised will of itself provide an effective guarantee against production of atomic weapons by a nation bent on aggression. Nor can we overlook the probability of the development of other major weapons of mass destruction, or of new methods of warfare which may constitute an ever greater threat to civilization than the military use of atomic energy. At Washington, we were therefore called upon to consider not merely the elimination of the atomic bomb as a weapon of war, but also the kind of world order which is necessary in an atomic age, if civilization is to survive.

In our deliberations we were seeking to take the first step in an effort to rescue the world from a desperate race in weapons of mass destruction. We were prepared to concede that the progress our three countries had made in the development and use of atomic energy demanded that our countries take the initiative in an international effort to prevent the further use of atomic energy for destructive purposes. We felt an equal obligation on the part of our countries to promote the use of recent and future exchanges of scientific knowledge, particularly in the utilization of atomic energy for peaceful and humanitarian ends. At the same time we sought to make very clear that the responsibility for devising means to ensure that the new discovery should be used for the benefit of mankind, instead of as a means of destruction, rested not on our nations alone, but on the whole civilized world.

In the agreed declaration we felt obliged to draw a distinction between the information essential for the development of atomic energy for peaceful purposes and the information concerning the practical industrial application of atomic energy.

Representing, as we did, the three countries which possess the knowledge essential to the use of atomic energy, we declared our willingness, as a first contribution, to proceed with the exchange of fundamental scientic information, and with the interchange of scientists, and scientific literature for peaceful ends, with any nation that would fully reciprocate. We stated our belief that the fruits of scientific research should be made available to all nations, and that freedom of investigation and the free interchange of ideas were essential to the progress of knowledge. The basic scientific processes essential to the development of atomic energy for peaceful purposes have already been made available to the world. We declared that all further information of this character that might become available from time to time should be similarly treated.

As I have already explained, the use of atomic energy for industrial, commercial and humanitarian purposes is dependent upon the same methods and processes as, up to a certain point, are required for the military exploitation of atomic energy. While we were prepared to share the information essential to the development of atomic energy for peaceful purposes, we were not convinced that the spread of the specialized information regarding the practical application of atomic energy in the manufacture of bombs, before it was possible to devise reciprocal and enforceable safeguards acceptable to all nations, would contribute to a constructive solution of the problem of the atomic bomb. On the contrary, we thought it might have the opposite effect. However, we stated our readiness to share, on a reciprocal basis, with others of the united nations, detailed information concerning the practical industrial application of atomic energy, just as soon as effective and enforceable safeguards against its use for destructive purposes could be devised.

The attention so far directed to the strictly war aspects of atomic energy—that is, to the atomic bomb—should not be allowed to obscure the immense possibilities of development of atomic energy for the arts of peace.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

The atomic bomb is a weapon of destruction unsurpassed in human experience. But the energy locked up inside the atom, controlled and directed to useful and constructive ends, may make it possible to provide goods and services for people throughout the world on a scale which we cannot now envisage. It may be the means of raising the standard of living; of providing physical comfort against hazards of weather and extremes of heat and cold. It may revolutionize some present-day means of transport and communication, making all countries of the world near neighbours in a more immediate sense than has been made possible even by the development of air transport.

It must never be forgotten, however, that the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes cannot be developed without at the same time producing the very material which is used in a bomb.

In order to attain the most effective available means of entirely eliminating the use of atomic energy for destructive purposes, and for promoting its widest use for industrial, commercial and humanitarian purposes, we gave it as our opinion in the Washington declaration that at the earliest practicable date a commission should be set up under the united nations organization, to prepare recommendations for submission to the organization. We expressed the view that the commission should be instructed to proceed with the utmost despatch; and that, in particular, it should make specific proposals (a) for extending, between all nations, the exchange of basic scientific information for peaceful ends; (b) for the control of atomic energy to the extent necessary to ensure its use only for peaceful purposes; (c) for the elimination from national armaments of atomic weapons and of other major weapons adaptable to mass destruction; and (d) for effective safeguards by way of inspection and other means, to protect complying states against the hazards of violations and evasions. These tasks may well have to move forward by separate stages, building upon the confidence which the progressive exchange of information will provide.

Under the charter of the united nations the signatory powers have pledged themselves not to use force except in support of the purposes and principles of the charter. At Washington we expressed the view that by whole-hearted support of the united nations organization, and by consolidating and extending its authority, thereby creating conditions of mutual trust in which all peoples will be free to devote themselves to the arts of peace, there would be found the most immediately available means of maintaining the rule of law among nations and of banishing the scourge of war from the earth. We declared it to be the firm resolve of our three countries to work without reservation to achieve these ends.

Nothing can be truer than that without unremitting cooperation and the united effort of nations there will be no enduring and effective protection against the atomic bomb. Nor without this cooperation and united effort can there be protection against the indiscriminate use of poison or against the latest refinements in gas warfare, or protection against bacteriological warfare, all of which are even more frightful methods of human destruction than the atomic bomb. To ensure civilization from destruction it is not enough to banish atomic or gas or bacteriological warfare; we must banish war itself.

It is intended that the proposals of the Washington declaration for the establishment of a commission to prepare recommendations on the means of dealing with the problems raised by the development of atomic energy should be submitted to the first general assembly of the united nations. It is expected that the general assembly will open its first session in London on January 10. On the exact procedure to be followed in bringing up this vital matter for consideration by the united nations organization, I am unable to say anything at present.

Before leaving Washington on Thursday last December 13, to take part in the meeting in Moscow of the foreign ministers of the United States, the United Kingdom and the Soviet Union, the Secretary of State of the United States announced that he wished to discuss with the Soviet government its views on how they would be prepared to cooperate in the establishment of the commission and on the procedure which should be followed. On these questions we are in constant consultation with the governments of the United States and the United Kingdom, the other parties to the Washington declaration on atomic energy.

While I do not wish at the moment to attempt to look too far into the future with respect to proceedings of the united nations organization, I am pleased to have this opportunity to speak of the past in reference to the erection of the united nations organization itself. I recall very well while the war against Germany and Japan was still in progress, there were many who felt that President Roosevelt was pressing, with undue haste, the establishment of a united nations organization. Echoes of this criticism were heard at San Francisco last spring at the time of the united nations conference on international organization. It was not until after the conference was over, and the charter of the united nations organization had been brought into existence, that the world learned of the discovery of the release of atomic energy and of its practical application against Japan. The use of the atomic bomb as a major weapon of military warfare presented, in an instant, to all nations wholly new problems of security. Against the use of the atomic bomb in war, nothing has thus far been suggested which could be regarded as a means of defence.

President Roosevelt's prophetic vision had once more come to the aid of humanity at a time of its greatest need. Had President Roosevelt waited until the war was over to call a united nations conference to bring the charter into being, we should not have had the united nations organization at hand to-day to assist in the solution of the problems which the atomic bomb has brought so conspicuously to the fore. Instead, the countries seeking a solution of its problems would have been more bewildered and baffled than they are. The world is but slowly recognizing what it owes to the late President.

If I have made myself clear as to problems of the atomic era with which we are now faced, it will be apparent that they are primarily political problems affecting the relations between men and governments. Fundamentally they are a part of the age old conflict between good and evil. As such their ultimate solution will be found only in the realm of philosophy and morals. One thing is certain: they admit of no mechanistic solution. By themselves, devices for the control of atomic energy are at best but temporary expedients. For this reason, I believe, it is an error to contemplate the control of the use of atomic energy in commodity and police terms, as if atomic energy were some new and dangerous drug. Technical scientifiec controls of production, processing and final disposition are indispensable, but they are obviously inadequate. It would, I believe, be criminal folly to allow ourselves to imagine that the peace and security of mankind can be attained by any scheme of commodity control.

As political problems affecting the relations of governments, the solution of the problems presented by atomic energy must be sought in the realm of world politics. The more deeply one ponders the problems with which our world is confronted in the light—"the terrible light", as Mr. Attlee said—of the implications of the development of atomic energy, the harder it is to see a solution in anything short of some surrender of national sovereignty. With a limited surrender of national sovereignty, there must be instituted some form of world government restricted, at least at the outset, to matters pertaining to the prevention of war, and the maintenance of international security.

The united nations organization is not a sufficient answer to the problems of peace and security which the world is now seeking. It is a first step, and an all-important step, in the direction of that cooperation between nations which is essential to the survival of civilization. It is not, however, the only, much less the final step. The united nations organization is an indispensable medium and channel and forum through which the peoples of the world can work out new institutions and arrangements which their peace and security now require.

We do well to recall that the united nations charter had been signed before the world knew of the existence of the atomic bomb, much less anything about its ghastly military potentialities for mass destruction. The coming of the atomic bomb has opened our eyes to the appalling possibilities which will face the world if the united nations should fail tc achieve effective international cooperation. It is to be hoped that such a prospect may be sufficient to cause every country, in the interests of its own citizens, to recognize that "over all nations is humanity". It is devoutly to be hoped that the nations will not delay too long in welcoming, albeit in the form of some self-denying ordinance upon individual national sovereignties, a measure of world sovereignty sufficiently effective to maintain international security and to end all possibility of war.

If we are agreed on the ultimate necessity of some measure of world government to maintain world security, we should, by every means in our power, support and strengthen every agency of international cooperation anc understanding which can help to make the world community a reality. The peoples of all nations must address themselves to the task of helping to devise and shape institutions and relationships which will enable mankind to ensure, if not its salvation, at least its survival. We must work with all our might for a world order under the rule of law. This seems to be our only hope. Humanity is one. We must act in the belief that no nation and no individual liveth to himself alone, and that all are members one of another.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we have all listened with very great interest to the remarks of the Prime Minister as he outlined Canada's part in achieving the release of atomic energy and the various steps leading up to the agreed declaration which is now before us, and his elaboration of the various clauses in the declaration.

At the outset I wish to compliment the Prime Minister, and all those associated with him, and particularly the scientists of Canada, on their respective parts in bringing about the results of that great discovery. With much of what the Prime Minister has said I am in entire agreement, and I should like to think that in that respect I speak for members in every section of the house.

The question of atomic energy, its production, its control and its use, everyone will agree, is of great importance at this time. The immediate question before this house is the declaration recently issued and signed by the President of the United States, the Prime Minister of Great Britain and the Prime Minister of Canada. The resolution before us makes a statement and asks a question. It declares that it is expedient at this time that we approve the statement that has been presented to us. This statement, I am sure the Prime Minister will agree, is one which will have no effect in law at the moment, but is one which may be a guide to public opinion throughout wide areas of the world.

The Prime Minister has dealt with the history and the development of this recent gain in science. My remarks will deal more particularly with the political consequences of that development. The declaration before us contains nine clauses. I propose to analyse these very briefly and to make a brief comment on each as I proceed.

The first clause indicates the recognition of an important fact, perhaps the most important fact of the age in which we live, the fact that the modern developments in physical science are so far in advance of the modern developments in social science as to constitute a grave danger to the human race.

I believe it was Wells who, in one of his books, said that civilization is a race between education and catastrophe. If that were true twenty years ago, it is much more true to-day in the light of the new knowledge that science has given to the world. The question now is whether our growing control over the physical forces around us is to be used for the progress of mankind or for the destruction of mankind. That is the problem that has been dropped into the lap of this generation, and that is what makes this particular time the most interesting and perhaps the most challenging in which any generation of man has ever lived.

The second paragraph sets out that the responsibility arising from this discovery rests upon this generation. It rests upon us to see that all these discoveries are used for the benefit of mankind and not for its destruction. That paragraph indicates one other fact, that the initiative rests with those nations who happen to have been the first to discover the truth of the atomic bomb. But it indicates also, that the responsibility for ultimate success in controlling this new discovery rests with all the nations of the world.

The third paragraph is a statement of fundamental truth. It is in these words: that the only complete protection for the civilized world against the destructive use of scientific knowledge lies in the prevention of war.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that with the statements contained in these three clauses of the declaration no one in this house will be in disagreement.

The fourth paragraph is a statement of proposed policy. In it we are asked to declare our willingness to proceed with the exchange of fundamental scientific information, and the interchange of scientists and scientific literature for peaceful ends, with any nation that will fully reciprocate. Here we face, an immediate question: Are the scientific data and the technological knowledge so far developed to be entrusted by those who have them to those who do not have them?

This is a question to which an answer must be given reasonably soon. If the present attitude of exclusion prevails for an indefinite period, suspicions and distrust will be engendered in those who do not have this knowledge. At the same time there are few who would favour the distribution of the data and the technical processes indiscriminately, without taking every reasonable precaution to preserve world peace. It would seem reasonable that any nation which is to be permitted to have the knowledge we possess, and from it to develop atomic energy on a commercial scale, ought first to be prepared to submit its mines and laboratories to regular inspection. It is difficult to see how this secret can be shared without serious risk until every one of the great powers of the world is prepared to permit the free dissemination of news and the free admittance for observation of representatives of our great news services. I think it is not going too far to say that to our newspaper men and women we owe our survival in the last half dozen years of war. Had they not been able to find out what our enemies were planning for us and report, as they did, we would have been conquered before waking up to what was going on in the world.

The fifth paragraph contains four statements; one a statement of belief, one a statement of fact, one a statement of intention, and one a statement of hope. The statement of belief is this:

> We believe that the fruits of scientific research should be made available to all nations, and that freedom of investigation and free interchange of ideas are essential to the progress of knowledge.

I think everyone will agree with that statement of belief. The statement of fact is:

> . . . the basic scientific information essential to the development of atomic energy for peaceful purposes has already been made available to the world.

That is, the "basic" scientific information is widely known. The statement of intention is this:

> It is our intention that all further information of this character that may become available from time to time shall be similarly treated.

But that is it is to be made available under conditions mentioned later on. The statement of hope is this:

> We trust that other nations will adopt the same policy, thereby creating an atmosphere of reciprocal confidence in which political agreement and cooperation will flourish.

All will approve I am sure, of the general attitude expressed in this paragraph. The human race has never yet been denied the fruits of invention by conscious public policy, and denying them now would be unnecessarily holding back material progress. This new knowledge has potentialities for both good and ill. We cannot prevent its development. We must therefore control its use. We must make ourselves capable of turning this and other secrets of nature to constructive use.

Paragraph 6 contains a statement of opinion and an offer to share the scientific knowledge. The opinion is that the spreading of specialized information before it is possible to devise effective safeguards would not contribute to a constructive solution of the problem of the atomic bomb. The second part of the paragraph is an offer, as I have said, to share scientific knowledge on a reciprocal basis. It states:

> We are, however, prepared to share on a reciprocal basis with others of the united nations, detailed information concerning the practical industrial application of atomic energy just as soon as effective enforceable safeguards against its use for destructive purpose can be devised.

This brings us nearer to the nub of the problem we have to face. Is it possible or practical to develop the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes and prevent its use for war purposes? We cannot now be certain that explosives produced for one purpose will not be used for the other. The problem of policing the use of this process is a complicated one, much more complicated than any political problem ever undertaken in the past. Can society draw a line of demarcation—and see that the line is observed—between developing atomic energy for peaceful purposes and outlawing it for the purposes of war? That is the challenge. It is a challenge we must accept, and as the lines suggest, we accept it by tying our faith to reciprocal agreements to banish its use in time of war.

The seventh paragraph is another statement of opinion. In effect if says, "We state it as our opinion that a commission should be set up to prepare recommendations aimed at the elimination of the use of atomic energy for destructive purposes, and to make possible its use for humanitarian purposes". If any member of parliament has any criticism of this clause I suppose it would be in order for those subscribing to the agreement to ask what better solution could have been proposed. Its authors at best see through the glass but darkly. They are only groping their way, with care and hesitation. I hope this clause does not reveal a disposition to try to escape from the responsibilities incumbent upon those who possess the secret. It is practically certain that the bomb will be used if another war breaks out. Unless we are visionaries this must soon be realized. If there is to be war, any nation wanting to live cannot afford to be without a means of defence or retaliation if it is attacked. The secret is ours to-day. Others will have it to-morrow, and many will have more dangerous ones later on.

Paragraph 8 suggests a procedure. It suggests that the proposed commission should proceed by separate stages, and more specifically that it should undertake first a wide exchange of scientists and scientific information; and second, to develop a full knowledge concerning natural resources and raw materials. This clause adds a note of realism to which I think most of us will subscribe. We are dealing with a secret process, at least a process that is now secret. If the secret were no secret at all there would be little use in this elaboration of machinery. If it is still a vital secret in the hands of three nations a terrible responsibility rests upon these nations to devise the best safeguards possible for its use. There is no reason not to believe that some nations will relapse into a passive state, believing that entrusting the task to some international body will settle everything. The danger is that while the innocent will keep their promises, the aggressors will prepare to break their promises and war will be more likely than if no promises were made at all. A half-baked plan will mean that once more this generation will go to sleep on an inactive but still live volcano. That is what happened prior to the recent war.

Paragraph 9, as I interpret it, is an appeal to rationalism in a world made up of nation states. In that paragraph the necessity of three things is pointed out: the necessity of the rule of law among nations as well as among people within nations; the necessity of active and generous support to the united nations organization as the best means now known to humanity of achieving a world of peace; and the necessity of doing everything that humanity can devise to banish war. The paragraph concludes with this brief but strong resolve:

> It is our firm resolve to work without reservation to achieve these ends.

This clause sets before us a goal, but it does not guarantee that we shall attain it. It states the challenge that faces us. The united nations charter was founded on an agreement of the Big Three. That charter has been elaborated on the foundation of certain basic understandings. But the discovery of how to release atomic energy has shattered our faith in that foundation as it is now laid. The most vital problem, therefore, faces us still. Can the world, organized as it is to-day or as it may be organized in the future, so conduct itself as to save itself from destruction? Are man's own inventions to be the cause of his own destruction? Is the world to remain an age of unreason; or is man, with his new gadgets, to revert to times we thought were passed—times without the controls civilization could provide?

I am not one who feels that we must close this debate on a note of pessimism. I feel that many discussions outside this house have been characterized by too much alarm and despair and by too little hope and optimism. If man is to be destroyed by his own inventions, why weep about it beforehand? Rather, knowing the danger, let us set about with determination to avoid that end. Let us set out to find and to provide the most practical political solution that the collective mind of man is capable of making.

Some say: Let the problem be entrusted to the security council of the united nations organization. That would mean entrusting it to eleven sovereign states, leaving some forty others out of consideration. Let us not forget that warfare has experienced a great transformation in recent years. In the first great war, a country like Belgium could defend itself for weeks or months—this time, only for a matter of days. In future, days will not be allowed us to get ready—only hours, perhaps only minutes, possibly not even that. It is possible that non-aggressors will be less helpless than they have been in the recent past. Aggressors will at least know that if they make war there is every risk that an instrument is in being that may abolish their largest cities in a matter of seconds. That will surely be a restraining influence upon aggressors.

The choice for us seems to be between an association of powers in which it becomes the necessity of nearly all to prevent any one from dominating the scene—either that or a renunciation of some part of our sovereignty, some abridgement of our national sovereignty. If the latter is to be the solution, it ushers in the beginnings of a world state.

The nations of to-day were not built in a day. The national state as we know it has been a thousand years and more in the building. And a new international order will not be built in a day. But it can be started in a day—in fact, it has already been started; and while it is in the building, we must move with caution and with awareness. We are fortunate in being a member of the British commonwealth of nations and in being a neighbour of the United States. We all rejoice that the agreement before us to-day is one made between Britain, the United States and Canada. Thus we in Canada must all feel, as a member of this triumvirate, that while we are in good company we share a terrible responsibility.

What does it all add up to? If my sixty years tell me anything, they tell me that humanity will neither be satisfied nor safe till there is world security against aggressors. Any realist must know that this security will come in one or other of two ways—the way of war, followed by slavery to a dominating state, or the way of understanding, followed by a cooperative world; by force of arms that will result in a world state, in which one part will be dominant, or by force of reason in which nations will live together, each contributing its proper share of the price of discipline, and each bearing the fruits of the consequent peace and progress of mankind.

Our path as Canadians is clear. Collective security for humanity is possible only in international collective agreement. We must pay the price of international collective agreement. That price is the sacrifice of some degree of national sovereignty. That price the nations will only grudgingly and slowly be willing to pay; but that price we have already commenced to pay. A world state we now living may never see, but the various peace pacts of the past, the international labour organization, the united nations organization, the food and agriculture organization, the Bretton Woods agreement, the proposed international trade conference—all these are steps toward international security. All these give up something, even though it be little, of national sovereignty. What we are enduring to-day is the labour pains of better world understanding, the beginnings of a world of peace and of potential progress such as man has never before witnessed.

We have two things to do, both of which require conscious effort and a degree of international tolerance and understanding never before demonstrated in the world. We must determine to have international peace, and we must determine to be relieved of the shackles that have tied us to war and hunger and disease in the past. We must go forward in faith, conscious that, while we may not reach the goal in our day, we are going at least in the right direction and knowing that we are doing our part in bringing the world nearer to the time when peace and prosperity rather than war will be the inheritance of mankind.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I regret that owing to a slight indisposition the leader of this group is not here this morning, and I regret it particularly because I know that he had prepared something on this subject. He has given a great deal of thought to it, and while I, or anyone else who may speak from this group, would express the same views, I am sure we cannot do it as well as he would have done it.

The question before us to-day has to do with approval of the agreement arrived at in Washington by the President of the United States, the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and the Prime Minister of Canada, in regard to the control and use of atomic energy. I approve, and I believe this group approves, the agreement. It makes provision for passing on information to the other nations as quickly as an understanding can be arrived at as to the proper use of atomic energy.

I believe the proper organization to control this matter is that of the united nations. However, I am sure, and I agree with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) when he says that what must be done is not only to prohibit the use of atomic energy in war, but rather to abolish war altogether. So long as we have wars, those who make them will use every means they can find to win them. The question which we should put our minds to, then, is not the prevention of the use of atomic energy for war purposes, but the prevention of war itself.

One thing that is disturbing at the present time in connection with atomic energy is the fact that research seems to be in the control of private organizations such as the Duponts in the United States, the Imperial Chemical Industries in the United Kingdom and Canadian Industries Limited in Canada. I believe it is quite improper to leave research of this kind in the hands of private organizations, particularly when those organizations have demonstrated in the past that they are not much concerned with the social uses to which the results of research may be put. These organizations have tremendous vested interests and large aggregations of capital which might easily be rendered obsolete by the development of a new power of this kind. I had hoped that one of the things that would be done would be to bring research in this matter under the full control of the united nations organization, following what has been done by the three nations which at present seem to have the knowledge of this power.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) says we have come to the stage in world affairs where cooperation is not only necessary but imperative. Indeed, in my humble opinion the atomic bomb has brought us to the stage where world government at the international level is not only a desirable thing, but a necessity. The choice before us is either world government or world destruction.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, the problem of securing peace on a world scale seems presently to be the responsibility of the United States, Great Britain and Canada. In my consideration of the declaration made by the Prime Minister of Canada, the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and the President of the United States, and in my study of the whole problem of the atomic bomb and of the world situation, I have come to several conclusions which I wish to outline briefly to the house.

The first of these is this: If the United States and Canada and Great Britain were to remain in exclusive possession of the secret of the technical production of the atomic bomb for some long period of time, I am satisfied that for that period of time the world would have peace. Of course we must admit that eventually the other countries of the world will discover the technique of manufacturing these terrible weapons, and at that time the supremacy of the Anglo-American people will disappear and the problem of securing peace for the world will no longer be their exclusive responsibility.

The second conclusion which I have reached from my studies is this: If all the governments of the world and the nations, large and small, were truly democratic, then I am convinced that an international agreement on the production and application of atomic energy and the organization of effective international control for the production of atomic energy in all countries of the world could be made effective. I am satisfied that that would then be possible, because democratic governments are amenable to the influence of public opinion and of parliaments like our own. It would be possible, because in democratic countries secret arming would be out of the question, mainly because in countries like our own and in those having democratic governments money cannot be spent without the approval of parliament.

Let us examine in a realistic way the situation in which one of the parties to an international agreement—particularly an international agreement concerning the atomic bomb—is a dictatorship. In a dictatorship you would find no free press, you would find no opposition to the government, either in the so-called parliament or throughout the country, such as we have in this country; you would find no regard for parliament. There are such totalitarian countries in this world, and I may say that Russia is not the only one. However, I am convinced that Russia is perhaps the most closed and most totalitarian country of all the major powers.

Under such circumstances I ask in all seriousness, of what value would be any international agreement on the atomic bomb? Of what value would be an international control committee? Who would discover and bring to light, let us say, secret armaments plants that might be established in a totalitarian country? Who would uncover preparations for a new war and bring them to light so that the world would know? Lastly, who would uncover the secret production of this outlawed atomic bomb? Those are questions to which we must give serious thought. Those are questions to which answers are not easily found.

On the other hand, if Canada becomes a party to an international agreement on the atomic bomb and obligates herself not to produce the bomb or to use it in case of war, there are a number of important things which it seems to me we ought to be ready to look squarely in the face. Under such circumstances, in the first place we must ask: would the united nations organization be able to ensure the complete fulfilment of Canada's pact?

In the first place we have a comparatively free press in Canada. This free press certainly would publish the facts and the whole facts of what was going on. Sometimes we are irked at the actions of the press, but thank God in these days the press can say what it wishes to say. I uphold them in saying it, even though it may be criticism of me or of my actions or of those of the party that I represent.

We have here a free parliament. My first experience down here has assured me that this is a parliament in which men can and do speak their minds. The members of parliament will find out, or at any rate make a great effort at finding out, just what is going on. The government will daily be confronted with resolutions to place on the table copies of all documents relating to any of the processes concerning the atomic bomb that might be going on. Somebody, because of that free parliament, will find out what is going on. In this house we have an opposition to the government, constantly watching to see that the government does not do anything of which the opposition disapproves, and ready always to divulge to the world the things that the government is doing. I have known oppositions to take great glee in divulging such things. I cannot understand how a government in a democratic country could keep very long any secret such as that of the manufacture of the atomic bomb.

We have also throughout the country political parties in opposition to the government, constantly on the watch to find out and divulge what the government is doing. If Canada were signatory to an international pact on the atomic bomb I am satisfied that an international commission could come into our country freely and as often as it wished; and could investigate thoroughly over as widespread a territory as it wished, every plant, every arsenal, every laboratory. This would be in compliance with our solemn pact, and it is what would happen in a country such as ours, and in any other democratic country that can truly be said to be democratic. The commission could talk freely with people anywhere in Canada, and the people would give information to the commission freely because we do preserve in Canada, as in other democratic countries, a good measure at least, of personal freedom. People need not be afraid to talk. There is certainly no such fear in Canada—I have noticed that. No person in our country would be afraid to discuss almost any matter with an international commission, because we have guarantees of personal freedom—and we have no secret police, no death penalties for political offences, or what is often referred to as military espionage.

One must conclude therefore that the united nations organization would come into Canada and other democratic countries and find them fulfilling to the letter the pact and pledges given with respect to the atomic bomb.

Now the question I must face and all of us must face is this. What about Russia or any other totalitarian power? Would it be possible for the united nations organization to secure fulfilment of Russia's pact on the atomic bomb, or that of any other totalitarian country? We must know that in such countries there is no guarantee of personal freedom, and therefore the people cannot talk freely. Every remnant of personal freedom has gone. There is no free press. The press is wholly controlled and muzzled by the government and cannot divulge what is going on. There is no free parliament; there is no opposition to the government either in the so-called parliament or throughout the whole land. They liquidate oppositions in such countries. They do not allow oppositions to work, and no commission for controlling the atomic bomb could possibly have free access to such a country. They would allow the commission to come in, perhaps, but the commission would be allowed to see only what the government wanted them to see. They would be accompanied and guarded. They would be allowed to go into this and that innocent-looking place, but they would have no freedom at all to look into the arsenals and laboratories or to visit the plants and factories. I would point out also that in Russia, as in some other countries, there are vast areas about which foreigners know little or nothing, which have been developing over many years but which are completely fenced around so far as getting information in or out is concerned. Do you suppose for one moment that an international control commission would be allowed to go into such an area? Would it not be possible for plants, any number of them, to be established in such an area for the manufacture of the atomic bomb? Why, of course. It is unthinkable to suppose that an international commission could possibly find out what was being done there, especially in the light of the fact that an international commission for control would be up against the secret police and the threat of death for any who give information and speak their minds freely. There are death penalties in Russia and in all totalitarian countries for "military espionage", a term which is often loosely used to include most innocent observation and discussion. The prohibitions in such countries do not end with death. They often result in deportation of friends and families. These things are a constant threat to the people.

Under all these circumstances I am forced to the conclusion that a country like Russia simply cannot be controlled by an international organization. I am convinced that so long as there are dictatorships amongst the great powers, an effective international solution of the atomic bomb problem is utterly impossible. Now, if the secret technical methods of the manufacture of the atomic bomb are turned over to the united nations organization, it seems inevitable that the secret of this most dangerous weapon in the world's history will be conveyed to the dictatorships without attaining in return, any real and effective guarantees in return that the bomb will not be made and used in a war of aggression. Remember that only a dictatorship—and this I must impress upon hon. members with all the vehemence at my command—could possibly prepare secretly an atomic Pearl Harbour. It could not be done in democracy. Therefore it is absurd to talk of international control so long as Russia and some other totalitarian countries remain as they are.

I have reached another conclusion, of which I must speak briefly. I think it is absurd to talk of government at an international level so long as Russia remains as she is. I should like to hear those who advocate government at the international level tell us exactly what it means. Just what does it mean to Canada, and what does it mean to the other nations of the world? "Government at the international level" has been bandied around freely and loosely. Taking the situation in Canada right now, I wonder if anybody would advocate Canada becoming a party to an international government with representation on a basis of population? I wonder where would Canada's twelve million people stand in relation to the 130 million people in the United States? Suppose we should become party to an international government in which the United States might be the dominant nation, and come in on a basis of population, would Canada be prepared to become the northern share-cropper area for the United States? Has anybody ever taken the pains to study what happened in the southern United States, and how they became the southern share-cropper area for the industrial north of the United States? I say that the people of Canada, if they knew the truth, would not support for one moment any such thought; and if they would not accept such an attitude towards our friends of the United States, to whom would they subordinate themselves as a nation? Would it be Russia? I am not prepared to grant that, not for one moment. So far as I am concerned, I can see only one end to such a complex as has been developed on this "government on the international level", and that is the destruction of the British commonwealth of nations of which we form a part—the only real security, the only guarantee of international security we have under the present circumstances. The situation may look black, but situations have looked black at various times in the past.

Mr. Speaker, there is a man not far from me the hon. member for Yorkton, who speaks of my being "the worst bloody imperialist"—I do not know what he was going to say further, but I should just like to have him know that I am not going to lend a hand to selling my country down the river for any association with a doubtful international organization which rests upon the balance of a strong totalitarian country.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: There was no reference to the hon. member. He just imagined that.

Mr. LOW: Of course the hon. member for Yorkton is very smooth in getting out of situations of a kind where his tongue runs away from him. I have seen him in those situations before.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Anybody stirring up hatred in the world the way the hon. member for Peace River does deserves what he gets.

Mr. LOW: I am talking straight to the communists, Mr. Speaker like the one who just cut in. I say to you that God has come to the aid of the United Kingdom and the commonwealth of nations times without number. The only way we can ever explain some of the interesting, important and almost supernatural events which have happened in the past through our history is to recognize that God's hand was in it. There have been times when it looked as though all was lost; times when great men such as Wellington and Pitt have been led to exclaim that all was lost and that there was no hope for the empire or the commonwealth; that we were bound to be defeated and destroyed. Well, Mr. Speaker, men have commonly said such things; they have said them in all ages.

Mr. REID: But it will last a long while yet.

Mr. LOW: Yes, it will last a long while yet if we do our duty and do not sell ourselves and our birthright into slavery.

I say that the spirit of unity which was placed amongst us was put there for the purpose of rallying the various parts of the commonwealth to the aid of each other in times of stress. That spirit has rallied us all many times in the past, and it will do it again if we give it a chance. I should not like to see that spirit destroyed. It can easily be destroyed by such loose talk on "government at the international level" as we hear so often in this house.

Mr. ROSE: It came first from England, did it not?

Mr. LOW: I am convinced that the Prime Minister has set his hand to a fairly wise declaration. I believe history will record that in its main clauses it was wise.

Now, having set its hand to this declaration, the government should, it seems to me, take under serious and earnest advisement the reform of its whole external policy somewhat along the lines which I shall now give and which, I may say, the Social Credit Association of Canada will endorse most heartily.

There have been numerous occasions, Mr. Speaker, on which people in and out of this house have declared that the Social Credit people are narrow nationalists. That is not so; I deny it most vigorously. Just because we are not ready to accede to every request and every suggestion to sell our birthright, to yield our sovereignty completely and become subject to the domination of tremendous forces outside Canada, does not mean to say that we are in any way narrowly nationalistic.

In the first place, the government should be determined to preserve within Canada, the spirit and the practice of true political and economic democracy. I claim that that is the best guarantee of the intentions of any country not to become a dictator or to tolerate anything like a dictatorship. I repeat that we should be careful to preserve all the elements of true democracy, with all that that means, and we shall then have done our best to assure the nations of our peaceful intentions.

The second thing I suggest is that we give every assurance of the fullest international cooperation on the part of Canada, as a sovereign nation, for the achievement of an era of peaceful prosperity throughout the world.

Third, we should be prepared to extend as a nation to all other nations the hand of good will and brotherhood and justice.

Fourth, we should be prepared to send economic aid to all needy nations, if necessary without even expecting repayment. Give them every opportunity to balance their payments with us and I am satisfied we shall thereby convincingly demonstrate our peaceful intentions.

In the fifth place, I plead with the government not to yield to this diabolical doctrine of surrendering our sovereignty to any supranational government. We must be in a position in the next few years to act quickly and unfettered. The speedy action of Canada alone might be a means at some time in the future of saving the world.

Sixth, because it is not possible to devise a foreign policy which will be acceptable to the great majority of Canadians so long as they have no real knowledge and are torn between opposing opinions which are spread through the country, mainly through the propaganda of legions of foreign agents, the government must now provide the people with really accurate information. That is the only way the people can possibly make up their minds —on the basis of facts, conveyed by sound and accurate information about what is going on abroad.

Canada can never have a successful and sound external policy until the people of Canada are informed, and through their possession of accurate information are ready to instruct and to support their government.

Seventh, Canada should meticulously keep the peace, praying God that the Anglo-American people will be true to their great trust. At the same time they should be ready instantly, if necessary—and I emphasize this very particularly—to rain fire on those nations who disregard their solemn pledges and wantonly wage war.

I know that some hon. members, particularly in the group to my right, will declare that in saying this I am a warmonger. That is not so. I am a lover of peace. But the only way to guarantee non-aggression in such a world as we now have is to be strong, and just, and ready to act on a moment's notice if necessary.

Last but not least, I say to the government that their foreign policy as well as their domestic policy should be one of absolute trust in God and keeping our powder dry.

I support the resolution.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: And the brotherhood of man?

Mr. LOW: Yes, sir.

Mr. FRED ROSE (Cartier): We have just heard from the leader of the Social Credit party what is practically a war declaration—in my opinion a very irresponsible way of talking in this atomic period. If he were concerned with his own province of Alberta—because we know against whom he made the war decla ration—he would realize that parts of that province would be very much in the area of the war which he was advocating this morning.

Mr. LOW: I was not advocating war. That is just the hon. member's own microbic interpretation.

Mr. ROSE: It is most regrettable that only a few months after the war we should have here a discussion of so serious a problem as the prevention of another war. People throughout the world, and that includes Canada, are disturbed by present events. I have here a letter from a woman in Ottawa, Mrs. Sheila Woodsworth, who writes to me as follows:

> I am afraid of the atomic bomb. Alone I can do nothing about it. I am writing to you in the hope that you will do all in your power to see that this great discovery is not left in the hands of a few countries but is controlled by a world organization. This seems to me the only hope for us and our children.

An hon. MEMBER: Who wrote it?

Mr. ROSE: I gave the name—Mrs. Sheila Woodsworth, of Ottawa. I do not know her. As I said before, it is most disturbing that a few months after the war, people feel impelled to write such letters as this to members of parliament, asking them to do something so that this atomic bomb shall not be used among peoples. The Washington declaration does not reassure me any more than it reassures that person; I do not think it reassures any member of this house. The fact is that the declaration leaves in the hands of those who have it the power to use the atomic bomb at their discretion, and leaves the door open to an atomic armament race. It may sound very harsh, but it is a fact that it has left in the hands of the United States, Great Britain and Canada not only a dangerous weapon of war, but a dangerous weapon of diplomacy.

War simply does not come by itself; someone once said that war is a continuation of politics in a different way. Politics goes on before war, and politics to-day is becoming an atomic diplomacy. We see it going on right now in Washington, more perhaps than anywhere else. And recently we had the example when Ambassador Hurley practically demanded that the United States should use the advantage of the atomic bomb in her diplomatic dealings. Such voices are heard more and more in the United States. Pressure is being exerted on Washington for the United States government to use the atomic bomb as a diplomatic weapon to club everybody.

I follow closely the United States press. I spoke in Boston a week ago Sunday, and there you get the feeling that a new diplomacy is being advocated in the United States. There is the intervention in China, and Washington practically says: "We will keep those marines there until the situation fits into our pattern." One hon. member spoke about Anglo-American democracy. I would say that this is far from a democratic action. We read daily about the wiping out of Indonesian villages, of people poorly armed fighting for their freedom against British forces, and again we hear about Anglo-American democracy. This is not the type of pattern we had hoped for in the post-war period. It is not the type of pattern that will produce lasting security.

The Prime Minister praised the great work of President Roosevelt, and we all had the greatest respect for the late president, but I would remind hon. members of something that he said in March 1945. He knew that collaboration cannot be Anglo-American but must be collaboration among those powers that made victory possible, the powers that can preserve the peace together. Speaking about the trouble at the time, he said:

> It is fruitless to try to place the blame for the situation on one particular nation or another. It is the kind of development which is almost inevitable unless the major powers of the world continue without interruption to work together and assume joint responsibility for the solution of problems which may arise to endanger the peace of the world.

The other day President Truman seemingly forgot these words when he said: "No more conferences of the big three; we don't have to get together any more."

There is no solution but in the continued unity of the big three. Only a few weeks ago when Cordell Hull, that great old statesman, accepted the Nobel prize, he said:

> We must never forget that to achieve the great goal of lasting peace it is imperative that there be continued unity, friendly understanding, and common effort among the people and statesmen of the major united nations who bore the principal burden in the war against the axis.

Unity and understanding among those who bore the burden in the war! But this declaration of Washington has been made by powers outside one great power that bore one of the greatest burdens, and this can only tend to create suspicion and bring about a situation that is not the best at the present time. Some people are always suggesting that the Russians are close-mouthed, that they do not say what they want to say, that they do not say what they mean, that they just keep everything to themselves, and so on. Hon. members who are interested have the same opportunities as I have for acquiring information. They can resort to the New York Times, as I do. If they will look at that newspaper in its issue of Wednesday, November 7, 1945, they will find reported therein a speech made by foreign commissar Molotov in which he referred to atomic diplomacy. What he says reflects the feeling of the Soviet people over the fact that they are being kept out, and are being given reason for suspicion. He said:

A word must be said about the discovery of atomic energy and about the atomic bomb, the colossal destructive force of which was displayed in the war against Japan. Atomic energy has not yet been tried, however, for averting aggression or safeguarding peace, but it is not possible at the present time for a technical secret of any great size to remain the exclusive possession of some one country or some narrow circle of countries. This being so, the discovery of atomic energy should not encourage either a propensity to exploit the discovery and the play of forces in international policy, or an attitude of complacency as regards the future of peace-loving nations.

Plainly and simply, Mr. Molotov says that there are some nations who believe that they have an advantage because they have the bomb, but that it cannot be kept a secret. It shows that there is a good deal of suspicion in his mind. He ends his speech by saying, "We will have atomic energy and many other things." I would say that as a result of the great contribution which the Russians made to victory, it should have been possible for the three nations to get together, making the atomic bomb the possession of all, because we would then know that it would not be used by any one nation.

It has been disclosed that the Germans had some very dangerous type of poison gas but they did not use it because they knew that everyone had it. From the point of view of equilibrium in diplomatic and political relations, it would have been better if the atomic bomb had been placed in the hands of all rather than in the hands of the Anglo-American nations. It is true there is a conference of foreign ministers where the matter is being discussed, but this is taking place after the Washington understanding and agreement. It could have taken place before, and it should have occurred before.

One United States newspaper man, Leland Stowe, referring to the atomic bomb as a diplomatic weapon, gives the following picture, writing in the Montreal Standard on November 24, 1945. He is a newspaperman of great repute who has travelled throughout the world and has seen the various countries at war. He knows of their sufferings. He says:

If the Soviets had the bomb and had followed Washington's precise course since August 6, how would the average American feel? I think the newspapers would be full of explosive condemnation of the "imperialistic power-seeking" Russians—and an awful lot of us would be plenty scared.

We would say: If the Russians don't intend to use the bomb, actually or for blackmail purposes, why didn't they invite President Truman and Prime Minister Attlee to a conference right away?

We would say: Why is Moscow treating the Americans and British as if they were second-class allies? Military men would be derelict in their duty if they didn't say: We've got to build a bomb of our own in the shortest possible time. Don't trust the Russians. The very fact that they only talk about sharing, after they've had time to make many more bombs themselves shows they can't be trusted.

If I were a Russian I think I should feel exactly like that. But I am not worried about being a Russian. As one member of this house and as a Canadian interested in the peace of Canada and the world, I am afraid that the damage which has been done already will be hard to heal in the coming months, though I hope it may be healed. Scientists who have worked on the bomb have spoken publicly for the first time, and this is all to the good. Scientists who know exactly what is involved in this atomic energy, much better than at least many of us in the house can know, have advised that we hand over the secret to an international committee, not at some future date but right away. A number of scientists were engaged in this work. One very prominent man, Doctor J. R. Oppenheimer, who directed atomic bomb research at Los Alamos, New Mexico, said:

It has momentarily strengthened us—

Meaning the United States.

—but not in the long run. Some people apparently have been reluctant to draw this to the attention of the world.

Then he recommends that it be placed in the hands of an international organization. Doctor Curtis, who was one of the leading scientists working on atomic energy at Oak Ridge, Tennessee, said that atomic energy should be turned over to an international organization to control all aspects of atomic power. There are many more. Only the other day Professor Sziland, appearing before the senate committee on atomic energy, said it would appear that we were producing bombs against the soviet union. One of the senators interjected, "No, no; we are friends." Professor Szilard replied, "Well, I assume we are producing them against the Soviet Union," and he was one of those who first thought of the possibility of the bomb. He went on to say: "Well, if we are, we are going to be at a disadvantage." He pointed out that it would take the United States twenty years to decentralize her industries, which would have to be done in the event of atomic war, but he said it would take Russia only two years, and therefore the advantage of having the bomb now would be completely lost. One of the most ridiculous arguments against passing on the "know-how" to other countries was presented by Major General Leslie G. Groves, who was in charge of the whole project of producing the atomic bomb. He gave some reasons why it should not be placed in the hands of an international organization; and do you know what he said: He said it would erase national boundaries, end the sanctity of the home and destroy private commercial enterprise. That was the reason for his opposition to an international organization; that it would destroy the sanctity of the home and destroy private free enterprise. If these are the reasons then I would say that those who oppose handing this over to an international organization are relying on pretty weak arguments. After all, the atomic bomb would definitely destroy the sanctity of the home; everyone will agree with that.

I was not going to speak on this at all, but before I conclude I must say a few words about one group in this house who have been carrying on a most vicious agitation against a country which has been a loyal ally and which has been carrying out all the decisions reached at various conferences. People say you cannot trust the Soviet Union, that they are going to bolshevize the world. Well, right next door to Russia is Finland. We were told that was a country Russia was going to swallow. They had elections in that country. The communists did not come into power. A majority of those elected were neither communists nor socialists. They said Russia would swallow Hungary. Well, Hungary has not been swallowed. They had elections there and the small holders' party came out with the largest group. Then people said, "Aha! now there has been a free election, because the communists did not come out in the majority." In France, of course, the communists came through the election as the largest party and the Red Army is not there. Again, something was said about Austria, but in Austria the Russians actually placed their cards on the table. They recognized the free government at the head of which was Renner, a socialist. They had elections there, and what happened? We all know the results. Then the Soviet Union said they would withdraw from Manchuria, and they are allowing Chinese troops to go into that country. I should like to see the other countries living up to their promises and responsibilities as the Soviet people have been living up to theirs. Let the other countries prove their good faith. Let them prove it in Indonesia, in French Indo-China, in China and everywhere else. They have not done so. The Social Credit group in this house, and particularly the leader of that group, assisted very ably by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin, have been carrying on a vicious agitation here.

Mr. HANSELL: What about me?

Mr. ROSE: I am sorry; I did not mean to overlook the hon. member for Macleod. They have been carrying on a most vicious agitation against the Soviet Union, actually speaking as though the Soviet people have been our enemies, carrying on the type of agitation which I have said before does not help bring about unity, does not help us when we try to build peace in the world, which will not solve anything but in my opinion will only help create more and more suspicion.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. ROSE: No, it is not going to be carried so quickly; this is one time I am going through with it. I will say that those who have been speaking against the Soviet Union are using the language of the Hitlerites. That is a sharp statement, isn't it? One day they will speak about the Soviet Union. The next day they will speak about bankers, international bankers, and they will mention any Jewish name they can think of in the banking world, forgetting the Mellons, the Chase National Bank, the Royal Bank, the Bank of Montreal—on the board of which there is not a single Jew—and all the rest of them. They are carrying on an agitation anti-soviet, anti-Jewish, anti-Socialist. Why, they even charged the Liberal party with becoming a socialist party. In every sense the sort of agitation they are conducting to-day resembles the agitation of the Hitlerites in the good old days. I have before me their attitude toward foreign affairs. Here in this house, of course, they have to polish it up a bit, but down in the province of Quebec they believe they can sell the people anything they wish. Here is their attitude, for instance, toward San Francisco, from their own paper, Vers demain, dated April 15, 1944:

Nous pouvons être sûrs qu'à San-Francisco, il y aura d'autres délégués que les représentants officiels des nations invitées. Ils n'auront pas le droit de vote, mais ils seront là pour inspirer ceux qui auront le droit de vote. Les financiers y seront. Les Juifs y seront. Les socialistes y seront. Toute la bande infernale essayera de canaliser ce concil œcuménique de la matière.

I should like to translate that, because it is too good to be missed by some hon. members.

We can be certain that at San Francisco there will be other delegates than those officially representing the various nations. They will not have the right to vote but they will be there to inspire those who have the right to vote. The financiers will be there, the Jews will be there, the socialists will be there. All that infernal gang will be there to canalize this conference into their own channels.

And, speaking about the peace we want to have, in another edition of the same paper, under date of May 1, 1945, they say:

(Translation).
The last peace, brought about by the Versailles treaty, was shaped by international Jews such as Schiff, Warburg and their associates; we all know what came out of it. Is the Christian but paganized world of 1945, about to yield to the same influences?

Then, speaking about the peace after the last war, they say that the last treaty, the treaty of Versailles, was fashioned by international Jews, Schiff, Warburg and Company, and that we know what has come out of it. Then they ask if the Christian world, Christian but paganized in 1945, is to pass through the same status.

Let me say that that was Hitler's argument. I have one extract here which actually uses material I saw in a nazi paper, and which states that the Jews, the Jewish financiers, such as Kuhn, Loeb and Company, had helped the Russians to carry out their revolution. Those are the stories, printed in that paper, which appeared in the nazi press. According to one of these papers the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Jaques) was to speak over the air about Shylock and Marx.

Listen to that language. That is language we have not yet forgotten, language that is not yet dead. Here they come to the House of Commons and, while they do not use the same language, that is what they mean. It is language which can only create trouble. If we proceed on the basis of it we can have no peace, no stability.

It is the good fortune, however, of the people of Canada that those people are limited to one province. We understand that we must have peace, and Canada as a neighbour of the Soviet Union and the United States and as a member of the British commonwealth holds great responsibility. We must do everything in our power to cement that degree of unity needed throughout the world, and especially among those who have carried most of the burden in the war. Otherwise we shall have chaos and disaster.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I shall not take much time this afternoon. I had not intended speaking at all until, as the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) was speaking, I heard certain mumblings in this section of the house. I did not have to strain my ears to hear the last speaker, the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Rose), and I am not going to answer him.

Mr. ROSE: It is just a debt repaid.

Mr. HANSELL: However, he has attacked some of our supporters in the province of Quebec. All I wish to say is that whether they are our supporters or not, the people of Quebec have the happy faculty of speaking their minds. And they use the freedom Canada gives them as citizens. That is all.

There is no semblance of hatred whatsoever in the minds of hon. members of the Social Credit party; no hatred toward any people or any nation. We disagree with totalitarian dictatorship, and we have been outspoken in our disagreement. We wish no ill, and will fight against anything that will bring ill to any people or any nation anywhere.

May I compliment the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the other signatories of the declaration now before us for consideration. I have read it with considerable care and, after reading it, it was my view that it is a magnanimous document, Great Britain, the United States and Canada, represented by the heads of those nations, in that document have offered to the world all the benefits of atomic energy which they have discovered. I repeat that those benefits are offered to the entire world.

For a period of time, for economic reasons those countries could have retained this development of science. They could have brought to the western democracies the greatest standard of living yet dreamed of. But they have shown themselves willing to share this development with the world. The only place they have stopped in extending their gift is when it comes to destruction. And even in that respect, the declaration goes so far as to say that they will let the world have the benefit of their knowledge, when they are sure it is safe to do so.

Surely no nations could be more generous or more magnanimous to the rest of the world than have these three, when dealing with this matter.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I gather from the debate that the house is all but unanimous in support of the resolution, and that at most there is but one member, the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Rose), who is opposed to it It will be, I know a source of great satisfaction to all members of parliament—members of all parties—that both in the Senate and in the House of Commons of Canada there has been unanimity in support of the resolution. That will help in all parts of the world.

May I convey to my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Bracken) my congratulations upon the splendid address he delivered this morning. Clearly, it was one to which much thought had been given, and which will be helpful I am sure to all who are interested in this all-important question.

There was one reference my hon. friend made—I believe it was to paragraph 7 in the declaration—where it seemed to me, if I heard his words aright, that either he had not in mind the true interpretation of the language of the motion, or that he was saying something that was not wholly what was in his mind. If I heard his words correctly, he said we were relying upon reciprocal agreements to see that the atomic bomb would not be used in future wars. Hansard will show whether I have understood my hon. friend correctly.

I noticed the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) took up the point and I thought quite rightly, said that the whole purpose of my remarks, in interpreting the declaration, had been to make clear that we cannot afford to rely upon any agreement anywhere; and that the only security against the use of the atomic bomb is the abolition of war itself. That was the point I wished to make very clear, namely, that so far as a major weapon of warfare of this kind is concerned, agreements amount to nothing at all, unless there can be some way in which apart from agreements an unscrupulous people may be prevented from violating an agreement into which they may enter or from using weapons of mass destruction. I repeat, the only safeguard for the preservation of civilization, now that the world is possessed of a weapon of war so devastating as the atomic bomb, is that matters be so worked out in the course of time, and in the near time, that nations will realize that those who take up weapons of this kind to destroy other nations are going to destroy themselves as well. In this last war the use of the bomb by one country was replied to by the use of the bomb by others, but it was not the atomic bomb. In an atomic age, that same kind of conflict can only bring disaster to all mankind.

I am quite sure that my hon. friend is in agreement with myself on that particular point.

Mr. BRACKEN: I was not conscious that I was in disagreement; I am trying to find the reference to which my hon. friend alludes but I have not been able to find it as yet.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It may not be there, and I hope it is not, but if it is there I am quite sure my hon. friend did not mean in any way to disagree with what had been said by myself.

May I express also to the hon. member for Vancouver East my appreciation of the manner in which he spoke this morning, and, with one exception, of what he said. I shall allude to the exception in a moment. I should like to say that we all regret that the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) has been prevented from taking part in this debate, particularly for the reason which has prevented him from being here this morning. Fortunately, he has already spoken elsewhere on this question, and a good deal of publicity has been given to what he has said. I think his remarks have made it clear that he would strongly support this resolution.

The one remark, if I caught it aright, of my hon. friend the member for Vancouver East to which I wish to take exception was his statement that research into atomic energy for use in war had been in the hands of the DuPonts in the United States, Imperial Chemical Industries in Britain and Canadian Industries Limited in Canada. That statement is absolutely untrue, and I want to make the strongest possible denial I can make of the statement. This particular field of research was a matter of the most complete cooperation between the universities and government departments; it was not in the hands of these industrial concerns to which my hon. friend has referred. It is quite true that in the building of some of the plants firms which were possessed of special skills and had been associated with one or other of the industries to which my hon. friend referred were employed to help on the work of construction, but so far as the research work is concerned that was a matter which was kept entirely under the control of Government departments of our three countries and the industries mentioned were not parties to the research work.

Mr. MacINNIS: Have they access to the research and the use of it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, and I wish to make that very clear. Will my hon. friend give the house his reason for believing that they have had such access?

Mr. MacINNIS: If I did not think that I had fairly good reason for saying that, I certainly would not have made the statement. I am very glad to accept the Prime Minister's statement that it is not true, although I do not think that is the best way of saying it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that a thing is either true or untrue. If it is not true, then there is only one way of stating the fact.

Mr. MacINNIS: If I had said that about my right hon. friend, I am sure he would have objected.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would never have made the statement that my hon. friend made.

Mr. MacINNIS: I would not agree with the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is a very serious statement to make, particularly by an hon. member who is leading his party. Unless the hon. member was prepared to give the grounds on which he based a statement of that kind, he should not have made it at all. I must thank my hon. friend for having accepted unreservedly the correction which I have made in the particular I have.

I also want to thank the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low) for so strongly supporting this resolution. I do not think it is necessary for me at this time to enter into a discussion as to the points of difference between the hon. member and the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Rose). There is a time and a place for all things. I think a debate on the principles of democracy versus dictatorship might well have been left over for another occasion.

May I say to the hon. member for Cartier, who appears to have felt it necessary for him to speak on behalf of one particular country, that I think it is unfortunate for that country that he has taken the attitude which he has to-day, particularly when at the moment there happens to be in the capital of that country the foreign secretaries of both the United Kingdom and the United States. They have gone there to seek to dismiss altogether any ground of suspicion, and to do their utmost to secure, as respects the course to be taken to prevent the atomic bomb from being used for purposes of destruction, complete accord between the three countries which are represented at that conference.

In conclusion may I say this one word which I feel I should like to say at this time. I do not believe we can survey the past years without realizing that the most dangerous of all things that can happen to any country is that evil men should get control of its affairs. No one can look at what is being brought out at the trial at Nuernberg without realizing that the reason the German people are in the position they are in to-day, the reason we have had this terrible war, is that the government of Germany got into the hands of wicked men. If democracy is to save itself, I do not care what the country is, if any form of government is to save itself, the people must make it their first endeavour to see that the men whom they entrust with the responsibility of power are men who believe in what is right, who are honest men, not men, as this group in Germany have been, a lot of gangsters at heart.

Speaking of science, I believe the world has reason to be thankful that men of science have made the great discoveries they have. The progress of the world has come in large part from scientific discoveries. Most discoveries may be made to serve diametrically opposite ends. They may be used for beneficent or for diabolical purposes. It all depends upon who possess the control and what the motive is that lies behind their actions.

The greatest of all scientists, so far as being a benefactor of mankind is concerned, was, I believe, that great man, Louis Pasteur. I have before quoted in this house a certain passage from Pasteur, I should like before we conclude this debate to quote it again because it seems to me to go to the very heart of the whole situation we have been discussing to-day. The statement was made by Pasteur over half a century ago. It will be seen to have a much wider application than could ever have been dreamt of at the time it was made:

> Two contrary laws seem to be wrestling with each other nowadays: The one, a law of blood and of death, ever imagining new means of destruction, and forcing nations to be constantly ready for the battlefield—the other, a law of peace, work and health, ever evolving new means of delivering man from the scourges which beset him. The one seeks violent conquest, the other the relief of humanity. The latter places one human life above any victory; while the former would sacrifice hundreds of thousands of lives to the ambition of one Which of these two laws shall ultimately prevail, God alone knows.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the Prime Minister add the name of Doctor Banting?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am very happy to add Doctor Banting's name to the list of scientists who will ever be remembered as among the great benefactors of mankind. In referring to Louis Pasteur, I was quoting from one who so far as the world's record is concerned stands, I believe pre-eminent as a scientist and benefactor of mankind.

I believe that by enabling us to make prevail among nations, the law of peace, work, and health, science will have given us the key to the solution of our world problems. The great scientists are known to be men of wide vision and of large heart. I am sure the motive that actuates them is, in most cases, at least, that of service to their fellowmen. Again, in the words of Pasteur, I believe the final verdict upon their researches will be: "Science will have tried by obeying the laws of Humanity to extend the frontiers of Life."

Mr. BRACKEN: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that I caught the full significance of the Prime Minister's comments with respect to one of my observations. I am sure there is no difference of any consequence between us, but lest there should be I should like to refer to the matter. I think it was not paragraph 7 but paragraph 6 to which the Prime Minister must have been referring. The last sentence in paragraph 6 of the declaration reads as follows:

> We are, however, prepared to share, on a reciprocal basis with others of the united nations, detailed information concerning the practical industrial application of atomic energy just as soon as effective enforceable safeguards against its use for destructive purposes can be devised.

My comment on that was as follows: I said that it was an offer to share scientific knowledge on a reciprocal basis, and I added:

> The problem of policing the use of this process is a complicated one, much more complicated than any political problem ever undertaken in the past. Can society draw a line of demarcation and see that the line is observed —between developing atomic energy for peaceful purposes and outlawing it for the purposes of war? That is the challenge. It is a challenge we must accept, and as the lines suggest, we accept it by tying our faith to reciprocal agreements to banish its use in time of war.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was the phrase I meant—tying our faith to reciprocal agreements to banish its use in time of war. I do not think we are tying our faith to anything but the abolition of war itself. That is my point.

Mr. BRACKEN: I think the Prime Minister will agree that I was dealing with the clauses as I came to them, and that what I said was not meant to be an all-inclusive statement, but rather an interpretation of the clause itself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I quite agree.

Mr. BRACKEN: I might have made it more inclusive and said, banish its use in time of war and to banish war itself. But I went on to say that it must be our main effort to banish war itself. Since the Prime Minister has referred to it, and in order that there may be no doubt as to the record, perhaps I might be permitted to repeat what I said with respect to war itself. I said:

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

> What does it all add up to? If my sixty years tell me anything, they tell me that humanity will neither be satisfied nor safe till there is world security against aggressors. Any realist must know that this security will come in one or other of two ways—

And so forth; I need not repeat it all, but I ended by saying:

> What we are enduring to-day is the labour pains of better world understanding, the beginnings of a world of peace and of potential progress such as man has never before witnessed.
> We have two things to do, both of which require conscious effort and a degree of international toleranace and understanding never before demonstrated in the world. We must determine to have international peace and we must determine to be relieved of the shackles that have tied us to war and hunger and disease in the past. We must go forward in faith, conscious that, while we may not reach the goal in our day, we are going at least in the right direction, and knowing that we are doing our part in bringing the world nearer to the time when peace and prosperity rather than war will be the inheritance of mankind.

Motion agreed to.

TRADE AND EMPLOYMENT

CANADIAN REPRESENTATION AT INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE IN 1946

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to ask which on two previous occasions I addressed to the Prime Minister, with respect to the proposed international trade conference next summer in the United States. I understood that it was to be answered this morning. I asked whether an invitation had been received by Canada; and, should one be received, would it be accepted and would the Prime Minister consider sending a non-partisan delegation to the conference. Perhaps the Minister of Fisheries would bring the question to the attention of the Prime Minister so that I may have an answer later to-day.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO ASSIST MR. SPEAKER IN REVISION OF STANDING ORDERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask what progress has been made by the special committee, appointed on November 7, to recommend revision of the rules of the house. I think it is apparent to all of us that revisions of the rules are urgently needed, and as the committee has not brought in a report at this session, might we have an assurance from the Prime Minister that action will be taken, as soon as parliament reassembles, to appoint another committee which will have ample opportunity to make a thorough study and a full report?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): It is the intention to set up that committee as soon as possible after the next session is convened.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

72. Departmental administration, $163,760.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I should like to say a few words on this general discussion. When the department was before the committee previously I did not get up in time.

I should like to bring to the attention of the minister a problem which will soon arise on the international markets of the world in selling the produce of the sea. Such countries as Venezuela and Chile are going into the building of large cold storage plants, and though the fishing industry is in a healthy condition at the present time it is apt to face in the near future competition which it will be difficult to meet. If we are to keep the fishermen in their independent position they must have a reasonable price for their products. For instance, the halibut fishermen do not want to see the price of halibut go down to two cents a pound, as it did around 1931.

Another problem is that of the boats. During the war the fishing industry had difficulty in getting lumber, as many other industries did, to replace old and outworn equipment. Now the few boats which are being built at the boat yards are having a hard time getting good lumber. It is a disgrace to see the type of lumber which is going into the holds to-day. It is a flat-grained fir. Prior to the war, in such things as decking you could get No. 1 edge grain, but they are not getting it to-day. In British Columbia we are exporting 65 per cent of our total cut, with only 33⅓ per cent being exported from Ontario. Surely the minister could find some way of retaining some No. 1 lumber to put into the boats of the fishermen. There are subsidies of from 50 cents to $3 a cord on such things as cordwood. The minister should be able to get something of the sort for the fishermen on the coast.

A word as to the old halibut boats up in Prince Rupert. Most of them were built in the United States, and they will soon have to be replaced. These boats were built in the United States under subsidies given by the United States government. We in Canada will have to follow the same practice in the future. We talk about free enterprise; the halibut fleet out on the coast is the highest expression of free enterprise. The boats are individually owned. The men who work on these boats work on a share basis, and any new member of the crew who comes on them is not picked by the skipper so much as by the boys. In the interests of the men I should like to see that independence continued.

The equipment which the fishermen have on the coast does not compare, I think, with that which comes up from the United States coast. Not many of our halibut men fish in the No. 3 area because they have not large enough boats. I should like to press on the minister the desirability of subsidizing or helping the fishermen to establish a No. 1 modern fleet.

We know that the fishing season on the Pacific coast in practically all lines is getting shorter. There should be some research in the matter of developing new fields for the fishermen to enter. Take, for example, the tuna fishing. It has been developed just over the past two or three years, and the fishermen have had to go out and test the equipment for themselves. Some boats, because they have had to keep the bait on the deck, have been turned upside down, and lives have been lost, because there has not been research as to the kind of equipment required in this branch of the fishing industry.

Investigation should also be made in the Jap current which lies thirty miles off the northern tip of the Queen Charlotte islands. It is reported that large schools of salmon have been seen, but it may be tuna. The tuna fishing season is very short, and this would fit in nicely with the halibut fishing industry.

Consideration should also be given to helping out the fishermen by modernizing their equipment. In the United States one firm is going into the manufacture of radar equipment for fishing boats. In "Time" magazine it is stated that no up-to-date fishing boat should be without radar. Is Canada going to be one beat behind the United States at all times? We developed radar; now let us see that the fishing fleet get it, because it will be a marvellous help in finding fishing schools and also telling what type of bottom they have where they are fishing.

Mr. WINTERS: Not with radar.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: A word about such places as Langara island and Juskatla. I was caught short because I did not have the names, but I will give them to the minister so that he can bring pressure on the Minister of Public Works with regard to these points which the northern fishermen want built up. At Massett they need facilities as soon as they can possibly be brought in. Officials of the Department of Fisheries are well aware of the needs of the fishing fleet in northern British Columbia. In Prince Rupert the fishermen through their cooperatives have built a large cooperative cold storage plant, but they have no proper facilities to get down to the plant, and they need a road right along the C.N.R. right of way. If this provision could be made for them it would be much easier for them to get down to the boats with their gear. At the present time they practically have to pack it on their backs if they want to get down to the boats on the roads built by the Department of Public Works.

I bring these points to the attention of the minister so that the fishing industry may be enabled to maintain its independence and grow and develop with the development of the country.

Mr. WINTERS: In rising to speak for a few minutes on fisheries I would say, as almost everyone else says upon rising in these last days of the session, that I regret taking the time of the committee under the circumstances. I offer by way of justification the fact that I represent Queens-Lunenburg, which is the best fishing constituency on the continent. In other constituencies possibly more fish may be caught, but I know of no other wherein a greater percentage of the population is engaged in fishing or wherein this single basic industry represents a greater proportion of the over-all economy.

This constituency is steeped in the tradition of fishing, involving wooden ships and iron men. There has been a tendency on the part of some hon. members to compare the merits of the west with those of the east. In my opinion competition is always a good stimulant, but it is better when tempered by co-operation. Progress on the east coast will mean betterment on the west coast, and vice versa. On this basis we in the east are pleased with any developments our western friends can achieve, so long as we have adequate opportunities to do a little developing on our own part.

The fishermen on the west coast have been well championed by the hon. member for New Westminster and others. We do not deny that they catch fish of many varieties, and in large quantities. We cannot agree, however, with the hon. member for New Westminster, when he says that British Columbia fisheries are neglected in favour of the maritimes.

[Mr. Archibald.]

To refer again to our good friend the hon. member for New Westminster, he was kind enough to send me a copy of a report entitled International Pacific Salmon Fisheries Commission Annual Report, 1944. This report sets out in a clear and interesting way the work put into the development of the Fraser river, and the expenditure of money involved in the effort. It is undoubtedly all to the good, and illustrates what could be done, on a much smaller scale of course, to improve such rivers as the Medway in Queens county and La Have in Lunenburg county. Both these rivers are essential to the economic welfare of the communities along their courses, and their development is urgently needed. People who live along these rivers, and read of the development of British Columbia rivers, find it hard to agree that the Department of Fisheries discriminates against British Columbia in favour of the maritimes.

As I have said previously, the department is well aware of the importance of developing these Nova Scotia rivers, but when I press the issue, I am told by the department that work cannot be proceeded with because the engineers who will eventually be concerned, are occupied in British Columbia.

In Queens-Lunenburg we have been engaged in fishing for a long time. It is of more than secondary importance to us. I can join with my colleague, the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare, in asserting that, in our adjoining constituencies, fishing is the very core of our economic life. To us it is not difficult to justify the appointment of a minister from the maritimes, and right now we maritimers think we have a pretty good one. His department may be the Cinderella of the government, but it is growing in stature.

It is pretty difficult to sell to maritimers the idea that other departments are more important and require more personnel. I would imagine it is equally difficult to sell the idea to fishermen from British Columbia. What the fishermen want is a fisheries department strong enough and sufficiently well staffed with experts of all kinds, such as researchers, inspectors, guardians and so forth, to provide fishermen with adequate assistance to guarantee them a just share of Canada's wealth. I do not know of any class of people who work harder for what they get in return.

The fishermen in the maritimes are grateful to the government for floor prices under fish. Although this has been a temporary measure, we hope that the government will continue to extend these benefits, which have proved to be such an advantage to so many people.

We have just come through a period of fair prosperity for fishermen, because their entire output could readily be absorbed, at good prices, to feed warring nations. These nations are now at peace, and are bending every effort to restore their own economies. We shall have to look elsewhere for markets and perhaps be prepared to accept lower prices. There is much to be done in developing markets both in Canada and externally. When one realizes that the average consumption of fish per capita per year in Canada is only about twelve pounds, and that during the same period the average meat consumption is 157 pounds, we can see why the fishermen think there is room for improvement.

Externally our big markets used to be the United States and West Indies, and these are still good potential markets if we are given an adequate chance to develop them. The Canada-West Indies treaty operated to the disadvantage of maritime fishermen. We lost good customers because of preferential trade barriers and discriminatory freight rates on Canadian steamship lines which considered it expedient to carry other commodities, and even fish from other countries, at rates considerably less than those charged for our own Canadian fish. These conditions are clearly presented in a report prepared for the Department of Fisheries in 1938 by two well known and authoritative merchants and experts, Messrs O. F. MacKenzie and F. Homer Zwicker. The report is entitled, "Markets for Dried and Pickled Fish."

Another report I would commend to hon. members is entitled "Report of the Royal Commission Investigating the Fisheries of the Maritime Provinces and the Magdalen Islands" presented in 1928. After reading this latter report I gained the impression that the government has given it close study, since many of the recommendations have been implemented already. I cannot urge too strongly, however, that the MacKenzie-Zwicker report be given careful study and that it be acted upon. Maritime fishermen are convinced that the southern markets can be regained by negotiating favourable treaties, but they insist that this must be done without delay. This applies to frozen, fresh and salted fish.

It is most important that the department's programme of development and research be pushed with vigour. There is much to be done. We must find out how to get fish to markets in the best possible condition. This means quality control, scientific methods, more and better inspection, and a full programme of education. We have lost many sales because we were outdone in quality.

The research programme must, of course, embrace shellfish. Lobster and scallop fisheries must not be overlooked. There is still too much illegal fishing of lobsters. This applies particularly to the fishing of lobsters in closed seasons and taking of small lobsters both in closed and open seasons. Greater vigilance is necessary on the part of guardians, and it may well be that their number needs to be increased.

Scallop fishing needs some attention. This used to be a lucrative business, and scallops were taken in large quantities. The supply is fast diminishing. An investigation should be undertaken to locate new beds, and with a view to providing regulations as to the dates of the season, the length of the season and the permissible quantities to be taken.

I would add a few brief remarks in support of all that has been said by the hon. members for Saint John-Albert, New Westminster, Halifax and Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare, in requesting close cooperation among the departments of fisheries, transport and public works. It is fundamental that fishermen must have the full advantages of breakwaters, wharves, adequate buoys, direction-finding devices and so forth, if they are to develop to the best advantage.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would say again that there is much to be done. Fishermen are counting heavily on this government to help them take their rightful place in the Canadian economy. We have full confidence in the minister and his department, and we are hoping for the best.

Mr. GREEN: Could the minister tell the committee what plans his department have in mind for the extension of the fishing industry, more particularly plans in connection with the rehabilitation of the men coming back from the forces? As the estimates of the different departments have come up for consideration I have formed the opinion that the departments are allowing themselves to slide back to the 1939 outlook. They seem to be getting back to normal, whereas there should be some recognition of the fact that we are living in a new era and that there must be expansion and a movement forward. I hope there are some forward-looking plans all ready to be put into effect by the Department of Fisheries.

With regard to the fisheries on the Pacific coast suggestions have been made by very responsible people, which I think would be backed up by the members from British Columbia, to the effect that a great deal could be done in the way of clearing streams so that salmon could get up to spawn and the young fish could get back to the sea, and that there should be a far more carefully organized patrolling and observation of conditions on the various fishing streams. It is suggested that once again fish hatcheries should be established in our province. I do not know how many hatcheries the dominion operates at the present time, but certainly most of them have been closed. Another suggestion is that courses should be established in connection with the rehabilitation of veterans, in which they could study such subjects as biology, zoology, stream control and a certain amount of forestry. Those are typical of the suggestions which have been made about the fishing industry. I see quite a large vote for this department in the supplementary estimates, but the particulars show that the bulk of the money is to be spent on the acquisition of boats, and is not for measures such as those I have suggested. Could the minister make a short statement with regard to the questions I have raised?

Hon. H. F. G. BRIDGES (Minister of Fisheries): We are still on the first item, and it is my intention to make a short statement after all those who wish to speak have done so. At that time I will deal with the matters the hon. gentleman has brought up.

Mr. REID: I have one suggestion to offer to the minister, and I am not going to repeat what I said when we were in committee recently. It is this. Our Canadian fishing fleet on the Pacific coast now is going farther afield. As the inshore fisheries are becoming depleted they are building larger vessels and going out into the open sea. They are also going down south and fishing off the coasts of California, Washington and Oregon. I realize that the minister is new to his position, but I should like him to take serious note of this suggestion, because I believe it would be of great benefit to our fishermen. Back in 1845 a treaty was drawn up between Great Britain and the United States concerning the Columbia river, which begins in the interior of British Columbia and flows to the sea through the state of Washington. In that treaty it was laid down that British subjects would at all times have free access over the river to the sea.

That would be of benefit to us in this way. The Canadian fleet fishing off Washington and Oregon sometimes have to run for cover when a storm comes up. At the present time they have to pick up anchor and move back into Canadian waters, which takes a considerable length of time. It is my opinion, and the opinion of others, that by this treaty our fleet could enter the Columbia river, which would save them a very great deal of time. To those who are not aware of conditions out there this may seem a trivial matter, but to those who know the district and to the fishermen themselves this would be worth thousands of dollars annually. If instead of having to run a hundred miles or more in order to reach Canadian waters they could find safety in the Columbia river, which under the treaty I claim they have a right to do, it would be of great benefit to them. I do not expect the minister to give an answer now, because he has many matters to look into, but this is one thing I would ask him to consider carefully just as soon as the opportunity presents itself.

Mr. STUART (Charlotte): Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words in behalf of the fishermen of Charlotte county. Perhaps our fishing industry is not as extensive as that of Nova Scotia, but still we believe it is of considerable importance. The people in that county are hardworking, ambitious men, and all they ask is an opportunity to make a living. It is a hazardous business, as we all know, and in the past the prices of fish have fluctuated to such an extent that at times fishermen have been unable to do more than meet expenses. During the past two years prices have been fair, giving these fishermen an opportunity to purchase new boats and greatly improve their equipment. Even with these improved conditions, however, the breaks many of them got due to war conditions were not so good; and when they did have luck in one season the method of computing income tax left them with very little after paying off their debts incurred during the poor seasons. This condition is being improved to a great extent by legislation now before this parliament.

The hon. member for Saint John-Albert has mentioned my name in connection with lobster hatcheries. I feel this matter to be of vital importance to one of the greatest industries in the maritime provinces; and though reports regarding lobster hatcheries are not so encouraging in Canada, they are still being maintained in the state of Maine and have proved of great value. Several hatcheries are operating in Canada where trout, bass, salmon and other fish are propagated to improve our tourist business and encourage sportsmen to come to this country. I believe that to be a sound business proposition, but in relation to the lobster fisheries there is no comparison in dollars and cents or in the number employed, since in the maritime provinces thousands depend upon these fisheries for their livelihood.

In the past few years this industry has greatly improved. Lobsters are more plentiful than they have been for twenty years, and in some cases the catch has doubled. The cause of this increase has never been explained, but I do know that to-day lobsters three and four inches in length can be found in the bay of Fundy where the oldest resident had never seen a lobster of this size until the past five years. Just where they have come from I cannot say. We were always given to understand that lobsters of this size could not survive owing to the water temperatures. I take it for granted that the water temperatures now are practically the same as they were twenty years ago, yet to-day these lobsters can be found. In my opinion these small lobsters come from the state of Maine, as the first place to increase their lobster catch in Charlotte county was Grand Manan island, the nearest lobster ground to the Maine coast. I would urge upon the department that they give this matter serious thought. To give you some idea of the value, the Conley Lobster company, who ship lobsters from the town where I live, will this year sell lobsters to the value of over three million dollars. Ninety-five per cent of these lobsters will be sold in the United States.

We have also in this particular county a valuable sardine industry. Millions of dollars are invested in canneries, sardine weirs, boats and other equipment necessary to carry on this very important fishing. In fact, we have the largest sardine cannery in the British empire or perhaps the whole world. This is the largest industry in the county, employing directly and indirectly thousands of men and women. Practically all fish are purchased from fishermen within a radius of fifty miles. This cannery in the year 1943 used over 70 million tins which are made in their own can shops. It uses thousands of barrels of cotton-seed oil, when available, when not, soya bean oil is used, and olive oil in the more expensive brands of sardines when it is available. Thousands of tons of salt are also used in curing the fish. Over one hundred brands of different kinds of sea foods are canned by this company. I wish to mention again the fact that seventy-five per cent or more of their finished product is sold outside Canada. In fact, before the war this company shipped goods to over one hundred different countries.

The one thing I wish to impress upon the committee is that about ninety per cent of the sardines caught in Charlotte county are sold outside Canada. The American market takes nearly seventy-five per cent in the fresh state which are canned in the state of Maine. Of the remaining twenty-five per cent canned in Canada, seventy-five per cent is sold in over one hundred countries outside of Canada. In other words, if we depended on Canadian markets for our sardines, ninety per cent of this very important industry would be lost.

The same condition exists regarding lobsters, smelts, scallops, oysters, ground fish, which would mean cod, haddock, pollock, hake, and all other fish that are caught in the province of New Brunswick—even the herring scales, which to-day is a worth-while business, with hundreds employed. This year the value will be, I believe, $200,000 or more. They are sold one hundred per cent in the American market.

The fishermen of the three maritime provinces are all interested in having floor prices established on all kinds of fish. We have heard in this house many discussions as to floor prices for wheat and other farm products. This, I believe, is a wonderful idea. A period of five years with guaranteed floor prices has been discussed, and no doubt will be enforced. We in the maritime provinces are in a different position from the western farmer. As I have pointed out, we are depending on the American markets for our livelihood. Therefore nothing but an international agreement would be sufficient to give us the protection I feel we deserve.

I am personally acquainted with most of the Maine canners and fish buyers, and knowing them as I do, and knowing the friendly feeling that exists on this border, I feel confident this could be done by the two countries agreeably to the fishermen on both sides.

I trust the department realizes the importance, indeed the necessity, of an agreement of this kind, and will work with the fishermen and the fisheries department in the United States to have an international agreement as to floor prices that will meet with the approval of all concerned.

Another great handicap to the fish canning industry during the war was the tax on overtime. It was responsible for cutting production to a great extent. In the canning of fish you have a very perishable article, particularly in the summer months; within a short time of being taken from the water, it must be processed. It is impossible to adjust the quantities needed from day to day, as the supply is never dependable. Therefore, you are in short supply one day and in over-supply the next; consequently, with an over-supply your help are obliged to work overtime, which was gladly done in normal times. However, when taxes were imposed on this work the help refused. This was responsible for loss of production, as the canner was obliged to play safe and usually worked less than a full day. To me this is proof that a regulation that will work in every case is something as yet undiscovered, and adjustments should be made in extraordinary circumstances such as these. I sincerely trust that the government will consider this carefully and also consider tax adjustments on low personal incomes, which I believe fall far short of present requirements and should be eliminated. There should be established a graduated scale for middle income brackets, which would remove more of the tax burden from the small wage earner.

I was in this house a very short time when the name "free trader" was given me by some of my colleagues. They were perfectly justified in doing so, as I still look back to the election of 1911 as the greatest disaster in the history of the maritime provinces. We have always been obliged to sell our products in a competitive market and forced to buy in a highly protected market. This has proved disastrous to the maritime provinces, particularly in the fishing industry. In order for this industry to prosper, a more friendly feeling must be created between the primary producers and the canners on both sides of this border, as the fishermen here have always been obliged to depend upon these canners for a market for their fish.

As I have pointed out, we in the maritime provinces are obliged to depend almost entirely on foreign countries for markets for our fish and fish products, and we are obliged to sell in competitive markets and buy in a highly protected market. Our sardines in the fresh state have always entered the United States free of duty; that market absorbs about 75 per cent of the yearly catch. Lobsters, scallops, oysters, smelts and many other kinds of fish enjoy the same privilege. Ninety per cent of these fish are sold in the United States. If a prohibitive duty were imposed by the United States government, the fishing industry in the maritime provinces would be practically worthless.

Now, how does this country reciprocate? Does the United States fisherman have the same privilege of trying to sell fish in Canada? Absolutely not—except during a very short period. During the first great war—I believe it was the years 1917 and 1918—and for a few months during this last war, the United States sardine fishermen were absolutely barred from any market in Canada. The lobster fishermen in Maine got exactly the same treatment. Why this has been done I cannot explain, and I doubt if any department in Ottawa could give the house a reasonable explanation. If they feel they are protecting the fishermen of the maritime provinces, they are absolutely wrong.

In the seventy-eight years since confederation we in the maritime provinces have earnestly endeavoured to find that market for fish in Canada and have failed. If the United States fishermen can do what we have failed to do, I feel they should be given every opportunity, and the least this government can do is to give them the same consideration we are given; even though it would be of little benefit to them, it would at least create a more friendly feeling on both sides of the border.

Another matter I wish to bring to the attention of the committee is the destruction caused by the storm of November 20 to both private and public property in the maritime provinces. In Charlotte county alone this damage is estimated at one million dollars. A great proportion of this loss was private property. In some cases a life's savings were destroyed in a few hours. These fishermen should receive every consideration from the government, and everything possible should be done to assist them in getting established in business again.

The destruction of wharves and breakwaters is a very serious matter, particularly at this time of year when a large fleet of boats engaged in winter fishing depend on these breakwaters for harbour. The boats used to-day are much larger than were used even ten years ago. The value has increased at least 400 per cent, consequently, a much larger space is necessary to berth them. The number of boats engaged in this particular branch of the industry has also increased to such an extent that breakwaters must be built larger and dredging done to accommodate a valuable fishing fleet.

Another matter I wish to discuss briefly is the wages that are paid fishery guardians. These men are employed temporarily by the fisheries department, usually for a period of a few months, and in many cases they are obliged to live away from home. Guardians are paid $2.50 per day, which is far too little. Returned veterans usually get these appointments. I well remember attending a fisheries conference at Shediac, New Brunswick, in 1941, when an official of this department made the statement that due to the fact these appointments were political appointments, they were getting the wrong type of men. Just what he expected for $2.50 a day I never could understand. This condition may exist in some parts of this country but being personally acquainted with the guardians in the county I represent, and working with them for quite some time myself, I feel I am in a position to say they are reliable citizens, doing a fine job for starvation wages. I think the department should consider paying these guardians, who in most cases, as I have said, are returned soldiers, a living wage.

Much can be done to improve this industry by sincere cooperation between this department and the fishermen. If every official from the highest to the lowest could be convinced that he is paid not only to make and enforce regulations, and I might add that there are plenty, but also to study the problems confronting the fishermen from coast to coast, to associate with them in a friendly manner, imparting knowledge acquired by that study where it would be beneficial and appreciated, then everyone would be benefited. From experience I would say that too many officials see only one part of their obligation, that of enforcing regulations. That may be essential, but it does not require great knowledge of the fishing industry; or it may not prove to be a great credit to the official. I sincerely hope that in the future this department will seriously consider the importance of arming these officers with knowledge of the fishing industry, not with firearms to carry while on official duty as has been done in the past and is being done at the present time. An officer's efficiency cannot always be gauged by the number of infractions of regulations reported, or by the number of prosecutions secured, although this is the yardstick commonly used by this department.

In conclusion may I say that I am personally acquainted with practically every fisherman in the county I represent, having been associated with them during the time I was engaged in this industry myself, for over twenty years, and I feel I have some knowledge of the difficulties they have to contend with. Long hours of exposure and hard work mean nothing to these men if they can make the living which they justly deserve. I have endeavoured to point out the situation regarding markets and the absolute necessity of cooperation between the fishermen and the fisheries departments of these two countries, since we are obliged to look to our neighbours for the markets we have always enjoyed. We are also dependent upon the cooperation of all departments of the government to see to it that those privileges are preserved which mean so much to the fishermen of Charlotte and the maritime provinces. The men who go down to the sea in ships have over a period of years built up a friendly international spirit which might be copied with great benefit and credit by other parts of this dominion.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Chairman, I would like to take a few minutes to discuss certain phases of the fisheries industry. I also represent a fishing constituency, that of Comox-Alberni. While perhaps I cannot say that it is the best fishing constituency in Canada, I can say to the hon. member for Queens-Lunenberg that it probably produces the most fish. I welcome the suggestion of the hon. member that we who represent fishing communities should work together and cooperate rather than endeavour to create rivalry between the Pacific and Atlantic coasts. In that I am in complete agreement.

I notice that the agricultural members in the house have achieved great success in, shall I say, assaulting the treasury. They have made an excellent job of this. I notice that every time the agriculture estimates are up those hon. members appear to cooperate whole-heartedly with the Minister of Agriculture in an effort to obtain all the assistance they can for their farmers. I know that the budget for the Department of Fisheries of some $4,200,000 will not appear like a large sum to members representing agricultural districts. I noticed that one hon. member from Saskatchewan made an appeal for his whitefish. I am glad to see him taking care of the fishermen of his constituency, but I am just wondering, in view of the technique displayed by these agricultural members, if we will not find our appropriation going to the province of Saskatchewan. I am a little bit worried about their skill in that regard.

The hon. member for New Westminster has suggested that the British Columbia members were not pressing their fisheries as much as they should. That may be true. We British Columbians are modest people. We never say much about our climate or our peaches or anything like that. We have always found that if you have a real good product or a real good industry it will be something like mother's pies—they will not need too much praise.

I am sorry there has been so much delay in bringing down these estimates. It was unfortunate that so much time was wasted on the speech from the throne in discussing generalities. I hope that next year we will be able to get down to these matters earlier in the session. We are fortunate in having so many British Columbia members still present in the house. They must have been lucky with their train reservations.

The estimates we are discussing are practically all dead and gone now. I notice the supplementary estimates are quite substantial and indicate some expansion, for which I am very glad. I hope next year the minister will bring in even larger estimates, and I can assure him that he will have the support of all maritime members. The Department of Fisheries would be well advised to cooperate closely with the Department of Trade and Commerce in connection with marketing. This has been mentioned already by some hon. members. I should like to see our reentry into the great oriental market in connection with Pacific salted herring and salted salmon.

Speaking of market extension, I think a good job has been done in British Columbia by the wartime prices and trade board in extending the market for Atlantic coast products. Because of our higher standards of living out there, we must pay higher wages and therefore it costs us more to pack our products. One item I might mention is clams. I happen to be a connoisseur of clams because I was brought up near a clam beach. We always figured that the table was set twice a day when the tide went out. Without wanting to disparage the wonderful shellfish that they have on the Atlantic coast, I must say that they just do not come up to the product of the Pacific coast. We have been pretty well forced to use the product from the Atlantic coast, because the ceiling prices put on by the wartime prices and trade board made it impossible to put our superior product on the market.

I certainly would not have supported bill 15 if I had thought that the wartime prices controls were to continue into that sphere. What they have done is to send our products in the raw state across to the United States, and there are at least one thousand jobs less in British Columbia because of that. I sincerely trust that by next year we shall have got away from that condition. The wartime prices and trade board has done a wonderful job, but one unfortunate thing they have done is to lump a quality pack with a pack of lesser quality on the same price basis. I do not think that should be done, in view of the fact that the department is carrying on a very worthy work in emphasizing the quality of our fish. If we are putting out a high class product, we should be allowed some extra price in order to take care of the extra expenses.

The vote for fisheries research this year is $541,000. To some hon. members this may not look like a large amount, but it is a lot of money for fisheries research. I sincerely hope that we shall get value for that money. I wish to congratulate the minister and his department upon the excellent research experimental station at Vancouver. They have made a most valuable contribution to the industry out there. The advice they have given to the canning industry has been most valuable, and they have developed some new products which should be very helpful in creating a market in Canada. Canadians are the lowest per capita eaters of fish in the world whereas with the high quality of our products we should have a very large domestic market. Our scientists and research stations have a tremendous job on their hands and if we give them proper direction and tell them what we really need in the fishing industry they can supply us with the information required.

In the brief that was presented to the former minister of fisheries (Mr. Bertrand), early this year, it was suggested that the question should be looked into of reestablishing salmon hatcheries in British Columbia. I know of one area that used to produce one hundred thousand sockeye salmon in one year. Despite the fact that there has been no change made in the stream, no obstructions put in and no logging done nearby, for no apparent reason that run has disappeared so that in one year alone only one thousand salmon were taken out. The value of the fish in that run alone, as it formerly was, would almost equal this appropriation for research.

There is another question which I should like the research board to look into very carefully and do it promptly. There has been a great deal of criticism regarding otter and beam trawling. A large number of fishermen feel that in scraping up the bottom of the ocean bed the spawning grounds for the fish are being ruined. I have seen hundreds of tons of small immature fish brought on to the deck of trawlers and shovelled off again into the water, probably causing pollution. That is the kind of thing our scientists can look into. Unfortunately our fishery regulations in Canada seem to have been made on the basis of the number of squawkers. No class, however numerically large it may be, should be able to get the regulations so framed as to do an injustice to our fisheries. I think that rather than yield to pressure from groups we should call in our scientists and experimental stations with a view to passing proper regulations.

I am very glad that the minister is taking into consideration implementing some of the suggestions that were submitted in the Bertrand brief earlier this year. I see by a notice that I have received that a waterways engineer is being sought to clear stream obstructions. I would point out to the minister that British Columbia definitely now has an unemployment problem, and I sincerely hope that his programme of expansion of our fishery service will result in the employment of a large number of war veterans, who I understand are being trained in this work. I hope that that programme will be implemented as soon as possible.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): This is one of the most important departments of government so far as the people of Nova Scotia and the maritime provinces are concerned. Fish is one of our great natural resources and deserves more attention than it has had in previous years. The Duncan commission recommended that fisheries be set up as a separate department, with a special minister placed in charge. I was a member of the provincial government that made this representation to the Duncan commission. We have had some capable ministers in charge of the Department of Fisheries who have made considerable progress. Unfortunately these ministers, I think without exception, have not been practical fishermen, but distinguished members of the legal profession. Many people interested in the fishing industry would have preferred that someone with practical experience and knowledge of the fishing industry be placed in charge of this department. I believe that the present minister has done fairly well in the time that he has been there, considering that he has had very little, if any, practical experience. He has been supported by capable officials in his department—I refer especially to the deputy minister and assistant deputy minister.

The great problem in Nova Scotia has been markets and prices. Our fishermen in former years have had to work at starvation wages over long periods of time. In recent years prices have been more satisfactory, but the fishermen could never understand why there should be such a tremendous spread between the price they were able to get, as low as fifty cents a hundred pounds, and what the consumer had to pay. I hope that the legislation we put through at a previous session providing for floor prices will rectify this.

There is also the matter of the quality and the marketing of the fish. It has been recommended that a special aeroplane service be established in order to market the fish regularly and in the best possible condition. I do not know whether the minister is prepared to make a statement in that regard. I am referring particularly to fish caught in the outlying portions of Nova Scotia, fish caught on the coasts and marketed inland at a considerable distance from where it is caught. The marketing of the fish in first-class condition depends upon better facilities for transport, and in this connection it is desirable that an aeroplane service be established.

I would ask the minister what is his attitude and that of his department with respect to the large merger recently made in Nova Scotia in the fishing industry. I have no reflections to make on those who are at the head of this big organization. If they are going to direct their attention to assisting the actual fishmermen in the marketing of their product, I believe there is no one more capable of doing that than those at the head of that great merger. On the other hand it is giving the fishermen of Nova Scotia a great deal of concern as to whether the merger has been set up with the approval and under the control of the department and has for its object an improvement in the lot of the fishermen, and whether it will be able to achieve that purpose and guarantee them a satisfactory price and a steady market.

There is a good deal more that I should like to say in connection with the work of this department, but I know the committee is anxious to make progress and I shall not delay it.

Mr. MOORE: I have listened with a great deal of interest to the discussion that has taken place this afternoon on fishing. All the speakers have been brief and to the point and the discussion has been really worth while. I happen to come from Manitoba, where the fishing industry is of considerable importance. The statement was made this afternoon that the agriculturists of this country get a great deal of benefit from the federal department of agriculture because of the activities of members of parliament on behalf of agriculture. That may be true, but we must look forward to a much greater expenditure still on agriculture if it is to continue to be the industry it is supposed to be. Saskatchewan, for instance, will require an expenditure of $200,000,000 for a major irrigation project. This is something of extreme importance. I do not think we are asking too much when we ask this. We must remember that prior to the outbreak of the present war over 400 million dollars was spent on Singapore, and the guns of the naval base could not be turned around to fire inland. The enemy came up from behind and the garrison simply had to surrender.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MOORE: That fact may not be greatly related to these estimates, but I think it may be in point as far as the question of recommendations is concerned. As to fishing, Manitoba has a considerable fishing industry which is gradually extending northward. I recommend that the department lay plans for the building in northern Manitoba of a number of fish filleting plants at places where the fish have to be transported by air. If that were done it would be quite possible to expand the industry considerably. I think we can take a leaf out of the book which Saskatchewan has written in connection with the fishing industry. The Saskatchewan government has done considerable to expand the industry in the northern areas of the province. I suggest also that we investigate the possibilities of cooperative marketing of fish. Already Nova Scotia has done a great deal in that line.

After looking through the estimates it appears to me that no large amount of money has been allocated to the inland fisheries. How much money, for example, is to be spent in these estimates on fishing in Manitoba?

Mr. BRIDGES: I was most anxious that every hon. member who wished to speak on the fisheries estimates under this item should do so before I made any remarks, and then, as to individual items, I hope there will not be too much delay, since we are so near to the end of the session.

It is not my intention to make any extended remarks. Some fourteen or fifteen persons have already spoken on the estimates and it is impossible for me to reply to all of them, but I will deal with certain salient features of the remarks which have been made this afternoon and the other day. If I happen to overlook some of the matters which have been referred to I hope no hon. member will feel that I am deliberately neglecting to deal with his remarks.

I should like first of all to take this opportunity of thanking hon. members on both sides for the congratulatory and felicitous remarks which they have made on my appointment as Minister of Fisheries. I appreciate them sincerely. While I am a Liberal in politics I have always rejoiced in the fact that I have many personal friends of all political colours. There is nothing I cherish more than personal friendships; and whether my stay in this House of Commons be long or short I hope that I shall enlarge my circle of personal friends no matter what political party they belong to.

I am going to deal first of all with some remarks which were made the other day when the fisheries estimates first came up. I shall deal briefly with them, I hope to the satisfaction of the committee.

The hon. member for New Westminster made certain remarks regarding offshore fisheries and the recent announcement by President Truman. No doubt this matter has been brought to the attention of the Department of External Affairs, and perhaps it would be more appropriate that he direct his question to that department.

As I heard the various speeches which were made here I could not help but feel that sometimes the speakers considered me to be the Minister of Public Works, other times the Secretary of State for External Affairs, other times chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, and after the latest contribution I came to the conclusion that the boundaries of the fisheries department no longer extend from Sydney to Vancouver, but from Sydney to Singapore. I feel that I should deal with each of the criticisms as it affects my own department, and not endeavour to answer criticisms which really should be directed to other departments.

The question of lobster hatcheries in the maritime provinces and the possibility of establishing them was brought up both by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert and the hon. member for Charlotte. I should like to give a little information concerning lobster hatcheries, because apparently some idea prevails that they have never existed in Canada. The first lobster hatchery was built under the jurisdiction of this department at Bayview, Pictou county, in 1891, and fourteen others in connection with Long Beach Pond, Digby county, from 1903 to 1913, so at one time we had a total of fifteen lobster hatcheries in Canada. All fifteen of these were discontinued and disposed of in the year 1917. This, I find from information, was apparently as the result of a recommendation which was made by the fisheries research board, or biological board, as it was then called, to the effect that the lobster hatcheries at that time were not considered to be sufficiently successful in producing lobsters to warrant their continuance. The situation to-day may have changed; I am not saying so, but I assure hon. members who have brought up this question that it will be carefully studied and considered by the department and probably by the fisheries research board as well. I hope that I can make a further statement on the subject when the next session of the house comes around.

The hon. member for Saint John-Albert asked for some information regarding the item of $1,200,000 which appeared in the war appropriation estimates under an item to provide for payment of subsidies in connection with the purchase of Canadian canned salmon. It should first of all be borne in mind that this item in the war appropriation estimates will involve no final expenditure on the part of the federal government; it is simply an estimate of payments to be made pending reimbursement from the British Ministry of Food, the Canadian Red Cross Society, and the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation. This salmon was disposed of to the British Ministry of Food, the Canadian Red Cross Society, the armed services and the Canadian domestic market. My friend asked the quantities disposed of in this manner, the names of the persons, and the amounts each received. It is my intention to furnish him now with quantities. It would take some time to furnish him with the other information; I shall be glad to do it for him privately, or I will write him a letter on the subject.

Regarding the disposal of the canned salmon in the last year: to the British Ministry of Food, 775,557 cases; to the Red Cross, 52,000 cases; to the Canadian domestic market, 250,000 cases; to the armed services, 20,000 cases.

The hon. member also asked for some information regarding an item which appears on the war appropriation under the title, experimental long line fishing vessel. The object and the purpose of this experiment are twofold. The first was to examine the possibilities of using mechanical hauling in place of hand hauling from dories. Fishing was engaged in by one vessel used for this purpose on various parts of the Atlantic coast, and its success may be judged by the fact that fishermen are now installing similar mechanical apparatus on their own boats. The second was to ascertain whether fishing for species little fished in the past could be further exploited. The results in this instance showed that such fisheries as the halibut in various regions of the Atlantic coast could be profitably exploited. As an example, in one area the vessel engaged primarily in halibut fishing in two trips each of seven days fishing duration grossed about $3,000 in each case. In order to expedite matters, it is not my intention at the moment to elaborate on this item, but I have a considerable amount of information available concerning the experiment and I shall be glad to furnish it to any member of the house.

The member for St. John-Albert referred to a certain temporary appointment of a fisheries inspector at Shediac, New Brunswick. When this matter was first mentioned I suggested to him that he put the question on the order paper; I still feel that that would have been the more appropriate course to follow. However, I will say this. This man is at present occupying the position of temporary fisheries guardian and not fisheries inspector. I would advise the committee that all appointments of fisheries inspectors are made by the civil service commission. Apparently the policy at present is this: These positions at the present time are all temporary until the rest of the servicemen get back from overseas. Eventually the job will be advertised, and I am sure that when the commission does make an appointment it will go to a man who has had overseas service. I am sure the commission will carry out the regulations in that regard. Everyone knows, I believe, that I am as much interested as anyone else in seeing that these various appointments are held by men who have had overseas service and experience.

Another question brought up first of all by the member for Royal was whether or not an investigaiton is being made into the possibility of transporting fresh fish from the maritimes to the larger centres of Ontario and Quebec. It gives me great pleasure to inform him that this department has, through the fisheries research board, evolved a new type of refrigerator carrier known as the overhead refrigerator car, which is being manufactured as quickly as possible by the two Canadian railway systems and which is at present in use. The war, of course, halted continued manufacture of these cars.

With regard to transport by plane, it should be borne in mind that the war has been over now only a matter of months, but I can say that the department has a fund of information available for anyone who wishes to make use of it. In other words, it is available to those engaged in the industry who desire to use it. This information concerns several factors which are involved in securing new methods of transportation.

Several hon. members have brought up the question of markets. The member for Royal was the first to do so. With regard to markets such as the South American and West Indian markets, this is a matter that comes within the jurisdiction of the Department of Trade and Commerce. However, I would advise the hon. gentleman that my department is cooperating to the fullest extent with other departments in furthering trade opportunities in this industry.

The member for Queens made some reference to controls. At that time I felt that I was being addressed as chairman of the wartime prices and trade board. However, when I asked him what report he referred to in his remarks he told me it was not a document that had been put out by the fisheries department. It is really not within my competence to discuss the matter of controls, because it does not come within the purview of the Department of Fisheries. There was, however, one remark of the member for Queens which I would comment upon. At page 2796 of Hansard I read:

> It has been most annoying to the fishermen that the Department of Fisheries have not cooperated with the packers and the fishermen in an effort to educate them to put out a better article for the market.

May I say that my information from the departmental officials is that a special effort has been devoted to this very problem. This cooperation took the form of courses given at the Halifax fishermen's experimental station for cannery managers and the preparation and distribution of pamphlets giving a simple description of improved technique and proper processing, and continued and repeated visits by experts of the department to the canneries to assist in various problems, placing at the disposal of the canners engineering and technical advice. Any fair-minded canner, especially the smaller ones, will attest to the truthfulness of that statement, and if the hon. member wishes further information, such as examples of the type of literature available, it will be furnished by my department. The department will be pleased to make such information available to him. One thing which the department has always emphasized and will continue to emphasize, in my tenure of office at any rate, is quality of product.

The member for Nanaimo made certain references to the rehabilitation of streams on Vancouver Island. I am pleased to be able to inform the hon. gentleman that this is being made the subject of special study by the fisheries research board, though the problem is a large one which cannot be tackled all at once. I can assure him that Vancouver island is included in the study. The hon. member also brought up the question of the utilization of seaweed. This is a matter that is receiving the continuous attention of the research workers.

With regard to whaling, my information is that whales have been threatened with extinction by the operation of competing countries, and there are conventions, to which Canada is a party, under which we have all agreed that, in order to conserve the industry, a definite limit must be placed upon the kill each year. The Canadian government has taken steps to protect the interests of Canada in this regard so that we may be assured of our proper share.

The member for Saskatoon City referred to the fact that in 1944, according to the public accounts, this department spent only $13.08 in his province. In fairness it should be pointed out to the hon. member, and also to the member for Churchill, who spoke a few moments ago, that the prairie provinces are responsible for their own administration of fisheries. I would also direct attention to the fact that the dominion government has established a prairie provinces division and experimental station to assist in the development of the industry and marketing problems of the prairie provinces. This was accomplished by order in council P.C. 4812, to which the member for Saskatoon City referred.

Mr. MacNICOL: Where is the experimental station?

Mr. BRIDGES: In the city of Winnipeg. Other speakers have brought up some other subjects which I wish to assure them are all receiving careful consideration. There is no doubt that I have found most helpful the remarks made by the thirteen or fourteen hon. members who have spoken. I am perfectly frank about the situation. I have not been in charge of the department for much more than three months, but I am in a position to learn; at least I hope so; and it is definitely my intention to learn. I believe I can learn a great deal from many members of the house who have given us some valuable suggestions to-day.

There is one thing to which I think I should reply, and that is to the remarks made by the member for Cumberland, who asked some questions regarding the recent merger of certain companies in Nova Scotia. My reply is that as far as the Department of Fisheries was concerned this merger was accomplished without either its approval or disapproval. The merger was carried out according to the law of the land, and the department had nothing whatever to do with it.

I do not wish to delay the committee any longer; in other words I do not want to make any sort of provocative speech and thereby block my own estimates. The hon. member for Vancouver South did ask something in regard to the future policy of the department. It should be borne in mind that the estimates before us to-day were prepared many months ago, while the war was still on; and that I myself, as I said before, have been in the department for a matter of only three months. So of necessity my remarks concerning policy will be brief. I hope when the next session of the house comes around I will feel in a better position to deal with this question. I would state to my hon. friend, however, that this government hopes to take all possible steps to ensure a favourable position for Canadian fish in the various export markets. Mention might also be made in this connection of the present plans of the Department of Trade and Commerce to extend and improve its trade commissioner service abroad in the interests of Canadian fish exporters. Future trade largely depends upon the quality of our products. Food standards generally became increasingly higher in the pre-war years. The department's emphasis is more and more on quality. The quality of the product must not only be of high calibre in comparison with fish of other countries but also in comparison with other foods.

The present transition period no doubt will bring greater responsibilities both upon the industry and upon the department. Here I might mention that the function of the department is intended always to be in the interests of the industry and these people dependent upon it. At times certain regulations may appear to be irksome and irritating, but from past experience it can be seen that while unpopular at their inception they have been amply justified as time went by.

No doubt the future will entail certain expansion and changes in the department. I cannot go into detail at this time, but we have hopes of producing adequate staff of high calibre and properly trained. In this connection I might mention that we shall be looking for recruits from among those of our young men who have been in the three armed services and who are now returning from overseas. These new recruits will be given proper courses of instruction which it is hoped will make them educationalists as well as police officers.

The fisheries of this country occupy a minor place in dollar volume in comparison with other industries, but one must measure it by the number of people who are dependent upon it for their livelihood. Parliament and the press as a whole throughout Canada quite naturally pay a great deal more attention to agriculture, forestry and mining, because they loom more largely in the dollar bracket; but we are interested in the number of people whose lives depend upon the industry. I regard the fishing industry as one of the most hopeful industries in Canada because, as the hon. member for Queen's-Lunenburg has said, there is so much still to be done.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): For many years I have risen in my place in this house and asked the Minister of Fisheries to see to it that we in Ontario should get our fish from the maritimes. I do not know how much the fishermen get for each class of fish, but I never could quite understand the tremendous spread between what they received and what my people in the city of Toronto have to pay for fish. I believe that for cod, as an example, they get three or four cents a pound; but in Ontario when you want to buy a piece of cod you have to pay thirty or forty cents a pound for it. There must be some reason for that. The minister spoke about our export trade. I think it is time we did something about trade within our own country and brought the fish from the maritime provinces up to Ontario, where we have about three million people who would like to get fish. But we do not believe fish should cost as much as roast beef, and that is about what it does at the present time. At other times of the year we cannot get the fish at all. I wonder if the minister would tell us something about this matter.

Mr. BRIDGES: It is really a complex question the hon. gentleman has brought up at this stage of the proceedings, though of course I am not criticizing him because it is so late in the session. I believe it is a matter which will require a great deal of study. If other ministers, after giving the matter considerable attention, were unable to give the hon. member an answer, I am sure it will require a great deal of study for me to answer his question. However, I can assure my hon. friend I shall endeavour to give him an answer when we meet again next March.

76. Fish culture, $199,030.

Mr. GREEN: Can the minister tell us how many hatcheries there are in British Columbia operated by the dominion government at the present time, and how that compares with the number formerly operated?

Mr. BRIDGES: There are no fish hatcheries operating in British Columbia under dominion control.

Mr. GREEN: How many were there previously?

Mr. BRIDGES: I am told there were about twelve.

Mr. GREEN: Has the department any intention of reestablishing dominion hatcheries in that province?

Mr. BRIDGES: The problem is being reexamined, and wherever it is really indicated that it would be of benefit to the industry, every consideration will be given to the possibility of reopening the hatcheries.

Mr. REID: I am glad the minister gave that answer, because for the benefit of the hon. member for Vancouver South I can say that the question of hatcheries is one of our great problems. In the past we had many tragedies in connection with hatcheries, and the matter is not altogether clear. There are two schools of thought; one does not believe in it and the other does. In the state of Washington, for instance, they have had a tragic decline in fisheries in the Columbia river, in spite of the hatcheries.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I should like to know the situation in Manitoba in regard to hatcheries. Are there any there under dominion control?

Mr. BRIDGES: There are no hatcheries at all under dominion control in Manitoba.

77. Oyster culture, $34,430.

Mr. McLURE: I want to say to the minister that this work is well run as a subdepartment of the fisheries department. The late deputy minister, Doctor Found, inaugurated this culture, and started anew a great industry throughout Canada known as aqua farming. In our section of the country the work is being carried on with great success under Doctor Needler and Doctor Kerswill at the biological station at Ellerslie, and they are being highly complimented on their work by the fishermen engaged in this branch of the industry. What is the gross revenue the department is receiving from the industry of oyster fishing?

Mr. BRIDGES: Was the question in regard to the gross revenue the department is receiving?

Mr. McLURE: Yes, from the royalties on oyster leases, and so on; not from the industry.

Mr. BRIDGES: I am told the amount is $6,073.28.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I should like to point out to the minister that along Northumberland strait it is generally known that only a fraction of the oysters are raised that this area is capable of producing. There is tremendous scope for a profitable development of this industry. It pleases me to note that there is a small increase in the appropriation, and I join with the hon. member for Queens in pointing out to the minister that there is a tremendous field for further development of this important natural resource.

The productivity per acre of these oyster areas is far above that of any agricultural crop. Looking back over the years it is clear that this branch of the fishing industry has been almost completely neglected. I am pleased therefore to see that the department is giving some additional attention to it.

78. Fisheries Research Board of Canada, $487,200.

Mr. REID: I note there is a great increase in the appropriation for this year as compared with last. I know that the government cannot reduce taxation and at the same time enlarge expenditures in certain lines. May I make my position clear; I am not about to criticize either research or scientists, but I must say I have found in nine years' experience with scientists who have been connected with the international Pacific salmon fisheries commission that unless one keeps a close eye on them, and directs and tells them what to do, he will be in difficulties. If one simply hands them a lot of money to play around with, then certainly they will play around with it. That is the experience I have had. I think it is time the minister told this board, in the words of Chisholm, that Santa Claus is dead, because during the war they increased their expenditures, while the department in general lacked men and equipment.

The increase in this vote over last year's is of considerable importance. I realize they have done some wonderful work in Vancouver in connection with the refrigeration and preservation of fish. However I would ask the minister to look into the situation at Nanaimo, and I would suggest that he do what has been done in connection with the salmon commission. He should have responsible to him a group who will supervise what these experts and scientists are doing. No longer can we turn money over to them, or turn them loose and let them do what they like. I know of one scientist in the state of Washington who spent thirty-five years of his life making investigations in connection with a small insect which was harming the industry. When he retired he said, "Well, it was an interesting time in my life, anyway, but no conclusion was ever reached."

The same would apply to some of the scientific research now going on. There is probably no end to it. It is unfortunate that at this stage of the session we could not have a full-dress debate on the entire question. However

I have felt it wise to draw the attention of the minister to this increase in the vote, and I hope that when we come back next year he will be in a position to give a complete answer as to what has been accomplished in British Columbia.

Mr. MOORE: I note that of this vote the sum of $237,127 is for temporary assistance. This seems a large figure under that heading. Of what does it consist?

Mr. BRIDGES: All the employees of the fisheries research board are not civil servants. They are temporarily employed by the board. The amount is large under that heading because the board has expanded to a considerable extent during war years.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How many are involved in this expenditure?

Mr. BRIDGES: I shall get the information later. I do not have it before me at the present time.

Mr. McLURE: I am pleased to note an increase of about $119,000 in this vote. Will most of this be spent in extra research work?

Mr. BRIDGES: Yes.

83. To provide for transportation, dressing and dyeing, and other expenses incidential to receiving and disposing of fur seal skins accruing to Canada pursuant to provisional fur seal agreement between Canada and the United States by exchange of notes dated December 8 and 19, 1942, $300,000.

Mr. REID: We have had a treaty with the United States since 1911, and have been receiving hundreds of thousands of dollars under that treaty through the sale of fur skins. When the United States built a village in the Pribyloff islands I understand they built an office, or at least some housing accommodation to take care of a Canadian representative. During all those long years we have never sent a representative to those islands to see what is being done. Surely when we are getting so much from the treaty we should take some interest in the matter, and send someone. I know the United States authorities are not well pleased about this apparent lack of interest.

Mr. McLURE: This item deals with a revenue producer, and at practically no cost. Why is there an increase in the vote? What was our share of the seal skins under the treaty of 1911, or of 1942? Where is the dressing, dyeing and machining of the skins carried out? Where are they marketed, and have we marketed our 1945 take? I understand the Americans have marketed their quantity, and I should like to know the gross amount we received from this industry.

Mr. BRIDGES: The increase in the vote is necessary to provide for a greater take of seals, and also for the payment of duties. The number of skins was 14,000, and the net revenue as to October, $253,260.37.

Mr. McLURE: Where were they sold?

Mr. BRIDGES: They were all sold in Canada.

Mr. McLURE: I understand that the total take-off was around 77,000, out of which we received twenty per cent. Formerly we received only fifteen per cent, but the new treaty of 1942 gave Canada twenty per cent and the United States eighty per cent.

Mr. BRIDGES: That is correct.

Mr. McLURE: Where were the dressing and dyeing done?

Mr. BRIDGES: Some in St. Louis, United States, and some in London, England.

Mr. McLURE: What did you receive for the skins machined and dyed in the United States as compared with those machined and dyed in England?

Mr. BRIDGES: I shall have to get the average prices worked out for both places and supply them to the hon. member.

Mr. McLURE: Perhaps I could give the minister a bit of information he may not have. It may be to his interest to know that when the ceiling price was taken off in the United States prices reached what was almost a peak. If the bulk of our skins had been sold there we would have averaged, that is taking the extra large, large and culls together, $70 a skin. Their skins realized $110 for the large and extra large, $76 for the medium and $51 for the damaged.

Mr. BRIDGES: I thank the hon. member for the information.

Mr. McLURE: I think we should take into consideration where would be the best place to market these skins as well as the best place to have them machined, dyed and dressed.

84. To provide for payment of a bounty for the destruction of harbour seals, $15,000.

Mr. McLURE: What is the bounty per seal?

Mr. BRIDGES: Five dollars.

Mr. McLURE: To what provinces is this allocated, and what has been paid out to each province?

Mr. BRIDGES: My information is that it is divided, $7,500 to the east and $7,500 to the west; there is no distinction as between provinces.

85. To provide for the extension of educational work in cooperative production and selling among fishermen, $56,000.

Mr. BURTON: What work is being carried on under this item, and who is carrying it on?

Mr. BRIDGES: This covers extension work carried on on the east coast by St. Francis Xavier and Ste Anne de la Pocatière universities and on the west coast by the university of British Columbia.

Item agreed to.

463. Educational extension service—further amount required, $45,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: I had not intended to say anything on the subject of fisheries, because the people in my riding have little or nothing to do with fishing except to buy fish or to catch them as a sport. However, I should like to ask a question about northern fisheries, and I do so because no one so far has inquired about this matter. If the minister cannot give me an answer right away he can furnish me with this information at a future time. Does the department have anything to do with advancing the sale of the white whales which are caught in Hudson bay? I have seen them so thick that you could almost walk on them, and they must possess some properties for oil or food or something else. Does the department do anything in connection with walrus fishing in the Arctic ocean? There are large numbers of these animals to be caught. What is the department doing to keep up the quality of fish caught in Great Slave lake, Great Bear lake and lake Athabaska? These fish are excellent when they are of good quality. They seem to offer the possibilities of a worthwhile business, because many of them are being sent out at the present time by aeroplane.

Mr. BRIDGES: White whale fishing in Hudson bay and walrus fishing in the Arctic ocean are protected for the native population.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is there any export of what is caught by the native population?

Mr. BRIDGES: I am afraid I have no information on that.

[Mr. Bridges.]

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister is a new minister and I hope he will interest himself in the subject. It would be worth his while to make a trip up there, because I know he would be delighted to see the white whales around Churchill. What about the fish caught in Great Slave lake, Great Bear lake and lake Athabaska?

Mr. BRIDGES: Two surveys were made in two different years. Considerable information was gathered, and the department is deciding just what should be done in the future. I am not in a position to say more than that.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

Departmental administration, $526,002.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to refer first to one or two of the minister's observations as recorded at pages 3625 and 3626 of Hansard. I am not sure that the minister has been correctly reported where he says, referring to the hon. member for Vancouver East:

As my hon. friend knows, the Department of Labour is a placement agency.

Is that correct?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am glad to hear that because that is the opinion I have had of the department. I have always maintained that part of the duty of the Department of Labour was to find employment. Am I right in that?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: That being so, I am going to suggest to the minister that he and the Minister of Reconstruction collaborate and cooperate and discuss closely and often the problems of supplying labour. I wish to help the minister and the Minister of Reconstruction. It is absolutely necessary that the two departments collaborate and cooperate, because today the biggest job in this country is and will be for some time to come, in spite of what anyone else says, the problem of finding jobs.

On the next page the minister says:

When we realize that during the last four months we have placed over 750,000 people in the employment stream—

I admit that that is a lot of placing, but I am sure that the minister will agree with me that a lot of that was temporary or seasonal employment. Of course a percentage of our people do not want more than temporary or seasonal employment, but the people I am thinking of are those who not only want a job but have aspirations and ambition to work up in the jobs they have. That is the type of men and women with whom I have been associated most of my life, those employed in industry, and I am sure that the minister never at any time meant that during the last four months 750,000 people were placed in jobs in industry.

Mr. MITCHELL: I gave the figure of 750,000, but 783,000 is the correct figure.

Mr. MacNICOL: The figures for the last normal year tabulated in the Canada Year Book, 1937, give the number of business establishments, small and large factories and all institutions that supply labour, as 18,000 odd. In that number of large and small businesses some would employ two or three thousand employees and some as low as two or three employees. The total number employed in those 18,000 odd establishments in 1937 was 660,000. That figure does not correspond at all with the figure of 750,000 given by the minister, which he now says should be 783,000.

Mr. MITCHELL: That figure includes far more than industry. It includes mining, logging and commerce as well as industry.

Mr. MacNICOL: I want the minister to understand that I am trying to help him. My whole life has been in labour and in industry, and I shall not say anything that would cause him grief or interfere with his programme for employment. Anything I say is intended to increase the number of employees. So that when I say that 660,000 were employed in 18,000 plants, large and small, in 1937, I hope that that number will be increased, and I think it can be increased as I hope to show later on. The minister also said:

This is a seasonal country.

That is true, but it is not true of industry. You, Mr. Chairman, from your long experience in your own city, where there are so many manufacturing establishments just as there are in Toronto and in other cities represented by hon. members representing industrial centres, do not want our industries to be seasonal. I know the minister did not mean that, but was referring to logging, harvesting, and so forth. What I am trying to point out is that the men we are in contact with in industry want permanent work with a chance to advance.

The minister also referred to unemployment insurance, and I am going to throw out a warning in that connection. The minister knows that I was one of the first in this house to be concerned with unemployment insurance many years ago. After making a thorough survey and spending a lot of time in England studying the whole problem of unemployment insurance I advocated it here in this house long before it came into effect, and when the Bennett government was in power, I made an address on this subject, as the minister knows.

Mr. MITCHELL: I remember quite well. I was listening.

Mr. MacNICOL: And the minister knows that I always listened to what he had to say. I like listening to men who know what they are talking about.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is why you sit close to me.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have not lost anything by sitting close to my hon. friend. Coming back to unemployment insurance, I remember quite well, following my survey in England, that unemployment insurance had not been in operation for many years following the first great war and it had piled up a fund of hundreds of millions of pounds. But when the soldiers came back and unemployment rose to a high peak the vast number of millions of pounds stored up in that fund by those who had paid into it was quickly dissipated and the fund went back several hundred million pounds. So that I throw out the warning to the minister: Do not depend on unemployment insurance to do the impossible. That was not the intention of those who inaugurated it. It was rather to tide over a period when men were out of employment.

The minister also said that he was not fearful of the future. I am not either if we can only rise to the stature we should have and if we can be assisted by the country and with the will of God. Then we have no reason to fear the future. On the other hand, I think we should be apprehensive if we do not make a study of the problem to see that we shall have no reason to fear the future. I urge the minister not to relax under any circumstances but to look forward and plan and collaborate in every possible way to see that there are jobs, not two jobs for every man, as the Minister of Reconstruction said a few weeks ago. That would be a grand situation, but having been in business all my life and having had a lot to do with employment I know that condition cannot obtain. But if the minister with the help and collaboration of the Minister of Reconstruction and the help of everyone who is willing to help him can bring about a condition where every man and woman will have a job I shall be thoroughly satisfied and I am sure the country will be, too.

In this connection one of the very first things which should be done is to find some means of eliminating strikes. The minister has been making some effort in this direction in collaboration with the labour minister of Ontario and, perhaps, the other provincial labour ministers, all of whom have experience and are able to help. The Windsor strike, which is in all our minds, is typical of many others. I know quite a number of the men who formerly worked in the Ford factory; in fact I have some relations working there. We read that there are approximately ten thousand men and women unemployed in the city of Windsor. Assuming they have received an average of six to eight dollars a day—at any rate a substantial wage—in the ninety-odd days during which they have been unemployed they have lost in wages between six and seven million dollars. That is a tremendous loss, which nobody wants to have continued. From a personal acquaintance with many of the business men of Windsor I am sure that the loss of six or seven million dollars of purchasing power has affected the city seriously, and the minister and everyone of us should concentrate our best efforts on trying to eliminate the cause of strikes.

Long ago I arrived at the conclusion that the federal Minister of Labour should take the initiative in calling to Ottawa, for conference in the railway committee room or some other suitable place, the country's outstanding employers—I mean men who collectively employ between 100,000 and 150,000 of the 660,000 persons employed in industry in 1937—and also the heads of Canadian labour. The government could bring them here at its own expense, get them around a table and see if they cannot iron out their difficulties. What is the reason that labour and industry cannot get along together? They are all human; their interests should be to work together. I am sure that the employer to-day is the same as I was. He knows that when the wheels are not turning nothing is being produced; one is just adding to the cost of that which will be produced later. As for the labour man, he knows that he is losing his very livelihood. All these should sit around a long table and try to iron out their differences. It was never more necessary than now, when we are entering a period of post-war competition and Canada has a golden opportunity to expand if only we keep our wheels turning and our men working. How can this be done? Perhaps it can be done by calling representative men together.

If we view the matter from another aspect, is our legislation complete to-day? The minister made, in conjunction with the minister of labour of Ontario, a vigorous and honest effort to end the strike at Windsor. I should like to hear something as to why it was not stopped; and if it cannot be stopped, is there any legisation we could bring into effect which would stop it and strikes of a similar nature? While the strike was on, I went one day to Montreal to discuss with some of the biggest labour men in the country how a settlement could be brought about, and it was suggested that perhaps, over and above the machinery which is now at the disposal of the minister, there might be appointed a judicial board, headed by a jurist like Judge Gillanders, with whom could be associated an outstanding labour man like Howard Chase, and one of the minister's capable departmental officials, Bernard Rose, K.C., whom I do not know, would be obtainable or not. At any rate there could be a board consisting of men of capacity, similar to the three I have mentioned, with power to say what shall or shall not take place, and with authority above the boards which the minister now has, so that strikes may be eliminated and men will be able to work. I cannot help thinking of the wives and families of the men in Windsor and what they are enduring to-day. They are the last who should have to suffer. So that if the minister, either during the recess or shortly afterwards, can figure out any way to bring in legislation, somewhat along the lines I am suggesting, which would eliminate strikes he would be doing a marvellous thing for this country. Once this problem is solved, we should be assured of some measure of security. We all agree that the man working in the factory is entitled to security. To-day he does not have it. Times without number I have seen the result of men being laid off. I will not enlarge on this at the moment; I have referred to it before.

I want to point out some of the problems which will need specific attention. A great many men in the armed services never had a job before they enlisted. I refer, of course, to the young men. They are untrained. I suggest that special consideration be given to these lads who had no jobs before the war. I pray that they will not come home, after serving for years in the blood and mud of Europe, to the same conditions they were in before they went over there.

Then there are multitudes of young men who went into the war late, because at the time it broke out they were not old enough to enlist. They were young lads who had just started in high school—seventeen, eighteen and nineteen-year olds. These boys, too, have not had any opportunities and I hope consideration will be given to them. Some have suggested that they should be kept temporarily on the payrolls of the country. I have arrived at the same conclusion. If a job is available they ought to take it. If a job is not available they should not be abandoned to the cold mercies of the world, because in this northern climate the world can be pretty cold.

We have also numbers of men who, when the war broke out were between fifty-five and sixty years old. During the war they were engaged in industry at good pay, better probably than they had ever before earned in their lives. These men are too young for the old age pension and too old to be thrown out in the cold. They present another problem.

I wish to offer some suggestions as to how things could be improved. I am convinced that industry will do its part. The minister said as much Saturday night. Nearly every executive I know of—and I know them by the hundred—started as I did at the bottom of the plant and worked to the top of it. The hearts of these men are responsive to appeals to provide employment, and I have great hopes that industry will do everything it can to re-tool, make what they made before, and undertake new lines to provide for this vast backlog of required employment.

I am convinced that family allowances will help a great deal. I supported the family allowance legislation, because I have seen during the depression so many boys and girls half-starved and half-dressed. Family allowances will eliminate that condition. When mothers are able to buy, nobody can beat the mothers in looking after their young sons and daughters. I see everywhere around me where the money is being used to make purchases for family needs. Perhaps in the odd case the money is squandered, but in the aggregate, I am convinced, Canadian people using the allowance will use it to the best advantage, and thereby in their turn, promote further employment. That, too, will provide a good deal of employment, and that is the reason I voted for it. The corner store, the little shoemaker, and all the small businesses round about will benefit. I am glad to see that the provinces are helping, and I hope the minister will consult with his colleague the Minister of Reconstruction. I say to the Minister of Labour: Do not let that minister put it over you.

Mr. MITCHELL: Take a look at me.

Mr. MacNICOL: I say to the minister: You have determination—so has the Minister of Reconstruction—and when he tells you that you cannot have $50,000,000 for this purpose, double up your fists, stick out your chin a little further, and say to him, "I want something for these men who are unemployed and I am determined to get it." If the Minister of Labour does this I am with him.

I am glad to see that the province of Ontario is going to spend $70,000,000 in connection with hydro development on the Ottawa river. Why could we not extend that programme? There is little hydro development in the west except to some extent in Manitoba and Alberta, and there should be plenty of opportunity all along the line for the minister to urge his colleague to do everything in his power to see that Canadian men and women are given employment.

Then there are the municipalities. The Toronto transportation commission is ready to undertake the spending, I believe, of some twenty or twenty-five million dollars to build a subway throughout the city. But, of course, it will be expected that the Department of Reconstruction and the Department of Labour will assist. Perhaps they plan to do so. The federal government might contribute half the cost, and in any event it should render some assistance. The same applies to Montreal. These are two great Canadian cities; I would call them devoted cities. They have done a great deal for Canada in their subscriptions to the victory loans. They have subscribed to the last dollar in every loan to carry this country through. Other cities, of course, and the Canadian people generally have also played their part, but I mention these two cities because they are entitled to consideration. I am not overlooking other cities when I say that.

Then there are the industrial commissions. The Toronto industrial commission during the last sixteen years has done very good work and now under the leadership of John A. Tory, and formerly under Charles Burton of the Simpson company. Through their efforts they have brought to the city of Toronto 221 plants large and small which have given employment to thousands of people in that length of time. In 1944 they brought in a sufficient number of plants to cover 112 acres of land. I suggest to the minister that he get in touch with every industrial commission in Canada, and where there are no commissions they should be urged to establish such organizations. I might mention Stratford, Peterborough, Brantford, Windsor, Sherbrooke, Quebec, which are only a few of a multitude that might be named. If the minister would get in touch with the various industrial commissions he would obtain invaluable assistance. All I want to do is to help the minister to provide employment.

In the United States they are going in for the construction of roads in a big way. They are going to vote some three billion dollars. Well, goodness knows, Canada is one country where such work can be carried out to advantage. The Minister of Reconstruction and the Minister of Labour should collaborate on a proper road construction policy for Canada. Our distances are too great by the circuitous routes that have to be followed in most cases. Let them introduce a programme that will shorten distances between cities, by straightening out roads, and so cutting down the cost of travelling. If you cut down the cost of travelling and traffic you will cut down correspondingly the cost of production. Everything possible should be done by the Departments of Labour, Reconstruction and Finance to reduce production costs in Canada, because otherwise we cannot hope to compete successfully against all comers. But whatever is done, I am opposed to a reduction in wages. Far from it; I think wages ought to be increased. They are not too high as it is. When one considers the rents that have to be paid, and the cost of living, the workingman's wages have not gone up proportionately. But it ought to be possible to cut down production costs by providing cheaper power. The Almighty has endowed this country with the cheapest kind of power, hydro electric, and that is an avenue which can well be developed. If we do that and shorten the routes of traffic to bring materials to factories at lower cost we are bound to reduce the cost of production. But do not cut down wages; increase them, so as to bring up the standard of living.

I could speak at greater length on this subject, and no one knows better than you do, Mr. Chairman (Mr. Golding), how important it is, because you have devoted a good deal of your time to industry. My heart is attuned to the interests of the working class, and you cannot do anything to help them unless you pay them good wages.

Mr. MITCHELL: If I might reply briefly to my very good and hon. friend, he said something about not relaxing. Let me say frankly to the committee that the way we have been carrying on since this session began is inhuman, and I say that as Minister of Labour. I do not think any human being should be asked to stand the strain that we have had to bear, in the last two weeks especially, and administer departments at the same time. We talk about a forty-hour week and take-home pay, or arrive-home pay, as it is sometimes called, which is a slightly different thing from take-home pay. In my opinion the time is long overdue for an amendment of the procedure of the House of Commons. To spend hours and hours on estimates in this committee is not right. I say this constructively, because I think that the sooner we adopt the British practice of having estimates studied in committee rooms instead of on the floor of the house, the better it will be for all concerned. When we do that we shall do better work on the basic legislation that comes before parliament every year.

My hon. friend said something about the elimination of strikes, and he mentioned one large industrial dispute that is going on in the dominion. I do not wish to say anything that might influence the decision in that dispute; it would not be wise for me to do so. We all hope that in the course of the next few days it will be terminated. At the same time, I believe that leaders of labour and industry, as well as governments, both federal and provincial, should take some credit for the fact that this country has fewer disputes than any other in the world. At this moment we have only one major dispute, at Windsor, and one or two smaller ones, and this, in a population of 12,000,000 people. I have tried to analyse the situation to find the reason for this.

My hon. friend spoke about the passing of laws. I think you can have too much law. If I may say it without the slightest intention of offending, I think our good friends to the south of us have too much. They think they can solve a thing by the mere passing of a law. I do not think that is the answer; the answer lies in the hearts of men. I am convinced, as I have said before, not in this parliament but in the last one, that character is the basis of trade union agreement. Where you get character on both sides of the table, together with an understanding of the economics of industry and a willingness to give and take, you have what spells for success in trade unionism, as exemplified in this dominion.

My hon. friend spoke of a national meeting. If I may say so with deference, we have a meeting complex. There are so many people running up and down the country that they do not have time to think. I believe it is far better for officials and their principals to go to national conventions and organizations —labour organizations and employer organizations—so as to get not only their official but their off-the-record opinions. I think you get a better understanding of the problems in that way, both from industry and from labour.

Mr. MacNICOL: Could you not get the heads of each together in one room?

Mr. MITCHELL: I have sat in many rooms of various kinds. I say this in a kindly way, but Mr. Truman held one of these meetings the other day, and I do not know that it accomplished a great deal. I would not say that our method of doing business is better than theirs, but if I may say so, the results tell the story.

Then my hon. friend spoke of returned men, and I think I should say a word or two about that. So far, more than three hundred thousand men and women have been discharged from the armed forces, but at the present time only ninteen thousand of these people are registered as having been unemployed for more than fifteen days. My hon. friend spoke of training. We have ample training facilities, in cooperation with the provinces, for any returned men who want it. The Minister of Veterans Affairs has pointed out the educational facilities that are available to any man or women with the necessary qualifications, after discharge from the armed forces.

I think I have gone over pretty well all the ground covered by my hon. friend, but I wish to say that I agree with him that no wage can be high enough if the production is there. It is the unit of production that counts, and I believe that wages should be paid in proportion to that unit of production.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): On several occasions this session attacks have been made on individual civil servants from a certain position on the government benches. I think any member of parliament who attacks a civil servant by name is indulging in unseemly and ill-becoming behaviour. If anyone has to take responsibility the minister himself should be attacked; he is quite capable of looking after himself.

I mention that as a preface to what I am about to say, because I intend mentioning the name of a civil servant. I cannot avoid doing so, because I am going to quote from a document which has been sent out by the information division of the Department of Labour. This particular copy got into the hands of the Winnipeg labour council. It is dated November 22, 1945, and headed "Jobs, and selected jobs." It goes on to say:

> Mr. MacNamara, deputy minister of labour, would appreciate any local publicity that you might get on the following editorial from the Ottawa Journal, November 20, 1945.

I am not going to quote the entire editorial, but this is the concluding paragraph:

> We hear much these days about "full employment." That (if it is attainable at all, which we doubt) doesn't mean work for everybody at the jobs they like, or a home for everybody in the place they like. Full employment means that people must move to jobs, not jobs to people, and that there must be enough people willing to take all the sort of jobs that are offered. In a collectivist state, towards which we seem to be moving, full employment may even mean that people must work at what they are told to work at, where they are told to work, and at what hours and wages.

This release from the Department of Labour was the cause of much discussion and some alarm among those at the meeting of the Winnipeg labour council. It appears to many that the government subscribes to these policies, or that this is the policy of the government, and I should like some clarification by the minister in that respect.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let me say first, without equivocation, that this does not represent the policy of the government or my own personal opinion. When I was charged with responsibility for selective service on both the military and civilian sides I made this observation to this House of Commons, or words to this effect; that I hoped nothing I had to do would in any way damage the basic principles of freedom that have made the Canadian people what they are. No doubt hon. members have followed our actions with respect to selective service, and they will agree that we went about removing controls perhaps more quickly than any other department in the government. I believe in a free country; I believe that people suffer for their sins if they do the wrong thing. That is basic.

Getting back to this letter, may I tell my hon. friend that I receive the information service from one of the other departments, I forget what it is just now, and sometimes see articles which are critical of myself. That is a government agency. In the Department of Labour we have an information service from which editorial and newspaper comments from all sections of the press are sent to civil servants across the country. The article in question here came from the Ottawa Journal. When I speak about the basic principles of freedom, let me say that I know something about Mr. MacNamara, or at least I should; and he thinks exactly as I do in these matters. By that I mean he is a liberal mentally; I do not know what his politics were before he became a civil servant. I wish to say further, Mr. Chairman, that this nation can thank goodness for Arthur MacNamara. I do not care about your O.B.U. or W.C.T.U. or any of the rest of them; let them say what they will. I am not addressing this particularly to my hon. friend, of course; I am speaking in vigorous terms because I believe what I am saying—

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I do not think the W.C.T.U. would care much about it.

Mr. MITCHELL: Well, you cannot tell; sometimes people do silly things, even the W.C.T.U., although I do not wish to cast any reflection upon them. I do not know much about them; I belong on the other side of the fence. But I do resent that attack on Mr. MacNamara, because I know something of the contribution he has made to the life of this country. I know something about his social outlook, naturally, too. No doubt this editorial did appear in the Ottawa Journal. I do not know what prompted it, but certainly neither the party of my hon. friend nor the party which is to his left, nor the official opposition nor the government of the day—

Mr. MacINNIS: The party that were to his left.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not mean the party down in the corner. I stopped right there; I am not fooling myself about these things. None of these parties subscribe by one iota to any expression of opinion in any newspaper to the effect that we are inevitably drifting toward collectivism. For one thing, the Canadian people are not foolish. When it comes to freedom I know of no nation on earth that has a deeper regard for the basic principles of freedom that have made the British people what they are.

Mr. MacINNIS: At this stage of the session I suppose it is too late to make a speech, which I regret; so that I shall content myself with asking the minister a few questions. I imagine we shall be back here in about two months and a half, and perhaps all we need be concerned about now is that provision is made for situations which may develop in that time. It is too late this session to discuss policy, unless we intend to stay here until after Christmas.

If the minister has the information I should be glad if he would give the committee the latest figures as to applications for employment; placements; the number of those placements which are permanent, by which I mean in occupations which will continue for a period of time and which are not seasonal; the number that are seasonal, together with the number unemployed at the date mentioned, that is the number for which no jobs were available. If the government has any policy for assisting provinces and municipalities where large-scale unemployment takes place, I should like to know what it is.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am sorry we have not the figures respecting seasonal and other kinds of employment. As a matter of fact, it is only since the establishment of unemployment insurance that we have really gone into the statistical feature of the matter. I have before me some figures which I shall have boiled down so as to give some indication of the number of vacancies.

Then, the hon. member asked as to any special arrangements with the provinces. At the present time we have none. However, as he knows, the matter is now under discussion, in connection with the dominion-provincial conference on reconstruction.

Figures which have been handed me just now show that unfilled vacancies at the present time total 88,845 while unplaced applicants number 184,523.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am somewhat disturbed about the unemployment insurance commission, something in which, as a trade unionist for many years, I have been keenly interested. When the measure was introduced I supported it and, along with some other hon. members, most of whom are not in the chamber this afternoon, considered it in the special committee. I believe the feeling at that time was that the bill was not a bad one. At the close of the session I did my best to have the unemployment insurance measure accepted throughout the country. There was some resistance to it, although not very much.

The Unemployment Insurance Act makes provision for administration by three commissioners, the first of whom was to be the chairman, the second to be appointed after consultation with employers, and the third after consultation with trade union organizations. The business of the commission can be carried on only after the vote of a majority of that commission has been secured. At the present time, and for some months past, only one commissioner has been acting. I do not know when the employers' representative resigned, but I understand that it was some time early in the autumn. Then, the term for which the workers' representative was appointed ended in September. Obviously, since that time the commission must have been carrying on without legal authority. If a majority of the commission is required, then that would mean that two would have to be present. When only one is present, clearly it is not functioning properly.

There is a provision in the act which states that if a commissioner is absent, and is not in a position to perform his duties, a substitute may be appointed. This indicates that when the measure was drawn up there was an understanding that there should be a full board at all times. All cases which come before the board present two points of view, namely those of the employers and those of the employees, both of whom are contributors under the act. If decisions are made without representatives from those two groups I suggest that the way is left open for all sorts of suspicion that things are not being done properly.

On what date did Mr. Mitchell resign, and when did Mr. Talon's term expire? How has the commission been carrying on since those dates?

Mr. MITCHELL: The date of Mr. Mitchell's resignation is July 31, and Mr. Talon's term expired on September 23.

As the hon. member knows, when I was in charge of organizing selective service certain powers were turned over to me, namely the powers of direction of the employment service. That order in council is still in operation. Perhaps it is more necessary to-day than it was when we first tried to organize the civilian population for war purposes.

The question of filling vacancies on the commission is under consideration, and in due course after this long session is over, and when we have had some rest, the country will be informed as to the composition of the commission.

Mr. MacINNIS: Did the order in council provide that the minister could function without the unemployment insurance commission? I do not recall having seen any order in council which made provision for disregarding the unemployment insurance commission. If such order in council was not passed, then in my opinion a general order in council does not give the minister the right to dispense with the services of the commission set up under an act of parliament, and to perform the functions of the commission himself. This is a serious matter.

Mr. McMASTER: In what may have been a state of righteous indignation the minister, speaking a short time ago, made use of certain letters some of which sounded familiar to me. I was wondering whether he used only a jumble of letters, or whether he intended those letters to represent any particular organization.

Mr. MITCHELL: No; there was nothing sinister in my mind at the time. I was simply reaching out for letters. In fact, I am not quite sure what the letters W.C.T.U. stand for—although I believe it is a temperance organization. However, I want it clearly understood that I was not casting any reflection on any organization.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The minister has said that the strike at Windsor is the only labour disturbance of major importance at the present time. That strike has been going on much too long and, in view of the fact that other strikes have been settled more rapidly it seems to me that, had the minister been willing to take the necessary steps, the Windsor strike might have been settled more quickly.

In a strike of this kind between thousands of workers and the owners of a wealthy organization the time element is an important one. The people of Windsor are learning that, to their sorrow, to-day. They are learning, too, that in the type of struggle they are having, in which they seek to establish and maintain certain basic rights—and I believe the minister will agree that they are basic rights, since they include the right of union security—delay assists the owners. The very existence of the workers depends upon work. They are learning the truth of the assertion that those who own the machinery of production own their very way of living, their very lives. If the workers have no control over union security they are entirely at the mercy of those who hire and fire them.

It would appear to me that the delay has been much too long. Whether we say we are taking one side or the other does not make very much difference if the delay works to the disadvantage of one side or the other. The minister has stated several times that this strike is the responsibility of the province, that the province must deal with it. Apparently that was not the attitude taken in connection with other strikes. I remember the threatened strike in the packing industry when the department went ahead and appointed a controller and the matter was settled very quickly.

I should like to know if at the coming conference between the provinces and the dominion the government is going to make definite representations to bring about a decision as to whether these labour matters shall be left in the hands of the dominion or in the hands of the provinces. I think the federal government is right in trying to secure uniformity in these matters.

The Windsor strike is a very serious matter. It is a most unfortunate thing to have happen during our reconversion period. Some decision should be made with regard to legislation, so that this could be settled. I am sure the house and Canada are waiting anxiously to know whether it is possible to reach some settlement in the near future without prejudicing the rights of these people for union security. Probably some mistakes have been made on both sides. I think the union has had some leadership that was in error. I suppose the choice of leadership was their own, but perhaps there was some blame on the other side.

So far as the management is concerned, they did come out with a statement: You pass legislation which grants to people union security, the same as they propose to do on the other side, and we will abide by it. You should not make us obey a certain rule and not make the rest of the manufacturers obey it. Set down your rules with regard to labour and we will follow them, but what is good for us must be good for the other fellow. I think they were right in that regard.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not really know how to answer the hon. member, but I know from his remarks that he has made a profound study of labour matters. There is no country in the world which recognizes by law the union shop; the only place where that is done is the province of Saskatchewan.

An hon. MEMBER: What is wrong with that?

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not know, but you will learn what is wrong with it. You will probably have to suffer for your sins. I know I would put the judgment of Mr. Phil Murray and Mr. William Green and Mr. John L. Lewis against the judgment of my hon. friend, and even myself, in connection with industrial matters.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Rackets.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend says "rackets", but I do not think that is a fair thing to say about Mr. Phil Murray.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: There can be union rackets.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not think that is a fair thing to say about Mr. Phil Murray. If my hon. friend had the same chivalry toward men in public life that Mr. Phil Murray has—

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I did not say a word about Phil Murray.

Mr. MITCHELL: I mentioned three men and the hon. member said something about rackets. However, that is beside the point; let us get on with the business. At the recent conference on industrial matters with Mr. Truman it was made quite clear by the American Federation of Labor, the C.I.O. and the railroad brotherhoods that they did not want even arbitration by law, let alone some of the things my hon. friend talks about. Do not forget when you put those things into force you are getting almost into that collective state at which my hon. friend and myself take offence; that is what will happen when the government says to a man, "This is the organization you have to belong to."

An hon. MEMBER: Not necessarily.

[Mr. Castleden.]

Mr. MITCHELL: I know of what I speak; that is what it means. The dividing line between freedom and persecution is so thin that trade union leaders, the older trade union leaders, have shown that they have more sense than to talk about compulsion and coercion by law. They have reached a stage of maturity not as yet reached by the younger people who have not had so much experience. My hon. friend spoke about the Ford strike, but at the moment I am not going to say any more about it. I do not think it would be wise for me to do so.

Mr. BRACKEN: The minister has been receiving a great deal of attention from different quarters and has been asked a number of questions about several things. I am neither going to give him advice nor ask him questions, I am just going to make two or three suggestions from one who is a layman. I am not an expert on labour matters. There are several members on this side who have been studying this question; they are not here at the moment and I do not want them to be blamed for what I am going to say.

First, I should like to refer to the comments the minister has just made. He said that we should thank goodness for Arthur MacNamara. I think he is putting that in the wrong way. I think we should thank the province of Manitoba for letting him come here, and I think we should thank one of the outstanding governments of Manitoba for having trained him for twenty years before he came here.

The minister said something about the rules of this house. I believe that every hon. member will agree with what he has said. I suggest that he give the same speech to the cabinet the next time it meets, so that the changes he suggests may be approved and we can avoid these long hours and hurried discussions during the late days of the session.

I have three suggestions to make. The first is in connection with low wages paid in certain places. The second is in connection with wages in relation to shorter work weeks. The third concerns the controls that have been hampering men in seeking the work they desire.

I suggest first, that the wage freezing order be lifted or modified with respect to sub-standard wages. I know the minister will have an answer that perhaps satisfies him, that that can be done by application to certain of his labour boards and so on, but I suggest that at this time there should be a general lifting of that order in so far as those receiving sub-standard wages are concerned.

There are also some industries in provinces which now have a forty-eight hour week regulation, as well as in other provinces, industries which are willing to give the same weekly wage for a forty-eight hour week as they now give for a fifty, fifty-two or fifty-four hour week. Government regulations now prevent that from being done. These men should not have to go through the present red tape to get that benefit. My third suggestion is that there be an abandonment of such controls as hamper men in seeking the work they desire. I do not intend to take more time with these suggestions. I am aware that many controls have been removed, and possibly more have been removed than we know of, but there are still some in effect that should be lifted.

I shall take just a couple of minutes more to amplify this suggestion. Wage control order P.C. 9384, controls sub-standard as well as other wages. The freezing of those particular wages was widely protested. It does not do any good now to say that one doubted the wisdom of freezing wages that were below standard. We recognize that controls were necessary during the war and possibly could not be avoided, but now that the war is over, my suggestion is that the freezing orders affecting sub-standard wages should be lifted.

My second suggestion is with respect to the 48-hour week. Some of the provinces now provide for that. But there are industries employing men for fifty, fifty-two and fifty-four hours a week which are willing to pay them the same total weekly wage for a 48-hour week. My suggestion is that where industries are willing to do that, no regulation should prevent it from being done.

My third point is with respect to men seeking employment. Prior to the war, men were free to seek employment where they could find it and choose the work that suited them, but during the war regulations were imposed to place men in particular lines of employment. The war is now over. I recognize that, while many of our veterans are still away and for other reasons perhaps, some regulation may still be necessary with respect to preventing men from seeking employment where they can find it. Generally speaking, however, the sooner the regulations which hamper men from finding employment best suited to them are removed, the better.

I am not an expert on these matters, and if I have made any errors I trust the able officers—around the minister, will not point out to him that what I suggested should not be done.

Mr. MITCHELL: The mind of the leader of the opposition I think travels very much along the same line as my own. The wage control order is, at the moment, under review. I would think, or I anticipate that the last vestige of selective service will disappear on the 1st of January. We still have the permit system left. We continued that for two reasons. One was to stop the drift from agriculture. We needed to keep the men in agriculture to get this year's crop out. They were given protection during the war because of the tremendous drift from agriculture into the armed services and into industry, and it was necessary to retain the permit system in order to get off the crop. The other reason was to permit us to give priority to veterans when vacancies occurred in industry and commerce.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The minister did not reply to my question whether the department was taking action at the dominion-provincial conference to establish a national labour code of uniform procedure dealing with labour disputes.

Mr. MITCHELL: We have one now.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I mean establishing it on a solid basis.

Mr. MITCHELL: I understand the implication of my hon. friend's question, but, as he knows, we have a constitution in this country known as the British North America Act which gives jurisdiction in these matters to the provinces. The only way in which this government or any other federal government in power can assume responsibility for a national code such as he has in mind is by amendment of the British North America Act. You cannot do it by agreement. You cannot break the law by agreement, as my legal friends will appreciate. I would think we should get back to free collective bargaining in the not too distant future. Then, of course, the constitutional rights enjoyed by the provinces will be assumed by them.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is the department making representations in this regard to the dominion-provincial conference?

Mr. MITCHELL: We are discussing it and have discussed it at the conference.

Item agreed to.

105.* Combines Investigation Act, $29,000.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Canadian Industries Limited, as I pointed out some time ago, has a virtual monopoly and stranglehold over many materials used in this country. I shall deal with one only. In western Canada there is a company called Merchants Consolidated Limited, which is made up of a great number of small retailers who got together to purchase their goods wholesale. C.I.L. refuse to sell to Merchants Consolidated sporting ammunition and Merchants Consolidated cannot buy it from any other firm in Canada, although they could import it if they were willing to pay heavy import duties. I think this is a case of monopolistic practice which could very well be investigated. Has the minister any intention of using the Combines Investigation Act to investigate these companies which are monopolistic in tendency, especially C.I.L.?

Mr. MITCHELL: I am very glad to tell my hon. friend that the Combines Investigation Act is no longer under my jurisdiction.

Mr. BENTLEY: Then what is this vote here for?

Mr. MITCHELL: The jurisdiction was transferred about August 1 to the Department of Justice.

Mr. BENTLEY: I am interested in this matter, because it certainly looks as if there was some discrimination on the part of the explosives division of C.I.L. Since this item appears in the estimates of the Department of Labour for 1944-45, I think we are entitled to ask the minister what his department did about this matter when it was under his jurisdiction.

Mr. MITCHELL: It comes under the jurisdiction of the Combines Investigation Act registrar, who upon representations or complaints from a certain number of persons—I have forgotten how many—can investigate any industry that is considered to be a combine. But the over-all controls of the government during the war were so rigid that it was well nigh impossible to operate a combine. Possibly, when we get back to a freer economy, if I may call it that for want of a better word, there will be need for investigations under the act.

Mr. BENTLEY: We have waited until this item came up, thinking it was under the jurisdiction of the minister. I have here a long submission on behalf of Merchants Consolidated Limited and Falcon Hardware company against the explosives division of C.I.L. I do not want to hold up the committee. If I send it over to the minister will he see that it gets into the right hands because, so far as we who are interested in this matter are concerned, this item still comes under his department.

Mr. MITCHELL: I shall be glad to do that. Will my hon. friend send it with a covering letter?

Mr. BENTLEY: I will send it across the room to the minister now.

[Mr. Stewart.]

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Let me give the minister an instance of the difficulties in which men are placed by the present controls. A man in my own part of the province, fifty-eight years of age, being unemployed, wrote to a packing company in Moose Jaw to find out whether they had the type of work he could do. A man of that age is not capable of doing very heavy work such as carrying around quarters of beef, but there is a certain type of work that he can do. The employment manager of Swift Canadian said that they had such employment for him but that he would have to get permission to go there from his local employment officer. This man interviewed his local officer and said that he had employment in Moose Jaw and would like to get a permit to go. The chap in charge of the Yorkton office said, "Did you get a permit from us to go? Did you ask permission of us to write to this man?" He said. "No". The official said. "Well, we are giving you no permit; you do not go." The man said, "I would like to get work here but I could not find any." That man was compelled to go through the whole winter of 1944-45 looking for work. In the spring of the year he was unemployed, but he went around digging gardens and doing one thing and another. On the 5th of June the following year he received a sort of mimeographed letter. It came in with the rest of the mail and he thought it was of no particular consequence, but it was in actual fact a directive telling him that he was to go from Yorkton to the Swift Canadian company and take employment there. By this time he had established himself. He was working in the summertime at home, and he was satisfied with conditions. He thought this was merely a permit informing him that he could go if he wanted to; he did not understand its significance.

Mr. MITCHELL: Was this man a farmer?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: No, he was not. He works on a farm in the summertime, and he threshes in the fall. He works in the spring, and in the wintertime likes to get employment such as in the packing plant. He went on getting a living at small jobs around town in June and July, went out threshing in August, came back the first of September, and was met by a police officer who handed him a summons for not having obeyed the directive. He appeared at the police court and was fined some $55 for disobeying the directive. The man was absolutely innocent; he had asked for work, and had been constantly refused by the local officers. Then, receiving this letter and not recognizing that it was a directive, he went on with his employment and was penalized in court to the extent of $50 and costs. That sort of thing has a serious effect on the attitude of some people toward the government.

The other case relates to unemployment insurance and will be brought up under the appropriate item. I bring this matter to the attention of the minister with a suggestion that when these directives are given the man should be notified of the seriousness of the offence in case he fails to obey, because this man was quite innocent of any intention of disobeying the law, and in view of the fact that he had been refused permission when he needed work he did not think the notice he afterwards received meant anything more than that he could go to this job if he wanted to.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think it can be said that in my department we act with expedition on receiving information of cases like that to which my hon. friend refers; and if I might say this in a kindly way, I think that is better than to bring such cases up on the floor of the House of Commons. I suggest that the telephone is the right way to get answers to a lot of questions which are asked in this chamber. I have been told that it costs $60 a minute to run the House of Commons. If a member rises to make general suggestions on policy or present basic principles, that is different. If my hon. friend will turn this case over to our department, even at this late date, with the other case he has, I will endeavour to see that the men obtain justice.

Item agreed to.

109. Payments to the provinces under agreements, including undischarged commitments of previous years, $750,000.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I do not know whether this is the place to bring up a question I have in mind. Some years ago there was administered a youth training grant. I did some work on that in Mantioba in cooperation with the present deputy minister and with the leader of the opposition, who was then premier of Manitoba, and although the amounts given by the dominion government were niggardly and miserly, the work which could have been done there was tremendous—work along the lines of eduction, teaching youngsters to live with each other and to use their leisure properly—and I think it could well be continued in the future. Could the minister give us any idea whether this plan will start again next year or in some predictable future time?

Mr. MITCHELL: All that my hon. friend has said about the scheme may be true. I was very close to Mr. MacNamara myself in those days as an executive assistant under the Hon. Norman Rogers. I would say that this plan laid the foundation of the war training programme under which we trained, I think, over 400,000 people. We had to build ships and tanks and guns and aeroplanes and other things which had never before been built in this country, with a small base of trained mechanics; and out of the experience we gained in the youth training scheme we used the same organization in cooperation with the provinces and built that tremendous industrial machine and the trained personnel necessary to operate it. The $750,000, I think, is in the estimates this year for that plan. Of course, in addition to that there are much larger amounts for the training of people coming back from the various theatres of war. I shall have the figure looked up in a minute. It runs into the millions, anyway.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I should like to point out that what was done in one place was to take a great number of young teachers and bring them together for a month to study together citizenship and life. It was a profitable experiment for the country.

Item agreed to.

Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940—
112. Government's contribution to unemployment insurance fund, $13,500,000.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): How many applications for benefits under unemployment insurance have been received up to the most recent date of which the minister has record, and how many are now receiving benefits?

Mr. MITCHELL: We will look it up. I think it is around 60,000.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): While it is being looked up, may I ask if the government is giving any consideration to shortening the waiting period for those who receive unemployment benefits?

Mr. MITCHELL: The answer is, no.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Has the minister given any consideration to including others under unemployment insurance, for instance longshoremen and loggers?

Mr. MITCHELL: That is being done continuously. We have an advisory committee made up of employers' and employees' representatives to advise the commission, who in turn advise me as minister. My own view of unemployment insurance is that I would have everyone, even members of parliament, under unemployment insurance. I think it is absolutely sound. Of course, in operating a big administrative machine like this you have to learn, and it takes time to develop so large an organization. The British scheme started off with seven trades. We started off, I think, with between sixty and seventy per cent of the people engaged in industry in this country. But I agree with my hon. friend that the quicker we can expand it to cover everybody, the better it will be for this dominion.

As to the figures the hon. member was asking for, live claims in October were 61,563; number of insured, two and three-quarter million.

Mr. SKEY: Would the minister include women under the statement he has just made in respect of unemployment insurance?

Mr. MITCHELL: They are already under the act.

Mr. SKEY: What balance has the government in hand at the present time?

Mr. MITCHELL: It is over $300 million.

Mr. PROBE: I should like a short explanation from the minister of the item under administration of Unemployment Insurance Act for temporary assistance; it is somewhere in the neighbourhood of $10,668,000 as compared with a little over one million dollars for the permanent staff. There must be some special reason for the apparent disproportion of temporary to permanent staff. Could we have a brief explanation for the benefit of one who is not so familiar as the minister with the workings of the staff?

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend will appreciate that the unemployment insurance commission was set up during the war, and of course men who have served overseas have a priority in appointments to the civil service. That is basic law. For that reason the great majority of the people employed by the commission are on a temporary basis. That is in keeping with the law.

Mr. PROBE: Is the situation such that this $10,000,000 or any large proportion of it will become a permanent payroll?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes. I am thinking ahead of my hon. friend.

Mr. PROBE: So long as we get the answer.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Railway service—

375. Hudson Bay railway—To provide for the difference between the expenditures for operation and maintenance, and revenue accruing from operations during the year ending March 31, 1946, not exceeding, $500,000.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. JACKMAN: May I ask the minister what he expects will be the financial results of the Hudson Bay railway project; not just the estimate for the present year, which is rapidly coming to a close, but what he expects will be the financial results for the next four or seven year period? I understand that during the brief hearing we had, while the manager was before the railways and shipping committee, it was pointed out that many of the structures and the right of way of the Hudson Bay railway were getting old, and that inasmuch as this railway does not set up any depreciation fund it is necessary to look after these rentals when they occur, so that obviously when the railway is new the rentals are not very costly, whereas, when the railway gets older, they mount up. Will the minister throw some light on anticipations for the next few years?

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): The position of the Hudson Bay railway is pretty much the same this year as it was last year. There is a decrease of $64,940 in the deficit and the amount of operating revenues has increased slightly this year as compared with last year, while operating expenses have also increased. I doubt whether any good purpose would be served by going into this matter at any length, because, as the hon. member knows, the manager of the Hudson Bay railway was here during the sitting of the railways and shipping committee and he gave evidence. I was under the impression then that the committee had obtained from him practically all the information that was desired at the time.

Mr. PROBE: With reference to the Hudson Bay railway, I went to the report of the committee, on the recommendation of the minister the other evening, to find out what was contained in that report, because it had slipped by me the last couple of weeks, and while it contains a logical enough explanation for the figures that are before the committee, I consider that we should have a statement from the minister so that in some way we can tie up the future of the Hudson Bay railway with the port of Churchill and the northeast gateway of the prairies. It is thirty-six years now since we started building what we look upon as a more or less natural gateway into and out of the prairies. Because the weight of the House of Commons and of the people of Canada generally is away from that section of the world, those of us who believe that we can improve our economy by making use of the facilities which are at our door, imperfect though they may be in part, believe that we have had neither a complete and fair report on the possibilities of that harbour nor a recent note of optimism from the department as to what we can do with respect to that northeast gateway. Must we just forget about it and consider it a dream, or can the minister give us a constructive hope, shall we say, that "there's gold in them thar waters up there?"

Mr. JACKMAN: Ice anyway.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I went into this whole subject at great length on the discussion of the resolution of the hon. member for Churchill, and at that time I put on Hansard a number of tables and statements having to do with the capital cost of construction of the railway, of the harbour and other matters which I thought were of interest to the house. Apart from that there was the statement made by the manager of the railway before the railways and shipping committee. I can tell the hon. gentleman generally that the railway is being operated as efficiently as it possibly can be, and it is being operated by the Canadian National as agents for the Department of Transport.

Mr. PROBE: That is not what I am getting at. I am not disputing the efficiency of the railway; I am thinking of the future success of that route. We feel in the west that it has not had a chance. I read the report of the committee, and I saw nothing in there that would indicate that the government is going to change its policy with respect to the disuse of the port of Churchill. Yet at the same time the minister himself refers to a resolution that was concurred in by a fairly handsome majority in this house during the session that is now closing. What is to be done?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. gentleman asks me for a statement. I can only say that I have no other statement to make than that which I made on that occasion. If he wishes to know what the policy of the government is, it will depend on the amount of trade that can be taken out of that part of the country. The complaint thus far has been that there is no ingoing cargo. There is wheat to be taken out of Churchill to other parts of the country and other parts of the world, but there is no ingoing cargo. That, as I say, has been the complaint. Hon. gentlemen opposite say: Well, if means were adopted to keep the port open for a longer period, perhaps something could be done. I do not disagree with that, but I say that, according to the experts of the Department of Transport, unfortunately the port can be kept open for only a small portion of the year, and unless that position is changed I am afraid the outlook is not too bright. Again, something was said about assisting shipping interests to go into that port. In that regard I can say that the national harbours board and the Canadian shipping board have done a great deal in that direction, and are still working in an attempt to get grain out of Churchill. At this date I think it is too early to make any announcement about possible shipments in the spring.

Mr. PROBE: I do not want this matter closed just yet. With regard to incoming cargoes, surely our trade commissioners in all parts of the world could arrange to have cargoes brought to Churchill, just in the same way that they foster the promotion of international trade generally. This does not look to me at all like an insurmountable problem. Supposing we can operate Churchill for only three months, or for only four months. I do not believe either of these figures is given by any official with finality, and if the government were sincere in operating the port of Churchill and the Hudson Bay route I suggest that it would use the facilities it already has all over the world in connection with bringing imports to this country. I should like the government to say that they will give this thing a trial for at least three or four years, using perhaps what is left of the Park Steamship company. Run it as a government proposition; let the government take the loss—that agrees with private enterprise principles anyway—and then if it should be profitable turn it over to private enterprise. If not, wash it out and we shall forget about it. We still think it is feasible.

Mr. JACKMAN: I believe that point is well taken. As the matter stands to-day, the country is losing half a million dollars a year on the Hudson Bay railway, and seems destined to lose a great deal more as the line gets older. I believe, with the hon. member for Regina City, that the route should be given a fair trial. Now that the war is over, I believe the minister should see whether it will be possible to send enough grain shipments through Churchill, and perhaps get enough incoming shipments, to give the line a fair trial once and for all, and let us discover whether we have a white elephant on our hands or whether the hopes of many people in the west are justified. Let us discover whether this line will at least carry itself, if not make a profit, and so take a burden off the taxpayers of this country. Could the minister say whether anything can be done by his department or by the government to give this line what might be considered a fair trial in the opinion of those people who come from the west and who know something about the territory there?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I can add nothing to what I have said already.

Item agreed to.

Air service—civil aviation division—

386. Control of civil aviation, including the administration of the Aeronautics Act and regulations issued thereunder, $304,000.

Mr. SKEY: I should like to ask the minister if the licensing of private pilots and transport pilots comes under his department under this item.

Mr. CHEVRIER: No; this part of the department is under the Minister of Reconstruction by virtue of the Transfer of Duties Act. The Minister of Reconstruction controls civil aviation, and the operation of the Aeronautics Act and the regulations thereunder.

Mr. SKEY: Does the minister anticipate that this branch will again come under his jurisdiction as part of the Department of Transport, or will it remain in the other department?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That will be a matter for the governor in council to decide, and the policy will be made known in due course.

Mr. SKEY: Would the minister object if I made an observation on this item?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Certainly not.

Mr. SKEY: During the war many service personnel qualified in many aspects of air transport including pilotage, navigation, wireless operating, meteorology and all the other subjects which any aircrew member had to study. They have qualified under service regulations, but they are still forced by the Department of Transport to try examinations before they have the same privilege of operating aircraft under civil administration that ordinarily they would have under military administration. I refer particularly to their green licence cards which entitle them to fly blind over an airways route. All service pilots with any experience are qualified in the subjects which the Department of Transport now requires them to take in order to requalify for this licence. I have in mind the position in the United Kingdom, whereby the air ministry has control of the licensing of private and transport pilots; and any pilot or other aircrew category qualified under the military regulations is automatically given civil qualification. I should like to bring this point to the consideration of the minister, because even at the present time we have in the service men who are requalifying, wasting their time in studying subjects they have already taken.

[Mr. Jackman.]

Mr. CHEVRIER: The only thing I can say is that I will bring these suggestions to the attention of the Minister of Reconstruction.

Item agreed to.

Air service—radio division—

395. Radio direction finding stations, radio beacons and radiotelegraph stations, operation and maintenance, $748,375.

Mr. JACKMAN: May I ask the minister a general question? We find that many of these estimates are for items which are used almost exclusively by Trans-Canada Air Lines, although they would be available to private services if there were such private services in this country.

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I ask the hon. gentleman if he is speaking to item 395?

Mr. JACKMAN: I am just on the general question. Could the minister give the committee the total amount that has been spent on airfields in Canada, including meteorological devices, radar equipment and so on? Perhaps I should divide the question into the amounts spent under civil estimates and out of war expenditures, so that we might have some idea how much is invested on capital account in these various matters of equipment.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Will the hon. gentleman allow the question to stand for the time being? It is a detailed one, part of which was answered by the Minister of Reconstruction on the war estimates. As to the other part, I shall try to get the hon. gentleman a reply as quickly as possible.

Item agreed to.

Air service—radio division—

397. Issue of radio receiving licences—(transport department only), $216,975.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Would the minister tell us exactly how much it costs to collect the $4,018,000 in radio fees? I have never been able to get this straight. In the radio committee a year ago we were told that something like $230,000 was paid in vendors' commissions and $306,000 in administration costs. Is this $216,000 in addition to all that, as the cost of collecting some $4,000,000?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The total cost of collection of licence fees for the fiscal year 1944-45 is $217,348.60, and it is not included in the amount of fees received.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The way I figure it out is this: First of all, licence fees collected in those years, amounted to $4,018,000. Vendors' commissions amounted to $230,000, and there was an amount of $306,000 for administration fees. Then we have a further amount of $216,000 on top of that. If that is so, it means that it costs $753,000 to collect $4 million.

Why should we collect licence fees from those who own radios? Everybody listens to the radio and is interested in it. Why should the individual who owns the radio have to pay a nuisance tax of $2.50, when everyone in Canada gets the benefit of radio? The fact that it costs $753,000 to collect $4 million is simply ridiculous. What is the difficulty?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The total cost of the collection of fees is $521,472.75, which is made up of, first, commissions deducted at the source, amounting to $304,124.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I do not think that can be quite right. There is more involved in it than that. First of all, we have vendors' commissions of $230,000, as was explained in the radio committee, and administrative costs of $306,000. Where does this other figure come into the picture? Let us suppose we take only the first two items of $230,000 and $306,000—and these certainly are in the report —we would have a total of $536,000 which it costs the country to collect $4 million. Why should anyone who owns a radio have to pay for that privilege, in these modern days when everyone enjoys the benefit of radio?

Mr. BOUCHER: How much does it cost to investigate and to prosecute or to threaten prosecution in connection with those who do not buy their licences?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I can give the hon. member for St. Paul's the break-down, as I have it, of the cost of collecting radio licence fees. To the administration is charged $188,211 on account of the radio division and $29,136 on account of the treasury branch, making a total of $217,348.60. Then there are commissions deducted at the source, and not included in gross revenue, of $304,124.15, making a grand total of $521,472.75. That is the break-down of the total cost.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What was the total amount of commissions collected from the public?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It amounts to $304,124.15.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): And the total amount of revenue was $4 million?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The total revenue was $4,000,801.

An hon. MEMBER. Carried.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): No, it is not carried yet.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I cannot give details as to the cost of investigations or prosecutions. Those figures are not kept separately, but I shall ask if they can be obtained.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): We find that it costs $500,000 to collect $4 million. Does the minister not think that in the interests of economy it would be better to collect the money through the Department of National Revenue, and save that $500,000? Does the minister not think that each individual should contribute to radio, instead of limiting it to those who buy radios?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I completely disagree with my hon. friend, because this is one of the finest form of occupation for those who have served their country in various ways in Canada. This is a very modest amount that they receive, and I say that it is a fine investment to help them along, in their employment.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I would rather do it in some other way.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You would.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I would rather do it in some other way. After all, we have to think about economy in this country. In 1938 we had 44,000 civil servants in Canada, and to-day we have 150,000. While in 1938 we paid $88 million for the conduct of our civil service, to-day we pay $229 million. May I remind the government, which sits opposite, that we must think about economy in this country. That is why I have brought this matter up.

Item agreed to.

Government-owned enterprises—non-active accounts—National harbours board—

420. Advances to national harbours board, subject to the provisions of section 29 of the National Harbours Board Act to meet expenditures applicable to the calendar year 1945 on any or all of the following accounts:

Reconstruction and capital expenditures—

Generally,—unforseen and miscellaneous, $200,000.

Mr. JACKMAN: Is this the item under which the grain elevator at Churchill might be discussed?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No.

Mr. JACKMAN: Is the elevator under the minister's administration?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Special—Deficits—Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals—

421. Amount required to provide for the payment during the fiscal year 1945-46 to the Canadian National Railway company (hereinafter called the national company) upon applications approved by the Minister of Transport, made from time to time by the national company to the Minister of Finance, and to be applied by the national company in payment of the deficit certified by the auditors of the national company) in the operation of the Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals arising in the calender year 1945, $713,000.

Mr. McLURE: When will the new car ferry between Tormentine and Borden be completed? I probably could have brought up this matter under vote 376, but perhaps it is not too late to bring it up under this item. We have had many answers to our questions about when this new boat would be completed. The S.S. Charlottetown was lost in 1941. She was insured for $1,000,000, the first time insurance was carried in the history of the boat. When can we be assured of a ferry? It was not until 1944 that it was announced that the contract was let. We have had different excuses given about this matter. First, they were going to salvage the old boat. Then they were going to complete a causeway, or they were going to think about it. Then there was talk about a tunnel. Finally, the minister, not the one who at present adorns this portfolio, stated in 1944 that a contract had been let to be completed in 1945.

Then came a lot of excuses about shortage of materials or no materials for the construction of such a boat. But different stories leaked out from the yards at Sorel. We found that those yards were not being closed on account of a shortage of materials because they were building many types of vessels. In September, 1945, we had a definite statement from the minister who at present adorns the portfolio, in answer to a question that I submitted, that we could expect this boat in the late summer of 1946, or, as we say in the east in Indian summer, which means that it may never come.

Would the minister give us a full statement about this matter? When I spoke on this matter before I emphasized the fact that we should have a boat at an early day. The S.S. Charlottetown was lost in 1941, and if the government intended to live up to the terms of confederation they could have had this boat built in the United States. But that idea was cancelled from some source that I do not know of, and they said, "No, the people of Prince Edward Island can wait." However, I am not going to go into the terms of confederation under which this boat is absolutely due us, because I dealt with that before and I do not wish to hold up the committee any longer.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Every government in Canada has known full well the terms under which my province entered confederation. No government, either Liberal or Conservative has fulfilled the term of that agreement with reference to transportation. I will give credit to the government of the late Robert L. Borden for trying to implement the terms of confederation, but no credit can be given to any other government. When my leader visited Prince Edward Island last year he made a special study of this problem, having had some practical experience with our disadvantages in transportation. At his opening campaign speech in Charlottetown he promised on behalf of his party that he would give us a full implementing of the terms of confederation having to do with transportation. However, his party was not elected to power. The government that is now in power should solve our transportation problem.

I should like to refer to one matter that I mentioned previously, namely the traffic that goes over the Borden-Tormentine ferry. In 1944—the 1945 figures are not yet available—a total of 42,282 freight, passenger and baggage cars were carried on this ferry. There were 175,662 passengers carried, and 12,052 automobiles. This was only half the number of automobiles carried in 1939 and 1940, because gasoline rationing had had an effect on this traffic. There were 5,858 carloads of potatoes carried, and there would have been at least another thousand cars if shipping conditions had not been interfered with by the ice.

I should like to refer to another matter I mentioned before, and I want the minister to take notice of this because I should like to have it rectified. We are handicapped as no other province is handicapped in connection with truck transportation over the Borden-Tormentine ferry. The department should eliminate the prohibitive rates that we have to pay at the present time. This is what is charged a 5-ton truck going from Borden to Tormentine. First, there is a charge of $10 each way for loading on flat cars, because the tramways and the boat itself are not capable of carrying a 5-ton truck. That totals $20. Five tons of first-class freight at twenty cents per 100 pounds gives a total of $40 both ways. Then the driver's return fare is $5. That makes a grand total of $65. After I made my previous statement, I received a letter from the president of the Prince Edward motor carriers association who stated that I was wrong. Here is his actual experience. In effect the charges on a truck carrying a 5-ton load is, taking it both ways $72, and he says, "You are in error $12 or thereabouts." However, even with the figure I have here of $60.65 it is a prohibitive rate. That is the C.N.R. rate. Why should they make rates over a ferry owned by the government? I want the Minister of Transport to set the rate himself.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The Minister of Transport cannot set the rate.

Mr. McLURE: Does the minister tell this committee that he has no authority over rates?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I said that the minister could not set the rate.

Mr. McLURE: Does the minister mean by that, that the government cannot set the rate?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I will explain what I mean when I answer the hon. gentleman.

Mr. McLURE: Then I do not know just where I stand in this matter. But no matter what rates are set on this ferry owned by the government of Canada, the government of Canada are in duty bound to fulfil their part of the contract and give us a rate which is in proportion to all the other rates on ferries for similar traffic. They are not giving us this rate now and we are the ones who are suffering. I have no complaint to make with reference to the Canadian National Railways. That is their business. If they can extract more money, that is for the benefit of themselves. Their service is all right; but their charge is prohibitive, and without any reason or satisfaction to the people of my province. Imagine a rate of $60.65 for carrying a truck a distance of eighteen miles! According to the transportation laws and the transportation commission which sat a few years ago in Ontario and established the rates for transportation by truck, this is a prohibitive rate to a great degree, and again I say to the minister that before another session of this house I want him to establish the rates on trucks. He may tell me and tell this committee that he has no authority to do that. I disagree, because his department and the government are the owners of this means of transport. I could say a great deal more with reference to these prohibitive rates on the car ferry, but I do not want to delay the committee.

Let me say, in closing, that we expect in our province at least fair treatment. It does not matter to the Canadian National Railways whether the rate is $10.60 or whether it is $60.65, because every dollar that they lose in operating this ferry they bill the government for, and it is paid, and correctly so, according to the terms of agreement under which we entered into confederation. But I want to see an individual who is operating a business so protected by the new rates that he can deal with the maritime provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick by truck traffic. I want the Minister of Transport to make a mental reservation regarding this matter and to provide us in the near future with a rate that is at least fair and equitable.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. gentleman has raised a number of questions to which it would take some time to reply. I should like to reply at some length, but I feel that in justice and in fairness to the committee I should not go into any detail. But I wish to reply briefly to some of the questions he raised.

He said that the government should look after the transportation problems in Prince Edward Island. I say to him that the government has looked into those problems; is giving them serious consideration, and is spending a considerable sum of money. My hon. friend is not unmindful of the fact that already we have made commitments for improving the facilities at Tormentine and Borden.

Mr. McLURE: That is under the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It does not matter under whose department it is. At the moment it is under the Department of Transport, but that is aside from the question. We are spending on these facilities somewhere in the neighbourhood of $5,500,000. That is over and above the new ferry boat, which will cost between $4,500,000 and $5,000,000. That is over $11,000,000 for these facilities. So that I am sure the hon. gentleman cannot say that we are not looking with interest into the transportation problems between Prince Edward Island and the mainland.

He also asked with reference to the ferry boat. In my answer to his question on the order paper I stated that it would be late in the summer of 1946 before we could expect the ferry boat to be completed. There are many reasons why this could not be done sooner. I should like to be able to go into those reasons fully, but I feel that I should not take up the time of the committee. I have a long statement here showing just what progress has been made with reference to this Prince Edward Island car ferry, and I should be glad to show it to my hon. friend. It is a progress statement as of November 28, 1945, and shows what progress has been made on the construction of various units of the car ferry. It is an interesting document, but too lengthy for me to read at this stage.

Mr. McLURE: Would the minister put that statement on the record?

Mr. CHEVRIER: With the consent of the committee, Mr. Chairman, I shall be glad to put it on Hansard. The statement follows:

New Prince Edward Island Car Ferry
Progress to November 28, 1945
Hull
(under construction at Marine Industries Limited)

Steel construction in hull up to car deck, including 9 strakes shell plating, floors, 90 per cent erected.

Deck plating, bulkheads and longitudinal stringers, 50 per cent erected.

Structure above car deck, 15 per cent erected.

The loft moulds for remaining shell plating, fenders, rail supports, mezzanine deck plating, top side framing and top side bulkheads, 85 per cent finished.

Stem completed.

Lower portion stern frame machined.

Pattern for shaft brackets completed.

Diesel Engines
(under construction at Dominion Engineering Works)

8 Main Propulsion Units—

Unit No. 1, completed and tests to commence to-night, November 28.

Unit No. 2, practically completed and tests expected to be commenced soon after No. 1 tests have been completed.

Unit No. 3, on erection bed—80 per cent finished.

Unit No. 4, on erection bed—80 per cent finished.

Unit No. 5, on erection bed—70 per cent finished.

Unit No. 6, on erection bed—50 per cent finished.

Unit No. 7, on erection bed—35 per cent finished.

Unit No. 8, on erection bed—20 per cent finished.

(One unit comprises 2-6 cylinder Diesel engines.)

Auxiliary generating units—parts passing through machine shop.

Motors and Generators
(under construction at Canadian General Electric Company)

8—1050 K.W. Main power Generators—

Units No. 1 and No. 2—now ready for test.

Units No. 3 and No. 4—Shop tests completed and units delivered to Dominion Engineering Company.

Units No. 5 and No. 6—Assembled on test beds.

Unit No. 7—75 per cent complete.

Unit No. 8—65 per cent complete.

3—330 K.W. Auxiliary Power Generators—

All 3 armatures completed and field poles being installed—85 per cent complete.

4—3850 H.P. Propulsion Motors—

Unit No. 1—60 per cent complete.

Unit No. 2—50 per cent complete.

Units No. 3 and No. 4—35 per cent complete.

Auxiliary Power Generator Switchboard—

Structural steel case—95 per cent complete.

My hon. friend raised several other questions. He laid stress on truck transportation and the rates paid on these trucks when carried by the ferry. He is of the opinion that the Minister of Transport should eliminate what he calls these prohibitive rates. I say to him that the minister has no authority to do that. The rates are filed with the board of transport commissioners on automobiles and trucks carried by the Canadian National Railways on the ferry between the island and the mainland, and it would appear from the information I have at hand that anyone who wishes to complain about these rates can do so before the board. I am not prepared to disagree with the hon. gentleman upon the amount of these rates. The explanation given before the railways and shipping committee by the president of the Canadian National Railways was that in fixing the rates on the ferry regard had to be had to similar railway rates. He also gave other explanations, which the hon. gentleman can find in the evidence of that committee. For the hon. gentleman's information I am sending over to him three photographs showing the progress of the Prince Edward Island car ferry as it is now in course of construction at Sorel.

Mr. McLURE: With reference to these rates, I understood the minister to say that the commission set these rates, and that he as minister of the Department of Transport did not have the authority to go into them in detail or have them reduced.

Mr. CHEVRIER: To fix the rates.

Mr. McLURE: There is another ferry operating between Woods islands and Cariboo, and the rates on that were fixed by this government, which pays a bonus to the people operating that ferry.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is right.

Mr. McLURE: The rates on that ferry on small trucks are less than half of what they set on the other, although the distance is twice as far, and I take it from the minister that the only redress we can have is to take the matter before the commission. Unfortunately, or probably fortunately, I was not a member of parliament in time to take this matter up when the railway committee was meeting. Had I done so, I believe that they would have left it to the discretion of the minister to place a proper rate on auto trucks.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The reason for the discrepancy between the two sets of rates is that a subsidy is paid on the Woods ferry, and in the payment of the subsidy it is set out what the rates shall be.

Mr. McLURE: At the same time we are paying a subsidy to the Canadian National here, according to this vote, or $721,000.

Mr. CHEVRIER: We pay $713,000 of a deficit.

Mr. McLURE: Well, that is a subsidy to it for carrying on the service.

Item agreed to.

Special deficits—National harbours board—

422. To provide for payment to national harbours board, of the amount hereinafter set forth, to be applied in payment of the deficit (exclusive of interest on dominion government advances and depreciation on capital structures) arising in the calendar year 1945, in the operation of Churchill harbour, $90,000.

Mr. JACKMAN: If the minister would be agreeable to answering certain questions in connection with the grain elevator at Churchill in the railways and shipping committee, I would defer them until then. I want to inquire about the amount of depreciation, the capital involved and the interest charged as set out there, but we can go into it better, I think, in the railways and shipping committee if that is agreeable to the minister.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I would prefer that.

Item agreed to.

Mr. BRACKEN: Did I understand that there might be a brief discussion later of item 422?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No; that has been passed.

Mr. BRACKEN: A question was raised in connection with No. 422 and the railways and shipping committee.

The CHAIRMAN: No; item 422 was carried.

Mr. BRACKEN: The question I wanted to ask was with respect to the harbour at Churchill.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I understood from the hon. member for Rosedale that he asked if I would prefer to have the discussion before the railways and shipping committee next session. I agreed, and I think the committee did, but if the hon. gentleman wants to ask a question on the item I shall be glad to answer it if I can.

Mr. BRACKEN: The question may be something like the one the hon. member for Rosedale wished to ask. It has not to do directly with the harbour, although I should like to know if the government plans to make any expenditures in connection with that harbour this year or the coming year.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The answer to that question is that the expenditure is set out in these estimates. So far as expenditures for next year are concerned, they will be in the estimates for 1946-47.

Mr. BRACKEN: May I ask if the minister will answer this question—

Mr. CHEVRIER: Perhaps I should answer the question by saying that there is a sort of a floating vote for the Hudson Bay railway on capital construction, which we passed some days ago, for $20,000. That is used for capital construction.

Mr. BRACKEN: Well, in a previous item, No. 375, there appears an item of $500,000 for the Hudson Bay railway. I do not want to keep the minister more than a minute or two, but probably he can answer my question briefly. I should like to know what is the net deficit on that railway. This figure may or may not be the net deficit. This figure probably does not include interest on the investment; it may or may not provide for depreciation. Would the minister let us know what is the real net loss per year in the operation of that railway?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The real net estimated deficit is $500,000. The actual deficit will be a little less than that, because, now that we have reached the month of December, it is possible to know with greater certainty. I cannot tell the hon. gentleman what the amount will be, but it will be less than the estimated amount.

Mr. BRACKEN: But does that include the interest on the investment? I am afraid it does not.

Mr. CHEVRIER: No, it does not.

Mr. BRACKEN: Well, then, that is not the actual deficit. Does it also include provision for depreciation, or would that, too, have to be added to the $500,000 in order to show the actual loss per year from that project?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, it would have to be added to the amount. The hon. gentleman remembers the discussion which took place on the motion of the hon. member for Churchill. I tabled a number of statements showing the deficit on capital, the deficit on interest, and I think there was a reference to depreciation.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It is all on Hansard.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. member says, that it is all on Hansard, and I believe it is.

Civil aviation division—

600. Airways and airports—construction and improvements, including lighting and radio facilities—capital—further amount required, $178,900.

Mr. GREEN: Can the minister tell the committee whether a policy has yet been decided upon with regard to assistance to municipal airports which are on the feeder lines? For example, there is to be a feeder line running from Vancouver to Penticton, Cranbrook, and then into Lethbridge. There is an airport now at Cranbrook, but I believe they have no hard-surfaced strip, and they have asked the government to give them some assistance in putting down a proper strip. Has any policy been decided upon for assistance of that type?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am informed that the air transport board is working on the details of the policy all across the country, but they have not materialized to a sufficient extent to enable them to be made public at this time.

Mr. GREEN: Will any assistance be given to these cities where they show that they are willing to assume their fair share of the cost of improving these airports?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am sure there will be, because before the war we gave these airports assistance, and while I am not in a position to say what it will be, it will not be less than it was then.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Is it the policy of the department to utilize the Debert airport in connection with Trans-Canada Air Lines? More than $3 million has been expended on that airport, and often planes connot make the landing on the eastern passage near Halifax. The service to the central and eastern part of the province is important. Can the minister say whether the airport can be used to a greater extent?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The airport has not been declared surplus to War Assets Corporation; but when it is, consideration will be given the question whether it can be used for the purpose asked.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF RECONSTRUCTION

308. Departmental administration, including expenses incidental to organization, $1,500,000.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There are just one or two items of the Minister of Reconstruction and the Minister of Munitions and Supply. This item was discussed at full length on the war appropriation estimates, and the minister said that this amount of $1,500,000 was duplicated in civil estimates as well. There has been ample opportunity therefore for discussion.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I am rather upset by the treatment that the house has received from the government. Several of us had questions on the order paper asking for specific information, and we were told to defer those questions until the war expenditures committee met. We cooperated and deferred the questions and, the war expenditures committee having met, we have not been able to ask the questions in committee. I am not blaming either the chairman or the committee; there happened to be too much work to allow us to get down to the details. I do not like the idea of the minister having such unlimited powers without any check on him until the house meets at the next session, when the committee is set up again. I have suggested before that, on this question of war assets and the realization of moneys therefrom, there should be a continuing committee or a royal commission sitting until the house meets again. There are a number of things we want to know, and many things will be happening while the house is in recess. Dominion Magnesium Limited ought to be thoroughly investigated and so should Research Enterprises plant. The Minister of Reconstruction has power to do whatever he likes under the act, and that power is far too great for any minister, no matter how capable or honest he may be. Already he has sold one building and he has told us that he is going to close the plant. There is also the Cardoza matter that has to be investigated. The government should carefully consider the advisability of setting up the committee I have suggested.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

39. Departmental administration, $526,085.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The leader of the opposition asked a question on Thursday last relating to external affairs, and I might give my hon. friend the answer immediately. He inquired whether the government had received an invitation from the United States government to attend an international trade conference. My hon. friend went on to inquire whether, if such an invitation should be received, the government would give favourable consideration to making its delegation to the proposed conference a non-partisan delegation rather than one representing only the government itself.

The position is that the United States government has proposed that the united nations organization, once it is established, should take steps to convene a general international conference on trade and employment, if possible by the summer of 1946. The Canadian government has warmly welcomed the initiative which the United States government has taken in this matter and will give its full support in the united nations assembly to the proposal that such a conference be held. In the meantime I can only say that no consideration has yet been given to the composition of the Canadian delegation to such a conference.

I should like to take this opportunity of informing the committee that the government of Canada has accepted an invitation from the government of the United States to participate in a preliminary meeting, which will probably be held during the spring, to prepare concrete and concerted measures for the reduction of tariffs and other trade barriers, and generally to prepare the way for the successful accomplishment of the general objectives which we hope the united nations conference on trade and employment will be able to realize. I need not emphasize again the importance to Canada of restoring the world trading economy on the fullest and freest basis possible. No country has a greater stake in the attainment and consolidation of these objectives and we must be prepared to take our full part in cooperation with other like-minded nations in this great task.

Mr. GREEN: Is the Prime Minister not making a general statement on this item?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have not a prepared statement. I rather anticipated that a number of questions might be asked which I would seek to answer. In one way or another at different times during the session there have been extensive references to the more important matters of external affairs, and at this stage of the session I have not had an opportunity to prepare a statement of any length.

Mr. GREEN: There are three questions I should like to place before the Prime Minister having to do with the Department of External Affairs. Before doing so, may I say that I consider it very unfortunate that the debate on external affairs should have come on so late in the session. The Prime Minister has been back from his trip to the United Kingdom and the United States for almost a month, and in the best interests of the country as well as of the house it would have been wiser for him to bring on this debate shortly after his return. The Canadian people have not had many opportunities over the last decade to consider foreign affairs. I think it has been a weakness of this parliament that we have not had enough discussions on these topics, and as a result it has been difficult for public opinion to crystallize. Then, of course, it is particularly unfortunate because so few members of parliament are here this week. Most of them have gone home, and only a comparative few will have had the privilege of listening to the discussions on external affairs which have taken place to-day.

My first question has to do with Canada's position in the key negotiations which take place from time to time. For example, negotiations are now under way in Moscow, and there were similar negotiations in London in the early fall. They are of great importance. They may be settling the peace terms. In any event, there is no doubt that many of the terms will be settled at these conferences which means that they may involve war or peace in the future. Canada is very deeply concerned with these negotiations, not only because of the part she has played in the recent war but also because of the part she undoubtedly would have to play in any future war, and more particularly because we are now one of the three trustees of atomic force. That has tremendously increased the responsibility of Canada as a nation in external affairs in the last year; I am confident the Prime Minister will agree with that statement. At this time the Canadian people are far more directly involved in the issues that have to be settled between the nations.

I suggest to the Prime Minister and to the committee that some procedure must be established so that Canada can take an active part in reaching these vital decisions. At the present time we are largely confined to complaining about the decisions after they have been reached and to trying to change them, which is a difficult thing to do. Once a decision is reached, it is almost impossible to make any far-reaching changes. The Prime Minister showed that this was Canada's position when he spoke in this house on September 27, referring to his projected visit to Europe. At page 491 of Hansard he said:

> In this entire matter the understanding of the Canadian government, as I have already intimated to the house, is that any draft treaty that results from the discussions of the council of foreign ministers will be of a preliminary character and that there will be an opportunity for Canada, as well as for other interested united nations, to express their views at a later stage.

It would be far more satisfactory if some method could be worked out whereby the Canadian house and the Canadian people could have additional knowledge of the facts and of the trends; have the time to consider them, and to hold discussions with the United Kingdom and with other nations of the commonwealth, before decisions are reached. I have no doubt that something along that line is being done at the present time, under present practice; but it must go a great deal farther. I believe that Canada could get whatever procedure she wished; that the United Kingdom and other nations of the commonwealth would follow our lead to a great extent if we suggested a change. So that, I repeat, my first question is for an explanation of Canada's position in respect of negotiations such as those being carried on at this time in Moscow.

My second question has to do with Canada's policy in the Pacific. I would ask the Prime Minister to explain the attitude of his government toward Pacific affairs. That area has increased greatly in importance. In fact, I think the centre of world activity has now shifted from Europe, certainly to America and perhaps to the Pacific.

During the course of the war against Japan the United States did a great deal to open up areas in the Pacific. Russia has expanded and she is now taking an active interest in Manchuria; she is also very active in the northern part of the Pacific. China, of course, is like a giant just awakening from a long sleep. No one can tell what developments there may be on the mainland of Asia in the next decade or generation, but it is almost certain that they will be very great.

Then, Australia and New Zealand have developed remarkably during the war. They have taken a most aggressive position in Pacific affairs, and have told the rest of the world in no uncertain language just what they think their part should be in that area. What is Canada's policy on such questions as the allied advisory commission on Japan, which has been set up in Washington? Apparently the Russians wanted to have an allied control commission, functioning not in Washington but right in Tokyo. What position is Canada taking on that suggestion?

Are we in favour of a regional council for the Pacific? Some of the nations have been suggesting that there should be a council for that region, and Canada should take some position on the question. It is, of course, of vital interest to those Canadians who live on the Pacific slope. We should like to know what the Canadian government has in mind about a regional council for the Pacific. There is much to be said for such a council, because there are many problems which are peculiar to the Pacific area.

Then, what is Canada's policy with regard to a united nations trusteeship of the former Japanese territories in the Pacific area? That, again, is a most important question; and we should like to know whether or not the government believes that such trusteeship should be established.

My third question has to do with the work of the house itself in connection with external affairs. This year for the first time there was set up an external affairs committee. It is a very good committee, and the members who served on it took their work most seriously. On November 12, when the Prime Minister was away, that committee brought in a report, the last paragraph of which read as follows:

> Your committee further recommends that it be empowered to consider matters connected with external affairs and report from time to time any suggestion or recommendation deemed advisable to the House of Commons.

That, of course, was a wide-open recommendation. The committee asked that it be given power to consider anything having to do with external affairs.

A few days later, on November 16, on a motion for concurrence, the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) moved in amendment that the words "be now concurred in" at the end of the motion be struck out, and replaced by the following:

> That the report be referred back to the said committee and that it have power to reconsider the recommendation expressed in the last paragraph of the report.

In moving that amendment, the Minister of Justice said that he thought the new committee had gone too far and had asked for powers that were much too wide. His suggestion was that they should consider only what was referred to them by the house.

In this matter there is a clear difference of opinion. Perhaps some middle ground can be found. May I suggest to the Prime Minister that the estimates for the Department of External Affairs might very well be referred to the external affairs committee. That is done now in respect of certain items in the Department of Transport which are referred to the special committee on government-owned railways and shipping. If this were done, if these estimates were referred, it would give the committee reasonable scope in the discussion of external affairs, and at the same time would not deprive the house of the right to discuss those estimates subsequently.

This new committee must not be crippled at the outset. There was great hope for it, in the speech of my leader when he proposed that it be set up, in the speech of the Prime Minister when he accepted the proposal, and in the speeches of the leaders of the other parties.

As I said at the opening of my remarks, matters connected with external affairs have not been discussed at any great length in the Canadian parliament. However, they have become more and more important, until now there is nothing much more important which could be discussed either in committee or in the house. The standing committee could get at the various facts in connection with the estimates. It could call officials of the department, and could hear witnesses. It could help to keep the Department of External Affairs more closely in touch with the Canadian people. There would be valuable training for the members serving on the committee and the result would be to help the people of Canada to understand and to follow external affairs better than they do at the present time. Further, if my suggestions were followed it might be possible to reach unanimity on many questions connected with external affairs. So that I repeat my suggestion that the government adopt the policy of referring estimates of the department to the standing committee on external affairs at the beginning of the session.

Those are the three questions that I have to place before the Prime Minister to-night. It is impossible to overemphasize the importance of external affairs. Twice in twenty-five years young Canadians have sailed from our shores to fight, and in many cases to die, because of issues that arose beyond our boundaries. They have had to do that in order to prevent war from approaching our land. I believe that if the Canadian people are told the facts, if they are given an opportunity to discuss and to understand the various issues, they will reach the right decision. But the leadership must come from the house itself. Therefore I suggest that in another session the Prime Minister see to it that more opportunity is given for a thorough examination of all questions having to do with external affairs.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, may I say to the hon. member for Vancouver South that I agree with practically all he has said this evening. Personally I am sorry that it was not possible to have these estimates brought down at an earlier time. I can give him an explanation which, however, he may regard as an excuse. The fact is that when I returned I found there was quite a lot to do. My hon. friend knows that part of the time was taken up with presiding at the dominion-provincial conference and studying questions in relation to it. He knows also that there were a number of very important measures which still had not been considered by the house, or if they had been considered, had been considered only in one stage, and it was desired by the house to have them debated before anything else was taken up, or at least I so gathered. I met with the leaders of the three parties when I came back and we had a discussion as to how the business of the session should be arranged for the remainder of the session in order that we might get through about this time. In that discussion it was clearly emphasized that there were certain measures—for example, the emergency powers bill, the budget resolutions and other matters—which it was felt it was all-important should be dealt with by the house as soon as possible. I agreed to do all I could to see that those measures were brought forward as rapidly as possible. If I am not mistaken, I undertook to see that estimates which it might be requested should be brought down before others would be given priority. I do not recall any particular request that the estimates of external affairs should precede other estimates. I have been holding back, in part, to allow the business of the house to get along as rapidly as possible. I agree with my hon. friend that it is unfortunate that we should be discussing at this late stage of the session many matters that relate to external affairs.

I agree with my hon. friend that there is perhaps no more important phase of the government's work than that which relates to external affairs. I think he will agree that the importance of external affairs in the work of government has in Canada come to the fore very suddenly. During the period of the war there were strong reasons why we had to follow the course we did in regard to making our voice heard on many questions. I have said to the house that at times we found ourselves in an extremely embarrassing position. Decisions were being made by the Prime Minister of Great Britain associated with the President of the United States. Some of these decisions had to be made very quickly, and in a few instances we did not learn about them until after they had been made. But those cases were very few and there were good reasons for the haste that was required.

I had at that time to make up my mind whether I would protest each time we had been overlooked or whether I would look at the matter in a reasonable light and say, "Everything considered, as we are in a war, we had better allow this to pass without too much in the way of protest." But I can assure my hon. friend that there never was an occasion, while we may not have said much in the way of protest in public, that we did not place our position very strongly on record.

Coming to this present period, now that we are out of the war, I did as my hon. friend has read from Hansard make a strong protest before I went across the Atlantic at Canada being invited to come for purposes of consultation on matters related to the settlement of the peace, and not invited to come as a principal, to sit as such with others. One reason why I felt it important to go to England was to discuss that very phase of the situation with the prime minister and the minister of foreign affairs there. I thought that matters of the kind could be referred to much better in conversation than to be made an occasion for discussion across the Atlantic. I would say that I believe that the members of the British government have had and have every desire to see that Canada secures her full representation in important international negotiations, but to some extent the matter has been beyond their control.

My hon. friend has referred to the meeting of foreign ministers that took place in London. If I remember correctly, that meeting was the outgrowth of the conference held at Potsdam. Similarly, there is a conference taking place at Moscow to-day at which are present only the foreign ministers of the United Kingdom, the United States and the Soviet Union. That conference is the outcome of the decision reached at Yalta that the foreign ministers of the great powers involved in the war should meet every once in so often, I think it is every three or four months, to become—I do not say better acquainted with each other—better acquainted through conferring with one another, with all aspects of questions as they come up.

President Truman himself has said that he does not think there should be any more peace settlements by the great powers alone. In that connection I am sure the President was referring to a peace conference and the final settlement of peace terms. Canada has made her position very clearly known in that connection. In regard to matters that relate to the peace we expect to have all the powers recognize the great part which Canada played in this war, the great sacrifice of life that has been made, all that has contributed to victory on the part of our armed services, to say nothing of the much lesser but nevertheless very important contributions that Canada has made in the way of furnishing supplies, making loans, in fact giving assistance where it was needed without any consideration. We do expect and will expect that this country shall be given full recognition along with other powers that may have to do with these international matters that affect the future.

May I deal with the last subject to which my hon. friend referred before going on to the other two questions he asked? I think it would be all to the good to have the estimates of the Department of External Affairs referred to the committee on external affairs. That committee was formerly known as the committee on industrial and international relations, but its designation was changed at the beginning of this session. My impression is that I suggested at a previous session that we should refer the estimates of the Department of External Affairs to the committee on industrial and international relations. I know that I did advocate that course in regard to the estimates of different departments, namely, that they should be referred to committees, and I did so for two reasons; first, in order that all members might be better informed on the work of the government in these matters and also because I believe it would involve a real saving in time in taking up the estimates themselves. I agree with my hon. friend that if the committee does go into these matters and takes up the estimates of any department—I am speaking now particularly of External Affairs—that should not preclude the fullest discussion on any of the items for external affairs when the report of the committee comes back to the house. I do think that the committee of supply might well decide that there are a large number of these items which the standing committee had gone into so fully that there was no need of bringing them up again here and taking up the time of the house, but that it would rather pick out the items which it was felt should receive attention here.

The leader of the opposition also asked whether it was the intention to reappoint the committee on the revision of the rules of the house. I would answer him now by saying that that committee will certainly be reappointed, and I hope that it will consider very carefully how time can be saved in the House of Commons by a revision of the rules in some respects along the lines I have already suggested. The recommendation of the committee to which my hon. friend referred was that it be empowered to consider matters connected with external affairs and to report from time to time any suggestions or recommendations to the House of Commons. I think that was construed as being something very broad and as rather a departure from the rules we follow generally in the house; namely, that when matters are referred to committees, they are referred to them specifically. For example, this committee on external affairs in its report referred to certain conventions they approved, and there were also the treaty of extradition and one or two other matters which they considered. I think that is the right way in which to refer matters to a committee.

But with regard to External Affairs there is one very special reason why care must be taken as to the extent to which the committee might be authorized to go in investigating External Affairs generally. My hon. friend knows that in the Department of External Affairs there is a great deal of correspondence with different governments on matters that are under consideration and one thing above everything else that we have to watch is to see that where other governments are concerned their consent is obtained in advance of the disclosure of information that may be the subject of communication between those governments and our own. The committee might quite unconsciously, unless there was someone watching the situation pretty carefully, be going into some matters about which, if they were brought up in the House of Commons instead of in the committee the minister in charge would have to take responsibility. But I do not press that consideration too far. I think that what my hon. friend has in mind is that if the estimates as a whole were referred to a committee it could bring before it the officials of the External Affairs Department and if they had doubt as to the propriety to certain matters arising in the committee the matter could be considered and dealt with by the minister in the house. I am happy to join with my hon. friend in the move to have the estimates of External Affairs referred to the standing committee and I would hope that that committee might, as I have already suggested, bring down to a few topics the matters which subsequently need to be referred to in the House of Commons. Possibly later, when we call this particular resolution, and the amendment which has been proposed to refer the matter back for consideration the amendment might be allowed to pass as the committee will not be meeting again before another session.

My hon. friend asked me about Canada's position in certain key negotiations. I have touched on that to a limited extent. I cannot emphasize too strongly the right of this country to be one of the principals in any matters that have grown out of the war and relate to the making of the peace. I can assure him that we shall watch the situation carefully and press for our rights in that regard.

My hon. friend has made reference to Canada's policy in the Pacific. I had anticipated that some questions would be asked in regard to the Pacific and I should like to answer his question as follows:

I should like to summarize briefly the situation with respect to the occupation and control of Japan. It will be recalled that, in October, Canada was invited to participate in the work of the far eastern advisory commission, a body convened in Washington to consider political matters connected with the fulfilment by Japan of its obligations under the instrument of surrender. The invitation was accepted, as the house was informed, and the Canadian ambassador in Washington was named as Canadian representative. A number of preliminary meetings have been held which have been chiefly devoted to examining the manifold problems with which the committee will have to deal and discussing the way in which its work can most profitably be arranged. The members taking part in these meetings, in addition to Canada, are the United Kingdom, the United States, China, Australia, France, India, the Philippine commonwealth, the Netherlands and New Zealand.

So far, the Soviet Union has not sent a representative to the commission, but it is my understanding that discussions are now proceeding between the four powers signatory to the Potsdam declaration with a view to reconciling certain differences of opinion which have been expressed over methods of procedure. It is hoped that these discussions will result in the attendance of a Soviet representative, which will be genuinely welcomed by all.

It is premature as yet to attempt to predict, with any exactness, how the far eastern advisory commission will function and what role it will play. The important thing is that machinery has been created which will provide for joint discussions by all the nations directly concerned with the Pacific of the intricate and far-reaching political problems occasioned by the defeat of Japan. An opportunity is thus afforded to the Canadian government to express its views on matters of concern to it and to share in the formulation of the policies that will be applied to Japan. I am hopeful that the far eastern advisory commission will make a worth-while contribution to the problem of creating conditions which will encourage the development by the Japanese people of a peaceful and democratic government.

Canada will be represented on the far eastern advisory commission during its forthcoming visit to Japan by Mr. E. H. Norman, a member of the external affairs service. Mr. Norman served at the Canadian legation in Japan before the war and is a specialist in far eastern affairs. He will act in place of Mr. L. B. Pearson, the official Canadian representative on the commission, who will not be able to leave his post as Canadian ambassador in Washington for the time required for this visit to Japan.

Colonel L. M. Cosgrove of the trade commissioner service, has been appointed as economic consultant to the Canadian representative. Colonel Cosgrave served for many years as a trade commissioner in the far east and has more recently been military attache at Canberra.

May I say a word with respect to China. The sense of relief experienced by all the united nations with the final surrender of Japan was surely nowhere felt more profoundly than in long-suffering China. To that great country it brought not only release from over eight years of war—indeed from fourteen years of continuous resistance—but a removal of the shadow of Japanese domination that had marked many more years of uncertainty and fear. We may well recall at this time the debt of gratitude the world owes to China for her resistance in those early days when she was willing to withstand the might of Japan. By a happy coincidence, on the very day when Japan signed the formal surrender terms in Tokyo bay, the Premier of China was the guest of our government, and as Prime Minister I was able to express to Dr. Soong Canada's congratulations and thanks, and to assure him of Canada's continued aid as China addressed herself to her tasks of reconstruction.

Canada with the other united nations looks with expectation and hope to China as she takes up her task of economic reconstruction and political development. Her leaders are fully aware that the task will not be without difficulties. News of recent days indicate a political condition yet unsettled and disturbed. At this stage we can only affirm our confidence that the Chinese people will be able satisfactorily to solve their own internal problems. Good neighbours and far-off friends alike must be united in the hope that she may be completely successful in attaining the unity and strength that will enable her to take her place as a bulwark among the peace-loving and democratic nations of the world.

My hon. friend asks specifically with regard to the regional council in the Pacific. The government's policy has been to keep in touch with all these matters that relate to the Pacific as they have come up for consideration, but we have not thus far decided that it is advisable for us to become members of a regional council. It may be that the developments which will take place within the next short time will show the wisdom of Canada being a member of the regional council, but I think we have much to gain and nothing to lose by not taking too immediate a step in regard to what is most advisable in the intricate situation which exists at the present time in the Pacific.

Mr. GREEN: I also asked the Prime Minister the attitude of the government toward a united nations trusteeship of Japanese possessions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is really nothing I can say at the present time about it, and it is felt that it would be unwise to make any particular statement on that subject at the present time.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have a few remarks to make on a specific point and, perhaps, a few questions to ask to which, I think, a great many people in Canada would like to get fairly specific answers from the Prime Minister. Before I do that, however, I wish to associate myself with the points made by the hon. member for Vancouver South in regard to the unsatisfactory condition in which we find ourselves with this Department of External Affairs; indeed, it applies also to a great many other departments. We have to go back to our homes without having an opportunity of getting information on many points which we would like to have clarified. Perhaps, however, the blame for this state of affairs does not rest with the government alone. It rests with the government for having failed to take the initiative in arranging the business of this house so that we can deal with matters with more satisfaction and more dispatch; but in my opinion, it must have the support of the opposition side of the house. I hope that when another session comes around, one of the first things we shall do will be so to arrange the work of the house that we shall deal more with practical matters rather than make speeches which in the end do not amount to anything anyway.

The Prime Minister said in another debate the other day that external affairs were of tremendous importance, that almost every subject we discussed to-day touches our affairs with other countries. I agree. May I say here that I was extremely glad when the Prime Minister found time earlier in the session—perhaps he did not find time; he just took it—to go to Great Britain and acquaint himself with many things at first hand. We criticize him, and we are going to continue to do so, but I admit that I felt somewhat relieved when he took that trip, because I considered at that time that international conditions were as bad as they could be without an eruption, and I believe to-day they are somewhat better. I hope that either the Prime Minister or whoever is in charge of external affairs will find time in the future to visit other countries with which we have intimate international relations.

What I wish to touch on more specifically is a matter which was discussed in the session of 1944 under the estimates of the Department of External Affairs. I do not see any item concerning it in the estimates before me; but since this point was discussed and the Prime Minister made a very full statement on it at that time, I am going to bring it up to-night. I refer to the position of our citizens of Japanese origin. Their position has not been satisfactory to them and certainly not satisfactory, I think, to other Canadians, and now that we have come to the stage where the war is over, there must be some final solution in this important matter.

I am sure the Prime Minister has received communications from many organizations across Canada, organizations which are waiting to hear what he has to say on this subject. Had there been more time, I would have quoted at length from the Prime Minister's speech of August 4, 1944, with which in large measure I agree. The fault which I find with it is that that policy, in my opinion, has not been carried out. I will content myself with reading from part of the paragraph which appears on page 5916 of Hansard. The Prime Minister said:

> Those who are disloyal must be removed. That is clear. Surely however it is not to be expected that the government will do other than deal justly with those who are guilty of no crime, or even of any ill intention. For the government to act otherwise would be an acceptance of the standards of our enemies and the negation of the purposes for which we are fighting.

I agree with that whole-heartedly; it expresses my point of view absolutely. But I maintain that we have not dealt justly with these people, and it is for that reason that I wish the Prime Minister to-night, if he can, to give an assurance not only to these people themselves but to the people of Canada that democratic principles and the principles of freedom will be observed in our treatment of them. I should like to know if those who signed for repatriation and now wish to reconsider their signatures—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I do not see anything in the estimates with regard to this matter. In fact it is my recollection that it was discussed previously in this committee under a different department.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I recollect, Mr. Chairman, that there was an understanding that, if we took up these estimates rather hurriedly at the end, considerable latitude would be allowed, and I should hope that this question would be one which we might permit to be discussed. Your ruling is strictly correct as to the particular item, but the understanding was that we would allow considerable latitude. That was the general agreement, and possibly the discussion can be continued.

The CHAIRMAN: If that is the wish of the committee the hon. member may proceed.

Mr. MacINNIS: I wish to thank the Prime Minister. You will recall, Mr. Chairman, that I drew your attention to the fact, when I began to speak, that there was not an item in these estimates under which I might speak. I was going to raise a few points on which I believe the people of Canada would like to have some assurance. First, will those who signed for repatriation and now want to reconsider be given that opportunity? Second, will children under sixteen years of age who are Canadian citizens and who are taken to Japan by their parents have their citizenship rights safeguarded? There is another question. When will the restrictions on the freedom of movement of these people be removed so that they can again take up their lives as free citizens of a free country? On these particular points I should like the Prime Minister to reply if he will.

There is another matter, and I refer to it particularly for the leader of this group, who is not able to be here to-night. It arises out of an item that appeared in a Vancouver newspaper on May 31, 1945. It was a statement made by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) during the election campaign, and it refers to high-ranking members of the Department of External Affairs, who are not named. I quote:

> Tom Reid, Liberal candidate for New Westminster, took issue with Prime Minister Mackenzie King on the Japanese question here Wednesday when he charged:
> "Prime Minister Mackenzie King is advised by men who had fine trips to Japan and were bribed by the Japanese previous to the war."
>
> Declaring his policy regarding the Japanese question differed from that of Mr. King, he said:
> "These higher up civil servants are putting in a plug for the Japanese on every occasion. When he was asked in the house to name an individual who had been bribed by the Japanese, he refused, but said he would write the name in a letter and send it to Mr. King. He did this and was later summoned to an interview attended by Mr. King and Norman Robertson, Assistant Secretary for External Affairs."

The interview was brief, Mr. Reid said. Mr. King asked Mr. Robertson if the individual named in the letter denied the charge. Mr. Robertson made no reply and the interview was over. Mr. Reid declared his only mistake was in failing to mention two others in the same category.

These are serious charges. The people concerned, although no names were mentioned, feel that they were the ones in question, and if this statement is true, then these people have no business in the Department of External Affairs. They have no business in the service of the Dominion of Canada, and the Prime Minister should remove them from their positions at the earliest possible opportunity. If, however, the statement is not true, then the character of these people should be cleared, and it should be done publicly. I suggest that this is a matter that the Prime Minister cannot leave as it is now. He cannot do so in fairness either to the people of Canada or to the gentlemen concerned.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I expected that my hon. friend or some other hon. member would bring up the question of the present position of the Japanese, and I am glad to have this opportunity to give to the house copies of orders in council which were passed on the fifteenth instant and which I think will in themselves serve to answer the questions my hon. friend has asked.

This is a matter to which the government has been giving very careful attention. It is not an easy matter to settle or to deal with, and as my hon. friend has rightly said, I had mentioned before that we would seek to deal with the whole question justly. May I say that we have sought to deal with it, and in doing so we have followed the ancient precept of doing justly but also loving mercy, and the orders in council which I now table will give expression to that approach.

I have in my hand three orders in council, P.C. 7355, P.C. 7356, and P.C. 7357 of December 15, all of which have been passed under the War Measures Act, to carry out the policy announced by the government on August 4, 1944, and November 21, 1945, with respect to Japanese people in Canada.

It will, I believe, assist in the understanding of these orders if I give a brief explanation of their purpose and effect. With the permission of the house I should like to table the orders before we rise this evening, and in the meantime I will give the substance of them. I will endeavour briefly to review the situation.

The general outline of the government's policy with regard to the Japanese was given in my statement of August 4, 1944, to which I have referred and which my hon. friend has also mentioned. As a first measure in its implementation, the government sought to determine which of the Japanese now in Canada did not wish to remain here after the war. On November 21 the Minister of Labour referred to the number of applications that had been received for movement to Japan. The minister announced that the government intended to order the removal from Canada of Japanese nationals who had applied for repatriation; of naturalized persons of Japanese origin who had similarly applied and who had not revoked their applications prior to midnight on September 1, 1945; and of Canadian-born Japanese who wished to go to Japan and who did not renounce such intention before an order for their deportation was made. The first order in council P.C. 7355, simply provides that the Minister of Labour may carry out this policy. He is not ordered to have the persons deported, but he is given the power to arrange for their movement.

In all cases in which removal from Canada is to be effected, it is provided that the persons involved shall be able to take out their personal property and all cash and other movable assets, and that they shall be able to sell or otherwise dispose of their real property or of anything else they do not wish to take with them. In addition, they are to be assured minimum liquid assets to assist in their resettlement to the extent of $200 for each adult ordered deported, and $50 for each dependent. In cases where the person going to Japan has a certain amount of cash, but less than $200 plus $50 for each dependent, he will be advanced the difference in order to bring his cash assets up to the minimum I have mentioned. In those cases where the persons to whom cash is advanced have assets with the custodian, the minister will recover his advances out of such assets.

The other clauses of the order simply provide the necessary administrative machinery to carry out the terms of the order.

The second order in council, P.C. 7356, provides for the removal of British and Canadian status from any naturalized persons who now leave Canada for residence in Japan, or are deported from Canada pursuant to applications made and orders issued under P.C. 7355. It has, of course, no application to Japanese nationals, nor does it apply to persons born in Canada. Its application is only to persons naturalized in Canada who have expressed a wish to go to Japan and who have not, as I have said, revoked this application, and also to naturalized persons who come under the third order which I shall now describe.

The third order in council, is P.C. 7357. Hon. members will recall that, in my statement to the house on August 4, 1944, I said that the government intended to establish a quasi-judicial commission to investigate the loyalty of certain of the Japanese in Canada "to ascertain those who are not fit persons to be allowed to remain here". The time has now come when this commission should be appointed. We now know with certainty that same persons do not wish to remain here. There is no object in examining them. There are, however, among the Japanese nationals and naturalized Japanese who wish to remain, a number whose behaviour casts doubt upon their loyalty and before deciding what should be done about them, it is proposed to have a full and fair examination of their cases. Some of these are persons who were interned during the war and whose conduct in wartime has been such as to raise question as to whether in the national interest they should not be deported.

In general, the order in council provides that the governor in council shall appoint a commission of three persons to inquire into the loyalty of "Japanese nationals and naturalized persons of the Japanese race in Canada in cases where their names are referred to the commission by the Minister of Labour". It will be noted from this that the commission will examine only Japanese nationals and naturalized persons. It will not examine any persons born in Canada. It will, moreover, have the power, where recommended by the Minister of Labour, to examine the cases of naturalized Japanese who applied to be sent to Japan and who did not renounce such application prior to midnight on September 1, 1945.

The commission will, where it deems fit after examination, have the power to recommend deportation. In such cases, any Japanese national or naturalized Japanese who is ordered deported will be deemed to come within the terms of the two orders in council previously mentioned. The conditions with regard to property and minimum assets will apply and, in the case of naturalized persons, they will be divested of their British and Canadian status as of the time they leave this country.

The problem of dealing with the question of the Japanese is difficult in the extreme. In its solution, the government is endeavouring to avoid unnecessary hardship. The orders that have been passed involve no change in principle from the general provisions that already exist under our statute law. The Immigration Act contains provisions for the deportation of "enemy aliens or persons who have been alien enemies" in certain cases. In general, the deportation of certain "prohibited classes" is a recognized principle. The Naturalization Act similarly recognizes the principle of revocation of the status of a naturalized person who has shown himself by act or speech to be disaffected or disloyal. The circumstances of war and the peculiar character of the present problem require more expeditious and broader action that the present statutes allow. But the orders that have been passed to permit effective action raise no new principles, nor do they depart from any established principles.

My hon. friend spoke of another matter, that is, certain charges against officers of the external affairs department, to which reference was made in a paragraph he read to the committee to-night. May I say that I personally had a talk with the hon. member for New Westminster. I asked him if he could substantiate the statements that had been made. He said that at the time he made the statements he had reason to believe that they were founded on fact, but that he was now quite prepared to say that he would not countenance the statements at all and withdrew what he had said at that time. May I say that I cannot believe we have in any department of government more honourable members of the public service than we have in the Department of External Affairs; and I am sure it was a pleasure to the hon. member for New Westminster, as it was to myself, to have the opportunity of saying that on further examination and consideration he felt that any charge which would in any way discredit an official of that department had not been well founded.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I found it difficult to get the purport of order in council P.C. 7356. As I understand it—and I should like to be corrected if I am wrong—there are two groups of Canadian citizens: those who applied for the revocation of their applications to go to Japan before September 2 and those who did not, who were in the great majority. Can this latter group have the right to appeal to the quasi-judicial commission which is being set up?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me repeat what I said about the second order in council. It provides for the removal of British and Canadian status—I do not whether that is the order to which my hon. friend is referring.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): P.C. 7356.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. It provides for the removal of British and Canadian status from any naturalized persons who now leave Canada for residence in Japan, or are deported from Canada pursuant to applications made and orders issued under P.C. 7355. Naturally we do not wish to have in Japan, in the person of anyone who was deported, a person still carrying the status of a Canadian citizen; I think we will all agree that should not be permitted. This order, however, has no application to Japanese nationals, nor does it apply to persons born in Canada. Its application is only to persons naturalized in Canada who have expressed a wish to go to Japan and who have not, as I have said, revoked this application before September 1, 1945; and also to naturalized persons who come under the third order which I have already quoted.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): For one reason or another a great number of Canadian citizens did not revoke their applications before September 2. Does that mean that automatically they will be deported, or do they have a right to appeal to some body?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Perhaps I may be permitted to say a word, in view of the fact that I had something to do with the preparation of some of these orders. These orders purport to deal only with those who have asked to be deported, whether they be Canadian born or naturalized in Canada or Japanese nationals. With respect to those born in Canada who may not want to go at the time we can arrange to have them go, no decision has yet been made, because there was nothing in the statutory legislation which permitted of their being dealt with. The only ones who are to be forcibly dealt with under these orders are the naturalized Canadians of the Japanese race, or Japanese nationals. These orders do not purport to deal with Canadian-born persons of Japanese ancestry who had expressed a willingness to go, and who had revoked before September 1, nor with those who had expressed a desire to go, and had not revoked before September 1.

It was found upon examining the Immigration Act and the Naturalization Act that if anything was to be done about them, further legislation would be required; and it was not felt that it would be proper for the governor in council to enact that legislation under the War Measures Act or under the Emergency Powers Act, but that if and when it is done, it should be done by parliament itself.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I should like to pursue this matter further. I am dealing only with Canadian citizens who are naturalized. Those who did not apply to revoke before September 2 are to be deported?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): In other words, there will be a distinction between Canadian-born citizens, and Canadian citizens who took out papers in this country?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I think that is wrong; it is unjust.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Apparently parliament did not think so when it passed the legislation now on the statute books.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Would the Prime Minister give the committee the assurance that no persons of Japanese ancestry will be allowed at any time to return to the Pacific coast?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think I can give that statement.

Mr. GREEN: What is the Prime Minister's answer?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does the hon. member wish me to give a statement that persons of Japanese origin will not be permitted to return to the Pacific coast? I cannot give that statement.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Mr. Chairman, I know the committee is eager to complete its business; yet as a new member I believe I have had as little to say as anyone. I have tried to be a good listener, and I have been gaining impressions every day so that a little later on I would be able to have a clear idea as to what really constitutes our Canadian parliament.

When this matter was being discussed under the estimates for the Department of Labour, the Minister of Labour made two statements which caught my attention. If I understood him correctly, he said, first, that this is no time for sitting on a fence. I understood him to mean that this is the time when people should take a stand on matters of vital interest.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think the hon. member has the dates wrong. I said that when a nation is in jeopardy is no time to sit on the fence—when you have your back to the wall, and when you are hanging on the ropes as we were when we stood alone in 1940 and 1941. That was the time I referred to; but not now. It is easy to sit on the fence now.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): I stand corrected.

The CHAIRMAN: I was afraid there would be reference to a previous debate, and that was why I mentioned to the hon. member for Vancouver East that I had seen no estimate in the Department of External Affairs with respect to Japanese. I was fearful there would be a review of this question and a reference to a debate which took place in the house a few weeks ago. Since it has been agreed that there will be some discussion on the Japanese question, I suggest that there should be as little reference as possible to the debate which has already taken place on this subject.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): I am asking only for the latitude granted at the request of the Prime Minister to the hon. member for Vancouver East.

The CHAIRMAN: I am not trying to circumscribe the hon. member in what he has to say. However, I do not think the hon. member for Vancouver East referred to an earlier debate. If he did, it was only to a limited extent. I would ask hon. members not to revive the debates which have already taken place.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): To the best of my ability I shall keep within those limits.

It seems to me that as a member from British Columbia I should express my views, because I know I hold a view which is shared by a great many people in my province. The impression has gone out that practically all the people of British Columbia are desirous of the deportation of these Japanese. That is not true, because I hold in my hand clippings from the Vancouver Sun, which is looked upon as a good Liberal paper. In one of these clippings I notice that the members of the Student Christian Movement, from the campus of the university of British Columbia, urge Ottawa to refrain from sending to Japan those Japanese-Canadians who signed up for return but now wish to remain in Canada. The article goes on to say:

> We urge that the government give due consideration to the conditions of perplexity and despair under which many Japanese-Canadians expressed the wish to be sent to Japan.

And here is another extract:

> Six interior locals of the International Woodworkers of America petitioned Ottawa following a week-end meeting in Kamloops. The union thus goes on record as being the first major organization to demand that Japs be allowed to return here permanently, now that the war is over, and enjoy the franchise.
>
> Harold Pritchett, president of the B.C. district, IWA, said his union has many Japanese members in the interior.
>
> The IWA is of the opinion selective service should establish an appeal board to which loyal Japs would have recourse if they want to stay west of the Cascades.
> At present Japanese face deportation to other parts of Canada if they choose to remain in this country.

I should like to make myself quite clear that I hold no brief for the Japanese in Japan, not even for their god-emperor Hirohito. I believe that war criminals must be punished, in whatever country they may be found. But I have great love for justice, and all that I would ask hon. members to keep in mind is that justice should be done.

I came to Canada forty years ago, in the spring of 1905. One of the things that influenced me in choosing Canada as my future home was the fact that it was under the union jack, a flag that has always stood for justice. Hon. members in the debate on the flag spoke strongly and pleaded that nothing should be done now that would jeopardize national unity. Yet I feel that if this question of the Japanese is not handled very wisely it will have a definite effect on empire unity in the days ahead.

I believe that in the past Canada has not acted clearly or wisely so far as racial minorities are concerned. I believe it was in 1914 when we had in Canada what was known as the Komagato Maru question. A Japanese vessel of that name came into Burrard inlet loaded with Hindu men and women seeking entry into Canada. They were refused admission, and the vessel sailed back with that load of people. Remember, these were men and women migrating from one part of the British empire to another. They came to Canada from a country under the union jack. Then sometimes we wonder why to-day India is so antagonistic to the British empire.

Speaking of racial prejudice, we have had a lot of that in British Columbia. I know that for some years, coloured people were refused admission to the Crystal swimming pool in the city of Vancouver, but I am glad to see in the issue of the Vancouver Sun of November 8 that the Vancouver parks board have decided to lift the colour ban. That is all to the good, but what is not so good is the fact that the Ottawa Evening Citizen of Friday, November 15, tells of the colour ban being applied in Toronto "the good". Let me read this article:

> A Toronto negro, tears in his eyes, told the city board of control to-day that his fifteen-year old son had been refused admission to an ice rink in North Toronto. The negro, Harry Garrey, concluded with an apology for "taking up your valuable time."
>
> "I don't know that we have any work more important than trying to overcome things like this," Mayor Robert Saunders told Garrey. "We assure you this matter will be investigated."
> The control board was told by Alderman Norman Freed that young Garrey and five of his white school friends purchased entrance tickets at the rink and when filing through the turnstile to the ice surface the negro lad was told by the manager: "Sorry, no coloured boys allowed here." The other five refused to enter and left the rink with young Garrey.

I know that the situation has now changed considerably with regard to the Japanese people. As a member from British Columbia I have always resented the fact that this question has been allowed to become a provincial one. It should always have been considered as a matter to be decided by the federal authorities. I personally have accepted the Prime Minister's statement of August 4, 1944, as a statesmanlike solution of this problem. I agree with him that not another Japanese should be allowed to come into Canada. I agree with him that those who are in Canada and who are to be allowed to remain should come before a quasi-judicial board so that their loyalty may be proved, and that those who remain in Canada should be distributed among the various provinces of this dominion. I submit that British Columbia should be willing to take her share of these people, but the other provinces should also stand their share of this particular burden. Oftentimes the impression is left that none of these people are any good. I should like to read a letter from a soldier which appeared under the date line of Esquimalt, British Columbia. It reads:

Lance-Corporal Stewart Ganton of Prince George, who arrived here with other repatriates from Hong Kong, declared that "there was a good Jap in Hong Kong—and he came from Vancouver."

Mr. REID: May I ask the hon. member what newspaper he is reading from?

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): The New Canadian.

The report stated that Ganton, who was in auxiliary hospital when Hong Kong fell, said the man was formerly of Vancouver who had worked in a city lumber mill.

"He served as interpreter. He liked Canada and apparently had been given what he thought was good treatment over here. So he tried to do the same for us, such as giving us cigarettes," he said.

A few weeks ago I had the privilege of attending a meeting in a church here in Ottawa and listening to Captain U. Laite, a chaplain of the United church who had been released from Hong Kong, recounting some of his experiences in that captured city. He spoke most kindly of some of the Christian Japanese and related their kindnesses to himself and other prisoners in their care. A few weeks ago the hon. member for Fort William said that this is a great time for some forgiving. I would reiterate that statement and repeat that it is a great time for some forgiving. Punish the criminals in Japan. By all means. They have asked for it; they must take it and like it. Punish the criminals in Europe also for that matter, but do not let us punish innocent and helpless people here in Canada and then call it an expression of patriotism. Just before Nurse Cavell faced the firing squad during the first great war for her work in assisting British prisoners to escape, she is reported to have said, "Patriotism is not enough." There is a feeling that goes deeper than patriotism, and I believe that we here in Canada should try to follow the greatest of Christian principles:

Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them.

During a previous debate the hon. member for New Westminster asked if we would be willing to allow the soldiers who had been released from Hong Kong to settle this matter of the Japanese. To that question I would say, "no." We in Canada have never been willing to allow any section of the people to settle our national problems. I believe that is a matter for the parliament of Canada to settle and not the soldiers alone. When we start looking back over what happened at Hong Kong we realize that there are two sides. I hold in my hand an editorial which appeared in the Vancouver Sun entitled, "The Blackest Page." It reads:

"We were shipped into a trap. It was a mess."

In fewest words, Private Harry Gyselman, of Winnipeg, summarizes the 1941 Hong Kong fiasco. Lack of equipment and too little of everything, men and munitions, spelled defeat even before the arrival of the ill-fated expedition.

The fact that the Japanese would probably have won anyway does not excuse our failure. Why the Canadian high command handled the situation so badly has never been explained.

It will be remembered that the men were here in Vancouver ready to sail, but their heavier equipment was still on its way from eastern Canada, stranded in half a dozen places. There were empty holds in the troopship. General Alexander—

The CHAIRMAN: I must inform the hon. member that this has nothing to do with the estimate under discussion.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay West): It was stated previously that the soldiers should be allowed to settle this matter of the Japanese. I would ask to be allowed to finish this and then I am through.

The CHAIRMAN: The discussion must be confined to the estimate before the committee.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay West): Then I can only say that it is the truth that hurts.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member who has just taken his seat has made a reference which might be misinterpreted and misconstrued and do a great deal of harm if it were not corrected. During the course of his remarks he has referred to the treatment given by Canada to British subjects from other parts of the empire. He referred to the Komagato Maru which arrived off the coast of British Columbia in 1914 with a large number of the subjects of India aboard and which was sent back to India without its passengers being permitted to land. It was sent back to India without these persons being permitted to land.

My hon. friend has left the impression that Canada was not treating honourably and properly subjects from another part of the British empire. May I say to him that I used to know a good deal about matters of the kind because at one time I investigated under royal commission in the province of British Columbia the whole question of immigration from the orient, and subsequently I was sent by Sir Wilfrid Laurier to see Lord Morley in London when he was Secretary of State for India to seek to arrange with him a plan that would avoid anything that could look like discrimination so far as these British subjects of India are concerned. Later I went to India and dealt with this matter with the government of India, and the government of India took the position that Indians under their own law should not be permitted to be taken under indenture to other parts of the British empire—the question came up first in relation to South Africa—and there be exploited by contractors who were responsible for bringing them to other parts of the empire.

In order to keep persons from coming here who were going to become public charges, our law required that anyone who had not a contract of employment or someone responsible for him should have in his possession the sum of at least two hundred dollars, I think it was. None of these men aboard that ship would have been eligible to enter Canada under our Immigration Act, and to the extent they were under indenture, they would be coming to Canada in violation of the laws of India. Far from there being any effort on Canada's part to discriminate against people from another part of the Brtish empire there was an effort on Canada's part to see that the laws both of Canada and of India were observed in a manner which would avoid conflicts of that kind.

May I say that the arrangements made at that time, as long ago as 1908 or 1909 have stood from that day to this, and have helped to lessen what otherwise might have raised a very serious difficulty in our relations with the great empire of India.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Was as much publicity given to the solution of that difficulty at that particular time as has been given to this?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say that if my hon. friend had been following matters as closely at that time as he is to-day he would have seen that full publicity was given to it. May I say that I made a report for the government of the day on the whole question of immigration from India. The report exists and is on the files of the Department of Labour and will be found in the sessional papers in the library of parliament. If my hon. friend looks at it he will find that the report covers the very points mentioned to-night. The report was tabled in this House of Commons at that time, and received much publicity at the time.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Mr. Chairman, I make no apology for holding up the committee at this stage on a matter of fundamental importance to democracy. I want to be absolutely clear in my own mind that I am right before I proceed. The matter has been explained to me, and I think I grasped the gist of it, and I am going to speak on it now. I have no argument against P.C. 7355 or against P.C. 7357; my argument is against P.C. 7356. I do not know why it was brought down so late in the session. The Prime Minister and the committee know that the matter of Japanese Canadians has been exciting interest all over this country, and to bring it down on almost the last day of the session is not fair to this parliament. As I understand it,, every Canadian citizen of Japanese descent who did not apply for cancellation of his repatriation request before the 2nd of September of this year is going to be deported. It that right.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad that my hon. friend has brought the matter up anew. May I make the situation perfectly clear?

There were certain naturalized Japanese who, when Japan was doing its utmost to destroy the British empire asked to be returned to Japan. When we were fighting Japan these naturalized Japanese wanted to go back to the enemy country. What the government said was that any man who in time of war wished to go back to the enemy must have believed pretty strongly at the time that the enemy was going to win and wanted to be with them; he was more anxious to be with them than to remain here in Canada. The government's position is this, that anyone who has shown that spirit and that sort of attitude deserves to have his naturalization revoked, and these people are having their naturalization revoked for that reason.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I am sorry I disagree with the Prime Minister. He assumes, as did the Minister of Labour and others, that because the signers of these repatriation requests put their names to these forms, they were all disloyal. That is a non sequitur. It does not necessarily follow because, despite statements made to the effect that coercion was not used, I say coercion was used.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let me state—

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Wait until I have finished. Coercion is not a matter of sticks or bludgeons or clubs.

Mr. CHEVRIER: You are using sticks and bludgeons now.

Mr. MITCHELL: I say without equivocation—

Mr. REID: Say it strongly, too.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am an old country man like my hon. friend, and proud of it, and I know something of the traditions of our people. To say that coercion was used is not a statement of fact, and I say that with all the emphasis of which I am capable. As a matter of fact, the whole thing was looked over by the International Red Cross, which vindicated the position that the Canadian government took. I do not know of any better agency than that. What I get a little tired of is some people trotting out their consciences like a lavaliere worn around a woman's neck. I do not take second place to my hon. friend or anybody else in acting decently toward other people, irrespective of their race or colour or creed. May I say this to my hon. friend—

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): If you are asking a question, all right. If you are making a speech, I have the floor.

Mr. MITCHELL: Well, I am just about fed up with—

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): You will be more fed up after I am through with you.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let me put it clearly to my hon. friend as I did to the hon. member for Kootenay East. When a nation has its back to the wall—

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, is the hon. gentleman asking a question or not?

The CHAIRMAN: I understood that he was to put a question, but if the hon. member for Winnipeg North does not desire a question to be put, he has the floor.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I am willing to have a question asked, but not to have the minister make a speech in the midst of mine.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Winnipeg North.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I have here the Winnipeg Free Press, which is not notoriously unsympathetic to this government, and on the 19th of September of this year it had an editorial headed "We will regret Racialism". The editorial says in part:

> A government spokesman has said that if it can be shown that a Japanese Canadian refuses to move out of British Columbia this may be counted against him.

What is that but mental coercion? There is more than one kind of coercion, I should like the hon. gentleman to understand.

We have had several policies in this matter in the last few years, two or three of them deplorable. We had the policy of the Prime Minister of the 4th of August last year; we had the policy of the Minister of Veterans Affairs last September, which was iniquitous; we had the policy of the Minister of Labour some time ago; and now we have certain amendments made by the Prime Minister to that policy to-night. I assume that the orders in council tabled fit in pretty well with a statement which was in the Ottawa Citizen of November 24, in a story by Mr. H. R Hardy that Arthur MacNamara, deputy minister of labour, stated the previous day that preparations to expatriate ten thousand Japanese were being rushed just as fast as possible. The Prime Minister now comes to the conclusion that these people were enemies of the country, but when he spoke on this matter on August 4 of last year he had to admit that not one of them had committed an act of sabotage against Canada.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): They did not get the chance.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): They had plenty of chances. I should like to know why it is that the Japanese are being singled out, why the same action is not being taken against the Germans and against the Italians.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that if there was a naturalized citizen of Canada who had been a German national and he wanted to go back to join the Germans instead of remaining in Canada, I for my part would have done all I could to see that his naturalization was revoked.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I doubt very much whether these citizens who signed these forms did so willingly, knowing how far this Liberal government would go.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Call your evidence.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I have quoted the Prime Minister. I think the committee know the speech. These people were coerced.

Mr. MITCHELL: They backed the wrong horse; that is all.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I quoted the Winnipeg Free Press, and if the government has any greater friend I should like to know who it is.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope my hon. friend will make it perfectly clear that we are talking about naturalized persons, men who were accorded by this country the privilege of being naturalized, and while the war was on signed a document to the effect that they wished to go back to Japan, which was fighting this country at that time. I say that is prima facie evidence that their naturalization should be revoked.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Were naturalized Germans and Italians asked to sign similar documents? They were not asked to do the same thing at all. I want to remind the Prime Minister of a statement which he made in Winnipeg. He said that any man who lends his voice or his pen to the stirring up of racial and religious strife is an enemy of mankind.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I suggest that he has some of those men sitting behind him to-night.

Mr. REID: Name them.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): The hon. member for New Westminster is one of the worst.

Mr. REID: You are raising up hatred of class against class, and you know it.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I am raising no hatred. I am pointing out what kind of Liberal government—

Mr. REID: You can't tell me.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I will tell you; I will tell you again.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. May I remind all members of the committee that all remarks must be directed to the Chairman. The hon. member for Winnipeg North.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I should just like to read this statement of policy by the Minister of Veterans Affairs, in direct contradiction to the policy of the Prime Minister as it was announced last year. The minister said, on September 19, 1944:

> Not a single Japanese from the Rockies to the sea.

One can imagine him airing his Highland rhetoric, as he goes on—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Take them into Manitoba, if you want them.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): The minister said:

> I ask my fellow-citizens of Vancouver Centre, and of British Columbia as a whole, to range themselves beside me on this issue and to serve notice of the rest of Canada that we will not have Japanese in this fair province.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is right.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): What an example of racial intolerance from a Liberal!

Mr. MACKENZIE: You speak for your province; I am speaking for mine.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I am telling the minister what I think of him, and it is not very much. I should like to mention this, too. We have been told on more than one occasion that we follow the traditions of Westminster, not always closely, not always exactly the same traditions, but by and large we do; and there is a tradition there about cabinet solidarity. The theory is this, that in a cabinet, where a minority disagrees with a majority, they accept the verdict of that majority, or they are in honour bound to resign.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is not true.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): On the other hand, where a cabinet minister goes out and makes a declaration of policy, unless it is denied, that is the policy of the cabinet.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Where did my hon. friend get the idea that a majority of the cabinet necessarily control?

Mr. MACKENZIE: In the Book of Job.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): How does this government control, except by a majority? That is how it is in control here. I say this, that the policy that is to be carried out as regards these Japanese Canadians is certainly not Liberal.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): It is generous.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): What I would call a Liberal policy would be to have all those who signed their names given an opportunity to revoke their signatures. Where there are those who want to go back to Japan, by all means send them back; where there are those who are proven enemies of Canada, by all means send them back. But every Canadian citizen, be he black, white, or yellow, Catholic or Protestant, believer or unbeliever, should have exactly the same opportunity in this country. To-day we are singling out one particular group as objects of our hatred.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is playing both ends against the middle.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): The democratic principles which the Liberal government are supposed to hold are being shamefully violated.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I tell my hon. friend that I fought an election on that issue and I am here on this side, to the right of the Speaker.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): The hon. member may be here, but that reflects no credit on his constituents.

All I want to say is that I regard this policy as a direct negation of Liberalism and of decent, elemental, fundamental democracy. I will go farther and say this, that in carrying through this policy, in deporting these Canadian citizens of Japanese origin, the Liberal government has merely proven itself to be what many of us have long suspected, an organized hypocrisy.

Mr. MACKENZIE: A government which is in office and in power.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I ask that that term be withdrawn. No hon. member has any right to say that any other hon. member or any government is an organized hypocrisy. Those are words which must be withdrawn.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I will withdraw the words if I am out of order. I should have said, the Liberal party.

Mr. MITCHELL: Statements of that kind are all right on a soapbox, but you cannot make them here.

Mr. HACKETT: I ask the Prime Minister if, in the negotiation of the extradition treaty to which he made reference earlier in the evening, full recourse was had to the information and guidance of the department over which he presides.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it would be correct to say that it was, yes.

Mr. HACKETT: Would the Prime Minister be good enough to say for what reason the treaty was kept a secret or kept away from parliament for three years?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot give my hon. friend the exact reason, but I have had enough experience in watching some of these international negotiations not to be surprised that it took three years. It might have taken four or five. I think the subject itself has been such a complicated one that there has been some delay.

Mr. HACKETT: I am afraid I have not made myself clear. The agreement itself was signed by the high contracting parties on the 29th of April, 1942, and my query is, why was it kept away from parliament during the period which elapsed between the 29th April, 1942 and October, 1945?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot give my hon. friend an answer. I am informed that it was modified once by a protocol. That is all I can say about the—

Mr. HACKETT: It was modified on the 3rd of October of this year. But it would have interfered with so many national undertakings, and with some enterprises in my own constituency, that I have been prompted to be unduly curious about it. I draw to the attention of the Prime Minister that the treaty appears to have been dealt with most expeditiously in the United States. It was signed on April 29, 1942; on May 6, 1942, it was sent by the President to the senate of the United States, the committee on foreign relations dealt with it and made a report in the month of May, 1942. It appears to have been ratified by the senate within a few weeks after it was executed. I am prompted to inquire why Canada delayed in dealing with it. There was nothing in the treaty to be concealed because of the war in which we were engaged. After having seen it, I can understand why there may have been some hesitancy in introducing it into parliament, but I should like to know if there is some high reason for having held it in abeyance away from parliament for such a length of time.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think I can satisfy my hon. friend's curiosity, although I cannot agree with all he has said. He said that the treaty had interfered with the operations of firms in his constituency. It cannot have interfered yet, and it will not interfere with anything done in Canada until it becomes effective, and it will not become effective until instruments of ratification have been exchanged between the high contracting parties. But as to the reason for not bringing it to parliament before this year, the fact is that the protocol had not been arranged before this year. The treaty became public and became the subject of objections as soon as it was signed, and those objections were for a very long time under discussion. It was not until October of this year that the protocol was arranged to restrict its application when it did become effective; and after that protocol had been arranged, both the treaty and the protocol were brought to the houses of parliament for their consideration before the government would undertake to exchange instruments of ratification. When it was brought to this house it was referred to the committee on external affairs. Many of the objections that had been urged against the treaty in its original form were repeated against the treaty as modified by the protocol. The committee on external affairs has reported the evidence and has recommended that both the treaty and the protocol be reconsidered. There has not yet been time to give consideration to that recommendation of the committee on external affairs. Until there has been time to give consideration to that recommendation of the committee, and also to the evidence that was adduced, there will certainly not be any exchange of instruments of ratification, and I would be very much surprised if it did not again come before the committee on external affairs before the government undertook to make the exchange of instruments of ratification.

Mr. HACKETT: I wish to tell the minister that if I said that the treaty had interfered with enterprise in my constituency I said something I did not intend to say, and I do not think I did say it. I said that the treaty was in such terms that, were it ratified in the form in which it now stands, it would have that effect. I should like to make this suggestion to the minister. I understood from the Prime Minister that all the resources of the department had been called into play in the negotiation of the treaty. If that be true, may I, with the utmost respect for the department, suggest that they go a little outside it for inspiration when the document is being redrafted, if it be redrafted, because it is quite evident that those who dealt with the matter were neophytes who had never had anything to do with extradition and were possibly not very much interested in it. I suggest, therefore, that when the matter is taken up afresh, the usual care of the department be exercised in availing itself of all help that can be had to make a treaty which will be in the general interests of Canada.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): May I ask the Prime Minister a question with regard to the basis on which the number and character of our representatives in different foreign countries are determined. I have in my hand a white paper entitled, "Canadian Representatives Abroad", dated October 1, 1945, and it seems to include both diplomatic and trade representatives. On what basis is our representation determined? Is it on the extent of business generally, or perhaps business anticipated, or the nature and importance of our diplomatic relationship with the respective countries? The reason for the question is that I do not find it immediately apparent why our representation as set out in this document is as it is. For instance, we have one representative in India, a trade commissioner; one representative in Luxembourg, a minister; one in Greenland who is a vice consul; four representatives in Peru, all of whom are diplomatic; twelve representatives in France, who are apparently all diplomatic, although one or two are referred to as commercial attachés, none of them being referred to as trade-commissioners; five diplomatic representatives and three trade commissioners in Australia; in Brazil five representatives; diplomatic, and no trade commissioners. In Sweden we have no trade representatives at all, although we have in Norway. It is not immediately apparent on what basis we selected these. Some of the results seem surprising, and it is a matter of interest to me, and as a matter of public interest I wonder if the Prime Minister would be good enough to explain the basis on which representation abroad is determined.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A variety of considerations have governed in this matter. As my hon. friend is aware, prior to the war certain legations were opened. Some of them have since become embassies. They were opened in a limited number of countries, but during the war a large number of representatives of other countries came to reside in Canada, and, where opportunity was afforded, the government gave assurances that when the appropriate time came we would reciprocate in the matter of representation. That would account for some of the countries to which representatives have not yet been appointed where they otherwise would have been appointed. In connection with each mission I think there has usually been some special reason why that appointment was made at the particular time it was. The government has not found it possible to have missions in all countries. We hope we will have them by degrees, but during the war many who would have been excellent persons to represent Canada in different missions were not available; they were serving overseas, and we have been waiting until the war was over in the hope that out of the numbers who served abroad there would be found good candidates for our diplomatic service. The aim of the government is to have representation in all important countries, but it will take time and we have to deal with these matters as circumstances will permit. Take the case of India, which my hon. friend has mentioned. For some time we have been seeking to make an appointment of a high commissioner to India. I think we should have a high commissioner there but it is much better, I am sure my hon. friend will agree, to defer making an appointment until the most suitable person is available.

I agree it is anomalous that in certain of these countries there should be a larger representation than in others; but as I have said, in many cases representatives have been appointed because of special considerations which it was necessary to take into account at a particular time. With regard to the trade commissioners I may say that in posts where we have diplomatic missions they are listed as commercial attachés. If my hon. friend would ask questions as to any particular representation I would seek to give him a word of explanation. I would make clear that the problem the Department of External Affairs has faced in all these matters of representation is one that has been very hard to solve owing to the extreme difficulty of securing a sufficient number of suitable persons during the period of the war. Perhaps my hon. friend will agree with me that the question of representation is one that might appropriately be discussed by the committee on external affairs. Perhaps the committee could deal with questions of that kind more effectively than they could be dealt with on the floor of parliament.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I do not want to press the matter, but I should like to ask one supplementary question. Let us take France, for example; and this raises the whole question of the relative importance of our diplomatic and trade representation. I noted what the Prime Minister said about the commercial secretaries. In France, as far as I can understand, out of twelve people there is only one whose designation suggests that he has anything to do with trade; and by the way I notice there are two newspaper men. I wonder if the Prime Minister would answer this question. What is our objective in a country like France, for example? What do we aim at in the way of relative strength as between commercial representatives and diplomatic representatives? I can quite understand that it has not been possible to cover the whole situation, but will the Prime Minister say a word as to what are the relative objectives, because at the moment it would appear that the commercial side is away under represented?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With regard to the commercial side, as my hon. friend is aware the situation in regard to trade between France and Canada is still far from normal at present. As business opportunities develop, we would certainly expect to have a larger commercial representation than we have at the present time.

Mr. JAQUES: As a member of the committee on external affairs I should like to make a few remarks; but before doing so, I wish to take this opportunity of saying a word of welcome to the Prime Minister on his return from his travels. We have not seen very much of him in the house this session. I can only hope that we shall see more of him next session, and certainly that the external affairs estimates will come up before the last day of the session.

I wish to make a few remarks about a country that is very much in the news these days; and, since the question is a thorny one, I intend to follow my notes pretty closely. We read and hear a good deal about Palestine, not only in the press and on the air but at organized public dinners and meetings. I have no brief for either Arabs or Jews, but it seems to me that the public hears only the Zionist arguments, never the Arab side of the question. As I have said, I have no brief for either side; my sole concern is to establish the truth, for just as truth and freedom are indivisible, so mutual faith in the given word is the basis of friendship, individual and international. Once that faith is destroyed or even impaired, trust and friendship turn to suspicion and hatred. But instead of historic fact, the Zionists base their case on racial, cultural and commercial superiority. These claims on behalf of a favoured nation and a chosen people are upheld especially by leftists and internationalists, by the very people who denounce racism and nationalism. They also are the people who claim especially to be the world's peacemakers but who, in the face of continued and fatal rioting in Palestine, are going out of their way to embarrass Great Britain in her efforts to maintain peace by encouraging tolerance by both Arab and Jew. Some time early in the session I received a pamphlet issued by the Canadian-Palestine committee. In answer to that, I wrote the director of that committee for a little more information, and received this letter from Mr. Herbert Mowat, executive director of the Canadian-Palestine committee:

Dear Sir:

Your letter of October 25 greeted me on my return to Toronto . . . and I wish to make the following comments.

The Arab population of the middle east totals 16,000,000, not 60,000,000, and the position of Iraq, Iran, Lebanon, Syria, Saudi Arabia and Egypt is the same in respect to Palestine as is that of Canada—membership in the united nations which is the official authority in regard to the disposition of Palestine. If the Arabs fight a united nations decison on Palestine it is apparent that they have forfeited their place of good standing in this world organization. Our committee represents the united nations point of view and technique in respect to Palestine. If the Arabs fight what the world agrees should be done about Palestine they fly in the face of world law and order and, so far as the united nations organization is concerned they are outlaws and as such are subject to military measures to be taken by the security council of the united nations, a body which Canada is bound to support in whatever action it takes according to the unanimous adoption of the united nations charter which took place in our Canadian House of Commons and Canadian Senate not long ago. Whatever responsibility rests on Canada through membership in the united nations organization accruing from the situation in Palestine our committee believes should be accepted.

I do not think Arab threats directed at Great Britain, the United States and other members of the united nations organization should be taken too seriously. They are a species of blackmail from a primitive people by which they have profited in gold and various concessions in the past. Threats of violence have been the Arabs' most profitable stock in trade. How much longer are the great powers going to appease them? There is no doubt that a policy on Palestine agreed upon by the United States, Great Britain, and the other united nations will be one to which the Arabs will be forced to adjust themselves. Such adjustment will be achieved with great benefit to the Palestinian Arabs; this has been substantiated clearly in the experience of the Jewish national home project up to now. Our committee believes that the broad humanitarianism which motivates the Jewish national home project in Palestine on the part of both Jews and non-Jews will ultimately vindicate itself by incontestable benefits to both Arabs and Jews in Palestine.

Yours sincerely,
H. A. Mowat.

I maintain that this reply by the Canadian-Palestine committee not only is prejudiced and one-sided, but is not even a true statement of facts, as I shall show. The contemptuous and dictatorial tone adopted by this committee toward the Arab people exhibits an evident and biased partisanship which, in the end, will not advance their cause. The statement shows clearly that the united nations organization is to be regarded as an instrument for clubbing the small states, and of power politics.

Let me refer briefly to the history of the Arab-Zionist question and the Palestinian problem. In the first place, the Arabs have made Palestine their own home for thousands of years, continuously for the past thirteen centuries. However, I shall not refer to anything that happened before the first world war.

Early in 1915 Great Britain needed the help of the Arabs to defend the Suez canal from the German-led Turkish forces; and therefore, on behalf of the British government, Sir Henry McMahon began to netotiate with the Arab leaders. In May, 1915, the Arabs stated their conditions for their aid against the Turks. Their terms were the recognition by Great Britain of Arab independence within certain boundaries. I will not go into detail, but a main point in the dispute is whether Palestine was included in the Arab territory.

The whole situation is complicated by secret pledges and treaties; that is, subsequent agreements which, unknown to the Arabs, were concluded between the great powers: for instance, the Sykes-Picot agreement signed in London in May, 1916. This deals with the disposal of the former Turkish empire between Great Britain, France and Russia. This agreement was made six months after the last note exchanged between Sir Henry McMahon and the Arab leaders. By this agreement, under Zionist pressure, Great Britain broke her pledge for Arab independence.

Next came the Balfour declaration of November, 1917, which reads:

His Majesty's government views with favour the establishment in Palestine of a national home for Jewish people and will use their best endeavours to facilitate the achievement of this object, it being clearly understood that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine, or the rights and political status enjoyed by Jews in any other country.

The confusions and misunderstandings of the Palestine question mainly are due to the different interpretations to be put upon the phrase "National home in Palestine". For the political Zionist and for a great many of their leftist fellow travellers and agents a national home has come to mean a national state, with or without consent of the Arabs. Cultural zionism had been spreading slowly in Palestine even before the present century Probably a Jewish national home is supported by some, though not by a majority of the Arabs. But all of them are opposed to a Jewish state in Palestine.

Confidence in the great powers by the Arab leaders, already shaken by a long chain of broken promises and pledges finally was lost by the decision of the supreme council at St. Remo in 1920, which placed all the Arab territory between the Mediterranean and Persia under mandate to Great Britain and France.

In 1922 the United States congress passed the following resolution:

> That the United States favours the establishment in Palestine of a national home for Jewish people, it being clearly understood that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of Christians and all other non-Jewish communities in Palestine shall be adequately protected.

Since 1921, there have been from time to time serious troubles in Palestine which have resulted in the publishing of general white papers, the most important of which was issued in May, 1939. In this the British government proposed that within ten years an independent state be created in Palestine, but it limited Jewish immigration into Palestine to 75,000 for the next five years. After that date Arab consent would be necessary for further immigration; and it provided that land purchased by Jews would be prohibited in some districts and restricted in others.

Zionists and their henchmen in Great Britain, Canada and the United States have maintained terrific propaganda and political pressure to open the doors of Palestine to the fullest possible extent, so that ultimately it may become a free Jewish commonwealth.

In 1920 the Jews formed eight per cent of the people of Palestine. In 1943 they comprised thirty-three per cent, while the rapid development of political zionism and its growing power naturally increased the anxiety of the Arab people.

To sum up:

1. The Zionists claim Palestine is their own, on historical and religious grounds. So do the Arabs, who have been there for many centuries, while the Jews left in A.D. 71. To three hundred millions of Molsems Palestine is a holy land. A Moslem family has been entrusted with the keys of the holy sepulchre for several generations.

2. Zionists claim that the Arabs benefit from the colonization of Palestine. Sir John Hope Simpson's report states:

> It ceases to be land from which the Arab can gain any advantage whether now or at any other time in the future. He is deprived forever from employment on that land, nor can any one help him by buying the land and restoring it to common use. The land is in mortmain and inalienable.

3. Zionists claim they brought the benefits of civilization to the Arabs of Palestine.

Arabs have not benefited from Jewish education, since the language in Jewish schools is Hebrew. And as to medical facilities, Arabs do not frequent Zionist hospitals. According to the latest report to the league of nations, out of 12,000 patients admitted to Zionist hospitals, only four were Moslems; seven were Christians; nearly 12,000 were Jews.

4. Zionists claim that by industrialization Palestine can support a large Jewish population. Facts are that industry in Palestine is supported by charity and discriminatory tariffs. But the real issue cannot be settled on a material basis. The fundamental question is one of freedom. According to the Atlantic charter we agreed, first, to seek no territorial changes that do not accord with the freely expressed wishes of the people concerned and, second, to see sovereign rights and self-government restored to those who have been forcibly deprived of them. It may be replied that the Atlantic charter does not apply to Palestine, but in a letter to King Ibn Saud, dated April 5, 1945, President Roosevelt stated:

> Your Majesty will also doubtless recall that during our recent conversation I assured you that I would take no action in my capacity as chief of the executive branch of this government which might prove hostile to the Arab people.

President Truman, in his speech on navy day, October 27, 1945, said:

> We believe that all peoples who are prepared for self-government should be permitted to choose their own form of government by their own freely expressed choice, without interference from any foreign source. That is true in Europe, in Asia, in Africa, as well as in the western hemisphere.

The story of Palestine is one of broken promises and secret agreements by the great powers—of power politics. The late Colonel T. E. Lawrence—Lawrence of Arabia—whose actions and writings prove him to have been a very great and brilliant Englishman, and an honourable man, led the Arab revolt against the Turks in the first great war. When he heard of the broken pledges to the Arabs he refused all the honours offered by his country, enlisted in the ranks and finally committed suicide.

I submit that the Pax Britannica was maintained by faith in British pledges and that Palestine is a graveyard of that peace. Certainly those who are working hardest for Britain's downfall are to be found among the Zionists, their agents and communist cousins.

Mr. WARREN: I submit that on other occasions it has been ruled that members are not permitted to read speeches.

Mr. JAQUES: I stated at the beginning that I was dealing with a thorny subject. If my speech does not please the hon. member, may I suggest that he just go to the other side of the curtains.

The CHAIRMAN: It is not a question of whether or not the speech pleases another hon. member; the only question is whether or not the hon. member is in order.

Mr. JAQUES: I will recall my remark and regret that I made it.

In regard to the objection that has just been raised, I may say that I have been here for ten years, and I do not think any one has ever accused me before of reading a speech. I do not think there are many hon. members who can say that.

The CHAIRMAN: I did not rule that the hon. member was reading his speech.

Mr. JAQUES: Thank you very much. Principles have been sacrificed for expediency, for which we have broken faith with our friends and faithful allies, such as the Poles, the Yugoslavs and the Arabs in Europe, Asia and Africa.

Quite recently it was reported that the national leader of the C.C.F. at a public meeting in Washington, "urged the immediate opening of Palestine for Jewish immigration to the fullest possible extent so as to provide a refuge from the terror of their persecutors." In the light of the present critical conditions in Palestine, I would ask the leader of the C.C.F.: Can he assure us in making those demands that he is promoting the interests of world peace? Does he realize that such demands are calculated to embarrass Great Britain and if insisted on may lead to a clash of interests between the British empire, the United States of America and the U.S.S.R.? In the event of war in Palestine and the near east, is he prepared to commit Canadians to active service in such a war? If not, whom would he expect to fight it? The nazis having been destroyed, from what persecutors and terrors does he seek refuge?

About a year ago the C.C.F. leaders were denouncing Great Britain's efforts to protect Greek civilians from communist terrorists, and now they are hindering her efforts to protect Palestinian civilians from Zionist extremists. To show the extent of the propaganda that is being used, may I quote from a pamphlet which was recently sent to me by a business friend in Toronto who told me that he found it pinned to an invoice which he received from another business man. I shall not read the whole thing, but I should like to make one or two quotations. It is headed "Pretend You're a Jew" and reads:

Offhand would you say Jews are entitled to a break now? You say without reservation that these three million surviving Europen Jews deserve to be left alive.

But (and here's where your non-Jewish neighbours are amazed to hear about it), England doesn't think so. England thinks they ought to die as fast as possible. And England is seeing to it that they may really die as fast as possible.

And further down:

England's new Labour government is still barring Palestine to the Jews. And the Jews are desperate. The European Jews are desperate to get in. The Palestine Jews are desperate to get them in.

So there's friction. Friction between Palestine's Jews and the English authorities. Only the English colonial office, being good publicity men, are careful to tell the world that the trouble is between the Jews and the Arabs and that the English are just the poor referee.

And England keeps sending troops into Palestine, and it's not for the troops' health either. She even goes so far as to transport one hundred thousand anti-Russian and anti-Jewish Poles to Palestine. These Poles are afraid to go back to Poland, and England sends them to Palestine instead of to Canada or Australia or New Zealand. England is fixing to have plenty of man-power to quell any revolt of the Jews.

But whether you're interested in more of the story or not, just bear it all in mind when you see those little stickers that the undersigned has been putting on his business correspondence.

And the sticker reads:

As proud and self-respecting Canadians we will buy no goods made in England as long as England bars the Jews from Palestine.

That statement is signed and the name and address of the writer is given. I do not know that I should advertise the author but, if the committee wishes, I will give his name and address.

Mr. PROBE: Certainly; give them the works.

Mr. JAQUES: It is signed by I. M. Gringorten; the address is 272 Van Horne street, Toronto, and it is dated October 1, 1945. You may say that that is an irresponsible individual, but here is a statement that was recently made by Doctor Stephen Wise, president of the World Jewish Congress in a national radio address in the United States. He charged:

The anti-Jewish riots in Tripoli were instigated by the Arab league under the leadership of reprehensible underlings of the British colonial office.

That statement was made by the president of the World Jewish Congress, and these statements are being made to inflame the feelings of millions of people in America and elsewhere, who thus are being taught to become anti-British. There can be no doubt that this biased and misleading propaganda by well-known public men is sowing the seeds of racial, national and religious hatred among people everywhere. Let me quote a statement that was printed in The Statesman of Calcutta on April 13, 1944:

> The shocking twaddle spoken and written by United States publicists and the press about Palestine contains more than one danger . . .
> The more the strongest and more democratic existing nation undertakes permanent responsibilities on peace-loving men's behalf outside the American continent the better we shall be pleased. But if that happens there is already danger that it will have initially to contend with widespread Muslim suspicion.
> Owing to American propaganda about the Palestine problems, which is presumed to reflect American general opinion, many Muslims now suppose the U.S.A. to be anti-Islamic. For that reason comments such as have recently come from the U.S.A. on the very delicate and complex problem of Palestine which excites Muslim interest everywhere appear to us to be deplorable.

That statement is from the Calcutta Statesman. There is another curious side of this question, which is presented by Doctor Charles Watson, of the American university of Cairo. He wrote in April, 1944:

> The reason given for the disturbances at this time is that as soon as Europe is open to a return of now exiled Jews, there will be a mass exodus of Jews from Palestine back to their homes in Europe which will weaken seriously the Zionist cause and support. The time to strike is therefore now.

In the "Reader's Digest" of May, 1944, Frederick C. Painton stated:

> The Jewish agency people fear that the skilled refugees who make many of these products (exhibited in Tel Aviv) will return to their native lands when the war is over. The Czech Jews were being absorbed in their nation until the war—they knew no persecution. They look upon themselves as Czechs, not Jews, and want to go home. The Dutch diamond cutter intends to go home to Holland. Strangely enough, scores of the German Jews want to go back to Germany. This failure to sink roots deeply applies to American Jews; of 5,500 such in Palestine less than 100 have given up their American passports. The other Jews in Palestine know this and fear it and it is one reason why the extremists are making the trouble now. Many leading Jews told me they feared they would lose their main argument at war's end by having more emigrants than immigrants.

According to these Zionists the non-Jewish inhabitants have not been injured; they have been benefited. But it is curious that the lucky Arabs should be so blind to their own welfare that they resist the gifts and benefits which the Zionists and their agents of this Palestine committee are so anxious to bestow, even by force if necessary. How would we Canadians appreciate a few million aliens being forced upon us who thereupon proceeded to buy up our land, with the proviso that no Canadian ever again could own the land or even work on it. Would we be primitive and guilty of blackmail if we resisted such an invasion?

The CHAIRMAN: I must remind the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. JAQUES: I have just three lines more, Mr. Chairman. Had we known that the united nations would force us to accept such terms, would we have ratified the united nations charter? Let me repeat, my whole object is to establish the truth and so to promote world peace based on international good faith in international promises.

Mr. McLURE: After all these $64 questions put to the Prime Minister, I have but one simple question to put to him. I would ask the Prime Minister, as Minister of External Affairs, this question. I have four personal friends, now good citizens of Canada and good taxpayers in Canada, who owned considerable property in Berlin and who have the deeds to that property at the present time. They have asked me to find out how they can proceed to get recompense for their property taken from them by Hitler. I have written to the Department of External Affairs but have not yet received an answer. I know that the hon. Minister for External Affairs can advise me so that I can advise these people.

The CHAIRMAN: I must remind the hon. member that we are dealing with the Department of External Affairs. I believe the matter to which he refers comes under the Department of the Secretary of State.

Mr. McLURE: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say, Mr. Chairman, that it would be possible for the friends of my hon. friend to file their claims with the Department of External Affairs, and action would be taken on their claims in accordance with the procedure which is being arranged at the present time.

May I answer the hon. member for Wetaskiwin on his question respecting the Arabs in Palestine? It may be that he has served his own purpose better by giving us a speech than by putting any question to which I could reply. But in regard to this question of Palestine, I would say it was, when I was in England, as burning as any other issue which was being considered by the British government. As my hon. friend knows, the British government invited the government of the United States to join with them in appointing a committee of inquiry into the whole question. The government of the United States agreed to accept the invitation of the British government and a committee of inquiry was appointed. I believe that on the 10th of this month the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom announced the personnel of that committee. I could give my hon. friend and the committee a statement of the matters which they have been authorized to examine, but I do not think I need take up time in doing it at this hour of the day. They are comprehensive and they cover, I think, all that is uppermost in the minds of those who are greatly concerned about this question. I take it that the peoples of this continent and of Great Britain feel that the right procedure has been adopted in having the whole matter gone into by this joint Anglo-American committee, which will report, I believe, very soon.

Mr. JAQUES: I thank the Prime Minister for his reply. I only wish to say that my purpose was to do what little I could to expose the activities of certain organizations which are handicapping the efforts of people of good will, like the governments of the United States and of Great Britain, to promote good feeling and peace in Palestine and elsewhere.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I am not going to refer to what the hon. member for Wetaskiwin said, for the simple reason that, were I to do so, I might imply that he should be taken seriously, and that would be regrettable. What I wish to do is to advance another suggestion to the government, for which I hope to get a more tolerant acceptance than the last one I made. The situation in the Argentine to-day is one which must cause alarm to many people. We see arising in that country what is nothing less than a fascist dictatorship. This is not the time to appease fascism. We have learned our lesson, I hope, from the past. There are hundreds of thousands of loyal democrats in the Argentine who are looking northward for help and for some inspiration; and I would suggest to the Prime Minister that, if we occupy the position we say we do, that of a leader among the middle powers, we should realize the responsibility which goes with it and should show our condemnation of what is happening in the Argentine by withdrawing from that country our ambassador.

Mr. ADAMSON: Before this item carries, I feel that, as a member of the committee of external affairs and as a member of the steering committee which drew the report that was finally adopted by the whole committee and presented to this house, and which report was unfavourable to the ratification of the treaty and protocol and recommended that it be reconsidered, I should at this time give briefly some of the reasons why both committees came to their conclusions.

The conclusions the committee came to were, I think, based on four fundamental points. We—and I speak because I do not see any other members of the steering committee here—felt that while an instrument of extradition was essential, the instrument which was presented was so drawn and violated so many fundamental principles that we could not on the face of it recommend its adoption. Basically the principles which the treaty violated were these. First, it did away with the time-honoured and, I believe, historic principle of dual criminality. In other words, extradition could be sought by the requesting country for an offence which was not an offence under the laws of the requested country. A great deal of evidence and a great deal of learned evidence was produced on this matter. It is all in the record, and I do not propose to go into it at this late hour; but I suggest through you, Mr. Chairman, to the high contracting parties that when they redraw this instrument of extradition they should not disregard the basic principle of dual criminality.

The second fundamental point which the committee felt was detrimental to the acceptance of this instrument was that the treaty by its various clauses greatly enlarged the offences for which extradition might be sought, and it not only enlarged the offences which time has brought to mean the offences for which extradition could be sought—that is criminal offences—but it enlarged them to include regulations not brought about by legislative bodies but by committees appointed by legislative bodies, and these regulations were considered to be not in the best interests of this country or the best or even good extradition practice.

The third reason—and this was an important one—was that we were not satisfied that the treaty and protocol as drawn were not ultra vires of this parliament with regard to the rights of property and civil rights as vested in the provinces under the British North America Act. We had a degree of learned opinion on this matter, including the attorney general of British Columbia. I am not myself learned in the law, but I venture to suggest to those whose duty it will be to redraw this instrument that that point be carefully and definitely looked into before the treaty is again presented.

Then—and this is not a legal point; it is perhaps a physical point—we felt that the restrictive clauses which were mentioned in the treaty, subsections 26, 31, 32, article III, article IX and article XII, section 1 of the treaty, would definitely restrict the opening up of our great natural resources. May I suggest to the high contracting parties that this is one of the fundamental economic necessities of the entire North American continent, and if our great natural resources are not expanded to the fullest extent not only we but the republic to the south, that great and friendly nation, will suffer. We specifically refrained from mentioning sovereignty. I believe we realize, as the Prime Minister pointed out this morning when discussing atomic energy, that no question of narrow sovereignty can carry real weight at the present time, and we feel that we should reject any appeal to present this adverse report on the treaty and the protocol on a question of sovereignty. I am not going to speak at length on the individual parts of the treaty, but I would suggest—and the report was a unanimous one—that, when this treaty is redrawn and reconsidered, these fundamental and basic points of international agreement shall not be violated.

Item agreed to.

449. Canada-United States permanent joint board on defence, $2,500.

Mr. GREEN: Will the Prime Minister explain why this vote is so small? Is that the total amount for the board?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This item relates only to incidental travelling expenses.

Mr. GREEN: What is the total vote for the board?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Department of National Defence and the Department of External Affairs meet the general expenses of the board, and this amount is to supplement what has already been provided.

Mr. GREEN: Is there any intention of doing away with the board?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, no.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

Chief architect's branch—Ontario—

255. Dominion public buildings—improvements and repairs, London public building—repointing masonry, painting and repairs (revote $15,000), Ottawa—hydrogenation laboratory for the Department of Mines and Resources (revote), Ottawa—central experimental farm—water tank and pump house, etc. (revote $22,000), $480,000.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What is this item?

[Mr. Adamson.]

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): This is for improvements and repairs to public buildings in Ontario.

Item agreed to.

Chief architect's branch—

551. Public buildings generally—repairs, alterations, fittings and improvements—further amount required, $75,000.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: In the absence of the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) I should like to ask the minister certain questions in regard to Gimli.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Will the hon. member be good enough to wait until we get to item 565, which is for wharf reconstruction and so forth? There is a vote of $10,000 there for Gimli.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Very well.

Item agreed to.

Chief engineer's branch—dredging—

552. Maritime provinces—further amount required, $46,200.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): May I point out the necessity of undertaking dredging at Pugwash. That is a port where no dredging has been done. It is one of the finest ports in all Canada for depth of water, but it requires some dredging to straighten the channel, which is just a natural channel, in order to take larger steamers. At the present time it is able to take steamers with a draft of about twenty-one or twenty-two feet, which are the 4,700-ton boats; it will not take the 10,000-ton cargo boats, of which so many were built in Canada during the war. For these it would require dredging in certain places to a depth of over twenty-eight feet. I am not going to delay the committee further at this time, but I wanted to point this out to the minister, because it is the general wish of the shippers in that part of Nova Scotia—and this port also serves a considerable portion of New Brunswick—that this work be undertaken by the department as soon as possible.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): We shall certainly take note of the remarks made by the hon. member.

Item agreed to.

Chief engineer's branch—construction, repairs and improvements—harbours and rivers—Prince Edward Island—

561. Charlottetown—wharf reconstruction and improvements (estimated cost $340,000), $50,000.

Red Head—wharf extension and breakwater (revote $2,900), $3,500.

Rocky Point—wharf reconstruction (estimated cost $42,000), $20,000.

Harbours and rivers generally—for maintenance of services, no new works to be undertaken—further amount required, $10,000.

Mr. McLURE: I notice here an amount for Rocky Point wharf. A peculiar situation exists in reference to this wharf. It is half owned by the dominion government and half by the provincial government, and in repairing it they always have two different crews. They always have more bosses on it than workmen. I have often wondered whether something could not be done to have this wharf owned outright by either the federal government or the provincial government. It has always been in a most unsatisfactory condition. If the dominion government does its repair work, the provincial government does not do its work. It has been repaired from time to time, but they have never made a good job of it. Is there any possibility of the dominion government taking it over entirely?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I shall have the resident engineer prepare a report, and see if we can adopt the hon. member's suggestion.

Item agreed to.

Chief engineer's branch—construction, repairs and improvements—harbour and rivers—Manitoba—

565. Gimli—wharf reconstruction (estimated cost $62,000), $10,000.

Selkirk—wharf reconstruction (estimated cost $148,000), $10,000.

St. Andrews—river breakwater (estimated cost $11,000), $5,000.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I believe the minister was going to make a statement in connection with Gimli wharf. I notice that the total cost is estimated at $62,000 and that the expenditure this year is to be $10,000. I should like to know whether that includes the extension of the breakwater. Probably the minister has a report on conditions there. The breakwater has collapsed to such an extent that the water is now flooding a large area of the town where they have built a home, and is threatening to move in and destroy a great deal of property in the lower part of the town. The board of trade and the town itself are making strong representations that something be done about the breakwater, but there seems to be no estimate for that here. Could the minister give us a statement?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): The proposed work is the reconstruction in sheet steel piling of the 850-foot crib and pile wharf, twenty-two feet wide, largely rock-filled. It is also proposed to widen the outer thirty feet of the wharf to thirty feet. I have a report here from the engineer concerning this wharf. He says that Gimli wharf consists of three sections, or legs, at an angle with each other, having a total length of 743 feet measured along the harbour side. The shore leg is 148 feet; the middle one is 345 feet; and the outer leg is 250 feet long. The shore leg is twenty feet three inches; the middle leg is twenty-one feet two inches, and the outer end is twenty-two feet three inches wide. This wharf, along with a jetty to the south, serves to make a harbour of refuge and also a receiving and shipping point for fish. It is generally in poor condition and repair, but still serviceable. It is proposed to reconstruct the wharf as a post-war project, using as much as possible of the existing wharf as a core. On account of the heavy ice shoves that sometimes occur, it is proposed to widen the outer thirty feet of the wharf to a width of thirty feet.

The type of new construction is sheet-pile work on both sides of the shore leg; on the seaward side of the middle leg, and on both sides and end of the outer leg. Where there is danger of abrasive action from ice; that is, the outermost forty-five feet of the harbour side, the outer end and the seaward sides of the outer and middle legs, it is proposed to use steel sheet piles. That is the report I have concerning this work.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It is probable that the engineers have arranged in their construction to take care of part of the breakwater. It is intended to spend only $10,000 on that construction this year?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Yes. We could not spend more between now and the end of March, but the total estimate is $62,000. That would be the amount required to finish what we have in mind.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Then, if we have the minister's word that they will try to complete the wharf, probably the people will be satisfied, if that is being taken care of in the estimates for next year.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I might ask for a report on this part of the project mentioned by the hon. member, and let him know.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: If the minister would forward it to the hon. member for Selkirk he would be pleased.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Very well.

Item agreed to.

Mr. McLURE: If I am in order I just wish to say that I made a mistake when speaking on item 561. I notice there an amount of $50,000, and I want to thank the minister for putting that in the supplementary estimates.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

231. Departmental administration, $811,425.

Mr. BRACKEN: Might I ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs to give us the programme from now until prorogation. I have been canvassing the situation, and I wish to help the government to get through so that we may be sure to have prorogation to-morrow. I wonder if you, Mr. Chairman, would permit the minister to outline the work we have yet to do.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It was my intention before adjournment to-night, slightly before midnight, to ask the house to meet at 10.30 o'clock in the morning. The items still undisposed of are: finance, nineteen items; insurance, two items; legislation, which is a non-controversial matter, about ten items; munitions and supply, just two formal items which are not controversial; national defence, mostly routine amounts for militia pensions and so on, which are not contentious; national war services, one item; post office, six items, which we are taking up now; reconstruction, three items; national revenue, eight items, and the supplementaries in all departments. That is the whole list.

Mr. BRACKEN: I wonder if the leader of the government would permit my making a suggestion. I have canvassed the situation, and I think there is an inclination on the part of hon. members on this side of the house to try to get through. There may be someone over there who might wish to continue the discussion after to-morrow, but we would like to help the government to get through. I suggest that we go on to-night until 11.30 o'clock; then we come in at eleven o'clock to-morrow morning and plan to take one hour for lunch. I think there is a general disposition to assure the government that we shall be through here not later than five o'clock. One cannot speak for everybody, but I think there is an inclination to do that. Would that be acceptable?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think that is a most reasonable suggestion. We will adjourn to-night at 11.30 p.m. and come back to-morrow at eleven a.m. We would have only one hour for lunch to-morrow and finish about four or five o'clock in the afternoon for prorogation.

Mr. BRACKEN: Not later than five o'clock. I hope I have not spoken out of turn.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: We will do our best. This group has not any long speeches to make. If government followers do not make long speeches, I think we could get through by that time.

Item agreed to.

234. Railway mail service, $14,651,279.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I should like to bring to the attention of the minister the case respecting railway mail clerks with which I have no doubt he is already familiar. These men are the highest class of manipulative workers in the post office department, and they consider they are being discriminated against. I should like to place their case before the minister.

On July 1 of last year post office workers who were receiving sub-standard wages quite properly got an increase ranging from $120 to $180 a year, while railway mail clerks got only $60, thus reducing the differential between ordinary post office workers and railway mail clerks.

I am also informed that railway mail clerks got mileage in their salaries, for the purpose of superannuation; but this did not represent any actual increase. I know that representations were made a year ago to the minister asking that the differential be reestablished. The answer always given is that this is in the hands of the civil service commission, and that until the commission reports nothing can be done about it. Could the minister give me a statement on the matter?

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Postmaster General): Of course, I have no more jurisdiction over these salaries than had my predecessor. The civil service commission regulates these things. However, I may tell my hon. friend that representations will be made very shortly on this point and, as soon as this session is over, I intend taking this matter up with my officials to see what we can do. The hon. member may know that we also have to do something about the war bonus.

I am not ready this evening to state exactly what we shall do. However, we want to be reasonable, and we are going to consider the matter.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I am glad to hear that the minister will do everything possible to reestablish the differential.

Mr. BENTLEY: The little city of Swift Current from which I come has been anxious for a long time to have a postal delivery service. Is the minister giving this matter serious consideration? If this were looked into, it would be greatly appreciated. Certainly all cities of that size have this service. It is difficult for many people to get down to the post office, and I should like to have a definite answer from the minister.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We are inclined to give mail delivery to all cities in which the revenue is $40,000 or more. We should like to give it wherever there are a sufficient number of citizens to justify our doing so. However, we have to follow certain rules. We ask that there be a net revenue of $40,000, and that there be at least 2,000 points of call in order to employ our men.

If Swift Current comes within these stipulations, I am sure we shall be happy to give the service. However, the streets have to be well marked and the houses numbered. I do not know whether Swift Current has those things.

Mr. BENTLEY: Oh, yes, we are quite civilized.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Or if there are long streets without many points of call, it would not be possible.

Mr. BENTLEY: That is not the situation, at all.

Item agreed to.

235. Air and land mail services, $19,862,725.

Mr. HERRIDGE: In my constituency there has been quite a controversy in recent weeks owing to the awarding of a rural mail contract to a non-veteran, at a price $200 below that offered by veteran tenderers. This subject is fraught with difficulty. Would the minister give consideration to making it possible to give greater preference to veterans in connection with rural mail delivery?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): This is a ques-question which at times is embarrassing, but which we should like to settle in accordance with the wishes of the hon. member. However, we must decide whether we can grant contracts to returned men, in preference to civilians, where tenders are asked. If we did that, it would completely destroy the principle behind the tender. If we ask for tenders we have to be fair with the people who submit tenders, and of course we must give the contract to the lowest bidder, provided that he has the necessary equipment to fulfil his contract. If we were to make an exception and give a contract to a returned man, whether he was a lower bidder or not, in our opinion it would destroy the principle behind the tender, and might become a source of collusion.

Very often in towns or villages where we have rural mail delivery there might not be even one returned man who would be ready to take a contract. Some other people, knowing that a returned man would have a 100 per cent preference, might ask him to tender on their behalf. We think the Post Office Department in these circumstances might lose many millions of dollars throughout Canada. We have to abide by the Post Office Act, which is the law in force to-day, and which obliges us to give contracts to the lowest tenderers.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Has the minister given consideration to the proposals of the dominion command of the Canadian Legion, in which they suggest that the whole question be reviewed, and that the delivery of rural mail be put on a mileage basis?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): That would not be possible. It would have to be a base which could be applied to all Canada. The transportation of mail on the plains in western Canada, and the transportation of mails over the mountains in British Columbia, on difficult roads, would not be comparable, and the same base could not be applied. It has to be a tender for every one of these rural mail deliveries, because conditions are not the same.

Mr. McLURE: The minister has told us how these contracts are made and so on, and I should like to say a few words about rural mail delivery. This is a most difficult job, especially in wintertime, and unfortunately it is the most underpaid service of any of the services of the dominion government. It is quite true that during the last four years the government has paid an extra bonus to rural mail carriers, but that is not on an honest-to-goodness basis. Is there any possibility of bringing these men under the civil service, so that they may be paid for their services?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): It is done by tender, and that is the best way we can do it. The minister may award contracts up to $200. The section of the act is the same as it was in 1867. Sometimes people tender for contracts which will take only part of their time, and in an effort to make a few hundred dollars they calculate at too low a rate. At different times we have had to take over these contracts and ask for new tenders. It was my intention this year to ask to have this limit raised from $200 to $400 to protect these people against themselves, but we cannot do it.

DEPARTMENT OF RECONSTRUCTION

308. Departmental administration, including expenses incidental to organization, $1,500,000.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: There are a number of things in connection with the Department of Reconstruction which require clarification. War Assets Corporation is under this department, and the people of Canada have been inquiring about what is being done with the billions of dollars worth of war assets which now stand to the credit of the Canadian people. The people of Canada gave freely throughout the period of the war in an effort to bring the war to a successful conclusion. There was scarcely a question raised during the whole period of the war about the granting of money. We were in the full flush of production when the war ended, and there were many war assets in Europe, in the United Kingdom and in other parts of the world.

All these are being disposed of through War Assets Corporation, and the Canadian people would like to know what is happening to them. I am of the opinion that the Minister of Finance is anxious that the treasury should be reimbursed as soon as possible for what value is there. The Canadian people consider that these assets belong to them, and they view with considerable alarm one or two aspects in connection with their disposal. In the first place, soldiers coming out of the army find it difficult to get the trucks they were driving around during the war. Jeeps and things like that do not seem to be available at all.

Many questions were placed on the order paper with regard to what was happening. They stayed there for weeks, and finally the Minister of Reconstruction asked that they be withdrawn on the promise that they would be answered fully in the committee. We accepted that in good faith and they were withdrawn. The committee held about ten meetings of about an hour and a quarter each. That committee undertook to study the set-up and organization of War Assets Corporation. The steering committee agreed on that, which was all to the good. However, it seemed that War Assets Corporation was in a constant state of flux. Policies which were placed on the paper with regard to their organization seemed to show one thing, while actual operations seemed to show another.

Farmers inquire whether it would be possible for them to get hold of tractors or trucks. Provincial governments would like to get hold of road-making machinery and aeroplanes, but they are having considerable difficulty. Hospitals wish to know if it would be possible for them to get hold of hospital supplies. People need things such as blankets and clothing, and there are tools which the government could use. There are thousands of schools in the different provinces which could use radio material, generators and other things in their construction and science classes. These things would be of very little loss to the government if they were turned over to these schools.

We were quite anxious that this committee which was carrying on an investigation of this work should continue. As I say, the committee had only ten meetings. A report was tabled in the house, which report stated that the committee would be reorganized at the next sitting of parliament to carry on its work. Between now and the time at which the committee could be set up will be at least three months. War Assets Corporation is receiving into its funds $10,000,000 a month. The report which stated that the committee would not sit until the next session was a majority report, but there was opposition.

We have more to say on this matter than can possibly be said to-night, and since it is close to eleven o'clock I think the committee should rise.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE: With the consent of the house, and as a result of the discussion we had a few minutes ago, I would move:

That when the house rises at one o'clock to-morrow there shall be an intermission until two o'clock p.m., notwithstanding the order passed on November 27, 1945.

Mr. BRACKEN: Can the minister say now at what time prorogation will take place?

Mr. MACKENZIE: It will depend, of course, entirely upon the progress made in the house. Generally speaking, the other place requires an hour's notice after we have finished the active business of this chamber. So that if we finished at three or four o'clock, prorogation would be about five o'clock. But I shall be pleased to let my hon. friend know to-morrow.

May I refer to a question asked by the leader of the opposition this morning when I was engaged on other duties outside the chamber. He asked whether the committee on the orders and rules of the house would be set up again next session. It is the intention to set up that committee as soon as possible after the new session is convened.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie the house adjourned at 11.35 p.m.

Tuesday, December 18, 1945

The house met at eleven o'clock.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

The house resumed from Friday, November 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Bradette that the second report of the standing committee on external affairs, presented on Monday, November 12, be now concurred in; and the amendment thereto of Mr. St. Laurent.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Last evening during the discussion on external affairs I gave the committee an explanation of the government's attitude toward the subject matter of this resolution. I made it clear that the government was prepared to have the estimates of the Department of External Affairs referred to that special committee. At the time it was agreed that when this motion came up this morning, the amendment, and the motion as amended, would be agreed to.

Amendment agreed to.

Motion as amended agreed to.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

INQUIRY AS TO PRINTING AND DISTRIBUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance with respect to the public accounts. A single copy was tabled on November 12, but I am advised that the printed copies are not yet available, though under the statute we were supposed to have had them some two months ago. Can the minister advise when they will be available, and could they be distributed to hon. members even though we have left Ottawa, so we shall not have to wait until next session in order to have them?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I will make inquiries and let the hon. gentleman know later to-day when they will be printed. As a matter of fact I had lost touch with the matter; I assumed they would be printed and tabled before this. It would be a great pity to have to mail them, because they are so bulky, I will find out to-day how the matter stands and let the hon. gentleman know before the house prorogues.

Later:

(In committee of the whole).

Mr. ILSLEY: If the leader of the opposition will allow me to state this in committee, he asked a question while the Speaker was in the chair in regard to the public accounts. I have made inquiry, and I am told that the public accounts will not be ready before another month. They will be mailed, however, or expressed to all hon. members of the House of Commons as soon as they are published. The reason for the delay is that we have superannuated a number of employees at the printing bureau who have not been replaced; the session came on, with all the printing tasks which it involved; we have had various royal commissions, and it has been impossible to have this work done.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

ADMINISTRATIVE STAFF

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I should like to reply to a question the leader of the opposition asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare on December 15, dealing with the staff administering family allowances. I will send him over a copy of the reply, but it can be summed up as follows: the regular staff numbered 458 and casual employees, 543, a total of 1,001.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ANSWERING OF QUESTIONS REMAINING ON ORDER PAPER

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, I understand there are still nine questions on the order paper.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): They will be referred to during the course of the day. With regard to the question raised yesterday by the leader of the opposition respecting any orders for returns or notices of motion for production of papers which probably could not be produced during the day, may I refer to standing order 81 which states:

> A prorogation of the house shall not have the effect of nullifying an order or address of the house for returns or papers, but all papers and returns ordered at one session of the house, if not complied with during the session, should be brought down during the following session, without renewal of the order.

Mr. BRACKEN: Is there any rule preventing the government's bringing them down earlier than that?

Mr. MACKENZIE: If the government can, it will.

Mr. BRACKEN: I hope it can, and will.

REPATRIATION OF UKRAINIANS

PROTECTION OF INTERESTS OF UKRAINIANS IN MILITARY OCCUPATION ZONES

Mr. ANTHONY HLYNKA (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister of which, I regret to say, I have not had the opportunity to give him notice. This morning I received a telegram from the Ukrainian-Canadian committee, a copy of which I believe was sent to the Prime Minister. Has the government anything to say on the subject of further forceful repatriation of Ukrainians from military occupation zones to the east? They are being refused food unless they agree to go. This is a question of great concern to Canadians of Ukrainian origin. Can the Prime Minister make a statement in the matter?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The subject to which the hon. member has referred is one which relates to Europe. I am not in a position to say whether the representations made are wholly correct. I would suppose in that respect that my hon. friend is in the same position as I am. I can assure him however that the government has watched this whole Ukrainian situation most carefully and, so far as it is within our power to control matters, we have sought to see that the course taken would be such as would protect their interests.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

467. Departmental administration — further amount required, $11,950.

Mr. HACKETT: Will the committee not continue from where we left off last night?

Mr. MACKENZIE: No, not necessarily.

The CHAIRMAN: The committee is now considering the supplementary estimates for the Department of Justice.

Mr. HACKETT: I understood that when we adjourned last night we were to carry on this morning at the point where we left off.

Mr. MACKENZIE: There was no arrangement to that effect.

Item agreed to.

468. Combines Investigation Act, administration—further amount required, $32,000.

Mr. BENTLEY: Yesterday when the estimates of the Department of Labour were before us we asked about combines investigation and the Minister of Labour informed us that that was now under the Minister of Justice, who was not present at that time. I should like to tell the Minister of Justice that there was a little matter that we left in the hands of the Minister of Labour which would come under this particular item. We should like him to look into this as quickly as possible. I refer to the case of Merchants Consolidated Limited and the Vulcan Hardware people in Manitoba and Saskatchewan. We feel that they have something worth investigating and we should like this to be done as soon as possible so that we may have the results.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF RECONSTRUCTION

308. Departmental administration, including expenses incidental to organization, $1,500,000.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Mr. Chairman, when we were dealing with this item last night I was pointing out that the war expenditures committee had brought in a report stating that it was the intention to call the committee together again at the next session. We think it advisable that this or some other committee continue the investigation of War Assets Corporation between now and the time any such committee may be set up at the next session. The sales and operations of the War Assets Corporation leave a great deal to be desired so far as public information is concerned. Purchasers throughout Canada who try to obtain materials from War Assets Corporation find that there is very little information as to what supplies are available. Something of a run-around is being given to these people.

We were told in the committee that a certain price structure had been set up and that a certain policy was being followed in connection with the pricing of commodities, but those who have endeavoured to buy articles from this corporation find that that is not the policy that is followed. People may be asked to make a bid for certain articles but when they try to get hold of them they are told that someone else has purchased them. It is evident that someone has a priority, that someone higher up has the power to sell these commodities and they are withdrawn from the market overnight.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The policy of merchandising was dealt with fully in the committee.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I agree that is so, but the policy outlined in the committee is not the policy that is followed with these people who are trying to purchase material. As I say, there is a difference between the actual operations of the corporation and the policy that was supposed to be laid down. Take machine tools, for instance. When people tried to purchase these they found that they were not available, or that they were available only to dealers or agents. There appears to be a division of authority. These people find either that War Assets Corporation has no power to sell this material, or that someone higher up has already made a deal. On September 24 I placed a question on the order paper asking:

What was the total value of the buildings, equipment, supplies, and other materials: (a) sold; (b) exchanged; (c) loaned; (d) leased; (e) otherwise disposed of by the Minister of Munitions and Supply as of August 31, 1945, under the Surplus Crown Assets Act?

What is the total amount received by the government for the materials referred to in question 1?

That question was never answered by the committee, and the committee is to be disbanded with the prorogation of parliament. Apparently that information is not to be given. There is a question on the order paper at the present time which I placed there on November 12 and which has not been answered at this late day. It reads:

What persons or companies, if any, have been paid or allowed commission by War Assets Corporation on sales or exchange of goods by that corporation?

What is the amount of commission to each person or company?

Apparently that question is not to be answered. The War Assets Corporation published an annual report as from July 12, 1944 to March 31, 1945. Apparently this corporation has changed completely in its personnel. There seems to be practically an entire new company in operation, because we find this on page 5 of the report:

To obtain the complete picture of surplus disposals in Canada there should be added to the record of the corporation the surplus disposal operations of the Department of Munitions and Supply prior to the formation of the corporation and later running in parallel with it, and there should also be added transactions negotiated by the director general of war surpluses, Department of Reconstruction, Ottawa.

These three operations added together show a total volume of material disposed of amounting to $19,768,000 divided as follows:

As to what that material was and what the original cost of it was, we are given no information. We do not know what kind of deals were made; we do not know what the material was originally worth. On page 12 we find an analysis of sales. In the case of real estate all the information given is that there were two sales of a total amount of $13,000. What good is that? We want to find out whether the Canadian people are getting proper value from these sales. It says there were 2,086 sales of scrap metal totalling $1,257,568.15. For trucks and tractors, there were 1,107 sales—this could mean 11,000 trucks—totalling $871,366.63. There were 1,555 sales of ferrous metals, totalling $840,-180.08. That sort of information is not good enough. As I said, the people of Canada were ready to spend money lavishly to win the war. The war had to be won and war is a costly business. Apparently there is a lot of monkey business in it as well. The Canadian people will deeply resent the giving away or the handing over of assets valued at billions of dollars without a proper accounting. The kind of thing that makes us suspicious is what is set out in a press report from Washington which appeared in yesterday's papers. This reads:

Britons, Canadians who were in Britain, and perhaps some Americans will be a little dismayed to learn that the gasoline used by the Luftwaffe bombers which droned over London every night early in the war was "made in U.S.A." So were the casings of thousands of the magnesium fire bombs which were used in the fire blitzes.

A war department report presented to a special Senate committee here says that I.G. Farben, vast German chemical trust, exploited cartel agreements with American companies to make nazi armies self-sufficient in strategic materials needed to start and maintain the war. From the United States it got new methods for making components of high octane gasoline including tetraethyl lead, and when it could not make tetraethyl lead in time for the start of the war in 1939, it got 500 tons from the Ethyl Export Corporation of the United States.

The report goes on to say that the I.G. Farben company found ways to make through chemistry what was not readily available in Germany. It goes on:

Other things, which it could not make, I.G. Farben obtained through its cartel cohorts in foreign countries.

One of the greatest of these was Standard Oil of New Jersey, which made known to I.G. Farben its revolutionary process of producing iso-octane and utilizing it for motor fuels.

One of the German scientists said in a report brought to light by the War Department investigating committee "production of iso-octane originated entirely with the Americans and became known to us in detail in its separate stages through our agreement with Standard Oil Company of New Jersey and is being used extensively by us. The process for producing tetraethyl lead, essential for the manufacture of aviation gasoline was obtained in exactly the same way."

In addition to making and stockpiling magnesium for bomb castings, the report says Farben Company purchased large stocks of magnesium from the Dow Chemical Corporation of America to build up its reserves for the Luftwaffe.

Farben had about 2,000 cartel arrangements including some with Aluminum Company of America, E. I. Dupont de Nemours, Imperial Chemical Industries of Great Britain, and companies in France and Japan.

It is evident that in the operation of a war there are people who make money out of it, and it is beginning to dawn on the peoples of the world that until we take the profits out of war it will be difficult to end war. When this war is over I think the people of Canada are going to demand a complete investigation of War Assets Corporation to find out what is happening to our assets, who is obtaining them, and whether Canada is making a good bargain in their disposal. So far as this house is concerned we have no information on these things. It is very difficult to get information. That is why I ask the minister to see that a committee of this house, or perhaps the very committee that was set up to investigate War Assets Corporation, be allowed, under the powers granted to the government by the special powers bill, to continue its investigation.

I personally wanted to visit some of the War Assets plants. I was informed by the minister that he could not give me a blanket pass to visit the plants but that War Assets would have to be notified in advance. He was willing to give me an introduction to the manager of any plant operated by War Assets if I would notify them when I was coming, and would make arrangements for me to make a tour of the plants.

What we need is a committee with power to go around and visit War Assets plants. We do not want this investigation shut off for another three months. That only means that when we come back here the barn door will be open and the horse gone. I would ask the minister to make a statement.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I want to say a word or two about the committee that was appointed to investigate War Assets Corporation, and the reason I want to do it is that I feel that I have been called upon as a member of that committee to take part in a solemn farce. I wonder if parliament wants to leave that situation as it is. What do I mean by a solemn farce? I will try to state it briefly.

This committee was set up with twenty-five members, a very sensible lot of men; they looked to me quite sensible. We sat in a large room and I felt quite important, almost as if I were at a peace conference. The newspaper men were all there, solemnly taking down what we said. Official reporters were there taking down our every word as if the whole thing was important. Senior civil servants were there, running in and out. You really felt that something was stirring. I was so much impressed that I believe I wrote a letter to the chairman saying that I felt pleased that something was really going to be done. If I did, hon. gentlemen will be amused about that, though as I look back I do not know whether to be amused or indignant—either one or the other; one either should laugh or be angry. Why? What happened? We had eight meetings. Several of the meetings toward the end were held while the house was sitting, and unless you can split yourself in two or three pieces, and I could not do that, vertically anyway, you could attend only one thing at a time, the house or the committee. In the committee we were given statements by officials of War Assets Corporation, a sensible lot of statements; I had no quarrel with what they said. I think those officials were good men, and what they were doing seemed sensible. But it was made clear that they were not actually dealing with the important things; these were dealt with by the Minister of Reconstruction. I do not know how he deals with them when he is in Bermuda attending an air conference, and if I may digress for a moment I want to say what I said in the house once before that unless the Minister of Reconstruction can split himself in four he cannot do efficiently what he is attempting to do to-day.

Mr. CHEVRIER: He is doing a mighty good job.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The minister will speak to that. What I am talking about now is what the committee has done, or rather did not do. The committee got these statements, which I thought were very sensible statements. Then I thought we were getting to the stage where we should be able to get our teeth into something, or, as one member of the committee said, see the work in action. What do I mean? I mean by taking some actual cases.

We had a steering committee, which I thought was going to bring forward some actual cases. We were asked to send cases to the steering committee, and I sent in one or two. What do I mean by cases? Not suggestions of any impropriety. I just mean cases where on the face of it, it looked as if the disposition of a certain property had not been provident, perhaps had been done hurriedly, perhaps with not as great efficiency as might have been.

Let me say again that there was no suggestion of scandal or anything of the kind. It was just a question of trying to get the committee at work on something. I hope that I shall never be asked to sit on such a committee again. I was told by an experienced parliamentarian when this committee was first set up, "Don't imagine it will ever do anything". But I was young in experience here, and I thought perhaps this was a committee that would be different. I just want to say that it was no different. Up to the present we have not been allowed to do anything of any value because we have just had these general principles, and as the hon. member for Yorkton has just said, we were not allowed to see the thing in action.

The way we suggest of seeing it in action is that we should be allowed to go on with our investigation during the recess. I do not know that I agree with the hon. member for Yorkton that we should go around and visit the different plants. I doubt very much that I would be in favour of that. But I would be in favour of having some continuous connected time for our investigation so that we can really deal with this thing. I ask members present whether it was sensible towards the end of the session to appoint a group of men who could meet only eight times many of whom were not able to be there all the time, and who could only hear a story told them, very pleasantly, of certain things that were happening. But the main things never came before that committee because the main things are the sale of plants, going concerns, and that is dealt with by the Minister of Reconstruction. I am not complaining about that. That may be quite all right. But what I am saying is that either the committee should never have been set up at all or it should have been allowed to do something. I do not want this house to make a fool of itself in the eyes of the public. That is what we are doing. I think that the operation of the committee is inconsistent with the picture that was drawn by the Prime Minister—I wish he were present to hear what I am saying—and with what he said and said so well the other day about the part which this house should play.

I finish as I began, by saying that I object to the history of this committee; I object to our being now dissolved after three or four weeks, for two reasons. First of all, we were just beginning to get hot, as the phrase goes, to get to a position where we could have gone ahead with some intelligence. Now we are going away for two or three months, and when we come back I suppose it will not be possible to set up the committee the first day we return, and if we do, we have a dozen other things to occupy us. This committee is dealing with hundreds of millions of dollars of the assets of the people of this country. One can only look on all this as a bad joke, or something to get angry about, and I alternate between one and the other.

Mr. HACKETT: I suggest to the minister that I might ask a question which he could answer at the same time as the questions he is about to answer.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I want to reply to what the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario and the hon. member for Yorkton have said. In the first place let me say that in my opinion this discussion is superfluous, and I say this having in mind what the Minister of Reconstruction said when this whole question was debated on his war appropriation estimates. I would not like to take up too much of the time of the committee, but I think in fairness to the Minister of Reconstruction I should point out that in the course of the debate on the war appropriation estimates a large part of the subject matter of this discussion was gone into. I pause for a moment to quote what the minister said as reported in Hansard, page 2349.

> I should like to point out that there has been a duplication in the first item, in that departmental administration is also in the civil estimates. I mention that so that when we discuss it now it will not be necessary to discuss it again in the civil estimates.

In the civil estimates we have item No. 308, "departmental administration, including expenses incidental to organization, $1,500,000." That was gone into fully at that time. And I cannot see why it should be gone into now. However, as I said a moment ago, some statements were made here this morning which I think should be replied to. The discussion which took place in the committee had to do with the alternatives which were mentioned a moment ago by the hon. member for Yorkton and the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario. I do not know whether the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario made a motion, but I do know that the two alternatives suggested to the committee were, first, that they sit after prorogation, and, second, that a royal commission be set up. It was pointed out that if sittings were to take place after prorogation they would be irregular because of the rules and proceedings of this house. As for a royal commission, I cannot see how a royal commission would be of any value at this time. Nobody has suggested that there were any scandals, nobody has made any charges, and if there were any charges to make, it was before the committee that they should have been made. The hon. member for Yorkton said in his statement a moment ago, "There is monkey business going on." Well, if there is monkey business going on I think it is up to him to say where the monkey business is, and if on his responsibility as a member of parliament he has any charge to make, let him make it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: On his responsibility as a member.

Mr. CHEVRIER: He should have made it before the committee. Did he make it then? I say to him that he did not, but he chooses the dying days of the session to say, "There is monkey business going on." The place to make a charge of monkey business is before the public accounts committee.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: On a point of order, I said the thing that made us suspicious was the kind of thing which happens when profits are made in war. I said that profits are made in war; war is big business, and there is monkey business too, and that is why I read the report.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is not what the hon. member said at all.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. gentleman has been making statements in this house which are sometimes more or less accurate; and when he speaks as he did a moment ago, I say to him that profits which are made in war have nothing to do with War Assets Corporation. That is not the business of War Assets Corporation. The hon. gentleman knows that when War Assets Corporation was set up last year the powers of the minister were specified and the duties of the corporation were therein set out. It was its business to take over from the crown assets allocation committee any surplus material declared to the latter by other departments and to dispose of it by sale. That is the business of War Assets Corporation.

The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario says that he took part in a "solemn farce." I am sorry that the hon. gentleman should make that statement. I have a great deal of respect for the hon. gentleman and for the manner in which he has conducted himself since he has been a member of this house; but when he says that that committee is a solemn farce, such a statement is not accurate. He was a member of the committee. He could have complained. The committee held seven or eight sittings and heard as many witnesses and made a report. Surely the hon. gentleman should have objected then, as he does now,—

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Will the minister allow me an explanation? I intended to say, and perhaps this would be a good time to say, that there was a vote, in which I took part, on a motion that by some means the work of the committee should continue in the recess. Incidentally I might say that that motion came very near to being carried. I think there was a majority of only one or two against it. I think that is an answer to what the minister is saying now. We did our best in the committee.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I say it is not an answer to what I said, because as far as the first part of my statement is concerned there could be no answer; it would be contrary to the rules of this house to sit after prorogation. And does the hon. gentleman suggest that there should be a royal commission on this matter at this time?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I should like to say that—

Mr. CHEVRIER: No, I am not going to allow the hon. gentleman to speak at this time.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): May I not ask a question?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The minister is perfectly correct in what he said about the committee. It was explained that it could not sit. I was in favour of a royal commission, and it was not in my mind, and it is not in my mind yet, that the institution of a royal commission suggests any scandal. I was careful in what I said a few minutes ago not to suggest any scandal at all. I was very emphatic about it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. gentleman and I agree on that, so let me pass on to another part of the remarks which I proposed to make.

Something has been said by the hon. member for Yorkton about the policy in Washington. Let me tell him this, that the United States policy so far as War Assets Corporation is concerned is very much the same as our own; in fact I can go a step further and say that to a large extent they have copied our policy, or that their organization is based on our policy.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is right.

Mr. CHEVRIER: They have sent a representative from Washington to Canada to study the manner in which we are disposing of our war surplus material, and they did not send him here because they did not like the manner in which we were doing business; I am sure it is because they approved of it.

I am sorry that I should have had to go into this at greater length than I anticipated. I repeat that the matter was gone into fully by the Minister of Reconstruction, and I cannot see why it should be gone into again to-day. The committee has made its report, it has made its decision. It strikes me that parliament should accept the report, and I ask this committee to do so.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. HACKETT: I draw your attention, Mr. Chairman, to the fact that I was on my feet and ceded my place to someone else a few moments ago, and I ask the privilege of saying a few words now. I point out to the minister that the complaint advanced by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario rests on something which has arisen since the Minister of Munitions and Supply made his statement on November 21. At that time it was anticipated—

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I interrupt the hon. gentleman and say to him that that is not so. We should not now be dealing with the war expenditures committee. We are dealing with an item for departmental administration. If the hon. gentleman sticks to that then, strictly speaking, there should be no discussion of the war expenditures committee.

Mr. HACKETT: If the minister thinks he can make a statement and prevent a reply for the reason just given, he will have to have the rules amended. I am pointing out that the excuse he gives is of no avail because the objection which was raised by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario has arisen since the statement of the Minister of Munitions and Supply. When the minister made his statement it was believed that there would be an opportunity for investigation which has since in the result been denied. That is the ground of the complaint of the member for Muskoka-Ontario. Furthermore, I point out, Mr. Chairman, that the difficulty is the absolute lack of information. It is the secrecy, it is the unwillingness to tell, it is the recrudescence of the spirit of autocracy and buraeucracy that is troubling the people at the present time. This surplus war assets corporation—

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. HACKETT: Certainly.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Is he making the statement, or is he prepared to state, that in the war expenditures committee any official denied any information that was asked for?

Mr. HACKETT: I am certainly prepared to say that no information was given and that no opportunity was afforded for getting it.

Mr. LALONDE: That is not true.

Mr. BRADETTE: It is not correct.

Mr. LALONDE: As a member of the committee I rise to a point of order.

Mr. BRADETTE: It is foolish to make a statement such as that.

Mr. LALONDE: On a point of order—

Mr. HACKETT: I intend to proceed with my remarks.

Mr. COTE (Verdun): I wish to rise to a question of privilege. This may not derive exactly from the remarks made by the hon. member for Stanstead, but it arises directly from the remarks made by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario. By the statements he has made in this house he makes me and other members of the war expenditures committee parties—

Mr. HACKETT: May I point out, Mr. Chairman, that this is not a matter of privilege.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It certainly is. The hon. gentleman said something which the member who is raising the point thinks is a reflection upon his attitude in the committee.

Mr. HACKETT: It does not arise from anything that I have said in this committee, and since I have the floor I should not be interrupted.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): If the hon. member will wait until the member for Stanstead concludes—

Mr. MACKENZIE: The rule is that a question of privilege can be taken into consideration at any time.

Mr. HACKETT: Not while another member has the floor.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): If the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Coté) will wait until the member for Stanstead is through, he will have an opportunity to state his point.

Mr. MACKENZIE: He does not have to.

Mr. HACKETT: I was saying, Mr. Chairman, when I was interrupted, that the difficulty appears to be that so far as the war assets corporation is concerned, no one can get any information from it with regard to the method of disposal of its assets.

An hon. MEMBER: What information were you denied?

Mr. HACKETT: The assets of this corporation are estimated to be something approaching—

Mr. MACKENZIE: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman, and I would quote standing order 16:

> Whenever any matter of privilege arises it shall be taken into consideration immediately.

Mr. HACKETT: I call the attention of the chair to the fact that no question of privilege arising from my remarks is before the committee.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): That is no answer.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): If the hon. member for Verdun will wait until the member for Stanstead is through, he can state his position.

Mr. HACKETT: The rule says "immediately" and three hon. members have spoken since the challenged statement was made.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The committee will make better progress if it permits the member for Stanstead to complete his statement, and then the member for Verdun can state his point.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is not according to the rules.

Mr. HACKETT: I was pointing out to the committee that it is absolutely impossible to get from the surplus war assets corporation any information concerning its assets.

Mr. LALONDE: You are not even a member of the committee.

Mr. HACKETT: I am not asserting that I am. I am merely telling the committee that it is impossible to get from the War Assets Corporation any information concerning the assets which it has for sale. The national income of the whole country before the war was four billions, and we are informed that the assets to be disposed of by this company amount to nearly twenty-five per cent of that huge total. For over a year I for one have been attempting to get information concerning the sale and liquidation of these assets, and whenever I have endeavoured to get information concerning the sale of vehicles, trucks, jeeps and sundry machinery, invariably there has come a long letter of explanation intimating that this was not the time, this was not the place, perhaps if I wrote to Calgary or to Vancouver, or perhaps if I waited until next fall, or perhaps if I did not bother with it any more I would get as far as I had got. The complaint is that the War Assets Corporation is absolutely beyond the reach of the Canadian people, absolutely beyond the reach of the ordinary member, at least of members of the opposition; and any information that one seeks from the ordinary vendor of materials, any information that one seeks from any large distributor of materials on this continent, is not forthcoming. It is that type of conduct, it is that type of arrogance, it is that unwillingness to divulge information to would-be purchasers, that constitutes the basis and the genesis of my complaint.

I point out to the minister that in fairness to the Canadian people, in fairness to his own government, these arbitrary methods should be abolished. It should not be necessary that one be forced to resort to extraordinary methods to get elementary information concerning the purchase of commodities which we are told are offered on an equal basis to all Canadians. It is that attitude that is resented, that attitude of the War Assets Corporation that is resented by the Canadian people. It is that attitude that makes one wonder, without knowing, if there is something wrong. It is that attitude that makes people say, "Are we living in a democratic country?" Why was this War Assets Corporation set up? It is away beyond the reach of parliament. We are told it is beyond the administrative powers of the minister. It seems to have been set up as a kind of buffer state between parliament and the people. It is because of this attitude that there is a great deal of unrest and uncertainty and a longing that a few rays of sunlight and fresh air be allowed to permeate the transactions of this body.

Mr. COTE (Verdun): Mr. Chairman, I should like to draw your attention to the fact that the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario has qualified the proceedings of the war expenditures and economies committee as a solemn farce. As a member of that committee and of the steering committee I want to reply to the hon. member on a point of privilege. I have attended each sitting of that committee, and I think I can draw conclusions much better than an hon. member who has been there perhaps twice or three times, or not at all. I want to say that everything that has been done in that committee has been decided by the members themselves. The committee has been master of its own procedure. The steering committee studied at length the best way and means of progressing within the terms of reference to that committee. A member of the committee had two ways in which he could place any particular fact or request before the committee. He could either put questions himself to the witnesses from the War Assets Corporation or he could communicate with the steering committee. That steering committee received only one complaint; it came from the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario and was in regard to the sale of Fairmile boats.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): May I correct the hon. member?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): It is a question of privilege. The hon. member is wrong; I think he will find I did not do that at all.

Mr. COTE (Verdun): It may take more than a few moments to make the hon. gentleman understand that this was not a solemn farce, that we have been doing our work carefully and have achieved some results. As far as the hon. member is concerned he brought only one complaint before the steering committee, in connection with the sale of Fairmile boats, and this was answered most satisfactorily by Mr. Peterson, sales manager of the corporation, in a brief which he presented to the committee. I am satisfied that all those who have read the briefs presented to the committee should be satisfied, because in eight or nine meetings we laid down the basis for our proceedings; we learned the set-up of the War Assets Corporation and were informed about their policies, and we put ourselves in a position to answer any complaints or inquiries that might come to us as members of the committee. We are ready to do a good job again next session, as soon as we resume our activities.

Mr. MACKENZIE: For certain reasons it is necessary to have the Speaker in the chair for a moment or two, and therefore with the consent of the committee we can resume this debate in a few moments.

Progress reported.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT

MESSAGE FROM THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SECRETARY

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following message:

Ottawa, December 18, 1945.

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Thibaudeau Rinfret, Chief Justice of Canada, acting as deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the senate chamber on Tuesday, the 18th December, at five o'clock p.m., for the purpose of proroguing the present session of parliament.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

F. L. C. Pereira,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF RECONSTRUCTION

308. Departmental administration, including expenses incidental to organization, $1,500,000.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I want to correct two statements made by the hon. member for Verdun. He referred to me as having made a complaint to the steering committee. I want to make it very clear that there was no question of complaint; it was a question of bringing up certain things which I thought should be inquired into. In the second place he was quite wrong in saying that my inquiry concerned Fairmile boats. My inquiry referred to two other companies. That is not important, but I think I should make this correction to show that the hon. member is not quite as knowledgeable as he would appear to want us to think.

Mr. LALONDE: I rose a few moments ago on a question of privilege also, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member for Stanstead said something which in my opinion is not accurate. He made the statement that the right of investigation had been denied in the committee of which I was a member. May I say to the hon. member that he does not know what went on in that committee, because he is not a member of it. If he wants to get some information as to what went on it would be very easy for him to get the pile of papers and briefs that were presented to the committee. Instead of making a statement which he cannot prove it would be better for the hon. member to read with the greatest care all the information that has been given this committee. If my memory serves me well, we received ten or twelve briefs summarizing the work of the War Assets Corporation and the other crown company, the name of which I forget for the moment. The hon. member for Stanstead is a serious man; he is a lawyer of great reputation in my province, and I do not understand how he can rise in his place here and make a statement about which he has no knowledge.

The hon. member said the right of investigation had been denied. I should like to know to whom that right was denied in our committee. I attended perhaps six meetings, and all members were absolutely free to ask any questions pertinent to the briefs presented. So far as I am concerned to a certain extent I cross-examined the witnesses who appeared before us, and I am in a position to declare that we were absolutely free to seek information and to get right to the bottom of the matters put before us. I invite the hon. member for Stanstead to come to our meetings. We have nothing to hide. We are there to do a good job, something else than a solemn farce. I was quite surprised to hear my hon. friend, for whom I have great respect, make the statement publicly in this House of Commons, to be broadcast all over Canada, that the work of our committee was a solemn farce, and I am protesting against this fallacious declaration by the hon. member. It was not a solemn farce. We were doing a solemn work for the good of the people of Canada.

Mr. PROBE: I want to say a few words about the reconstruction phase of the matter which is before the committee this morning. As citizens of Canada we have had six years of self-denial. In public and in private our confreres of the government have taken credit for the efficient prosecution of the war. In her industrial output Canada has made a mark that does credit to all sections of this country. That output was due to the energy and patriotism of our scientists, our service personnel, our war workers and all other classes in the country who made sacrifices without hope of material award, but with the hope and faith that in this country there would be a better post-war condition than the one we left behind us when Hitler challenged our right to live in our way.

In this connection I would recall to the minds of hon. members the first days of the session in September, 1939. At that time the Minister of Munitions and Supply as he was then known, told us, and kept repeating day after day, that not one aircraft contract could be let—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order.

Mr. PROBE: This is relevant.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): We are not dealing with 1939. This is an item in the Department of Reconstruction for departmental administration, including expenses incidental to organization, and we must confine ourselves to that item.

Mr. PROBE: Very well. In leading up to this point the Minister of Munitions and Supply capitulated to the demands of industry and private capital. He bought equipment; he bought plants with the money subscribed by the war savings of the Canadian people. He arranged for the—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order.

Mr. PROBE: Are we in this House of Commons not to be allowed to present our points of view?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Will the hon. member please resume his seat?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): In committee of the whole remarks must be relevant to the item before the committee. The hon. member is now dealing with what happened when the war began, something which has nothing to do with this reconstruction item.

Mr. PROBE: Not at all, no.

[Mr. Lalonde.]

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I suggest the hon. member should confine his remarks to the item under discussion.

Mr. PROBE: We got the job done, and the war is over. We thank the government for having piloted us through. Now the people of Canada are demanding certain reconstruction rights which were promised in the years which have passed. We want individual reconstruction of the veterans, the war workers and the small business man, so as to enable rehabilitation and reconstruction of home and business.

Yet we have this farce—and I like that word, as used by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, because it is only too true—of talking about houses when people do not have a place to rest. As a new member I am amazed when I listen to the solemn talk which takes place in connection with these matters, when the job of government should be to get to grips with actual realities. The Liberals have said that they are business people and that they will see the job through and reconstruct Canada. I say that in no small measure we have here the means of reconstruction. Through War Assets Corporation many individuals and small businesses which suffered most as a result of the war could receive a great measure of reconstruction.

During the session dozens of questions were asked of the Minister of Reconstruction as to what was happening with these huge surpluses of commodities. Each one of them was solemnly evaded with the promise that an opportunity would be given to the war expenditures committee, when set up, to investigate every matter fully. And so very late in this session, the government saw fit to establish that committee, of which I was a member. It held its first meeting on November 13, and adjourned a week. It met for one hour and fifteen minutes twice a week for eight complete weeks, and then at its last meeting sat in camera to prepare the report which was presented to the house—and which, in essence, said nothing more than that we had met, and that we hoped some day to meet again.

I should like to read the terms of reference of that war expenditures committee. It was resolved on November 6:

> That a select committee be appointed to examine the expenditure defrayed out of moneys provided by parliament for national defence and demobilization, and for other services directly connected with the war, including the disposal of surplus war assets, and to report, what, if any, economies consistent with the execution of the policy decided by the government may be effected therein.

As a result of the first meeting of the steering committee it was decided that the preliminary investigations should follow along certain lines. On November 20 the steering committee recommended——that the main committee determine its future activities with the understanding that it will first inquire ino the four following subject-matters in the order named, viz:—

1. The Crown Assets Allocation Committee.

That was covered to the extent that we received a report from the president, and asked questions thereon. Then—

2. War Assets Corporation.

That was covered to the extent that we heard half a dozen briefs and were given an opportunity to ask a number of questions. There is still a backlog of questions, the answers to which have been promised by the corporation. Up to this time many very important questions have not been answered. The remaining two were:

3. The Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, Limited.

4. The Wartime Prices and Trade Board.

The stabilization corporation was to be investigated on the basis of certain correspondence asked for in the house by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in connection with the Cardoza charges. And then followed the wartime prices and trade board. Neither of these organizations has been investigated—

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am afraid I must object to this procedure. I do not wish to interfere with the hon. member's right of free speech in the house; but surely the two last-named organizations come under the Department of Finance, and could not possibly come within item 308 which we are now supposed to be discussing.

Mr. PROBE: The steering committee had recommended—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I do not think the hon. member is in order, in the manner in which he is dealing with this item. Item 308 has to do with departmental administration, including expenses incidental to organization.

Mr. PROBE: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, and I shall postpone anything further I have to say on these two items until we reach the estimates of the Department of Finance.

May I at this time rush through some criticisms—and I hesitate to go quickly, because this matter is too important to discuss hurriedly. These are my observations as to what happened in committee, or what failed to happen. The word "farce" still applies, and I thank the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario for it.

From questions asked in committee I am satisfied that there has been considerable disposal of war assets by the Minister of Reconstruction without prior knowledge or recommendation of the officials of War Assets Corporation.

Second, the staff is not familiar with the duties of other departments of War Assets Corporation. That is, there seems to be no interdepartmental liaison.

Third, the reconstruction needs of special areas or groups have not been considered. Perhaps I may be permitted to give one example, namely farm tractors. The list of vehicles sold by the automotive branch, as explained to us on November 27, indicated that 189 farm tractors had been disposed of by War Assets Corporation; 40 of which were sold in Quebec, 102 in Ontario, one in New Brunswick, two in Nova Scotia, two in Prince Edward Island, 28 in Manitoba, one in Saskatchewan, 12 in Alberta, and one in British Columbia. The reason that item comes to my mind specifically is that my province is definitely one of the major agricultural provinces of Canada; it is a province which could make use of tractors, and yet its economic need for that particular type of equipment was not considered. That is contrary to the original terms of the policy set out by the Minister of Reconstruction.

There has not been a proper general advertising of surpluses. The priorities as established on paper by this document entitled "How to buy war surplus materials" are not being honoured. There is an unequal availability of these materials by areas, and the sales by provinces which I have given lend strong support to the point I am trying to make. As of October 31, 1945, the sales by provinces of war assets materials were as follows:

British Columbia	$ 1,817,465 71
Alberta	793,877 82
Saskatchewan	377,895 63
Manitoba	685,081 44
Ontario	16,948,100 57
Quebec	11,216,486 84
New Brunswick	661,031 84
Nova Scotia	479,426 71
Prince Edward Island	145,291 71
Newfoundland	172,272 53
Foreign	4,039,605 90
Dominion government	2,796,629 99
Grand total	$40,133,166 59

No special consideration has been given by War Assets Corporation to the need of equipment by farmers and small industrialists or the special needs of veterans setting up in business for the first time. In fact, these veterans are definitely discriminated against, because the position taken by the corporation is that only dealers who were in business in 1941 are permitted to buy through the regular channels.

Contrary to the policy expressed by War Assets Corporation, the speculator is not being kept out of the picture. This applies particularly to machine tools which are being advertised for sale in the leading papers of Montreal and Toronto by people who have bought them from War Assets Corporation. No attention has been paid to the request of departments of education throughout the country for such things as lens equipment, moving picture projectors, radio transmitting equipment, aircraft frames and engines, kitchen equipment, shop tools for manual training, and things of the kind.

I want to be constructive as well as critical. I brought up some of these points in the committee, and I should like now to indicate briefly what this particular branch of government should be doing. I contend that there should be no direct sales made by the Minister of Reconstruction or his staff without prior advertising in the press of Canada. There should be no distribution on a partial geographic basis. There should be no destruction, that is, making scrap out of what to the casual examiner appears to be worth-while equipment, until provincial and municipal bodies and schools have been given a reasonable opportunity to remove this equipment. The one exception to this would be munitions. If priorities are to be continued as a matter of policy, then they should be made effective. When the crown assets allocation committee notifies War Assets that certain materials are to be allotted to it, at the same time notification should be given to the provincial and federal governments. That would mean only ten copies of a slip indicating the material available, its location, whether used or new and its approximate value. Those bodies should be given two or three weeks to take up their priority. If it is not taken up, then the material could be made available to the general public, with proper advertising of the full particulars of these surpluses.

To let surplus automobiles be distributed by the automobile manufacturers association of this country is ridiculous. Trucks and other merchandise that might be suitable for veterans should be disposed of through the Department of Veterans Affairs. The Minister of Veterans Affairs assured me the other night that he was taking up actively with the Minister of Reconstruction the matter of securing some portion of the tools that are available and which might be used by the veterans. I wish him every success in that. If he does not have any better success in getting that material than we had in getting concrete answers to our questions in the eight meetings of one hour and fifteen minutes each that were held, then the veterans of this country will not receive the consideration that is their due.

A word as to distribution. The ordnance services are still in existence in every military district, and they could be used as distribution agencies for surplus war assets to get these items into the hands of the individuals who need them rather than having them go through the cartels who are going to get them.

Mr. BOUCHER: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to delay the committee, but the government seems to be giving the impression that they do not want an investigation held and the limelight of publicity thrown on the operations of War Assets Corporation.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There is no such impression, and my hon. friend knows it.

Mr. BOUCHER: If my hon. friend has that conviction, he probably reflects the fact that the Minister of Reconstruction has it in his mind and that the cabinet ministers and some members of the government have it in theirs; but let me assure him that it is not in the minds of the Canadian people. They want to know just how this colossal disposal of public property is being taken care of. They want to know whether things are being run correctly. As I listened to the hon. member for Verdun and the hon. member for Labelle I thought that they both spoke too long and said too much for their argument. They explained how the war expenditures committee had met to investigate various matters of war expenditures and economies that needed investigating. I understand that committee held eight meetings. Members had given to them for discussion and consideration eight voluminous briefs, each of which would take a long time to analyse. The members of the committee were told that they were privileged to ask questions on the briefs submitted to them.

The committee got certain advice on certain aspects of this situation, and it made a report. No concurrence in that report was moved in this house, and the same is true of the report of any war expenditures committe which has sat since the beginning of the war. There has been no discussion of those reports in detail. That is not enough where we have a government in power for five or six years, a government which has brought a war to a successful conclusion but which has on hand large volumes of war assets to be disposed of. These are things which are short at the present time; the people are anxious to secure them, and in fairness to everyone I think the greatst publicity should have been given to their disposal.

The government may be sure that everything is all right, and everything may be all right, but I think it would be worth their while having the test of publicity and of public opinion placed upon their actions. If they are so sure that they have the most perfect way of disposing of war assets, they should be ready to convince the members of this parliament that their judgment was right, and through the members of this parliament convince the people of Canada that war assets are being properly, efficiently, wisely and fairly disposed of. That is all we ask; surely that is not asking too much. Even at this late date in the session, if there is anything we can do to get the government to bring publicity to bear on the actions of War Assets Corporation, we will do it. The war expenditures committee has sat for about five years, almost every session since it was first set up.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The item on war expenditures has passed. War expenditures cannot be dealt with on this item.

Mr. BOUCHER: We are dealing with administration and reconstruction, Mr. Chairman, and this is a part of reconstruction. War expenditures have to do with reconstruction as well as with waging war. They deal with the disposal of assets which are a part of reconstruction.

An hon. MEMBER: Louder.

Mr. BOUCHER: I will speak louder, but there are none so deaf as those who will not hear. I might even whisper it in the hon. member's ear. That would be a better way than trying to rush this thing through in the last few moments of the session.

Mr. CHEVRIER: No one is trying to do that.

Mr. BOUCHER: I urge the government to set up the committee early next session, or continue the present committee, if you like; for there is a big work to be done and the public are waiting to be satisfied about what is being done with our war assets. May I appeal to the government to give more publicity to the disposal of this country's goods, to let the public know that everything is being done properly.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What is the value of the war assets which have been sold to the Netherlands government to date, or say up to October 1? What was the original value of the equipment? What price was received for it?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am informed that that question was dealt with by the president of War Assets when he filed before the committee a summary, consisting of from ten to fifteen pages, of the custodian sales to November 30, 1945.

Mr. HACKETT: Can the minister state the value of the assets that have been placed in the possession of War Assets?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That statement was filed by Mr. Berry when he gave his evidence before the committee.

Mr. HACKETT: I want to know the cost.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The total amount is set out in the minutes of proceedings of the committee, No. 6, giving a summary of custodian sales for November 30, 1945. That gives the original cost price, the sales price, the terms, and the percentage realized.

Mr. HACKETT: But that is only up to—

Mr. CHEVRIER: November 30, 1945.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It does not include the sales of assets overseas to the Netherlands government. Another question: What is the amount of commissions paid or allowed by War Assets in the sale of their goods to date?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I think that was the hon. gentleman's question on the order paper. I am sorry I cannot give him that information now, but I will ask the officials of the Department of Reconstruction if they can give him the information.

Mr. PROBE: What amount, if any, of military clothing and equipment has been sold to the Dutch government for use in eastern waters?

Mr. CHEVRIER: If the hon. gentleman is referring to military equipment sold to the Dutch government, that matter comes under the Department of Munitions and Supply. It would be assets that had not been declared surplus to War Assets Corporation, and the Department of Munitions and Supply through its agents would deal with it. On this item I cannot give any more information than that.

Mr. PROBE: The Prime Minister promised us some latitude in asking questions. I am not trying to embarrass the minister unduly. I think it is a fair question.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am not saying it is not. I am saying that the material is in the possession of Munitions and Supply, and is not the property of War Assets Corporation. Until it becomes the property of War Assets Corporation I cannot give my hon. friend the information.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: A moment ago I asked what equipment had been sold to the Netherlands government, and the minister referred me to the summary appearing in the minutes of proceedings, No. 6. But that summary is a summary of custodian sales of lands and buildings disposed of. It has nothing to do with the 130,000 blankets and other materials sold to the Netherlands government.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If my hon. friend will look at the appendix which was filed with the committee on page 98 of the minutes of proceedings, volume 3, he will find there under the heading, Consolidation of Sales Invoices, the total amount of foreign sales, $4,039,605.80. That is not broken down as between Dutch and other governments, but the sales are itemized and the total is given.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

51. Departmental administration, $639,578.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): No one of average intelligence can doubt that we should try to save as much time as we can to-day. If there are no other reasons for it, there is the eagle glare of the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Nevertheless what we are doing now is not simply disposing of a few millions or tens of millions of dollars. What we are really doing is considering the whole basis of the expenditure of sums which to me still look astronomical, and I think it is fair to spend a few minutes on that. I regret very much that we are dealing with this matter in the expiring hours of the session, but that is something that we cannot remedy now.

When I spoke on October 19, commenting on the minister's budget speech, I pointed out that to my great surprise there was no statement of affairs, one might call it, given to the Canadian people. We were told the deficit of this year, and if I remember aright we were told the estimated deficit from November of this year to November of next year, but as I said then, we were given a mass of figures really related to nothing. I felt that we should have some estimate from the minister of our national income and some projection into the future. We were not going to hold him to a million or ten million, nevertheless I felt that we had the right to ask for some statement of our position, and I do hope that we are going to get it now, because I think it is important.

That statement should contain in my opinion a few simple things. It should tell us roughly what we may anticipate in the way of a reduction in the deficit next year, the year after, and so on. I observed with interest that in the budget speech in London of the Chancellor of the Exchequer he grappled in a general way, though only in a general way, with that question, but he did attempt to forecast when they might expect to get to the stage of balancing budgets. Incidentally let me say here—and I think in this the minister will agree with me, if in nothing else that I say—that we hear bandied about now such phrases as "deficit financing", "expanding economy" and so on. These words properly have a place in our financial jargon, our financial vocabulary and perhaps in our financial thinking, but they seem to lead some people who ought to know much better to talk as if you could go on borrowing and borrowing without limit. I hear men who ought to know much better comforting themselves by saying, "It is all right so long as we borrow from ourselves." My understanding is that the minister does not agree with that view, and I think it would be well if he would take occasion to say something on it to-day.

I mention these things because it seems to me they go to the very root of the matter. The minister must be perturbed, as every thoughtful man is perturbed, when he considers the astounding heights to which our expenditures have risen. I do not think I need say any more about that now. I shall wait in the hope that the minister may be able to do what I am asking him to do.

As to my second point, I speak as a new member, and perhaps in some ignorance, and part of what I say may appear somewhat naive; if so, I am sorry. I watch these estimates going through and I see hundreds of thousands of dollars being voted for various items—I am referring now in particular to the supplementary estimates, because I assume that they would have had particularly careful scrutiny—and I ask the minister, because I regard the matter as of great importance, to what extent is the Department of Finance really effectively acting as the watchdog of the treasury?

Let me illustrate what I mean. The other night there was an estimate before the committee for some hundreds of thousands of dollars; it came before the committee and actually there was no explanation given on it until it was asked for from this side. Then an explanation was made in general terms, and it did not seem worth while holding up the business of the committee to cross-examine the minister on this or that item; I do not think we could have done it very intelligently at that point. But can the minister say something to indicate how that sort of thing is handled in his department? When some expenditure is proposed, is it merely a case of the department head saying, "Well, this is a useful expenditure, it will be for the good of the people of Canada"; or is there some yardstick which is being used? Has the minister some budget which he is working to; does he know what we can afford or not afford? Those are two things on which I earnestly hope the minister is able to say something to the committee.

Mr. ILSLEY: What was the item that the hon. gentleman had in mind?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): It was the film board, and the vote, I think, was $335,000. I take that merely as an illustration.

There is another thing I might mention as I am on my feet, although it is really a separate matter. I want the minister to tell us something about the operations of the war-time prices and trade board. I mentioned this to him before. What I suggest is that he might take one of the branches of the department, say food, and let us know how it operates. Also, because I think it is closely related, I should like the minister to say something about the subsidies, and I mean subsidies of all kinds; for example, payments to millers, presumably to keep down the price of flour; payments of freight to bring western grain to the east; all kinds of things which, in my opinion, are in effect subsidies. In elucidating that subject I hope the minister will say whatever he can say as to the policy with regard to subsidies: whether they are confined to the necessaries of life, or as the case may be.

I hope the Minister of Veterans Affairs will think I have been commendably brief. I hope the minister will not be so brief, because I do feel that, in particular, the first question I asked him goes to the very root of the matter. The people of Canada look to him; they respect him; and I would not willingly say anything to add to his burdens. But I think it is one's plain duty to say that we must not be allowed just to wander along hoping for the best. In war time, of course, we had to do that; we could not do anything else. It was not a case of saving money; indeed it was almost a case of determining how fast could we spend money, because we were spending in order to get the munitions of war. Nobody blamed the minister for that; everybody praised him for it. But now the shoe is on the other foot. I sympathize with his difficulties, but sometimes I ask myself, with all proper deference, whether it is possible, having spent tens and hundreds of millions of dollars without really looking at both sides of the nickel, to get down to the present task, which is, as I understand it, to have a plan to work to, and to work to it.

Mr. ILSLEY: The questions are very fair questions. The trouble is that to answer them at all fully would take a long time, and while I do not object to taking a long time I do not think it is the wish of the committee that I should do so.

With regard to the first question—what are our plans for future budgeting?—the answer cannot be very satisfactory, because we are functioning in an atmosphere of great uncertainty at the present time, owing to the unfinished state of the negotiations with the provinces. We made certain offers to the provinces which would involve the assumption of greatly increased social service responsibilities by the dominion government and largely increased subsidy payments to the provinces by the dominion government, and we have no idea whether those proposals will be accepted or not. The provinces have made it fairly clear that they will expect our expenditures and subsidies to be much greater than those which we have proposed, and therefore it is impossible for me to be at all definite as to what our uncontrollable expenditures will be over the next few years. I may mention however that during the last year or thereabouts an interdepartmental committee has been sitting considering dominion-provincial relations and payments from the dominion to the provinces and what responsibilities each should assume. Draft budgets—I think I can call them budgets, although they are not detailed at all—have been prepared covering periods two, three or four years hence, and these are based upon various alternative assumptions in respect of national income. That is, they have been based upon the assumption that our greatest production would be twelve billions or ten billions or eight billions. Perhaps there is another alternative still, but the general principle that will apply to budgeting for the next few years is this, in periods of depressed national income—and by that I do not admit for a moment that we must necessarily have a depression income in any year. But the income in some years will be less than in others. I might describe the years which we shall have to keep in mind as fair, good and excellent, and in a period of high national income we certainly intend to balance our budgets and have surpluses. In certain other years we shall just be able to balance our budgets, while in still other years we shall have to have deficits. I have announced the policy of the government to be to budget not for a surplus each year, as has been the ambition of ministers of finance in past years, but to budget rather for cycles and to face the certainty that if some adverse conditions strike the country it may be as a result of developments beyond our borders. It may be as a result of weather. There are several causes to which such conditions might be attributable, and it might be necessary for us to have deficits. It is impossible for me to place before the House of Commons now a five-year plan—that is a five-year budgeting plan. It is impossible because we have not completed our negotiations with the provinces, and we do not know within—well, I would take a figure of two hundred or three hundred million at any rate—what our expenditures will have to be as a result of agreements that we make with the provinces. That is a matter that we shall have to iron out.

This question was raised. I was appointed chairman of what was called a subconference of the dominion-provincial conference at the time it met in August, and the representatives of one of the provinces asked the same question. They said: "It is all right for you to ask us to enter into these agreements, but what are your plans? Can you tell us what your budget will look like, what your statement of receipts and expenditures will look like in, say, the fiscal year 1948-49 or 1949-50?" I said in reply: "Yes. I can tell you that, on the assumption that our proposals are accepted; but I dare not tell you that without the deletion of a great deal of information, because it involves plans with regard to tax rates, corporation taxation, individual taxation and so forth, which simply cannot be made public." And I can no more make it public in this house than I could before the dominion-provincial conference. Therefore, a minister of finance, it seems to me, in this month of December in this year 1945, is limited to a statement of general principles. The general principles are that we shall have as our objective the balancing of budgets over a period but not to balance budgets every year. Some years we shall have surpluses, some years we shall strike an almost exact balance, and some years we shall have deficits.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

That is a brief answer to the questions which the hon. gentleman has asked. It may be briefer than the exposition of the subject entered into by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I do not know. But I have asked myself several times during the last year whether I should not make a speech somewhere in which I should tell the public of Canada how we hoped to finance and what methods we would use in financing for the next few years—to what extent we would raise money by borrowing, to what extent by taxation, to what extent if any by bank borrowings. But every time I approached the subject I backed away from it. I discussed it with the deputy minister of finance two or three times, and backed away from it because of the uncertainty inherent in that situation and necessarily arising from it. The uncertainty was so great. However, we did go as far as we could in the white paper on reconstruction last spring and also in speeches I made in the victory loan campaign, when I made similar statements. I cannot be more definite.

All we can do is to take it a year at a time. We have been definite about the present fiscal year: everything is before the house; and we shall have to be equally definite for the next year when we present our estimates for the next fiscal year and budget for that fiscal period.

I agree that we should not go carelessly on hoping for the best, but should have some principles on which to proceed, and it may be possible to be much more definite if we are able to come to an agreement with the provinces. If we are not able to come to such an agreement—

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): May I ask the minister a question? The sum of $300,000,000 which he mentioned as being the possible variation according as this or that agreement was made with the provinces surprised me by its size. Will the minister enlarge on that?

Mr. ILSLEY: I would prefer to withdraw it rather than explain it. When I made the statement I said I did not know what figure to use, whether one, two or three hundred millions, because there are so many things that have to be considered. There is the question of our share of a health insurance plan, for example. The total cost of a health insurance plan to the governments, if I remember correctly, is about $250 million a year when fully in operation. The total cost of old age pensions on the basis which we proposed is something like $200,000,000 a year, if I remember rightly—that is for the non-means test old age pensions, those which will be paid to everyone from the age of seventy, regardless of means. Then there is a wide range in the amount which may or may not be payable to the provinces. As regards subsidy arrangements, we have not got down to that. We offered a minimum of $12 per head, rising with national production and with the population of the particular province. Well, I understand, although it has not been very definite, that some provinces think it should be more like $17 per head. What that will work out to I have not dared to write down, but it will make a tremendous difference. And so I am pointing out that when you are dealing with items, several of which are two hundred million or two hundred and fifty million, and you begin bargaining, the swing or variation is not small, when dealing with the provinces. I do not know what we shall agree to. I want an agreement with the provinces, but I cannot agree to an arrangement with them which will make our budgetary position impossible. I cannot do that. The old bad system would perhaps be better than that. The whole thing is that I cannot be definite about the future in the light of present uncertain circumstances.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at two o'clock.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Would it suit the convenience of the minister if I made one or two comments on his answer to the first question?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Anyone who has tried to think about these matters must realize the difficulty the minister pointed out before the luncheon recess. I have two comments to make. He pointed out that one of the great difficulties he faced arises from the fact that we have had no agreement between the dominion and the provinces. I had thought of making no further comment, except the perfectly proper one that this is another indication of the great difficulty which has been experienced by the Minister of Finance, and no doubt other ministers of dominion-provincial relations, in the delay in dealing with this matter, a delay which in my opinion had nothing to do with the welfare of this country.

The minister pointed out the difficulty—and of course it is a real one—of projecting the financial condition of the country. But he did say—and I fully accept the statement, because everyone knows it must be done—that he had made various projections as to such and such a national income, such and such a tax, and such and such expenditures. My suggestion is that more can be told to the people of Canada than has been told. I am not suggesting he should give all details; of course I am not. But there is no reason why the calculations he arrives at as to national expenditures and national income should not be given, on the different bases.

After all, what is being done now is that this is being left to private enterprise. Various responsible people are putting forward these calculations, and I think the calculations I have read have been intelligently prepared. Why should not the people of Canada have that from their own Minister of Finance? Let me say again that I know there are certain details which it would be unwise to ask the minister to put forward, and of course I would not ask it. I proceed with the suggestion that more can be given us than has been given, and that to withhold it is, first of all, to withhold from the people of Canada what is their own business, and, secondly, it is leaving it with other people who are not as responsible as is the Minister of Finance.

I have just one further comment to make. The Minister did suggest that he had in mind making a speech on this subject. I think he said he had considered making it during the victory loan campaign, and stated further that he had considered that he might make it at some other time. I hope a new member has not become too sensitive about the privileges of the house, but I would venture to say to the minister that this body might have the right to expect that a statement of the kind would be made to it. Of course it cannot be made this afternoon, and I am not proposing to say that it should be. As I said this morning, we have not time for that. But I would certainly leave it with the minister that this is something which is not merely of academic interest, but something of interest to every thoughtful citizen of Canada. It is of interest to all responsible people in business, because naturally they are full of anxiety and concern. Why would they not be? We are all full of anxiety and concern. We cannot see the future clearly. I do think, however, that we are entitled to ask the Minister of Finance to take the people of this country into his confidence. In saying this I repeat that there must be due regard to certain things concerning which he would be entitled to maintain certain reservations.

Mr. ILSLEY: The only thing about making a statement of that kind now is that it would be made on certain assumptions which might prove to be unjustified, as a result of our negotiations with the provinces. That is the only trouble with that. It would be confusing. Projections we have made have been on the assumption that our proposals will be adopted exactly as made. There is no indication that they will be. There may be very wide variations from them, and therefore any statement made would be confusing.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Perhaps I did not make myself clear. I am not asking the minister to do it now, although I would point out that even $200 million or $300 million, which is certainly a tidy sum, is not what it was when our total expenditures were $500 million or $600 million. It is not such an overwhelming figure as to dwarf everything else, when our expenditures run into $3,000 million or $3,500 million, as I suppose they will during the next year. However, I am not persisting in that.

I do recognize the difficulty, and what I am talking to the minister about is that as soon as may be possible—perhaps not before this house meets again—we should have a statement to let the people of Canada know what the minister can tell them about their affairs. At the present time I submit that, so far as the minister is concerned, we are just like the babes in the woods; indeed, perhaps we are worse than the babes in the woods, because at least they knew they were lost.

Mr. PROBE: What was the practice with respect to the payment of commissions for the sale of victory bonds to the forces overseas? I notice a large item for expenses in connection with victory bonds. Was the normal practice followed in connection with commissions and, if so, who got the cheques?

Mr. ILSLEY: No commissions were paid for the sale of victory bonds to the armed forces overseas, and no commissions were paid for their sale to employees in plants which were on the payroll plan.

I think I ought to answer the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario first, as to what extent the minister is really the watchdog of the treasury. He wanted information as to how far the Minister of Finance goes in checking expenditures. That is a long story. I have gone into it at various times in the past; I have been frank about it and my frankness has got me into trouble. I have been criticized in the newspapers for what I said, but I think in the long run frankness is probably the best policy. I shall be frank again to-day.

The chief check that the Minister of Finance has on expenditures in time of peace, when we are proceeding on the basis of bringing in estimates in detail before parliament, is in the preparation of the estimates. Normally we begin about November of each year to ask the departments to submit their estimates for the coming fiscal year. The estimates come in; and the staff of the treasury board, without reference to the minister in the first place, go at those estimates and try to have them reduced. They are successful to a considerable extent in having them reduced. But various departments demur, and some go even farther than that and vigorously and violently protest against the proposed cuts. The matter is then taken up by myself with the various ministers and by the treasury board with the various ministers, and after a considerable amount of argument the estimates are still further reduced until they reach the form in which they appear before the House of Commons.

When speaking in this house on a former occasion about non-war estimates I was severely criticized by one of the leading metropolitan newspapers for saying that I considered my responsibilities pretty well finished at that point; they criticized me for abdicating at that stage. But I really do not abdicate at that stage, because many of the expenditures to be made under items passed by the House of Commons must be made under orders in council passed pursuant to various acts of parliament. Time after time I have taken exception to those orders in council. They are then referred to the Department of Finance for study and report by the Minister of Finance.

So far as my own duties are concerned, I have often said that the most difficult thing is not the control of prices; the most difficult thing is not the borrowing of money; certainly the most difficult thing is not taxation; the most difficult thing is not housing; perhaps the most difficult thing, the thing that is hardest on the nerves is the perpetual watching of expenditures made under authority of orders in council. The reason it is such a strain is that unless the Minister of Finance is very careful, an order in council will be passed which in itself may be sensible and wise but which would set a precedent for expenditures to follow which would be most serious from the point of view of further financing or from the point of view of economy in expenditures. That is the practice in time of peace.

In time of war the difficulties of being the watchdog of the treasury are greatly increased. They are greatly increased, not because expenditures have to be so much greater but because of the flexible system we have to have in time of war. We bring in a War Appropriation Act which enables money voted thereunder to be applied to almost any project or purpose. The various departments decide that money should be devoted to this, that or the other purpose, and the responsibilities of the Minister of Finance thereupon become much greater than if the scope of the expenditure were limited by a parliamentary item. That is the reason why all through the war the tendency of the treasury has been to force expenditures into the estimates as much as possible and out of the War Appropriation Act.

I am afraid I am making a self-righteous speech here, talking about other ministers and so on. The treasury may be wrong about this; in fact the treasury is apt to be very wrong in time of war, because action is more important in war than economy. Other ministers with the very best of intentions, men who get action and so on, desire flexibility. They desire the power to put money to this, that or the other purpose, and they find themselves up against this somewhat financially minded Department of Finance which is cramping their style all the time. I do not know whether on balance to take credit for these watchdog operations or not, but they go on to the best of our ability.

We have an institution called the treasury board. With the exception of the Minister of Public Works the other night, who, thank heaven, did say a good word for the treasury board, I cannot remember of anyone ever saying a good word on its behalf. We talk about putting a watch on expenditures, but how much assistance do we get in this house in watching expenditures? Nine-tenths of the speeches in this house are asking for bigger and better expenditures. That was the case all through the last parliament. While this session did not start out in that way, it finally got that way. If the government is making large expenditures, it is not because the ministers are trying to make those expenditures; it is because of public and parliamentary demands for those expenditures. That is why the expenditures are being made. At times I feel as though I am against the whole world when I try to keep a lot of these expenditures down. We just do the best we can, that is all, and keep them down.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Chairman, first I want to say that I realize what the minister is up against. I have been trying myself to avoid making any suggestion for increasing expenditures because I wanted to be in a position to come along and talk about economies. I am perfectly conscious that we on this side have been suggesting expenditures. In fact we had differences of opinion in the ranks of this party no later than last Saturday night.

There is one thing I should like to ask the minister, a thing which I believe goes to the root of the whole matter. I think he will agree that in the next two or three years economies will have to be made that are just beyond anything that have ever been attempted before by the Department of Finance. If things go on as they are now, first of all the minister is going to break his own heart, which would be undesirable and, second, he will fail, which would be even more undesirable from a public point of view.

I ventured when I spoke on the budget to refer to what is called the Geddes committee in Great Britain after the last war, and I was careful to say that I thought that Geddes' axe went too far and probably produced evil results. Nevertheless I do not believe that there is any hope of getting our expenditures down within any reasonable time until the shoe is put on the other foot, and until somebody—and I cannot see anybody else but the Minister of Finance—tells the other departments what they are to have. Otherwise it seems to me the minister is just fighting a heroic battle, if you will, but a losing battle.

Take just one thing mentioned in the house by the hon. member for St. Paul's, the civil service estimates, amounting to $229,000,000, or half as much our whole pre-war budget. Without taking more time I suggest to the minister that the procedure which he has just suggested will utterly fail in the years that are ahead of him. He must devise some entirely new procedure. I understand that in Britain the shoe is more or less put on the other foot, that the treasury there does call the tune; that it tells departments what they can have. I am speaking without any parliamentary knowledge, just looking at it as a business proposition, and it seems to me that as I said before unless the minister does that he will break his heart, and second, he will fail.

Would the minister care to take a single item in the estimates, the film board item or anything else he likes, just to show the committee what happens when a supplementary estimate comes before him? Perhaps he would take one of his own estimates. There is an item at the top of page 22 of the supplementary estimates, 1945-46, $200,000 for printing and stationery. I would be interested to know just what is done, who is responsible, just what technique was followed in having that item inserted? I am just wondering whether the minister was satisfied that somebody looked into that and arrived at the conclusion that that was the amount required, or did somebody just say: We need quite a lot of money and $200,000 will go through as well as any other figure?

One last comment. I hope—and I am going to suggest this to my leader and I think he will be sympathetic—that at the beginning of the next session we are going to say that these estimates will be looked into in a very different way from this time. We shall have a chance to find out what the score is. That has not been possible in the last few days, but next session I hope we shall be able to do it.

Mr. ILSLEY: The item of $260,000, which includes the $200,000 mentioned by my hon. friend, was not given personal attention by me. The officials in my department put it into the supplementary estimates without comment, and I accepted it, having confidence in the officials. The treasury board officials would have received that estimate from the comptroller of the treasury, Mr. B. G. McIntyre. My confidence in Mr. McIntyre would be such, knowing him to be an old employee of the finance department, having been in the department I should say between thirty and forty years, and having a keen appreciation of the importance of economy, and by the very nature of his work being engaged in checking expenditures all the time, that if he said he needed $260,000 I would know it to be true, and that would not be an item I would check.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I would not suggest for one moment that the minister should take his own time to check it. I am speaking earnestly and only with the desire to help him, and with the full conviction that I am right, when I say that unless the minister can devise some scheme which puts the shoe on the other foot he is in for a bad time, and we all are.

Mr. BRACKEN: There was a discussion in the committee of supply the other night on the estimates for the film board, which appear in three different places, in the main civil estimates, in the war estimates and in the supplementary estimates. Could the officials who are with the minister figure out what the total appropriation for the film board is? The total has never been presented to the house. What was the total last year and what is it for this year?

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

Mr. ILSLEY: We will try to get that information and give it a little later.

Mr. ROSS (St Paul's): I do not like to repeat, but I think this will bear repeating. In 1938 we had 44,000 civil servants in this country, and we paid them $88,000,000. In 1945 we had 150,000 civil servants and the amount we paid them for 1944-45 was $229,000,000, according to the return I got. That is about half our normal peace-time budget. My purpose in rising is first to bring that to the attention of the house and the country.

The other thing that I have in mind is this. We have 150,000 civil servants, and with three to a family, this means that 450,000 people in this country are living off 12,000,000. That does not take into consideration the number of civil servants working for the various provincial governments and for municipal governments. That is just a little more than Canada can stand. These 150,000 civil servants have been doing a job and a good job in this war. But that number must be cut down. They are not engaged in constructive effort; they are non-constructive, and what we want to do is put some of them back into useful enterprise. I think that is one of the biggest jobs before the Minister of Finance, the treasury board and the government at the present time. I urge them with all the power at my command to try to cut down this overhead, so that we can cut down the cost of government in this country and reduce the burden of taxation on the individual taxpayer.

Mr. ILSLEY: Before the item carries, I think I should answer the question asked me by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, who wanted me to give some indication of the activities of the wartime prices and trade board. It is hard to cover that subject in a few words. We have an annual report from the wartime prices and trade board which covers the work of the board fully. I presume that the hon. member has read that. He particularly referred to the question of subsidies. He intimated to me very kindly last night that be would be asking me something about subsidies, and I jotted down the main types of subsidies that are paid and the reasons why they are paid. When we imposed the over-all or general price ceiling in the fall of 1941 we realized that some provision would have to be made for imports. That is, if the price of goods went up abroad it would be impossible for importers to import those goods and sell them under the Canadian price ceiling unless they were subsidized. So the first important class subsidy which was authorized was the import subsidy, which has continued from that day to this. The tendency through the years has been to take more and more articles off the subsidizable list. To begin with we subsidized any import, but with a little experience it became apparent that it was hard to justify the payment of subsidies on the importation of certain types of luxuries, so they were taken off the subsidy list. Those are the import subsidies.

The second class of subsidies I want to mention is an interesting class. It was discovered that retailers were selling in some cases in the base period—the period was a few weeks in the fall of 1941—and that their prices during that period were based upon the purchase price of goods which they had bought perhaps six months before. In the meantime the wholesalers' price had gone up so that it would be impossible for the retailers to continue to sell, say in the spring of 1942 and later, unless they were able to buy the goods from the wholesalers at the pre-basic period price, the price which they charged as early as the spring of 1941 or the fall of 1940. So we then paid these roll-back subsidies, subsidies which rolled the wholesalers' price back to the appropriate period which enabled retailers to sell under the price ceiling. That is a second class of subsidy.

As the years went by, costs increased in various ways to certain domestic producers; and while we have not recognized increased wages as a reason for the payment of subsidies, many other costs are recognized as a reason for the payment of subsidies, and domestic subsidies are paid to some industries to enable them to produce and sell under the price ceiling. That is the third class of subsidy.

Another class of subsidy, of which I believe there is only one example, is the milk subsidy, which was undertaken for the specific purpose, not of keeping the price at what it was during the basic period, but to reduce it two cents below what it was in the basic period, in order to prevent the cost of living index from rising unduly. That is a consumer milk subsidy, a very important subsidy, and virtually the only one of its kind. This is the fourth type.

The fifth which I should mention is the bulk trading losses. Some goods are purchased by government agencies and sold to the trade in Canada or to the Canadian public at a loss. This subsidy applies to dried fruits and to some other commodities which I have forgotten for the moment—it is immaterial.

But these are the main types of subsidies. These are the subsidies which are payable by the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, which is the agency of the wartime prices and trade board.

In addition to these, there are production subsidies which are recommended and paid by the Department of Agriculture. They are for the purpose of encouraging or of maintaining production and to some extent correcting inequities as between farmers and other producers in the country. They are substantial. In that class would come the butter subsidy and the fluid milk subsidy—except this consumer milk subsidy I have mentioned; the canned milk subsidy, the cheese subsidies, and some others: there are certain other subsidies paid by the Department of Agriculture.

These are the subsidies. We are getting out of subsidies as fast as we can.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Would the minister say a word about amounts?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. The subsidies on bulk trading losses from December 1, 1941 to September 30, 1945 amounted to $296,288,670.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I have here the price board's report up to December, 1944. It gives the subsidies from the inception in the autumn of 1941 to December, 1944, totalling for the commodity prices board $200 million, and totalling losses on commodity trading at $25 million.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): According to the best additions I can make, if you divide $225 million by three you would have $75 million in the two following years. Including the current fiscal year, the total subsidies are on a much higher scale than that, something in the nature of $150 million.

Mr. ILSLEY: Which year?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am taking the current year. I am looking at the statement of September 28 last, and including such things as millers' subsidies, subsidies for transportation, and so on, and I made it something in the neighbourhoood of $150 million. I do not want to pursue that very far, and if the minister can make a general statement as to whether these subsidies are going up or down I think that will suffice for my purpose at the moment.

Mr. ILSLEY: That Canadian millers' subsidy was not included in the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation subsidy; that is a separate subsidy. But the question the hon. gentleman wants answered is whether they are likely to be less, or much less, in 1945 than in 1944. The trend is down. In the first nine months of 1945 the subsidies payable by the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation amounted to $68,584,697. There are two reasons why they should be coming down. One of the important elements in subsidies was the war risk insurance and high costs of freight on some imports; those have gone down very considerably.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Will the minister say a word as to future policy?

Mr. ILSLEY: We are working on elimination of subsidies. Some of the subsidies have been eliminated already. We intend to get out of these subsidies just as soon as we can. It is a question always whether it is desirable to authorize a price increase or to continue the subsidy; in some cases one seems to be desirable, and in some cases the other seems to be desirable.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): That matter of price suggests one question I should like to ask. Are the price controls to be increasingly applied merely to necessaries? I pointed out to the minister the other day that it is a serious thing if the price of food rises, but, except to a limited class of the community, it is not a serious matter if the price of jewellery rises. That is an exceptional case. But what is the policy? Is it that as quantities become adequate the minister will take the price controls off?

Mr. ILSLEY: The main reason for price controls is shortage, and when the conditions of shortage disappear the reasons generally for the controls will I think have pretty well disappeared also.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): But I mean when they disappear specifically, in any particular case.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not so easy to answer. I could talk about this a long time, but we have not the time for it. However, I have discussed the matter with the officials and I have put this question to them: Why can you not take the price ceiling off jewellery and a long list of other things? We have gone into that question very fully, and it is extraordinarily difficult to do it unless you see the end of price control in sight, because you cannot pick out any class of things that do not enter in some form into the cost of other things. As I say, I have no time to enter into it in detail but it is most difficult. The policy now is an over-all price ceiling, with an increasing tendency towards increases on certain articles.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. WRIGHT: When the Americans lifted their price ceiling, how did it affect the amount of subsidies we had to pay in Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: They did not lift their ceilings on articles that we were subsidizing.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am sorry to be so disobliging, but I am not making any apologies. This is a serious matter. I do not find myself immediately convinced by what the minister has said about not being able to lift the price in any one case because of its effect on others. I am not disputing that that may to some extent be true, but if that argument is pushed very far it may result in continuing controls beyond the point where any of us would like to see them. One question the minister has not answered is this, and I will make it specific, so as to take up as little time as possible. I do want a picture, very brief, of just how one specific control works. Take food. I was in a little store in my riding and I imagine the amount of groceries in it would not occupy the space of more than twice the size of that table. An inspector had been in during the afternoon checking up what was there. I do not say that he was checking groceries particularly. In fact, two inspectors had been there that afternoon. Will the minister indicate how far the control goes in the case of food, how it gets down to the small man, and what is being inquired into when the small man is investigated?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a retail price ceiling on the articles that are identical with those sold in the basic period. He must sell at basic-period prices unless there has been an order raising the ceiling on those particular articles. If there are different types of articles there have been orders fixing the respective price ceilings under which he must sell. It may have been an order fixing the wholesale price, with a mark-up permitted him. They are circularized and informed of the prices and the enforcement branch makes checks to see that they are complying with the law. New price fixations run from six thousand to seventy-five hundred per month.

Mr. BRACKEN: The minister spoke of the wartime prices and trade board. Is that the organization that administers meat rationing?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BRACKEN: Is there any thought of discontinuing meat rationing?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; there is no thought of doing so. I do not mean that we shall always have it, but there is no thought at the moment of discontinuing it.

Mr. WRIGHT: The minister said in answer to my question that price ceilings had not been lifted in the United States on articles subsidized coming into Canada. I understand that on oranges in the United States the price ceilings were lifted and subsidies were paid on them coming into Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: We have not subsidized oranges since the 1st of January, 1945.

Mr. BRACKEN: Has the minister with him at the moment any advisers who are familiar with meat rationing?

Mr. ILSLEY: Moderately so, I think. The rationing experts are not here, but the officials who are present could give some advice.

Mr. BRACKEN: I remember when the minister was dealing with this matter two or three months ago he indicated that there had been a tripartite arrangement on the part of Britain, the United States and Canada, in which the United States and Canada undertook to increase the supply of meats sent to the old country and to liberated countries. A meeting was called by President Roosevelt, as I remember. Can he tell me when that meeting was held.

Mr. ILSLEY: In April, 1945.

Mr. BRACKEN: At that time this government undertook to send more meat to the old country. If I remember rightly the government was sending sixty million pounds per month and it undertook to send about seventy-five million pounds per month, and to do that it was proposed by rationing to reduce the average amount consumed in Canada from, I believe, 145 pounds to 130 pounds per capita. I believe that is correct —the difference was about fifteen pounds.

Mr. ILSLEY: It was from 145 to 115, but we undertook to raise it to a little over 130.

Mr. BRACKEN: That was to make it possible to send additional amounts overseas.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not to send more than we sent in 1944, but to live up to the programme that we had outlined as appropriate for us in 1945—more than we otherwise would send.

Mr. BRACKEN: After coming back from that conference you undertook to increase the amount you were then sending overseas.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, yes; I think that is correct—more than we otherwise would send. It was going down, if I remember correctly, and we wanted to keep up the programme.

Mr. BRACKEN: When dealing with the question of meat rationing the minister made that statement. It is reported at page 393 of Hansard. My point is this. The government proposed to increase the amount of meat it was sending overseas at that time. It did so at the very time when it knew that meat production in Canada was going down by double the amount by which it proposed to increase the supply for overseas shipment. The minister will find, by analyzing his own statement at page 393, in the first eight months of this year 270,000,000 pounds less of meat was produced than in the same period last year, 30,000,000 pounds a month less, and the government, in the face of that, undertook to send 15,000,000 pounds more a month overseas. My question is: Why did you not bring in meat rationing then?

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member is referring to April? Why did we not bring it in earlier than we did?

Mr. BRACKEN: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: There was a good deal of opposition to it and it was something that could not be brought about abruptly. Many preparations were necessary for it and the matter was considered for quite a period before we decided upon it.

Mr. BRACKEN: The only point I wish to make is this, and it will all be found in the minister's own statement. He proposed in September to increase the amount of meat we were sending by 15,000,000 pounds a month, and to do that he asked the Canadian people to eat less. In the very same address and in his own figures he pointed out what the bureau of statistics had always known, that the production of meat in Canada as shown by the slaughterings of live stock was down by more than thirty million pounds a month. My question is: when the government knew that and knew it would have to bring in rationing, why did it not bring in rationing then instead of leaving it until September?

Mr. ILSLEY: It was decided to bring it in long before September, but a great deal of preparation was necessary. I think it was decided about July. The middle of the summer, in the hot weather, is a bad time to bring in meat rationing, and there was continual argument about it. A great many people thought meat rationing would not increase the amount of meat available for overseas; that there would be so much opposition to it, so much friction, and so on. We had a great deal of opposition and friction; we must not forget that. We had a strike of miners in Alberta lasting for more than a month following the introduction of meat rationing. We had a butchers' strike in Montreal, and we had endless delegations. We persisted, however, and it was the right thing to do; but the restoration of meat rationing was not something to be entered into lightly.

Mr. BRACKEN: I suggest that the opposition to rationing, whatever it was, should not have been allowed to influence the government to postpone that decision when it knew it was increasing the amount of meat going overseas and when it also knew that at the same time production in Canada was down almost twice as much a month as in the previous year. The government undertook to send an additional fifteen million pounds a month overseas at the very time it knew production was down thirty million pounds a month compared with the previous year. Yet it did not bring in rationing until September. The reduction in production was known to the government in January of this year. Its own statistics show that from 200,000 to 300,000 fewer hogs were killed each month from January onward during the first half of this year.

Public debt charges—Servicing of public debt—
60. Commission for payment of interest on public debt, services of fiscal agents, London, registrar's fees, etc., $280,300.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I wish to ask just one question in regard to the figures shown for the provinces, a statutory item following this one. Do these figures still stand, or has anything that has happened in the interval caused them to be altered? Are these still the working figures?

Mr. ILSLEY: These figures still stand with the exception of the figure for Alberta, which was raised the other day by legislation.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: There is also a statutory item covering the interest on the public debt. Could the minister give us a comparison of this item for 1945-46 with the same item for 1939-40? I see the increase this year is $79,253,628, and I am just wondering whether the debt increased in the same proportion as the public debt charges.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would have to send for the 1939-40 figures; I have not them here.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The minister could not give me any approximate idea?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; I have not those figures here.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous grants and contributions—federal district commission—
66. Maintenance and improvement of grounds adjoining government buildings, Ottawa, and improvements to the parkway system under the control of the federal district commission, $133,500.

Mr. MacNICOL: I understand that the grounds around these parliament buildings now are cared for by the federal district commission. Is that correct?

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot be sure about that. I thought the public works department had something to do with it, but from this it would seem that the federal district commission looks after the grounds.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am told that they are now cared for by the federal district commission, and I wish to make this comment. Until last year the grounds around these buildings were kept beautifully, and we had flower beds which really enhanced the appearance of the grounds. Last year, however, because they were not cared for by the same staff, the flower beds were allowed to run into the grass, particularly at the west end of this building. I do not know that the commission is doing as good a job as our own men did. Previously the work was very well done, and I have often wondered why the care of the grounds was turned over to the federal district commission. Certainly they are not as beautiful as they were.

General—
68. To provide for the expenses of the comptroller of the treasury's office, $5,122,560.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): There is an increase of $2,000,000 in this item. What are the reasons for that?

Mr. ILSLEY: The increase here is $1,903,040. The vote provides for salaries and expenses of the comptroller of the treasury's office. The Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, provides for the appointment of the comptroller of the treasury for the purpose of maintaining more complete control over the administration of the consolidated revenue fund. The act assigns the following duties to the comptroller:

(1) The issue of public moneys out of the consolidated revenue fund by cheque, or other instrument as directed by the treasury board.

(2) Certification that there is a balance available in the appropriation by parliament for the specified service, before any issue of public funds shall be made.

(3) Certification that there is a sufficient unencumbered balance available out of the amount authorized by parliament for the particular service to pay any commitments before any contract or undertaking involving a charge on the consolidated revenue fund is entered into.

Since the outbreak of war, there has been a large increase in the work performed in many of the offices of the comptroller owing to enlarged war-time staffs and increased expenditures. Funds have been made available under the war appropriation, however, for expenditures in connection with distinctly war services.

There is a statement in regard to the increases, but I think it is too long to read.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I do not want the minister to read a long statement, but here is an increase of $2,000,000 or about 66 per cent in the expenditures of the comptroller's office in one year, and it comes at the end of the war. There must be some substantial explanation for that. Really I am wondering whether some other expenditures have crept in there, because it is hard to understand why the amount should be almost doubled.

Mr. ILSLEY: Here are some of the items: promotional and annual increases, $113,700; net increase resulting from transfers between normal and war staffs, $69,495. Those are small, but look at this: increase for national health and welfare, $656,500.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Would the minister explain just what that is? Is that in connection with family allowances?

Mr. ILSLEY: Largely.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Why is that expenditure not carried by national health and welfare? I do not understand that. We have heard quite a lot about the very low cost at which that was operated, and it is astonishingly low. I could operate at a low cost, too, if somebody paid all my expenses.

Mr. ILSLEY: Our system is that when departments pay money they pay through treasury officers. We have our treasury officers, officers of the comptroller of the treasury, in all the departments of government. Very often they are almost regarded as officers of that department, although in actual fact they are really officers of the Department of Finance. If I am correctly informed, that system was introduced in 1931, when the new act was passed. It was considered a reform, and perhaps it is, because it places under the Department of Finance the actual paying of money in all departments.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I do not think I need question the matter farther. I did not ask for complete details, and the minister has explained in a general way. I suppose we have to accept it as it is. There is no system whereby a civil servant is graded according to the number of employees he has under him, is there?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Insurance—

89. Departmental administration, $180,830.

Mr. BRACKEN: Would the minister answer the question I asked respecting the film board?

Mr. McCANN: The expenditures of the film board are in three or four places, and perhaps therein lies the difficulty in finding out what the total expenditures have been. In the main estimates is an item of $810,000, which has already been passed. The details of this are found at page 147 of the estimates.

Mr. BRACKEN: I do not wish to have details. However, we were aware that the items chargeable to this service were to be found in different places. They were not given to us at one time. I just wished to have the totals for this year and last year.

Mr. McCANN: In the main estimates there is an item of $810,000; in the supplementary estimates there is one of $335,000, and under the War Appropriation Act there is an item of $1,280,000, giving a total estimated expenditure of $2,425,000. This amount does not include the $500,000 in a revolving fund, which is recoverable. In 1944-45 the ordinary expenditures were $775,000, with an additional $1,341,000 under war appropriations, making a grand total of $2,116,000 for that year, as compared with $2,425,000, plus $500,000 in the revolving fund, for 1945-46.

If the hon. member is interested in the details in respect of the main part of the item, which came under national war services and amounted to $1,280,000, he would find that detail in Hansard for Friday, September 28.

Mr. BRACKEN: I was not in search of detail. What the minister has given is exactly what I wanted. These amounts were available somewhere and, while I am not suggesting that anyone hid them, we could not find the complete story.

Mr. McCANN: Well, does what I have said answer the question?

Mr. BRACKEN: Yes.

Mr. McCANN: I admit it would be much clearer if the various expenditures were consolidated. In past years I have found myself in exactly the same position as the leader of the opposition finds himself in to-day, where it took a lot of ferreting out to determine what the total expenditures in a department might be.

Mr. BRACKEN: The moral to be drawn from this is that it seems to me that when these estimates are brought forward someone should give the committee a frank and full picture of each service, stating that there is so much here, so much there, and so much somewhere else, and that it adds up to a certain amount.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Under this item for departmental administration I should have asked if there has been any discussion between the dominion and the provinces with a view to having a little less by way of insurance departments than we have at the present time throughout the country.

Mr. ILSLEY: That matter was mentioned at the last meeting of the coordinating committee, attended by the premiers, but it was not discussed for any considerable time. I should hope that it would be discussed later. It must be remembered, however, that the provinces have always been most retentive of their jurisdiction.

458. Royal Canadian Mint, including the Dominion of Canada assay office, further amount required, $47,245.

Mr. ADAMSON: I put several questions on the order paper respecting overages at the Royal Canadian Mint. I received a letter in the matter this morning, and I understand that all overages at the mint go into the consolidated revenue fund, whether they arise from the operation of the cotrelle, or from sweepings.

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot answer that.

Mr. ADAMSON: Could the minister find out from his officers and let me have the information later?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Income Tax Division—

225. General administration, including authority to create positions and make appointments within the division, notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act and the said positions and staff so appointed are hereby wholly excluded from the operation of the said act, $888,073.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What has the department done in connection with preparing a more simplified form of income tax return to be made out by those engaged in agriculture? I understand that an attempt is being made to spread the income tax over a five-year period. The minister said earlier that the department was doing something in connection with preparing a simplified form, and had hoped to have something ready at this time. I do not want a long statement, but I want something that will be comprehensive.

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue): The question of income tax assessment of farmers and ranchers was raised some time ago in the house, and I undertook then to make a statement indicating the basis on which they are assessed, having in mind two particular problems; first, cash versus inventory and, second, what might be called dispersal sales by ranchers and farmers of their cattle.

I am advised that farmers and ranchers are assessed on either the cash disbursed and cash income or on an accrual or inventory basis. The cash basis, as its name implies, takes into account only the cash received and the cash paid out during the taxation year. At the inception of the Income War Tax Act farmers as a class did not keep accurate accounting records, and to a lesser degree that still is substantially true. In the main they only keep memoranda regarding the money received and the money spent. Because of this, farmers, unlike other business concerns, were permitted to use the cash basis and to report as income that which they paid out, the difference representing the income on which they were taxed. This method fitted in with the factual position of farmers, and found general acceptance by farmers because it was simple and could be easily understood. As stated, they regarded that which they sold for cash in the year of sale and that which they bought for cash in the year of purchase as representing income and outgo. They set one off against the other, and the difference indicated their income for that year. This method of determining revenue and expense does not apply to capital assets that were bought or sold during the year, that is, farm machinery was not an expense in the year of purchase. It was a capital expenditure and was subject to depreciation. Likewise machinery sold was not brought into revenue account.

The second system was, as stated, the accrual or inventory basis. This requires the maintenance of proper accounts and records, taking into consideration not only the cash receipts and the cash outlays but maintaining an accurate record as to inventory of live stock, grain and other revenue producing assets on hand at the beginning and end of each year, so that the cost thereof could be carried forward and offset against the sales in the year of sale. Likewise it required the maintenance of a record of accounts receivable and accounts payable. The number of farmers using this accrual basis is in fact very small. Generally speaking it is not their practice. They are not accustomed to it. They are not skilled in it and, generally speaking, they find it difficult and confusing. The practical application of the income tax law was therefore on a cash basis.

There were practically no objections raised to farmers reporting on a cash basis until the advent of war and the resultant increase in their sales, particularly of live stock at substantially increased prices. Herds had been built up by farmers. The cost of raising or purchasing, maintaining, attending and feeding the cattle had been allowed as an expense in years prior to their sale. Thus all expenses over successive years were taken during the successive years as an expense against whatever income there might be in those years from all sources. The herd, by natural increase or by purchase, continued to grow—that is, expenses continued successively over the years—but no substantial sale of cattle took place. Then a sale of a substantial portion of the stock did take place. The sale price as usual was income in the year of sale. The farmer perhaps felt aggrieved that in the year of the substantial sale of cattle he should be called upon to declare his income on the cash basis, even though that was the usual basis.

Now it is quite clear that he has laid the foundation over the years in respect of which his assessment should be levied, but the high rates of tax, together with the high income, with the resultant heavy tax, creates in him a sense of dissatisfaction. His tax will be much higher than that which he has normally been paying over the past years. Not having felt the weight of such a heavy tax he feels that there is something wrong in asking him to pay a heavy tax in the year of substantial sale on the mere basis of relativity when compared with the prior years of small tax liability.

The taxation division, appreciating the difficulties and the concern of such farmers, under date of February 24, 1944, instructed the inspectors of income tax across Canada that any farmer or rancher who had previously filed his return on a cash basis but who desired to change to an accrual basis would be permitted to do so, and outlined the procedure to be followed in such cases. Briefly the procedure was as follows: First, ascertain the inventory of cattle, grain, et cetera, on hand at December 31, 1935; second, tax that inventory as income of 1935 along with the income of 1935 previously reported; and third, adjust subsequent returns in accordance with the inventory at the end of each year.

The instructions also indicated that where actual inventories could not be accurately determined, a reasonable estimate of such inventories would be accepted, provided that in future the farmer or rancher took actual annual inventories. The inventory values were to be taken having regard to the appropriate stock market and grain market reports in the locality of the taxpayer at the various dates. The effect of this ruling was to spread the income arising from a substantial sale over a number of back years, including the year of sale, instead of considering the total receipts as income of the year of sale. This resulted in relief from an excessive tax burden to the farmer by ascribing his income to the years during which the inventory grew in value.

This method is dependent entirely upon the farmer being prepared to go in future on an accrual basis and keep accurate records henceforth of cattle, grain, et cetera, inventories, accounts receivable, accounts payable, et cetera—in other words to maintain a proper accounting system, if he continues in business. There are no statistics of the number of farmers or ranchers who have changed from a cash basis to an accrual basis, although on general knowledge they are believed to be comparatively few.

Another problem arose in connection with farmers who were giving up business and selling their entire herd and inventories in a bulk sale. The claim was made that it was unfair to tax in one year the proceeds of the sale of stock which had been acquired over a number of years. Again it had to be pointed out that the cost of raising or purchasing that stock had been allowed as an expense of previous years, and having returned their income on a cash basis the cash received on a bulk sale was strictly income of the year of sale. It was realized, however, that some injustice would be occasioned by taxing on this basis, and the taxation division has permitted a spreading back of the proceeds of the bulk sale over a period of three to five years, including the year of sale.

In doing this several factors have to be taken into consideration, that is, the inventories, accounts receivable and payable, et cetera, at the end of each of the three or five years, and in many cases they have to be estimated. In any case relief from an excessive tax burden enures to the farmer. At page 2745 of Hansard of November 30, the hon. member for Souris suggests an example be given of how such a method would be worked out. We will take his arbitrary figure of a bulk sale in 1945 of $10,000. Assume that the farmer's inventory was as follows:

1941	$4,000
1942	5,500
1943	7,000
1944	8,500
1945	10,000

Instead of taxing the total proceeds of the sale of $10,000 in 1945 the taxation division would be prepared, if there were no other factors to be taken into consideration, that is, accounts payable, et cetera, to deem $4,000 to be income of 1941 and $1,500 to be income of each of the four subsequent years. Most cases are not as simple as this, and all factors have to be taken into consideration in coming to a conclusion, but the fact remains in the case of a bulk sale where the farmer is going out of business, a reasonable adjustment is made. The inspector of income tax is always ready to discuss and recommend adjustments in the matter of bulk sales by farmers.

Questions have been raised as to the taxation of the proceeds of breeding animals. Inasmuch as the cost of purchasing or raising such animals has been allowed as an expense, the proceeds of sale represent taxable income. Indeed, the animal may be considered a breeder to-day and to-morrow be slated for re-sale. It is suggested that it is part of the farmer's merchandise; that is, what he deals in, and therefore on sale returnable as income.

With regard to the taxation of the proceeds of wheat participation certificates, the treatment of such is covered by order in council P.C. 6020 of August 1, 1944, which provides that any additional tax found due by reason of including the amount received from the encashment of wheat participation certificates with other income of the farmer in the year of encashment over and above that tax which would have been claimed if the farmer had been taxable in the year of receipt of the wheat participation certificate be remitted in any individual case.

Finally, it might be pointed out that by the 1944 statutes, section 4, subsection 5, chapter 43, provision is made for spreading a loss sustained by a farmer over a number of years, that is, one year back and three years forward; thus a loss sustained in 1944 could be claimed first against the 1943 income, and if not recouped in that year, then successively against 1945, 1946 and 1947.

I think that with that comprehensive statement on the record, hon. members interested who give it a little study will find that it covers in as clear a manner as it is possible to do it the whole question which the hon. gentleman has raised.

Income tax division—
226. Internal inspection and verification, $445,774.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): To what extent is the auditor general responsible for auditing the receipts of this department?

Mr. McCANN: The accounts of the Department of National Revenue taxation division come under the audit of the auditor general in exactly the same way as the accounts of any other department.

Item agreed to.

Income tax division—
227. District offices, $11,075,604.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Would the minister explain this substantial increase? Then I wish to make one comment.

Mr. McCANN: The increase is due almost entirely to the enormous increase in staff. No department of government has, I think, grown more rapidly in war years—that is, of all the older departments of government—than has the taxation division of the Department of National Revenue. The expenditures for salaries in 1944-45 were $6,250,000, and for 1945-46, $8,775,000, an enormous increase.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): What was the expenditure two years back?

Mr. McCANN: I have only the figures for one year preceding.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Has the expenditure jumped up this year more than usual?

Mr. McCANN: No; there has been a fairly gradual growth during the past four or five years of war.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I just wish to make this comment. This increase in expenditure represents a great increase in staff. I do not suppose that it is any mystery to any of us why it is necessary; but I point this out, having regard to what the Minister of Finance said last October, that it was not proposed yet to have a full-dress inquiry into our system of income tax collection, that the time was not yet opportune. I think he was wrong then, and I think he is even more wrong now if it is delayed any longer, for every time we engage a lot more staff—that is inescapable, no doubt—the thing gets more and more set and it becomes harder to make a change. You have more people doing things that you have to change if you adopt a new system. I earnestly suggest to the two ministers concerned that every month they delay does not make it any easier; it only makes it harder. It is a matter that should not be delayed. I am not going to repeat any of the things I said two months ago, particularly because I see that the deputy minister is here. What I said then were strong things, and they were fully accepted throughout the country. Most people are groaning under the various things they groan under in connection with the income tax, apart from the amount of tax they pay, and I earnestly suggest that this inquiry should no longer be delayed, for every month of delay makes the system harder to change. A full-dress and comprehensive inquiry should be instituted at once.

Mr. MacNICOL: The details given on page 146 show that the staff of the district offices has increased by 1,168, and that the staff of the main taxation division has increased by a substantial number. That, of course is to be expected. The details also show that the expenditure for temporary help has gone up by $1,029,000. That is for temporary help, not likely to become permanent?

Mr. McCANN: The increased expenditure has been due to the increased amount of work. During the war years employees were taken on in the department only on a temporary basis. I think the increase in the temporary staff is a little more than the increase in the permanent staff. But it has been due entirely to the increased amount of business and the fact that these employees were not taken into the permanent service during the war years.

Mr. MacNICOL: I quite appreciate that. What is the explanation of the increase of 1,168 in the permanent staff?

Mr. McCANN: That is following the policy of the government in all departments to give employment to returned men and women from the armed services.

General—

228. Amount to be paid to the Department of Justice to be disbursed by and accounted for it to customs, excise and income tax secret investigation services, $15,000.

Mr. McKAY: This amount of $15,000 is apparently for secret investigation services in connection with customs, excise and income tax. Is this a separate service conducted by the Department of Justice, or is it part of the work of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police? Have the results justified the expenditure?

Mr. McCANN: This item has to do with services in connection with customs, excise and income tax investigations. Certain people have to be paid a moiety for the amount of work which they do in connection with these investigations. Payments are made on the approval of the deputy minister in whatever division the investigation takes place.

Mr. McKAY: Is it separate, or is it under the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

Mr. McCANN: Although the Royal Canadian Mounted Police do some work for the customs and excise division these payments are to what might be called casual informers.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

582. Departmental administration — further amount required, $40,480.

Mr. HAZEN: I am sorry that neither the Minister of Trade and Commerce nor the Minister of Agriculture is here, for there is a question I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce under this item. It is brought to my attention that a large quantity of seed potatoes has been sold from the province of New Brunswick to Spain. All seed potatoes from the province of New Brunswick, I am informed, are sold or supposed to be sold through the special products board of the Department of Agriculture, except those that are sold to Venezuela and the United States and, I think, to Cuba. Under the regulations of the special products board the dealers or shippers of New Brunswick have the business divided between them on a quota basis. All exports are filled by the dealers and handled through the special products board. For example, F. W. Pirie Company, Ltd., of Grand Falls, N.B., got about 16 per cent of the business; Porters Ltd., of Perth, N.B., got 16 per cent; McCain Products Co. Ltd., of East Florenceville, N.B., got 16 per cent; and Hatfield Industries Ltd., of Hartland, N.B., got 16 per cent; the rest is divided among the smaller dealers. My information is that this large sale of seed potatoes to Spain is not being made through the special products board, as sales are supposed to be made; that the dealers or shippers of New Brunswick were not notified of the sale, that they were not given their fair share of the business, but that, in some way which should be explained, one dealer or perhaps more who possibly had some pull with the government was given the business. The special products board, I am informed, in reply to inquiries which were made a day or two ago, refused to give the quantities of potatoes that were being shipped or the names of the shippers. The board stated that it was done under a private agreement—whatever "a private agreement" may mean. The transaction, I believe, is contrary to the regulations; it is not playing fair with the shippers and dealers; it has the ear-marks of somebody having some particular pull; and it seems to me that light should be thrown on the transaction.

I ask the minister these questions: Have seed potatoes been sold to Spain? If so, how many were sold and at what price; what shipper or dealer supplied the potatoes, and if there was more than one, who were they and how much did each supply? What was the date of the contract and what were its terms? Has an export permit been issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce; and if so, for what quantities was it issued, and when? Was the sale made through the special products board? If it was not made through that board, how was it made, and when? Why were not all the shippers or dealers in New Brunswick permitted to share in the business?

These are questions which, I think, should be answered. It is difficult to understand, if this sale has gone through, why it did not go through in the regular way and why all the shippers or dealers in New Brunswick did not get their fair share of the business.

Mr. McCANN: I must admit that I am not in a position to answer the question, and there is no use in bluffing about it. I am only handling these supplementary estimates for the Minister of Trade and Commerce in his unavoidable absence from the house; but I think I can assure the hon. gentleman that the questions as indicated on Hansard will receive the personal attention both of the minister and his staff and that the answers will be sent to the hon. member for St. John-Albert.

Mr. HAZEN: I thank the minister very much. I shall appreciate it if the minister will do that.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Normal services—

181. Grants to military associations and institutes, as detailed in the estimates, $10,425.

Mr. PROBE: I want to make a very short plea at this stage on behalf of the Canadian men and women in the army of occupation. I have had quite a number of letters, as no doubt all hon. members have, concerning conditions in Europe. I have summarized them briefly, and I should like to have the Minister of National Defence make some statement with respect to them. The most common allegation at the moment is with respect to the inadequacy and bad quality of food received by other ranks in the army of occupation. I was over there at a time when the black market situation was not too good, in France particularly, and United States and Canadian boys were penalized because advantage was taken of the quartermaster. It seems to me that if the men are suffering as a result of this, the Minister of National Defence may have means of investigating it.

The second important criticism which is commonly received is a protest about the lack of educational and vocational training for the occupation troops. I know that an elaborate scheme was set up to provide that material over there, and I wonder whether it has fallen down, whether the staffs have left the continent and the boys are limited to their own initiative.

The third matter is with respect to lack of proper recreational facilities. I have here a number of clippings from the Overseas Maple Leaf as late as the 28th and 29th of November complaining about that. I will not read them, but I should like to know what facilities are available.

Of course there is also the perennial complaint, arising from considerable resentment, that former combat men, some of whom were wounded in action, are placed in the army of occupation while N.R.M.A. men have been returned to Canada. Might we have a brief statement from the minister explaining how he is safeguarding the morale of the army of occupation?

Mr. ABBOTT: First, on the question of food: as I said a little while ago, the rations which our men are receiving are exactly the same as the rations issued to the British troops. We have always supplied our troops with the same ration, but we are supplementing it to some extent with fruit juices. The basic ration however is the same as that received by the British army of occupation.

Mr. PROBE: And they are getting it?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have had no complaints as to the inadequacy or bad quality of the ration. The ration on the continent was cut, as I announced in the house some little time ago. Formerly, when the troops were engaged in combat service, there was a surplus ration. Now the ration is the same for all the troops of occupation, that is all the commonwealth troops.

Mr. PROBE: The British standard, supplemented by—

Mr. ABBOTT: Supplemented by fruit juice. As to the lack of vocational and educational facilities, this is the first complaint I have heard. We are doing our best to see that these facilities are provided and will continue so long as our troops are there. As to the provision of recreational facilities, my hon. friend will appreciate that it is somewhat difficult to maintain the same standard and quality of concert parties as we had when more of the troops were there. An effort is being made to see that these facilities are provided because we realize how important it is to the morale of the troops. As regards combat men being retained in the army of occupation when N.R.M.A. men and others are not sent there, the answer is that you cannot run any army with totally inexperienced men, or men with a low degree of training. It has been necessary therefore, in the army of occupation, to have some high-point men who have seen combat service to provide the necessary discipline and supervision, but they are being replaced as rapidly as shorter service men can be sent forward.

LEGISLATION

House of Commons—
117. The Speaker of the House of Commons—salary and motor car allowance, $7,000.
Allowance in lieu of residence, $3,000.
The deputy speaker of the House of Commons—salary, $4,000.

Mr. ADAMSON: I wish to make a suggestion which I think is very timely. We have watched these estimates going through, having sat here nearly a month, meeting at eleven o'clock in the morning and sitting until eleven at night. Some of the estimates have been rushed through with the everlasting complaint of insufficient discussion. First of all I would ask the government to set up the rules of the house committee as one of the first of its acts at the next session of parliament, and to see to it that the committee meets. This session we had only one meeting, and only covered one-eleventh of the work of the previous committee. We brought in only one recommendation.

There is a second suggestion I have to make. The proceedings of the house in the last few weeks have become a travesty. We are ceasing to be an efficient instrument of democracy. We are losing our efficiency, and are ceasing to carry out the function of expressing the will of the people. This is a serious situation. I wish to make one complaint here and now, and to carry on from where the Minister of Labour left off the other day. I suggest that consideration be given the question of having estimates reviewed in a committee of the house before being brought on to the floor, and that when they are brought in here they come down as one item. All contentious debate could be held at this time. The external affairs committee passed through this house, to-day or yesterday, a resolution that the estimates of that department be put through the special committee first. There has been a resolution, and there is general agreement, that the national defence estimates should go to a committee on national defence and be discussed there. I shall not discuss the obvious advantages of being able to have experts questioned orally instead of having them here mumbling and passing over to the minister a piece of paper of which the minister may or may not have full comprehension.

I suggest further that we follow the British practice and institute a limitation upon debate. This session we have had long debates on the speech from the throne and on bill 15. They may have been important debates; possibly that on bill 15 was. But frankly we do a lot of beating the air. The debate on the speech from the throne was not of great importance. I suggest to the government that at the next session serious consideration be given to the limitation of these debates which have been so long, so that we shall not go through the travesty of bringing in estimates as we do and behaving as we have done in the last two or three weeks. Parliament is on trial at this moment as never before.

Mr. MACKENZIE: On behalf of Mr. Speaker, who is in charge of the estimates, may I refer for one moment to the observations of my hon. friend. His leader asked me a question yesterday morning when I was not in the house, and I replied to the question since then indicating the determination of the government to have that committee set up as soon as possible after the next session is convened. Every single point which my hon. friend has referred to was carefully considered by that committee last year. The question of having estimates referred to committees was one upon which we could not agree, and as regards the limitation of debate we made specific recommendations to the house. We did not however receive great respect or support from the house when our report came in. I hope that at the next session the committee, whoever its members may be, will have greater success than we had last year in regard to the very constructive suggestions of the hon. gentlemen.

Mr. ADAMSON: I suggest that the degree of desperation that is obviously prevalent in this house now may bring results when the committee meets again.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am sorry my hon. friend feels that way.

Item agreed to.

House of Commons—

120. Estimates of the Sergeant at Arms, $332,767.

Mr. MacNICOL: If I am correct, the house for some time was without a permanent Sergeant at Arms. I should like to know who performed the duties of Sergeant at Arms in the interim and what his remuneration was.

Mr. SPEAKER: During that time, the Clerk of the House, Doctor Beauchesne, acted as Sergeant at Arms.

Mr. MacNICOL: Was he compensated for that considerable amount of extra work?

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not believe he was, and I should be pleased if it were the wish of the house that he should receive some compensation for his services in that regard.

Mr. MacNICOL: Perhaps I should not say anything with the Clerk present, but he has always been very helpful to every one of us. He has always been willing and ready to assist us in any possible way, and if he did all that extra work I suggest that he should receive some compensation. It does not sound reasonable to me that he should not.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am pleased that the hon. gentleman has brought the matter to the attention of the committee, I shall bring his remarks to the notice of the internal committee on the administration of the house, in the hope that we shall succeed in our representations.

Mr. BRACKEN: I suggest that Mr. Speaker use his influence with the government as well.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The suggestion is noted.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I wish to bring to the attention of the government a matter that I brought up before when the public works estimates were under consideration. On that occasion I spoke briefly, as I shall again, but I wish the committee to remember that the importance of my remarks is in inverse ratio to their brevity. I spoke then on the lamentable wages and salaries paid to those who work in this house to promote our comfort and convenience. I should like to draw the attention of the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the Minister of Labour to the fact that there are several messengers on this staff, men who were in the army for four or five years and who served overseas, who are going to be out of work when this house rises; and as far as I know no provision is being made by the government for their employment. That is a heartless and callous way to treat these men. The other matter is that the low salaries which are paid do not give the employees of this House of Commons a chance to live in decency, and I would strongly urge the government to review these wages and increase them, so that this parliament may give a lead to industry and commerce in the matter of wages and salaries paid to employees.

Mr. SPEAKER: I will take into consideration the remarks of the hon. gentleman, and he may be sure that I have as much sympathy for the employees of the house as he has. If it is possible to do something in order to be fair to them I shall do it with pleasure.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I appreciate Your Honour's sympathy, but these men are going to be out of work in a day or two. Can the Minister of Veterans Affairs tell us if he has made any plans to give these men work to tide them over? They have nothing to look forward to. They fought for this country, and now they get $4 a day here. Surely you are just not going to put them out on the street like that, just before Christmas.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think I can say that over the years I have had as much sympathy with ex-service men as any man in this house. The case of these men has been brought to my attention, and I have taken action, instead of talking about it.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): That is very good.

Mr. LENNARD: I want to ask several questions which the rules prevented me from putting on the order paper several months ago. Who is the purchasing agent for the parliamentary restaurant? When was he appointed? Why was he appointed? Is it a full-time or part-time position, and what salary does he receive?

Mr. SPEAKER: The purchasing agent for the restaurant is a gentleman named Martial Rheaume. He has been appointed permanently, and I think his salary is around $2,000 a year. I am told he is making a very fine job of it.

Mr. BOUCHER: I do not wish to let this opportunity pass without referring to the fact that last year in this house we discussed the difference in the pay received by the protective staff of the House of Commons and the protective staff of the Senate, and I do not believe proper action was taken. I would refer that matter to Mr. Speaker also, bearing in mind that the protective staff on this side of the building, although doing more work than those on the other side, receive less pay; and I do not believe the ratio between them is at all fair.

Mr. SPEAKER: During the recess I shall be able to take time to look after my administration. I will look into that matter and do for the protective staff, as for others, whatever may be possible.

Item agreed to.

122. To provide hereby, notwithstanding anything contained in the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act or the provisions of the Senate and House of Commons Act respecting the independence of parliament, for payment out of the consolidated revenue fund to each member of the House of Commons appointed by the governor in council to be a parliamentary assistant (which appointment shall not render such member ineligible or disqualify him as a member of the House of Commons) to assist a minister of the crown in such manner and to such extent as the minister may determine and to represent his department in the House of Commons in the absence of the minister therefrom, a salary of four thousand dollars per annum and pro rata for any period less than a year, $40,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: In previous sessions a number of hon. members, including myself, have complained about the fact that the auditor general did not provide the house with full details. I have no complaint this session. I wish to compliment the auditor general on the statement he has given us this year. I am one of those who have studied it very carefully; and next year if it is even more complete it will be all to the good.

Item agreed to.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

Library of Parliament—

124. General administration, $81,888.

Mr. HAZEN: I would ask if we could not have better lighting in the library. The light is very poor, and I do not see why it should be difficult to have it improved. It is impossible to read there in the evening with any degree of comfort, so that I would ask Your Honour to be so good as to look into this matter. I would suggest also that the whole library system be modernized. There should be an information desk where a member could ask for what he wanted and be directed to where he could find it. I believe the method of conducting the business of the library should be brought up to date.

Mr. SPEAKER: Some days ago I had an interview with the librarians and acquainted them with the complaints of some hon. members. I have asked them to prepare a report for next session. We have a committee on the library; as soon as that committee meets we will study the report, and I hope every hon. member will be satisfied.

Mr. HAZEN: While I am speaking about lighting, might I direct attention also to the lighting in the railway committee room. When we have to meet there at night it is most difficult to read anything.

Item agreed to.

GENERAL

General—

484. Printing of parliament, including salaries of staff of the joint distribution office, further amount required, $510.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is this the last item?

Mr. MACKENZIE: This is all.

The CHAIRMAN: Since this is the last sitting of the committee of supply I wish to take this opportunity to congratulate and thank all hon. members for the respect they have invariably shown to the Chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Before the resolutions are reported, may I on behalf of the government, and having had some little responsibility for directing the proceedings of the house, thank the leaders and members of all parties and groups in the house for their excellent and kindly cooperation.

Mr. MacNICOL: Before we conclude, Mr. Chairman, may I thank your assistant the deputy chairman, the hon. member for Huron-Perth (Mr. Golding), for the courtesy he has extended to all members of the committee.

Mr. GOLDING: I was hoping perhaps I would be in the chair so that I might have an opportunity to express my sincere appreciation for the kindness of all hon. members while I occupied the chair helping out our good friend the Deputy Speaker. I should like also to congratulate the new members who have come into this house following the last election. It is a splendid thing to see the young men who have come here taking such an active part in our work. I have been here for quite a few years, and I must say they are a very high class of young men indeed. I wish to thank every hon. member here for his extreme kindness to me while I was presiding over the committee, and to wish you all a merry Christmas and a very happy New Year.

Mr. BRACKEN: I was a little afraid yesterday that I was developing a bad habit, and I am afraid I still have it to-day. I am very glad to add my word of commendation to the two men who have acted as chairmen of this committee during the last two or three months, and as well to all the officials of this house in Mr. Speaker's organization. If it is not out of place I should like to say especially how much we appreciate the services rendered to us by each of the young men I see in uniform over to my right. As a last word I should like to compliment the Minister of Veterans Affairs on the admirable way he has helped the opposition to get the government's estimates through the house.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I should add a word from the members of this group. We have appreciated the fairness with which we have been treated and the consideration that has been given us, so that we have had an opportunity to speak on all matters.

Mr. BOUCHER: As one of the members for the city of Ottawa I think on behalf of the city I can extend to all a cordial welcome back in a short time, and our appreciation of your visit with us for the past few months.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I say a final word in connection with the remarks of the leader of the opposition. We often mention the members of our staff here. We very seldom have heard mentioned the hardest working members of the staff of the house, that is the members of the Hansard staff, who have sat with us and have listened to some indifferent and some good things until the wee midnight hours. I think the whole house will join with me in extending our thanks to them.

Mr. BRACKEN: Under this new item of business I hope I shall be allowed to make another speech. I am sure the members of the Hansard staff know where the indifferent speeches come from—and also where the good ones come from.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I hope so.

Mr. BRACKEN: I wish to thank them for the way in which they have improved the speeches I have made.

Mr. MacNICOL: And there should also be included Mr. Young and Mr. Galbraith.

Item agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS

SUPPLY BILL

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. ILSLEY moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1946, the sums of $117,775,292.34 and $21,931,048 respectively be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 244, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1946.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

Then the Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons addressed the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General as follows:

May it please Your Honour:

The Commons of Canada have voted supplies required to enable the government to defray certain expenses of the public service.

In the name of the commons, I present to Your Honour the following bill:

An Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1946.

To which bill I humbly request Your Honour's assent.

To this bill the Clerk of the Senate, by command of the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General did thereupon say:

In His Majesty's name, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General thanks his loyal subjects, accepts their benevolence, and assents to this bill.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

After which His Honour the Deputy Governor General was pleased to close the first session of the twentieth parliament of the Dominion of Canada with the following speech:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

More than three months have elapsed since the unconditional surrender of Japan, following upon the unconditional surrender of Germany, brought to an end a world war which has lasted for six years. But peace throughout the world had still to be attained. We are now passing through a period fraught with the inevitable difficulties and dislocations of a time of transition from war to peace. Efforts to establish an enduring peace must be the first concern of all nations.

An essential step towards world peace is the relief of human suffering occasioned by war and the restoration of the countries physically damaged by war. To that end, the further appropriations you have made for international relief and rehabilitation will be of the utmost service.

Canada's determination to do her full part in maintaining international peace and security has been expressed by the unanimous approval given by both Houses of Parliament to the Charter of the United Nations. A delegation, including members of both Houses, is at present in London attending the meetings of the Preparatory Commission of the United Nations Organization.

During October, after a brief conference at Washington with the President of the United States, my Prime Minister visited the United Kingdom for discussion with members of the British government and for consultation with Canadian representatives in Europe. Shortly thereafter the Prime Minister joined with the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom in conversations with President Truman at Washington on the subject of atomic energy. Their discussions resulted in an agreed Declaration. The initiative was thereby taken in an international effort to prevent the use of atomic energy for destructive purposes and to promote its use for the benefit of mankind. The approval you have given the declaration will further this initiative.

The visit to Ottawa of the Prime Minister of Great Britain and his address to the members of both Houses of Parliament were deeply appreciated. The visit afforded opportunity for an expression of Canada's admiration for the spirit and resolution of the people of Britain in meeting the difficulties and privations of this post-war period.

Efforts to stimulate the expansion of external trade and the restoration of a world economy have been intensified. These ends will be greatly furthered by the vastly increased appropriations you have made for export credits to allied countries and by your approval of Canadian participation in the International Monetary Fund and the Bank for Reconstruction and Development. Negotiations are under way to extend export credits to the United Kingdom. Far-reaching proposals on trade and employment for consideration by an international conference have been advanced by the United States government and are now before you. My Ministers welcome the presentation of these proposals.

With your approval Canada became a member of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations. The first meeting of the new organization was held in Quebec City in the month of October.

In November, the Co-ordinating Committee of the Dominion-Provincial Conference, which includes the Premiers of all the Provinces, devoted several days to a detailed and frank exchange of views with my Prime Minister and other of my Ministers. A Dominion-Provincial Economic Committee was set up by the Co-ordinating Committee to examine and report to the participating governments upon the economic factors affecting Dominion and Provincial proposals and relations. The Co-ordinating Committee will meet again early in the new year. My Ministers are resolved to continue their utmost endeavours to reach an agreement which will place the Federal Government and the governments of all the provinces in a financial position to discharge effectively their several responsibilities.

The members of the armed forces serving abroad have been returning to Canada as rapidly as transport facilities would permit. The release of men and women from the forces is keeping pace with repatriation.

Pending a decision as to the size of the permanent defence establishments, interim arrangements have been made for continued voluntary service in the armed forces of members of the three services who have the required qualifications.

A special committee of the House of Commons, has given close study to the various statutes and orders relating to the care, rehabilitation and reestablishment of war veterans. On the recommendation of the committee, a Veterans' Rehabilitation Act has been enacted and amendments have been made to the War Service Grants Act and the Veterans' Land Act. The Government intends to propose that the committee be reconstituted at the next session to complete its examination of the measures which are being consolidated into a Veterans' Charter.

Steady progress has been made with the conversion of war industries to civilian production. Provision has been made for the amalgamation of the Department of Munitions and Supply with the Department of Reconstruction. The work of the Department of National War Services is all but completed.

War restrictions are being removed as rapidly as this can be accomplished without occasioning inflation or other economic disturbances.

In order to make possible the continuance of controls essential to the welfare of the people, a measure has been enacted to permit the extension of certain specified emergency powers during the period of transition from war to peace.

To accelerate the construction of houses as the supply of materials and the availability of labour increase, amendments have been made to the National Housing Act. Provision has also been made for the establishment of a Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Special attention is being given to the provision of low-cost housing for war veterans and to making emergency shelter available during the present shortage of permanent housing.

Provision has been made for increasing the capital of Trans-Canada Air Lines to permit of the expansion of our international air services.

Members of the House of Commons:

I thank you for the financial provision you have made for all essential services, as well as for expenditures arising out of the war and for purposes of reconstruction.

The unprecedented response to the Ninth Victory Loan was heartening evidence of the determination of the Canadian people to consolidate victory.

A measure of relief from the wartime burden of taxation has been a significant feature of the session.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

My Ministers were gratified at the approval given to the proposal that Canada should possess a distinctive national flag. At the next session, they will propose that the Select Committee of both Houses be reconstituted in order to complete the task of considering a suitable design for a Canadian flag.

It affords me pleasure to state that a successful beginning has been made in the planned development and beautification of Canada's capital and its surrounding area as a national memorial to commemorate the service and sacrifice of Canadians in the war just ended.

On taking leave of you at the close of this momentous year, I pray that Providence may continue to bless our country, and to guide the nations of the world in their efforts to establish an enduring peace.

This concluded the first session of the twentieth parliament.
