Atlantic City, N.J., Nov. 30.—Canada did not allow financial consideration to interfere in making war supplies available to her fighting allies "and we don't ask now for any settlement for goods given under mutual aid and used by others to fight for us", L. B. Pearson, Canadian ambassador in Washington, said to-night.

I think the minister should state whether or not that announcement coincides with government policy. Also he should explain to the committee whether or not it is expected that further sums will be required for guarantees or loans to other countries apart from the United Kingdom and the other nations in the sterling bloc. I understood last year, when this Export Credits Insurance Act was first brought in, that the making of a guarantee or a loan to another government was only a temporary measure, that the long-range policy of the government for assisting export trade was contained in the first part of the act, which provides for export credits insurance. I have here Hansard for August 1 of last year; at that time the Minister of Trade and Commerce made this statement, as reported on page 5897:

> It is the intention of the government to have part I become operative as soon as possible. Part I is essentially looking toward the carrying on of this export business in time of peace. I do not think it is necessary to wait until then for it to begin to function, and in the meantime part II will operate. Conditions during the war and possibly immediately after the war will make it difficult for part I to become operative in a very large way during this particular period.

Then I asked:

> Am I correct in saying that the basic policy of the government for increasing the export trade of Canada is to insure transactions between the Canadian exporter and the foreign importer?
> Mr. MacKinnon (Edmonton West): Yes, that is correct.
> Mr. Coldwell: Transactions as between individuals?
> Mr. MacKinnon (Edmonton West): Yes.

That was the announcement of policy last year. I should like to know whether or not that is still the long-range policy of the government, in promoting export trade, and that this business of providing guarantees and direct loans to foreign governments is only a temporary measure to tide us over the post-war period. I think I am correct in saying that if this amendment goes through, there will then be available for promoting export trade $200 million, which can be used by way of guarantee to foreign governments; $750 million which can be used by way of direct loan; this makes a total of $950 million; and under part I of the act, the export credits insurance provision, there will be available another $50 million, making a total of $1,000 million. The minister said in introducing the bill yesterday that at the next session there would have to be amendments made to part I of the act, and I assume that one of these amendments will be to increase the amount that can be used by way of insuring business. I ask the minister to state whether or not this is correct.

Mr. MacKINNON: As to the amendments which will likely be brought before the house at the next session, I am not able to make any definite statement now, but I do not want the hon. member for Vancouver South to misunderstand the amount of business involved in the money which is provided under part I of the act. That is simply a guarantee; there is no relation to the volume of business which is transacted under part I of the act.

Mr. GREEN: It is not a guarantee, it is insurance? Is not that what the minister means?

Mr. MacKINNON: It is insurance; it is a guarantee—

Mr. GREEN: By way of insurance.

Mr. MacKINNON: By way of insurance. That is it exactly.

Mr. ILSLEY: With regard to the questions asked by the hon. member for Vancouver South, the first question was whether what Mr. Pearson said correctly represented government policy. I should say that substantially it does. The mutual aid agreements are public documents; the reports on mutual aid have been placed before the house, and generally speaking the supplies which were sent under mutual aid are not to be paid for; they were regarded as contributions to a common cause. Some of them, such as ships, were chartered only, the ownership being retained by the Dominion of Canada, and those will be returned; and there was the right also reserved in the agreements to claim the return of certain other property.

Mr. GREEN: Mr. Pearson's statement appears to be waiving that right to claim a return. That was why I asked the minister about it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does it? I did not understand that it did at all. I understood from everything I heard there that Mr. Pearson was simply saying that Canada did not expect settlement for the goods delivered under mutual aid. I think that under the lend-lease legislation of the United States the president has reserved the right to require certain return advantages, or something of that kind. Well, we had the power to do that under our mutual aid legislation, too, but it is largely an empty right. Here we are, under these export agreements, seeking to sell goods, not to get goods from other countries now; it is the other countries which need the goods, rather than ourselves. So, if I understood correctly the citations from Mr. Pearson's speech, I should say that they substantially represent government policy.

With regard to the next question whether this policy of loans by the government to foreign governments is a temporary or permanent policy, it certainly is intended to be a temporary policy. Part I embodies a permanent policy; it sets up an institution, a corporation which will continue and which will function indefinitely.

Mr. GREEN: Part I is really the long-range policy of the government to promote export trade.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, one of them only.

Mr. GREEN: So far as this bill is concerned.

Mr. ILSLEY: So far as this bill is concerned, yes. Indirectly perhaps the loans will promote export trade in the future. That is, they enable countries to reconstruct themselves and convert themselves into healthy trading units. But the policy of lending I would not expect to go on indefinitely or as a permanent policy at all, and I do not know of any money which will be required beyond the amount asked for in this bill, for any country except the United Kingdom.

Mr. GREEN: This bill is meant to cover all possible loans?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is meant to. I cannot say that we shall not be back some time, but we do not know of any other requirements that we will have for export loans to any country except the United Kingdom. We are providing or we are asking the house to provide us with enough money to cover everything reasonably in prospect, with a small margin, in that $750 million; that is $650 million additional. Is there any other question?

Mr. GREEN: Will there be provision made in the amendments next year to the first part of the act that a larger sum of money than $50 million can be used for insurance of export trade?

Mr. MacKINNON: In answer to the last question of the hon. member for Vancouver South, I would say that at the present time there is no evidence that a larger amount of money is required under part I of the act. But, to supplement the answer I gave a few minutes ago, I should like to point out that it was found, in the working out of part I of the act, that certain amendments were necessary. There were half a dozen of these, and they were put through by order in council P.C. 5845, which has been tabled in the house. These amendments at least will be introduced by way of legislation next session.

Mr. GREEN: How much business has been done up to date under part I of the act?

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. MacKINNON: I could not give that information offhand, but it will run into very large figures. I think the policies run from a few dollars up to two or three million dollars.

Mr. GREEN: The minister has no idea of the approximate total?

Mr. MacKINNON: I have not the figures before me. I might get that information later.

Mr. GREEN: I should also like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether consideration has been given to the type of goods Canada would have to be prepared to import from these countries to which loans are to be made. I think the principal countries are France, Norway, Netherlands, Netherlands East Indies, Belgium, the U.S.S.R. and China. I presume the Department of Trade and Commerce has given pretty careful consideration to what products we would expect to get from those nations. Everyone in the committee admits that if we are to get payment at all a good deal of it will have to be by way of goods from these countries. Can the minister tell us to-day what products it is expected we will have to take? I mean the main products; I do not want them all.

Mr. MacKINNON: Well, Mr. Chairman, I have not the details before me which would enable me to answer that question, but I can say that in our negotiations with the people who have come to Canada in connection with obtaining these credits, our people have held discussions. We have considered what goods they were anxious to have, and in most cases those people had lists of the things they wanted to buy. In some cases we had to tell them we could not give them what they wanted because we had not those certain goods in surplus supply. In other cases we were able to tell them we had the goods which we could let them have. In other cases we had to try and keep them down somewhat in their requirements. In other cases we suggested that they might be able to use other goods we had in surplus supply for export. I may add that conversations are going on continually in the recently established import division of the Department of Trade and Commerce, in connection with what goods can be profitably and economically brought in from the various countries with which we are hopeful of extending our trade.

Mr. GREEN: The minister will agree, I think, that this is a very important feature of the bill. We are loaning huge sums of money to other countries. We will have to take back goods from those countries for at least a portion of those loans; otherwise in effect we will be giving away this money to these other nations. Surely it is the duty of the Department of Trade and Commerce to consider very carefully in connection with this whole transaction and in connection with this bill what are the main types of goods we must take from each of these other countries. There are not so many of those countries, only six or seven and I would ask the minister to let the committee have a more detailed statement on that point. Both the committee and the country are entitled to that information. The Canadian people should have the opportunity to size up this whole policy and to decide whether or not they are in favour of it, and those people who are going to be hurt by the importation of these goods should know ahead of time what to expect. We hope no one will be hurt, but probably someone will be hurt financially by those imports. That information is of the utmost importance, and I would ask the minister to get it and make a statement to the house before this bill goes through.

Mr. ILSLEY: I want to point out that we do not necessarily take imports to the same amount as the instalments due us.

Mr. GREEN: I realize that.

Mr. ILSLEY: All the other country needs to do is export goods or services to somebody, and perhaps get the gold with which to pay us. The hon. gentleman is asking us to cover our plans in regard to imports in some cases for the next thirty years, and I do not think we can give him that information.

Mr. GREEN: No. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has already said his department has given consideration to the type of goods that will have to be imported from the countries who have come here to ask for credits.

Mr. MacKINNON: Not under this particular legislation. It is a continuing matter in the import branch of the department, through our trade commissioners, to ascertain what goods we can profitably import from other countries with which we are dealing.

Mr. GREEN: The information would be very beneficial even if it were not tied up with this act. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has said his department has considered it and that the other nations coming here to negotiate have given that information.

Mr. MacKINNON: No, they have not.

Mr. GREEN: That has entered into the discussions, as it naturally must; it is the businesslike thing to do. We should have a statement of the main types of goods each of these nations could export to Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is rather remotely connected with this matter. I should think all we could do would be to try and foresee the kind of imports this country will be taking from the world at large.

Mr. GREEN: No; there are only six or seven of these countries.

Mr. ILSLEY: But that is not necessarily the way in which these advances are going to be repaid at all. Take the case of France, for instance. France may export to a South American country and that South American country may export to us. So long as France exports to somebody we get paid. It is just a matter of compiling a list of imports.

Mr. GREEN: I know that just as well as the minister does, but I also know as he also knows that France will want to export as much as possible to Canada to help repay this loan of $242,500,000. I should like to know what probably will be the goods France will want to export to Canada. We are stepping into a new field here. The government is either going out to give away Canadian goods, or it is going out to promote trade between the nations. It is a new step, and the Canadian people are entitled to information of the type I suggest. I realize that it is embarrassing for the government to give that information—

Mr. MacKINNON: Not at all.

Mr. GREEN: —that they do not want the men who will have to compete with goods coming in from France, for example, to be upset about this business. But I suggest there is no reason why the Minister of Trade and Commerce should not make a statement of this kind. He has set up a division for imports, so why all the hesitation; why all the secrecy? Why can he not say we would expect such and such goods from France, largely; we would expect from the Netherlands East Indies such and such goods; we would expect this and that from the U.S.S.R., and so on. Surely this committee and the Canadian people are entitled to that information.

Mr. MacINNIS: I knew we would get into this business of trade pretty soon.

Mr. GREEN: I am not opposing it at all; I am simply asking for the information. I have not said one word to the effect that it is a bad thing. I am all for export trade, as much as anyone in this committee.

Mr. MacINNIS: For import trade, too?

Mr. GREEN: My province of British Columbia depends on being able to export, it is true largely to the United Kingdom and the other parts of the commonwealth; but I think this information should be given along with the other information that has been given by the two ministers during consideration of this measure.

Mr. MacKINNON: I can assure the hon. member there is no information concerning any possible imports that is being withheld from the members of this house. On my own estimates I can be asked as to what imports we may expect from any country in the world.

Mr. GREEN: Then why cannot the minister give that information to the committee now, for the different countries that are mentioned?

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): No, Mr. Chairman; I want to make a comment and ask a question. My comment is this. I did not raise this question this morning just to waste the time of the committee; I raised it because I thought it was a very serious matter, and I still think so. I was disappointed with the minister's answer, on the whole. I was disappointed when he spoke about Great Britain selling us down the river. I assume he was not attributing any such thought to me.

Mr. ILSLEY: What is the hon. gentleman afraid of, if it is not something like that? That is what I would like an explanation about. Do not connect me with the phrase in the sense that I approved it at all. I was trying to find out what my hon. friend was so much excited about. He was implying that somewhere, in some room or rooms in Washington, something was being concocted that was going to happen to the Dominion of Canada, and it was to come from the United Kingdom, not from the United States. That would be selling Canada down the river in the sense that I understood it. I said I did not believe it would occur, because I said we had been very emphatic in presenting our views but that we could not go to the length hon. gentlemen opposite wanted us to go and sacrifice our dignity and self-respect by going and knocking on a door and trying to get into the discussion. What would we have thought, when we had the Hyde Park discussions between Mr. King and President Roosevelt, if the United Kingdom had said, "Now, look here, we would like to be in on this. We would like to get in there and find out what you are going to do, because you may be doing something to hurt us." We would have said, "You come when you are invited, please, and not until then." That is what we would have said.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am not greatly impressed by that, but I do not propose to press that point. Actually we have sat in on a great many matters, including the atomic bomb. The point I should like to make is this; I will answer the minister as well as I can, and I think he will agree it is a quite good answer. I am not afraid of Great Britain selling us down the river, but the British are in some mental perturbation, let us say, as to whether they can go for the joint arrangement, let us call it multilateral trade, or whether they will retire into the sterling bloc. They have been debating at Washington for weeks as to whether the offer they are going to get there will be sufficient, and my point, which I believe is a very substantial one, is this. If this thing is on balance between the United States and the United Kingdom, then what we are prepared to do might just affect the balance one way or the other. We should not just go along after the door is banged, barred and bolted and say we would have done so and so; we should be prepared to put our weight on the scales now. In spite of the minister's rebuke, which I do not quite take at its full value, I suggest again that if this thing is still on balance, as it appears to be, it might not be too late even yet for us to indicate what we are prepared to do.

That brings me to another point. I quite realize the government has gotten into the habit of thinking they do not need the endorsation of the house, that they can go ahead and do things themselves. Up to a point that has been perfectly proper, though some of us think that attitude has been continued perhaps too long. But now I come to this. If I am right, as I think I am, in saying that our contribution might just tip the scales, I believe we should make known now what that contribution may be. I inferred from what the minister said that we were waiting to see the conclusion at which they arrived, but then it may be too late.

Now before I sit down I am going to direct a question to the minister. I am still uncertain in regard to an answer the minister made, because if he is correct it seems that what the newspapers have been saying is all wrong. I understood the minister to say that these negotiations, these pourparlers in Washington, were purely financial. Am I correct?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is what I understand them to be.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I understood they started out in that way but my understanding is that long ago they began to be trade negotiations. Well, I am not suggesting that we should be undignified, but I am suggesting that the Minister of Finance of this country is a person with considerable standing in any negotiations between these countries, and I am suggesting that if he had wanted to be represented at those negotiations he could have been. The minister has told us the British people were here and got our views before they went down to Washington. To me that is not the same thing at all, and I entirely refuse to accept the suggestion that we could not do anything in respect of this. Indeed to some extent the minister has accepted my view by saying that we indicated our position while the British people were here en route. Now I want the minister, if he would be kind enough, to find out whether these reports we have been reading in the newspapers are wrong and there have been no trade negotiations, or whether they are right and he was wrong a few minutes ago. In the next place, and perhaps this is important, I should like the minister to tell us whether in fact there have been economic observers from the Department of External Affairs who have been perhaps not sitting in, which is a rather equivocal phrase, but who have been in the neighbourhood, who have known what is going on and who perhaps have been consulted off the record.

I think that is a fair question to ask, for this reason. I have a feeling, and I am quite unrepentant in this, that the minister's own department might have had more to do with this than apparently it has. My final suggestion, and again I am unrepentant, is that the part Canada is going to play in this might well be decisive; that it should be known, and that it should not be decided by the cabinet while parliament is prorogued but that we should have a chance to discuss it now. And I repeat my further suggestion that if I am right in thinking the contribution we make may be decisive it should have not only the sanction of this house but should have all the publicity it can get. I am not suggesting that the minister can be tied down to this or that detail. I have enough sense to know that if they are going to deal it has to be in a large way. But I do suggest the government might still come to this house and discuss this all-important matter before we prorogue, because if it is as important as I think it is an extra day or two would not matter.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend says Canada should perhaps inform the United Kingdom what we are prepared to do, and that might tip the scale. Will he tell us what he means by "what we are prepared to do"?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): As I understand it from the reports of competent observers in London, the British are troubled. They feel that the terms of the advances that have been proposed are—well, the word "harsh" has been used, and another word I have forgotten. At any rate the report is that they are in some doubt as to whether the proposals made by the United States are adequate. I am suggesting that if they had proposals of a similar kind from Canada—because after all ours are of a very similar kind—it might have a very profound effect. The dispatch I quoted said they were seriously considering in London whether they would go it alone, I think the phrase was. To go it alone, as I understand it, means the sterling bloc, and what that implies for us.

Mr. ILSLEY: Then I want to ask one other question. What is it the hon. gentleman fears may be happening which will be prejudicial to the future of Canada?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): A dispatch, again from a competent observer, suggested that if the British were not satisfied with the termination of these negotiations they might go it alone, to repeat the phrase I used a moment ago; and my strong recollection is that one of the things this might very well mean was that Britain would not enter into the Bretton Woods agreement.

Mr. ILSLEY: Then it is not trade negotiations the hon. gentleman is concerned about at all; is that right? I am trying to grasp the hon. gentleman's idea.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Let me answer that question by saying it is a debating point, because we all know Bretton Woods, while a financial measure, is really ancillary to trade; it will stand or fall eventually by trade; and after all I really do not feel that the answer the minister has given is a substantial answer at all.

Mr. ILSLEY: I want to get somewhere with this thing. I understand that the suggestion of hon. gentlemen opposite is that trade negotiations are going on. I said that to the best of my knowledge they were financial negotiations. I am told that trade experts went to Washington, but whether that was for the purpose of this conference or not I do not know. Trade negotiations are coming on, and they are coming on pretty fast, but they are not these negotiations.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Unless the newspaper people are all wrong, such important trade questions as empire preference agreements have been under consideration. The newspaper people say also, and we believe them, that pressure has been put on that as one of the conditions of this loan from the United States the empire agreements are to be played down. Personally I am not arguing against that for the moment. If we can have multilateral trade, that to me is the thing, but surely it cannot be said that what I have been talking about is not a substantial matter. After all, what Britain needs will come mostly from the United States and Canada, and she is to have valuable assistance in the way of credits and trade arrangements and what not. As I understand it, a whole field of that kind has been under consideration and has been explored at Washington. To split it up seems to me to be meaningless.

Mr. ILSLEY: Great Britain knows exactly what our views are with reference to preference and tariffs.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): They should know what we are prepared to do in the way of granting credits to assist.

Mr. ILSLEY: We do not know what we are prepared to do.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Should not our government know?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Why not?

Mr. ILSLEY: Because we must see what arrangements she makes with the United States. The hon. gentleman's view is all distorted. In proportion the deal with the United States is so much greater, so much more important, of so much more magnitude than anything that would be done with the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The minister could have said that our contribution to the war in 1940 was small.

NATIONAL EMERGENCY

BILL TO CONFER CERTAIN POWERS UPON THE GOVERNOR IN COUNCIL

The house resumed from Friday, November 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent for the second reading of bill No. 15, to confer certain powers upon the governor in council during the national emergency following the war.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, in the first place I desire to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) and the other members of the cabinet who have discussed this important matter with the representatives of the provinces. It is a very great problem that they had to face, and they have come to a certain compromise regarding the distribution of powers between the dominion and the provinces. The subject has been argued, discussed and debated for a long time. Some jurists hold the view that as the jurisdiction of the dominion on the one hand and of the provinces on the other are both exclusive, it is impossible for the dominion and the provinces to come to an arrangement on matters which are not already provided for by the British North America Act, and that any change in the distribution of those powers should be ratified by Westminster; in other words, that the agreement with the provinces to abandon part of their jurisdiction to Ottawa and the decision of Ottawa to abandon part of its jurisdiction to the provinces is null and void unless ratified by Westminster. I shall not argue that point. All I shall say is that I am sure that my colleagues realize the tremendous importance of this legislation.

During the war parliament did not function as it used to before. Its powers were delegated to various bodies and individuals, and the law of the land most of the time was no longer the enactments by both houses of parliament with the sanction of the king; it was instead just an order. Naturally conditions were most difficult, and we were told that it was necessary to act in that way because matters of urgency might arise at any moment. That was a very good explanation in some ways.

I should like to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that as soon as a state of war was declared between this country and certain countries of Europe the member for Temiscouata wrote to the Prime Minister to inform him of the increase in the price of sugar which was then taking place. The reply was that the government would see to that matter, and the government intended to do it in a way that is unknown to most members of the house. The first intention of the government was to have it done by two members of parliament under the jurisdiction of the then minister of national defence, the Hon. Norman Rogers. Mr. Rogers called two members of parliament to form a committee of internal security, the purpose of which was many-sided. It was to look after dominion-provincial relations, food, commodity prices, protection against air attacks, and finally a survey of the press and public opinion. It meant that the government wanted to have all those matters looked after by a couple of members of parliament. The only trouble was that the job was too tremendous for any two members of parliament to be able to do. But that was the offer. Those two members declined—they were to be paid a living allowance in virtue of an order in council passed under the War Measures Act—because it was impossible for any two or even three human beings to deal with matters of such magnitude. But the government should be given credit for the offer that was made at that time for the settlement of those difficulties, and also for foreseeing the inflation which would have resulted if no action had been taken by the government at that time to control prices. It was wise to do it, and the government showed foresight. To govern is to foresee, and the government showed foresight by doing its best to prevent inflation.

On the other hand there is always the question of responsibility and control. I remember a long time ago, after the last war, when Sir Henry Thornton was appointed as the big boss of the Canadian National Railways, there was a certain element of the Canadian Press which suggested that Sir Henry should be free from politics, that he should be left alone to carry on his job as the big boss of the Canadian National Railways. I knew Sir Henry Thornton very well. He was undoubtedly a great man, but he needed the control and supervision of parliament to do what he would have been able to accomplish under wise guidance. A small number of people who represented the yellow spirit of a few individuals in the management of the railway objected to it and told the government. "Now that you have appointed Sir Henry, leave him alone"; and that feeling has continued to exist, even in this house, when we have been told that some people were doing so well and were such great men that we had to give them the reins although they were not responsible to the people.

We have a responsibility to the people. Each member of parliament is a shock-absorber for all the policies of the government. We are in contact with the people. We meet them every time we go home. They come to us, they tell us their troubles, and then we come here to try to redress wrongs.

Since the institution of parliament there have been two ways for us to correct wrongs. One is by the sponsoring of public legislation by private members, the other is through the control of expenditure. During the war members of parliament were not allowed to present public legislation. Some public bills were moved by private members but they did not go further than the second reading, and all the initiating of legislation, I mean regular legislation, passed by both houses and sanctioned by royal authority, was left to the government.

With regard to the control of expenditure, I have complained many a time about the shape of the public accounts, suggesting that they should include the details of all expenditure, because it is much better for the country when all expenditure is brought to light in detail, even though nobody reads the public accounts—and each one of us must confess that reading them is not as interesting as reading the latest novel. But so long as the figures are given and all the information is available to all persons, not only members of parliament but everybody, those who have made that expenditure are much more careful. Seldom is crime committed in daylight; it is the darkness of the night that favours crime; and the same principle applies with reference to information which is lacking in the public accounts. We were told that so much work was done on account of what is properly called war effort that it would have been impossible for the king's printer to publish details of all accounts. Here again we fought for detailed accounts, and I pay homage and respect to my hon. friends the members for Davenport and Broadview for their assistance in the matter.

Well now, there is a great distinction between the settlement of dominion and provincial taxation and the prevention of an oncoming crisis in this country. Even though the arrangement which has been reached by the dominion cabinet ministers and the provincial cabinet ministers is splendid, and I assume that it is, and that they have all shown good will, for which I congratulate them, and have done their best to achieve results, I do not see how the proposal which is contained in the corrected bill No. 15 will prevent the crisis which we are bound to expect in this country, on account of the lack of purchasing power of gradually increasing numbers of unemployed. When a man manufactures a suit, a pair of boots, an electrical fixture or anything else, he applies his skill to do it and to do it well, and he should earn enough money to be able to purchase adequately, because he is entitled to the comforts of life as much as anybody else. If we consider the tactics of some of our large employers we may wonder whether they will not kill the goose which has been laying the golden eggs, by keeping their men at work for too many hours and preventing others from securing work. It is a great problem. As a rule, now, the hours of employment are ten per day. On the other hand there are man who do not work, who have been let go, who may get something for a limited time from the unemployment insurance fund but whose future is far from being bright. They are greatly concerned because their skill is not being put to use at the present time, Others, too, may be laid off and increase the numbers of unemployed. How long will they be out of work? Well, it is the secret of God. But here our duty is to see to it that the wheels of business in this country turn regularly so that the least possible number of Canadian citizens shall be affected by the period of transition which we have reached.

It is very easy to paint a rosy picture of the future. It can be done when someone tries to convince himself by auto-suggestion that conditions will improve. Sir, I may be contradicted in some quarters but I believe that those who are the true representatives of the people are precisely the men who have been elected by the people to enact legislation for the benefit of the people at large. Those men are found here and in the other legislative assemblies of this country, and their duty is not always to consider the accomplished fact. Their duty is to proceed exactly as the government did at the start of the war and even before the war began, with regard to anticipated inflation. The duty of all public men to-day is to prevent the crisis that otherwise will inevitably come. I do not wish to pose as a prophet of evil; not at all. But it is enough to listen to people in all walks of life to know that their hearts are not full of that joy that one could expect after we have won a victory over the common enemy. There is worry in every home; we do not find the exuberant joy that we saw everywhere after the first war. Of course, in many countries in Europe the war is still on. It is the same in Asia; the fires of hate are not yet extinguished throughout the world. Far from it. So much so, that in the bill I hold in my hand it is mentioned that the war is not over. Fortunately it was changed in the new draft Think of it, sir. After V-E day in May last and V-J day in August the war is still on—most extraordinary. But fortunately it was decided by the dominion-provincial conference that the war will be over on the first of January.

I have some suggestions to offer before I resume my seat, and one of them has reference to the responsibility of members of parliament. We have not only a responsibility for answering the letters that we receive, which is one of our duties, and for acting honestly and fairly with all our electors, which is another of our duties. Our task is much more than that. Foresight is not the exclusive possession of the government. Members from all over the country are here to inform the government about disturbances that may occur in their far distant constituencies. They are here to make suggestions.

My first suggestion is that we put an end to the crisis of irresponsibility. I do not mean ministerial irresponsibility, but clerical irresponsibility, which has been the curse of the country since the beginning of the war. I am ready to give credit to some men who have been at the controls. I am ready to say they have done their best. But my contention is that they would have done much better had they been submitted to the control of parliament and had they not been called supermen, men who cannot make a mistake. With the problem of irresponsibility we have that of infallibility, and in this case it means that those who are not responsible to the people are infallible while those who are responsible to the people are fallible. The latter proposition is just as true as the former is not. We are fallible, of course, but the others are fallible too, and I do not see why members of parliament who are responsible to the electors for all the errors and mistakes of these men should always receive the blame.

We can make friendly suggestions for the improvement of things in this country, but they are always and inevitably turned down, and they are turned down because they come from members of parliament. If any member of parliament who makes a suggestion were a dollar a year man he would be considered a genius. It is precisely because the member of parliament is elected by the people and is responsible to the people that he is not accorded the same degree of confidence and respect as the others are.

It cannot go on like that. I am for the Tudor system of government and not for the Stuart system. You remember very well, sir, the difference between parliaments under the Tudors and under the Stuarts. The Tudor kings were friendly to parliament and the Stuarts were not. And how did that struggle end? By the triumph of parliament.

My impression, sir, is that we live now in an atmosphere of illusion. Members of parliament work hard. They are in committees early in the morning and sometimes they sit there during the afternoon, and their work on those committees may be done very conscientiously, leaving them not a moment of leisure. But what purpose does a committee serve? What purpose does any committee serve here as things are at present constituted? Members are bound to make decisions, because if they do not reach a decision there is no agreement and there is no report. And when a report comes in it is put on the shelf to wait for future generations.

My impression of what is done by members of parliament is that each of us could be compared to a horse on a disconnected treadmill. The horse walks all the time on the treadmill but does not advance one inch. It is covered with sweat, but the mill is disconnected and nothing is done, although the horse has the illusion of accomplishing something. I do not say that to deprecate the work of members of parliament. I have the greatest admiration for my colleagues, but I find that in spite of the enormous quantity of work that is done by each of us we do not achieve the results which we should get, because perhaps we are not taken sufficiently into the confidence of the government in the drafting of policies of national concern.

I do not think that the present system of various boards will help to prevent a dangerous state of affairs in this country. To a certain degree it is a question of taxation. It is not so much a question of restriction as the foremost question of adjusting difficulties between capital and labour in order to settle them.

We are about to contribute to the establishment of an international peace court somewhere in Europe or in Canada. Why not have our own peace court here, a peace court composed of men who are outside of the government and outside of the civil service, men who are free from big business and who will not represent classes?—because the representation of classes inevitably brings about a clash. What we need is the representation of the nation, as we represent it here in parliament. We need a body really independent of government, a body which is not a stool-pigeon of the government or the servant of the government; a body which is entirely free. This body should be composed of men of the soundest judgment, men who will be able to deal with the question of the fluctuations of labour, of wages and even of salaries. It should be a kind of tribunal on which the dominion government as well as the provinces can be represented. They should represent the nation for the benefit of the nation.

There are serious-minded people who think that should be done at the earliest possible moment. Perhaps it is not too early to do it now. Sometimes I have spoken of things that were not believed when I said them, but I now ask my colleagues to think about realities, to think about the things as they are now, and also their trend. I am sure that they agree with me that something has to be done to meet unusual conditions. Moreover it is impossible for any government to find jobs for all the boys returning from overseas. It is impossible for the government to keep in their former jobs all the men who have been working in munitions plants. There are many things that should be done; there are many wrongs that should be redressed. When I think of the boys of the merchant marine who have no preference in the civil service I am ashamed.

How many corrections are to be made? Suggestions may come from any member of parliament, but my suggestion to-day is that while this legislation may be needed at the present time, if we are to bring about lasting and favourable results we must adopt something different at the next session of parliament. I do not want my constituents to be the slaves of anyone for a certain number of years. The question is not so much the issuance of permits for tires or the removal of some restrictions as it is the organization of the thing that we should never have departed from—order in society. I distinctly remember that in February, 1939, at the beginning of the session before the war, I mentioned all the speeches that had been made about discipline in England, in the United States and even in Canada. Some of those people who were so strong for discipline were praising Hitler. There was an Anglican archbishop who was praising Hitler. He said that Hitler was a coming man, a man who had a policy that would benefit the world to the utmost. Of all those whom I have mentioned there was only one man who spoke of order, and the surprising thing is that he was the Minister of Finance. He spoke of order in a speech he made in New York.

I am against discipline. If we call for discipline it is because order no longer exists. Our work here should not be for the continuation of discipline of the Canadian people; it should be for the reestablishment of order, which is the gift of God to man. The men who are not of good will in this country are very few. We must work together for the reestablishment of that order. It cannot be done in one day; it cannot be done in two days or in two months. It should be the work of the future sessions of parliament to see that that is brought about. I say to the government it will be much more important for members of parliament to meet in committee for that purpose than to waste their time discussing the extradition treaty with the United States, a horse on a disconnected treadmill.

I deeply regret that in the first place, so many of those experts do not know how to work. In the second place they lack imagination. In the third place I find that they are imbued with an exaggerated sense of importance, an importance that is attached to them by others. I do not say that to depreciate them too much, but they need control. We are here to control what is done not only by the government but by all the boards which administer Canadian business. There must be a great reform, and that reform must start in this very house, where hon. members must display their sense of proportion and give as much importance to any of their colleagues as to anyone who is not responsible to the people. It was quick and easy to depart from centuries-old tradition; it will perhaps take us a long time to come back, but this is the right way. We shall not find the right road by going farther along the wrong one. We shall have to retrace our steps to the crossroad, find the right way and then proceed farther along it; and the right way is that which has been beaten by our forefathers. It is the way of ministerial responsibility. We have had some troubles in this country. They always occurred because the government of the day departed from the principle of ministerial responsibility. I will not say any more for the time being, but perhaps I may do so later on.

I have spoken with great concern about the future, and those who have children will understand my feelings. Most of us are old enough; we do not know how long we will live. Perhaps we shall see the next war, perhaps not. What is to be hoped is that the next war will be put just as far as possible into the future, so that neither the living generation nor their children nor their grandchildren will see it, because when it comes it will be the end of the world. But the end of the world may not only come through the atomic bomb. There are civil wars that are to be averted at all costs, and this is one of them. Hon. members of the House of Commons should put aside all their political differences to consider this matter as it deserves to be considered. I hope at this time the government will be broad enough to accept some earnest suggestions offered by a veteran of parliamentary life who has at heart the welfare of his fellow citizens.

Mr. PAUL EDMOND GAGNON (Chicoutimi) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the motion now before us must once more bring home to the Canadian people the fact that the optimistic views they had entertained when victory was achieved by our armed forces are not quite in line with the government's plans.

It is distressing to realize that the dismal wake of blood, tears, worries and troubles which the European storm has carried over this country, instead of giving way to new visions of joy and splendor, continues on its march winding and gloomy toward restraint and distress.

When the honourable member for Terrebonne (Mr. Bertrand) said on July 3, 1944 that——he was perfectly justified in voicing concern about the future of this country.

> We shall come out of this war overburdened with the most gigantic financial effort in our history, struggling with an economy upset by the present conflict, and compelled to undergo numerous privations and sacrifices for many years to come.

Mr. Speaker, in the name of the great principles of peace, security, order and freedom, the most sacred rights of the citizens are sacrificed upon the altar of a deified state and a permanent character is given to an abnormal system which has lasted but too long and which, unless checked by parliament, will result in the disappearance of the last vestige of that democracy for which thousands of human lives will have been sacrified in vain.

The passing of bill No. 15 will enable the government to continue controlling by order in council the material and social life of this country.

By adding the word "transitional" in the title of the bill the government has only lengthened a sentence which already contained too many words, since the bill might simply have been entitled "Dictatorship, second stage".

Section 2, worded in terms somewhat different from those of the section formerly proposed, has the advantage, from the standpoint of the government, of being less explicit, more sentimental toward the starving people of Europe, as well as more vague and nebulous for the man in the street.

Section 3 is an improvement on the original wording, but nevertheless it is still unacceptable.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I may point out to the honourable member that bill No. 15 as reprinted and amended is not before the house. The reprinted and amended bill will first come up in committee. The bill cannot be amended before the second reading.

Mr. GAGNON: I thank you, Mr. Speaker. (Text).

Mr. SPEAKER: I might repeat to hon. members what I have just said in French to the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon). The hon. member was discussing the amended and reprinted bill, and I informed him that the reprinted bill would come only before the committee of the whole; so actually we have before the house the original bill. I must add that on the motion for second reading it is not permitted to discuss the amendments. The question before the house is the principle of the bill.

Mr. GAGNON (Translation): Finally, parliament will find itself before a definite situation which it may criticize but which will not have been submitted to it for approval and for which it will be held responsible by the people. The golden age of governmental boards will thus have reached its height. The czars in charge must feel secure; they are and will remain above the law. They are and will remain above the representatives of the people. Being accustomed to controlling trade in all its forms and to pry into everybody's business, Mr. Gordon will continue to dictate to everyone, including the provincial legislatures, to dominate the unruly, to prosecute them before the courts and, by way of amusement, to assume the role of supreme arbiter of fashion, and to determine with his learned advisers, the colour, the length and the thickness of ladies' under-garments and men's shirts.

The ineffable wartime prices and trade board has permitted and encouraged, by its untimely interventions and culpable omissions, the manufacturers to abandon the making of low-priced articles in favour of goods on which they make large profits.

The quality of garments, canned goods, gasoline, has deteriorated but the authorities, however, have not decided to alter the standard prices of the basic period, and this has contributed to an important rise in the cost of living.

Now we come to the selective service. It is an unmitigated conscription system, placing the country's man-power under the grasp of the all-powerful officials who force everyone, employer and employee alike, to bow to their rulings and comply with their demands. They may tell one of the good people from my constituency that although there is no work for him in his town, there is plenty of it in northern Ontario; that he had better leave his family and go to work as a miner in a place hundreds of miles from his home; or else, there will be no unemployment insurance for him.

Mr. Speaker, the workers in my constituency, who have toiled like galley-slaves during the war and have often received, at the end of the week, nothing better than tax receipts for their pains or cheques reduced by half by fiscal deductions, are tired of these annoyances and vexatious measures. They want work but they also want to remain free to sell their services to whatever employer they prefer, without having to report to a superior whenever they quit a job or take on a new one.

On the other hand, the property owners have had enough of the lessons taught them by the rent administrators during the war and they now wish to be again masters in their own houses and be entitled to rent their properties to whatever tenants they choose. However, the infallible creatures of the government tell them that they may not do it.

What does it matter to me that, in order to gild the pill, some restrictions on a few commodities have been removed and some orders have been cancelled; our people are tired and have had enough of boards of all kinds, who have taught nothing but crime and moral turpitude, by forcing our citizens to resort to all sorts of tricks in order to evade the law and get what they sorely needed.

Bill No. 15 authorizes the governor in council to adopt rules which he deems necessary, according to his liking, in the fields of production, trade, exchange, transport, etc. It is a blank cheque handed the government, not in order to safeguard the rights and privileges of the ordinary man, the humble citizen, the poor or the masses who have suffered and are still suffering, not in order to allay and reduce the effects of six years of privation, but to preserve in the country a war-like atmosphere which will allow the government to please the brass-hats thirsting for military prestige and the bureaucrats stricken by the evil of internationalism, who want an armed force in time of peace to defend foreign countries in time of war. Our people will have to go without sugar, so as not to displease monopolists who will not import this product from South America in order better to control the market.

We will ration meat so as to send more to certain European countries which buy their wheat in Argentine and their bacon in Denmark, when that suits them, but which gracefully accept gifts in critical times.

The Canadian people have sacrificed a great deal during the war; they have, according to civilian and military authorities, both Canadian and foreign, come forward, since 1939, with a tremendous effort on behalf of the allied cause. A heroic task has been achieved, and we are proud of our soldiers, sailors and airmen who fought that the principles of free peoples might triumph, just as we are proud of our workers, farmers, technicians, engineers and scientists who, in the rear, have given an outstanding performance in keeping our armies supplied with munitions, clothing and first rate services. Our people, to whom we held out bright prospects of paradise on earth in a new era of peace and prosperity, accepted without grumbling every hardship and annoyance, in the hope that by working and helping to shorten the slaughter, they might the sooner enjoy the blessings of the usual everyday life under normal economic conditions. Unfortunately, at present, they must be satisfied with casting envious glances on our neighbours to the south.

As a matter of fact, as soon as hostilities ended, the United States relaxed their control in order to give employment to a greater number of workers and to make it possible for private enterprise to reach maximum production in a minimum period of time, to attain world supremacy in trade and to compete profitably with other countries on international markets. They have put into practice the saying that "Charity begins at home".

Do you not think that the American republic is setting the example for us? Canada, one of the largest producers in the world, may lose the place she occupies in international trade unless the barriers imposed upon her trade by the various control boards are lifted as soon as possible. Our country's prosperity depends on our export trade and if we want to keep employment at the same level as during the war, we must continually increase production in order to export the greatest possible quantities of goods produced by our workers and farmers.

I am aware that the British government has obtained from parliament the authorization to administer the country in conformity with the War Measures Act, but I am also aware that Mr. Anthony Eden stated in the British House of Commons when Prime Minister Attlee introduced that measure "never before has a British government asked in peace time for such far-reaching powers as requested by the Labour government—

Mr. LALONDE: The British government asks for the continuation of controls for five years.

Mr. GAGNON: —such extended powers are not necessary", he added. I would like to know if a spirit of interdependency moves us to imitate Great Britain in this regard and whether the main purpose of bill No. 15 is primarily to help European nations by supplying them with the materials and foodstuffs which are left after the people of Canada have been rationed.

I should like to know also whether farmers will still be forbidden to partake at their own table of the honey and cheese which they produce on their own farms, whether furniture manufacturers, for instance, will be allowed to manufacture beds with pressed-board end panels, selling for three times the price of pre-war steel beds and to manufacture living room suites costing a minimum of $100 whereas in 1938 we would get three suites for that price.

Will the workers and their fellow employees be prevented to travel to their shops in their own motor cars, under the pretence that we must save gasoline, we must not exceed the prescribed travel limits in order to enrich the powerful transportation companies?

Jefferson said that "the countries where the government is least autocratic are the best governed". When the state seeks to dominate the individual, Mr. Speaker, it always finds arguments to justify its untimely interference in spheres which do not concern it.

By entrusting the administration of the country to a bureaucracy which is frequently incompetent, always troublesome and irritating, and which serves the state and not the people, democratic principles are disregarded and a further step is made in the path leading to dictatorship. I recognize that it is necessary to maintain some supervising bodies, but I do not believe that bill No. 15 as amended is urgently needed—

Mr. LANGLOIS: Name them.

Mr. LALONDE: Could the hon. member name those bodies?

Mr. GAGNON: It is up to the government to name them,—and I shall vote against such a comprehensive bill—

Several hon. MEMBERS: Oh! Oh!

Mr. HEON: Let him continue, there still is some courtesy left in this house.

Mr. LANGLOIS: That suits you.

Mr. HEON: Courtesy suits those who know its meaning.

Mr. GAGNON: —as this one. It is a principle of law that a general legislation must not be based on exceptional cases. The war might have justified such a drastic and despotic measure, such an outrage against individual freedom, but to-day there are no such military reasons, even though the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) is appropriating again this year billions for military expenditures. If controls are necessary, I endorse the views expressed by a prominent Toronto business man who suggested that such controls be enacted by means of legislation and that parliament should sit as frequently as necessary.

I should fail the workers, the farmers, the merchants and the industrialists of my country if I did not protest against this unhealthy encroachment of public authorities upon the field of private enterprise and I should deserve the censure of my constituents if I approved a measure intended to deprive them of clothing, transportation, leisure, bread and freedom.

Mr. JEAN LESAGE (Montmagny—L'Islet): Mr. Speaker, I sincerely believe the speech which the honourable member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon) has just delivered is indeed ill-advised. He is one of the personal friends whose acquaintance I have made in this house and whom I have valued. He has greatly disappointed me.

He discussed in the most superficial way a matter which is most difficult. I do not wish to impute motives to the honourable member and I dare say that the views he has expressed and the way he has expounded them, have originated in the minds of people who do not sit in this house. The hon. member has mentioned the prices which prevail in the United States, in his remarks, he said that there is no control in the United States—That is true, but everyone in this house knows how much during the recent war—and even since the end of the conflict—prices have risen in the United States. They have gone up to such an extent that there has come an economic upheaval which, I regret to say, is evidenced by the constant increase in the number and importance of strikes in the neighbouring country.

Would the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon) like to see economic chaos happen in Canada? Did his electors send him to this house for the purpose of holding out to them the prospect of the abolition of controls that were established in the general interest?

I am sure that the hon. member has not thought that his constituents were merely voters to whom he would ask a renewal of his mandate in a few years. I still hope that he has considered them as Canadian citizens who are entitled to economic and social security, and I hope that in this debate, within the next few days, he will repent for having delivered a speech which, in spite of the sympathy and friendship I have for him, I consider as ill-advised.

(Text).

Mr. Speaker, if I understand correctly the mandate which has been entrusted to us, we are here to study the present conditions as well as those we may foresee, and to write the laws which will meet such conditions for the benefit of the people, the whole within the limits of the constitution, the rights of the provinces and the sovereignty of parliament. We are here to meet the economic conditions of the reconversion period with legislation that will enable the people of Canada to go through that period without violent shocks. That is our primary duty.

What are those conditions? How can they be met? And then, what effective laws should be adopted? Those are the questions which I intend to discuss.

What is the present economic condition? May I summarize it in a few words? The supply of goods is far below the demand for goods. Before the war our economic life was governed by the law of supply and demand. During the war the supply of goods and services became so low that some controls had to be established in order to avoid inflation and to distribute adequately the few goods and services available. The situation has not changed since the war ended, and will return only slowly to normal conditions. I quote from the proposals of the government of Canada at the dominion provincial conference on reconstruction:

> Rehabilitation of men in the armed services, re-conversion of war plants, relief for areas devastated by war and participation in emergency international commodity controls are all emergency requirements arising out of war and call for continuation of national controls for a temporary period. The requirements and duration of this emergency cannot be defined in advance; they must be continuously examined and dealt with in the light of conditions as they develop.

These last words are very important and must be borne in mind in any discussion of the means of going back to a normal economic life. The conditions must be continuously examined and dealt with in the light of conditions as they develop. That is to say, during the period of reconversion some organization must be set up and given the necessary power to examine constantly and speedily deal with the requirements of any emergency. Before examining what that organization should be let us go further into detail with respect to the economic situation.

Every member of this house will admit that the danger of economic disturbances and especially of inflation has not disappeared with the defeat of the axis powers. Our prices have been fixed during the war on a basis which is called "the basic period prices". Should the price control be removed suddenly, we would witness an immediate upward surge in prices. The supply of goods is not sufficient; deferred needs have piled up and the accumulated demands would bear a terrible pressure on prices, a pressure which would be even greater than during the war.

Higher prices in other countries are also a threat to our own price level. If the price control were suddenly removed, the prices of imported goods would rise immediately, and a lot of commodities that we export would either disappear from the domestic market altogether or be so dear as to be out of reach of the people.

We must not minimize the terrible pressure on prices caused by the tremendous purchasing power at present held by Canadians. The relaxation of personal income tax announced by the Minister of Finance, together with the gratuities paid to veterans, have also increased the buying power within this country. We have to admit that the danger of inflation is even greater than during the war. Let us remember that it was after the first world war, in 1919 and 1920, that inflation was the strongest and highest.

I have here some interesting figures showing the extent to which retail food prices increased after the armistice in 1918. These figures are taken from a publication of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics entitled: "Living Costs in Canada—1913—August 1939". The price of one hundred pounds of flour in July, 1914, was $3.30; in November, 1918, $6.90; and in the spring of 1920, $8.40. One hundred pounds of sugar cost in July, 1914, $5.50; in November, 1918, $12.30; and in the spring of 1920, $25. Similar increases occurred in the prices of butter, bacon, milk, coffee, eggs and potatoes. For example, one peck of potatoes in July, 1914, cost 25 cents; the same price in November, 1918, and in the spring of 1920, $1.08.

Are we ready to take responsibility before the people for letting the same thing happen from 1945 to 1947? If we have inflation, the value of our dollar will decrease. What will be the reaction of the worker if the buying power of his $100 victory bond decreases to the extent that it will buy only from sixty to sixty-five dollars' worth of the one hundred dollars' worth of the same goods and services that it would have bought at the time he purchased his $100 bond?

And what about our returned men? Is it not out duty to prepare for them a Canada which is worth living in? According to the booklet published by the wartime information board, entitled "Canada at War", the July issue, 1945, the total number of persons in the armed forces as at December 31, 1944, was 759,879. As of March 31, 1945, a total of 1,800,033 men had at one time or another been in the armed forces. This does not include more than 40,000 women. A large proportion of these have returned or are returning to civilian life as speedily as possible. This means an increased demand for goods of all sorts and for housing. It means an increased drain on domestic food supplies, although it must be admitted that the personnel of the armed forces were largely fed with Canadian food. The effect is much more striking in the case of clothing. Every man knows how difficult it has been during the last year or so to obtain men's clothing. Let us assume that one-third of the population of Canada consists of adult males. Let us assume also that 700,000 discharged men require clothing. This means a sudden increase of from twenty to twenty-five per cent in the demand. Unless price controls are maintained, it requires little imagination to see the possible effect.

By the same token there is a great increase in the pressure on housing. Many returned men will wish to marry immediately and set up homes. Many will wish to build homes with their discharge benefits provided for that purpose. Many whose wives lived with parents during the war will now wish to set up separate establishments. Again realizing that not more than one-third of the population are wage earners and probably not more than one-fourth of the population are actually tenants or occupiers of housing accommodation, the discharge of service men means a sudden increase in the demand of probably close to twenty per cent, and this means increased pressure on rentals, on new houses, on building materials and on furniture.

The control of prices, including the rentals, must be kept in force, otherwise we go directly to inflation, and we, who have the responsibility of legislating for the people as a whole, will be responsible for an economic chaos.

In preventing economic disturbances we have the primary duty to see that the essential needs of the population are satisfied. A sufficient quantity of essential goods has to be either produced or imported and then equitably distributed. Even at present, now that the war is over, some domestic and imported materials are in very short supply, and will be for a time which is impossible to determine. It is understood that large quantities of raw materials will be released and made available as component parts for civilian industries, but the need of the public for such important items as automobiles, electric stoves, refrigerators, et cetera is so widespread that we should see that they were equitably distributed. On the other hand, the shortage of certain imported materials, as fats, oils, tin, rubber, sugar, textiles, will be continued for an undetermined period of time, and will be made worse by the terrible needs of the liberated countries for such supplies. In a considerable number of cases the imports are subject to international agreements. As long as bulk purchasing is necessary on the international markets, purchases have to be made by government agencies.

The same is true of exports. Owing to the higher prices outside Canada it is necessary to regulate all exports in order that some essential goods are not exported to the detriment of internal needs. For example, in normal times Canada does not export textiles to the United States. At the present time their export is controlled. Canadian prices are, however, definitely lower than United States prices. If the export controls were removed, the small quantity of textiles we have would disappear over the border very quickly. Exactly the same thing applies to meat, poultry, timber, charcoal, et cetera. That is why I think, Mr. Speaker, that the words "exports and imports" should remain in any other draft of the bill.

Exports and imports, however, are only one aspect of the problem. Domestic production has to be directed towards the needs of the population, and that means central production directions as long as the supply of goods and services in Canada has not reached the level of the demand. Rationing and priorities are still necessary, and will be as long as essential consumer goods are in short supply. It is the only way of ensuring their fair distribution.

I respectfully submit, Mr. Speaker, that I have mentioned a few facts which demonstrate that there is still, and for at least one year to come, a national and economic emergency. It is essential for the security, defence, peace, order, welfare and good government of Canada that all practical measures should be taken to prevent economic dislocation, hardship and suffering to Canada as a whole until such national dangers as the risk of inflation, of shortages, and national maldistribution of essential goods and services have passed. That is why I am going to vote on second reading for the principle of the bill.

As suggested by the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), we shall have the opportunity of discussing the extent of the powers needed when we study the bill in committee. I repeat now what I said at the beginning, that during the period of reconversion some organization must have the power to examine constantly and speedily deal with the requirements of an emergency. What should be the organization?

The British North America Act distributes the legislative powers between parliament and the provincial legislatures. The British North America Act is a bilateral contract, and one party to it cannot ask the other to surrender some of his rights for a certain period of time unless he is ready to do the same when it is necessary for the good of the other party. In certain exceptional circumstances it has to be done, either by one party or the other for the benefit of all. I am a strong believer in the confederation pact, and I hold that neither party should be asked at any time to surrender some of its rights in the political field, but I am ready to admit that under certain emergency situations, one party may ask from the others the surrender of certain rights and privileges in the economic and social fields. It is in virtue of that principle, which acts reciprocally, I repeat, that some of the provincial legislative powers on given matters have to be surrendered to the dominion parliament in a time of emergency to attain, through central laws and regulations, economic stability for our country as a whole. Unless such laws or regulations are uniform and enforced in a uniform way throughout Canada, there will be chaos similar to that which we should suffer without any control at all. No one will pretend that such uniformity could be attained now through all the provincial legislatures or governments.

If the power to fix maximum prices on all commodities were left to the provinces, I submit there would possibly and even probably be unrestricted competition between provinces. For instance, the automobile industry is exclusively located in Ontario. Nothing could prevent the legislature in Toronto, or the provincial government, from raising the prices of automobiles and trucks for the benefit of local industries or to permit such industries to raise wages of workers in order to avoid strikes, for example. Let us admit that at least the temptation would be great. What would happen in Ontario would normally carry reactions and retaliation from other provinces on the commodities they produce; and any control of prices would be torn to pieces. But let us admit for one moment that it would be possible for all the provinces to reach an understanding in order to keep prices down. It would be at the cost of nine different price administrations and enforcement offices, at the cost of constant interprovincial conferences held by hundreds and thousands of representatives, even if there were only one for each field of commodities, everyone trying to get the most for his own province. I am drawing in my mind a picture of these thousands of representatives meeting together somewhere in a large room, and I ask hon. members of this house to picture for themselves what a Capharnaum it would be. But price control is not all. Let us suppose that the provinces reach uniformity of price control. What about supply and distribution? The normal course for each province would be to try to satisfy the province's demands before selling elsewhere in Canada. Butter, which is in short supply, is produced mostly in the west. If the prairie provinces satisfied all their people's needs before selling elsewhere, some people in Canada would be completely deprived of all commodities.

The same is true for maple syrup produced only in Quebec. It is true also for the automobile industry located exclusively in Ontario. How would the citizens of the rest of Canada like to look at our friends from Ontario driving beautiful and brand-new cars while they themselves would be walking? These things would certainly happen if the control of supply and distribution were provincial. The provinces might try to reach some agreement and we would witness between them the bargaining which has caused the ruin in the Balkan states, not to mention that the procedure would be so slow that the shortages would be over when the agreements were reached.

Our economy is a complete national whole and any control of it has to be one and must apply to Canada as a whole. Uniform economic control by the provinces is a Utopia. I am a strong advocate of provincial autonomy; I am not a centralizer; but I have to be practical. I would ask those who hypocritically shout about provincial autonomy in everything whether they are ready, before the people of their own province or even of their own riding, to take the responsibility for economic chaos. The constitution provides for the temporary transfer of rights in a time of national emergency and the present emergency is as serious for Canada's economic structure as the emergency of war was for its political structure. If the emergency regulations are to be enacted by the federal authority I now ask the question, are they to be enacted by parliament.

The British North America Act gives the legislative power to parliament and executive powers to the governor in council. In law it would be the right of parliament to enact all regulations on prices, imports, exports, supply, production, distribution and so on. But from a practical point of view, how could parliament, with its slow and complicated procedure, enact the hundreds of orders which would be necessary in the period of one year provided in the bill? How could parliament be ready at every moment of every day to face any economic emergency which is apt to arise at any moment?

Since the creation of the wartime prices and trade board there have been almost six hundred formal orders issued by the board and almost 1,800 administrative orders issued on behalf of the board. It is true that at the present moment there are only a few hundred basic orders in effect. The number that has been enacted in the past, however, illustrates the complexity of controls generally and the need of continued revision and change as conditions change. One has only to look at a few orders and regulations of the past years to realize the amount of detail involved in control legislation, and consequently the impossibility of parliament itself handling controls by ordinary statutes.

Nothing is dearer to my heart than the sovereignty and the rights of parliament, but is it not our duty under the emergency circumstances to delegate part of our legislative rights to the government and those boards which are in a better position than we are to deal with the matters mentioned in the bill? As has been said by the member for Chicoutimi the government and its agencies have successfully maintained the Canadian economy during the emergency of war. The wartime prices and trade board, for example, has accomplished a tremendous and wonderful job. Canada stands first in the world for its record in the struggle against inflation. Who wants now a programme of free competition which would, under the present conditions of lack of supply, lead us directly to high self-price-fixing by monopolies and cartels?

The only practical and possible solution at this moment is to surrender to the government part of our legislative powers. Let us not exaggerate. After all, the government is always responsible to parliament for all its acts and those of its boards, agents and controllers. Whenever parliament is not satisfied with the government's actions, it may reverse the government at any time.

I have already said that I am going to vote for the bill because I deem it essential that we surrender our legislative powers to the government in certain definite maters, but I do not feel that I have the right to do more than give the government such legislative powers as are necessary to meet the emergency situation. I do not feel that the people of my constituency gave me a mandate merely to pass that mandate over to the government.

I cannot accept without explanation section 5 of the bill introduced in the house on October 5—section 4 in the new proposed bill which will be studied in the committee has the same meaning. In that respect I am not far from the opinion expressed on Friday, November 23, by the hon. member for Lake Centre, which I quote at page 2457 of Hansard:

> That section means that all the orders in council that have been passed since 1939 will, on the day that this bill becomes law, be deemed to have been enacted by parliament and to be thereafter in effect.

The hon. member went on to say:

> Section 5 ratifies everything that the government has done under the War Measures Act and all the orders in council in effect on the date when this bill becomes law.

Further on the same page the hon. member said:

> I repeat, under section 5 parliament is asked to give approval to orders in council passed under the War Measures Act, sight unseen, in some cases unheard of by parliament.

Further on in his speech the hon. member said:

> Under the guise of giving support to certain controls we are asked to stand up manfully in this parliament and say to the government: We place our approval on everything that your controllers and ex-controllers, your boards, agencies or commissions have done under the War Measures Act whether we know of their existence or not.

I understand it is necessary, in order to avoid chaos, that the orders now in effect remain in force. But if the governor in council has taken the responsibility of enacting them, he should also take the responsibility of reenacting them under this bill.

Is section 5 necessary? Could not the governor in council renew the now existing orders on January 1, 1946, or even issue only one order in council which would state that all orders issued under the War Measures Act are reenacted? Could not the governor in council do it under a paragraph which could be drafted as follows—I understand that I have not the right to say that it is paragraph (e) of subsection 1 of section 2 of the new bill:

> Continuing, and discontinuing in an orderly manner as the emergency permits, measures adopted during and by reason of the war.

There is another point to which I should like to draw the attention of the house, namely, the possibility of the existence in the bill of a section under which the senate alone could jeopardize the whole economic structure of the country without the consent of this house. It might be argued that under this bill the government will be passing legislation which in ordinary times would necessitate the consent of both houses, and that consequently the withdrawal of the consent of one house only should be necessary to annul any legislation so passed. But it may be answered that if both houses in adopting this bill consent to surrender some legislative powers to the government, only both houses can withdraw such consent, even if it is on one specific matter.

If there is an emergency situation, and I believe there is one, can we take any risk even with the senate? I will go further and say that we cannot take the risk that any order enacted under this legislation after serious study by the cabinet and men of the trade concerned should be revoked by the senate, which is not a body responsible to the people, to the detriment of our economy. No order should be repealed without the consent of both houses and after thorough study. There are some means of assuring such an end, and at the same time of safeguarding at least in part the sovereignty of parliament. A joint committee of both houses could be set up which could examine, through subcommittees if necessary, the regulations and orders of the governor in council and the boards, and promote a gradual and yet as speedy decontrol as is wise in the national interest.

Decontrol is going to be a difficult job as far as prices are concerned. Let me quote from page 15 of the reference book on economic controls:

> The decontrol of prices will involve some risks. This is particularly true of retail or "final purchaser" ceilings since these represent the ultimate line of defence. It is not easy to judge when price control over a single commodity can be safely removed—the appearance of some unforeseen obstacle to the expansion of production or some unexpected increase in demand, possibly resulting from a shortage of another commodity used for similar purposes—might result in a substantial price increase. Moreover, the removal of price control over a particular article is likely to lead to prompt demands for freedom of bargaining on the part of producers of similar or competitive articles, which would obviously become very strong if the price of the released article rose above its former ceiling while manufacturers of competitive products were still held to their ceilings. Even if there were no significant price increase for the released article, the freedom to rearrange the price structure concerned, untrammelled by basic period prices, would be regarded by many manufacturers still subject to price control as a very real advantage. There is the further difficulty that ceilings once removed would be extremely difficult to reimpose both from an administrative and public relations standpoint.

It is true, however, that on all procedures of decontrol in all fields parliament should have something to say, and the proposed committee could safely do the work through subcommittees for the various kinds of controls. Why not have, as in the United States, a special committee on economic planning and policy? Such a committee, given the necessary powers to report on government and board regulations and orders, and procedure of decontrol, could at the same time assemble further material for the preparation of still more definite plans for Canada's economic future under normal conditions.

Let me say that we cannot dive into the future, into the dark of the unknown and risk the obligation of finding expedients when a sudden storm arises as we sail on the sea of laissez-faire. We cannot go blindfolded to a return of the economic conditions of 1930-39. Some planning has to be done.

If I am for individual freedom, I am against the abuse of it. I am against the unavoidable disappearance of economic and social freedom and security in a world of laissez-faire. I do not mean that government controls should remain when supply and demand are normal. I do not mean that the provinces should not get back their complete autonomy and parliament its complete sovereignty. But parliament has the responsibility of looking ahead to normal times. It has the duty of planning Canadian economy and enacting laws to avoid the errors and faults of a regime which many hypocritically call free enterprise, but which due to such errors and faults is apt to bring about a real enslavement of the people through monopolistic and cartel methods.

To conclude in a few words, Mr. Speaker, we need government economic control for the period of reconversion. We need planning for the future in order to attain two main objectives for the people of Canada: one, the establishment and maintenance of world and interior peace; and two, the provision of a higher standard of living and of economic and social security for all Canadians.

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, to repel the onslaught of totalitarian peoples, Canada found it necessary to adopt their methods. At this moment we are endeavouring to extricate ourselves from the situation created by these methods. May we hurriedly review the situation? When war came, the dominion government invaded the provincial field, and the cabinet took over the law-making for the dominion. The invasion of the provincial field by the dominion was carried out under an interpretation of the constitution. It was held that in the emergency of war the dominion had power over matters which normally fall within the provincial field; and under the War Measures Act the cabinet assumed powers which ordinarily reside in parliament to legislate for the people of Canada.

The war is over. During the emergency of war the War Measures Act gave powers which are mentioned in sections 3, 4 and 5 of that act; but the emergency came to an end when the war was over; the validity of all orders in council enacted since the end of the war may be properly questioned under section 6 of the War Measures Act, which says that the act shall avail only as long as the state of war exists. If anyone doubts this proposition he has but to turn to the preamble of bill No. 15, where it is so stated in terms.

What is to be done to get the Canadian people back to normal methods of government? Bill No. 15 has been brought down. It declares frankly that an emergency exists other than an emergency arising from war. There has been brought into this house and distributed to hon. members another bill No. 15, which I will style the second edition. It has been stated that it is not competent to hon. members to discuss the second edition of this bill until it has been introduced. I doubt very much if that be the government's wish. It is quite apparent that the government found that for reasons good or bad it could not maintain the position it took in bill No. 15, first edition, so that it caused to be distributed bill No. 15, second edition, as an intimation of its intentions. I assume that it was to preclude the necessity for two debates that bill No. 15, second edition, was made available to hon. members, in order that they might direct their remarks to the legislation the government intends to enact, provided that the second edition of the bill does not meet with the same sorry fate that was meted out to the first edition.

I do not think, Mr. Speaker, we need be very much disturbed in discussing the second edition because, with the exception of section 3(g) of bill No. 15, first edition, which is something in the nature of a combination of a naturalization act, an immigration act and an extradition treaty which would confer upon the executive power to deal in stringent fashion with people in the country as well as those who wish to come into it, the terms of the second bill in the result are identical with those of the first. Possibly with this exception, that bill No. 15, first edition, is clear; everyone understands what it means. Bill No. 15, second edition, is confusing; it has succeeded in confusing everyone a little.

Mr. MITCHELL: Not everyone. Speak for yourself.

Mr. HACKETT: Possibly the minister has had more experience with confusion than I have had, and I will let him speak to that point. But I would ask him to listen for just a moment, and perhaps he may have an opportunity later on to explain what this means. In bill No. 15, first edition, we find there is an emergency; here is the language:

. . . the War Measures Act be continued in force and that the governor in council be authorized to do and authorize during the said period such further acts and things and make such further orders and regulations as he may by reason of the national emergency resulting from the war deem necessary or advisable . . .

The second edition is not quite so clear. It is in these terms:

. . . and certain orders and regulations made under the War Measures Act be continued in force and that the governor in council be authorized to do and authorize such further acts and things and make such further orders and regulations as he may deem necessary or advisable by reason of the emergency and for the purpose of the discontinuance, in an orderly manner as the emergency permits, of measures adopted during and by reason of the emergency . . .

Now that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) has composed some of the great difficulties with which he has been confronted, I wish he would turn a few moments of his leisure when opportunity offers to the paragraph which I have just read and enlighten the house as to its meaning. There are a few of us who are perplexed by this multi-emergency, which seems actually to mean that there is and there is not an emergency. If I grasp the significance of the terminology, it means that there was an emergency, that there is not an emergency now, but to retreat from the emergency we must have emergency powers. That is what I believe the bill means.

If there be an emergency, it is not a war emergency. If there be an emergency, it is an emergency which arises from the totalitarian legislation which we enacted to fight and defeat a totalitarian people. That distinction is important. A system of controls can be effective only in so far as it is all-embracing. We have it on the high authority of the minister who said at page 2452 of Hansard: "That the whole of these controls are integrated, and each part is necessary to the harmonious functioning of the whole system." If it be necessary to maintain all the controls in order that they may function and we have an emergency arising out of the operation of these controls, I submit that it is futile to perpetuate controls for the purpose of releasing ourselves from controls. It does not make sense.

I do not criticize those who had the responsibility of enacting the legislation that brought these controls about. They were anxious to win the war. They had but one aim in view, and they have achieved that aim. But to achieve it they paid a price. I say to the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage) that the Canadian people paid a price which is spelled out in liberty and freedom and that a price in that coinage is too high to pay for anything but life itself. When we come to consider our present situaton and determne what course we should follow, we cannot hope to get back to normal without going through some turbulence, without experiencing some inconvenience. Anybody who takes a stimulant, anybody who develops artificial energy within himself must pay a price and Canada just cannot afford to taper off in a matter of this kind.

I submit that the emergency which confronts Canada to-day is not a war emergency; it is an emergency which arises out of the legislation which we enacted to win the war. We cannot ease ourselves out of it, because that is impossible. You cannot dam half a river; a dam to be effective has to go all the way across. I would draw to the attention of the house the fact that bill No. 15, whether it be edition No. 1 or edition No. 2, goes farther than the War Measures Act. It reenacts everything that was passed under the War Measures Act and it adds everything that was forgotten or omitted in framing the War Measures Act. We are told that this is being done for the purpose of maintaining order.

Somebody has threatened us with terrible trouble, with great evils, unless these controls be continued. What are these great perils? The hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet tells us that flour went up, that sugar went up in price. Supposing it did; supposing it goes up again. Is that to be weighed on the same scales with the intolerable situation in which the Canadian people find themselves now that the war is over? I submit that the control of prices is the first step in the first mile toward a situation which makes of a whole people so many vassals. That may sound somewhat extravagant, but anybody who is inclined to examine the situation, anyone who is inclined to find out just what it means to curtail the freedom of buying and selling, just what it means to those who are subjected to it, will not question the accuracy of that statement. If you control prices, of necessity you control wages. When you control prices and wages, you determine where men are to work. When you determine where men are to work, you tell them that they are to leave the province of Quebec to go to another province to earn their bread. They are no longer free; they are bound to accept dictation; they are bound to accept the rule of some master. Who he may be matters little; it is an infringement upon liberty and upon the right of the individual to make his own selection and live his own life.

Not infrequently we hear it said in the house that this is done in Great Britain, that something else is done in the United States. I do not think such instances are very helpful, because conditions are entirely different in Great Britain and in the United States. In Britain the area is much smaller; the British are a homogeneous people, and they have but one legislature. The Americans have a different form of government. We forget that we have in this country nine legislatures with definite functions, nine legislatures that came into existence to meet the needs of this country. When we are told that some ogre is going to pounce upon the Canadian people and squeeze its life-blood from it if these controls be not reenacted, if cabinet controls be not continued, I wonder whether one has thought that there are competent and going legislative bodies in each province across this country which can look after, as it is their duty to do, the welfare of the people in their respective provinces. Are rental controls required in Prince Edward Island? I do not know. Are they required in Saskatchewan? I do not know. But I venture to say that the rental situation may not be as acute or as difficult in Prince Edward Island or in Saskatchewan as it is in Ontario and Quebec. Ontario and Quebec have legislatures competent and well able to deal with these situations. I for one think they should not only be permitted but be obliged to deal with them. Let the provinces take up their duties. That is the scheme under which the dominion came into existence. It is well that we should decentralize the power which has gradually been concentrated and kept in the dominion cabinet.

[Mr. Hackett.]

If a man should come back to parliament after having been out of Canada, say on an extended trip to Mars, for fifteen or twenty years, and witness the degradation, the desuetude, the complete abnegation of parliamentary functions, he would be amazed and wonder what had happened to the Canadian people.

Gradually and because of the existence of war parliament has entrusted its lot to the cabinet. The cabinet has enacted something like one hundred thousand orders in council. But we are not dealing only with the cabinet. I doubt if there is a cabinet member in the house to-day who could put up his hand and say that he had not been embarrassed by the autocrats who have drafted orders in council that he has not had time to read and have enacted laws of which he knows little or nothing. There has grown up in this country, in this city I might say, a body of autocrats who are making legislation for the people and who are telling the harried members of the government opposite: Oh, if you relax these controls even the least little bit, great and irreparable damage will be done to the country, and there will be no remedy because we shall all be swept into the gulf—of oblivion possibly. I for one do not believe that. I am of those who think we took the right course during the war. But as Francis Thompson has said:

> Nothing begins, and nothing ends;
> That is not paid with moan,
> For we are born in other's pain,
> And perish in our own.

We shall perish in the anguish that is brought upon us, not by the war, but by the measures to which we resorted in order to win the war, unless we exhibit that measure of energy which enabled us to win the war to rid ourselves of the shackles that are fastened upon us at the present time.

I cannot do more than point out to the house that these emergencies do not come from the war. They are indirectly incidental to it. There is no hope of getting away from them, because they cannot be effective unless they are all maintained, and we are only deluding ourselves if we perpetuate this type of government.

Power does something to people. It does something to good people. It does something to decent people. I do not know that I can describe exactly what it does to them, but it certainly warps their point of view. It certainly raises themselves vastly in their own esteem, and it certainly has a tendency to diminish any appreciation of their own fallibility. We have consented that we be governed for the period of the war with absolutely blind confidence in the righteousness and virtue of those upon whom power was conferred. That was the proper thing to do. But just as it was the proper thing to do then, it is just as much our duty now to react against the philosophy and doctrine of those who preach that Canada will disintegrate and crumble if the We shall perish in the anguish that is brought upon us, not by the war, but by the measures to which we resorted in order to win the war, unless we exhibit that measure of energy which enabled us to win the war to rid ourselves of the shackles that are fastened upon us at the price of flour goes to $6 a barrel or if the price of sugar is raised. There are some things that are not measured, as I said earlier in my remarks, in terms of the market. We did not compute our position in that way at Dieppe. We did not compute in dollars and cents our position through the whole period of the war, and I submit that at the present time it is folly to endeavour to do so. I consider that many members of the government, who are just as much devoted to Canada as men can be, are being led astray by the whisperings of those on whom they had to rely during the past five or six years.

We have heard a lot about democracy of one kind and another. It has been described as an especially European form of government. Until recently it was assumed to be the form of government best suited to all civilized peoples, and there was an implicit belief that it was destined ultimately to triumph over all other forms of government and become itself the vehicle of the permanent golden age. But recent experience and the long story of history go to prove, on the contrary, that democracy is an unstable and impermanent system of government.

Thirty years ago a dictatorship was thought to be merely a passing unpleasantness and anarchy a brief catastrophe. The truth, which is now more evident, shows that dictatorship has been the most lasting of all methods of ruling civilized people and that if the history of anarchy were written it would be shown to have existed for much longer periods than democracy itself. Like the highest and most effective type of citizenship, democracy is a delicate flower of short life. The reason for this comparative impermanence of democracy is plain enough. Like civilization, democracy is a difficult enterprise, a complex and subtle way of life. Autocracy, the way of the order in council, on the contrary is the easiest and safest way for humanity when the high and more dangerous form of government has broken down. It is a short-cut for civilization to rescue itself from anarchy.

Mr. Speaker, what we require here, what Canada requires is not more legislation continuing controls. What Canada requires is an energetic government, a government with nerve enough to remove controls and give Canada back to democracy and democratic institutions.

Mr. MAXIME RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, we are called upon to vote the second reading of bill No. 15, as submitted to the house by the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), on November 23 last, and to scrutinize the reasons he enumerated in support of the measure. Indeed, as mentioned a while ago by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett), there has been a second edition. However, whether we consider the first or the second versions, we have to draw the same conclusions, for the difference is in form rather than substance.

The object of this bill seems evident. Since the outbreak of war, the government, under a statute known as the War Measures Act, may, by orders in council, be entrusted with powers which, in peace time, come under the jurisdiction of the federal parliament or the provincial legislatures.

Now that the war is over, the government wish to be entrusted, in peace time, with the same powers, under a different formula. To my mind, this measure has a dual aspect, both dictatorial and constitutional, and it is from these two viewpoints that I intend to consider it.

First, the dictatorial aspect: as I have already pointed out, due to the war, the government has assumed the functions of parliament and governed by orders in council. For six years we have been under a real dictatorship. We had reasons to believe that the war being over this system would come to an end. But no, it is intended that it will be maintained. One has only to read this bill to be convinced of this. It is truly an attempt to establish dictatorship in peace time, in spite of the constitution. It is a flagrant denial of responsible government.

I do not claim that, in certain cases, a measure of control may not be resorted to for a time, but then, let the government ask us to consider a legislation covering specific cases, let them prove to us the necessity of taking such a course, let them demonstrate that these powers are not devolved on the provinces, or that they are unable to exercise them; then we shall be in a position to decide with full knowledge of facts. But we are asked at the present time to give a blank cheque without being shown sufficient reasons for doing it.

However, we know how the government intend to exercise these powers. We all remember that, a short time ago, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) who was then acting prime minister told us, in support of his refusal to table orders in council, that it was up to the minister to decide whether it was in the public interest to supply these orders to the house and that the house had to be governed by his decisions.

Never had such an autocratic and dictatorial pronouncement been uttered in this house.

Just imagine, Mr. Speaker! While parliament is in session, the cabinet legislates by order in council, and the assembled representatives of the people are not even entitled to information about this legislation which belongs to parliament. If that is not dictatorship, I do not know the meaning of the word.

Never in peace time has a more anti-democratic measure been introduced in parliament.

After a six year war which proved tremendously costly in life and wealth and which was waged, we were told over and over again, to overthrow dictatorship and to defend democracy in Europe, the most anti-democratic measure one could possibly devise is introduced. What a joke!

What is even more astounding is that such a bill should be introduced by a Liberal government, headed by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King).

On August 2, 1935, before the general election held the same year, the Prime Minister expounding the Liberal philosophy in a broadcast speech to the Canadian people in which he criticized the legislation put through by the Bennett government during what were perhaps the most critical years in our history—unemployment at that time endangered the economic future of the country—spoke as follows:

Restoration of Responsible Government

The Liberal party believes that the present crisis has been made an excuse for the usurpation of the rights of parliament, and the assumption of autocratic powers by the executive. Liberalism stands, as always for the principle of a free parliament, and for the supremacy of parliament. To this end it would repeal the legislation enacted by the present administration, which deprives parliament of its control over expenditures and taxation, and invests the executive with unwarranted arbitrary powers, as for example:

(1) legislation permitting the executive to enact measures by order in council for peace, order and good government, and

(2) legislation providing the executive with a "blank cheque" for expenditure of any kind.

[Mr. M. Raymond.]

What the government alleged to be emergency measures, to aid in the relief of the unemployed, have turned out to be a part of a deliberate policy, directed towards accustoming the public mind to the framework of the fascist state. We cannot too soon, once more, subject the executive to the control of parliament, if we are longer to have responsible government in Canada.

No better qualification could be applied to this bill or help us weigh its merits. These words I commend to the consideration of the house.

Some of the absolute powers the government seeks come under dominion jurisdiction while others are provincial prerogatives.

Let us first look into those which may be delegated by the dominion parliament. We will then discuss the others in relation to the constitutional aspect of the bill.

What reason has the Minister of Justice alleged to justify the section of the act which deals with the powers of the federal government? None whatever.

Of course, he said, without proving it, however, that a state of national emergency prevailed, but that was mainly to justify the government's encroachment upon provincial rights.

Parliament was assembled on September 6 to pass the legislation needed to meet present conditions.

The speech from the throne stated that everything had been foreseen and that, accordingly, plans had been prepared and were already in operation. I quote the following excerpt from the speech from the throne:

So far as the future could be foreseen, my ministers had taken steps to see that Canada was prepared to meet the very difficult situations which would arise when victory had been won.

We were told that everything had been foreseen.

Preparations for the demobilization, rehabilitation and reestablishment in civil life of the men and women in the armed forces were well under way when Germany surrendered. The same is true of measures for the reconversion of the economic life of our country from a war-time to a peace-time basis, and for the maintenance of a high level of employment and national income. The plans thus developed to meet the requirements of the period of transition are now being put into full operation.

In view of those official statements, I do not see any justification for parliament delegating its powers to the governor in council.

More than that, we have been sitting since September 6, ready to pass any necessary legislation to meet any emergency and I am still endeavouring without success to find any justification for Parliament delegating its powers to the government.

What are the exceptional measures submitted by the government since this session began or since September 6, to meet an emergency?

Certainly not that dealing with a national flag bearing the union jack as advocated by the Minister of Justice.

Certainly not that dealing with British nationality under the camouflaged name of Canadian citizenship.

The Housing Act was amended but it was already on the statute books. A special act has been passed to provide for the welfare of returned soldiers.

If other measures were necessary, why have they not been introduced?

There has been a strike in Windsor for the last three months. But when some hon. members brought up the matter in the house claiming that it was urgent, it was held that it was not sufficiently urgent to warrant discussion at that time and the strike is still going on. I wonder what the government is doing with its dictatorial powers to settle the condition prevailing at Windsor?

In short why are we here? In what respects has parliament been unable to cope with the situation? This has not been shown.

But the bill goes farther than that and encroaches on the prerogatives of the legislatures, which is more serious, and that is what induces me to discuss the constitutional aspect of the bill.

If one refers to the bill, he finds that several of the powers specially requested fall under section 92 of the B.N.A. Act and therefore come under the sole jurisdiction of the provinces.

When the government requests the authorization to take over those prerogatives from the provincial legislatures they violate the constitution.

To justify its actions the government invoke, as it appears from the preamble of the first edition of bill No. 15, a "National Emergency", stating that the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada are at stake, while in the second edition of the same bill the words "peace, order and welfare of Canada" have been deleted.

I do not know whether unusual changes have taken place since November 23; but what evidently was the basis of bill No. 15 on November 23 last is apparently no longer the basis of bill No. 15 on December 4, that is ten days later.

The "national emergency" invoked in the bill is not proven and we are entitled to ask the Minister of Justice how Canada's national existence is endangered and what is meant by a "national emergency"; in addition it must be shown that the provincial legislatures are unable to cope with the situation.

Clause 91 of the constitution which formed the basis of the first edition of the bill, expressly states:

> It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces.

Now that the honourable the Minister of Justice has deleted the words "peace, order and good government" from the preamble of the bill, I do not know on what grounds he will seek to prove that his bill is constitutional.

I think I can summarize as follows the arguments advanced by the Minister of Justice in support of this bill on November 23 last:

He claims three grounds; first he considers as a legal principle the decision which the Privy Council gave in 1923 in the Fort Frances case; the legislation passed by the United Kingdom for the purpose of conferring certain special powers on His Majesty's government since the cessation of hostilities; the fact that from November, 1918, at which time the first great war came to an end, to May and July, 1920, the cost of living and wholesale prices indices rose considerably, a thing which might occur again and would constitute a national emergency.

Let us examine the first argument, of a legal character, based on section 91 of the B.N.A. Act and on the Fort Frances case.

(a) It should first be noted that the above mentioned case related to control powers on the supply of paper, that is one commodity only, which is entirely different from the present case in which the provinces are to be deprived of most of their prerogatives.

Thus, in paragraph (c) of section 2 of the reprinted copy of bill No. 15, which corresponds to paragraphs (d), (e) and (f) of section 3 of the original bill, mention is made of a number of matters, besides the others that are included in the other paragraphs of the same section.

Mr. LESAGE: Does not the hon. member think that this is necessary, from an economic standpoint?

Mr. RAYMOND: It is up to the minister to prove that, and that is why I am discussing the reasons which the Minister of Justice has put forward in support of his measure. If the hon. member will kindly wait, I shall come to that later when dealing with the third reason which the Minister of Justice has adduced in order to show that a special emergency existed. I am now discussing his first legal argument, namely his reference to the Fort Frances case.

(b) Besides, the Fort Frances case more especially related to the validity of the war measures act, which has nothing to do with this discussion.

(c) As regards the principle expounded in the above mentioned decision, to the effect that parliament is in a better position than the tribunal to determine the special circumstances creating a national emergency, I may say that the privy council did not hesitate to declare ultra vires certain acts that had been passed by parliament under section 91 of the B.N.A. Act, on the grounds of peace, order and good government, especially in 1921 and 1925 in connection with the Board of Commerce Act, 1919, and the Combines and Fair Prices Act, 1919, as well as in the Snider case. I shall quote from the decision given in 1925 in the Snider case. It was then ruled:

> The act could not be justified under the general power in section 91 to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada, as it was not established that there existed in the matter, any emergency which put the national life of Canada in unanticipated peril.

We have there the proof that parliament can decide one way while at the same time the privy council can take an opposite stand. Therefore the legal authority of the Minister of Justice, based on the Fort Frances case, no longer applies, because not only in 1925 but even in 1937, as the Minister of Justice is aware, since he was representing the government, the privy council put aside parliament's conception of a national emergency when it invalidated the social legislation passed under the Bennett government in 1934 and 1935 on the grounds of "peace, order and good government".

But I would add, in connection with the Snider case, Justice Duff's remarks, when he declared that "social legislation" ultra vires:

> The legislation in question there was framed for the purpose of dealing with industrial disputes and authorized the Minister of Labour to take steps to convene, in the case of such a dispute, a board composed of a representative of the workmen, a representative of the employer, and a third person, to be nominated by the Minister of Labour himself. The act prohibited a strike or lockout pending the consideration of a dispute by the board. The importance of the matters dealt with by the statute, the fact that the statute was making a provision for meeting a condition which prevailed throughout the whole of Canada, and for dealing with industrial disputes which, in many and, indeed, most cases, would affect people in more than one province, the fact that the machinery provided had proved to be a valuable instrument in the interests of industrial peace, were not disputed . . .
> Nevertheless, the board negatived the existence of the general principle that the mere fact that dominion legislation is for the general advantage of Canada, or is such that it will meet a mere want which is felt throughout the dominion, renders it competent if it cannot be brought within the heads enumerated specifically in section 91.

As I have just said, as recently as 1937, the Privy Council ruled ultra vires the laws enacted by parliament in 1934 and 1935 under the Bennett government, at a time when unemployment was at its height.

At all events, that principle does not exempt the government from proving the existence at the present time of "a national emergency" endangering the "security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada."

Then, the minister mentioned the United Kingdom legislation.

We cannot compare things that do not suffer comparison. Not only does Great Britain's legislation apply to questions of limited import, when compared with those covered by bill No. 15, but conditions are different over there, as the hon. member for Stanstead has just remarked. In Great Britain there is not, as in Canada, a division of powers between a central parliament and provincial legislatures, and for this reason, there is no jurisdictional conflict nor constitutional issue involved.

Moreover, Great Britain is in Europe, Canada is in America. The disorders which prevail in Europe are inexistent in this country. In Canada, famine is unknown while it is more or less prevalent in the United Kingdom which depends upon our exports to live.

Thirdly, the minister, as reported in Hansard of November 23, mentioned as a condition of national emergency, the possible increase of the cost of living—and this is the only condition he has mentioned—recalling that, after the end of the first great war, that is from November, 1918 to July, 1920, the cost of living index had shown an increase of thirty-eight per cent, while the wholesale price index had risen by fifty-five per cent from November, 1918 to May, 1920.

I shall be content to point out to the Minister of Justice that the Privy Council has decided that such circumstances did not warrant the central authority to encroach on provincial prerogatives. I refer him to the case relating to the Board of Commerce Act, 1919 and the Combines and Fair Prices Act, 1919, heard in November, 1921. This is a direct answer to the allegations of the hon. minister.

I quote the judgment and a few notes reported in 1 App. C. 1922, pages 191, 197, 198 and 200:

The Combines and Fair Prices Act, enacted by the parliament of Canada, in 1919, authorized the board of commerce, created by another statute of that year, to restrain and prohibit the formation and operation of such trade combinations for production and distribution in the provinces as that board might consider to be detrimental to the public interest; the board might also restrict accumulation of food, clothing, and fuel beyond the amount reasonably required, in the case of a private person for his household, and in the case of a trader for his business, and required the surplus to be offered for sale at fair prices; and the board could attach criminal consequences to any breach of the act which it determined to be improper:

Held, that the acts were ultra vires the dominion legislature, since they interfered seriously with "property and civil rights in the provinces," a subject reserved exclusively to the provincial legislatures by section 92, head 2, of the British North America Act, 1867, and were not passed in any highly exceptional circumstances, such as war or famine, which conceivably might render trade combinations and hoarding subjects outside the heads of section 92 and within the general power given by section 91.

Now I am going to quote the notes of the privy council:

It is to the legislatures of the provinces that the regulation and restriction of their civil rights have in general been exclusively confided, and as to these the provincial legislatures possess quasi-sovereign authority. It can, therefore, be only under necessity in highly exceptional circumstances, such as cannot be assumed to exist in the present case, that the liberty of the inhabitants of the provinces may be restricted by the parliament of Canada, and that the dominion can intervene in the interests of Canada as a whole in questions such as the present one. . .

And further on:

It has already been observed that circumstances are conceivable, such as those of war or famine, when the peace, order and good government of the dominion might be imperilled of a character in reality beyond anything provided for by the enumerated heads in either section 92 or section 91 itself. Such a case, if it were to arise would have to be considered closely before the conclusion could properly be reached that it was one which could not be treated as falling under any of the heads enumerated.

Mr. Justice Duff, rendering judgment in the cases to which I have already referred, concerning the act enacted by parliament in 1934 and 1935 under the Bennett government, said:

In the board of commerce case the judicial committee had to consider legislation by which a dominion board was constituted and empowered, broadly speaking, to inquire into, and prohibit, profiteering and practices in connection therewith in dealings in the necessaries of life. In particular, the board had authority to regulate the price of such necessaries of life.

The question arose upon a case stated as to the validity of an order made by the board regulating the prices of ready-made clothing in certain establishments in Ottawa. The validity of the order was attacked by the association of manufacturers concerned and was supported by counsel on behalf of the board and of the dominion. The litigation raised the concrete question inter partes as to the legality of the particular order; and the answer to that question turned upon the answer to the question concerning the validity of the legislation, which it was, therefore, essential to determine. The statute was supported on various grounds and, among others, on the ground that in the year 1919, when it was enacted, the evils of hoarding and high prices in respect of the necessaries of life had attained such dimensions "as to affect the body politic of Canada." Nobody denied the existence of the evil. Nobody denied that it was general throughout Canada. Nobody denied the importance of suppressing it. Nobody denied that it prejudiced and seriously prejudiced the well being of the people of Canada as a whole, or that in a loose popular sense of the words it "affected the body politic of Canada." Nevertheless, it was held that these facts did not constitute a sufficient basis for the exercise of jurisdiction by the dominion parliament under the introductory clause in the manner attempted.

This, I believe, is a direct answer to the facts put forward by the Minister of Justice to justify the existence of a national emergency.

After the first world war, ended in November, 1918, the cost of living, as the Minister of Justice pointed out, went up considerably with the increase in wholesale prices. The government adopted an act to control prices, thereby assuming a right which in peace time belongs to the provincial legislative bodies.

The Privy Council decided those were not sufficient grounds to disregard section 92 of the B.N.A. Act. More recently the measures enacted by parliament under the Bennett administration in 1934 and 1935 on the plea of a national emergency were declared ultra vires by the Privy Council because they infringed upon the rights of the provinces, which alone have the power to pass legislation regarding labour agreements, wages and working hours.

The Minister of Justice has not substantiated the preamble of the bill, that is, "the national emergency" which might endanger the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada. That was essential. According to the Privy Council only in an emergency such as war or famine would the federal government be justified to deprive the provinces of their powers.

Well, the war is over and there is no famine. According to the Prime Minister we export "nearly half of all our inspected meat."

In peace time the provinces have the exclusive right to legislate in regard to property and civil rights, in matters of labour or other contracts and to fix the quality and prices of goods and services. And as the privy council ruled in 1937:

The apportionment of powers as between the dominion and the provincial legislatures is one of the most essential conditions, and very likely the most essential one, of the interprovincial pact to which the B.N.A. Act gives effect.

If controls are necessary, they should be exercised under the authority of the dominion or of the provincial legislatures, as the case may be, but within their own jurisdiction. I am afraid that this legislation is a further step leading to the centralization of powers, in order to gradually deprive the provinces of their powers. I am opposed to that.

Let us respect provincial autonomy.

Mr. LESAGE: And invite economic chaos.

Mr. RAYMOND: I say that it is an encroachment on the part of the dominion upon the rights of the provinces. This legislation is null and void and ultra vires. I call the attention of the house to section 9 of the original bill which reads as follows:

This Act shall come into force on a day fixed by proclamation of the governor in council and on and after that day the present war shall for the purposes of the War Measures Act, be deemed no longer to exist.

Well, should this bill be passed and subsequently be declared ultra vires, what would be the consequences? It would cease to be in force. More than that, it would be considered as never having been in force, as it would be null and void ab initio. And all the consequences of the act would disappear at the same time. As section 9 says that, for the purposes of the War Measures Act, war shall be deemed no longer to exist from the day that this act shall come into force, the War Measures Act would have continued and would continue to be in force.

Whether this bill is ultra vires or not, we are asked thereby to grant dictatorial powers to the government, and to strip the provinces of their rights.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ANTHONY HLYNKA (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us, an act to confer certain powers upon the governor in council during the national emergency following the war, is nothing more or less than an extension for another year of the powers of the cabinet which they enjoyed under the War Measures Act. The proposed act will authorize the governor in council to continue legislating by order in council, as has been the case during the war. The system proved to be a very useful and convenient instrument in the hands of the government in legislating as it pleased whether parliament was sitting or not. The question before us now is, should this power of the government be extended for another year? My personal view is that it is essential at this time that the governor in council should have a certain amount of power but only to the extent necessary to enable the government to deal with ordinary routine matters and matters which are truly emergency matters; but unlimited power of the government should definitely be curbed.

I have personal knowledge of the manner in which many of the various controls operate, and I might as well say frankly that there is altogether too much red tape in their administration. I shall give only one illustration, which is a good example of maladministration called the control. Some of these controlling agencies have simply gone the limit. Their chief aim seems to be to control for the sake of controlling and nothing else.

Several months ago I referred to the construction controller the case of a farmer who, by the way, lives in the constituency of my hon. friend the member for Athabaska. This man applied for a permit to build a small hall and a candy store at a country resort. The value of the building was to be in the neighbourhood of $300. The farmer had his own lumber, which was exposed at all times to country fires, and being an amateur carpenter he was going to build the hall himself in his spare time. He owns one or two boats which he hires out, and manages to keep and clothe his family on the income he receives from that source. The construction controller could not see his way clear to grant him a permit "at the present time".

I submit that in that case there was absolutely no excuse for refusing the permit. The farmer had the lumber and he was going to do the work himself. But no; the controller was on the job controlling for the sake of controlling. I could recite many other cases where similar things have been done. In view of my experience with the various controllers, therefore, I can only come to the conclusion that many of them control for the sake of controlling only.

Nevertheless I am in favour of some of the essential controls. I cannot, however, subscribe to all these controls being maintained in a wholesale manner, especially when I know the extent to which this power has been abused even during the war. Does one need to mention the various orders in council which were passed while the house was sitting? It might as well be said that altogether too many of these orders in council have remained a government secret far too long. True, the ministers try to justify every action of the government, but the fact remains that these numerous orders in council and controls have placed this nation in a strait-jacket, which is an unhealthy condition for an individual or for a nation to be in.

It must be remembered that all this maladministration and abuse took place during the war. But now that the war is over, the people of this democratic nation resent the undemocratic and unreasonable controls. In other words, the Canadian people demand that parliament exercise some control over the controllers.

I did not rise, however, to discuss merely the administrative inefficiencies of the various controls. I rose chiefly to discuss an important principle. I have in mind the unjustifiable disregard of the rights of some of our citizens. Apparently bill No. 15, as originally presented, has been or will be withdrawn and with it section 3(1)(g), and I was wondering whether the amendments which the government will propose will cover the objective of section 3(1)(g). I want it clearly understood that I am not objecting to the granting of some power to the governor in council to deal with what are emergency matters and matters of merely routine significance. But we must draw a line somewhere when we deal with naturalized or Canadian-born citizens. Let me point out what I mean.

At the beginning of the war the government under the War Measures Act passed what is known as the defence of Canada regulations. Under section 26A it was directed that all unnaturalized persons born in territories which were under the sovereignty or control of enemy countries on the dates on which Canada declared war on those countries must register with the police and report from time to time to the police as ordered. It is my personal view that persons who were not British subjects and who were nationals of enemy countries should have registered in the interests of the safety of our country. But persons who were born in countries which fell under the pressure of the enemy were wronged when they were ordered to register as enemy aliens. The original order in council revealed that those who framed it had little knowledge of the history and geography of Europe. For instance, former Czechoslovakian citizens were asked to register as enemy aliens after Czechoslovakia was given away to the nazis at Munich in 1938 against the will of its inhabitants. Having thrown them into the clutches of the nazis we then proceeded to ask persons who originally came from that country and resided in Canada to register as enemy aliens. Whoever conceived that bright idea certainly made us look ridiculous in the eyes of the nations of the world. Eventually representations were made to a committee of this house by Czechoslovakian representatives in Canada, and the Canadian government amended section 26A of the defence of Canada regulations by passing, on February 7, 1941, order in council P.C. 2420. Other representations were made on behalf of other nationals who found themselves in similar circumstances, and eventually all of them were exempted from this registration.

I might mention at this point that the officials who interpreted these regulations did not even know the difference between Austria as it existed before the first great war and Austria as it existed before this war. For that reason, any person whose naturalization certificate showed that he came from the Austro-Hungarian empire was asked to register if he had taken out his naturalization certificate after September 1, 1922.

But that was not by any means the worst thing the government did. The defence of Canada regulations as originally framed applied only to enemy aliens, but later section 26B was enacted by order in council which brought under these regulations even some British subjects, namely those persons who were naturalized since September 1, 1922, and who were born in territories which were under the sovereignty or control of enemy countries on the dates on which Canada declared war on them. That is the point to which I wish to draw attention in particular.

I also wish to say at this point that it is time we made up our minds whether we are going to trust naturalized British subjects or not after we have granted them naturalization certificates. We cannot continue to suspect and hold responsible every naturalized Canadian citizen for everything which happens in the country from which he came. I certainly object to the idea of permitting anyone to push around any of our citizens, regardless of where they may have come from originally. Should any one break the law, we have the courts of justice to deal with offenders, whether they are of Canadian or any other origin.

I maintain that nothing positive can be accomplished by such orders as those to which I have referred. On the contrary, they can do us a lot of harm, especially when we assist in promoting suspicion against our own citizens. As I have already remarked, if an individual among a group of naturalized Canadians should break any of our laws, whether in time of war or in time of peace, such individual should be brought before the courts of justice and dealt with as an individual. I maintain that once we grant a person the status of Canadian citizen he must be regarded as a Canadian. We must do everything possible to help our naturalized citizens to feel completely that they are a part of our nation. When we shall have eliminated suspicion and distrust from our midst we shall then have a truly strong and united Canada.

I should like to place on record a paragraph or so from an order in council which was passed by the governor in council on November 2, 1940, amending the defence of Canada regulations. I am placing these paragraphs on record to show what a ridiculous stand was taken and how little we know about our own people. On November 2, 1940, order in council P.C. 6150 was passed. This is the first paragraph:

Whereas the Minister of Justice reports that it has been reported by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police that certain persons who are guilty of technical offences of not registering in accordance with the provisions of the defence of Canada regulations relating to enemy aliens, have been ordered interned under the provisions of paragraph (9) of regulation 25 of the said regulations.

Further down in the order in council I find this paragraph:

That in view of the fact that certain persons who were not required to register under the original regulations were under the impression that they were not affected by the subsequent regulation due to the fact that they were naturalized, some of them have been guilty of the offence of failing to register.

In substance, this order in council goes so far as to offer another opportunity to these Canadians, who had been naturalized since September 1, 1922, to register as enemy aliens, and therefore paragraph 9 of regulation 25 was revoked, and another paragraph 9 was substituted so that these persons might register within one month after the notice. It further states:

. . . or if he refuse or fail to answer truly any of the questions put by the registrar, or if being registered he fail to report as hereinbefore required or to observe any of the conditions upon which he is permitted to be at liberty, he may in addition to any other penalty to which he may therefor by law be liable, be interned as a prisoner of war on the order of the Minister of Justice or the registrar general of enemy aliens.

As I have stated, the reason I wished to place these two or three paragraphs on record was to show to what extent the government may go in legislating by way of orders in council. It seems to me that, had this matter been brought before the house, the house surely would not have approved any such legislation. I wish to emphasize as strongly as I can that, when we deal with this particular phase of the problem concerning persons who do not happen to have been born in this country, once such persons become naturalized citizens of Canada we must not entertain any idea of deporting them wholesale, no matter who they may be; because to-day it may be one group of people, and in a year's time or five years' time it may be another group and so forth.

I wish to read from an article that was published in Toronto in News of November 24, 1945. It is not very often that I agree with Mr. Elmore Philpott, because he is inclined to be pinkish, but on this occasion I consider that he has hit the nail on the head. I quote:

When a person acquires Canadian citizenship, either by birth or due process of law, possession of that right should be absolute and inviolable. It might be argued that for certain offences nationality should be revoked from people who have shown themselves unworthy of it. I doubt even that. But, if so, the power should be conferred only on judicial tribunals where the subject would have all the customary protections of British law. It is nothing short of an outrage to propose that the cabinet be given power to discuss in secret session cases involving revocation of nationality. That is nothing more nor less than the writing into the laws of Canada of one most outrageous feature of the nazi system.

Surely we all recall the dark days of the depression of the thirties when, through no fault of their own, scores of thousands of immigrants to this country were unemployed, the government of Canada arbitrarily deported whole shiploads of them.

If at that time there had been on the statute books of Canada the arbitrary and outrageous powers now asked in Bill 15, every foreign-born person would have been made liable to secret revocation of citizenship—and deportation without even so much as the right to say good-bye to friends or even close kin.

Bill 15, subsection (G) of section 3, is the most outrageous proposal ever introduced into the parliament of Canada. It should be stamped on and killed so emphatically that all the world will know that the Canadian people want no thin edge of the nazi doctrine wedged into our most sacred laws.

I agree with that view wholeheartedly, and having chosen to touch upon this very aspect of our legislation, I might say that we have too long entertained the view that if a person does not behave we must brand all other individuals of the same race or the same background as being disloyal to the country. I hold that once a person obtains his citizenship certificate and becomes a Canadian citizen we should not even dream of revocation. If a man commits a crime he should be punished, but I see no justification for holding a stick over the heads of all those people who do not happen to have been born in this country. The governor in council, by passing these various orders in council, has been wielding this stick altogether too long, and for that reason I am bringing this matter to the attention of the house. I am sure the present Minister of Justice will take my remarks into consideration, and I believe that in the future he will avoid the recurrence of similar action on the part of the government.

Mr. D. KING HAZEN (St. John-Albert): The bill that was presented to us this afternoon differs in some respect from the bill that was introduced in this house on October 5 last. While it limits to some extent the powers which the government sought under the former bill, nevertheless, if it is passed by the house in its present dress, which is somewhat more modest than the dress it previously wore, it will give the government powers which in my opinion no government should possess in the days of peace.

I wish to place myself on record as opposed to the bill. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said in this house yesterday that he understood no exception was likely to be taken to the principle of the bill. Well, if the principle underlying it was that the government have authority for a period of one year to make orders and regulations, when this house was not sitting, to meet any national emergency that might suddenly arise in consequence of the war I would not find it objectionable. But as I read the bill that is not its principle.

As I read this bill the principle that underlies it is, that the government shall have dictatorial powers for a period, which is not altogether definite, to carry on a great part of the business of the country by order in council and by regulations when, how and as it sees fit; or, to put it in another way, the principle that underlies the bill is, not to provide for emergencies in peace time but to provide means of continuing government dictatorship now that the war is over.

I am opposed to the government having such dictatorial powers, and unconstitutional powers in times of peace. The War Measures Act gave the government dictatorial powers during the war. It gave the government power to do what it thought was necessary for the security and the defence of Canada. It took away the functions of parliament, or a great many of them. It deprived the provinces of many of the rights given to them by the British North America Act.

I do not find fault with the government having such great powers in times of war; there are good reasons why they should have them. But the war is over now and government orders in council and government regulations are not going to help us win the peace, nor are they going to help us maintain freedom, justice and democracy in this country.

I do not suggest for one moment that all controls should be taken away immediately. I believe it is essential that some controls be maintained for a time, but there is a right way and a wrong way of establishing them.

The wrong way, the unconstitutional way, the undemocratic way, is by government orders in council and regulations.

The right way, the constitutional way, the democratic way is by legislation properly introduced into this house, and after it has been discussed and considered by the elected representatives of the people and by the senate, passed by parliament.

Now that the war is over, are there any good reasons why parliament should surrender one of its most important functions, that of legislating, and let the government legislate by orders in council and by regulations on all subjects set out in section 2 of this bill? If there are any good reasons I have not heard them; if there are such reasons I think the members of this house should be made acquainted with them by the government before this bill is passed.

What is a national emergency? It is not defined in the bill and we have not been told by the government what it is. We should be told that; there should be some definition of a national emergency in this bill before we give the government the great power for which it asks.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What does Drew say?

Mr. HAZEN: The function of this house—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I asked what Drew said.

Mr. HAZEN: The hon. member should tell us; I do not know.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The hon. member is reading every word of what Drew said.

Mr. HAZEN: The function of this house to enact legislation—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What did Drew say?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. When an hon. member has the floor no interruption should take place without his permission.

Mr. HAZEN: The function of this house to enact legislation will be abrogated to a great extent if we pass this bill in its present form. The Minister of Finance said recently in this house:

There is danger that the House of Commons may be losing sight of its real functions, which are to vote supply, control expenditures and to enact legislation.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That is the second page.

Mr. HAZEN: If this bill becomes law in its present form our function to enact legislation will be lost to a great extent and for a considerable time. Let us not lose sight of that danger. We should insist that legislation by government orders and regulations be brought to an end, and that the people's representatives in this house, who are much more familiar with conditions in their constituencies than are members of the cabinet or deputy ministers or civil servants, make the law of the dominion.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Hear, hear.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. HAZEN: Under our constitution and under our democratic form of government the men and women whom the electors of this country send to parliament to represent them and to whom they are responsible at the next election, are supposed to make the laws.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That is going to be tough for some of us.

Mr. HAZEN: And independent judges have the duties of administering those laws.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The hon. member said all that before.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. For the second time I would ask the hon. member not to interrupt the hon. gentleman who has the floor.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, according to the rules an hon. member is not allowed to read his speech. The hon. member is reading every word.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Yes, he is, every word he is saying.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The hon. member is just in a haze.

Mr. HAZEN: Mr. Speaker, as I said—and I propose to repeat it now—under our constitution and under our democratic form of government the men and women who are elected to this house by the people throughout the country are supposed to make the laws, and independent judges have the duties of administering those laws.

[Mr. Hazen.]

That, sir, is a principle that should not be lost sight of; it is a principle that should be carefully observed; it is a principle that should be guarded jealously by the members of this house and should not be surrendered in times of peace if we are to have government by, of and for the people.

Every person in this house was elected by the voters of his constituency to make the laws or to assist in making the laws of the dominion. As I say, we are responsible to them at the next election for what we do here. In my opinion we do not keep faith with them or with parliamentary institutions, nor are we true to the principles of British justice, if we fail in our duty in this respect on the ground of expediency or convenience or national emergency, call it what you will, and let the government make orders and regulations which have the force of law and impose fines and penalties for their violation, which directly affect the lives of the people throughout the dominion.

The people of this country are becoming alarmed at government by order in council. They are losing patience with controls and regulations. They are becoming fed up with bureaucracy, and they have good reason to be.

The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has given instances of how some orders in council have overridden the fundamental rights of the people of Canada by depriving them of the right to counsel when investigations are being carried on by officers of the crown.

He has rendered a service to the dominion by bringing those orders in council into the light of day; he has rendered a service to freedom and to justice in bringing them to the attention of the house and the country, and yet by this bill we are asked to approve all orders in council which have been passed under the War Measures Act. Under section 2, subsection 3 of the bill, we have no right to look into those orders in council or to have them annulled, as is provided for other orders in council.

There are always some people about, and present company is not altogether excepted, who hold the view that the underlying principles of British justice and of our constitution are very fine principles indeed, so long as they do not interfere with their plans or activities, or prevent them from taking short-cuts to achieve the ends they have in view. No matter how good their intentions may be or how earnest they may be in their endeavours, such persons are a menace to the state if they have the power to override those principles.

A chief justice of England once said that "high capacity and ardent zeal never need to be more carefully watched than when they appear to have entered with all their might upon a wrong course."

In this connection I am reminded of a letter that Lord Disraeli, when Prime Minister of Great Britain, wrote to Queen Victoria who wanted a certain gentleman appointed Archbishop of Canterbury. He said: "The Bishop of London sympathizes with everything that is earnest, but what is earnest is not always true. On the contrary, error is often more earnest than true."

It seems to me, sir, that the government of the dominion, in bringing this bill into the house, has proceeded upon a wrong course, very earnestly and no doubt very sincerely, but on a course that violates constitutional principles and, I may add, the principles of British justice.

I propose to give one or two illustrations that have come to my notice to show how government orders and regulations affect men's lives, interfere with their means of livelihood and violate their fundamental rights.

Early this year a young man showed me a letter he had received from a government department. He was a carpenter in a very small way, and in 1942 had taken a contract to construct some small buildings, an undertaking with which he was not very familiar. Neither was he familiar with government regulations, but he made an honest effort to comply with them. When he paid the men who worked for him he deducted the tax from their wages, as required. A year or so after he had finished the contract, government officials inspected his books and sent him the letter to which I have just referred. In that letter he was informed that he was short about $10 of the amount he should have deducted from his workmen for taxes in 1942, and about $60 short of the amount he should have deducted in 1943. The letter went on to say in effect that, as he was just getting started in business and was not familiar with the regulations he would be fined only $25.

What is British justice coming to when a thing like that can happen in this country? Do hon. members realize what it means? It is a fundamental principle of law, which is subject to some exceptions, that a man is not guilty of a crime if he commits an innocent mistake. But the most shocking feature of the case is that under these regulations, government officials have the right to act as complainant, prosecutor, judge and jury, and impose a fine on a man without giving him an opportunity to be heard.

I say that this kind of thing must stop if we are to remain a free people.

Let me give another example, this time under selective service. A man who was a vulcanizer by trade had been ill for about six months. When he was well enough to go to work he looked about for a job and found a vulcanizing firm in the city in which he lived, engaged in essential war work, which required his services. He knew the boss of this plant and wanted to work for him. He went to the selective service office, told them he was a vulcanizer and said he would like to work for this particular firm which required his services. Selective service officers, after looking through their cards, ordered him to go to work with another vulcanizing firm. He said he wanted to work with the man he knew, and an argument ensued. He noticed the card stated that the wages would be $140 a month, but he was told the wages would be $120 a month. This led to another argument, but in the end he was forced to go where he was ordered.

It is only natural that he did not go in a very good state of mind, and it followed that he and his boss did not get along very well. Finally he said to the boss, "This is not fair to you and it is not fair to me," and the boss who was fed up with him by this time, no doubt for very good reasons, called up selective service who said to send the man in. Before he went, however, a discharge card had to be filled out. Under the heading, "Reason for release" the boss wrote the words, "Claims to be sick," and this card was signed by both employer and employee.

When the workman went back to the selective service office with this card, though there was a shortage of vulcanizers in the town he was ordered to go to work for a certain company as a carpenter. He said that he was not a carpenter; that he had done carpentering work at one time but had sold his tools years ago, and that he was a vulcanizer. He was told, "Well, you can either go to work as a carpenter or you can go to work as a labourer."

Apparently selective service officials thought they had the right to punish him because he had the effrontery to speak up for himself in the belief that he had some rights as a Canadian citizen.

When he came to look at the card he had brought to the office, which both he and his employer had signed, he found that some official there had scratched out the words "Claims to be sick" and had written in their place "Unreliable." This, of course, was an out-and-out forgery and could not be justified on any grounds whatever.

This story gives us an example of how men are treated when they are governed by bureaucracy established through government orders in council and government regulations, and I say it must stop.

Now let me give another example of the way in which bureaucracy is carried on under national selective service. A man who conducted a restaurant business and rendered service to men engaged in heavy work by providing them with substantial meals had difficulty in obtaining waitresses. Selective service could not supply them. On one occasion after a long search he engaged a girl and drove her to the selective service office to have the necessary forms completed. When she came out of the office and got into his car he looked at her card and found that she had been directed to go to work for another restaurant.

Now let me give an example of a different kind. A man who had a service station and repair shop on the outskirts of a city went into the used car business in a small way in 1941. Last year he was notified that he must get a permit from the government to carry on a used car business. He filled out the form and received a permit.

This year he applied again to the government authorities for a permit, and received a letter in reply informing him that his application was refused on the ground that he had not adequate facilities to deal in second-hand cars. He had a service station, a repair garage and a good-sized lot adjoining it on which to park cars, but evidently this was not sufficient for some reason or another and a licence was refused. Not only was it refused, but he was ordered to sell the cars he had on hand and report to the government department when the sales had been made.

These are only a few instances that have come to my notice. I could cite many others, and no doubt many hon. members could cite a great many more of how affairs in this country are being carried on under government orders in council and government regulations rather than by acts of parliament.

In conclusion, may I quote again from Lord Hewart, who said:

> Writers on the constitution have for a long time taught that its two leading features are the sovereignty of parliament and the rule of law. To tamper with one of them was, it might be thought, a sufficiently serious undertaking. But how more attractive to the ingenious and adventurous mind to employ the one to defeat the other, and to establish despotism on the ruins of both.

The government by this bill is attempting to defeat the functions of parliament and the rule of law and by means of orders in council and regulations to establish a new despotism in time of peace.

The great national emergency that exists in Canada to-day is the attempt that the government is making to maintain a dictatorship now that the war is over.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to enter into this learned discussion on controls; but as a member since the beginning of the war of the government which has been administering the affairs of Canada, possibly I should reply to some of the statements which have been made in the discussion up to this time, more particularly those which were made this afternoon by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett). Before doing so, I should like to say that I do not think there is anyone in this House of Commons or in Canada who is more opposed to controls of any kind than I. Liberalism has always taught me to have objection to controls in so far as they are not necessary to preserve the rights of others. Naturally those of us who have been brought up in that belief have objection to the infliction of controls of any kind upon the people of the country to which we belong which are not absolutely necessary to the welfare of all of us.

But I think those of us who have had the privilege, unfortunate or otherwise, to have lived in this generation, we have all learned through the experience of time. We certainly have had an opportunity, equal to that of any generation that has ever lived, to understand the necessity for controls at a time when our nation is being attacked by the enemy. On two occasions within the lifetime of those of us who are gathered here democratic countries have found it necessary to defend democratic institutions. On each occasion that we have found it necessary to do so, it has been natural that we have had to utilize instruments in which we did not personally believe.

Anyone who believes in the freedom of democracy does not believe in war. But anyone who believes in the freedom of democracy knows that when democracy is attacked by those who believe in force, there is only one way in which that force can be effectively met, and that is by force. We all realize, too, that when we are placed in the position where we must of necessity use force, we must use instruments which are not the common instruments of a nation which is free. So that under those circumstances we have control.

I object to those who consider themselves radicals, who looking at the effectiveness of controls during war time advocate their maintenance during a time of peace. My reason for opposing that is very much the same reason as was given expression to a few moments ago by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Hazen); my reason for opposing that is the same reason as was given this afternoon by the hon. member for Stanstead, namely, that if the application of controls is continued long enough we shall be afflicted by the same kind of totalitarian state and totalitarian institutions against which we are compelled to fight when we defend democracy against those totalitarian institutions. I am as anxious as any one in this house to get rid of controls. I am sure I have in agreement with me, not only every member of the government but every member who sits on this side of the house. We always have wished to get rid of controls.

After having made that statement, I should like to say that there is a middle course between wishing to rid ourselves of controls overnight and wishing to maintain those controls for an exceptionally long period of time which may eventually land this country in a position where we would be threatened with a totalitarian form of government. That middle course is not necessarily expressed by Liberals, nor is it necessarily expressed by those who would take the course of totalitarianism. However, it is often expressed by people by whom we would least expect it to be expressed; it is expressed by businessmen; it is expressed by the people on the street; it is expressed by the leaders of finance. I should like to quote to the house an expression of opinion, given by one with whom many of us on this side of the house do not always agree, one with whom some hon. members on the other side of house never agree. Mr. Spinney of the bank of Montreal is reported in the Montreal Daily Star of December 3, 1945, as follows:

> At the same time, Mr. Spinney said, there must be a realization that for many months to come there still would be a need for some of the controls introduced during the war years.
> "It is quite evident that inflationary pressures are now, if anything, more intense and more fraught with potential danger than at any time during the years of actual conflict.
> In consequence, the need for continuance of the war-time pattern of voluntary restraint, and for intelligent acceptance of appropriate stabilization controls still remains as a challenge to the good sense of the Canadian people.
> The manner in which we meet that challenge will determine whether we tackle the tasks of reconstruction against a background of stable monetary conditions or in the turbulent atmosphere of inflationary boom and subsequent collapse.

With that statement which appears in the press of yesterday I think most members of the house will agree, particularly the latter part of it which says that if we took off overnight all controls at the end of a war such as we have just passed through, the result would be the subsequent collapse of our institutions. All one needs to do to be persuaded of that is to read the history of the period immediately following the last war, when countries which followed that course brought upon themselves great difficulties from which they had greater difficulty in extricating themselves. With that statement of the president of the bank of Montreal before us together with the experience of other countries following the last war, may I now refer to some of the remarks that were made this afternoon?

The hon. member for Stanstead took the position that this bill was most confusing, and in order to prove his point he read from the preamble of the bill to show that it was most confusing. I should like to read part of the preamble to the bill, and I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the intention of the government could not be set out more plainly than it appears in the preamble. The preamble says:

> And whereas the national emergency arising out of the war has continued since the unconditional surrender of Germany and Japan and is still continuing; and whereas it is essential in the national interest that certain transitional powers continue to be exercisable by the governor in council during the continuation of the exceptional conditions brought about by the war and it is preferable that such transitional powers be exercised hereafter under special authority in that behalf conferred by parliament instead of being exercised under the War Measures Act; and whereas in the existing circumstances it is essential that certain acts and things done and authorized and certain orders and regulations made under the War Measures Act be continued in force and that the governor in council be authorized to do and authorize such further acts and things and make such further orders and regulations as he may deem necessary or advisable by reason of the emergency and for the purpose of the discontinuance, in an orderly manner as the emergency permits, of measures adopted during and by reason of the emergency: Therefore His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows . . .

That language seems to me to be perfectly plain; there is no confusion in it at all.

Mr. FLEMING: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the minister is reading, not from the preamble to bill No. 15, but from the preamble to the bill which has been circulated since yesterday and which will not be introduced until the house is in committee of the whole.

Mr. GARDINER: That, of course, is the bill which is to be submitted to the committee for consideration. That is the bill I am speaking to. For bill No. 15 which was before the house, another bill is being substituted which expresses very clearly the position. May I say that I am only replying to the hon. member for Stanstead, who this afternoon read part of the preamble from the original bill and part of the preamble from the second bill and indicated that the preamble of the second bill was confusing. I am simply reading from the preamble of the second bill to indicate that it is not confusing; that it is perfectly plain.

In the speeches to which I have just listened the statement has been made over and over again that we are asking the members of this house to permit the government to pass legislation over which this parliament will have no control. The members who make that statement have not read the bill. The bill definitely says that what we are doing is just what the preamble outlines, namely, asking the house to permit the government to continue in existence the orders in council which were passed during the war and which it is necessary to have continued for a few months after the war. The bill goes on to provide that within a certain period of time the government must place on the table of the house any order that it passes and, further, that either the House of Commons or the Senate can take action to make that particular order inoperative. There is nothing in the bill which says that but for more than a few days the government has authority to legislate without that legislation having been given consideration by the membership of the house and the senate as well, and the bill contains the further extraordinary provision, one that I never heard of before in any bill, that in order to protect the rights of the members of this house and of the members of the senate, either house may prevent such an order from becoming the law of this country. With such a provision in the bill I cannot understand why all this discussion is taking place at this time. It must be because certain members of the opposition have in their minds ideas which I am sure are not in the minds of the great mass of the people of this country, and in order to make plain what the hon. member for Stanstead did have in his mind this afternoon, I should like to read some of the statements he made, bringing them a little closer together than they appear in the long legal argument that he put before the house.

[Mr. Fleming.]

In the first place I read this:

> If I grasp the significance of the terminology, it means that there was an emergency, that there is not an emergency now, but to retreat from the emergency we must have emergency powers. That is what I believe the bill means.

Well, Mr. Speaker, if anything could be more confusing than that particular statement except confusion itself I do not know what it is. After having read part of the preamble into the records of this house the hon. member immediately proceeded to state that this part of the preamble means exactly the opposite of what it does mean. Then he went on to say:

> If there be an emergency, it is not a war emergency. If there be an emergency, it is an emergency which arises from the totalitarian legislation which we enacted to fight and defeat a totalitarian people.

Well, Mr. Speaker, if it was legislation enacted to fight and defeat a totalitarian people, surely it is legislation which has arisen out of the war to cover emergency acts of this government done for the very purpose of assisting in fighting and defeating a totalitarian people; and this legislation arises out of the fact that we have been at war and that there are continuing results from that war. He goes on to say:

> I do not criticize those who had the responsibility of enacting the legislation that brought these controls about. They were anxious to win the war. They had but one aim in view, and they have achieved that aim. But to achieve it they paid a price.

Mr. Speaker, I do not look for any higher eulogy of the government of the Dominion of Canada which carried on during the war than that which was made by the hon. member for Stanstead in his criticism of the government. Let me read it again:

> I do not criticize those who had the responsibility of enacting the legislation that brought these controls about. They were anxious to win the war. They had but one aim in view and they have achieved that aim.
> But to achieve it they paid the price.

Yes, Mr. Speaker. Not the members of the government paid the price, particularly. The people of the Dominion of Canada paid the price. The people of all the democratic nations of the world fighting against the totalitarian form of government paid the price, but I do not know that I am in agreement with the hon. member for Stanstead in all that he said in regard to what that price was. He does go on to say this:

> When we come to consider our present situation and determine what course we should follow, we cannot hope to get back to normal without going through some turbulence, without experiencing some inconvenience. Anybody who takes a stimulant, anybody who develops artificial energy within himself must pay a price, and Canada just cannot afford to taper off in a matter of this kind.

May I call attention to the fact that my hon. friend believes that we cannot get away from this war without turbulence. We, the members of the government, believe that by acting sensibly we can get away from this war, in Canada, without turbulence, and we intend to try so to conduct the affairs of Canada, in getting ourselves from the war into a period of established peace, that turbulence will not be necessary within the dominion. Of course I think he is correct when he says that we cannot get away from it without experiencing some inconvenience; and this inconvenience the people of Canada are prepared to meet, even the inconvenience of the continuation of those controls which are necessary to bridge us over from the period of war into the period of peace. The hon. member goes on to say:

I submit that the emergency which confronts Canada to-day is not a war emergency; it is an emergency which arises out of the legislation which we enacted to win the war. We cannot ease ourselves out of it, because that is impossible.

The inference from that is that we should go out with one jump. We must not ease ourselves out; we must take one leap right out of the war and into peace, and in doing so avoid the necessity of having legislation of this kind. That not only would be most ridiculous, but would have an effect upon the people of this country such as nothing which has been done up to date, either by the government or by any of those who are attempting to hinder what is being done by the government, to bring turbulence; it would have an effect more detrimental to the people of this country than anything else which I can conceive of. He says:

Somebody has threatened us with terrible trouble, with great evils, unless these controls be continued. What are these great perils? The hon. member . . . tells us that flour went up, that sugar went up in price—

I assume, at the end of the last war.

Supposing it did; supposing it goes up again. Is that to be weighed on the same scales with the intolerable situation in which the Canadian people find themselves now that the war is over?

Well, there may have been some questioning during war time when price controls were imposed as to whether all those price controls were necessary. But when an hon. member in one breath says that controls were necessary in war time—

Mr. COCKERAM: Why do you say that?

Mr. GARDINER: He said that in what I read a moment ago, and if the hon. member reads his speech to-morrow he will find it there. The remarks he made were definitely to that effect.

Mr. COCKERAM: But the minister puts on the emphasis.

Mr. GARDINER: I put emphasis on in my speeches. Some people do not emphasize theirs at all; they just get up and recite from a piece of written paper. The hon. member continued:

Is that to be weighed on the same scales with the intolerable situation in which the Canadian people find themselves now that the war is over?

An hon. MEMBER: Louder, please.

Mr. GARDINER: If I had made as many speeches as my hon. friend has made since the war was over I would not need to be explaining anything. Listen to this one on top of that one:

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The minister is reading a good speech pretty closely now.

Mr. GARDINER: He says:

If you control prices, of necessity you control wages.

I may say for the benefit of the hon. member for Souris and his friends that when I do not read their remarks very carefully they accuse me of misquoting them.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Hear, hear.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member says:

If you control prices, of necessity you control wages.

I think I should read something which comes even before that; it is very interesting:

I submit that the control of prices is the first step in the first mile toward a situation which makes of a whole people so many vassals. That may sound extravagant.

I do not think I am a radical. I know I am not a C.C.F.'er.

Mr. MACKENZIE: And certainly not a Tory.

Mr. GARDINER: But when some people talk about controlling prices I am tempted to express some of my own views with regard to that. I doubt if there has ever been a time in my lifetime—I believe I could go back much further than that—when there has not been somebody controlling prices; and I do not know that they have ever been controlled to the advantage of the farmers and of the great mass of labouring people in this country when the government did not take a hand in it. I suggest that, if there is to be any control of prices and any control of wages, the one authority which ought to have that control in Canada is the government of Canada and not some other organization. We are having built up in this country, on the one hand, organizations which some people call cartels and which try to control prices. We have organizations on the other hand which are called by various names and which are trying to control wages. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if all the people of this country are to be dealt with in the manner in which they should be dealt with, the proper authority to deal with such matters, if they must be dealt with, is the parliament of this country and particularly acting through the members of this government. So that I am not so much afraid of what my hon. friend speaks of here when he says:

I submit that the control of prices is the first step in the first mile toward a situation which makes of a whole people so many vassals.

If we have democratic government in this country, if we have elected representatives to this House of Commons, and if they speak their mind here as they should speak it and as they do speak it in order to get votes in the country, we do not need to worry about people becoming vassals.

Mr. HARKNESS: What about the price of hogs?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend is talking about hogs. You will find more people over there who are experts on hogology than I am.

If you control prices, of necessity you control wages. When you control prices and wages, you determine where men are to work.

I think we did all that during the war. We controlled prices and we controlled wages. We said, as my hon. friend remarked, where men were to work. Even sometimes we said whom they were to work for; and I may say there was not any group in this house which advocated more strenuously and more continuously that we ought to tell them where to go than hon. members who sit in that part of the house. They were insistent upon that throughout the whole period of the war. They wanted everybody to be told what they were to do, how many hogs they ought to produce, how many cows they ought to milk, how many bushels of wheat they ought to grow, and so on.

An hon. MEMBER: And everybody told them how many Germans they ought to kill.

Mr. GARDINER: Now, when we suggest that for a few months longer, until we tide over the period between all these controls and the period of peace when we can get along without them, we ought to have a bill to make that possible and thus ease off from what we have been doing to what we all desire to have, it is called tapering off and it is said that we do not require that. I am not an expert on tapering off, so that I cannot discuss that question at any length.

The speech which is before me, however, has some other remarks which I should like to bring to the attention of the house. Here is one:

I cannot do more than point out to the house that these emergencies do not come from the war. They are indirectly incidental to it.

Well, when I started out in the hope that some day I might be a lawyer—I did not arrive there; I arrived somewhere else—I was taught to believe that a man should be very careful about his statments and that he should not make a statement in one sentence which he denies in the next, particularly if he is before a careful judge, and this house ought to be a careful judge. The hon. gentleman says: "I cannot do more than point out to the house that these emergencies do not come from the war", and then he says in the next sentence: "They are indirectly incidental to it. There is no hope of getting away from them because they cannot be effective unless they are all maintained, and we are only deluding ourselves if we perpetuate this type of government." Then he goes on to show that these controls will ultimately lead to the totalitarian state, and in the last sentence he has the gem of it all. After telling us that these controls were necessary to the conduct of the war, that they were essential to the defeat of the totalitarian states, that they were used by the government of Canada—and he even gives us credit for having used them so effectively as to have won the war—something we would not claim for ourselves—after having done all this, then he says that this condition which we have now is not brought about by war, this emergency condition. He says it is only indirectly incidental to it. And he makes this statement:

Mr. Speaker, what we require here, what Canada requires is not more legislation continuing controls.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend says "hear, hear". He goes on:

What Canada requires is an energetic government—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, listen to this:

—a government with nerve enough to remove controls and give Canada back to democracy and democratic institutions.

Well, my hon. friends do not say "hear, hear" to that. What does that mean? The whole argument of this speech is to the effect that we needed controls during the war, that the emergency that has existed following the war is indirectly at least incidental to the war, and then he goes on to say that we do not need these controls, that if we do keep these controls we are going to have ultimately the totalitarian state. Then he says that we should not taper off but that we should jump right out of the frying-pan into the fire and ease ourselves off in that way. Finally he says that what we want is a government with nerve enough to do that.

I submit that that is not what we want at all. What we want is a government with the same kind of nerve that was exercised during the war, the same kind of nerve which this government exercised during the early part of the war when our hon. friends opposite said to us, "You are never going to get a higher production of hogs. The man-power policy of this government, the policies enunciated by the Department of Agriculture are not going to yield a greater and greater production of hogs." They kept that cry up for two years. They did not even have the information which made it possible for them to stop until they found themselves under such an avalanche of hogs coming across Canada and going to Britain that they just closed up and said nothing more about the matter.

What we want is the same kind of nerve which, in spite of the fact that they talked about man-power in season and out of season, results in the Dominion of Canada being recognized to-day as one of the allied countries that did its utmost during the war not only in the production of necessary food and the production of necessary munitions and machines of war, but in sending men to the front line in all the services in greater numbers than any other policy that could have been conceived of by any other government in Canada would have put them there. That is admitted to-day by everyone—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. GARDINER: —except a few.

An hon. MEMBER: Were you there?

Mr. GARDINER: I was about as near there as you were. I was in Britain when it was bombed every night, and my hon. friend was about as close as that. Not only do we require that kind of nerve but we require the kind of nerve, in the present period, which was exercised at all times. No matter what criticism may have been made of the policy of the government, that policy brought about the results which we knew it would achieve; and after we have had these experiences during the war period, now that we have come into the period which is the transition between war and peace, we want a government with the same kind of nerve which this administration had in the last session before the election when we brought down the family allowances bill. When it was first brought down my hon. friends opposite sent their leaders out into the country to condemn it; but when it was finally voted on in this house, you could not find a single member in his seat who had enough nerve to stand up for what had been advocated by his leaders. The only man who had the nerve to do so was the hon. doctor sitting over there who appeared the next day and registered his objection to what had been done by his own bed fellows the day before.

That is the kind of nerve which is wanted. I even prefer the nerve of the hon. member who came back and stayed with the position that had been taken by some of his leaders outside the house. To-night we are asking the house to permit this government, which has shown nerve, which has exercised that nerve to get results, to put this measure through the house. Those results have caused the chief critic of this particular legislation to get up and say: Yes, every bit of it was legislation that was necessary to win the war against the totalitarian states; I admit that every part of it had to be enacted; I admit that all these controls were necessary. And yet all he can say about it now is that if we are to go on from here we must kick it all overboard overnight and start off from a fresh point. I do not think we can do that at all. What we ought to do is what is proposed in this bill. As a House of Commons and as a parliament we ought to give the government of Canada the authority to go ahead and handle this position during the period of transition, and bring us from that period of transition toward peace. I hope that it has to be enacted only once, as does every hon. member. The terms of the bill state that it will remain in force for only one year if parliament meets in November or December of that year, and if parliament does not meet during those months, fifteen days after the commencement of the ensuing session. It must be reconsidered at that session, and I hope it will never require to be reenacted. I can assure hon. gentlemen that it would only be reenacted if it is essential to carry on our activities which would bridge us over the period of war into the period of peace. With that idea before us and the suggestions I made a few moments ago that this bill has safeguards which no other bill has ever had which was introduced into this house—

Some hon. MEMBERS: What are they?

Mr. GARDINER: Read the bill and you will find out. I see that you have not read the bill. This bill has safeguards such as were never in any other bill introduced into this house by any other government.

Mr. JACKMAN: Who put the safeguards there?

Mr. GARDINER: Those safeguards are put there in order to preserve the rights of the people and of the representatives of the people of Canada. My hon. friend asks who put them there? The government of this country takes—

An hon. MEMBER: The premiers of the provinces.

Mr. GARDINER: The government of this country takes the responsibility for anything that is put in any bill which is brought into this house by the government. We take the responsibility for this legislation. We are not such hidebound Tories that we never take information or advice from anybody. The only people who will not listen to advice die in their tracks. We sometimes listen to it—

An hon. MEMBER: You are already dead.

Mr. GARDINER: We hope that this measure meets not only with the approval of the premiers of the provinces and the members of this house, but with the approval of the great majority of the people of Canada. I am sure it does, and therefore I support the second reading of the bill.

Mr. G. RUSSELL BOUCHER (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I shall not attempt to answer in detail the speech made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). He spent his whole time in discussing nerves and controls. His whole speech demonstrated nerve without control. It was amazing to sit and listen to the speech of the spokesman of the government in power in which he tried to illustrate to the house the necessity of controls and nerves without attempting to portray the role of members of parliament in the situation.

In his opening speech on Bill No. 15 in its original form the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) pointed to two main questions before the house. He said that this bill required two distinct things, a declaration of a post-war emergency and the delegation of the powers of parliament to the government of Canada. There is nobody in Canada who does not realize that in war time stringent controls are necessary in many aspects of human life. Nobody will disagree with the government when they say in the bill, as amended, that the war-time condition will stop on the first day of January, 1946. We all agree with the government when they say that because of war our social, economic, trade and home conditions have been upset. We all agree with certain measures which the government brought in during the war. By this bill the government seeks to extend and increase them to meet a different emergency in post-war days. The emergency we have now is not that of war entirely; it is the consequence of our war-time economy and a consequence of the present government's war-time controls, by order in council and administrative regulations.

After listening to the speech made by the minister to-night, in which he emphasized his viewpoint and, I believe, the viewpoint of the government, one would almost be compelled to come to the conclusion that there was nobody but Hitler who could govern. There is nobody but the little autocrat who spoke to-night who has sole power and who wants to increase that power, who can better exemplify the autocracy he wants to extend.

Mr. ABBOTT: Explain.

Mr. BOUCHER: No explanation of mine could be better than the demonstration already given by the previous speaker.

The War Measures Act, which was passed at the beginning of the war, declared that because a state of war existed certain powers must be vested in parliament and that parliament must delegate certain of those powers to the government. Then we find that the government has delegated to the executive of the government, the cabinet, the privy council, the right to carry on by order in council the hitherto unknown and undemocratic policy of legislating to the extent of abrogating statutes and interfering with civil and property rights, of interfering with the privilege of carrying on your trade, of marketing your own produce, of living your own life as you might see it. I agree that to an extent many of those policies were necessary. We now find that after the war is over, so far as combat is concerned, the government are coming back to parliament and telling us that they are going to declare it over within a few short days and asking us to approve everything the order in council government did up to that date and to grant them the power to extend their regulations. In other words, it definitely illustrates, as did the minister's speech to-night, the total forgetfulness of this government or of the cabinet of the government of any legislating power in Canada other than the King cabinet. I hope that all hon. members do not agree with this. The government is forgetful of the fact that there are provincial legislatures and municipal institutions which can take the burden off this government of displacing the war-torn economy of Canada and of helping it to restore peace-time conditions. The minister did not refer to that; it did not occur to him that anybody but a little secret council, a little cabinet, an executive committee, could handle the situation which the law and the constitution of the country requires to be handled by other than the parliament of Canada, except in an emergency.

I say to him and to hon. members that certain controls are necessary. During war time, and because of a war economy, government action must be centred more in the federal parliament than in peace time, and to a degree parliament must place more confidence and more power in the executive or the privy council.

As Mark Antony said, Caesar was ambitious when he tried to turn autocracy into tyranny and lost his life. He illustrated for all time the lust of those in power for greater power, and the unwillingness of those with power to surrender that power. That has been further demonstrated not only by this bill, not only by this cabinet but, to the umpteenth degree, by the remarks of the minister who preceded me.

What does this bill do? For a while I thought we were to speak only on the original bill, that bill No. 2 was only a suggestion as to what the government might do at a future date if we gave our blessing to bill No. 1. However, the minister took the liberty to discuss bill No. 2, and emphasized the wording of the preamble where in three or four places it stated that the situation to-day required certain transitional powers to be given by parliament to the executive, that it asked that certain things should be done and that certain orders and regulations under the War Measures Act should be continued. The bill contains very little that is certain. Let me read the powers which are sought:

(a) providing for and maintaining the armed forces of Canada during the occupation of enemy territory and demobilization and providing for the rehabilitation of members thereof . . .

Power to do every bit of that, with the possible exception of some rehabilitation measures, is already in the hands of the cabinet; but as far as the army is concerned, how could they ask for more outright and absolute power? Then the next paragraph states:

(b) facilitating the readjustment of industry and commerce to the requirements of the community in time of peace . . .

To what community, may I ask? Is it the community of the hon. gentleman who just spoke, the Minister of Agriculture, or is it some other little community within our country? Is it the community of the cabinet, as someone suggests? Perhaps that is the meaning we should take from it. They want power to facilitate the readjustment of industry and commerce to the requirements of the community in time of peace. Perhaps it is the world community. What does that not cover? It covers anything the government—not the government, but the executive committee of the government—may hereafter think will tend to facilitate the readjustment of the war-torn world. Could one get any broader power than that? Then the next clause goes on:

(c) maintaining, controlling and regulating supplies and services, prices, transportation, use and occupation of property—

They should have put "real and personal" there, so that we would know there was no property they could not control.

—rentals, employment, or salaries and wages . . .

I wonder why they did not include the control of going to church. That is about the only thing I can think of that they have omitted.

(d) assisting the relief of suffering and the restoration and distribution of essential supplies and services in any part of His Majesty's dominions or in foreign countries that are in grave distress as the result of the war . . .

Does that not mean every place where distress may exist, in the minds of the executive committee of this house? Then:

(e) continuing and discontinuing in an orderly manner, as the emergency permits—

It does not say as the war emergency permits, but any emergency.

—measures adopted during and by reason of the war.

The first bill No. 15 had something that was specific, something that was certain; but in the second bill No. 15 the only certainty was the word "certain" used in the preamble. Does this bill represent the government's intention to give back the powers which under the constitution heretofore belonged to the parliament of Canada. It does not purport to give any powers to parliament but gives them directly to the executive committee. It is a case of all power to the privy council and no power to parliament. Does it favour the legislatures of our provinces reassuming any of their pre-war privileges and obligations? It does not. It seems to represent the very opposite. Does it diminish the powers of the non-elective boards and commissions? No. This bill as now drafted wants the parliament of Canada, the legislatures of Canada, the municipal councils of Canada, the people of Canada, the government of the day and all members of this house to delegate to the cabinet not only the power to legislate but the power to delegate to other men and other boards, who have never been elected by the exercise of any franchise, power to abrogate statutes and make orders and regulations having the force of law. That is not democracy. I say that the time has come when parliament should not delegate any powers it has to men who have not been appointed to their positions by the democratic franchise. To me that is the important thing about this bill. It does not by any means limit, curtail or show any desire to stop the order in council government that has been so obnoxious to the Canadian people. Under the amended bill the powers are so general and so all-inclusive that I cannot conceive of anything being more all-embracing. Surely we in Canada, having beaten the totalitarian states, must work against totalitarianism within our own state. The people now desire to see a return to pre-war privileges, to peace-time prosperity and happiness, to the privileges of British and Canadian citizenship and freedom, to the use of their property without having the government take control of all property rights, without submitting its orders even to the members of the House of Commons until long after they have been passed.

The minister said that ample provision is made for these orders in council to be tabled in the house and for hon. members to pass upon them. I ask hon. gentlemen how practical it is to place a resolution on the order paper and have it discussed, with the government taking precedence for its business as it has for the last five years. How will that be worked out? I do not want to go through all the provisions of the bill in detail, but let us see when it may be terminated. Section 6 of the amended bill states:

> Subject as hereinafter provided, this act shall expire on the thirty-first day of December, one thousand nine hundred and forty-six, if parliament meets during November or December, one thousand nine hundred and forty-six—

The Prime Minister or the cabinet, who heretofore have not called parliament to meet to sanction their orders in council, are not likely to change their ways and call a meeting of parliament next November or December for the sole purpose of submitting to the members of the House of Commons the products of their imagination and those of their dollar-a-year men, unless they have a complete change of policy. But it goes on:

> —but if parliament does not so meet it shall expire on the fifteenth day after parliament first meets during the year one thousand nine hundred and forty-seven—

It does not say when it will meet, because it may be postponed until the next fall. We have been running a year late now in our parliamentary sessions, so that we do not know whether it will be called until November or December, 1948. The section continues:

> —provided that, if at any time while this act is in force, addresses are presented to the governor general by the Senate and House of Commons respectively, praying that this act should be continued in force for a further period, not in any case exceeding one year, from the time at which it would otherwise expire and the governor in council so orders, this act shall continue in force for that further period.

As the Minister of Agriculture has shown so well to-night, we can well imagine a continuation of order in council government without even the possibility of calling parliament to let members have an opportunity of seeing these matters, whether the government ever lets them come to a discussion or not. Under those circumstances we have to look at this bill, not as a declaration of the necessity of controls, but as a declaration by the cabinet of contempt for parliament, of contempt for the legislators, of contempt for democracy and of contempt for the people. I see nothing in it to indicate in any way any desire, hope, wish or possibility of returning to the democratic and freedom loving people of Canada privilege of having their elected representatives make and sustain their own laws.

Mr. DONALD FLEMING (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I think at this stage of the debate it is necessary to pause and take stock of this situation. We have had presented to us bill No. 15, the original bill, by which we had understood until a few moments ago that we were bound and circumscribed in this debate. Then, after certain significant events of recent days we have had held out an enticing bit of bait in the form of a revised bill. Notwithstanding what the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) said a few minutes ago, the bill before the house at the moment is the original bill No. 15 and when this house votes on the second reading it is voting for the second reading of the original bill. In the meantime the government is holding out a little bit beyond our grasp this bait in the form of a revised bill which cannot be put before this house until we are in committee of the whole. There is the issue before this house on the second reading of the original bill No.

15. What is the principle of that bill? I say that the principle of that bill is such that no self-respecting parliament in this month of December, 1945, could possibly consider it. There has been introduced a bit of window-dressing, a bit of bait, but parliament is faced with the stark reality of bill No. 15.

Since this bill was first introduced and since this debate first began a week ago last Friday, several mysteries about it have perhaps been cleared up. But one mystery has not been cleared up. The veil of secrecy still enshrouds the author of the bill. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), in his masterly address in this chamber a week ago last Friday challenged the government to declare who was the author and draftsman of this bill. That challenge has not been met and secrecy still surrounds the authorship of the bill. But if one will look for a moment at the substitute bill which is being dangled just out of the grasp of this chamber, he will perhaps see a familiar hand in the authorship and draftsmanship, a hand which apparently was not present in this country when the original bill No. 15 was drafted.

Let us face certain simple facts which I fear have been lost sight of somewhat, certainly in the speech to-night by the Minister of Agriculture. In passing, I wish to pay the Minister of Agriculture a compliment. When the government get deep into a hole they always call upon the Minister of Agriculture to pull them out. We need no further proof of the fact that in this debate the government are in a hole, a deep hole, than the fact that they have called upon the Minister of Agriculture to come to the rescue.

It has been said that the constitutional position is such that in a time of national peril the authority to enact extraordinary measures to meet extraordinary situations is vested in the governor in council. Of course that is absolute nonsense. All that the privy council has ever said is that in times of great national emergency, where the whole nation is in dire peril, the classes of subjects enumerated in sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act take on new aspects. Under the peace, order and good government clause extraordinary powers are vested, not in the governor in council but in parliament, to take the measures required to meet such situations.

Those powers rest, not in the governor in council but in the members of parliament, the elected representatives of the people. Are we to discharge our responsibility at this time by saying, "Well, we are content to go on and adopt what the nineteenth parliament did in time of war, even though we have now come to a time of peace." That is the responsibility which faces this house at the present time.

Section 5 of this bill means this: The government is seeking to get out from under its responsibility, the responsibility for that teeming mass of orders in council and treasury minutes which now number close to 100,000. The government is asking this parliament to adopt a whole mass of orders in council and treasury minutes, in many cases sight unseen. Are we, the twentieth parliament, elected in a time of peace, elected to restore parliament to its proper function, prepared now to abdicate so completely that we not only transfer to the governor in council the powers that we possess but assume the whole load of responsibility for everything the government has done by order in council, by regulation and by treasury minute since the War Measures Act came into effect in September, 1939?

Can any self-respecting parliament in December, 1945, take on that responsibility? I say it cannot.

In the three months that I have sat in this chamber I have been impressed with the care which has been exercised on many occasions in scrutinizing the particular form of the legislation placed before the house and the committees. That is most commendable; that is parliament doing its duty. It should scrutinize every letter and word placed before it in the form of bills and resolutions. But what does this government ask of us? It asks that without so much as seeing the contents of many of these orders in council we simply adopt them and take full responsibility for them. In time to come, when we find out what we have done in our folly they will say to us, "Oh, that is not our act, you took that over; you took the responsibility and it is your responsibility, the responsibility of the twentieth parliament of Canada."

There is no escape from that position. Does the new bill make any improvement in that respect? It does not. Look at section 2, subsection 1 (e) and section 4 of this bill, and you will see that the position under the new bill is precisely the same as the position under the original bill. Parliament is asked to accept all responsibility for what has been going on in this country since September, 1939, by order in council, by government regulation and by treasury minute. I see no improvement in the new bill in that regard.

I say further that the effect of section 3 of the bill is that parliament abdicates, and abdicates completely, its functions. It does not matter apparently that peace has come. No; the war complex still remains with the government because with the war goes power, and that is the complex of the government which has conceived and presented this bill to parliament.

Let no one be misled by the provision requiring tabling of the orders in council. The old bill, by section 3, subsection 4, provided for the tabling of orders in council as soon as might be. Section 4 of the new bill expands that provision to some extent. But what is the situation in fact? Suppose the orders in council are tabled—not the old orders in council because there is no obligation on the government under either of these bills that the governor in council shall table the old orders in council. Not one of those orders does the governor in council have to table, only orders passed in the future. Then the government tells you that if parliament does not like these orders, parliament can annul them; but what is involved in that? It means that a private member's resolution must be presented and carried through both houses of parliament. If there is one thing that all the new members of parliament have learned it is this, that private members' resolutions have no hope whatever of getting to a vote. How many private members' resolutions have come to a vote this session, although we spent many days and evenings in discussing them? Only one, and that because it apparently happened to suit the government. There is no safeguard whatsoever of the rights of parliament in that provision.

Some hon. members on the other side of the house speak as though this were the only legislature in the land. It is a convenient view for the government to take. As a matter of fact, if the government goes on pursuing the course which it has pursued since September, 1939, this parliament will become in fact the only legislature in Canada, because the rights of the provincial legislatures have been constantly trampled and trespassed upon by this government without regard to the rights of the provinces. There has been no indication whatever of a change of heart or a repentant attitude on the part of the government in this regard, and so we can go on expecting the same disregard of provincial rights. Our system of government is not a unitary system but a federal system. We have legislatures which are capable of assuming responsibility for property and civil rights in the provinces, and this government is not required to adopt extraordinary measures to meet problems which can be coped with by legislatures acting within the scope of their constitutional powers.

In the impassioned contribution which was made to this debate this evening by the Minister of Agriculture, he put a glowing picture before us. I am paraphrasing the gist of his remarks. It may be, he said, that this bill gives the government extraordinary powers but, after all, you can trust us because we are not the kind of people to use extraordinary powers in an arbitrary way. Look at us, he said; we won the war.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that the government did not win the war. The boys who fought on the battlefields, the labourers working in the factories and munition plants, the farmers toiling in the fields, the people of Canada won the war. The government takes a great deal of credit for winning the war, credit which is not theirs.

Let us see what we can expect from this government. Can one find a better test of what one might expect in the exercise of the extraordinary powers the government is asking parliament to confer than to look at what the government has been doing under the powers conferred upon it by the War Measures Act? We do not need to go back very far, not farther than the 6th of September, 1945. What has been happening while parliament has been in session? I do not need to weary the house by an enumeration of the occasions upon which the government denied parliament essential information for which it asked. It became monotonous, these denials of information which parliament sought. We remember what happened about the Canadian information service. The government at one fell swoop, while parliament was in session, without consulting it at all, did away with the wartime information board and by order in council placed the appropriations which parliament had provided for the wartime information board at the disposal of the government's new creation, the Canadian information service, and when we asked for the minutes to be tabled we were told: "Oh, no; that is a privileged document. We cannot trust parliament with that information. Only the government is capable of treating that information as it ought to be treated."

The last hon. member who spoke in this debate spoke truly when he said that this government has treated parliament with contempt. I go farther and say that it has treated parliament with studied contempt.

I refer to the situation with regard to appropriations. As long as government by order in council continues, parliament will be asked to vote blindly tremendous sums of money to be expended in any way the governor in council sees fit, without any effective restraint, restriction or control by parliament. We have put hundreds of millions of dollars at the disposal of the governor in council.

Have we had any proper accounting? Hon. members know that the money was spent before we were ever asked to vote it. You know, Mr. Speaker, that we were not offered any details of the items of expenditure in the estimates. Frequently they were brought in with apologies. Are we to continue that situation in time of peace? It would be an abdication of the functions of parliament, and I say that no self-respecting parliament dare do such a thing.

We know perfectly well that as long as this bureaucratic system continues, the power is not exercised by hon. gentlemen sitting on the treasury benches opposite but by controllers, administering policies that daily affect the lives of all our people. Very often when we wanted to know what great policies were in the making we had to wait for some public pronouncement by one of these bureaucrats. We did not get it from the government; we did not get it in parliament. We had to wait until the bureaucrats announced it publicly.

Is that democracy? Never. In this new bill we have the very same thing. The governor in council may continue to legislate by order in council while parliament is still in session. That alone is enough to condemn the bill. Let every hon. member understand that if he votes for the second reading he is voting in support of legislation to provide that the governor in council may continue to legislate by order in council even while the representatives of the people are assembled in session in parliament.

The situation would not have been so bad as it is if, along with the power which the government has enjoyed, there had been a proper appreciation of and a rising to its responsibilities, but we have had a deplorable situation revealed in this house. Although all aspects of labour relations were vested in the federal government under the extraordinary powers conferred by the War Measures Act, when the Ford strike took place at Windsor the members of the house asked what this government was going to do about it, and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) rose in his place and said in effect: We wash our hands of this; it is not a matter for us because the responsibility rests on the provincial government. Although this government had deprived the provincial governments of jurisdiction in these matters, this government said that the responsibility still rested on the provinces even though the power was vested in the dominion. I say that was a denial of this government's responsibility even while they possessed the power.

We have not been offered in this debate what every member had a right to expect, and that was an undertaking by the government when they brought in this bill that they would bring in at the same time a programme for the demobilization of the bureaucracy with which this country has become enmeshed. We have not had laid before us a properly integrated or comprehensive programme of demobilization of controls. They have not told us what, if any, objectives they are aiming at in connection with doing away with these war-time controls. No; we have waited in vain for that, and apparently we are not to be told. Are we told that there is any hope of easing the pressure of ceilings on wages and salaries? No; we have not been told that. Has there been any indication of any attempt on the part of the government to eliminate the inequalities which have existed with respect to wages, where people engaged in civilian production have not been paid on a scale commensurate with that paid to people engaged in war-time production? No; there has been no word of that. Has any hope at all been held out for the salaried workers, the white-collared people upon whom these controls have rested so oppressively during the war? No. There is not one ray of hope in anything which has fallen from the mouth of a member of the government during this debate—not one word. It is an amazing exhibition of bankruptcy of policy and lack of vision on the part of this government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FLEMING: Hon. members opposite can treat this as a matter for laughter and levity. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that it is not so regarded by the people of this country who elected us to sit in this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE: They elected us too.

Mr. FLEMING: They expected something higher and better from us than to treat this issue with levity.

What is the significance of this bill? I have said that there is in section 3 a complete abdication by parliament. That is what is involved. We may prate about the supremacy of parliament; but if this bill passes, the so-called supremacy of parliament becomes nothing but a snare and a delusion, a shell and a sham. Parliament is invited by this measure to turn its supremacy into a sham, because real power will rest not with parliament but with the governor in council, and it will be based on the abdication by parliament of its proper constitutional function.

Something like three hundred years ago a man strode into the parliament hall at Westminster and, pointing to the mace which rested on the table, said, "Take away that bauble." The government of the day is not saying to this parliament, "Take away that bauble", but, "Hand that bauble over to us." we might as well see in fact that mace preceding a procession to the executive council chamber, because that is where the effective legislative power of this country will rest if bill No. 15 is passed.

I said something about judging this government on its recent record. We do not need to go back very far to find enough wherewith to answer the question, "Can the leopard change its spots?" with an emphatic "no". I refer back to the twelfth day of November, when the then Acting Prime Minister dropped on this chamber an atomic bomb. His statement, which is to be found on page 2020 of Hansard, is unquestionably the most amazing which we shall have in this session. I daresay it will be many a year, and many a parliament will come and go in this country, before a more remarkable, a more astounding statement will be made in this chamber, certainly by a minister of the crown. There are two or three sentences of it which ought to be impressed by now indelibly on the minds of hon. members. The Acting Prime Minister said this:

> There is danger that the House of Commons may be losing sight of its real functions, which are to vote supply, to control expenditure and to enact legislation.

Look at those three things: vote supply, control expenditure, enact legislation. Compare them with this bill, and what do we see? Voting of supply? Yes; voting in the dark. Certainly we can go on voting money in the dark. That is the situation to-day. Second, to control expenditure. Seriously, Mr. Speaker, what effective control over expenditure exists so long as government by order in council can be continued, so long as they can go on spending the money in advance and come back to parliament later and ask parliament to vote the money, not to vote it according to proper estimates, but to vote it in the dark. "Trust the government"! Is parliament prepared to trust the government to the extent that it is ready to abdicate? I hope not. The third function is to enact legislation; and we as a parliament are asked now to abdicate in favour of the governor in council this last of our remaining powers and responsibilities, the enactment of legislation. Yes; turn all these functions over to the government. And to a government with what conception of its relationship and responsibility to parliament? A government which measures its responsibility in these terms: Hansard, page 2020:

> The authority of the government is not delegated by the House of Commons; the authority of the government is received from the crown.

I want to put alongside of that amazing statement a more orthodox statement. It is this:

> It is impossible to imagine that the people of Canada will consent to pay the enormous sums which they are being called upon to provide by way of taxation . . . and will sit silent under the government's refusal to give them any information as to how their money has been spent.

That is the exact situation we have to-day, where we are not given information to which we are entitled. These last words I have quoted are those of the right hon. gentleman who is now Prime Minister of this country; they were uttered in this house in 1921, and reported in Hansard of that year, at page 1292.

What has already happened as a result of the introduction of this bill? I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the whole cause of interprovincial cooperation, of cooperation between the dominion and the provinces, of constitutional reform, has been set back a long distance by the introduction of this bill, which plainly shows the hand of the government. It is a good thing that the provincial premiers met last week while parliament still had this bill before it. You know what happened. The voice of the provincial governments was heard speaking emphatically and unanimously in demanding that this bill be withdrawn, because inherent in it is the denial of the constitutional rights of the provinces. If this parliament should pass this bill it will have gone a long way toward rewriting the British North America Act to the infinite disadvantage of the provincial legislatures.

Another result which has followed the introduction of this bill in the house has been the most widespread expression of an outraged public opinion. That is one reason why the government to-day is holding out that bait in the form of a revised bill, which still is just beyond the grasp of parliament. I say to you that we are witnessing, in the step which the government has taken this week in dangling this new bill before us, an abject, even if a strategic, retreat on their part. There has been no more complete vindication of the stand of an opposition at any time in the history of this land than has been seen in the vindication of the stand of the opposition on this bill since its attitude was shown in this chamber a week ago last Friday. We have seen the most widespread expressions of condemnation from all sections of the Canadian public, a denunciation of the arbitrary measures and arbitrary intent on the part of this government; and if I may say so, I feel sorry for hon. members opposite, who were put in the humiliating position of having to choose between support of the government and the course which they know they ought to follow on this bill; that is, the putting aside of arbitrary measures.

Many hon. members opposite have taken a firm public stand on many an occasion against any trespass upon the rights of the provincial legislatures. But here, without so much as consulting the provincial legislatures, the government has undertaken to trample upon and ride roughshod over the sacred constitutional rights of these legislatures. It is interesting to note that the public has rebuked the government. It is not only the opposition that has rebuked the government but the public. The provincial premiers have rebuked the government, and now the government appears to be accepting the rebuke. At least it would have us think so.

Let the government learn its lesson out of this: That this parliament has no intention of abdicating its functions in favour of an arbitrary government. Look at these bills. Time does not permit an exhaustive analysis, but I say that every power the government sought under the original bill it has under the new bill, and those vaunted safeguards that the Minister of Agriculture boasted about to-night do not amount to a snap of the fingers. Those safeguards are a sham. They are a snare and a delusion.

I said at the outset that we have to face the question whether in this approaching vote we as a House of Commons will give support to the principle of the bill. The principal of the bill is the abdication of the functions of parliament in favour of a cabinet which shows it does not regard itself as responsible to parliament. That is the principle of the bill. The principle of the bill is the right to go on legislating by order in council while parliament is in session, the right to prevent parliament from having any effective means of bringing those orders in council under review even when we are called into session. Here we are told that the emergency is so great that we cannot wait until the next session of parliament, a scant two and a half months away, and that the government must have all these powers they had under the War Measures Act, and the powers sought under the original bill No. 15. The government has shown its hand, a greedy hand, reaching out for power. The complex that has dominated this government in time of war dominates it to-day. That is the principle of the bill and there is no escape from it.

Is parliament going to permit itself to be reduced to a rubber stamp? I offer this quotation to the house, and I give it as precisely fitting the situation that is facing this country to-day.

> . . . the government has proceeded, in practically everything it has done, as if it were an executive wholly independent of the House of Commons, rather than an executive which derives its powers from and is responsible to the House of Commons. Indeed, the House of Commons has come to be, in the phrase used by the Prime Minister himself not so long ago, a sort of rubber stamp for what the ministry may choose to do, regardless of how its own wishes and desires may be expressed, and regardless of how much those wishes and desires may represent the wishes and desires of the people at large.

That quotation is taken from a speech delivered in this house by the present Prime Minister and is to be found in Hansard of 1934, at page 42.

If the government really meant to show a change of heart in that phantom bill which is not before us yet officially, but which is dangled before us, what course would they have followed? Certainly not the course they have actually followed. The course they would have followed, the manly course, would have been to come to the house and say, "We wish to withdraw this bill; we made a blunder, we frankly confess it; we know we have outraged public opinion and are in the wrong and therefore we wish to withdraw this bill and introduce a new one." That is what they ought to have done but it is what they did not do. They would have brought before us a comprehensive programme for the demobilization of this bureaucracy that oppresses us. They would have shown us the objects at which they should be aiming and toward which they should be bending every effort. But they did not do that. They had not the courage to do it.

An hon. MEMBER: Don't get mad.

Mr. FLEMING: I do not get mad, Mr. Speaker, but I believe in calling a spade a spade, and I denounce the lack of courage shown by the government when they did not withdraw bill No. 15 and bring in whatever modest measure may be required to meet the admitted exigencies of the situation. We know we have to have some measure of price control; no one has denied that. But we wish to see that measure couched in terms no wider than are necessary and commensurate with the needs of the moment. We wish to see what the objective of the government is; what it aims at, so that it can give the promise of restoration of constitutional equilibrium in this country in terms of the British North America Act.

The record of this government in the debate has been a record of retreat, surrender, confusion and confession. In the face of that, no self-respecting parliament could support the principle of the bill.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): When this bill was originally introduced we saw some of the objectionable features of it, and we followed, I think, the course that should have been followed by any critics of the bill. We appointed a committee to look into the bill and suggest certain amendments to it which we thought might bring it more into line with what was required, with the result that the hon. member for Kindersley, a week ago last Friday, presented to the house amendments which we thought would make the bill more acceptable to the house and the country. I am very glad to note that in the amendments to the bill which the government have now brought down, most of these objections have been met and most of the amendments have been accepted by the government.

I suggest that we have to consider a bill of this description from the point of view of what one would do if one were in power and faced with the situation that now confronts the country. I have no sympathy with those who stand up and denounce the powers which a bill gives to a government when on occasion, from time to time, the party that makes these criticisms has adopted similar measures under certain circumstances. I have before me at the moment a bill that was assented to on August 3, 1931, when the Conservatives were in power, and I would remind hon. gentlemen to my right of what that bill contains.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Lest we forget.

Mr. COLDWELL: Let us look at it:

Whereas it is in the national interest that parliament should support and supplement the relief measures of the provinces and other bodies in such ways as the governor in council may deem expedient—

Not as this parliament may deem expedient but as the governor in council may deem expedient.

—and for that purpose should vest in the governor in council the powers necessary to insure the speedy and unhampered prosecution of all relief measures and the maintenance of peace, order and good government in Canada.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What was the stand of the official opposition at that time?

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. COLDWELL: Just a moment. Nothing more comprehensive has ever been introduced in this house than an act of parliament which was passed by the government of my hon. friends to the right. The way I am inclined to look at this measure to-night, is, what do we need to cope with the situation with which we are confronted in this country? I cannot understand the official opposition speaking at this time of getting rid of controls and telling us in the next breath that we need controls, as the last speaker has said, in order to see that the people of Canada who have to rent homes are not victimized in the renting of those homes, in order to see that the people who need clothing and food are not victimized by interests who would victimize them in the prices of those products if there were no controls.

I think the government is ill-advised and wrong in bringing down the amendments as they have been brought down. It would have been far better from the point of view of every hon. member who has to cast a vote if the government had withdrawn the original bill and brought down the bill which is now actually before us in the form of amendments to the original bill. It makes it difficult for hon. members to vote for the principle, which we believe is sound at this time, that the government must have power to do those things which are in the interest of the people of Canada and will protect them. I would prefer to have seen a new bill brought in, but when we cast a vote on this bill now before us we shall cast a vote for the principle, the principle being that in the circumstances which now exist this parliament must give to the government the right to exercise certain controls in the public interest. If the government exceeds that power, then this house must discipline the government.

An hon. MEMBER: It is then too late.

Mr. COLDWELL: Too late, we are told. My hon. friends well know that in three months this parliament will meet again. Let me say that the composition of this house is such to-day that if the government exceeds its power and adopts measures or institutes orders in council which are not in the interests of the people of Canada, public opinion alone will see to it that a sufficient number of members vote that government out of office.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): They have not done so yet.

Mr. COCKERAM: It has not been done yet.

Mr. COLDWELL: We are in a position to-day that we were not in in previous parliaments where the government had an overwhelming majority. To-day the government has to pay attention to the state of public opinion as represented on all sides of this house.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): They pay more attention to the whip than to the public.

Mr. COLDWELL: We are told now that they pay more attention to the whip than to the public.

Mr. COCKERAM: They do.

Mr. COLDWELL: That may be so; but let me point out, as the interjection came from this side of the house, that there was a time when my hon. friends who are interrupting paid attention to the will of one man in this country and placed Canada under as firm a dictatorship as this country was ever under or likely to be under. Peace, order and good government! Let me remind my hon. friends—

Mr. POULIOT: The governor in council was then R. B. alone.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The leopard does not change his spots.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Neither do you.

Mr. COLDWELL: Let me remind my hon. friends that that was used not only to give assistance to the provinces in providing relief, but in using the mounted police of this country in cities, where they had no right to enter without direct instructions from the provincial governments, to cause conditions in those cities which I think everyone who lives in them regrets to-day. I am thinking of Regina on July 1, 1935, when the boys who were asking for bread were fed tear-gas bombs. I know something about these things, and I am going to remind the house of them to-night.

Let us take another look at this act, which reads as follows:

> This Act may be cited as the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931.
> There may be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund such moneys as the governor in council in his discretion may deem expedient to expend for relieving distress, providing employment, and maintaining within the competence of parliament peace, order and good government throughout Canada.

The widest possible powers which could be conferred by parliament upon any government were conferred by this act to which I am giving some attention; and then without—

Mr. MITCHELL: Was that not after the statement: "I will cure unemployment or perish in the attempt!"

Mr. COCKERAM: Was it at the time of "not a cent to Ontario"?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): "Not a five-cent piece".

Mr. COLDWELL: Section 3 reads:

> Without restricting the generality of the terms of the next preceding section hereof, and notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law, the governor in council may . . .

There is no stronger language contained in any measure which was ever adopted by any parliament than what is contained in this particular measure.

Mr. ABBOTT: Shocking!

Mr. COLDWELL: I repeat:

> Notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law, the governor in council may—

An hon. MEMBER: Do what?

Mr. COLDWELL: Do a number of things.

> —provide for the construction, extension or improvement of public works, buildings, undertakings, railways, highways, subways, bridges and canals, harbours and wharves, and any other works and undertakings of any nature or kind whatsoever.

Mr. FLEMING: Build public works.

Mr. JACKMAN: To help unemployment.

Mr. COCKERAM: He does not believe in helping unemployment.

Mr. COLDWELL: My hon. friends do not like this. I am reminding them of this because I am a little bit tired of this debate. I think any party in this house that rises to criticize should not be guilty of doing the thing it criticizes. Any party that rises in this house—

Mr. JACKMAN: What are you doing now?

Mr. COLDWELL: —to suggest anything ought to ask itself this question: What would we do if we were in a similar position to that of the government and had to ask for powers to do things?

Mr. COCKERAM: We know what your party would do.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have no hesitation in saying that if my hon. friends were in power—

An hon. MEMBER: Heaven forbid.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, heaven forbid.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Take him over with you and put him to work.

Mr. COLDWELL: If my hon. friends were in power they would probably use the language of this act to which I have referred, which indicates—

Mr. COCKERAM: You would do worse.

Mr. COLDWELL: —that they could do anything regardless of any statute whatsoever, and I say that if we were in power at this time—

An hon. MEMBER: Heaven forbid.

Mr. COLDWELL: All right. We would have to do what every other government in the British commonwealth of nations has done in similar circumstances, namely, to ask for the power to meet a situation which has arisen. I am not forgetting when I am speaking to-night that a government with which I sympathize very deeply, the British labour government, has had to extend its powers for five years in order to do the things which are necessary to be done in Great Britain.

An hon. MEMBER: We will do it in one year.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not objecting to the principle of this bill. I do not like the language of the bill which was introduced. I do not like some of the powers that were implied in that bill, and as I say, I am sorry that the bill is now before us and that we have amendments instead of a new bill. But let us face this situation squarely. We are faced with a test of our democratic institutions. To my mind, democracy involves self-discipline. And if in a democracy it is essential in the public interest that powers shall be granted to a government in office temporarily to do things in the interests of that democracy, then that power must be given to that government to do the things which are required.

As far as this debate is concerned, we hear about voting supply, controlling expenditure, and so on. This parliament must vote supply and must control expenditure; we agree with that. But the government under this bill is not asking for the blank cheque that my hon. friends received in 1931. Therefore I say that while we support the principle of the bill, we propose to do this. We made our position clear, and I believe the government paid some attention to the speech of the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Jaenicke) who placed our point of view before the house, because we find incorporated in the amendments which have been brought down much of the point of view which was expressed on our behalf. But when this bill gets into committee, if the critics are honest in what they are doing they will have an opportunity to deal with it clause by clause and to attempt to amend it in such a way, if the powers are too wide, as to restrict the government in those powers. That is the proper thing to do. When I listen to the speeches and hear support for the principle of the control of prices, of rent, and so on, and then hear a denunciation of this bill; when I hear, as I did a few minutes ago, a wholesale denunciation of the bill and the new amendments, and then in the next breath a statement to the effect that the government had surrendered to the house and to public opinion, it seemed to me that if the amendments constituted a surrender to the criticism of this house and of the country, then surely to that extent the opposition has won its point in criticizing the bill. You cannot have it both ways. You cannot argue that the bill is as bad as ever it was, and in the next breath say that the government has surrendered to the criticism of the house and the country.

Therefore, as far as we are concerned we believe the principle of the bill granting powers that may be necessary is a principle which this house should support at this time and under these circumstances. We believe it is the duty of those of us who may think the new amendments are inadequate to make up the sort of measure we require to attempt to amend the provisions of the bill so that they meet with approval to a much greater extent than may be the case at the moment. Under those circumstances, Mr. Speaker, when the vote is called we propose to vote for the principle of the bill.

Mr. E. D. FULTON (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to two very fine election speeches to-night, taking us back over a considerable portion of the history of this country. It is not necessary to say whose they were; I think hon. members will know to whom I am referring. Before I proceed to address myself to the principle of this bill, I should like to correct what I feel was one error in the very fine address delivered by the hon. gentleman who is my deskmate, the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming).

Some hon. MEMBERS: One error?

Mr. FULTON: My hon. friend said that when the government is in difficulty it always calls upon the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to pull it out. I am not quite certain he was absolutely correct, or perhaps I should say he did not tell the whole story, because sometimes they seem to call upon the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) for the same purpose.

Mr. COLDWELL: I rise to a question of privilege. At no time has the government called on the leader of the C.C.F. to do anything for it. The leader of the C.C.F. speaks for himself and his group when he speaks.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I should like to direct the attention of some hon. members to standing order 12, which requires hon. members not to interrupt any hon. gentleman who has the floor, without his permission. They will see that it is the duty of the Speaker to maintain order and decorum in the house, and also to preserve freedom of speech.

Mr. FULTON: If I may be permitted to say so, Mr. Speaker, I agree entirely with what you have said, but I hope we shall not depart too much from the freedom of exchange and discussion which is characterizing the debate at the moment. Possibly the leader of the C.C.F. party was not called upon by the government, but hon. members cannot fail to have remarked how, on measures of this sort, the government and the C.C.F., by accident as it were, seem to find themselves almost at one. It is notable that the applause from the government benches was rather louder than the applause from the C.C.F. party itself. Perhaps it is not going too far to suggest that some slight reason for that was that this is a bill which seeks to introduce the principle of control into this country, and there is no bill which would be more welcome to hon. members who sit to my left.

We have heard criticism, or what purported to be criticism, of this party based upon something that took place in 1931, fourteen years ago.

Mr. ABBOTT: Before your time.

Mr. FULTON: That is the point, and I entirely agree; before my time and before the time of a good many of us here in this house. I am surprised to find that my friends of the C.C.F., which claims to be a new party, should have such a very long memory for certain things which are past history. As I was saying, the criticism was directed toward something that took place in 1931, when a measure of control was sought to be introduced into this country under new circumstances, when we had a depression such as the world has never seen before.

That brings up the question of the attitude of this group, and I am talking of the group that is in this house to-day. The Progressive Conservative party in this house represents the Progressive Conservative party in Canada to-day and I should like to define to some extent our stand on this matter of control. It has been said several times in this house that we agree that a certain amount of control is necessary for the orderly transition from war-time to peace-time conditions. That was said by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) when the war expenditures appropriation came up at the beginning of the session. It was said by myself on that occasion. It has been said in the past—not in the dim and distant past but in the spring of this year—by the leader of this party. It was said again a week ago last Friday by the hon. member for Lake Centre. That is our position, and we have no hesitation in avowing it. We realize that a certain measure of control is necessary for the orderly transition from war-time to peace-time economy. That, then, is what we believe with regard to the principle of control; that only a limited control is necessary, and that it should be maintained only for the period of the emergency. There is no inconsistency as between our belief and our stand on this bill.

While we believe in the principle of that limited control for that limited period, we also believe in those principles of our constitution which guarantee to the subject his full liberty and the preservation of his initiative and enterprise. Because we believe in the principles of our constitution; because we believe that this bill infringes those principles; because it infringes the liberty of the subject in an unwarranted and unjustified and unnecessary manner, we oppose this bill.

This bill should have been a new one, not, as the hon. member for Eglinton has said, a sort of bait dangled just out of our reach. I am glad to find that the leader of the C.C.F. is in agreement on that point. I do not just know where we stand here, whether this is a new draft of a proposed bill or whether we should be discussing the original bill. However, let us say that we are considering the new bill which will be submitted when we get into committee. It still goes too far. It attempts to grant powers which are unnecessary to cope with the emergency, but chiefly it is objectionable because it seeks to grant in the transitional peace-time period powers which were sought and used for war purposes. That is what we object to. We have it from the government's own statement that the powers which they needed during the war are not necessary in peace. They cannot understand why we criticize them for seeking to extend those powers.

In this connection I should like to refer to the speech made in this house this evening by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). While the minister was making his speech, I could not help thinking that he should have been a lawyer, and I was not surprised to hear him say during the course of his remarks that at one time he had studied for the law. At the commencement of his remarks he outlined his absolute detestation of controls; he said that he could not get rid of them too quickly, and then we heard him say in his speech that he was a pretty good controller. As I listened to him announce his detestation of controls, I was reminded of a story which attaches to a famous lawyer.

When confronted with a troublesome piece of evidence a friend said to this lawyer, "You cannot use that piece of evidence on appeal because it will destroy your case if you mention it." This famous lawyer replied, "No; that will not be any trouble. I will read the evidence through once; I will repeat it again with comments on each sentence; I will repeat it again the third time and contrast it with the evidence on the other side. Then, when my learned friend gets up to deal with his case the court will say to him, 'Oh, we have heard enough about that; we cannot be bothered to go into it.'" As the minister dealt with the extent of his detestation of control, I could not avoid being reminded of that story.

Hon. members will recall that not much later in his speech the minister proceeded to tell us just how much had been accomplished by controls, just how good the controls were and how good he was as a controller. He told us of the avalanche of hogs he had finally sent over to England, or something like that. There is really no doubt as to the attitude of mind of the ministers who sit on the government benches. They like controls. They have done what they regard as a good job by means of controls and they are reluctant to part with them now in time of peace.

We detest controls as much as the minister. What we are saying in effect is that we think the controls can be got rid of a great deal faster than they are being. But the government is asking for war-time controls and a further extension of them. If controls are inherently bad, there should be no objection when we criticize this bill. The government should have gone farther; they should have thrown out the old bill and brought in a new bill so that we would not have been presented with this sort of strip-tease bill, half undressed and half clothed and then when we are just going to grasp it, it is suddenly fully clothed in its old garments—it is the old bill.

One further point before I come to the actual subject-matter of the principle of this bill. The Minister of Agriculture read the preamble of the new bill, so that I assume I shall be forgiven if I deal briefly with that preamble. He said that it was very certain and very specific. I will not argue that point; I will accept his words on it. Referring to the measures taken under the War Measures Act, the preamble says:

> And whereas in the existing circumstances it is essential that certain acts and things done and authorized and certain orders and regulations made under the War Measures Act be continued in force . . .

That is the preamble. We are told that it is only those acts and measures which are necessary for limited control that will be continued over the transitional period, but when we come to section 4 of the new bill we find:

> The orders and regulations made under the War Measures Act or pursuant to authority created under the said act in force immediately before the day this act comes into force shall, while this act is in force, continue in full force and effect . . .

Everything that was done under the War Measures Act is being continued under the provisions of this bill. We find that this burlesque, this strip-tease show is resolving itself into a simple farce and illusion and we are back again dealing with the original bill No. 15.

On motion of Mr. Fulton the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, December 5, 1945.

The house met at eleven o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

DORVAL AIRPORT—EMPLOYMENT OF UNITED STATES NATIONALS

Mr. BROOKS:

1. How many United States nationals are employed at Dorval airport, Montreal, by the R.A.F.T.C. in the capacity of pilot?
2. What is their salary per month?
3. What action has been taken by the government to replace United States nationals with Canadian R.C.A.F. pilots capable of doing this work?

Mr. McILRAITH: Mr. Speaker, it will be noticed that this question asks how many United States nationals are employed at Dorval airport, Montreal, by the R.A.F.T.C. in the capacity of pilot. This question has to do with the British Air Ministry. The Canadian government therefore has no way of answering it.

ELECTRIC ENERGY—FEDERAL TAXES, MONTREAL AREA

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. What was the total federal taxes for electric energy paid by utilities and their customers in the Montreal area for each fiscal year from April 1, 1939, to December 1, 1945?
2. What was the total electric energy distributed during such years?

Mr. McCANN (On behalf of the Department of National Revenue):

1. No information.
2. No information.

ANTI-SEASICK SERUM

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Have any steps been taken to place the anti-seasick serum developed by the Canadian Navy on the public market?
2. If so, in what manner will this be done?
3. If not, why not?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. The seasickness remedy was made for the navy by a commercial firm according to a formula accepted by the Department of National Defence (Naval Service). Further research indicates that a change in the formula may produce a more satisfactory remedy and the research group in charge has recommended that this work be completed before the product is released for sale to the general public.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Answered by No. 1.

ARMOUR HEIGHTS, TORONTO, R.C.A.F. STAFF COLLEGE

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Were the premises of the R.C.A.F. staff college at Armour Heights, Toronnto, offered for sale to the government?
2. If so, at what price?
3. Was the offer accepted or refused?
4. What orders in council if any, have been passed for the expropriation or purchase of the property?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West):

1. Yes.
2. $100,000.
3. Accepted.
4. P.C. 6795 dated November 15, 1945.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. Has the government received any complaints concerning delays in the payment of family allowances?
2. If so, what steps are being taken to avoid such delays in the future?

Mr. CLAXTON:

1 and 2. In a number of cases, as would be expected in a mass operation involving 1,400,000 applications, delay has resulted in issuing the first family allowance cheque. These delays have in part been caused by the fact that many forms were incorrectly or incompletely filled out and had to be returned to the applicants for revision. Shortage of space, trained staff and equipment have now been largely overcome. In cases of such delay payment is retroactive.

MOBILIZATION SURVEY

Mr. ZAPLITNY:

1. Is the federal government employing any persons in connection with the mobilization survey?

2. If so, what work are they doing?

3. What salaries are they receiving?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. No.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

1. How many suits of underwear, (a) men's; (b) ladies'; (c) children, have been produced in Canada during, (1) 1943; (2) 1945, as far as the records show?

2. How much of each year's production of this underwear was used by, (a) the armed forces; (b) for domestic consumption; (c) for export?

Mr. MAYHEW:

BRITISH IMPORT LICENCES

STATEMENT WITH RESPECT TO POLICY OF UNITED KINGDOM GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement in answer to a recent question by the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser).

The question of the hon. member touches on a matter that has been of great concern to this government for some time and has been the subject of repeated consultation with United Kingdom representatives both here and in London. The situation with which we are now faced is one which was foreseen and one which both governments have hoped to avoid. Unfortunately, that has not been possible. It was anticipated that these questions would arise after the termination of mutual aid and lend lease and, accordingly, plans were laid for discussions with the United Kingdom to follow immediately on the conclusion of the United Kingdom-United States talks which we expected to be finished early in November.

The Washington discussions have continued much longer than was anticipated, and of necessity our talks with the United Kingdom have not yet taken place. Because of the magnitude of the problems involved, it would have been quite impossible for us to have any productive discussions with the United Kingdom until the results of the United States talks were known.

On the matter of the import policy which the United Kingdom is pursuing, I am now able to give the house a statement that we have received from the United Kingdom government:

> The stringency of Britain's external financial position resulting from the war, has left the United Kingdom government with no alternative but to restrict by licence for the time being, the United Kingdom's imports of manufactured goods. Until her industry can be reestablished, and her export trade developed to a level substantially in excess of pre-war, the United Kingdom will have an adverse balance in her overseas payments. This means that she must forgo, for the present, many articles which she would like to import. Thus, essential supplies of foodstuffs and raw materials have, for the present, to receive priority, and in the case of manufactured goods, import licences have perforce to be restricted to such goods as are urgently needed to supplement home production and quicken her economic recovery.
> This, however, is an interim policy only, dictated by present necessities. As Britain's external financial position improves, there should follow a progressive relaxation in import controls. It is the aim of the United Kingdom government that this relaxation should be as rapid as possible, but it is difficult to make any forecast as to the rate of relaxation since this will depend on many factors, particularly the extent of such financial assistance as may be forthcoming from abroad, the improvement in United Kingdom exports, and the reduction in the United Kingdom's expenditure on external commitments consequent on the war. The United Kingdom government hope, however, that it may be possible to proceed to a more definite policy before very long.
> In the meantime, certain Canadian firms have approached the United Kingdom government for facilities to establish production in the United Kingdom. I am informed, however, that it is not the policy of His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom to use the import licensing system to bring pressure on Canadian firms to do so.

This is the end of the statement by the British authorities. I wish briefly to supplement this statement. It is gratifying to make public this assurance that the policy which the United Kingdom finds itself forced to adopt is an interim policy only and is subject to reconsideration in the light of changing circumstances. It is our hope that the conclusion of the Washington negotiations is not far distant, and I can assure the house that immediately the results of those discussions are known, we shall proceed to examine these with United Kingdom representatives and discuss with them arrangements for formal discussions between the two governments which we would hope to hold shortly.

Apart altogether from the statement by the United Kingdom which I have just read, I should like very briefly to draw the attention of the house to a matter which may serve to illustrate the reluctance of British authorities to discriminate against imports from Canada and of their desire to safeguard our traditional place in the British market, in so far as present circumstances permit.

The house is aware that we have been in consultation with the British authorities on a number of important individual cases. The British austerity programme has dictated the continuation of the general policy of a four-page newspaper. But as the result of Canadian representations that have been made, assurances have now been received from the United Kingdom that Canada will supply a fair part of the reduced British consumption of newsprint.

Other representations made resulted in the reinstatement of orders for agricultural implements which the United Kingdom authorities had cancelled some months ago. The Canadian export board of my department estimated that these cancellations alone would have amounted to more than $1,600,000. Continuing representations are being made on other matters, and I cite two cases simply to illustrate the general British attitude and their desire to cooperate as much as their circumstances permit in acceding to our representations.

Personally I do not in any way question the assurances that are given from time to time by leaders of the United Kingdom government with respect to the principles that will guide the future trading policies of Great Britain. I recognize, however, that the time which may elapse in giving them full effect is a matter of the utmost concern to individual Canadian companies that have relied heavily upon the British market, and to our own national trading position in the great British market.

I need hardly add that I realize that it is of importance that we press on as quickly as possible with our discussions with the United Kingdom authorities, having in mind that we must reach the earliest possible solution of our United Kingdom-Canada trade arrangements which are so vital to our whole trading position.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CANADIAN NATIONAL DRY DOCK AT PRINCE RUPERT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. G. ARCHIBALD (Skeena): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can he give a statement on future Canadian National construction in the Canadian national dry dock at Prince Rupert? The men are being laid off and are worried, and so are the business men.

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): The hon. gentleman was kind enough to send me notice of the question, as well as a telegram which has been received from the Prince Rupert industrial development committee. The dry dock at Prince Rupert is owned and operated by the Canadian National Railways and I have asked the officials of that company for a report both on future shipbuilding and on the present position of employment. I am informed by the Canadian National that 622 shipyard workers were in employment at Prince Rupert on November 24. This staff will be reduced around the end of January to between 400 and 450, when the first vessel will be completed, and will be further reduced to about 250 by the end of February, when the second vessel is expected to be completed. Normal pre-war employment at Prince Rupert has been between 90 and 100. The management of Canadian National Railways is proceeding with the preparation of plans for the design of one or more vessels for the west coast service of Canadian National Steamships, and it is exploring the possibilities of making arrangements for such vessels to be constructed at Prince Rupert. The plans are not yet sufficiently advanced to permit the management at this time to make any definite statement.

ATOMIC BOMB

DEVELOPMENT AND PRODUCTION—COST TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Reconstruction. On Monday there appeared on the order paper this question:

What was the total cost to Canada in connection with the discovery and production of the atomic bomb?

The minister replied:

I would not care to answer the question in its present form. . .

On November 5 there appeared on the order paper a question of mine as follows:

What share did Canada have in the cost of discovering and producing the atomic bomb?

On that occasion the minister said—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. FRASER: The minister said:

If the hon. member would like to know what Canada has spent, we shall be glad to tell him.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. member that when the Speaker calls "order" he should resume his seat.

Mr. FRASER: Mr. Speaker, I apologize for not resuming my seat, but I did not know you were standing, because there was a noise in the left-hand corner. The question I would ask the minister is this: why can he not answer my question as it appeared on the order paper on Monday? That is the form in which I understood he wanted it, and the question has been on the order paper for four weeks.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): There was a question on the order paper asking for the total expenditure for atomic energy, and we are prepared to answer that. The objection to the other question was that it asked how much we had spent in manufacturing atomic bombs. We have not manufactured atomic bombs, we have no intention of manufacturing atomic bombs, and therefore I should not like to have it suggested that any great sums of money have been spent in that occupation.

Mr. FRASER: I understand from the minister's department—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. FRASER: —that there has been an expenditure of at least $25,000,000 for research.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The minister's reply is not debatable.

CIVIL AVIATION

PAN-AMERICAN AIRWAYS—RATES FOR ATLANTIC CROSSINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply in connection with the rate war that was recently declared by Pan-American Airways. Have there been any new developments in connection with that matter, and has anything been done with a view to ensuring uniformity of rates on the Atlantic?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I am informed that all air lines operating across the north Atlantic have reached an informal agreement that, pending another meeting of the International Air Transport Association and Picao, all air lines will charge a rate of $375 for a one-way crossing.

LEGAL SERVICES

BORDEN, ELLIOT, SANKEY AND KELLEY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): May I be permitted to refer to pages 2448 and 2828-9 of Hansard? I have been sailing against contrary winds and bucking the tide to secure some information about refunds of the Borden firm to the treasury, and what I regret, sir, and I say this on a question of privilege, is that the question that was called on Monday, when I was not in the house, was not well understood. I did not ask for a new photostat copy of the cheques for the amounts that were returned. What I wanted was a copy of the photographs that were made of the cheques when they came in, because I am under the impression that the minister found that the remittance was so admirable that he had these cheques photographed as soon as they came in. It is one of these copies that I wanted.

SERVICE PERSONNEL

R.C.A.F.—PLASTIC SURGERY TREATMENT AT TRENTON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JAMES SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): I wish to direct a question to the minister for air. It is of immediate concern to a very small group of airmen who are certainly deserving of the utmost consideration in this house and in the country. In the R.C.A.F. plastic surgery ward at Trenton—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman is not permitted to make a statement.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): I will put it in the form of a question, although in this case the house should have given me this opportunity. I will ask the minister whether he will give consideration to keeping those dozen airmen who are at present in the plastic surgery ward at Trenton, which is being closed, in uniform instead of being discharged as civilians for civilian treatment, until such time as their facial plastic surgery is completed.

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Minister of National Defence for Air): I had an interview last week-end with some of the patients from the plastic surgery ward at Trenton and I visited Trenton on Sunday. Under the ordinary routine, if a man is no longer fit for service he is demobilized and transferred to the Department of Veterans Affairs. When he is demobilized from the forces he no longer has the privilege of wearing uniform. Many of these plastic surgery cases are badly disfigured, and they find it embarrassing to appear on the streets in civilian clothes because the general public does not know they received their injuries on service. I am having the regulations examined to find out what arrangements can be made, and if it is possible—and I think it will be possible—arrangements will be made to permit these men to continue to wear their uniform during the period they are undergoing treatment for facial injuries.

NATIONAL EMERGENCY

BILL TO CONFER CERTAIN POWERS UPON THE GOVERNOR IN COUNCIL

The house resumed from Tuesday, December 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent for the second reading of bill No. 15, to confer certain powers upon the governor in council during the national emergency following the war.

Mr. E. D. FULTON (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose last night I had just concluded a few general remarks on the stand we take with respect to this bill, and was about to consider the principle of the bill itself. I realize that there is a duty on all members to be as brief as possible in these discussions, and I should like to assure you, sir, and through you all hon. members, that I shall endeavour to carry out that duty. In order to make my case coherent, however, I should like merely to outline again the stand which we take, and then develop our case against the principle of this bill.

First, we are very much concerned with the constitutional safeguards which protect the rights and freedom of parliament and the rights and freedom of the individual. We are particularly concerned with the supremacy of parliament in the legislative sphere.

Second, this bill—and indeed any measure which seeks for whatever reason to take away those safeguards and give to the executive powers and privileges which rightly belong to parliament and are assured to parliament by the constitution—is, on the face of it, a bad measure. If it infringes the constitution it should be resisted. However, it must be admitted, and it has been admitted by us without reservation, that in an emergency situation there is justification for a greater or lesser departure from the strict rules of constitutionality. In this particular case it is the contention of the government that in order to maintain the economic structure of the country and to secure an orderly transition from war-time to peace-time economy, emergency powers are necessary. We are therefore prepared to make certain concessions; but in view of what I have said with regard to the way we feel about the supremacy of parliament and the sanctity of the constitution, we are not prepared to make further concessions than are absolutely necessary to accomplish the objects the government has in mind.

When we saw bill No. 15 as it was originally printed and distributed, the second reading of which is now before the house, we considered it wholly bad, inasmuch as it asked not for the delegation of powers, but for a complete abdication, a complete denial of constitutional principles. The situation has been confused by the circulation of the new bill 15. With the permission of the house I should like to refer briefly to that bill. I hope the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) will permit me to congratulate him on some aspects of the new bill, inasmuch as it does show a certain willingness to concede, and for that we are extremely grateful. But the bill still goes a great deal too far; therefore, in view of the way we feel about the constitution, the bill is still bad. We are encouraged, if I may put it that way, by the generosity of the Minister of Justice in maknig the concessions which he has made, and knowing that the Minister of Justice listens to representations made when the subject matter under discussion is the constitutional right and the rights and liberties of the individual, I feel encouraged to discuss the bill. I should like the minister to make further concessions, and those concessions can be indicated in the discussion of the general principle of the bill.

Our objection to the bill as it stands is that the powers sought by the government are still far too wide. They are so wide as to constitute an unwarranted attack on the constitution, and to involve an unjustifiable violation of the principles of the liberty of the subject; therefore we are unable to accept the principle of the bill.

The main basis on which we say this bill is still too wide is to be found in clause 4, which reads as follows:

> The orders and regulations made under the War Measures Act or pursuant to authority created under the said act in force immediately before the day this act comes into force shall, while this act is in force, continue in force and effect. . .

It has been conceded by government speakers, and was conceded last night, that many of the regulations and things done under the War Measures Act were, strictly speaking, unconstitutional. It was conceded that although justifiable in time of war, they were not justifiable in time of peace. It was further conceded that it is desirable to curtail these powers on the part of the executive and to discontinue them as soon as possible. The strongest possbile case for that position was made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in his speech last night.

In both the original bill 15 now before the house and the new bill 15 which has been circulated with proposed amendments we find that it is desired to continue in force all those acts and things done under the War Measures Act. The effect of section 4 of the new bill, which is section 5 of the old bill, is that we are asked to give, sight unseen, assent to a number of measures the content and effects of which are unknown to us. I submit to the minister that it is not fair to ask this house, it is not fair to ask any members of this house, so to endorse provisions, the content of which we do not know and the effects of which we do not know. It is not necessary; therefore, it is bad. As it is such a vital and integral part of this bill, it constitutes a valid ground for objection to the principle of the bill.

I have said, Mr. Speaker, that it is not necessary to seek this blanket endorsement for all that was done under the War Measures Act. In substantiation of that statement I should like to refer briefly to the bill recently introduced in the British house, the Supplies and Services (Transitional Powers) bill. In the first place this confers no new power on the government to make regulations, as does bill 15 in this house. In the view of the British government they have sufficient power already under the defence regulations to do everything required during the transitional period from war to peace. They do regard it as necessary to continue certain of those powers; but instead of asking for a blanket continuation the British government has adopted the proper constitutional method and defined the four categories of powers which they require for the maintenance and the orderly regulation of the economy of their country. They have defined those powers and then have said, "The only regulations we are going to ask this house to continue are the specific regulations falling within these four categories." Here is the relevant portion of the British act, which is found in section 1:

> If it appears to His Majesty to be necessary or expedient that any defence regulation to which this section applies should have effect for the purpose of so maintaining, controlling and regulating supplies and services. . .

Then they define the four categories within which those regulations may fall, giving the four heads under which they need power, and go on to say:

> . . . . he may by order in council direct that the regulation shall have effect by virtue of this act. . .

In other words the regulations already existing must deal with one or other of the four subjects; in the second place the regulations must have specific consideration and extension, and in the third place the regulations will be reviewed and adapted to meet the needs of the moment. In elaboration of this I should like to read some extracts from the British Hansard for Tuesday, October 9, 1945. On that date the home secretary, Mr. Ede, brought into the British house this bill to which I have referred. In moving second reading he said, at page 111:

> I want to make it quite clear at the outset that the government intend to retain only those war-time powers which are desirable in the public interest.

Then at page 115, referring to the orders made under the British Defence Regulations Acts, he said:

> Those acts will now expire on the 24th February next. We have decided that we will not ask the house to continue them beyond that date.

In the first place only those powers necessary were being sought. In the second place none of the others would be asked to be continued beyond that date. Then at page 119 he went on to say:

> . . . except for a limited period in respect of price control, the bill confers no power to make fresh regulations for the purpose of the transition period, but only a power to make any of the existing defence regulations contained in parts III and IV of the defence (general) regulations . . . applicable to the new purposes of the reconstruction period . . .

And further down on that page:

> The existing regulations which will be continued will have to be justified to the house.

And finally.

> These orders in council, bringing the defence regulations into the scope of this bill will have to be laid before both houses and will be subject to annulment by resolution of either house.

There, I submit, is the proper constitutional method to follow: first, to define the categories of the powers you require; second, to say that only those existing regulations which fall within those categories will be continued; third, that even those you seek to continue will be brought into this house and the need for them and their relevancy to this act explained, and then they will be continued in force under this act; finally, that all these regulations, even those we continue, should be subject to annulment by resolution of either house, not as in this act by this house alone. That, I submit, is the proper course and is all that is required to give the government sufficient power. It is the course which should be followed here.

In the preamble of the new bill it seems that this is the intention of the government. At line 21 of the preamble I find these words:

> . . . and whereas in the existing circumstances it is essential that certain acts and things done and authorized and certain orders and regulations made under the War Measures Act be continued in force . . .

That would seem to imply that only certain specific regulations and orders were asked to be continued; but, as I have pointed out, that is not the effect of section 4 of the bill.

Therefore I would ask the minister to see to it that the implications contained in the preamble of this bill, and the provision contained in the British bill, are actually incorporated in the bill now before the house. The principle of the bill would then be far more acceptable to all hon. members, and, I am sure, also to all the people of the country, because they would know what regulations would affect them. It is a well-known principle that ignorance of the law is no excuse for any offence which may be committed, but I defy anyone to know what is the law when that law is contained in ninety or a hundred thousand orders in council and regulations. I think that is one of the strongest possible cases that could be made to require the government to tell us what laws, what powers, what orders in council are being continued by virtue of this present bill.

Mr. CLAXTON: If the hon. gentleman will permit a question, does he not realize that of the great number of orders in council adopted, the vast majority contain no laws whatever but are orders approving contracts and appointments, and so on? That has been stated time and again in this house.

Mr. FULTON: I appreciate the force of what the minister has said; and if there are large numbers of orders in council of the nature he has outlined then of course there can be no objection to continuing them. But is it too much to ask each department of the government to go through its own orders in council and find out the ones which are applicable, the ones under which they are still acting, and consolidate them and then bring them into the house so that we may see them?

Mr. CLAXTON: I can assure my hon. friend that every department is working steadily at that.

Mr. FULTON: If that is the case I can only say that this statement is most inconsistent with the statement of the then acting Prime Minister (Mr. Ilsley) that it was not in accordance with government policy to table the orders in council passed since September 6 of this year. I am trying to present a case to the minister, and so far I have tried to avoid appearing unduly critical. I must say, however, that suspicions are aroused. We should like to regard this bill in the best possible light; we should like to believe in the intentions of the minister and of the government, but suspicions are aroused when we are denied access to the information we seek as to what has been done by order in council, and in the second place when we are asked to approve, sight unseen, everything that has been done.

I am content to leave my case there, because I think it cannot fail to commend itself to the Minister of Justice. A great deal of work may be involved, but surely it is worth that to see to it that the people of this country know what are the laws which bind them.

That, Mr. Speaker, is our particular objection to the bill as it now stands. I should like to conclude by making a few remarks on the general principles governing the whole situation, which I feel must be said before this measure can be allowed to pass. What I shall present now is the larger application of the particular remarks I have just made.

We oppose this bill on a question of principle, in the belief that it is an excessive infringement of constitutional rights. We oppose it because it goes farther than it has any right to go. Liberty is perhaps—no, I will say liberty is certainly—the most precious possession of our heritage, the greatest privilege guaranteed to us by our constitution; and therefore the features of the constitution which guarantee it are most vigorously to be fought for. No features of our constitution are so surely protective of liberty as the freedom and supremacy of parliament and the right of the subject to the protection of the established law of the land. In the pursuit of liberty we have just concluded a war; we should be willing to spare no effort to secure and maintain liberty now in Canada. Therefore we say: Let no man, let no government dare lightly to ask us to agree to a surrender or even to an infringement of either of these two rights given us by the constitution. While we are ready to agree to the handing over of powers and the denial for the moment, of the rule of law and the supremacy of democratic processes, in order to attain certain specific ends, and within certain specific limitations, we are justified nevertheless, in taking the strongest possible issue with the demand, such as we find here, for the wholesale and abject surrender of these rights.

As hon. members know, many of the powers vested in the governor in council—and these are legislative powers we are dealing with—powers the property of parliament, not executive powers properly vested in the cabinet—are, when embodied in orders in council, given such form as to limit in a most drastic manner the liberty of the subject. I have in mind such things as taking away from a subject the right of resort to the courts, denying a person the right of appeal from the acts of the controllers, and provisions that where investigations are being made into the conduct of Canadian citizens under certain regulations, such citizens shall be deprived of their right to counsel, deprived of their protection under the criminal code, and then made liable to prosecution as a result of anything they may say during that investigation.

It is realized that in war the delegation of powers to controllers is necessary. The delegation of powers to make regulations is also necessary. But as I have indicated, this system, when carried out, is full of dangers to the liberty of the individual. That is why we object to any delegation of legislative powers which is not essential.

In support of what I have said I would read from the report of the committee on ministers' powers appointed by Lord Chancellor Sankey in Great Britain in 1932. Dealing with the new principle of delegating legislative authority, the committee made certain observations which I now quote with approval. I would refer first to page 5 of this report, which states:

> Between liberty and government there is an age-long conflict. It is of vital importance that the new policy,—

That is, the policy of legislation by delegated authority—> —while truly promoting liberty by securing better conditions of life for the people of this country, should not, in its zeal for interference, deprive them of their initiative and independence which are the nation's most valuable assets.

> It cannot, we think, be denied that prima facie this involves an infringement of that rule of law which is "a characteristic of the English constitution." In this context we may quote a statement of the ideal of justice which should always be an aim of British statesmanship:
> "Amid the cross-currents and shifting sands of public life the law is like a great rock upon which a man may set his feet and be safe, while the inevitable inequalities of private life are not so dangerous in a country where every citizen knows that in the law courts, at any rate, he can get justice."

Mr. MITCHELL: Would the hon. member permit a question? Is that the same Lord Sankey who recommended the socialization of the coal industry in Great Britain?

Mr. FULTON: I have been reading from the report of the committee on ministers' powers. Lord Sankey did not make the report: his committee made it, and that portion which I have just read was taken from a passage in Lord Hewart's book, with which I have no doubt the minister, who is so well aware of the ideals of British justice and statesmanship, is familiar.

Mr. MITCHELL: I did not hear what the hon. member said. I think he said it under his breath.

Mr. BOUCHER: It is worth reading, anyway.

Mr. MITCHELL: I hope the Hansard reporter was more successful in hearing it than I was.

Mr. FULTON: I cannot hear the minister. Mr. Speaker, I see the time at my disposal is running out, and I shall have to conclude my argument.

It is a principle in our constitution, one which has remained inviolate from at least the seventeenth century and which has been the envy of all those who at various times have suffered from tyranny, that no man should be denied the right of access to the courts, and further that the judiciary must be independent of the executive. Thus liberty of the individual is assured. And when we find, as we have found in investigating many of these orders in council, not that they take issue with the courts or try to dictate to them, but that they tell the subject that he shall have no right of appeal to the courts, then I say an attack is being made upon the very foundations of our liberty. It is because that sort of thing has been done, under the War Measures Act, because it is sought to carry over into this measure all the things that have been done under the War Measures Act, and because we see in this measure no suggestion of safeguard for the principles and rights of which I have spoken, that we are justified in opposing the principle of the bill.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I have received several letters expressing strong disapproval of this bill. I will quote only the objections made by the League of Montreal Property Owners:

> Dear Sir,
> Since October 11, 1941, the League of Montreal Property Owners has informed you of its grievances against the rent control set-up and suggested means of improving the sad lot of its members.
> Bill 15, as amended, is now before the house. We earnestly beg that a clause be inserted in the bill providing that property owners be restored the rights to which they are entitled and which were suspended during the war, in order that their property may afford them more profitable earnings.
> Hoping, dear sir, that you will give this request, your best attention, please believe me,
> Yours very truly,
> (Signed) Arthur Lussier,
> Secretary.

This letter speaks for itself. There is no need for me to comment upon it since its request is based on a most elementary principle of justice.

Is the bill now before the house necessary, is it even advisable? Under the National Resources Mobilization Act which affects both manpower and materials, all power is vested in the government, and the latter has availed itself, in fact still avails itself fully of its authority. It is free to extend or curtail controls or restrictions in due course, as is evidenced by the following extract taken from page 148 of the 1945 Recapitulation Issue of Canada at War:

Since the end of the war in Europe some restrictions on the production of civilian goods have been removed altogether. The Department of Munitions and Supply and the Wartime Prices and Trade Board have both announced a policy of gradual relaxation of the controls as soon as the supply situation justifies.

A state of war still exists in Canada. Here is a quotation taken from page 2 of the 1945 Recapitulation Issue of Canada at War:

". . . by and with the advice of Our Privy Council for Canada . . .
Now Therefore We do hereby Declare and Proclaim that a State of War with the German Reich exists and has existed in Our Dominion of Canada as and from the tenth day of September, 1939."

I am not aware that the National Resources Mobilization Act, affecting both manpower and materials, has been repealed. Therefore, I find this bill altogether useless. Are more extensive powers sought? That would be detrimental to the prerogatives and privileges of the provinces that have already been bled white.

The planning and execution of the federal government's war-time programme of income taxation has been greatly facilitated by the withdrawal of the provincial governments from the fields of personal and corporation income taxes for the period of the war. This withdrawal was effected in 1941 by formal agreement between the federal and each provincial government. The provinces have been compensated for the loss suffered by repealing their own taxes.

Did the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) wish to imply in the house a couple of days ago that the provinces would agree to the clauses and conventions set out in the bill? If such is the case, I advise the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) without further ado, that I am willing to accept the clauses of the bill now before the house; otherwise, however, I would have to oppose the measure in the interest of the respective provincial prerogatives and jurisdictions.

At the close of hostilities the government's first duty should be to recognize the efforts made by the Canadians by restoring the prerogatives of parliament. The time has come to abolish the restrictions and controls which paralyze agricultural, commercial and industrial development. Otherwise the process of reestablishing the members of our armed forces in civil life will be an exceedingly slow one. Canadians who have fought valiantly in this war expect the party in power to give them new directions which will enable them to take an active part in restoring Canada's economic life. Young people, whose career has been interrupted by the war, are entitled more than anyone else to employment and social welfare. We should find an immediate solution to the problem of employment in civil industries. The people are demanding that production of several essential articles be resumed. Sometimes there are delays which the people are at a loss to explain in view of the abundance of raw materials and labour in this country. We have no right to refuse for the achievement of peace similar sacrifices to those made for the prosecution of the war. The reestablishment of soldiers in civil life must be carried out with diligence and method. Do you think it is fair that in a country like ours veterans who are returning to Canada should find themselves without a dwelling? What good is it to a soldier to be a Canadian and to have sacrificed everything for his country if he cannot even find a place to live?

For years, boards which are not responsible to the people have been daily encroaching on the privileges and on the mandate of duly elected members of parliament. Now that the war has come to an end those boards should be abolished and parliament's supremacy restored. Those wartime boards have already lasted long enough. We must abolish those states within the state and reestablish responsible government. Canada has sacrificed everything so that liberty and democracy may triumph. The existence of wartime boards which are not responsible to the people of Canada is a challenge to liberty and democracy. For everybody's sake it is time that this dictatorship be eradicated.

In a recent speech in the British House of Commons, former Prime Minister Churchill stated as follows:

Whatever may be our views on socialism and free enterprise it would be in the general interest that we set in motion the large, as well as the small wheels of life and industry. And for this we need men.

In attacking the Labour government's demobilization plan as inadequate, he stated that it was "the source of our national difficulties".

And he added:

While we are keeping men and women in the armed forces without sufficient reason, there can be no speedy reestablishment.

Thousands of Canadians are not alone in demanding demobilization and the abolition of those boards which are not accountable to the people. Former Prime Minister Churchill rightly claims that failure to do so is the chief cause of the difficulties experienced by his country. He has been urging the British government to demobilize men and women in larger number in order that they may help restore production in all fields. Who can question the experience and the sincerity of the former prime minister? Like England, Canada feels the scarcity of goods. The time has come to promote civilian industry. Let us give back to industry, trade and agriculture the help which they require.

Finally, the abolition of controls, the repeal of the mobilization and conscription act and the granting of an amnesty to defaulters and deserters would enable our young men to devote their energies to the economic reconstruction of Canada. Useful jobs are awaiting them. Why deprive the country of the contribution which they are in a position to make through their initiative and their efforts?

In support of my contentions, I quote these further statements by Winston Churchil, which appeared in La Presse of Montreal on October 22, 1945:

> The regrettable shortage of goods will continue. The government cannot allow the people to spend their savings lest an undue increase in prices take place. Shortages will be invoked to justify the continuation of controls and the latter will prolong the scarcity of goods.

He asked the government to release the men from the services and to "set in motion the machinery of economic life". He stated that he would be ashamed to bear the responsibility of the government's statement on demobilization.

> The moment has come to bring back to the country the men who have conquered, he stated, and no acute unemployment is to be feared. All industries require workers and there are numerous useful and fruitful tasks to be accomplished.

Since Mr. Churchill urges the return to England of British soldiers and their demobilization, are we not entitled to urge the repatriation to Canada of thousands of our soldiers and the demobilization of our men who are occupying Germany and the conquered countries? Has Canada not played her part in the achievement of victory? To paraphrase a sentence made famous by the former British prime minister who said: "Give us the tools and we will finish the job", I say to the government: Give our youth the tools necessary to achieve and win the peace.

Let us make no mistake about it, peace exists in appearance only.

Mr. COTE (Matapedia-Matane): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. LACOMBE: Certainly.

Mr. COTE (Matapédia-Matane): Does the hon. member want the policy of the Canadian parliament to be directed by the former prime minister of Great Britain?

Mr. LACOMBE: The hon. member for Matapédia-Matane is misinterpreting my statement. I fail to see by what right he distorts the arguments I am developing in this house. However, his question does not deserve any answer. I simply quote the statements of the former prime minister of England and apply them to Canadian politics as anyone might do in similar circumstances. I will therefore ask my hon. friend to feel no anxiety on this score.

I was saying that peace is only apparent at the present time. Europe is, to a certain extent, dominated by communism. A system which is worse than the dictatorship crushed by the united nations rules over the liberated countries in the name of justice, Christianity and right. The Atlantic charter, the Yalta resolutions, the war objectives of the allies are trampled under foot. Soviet Russia is causing its whole weight to bear on nations which it is its mission to revive and not to overrun. Religious authorities of Lithuania and the Slavic states have protested against such brutal treatment.

Let us beware lest, under cover of the critical times which Canada will experience, subversive elements might spread through the land. Having won the war would be of no avail were we to lose the peace. True peace is not attainable through the violation of other peoples' rights. The respective jurisdictions of the provincial and federal authorities are clearly defined. Under war-time measures, provincial rights have been encroached upon time and again when they have not been positively ignored. What was unwarranted in time of war is unjustifiable in time of peace. Why attempt to delay the proclamation of peace for the sole purpose of maintaining a bureaucratic system which has replaced the elected representatives of the people? The time has come to return to normal living and do away with restrictions, boards and controls.

I respectfully submit, Mr. Speaker, that the government is endowed with all the powers to that end, but I repeat what I said a few moments ago. If the provincial premiers, at the recent federal-provincial conference, have approved the clauses and conventions contained in the present bill, I am willing to uphold them, otherwise, I shall oppose them.

(Text).

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, as the leader of this group stated a week ago Friday, we did not think that the government should seek such blanket and absolute powers as those put forth in sections 3 and 5 of the bill. We therefore stated that when the bill reached the committee stage we would move certain amendments. However, the government now intends to move a new bill as an amendment in committee stage. This new bill apparently has come into being largely as a result of the conference which took place between the federal government and the provincial premiers, and also no doubt as a result of consideration of the various criticisms which were made in this house when the bill was first introduced.

The new bill is certainly an improvement on the old one, but the powers of control are still very wide. I think we all agree, however, that certain controls are essential at this time and will continue to be essential for several months; and therefore it is concerning these controls which are essential that I wish to say a few words at this time.

I think people across Canada from one end to the other are looking forward to the day when these controls will be just an unpleasant memory. They are fed up with being at the mercy of the whims and the tyrannies of a bunch of bureaucrats. It is a strange thing that when you give some people a little bit of power it seems to have about the same effect on them as when you give some people a drink of liquor; it goes to their heads, and. from being just ordinary likeable individuals they become a great big nuisance, a headache to themselves and everybody concerned.

On the other hand, while recognizing the needs for these controls in war time, the people are demanding that they be eliminated at the earliest possible day. Obviously controls cannot cease upon the day of victory. Conditions arising from war will continue for many weeks and months after the war, and until those conditions have been removed, controls will have to continue, unless of course we are prepared to face consequences which might very well be chaotic. If that comes about, I would say, it will not be the wealthy people of the country who will suffer but the people in the lower income brackets, and especially veterans and their dependents who will be trying to start life anew. They would be the main sufferers from any chaotic state of affairs that might ensue such as existed at the conclusion of the war 1914-18.

In addition to price controls certain controls are needed in connection with transportation in order to expedite the repatriation of the troops from overseas; and many of the benefits and preferences awarded to the veterans to-day having been passed under orders in council adopted by virtue of the War Measures Act, should the War Measures Act cease, those benefits would largely go out of existence.

Practically all war-time conditions requiring controls arise from a shortage of consumer goods and services. It is well to remember that during the war approximately fifty per cent of the production went for war purposes, and in spite of very heavy taxation during the war, billions of dollars of savings were accumulated in the form of bonds, war saving certificates and refundable taxes, so that these savings would become a very active demand for the class of goods which the people were not able to obtain during the war and which are still in short supply. Therefore until we complete the reconversion of industry from a war-time to a peace-time footing, it will be necessary to curtail the demand for that type of goods.

We have also of course a heavy responsibility in regard to the devastated areas of Europe and other parts of the world as a consequence of the war. Unless we want to witness wholesale starvation in those areas we, along with other nations that have not been devastated as a result of the war, will have to make large contributions to those areas; and that of course is bound to reduce the amount of goods available for distribution in this country.

Again, certain imports have been scarce during the war owing to lack of shipping and to the fact that the countries from which we obtained those imports in the past were overrun by the enemy. I point this out to show that the answer to all these questions is the expansion in production of consumer goods and services. Therefore the question which the government must ask themselves is whether their policy is one that will bring about the most rapid expansion of production, thereby making it possible to eliminate these controls in the shortest possible time. For instance, what assurance is being given industry to-day that not only will there be an immediate demand, but a continuing demand, for their total output? What assurance is being given industry to-day that when the accumulation of savings, causing a demand for goods, has been spent, other demands will take their place? And again, what assurance is being given industry that when the devastated areas have been rehabilitated, when they have rebuilt their industries and are once more in a position to export their goods in payment for imports, we shall be willing to accept those goods without the danger of their flooding the market and causing unemployment in this country?

That assurance and that guarantee can be given industry only if the government intend to adopt a sane financial policy that will maintain in Canada at all times an effective demand against our production. Is the government prepared to give industry the assurance that it will underwrite an effective demand in this country, so that there will be in Canada a ready market for our total production or the production of other nations for which our own production can be exchanged? If this is not done, then it will retard our production and considerably delay the time when these controls can be lifted, because no industry can continue to expand production unless it has at the same time an expanding market.

The next important point is this: What effect is the government's taxation policy having upon production in this country, upon the secondary industries, upon primary industry and upon labour? I think the answer in every case must be that their taxation policy has retarded production. I know that is certainly true so far as agriculture is concerned. It is true in regard to mixed farming, grain farming, and the production of live stock. Again, as the production of this country expands, is the government prepared to reduce drastically the taxation on the people in the lower income brackets so as to help to maintain an effective demand?

I would say that unless this government intends to deal very rapidly with the points I have raised it is also bound to delay the day on which these controls can be removed. Yet, on the other hand, I would ask this question: How can the government hope to underwrite the full development of the resources of the country and at the same time reduce taxation without plunging us still further into the morass of debt? Unless of course they intend to adopt a sane financial policy such as that outlined by the Prime Minister in 1935, when he said that currency and credit would be made available in terms of public need to meet the domestic and social requirements of the Canadian people, it cannot be done.

It may be said that the government have done that in the war. To a certain extent that is true, but you must remember that it was done by expanding the national debt by over ten billions, and no one would suggest that this can be considered a sane policy for peace time. While therefore we want a policy that will make sufficient money available to maintain effective demand against the production of our country, we want it done on a basis that will not at the same time expand our debt. Notwithstanding anything I have said, I am not suggesting for one minute the elimination of all controls. Some controls should be considered a permanent part of government policy for all time; for example, the control of foreign exchange in order to prevent gambling in foreign exchange, in order to prevent large-scale foreign investment abroad, which can only result in one of two things: either an unbalanced trade or a lower standard of living for the Canadian people.

We definitely favour a degree of price control in primary products in order to guarantee the farmer a fair share of the national income, so that the farmer's income may bear the same relationship to the national income as the farm population does the national population. Therefore we favour at all times a floor under primary products, and it should be based on parity prices, thereby helping to bring about a fairer distribution of income as between the primary and secondary industries.

I would emphasize this. Because ever since 1935 we in this group have consistently, year in and year out, advocated a degree of price control, and that was one of the main planks of the platform of the Social Credit party in Alberta in that year. We hear a lot of talk about free enterprise and free markets. I would point out that this condition has not existed in this country for as long as I can remember. It ended with the coming into being of combines, trusts, cartels, trade unions —and I am not attacking trade unions—and fixed overhead debt charges. Every one of these resisted the operation of free enterprise, therefore we need controls to prevent its abuse. The idea of free enterprise and markets was based on the understanding that there should be no government interference in prices; that prices were governed by the laws of supply and demand; that when supply, exceeded demand prices would fall until the balance was restored and vice versa; that when demand exceeded supply, prices would rise and absorb the difference. What has happened? Does anybody suggest for one minute that that is what has happened in the past? When supply exceeded effective demand, whilst the prices of primary products fell, the prices of the secondary goods, although registering a slight fall, were quickly stabilized by the secondary industries reducing production in order to meet the reduced buying power. That was done instead of reducing prices. Therefore it is nonsense to suggest that we have had free enterprise in operation in this country. Had the purchasing power of the people been maintained so that there should be an effective demand against production, prices need not have fallen and production need not have been reduced. Therefore, so long as the government maintains the present system price, controls will be essential in order to assure a parity living cost between the primary and secondary industries of this country, and, consequently, labour.

Generally speaking I believe the government have made a good job of maintaining controls during the war. I want to be fair in making that statement. Of course we all know that mistakes have been made, but considering the circumstances they might very easily have been far greater. I find that the main demand for the removal of all controls does not come from the great mass of the people but from the heads of certain corporations who want freedom to exploit the people. The people of this country endured the inconvenience of those controls during the war because they recognized they were essential. Surely it would be better to put up with them for a few more months than prematurely to lift them and cause a chaotic state of affairs in the country. Again I want to emphasize the fact that if that happens it will not be the wealthy people who will suffer, but mainly the veterans and their dependents and the people in the lower income brackets. Nevertheless I say that it is important for the government to realize that the people will not tolerate the extension of those controls for one day longer than is necessary.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, parliament is now being asked to give through or by legal status almost what amounts to blanket powers of control over what in the end will mean the lives and destiny of the Canadian people. I have listened with considerable interest to the observations that have so far been made in this present debate, and many valuable points have been brought out both in favour of and against the measure. I find that those who seem to be in favour of the measure base much of their argument on the fact that because of certain present circumstances for which we cannot be responsible, it is advisable to grant the government an extension of time in matters of control. On the other hand I think I can say that those who desire to argue against the bill argue on the basis of the principle which is involved, and it is upon that basis that I should like to argue to-day.

It is all very well for those of us of the opposition to be asked: "What would you do if you were in power?" Perhaps that is a reasonable question, but the fact remains that we are not in power. The fact remains that under our parliamentary system we are not members of the government, but members of His Majesty's most loyal opposition. As members of that opposition it is not our duty to say what we would do if we were in power. It is our duty to bring out the weaknesses of His Majesty's loyal government and to seek to peruse and investigate every detail of legislation which His Majesty's government proposes, bring out its weak spots and warning the government and the people of Canada of the dangers we see in it. I believe that is what we are here for. The argument, what did you do under certain circumstances, was made last night. The Conservative party were referred to, and certain legislation which they passed when they were in power was quoted. I am certain that we could refer to the speeches which were made at that time by the present Prime Minister, who was then leader of His Majesty's most loyal opposition. I wonder what he would have said at that time about such legislation as this. Overnight I have not been able to make an analysis of all those speeches; I have not even looked at the index of Hansard to find out where they appear, but I am certain that the present Prime Minister did not attack it as he would if he had been in power. If he opposed the bill he opposed it because he had a duty to perform as leader of His Majesty's opposition.

I should like to discuss the measure on the basis of what I believe to be the principle involved. In the first place I suggest that the government is asking for almost omnipotent power. It is Canada's responsible government which is asking for this power, and I feel impelled to ask, to whom is the government responsible? Is it responsible to big business? Is it responsible to some unseen backstage powers, or is it responsible to the people of Canada? Technically, of course, the answer is that it is responsible to the people of Canada, but in practice it seems to me that it assumes it is responsible to a government which is more responsible than it is, namely, a government of a mighty financial tyranny.

I am going to refer to something that was said the other day. I cannot quote from Hansard because it was during another debate, but I recall that at the time a little argument was going on between someone on this side of the house, the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). They were talking about coal, and the Minister of Labour described the economic cost factors involved in the mining of coal in Canada as compared to the mining of coal in the United States. Then he went on to say that when conditions eventually reached a normal state the price of coal—and I want

hon. members to get this—then would be the determining factor, that it would not matter very much where it came from. To him the question was very complex, and it seemed that he was alarmed because at the very moment he was speaking we could buy coal from West Virginia for much less than we could buy coal from Nova Scotia. Then I recall he made this remark, because I made a little note of it; he said, "That is an alarming situation, and you cannot wish yourself out of a jam like that." He hoped the coal commission would have an answer.

What was the principle involved in that? The principle was that the money system, with its complex construction of cost factors, trade and so forth, was his master; that there was an unseen government inherent in the present financial system which did not leave this government free to do what it wanted to do; that the present monetary system controlled the policy of the government. Now, what am I getting at? I am simply saying that a government which is already controlled now is asking parliament to give it power to operate under a system which is more powerful than it is. As members of the opposition we can take to task a government which has not received power from us; but when we give it the power and it in turn becomes subject to a higher power, where does it leave parliament? To my mind that is the principle involved. There is an unseen power of financial circumstance, and in the past the government have refused to face the physical facts squarely and then apply the remedy. Rather they have listened to the voices of proteges of the big bosses of finance; and because they have listened to those voices they have become grooved, rutted, bogged in the mire of financial circumstances inherent in the imminent breakdown of a faulty financial system.

The principle involved is this: that to make the system work they must have power to apply some force; and under the terminology of controls, shall I say, they are seeking power. Let us not fool ourselves on this. They do not say they want controls; they want power. They want parliament, the representatives of the people, to delegate power to them. The whole scheme abroad, not only here in Canada but throughout the world to-day, is a scheme to force the present financial tyranny to work. Therefore governments need power. What do they want power for? Do they want power to change the present system? I doubt that very much. They want power to fall in line, to keep in step with all other governments under the same financial tyranny; power to make it work, instead of power to change the system. Last evening the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) was talking about nerve. Well, it does not require very much nerve for a clerk in a store to tell his understudies what to do. It does take nerve for that same clerk to say to his boss, "You are wrong; you are stupid; you are a crook, and I am not going to do the thing you want me to do because there is a principle involved." That is the kind of nerve the government should have.

The minister said quite a lot about nerve. Well, during the war I think the government did have some nerve, but it was of a different kind. They had nerve when they put over a plebiscite on this country and then did not put into operation what the country told them to put into operation. That was pretty nervy. It went beyond nerve; it was cheek. They certainly had nerve to fire their minister of national defence and then the next day turn around and do what he had told them to do. That was nervy; it was cheek. I will tell you what the government can do if they want to show their nerve. They can tell their financial advisers, whom I sometimes call intellectual dry-rots, that for once in their terms of office they are going to face the physical facts and change the present system to fit those facts. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that in connection with legislation already passed by parliament and legislation still on the order paper, if we could only take a little peek behind the scenes we would discover that much of it is being passed at the circumstantial dictates of a power much greater than the government who now sit in office.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is nonsense; just twaddle.

Mr. HANSELL: Does the minister say it is just twaddle?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Just twaddle.

Mr. HANSELL: The circumstances prove it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. member cannot prove it.

Mr. HANSELL: And the minister is throwing out a bit of a challenge.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I do challenge the hon. member to prove it.

Mr. HANSELL: We will. There is enough legislation to come down upon which we can show that this is happening. And if it is not so, I shall ask one or two questions. How is it that, with the same government in office, and with production piled sky high in Canada, the government could not distribute production to the people who needed it?

Mr. JOHNSTON: Don't ask that; it is an embarrassing question.

Mr. HANSELL: They could not do it; they were helpless. There must have been some reason why they could not.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And they were stubborn too; they would not listen.

Mr. HANSELL: Perhaps they did not have enough nerve.

Mr. JOHNSTON: They have lots of that.

Mr. HANSELL: Or perhaps there were some financial circumstances which would not permit their doing it. That is what I am talking about, and it is not twaddle. Because, believe me—and I do not talk about this very often—I was one of those who, even in my profession, had to go to the city fathers, bow down on my knees, put my hands together in prayer, and say: "Will you please give me something, so that my little family will not starve?" Yes, sir, I was one who had to do that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And that was in Canada!

Mr. HANSELL: I regard the Minister of Veterans Affairs as a friend of mine, because he has done a lot for me. I do not believe I have ever taken a case to him in which he has not taken the utmost interest. When I have been in his office, discussing cases with him, I have thought sometimes that he must certainly have taken me for a Liberal. Yes, he is a good friend of mine; but I want to tell him that what I have just said is no twaddle, believe me.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Just plain twaddle.

Mr. HANSELL: I had not intended taking up this much time; but the big idea is that the whole move is toward centralizing power in the government in an effort to force the present system to work. If they do not change the system, then all they can do is force the people to obey the system now in use. I believe my logic is sound.

We in this parliament cannot give something away that we have not got. And when the government asks us to give it power, surely we must have the power to give. Once a thing is given away, one has not got it; that is all there is to it. If the government gets the power, then we have not got it—and that is the principle involved in this bill.

The only redeeming feature, as pointed out by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) is that there are certain circumstances which must be faced. The redeeming feature is—if it may be so described—that the government is asking for this power for only one year. Parliament is to meet again in the spring. At that time the government will have the power; we shall not have it. We must remember that. We can only talk then. And at that time the Minister of Veterans Affairs might well look toward us and say, "Twaddle, twaddle!" It will be twaddle then—because they will have the power, and the only power we shall have will be that of hollering our heads off. That is the principle involved, and that is what I oppose. I do not know which way I am going to vote. I suppose I shall have to keep my eye on the leader of this party. And let no hon. member misinterpret what I have said as meaning that the leader of my party has power over me, because he has not. I shall speak with an independent voice. I vote independently, if I wish to.

I do desire to be fair to the government and to all concerned. I am not saying that under the circumstances the government have not done a fairly good job. I am not saying that any other government which might have been in office, facing similar difficulties, would not have had to do the same thing. I am simply saying that a principle is involved. The government are asking for more power. I do believe that by a proper system of parliamentary procedure, of bringing down legislation from time to time, the government could devise some means by which any request for such power would be unnecessary, with the result that the same power would remain inherent in parliament.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. LUDGER DIONNE (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say just a few words to justify my attitude in regard to bill No. 15. Having received letters from many people in my constituency who do not approve this bill, I should like to point out publicly the reasons why I am in favour of it.

Before going any further I admit that I do not like any more than anybody else these orders in council which give or delegate powers to a bureaucracy who are not in any way responsible to the people. On the other hand, everybody will admit that we are facing a situation which has practically no precedent. The present session is getting near its end. We cannot expect the members to stay in continuous session to take care of any emergency which may arise from time to time. So authority of some kind must be delegated to some body to deal with the matter in the absence of the members.

I shall confine my remarks on the bill to its essence or spirit, without going into the details of the sections. At present, as everybody knows, there is such an acute shortage of goods nôt only in this country but all over the world that if there were no controls at all, prices would reach a ceiling never thought of. What would happen then? The poor people would be deprived of the necessities of life. What I have said regarding prices of goods applies as well to wages.

It has been said in this house that this bill No. 15 jeopardizes the rights of the provinces. But if we had to wait for the provinces to take action in the matter and control the situation it would certainly take a long time, during which the people of this country would suffer.

I will admit that drastic legislation such as that outlined in this bill is not agreeable to the people of this country, but action must be taken to protect the people, even if they do not like to be protected. It is the duty of the authorities to do it. When a person has to undergo a surgical operation he does not stop to think whether he likes it or not; it simply has to be done. I consider that the government has to perform a surgical operation presently for the benefit of the people of Canada, and if the government did not take the proper means to do it, it would not be justifying the confidence which the people have put in their representatives.

I would respectfully draw the attention of hon. members of this house to the fact that these remarks of mine are against my own interest. If I had my personal interest in mind I should vote against the bill, because the foreign markets are interested in buying certain goods that are made in Canada, and I could dispose at a premium of the goods which are produced in factories in which I am interested. As a matter of fact I could sell in the United States and South American countries many times the quantity of goods which I manufacture and of which the export is now prohibited. This goes to prove that it is against my own interest to favour legislation such as is outlined in bill No. 15. But I understand that as a member of parliament I must forget my own interest for the benefit of the public at large. That is the reason why I shall vote in favour of bill No. 15.

Before taking my seat I am proud to pay a tribute of admiration to the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) for acting in such a virile manner in presenting this bill under such adverse circumstances.

Mr. FRÉDÉRIC DORION (Charlevoix-Saguenay) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, it is certainly unfortunate that the government should have waited until the last days of the session to introduce this most important bill, the passing of which may entail very grave consequences from a constitutional standpoint. Now that we have to sit from eleven o'clock in the morning to eleven in the evening, besides having to attend committee sittings, it is obvious that we cannot devote to the study of this measure all the attention which its importance demands. It will perhaps be said that the bill has been on the order paper for a long time, but everyone knows what that means, since it has been decided that consideration of some measures which had been put on the order paper would be left until other sessions. A bill can only be discussed when it has been introduced in the house.

At all events, I do not intend to prolong this debate too much and I shall endeavour to be as brief as possible in the few remarks I have to make. Besides, I believe that the speeches delivered by the hon. members for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett), for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond) for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon) and for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) have covered the various aspects of the problem we have to solve.

I have also listened with deep interest to the speech delivered by the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage). Of course, I cannot agree with most of what he said, but he has also made a particular remark which has my entire support, and I think it is proper that I should quote it. The hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet said, as reported on page 2919 of Hansard.

> I do not feel that the people of my constituency gave me a mandate merely to pass that mandate over to the government.

I am in perfect agreement with the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet on that point. When I had the honour of being elected to represent the electors of Charlevoix-Saguenay, it was certainly not for the purpose of handing over to the governor in council all the powers devolved on the government of this country.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that the matter which is now before us is most important. It is important because it affects the very basis of the confederation pact. Indeed, I think I am justified in adding that in the past, when differences arose between the provincial authorities and the dominion government, it was almost in every instance upon the interpretation of sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act. Now, this bill involves those two sections; in other words, it is intended to transfer within the powers of the dominion parliament certain provincial rights and powers defined in section 92 of the B.N.A. Act. Hence, I contend that the matter is very important, I repeat, it may have far-reaching and altogether disastrous consequences. Instead of bombastic speeches of the type made last night by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), I should have preferred sounder and more weighty arguments in support of the government's point of view. Among the few principles set forth by the Minister of Agriculture, one of them stood out more prominently than the others; I refer to his quotation of a business man's opinion on the matter. At this point, Mr. Speaker, let me state the viewpoint of Mr. Burton, President of the Robert Simpson Company of Toronto, another business man well known all over the country. According to Le Devoir of October 12, 1945, Mr. Burton said, in relation to bill No. 15:

At present, Ottawa is devising the collapse of reconversion, and Canada's future is at stake. Bill 15 sets forth emergency powers more extensive than those vested in cabinet during the war.

Controls, instead of being curtailed, are extended to new fields. Now that hostilities are over, the privileges sought in the bill are no longer necessary; in fact, they would entail a severe menace. The act is to continue in force for a period of twelve months, but this type of legislation is usually renewed from year to year.

Civil liberties and property rights are imperlilled, and if bill 15 is passed, the provinces will be stripped of their constitutional prerogatives. The freedom of every Canadian citizen is thus affected.

I have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that if the matter discussed in the house for the past couple of days had been thrashed out before a fair-minded court, the arguments submitted by the hon. members for Stanstead and Beauharnois-Laprairie would have won hands down over those set forth by the hon. members sitting on the right.

Personally, I wish to point out only a few specific features of the bill now before us. Incidentally, if in so doing I have the good fortune to reflect the opinion of the electorate in the constituency of Charlevoix-Saguenay, well and good; some people may claim that I am making an election speech, but that is irrelevant, for I shall have the satisfaction of knowing that I have done my duty. Therefore, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that national unity is endangered by this bill.

Mr. DORION: Not that some menace with which we are usually threatened when we claim for example, as we did in the past in the house or elsewhere, the rights of an ethnical entity of this country when they are usurped by the other entity. I say that such is not the menace with which we are threatened at present, but the present menace may be more dangerous because it attacks the Canadian confederation in its very foundation. We are threatened with a conflict between provincial autonomy and the federal government. In order to mitigate the consequences of the bill, it is often said and contended that it is but a transitional measure which would grant powers to the governor in council for a period of one year only. This is not accurate. If one examines section 6 of the new bill he finds that the powers granted to the governor in council will extend until next session; it is therefore evident, from the text of the bill itself, that the said powers are given to the governor in council for more than a year, at least for one year and three or four months. But how long the bill remains in effect is not important. The situation would still be the same were the powers granted to the governor in council for a few months only. A principle is involved and not a question of time. I submit that it is exclusively a matter of principle and it is in that light that we should look at the bill which is now before us. On the other hand, the principle, the basis of that bill has been the subject of earlier discussions in the house. For instance, this happened during a debate when, during the second special session of 1930, the Bennett government having just attained power, a session was called in order to authorize the governor in council to spend $20,000,000 to ward off the disastrous results of unemployment which prevailed at that time. If I refer to the House of Commons Debates for the special session of 1930, I find certain statements which I believe should be remembered during the present debate. For instance, on page 178 I note the following statement:

Last night in speaking to the resolution on which this bill is based he said that we had no right to ignore the needs of suffering humanity. May I tell him in a spirit of absolute sincerity and humility that there are many of us on this side of the house who through birth and struggle have probably a better appreciation of the struggles of the labouring people of Canada. Let me tell him that he has no right to assume that because we are here protecting the fundamental rights and privileges of parliament he has any monopoly of sympathy with the sufferings of humanity.

Those words were uttered by the hon. Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) during the special session of 1930.

Further on, the hon. minister stated:

The leader of the government knows as well as anyone in this house that the struggle for responsible government in England since the days of Edward I has been the struggle on the part of the people's representatives to secure full and final control over every cent of money expended. Further, the hon. gentleman knows quite well that as a result of the constitutional struggle of 1910 in the old land the final financial control of the House of Commons was completely established. The same principle holds in Canada.

As reported on page 258 of Hansard of that same 1930 session, he went on:

My plea to the house is this: Leave the authority to parliament. Having been sent here by the Canadian people, we have obligations and responsibilities to them. It does not matter much which party claims our allegiance; the people who sent us here have placed certain obligations upon our shoulders. So far as I am concerned, therefore, not even to protect any industry in the country, not even the fruit industry of British Columbia, shall I stand for the infringement of the rights of parliament and for delegating to any cabinet, even the almighty, all-powerful Conservative government, the power which belongs to parliament.

To me this is not so much Tory legislation as it is Soviet control in the Dominion of Canada. I hope hon. gentlemen opposite will not add to the poverty of their argument the intolerance of interruption. Let me assure them that I stand for the fundamental rights of parliament as established through centuries of struggle in the old land, and I suggest to the Minister of National Revenue that if he will consult the debates engaged in by the fathers of confederation when they were building up the fabric of our Canadian constitution he will not find any delegation by them to the executive council of parliament's right to supreme control over the system of taxation in this country. For these reasons, I agree with the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Stewart) that section 4 is absolutely vicious and iniquitous in principle, and I object, therefore, to the legislation before the house inasmuch as it deprives parliament of its fundamental rights.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

An hon. MEMBER: Amen!

Mr. DORION: Those are the words uttered in 1930 by the hon. gentleman who is now Minister of Veterans Affairs. Further, in considering the many vicissitudes which befell this much talked about bill No. 15, I find that there may have been a recollection of those past statements of policy. Indeed, if the events which preceded this bill are looked into, it is noted that it was submitted with some hesitation even in its second form. In fact, the first inkling that such a bill would be introduced was contained in the speech from the throne when His Excellency the Governor General said:

You will be asked to approve a measure to extend certain specified emergency powers to meet emergency conditions in the period of reconstruction.

Mr. Speaker, I wonder what happened since the day on which the speech from the throne was read by the governor general, a speech in which the bill now before the house for granting the government certain powers was announced? What could have happened between this day and the 23rd of November when bill No. 15 was introduced in the House of Commons?

The speech from the throne was prepared by the cabinet, for we all know that this body is always called to pass upon this document before it is read. It is probable that, after having learned that the government intend to request certain limited powers, these gentlemen we call bureaucrats and controllers objected to it. Indeed if the government had introduced a bill as was forecast in the speech from the throne it would have meant that these gentlemen would have been deprived of the dictatorial powers they have enjoyed for too long. I do not doubt that in the interval between the reading of the speech from the throne and the introduction of bill No. 15, representations were made by the controllers and other powers such as the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) mentioned this morning, to ensure that the measure would be properly amended.

At all events, I claim that explanations should be given to the house concerning the change of policy, on the part of the Canadian government, which occurred between the reading of the speech from the throne and the introduction of bill No. 15 in this house. In any case, on November 23, the first draft of bill No. 15 was submitted to us and we all were surprised to notice that, after a brief discussion, the debate was suddenly adjourned. During the following week, the measure which had been presented to the house was submitted to the prime ministers then gathered here, in Ottawa, for a federal-provincial conference.

We evidently do not know what happened at this interprovincial conference when bill No. 15 was submitted to the gathering of prime ministers from the various provinces. However, we may surmise from what the Prime Minister had to say, on December 3, that, evidently, the members of this conference objected strenuously to the measure. I quote the words of the Prime Minister on that day, as reported in Hansard:

My hon. friend has referred to certain important amendments which have been considered and which the minister will be prepared to propose when the bill comes before the house in committee. During the sittings of the coordination committee of the dominion-provincial conference some of the provisions of the bill were under discussion. There were certain objections by some of the premiers to powers that were being requested under the bill. The government undertook to consider the objections that were raised. That has been done, and important amendments have been drafted which we believe and expect will help to meet the objections that have been raised, and incidentally help to meet objections that otherwise might have been raised by hon. gentlemen opposite.

By way of digression, may I say, Mr. Speaker, that in his statement the right honourable the prime minister perhaps said too much, but certainly did not say enough. He mentioned the objection raised by a few prime ministers. Now, inasmuch as the matter has been referred to the prime ministers of the nine provinces of the dominion and since it was the right honourable the prime minister himself who gave that information to the house of commons, we should, I think, have a right to know who are the prime ministers who raised objections and who are those, if any, who agreed to bill No. 15 in its original form. Is it fair that only the right honourable the prime minister and the provincial prime ministers should have that information? Did the prime minister of Nova Scotia accept the bill? Did the premier of Ontario accept it? Did the prime minister of Quebec accept it?

Mr. LANGLOIS: Ask your leader.

An hon. MEMBER: Your leader does not want to say anything about that.

Mr. DORION: It was the right honourable the prime minister of this country who brought the matter up in the house and we have a right to ask him to enlarge upon that statement and to tell us, in all fairness, who were those, among the prime ministers attending the dominion-provincial conference, who approved the bill and who are those who opposed it. A few days ago, we heard that the prime ministers had returned home on Thursday or Friday of last week. Three days after the conference had ended, that is on Monday, the government introduced the new bill No. 15, which had been revamped and was called a transitory bill.

Now, one question first comes to mind. Since the dominion government decided in the first place to submit this bill for the consideration of the provincial prime ministers at the dominion-provincial conference, we are now entitled to know whether the new bill No. 15 has been submitted to the same prime ministers and whether it has been approved or opposed by them. Parliament did not ask the provincial prime ministers to consider bill No. 15; the government decided to bring it up during that dominion-provincial conference. If the new bill has been submitted to them, we are entitled to know whether the same prime ministers have approved or opposed it.

As regards the new bill, Mr. Speaker, I must say, in passing, that I wish to abide by the ruling you gave yesterday, when my colleague the hon. member for Chicoutimi had the floor, and I am willing to admit that the measure now before the house is the original bill and not the reprinted one.

The statement was made Monday by the Prime Minister, that the government takes upon itself to submit to the house a recast piece of legislation. According to the declarations made last night by the Minister of Agriculture, I think we should, in order to gain a fuller understanding of the whole matter, take it for granted that the first bill as well as the amended version are now submitted for our consideration. If I look into it—

Mr. SPEAKER: I must advise the hon. member that if I allowed the Minister of Agriculture and an hon. member seated on the left to quote from the bill as reprinted, it was merely that the preamble might be discussed, since other hon. members had already quoted it in the house. I would therefore beg the hon. member not to refer to the sections of the bill as reprinted.

Mr. DORION: Obviously, Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to comply with your wishes. I will confine myself to the Prime Minister's statement which I quoted a short while ago. I should like to say that the bill as amended, which was submitted to the house afer the Prime Minister said that he had agreed to incorporate certain changes at the request of the provincial premiers, is, in some of its features, even worse than the first draft.

In fact, if we examine bill 15, I think I am justified in saying that it has a dual purpose. The first seeks to grant the governor in council, through parliament, powers which, under section 92 of the British North America Act, belong by right to the provincial legislatures. The second asks parliament to abdicate all control it may be entitled to exercise over the affairs of the country and to vest these rights in the governor in council.

The powers of the first category were clearly set forth recently by the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) when he introduced the bill to the house. The following excerpt is quoted from page 2452 of Hansard:

> One of the important questions for the consideration of the house is this question of fact: Is it or is it not true that some matters normally of provincial jurisdiction have aspects at this time which are other than their normal aspects as dealt with in the subsections of section 92 of the British North America Act?

And a bit further on:

> Are we still in a condition of national emergency such as to affect the distribution of legislative powers between the dominion and the provinces, and, as a practical proposition, such as to affect what should be the distribution of legislative functions as between parliament and the governor in council?

Well, these are the very questions to which the members of the government have not replied satisfactorily. In fact, the Minister of Justice quoted in support of his argument a ruling made by the Privy Council when the case of The Manitoba Free Press Company was referred to it; this ruling, as reported in a speech by the Minister of Justice, appearing in Hansard of November 23, states the following:

> Where an exact line of demarcation will lie in such cases it may not be easy to lay down a priori, nor is it necessary. For in the solution of the problem regard must be had to the broadened field covered, in case of exceptional necessity, by the language of section 91, in which the interests of the dominion generally are protected.

Therefore, it is apparent in the ruling quoted by the Minister of Justice that only in case of exceptional necessity, may we strip the provinces of the rights conferred upon them under section 92 of the B.N.A. Act.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that no weighty arguments and no sound proofs have been given in support of the contention that these really exceptional needs do exist. The bill in its present form, as introduced in the house, should have been first submitted to the provincial governments, for, at a time when the federal authorities are seeking the cooperation of all provincial legislatures in its attempt to reorganize our economic system, if parliament passes legislations on matters of such vital interest to the provinces as those contemplated in the present bill, the procedure adopted in this instance is a lack of confidence and, I might say, an insult to them, and this is not the proper way to promote cooperation on the part of the provincial bodies. Therefore, as a matter of justice, and in the interest of negotiations which are to be pursued between the federal and provincial governments, I claim that, as the federal authorities wish to be successful in implementing the policy they have expounded, it is necessary and appropriate for them to submit such projected measures to the provincial governments.

As to the assignment of powers we are requested to approve, it is purely a surrender of our control over certain matters into the hands of the governor in council.

I say that in the present circumstances we have no right to do so. I contend that it has not been satisfactorily proven to us that we have the right to grant to the governor in council the powers requested by bill No. 15. And, as a consequence of this claim, I say that if this bill is passed by Parliament, the law will be ultra vires and may be annulled at any time by courts of justice. Should a dispute arise as a result of this measure, I say that we may well see a repetition of what happened in 1935 and 1936 when several laws enacted by the Bennett government in 1934 and 1935 were set aside by the Privy Council.

It has been repeated time and again during the present debate, that we must admit in spite of all that there is a great necessity of maintaining certain controls and certain regulations passed under the War Measures Act.

I do not say, Mr. Speaker, that the whole structure set up in the past few years through orders in council and measures of all kinds should be demolished at a single blow, but I say that there are constitutional means of remedying this situation. If we had asked the provincial premiers last week to legislate on matters within their jurisdiction in order to maintain certain controls, I believe, if I judge from the atmosphere which prevailed at that conference, that we would have been supported by all the provincial premiers who would have agreed to legislate in the special cases within their own jurisdiction.

As for the second category of powers which I mentioned a while ago, if we had been called upon during the present session to approve definite and specific legislation dealing with the continuation of certain controls and regulations during the reconversion period, I am almost sure that no objections would have been raised in the house, because nearly everyone recognizes that some of the present controls should be maintained.

(Text).

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I should like to sum up my remarks as follows: My contention is that the bearing of this bill is twofold, or should I say that there are two categories of powers provided in this bill. First, the government is asking for authority to deal with matters pertaining to provincial powers. Second, the government is asking parliament to authorize it to make legislation by orders in council.

As regards the first category, now that we know the government has thought fit to submit to the provincial premiers the project of this bill, we ought to know if this new bill No. 15, as reprinted, meets with the approval of the premiers. The government should give us the evidence that the premiers of the provinces have agreed to this new bill; otherwise, in all fairness and equity, and I may say, in all decency, the proposed amendments should not be presented.

As regards the second category of powers, my contention is that this parliament does not possess the right to authorize the government to govern this country by orders in council. I believe this bill, should it become law, would be ultra vires of the powers of this parliament, and I do not hesitate to state that in a judicial case emanating from this law, our courts would come to the conclusion that it is ultra vires and illegal. One may reply that, even if we admit this point of view, we must also be aware of the fact that some of the measures adopted under the War Measures Act cannot easily be rescinded immediately I am ready to agree to that, but I suggest that this bill is not at all a proper remedy for this situation. What the government should do would be to ask the provincial governments to pass the necessary legislation dealing with the problems pertaining to their constitutional authority; and from what we were told about the interprovincial conference I believe the premiers would be willing to accept this suggestion.

As regards the first category of powers already mentioned, I would suggest that the government submit to parliament special and precise legislation which would cover the needs of the present period, but nothing else. Therefor, my contention is not only that this bill is ultra vires, but that we do not need it; and there is only one way out, which is by way of the following amendment. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Chicoutimi:

That in the motion now before the house the word "now" be left out and the words "this day six months" added at the end of the question.

Mr. GEORGES H. HEON (Argenteuil) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, as the majority of the hon. members do not speak French, I shall speak in English.

(Text).

Victory over the enemies of freedom having been won by our people, Mr. Speaker, at an untold price in lives and sacrifices of all kinds, every Canadian worthy of the name has become tremendously interested in the preservation of his political liberties and the democratic processes of government which he has come to cherish so dearly. The average Canadian believes, rightly or wrongly, that the institutions he fought for and for which his sons died will cope with the problems arising out of this complete but costly victory; and he has faith in his elected representatives, feeling that the difficulties arising within the immediate post-war period will be settled to his satisfaction, according to his conception of responsible government. Even to superficial thinkers it must appear abundantly clear that this parliament is faced with vast and complicated problems, weighty and huge, growing in immensity as new conditions arise. The bill before this house transcends party interests and immediate political advantage, and I for one would not care to consider this bill in the light of political colour. This bill, more than any other measure brought before this house during the present session, (including the flag question on which we could not even agree in principle) shows fully the varying trends of thought in this country, the difficulty of interpreting our constitution in time of war or economic stress, and how very finely balanced is our confederation. All of us here are sworn to serve the best interests of our country, and only those of bad faith would dare question the sincerity of their fellow members. We are all seeking to attain the same end, a united, prosperous, sovereign Canada; yet each of us may in all good faith differ from his fellow members as to the means of attaining that end.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am not at all scandalized by the speeches which have been made on this bill, whether they came from my personal friend, the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon); whether they came from the batonnier general of the Quebec bar, the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett), with whose speech I entirely agree; whether they came from the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Raymond), who offered a very strong indictment against the bill; whether they came from the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Dionne), whom I had to persuade all morning to make his maiden speech in this house, or whether they came from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) who, as "the old reliable", made a laudable effort to try and convince this house that this country has a good government. All these speeches show that we are breathing freedom, that we are living and working toward democracy. Ever since Lord Durham's report there has been a conflict of political thought in Canada; yet our country has prospered and developed almost progressively with this conflict of thought. Personally, and I say this with all due respect, I attach as much importance to the speeches and gestures made by Papineau and the grandfather of the present Prime Minister as I would attach to those of Sir John Colborne and his lieutenants. Their actions might have been diametrically opposed, yet they were directed toward the same end; and to those factions we owe the responsible government we are enjoying to-day.

Our struggle for responsible government has been long, arduous and costly. This bill is just another measure which literally throws back into the laps of legislators the responsibility of maintaining responsible government.

Shall we have economic control or shall we have economic freedom? That is the question. To all true lovers of liberty, urgent as this bill might appear to be, the underlying principle is repugnant, if I may use that word. Those who have sacrificed loved ones on the altar of liberty in the hope that the price paid would not be too high, attach great importance to that one attribute which establishes the difference between democracy and dictatorship, between free men and chained men. To those of us who worship at freedom's altar this bill is a dark and overwhelming question mark. Yet we must face hard facts, Mr. Speaker. Our economy is dangerously unbalanced. We have switched from agriculture to industry as a major occupation, and all our old theories as to supply and demand, freedom of enterprise and endeavour, have gone by the board. Let us admit it. Our participation in this war has given our economic skeleton, if I may use that expression, a terrific shock from which we may not soon recover. This house now is being asked to sanction a measure conferring upon the governor-in-council transitional powers during the national emergency arising out of the war. We are not told by what yardstick the transition will be measured, nor are we informed of the scope and extent of the emergency. If we were asked to sanction specific controls, fully described and demonstrated, I think it would be easier for all of us to accept the measure.

Unfortunately this bill is uncertain in its portent, like many other bills which have been presented during the present session. No one in his senses will deny the necessity of certain controls, but every disciple of freedom will challenge an unlimited mandate to the governor-in-council to legislate without consulting in advance the elected representatives of the people. If we are, and we are, a government of the people for the people, we cannot for any reason, however weighty it may appear, surrender our vested powers to any other authority, however respected it may be. This is a time as never before to reestablish the supremacy of parliament over an irresponsible bureaucracy which this war inevitably created and which the might of our war effort may have justified. I want to be fair about that. The more this parliament surrenders its powers to a bureaucracy which is not responsible to the people, the more this parliament will lose the respect of those same people. After all, it was not the bureaucracy which stood the last general election; it was all of us here. The old civil service did more than its share during the war, without any additional wages. It is that new bureaucracy which came in to win the war at any price that we should guard against.

Edmund Burke, that great English parliamentarian, speaking on conciliation with America, made this statement which I would ask hon. members to bear in mind:

> As long as you have the wisdom to keep sovereign authority of this country as the sanctuary of liberty, the sacred temple consecrated to our common faith, wherever our chosen race and sons of our country worship freedom, they will turn their faces toward you . . . Deny them this participation of freedom and you break that sole bond which originally made and must still preserve the unity of our empire. It is the spirit of the English constitution which, infused through the mighty mass, feeds, unites, invigorates, vivifies every part of the empire, even down to the minutest member.

Another delicate question, Mr. Speaker, is involved in this bill, namely the conflict of federal and provincial powers. I know of no province more willing than my own to cooperate with the federal authorities. Yet, because of its racial, linguistic, economic, geographic, social and even sentimental peculiarities, the province of Quebec is justifiably jealous of its autonomy and justifiably worried as to the loss of its essential powers. On this subject I want to state further that the influential and much respected English-speaking minority in my province has expressed itself as sharing the same views, since it feels that well enough should be left alone.

May I give a word of warning to the house? Broken friendships must not lie ahead if we are to become more united; and no province or group must look hopelessly to the future feeling that it has been betrayed. Controls have weighed very heavily upon our people, and I want to accentuate that there is a general desire that these controls should disappear, unless urgency demands that they be maintained. On the principle that the preamble to this bill, instead of extending the freedom which has been promised ever since war was declared, further strangulates that same freedom, I cannot accept it. But I wish to make this reservation: I shall gladly, however, vote for any specific measure of control, if its necessity is demonstrated.

These are my last words: Canadians were not born to be controlled. Our forefathers came to this country because they were searching for freedom. Our fathers fought to maintain freedom, and our own kith and kin fought in this war to save it. I am prepared to go on record as stating that I still prefer to rely upon the qualities of recovery inherent in all true Canadians rather than upon a state-controlled economy conceived and directed by irresponsible bureaucrats. And, Mr. Speaker, I would be prepared to go to the polls tomorrow on that sole issue.

Mr. FRED ROSE (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I believe this debate could have been shorter. Basically there is very little in the bill to which objection could be taken.

One has to have a thick skin to listen to all of the pleas for democracy and all the condemnations against dictatorships coming from people who, when war came along, opposed any idea of control of profits, while calling for all sorts of control of labour and wages. These same people, when it comes to the problem of tariffs and protection, are willing to have all sorts of government interference so that they may have sufficient profits. However in a matter which affects all the people, all of a sudden they become great defenders of democracy, as they understand it.

At present we are in a state of emergency so far as the problems of peace are concerned. There are many difficult problems, and hon. members in all quarters of the house—I have heard it from the start to the finish in various speeches from hon. members—realize that there is a peace emergency, a problem of finding jobs for people, a problem of creating work, a problem of making sure that there will be houses for the people, a problem of controlling prices and of wages.

I am sure hon. members who are opposed to this measure would gladly have a control of wages, but they would not like the control of prices—that is, they would agree to some controls, but not to others. I hold in my hand a letter which seems best to express the reason why there is so much opposition to this measure. This letter was received this morning from La Ligue des Propriétaires de Montréal —the league of proprietors of Montreal—and is as follows:

> Bill 15, as amended, is now before the house. We earnestly beg that a clause be inserted in the bill providing that property owners be restored the rights to which they are entitled and which were suspended during the war, in order that their property may afford them more profitable earnings.

In a few words this letter tells us that we must see to it that the bill contains a section guaranteeing proprietors greater income. That is, it must do away with rental control and the freezing of leases, so that they may throw people out when they want to. All this despite the fact that there is a shortage of houses in Montreal. But this is what they want to have done so they may raise rents a little higher. And let me assure hon. members that, despite rental controls, rents are high in Montreal. Someone told me recently that as much as $60 for a furnished room has been asked in that city. Without controls they would ask a rental of $100 or $150. They are very much interested in freedom, as they understand it—a freedom to fleece people, and take their last penny away from them.

I realize there have been abuses, and many of them. Small business men have come to me and told me that they could not get cloth, when the big business outfits had cloth. Used car dealers have told me that they were told they would have to close their yards in which they were selling second-hand cars, because they did not have shops to carry out repairs. Substandard wages have been frozen. No doubt there have been many other abuses. But basically we must agree that some measures are necessary at the present time.

Let no one dare to raise the constitutional problem. That problem has been raised again and again against the interests of the Canadian people. Some say, "Oh, you must not overstep the provincial rights of the provinces." What do they mean? They mean just this: "Leave us alone and we will handle problems in the interests of a few wealthy people." Every time the federal government wishes to do something, those people in the provinces take this stand: "We will soon block them by the holler of provincial rights and constitutional rights." We hear lots of that in Quebec. I know that the premier of our province is one of the loudest in those statements. He has also told the proprietors at their conferences that he is opposed to all controls, and believes they should be able to charge all sorts of rates. That is what they have in mind. It is property rights in which they are interested—not the rights of the people. When they raise the cry of constitutional rights it is because they are thinking of the few, not of the people. In that spirit, Mr. Speaker, I support the bill and urge other members to support it.

Mr. PARK MANROSS (London): Mr. Speaker, it is a little unexpected that I should be taking part in this debate on bill No. 15 because I saw by this morning's paper that bill No. 15 is virtually dead, but as the house is still debating it I shall join in the post mortem.

Bill No. 15 has been discussed by a great many members, especially members of the legal profession. One hon. member said yesterday that this bill controlled everything except going to church. He missed one thing. It does not take over control of the law business in Canada. It may be because the bill was drafted by a lawyer; I do not know.

But I think that those of us who are laymen, not legally-minded, should examine the bill from a layman's standpoint, because as you know, Mr. Speaker, the legal profession probably has the lowest batting average of any profession, for half of its members lose their cases.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): But this half is absolutely right.

Mr. MANROSS: This bill is to endorse and continue the wartime controls and government by order in council. To that we take strong exception. We admit that controllerships were necessary during the war, but undoubtedly they provoked a lot of animosity, and they will provoke more if continued in peace time. I have been thinking about a controllership right in this house. I moved down to this seat from the back row because there were three shadows on my desk and I could hardly see a thing. I saw the whip, the controller of lighting, and the Sergeant at Arms. I think we need a "shadow" controller to fix it up. However, with all the discomforts of my seat it is not nearly as uncomfortable as the seats of hon. members will be who vote in favour of this bill.

The house has discussed controllerships at length, and I shall not take up much time on that. We have discussed housing, which is run by boards and bureaucrats. Somebody had the idea that the veterans should be put on an acre of land instead of becoming city citizens and being assimilated in the general citizenship of Canada, and so they bought a lot of farms and established soldier settlements. That all comes from having too many controllers, each one trying to run his own department.

I do not necessarily represent any party in speaking about controllers. The people I am thinking of are the people of Canada, the business men, the farmers, the labouring men. There is no use telling the Canadian working man that he is better off than the Russian or Australian or British worker, because the Canadian working man wants to be better off than the Canadian working man. More power to him! He wants his own lot to be better. It cannot be better under a bill of this kind, because on whatever other subject you may legislate you cannot legislate human nature, and this bill diametrically opposes human nature because it kills incentive and initiative. "Controllers" remind me of the lighthouse-keeper on the coast who had been keeping the light for thirty years, with the fog horn sounding every two minutes. He woke up in the middle of the night when the fog horn had suddenly stopped sounding, and said, "What was that?" Some of these controllers do not know that the guns have stopped firing; they do not know that the war is over; they do not know that these temporary buildings are not permanent buildings.

My objection to a bill of this kind is that it lends itself to creating more bureaucrats, more boards and more controls. Not long ago the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. McCubbin) said, at page 913 of Hansard:

As I have said, I have always felt that we have too many boards.

He went on to say:

I hope they go forward with the legislation that is on the statute books and not appoint a lot of boards.

But on that occasion he was talking against somebody else's resolution. Under bill No. 15 we are bound to have more boards and more controllers.

It is an old story that governments make their worst mistakes when they assume infallibility on their own part, or assume a lack of interest or ability on the part of the public, and endeavour to reduce parliament to impotency. Nothing is more important than to recognize our form of government and that the representatives of the people shall understand that a responsibility rests upon them to protect not only the rights and liberties of the people, but the institutions of sound representative government that have been slowly and painfully worked out over the years.

Another thing that this bill does through establishing bureaux and controllers and boards is to absorb too large a share of manpower working for the government. That takes more taxes from the people to keep this thing going, and the people could spend that money themselves much more wisely than in paying taxes for boards and controllers. Of course, I know that these orders in council lend themselves to schemes that appeal to certain groups, which if submitted to the people themselves would be quickly turned down.

We have discussed in this house collective bargaining and union security when speaking of the rights of labour. That is all right. But how about collective bargaining with the provinces? The provinces met with the dominion government last week, and the provinces have certain rights which they quite properly feel should be respected. This bill I understand has been amended because of representations that were made by the provinces, but still the bill now before us seems to contain nearly everything objectionable that was in the original bill. The hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Jaenicke) said that he was going to support the principle of the bill but would offer some amendments later. If you were going to build a house you would not build the house and then decide that you wanted the kitchen on the other end. You would make your changes in the blueprint. This bill is in the blueprint stage. Then why not amend it and bring it in right? Why bring it before the committee of the whole to have the amendments made there? There are a lot of people in the government service who could draft a simple bill to cover what is required.

You have to use your imagination as a layman. I have no personal hates. If you spend ten hours of your life on personal hates you would be much better off dying ten hours sooner. I used my imagination on this bill when it was introduced last week. I can visualize things just by thinking a little, and it seemed to me that the minister came in carrying a bouncing baby. He mentioned bread and milk and butter. In other words the baby needed bread, milk and butter. And to get bread, milk and butter for the baby we are to have all these boards and controls continued. That was carrying the baby on a political platform and asking the people to vote for it.

The Social Credit party have spoken on this bill and stated that the government was asking parliament to set aside the constitution and to continue controllers and boards. Everybody took the same attitude on the original bill, so naturally when I came back from Montreal yesterday I expected to find a short one-page bill before the house. However, I did not find it. I agree also with the thought expressed not very long ago by the minister who introduced this bill. He is a gentleman whom we all like and for whose ideas we have a good deal of respect. He was talking about another resolution, and he said something to this effect: To pass this resolution in the terms in which it is drawn would be an abdication of the rights and privileges of this house. He was speaking of some other measure, but I agree with what he said, because we should preserve the rights of this house, and this bill No. 15 is a complete abdication of those rights. To me it looks as though you are just selling out our freedom, and I agree with what was said by an hon. member sitting to my left, that the principle of the thing was to give the government the power, and from then on we would not have any power ourselves. It is too much power to put in the hands of a few.

I have not the least idea, Mr. Speaker, that these ministers would exert all these powers, or take advantage of them; but why give the power to them?—because anything can happen to people. These ministers might go out in a bus and fall in the river and get drowned. That is not wishful thinking. Anything can happen. Someone else might crawl in and get their power; someone else, regardless of what party he belonged to, might succeed to the throne or the power behind the throne and take advantage of this act. I do not think we should resign all our power, to be used, perhaps by undiscriminating people; and it must be remembered that politicians and governments are not permanent. I might drop over myself. Don't get optimistic; I feel fine. Surely, if this parliament is to have 245 members, that is not too many in whom to vest the power of parliament, because that conversely is equal representation of the people of Canada, and hon. members on our side and on the other side can judge as to what are necessary controls, and do so just as well as the government. We do not need to put all these controls in the hands of the cabinet.

This parliament represents the people. There are only 245 of us, of whom half are usually here, but that is none too many to have charge of these things. The faster we get rid of these controls, or determine that we shall get rid of these various boards and controls, the sooner we can proceed with reconversion. I do not agree with the government that reconversion cannot take place until 1948. I think we should resolve that we shall be reconverted next year. We might not make it, but let us try it. Not long ago a minister told us that the reason the 1948 figures were selected was that that was thought to be the first year in which we could safely estimate that there would be full conversion from war to peace. If you make the date 1948 you will probably reach your objective by 1950, because they cannot keep up to schedule. The war is over, and I think it is time to pass a little more authority and freedom back to the provinces, the municipalities, and the public.

We have been fighting a war many years. Nothing matters in war; human privileges are discarded in face of the enemy; you have to spearhead the attack by asking, by pleading, by forcing people to go one way, to do the job and carry on the fight. But now the enemy is beaten, and it behooves us to look at the people behind us. What do they expect? Why did they send us down here? What do they want? Do they want to be controlled continually as they were during the war? Do they want to be "run", to be told where to go, what to do, what they can have and what they cannot have; or do they want to return to some semblance of the democratic freedom they had before the war? To get the answer to those questions one has only to turn to those who had boys overseas who fought and died, and to those who, having come back, expect to return to a free Canada.

It seems to me that the government's function now is to unfetter the individual, to let him go to work and use his initiative, and he will do something.

I am not trying to condemn anybody particularly in connection with this bill, but I believe this is a time when all parties and all hon. members should be united for once. So far this session, it seems to me, the only thing on which we have been united is being disunited. That may be an Irishman's way of putting it. Here is something on which we all agree in our hearts; I am sure we do. What do our people want? They want to return to civil life and get on with their jobs. Well, jobs are not created by boards, except jobs for the controllers; they come from ideas. What is an idea? Well, I was concerned with one myself not so very long ago, when the electric refrigerator was a new idea. In 1920 I stood in the Toronto exhibition, and people looked at the exhibit and laughed at me and said, "It makes ice!" I was associated with the pioneers of the industry. They had to go to it and find money and help, build a factory and launch a business. It was a new idea, a new venture, but 860 of us had employment in that industry during the depression, when other fellows were out because they did not have ideas.

Now there are new industries coming along. I know of one United States corporation whose representatives came over to the London district about a month ago and looked over some property; they went to Ottawa, and examined the tax structure and the possibility of getting standard profits under the existing controls, and then gave up the idea of putting up a factory in Canada. I do not think this bill encourages industry, and I would say to my hon. friend to my left who took me to task one night that I do not mean the kind of industry which exploits labour.

An hon. C.C.F. MEMBER: There is no other.

Mr. MANROSS: The hon. member and those who think as he does should let the workmen of Canada know that jobs cannot be created under a government-controlled plan, because government control kills all incentive and creative desires. We must get rid of war-time control and dictatorship, which I admit is necessary during war. The working men do not mind making more gadgets in eight hours than they ever made before if they receive more for eight hours' work, because this enables them to get more out of life.

I do not say that we should take off every control to-morrow morning. I agree that we should continue a measure of price control, which means prices of services or goods, rationing of goods in short supply, and foreign exchange, but I do not think we should let it go beyond the point where it checks inflation and ensures a fair distribution of scarce goods. Parliament itself is just as well able to handle these controls as any board or cabinet. Incidentally the sooner we get back to sane thinking on these controls the better off we shall be.

I was inclined to be against this beautification scheme for Ottawa when I heard about it, but if Doctor Greber will go ahead and take down these temporary buildings as the first part of his job, and so get rid of would-be permanent guests, I should be more in favour of the scheme. I was down in Washington on one occasion for three days with a gentleman who was connected with the Department of Munitions and Supply. The morning we got there a headline appeared in the paper, "President Roosevelt asks parasites to leave Washington." We did not know he saw us come in. I am not implying that these guests in the temporary buildings are parasites at all; they have worked hard, and done a grand job, but the longer you leave them there the less they will be needed, because their work is going to run out; so let us not encourage them to remain too long.

I am not necessarily speaking for my party, and I try to be non-political in my thinking. I have said that I have an imagination, and as I look down at my desk I seem to see my riding; I see London with its approximately 100,000 people. I do not represent the Progressive-Conservatives alone—at least I do not feel that I do. It is my job to come here as the representative of the constituency. I represent all parties, the voters and the non-voters, the women and the children. They want what they believe in and what they fought for—freedom to choose and freedom to live their lives, and I think we should make every effort—for all ridings are the same—to look after their interests and to do what they would like done.

Hon. members on the other side, if they vote against this bill, are not going to defeat the government or cause a general election. On the other hand I would hesitate, regardless of what part of the house I sat in, before I would vote for this bill, because if I were on the government side, and not in the cabinet, it would seem to me to be a declaration to my constituency that I was a weakling, not capable of handling the affairs of my constituents or of taking their just part in government by a free parliament.

It seems to me that this is an opportunity for all hon. members to show their constituencies that they have their interests at heart, to assert that members have the stuff and stamina that they claim to have and that the people, when they sent them here, believed they had and therefore voted for them. It would show their constituents that they are not frustrated, that they are not being run by the government, that they are not afraid to speak for the people, and that the will of Canadians will be done and a free parliament shall prevail.

I do not believe that hon. members will desert the public opinion of their ridings. I am confident that if they realize the principle involved, the principle of representative government and a free parliament, when the question is put there will be a thundering of "nays".

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): I should like to associate myself with some of the remarks expressed this morning by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell). One of his remarks was that members of the opposition, when we criticize and when we vote on any bill, we act more from the point of view of principle than from any technical viewpoint. I agree with that, and I am quite sure that is the way the people outside this house will interpret the vote of the opposition on this bill. Certainly previous speakers on this side of the house, opposition speakers, have made it clear that they at least are supporting or opposing the bill, one or the other, as a matter of principle, and I think I can say, in fact I know I can say, that this bill will have the support of all those who believe in state control and state planning. Well, I do not believe in either of those things, and neither do the people who sent me here, though I should say of course that I do not mean that everybody who votes for this bill necessarily believes in socialism. I am not saying that, but I do say that all those who believe in socialism will support this bill.

Some members have said that those who are opposed to the bill are taking orders from or studying the interests of those whom they call big shots. Let me say that I take my orders and my instructions only from those who honoured me with their confidence and their votes. I take orders from no one else. In that regard I have received several resolutions and a number of my constituents have instructed me to speak and oppose this bill to the limits of my power. Nobody who wants me to support the bill has been good enough to tell me so, and therefore I will listen to those who have taken the trouble to write and tell me what they want. For these reasons I cannot support the bill.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, we had first of all a bill which we might call the original presented to parliament, and in connection with that bill the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Jaenicke), speaking for our group, agreed with the principle that some powers which the government was seeking should be extended for a certain period of time and that we would vote for the measure on second reading and move certain definite amendments when the bill came into the committee stage. Subsequently the government undertook to amend its own bill and has presented us with a second bill which, as amended, is greatly improved over the original. Unfortunately the original bill is still before the house. It is a pity that the government did not withdraw that bill and present its amended bill as the measure to be discussed on second reading. That has not been done. However, I may say that when I vote on the second reading of the original bill, I am in fact voting for the amended bill even if it is not technically before the house, because that is the bill which will be discussed in committee.

The next point is this. The six months' hoist has been moved. That of course does not solve anything. It ignores what I think almost every hon. member has mentioned as a problem. It throws that problem into the waste-paper basket for six months. There is hardly a member who has spoken who does not admit that the situation is such that any government, no matter which government, must have certain powers to enable it to tide the economy of the country over the next six or twelve months, and to vote that the bill providing such powers be given the six months' hoist at this late hour in the session is to invite chaos. I certainly cannot vote for the six months' hoist. I am speaking of course for myself.

There are one or two things I should like to say. As I have just suggested, there are very few members who are willing to leave our unsolved problems without at least giving the government some opportunity to deal with them. That has been pretty well conceded. It has been suggested by one hon. member that the government has not the power anyway, that it never did have the power, that the government is being dictated to by some sinister, invisible force behind it. If that is so, then I think there is all the more reason why this parliament should act. That hon. gentleman did not seem to be quite clear as to whether the government should go to those invisible and sinister forces and ask them for power or whether it should come to parliament for that power. In my opinion there are certain sinister powers in all nations which seek to influence governments. Those powers had pretty full sway in Canada after the last war, and they made a sorry mess of it. It is necessary that any government should have enough power to check that sinister force.

The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) in particular spoke of the very loyal opposition and the hon. member who preceded me in this debate spoke in a similar vein, as if every hon. member who happened to sit to the left of Mr. Speaker is, by virtue of that position on the floor of this house, in the official opposition. I do not so regard my position here. In all the years that I have been in parliament it is true that I have not had the good fortune to sit on the government side of the house.

Mr. FRASER: And you never will.

Mr. IRVINE: I am not sure that I shall not be there before my hon. friend. If I am not it will be a bad thing for Canada.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The wish would not be father of the thought?

Mr. IRVINE: I have never regarded my position here as that of a member of the loyal opposition. I regard myself as a representative of the people, free to measure every issue on its merits and to exercise my right as a member of parliament to vote on that measure whether it is moved by the leader of the official opposition or by any member of the government. In that connection I should like to read a passage from a speech of the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, now Lord Bennett, delivered when he was Prime Minister of Canada. On that occasion, when he was addressing the house, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) who was the leader of the opposition at that time—

An hon. MEMBER: Loyal opposition.

Mr. IRVINE: Loyal, very loyal opposition! —had spoken in such a way as to indicate that all hon. members to the left of the Speaker were members of the opposition. The then Prime Minister said:

> I was somewhat surprised at the ease with which he attached to his party all those who now sit to his left. He included them in those opposed to the government, but I had always believed that many of them gave to matters brought before this parliament that measure of impartial consideration warranted by the merits of the proposals enacted.

I think that is a fair statement at least of the viewpoint which I hold with respect to the relationship of the group to which I belong to any measure which may be brought before this house, regardless of which party or group may move it.

I was surprised that the hon. member for Macleod who had discovered such a marvellous principle, and such a sacred one in this bill should not have been so attracted by this great principle which he had discovered that he would have known exactly how he was going to vote on the matter. But the principle, great though it appeared in his eyes, did not seem to have impressed him deeply enough to enable him to say whether he was going to vote for or against it. That does not seem to me to be a very great principle, but I noticed that he, like some others of his party, always manages to come back to the nest of his pet theory—there is an egg there, you know. He reminds me of a clucking hen who is trying to hatch out an infertile egg. While it cannot be hatched out, it can get bad. I think it has got quite bad.

Another hon. gentleman says that this bill is dangerous because it is going to give power, and power corrupts. He says that absolute power is absolute corruption. Well, Mr. Speaker, in that case the sooner this parliament gets rid of power the better. We do not want to be absolutely corrupted. If that were true I think we might well let the government have the power and it would get corrupted, and so badly corrupted that the official loyal opposition would become the government. It might be a good idea to do that. It is all nonsense to talk about power corrupting absolutely, because all the power which this parliament has to give comes from the people of Canada themselves. If they are going to be corrupted by power then just what are we doing about—

Mr. JACKMAN: Nonsense.

Mr. IRVINE: Hon. gentlemen who talk like that should not be here, because they are exercising that portion of power which properly belongs to the riding which they represent.

I know that there are always dangers in delegating powers in our hands to governments and individuals, but if we do not do so here we are going to leave the problems in the hands of people who represent nobody but themselves and who have only their own bank accounts to think about. Although I am not a Liberal, and vote against them nearly every time I get the chance, I would rather entrust power to the hands of a government which in one year from now can be thrown out because of what they may do with that power, than to leave that power blindly and stupidly in the hands of a profit-making bureaucracy, which is the most damnable kind of autocracy which ever existed in this or any other country.

I repeat that it is absolute nonsense to associate bureaucracy with a government organization when we know that the worst types of it exist in the very hearts of those organizations which do not wish any controls, which do not wish anything to stand between them and their so-called sacred rights of making profits.

All power comes from the people. The power is in our hands; I have a little bit of it because I represent the constituency of Cariboo. I recognize that in the terrific problems which now confront the people the government must have power to deal with them, and to the extent that I have the right to vote that little bit of power which has been entrusted to my care by my riding I vote that to a responsible and representative government. If that government misuses the power which I conceive it to be necessary for them to get, then I will be the first to kick them out for doing that, if I can. But they must have powers other than those ordinarily exercised by government in order to meet the situation now confronting the country. For that reason, sir, I shall vote for the amended bill.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I should like to say a word or two before the vote is taken. My chief reason for speaking at this time is to reply to some remarks made by the hon. member for London (Mr. Manross). If he were an older member, perhaps my language might be stronger than I intend to make it at this time. It ill becomes an hon. member of this house to rise in his place and say that any member on this side who votes for this bill is a weakling. If he looks into the records of the house and also of public life I think he will change his mind about being weaklings. I shall take my chance with the people of New Westminster, as I have done in the last twenty years.

Mr. JACKMAN: You will not be voting the right way this time.

Mr. MACKENZIE: He always has.

Mr. REID: Ever since this bill came up for discussion we have had wishy-washy statements from time to time from the other side of the house. They have said that this is a weak-kneed government. They also say, "Oh, yes, we want a little control, but we don't want this bill." In heaven's name let them get up and say what they do want, because it is my opinion that if we do not have this measure of control for at least a year there will be anarchy in this country. Let them get up and say that the farmers should not be assisted with subsidies, that the national labour code should be done away with, that regulation and regimentation regarding price control should all be abandoned. If that happens within the next year there will be anarchy, I say, that the poor people of this country will not be able to procure goods because the wealthy, which includes many of those who sit on the other side, will be getting nearly all. It is the voice of Toryism we are hearing to-day. Let them look to the last war and the years following it. When did the disaster of inflation overtake this country; was it during the war? No; the high prices, the inflation and all the other terrible things took place after the war. The Tories liked that, and so they want a repetition of it.

I am going to vote in favour of this bill because I want these regulations maintained for at least a little time. But let me say that if the first bill had been proceeded with I would have voted against it, and I am not just making this statement because the bill has been amended. All the opposition or suggestions did not come from the provincial premiers. There are men on this side who have the guts to speak out against the government; there are more of them here than I have witnessed in the opposition in my sixteen years in this house. I wish to refute now and in advance any suggestion that I am voting for this measure just out of weakness. I am going to vote for it because I think it is in the interests of the common people, in whose behalf I have not heard many voices raised from across the way.

Mr. WILFRID LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I deem it my duty to make a few comments in regard to the controls which are administered by the wartime prices and trade board under the Minister of Finance, who is in charge of the whole Canadian economy. I wish to make these few comments especially in connection with the production and distribution of goods and building materials. The controls were established to check and limit private enterprise in order to permit full production for necessary war purposes. Clearly, then, to my mind the removal of certain of these controls would stimulate an increase in production so as to take care of existing unemployment. It is not possible right now for a citizen of this country who was not engaged in business or industry in 1941 to obtain quotas of materials or goods in order to set up a new industry or business. Therefore these controls have the immediate effect of protecting the monopolies and large industries which existed in 1941 and which are only too glad to eliminate any competition.

It is free enterprise which will develop production and increase employment in this country. The establishments of the armed forces and auxiliary services were increased to 784,000 during the war, while the various branches of industry concerned with national defence, but not including agricultural pursuits, provided work for 1,055,000 men and women. Therefore there were some 1,839,000 jobs, which number has been decreasing from day to day since the end of the war and most of which will be completely eliminated in the not far distant future. Such is the situation now that peace has been restored. Of course not all those who held the 1,839,000 jobs in our wartime economy will be laid off. The land, sea and air forces will not be completely demobilized, and it is likely that the peace-time establishments will be larger than they were in 1939. It is certain also that a large number of men who left farms, industries, businesses or financial institutions to join the armed forces or to work in war plants will return to their former positions, in which in many cases they were not replaced. When munitions plants closed down undoubtedly large numbers of women returned to their homes or to domestic service. Having regard to these circumstances, it is felt in official quarters that the creation of some 900,000 more jobs than existed in 1939 would offer a satisfactory solution of the unemployment problem. Further provisions have to be made each year to find jobs for about 60,000 young people who reach the age when they are expected to earn their own living. Naturally to attain this purpose the banks must make money available to industrial and business enterprises in order to create jobs. To my mind, inflation is used chiefly as an argument in favour of the continuation of certain of these controls. For my part, I believe the true and sole reason the government wishes to maintain control is to keep money in the banks in order to ensure more readily the success of their future loans, a motive which of course they will not admit; but the more we continue by this system of control to curtail production, the more unemployment will increase in the country. It is money that creates production and thereby prevents unemployment, and by controlling production or limiting the distribution of goods produced to those who were in business in 1941, unemployment is deliberately brought about.

The government should free itself as rapidly as possible from those bureaucrats by whom it is surrounded. Of course it is necessary to retain certain controls. I believe that some should be kept for a short time to deal with the chaos resulting from the war. Without a doubt, if we defeat this bill it will mean the cancellation of all controls and throwing the whole economy of Canada into the hands of large cartels and trusts, to the detriment of the masses of the Canadian people. Further, now that the war is over, I believe it is urgent to hand back to the provinces the control over trade and industry of which they were deprived for war purposes. The prerogative of the provinces cannot be indefinitely trifled with, without touching off the spark which will destroy our national structure and will contribute more than anything else to the destruction of the unity which is essential to a country such as ours.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in my opinion this bill is necessary, but with some limitation on its application; and I trust the government will apply its provisions in very few cases, and not beyond the one-year term set out in the bill.

(Translation): I have listened attentively to the speeches delivered by the hon. members for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon), for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) and for Argenteuil (Mr. Héon), and I have read, a few moments ago, the amendment whereby the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay moved that bill No. 15 be considered this day six months. I have heard the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay say that he was in favour of certain controls, that some of them should be maintained. I have also heard in this house a similar statement from the hon. member for Argenteuil and many other hon. members. Now, Mr. Speaker, if some controls are to be maintained, if some are necessary, how can we maintain them if we nullify bill No. 15 by our vote and our attitude? In voting against this bill, in giving it a six months' hoist, as proposed by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay, we shall immediately plunge this country into chaos, an unavoidable consequence of the war policy that was followed and against which I always voiced the strongest opposition. This chaos now exists and it has resulted from the war. This chaos must be averted, and care must be taken not to hand over to the true dictators of this country the control of our national economy. The worst dictatorship which we now have to face is the dictatorship of capitalists, of cartels, and of the Tories who sit in this house, because they are quite dangerous.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that controls cannot last indefinitely. But are we going to leave our whole economy in the hands of the people whose shadows haunt the lobbies of the House of Commons and who are bent on defeating bill No. 15? Are we going to let those who control finance in this country starve the common people by depriving them of their means of subsistence? That is what will happen if this bill is rejected.

I believe that any one who votes for this bill will show that he is imbued with sincere patriotism and is anxious to act the part of a true Canadian. It should not be thought that I am infavour of controls; on the contrary, I have always opposed them, but, in this case, we have to prevent our goods and our whole production from falling into the hands of powerful cartels, which want to crush the common people of this country.

There are to-day in my constituency many industrial centres where, owing to the existing controls, tenants can continue to pay the same rent as formerly; but for those controls the increase would have been exhorbitant. If such controls were left in the hands of some landlords, whose business principles are well known, they would at once evict from their houses a great number of the people of this country, or compel them to pay an exhorbitant rent. Those landlords would derive a great advantage from the present housing shortage.

Well, Mr. Speaker, if there are some controls which must remain, owing to the unusual conditions with which we are confronted, we should disregard partisanship and support the government's courageous policy which the honourable the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) did not hesitate to present in its true light.

(Text).

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all hon. members have listened with keen interest to the speeches in the debate thus far. It is a matter of personal regret to some of us that we could not follow fully all that is said by some hon. members; but whether we can follow them or not, we give them credit for holding sincere views. We will read what they have said when the translations appear in Hansard, and consider them with every respect for those who have spoken.

I rise at this time to discuss two things. First, I should like briefly to comment on the situation in which the house finds itself as a result of the introduction of bill No. 15, and the suggestion that in committee of the whole certain amendments will be made. I wish also to state, as briefly as I can, our position with respect to bill No. 15, to the amendments it is suggested will be proposed in committee, and to the general question as to the unusual powers, if any, the government should be given in the period of transition between the war and a more normal time of peace.

We have before us bill No. 15, which is known as the national emergency powers bill. It was introduced by the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) about two months ago, and the minister moved its second reading about two weeks ago. This is the bill upon which we are asked to vote. I am aware that as a result of certain criticism in the house, and perhaps also in the country, and in the dominion-provincial conference which met a few days ago, the government has reconsidered the matter, and has made certain suggestions as to amendments that it is willing to have incorporated when the bill reaches the committee stage. I concede all that. The fact remains, however, that the bill upon which we are asked to vote is bill No. 15. It was introduced, as I said, two months ago and discussed by the Minister of Justice on second reading some two weeks ago.

To that bill, in its present form, we are entirely opposed. We are opposed to it for several reasons. We are opposed to it because of the unnecessary extent to which it invades the field of provincial jurisdiction. We are opposed to it because of the unnecessarily wide delegation of powers it confers upon the governor in council. We are opposed to it because of the wide powers the government seeks in connection with the entry of people into Canada, and the exclusion or deportation of people from Canada, and in connection with the question of the revocation of nationality. We are opposed to it because of the wholesale approval it requires us to give of the thousands of orders in council passed by the government under the War Measures Act, many of which we have never seen.

Having said that we are opposed to these wide powers as set out in the bill, let me say one thing more. We are not opposed to this government's having whatever powers are necessary to meet the emergent conditions of these post-war days. We are in favour of granting the government whatever powers are necessary to regulate prices, wage ceilings and the flow of essential goods in short supply. Personally, I am in favour of granting the government whatever other specific powers it can show to be necessary to meet the conditions ahead.

One hon. member, the member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion), has moved that the bill be given the six months' hoist. If carried, that motion would mean that the bill would be thrown aside and that no action would be taken. We could not support that failure to act. It would leave the government in the position of continuing the present War Measures Act. We take the position, Mr. Speaker, that the powers given in either act should be cut down and limited, and I am sure that members on all sides of the house agree with that view. But we are not in favour of taking away from the government all powers, nor are we in favour of leaving the government with excessive powers in its hands.

I think I have made our position clear. We are opposed to this bill as it stands, for the reasons I have given. The suggested amendments will no doubt be moved in committee of the whole, thus filtering down some of the objectionable features of the bill. But the amendments as now proposed do not remove the objectionable features. While we are opposed to the bill itself, and while we are opposed to giving it the six months' hoist, we think that in committee of the whole members on all sides of the house ought to come together to see how much we can further limit the autocratic powers which both this bill and its successor give, and yet enable the government to carry on and meet the problems of these days.

With all deference to the government, I think it has followed an entirely improper procedure. When the government reached the conclusion that important changes were so desirable in the bill as to warrant the printing of a new bill before the second reading of the original bill was proceeded with, they should have withdrawn the original bill completely and introduced a new one. That is the only course consistent with parliamentary procedure. As it is now, we are asked to support a bill to which members on all sides of the house are opposed. We are asked to support bill No. 15, the very bill which has been so severely censured in this house, and outside by the dominion-provincial conference, the very bill which the government itself is proposing to amend. Yet when we vote to-night, that is the bill we shall be voting on.

Bill No. 15 is, in our opinion, a most objectionable piece of legislation to be presented to this parliament. Should it ever become law in its present form, members of parliament might almost as well have packed their bags and started for home, because it would have clothed the government, in time of peace, with full autocratic and dictatorial power. This country would then be in the position of having an omnipotent government and an almost powerless and frustrated parliament.

It had been our intention to oppose this bill with all the strength at our command. The fact that the government now proposes to amend it in considerable degree is highly complimentary to those members on all sides who have so strongly opposed certain sections of the bill, and it is the severest kind of criticism of the government by the government itself. The very fact that the government is proposing changes is an indication that considerable changes are necessary.

The general position of this party was placed before the house by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) a few days ago in a speech that many have admitted to be an able and complete statement, many portions of which have been approved by speakers on all sides of the house. Our criticisms of the bill were several in number. I shall refer now to only four of them, because there is no need to occupy the time of the house much longer since members wish, I am sure, to come to a decision on this matter.

Our first criticism is that the bill proposed a most serious invasion of provincial powers and gave reason to the provinces to fear ever-widening encroachments on their autonomy. The proposed amendments also in our judgment involve a substantial invasion of provincial jurisdiction, although less than in the original proposal. It is important that this house should know, before second reading is given, the extent to which the provincial premiers have approved the amendments proposed in this piece of paper that has been handed to us.

The second objection is the blanket and unlimited delegation of power to the governor in council. An example of this is to be found in the clause which enables the governor in council to make orders for the appropriation, control, forfeiture and disposition of property. That is clause 3(1)(f). What a situation that would create—that a government in peace time should have the power to appropriate or forfeit property without due process of law!

Our third objection is to the pernicious clause which would enable the governor in council to make orders in respect of—I am now quoting from the bill—"entry into Canada, exclusion and deportation, and revocation of nationality." No clause more dangerous to national unity has ever found its way into a bill in this parliament. Hon. gentlemen opposite—and in this I agree with them—have made great political capital in western Canada over the provisions of the Wartime Elections Act and the disenfranchisement which occurred therein of Canadians. I agree with that criticism, but this bill is subject to the same kind of criticism to an even greater degree in the form in which it is presented. So far as the official opposition is concerned we would resist to the limit the passage of that provision.

Our fourth objection is the wholesale approval and legalizing of all orders in council passed by the government under the War Measures Act during the last half dozen years. This parliament has never even seen some of those orders in council. Most members have seen very few of them, and some of the orders we know nothing at all about. Many of the orders in council passed under that legislation parliament knew nothing about, many have been tabled though all have not, and many we have never heard of; yet we are asked to legalize, and to approve all that has been done by the government under those thousands of orders in council during the last six years.

The government now indicates its willingness that some of these objectional clauses be removed from the bill. That is all to the good. But the fact remains that certain of the provisions which it proposes to retain, as well as certain of those which it proposes to substitute, are still of too sweeping a character. The particular powers which the government requires can be given in specific legislation if parliament is asked for them specifically. That would be much better than for a democratic assembly to give to any small group of men the sweeping powers sought under this bill, even with its amendments.

In the five subclauses of the proposed section 2 many of the objectionable features are still retained by the sweeping language used. What the government proposes to do is to abandon the blanket delegation of authority proposed in this section of the bill and to redraft these specific clauses which were contained therein. But in redrafting these clauses the government still proposes to make them so wide in the authority conveyed that they are in effect almost as all-embracing as the blanket clause in section 3 of the bill before us.

Take, for example, paragraph (b) of section 2, subsection 1:

> The governor in council may do and authorize such acts and things . . . as he may . . . deem necessary for . . .
> (b) facilitating the readjustment of industry and commerce to the requirements of the community in time of peace.

[Mr. Bracken.]

This paragraph could not have been drafted in any broader or more sweeping terms. It conveys almost as unlimited power as section 3 of the bill before us. The fact is that no one with less wisdom than a Solomon or less ingenuity than a Philadelphia lawyer can define what limitation of power, if any, the paragraph actually contains.

Take another example in the same main section, paragraph (e) of the suggested amendments:

> (e) continuing and discontinuing in an orderly manner, as the emergency permits, measures adopted during and by reason of the war.

This paragraph, read in conjunction with section 4 of the suggested changes gives the force of statute to all orders in council made under the War Measures Act, and permits the government, without the control of parliament, to continue in full force and effect the sweeping controls at present operating.

What is the effect of all this? The effect is that we are asked to give parliamentary sanction—the full force of statute law—to all orders in council and to some orders in council which this parliament has never seen.

As I understand it, two classes of orders in council passed under the War Measures Act have not been laid before parliament: First those orders in council the publication of which has been withheld for security reasons. In this category are included orders in council the publication of which is omitted or deferred under the authority of the secret documents (non-publication) order of 1941. Parliament does not know and has no means of knowing what orders in council may fall in this category. Second, there are some orders in council, even of an administrative nature, which have not been tabled. The government itself decides by itself what ones are of an administrative nature. There is nothing in the War Measures Act which requires this government to table these orders in council. Certain offers have been made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and by the government to table them, and many of them have been tabled, but there is no obligation to table them, and in answers to questions and motions in this house it has been admitted that some of them have not been tabled. The house knows that certain ones have not been tabled until, by misadventure, they have come to light. We do not know and we have not been able to find out what orders in council in this category have not been laid before parliament. What we do know is that parliament is being asked to give the force of law to all these orders in council, known and unknown, some of which at least we have never seen.

Another objectionable feature, not of the same nature as I have mentioned, I shall refer to.

A highly objectionable feature of the government's proposed amendments is the indefinite date of the termination of the measure. The government's new proposal provides that if parliament meets in November or December next the measure shall expire on the 31st day of December next, but it provides also that if parliament does not meet during November or December the measure shall only expire fifteen days after parliament first meets in 1947.

It is well known that the summoning of parliament is entirely within the control of the government. If they decide not to call parliament in November or December next year they can postpone the calling of it until at least the middle of April, 1947, at which time the government would be under the necessity of calling parliament in order to secure additional money to carry on. In those circumstances this bill would not expire until the end of April, 1947. The government and the government alone have the power to decide when parliament will be summoned, and they can postpone its summoning if they wish, in which case this bill would remain in operation, as I have said, until April, 1947. In my opinion, this bill should not be operative for longer than a year, and the indefinitness and uncertainty of the present clause should be eliminated.

From what has been said in the debate, it is clear that the government has retreated from certain provisions of bill No. 15. They have not, however, eliminated all its objectionable features. This house has become accustomed this session to government retreats from established positions. One notable occasion was when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) withdrew the proposed tariff increases which were included in the budget resolutions.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BRACKEN: Am I not in order, Mr. Speaker?

With these self-made precedents before them, I hope the government will not hesitate to make still another retreat so that this bill may be finally passed in a form in which all could agree.

As I have said, certain unusual powers we think the government should have in this transitional period between war and what we might think of as more or less normal times. These we are agreeable to giving it. I refer particularly, as I did before, to the right to regulate prices and wage ceilings and to regulate the flow of essential goods in scarce supply, and such other essential powers as the government can point out it needs. But this bill goes much farther than that, and even the government has suggested amendments. We shall try to get in committee of the whole a further liimtation of the wide powers given. We are opposing the motion to discard the bill altogether. We are opposing the bill in its present form, and we think in the proposed amended form it is going too far. We shall have to oppose it on second reading. When and if it gets to committee of the whole we shall try there to have certain other wide powers eliminated. That in brief is our position with respect to this measure.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, before we finally vote on this measure, I think there are two or three observations it would be fitting to make.

I should like to know, and members of this group would like to know, to what extent the provincial premiers in the conference recently held in Ottawa agreed that the stipulations of this bill were acceptable to them. If the provincial premiers were satisfied with this bill as it stands, that would go a long way toward reassuring the members of this house.

We are living in an age in which centralization abounds. I believe in the British North America Act. I believe that power should be decentralized into the hands of the provinces and that guarantees should be placed in our legislation which would safeguard those powers in the hands of the various provinces.

I have noticed that many hon. members who have spoken on the measure have objected to it on the ground that it infringes provincial rights; hence the reason for my question regarding the attitude of the provincial premiers. I feel that one suggestion would be worth while for the government. They are of the opinion that they require extraordinary powers to meet an extraordinary situation. With their attitude in this respect I sympathize. I believe, however, that in future, in their endeavour to gain the power which is necessary to meet exigencies, they should take the provincial governments more into their confidence.

I do not see any serious objection to such an approach as this: Let the dominion government, through parliament, pass a resolution that it would be expedient that extraordinary powers should be vested in the hands of the governments of Canada to meet an extraordinary situation, and calling upon the provincial parliaments to pass such measures as might be necessary to be put in the hands of the provincial administrations authority to deal with any situation which might arise. Then let the provincial authorities know that the dominion, with all its power, would stand behind them in the exercise of the powers which they were given. In this way the government in Ottawa would have not one administration in Canada seeking to cope with the divers emergencies that might arise, but ten administrations all seeing eye-to-eye and prepared to act immediately in cooperation.

To some people that may seem extreme. The conduct of the recent war has, however, given us an example of how that sort of thing can be done. Will the members of this house for a moment contemplate what might have happened if the British government, the king through the government of Great Britain, had endeavoured at the beginning of the war to pass emergency measures which would have enabled them to mobilize the forces of Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and the other self-governing members of the British commonwealth? We never would have won this war; we would never have come through more united than we were when we began. The British government simply made known to the governments of the various component parts of the commonwealth the seriousness of the emergency which had arisen, and among them they determined what were the measures best suited to meet the situation. Then the governments, this parliament taking its part, went back to their respective countries and took the measures necessary, and gave all the cooperation needed, toward the same great objective, and with magnificent success.

Is it to be supposed that a similar arrangement cannot be made between the dominion and the provinces? Why should the government in Ottawa seek to arrogate to itself all the powers that properly and constitutionally belong to the provinces? Why should it not call the provinces into cooperation in a great family endeavour to meet the exigencies which might arise and which certainly affect the various provinces as intimately and vitally as they affect the dominion as a whole?

I believe my words have conveyed the idea that is in my mind, which would enable us to equip ourselves for any sort of contingency that might present itself, without the danger of infringing provincial rights or in any way impairing Canadian unity.

As far as this group is concerned, we are anxious to get the bill into committee. We have said very little. We have spoken but briefly. We have been deeply interested in the bill and deeply concerned, as all other hon. members are. The members of this group have been more sternly demanding the preservation of all provincial rights in this dominion than any other group in the dominion for ten years. We have not changed our attitude at all respecting provincial autonomy. We believe that complete efficiency will result from complete decentralization of power, granted that everyone exercising the authority of government fully understands the objective to be attained.

As I have said, we are desirous of having the bill in committee; we are anxious to hear the government explain to the committee why it requires each of the several powers which it is proposing to have given to it in this bill; and in so far as the government can show to our satisfaction that each power or any given power is essential to meet the difficulties that may arise during the next year, this group stands prepared to support the government and to give them that power, because certainly nobody in Canada wishes to see any sort of calamity occur in the dominion by reason of the fact that those in charge in the dominion might not possess the power necessary to govern the country for peace, order and good government.

We should like to have the minister tell us, before we vote, exactly to what extent the provincial premiers have agreed to the measures which are proposed in this bill.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): After the speech of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) I had not intended to say anything at this stage, because it was quite apparent that at least a majority of the members of the house wish to have the bill go into committee and have considered in committee the provisions which it should contain. But the member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) has asked a specific question, and I think it is only fair to the house and to those who attended the dominion-provincial conference that that question should be answered.

It has been suggested that the government had submitted bill No. 15 to the provincial premiers. No such submission was made at all, but the bill had been introduced and was public, and in the course of deliberations of the dominion-provincial conference it became the subject of discussion. There were quite protracted discussions about it. The provincial premiers, however, made it quite clear that they would not take any responsibility whatsoever with respect to any of the terms of the bill, that that responsibility ought to be taken by the parliament of Canada, and they stated expressly that they considered it would not be within their province to deal with any specific language which would be dealt with by parliament. But they made their positions abundantly clear as to what they thought might be the terms of a bill that would not be objectionable.

No attempt was made to draft any clauses that would meet objections that were raised while the conference was on. But notes of the discussions were taken by the deputy minister of justice who attended some of the sessions, and after the adjournment an effort was made to draft proposed amendments for bill No. 15 which would give the government the powers it felt it should have to deal with the emergency situation and still not offend those who had attended the provincial conference and who are to return to continue it on January 28.

I shall be perfectly clear to the house and perfectly fair to the provincial premiers. I am not suggesting that any one of the provincial premiers has any responsibility whatsoever for a single word contained in this bill as reprinted with the amendments the government will ask to have proposed when the bill is in committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: Amendment (Mr. Dorion) negatived. Mr. St. Laurent moves, seconded by Mr. Mackenzie, that the bill be now read a second time. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. MACKENZIE: On division.

Motion agreed to on division; bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Chairman, with respect to section 1 I should like to ask an hon. member to move that the word "transitional" be added before the word "powers" in that section.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I so move.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Probably this affords an opportunity for a general discussion and the asking of certain questions with regard to this bill and a comparison of it with the bill that we may call bill No. 15 (1). With the exception of the change in the terminology which has been suggested by the amendment that has just been moved by the Postmaster General, and the removal from bill No. 1 the power to legislate by order in council respecting the entry into Canada, the exclusion, deportation and revocation of nationality, I fail to see any material difference between the bill as introduced and the bill which has been placed in circulation.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Does the hon. member not think that the discussion would more conveniently come upon section 2? Perhaps section 2 might be called and then a motion made to replace that section by that which is contained in the reprint. On that section the whole matter would be open for discussion. I feel that it will be difficult to discuss the particular principles that the hon. member wishes to deal with on section 1, without duplicating the discussion when we come to the proposed new section 2. I would undertake to see that any discussion that would have been relevant on section 1 will not be objected to on section 2.

Mr. HEON: May I ask the minister whether the word is "transitory" or "transitional"?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: "Transitional" is the word that is suggested.

Mr. BRACKEN: Would the minister explain to the committee just what prompted him to use that word? What advantage has it in the measure?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The word is taken from the title of the United Kingdom bill which was introduced and passed for a period of five years. It is felt that it will more clearly indicate that no attempt is being made by parliament at this time to declare that there is any other emergency to be dealt with than the emergency arising out of the war. There was uneasiness felt in certain quarters at the suggestion that parliament could declare the existence of an emergency not connected with war, pestilence or famine, or as was the motive in the decision in the Russell case, general drunkenness; and since there is no point in having an academic discussion on whether it would be proper or improper for parliament to declare the existence of a national emergency arising out of any other circumstances, there is no point in having that discussion at the present time, because the emergency that it is proposed to deal with is clearly one that arises out of the war, and the powers that it is suggested should be granted are merely for the transitional period and for a relatively short period of time. Although there was no acceptance by anyone attending the dominion-provincial conference of any of the language in the bill, those of us who attended the conference representing the federal government had the feeling after the discussion that it would be helpful if it were described as a transitional emergency.

Mr. BRACKEN: While this change in the name of the bill does not alter its substance in any respect, I wish to commend the government for the change, because I think it removes from the minds of some the fear that the bill as introduced might be a precedent for the introduction of similar bills giving the government wide powers under conditions not related to the war.

Mr. POULIOT: Before the section is carried, I have just a few remarks to make on one specific matter. I have great admiration for many of my new colleagues, who come from all over and who sit on all sides of the house, but some of them labour under handicaps. They can make the finest speeches; they can talk like angels, but their party will not benefit. I say that especially to my hon. friends of the Progressive Conservative party. Yesterday we had an illustration of this, and I refer to that in the best possible spirit. Of course there are many unfortunate occasions when we cannot maintain our friendships just because we are in public life, for the friendships that exist between men in private life cannot always be the same in public life. There are the old icons which have been hung on the wall of the council room of the Conservative party, Tory icons; and as long as they are kept there and worshipped, as long as there is a candle burning before them all the time, I do not see what results they can hope to achieve. In the party opposite are some very bright hon. gentlemen for whom I have the deepest admiration, who work hard and want to do something; but eventually they will come to the great divide, to the time when they will have to break the tie. They will reach the cross-roads and realize that the earth is turning and that those who have inherited power and might from others who have been elected by the people, as well as those who have never succeeded in getting elected by the people, should be completely discarded. There is another class of individual who must be discarded as well. It includes those who never took the risk of running in a riding. They are in a class by themselves. I will not classify them as birds of prey; I name no one, but there are two main categories, those whom the people did not want and those whom the people would not want if they went before the people. I will tell the committee the story of an experience I had in January, 1942, and of the result which was achieved in February of that year. Here in the house I objected to the person who was running in York South as a Progressive—at least as a Conservative, and I do not know what the qualifying word was.

Mr. COLDWELL: He was a plain Conservative at that time.

Mr. POULIOT: A Tory coat with a Conservative lining. Of course I do not know if that election is still remembered, because many things have happened since then, but I was particularly interested. I made just a few remarks about it in the house, and mentioned some facts that belong to history. I do not want to be cruel, and I never will be cruel to a man who remains in private life. That is his own business, his own domain; he is the master of his private life. But when a man goes into public life his actions as a public man belong to history.

Very early last session, I think in No. 7 of Hansard for the session of 1942, I quoted some things that had been done by a former leader of the Conservative party. I did so without offence, without recrimination and without passion. I did so in a cold-blooded way in order to express my deep regret and sorrow that the magnificent parliamentary efforts of some bright men were handicapped precisely on account of the fact that they did not throw these Jonahs overboard and did not keep themselves distinct from those people who had outlived their usefulness, if they ever had any. It is pitiful; it is a matter that inspires compassion when I see bright young fellows come to the house full of ambition, meaning well—and I give them credit for that—and have their wings clipped by the affection they maintain for other people who do not happen to be loved by the Canadian electorate. The leader of the C.C.F. party and the Minister of Agriculture were very cruel in using the ad hominem argument, which could not have been used against those honourable and bright colleagues if they had broken the tie and left in the ditch the glorious icons of the past, which do not get a single vote for anyone in this chamber who represents the Progressive Conservative party. I say that in the best possible spirit, to help them in future. I tell them definitely and categorically that they will never meet with success in public life, although they may be elected here and there, and the Conservative party will never come to power as long as they keep those people as advisers, as glories about which they still boast when nobody believes in them.

Now I want to practise what I preach. I will not mention the ciphered telegrams that have been sent by a former leader—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. We are on section 1, which is the short title, and I would ask the hon. gentleman to keep his remarks relevant to the section under discussion.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank you. I tell the committee only this. It was only yesterday that both the leader of the C.C.F. and the Minister of Agriculture made excellent speeches by using ad hominem arguments against the brightest debaters in the new generation of the Progressive Conservative party. Their speeches were remarkable—on both sides.

But what I am giving now is some friendly advice to those colleagues whom I admire in order that in future nobody may use ad hominem arguments against them by quoting what Arthur Meighen. R. B. Bennett, or anybody else who has been discarded by the people as leader of the Conservative party, might have said. That is my point. It is just in order to be helpful that I say this. Moreover, I shall be thankful to them if they will reciprocate by offering their own suggestions or advice, and I shall take those suggestions or advice in the best possible spirit. Perhaps there may be some occasion when they might do so, and I hope they will.

I believe I can say in a sentence or two what I dislike in the bill. I am opposed to these controls. We may try to do something to prevent future evils, but perhaps we shall have to do so in a different way, and it is my hope that at the next session of parliament a committee will be formed of hon. members belonging to all groups who will see if we in this chamber cannot find a solution to prevent future trouble.

I am definitely and categorically opposed to approval by this chamber of orders in council. The government has its responsibility in that regard; we have none. As a member of parliament I am not prepared to assume responsibility for orders in council passed by all controllers, and we are not going to ratify that sort of thing. I cannot ratify by my vote orders in council which I reprove in my mind. I hope I have made myself clear, and if I have not I am ready to answer any questions.

Mr. McMASTER: I hasten to accept the offer of the hon. member for Temiscouata. I find this title somewhat—well, I was going to use the word "incongruous". It is hard to understand, because any emergency I have ever known was always ahead of me; it was not behind. Yet this is supposed to be a bill for a transitional period, and we find that it is to be known as an act to confer certain transitional powers upon the governor in council during the national emergency arising out of the war. My suggestion is that the words "emergency" and "transitional" have entirely different meanings. If the bill is to be upheld I would suggest that the word "transitional" weakens it.

Mr. POULIOT: I have one word to add. During the election in York South a copy of Hansard was taken from house to house by two persons. One was a returned soldier, and the other his wife—both charming people. They offered precisely the edition of Hansard for Friday, January 30, 1942, when canvassing the constituents against the Conservative party's nominee, and attention was directed to two matters. These are expressions of a state of mind which are not in accordance with the declarations of freedom and thought which were expressed by some of my colleagues opposite last night.

Here is the famous ciphered telegram:

Winnipeg, November 30, 1917. Robert L. Borden, Ottawa, Ontario.

Would like one thousand soldiers' votes at large for Manitoba, of which 300 for Selkirk, balance divided between Provencher, Macdonald and Springfield, or same proportion of division, no matter what our allotment may be.

Arthur Meighen.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That has been denied.

Mr. POULIOT: And there was another very important matter too.

The CHAIRMAN: We are dealing with section 1, and I think I should read it. An amendment has been made so that the short title would read, "The National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945."

Mr. COLDWELL: That was an emergency transitional period.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is all very well to read into the record things of that kind. Arthur Meighen occupied a position high in the public annals of this country. The telegram which has been read has been denied. There has been no proof of it, and my hon. friend would not make outside the house the statement that he makes here. At least the ordinary proprieties should be observed in connection with outstanding Canadians, that we do not malign them by statements which must, to the knowledge of the person reading them, be untrue.

Mr. POULIOT: On a question of privilege—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I would draw the attention of the committee to the regulation which states that speeches in committee of the whole must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration. May I point out that we are now discussing the short title of the bill.

Mr. GREEN: Six o'clock.

Mr. POULIOT: I wish in the first place to rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Six o'clock.

Mr. POULIOT: I have said absolutely nothing offensive about the character or personality of Mr. Meighen. I have only said that he did not enjoy the confidence of the people. We have only to ask the director-general of elections to bring the returns in all the elections he lost, and what I have said will be confirmed. That is a public fact.

The hon. member for Lake Centre is not at all justified in putting in my mouth words I have never said.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I regret very much to have to continue with my question of privilege. I was interrupted at six o'clock, and I cannot leave it at that. While we were discussing bill No. 15 in committee I read a telegram which bears the signature of Mr. Arthur Meighen, dated November 30, 1917, and afterwards the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) rose and used language to which I am not accustomed. I took some notes when he spoke, and in part, he said this:

> At least the ordinary proprieties should be observed in connection with outstanding Canadians, that we do not malign them by statements which must to the knowledge of the person reading them be untrue.

Meaning by that, that what I had said was a lie. The hon. member went pretty far, and I say that for two reasons. In the first place, the telegram was read in the house on January 30, 1942, as appears at page 179 of Hansard, and when it was read one of the deans of the house, the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), said:

> It is on Hansard.

He meant by that, that when I read the telegram it had appeared on Hansard previously and that that was where I got it from.

There is another matter that is beyond me, namely that on that occasion, on January 30, 1942, the hon. member of the opposition who spoke immediately after me did not lodge a protest similar to the one that he made around six o'clock to-day. The only thing that he said, in reply to the reading of this telegram and another one that I shall read afterwards, both of which are in Hansard, was this:

> Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): As I listened to the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) it came to me once more what > democracy in this empire and this country means: That in the midst of war, when all of us are worried and concerned, an hon. member may rise in his place and make the type of speech he made to-day. That is freedom of speech—the opportunity to express one's view in parliament.

The only sentence that he added to that was this:

> I am not going to endeavour to follow the hon. member in what he has said.

If the telegram was denied by the man whose name appeared at the bottom of it in Hansard, how is it that the hon. member did not protest two years ago? How can he remember now a thing he never thought of two years ago? Then afterwards he used abusive language with regard to an hon. member of the House of Commons who tries to act as a life-saver for himself and his party.

That being done, sir, I have just one word to add to the discussion that is now before the Chair. It is that the question of freedom and the question of the rights of parliament are both matters of tremendous magnitude, and no member of parliament can disregard those vital questions.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT: Those who say "hear, hear" will have first to hear, hear, because something has to be told to them.

There are precedents which are good and which must be followed, but there are others which are bad and which cannot be followed by a body composed of men who are supposed to be the defenders of freedom, not only their own but that of others also, and for all mankind if possible. The greatest encroachment that was made on the liberty of man in Canada was made by a parliamentarian some years ago, and that precedent must never be followed in the future. I hope that no government, whatever it may be, will ever dare to imitate the action of that person. Here is the text of a document which appears in Hansard of January 30, 1942, and which reminds me of Nero, Diocletian and all the persecutors of the past. That document scandalized me the first time I heard of it, so much so that I never thought a man living in a democratic country could do a thing like that. That is at page 199 of Hansard of January 30, 1942. What was written then surpasses what Nero and Diocletian ever dreamed of, or Hitler, or Mussolini—all of them. It was dated June 17, 1919, and it was a telegram from Mr. Arthur Meighen to Mr. Andrew. Listen to it:

> Notwithstanding any doubt I have as to the technical legality of the arrest and detention at Stony Mountain (penitentiary) I feel that rapid deportation is the best course now that the arrests are made, and later we can consider rectification.

The hon. member for Lake Centre will be well advised to drop the icon of Arthur Meighen on the floor and break it, for the sake of his party and for his own sake.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 2—Continuation of national emergency.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I should like to suggest that some hon. member move this amendment:

That there be substituted for clause 2 as printed in the bill a new clause 2 in the form of the reprint with proposed amendments, and to obtain also this correction:

At line 26 of the proposed amendment substitute the word "or" for the word "and" between "continuing" and "discontinuing," and insert a comma after the word "discontinuing."

Mr. MACKENZIE: I move accordingly.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have read over the amendments and compared them with the original section which is to be amended, and with the exception of one or two subsections, I submit that this new section incorporates all the objected items to which I made reference when I spoke on the introduction of the bill. The only objected item which has been removed is "entry in Canada, exclusion and deportation, and revocation of nationality," a section which was nefarious in concept and would have resulted in untold hardship to Canadian citizens. That subsection has been removed. Then, too, the government has seen fit to follow one suggestion which was made, namely, that all orders in council passed under this act should be laid on the table of parliament, giving this house an opportunity of annulment within a reasonable period. But subsection 3 of section 2 does not remove the major objection that we on this side of the house took to the original bill, because in section 4 provision is made that:

The orders and regulations made under the War Measures Act or pursuant to authority created under the said act in force immediately before the day this act comes into force shall, while this act is in force, continue in full force and effect subject to amendment or revocation under this act.

In other words, no provision is made whereby parliament will be placed in a position that it may annul orders in council which were passed during the period of the war under the War Measures Act. The only power which is given to parliament is the power to annul orders in council passed on and after the date this measure comes into effect. Our major objection to this bill in so far as the order in council feature is concerned in general was that parliament was being asked to approve all the multitude of orders in council passed during the period of war, without knowledge of their contents, in many cases without those orders in council having been brought before parliament. The only provision now, under section 4, is for amendment or revocation, but not for annulment within the meaning of section 2, annulment being an act of parliament in consequence of the machinery being set in operation by a member of this house; amendment or revocation, an act which only the governor in council may follow. We on this side of the house intend to press to have every order in council which was passed during the period of the war under the War Measures Act laid on the table of the house, giving to hon. members an opportunity to repudiate those which ought to be repudiated.

I come now to the sections. A few days after the opening debate the dominion-provincial conference met in the city of Ottawa. Many felt that the premiers and attorneys-general of the provinces had been consulted and that as a result of the consultation a new bill had been prepared in place of the old. To-day, however, the Minister of Justice quite frankly states that such is not the fact, that all that took place was a discussion, that notes were taken of the discussion, and that in certain cases the suggestions of the provincial representatives were accepted.

These sections as now constituted actually embody, with the exception of the one dealing with naturalization, all the subsections that were objected to by us on this side of the house. For instance, we raised strong objection to controls over production, manufacture, trading, exportation and importation. It was pointed out that with that power in the hands of the governor in council the government placed itself in the position of being able to control all the business in this country. That subsection has been removed and in place of it has been substituted another section 2, 1 (b), providing for measures necessary for facilitating the readjustment of industry and commerce to the requirements of the community in time of peace. The only difference between that subsection and the new one is that new words have been used which no doubt it was believed would be more palatable than those that appeared in the original bill.

Again, we raised strong objection to the governor in council having power to take control over transportation by air, road, rail and water. There has never been an explanation by the minister why the government needs this power. Why does the government wish to take control over transportation by road or by air, or water or rail? What is the purpose? The subsection was removed, but when you look into the amendment you find that it is hidden away in another section, in section 2 (c) which gives the government the same power it would have had under the original bill; for it provides that the governor in council shall have power to maintain, control and regulate supplies and services, prices and transportation. In other words, it was taken out of one subsection and placed in another with the identical powers remaining in the governor in council.

We raised strong objection to the power which the government was asking for of appropriation, control, forfeiture and disposition of property. We asked what the purpose of the government was in seeking power to forfeit in 1945, forfeiture meaning the taking over of land or personal property without compensation. That subsection has been removed and in place of it another has been brought in namely 2, 1, (c), which in different terms and terminology still grants the absolute power the governor in council had asked for under the original bill.

To the original bill have been added certain other powers. Section 2 1(a) provides for maintaining the armed forces of Canada during occupation of enemy territory, demobilization, and providing for rehabilitation of the members thereof. That was not in the old bill. I feel that is necessary, because we are endeavouring to get the session over and there would be various matters in connection with veterans affairs which until the next parliament meets would have to be dealt with by order in council.

There is another subsection which grants the widest powers possible to the governor in council. It assists relief of suffering and the restoration and distribution of essential supplies and services in any part of His Majesty's dominions or in foreign countries that are in grave distress as a result of the war. Power is now asked for greater than was sought in the first bill, whereby the governor in council will be empowered under a blank cheque to do anything that he feels is necessary anywhere in the world so long as he considers that it is to relieve grave distress as a result of the war.

When the government agreed to amend the original bill many of us felt that the amendments which it had in mind, having regard to press dispatches in advance, would actually remove the causes of objections that we were raising; but anyone reading these amendments must come to one conclusion only, and that is that the government, having to recede in face of public objection, in face of objections raised in the house, in face of objections raised in the dominion-provincial conference, decided, instead of withdrawing the bill, to introduce a new one with as wide powers, except in the two instances I have mentioned, as were granted before, the only change being one of terminology.

But they did something else. They gave the bill a new face; they added the word "transitional". They found themselves in the position of having to save face, after having introduced a bill that shocked the sensibilities of the people of the dominion; and having found themselves in that position they followed the course of face-lifting, altering the face of the bill as it was originally. But the same tell-tale wrinkles are there, the same wrinkles that spell dictatorship in this country if we do not oppose the granting of these powers to the government. All that has been done, with the exception of the removal of the two subsections to which I have referred, is to reshuffle the deck, leaving in it the same cards but placing them in different positions and numbering them differently as compared with the old bill.

I think we have a right to ask at this time certain pertinent questions of the government, and the first is this: Are we not entitled to a complete summary of the degree to which war controls have been removed to date? Are we not entitled to know to what extent these powers are to be used as anticipated at the present time? Are we not entitled to know to what extent price controls are to be continued and to what extent they are to be removed, as they are being removed to-day in the United States? Are we not entitled to know now, before granting this power to the governor in council, the extent to which wages are to be maintained at their present level?

Are we not entitled to know the plans of the governor in council in reference to labour? Does the governor in council intend to continue the measures which were passed during the period of the war? Is selective service to be continued in its present form? To what extent are there to be releases from some of the controls which to-day are unfair to labour? We have a right to know these things before we place in the hands of the governor in council the powers for which he asks.

We can only rehabilitate this country if we restore to the small man the opportunity of going into business. It is true that during the last year some of the controls over a man going into a new business have been removed. Possibly they have all been removed; but the situation is this: while a man may open business he cannot get supplies. All he receives from the wartime prices and trade board is a hunting licence enabling him to go hunting for supplies. But those supplies are denied him and the opportunity to go into business is denied him.

Under these powers to what extent does the government intend to assure that retailers shall receive their fair and just share of the goods which are available? What is the situation with regard to clothing, woollens, footwear and the like? To what extent does the government intend to impose still greater controls with a view to assuring a fair and proper distribution of scarce materials? I believe we have a right to have an answer to these questions at this time.

I point out this fact, while we in Canada are asked to give the governor in council those tremendous powers, a change is taking place in the United States because of the fear of deflation. The Secretary of Commerce, Henry Wallace, said recently:

> Higher wage rates must be given labour to cushion loss of the war's overtime and incentive take-home pay.

They have taken steps in that direction. The trades and labour congress has gone on record in Great Britain that controls on labour should be speedily relaxed. They say:

> The congress recommendation is that workers over thirty be exempted from controls altogether and permitted to leave even essential industries in order to look for permanent peace-time employment. The congress officials feel that controls exercised against the will of the men are in fact a hindrance rather than a help to the food output, and that men would work much more willingly if allowed to choose their own jobs. I believe that the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Labour should explain these matters at this time for the benefit of the house and the country.

While we have received haphazard explanations from time to time from one minister and another, we have not yet found the over-all picture. I therefore ask the ministers and the government to answer these questions: What are your immediate present plans to maintain the purchasing power and the scale of expanding production capacity? What measures are being taken by the government now to do what the government of the United States is doing, namely, to combat possible deflation? Much has been said about inflation after the last war. There was inflation until 1921, which was followed by a serious period of deflation. The government must have plans to forestall deflation, and they should be made available to the house at this time.

In this connection may I say, sir, that a special committee of the United States house of representatives investigated federal agencies during the month of November. They brought down a report which I think is applicable to Canada at this time. In part that report read as follows:

> The policy of adherence to rigid formulae has retarded reconversion, prevented production, especially in low-priced commodities, has restricted opportunity for full employment . . . It has compelled manufacturers to discontinue and abandon production of pre-war low-priced commodities they were skilled in making in great volume, and has permitted newcomers to manufacture such commodities at higher prices than were necessary to enable those already in the field to stay in business.

These words of the committee of the United States house of representatives may well apply to Canada, having regard to the similarity of our economic conditions.

We have continued to preach the dangers of inflation, and I am not arguing that at the moment. We have talked about the necessity of maintaining wage schedules at the present level, and of preserving price schedules; whereas in United States the President said in his speech in late October:

> Wages must be allowed to be increased.

He indicated that higher wages are as vital to business and agriculture as to labour; for consumers cannot buy the products of industry and the farms unless they earn sufficient wages. He then used these words:

> I am convinced we must get away as quickly as possible from government controls and get back to the free operation of our competitive system.

The United States is extending; it is not decontrolling unnecessarily fast, but it is working in that direction as speedily as possible, and toward the removal in part and in whole of some of those controls. I therefore ask that at this time the government give to the house and the country a full, complete and integrated statement of government plans; a statement as to the use it intends to make of the powers which parliament is being asked to give, to the end that we shall not be in the position of being asked to place our parliamentary rights in pawn without realizing the security which the government is giving in return for these rights.

I have not received an answer to the suggestion that I made. We all want to co-operate in this matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Hon. members laugh because they have never learned the meaning of that. We are seriously endeavouring to assist in this tremendous problem. I regard my hon. friends' sincerity most highly, and in return I ask the same consideration in a matter such as this, which concerns the future of this country. I know that all hon. members are anxious to get away, but we realize we are faced with a problem which is greater than anything we shall have to face at any time in the years to come. I again make the plea I made the other day. There are men in this house who have made a great success of their business; there are men who understand the ramifications of finance; there are men who are representative of labour and of agriculture. Let us take this bill and place it before a committee composed of such men. They can hear evidence, listen to the story of the controllers and ascertain from them exactly what they intend to do, and why they need those powers. As a result of securing that evidence we shall be in a position where we can intelligently discuss this problem.

The extradition bill was sent to a committee. That is an important bill, impinging as it does upon the rights and the liberties of Canadians, but in my opinion it is no more important—in fact it is less important—than this bill which concerns the welfare and the future of every man and woman in Canada. Why not give us three or four days in committee? Give us an opportunity of having those men before us. Let us ascertain from them why they made certain orders. Let us ascertain from the rentals controller why rentals controls are applied in certain villages where there is no shortage of houses whatsoever. Let us ascertain why it has been applied in certain other ways resulting even in petty tyranny. Let us see the picture. Let us endeavour to work together for one purpose, so that when we delegate these powers to the governor in council they will be utilized for the welfare of this country, which comes first and foremost. In all sincerity I make that appeal. We have an opportunity to make a tremendous contribution in that way, an opportunity to assure that parliament will have been supreme, so that instead of blindly placing these tremendous powers in the hands of controllers and the like, parliament will know why they have been placed there and how they are intended to be used during the next two or three months.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Well, Mr. Chairman, we have been hearing some pretty extraordinary things for the last couple of days, and one of the most extraordinary is to hear them called "cooperation". I have been listening attentively to all that has been said in this debate, and I have yet to learn whether or not the official opposition wants a bill passed. I will make an exception as to the very objective speech made this afternoon by the leader of the opposition. The hon. member who has just sat down says that the tell-tale wrinkles are still there. That is true; the tell-tale wrinkles are still there. We heard some extraordinary statements about this bill yesterday afternoon and yesterday evening. When we continued the debate this morning we seemed to be getting back on another plane, but we did not stay there very long. The tell-tale wrinkles are always there.

Some hon. members have made it quite clear that they do not want controls. The hon. member for Stanstead wound up his speech by saying that what this country needed was a government with nerve enough to take off the controls. Most of the other hon. members disagreed with that stand. One can understand a position of that kind. The hon. gentleman was supported by the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains and by other hon. members. They are concerned with the effect of these controls upon the owners of property and the exceptional opportunities owners of property are losing at this time because the controls are in existence. One can understand something of that kind. The hon. member says; Of course we are told there are dangers. Prices went up after the last war, and they would go up again after this war; but what of it? The price of sugar would rise from five cents to twenty-five cents. The price of butter would go from thirty-seven cents to sixty cents; but what of it? Shall that weigh against the loss of freedom that is entailed in the maintenance of these controls? In July, 1914, flour sold for $3.30. In the spring of 1920 it sold for $8.40. Sugar sold for $5.50 per 100 pounds in 1914; in 1920 it was $25. Butter was thirty cents a pound in 1914; in 1920 it was eighty-seven cents; but what of it? How does that weigh in the balance? Bacon was 25½ cents a pound in 1914; in the spring of 1920 it was sixty cents. In 1914 milk was 8½ cents a quart; in 1920 it was 15½ cents. Coffee was thirty-seven cents in 1914 and sixty-two cents in 1920. Eggs went from twenty-seven cents a dozen in 1914 to eighty-eight cents a dozen in 1920; potatoes went from twenty-five cents a peck to $1.08 and fresh pork from twenty cents to forty-two cents.

Well, what about it? To some, perhaps nothing about it; but to this government it is a matter of considerable concern, and this government feels that it has behind it not only a majority in this house but a majority in this country. This government has not the nerve to take off controls and make opportunities for those who would derive benefit from those opportunities at the expense of the mass of the population. This government has not that nerve. If there are people in the country who want a government with that nerve, let them choose it from the other side of the house. When I proposed the second reading of this bill I said in so many words that whenever a government had to ask for powers of this kind it was always an opportunity for whatever party was in opposition to assert its attachment to constitutional and traditional rights, and to try to make out that the other party was departing from them. But I did not expect that it would go the lengths it has gone in this debate, and especially I did not expect that it would come with such violence from those who had supported and passed the legislation to which the leader of the C.C.F. party referred last evening and which is in the statutes of 1931.

It is regrettable that the circumstances are such that controls are required; but they are required, and this government has the nerve to come to the country and say it intends to see that they are maintained as long as they are required. La ligue des proprietaires, no doubt very respectable people, object to this bill because they are not allowed to use their property as they see fit and to get the better returns they mention in the representations they submit to members of parliament. Their position is much to be deplored, but there is a serious shortage of housing for the Canadian population at the present time, and that shortage would make for unduly enhanced rentals if there were not rental controls.

Hon. members say that we are asking for extraordinary powers and for a blank cheque. How many days ago was it that this house passed, for the sixth or seventh time, an appropriation this time of $1,365,000,000, unanimously and without a word of dissent from the hon. member for Eglinton or any other hon. member on the other side of the house? Second reading of that bill was unanimously approved in this house on November 22; I need not refer to the page of Hansard. What are the terms of that bill, which hon. members quite rightly found it appropriate to pass because the country is not yet in a normal situation? The terms, which are identical in each of these bills since 1939, were these:

From and out of the consolidated revenue fund there may be paid and applied, beyond the ordinary grants of parliament, a sum not exceeding one billion, three hundred and sixty-five million dollars less the amount provided for by the War Expenditure and Demobilization Appropriation Act, No. 1, 1945, subject to allotment by treasury board, towards defraying any expenses or making any advances or loans that may be incurred or granted by or under the authority of the governor in council during the year ending the thirty-first day of March, 1946, for:

(a) the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada.

How wide is that; how broad is that? Then:

(b) The conduct of naval, military and air operations in or beyond Canada;

(c) the expeditious demobilization of the Canadian armed forces;

(d) promoting the continuance of trade, industry and business communications, whether by means of insurance or indemnity against war risk or in any other manner whatsoever—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Unanimously.

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

—and

(e) the carrying out of any measure deemed necessary or advisable by the governor in council in consequence of the war.

Unanimously adopted by this house.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is cooperation.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: And containing, moreover, the clause that:

(1) The governor in council may make, from time to time, such orders or regulations as may be deemed necessary to give effect to the purposes of the War Expenditure and Demobilization Appropriation Act, No. 1, 1945, and of this act, and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms, the governor in council may, by order or regulation:

(a) make provision for the appointment of temporary civil officers, clerks and employees and determine their rates of compensation and conditions of employment;

(b) determine the rates of pay and allowances of officers and men of the naval, military and air forces of Canada;

(c) prescribe administrative practices with respect to contracts and agreements for the execution of any public work or for the acquisition of lands, buildings, equipment, stores, materials and supplies by purchase or otherwise, for the use of the public service of Canada;

(d) provide for the utilization, control and disposal of equipment, materials and supplies; and

(e) prescribe administrative practices with respect to the making of financial commitments, the taking of security for the performance of contracts and agreements, and the recording and paying of accounts.

(2) All orders and regulations of the governor in council made under the War Expenditure and Demobilization Appropriation Act, No. 1, 1945, and this act shall have the force of law and may be varied, extended, or revoked by any subsequent order or regulation, but if any order or regulation is varied, extended or revoked neither the previous operation thereof nor anything duly done thereunder shall be affected thereby . . .

Mr. MACKENZIE: Unanimously.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That was passed by this parliament—by you, gentlemen; you who were here sitting in this committee, without a word of dissent, without a whimper that there was anything being done there that was going to tear down the traditional, constitutional institutions of this country. Where were hon. members opposite who are so scandalized when we come in now and say that because there is a continuing emergency arising out of the war there should be an orderly continuance or discontinuance of those measures of control which it was found necessary to have in force during the war?

Surely it is not the leader of the opposition. When I spoke about something similar a few weeks ago I was quoting from a speech he delivered on April 23, 1945, I believe it was, in which he said that of course no one could contest the necessity for having applied these controls during the war, and that they could not be expected to come off in one fell swoop after the war was over. He thought they would have to be unwound with care and due planning. But when we come to this house and ask it to provide us with the necessary power so to unwind them with care and due planning, some hon. members find an opportunity for raising a political hue and cry.

I do not suppose one should become indignant over it. I do not know what we would be doing if we were on the other side of the house, and they were here. I do think they would be doing what we find it necessary to do. And I think it is time now, when there are not so many days left in this session of parliament, to forget the possibility of there being some political advantage in speeches of that kind, and to get down to business and deal with the legislation before us.

Mr. FRASER: The minister should take that to himself.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It was for that reason I refrained from making any reply to the speeches delivered on the motion for second reading of the bill. I thought after the speech of the leader of the opposition it was desirable to get into committee and to consider these sections one by one, to see if they were now in proper shape; and, if not, to see if they could be improved upon, without their being cut down to the extent that they would not operate, or to find out if they might be put into a form which might perhaps be more palatable to all of us.

None of us likes provisions which go to great lengths. But even in the drawing up of the proposed amendments I had more than one long session with the officers of the law department in an effort to reduce the possible spread of the sections in the bill. But I did it with a view to retaining in the bill what might be necessary for the purposes and effects the people of this country expect their parliament and government to attain for them, during this transitional period of reconstruction and reconversion. I was guided by their advice as to what might be necessary for that purpose.

One hon. member has said: "There is to be a provision in this that orders in council enacted under it will be brought down and laid before parliament, and may be dealt with within a period of twenty-eight days. But what chance is there for a motion of an hon. member getting consideration in this house? The record of this session shows how many of these private resolutions were voted upon." I have discussed this matter with my colleagues, and I am authorized to say that if at any time an order in council tabled in the house is challenged by any hon. member the government will use its best endeavours to expedite the discussion of such a resolution, and bring it to a vote of the house.

An hon. MEMBER: Would you put it in the bill?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, I will not ask that that be put in the bill. And I do not think that there is a majority of members in the house who will think that after I have made that statement it will be necessary to put it in the bill. Perhaps the hon. member would require to have it in the bill, but I do not think the majority in the house would want it.

I will give the hon. member for Lake Centre another undertaking, if he wishes to have it. If at any time during the next session of parliament he wishes to bring in a bill to repeal any one of these measures the government will use its best endeavours to expedite the consideration of any such bill.

All that is intended and all that is wanted is something that will enable this government to carry out the responsibilities it assumed on behalf of the Canadian people when it went before them at the last general election.

There seems to me something very unreal about this challenge as to there having been such dictatorial autocracy pushing people around in this country. If there was dictatorial autocracy in pushing people around, then we in the government are responsible for what was done, and we took that responsibility before the Canadian people—and it so happens that we are sitting here, and hon. gentlemen opposite sitting there.

Someone asked the other night: What would be the impression of a traveller who would return to parliament from Mars after a stay there of fifteen or twenty years? One would almost think there were lots of those travellers in this house. They do not seem to have been anywhere near this country for the last several months.

Other hon. members say: It is alleged that there is an emergency situation in Canada, but you have not brought forward the proof of such an emergency. Well, is there any hon. member who has not spent fifteen or twenty years in Mars, who does not know what has been going on in this country and what is the situation in this country at the present time? Is there any hon. member who can be better informed by anybody than by his own observation of what the economic situation is in this country at the present time?

An hon. MEMBER: Terrible.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: My hon. friend says that it is terrible. Has my hon. friend found no one who did not find there were conditons which unfortunately were terrible for him and which it was not possible to alleviate immediately? Does my hon. friend know of no one who is not in a position to find convenient and proper shelter in this country? Does the hon. member realize that everything possible since V-E day has been done to provide shelter? When I hear hon. members saying that if there was a shortage of housing it was because there had not been proper foresight, prudent looking ahead, I ask: Is there any hon. member who would, while the war was on, have wished the man-power or the resources of this country to be diverted to the building of houses instead of being devoted to fighting the enemy? If there is, I would like to see him rise in his place in this house and say so and take the responsibility for that attitude before his countrymen.

There were many things said in the speech delivered by the hon. member for Stanstead yesterday afternoon. No one on this side would have ventured to go so far as he did in the praise he meted out to the government for what was done. Here is what he said at page 2921 of Hansard:

> I do not criticize those who had the responsibility of enacting the legislation that brought these controls about. They were anxious to win the war. They had but one aim in view, and they have achieved that aim.

I would fully subscribe to that. The Canadian people had one aim, namely to win the war, and the Canadian people achieved that aim. So long as it was necessary to do that, they had but one thought in mind—win the war, and do the things necessary to win the war—and they were not thinking of slum clearance and of building houses at that time. But immediately V-E day came, the effort was made to remedy the lack of housing and to overcome the inactivity in that field which the war had compelled for several years. It has been stated in this house that the target is the construction of 50,000 new homes within the space of a calendar year, and that target will be realized. But even with that, there is still a terrible housing situation, and there is still a situation which, if rental controls were removed, would give la Ligue des propriétaires handsome returns on their ownership of rental houses. It is necessary, most hon. members are agreed, to maintain some controls.

But some hon. members say: Give us a clear-cut plan. Tell us what were the orders in council that were made during the war period, what are those that are still in operation, what are those that you want to continue in operation, what are those that you are going to repeal, and so forth? That is very nice. There were almost, it was said, one hundred thousand orders in council and treasury minutes passed during the war. The clerk of the privy council has given me exact figures about that. I have read the terms of one of the war appropriation bills, and they were all in the same terms. Practically all the administrative orders might have been made under the terms of these appropriation bills. But at that time, rightly or wrongly, our whole thoughts were on winning the war, and there was in operation the War Measures Act, which had been passed in 1914 by a previous government of another complexion. That act was very broad in its terms and was sufficient authority for anything that the government felt it was reasonable and proper to do toward winning the war. For that reason the War Measures Act was in a very large number of cases expressly referred to in orders in council that would have been fully justified under other measures. There was a small number, practically less than 3 per cent, of orders of a legislative nature. Hon. members have said that they did not know what those were; they never saw them. Well, if they did not know them, if they never saw them, it is because they did not take the trouble—it was a considerable trouble and I am not blaming them because I did not do it myself—of going over these six or eight volumes of war proclamations and orders that were put out as blue books and then the four volumes per annum, too, of Canadian war orders and regulations, four published each year with a cumulative explanatory index every three months showing the effect of each upon the other.

It is true that we did not do that as neatly as it was done in the United Kingdom. I have before me the 16th edition of the defence regulations. Evidently fifteen times prior to the 9th of May, 1945, they consolidated them and issued them in book form, numbered seriatim—a very convenient thing. The lawyers in the United Kingdom were in a more comfortable position to find out what the regulations were than were the lawyers in Canada, but there are not very many lawyers in Canada who have seriously complained of the fact that up to V-E day the government of Canada and the people of Canada were giving their whole thought to winning the war, and not to tidiness in the form in which the regulations had to be issued. I am not in a position to say to the hon. member for Lake Centre that this is the series of orders in council that are in force and that would remain enforced under the proposed section 4 of this bill. I have been doing other things than compiling these orders for the purpose of giving that information to the hon. member, and I am not sorry that I did other things. I think the things I did were more important than would have been the compiling of these orders to give the hon. member that information.

What this bill seeks to do now is to put, in a form which we think is apt to be more acceptable to some hon. members than was the previous form, an enumeration of the powers which it may be necessary to exercise. I hope it will not be necessary. I hope that from now on it will be possible to get along without exercising any of those powers for other purposes than for cutting down restrictions. But I am not in a position to guarantee that we are going to get through the next few months and maintain an orderly system of such controls as are necessary and an orderly decontrol without ever doing something new. I am not prepared to guarantee that that can be accomplished, and therefore I took the advice of the law officers as to the form a bill should have to make it possible to meet such unforeseen conditions as may arise in that process.

Much has been made of the terms of some of the subsections of bill No. 15, for instance section 2 (b):

facilitating the readjustment of industry and commerce to the requirements of the community in time of peace.

I am not much concerned whether that stays there or not.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Hear, hear.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That was taken from paragraph (c) of section 1 of the supplies and services (transitional powers) bill which was passed, for a period of five years, by the parliament of the United Kingdom.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: To bring in socialism.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If there is never any more socialism in Canada than this country will get from this government under this bill, the hon. member may remain perfectly undisturbed. The clause is in exactly the same form in section 1, paragraph (c) of this supplies and services (transitional powers) act. Quite frankly, it might be invoked, but I do not think it will be. I do not at the present moment see very well how it could be, but I am told that it might be of some use in doing something to the foreign exchange control regulations which are in existence and which the government intend to ask parliament to continue in existence under this bill.

Then, the hon. member for Lake Centre said that there were many of these clauses which in other words would express power to which he had taken exception on November 23. I do not deny that. We are not trying to meet all the objections which the hon. member raised on the 23rd of November. It is not only for the sake of the hon. member for Lake Centre that we are asking that this legislation be passed; we are asking that it be passed for the people of Canada. In determining what we would retain in the bill we were much more concerned with what would be in the interests of the people of Canada than with what would meet the objections of the hon. member for Lake Centre.

The hon. member says that no one has suggested why in the former bill there was some reference to transportation by air, by rail, by water or by road. Did the hon. member never get any complaint from anyone about the restrictions to which he was subjected in the use of automobiles, or autobuses, or trucks on the highways because of the—at the time—deplorable shortage of rubber for tires, and of oil and gasoline for motive power? Fortunately most of these restrictions have now been removed, but there are still in force a number of restrictions on travel by rail. Every time a shipload of returned men arrives at one of the ports of eastern Canada there is a general mobilization of rail equipment which is regulated and controlled in the interest, not only of the men who are returning, but in the interest of Canada, because Canada owes those men the best transportation it can provide for them when it is bringing them home from the fields where they went and risked their lives for the institutions of this Canada of theirs.

These powers are expressed in language which is broad and which is intended to be broad. It is intended to meet contingencies which may arise. But, so that we would follow another example set by that socialist government of the United Kingdom, we put into this bill a provision that anything the governor in council chose to do under it would be done upon the assumption that if it were to be done by legislation it would have the consent of the Senate and of the House of Commons as well as of the crown. Legislation, to be enacted, requires the three branches of parliament. Under these special conditions we think that, for the sake of having expeditious action, it is proper that the governor in council have from the Senate and the House of Commons a delegation of power to be exercised on the assumption that whatever the governor in council does thereby has the implied consent of the Senate and the House of Commons; and we say that we shall bring down everything which is thus done at the earliest possible moment and lay it on the tables of parliament, and that if either house chooses to say by resolution that it should not continue in operation, thereupon it shall cease to operate. Does any hon. member think that the governor in council, the government advising His Excellency the Governor General, will take the risk lightly of putting through things which it will bring before this parliament and which this parliament will then resolve to annul?

Let us get down to earth. I think most hon. members want the situation that is going to unroll itself during the next several months to be properly taken care of; and any government which exercises these powers in view of the fact that it will immediately declare to both houses of parliament how it exercises them and for what purpose it exercises them, will be reasonably careful that it does not indulge in fancies which will be frowned upon by either house.

I have heard the question asked, why leave it to either house thus to annul something decided by the governor in council. Quite frankly that was put in there to safeguard the absolute right of this house, unfettered in any way, to disapprove anything that the governor in council might do. If members of this house prefer to have it that a resolution of both houses of parliament will be required to have the effect of annulling something decided by the governor in council, I know there are a great many on this side who will be far better pleased with it; and if, when we are discussing that provision, it appears to be the desire of this house to subject its decision to a concurring decision from the other place, there will be no objection from the government to accepting a suggestion of that kind. But it was felt that it would not be respecting the full power and control of this house to have it otherwise than as expressed in the bill.

The section that is now under consideration provides, as the hon. member for Lake Centre so well pointed out, that the governor in council may do anything that he deems necessary or advisable because of the national emergency arising out of the war for any of the purposes enumerated in the five subparagraphs. The limitation is not on the objects which the orders in council or regulations may deal with, but on the purposes for which he may deal with them. He may deal with them for any one of the purposes thus enumerated. Subsection 2 provides that the orders shall, for the purpose of the Interpretation Act, be deemed to be regulations. That is merely for the purpose of avoiding having to repeat in this bill what is contained in the Interpretation Act, which applies to all enactments and which is a statute of some forty-two sections.

The third subsection provides that the orders shall be laid before parliament and that there shall be a period of twenty-eight days during which, in either house, a resolution may be moved to annul; and once more, if such a resolution is moved, the government will do its best to bring it to a decision at once, because it has no fear that the kind of things it will pass will not have the approval of the majority in this house, whatever may be the views of those who challenge the order in the resolution tabled. The government will have this further incentive to getting prompt decision upon it, that the psychological effect of these regulations on the Canadian public is now very satisfactory and has been built up over a period of several years; and if there were anything happening now to make those who are disposed to evade the provisions of the regulations feel that there had been any loosening up, it would be a considerable task to recreate by enforcement action the psychology which is necessary if we are to have the whole of the public respect the regulations that are made in the interests of all. That is all there is in section 2.

I am not in a position to answer specific questions put to me by the hon. member for Lake Centre. I am not in a position to say which control will come off or when. I can say to the hon. member that this morning's papers announced the removal of controls on construction permits. Of course that does not mean that it will be possible to build any more constructions than the material available will provide for, but it does mean that no one will have to get any other permit than the permits from the local authorities, to proceed when he can with any construction he chooses to undertake.

The hon. member said that he was not sure whether there were still permits in regard to the starting of new businesses. Personally I do not know; perhaps the Minister of Finance knows. But certainly there has been no removal of the quota system on the distribution of much of the material used in industry. There is still a shortage of that material. There was established and there is still being maintained a quota system whereby in many cases about eighty per cent of the material available is distributed on the quotas established during the period of 1941. There is about twenty per cent that is free for distribution to others than holders of quotas. Is that a good thing? Is it a bad thing? It is a thing which worked out very satisfactorily during the war. It is a thing which we think is good and which we are going to take the responsibility of maintaining because we think it is good so long as the reasons for it are apparent.

The hon. member asks whether price controls are to be removed. Price controls will certainly not be removed in the immediate future. Are wage ceilings to be done away with? Wage ceilings will certainly not be done away with in the immediate future. Is there to be any modification in those matters? That has been and is and will continue to be daily under active consideration for the purpose and to the end of lightening and removing these controls just as rapidly as the government feels that they can be removed and that it will still be respecting its responsibility to the Canadian public.

Reference has been made to what has been happening in the United States. It is not the place here to criticize what is happening there. I will make no comment. I will ask those hon. members who have had occasion to visit in the United States recently whether what is going on there is better suited to the needs of the majority of the public than what is happening here. I think I will leave it at that. We may be wrong, but we think that the manner in which the situation has been handled here has been more satisfactory to the Canadian public than had we duplicated here what has happened in the country of our very good neighbours to the south, and we intend to continue to apply the policy which we, with our advisers, consider is best suited to the needs of the Canadian people. If we have to make any new regulations we shall bring them here, and we shall get the opinion of the members of this house upon them.

As to those which are now in effect, if this house accepts, as I hope it will, the bill with the proposed amendments that we have suggested here and maintains in effect—I do not care whether it be by virtue of the law or whether they say to us the governor in council may continue in force under this measure all the things in force on the day when it comes into operation—the regulations we shall be satisfied. We are not trying to get rid of any responsibility. We do not feel the burden of any responsibility is too great for us to carry. We carried it through the month of June and we are prepared to carry it forward to any other contest when it may have to be judged by the public. We are not asking anyone else to take any portion of it, and we are not prepared to give any of those who criticize it any part of the credit which gave us the result which was achieved at the last June election. That we are not concerned about. But if hon. members feel that they will be in an easier position; if they say, "Well, if you want those things which are now in force and which are operating in a manner which is generally satisfactory, to continue in operation, do not ask us to say that they should continue, but we will allow you to say so." That is a matter of indifference. What we shall ask this committee to do is to say that they shall continue or that we shall have the right to say that they shall continue because we think they are necessary, and if the committee says that we shall have the right to say that they will continue we shall not hesitate about saying so.

With respect to the other point raised, my understanding is now recorded. My colleagues will respect it. Whenever any hon. member chooses to introduce a bill to repeal any of those controls which he thinks should disappear and which we think should not yet disappear we shall facliitate as much as is in our power the taking of the opinion of this house upon it.

Mr. MacINNIS: I thought when we came in this evening that we had finished with the debate that should have taken place on the second reading of the bill. I am not objecting to the speech that has just been made by the Minister of Justice. Indeed I believe his speech was long overdue and I am glad that it was made. I should like, however, to draw attention to one matter that he mentioned. He said he did not know what the Liberal party would be doing in this case if they were on this side of the house and the Progressive Conservatives on the other. Well, I do, because I happened to be here when the Liberals were on this side of the house and the Conservatives on the other, and they were doing just the same thing as the Conservatives are doing to-day.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Only better.

Mr. MacINNIS: Well, I agree that the minister who was then merely the hon. member for Vancouver Centre did perhaps a better job then than he is doing now, although I am not reflecting on what he is doing now. He was a very vocal if not a very consistent member of the opposition. I suggest in all earnestness that such methods are not good policy to-day. I believe that that is the sort of thing which is bringing parliamentary institutions into disrepute, because people will no longer believe in the sincerity of parties which, when they are on the opposition side of the house act one way on a question, and when they are on the government side act another way on the same question.

I am one of the twenty-five members left of those who came here in 1930. During all the time that I have been in the house I supported every measure introduced by the government if it appealed to me as a constructive measure, regardless of the sneers I might receive from this side, and I supported the opposition when I thought it was in the right, regardless of the jeers I received from the other side. I am convinced that is the only position a member should take to-day, because I am satisfied that the government cannot do anything in the way of good government without helping along the things that I want to do. I do not believe that the government can do anything wrong, or anything that is not in the interest of the people without adversely affecting the cause I have at heart. Therefore I repeat, if we wish to be taken as sincere people we must have the same point of view when we are on this side of the question as we have when we are on the other side of the question.

I believe that we should try to come to grips with this important issue. The hon. member for Lake Centre referred to the extradition treaty and suggested that it was an important issue. I believe that this is an immensely more important piece of legislation than the extradition treaty. I do not know if there is time to give it to a special committee, but if there were time I would certainly advocate that because if we could get the hon. member for Lake Centre into a special committee I have the idea that he would act in a much less partisan way than he does in the house, and consequently be far more useful in dealing with a matter of this kind.

I do not want the hon. gentleman to take offence at what I am going to say. He disturbs me, because when I see him in action I have the feeling that he is a man of great ability, great application, but yet a man of—if this is the proper term—tremendous ineffectiveness. He destroys the constructive effect of what he is seemingly attempting to do. I am not objecting because he aroused the Minister of Justice, but he destroyed the effect he should have had on the Minister of Justice, if, indeed, it was his hope to make the best of this bill, a bill which we all agree is necessary. He destroyed that effectiveness by the way in which he put forward his arguments. He would shake his finger and his head in protest. The result is that no cooperation is possible.

If we are sincere it should be a fairly simple matter to deal with this bill. When we start discussing the various sections of the bill, not being trained in the law, I feel myself at a disadvantage. I think I can understand ordinary English and what words mean, but when I hear lawyers talk I am convinced that words do not mean the same thing to me as they do to the lawyers. I realize I am not the only person affected in this way. After long observation I have come to the conclusion that there is no finality to any lawsuit except that imposed by the financial resources of the persons concerned and the number of courts to which it can be taken. When either the finances or the courts are finished then the case is at an end.

I have received a great many communications in regard to bill No. 15 as it was first introduced, but I think every one of the letters and petitions had to do with paragraph (g) of subsection 1 of section 3. That paragraph is out, and another part of subsection 1 of section 3 is out also. That part may not seem important to the hon. member for Lake Centre, but to me it seems important. I refer to the words, "but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms." It seems to me that rather limits the application of what the hon. member says are the similar provisions in section 2 of the new bill. I would suggest that, as the hon. member for Lake Centre knows how to do legal drafting, we take up the bill section by section, and when he comes to one he does not like let him move to delete it or amend it to conform to his ideas of what controls are wanted.

Then we can compare the amendment with the bill and we shall have a better idea as to which should be maintained.

I am convinced that we shall never produce anything constructive if we continue in the attitude we have adopted so far. So, then, I would appeal to this committee either to refer the bill to a special committee, where we shall get it out of the atmosphere of this house and away from the galleries, and where we can deal with it quietly and in an orderly fashion to achieve a certain end. Let us get down earnestly to business, each adding his quota of improvement to the bill which we are all convinced is to some extent necessary. Mention was made of the serious days ahead. Let us not delude ourselves that the days ahead will not be serious and that we do not want or will not need legislation of this kind. In my opinion it is not so much government control that is required as elasticity in government action so that it can deal with a situation as it arises or develops. That is what is involved, rather than control; it is elasticity of administration. And that, I believe, is what we should keep in mind in dealing with this matter.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I think I can quite truthfully say that I had not intended speaking on this matter, nor would I have done so but for the impassioned and, I say somewhat regretfully, the rather angry political speech made by the Minister of Justice. I see that beside him and behind him that remark creates some amusement. I am very happy to note that he has as his cheer leader the unanimous Minister of Veterans Affairs, who sits immediately to his left. I was also happy to note that the greatest applause he received was when he struck high points of great humour. Those desks simply rattled when he informed the hon. member for Lake Centre that this bill was not being submitted for his benefit but for the benefit of the whole of the people of Canada. The boys simply went wild at that. What wonderful humour came from the lips of the minister, and what appreciation was shown by the gentle jury which sits behind him! I know the Minister of Justice is one of the ablest lawyers in Canada—

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I almost equalled his applause on that one. For many years he has been a great ornament to our profession, but to-night I learned something about him that I never knew before. I always see his name as practising before many high courts, those about which the hon. member for Vancouver East was so worried just a moment ago, but to-night I learned that at some time or another he had a police court practice which must have been carried on in very far places where the justice of the peace or magistrate did not know much about his business. The hon. gentleman's advocacy went so far to-night as to take this appropriation of $1,365,000,000 to which we consented—yes, unanimously—in order to get the civil servants of this country paid, as the Minister of Finance asked us to do; then he turned around and said, "Where were you that we did not hear a whimper?" That is not good practice in any court or any assembly.

Mr. ILSLEY: But, Mr. Chairman, the civil servants are not paid out of that appropriation

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Apparently we have two cheering champions now. I am sorry I cannot hear some of those remarks; I know they must be good. I was not here last evening; may I say it was the first session of the house I have missed since I have been in Ottawa, but I am very glad the hon. member for Stanstead made his speech. As I read the speech of the Minister of Agriculture, and as I listened to ninety per cent of the speech of the Minister of Justice to-night, I discovered that if it had not been for what the hon. member for Stanstead had said both these hon. gentlemen would have been tongue-tied, because that was about all they paid any attention to.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is the only simple contribution I have to make. Let us endeavour to strip this thing of all the talking we have been doing—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): —and I include myself, being just as foolish as hon. gentlemen who now applaud. But stripped to its nakedness, if I may use that expression, what does it mean? As the hon. member for Vancouver East so well said, we all realize that some control is still necessary in this country. No one, I am quite sure, will deny or has denied that. I think that is a simple and very fair statement to make. Occasionally one becomes a bit annoyed at someone else. Perhaps we are interrupted. I have not even heard the unanimous Minister of Veterans Affairs say in this house, "It was a dirty Tory trick", although I have been waiting for that remark. I have not heard that remark. I know it is coming sooner or later, because he has a copyright on that, and Hansard has been full of it for the last fifteen years. I have read it.

But does it not simply mean this: We say, "controls?—Yes, they are necessary." I do not wish to buy eggs at the price at which the Minister of Justice bought them a while ago, or bacon at the price at which he bought it. Those were terrific prices. That was done, I gather, because it was under an administration from this side. How would it be for all political parties in the house, from now on, to do this: Let them admit that occasionally they have been wrong. This business of parties knowing perfectly well that they were wrong twenty years ago, and trying to justify it by devious ways here and now is, to my mind, complete nonsense. The man who does not admit he is wrong is the man who will never learn anything.

My real point is this, that it seems to me that what we all seek is a measure of control to avoid inflation. None of us wants these controls to go to the extent that they will frighten investment or frighten business. I think those are simple problems upon which all of us can be agreed.

Now, then what happens? We who sit over here say that the ministers of the government who sit opposite, have a great deal of information. Tell us what you want. To what extent do you want (a), (b), (c), (d) or (e), or whatever it may be? Tell us that, and then we will support you. Mainly what we have said is that this is too broad.

I do not think ministers of the crown are going to take our birthright away from us, or anything like that, by way of order in council. No, I do not think they are. But the fact that I do not think so does not alter the principle that if this bill is passed in its present broad form, parliament has given up its authority, for whatever time you may wish, unnecessarily. It may never be used. But it is neither here nor there whether it is used or not. I make this appeal: I know the people the minister has who can draw statutes. I think Mr. Varcoe is one of the ablest men in law I know, here or anywhere else. I know that he, in conjunction with the able people they have over there can say, "We are bringing down this bill. We will control prices there, and wages and exchange"—and the like. They may do that, for whatever time they say. Then surely all of those to my right and to my left and in front of me can all fall in line, because we believe in the same thing.

What are we doing? We seem to be quarreling about things which perhaps are not of major importance. We are getting off into the by-ways. But the fact remains that this bill should not be permitted to assume this authority, except without the greatest struggle that we over here can possibly put up.

Mr. MACDONNELL: I wish to add a word to what has been said by the hon. member for Calgary West. I had not intended to speak either, and perhaps the reason I am speaking is that I felt the minister had scolded us like rather naughty boys—though one never knows just how much of what a trained lawyer says he really means, and how much he just says because he is a very good counsel, and is acting for his client.

But I wish to say this, that the minister at some length, and I must say with a considerable degree of warmth, argued that we were being unreasonable and uncooperative. I am not going to waste the time of the committee by saying that we consider that it is hon. members opposite who are being uncooperative. But I wish to say this—and this is chiefly a repetition of what my colleague to my right has said—that we have no reason to doubt that a great many people throughout this country are greatly exercised about the powers conferred by this bill. One might often be mistaken about public opinion. One may get letters from people whose views are all cockeyed. But it must be clear that there is endorsation of our view. Unless reports are all wrong, when the provincial premiers were here, if we can believe reports, which appear to be credible, there was extraordinary unanimity among them—and let me add that they were not all of our stripe of political opinion—that this bill did need revision.

We then hoped that it was then going to get revision. Quite frankly I hoped that it would, and that it was going to meet the situation. But I am bound to say that as I listened to the hon. member for Lake Centre this evening, and as I read the extremely wide provisions of paragraphs (b) and (c), it seemed to me that a rose by any other name would smell as sweet, and that, as the hon. member for Lake Centre said, the new words are about as wide as the old. If I am right in thinking that there is a very strong public opinion in this matter, and if I am right in thinking that the provincial premiers had that view, then surely we are not very unreasonable in asking that some reasons be given to us.

Why, for example, do we have all these controls over transportation by air, rail and water? Are they necessary? I must say that this evening for the very first time the minister began to take some trouble to tell us why these powers were needed. Frankly I think that in that respect he has made only a beginning. I was very much unconvinced by what he said about the railroads. I would need more persuasion that it needs this control to persuade the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to do what every citizen of this country wants to have done, namely, to have these priorities given to the soldiers. Let me repeat that that seemed to me most unconvincing.

I do not wish the minister to feel that we are being unreasonable. I wish him to feel that we want to cooperate. Whatever may have been the opinion two months ago, I say that, despite the fact that hon. members opposite smiled when the hon. member for Lake Centre said he was willing to cooperate, no one should doubt our desire to cooperate. Unless we are unwilling to believe that the people of Canada are not sincere in their apprehensions, then I suggest that the hon. member for Lake Centre was not unreasonable when he asked that we should have a fuller explanation from the Minister of Justice. I say to him that he should go on and finish the job, because as these words appear in the bill they go away beyond what we think is needed.

The minister referred to a speech which had been made by the leader of the opposition. I wished afterwards that he had gone on to deal with that speech. However, he was so attracted, as was the Minister of Agriculture last night, toward dealing with the speech of the hon. member for Stanstead, because it happened to contain some praise of the Liberal party—we are generous people—and I do not mean the present Liberal party—that he failed to do so. But it seems to me that we would have spent our time more profitably if the minister had dealt with the definite points upon which the leader of the opposition agreed we needed control. He might have got an advance copy of the speech, as the Minister of Agriculture did last night in respect of the speech delivered by the hon. member for Stanstead. Had he done that, he would have known exactly what was in it.

I am really endorsing what was said by the hon. member for Vancouver East. It seems to me that if we start in that way; if the minister would take those controls to which the leader of the opposition agreed, and if he would draft the bill, starting from that point, we might find agreement before we knew where we were.

Mr. HACKETT: Mr. Chairman, I have been absent from the house, but if reports are true, then neither the Minister of Agriculture nor the Minister of Justice have lost much time in my praise.

[Mr. MacDonnell.]

I am not given to explaining, much less to complaining. I should, however, like to tell hon. members opposite, when they pound their desks—and I am relying upon what I read in the press in Toronto this morning—and cheer the remarks of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, and of my Hibernian friend the hon. member for Vancouver East, that this bill is right up their alley. It is a bill which enacts the very legislation that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and those who share his views would enact in permanency, did the people of this country in their wisdom ever call those hon. members to office.

So, when hon. members opposite express approval of the remarks of these hon. gentlemen, I would ask them to recall that there is a difference between the principles of government—in so far as they have any—professed by hon. members opposite and those of the hon. members for Rosetown-Biggar and Vancouver East.

I should like to draw this to the attention of the Minister of Justice. He said, as I came into the chamber a few moments ago, that the administration of the controls and the enactment of bill No. 15 were in conformity with the wishes of the great majority of the Canadian people and would have the approval of the great majority of the Canadian people. I suggest to hon. gentlemen opposite that statements of that kind show just how remote the government is from popular sentiment in this country, and if they have any doubt about it I suggest that they refer this matter to a committee and let the people of Canada come before that committee and tell them what they think of controls. If they do that and can convince themselves after they have heard what the people of Canada do think of these regulations and how they long to be freed from them, there will be no further opposition from at least one member of this house.

I should like to know where all these bedtime stories come from, stories of the terrible perils and the dire penalties and severe trials that await the Canadian people if the federal cabinet do not continue these controls. It would be of interest to know the source of these stories, to know their origin. We were given the story by hon. gentlemen opposite, and I do not question their good faith, but I submit that they are too busy with their duties of office to be in very close touch with the people at large, and I suggest to them that if they will take the time to inquire, they will find out that every little person and every big person in Canada, every housewife, every grocer, every merchant, every mechanic, every workingman are seeking liberation from the intolerable scourge of control that has been upon us for so long a time.

The hon. member for Vancouver East entered into a homily, as did the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, about the iniquities of the Conservative party in days gone past, but I would draw this to the attention of the committee that, whatever may have been the controls that were exercised by that party, it was during the period of emergency, and when the period of emergency was over the cabinet control ceased. That is what I ask, and nothing more.

Mr. JAENICKE: When I spoke on this bill when it was before the house in its original form I voiced three objections, two of which have been cured by this amendment, and the third objection I think has been pretty well met in subsection 3 of section 2, but there is one passage on which I entertain some doubts and of which I should like an explanation from the minister. It is this phraseology:

> If either the Senate or House of Commons within the period of twenty-eight days . . . resolves that it be annulled . . .

I think the word "parliament" should be substituted for either house. A resolution to annul an order in council such as these would be in the line of legislation, and according to our constitution legislation can only be passed by parliament, which includes the Senate and the House of Commons.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: This clause is taken almost verbatim from the act that was passed by the parliament of the United Kingdom.

Mr. JAENICKE: Their act says "parliament".

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, either house of parliament. I will send a copy of the act over to my hon. friend and he will find that section 4 reads, starting at line 31 on page 3:

> . . . and every order in council made under this act, shall be laid before parliament as soon as may be after it is made; and if either house of parliament, within the period of forty days beginning with the day on which any such order in council, order or instrument is laid before it, resolves that it be annulled, it shall cease to have effect, . .

The reason it was expressed in this form, that if either house of parliament resolves that it be annulled it shall cease to have effect, is not because the resolution is regarded as legislation, but because the order in council is regarded as legislation on the assumption that the crown had the consent of both houses of parliament. If either house within the period of twenty-eight days from the time the order in council is placed before it expresses itself by resolution to the contrary, then the order ceases to have legislative effect.

Mr. JAENICKE: Would the resolution have to have the endorsation of the other house?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No. But if it is preferred that it should be a resolution of one house concurred in by the other, that would be quite acceptable to the government. The government in making this proposal felt that it should not put this house in the position where, if it resolved that an order in council should not operate, the resolution should be subject to concurrence by the other house before it brought about the cessation of the operation of the order in council. But if the members of the house feel that it is preferable that there should be a resolution of both houses in order to bring about the cessation of effect of an order in council, that would be quite agreeable to the government.

Mr. JAENICKE: I think that would be the proper procedure, because I doubt very much whether under our constitution either house could pass such a resolution, which has the effect of passing legislation because it repeals any order in council which is the law.

Mr. LESAGE: The Minister of Justice said that it was an assumption of the governor in council when an order in council was passed that both houses would approve the order, which is legislation. It may be answered that if both houses adopt bill No. 15, we are surrendering to the government our legislative powers in given matters and that therefore there is no need of this assumption by the governor in council. As an hon. member on the other side of the house said, when parliament wants to withdraw or to annul an order in council, it is new legislation, and I submit very respectfully that under our constitution it should be by both houses.

There is another argument, which arises from a practical point of view. Decontrol will be a very difficult thing. Why take the risk that one or both houses would study the matter rapidly, and in supposedly taking off the price ceiling on one commodity, risk a crumbling of the whole economy of control? I think it will be quite easy to add, after the word "annulled" in the fifth line of page 3, the following words, "and the said resolution is concurred in by the other chamber, after formal notification by the initiating chamber," then "it shall cease to have effect." I offer this for the consideration of the Minister of Justice and members of the committee.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I should like to direct two questions to the hon. the Minister of Justice. Does he consider that the powers requested in bill No. 15 as reprinted are less extensive than those that were set forth in the original bill? That is my first question; if the minister will kindly answer it I shall ask him the second one.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, I consider that the powers requested in bill No. 15 as reprinted are less extensive than those set forth in the original bill.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): In that case, may I ask the honourable the Minister of Justice whether, when on November 23 he moved the second reading of the original bill No. 15, he was asking for powers more extensive than those which the government needs to deal with the emergency which it claims it has to face?

Mr. ST. LAURENT; The hon. member is a past master when it comes to asking questions which he thinks are disconcerting, but I may say that they do not disconcert me at all. I shall tell him quite frankly that what was requested in the bill introduced on November 23 implied things that are not asked for at this time, but which we have not forgone and will request from parliament through other measures.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): I am not at all trying to embarrass the Minister of Justice. I am just seeking information. On November 23, a bill was submitted to us asking for powers that seemed too far-reaching to me, and now, a new measure, a second edition of bill No. 15, is introduced and the minister acknowledges that the powers sought are not so extended. May I not conclude that, when the government submitted the first draft of the bill, they were seeking more extensive powers than warranted by the urgency of the conditions alluded to?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member may draw that conclusion if he wishes, but it is not logical to do so.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): Everyone is at liberty to appraise facts and circumstances as he sees them.

(Text.)

Mr. JAENICKE: The minister indicated that he would have no objection to changing the wording of subsection 3 so that the resolution to annul must be passed by parliament. The hon. member who spoke a moment ago has suggested some amendment, but I think the whole matter can be cleared up by striking out the words "either the Senate or House of Commons" and by substituting therefor the word "parliament". I move:

That subsection 3 of section 2 be amended by striking out the words "either the Senate or House of Commons" as said words appear in lines 39 and 40, and substituting therefor the word "parliament."

Mr. LESAGE: Yes. What about "twenty-eight days"? It is too short.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not think the hon. member will get from that what he really wants, because if he substitutes "parliament" that would have to be formal legislation, which would require the three branches of parliament; that is to say, the governor general representing His Majesty, the senate, and the commons. So that if it were a resolution of parliament and that resolution were not concurred in by the governor general, it would not become effective. I think it should be "the houses of parliament", because there it is not something which should require the consent of the governor general on the advice of the government to deal with something that the government itself had already dealt with.

Mr JAENICKE: I am just worrying about the question of constitutionality under the British North America Act.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think the result would be achieved by saying, "and if the Senate and House of Commons within a period of twenty-eight days . . . resolve."

Mr. JAENICKE: Yes, I think that would meet it.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That would mean that the two houses would have to pass the resolution, but that the governor in council would have no right, by refusing assent, to prevent the resolution of the two houses from being effective. If it is the wish of hon. members that that be substituted for the amendment as suggested, the government would have no objection.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I think that if that change were made it might be well also to change "twenty-eight" to "forty"—

Mr. LESAGE: It may be that the senate will not be sitting: that is the trouble.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: —so as to allow sufficient time, as is the case in the British house.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There would be no objection to that. What the government wished to do by that clause was to say that whatever it did was going to come before the houses of parliament and they would have an opportunity of saying whether they thought it was right or wrong. If hon. members feel that it is better to have two concurring resolutions there is no objection, and if, as is suggested, in order to have two, you should have forty days, there is still no objection. Will the hon. member for Kindersley move that?

Mr. JAENICKE: I move that the word "or" in line thirty-nine be struck out, and the word "and" substituted.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That the word "either" be deleted, that the word "or" be replaced by the word "and", and that the words "twenty-eight" be replaced by "forty".

Mr. JAENICKE: Yes.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: And the word "resolves" by the word "resolve".

The CHAIRMAN: Does the amendment to the amendment carry?

Mr. BRACKEN: I have had no opportunity to give much consideration to the suggestion which is made, but I should like the committee to know that we are not asking that that be done. We see no reason why, if the House of Commons wants to oppose some of these regulations or orders in council, we should be prevented from doing so if the other house should object; and if we are willing to accept that privilege for ourselves, perhaps we cannot ask that it be denied others. We suggest that this action be not taken because we think it would limit our powers in this chamber of dealing with these matters.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The act as it stands permits the other place to annul legislation without reference to this house.

Mr. BRACKEN: Why not make a motion then that they be not given that power if that is what is wanted? Why limit us in the way the proposed amendment would do, just in order to curtail the other place.

Amendment to amendment agreed to on division.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It seems to me that the debate over the past couple of days has arisen not over the use of powers granted in the bill but rather over the abuse of those powers, and it is against such abuse that hon. members wish to guard. It seems to me that in the past one of the difficulties of members has been the fact that while the house has not been sitting, orders in council were passed by the hundreds. We did not know what they were and when we arrived in the house they were tabled and that was the end of it. I am particularly pleased to note in the bill now before the house in its transformed state that there are certain provisions which permit annulment if this house so decides. But with regard to the other matter, that members of parliament when the house is not sitting do not know what is happening, it would be well if there were in the bill a provision whereby members could be notified and so make themselves conversant with what the government is doing by order in council. I suggest, therefore, that in this section we might easily provide to that effect. I suggest that another amendment be made to the section to provide, in subsection 3 of section 2, that there be inserted the following words after the word "sitting" in line 38: "shall be published in the current issue of the Canada Gazette and laid before parliament." The clause would then read:

> Every order in council made under this act shall be laid before parliament within fifteen days after it has been made if parliament is then sitting, or if parliament is not then sitting, shall be published in the current issue of the Canada Gazette and laid before parliament within fifteen days after the commencement of the next ensuing session thereof.

I move that amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Kindersley.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Perhaps it would suit the hon. member's purpose, if, instead of being published in the Canada Gazette, they were published, as in any event they will be published, in the war orders and regulations now called statutory orders and regulations. That is the publication which contains all these orders in council as well as all orders made by controllers, by the wartime prices and trade board and so forth. It is intended that they shall be published, but perhaps the hon. member prefers that this be put in the bill. They will be published whether parliament is sitting or not, and if the hon. member wishes to have something in the bill to that effect, I may say that I had prepared a subsection 4 requiring that these orders be published forthwith in the statutory orders and regulations.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How often is that published?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Every week. It is a collection in which all these orders and regulations appear; there is published with each number a table showing the correlation between them; and every three months there is a correlated table published so that it is a more convenient place in which to find such matters.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I am willing to withdraw the motion if the minister substitutes his subsection 4 and if that takes care of the matter.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Would this satisfy the hon. member, that subsection 4 read:

Every order in council made under this act shall be published forthwith in statutory orders and regulations.

That is the name of this publication now by reason of the order in council which was tabled the day before yesterday.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I am agreeable to that.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I so move.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Mr. Mackenzie moves that the amendment be further amended by adding an additional paragraph to subsection 4 as follows:

Every order in council made under this act shall be published forthwith in statutory orders and regulations.

Amendment to amendment agreed to.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I should like to refer to paragraph (b) of subsection 1 of section 2:

facilitating the readjustment of industry and commerce to the requirements of the community in time of peace.

That is a very wide power, and there has been no explanation in anything that the minister said in his lengthy disposition on the subject this evening that, I submit, would justify the granting of that power at this time. As a matter of fact, he indicated that it was so comprehensive a power that so far as the government is concerned it would not press for its inclusion, and would have no objection to its exclusion. The only reason the minister gave for its inclusion was that it appeared in the British act which was introduced by the Attlee government. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario:

That paragraph (b) of subsection 1 of section 2 be deleted and that the subsequent paragraphs be renumbered accordingly.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not know of anything that would be done for that purpose that could not be done for some of the other purposes enumerated in paragraphs (a), (c), (d) and (e), but the law officers feel it might be preferable to have it there. We shall have to table anything that is done. It will have to be for one of those purposes, and it is suggested that there might be something under the foreign exchange control regulations that would not be for one of the other purposes enumerated in this section. The judgment of those sitting around me is that it would be safer to leave it there, and that no possible harm can come of it.

Mr. HACKETT: Before we go any farther may I ask the minister if now, or later, I may ask a question about paragraphs (a) and (d) of subsection 1 of section 2? Would the minister rather deal with it now or dispose of the item before the Chair?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It would be preferable to dispose of what is before the Chair.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. FULTON: The question I should like to ask is confirmed particularly to paragraph (a) of subsection 1 of section 2, and has to do first of all with the demobilization of the armed forces. Can the minister explain what he has in mind, in view of the fact that extensive powers have already been given to the government up to the end of March, 1946, by bill No. 172, at which time I presume this house will again be in session?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: But at which time the whole of the Canadian troops will not have been demobilized. It is felt that the orders made in that behalf should be such that they can continue to operate as long as there are men being demobilized. These appropriation bills have to deal with the fiscal year; there are a great many things which are done and which have been done, and possibly there may be some more which will have to be done, dealing with the maintenance of the armed forces during the occupation of enemy territory and also with demobilization. The regulations dealing with demobilization are continuing regulations. I think we can probably bring most of them, if not all of them, under the terms of the Militia Act; but during the war we had one act that we could always fall back on. If the Department of Justice were asked if such-and-such an order in council could be made and there was nothing else turned up to justify it there was always the War Measures Act that permitted its being done. I think most of what would be done for demobilization purposes could be enacted under the Militia Act, but there may be something that has not been foreseen under the Militia Act. Then there is also the rehabilitation.

Mr. FULTON: I was not asking a question on that. The feeling I have in mind, if the minister will permit me, is that the Department of National Defence has undertaken to announce the terms of service in the permanent forces by March of next year; and while I appreciate the minister undertaking to table any order in council made under this bill I believe that it might be more practicable if all those terms and all those orders and regulations which affect the armed forces, and which may possibly be of a permanent duration, were made under the terms and regulations governing the permanent forces, and brought down at that time instead of being regarded as temporary measures under this bill and tabled within twenty-eight days or so after they are made.

I should like a little further explanation of the reasons why it should not be excluded from this bill. At present there is power in bill No. 172, and presumably when it expires there will be power under whatever act or regulations are brought in governing the armed forces. Some better reason should be given why it should not be done then and left out of the present bill.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Anything done under this bill will remain in force only while the measure itself is in force, and anything that will require to have a permanent character will be done under some other provision. It is felt that it may be necessary, in the course of demobilizing the armed forces, to do something which is not sufficiently provided for in the Militia Act. If this were to be permanent legislation, perhaps we should be more careful not to have it overlap something else, but it is for the purpose of facilitating the demobilization of the armed forces, something which will be in force for a period which is said not to be very definite because there is no assurance as to when parliament will meet toward the end of 1946 or the beginning of 1947, but after all it is a relatively short period.

Mr. HACKETT: I should like to ask the Minister of Justice a question about section 2 (1) (d). I have been unable to find in the War Measures Act or in the first edition of bill No. 15 the equivalent of this paragraph. I wish to ask the minister first if its equivalent does exist in the War Measures Act or the first edition of the bill and, if it does not, why it is included in the second edition.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not think it existed in the first bill, nor do I think it existed under the War Measures Act except in an implied way. Of course under the War Measures Act things were done to relieve suffering in foreign countries. Military relief was provided as part of the military operations, and that was paid for from money appropriated under the war appropriation and under powers conferred by the war appropriation and the War Measures Act. But this is something looking to the possibility of having to do these things during this future period. Of course it does not authorize the governor in council to use any money not appropriated for such purposes or not appropriated in a way that is broad enough to include such purposes. This is the clause that would be relied upon for the purpose of rationing meat or any other rationing that might be imposed to make greater supplies available for relief purposes. The terms in which it is drawn were taken verbatim from the British bill. The way in which it came about was exactly that. The question was put, where is there here anything that would authorize the rationing of supplies in Canada for the purpose of making greater quantities available for the relief of distress elsewhere? and we were somewhat puzzled as to where we would find the appropriate clause in the bill. We had before us the British act, and we copied that clause word for word.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is one question in connection with section 2 (1) (c), which has to do with maintaining, controlling and regulating transportation. Is it a fact that at the dominion-provincial conference the provinces raised objection to any control over road transportation?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They questioned the advisability of there being anything in the bill submitted to parliament dealing expressly with road transportation, and wanted to know if it was the intention of the federal government to take over the licensing of automobiles, trucks and other light vehicles. They were assured that there was no intention to interfere with their regulations in connection with motor traffic. But there was in force and there might have to be put in force certain regulations with respect to the use made of the rubber employed in tires for motor trucks and so forth.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Would that not come under the control and regulation of supplies?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No. One of the regulations had to do with the distance a vehicle might travel. There was a regulation which limited taxis to a certain radius. That would not come under supplies. The question arose as to whether it would not be services, but there was doubt as to whether it would be included in services.

Mr. HACKETT: And bus service, where there was parallel rail service.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. HAZEN: Subsection 3 of this section provides for the annulment of orders in council. Has any consideration been given to the amendment of orders in council, which is not provided for by this section?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No. What is provided here is that an order in council may be annulled, but it is not provided that an order in council may be amended by resolution of the house. However, if the temper of the house was that an order in council should be in slightly different form from that in which it appeared, and the house annulled it for that reason, that would be an indication to the government of the kind of order that would meet with the approval of the house; and the house can always deal with these matters by legislation.

Mr. FULTON: The government has assured us that it is not seeking any powers it does not absolutely require, but I cannot escape a feeling of anxiety about the powers it now has. It has powers under two separate acts until March 31, 1946. If hon. gentlemen opposite will read the provisions of the war expenditures appropriation measure they will find that in section 5 the government has practically all the powers for which it asks under the present bill, until March 31, 1946. Since there is provision in bill No. 15 for the tabling of orders in council passed under it, would the minister be prepared to give any assurance that orders in council passed concerning the powers given under this bill will be passed under this bill, so that they will be tabled in the house, rather than under the other act, in order that we may not know what is going on?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not think I can give the hon. member any assurance in that regard. The powers in the appropriation act are for the expenditure of the money that has been provided by that act, and I could not give any assurance that when an order in council is passed for the purpose of dealing with some of the money voted in that measure a reference will be made to this bill for the purpose of bringing it before the house. There has to be an accounting of the money that has been expended under the other act; and if this measure was not before the house at all the terms of the other legislation would still be there. If it was felt proper to pass the other bill in the form in which it has been passed I do not think a suggestion should be made at this time that we are going to get powers here but we are going to try to avoid tabling what we do under those powers. We will, so long as I have anything to say about the matter, try to avoid using these emergency powers—because I do not like them. I think that in the Department of Justice we should endeavour to have done whatever is being done under the permanent legislation. That will be the attempt, so long as I am in that department. When we are consulted, we will try to find a legal way under the permanent legislation of doing what is required.

But of course when it will come to legislating or making new legislation by orders in council we may have to use these provisions. There are some other statutes under which the governor in council is given power to legislate, and the war appropriation measure was a statute of that kind. But it contemplates regulations only to deal with the money that is provided by the statute, and those regulations must not go beyond what is to be paid for out of money provided by statute. It cannot be used mainly for the purpose of making the regulations. The regulation must be incidental to the expenditure of the money.

Mr. FULTON: I think, with due respect, the minister has missed my point. I am asking whether orders in council made covering these subjects will not preferably be made under the present measure, rather than under the war appropriation measure. As the minister may recall, at the time that act was before the house objection was taken by the hon. member for Lake Centre and myself to the wide powers given the government to make orders in council, and practically to legislate in that fashion. We objected particularly to the terms giving the governor in council power to do anything he may deem advisable for the security, defence, peace, or welfare of Canada, under that particular appropriation. We said then that we felt that what was done should be done with the authority of parliament rather than by order in council. The minister at that time pointed out, in answer to our objections, that there would very shortly be introduced into the house the emergency powers bill we are now discussing, under which certain specific powers would be asked for, and that that measure would meet the objections we were raising.

What I now ask is this: Will the minister carry out that undertaking and exercise the powers under the present measure, under which he has said he will table orders in council so that we may know what is being done, rather than under the previous measure to which we objected? In order to carry out his undertaking then given, he should agree to see to it that those things are done under this measure, so that they will be tabled in the house and we shall have full knowledge of what is going on.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not remember the incident. Has the hon. member the page of Hansard where it occurs?

Mr. FULTON: I shall get it before eleven o'clock.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not remember that. I am sure the hon. member will feel that the Minister of Finance will see to it that any undertaking he gave is carried out.

Mr. FULTON: It was the Minister of Justice to whom I was referring. When the former measure was under consideration the hon. member for Lake Centre and I objected to the wide powers being given to the governor in council in connection with the security, peace, defence and welfare of Canada. In his reply the Minister of Justice said that our objections were untimely—I believe that was as strong as he put it—in view of the fact that there would be this subsequent bill introduced, and that under it certain specific powers would be asked for. Can the minister give an undertaking on behalf of the government to see that that is done?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am not disposed to give any new undertaking on behalf of the government.

Mr. FULTON: It is not a new undertaking.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think the hon. member did refer to an undertaking on behalf of the government. I am not disposed to give any new undertaking, and I do not remember the incident to which the hon. member refers. He will no doubt call it to our attention. But if any undertaking was given it will certainly be carried out.

Mr. FULTON: That is what I wanted to know.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. May I say it is not in order to discuss on this measure bills which were previously passed at this session. That is to say, we cannot refer to debates in connection with bills which have been discussed previously at the present session. We are now discussing bill No. 15, and previous debates on any other subject are not in order.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish for only two or three minutes to voice my opposition to this bill. It is the very same bill in a new form as was proposed before, giving vast powers to the governor in council. As hon. members know, under the original War Measures Act and bill No. 15 the courts of this country—the high courts, the county courts, and the magistrates' courts—have before them cases to decide and give decisions based on the powers herein of the governor in council.

After the dominion-provincial conference which met last week some of those persons who spoke to the newspapers described bill No. 15 as the Donald Gordon plan. This new plan gives the governor in council powers to look after the maintenance of the armed forces of Canada, all trade and commerce and so on. In fact, it is the identical style of bill with the identical powers.

They have abolished these controls in Australia, and the President of the United States has practically eliminated them in that great country. Let me point out that under section 2 there is no doubt that people will be summonsed to court—police courts and other courts of competent jurisdiction—to answer to the same irksome control offences. Is this Liberalism as we have it in this country to-day? Is this what you call Liberalism? —control over the lives of every person, control over every man, woman and child in Canada, and the abolition of statutes which for 200 years have protected the liberty of the subject and of all reference to the law courts who have no control? Everything in the bill is removed from the controls of those courts. They would not stand for this in the United States. Why, we have a regular small standing army of officials in that country. The government knows something of what is going on. That standing army would reach from here to Lansdowne park. The expeditionary force we have over there should learn something of what is being done in that country to abolish all controls. But they have learned nothing.

Over there they have abolished controls. Under section 2 of this bill the small and large businessman would be put out of business. The difference between the new bill and the old one is the difference between Tweedledum and Tweedledee. That is the only difference between these two plans.

Under paragraph (a) the governor in council has power to provide for and maintain the armed forces of Canada during the occupation of enemy territory; it has power to facilitate the readjustment of industry, and also other powers. Small and large business, and every manufacturer in the country have been asking for the removal of these irksome controls. How does the government expect war-time economies to be turned into peace-time economies of large and small business when we have these irksome controls placed upon individuals?

The people whom we have been giving credit for the formulation of this new plan will be glad to be free of it, when they see how unpopular it is throughout the country. I know something of the way in which these irksome controls have operated during the war years and the effect they have had on business generally.

Section stands.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

PRIVATE BILLS—THIRD AND FINAL REPORT

Third and final report of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Maybank.

PRINTING—FIRST REPORT

Mr. H. R. EMMERSON (Westmorland) presented the first report of the joint committee of both houses on the printing of parliament.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): May I ask the hon. member if this means that the report on the Petitcodiac power development is not to be printed?

Mr. GLEN: Inquiries with regard to the cost are now being made from a private firm. We have not yet received the estimate, but we expect to have it shortly.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

SWIFT CANADIAN COMPANY—MELVILLE EGG DRYING PLANT

Mr. BURTON:

1. Has the Swift Canadian Company erected an egg-drying plant at Melville, Saskatchewan?
2. If so, did they receive any assistance from the federal government towards the construction of this plant?
3. Are they receiving any assistance from the government by way of subsidy or otherwise in connection with this plant?
4. If so, in what amount?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. The Swift Canadian Company has erected an egg drying plant at Melville, Saskatchewan.

[Mr. Church.]

2. No direct financial assistance is granted by the federal government toward the construction of this plant. The same indirect assistance is allowed them by agreement as was granted other egg drying plants for processing eggs for the British Ministry of Food. This consists of a partial rebate of customs duties and the customary depreciation of 20 per cent on annual income.

3. No assistance is received from the government in the way of subsidy or otherwise in connection with this plant.

4. Answered by No. 3.

INDIAN AFFAIRS—BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. ROSE:

1. How many agents are employed by the Indian Affairs branch in British Columbia?
2. How many such agents are employed in each of the various districts of the province?
3. How much money was paid in salaries and wages to agents in various districts in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1945?

Mr. GLEN:

1. Eighteen.

2. One at each of the following agencies: Babine, Bella Coola, Cowichan, Fort St. John, Kamloops, Kootenay, Kwawkewlth, Lytton, New Westminster, Nicola, Okanaga, Queen Charlotte, Skeena, Stikine, Stuart Lake, Vancouver, West Coast, Williams Lake.

3. Salaries, cost of living bonus and allowances in cash, $45,309.33.

VETERANS' LAND ACT—SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. Has any order been made by the administration of the Veterans' Land Act denying returned service men the right to settlement under the Act in certain rural municipalities in the province of Saskatchewan?
2. If so, what rural municipalities are in that category?
3. Why was the decision made in each case, and by whom?

Mr. TUCKER: There is no general order denying returned service men the right to settlement under the Veterans' Land Act in any area in Canada. The ground taken has been that the administration could not draw an arbitrary line around any particular community and forbid settlement therein. Any veteran who derives from a district—including the dry area of southern Saskatchewan—and wants to go back, and can satisfy the administration that his land establishment proposal is of a nature that promises some reasonable degree of success, is assured of full consideration being given to his application. But veterans whose experience has been in other parts of Canada are not encouraged to move into a district with a hazardous record. This statement is the substance of evidence given by the director, the Veterans' Land Act, before the special committee on veterans affairs on November 22, pages 830 and 831.

4. Has the government yet recommended any additional expenditures after the war for reconstructing grade separation throughout Canada?

VETERANS' LAND ACT

INCORPORATION OF PROVISIONS OF CERTAIN ORDERS IN COUNCIL

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the Veterans' Land Act, 1942, to make it conform in several respects with the Act to amend the War Service Grants Act, 1944, passed at the present session of parliament, by incorporating in the measure the provisions of certain orders in council passed under the War Measures Act and by extending and clarifying in several other respects the application and operation of the Act, as recommended and reported by the Special Committee on Veterans Affairs.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

SERVICE PERSONNEL

AIR FORCE—APPLICATIONS TO ENTER UNIVERSITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. A. KIDD (Kingston City): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence for Air. Will the minister kindly inform the house if immediate steps can be taken to speed up the discharge or release from the air service of those members of the air force whose applications to enter university have been accepted, and who have applied for discharge or release from the service in order that they may attend or reenter university? This matter is urgent in view of the few days that are now left in which they must make arrangements for the commencement of their studies after the Christmas holidays.

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Minister of National Defence for Air): The hon. member was good enough to send me a copy of the question. A large number of students have already been released in cases where they were surplus to requirements and their services could be spared from the R.C.A.F.; but at the present time certain trades are necessary in order to carry out demobilization efficiently and we cannot grant accelerated release in the case of students who are in a trade which has not a surplus. If we did so it would mean that others with longer service who wished to be demobilized would be held in the service beyond their proper time for release. Where it can be done, students are being released whose services can be spared, but otherwise it is necessary for them to take their ordinary turn in demobilization.

Mr. COCKERAM: May I ask a question supplementary to that put by the hon. member for Kingston City? Will the minister reconsider the whole question of discharges from the R.C.A.F.? A great many young men are being retained in the service who should be released if they have jobs to go to.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): The demobilization policy of the R.C.A.F. does not take into consideration the fact that a man has secured a job to go to. It does give consideration to a man returning to former employment, but if it were possible for men in the service while on leave to obtain jobs and then come back and be released in priority to men with longer service it would be most unfair to those with longer service, particularly those overseas.

BOUNDARY BAY AIR FIELD

ACCIDENT IN CONNECTION WITH DISPOSAL OF EXPLOSIVES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence for Air. My question has to do with the accident which occurred at Boundary Bay through the finding of shells from the Boundary Bay air field. Is the minister in a position to make a report regarding that accident?

[Mr. Kidd.]

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Minister of National Defence for Air): I received a copy of the proceedings of the court of inquiry which indicated that there was some negligence in the disposal of explosives on the Boundary Bay site. However, the proceedings did not indicate the persons who were guilty of negligence. I am having further inquiries made so that I may ascertain the names of the officers or persons who were guilty of the negligence.

AGRICULTURAL CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO RESULT OF DELIBERATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Now that the dominion-provincial conference on agriculture has ended, will the minister acquaint the house with the result of their deliberations? If he is not prepared to do it to-day, when may we expect such a report?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Just as soon as I get back into my estimates I shall be prepared to make a report, but we shall follow the usual practice of having the findings printed and distributed.

NATIONAL EMERGENCY

BILL TO CONFER CERTAIN POWERS ON THE GOVERNOR IN COUNCIL

The house resumed from Wednesday, December 5, consideration in committee of bill No. 15, to confer certain powers upon the governor in council during the national emergency following the war—Mr. St. Laurent—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 2—Continuation of national emergency.

Mr. CHURCH: Last night I was referring to section 2 of the bill, which confers certain powers upon the governor in council. I pointed out that these powers are greater than the governor in council had in time of war. One of the paragraphs refers to assisting the relief of suffering, the restoration and distribution of essential supplies, and so forth. For many years past I have objected to these controls and the people who are in charge of them. Some of those controllers have no knowledge of the business they seek to control; they have never had any training in any competitive business.

In Australia the control system has been abolished. In the United States President Truman has said that controls placed upon the country in time of war should be removed. Irksome controls which make it utterly impossible for a small man to conduct his business should be removed. A great many men are returning from the war and are trying to set up little shops where they can conduct their business, but they are unable to do it.

The original bill not only gives the minister the powers of the War Measures Act but has added a whole lot of controls nobody ever heard of, virtually abolishing the high court of parliament. Under this new bill whole spheres of activity, involving the livelihood of every man, woman and child in this country, have been removed from the jurisdiction of the law and of parliament and reserved for the determination of tribunals, irresponsible, irremovable, governed by no control and subject to no appeal. I object to that. It is done over the head of parliament, although they say parliament is supreme. That is only a myth; every business man knows it is a myth, with the result that parliamentary institutions are criticized by the people to-day, since we are to blame for the appointment of all these controllers.

I was saying something about a young soldier who came home and wanted to get a store. He went to a real estate man in my constituency and applied for one. The real estate man said: "I cannot do anything for you." The soldier said: "I can finance a little store right now"; but because of those irksome controls over business and real estate he was not permitted to start that little business. I do not know who wants to own real estate to-day.

I visited Cleveland and other cities a short time ago and I found that they are removing and relaxing those controls with the result that large and small businesses are expanding, not only in real estate, but in building and everything else. The other day they abolished meat rationing, if you please. We have been hanging on to the coat-tails of Washington all the time. One of the greatest mistakes we made in this war was the surrendering of too much political, economic, social, financial and military initiative to Washington, with the result that we are simply hanging on to the coat-tails of the United States to develop our economic system. You go to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and the Minister of Labour, and what do you get?

I wish to refer to the section dealing with assisting the relief of suffering. One of the local newspapers, the Journal, had a long editorial yesterday on what is being done to get domestic and nursing help. In the session of the spring of 1944 I referred to what has been done in the old country. Go to any hospital, and you cannot get a nurse. Go to any large hotel and ask for a nurse. Can you get one? No. I know some of the large hotels have them on duty twenty-four hours a day, but in the average city throughout Canada you cannot get nursing service if you happen to be sick while at a hotel.

I asked a question in the house about the scarcity of domestic help and nurses, and here is the return that was brought down. Go and ask any business man who is connected with a hospital about the difficulty of getting nurses; go and ask any person who wants domestic help. They cannot get them, and they blame these controls. Go around the country and see the great number of people travelling on the trains and crowding the stations, and you will see why we can get no relief. In Britain, the United States, New Zealand and Australia they have adopted policies to provide domestic help and nurses, but we have done nothing in this country. Take the awful horror of the motor car; this year 85 people were killed in automobile accidents in the city in which I live. Take the number of accidents on the highway, and you will find that the number of people killed and injured in automobile accidents during the war almost equalled the number lost in the war itself. When those who suffer these accidents are taken to hospitals where there is a shortage of nurses, it is a burden on the hospital. When I ask questions on these matters in this house, what is done? Ask any business man who is to blame for these conditions, and he will tell you. We have a large number of people still in the armed forces who should have been released long ago. Under this particular clause I cannot refer to the Department of Labour, but I can mention these matters under this paragraph dealing with the relief of suffering. They are spending $13,000,000 on national selective service, a system that might as well be dumped in the sewer. The minister is not here, and I do not wish to be unfair to him, but that is one of the reasons there is no domestic help available.

I asked a short question, covering only three lines, as to what was being done by the government to provide domestic help and nursing services for those with large families and for the sick. In England they have remedied that situation. Part of the reply came from the Department of Health and Welfare, the health part of which is only a skeleton branch because the municipalities and the provinces pay for health. What do they say about the lack of nurses?

The proposals by the government of Canada placed before the dominion-provincial conference on reconstruction—

Castles in the air!

—would provide financial assistance to provinces which adopt health insurance to provide visiting nurse service and other services for all persons qualified . . . . .

Then with regard to domestic health:

The offices of the national employment service throughout the country are making every effort to meet the demand for domestic workers.

I should mention the list of telephones that selective service has in the city of Toronto. One morning I wasted nearly forty-five minutes calling about eight different numbers, and I could not get anybody who knew anything about what I wanted. They would simply hang up the receiver. That is the kind of service we are getting there, and it might just as well be closed up. The member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) is chairman of the splendid East Toronto hospital board, a man who has worked hard for my city in many capacities, and I cannot speak too highly of his services. He knows of this scarcity. No hospital board can put up with this sort of thing any longer. You cannot get a room in a hospital; you cannot get a nurse; you cannot get domestic help. What is the reason? It is national selective service, and keeping people in the forces.

Let me point out to the committee the reason for that. I am speaking extemporaneously and without notes, but I can give you one reason. Most of these people travelling on the trains are members of the armed forces and their families. As the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) said the other day, speaking of Sparks street, you cannot go out into the highways and byways; you have to stay in the middle of the road because so many of the armed forces are kept there who want to return to business. Let us do what they are doing in the mother country; let us try to get rid of some of these irksome controls. I will admit that some controls are necessary to guard against inflation, high prices for food and all that sort of thing, and I will admit that the Minister of Finance has done very excellent work in that connection. The controls required to regulate the prices of the necessaries of life should be continued; but the controls essential during the war, when the majority of the orders in council were passed, were dictated by the needs of the state. In peace time, as a Conservative committee in England said, the preference of consumers is the mainspring of economic activity. Although controls will be essential during a transitional period for organizing the reversion from war to peace time conditions they must be removed as soon as conditions permit. That is Mr. Churchill's policy, and the policy of his party; and the committee goes on to say that since controls have no intrinsic value in themselves they are liable to lead to hold-ups and thereby slow down the speed of industry to adjust itself to consumers' needs. That committee went on to make these specific recommendations:

(1) Controls will be required in the immediate post-war period for the orderly disposal of accumulated stocks throughout the world, whether of foodstuffs or materials; for helping to right the adverse balance of payments and for dealing with shortages, but not otherwise.

(2) A practical measure of control over the location of new industrial undertakings in Britain is desirable as a permanent feature of the post-war world. It may thus be possible to secure a balance of different types of industry in each main region of the country, thereby lessening the risks of severe unemployment in any one area.

(3) A continuous survey must be carried on by a properly qualified national advisory body with local assistance, which will draw the attention of parliament to the emergence of dangerous features in the industrial situation of any particular area, and will formulate proposals for remedying them.

So you see they are trying to do something over there. In Britain the government proposed a term of five years, while the Conservative opposition suggested two years. In this country it should be no longer than six months; it should be well over by Easter at the very latest. In the early days of this war, when controls were being established, I asked the Minister of Finance a question as to whether he sees the orders issued by the control boards, in reply to which he made a lengthy statement in the house. I asked if he ever saw these piles of orders in council issued about food, clothing and all these other things. I believe his reply was no, that a general direction of policy was given and that was all he had to do with it.

By passing clause 2 we are paving the way for the return of the conditions we had previously. I blame the government because they are afraid to release those who should be released under the national service act, so these irksome controls may be abolished. It is either inefficiency on the part of the government or it is fear of turning these people out because of the effect it may have on the labour market. The government of the day should have far more courage than they have shown so far in seeking to relieve the conditions from which we are suffering, by returning to industry larger numbers of men and women. Now real estate is going to be controlled for two years under this measure. No one will want to own real estate. The hon. member for Eglinton is not here, but it will be remembered that some days ago he spoke about housing. People in his riding cannot hold their real estate and use their property. Soldiers who are buying properties cannot move into them, owing to irksome controls on real estate, with the result that they find themselves out on the streets, with the bailiffs after them. Others are under eviction orders and have nowhere to go.

I would ask the government to look at the picture as we find it throughout the country in the cities and towns. There is not a neighbourhood in Canada where families are not having difficulty in connection with housing, and if this bill is passed they will be tied up for one or two more years. In all our cities and towns men and women wish to end all the confusion and get back to their homes so that they can enter into small business enterprises.

I say this bill is much worse than the old one, because in it there is no control whatsoever which can be exercised by the courts. I pointed out on September 11 that any order in council can be revoked by the high court of parliament, through the process of some hon. member moving in the house that such order in council be annulled. But that is not so under the War Measures Act.

In my opinion the left was never right, either in war or in peace. We know that those belonging to the left went up and down this country, saying that we could depend upon collective security and league pacts without defences and armies, and all that sort of thing. But what happened when war came along? What was the result? We had no army, no navy or air force. Our navy was scarcely any size—less than a total of 10,000 tons. I do not say this in any spirit of disrespect for those who sit to my left, because they are pleasant gentleman, always courteous in debate, and I wish to show them the same courtesy, as we cannot all think alike on public matters. I must say however that I believe they are and were wrong. Everyone is entitled to his opinion, and that is mine. Some go around the country posing as supermen, and it was they who supported pacifism in the past. If this section is passed, then that will just about finish everything.

Since the beginning of this session we have heard a lot from the left about internationalism and almost nothing about the empire. Well, we know what it did for us in two great wars in our generation, and we think we can see what it will do for us now in this time of reconstruction. Let us wait and see what will be done by collective security and a new league. It will mean the dissolution of the British empire which saved the world in this war.

Paragraph (a) of this section provides for the maintenance of the armed forces, and all that sort of thing. I can tell you this, that there is only one way to solve this question, and that is for the dominions and the mother country to hold together. If we do not hold together historically, geographically, economically and from a military standpoint, we will not be able to go it alone and we will hang separately. We must, as an empire, hold together if we are not to perish. In Britain they have always been our best customers, and in the dark days they were our only friends. But it would seem now that we are willing to toss them overboard, through certain international agreements which can be made under order in council. I protest against that sort of procedure, as I have protested against it many times in the past. I continue to do so.

The plan set out in this bill is the Donald Gordon plan, and the plan to which the dominion-provincial conference objected. If that is the plan, then it is one which will have the effect of abolishing the high court of parliament. In my opinion Donald Gordon should have been dismissed long ago and irksome controls removed.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Chairman, I return to section 2, subsection 3, with which must be read—if you will allow me—section 4. Both are part and parcel of the same transaction. As has been stated before, new regulations which will be passed under this measure as now constituted will be laid on the table of the house; but the great mass of orders in council that have been passed during the war under the War Measures Act will be incorporated into the law of the land. Regardless of their nature, their interference with the rights of justice, or their unfairness, parliament will be approving those orders in council and will have no opportunity of annulling them, as it will in respect of new orders in council passed after this date.

I am not going to discuss again the situation respecting these orders in council. The minister explained last night that they were in six volumes.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; I think there are eight volumes of orders and proclamations, and there must be a larger number of war orders and regulations.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I appreciate that. But there were six large volumes, and then every few weeks a further assortment of orders comes out and is published in these periodicals.

The minister showed what they had in Great Britain, and, producing the volume, he said: This is the volume of the orders in council passed in Great Britain. Compare this with the depth of the volumes passed by this government, and you have some appreciation of the far more extensive use of orders in council by this country.

Among the orders in council to which objection has been taken during the period of the war, which we have been unable to annul or amend, and concerning which we could do nothing but take objection, there are some which, although possibly justifiable during the war, deny recourse to the courts on the part of anyone who feels himself unfairly dealt with or discriminated against. There are orders in council which amend and abrogate statutes passed by parliament. These, if this measure is passed, now become the law of the land. Why should not parliament have the right to amend, abrogate, suspend or annul such orders in council as have been passed during the period of the war, and which from this day forward will become part and parcel of the legislation of the country?

I cannot see why the government is so resentful, if I may use that expression—and I believe I am justified in doing so, because of the speech made last night by the Minister of Justice—of any suggestion that parliament should have the right to annul such orders in council. Is it because it is realized that if they are looked into, unfairness will be brought to light? Is it because injustices would be revealed? There is not an hon. member who has not received strong objections respecting unfairness in connection with some of these orders. Is it because the government is afraid that the whole situation would be brought into parliament? If not, then why the objection to incorporating into this measure the right of parliament to annul orders in council passed during the war? What of the secret orders in council that we are going to pass under this section? How many are there? We got the answer some months ago that there were none, and then out came one with regard to Eldorado and then another concerning seamen's regulations. That was an order in council that denied recourse to the courts, denied a man the right to have counsel; and now we are asked to give a blank cheque —an expression to which the minister objects— to the governor in council to deny to the individual seeking justice in this land the right to be represented by counsel. Its secrecy cannot be explained on the ground that there was need for secrecy in connection with the production of atomic energy, because this order had to do with seamen's regulations.

This is one type of regulation we are asked to incorporate as part of the law of the land under section 4. The minister says: We will not use these powers; we just want them, that is all. What do they want them for if they are not going to use them? There is an important principle at stake here, and I cannot understand the resistance of the government to allowing parliament the right to look into these things. I am asking the minister whether even now he will accept a further amendment of this section. He says he gives an undertaking that if any hon. member wishes to attack any of these orders in council, either those that are being moved forward under the provisions of the War Measures Act or those that will be passed hereafter, the government will give assistance, his voice being heard in the house. I accept that statement, but I ask: Why not, so far as those old orders in council go, give us our rights under statute so that the people of this country will know, not only that we have an undertaking but that we have the right within a period of fifteen days after the beginning of the next parliament to demand the rescinding of unfair orders in council? I do not want the right to be extended indefinitely, but let us be given the opportunity for the first fifteen days of the next parliament to move to bring unfair orders in council before the house. I will give one example in connection with rentals as it affects men coming back from overseas. In two instances while the husbands were overseas the wives built houses, rented them and moved into small flats in order to earn a little extra income. Now that their husbands have come back they are denied the right to go into their own homes. When I got in touch with the rentals controller the answer I received was that it was thought to be in the public interest that the tenants remain. We should have the right in parliament to discuss, to consider and where necessary to abrogate unfair and unnecessary powers under existent orders in council.

I suggest an amendment to section 2, subsection 3, which would cover the situation. I submit that it cannot be objected to by the government, if the principle of review by parliament is accepted now which was not accepted two weeks ago until strong objection was raised against this unfairness. I suggest that all orders in council should be laid on the table of the house and an opportunity given to members to raise objections by way of motion to the operation of any or all of them. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver South:

That after the word "thereof" in line 32 of section 2, subsection 3, the following words be added:

"and as to orders and regulations passed under the War Measures Act as shall be continued in effect under this act within fifteen days after the commencement of the next session of parliament."

Under this amendment any hon. member would have the right within fifteen days of the commencement of the next session of parliament to move for consideration by the house of the annulment of such orders in council passed under the War Measures Act as will be carried into effect and become the law of the land under section 4.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member, perhaps inadvertently, has misstated what the effect of his amendment would be. He gave the impression that within fifteen days from the opening of the next session of parliament the matter of whether or not orders in council passed under the War Measures Act and continued in force under this bill should remain, would be a question settled. That would not at all be the effect of the amendment. The effect of the amendment would be that there would have to be a new tabling of the orders in council that have already been tabled and published, and that tabling would have to be done within fifteen days. Then there would be forty days from that date in which any member of the house could move that one of them be annulled, not by a legislative act but by resolution.

These orders in council are in force at the present time and to bring about a situation where they would cease to operate would require legislative action. That legislative action is open to any hon. member of this house. On behalf of the government I gave last night, and I repeat it to-day, the undertaking that not only within fifteen days or within forty days, but at any time while parliament is in session, if any hon. member takes the position that there is an order which is unfair or unjust—the hon. member for Lake Centre assumes that admittedly there are orders which are unfair and unjust—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The courts have so held.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If any hon. member wishes he can come into the house and say, not in general terms and not for the disturbing effect it may have, with respect to something special, "In my opinion that order is unfair and unjust and should not continue in operation." The government has undertaken that it will do everything within its power to bring as expeditiously as possible a bill to that intent to a decision, both in this house and in the other place.

If that is not sufficient, well, I am sorry that under the circumstances I cannot accept the suggestion made here. This system which has been built up does not consist solely of the passing of orders. It has taken many months of trial and decision by the courts to bring about the situation where there is very much less effort than there was before to evade the real intent of the orders. For instance, take the orders concerning rentals, the fixing of ceilings on rentals. How many devices were attempted to thwart the real intent of those regulations? A man would rent an apartment at the ceiling price, but in order to get in the tenant had to pay $100 for the key, or he had to buy some furniture at a price ten, twenty, fifty times its market value, or he could not get a lease unless he got it through Mr. So-and-so, who was the exclusive agent to rent the premises, and in order to get any consideration from him one had to pay him a fee. Now these things have gradually been eliminated by amendments and court decisions; and if there is anything done to create the impression that the old system has gone and that something new has taken its place, all that will have to be gone over again. That is not in the interest of good administration of these controls, if they are proper controls and should be enforced in the interest of the general public. But if there are any of them to which any hon. member can point his finger and say, "That one is bad," and "I wish to have the judgment of the high court of parliament on that one," let him say so, let him particularize what he wants dealt with, and as far as the government is concerned everything that can be done to facilitate the bringing of that to a decision will be accomplished.

If that is not looked upon as sufficient, I cannot take the responsibility of accepting the suggestion of the hon. member. I should have to ask the Minister of Finance to give it consideration, because he is the minister responsible for the administration of these controls, and I should have to confer with him as to whether or not that would be disturbing to the proper administration of the controls. Perhaps the hon. member would allow the matter to stand and let the Minister of Finance give it some consideration, unless he is satisfied with that undertaking, and I make it seriously and formally. If he or any other hon. member will at any time during the next session of parliament point his finger at something which he says is wrong and which he says should not continue to operate, the government will do everything within its power to facilitate the bringing of that matter to a decision by this house and by the other house. If that is not sufficient, I shall have to ask that this stand, to be given further consideration.

Mr. HACKETT: I should like to ask the minister if the very reasons he has advanced are not reasons which show the gravity of the situation in which we find ourselves at the moment. He has told us of abuses that were petrpetrated under the regulations. The regulations enacted by the cabinet, instead of by parliament, have been drastic and far-reaching. They are so drastic and so far-reaching that they cannot be enforced unless there be a whole range of control.

I should like, at the expense of being charged with repetition, to draw to the attention of the minister the nature of the legislation forecast in the speech from the throne. The words are:

> You will be asked to approve a measure to extend certain specified emergency powers to meet emergency conditions in the period of reconstruction.

What I in my innocence understood was that parliament might be asked to enact another statute similar to that which was passed in 1919, as pointed out by the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie, dealing with a specific item, dealing with the control of pulp and kindred matters. Now the position is entirely changed. The minister says: If an hon. member will pick out something from the universal control which he considers is unfairly controlled, the government will do what it is able to do to give relief. The point is, Mr. Chairman, that the minister is reversing the position. The position was to be that the government was to pick out one or two—there may have been more—controls, and release all the rest. That was the significance, that was the purport, I submit to the minister, of the intimation in the speech from the throne:

> You will be asked to approve a measure to extend certain specified emergency powers to meet emergency conditions in the period of reconstruction.

That is not what we are asked to do to-day.

The minister does not deny that the bill which is before the committee goes far beyond the powers that were granted by the War Measures Act; and—to open a parenthesis here—one can say that each bill conferring powers that has been enacted since the original bill has contained broader powers for the cabinet. The reason for that is clear. It is the reason which the minister gave. I am not particularly trying to score off anybody; I am merely trying to show that a control must be an entire control if it is to be an effective control. The minister said that in his speech on November 23, reported on page 2452 of Hansard:

> The whole of these controls are integrated, and each part is necessary to the harmonious functioning of the whole system.

He has told us that it took five or six years to build up the system whereby control could be made effective. I can tell him here that a judgment was rendered by the chief justice of the superior court in Montreal a couple of weeks ago in a case in which a most arbitrary decision was reached by the rentals controller without summoning or hearing the adverse party. The judge merely said, "This is regrettable, it is alien to our whole system of laws; but I am bound, I am helpless." I will give the minister the reference to the case; but let me go on. We are confronted with the decision of perpetuating this type of control, this manner of life, or of getting back to the freedom of contract, the freedom of negotiation to which we still think we are attached.

The suggestion I attempted to make the other day, and which I make again, is that these controls are not universally required. I think that, without arousing any contention at all, I can say that rental controls are possibly more difficult and possibly more necessary in the large urban centres of Toronto and Montreal—I know less about Winnipeg and Vancouver—than they are in the smaller centres of the far east or on the prairies. Why not let the legislatures of those provinces deal with these questions? They are primarily within the ambit of their powers; they fall under the exclusive jurisdiction of provincial legislation. Why do we not say that after reasonable notice we will release these controls? The legislatures are or will be in session within the next month or two. Afford them the time necessary to meet the situation. I am not sure that it is beyond the power of a city like Toronto or Montreal to meet a situation such as this if it is properly empowered by the legislature of the province. Then we shall be getting the question home where it can be dealt with full knowledge—en pleine connaissance de cause, as they say in some parts of Ireland. That I believe is one way of relaxing the strangle holds which these controls have upon our whole economy to-day; because, if something like that be not done, if we take the words of the minister himself, we shall see months go by, a year go by, and we shall be no further advanced than we are to-day. The minister said:

> That the whole of these controls are integrated and each part is necessary to the harmonious functioning of the whole system.

If that is true—and no one doubts it; it took five or six years to complete them and give them the effectiveness they have—if that is so, the only way of releasing them is to give them back to the provinces and let the provinces wrestle with them where it is necessary. I am sure there are a number of provinces where a great many of these controls are not required at all. I will not weary the chamber with a reiteration of what I said about prices and similar topics—the minister and I apparently have not the power at all times to charm those who will not listen.

Mr. McDONALD (Pontiac): We are not obliged to listen.

An hon. MEMBER: We have heard your speeches before.

Mr. HACKETT: Yes, and you will hear them again.

Mr. McDONALD (Pontiac): We can take it.

Mr. HACKETT: I am sure that every man in this house is anxious to see freedom of commercial and personal relations again established, and there is no possibility of bringing that about in an effective way until these centralized controls are terminated.

Mr. GREEN: May I ask the minister to clarify the statement he made a few minutes ago? As I understand it, there are two groups of orders in council dealt with under this bill. In the first place, the bill itself makes provision for orders in council to be passed under it. That is found of course in section 2, and with regard to that group of orders in council there is provision that within forty days after parliament meets—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: After tabling.

Mr. GREEN: Within forty days after tabling, a motion may be made to annul any one or more of those orders in council that are passed under this particular measure. There is another group of orders in council which have been passed under the War Measures Act, and under section 4 of the present bill they are continued in effect. But as I read the bill, there is no provision whereby the house has the same right to move for the annulment of those orders in council passed under the War Measures Act.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Correct.

Mr. GREEN: I understand further that the amendment of the hon. member for Lake Centre would provide that right. Can the minister explain why there should not be the same right with respect to the second group of orders in council? That is the question that is bothering me at the moment. I suggest that both groups should be treated in the same way. There should be the same facilities for pointing out the need for removing an order in council no matter whether it may come in one group or the other.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The reason for the difference is the fact that as to one set they are the law of the country to-day, and if anyone says they should not be the law of the country the government will undertake to facilitate consideration of a bill to change the law. As to the others, they have not yet been made. We are asking the houses of parliament to delegate to the governor in council the right to make new legislation on the assumption that what he will do would have the consent of the Senate and of the House of Commons, and with respect to that new legislation we say that we are prepared to table it in parliament and to allow the houses of parliament forty days in which to declare that we made a mistake when we assumed that we had their consent.

Mr. GREEN: But in the meantime the orders in council passed under this new act would be the law of the land the same as the others.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They would be in operation but subject to cessation if there were a resolution of the houses of parliament that they should no longer operate. That is a proposal that is being made for the purpose of recognizing the supremacy of the houses of parliament in that regard. With respect to the others which are in force, the statement is made that there are some that are unfair or unjust. We say: Indicate which ones you consider are unfair and unjust and introduce a bill to repeal them, and we will see to it that that bill gets consideration just as speedily as can be made possible—not only within a limited time, but at any time. The reason for being careful about that system is that we do not expect this body of controls to remain in effect very long. It has taken quite a long time to cause the people to know that there are certain things which they cannot do without being subject to prosecution. Each time an order is made there are found methods of doing something which is against its real spirit and intent, but which is still outside what is specifically mentioned in the order; just as it took years to get an income tax act in which there were no loopholes permitted that were not illegal evasions. The courts have held that a man has a perfect right so to arrange his affairs as not to attract taxation, but to have legal avoidance of taxes. It took years to deal with the things that could be done without becoming subject to the taxes which were intended.

The administrators of those controls are not themselves the power-hungry people they have been represented to be. I know a few of them, and I know that there is nothing they are looking forward to with more pleasant anticipation than the time when they will not have to do those things. That I know to be the case. They say: If we are to have the responsibility of achieving the results which you want, do not take the proper instruments from us. We are quite willing to do our best to achieve those results, but do not deny us the proper instruments in that regard. That is the reason for the suggestion that all these things that we are going to ask to have continued in effect, and which have been tabled, be attacked specifically. If there is anything wrong with any one of them, let that one be mentioned. The hon. member mentioned a secret seamen's order. I wish he would give me more information, because I have inquired from all my colleagues around me and no one seems to know anything about that kind of order.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is exactly my point. It has been before the court of appeal in British Columbia, following its extraction from the records in this house. It is an order that was kept secret. It denies the right of counsel to appear on behalf of any man examined before the commission set up.

Mr. CLAXTON: What is the reference?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Could the hon. member give us the reference? He says it has been extracted in this house. He may have had a hand in the extracting. I should like to have some reference number so that we shall be able to look into it and inform the hon. member whether it is still in existence or not.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It was still in existence on November 5. I asked for a return of those orders which deny the right of counsel to appear on behalf of men charged or being investigated. I asked for that on October 5.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Was it produced?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes, it was produced. It was passed last May and produced on November 5. The minister says he does not know of the existence of this order. Will he tell us how many more secret orders there are which have not been produced?

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is not secret.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is not a secret order, and there are no secret orders. The hon. member says that it was tabled in the house. Well, if it was tabled it is not a secret order.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No longer, no.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: And if the hon. member thinks it is a bad order, it will be open to him under the undertaking I have given to say so and to move for leave to introduce a bill to repeal it. It is not true in fact that every order which says that there shall not be counsel attending witnesses called to testify in an investigation is necessarily bad. Here the witnesses are called for the purpose of giving information. They have no traditional or constitutional right to be represented by a lawyer. They do not require to have a lawyer with them when they are asked questions on which they are only being requested to give true answers. One does not need a lawyer for that purpose. If the orders go beyond that, if the orders deny defence counsel to someone being prosecuted, of course, I would consider, as does the hon. member, that it would be an abridging of his rights. These broad all-embracing statements may create an impression, but it is not the kind of impression that makes for proper administration. If the objections are directed at something specific which can be looked at and considered, it will be looked at and considered and every facility will be afforded for taking the judgment of the house upon it.

Mr. GREEN: As I read subsection 3, in order to bring about an annulment of an order in council passed under the act there has to be a resolution brought in by a—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I hope the kind of orders we shall make will not be the occasion for resolutions.

Mr. GREEN: That is getting away from the point. I want to make certain of the procedure which would have to be followed in order to bring about the annulment of one of the orders in council passed under this act.

Will that procedure be for a private member to bring in a resolution, or must he bring in a bill? Just what procedure will have to be followed?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I submit that the section is perfectly clear. It merely calls for a resolution. If the Senate and House of Commons resolve that it be annulled, the mere passing of the resolution will bring about the effect.

Mr. GREEN: In dealing with the orders in council passed under the War Measures Act, which are continued in effect under this act, the minister said a few moments ago that they could only be attacked by a private member bringing in a private bill—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, a public bill.

Mr. GREEN: Well, a public bill. I do suggest to the minister that both types of orders in council should be treated in the same way, and that is what we are asking. We are asking that there be the right to bring in a resolution for annulment of an order in council passed under the War Measures Act.

The minister said something about the breaking down of respect the public have for the whole system of controls. I think he is putting it on the wrong basis. There would be far more respect for the controls, and far less trouble, if some provision such as I suggest were made, so that the public would feel, in any event that their representatives in parliament have the right to move a resolution to have those orders in council discussed. That would help the government in enforcing the controls. I suggest to the Minister of Justice and to the Minister of Finance that they give some consideration to making an amendment to section 4 so that the orders in council passed under the War Measures Act can be dealt with just as readily as the orders in council which are to be passed under the legislation now before us.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The Minister of Finance, the Minister of Justice, and other ministers have given consideration to that very question, and have given it consideration in discussions with those who have directly to administer the regulations. The conclusion that was reached, whether it be the right one or the wrong one, was that provided for in these proposals.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask the minister one question in connection with the answer he has given the committee? He says the government will facilitate the introduction of a bill or resolution. How can that be done under the rules of the house? That is one thing that bothers me.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Probably there will have to be motions to waive the existing rules which set aside only specified time for the consideration of the legislation of private members.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is satisfactory.

Mr. FERGUSON: The minister suggests that these orders in council may be taken up at any time. Just let us reflect on the situation in connection with the order in council dealing with John Barleycorn, which has gone to the privy council to be decided. Members of this house had very little to say about that question; the provinces had nothing to say about it, and still have nothing to say, and now we are waiting for the privy council to decide as to the legality of the liquor situation in Canada under a war-time act brought in during the last war. So what chance has a poor humble private member to voice his feeling against any order in council brought in by this government?

Let me give you an example of what is going on. We are told these controls are brought in because the government believes them to be necessary. As members of this house we represent the people of Canada, irrespective of the party to which we belong. Here is a concrete case of maladministration or misinformation in regard to one particular control. In the part of Canada I represent, two almost identical buildings were erected without permits. Both men were summoned to court and fined $100. The construction controller believed the fines were not sufficient and the decisions were appealed. During the interval between the imposition of the fines and the appeal—this may not be absolutely accurate but it is what the public hears, and I am one of the public—one of these men was advised to change his lawyer. His appeal was withdrawn, and he obtained a permit to proceed with the completion of his building. The other man came to me personally and asked if he should change his lawyer. I asked why, and he said, "Well, the fee will be somewhere around $700, but I am told that if I do so my appeal will be withdrawn and probably I will be put in the same position as the man who was erecting the building about twenty-five feet from me, and receive permission to proceed with my building." I suggested that he should not change his counsel. I appealed to the wartime prices and trade board, laying the facts before them, and the appeal was withdrawn, though not for a month. In the meantime this citizen was irritated; he had seen his neighbour go ahead only four months previously, complete his building, occupy it and make a good deal of money through that occupation. He believed he had as much right to justice in this country as any other man, so he proceeded with his building for the second time; he did not change his counsel, and last week was fined in court another $700.

That is all right; I approve of that procedure, but I do not approve the situation brought about by these controls. The intention is probably all right, but the way these controls are carried out is disturbing the minds of the people of Canada. They are definitely unnecessary, and I appeal to you people as representing those in your constituencies, because you must have the same troubles I have. My people are experiencing the same miscarriages of justice that your people are experiencing, and the sooner these controls are abolished and people know they can go ahead with a free rein and appeal to the ordinary courts of this country, the better it will be. In these matters the controllers may be all right but their agents are wrong, because no two of them can see eye to eye. We are getting one kind of justice in one part of Canada and another kind in another part; we are being treated in one way on one side of the street and in an entirely different way twenty-five feet across the street. That is the trouble with controls. The sooner they are abolished and no new controls introduced, the better off we shall be.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. May I remind the committee that we are now considering section 2 of the bill. I would also remind hon. members that according to subsection 2 of standing order 58 speeches in committee of the whole must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under discussion. Therefore I would say hon. members should not discuss controls generally, but that their remarks should be strictly relevant to section 2.

Mr. HACKETT: During the period which elapses while parliament is not in session will any remedy be afforded under the section that has been discussed?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: From the looks of things for the last several days parliament is going to be in session nearly all the time.

Mr. HACKETT: That is not quite the answer I should like. It is admitted, is it not, that there is no means of obtaining relief from any order an hon. member may think objectionable if parliament be not in session?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No other method than bringing his reasons for feeling there should be relief to the attention of the minister in charge of the department in which the control happens to be; and he will find that each of the ministers who have to do with these controls is having his staff constantly at work reviewing them, trying to bring them down and unwind them in an orderly manner in order to get back to the situation which both the hon. member for Stanstead and I wish to see restored just as rapidly as that can be done without having this turbulence the hon. member feels is necessary as a price for having had the controls during the war.

The CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. member for Lake Centre wish to have his amendment to the amendment put to the committee?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: I thought it was to stand.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, Mr. Chairman. I agree with the Minister of Justice; I do not want to prolong the debate by giving my reasons.

Amendment (Mr. Diefenbaker) negatived on division.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 3—Powers of governor in council.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would ask some hon. member to move that there be substituted for this section the section that has been inserted in the reprint, with proposed amendments.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I move accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN: Does the committee wish me to read the section as amended?

Mr. McMASTER: Is the section the chairman has the same as the one which appears in the printed form which has been handed to us?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. McMASTER: Then I should like to speak to it. I am not quarrelling seriously with subsection 1, but I do suggest that so as to carry out the wishes of the minister, the drafting of subsection 2 might be changed. For instance, in subsection 1 we find reference to fine and imprisonment, and there is reference to which courts shall try certain cases. Then subsection 2 reads:

> Any goods, wares or merchandise dealt with contrary to any order or regulation made under this act may be seized and detained and shall be liable to forfeiture at the instance of the Minister of Justice, upon proceedings in the Exchequer Court of Canada, or in any superior court.

I believe the ordinary procedure is that the court which tries the action would decide whether or not the goods would be forfeited. If this is not so, the minister will understand that another separate action would be necessary in a superior court or in the exchequer court. If the articles in question are not of great value this would seem to be a useless expense. Why have the provisions respecting forfeiture been worded in this way? If a satisfactory explanation cannot be given I should like to offer an amendment.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It sometimes happens that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have to assist in the enforcement of these regulations in respect of stocks of merchandise accumulated in violation of the regulations. Subsection 2 is to give them authority to seize such merchandise, then to have court proceedings for the purpose of considering the question whether or not they were held in violation of the regulations, and if so whether they should not be forfeited to the crown.

The hon. member will recall, as I do, stories which appeared in the newspapers about quantities of sugar that had been seized. Occasionally there are quantities of merchandise accumulated under conditions which show a violation of the regulations in force. The procedure here suggested is the one which seemed appropriate, in respect of seizures of substantial importance. In respect of ordinary violations a fine or imprisonment might be sufficient deterrent. However, there may be cases in which substantial quantities of goods and merchandise have been the object of illegal transactions, and should be forfeited to the crown. The only inconvenient feature would consist of there being the possibility of one court dealing with the offence, and the other court dealing with the forfeiture of the merchandise.

However, that is not something entirely new. I believe it happens in connection with excise matters. What is contemplated here is something in the nature of proceedings in rem. The owner might be quite unknown; it might be that there is no individual who could be prosecuted successfully. And what was desired was something to meet the possible objection that we were not going to have the courts pass upon the enforcement of these regulations.

Mr. McMASTER: After hearing the minister's explanation it would seem to me that if a substantial amount of goods was seized and detained, and a trial took place before a magistrate, this would involve cumbersome procedure which would subsequently have to be followed. Why not cover the whole thing, and cover what would be the ordinary case where a violator is being tried? The same court which tried the violator would, if that were the intention of the measure, order forfeiture of the goods. We could have another section to provide particularly to cases where goods or merchandise are dealt with under orders and regulations.

An order something after this style could be made, that they should be liable to forfeiture and that the case would be tried before the Exchequer Court of Canada. To have a case come all the way to Ottawa from some other part of Canada is a cumbersome procedure unless a substantial sum is involved. I suggest that even in respect of cases where any considerable amount of goods is alleged to have been used in violation of the act, trials should take place in courts more convenient for those who would have to give evidence.

Mr. HACKETT: Is there any reason for increasing the severity of the penalties? I notice that under the War Measures Act the penalty was a maximum of five years and a maximum fine of $5,000. Under the present measure the penal servitude is limited to five years, but there appears to have been no ceiling placed upon the fine. Are we becoming more vicious?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not know to whom the "we" would apply. I do know, however, that there have been cases of violations in respect of which the pecuniary benefits flowing therefrom ran into a great many thousands of dollars, and where a pecuniary penalty of $5,000 would not prove to be a deterrent. There are violations in connection with these quotas which are deeply resented by some industrialists, and which have produced substantial profits. Here the fines have to be fixed by the courts, and I believe this is one instance in which the punishment should be made to fit the crime.

Mr. HACKETT: Is it left to the discretion of the court to determine what the fine shall be?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It would be within the discretion of the governor in council. But that discretion would always be subject to the tabling of the order and to the right of the houses of parliament to interfere with its operation, when parliament was in session.

Mr. McMASTER: I wish to speak again respecting subsection 2, because as I read it there would not seem to be any enacting clause. If the minister, we will say, were a judge trying a case, I believe he would look in vain for any authority to a superior court to order forfeiture of the goods. This is what it says:

> Any goods, wares or merchandise dealt with contrary to any order or regulation made under this act may be seized and detained and shall be liable to forfeiture at the instance of the Minister of Justice . . .

I suggest that there should be some clause providing for forfeiture under proceedings before a superior court or the Exchequer Court.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That was considered, and the law officers of the department came to the conclusion that if the courts were to be left free to declare whether or not there had been goods, wares or merchandise dealt with in a manner contrary to order or regulation, they should have the right to decide whether they should be liable to forfeiture. The forfeiture would date only from the decision of the court. The court would not be obliged to declare the forfeiture in every case of seizure but would declare forfeiture if it were established to its satisfaction that the goods, wares or merchandise had been the object of wrongdoing.

Mr. McMASTER: I should think that there should be one law; if they had been dealt with in violation of this statute they should be forfeited. Then the judge would have only one thing to decide, that is whether there had been a violation of the statute. Otherwise the court could decide that a man was liable and not forfeit the goods. If it is the intention to leave it to the opinion of the judge trying the case, then I say that is contrary to all British ideas of justice so far as I understand them.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That language was taken from the War Measures Act, which has been in force during two wars and which has had the test of a great many court decisions.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Will the minister make provision for recourse to the courts on the part of any individual who, as distinct from the class to which he belongs, believes he has been aggrieved by a discriminatory order? I am not asking that the right of appeal to the courts be given to all individuals within a class when they are all treated alike, but in many of these orders in council there is no right of recourse to the courts regardless of how unfairly and unjustly one may be dealt with personally as distinct from the class to which he belongs. I suggest that no harm could possibly be done by granting that right. The minister is asking for extraordinary powers for a period of one year, with the possibility, and, according to some statements which have been made, the probability, of them being extended, in part or in whole, beyond that time, provided parliament so directs. Will the minister not give consideration to granting such right of appeal in order to remedy manifest injustices in the case of individuals, and, again I repeat, as distinct from the class to which the individual belongs?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If the hon. member wishes to know whether the department would give consideration to any representations made in that behalf with a view to determining whether or not something should be done in that respect, I shall gladly give the undertaking. If it is to be an undertaking that something be done by this bill before it goes through to deal with the situation, I cannot give the undertaking. If the hon. member will submit the facts of some concrete case which show that an injustice has occurred and make suggestions as to there being some provision made to deal with cases of the kind, I will have the officers of the department try to do something that would give recourse to the courts under such conditions. But I cannot undertake to hold up this bill until that has been done.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: For the life of me I cannot understand the minister's attitude in some of these things, especially as he is a former president of the Canadian Bar Association. All I am asking is that certain requests of the bar association and of the people of Canada as a whole be carried into effect to provide the necessary safeguards designed to assure justice. We are being asked to accept everything the government has done during the period of the war; under section 4 we are being asked to incorporate those things into this legislation. When we are being asked to do that I think we have the right to request on behalf of the people as a whole that unfair denials of justice shall not be perpetuated by an act of this parliament.

What the government is asking for under this section is simply the right to claim in answer to criticism that parliament adopted and accepted everything they did during the period of the war by order in council. The minister says they could not possibly pass an order in council adopting all orders in council to be carried forward that that would interfere with continuity of enforcement. If the government were not endeavouring to get parliament to adopt everything it has done during the period of the war, just and unjust, under the War Measures Act, all that would be necessary to maintain the continuity of enforcement and the psychology of enforcement—I think that was the expression used—necessary to enforcement of the regulations would be on the last day of this year, or the first day of January when this act comes into force, to pass an order in council adopting all the orders in council that had been passed during the period of the war. Then the responsibility would rest on the governor in council.

What the government is endeavouring to do here is to place on parliament, on all the members of this house, the responsibility for the orders in council that were passed during the period of the war, and without their having been seen. I noticed the minister took offence a moment ago, as did some of his colleagues around him, to the question I raised about secret orders in council. There are some orders that have yet to be brought to light and tabled in this parliament. We are asking even at this late date that all orders in council be produced and tabled here. There are some that have not been seen as yet by the members of this parliament. Those are the ones I am asking to be produced so that when we approve of them we shall know what we are approving.

The CHAIRMAN: I take it that the hon. member for Lake Centre was discussing section 4 of the new bill. Do I understand that the amendment to section 3 is carried?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): It seems to me that this house is entitled to have the opinion of the Minister of Justice as to whether the suggestion made by the hon. member for Lake Centre is or is not in the interests of justice. I was surprised to hear him say, if I understood him correctly, that he was not considering the request made by the hon. member for Lake Centre because he could not hold up the passage of the bill. If I misunderstood the minister, he will correct me. Frankly, that is not my understanding of the reason we are sitting here. I ask him again if we are not entitled to have his opinion as to whether or not the suggestion which has been made is a reasonable one and entitled to consideration?

The CHAIRMAN: Before the minister answers, may we get the record straight? I understand that section 3 as amended is agreed to.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

The CHAIRMAN: We are now considering section 4. I declare section 3 agreed to.

Section agreed to.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose at one o'clock we had carried section 3 as amended and were about to consider section 4. I understand there is an amendment to section 4.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I would suggest that an hon. member propose that section 4 of the bill be replaced by a section 4 in the form of the reprint with proposed amendments.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I move accordingly, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In view of the fact that this section is amended, there is a question I should like to ask the minister with the leave of yourself, Mr. Chairman, and the committee arising out of an answer which he gave yesterday afternoon to the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie, as reported on page 3010 of yesterday's Hansard:

> Mr. Raymond (Beauharnois-Laprairie): Mr. Chairman, I should like to direct two questions to the honourable the Minister of Justice. Does he consider that the powers requested in Bill No. 15 as reprinted are less extensive than those that were set forth in the original bill? That is my first question; if the minister will kindly answer it I shall ask him the second one.
> Hon. Mr. St. Laurent: Yes, I consider that the powers requested in Bill No. 15 as reprinted are less extensive than those set forth in the original bill.

A little further down the minister is reported as saying:

> I shall tell him quite frankly that what was requested in the bill introduced on November 23 implied things that are not asked for at this time, but which we have not forgone and will request from parliament through other measures.

I should like the minister to explain what are the powers which were foregone in this act and what are the other measures which are to be brought before parliament in order to implement the powers which were withdrawn from the original bill?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Chairman, I shall not attempt to make an exhaustive comparison of the powers in the original bill and in the bill as reprinted; but what I had in mind in giving that answer was the fact that subparagraph (g) of section 3, subsection 1, had been dropped, but that that did not imply any change in government policy, and that if any further legislation was required in that regard it would not be in this bill but would be something dealt with by separate legislation to be introduced into the house.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is the only other measure to be introduced?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That was the only thing to which my mind adverted when the question was put.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not suppose that any amendment will be accepted, but, again asserting the attitude of this party on section 4 and our desire not to be placed in a position where we shall accept holus bolus all the orders in council which have been passed during the period of the war, whether fair, just or arbitrary; believing that we should have the power to annul any of these orders in council under the law, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver South:

That the words "amendment or revocation" in line 30 be deleted, and that there be substituted therefor the word "annulment."

I understand the distinction to be this: annulment of orders in council is the result of a resolution of this house; amendments or revocations are acts of which the governor in council alone is capable. Am I correct in that?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is the intent of the language as contained in the section.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is what I took it to mean. That being so the only power of amendment or revocation of the orders in council which were passed during the period of the war will remain in the governor in council and will not rest in parliament under the provisions of this act. The minister has assured hon. members that any member may rise in his place and move a resolution to annul orders and regulations made under the War Measures Act which become part and parcel of the law of this land when this bill becomes law. But regardless of that assurance no hon. member would have the right without the unanimous consent of the house to do something which is contrary to the terms of a statute. The member would find himself in this position: first, if he moved in this house for the annulment of one of the orders in council which was passed under the War Measures Act, the question which would naturally be asked would be "Under what authority do you do that?" One would turn then to the statute and would have to admit: I realize that under the statute I am not entitled to make this motion, but I had the assurance of the minister—and, given conscientiously—that this right would be presented to a private member of the house although not contained in the statute.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Will the hon. member permit me?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think he is under a misapprehension. I did not give the undertaking that the orders in council or regulations made under the War Measures Act could be annulled by a resolution, but I said that if any hon. member chose to bring in a bill the government would facilitate the consideration of the bill in the shortest possible time.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes, that is proper. The case is even worse than I expressed it. In other words, regardless of what these orders may be, regardless of how desirous the membership of this house may be to repudiate or annul any of these orders in council, such as regulations under price control, certain regulations under rental control, and any other controls, the rights of the member would simply consist of introducing a bill with the consent of the house. And then where would he be? It could not be a public bill if it were introduced by a private member; he would have to be in the position of introducing a private member's bill.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How far would he get? On certain days of the week there is one hour for this purpose.

Mr. HACKETT: During only a certain number of weeks.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes, during only a certain number of weeks; and I have known of cases where private members' resolutions have been talked out, possibly not intentionally but certainly with monotonous regularity. I press this question no further except to move an amendment, pointing out once again that it is unfair to ask hon. members to agree to the enactment by this parliament, as substantive law, of orders in council which passed behind closed doors during the period of the war. Many of them—most of them, according to the minister—are unknown to the members of the house, however diligent they may be. The minister himself, who is charged with the administration of justice, says that he could do more useful things than reading over these orders in council, and after reading some of them I think he is right. The position is that we are asked, without the right of annulment, to accept this pile of legislation. I make my last appeal. Will you not—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am glad, sir, that there are enough members who are following the discussion with interest that any remark such as this is met with appreciation. In spite of all the arguments advanced, has any argument been put forward by the minister which answers the simple request that we be allowed to determine what shall be the law of the land when we are asked to adopt something of which we know nothing? The British act sets out a schedule particularizing all the orders in council which the British government has made law as the result of the adoption of orders in council in the period of the war. They are set out in the schedule. The British house knew what they were passing. Here we do not know. I therefore suggest to the minister the acceptance of this amendment. It does not deprive the government of any power but it does vest in the members of the house the right to determine what legislation they are prepared to accept and adopt.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am not sure that the amendment proposed by the hon. member would bring about the result he desires. I think I understand what the desire is, that is, that the orders in council made under the War Measures Act be in the same position as such orders as may be made under this act. I am not confident that the amendment he has suggested would bring about that result, and if that result were to be agreed to I think more definite language should be used to implement the intent. The hon. member said he feared the government might not be prepared to accept any amendment at all to this proposed amendment that is before the chair. I said last night that the government had no desire to make the house take responsibility for continuance of the orders made under the War Measures Act, and that if it were felt by the house that it would leave them in a freer position merely to authorize the governor in council to take the responsibility of continuing them in force, there was no objection to that. That would mean that an order made by the governor in council to continue them in force would be tabled and could be dealt with, and to that extent the government would be prepared to entertain an amendment to the amendment, placing before the words that are in the amendment the following: "Without prejudice to any other power conferred by this act, the governor in council may order that the orders and regulations made under the War Measures Act or pursuant to authority created under the said act immediately in force before the day this act comes into force shall, while this act is in force, continue in full force and effect subject to amendment or revocation under this act."

That would mean that the governor in council would take the responsibility of determining whether or not he felt it was necessary to continue these orders in council in force, and his order to that effect—because I told the house last night that we should not hesitate to make it—would have to be tabled and could be dealt with here. I wish however to point out that that is not going the whole length that the member for Lake Centre has suggested, because that would be one order in council that would be tabled and would not provide for a selection being made among the things covered by that one order. The order would be one order continuing in force the things which are now in force and which would still be in force on December 31, 1945. It would however provide an opportunity for any hon. member to move that the order in council be annulled, and even if he did not insist upon the resolution going through it would provide him with an opportunity for calling attention to whatever order or regulation he considered was defective or no longer required. That would certainly give every hon. member an opportunity of pointing out what he had to complain about, and if he chose to follow that up with the introduction of a bill to revoke that special bit, instead of insisting upon his resolution to annul the whole lot, he would be free to take that course.

As to the possible delays in dealing with a public bill introduced as a private member's bill, the undertaking I gave implied that if it required the waiving of certain rules of the house as to the time allowed for private members' legislation, the government would be prepared to do that. I intended that to be a serious undertaking to satisfy every hon. member that if he wanted to test the opinion of the house upon a specific thing the government would do its best to have that proceeded with and a decision made upon it even it it required departing from the standing orders governing the business of the house.

I was concerned when it was suggested to me that we should accept an amendment in this form, because I did not want to have to sit up until one minute past midnight on the first of January and pass an order to continue in force things done under the War Measures Act; and on the other hand I did not want to have a hiatus between their effect under the War Measures Act and their effect under the new bill. But it was pointed out to me by the law officers of the department, who always have these things present in their minds, that there is section 12 of the Interpretation Act which covers that point and which, after this act is passed, if it is passed and assented to, would allow the governor in council to make an order which would come into effect the first minute that the act itself came into effect. So that in fact the amendment to the amendment would have no other effect than leaving it to the government to take the whole responsibility in connection with continuing those orders and regulations and of making it necessary for the government to table that order and have it open to annulment by the houses of parliament.

Mr. HACKETT: For the period stipulated, and then if it were not availed of, the full body would be beyond attack.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It would be beyond the form of attack provided for in subsection 3 of section 2 of this bill, but of course it would still be subject to attack before the courts if there were any illegality in its enactment. If it appears to be the sentiment of the committee that they would prefer the government to take the responsibility of continuing these in force rather than having the matter done by statute, there will be no objection to accepting the amendment to the amendment by putting these words ahead of the language now expressed in the reprint of the bill.

Mr. LESAGE: I so move.

The CHAIRMAN: I draw the attention of the committee to the fact that there is already an amendment to the amendment before the Chair.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: While the suggested amendment does not go so far as we should like, it goes a considerable way toward removing the major objection to the sections. I thank the minister for having taken this course, and I withdraw my suggested amendment to the amendment, because the amendment to the amendment suggested by the minister removes the responsibility from parliament and places it on the governer in council, which, on January 1, will accept the responsibility for the enactment of such orders in council as are carried on from the period of the war. In moving that amendment to the amendment the minister does much toward restoring the principle for which we have been contending on this side of the house for two days, namely, the restoration to parliament of absolute control over legislation passed in this country and of such orders in council as are continued during the period of the emergency.

Amendment (Mr. Diefenbaker) withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Lesage moves that the amendment be further amended as follows:

That there be inserted in section 4 before the words "the orders and regulations" the following words: "Without prejudice to any other power conferred by this act the governor in council may order that"

Mr. GREEN: At the time of the passing of the blanket order would it be possible to have as a portion thereof a schedule of the orders in council which will be so extended? I realize that there are many of them, but if that could be done we should at least start off knowing what orders in council passed under the War Measures Act were covered. I am sure it would make it much easier in the future to know just what the law is at any one time.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am sure it would be making it easier, but I cannot give the hon. member that undertaking. I do not think it would be physically possible to have that done. It would involve something which has been going on since V-E day and more actively since V-J day. It would involve going over all these orders for the purpose of eliminating just as much as conditions appear to us to justify. But that is not completed, and a schedule would be of no use unless it were exhaustive. I could not undertake to have that kind of schedule ready for the time that this will have to be done.

I had the basic orders here to mention to the committee, and I also had a list of several pages, coming from each department and checked with the privy council office, of orders which are still unrepealed. They are being considered. I appreciate the advisability of having something that will be all-embracing for the public and the legal profession, including the bench, just as soon as we can make it available, but I could not undertake to have that for the time when we shall have to pass an order in council under this section. I can say to the hon. member, however, that I shall be just as pleased as he will be when I can come into the house and table that kind of schedule or list.

Mr. HACKETT: Does not the minister think it would be helpful to annex to the bill a schedule of the principal measures? It need not be exhaustive. He must know the principal ones, the ones on which he is relying at the present time. It is possible that he could not name them all; that can be readily understood, but the minister has a list of the principal orders. If that list were made a schedule to the bill, with the right to extend it, it would be helpful. If the minister were willing to do that it would satisfy this side of the house.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not think it would be at all helpful. I think it would be disturbing to have a schedule which would say: "Here are some of the things that are subject to continuation." It would be disturbing to have some of them mentioned and not the others. At this time I should not care to take the time of the committee to give a long enumeration, but I shall mention what I consider to be the basic orders of this system of controls so that they will be on the record.

First of all there are the wartime prices and trade regulations, established by order in council P.C. 8528 on November 1, 1941, and various amendments thereto from that time down to June 22, 1945. An office consolidation has been published and is available to anyone who wishes to have it. Then there is the wartime leasehold regulations, as established by order in council P.C. 9029 on September 21, 1941, and various amendments, commonly known as the rental regulations. They have been consolidated and are available to anyone who wishes to have them. Then there are the emergency shelter regulations, P.C. 9439, of December 19, 1944, and amendments. The original and a copy of the amendments can be secured by anyone who is interested. Next is the foreign exchange control order, P.C. 7378, of December 13, 1940, as amended. There is an office consolidation of that order and amendments. Following that is the revised regulation respecting trading with the enemy, P.C. 8526. There is also an office consolidated booklet. Then we have the wartime wages control order, P.C. 9384, of December 9, 1943. It is consolidated with amendments in a booklet which is easily obtainable. There are the war labour relations regulations, P.C. 1003, which I am sure are well known to all hon. members; the wartime salaries order, P.C. 9298 of November 27, 1941, as amended, of which there is an office consolidation in pamphlet form which can be easily obtained; the order in council reestablishing the wartime industries control board regulations, P.C. 3 of January 4, 1944, with an amendment of August 11, 1944, which is the basic order under which the controllers operating under the Department of Munitions and Supply exercised their powers. Fortunately I think most of these controls already have been eliminated, and only yesterday the newspapers carried the story of the elimination of the restrictions on the construction of buildings. Then there are the national selective service civilian regulations, P.C. 246 of January 19, 1943, with amendments, which are gradually being removed. There are the defence of Canada regulations, of which some vestiges still have not been repealed. These are under active consideration and ere long will have completely disappeared.

The other large class are the orders in council relating to veterans and others entitled to certain benefits, which have been under consideration by the special committee of this house for the purpose of drafting legislation to put in statutory form what had been done provisionally by orders in council. Those are the principal groups. There are others, of course.

Mr. HAZEN: Did the minister mention the selective service regulations?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes. There are many others; the prize court regulations, which are still operative, but which will cease to be operative just as soon as the bill which went through this house the other day receives the royal assent. Then there are the regulations establishing the system of import and export permits. There are regulations which did not necessarily depend wholly upon this kind of legislation, providing for the stabilization controls which involved the expenditure of money appropriated under the various appropriation acts. Each of these things could have been done independently of this kind of legislation for each fiscal year under the terms of the appropriation act, but there are continuing regulations that were made under the War Measures Act and which did not have to be repeated in respect of each separate fiscal period.

In addition there is a very long list of orders in council that have been enacted, in many of which reference was made to the War Measures Act, though that might not have been essential. But it was there; it was sufficient to justify what was being done, without looking at anything else, and therefore it was referred to.

I have here a general statement that orders in council, including minutes of council and treasury board minutes from August 25, 1939, to November 15, 1945, inclusive, were passed in the following numbers: orders in council, 57,276; treasury board minutes, 37,603, or a total of 94,879. Orders in council passed under the War Measures Act and tabled from September 7, 1939, to November 14, 1945, numbered 4,138. Those were the orders in council which were not administrative, not directed to one separate instance but matters that were regarded of general public concern. There were orders in council published between August 25, 1939, and September 30, 1945, in proclamations, eight volumes from January, 1940, to October, 1942, and since that time in war orders and regulations, one volume every quarter or four volumes a year. There were published in the eight volumes of proclamations and orders in council, 1,152; in Canadian war orders and regulations, 1,522; in the Canada Gazette, 1,170, or a total of 3,844. The headings under which there are orders in council which are being considered at the present time for the purpose of consolidation or repeal or abandonment have been given to me for each department. They cover twelve pages.

Mr. GREEN: Could they be put on Hansard?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would have no objection to them being put on Hansard, but if the hon. member will look at the list I think he will see that it would not be helpful to have it there. Just as an indication I have as the first chapter, Agriculture. Then it goes on: agriculture advisory committee; agriculture food board; agriculture supplies board; dairy products board; feed grains reserve stocks; fertilizers and pesticides; fibre, flaxseed and so forth. In that form it would not be in my opinion worth the space it would occupy in Hansard.

Mr. GREEN: It does not give the numbers of the orders in council?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No. So I think it will be much more generally satisfactory to have this work continue and then bring to parliament and table something inclusive, with proper indications as to the numbers and probably also the places where they are published, so ready reference may be had to them.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 5—Orders and regulations re-enacted.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would suggest that some hon. member move that section 5 of bill 15 be struck out and be replaced by the one contained in the reprint.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mr. Chairman, before this section carries I should like to make some observations. This morning the hon. member for Lake Centre made certain statements which affect the merchant seamen's regulations, and I think I should reply to him.

In the course of his remarks the hon. member said that certain secret orders in council affecting the discipline of merchant seamen were passed. During the course of the noon recess I took the trouble to inquire from officers of my department, and I find that since I have been sworn in as Minister of Transport there have been no secret orders in council under the merchant seamen's regulations.

I also find that before that time there were two orders passed. One was merchant seamen's order 1941, which bears the number P.C. 11397, which was published in Canadian war orders and regulations, the issue of April 12, 1943, and was tabled on April 11 of that year.

The second concerns the merchant seamen's foreign jurisdiction order, 1944. It is P.C. 4312 of June 5, 1944. It was published in Canadian war orders and regulations of June 12, 1944, and tabled on March 19, 1945.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—continuation.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would suggest that some hon. member move that for section 6 be substituted the section 6 apearing in the reprint of the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I move accordingly.

Section 6 agreed to.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Then, as to sections 7, 8, 9, 10 and 11 I would suggest that someone move that they be stricken out.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would ask that some hon. member move that for the preamble shown in the bill there be substituted the preamble in the reprint of the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I move accordingly.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In view of the amendments moved to section 4, I am wondering whether the words "and certain orders and regulations made under the War Measures Act be continued in force" might not be deleted. It seems to me they are no longer applicable.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think they should still be referred to. However, it might be satisfactory if instead of the words "it is essential" with respect to the War Measures Act orders and regulations there were substituted the words "it may be necessary."

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That would be satisfactory.

Mr. ILSLEY: I so move, in amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Preamble as amended agreed to.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: With respect to the long title I would suggest that some hon. member move that for the long title in the original bill there be substituted the long title appearing in the reprint.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Shall I report the bill?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Chairman, before you leave the chair may I say through you to hon. members that, though at times this has been a strenuous debate, I should like to express my appreciation to all hon. members for the constructive criticism that has been offered in respect of various portions of the bill and—not too modestly—to state that I think we have all contributed to the preparation of a measure which will be helpful in the transitional period through which the country has to go.

EXPORT CREDITS INSURANCE ACT

INCREASE IN AMOUNT OF LOANS AND VALUE OF SECURITIES HELD UNDER SECTION 22

The house resumed from Tuesday, December 4, consideration in committee of bill No. 217, to amend the Export Credits Insurance Act—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Aggregate amount of guarantees.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): When the bill was last before the house there was some discussion as to whether it was desirable in making these advances to attempt to tie in rather tightly the trade of the country to whom advances are made, and the minister indicated that he did not think that was wise. I agree with him. Have we been satisfied that the countries to which advances are made are not tied up with monetary arrangements which will prevent them having control over their own trade? I do not mean in respect of the advances which are being made, because that is probably taken care of; but after all, part of our aim in making these advances is to have open doors for trade. Are we satisfied that these countries have not monetary arrangements which would tie up their trade to go in this or that direction? That might be injurious to our position and might defeat one of the aims which we have in mind in making these advences.

Mr. ILSLEY: All I can say is that I have no knowledge of any monetary arrangements between any of these countries and any other countries, and have no reason to think they exist.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I would ask the minister to concern himself with that question, because it may be important to us. I suggest it is a thing which the department might explore. Now I have a second question. Part I of the bill concerns the setting up of what is virtually an insurance company which I understand will have a head just like any other company. The company will operate virtually under the control of that head, subject to the control of the minister. The other part of the bill dealing with advances seems to me to be a sort of foster-child. There are two departments which seem to be interested, the Department of Finance and the Department of Trade and Commerce. I should be glad to know where the responsibility lies, if in fact it lies definitely on either department.

Mr. ILSLEY: The responsibility for making advances and making arrangements covering advances under part II of the act lies with the Minister of Finance. The responsibility for the insurance company lies with the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Some of these agreements have been tabled. The Minister of Trade and Commerce tells me that he does not sign the agreements under part II of the act. I know he has been present on nearly all occasions when the transactions were completed. The Department of Finance is the one which settles the terms, so to speak, of these agreements. The council decides, but the Department of Finance takes the lead and assumes the responsibility with reference to terms.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I have no desire to labour the point, but it did strike me that this might be one of those cases where there was divided authority. I would consider that very undesirable and I am sure the minister would also.

Mr. CHURCH: While I appreciate what the minister and the government have done in this bill and under lend-lease, there are certain questions which should be raised in connection with this bill. I have raised these matters in the house, often alone. The San Francisco agreement, the Bretton Woods agreement, the excise bill, our lend-lease—all these matters are interlocked and interrelated. We cannot discuss one without discussing the others and seeing the cause and effect. The United States abrogated lend-lease so suddenly that it left the mother country in a most dangerous position. She had lost her overseas investments and she was forced to revert back to the time when she was practically a small country.

This bill does not go far enough so far as the mother country is concerned. Last fall and again this spring I raised these same questions. There is no use beating about the bush, there is no use shadow-boxing about this thing; there is no use just having window dressing; we must see what is in the window.

Let us see what is in the window at the present time. Up to Dunkirk the mother country was all alone except for the dominions. She had to borrow money in order to defend the United States shores. Lend-lease was one means for what purpose? It was to protect the United States shores. If it had not been for the protection given by the mother country, with the dominions, after France fell, New York would have been invaded as well as this country. The United States lend-lease bill as amended was good as far as it went, but for two and a half years they had a cash and carry policy.

The Minister of Finance has done quite well on behalf of the government with regard to the proposals concerning loans in this and in other ways for the mother country. I am sorry to see that some of the other parties in the house are not following the principle adopted by the late Mr. Fielding and Sir Wilfrid Laurier of preferential trade within the empire, in which I still believe—it will always be necessary. I believe some announcement should have been made long ago because the mother country does not know where Canada stands on trade, defence and migration. The Ottawa agreements were the greatest boon this country ever had. There are some matters I should like to refer to which may be out of order under this bill, as they were on Tuesday, but as long as discussion is allowed I think we have to discuss many things at the one time if we are to close the session in a few days.

I say, regardless of the merits of the proposals, that it is time the people knew where the empire and the dominions stand. At the present time we hear a great deal in this house from an internationalist and a leftist point of view. The government seems to be in a scramble to placate my hon. friends on the left. It reminds me of that first Easter Sunday when Peter and the other disciple had a race to the sepulchre and "the other disciple did outrun Peter, and came first to the sepulchre." That is more or less the kind of thing that the government seems to be doing in relation to the "left" views expressed by hon. gentlemen who, I may add, are quite friendly and very courteous in debate. I say that the government has not done its duty in failing to let the dominions know where we stand on the matter of empire trade, defence and migration within the empire. I am absolutely in favour of the Ottawa agreements and of empire trade, and not the less so after reading the debates which have been going on in the senate and congress at Washington.

[Mr. Church.]

What we call the Export Credits Insurance Act is a most commendable measure; I have only a few further remarks to make about it. It is time for the government to lay all cards on the table, and to realize that the export credits bill, the Washington-Britain loan, empire trade, defence and migration within the empire are all wrapped up together; they all interlock. And what do we do? We sit here and fold our arms as a parliament. Influenced by waves of leftist propaganda and international sentiment, we seem to have forgotten all about the British empire, which guarded our shores and saved civilization, and which has been left to "carry the bag". Picture the situation of the mother country at the present time, and remember that, when lend-lease was discussed among the big three, it was understood that this assistance would continue for some time.

I do not think we have gone far enough in aiding the mother country in the matter of providing credits in exchange for goods and services. Also something should have been done for empire crown colonies and empire dependencies apart from the dominions. Take the case of the Fiji islands, whose tribes gave all they had and fought bravely for the empire in the recent war. Take the case of other dependencies and crown colonies whose soldiers, in the African campaign, marched across the desert under Montgomery and Alexander. Yet they have no part in the provisions of this credit bill. I say that some allowance should be made for any of these empire possessions which wish to come in.

My last point is that I believe we as a dominion should long ago have had a conference with the mother country on matters of trade and finance. There is a new government over there at the present time. In the last election the party they represent polled 11,000,000 votes and the Conservatives under Mr. Churchill received 9,000,000 votes, out of a total of 22,000,000 ballots, so the Conservatives were not very far behind.

I tell you this, that unless we as dominions stand by the mother country and get away from much of this internationalism and so-called collective security we shall live to regret it. Some of the results are reflected in the pacifism and leagues causing a second world war and resulting in the financial burdens of this country, the billions of dollars of war loans which have had to be provided by the taxpayers. In saying this I sympathize with the Minister of Finance, and I always have, in the good work he has done in his lend-lease and export credits act.

While I believe that the policy of lend-lease and export credits was right, and that it was a great patriotic move on the part of the government of the day, I think it should go farther. As for collective security, we have seen where that led to when Britain, in order to obtain a few ships, had to surrender bases from Newfoundland down to British Guiana.

Let me reiterate that the time has come for the government to lay down its policy as regards the Ottawa agreements. They proved a great boon to this country. The mother country has been consistently our best customer, and it spent a lot of money developing this country. What are we going to do to-day? Apparently we are to enter into bargains in the name of internationalism with a number of different countries outside the empire, many of which were unfriendly to our country, and to do so by proposals and agreements made by ministers of the crown over the head of parliament. There should be a constitutional change which would prohibit ministers from entering into such agreements without reference to parliament. I say that course is entirely wrong. Unless the dominions and the mother country hang together they will hang separately. Historically, economically, geographically and financially our interests are one. The handwriting is on the wall, and the war will have been fought in vain unless these foundations are maintained. Only one-third of the proposed guarantees are before us in this bill; we should know something about the aggregate of loans to be made. The government must know all about the proposed United States loan to Great Britain; there was a debate on the subject in the British House of Commons and in the senate at Washington. The cause and the probable effects are well understood by them. I urge the government to give us more information on these financial proposals and interrelated problems. Are we members just to be a lot of yes-men and nodders to endorse any proposals which the government put forward? I say no, and that it is the duty of the opposition to examine these policies and see how they are interrelated.

I appreciate what the government has done in this export credits bill. I believe the principle is right and should be extended. We should know whether any conference has been held with the new government in the United Kingdom with respect to the Ottawa agreements and preferential trade. Have any agreements or understandings been arrived at over there? If they have, it is the duty of the dominions to find out. If inter-empire trading arrangements are to go by the board it will be a sorry day for this country, because the hope of the world and of civilization is that the dominions and the mother country shall hang together. If they do they will have a powerful voice in the peace terms. Separately they are no match for Russia and no match for the United States, whether in the economic, the financial, the social or any other field. United they are more than an equal. If they hang together they are economically strong enough to get along without any other country. We can use our ports and harbours to transport our raw materials to the whole world, while maintaining our place in inter-empire trade. It is along such lines that we should be thinking. I am utterly opposed to much of this propaganda for trade and economic internationalism and so-called collective security. Such ideas, when put to the test, failed us years ago and will fail us in the years to come, unless we take heed. I ask hon. members to stop, look and listen to the real meaning of these policies at the present time.

Section agreed to.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to ask the minister if he has any reply to make to my questions. Has there been any conference with the mother country while the present United Kingdom government has been in office about the matters I have mentioned—the Ottawa agreements, preferential trade, lend-lease, and the rest?

Mr. ILSLEY: There have been conferences from time to time on the official level, as it is called, but there has not been a conference between governments with reference to preferential trading. I understand that arrangements are being made for a world trade conference; at any rate that is foreshadowed in the news; but that is not exactly what the hon. gentleman refers to.

Mr. CHURCH: What the minister says is absolutely correct, but the people of Canada and members of this house know that all these questions are interlocked, and it will not do to say that they are not. The public and the house should know how we stand, what conferences have been held with the mother country regarding the new loan at Washington and how we are connected with it, about Bretton Woods, and about empire preferential trading.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND—INTERNATIONAL BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to grant authority to accept on behalf of Canada and to carry out the obligations of Canada under the articles of agreement for an international monetary fund and an international bank for reconstruction and development prepared by the united nations monetary and financial conference held at Bretton Woods in July, 1944; to authorize the payment of the subscriptions required from Canada out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund to an amount not exceeding seven hundred million dollars; and to authorize the borrowing under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, of sums not exceeding seven hundred million dollars.

He said: In the measure now before it, the house is asked to express its approval of Canadian participation in the two new international financial institutions considered at the united nations monetary and financial conference held at Bretton Woods, New Hampshire, in July 1944. This conference was held after a couple of years of intensive discussion among the treasury officials of a large number of the united nations regarding the character and machinery of post-war financial relationships among countries. It was attended by the representatives of forty-four nations and drew up proposed articles of agreement of an international monetary fund and an international bank for reconstruction and development. These articles of agreement are printed as a schedule to the present bill. The countries participating in the Bretton Woods conference were not committed to membership as a result of such participation: the proposed institutions come into being only after membership has been formally accepted by countries providing sixty-five per cent of the resources. The articles of agreement remain open for signature on the part of the countries which were represented at the Bretton Woods conference until the end of this year.

The proposed institutions are intended to be part of the permanent framework of international collaboration in the monetary field, though—as I shall endeavour to show later—they have a special significance in the difficult years that lie immediately ahead. The international monetary fund is primarily concerned with securing orderly exchange arrangements, while the bank is intended to help in the restoration of economies which have been destroyed or disrupted in the course of the war and, over the longer period, to encourage and facilitate the international flow of capital for productive investment.

As members who have already had an opportunity of studying the proposed articles of agreement will, I am sure, agree, the subject matter is somewhat complicated. I do not propose at this stage to attempt to analyse the articles of agreement in detail, though I shall have something to say later about the salient features of the fund and the bank. What I should like to do now is direct attention to some of the more general considerations involved in these proposals.

The main issue which is at stake in the Bretton Woods proposals is the same as that involved in the united nations charter which this house recently approved by so overwhelming a majority. That issue is: are we and other countries to organize and cooperate for peace, or is each nation going to use its strength and resources at the expense of others in a struggle for survival? In many parts of the world there is evident a keen awareness that if peace is to be maintained and if prosperity is to be achieved it will be necessary to plan for a higher degree of international collaboration than we have ever achieved in peace time in the past. In pursuit of this purpose, the united nations are in process of creating a number of institutions which are to serve as the instruments of such collaboration. The central institution is, of course, the united nations organization embodied in the San Francisco charter. This, it is hoped, will provide the political basis of security. But it is recognized that security also has an economic basis and that economic instability and poverty and unemployment provide a background conducive to political dissension among nations. More positively, all the experience of the past has demonstrated that it is only through collaboration with others that countries can hope, over a long period of time, to achieve real prosperity. Economic isolation in the modern world is as impractical a policy as political isolation.

It is for these reasons that the Bretton Woods proposals should, notwithstanding their technical complexities, be regarded as one part of the united nations effort to create and maintain a peaceful and prosperous world. On the political side, the keystone in the structure of institutions being set up for this purpose is the united nations charter. On the economic side we have, to date, three main pieces. There is UNRRA, the united nations organization to deal with urgent problems of relief and rehabilitation, which has received unanimous support from all sides of this house. There is the food and agriculture organization, which this house has recently endorsed and which lately held its first annual meeting at Quebec city. And there are the financial institutions discussed at Bretton Woods, whose long-run purposes are to help provide the monetary and financial conditions necessary for the sound and expansive development of international trade and to enable countries to cooperate with each other for this purpose without thereby lessening their ability to carry out domestic policies aimed at full employment for their own people. The structure of international collaboration will be by no means complete when the fund and the bank are established. These institutions do not look after the immediate payments difficulties of countries like the United Kingdom whose international financial position has been so weakened by the war. Nor does the establishment of a monetary framework conducive to liberal commercial policies in itself assure that liberal policies will in fact be followed. For this, separate agreement is necessary. I shall have more to say about these points later.

The objectives sought by the united nations through the establishment of these institutions are the same as those which we as Canadians seek for ourselves—expanded production, trade, employment and higher standards of living all round. The destruction and disorganization wrought by the war are so enormous that it is only through a cooperative effort that there is any hope of establishing normal conditions of trade within a reasonable length of time. We in Canada have happily escaped the physical destruction of war, but that does not mean that our participation in joint efforts to aid in the reconstruction of other countries is an act of outright generosity from which we shall get no material return. Quite apart from any moral obligations, the fact is that we need prosperous markets in the world if we are to be prosperous ourselves and we shall need the goods which these economies can sell us when they are reestablished once more.

The Canadian government and parliament have already recognized our responsibility and our interest in helping tide those with whom we have had a mutually profitable trade in the past over their immediate payments difficulties by making provision for direct and guaranteed loans in the Export Credits Insurance Act. The international bank for reconstruction and development will make and guarantee loans for the foreign currency requirements of reconstruction projects of the member countries. Through these two mechanisms, Canada is and will be contributing what it can to getting the war-devastated countries on their feet and getting production and normal economic life started again. And in doing so, we are and shall be helping our own industries and farmers to find remunerative export markets and thereby to smooth the transition from the war to the peace economy.

From what I have said it is obvious that the Bretton Woods proposals are based in part on the immediate needs arising out of the war. But, significant though this element is, it is less significant I believe than the longer-run aspects of the proposals. As I have already indicated, the two institutions are regarded as part of the permanent machinery of international monetary collaboration. As such they are based on the experience of the inter-war period and they represent an attempt to avoid the errors of the past.

Members of the house will, I am sure, recall the disorganized state of international economic affairs that prevailed before the war. The international monetary standard that had been painfully reconstructed during the 1920's was built up by a piecemeal process in which each country chose its own time and its own rate for stabilization without regard to the effect of its action on others. The structure of exchange rates that resulted from the uncoordinated action of different countries was an irrational one which inevitably set up stresses and strains and weakened the system's resistance to shock. The overvaluation of sterling and the undervaluation of the franc are the most frequently cited examples. Another weakness of the system was that it did not provide adequate machinery for regular consultation among countries with a view to getting agreements on changes in exchange rates when changes were needed and with a view to getting agreement on coordinated policies aimed at economic stability. Further, there was no source of international credit to which countries had assured access. When the great depression struck, each country had to cope as best it could with the situation. For all, the prime consideration was to deal with unemployment, and the means of domestic recovery which appeared most practicable consisted of measures whose effect was to thrust the burden of the depression abroad. The result was the strangulation of world trade and the mutual impoverishment of all countries. The characteristic features of world economic relationships before the war were high and discriminatory tariffs, import quotas, export subsidies, depreciated currencies of uncertain value, discriminatory clearing agreements, multiple currency practices.

I am certain that in no quarter of the house is there a desire to see the world return to these pre-war practices. But if the nations of the world are left to their own devices and are not bound together in an association of mutual advantage which will set certain standards for its members, they will in my opinion inevitably revert to the practices I have described. If we want a reasonable degree of orderliness and fairness in international economic and monetary arrangements, we must set about to create it. It would be idle to suppose that countries will embrace it automatically. There was a period in the modern history of the world when the international gold standard ensured order and stability in the international exchanges. At the present time, however, the house can be certain that there are very few countries which would be willing to adopt this standard and to tie their currencies rigidly to gold if that meant that they were thereby committed to abandoning from time to time domestic policies aimed at stability and employment in order to follow deflationary or inflationary influences originating abroad. This does not, of course, mean that they will not use gold as a means of international payment and hold it as a reserve against such requirements.

In practically all countries today the primary objective of economic policy is the maintenance of high levels of employment and production. No international monetary system, gold standard, Bretton Woods or any other, will be generally acceptable which is incompatible with this objective. The task is to harmonize the two objectives of internal stability and international cooperation, so that we can have not only high employment but also a high standard of living through the mutually profitable exchange of goods with other countries. For any international monetary system to endure, it is clear that the technical arrangements regarding exchange stability will have to be supplemented by other arrangements looking towards the prevention, through common action, of violent fluctuations in economic conditions.

The international monetary fund represents the united nations attempt to create agreed arrangements to which all countries can adhere without feeling that they are entering a straitjacket and to provide international monetary conditions that will be conducive to the expansion of international trade. The articles of agreement are the result of intensive work on the part of the experts of forty-four nations over a long period of time. Inevitably they represent at certain points a compromise. No country was able to have each article drafted exactly as it might have wished, and I am not prepared to argue that the document is a perfect one or that experience will not prove that changes are required. But I do say that the three or four key points in the fund proposal are a realistic and constructive attempt to deal with the main sources of difficulty in pre-war international monetary arrangements.

In the first place, the fund will be a permanent organ of international collaboration on monetary matters. It will be a forum at which problems of common interest to the members can be discussed before they reach critical proportions. This may seem simple enough, and indeed it is, but the fact remains nonetheless that before the war there was astonishingly little organized machinery for international consultation on these questions. The fund will be governed by a board of governors consisting of the representatives of each of the governments which are members. The governors will meet at least once a year and between meetings their authority as regards the day-to-day operations of the fund will be delegated to an executive directorate consisting of the representatives of the five largest countries and six to eight others elected by the remaining countries. It is not too much to hope that considerable benefit will be derived from these regular meetings, through those responsible for monetary and exchange policy in the various countries becoming familiar with each other's problems and being provided with frequent opportunities for working out solutions which will reconcile the interests of all.

The second main feature of the international monetary fund is that the nations joining it recoginze that exchange rates have more than purely domestic implications and are therefore properly matters of international concern. Countries joining the fund agree on their initial rates of exchange and, apart from a leeway of 10 per cent, undertake not to alter them except after consultation with the fund. Competitive currency depreciation is out: members agree not to propose a change in their exchange rate except to correct a fundamental disequilibrium. These are the provisions designed to ensure exchange stability. But there are other provisions which are designed to ensure that this stability does not become rigidity and that countries will not be required as a result of their membership in the fund to maintain an exchange rate which has ceased to be appropriate and which therefore involves them in economic dislocation. One of these is the provision which authorizes members to change the initially agreed rates by as much as 10 per cent without this requiring the concurrence of the fund. Another is the provision which imposes an obligation on the fund to approve a requested change if the change is in fact necessary to correct a fundamental disequilibrium. The fund is specifically enjoined from concerning itself with the domestic policies — political, economic or social—which gave rise to the necessity for a change in the exchange rate to restore the economic balance of a country. It may only concern itself with the question of fact: is a change in the rate necessary to restore the balance or not? Thus the fact that a country has adopted a social security programme or has socialized its major industries can be no concern of the fund's if that member should subsequently apply for a change in its exchange rate: it cannot object on the ground that it disapproves of these measures and that they were responsible for the disequilibrium it is now desired to correct. If the disequilibrium in fact exists, the fund must agree to the change.

I do not think that it can be successfully argued that the provisions regarding exchange stability go further than it is desirable to go or that they represent an undue restriction on the liberty of action of the member countries. The undertaking that members give regarding exchange rates is an undertaking to consult: there is no undertaking to accept the fund's recommendations in all circumstances.

I have referred to two of the main features of the international monetary fund, namely the opportunity it provides for continuous consultation and the provisions it embodies regarding exchange stability. I come now to the third main feature, namely the provisions regarding exchange restrictions.

Members of the fund undertake, after a transitional period, not to impose restrictions on current account international transactions and to remove the restrictions now in effect as soon as conditions permit.

These provisions mean two things, both of particular interest to Canada. They mean that countries will not be entitled to discriminate against imports from any other member on currency grounds and that the foreign exchange which a country earns as a result of exporting to any member of the fund will be available to be used to pay for imports from any other member of the fund. When these provisions are fully in effect the Canadian exporter will be able to compete in the markets of the world with the assurance that no special exchange restrictions will be placed in his way. There is to be no question of blocked accounts in respect of any current account transaction and Canada as a country will be under no pressure to use the entire proceeds of her exports to any particular country to buy imports from that particular country. She will be free to use them to pay for imports from any part of the world. In other words, the international currency system which is being set up is one which permits of the multilateral clearing of balances resulting from international transactions. This is a matter of special importance to Canada on account of the structure of our balance of international payments, with its chronic surplus of sterling and chronic deficiency of United States dollars. The alternative of bilateralism, that is, the attempt to balance the trade between each pair of countries engaged in trade, was developed by Germany before the war and naturally proved destructive of international prosperity. It is a system which, by restricting the area in which the proceeds of exports can be spent, necessarily results in worse bargains for the seller than if he had freedom of choice. It is a system, moreover, which lends itself to political abuse by enabling the strong to exploit the weak.

Unfortunately, the abolition of exchange restrictions on current account transactions and the establishment of true multilateral clearing will not come into effect as soon as the international monetary fund is established. The immediate international financial position of certain countries is such that it will be necessary for them—unless other outside assistance is forthcoming on constructive terms—to continue for a period with exchange restrictions and clearing agreements of the type that have been in force during the war. This is notably true of the United Kingdom, which drastically curtailed her export trade during the war in order to devote all her productive effort to the war, which lost a large part of her merchant fleet and her income from overseas investment and which incurred huge overseas liabilities for war purposes. It is also true of other countries, particularly those which suffered years of systematic looting by the enemy. These countries will have import requirements far in excess of their immediate export capacity and it is recognized that the establishment of the fund will not relieve them of the necessity of husbanding their foreign exchange resources. Until a balance is established in the international accounts of these countries through reestablishment of their export trades or through other measures of outside assistance, it would not be reasonable to expect them to drop entirely their war-time exchange restrictions. They do agree, however, on joining the fund that this will be the objective of their policy towards which they will work as rapidly as conditions permit, and the fund is entitled to express views on any restrictions remaining in effect a few years after it is established. And it is, of course, the case that the establishment of the fund contributes towards the speedier abolition of these restrictions both through the greater confidence which will result from the assurance of financial support and through its general effect in contributing to the expansion of world trade.

I should like to make it clear to members of the house that the exchange restrictions which countries joining the fund undertake to abolish refer exclusively to restrictions on current account transactions, that is, such things as payments for imports and interest and dividends on investments. There is nothing in the provisions of the fund which requires any member to abolish exchange restrictions on capital movements and it is recognized that in order to restrict capital movements it may be necessary to supervise and control all foreign exchange transactions. Far from prohibiting control of capital movements, the articles of agreement stipulate that the resources of the fund are not to be used to meet a large or sustained outflow of capital and that the fund may request a member to exercise controls to prevent such use of the fund's resources. Moreover, there is in the articles of agreement a positive provision to the effect that members may exercise such controls as are necessary to regulate international capital movements. I wished to make this explanation here in order to make it quite clear that an exchange control operated along the lines of our own at the present time is in no sense inconsistent with our undertakings under the provisions of the international monetary fund.

The undertakings which members of the fund give regarding exchange stability and the convertibility of their currency in respect of current account transactions are obviously important commitments. In return, members get the assurance that the fund will stand behind them in time of need. This brings me to the fourth and final aspect of the fund to which I propose to refer to-day, namely the fund's exchange operations.

Each member joining the fund is assigned a quota, which represents the measure of two things: its obligations to provide resources to the fund and its ability to draw resources out of the fund. The quotas of the countries represented at the Bretton Woods conference were worked out there and printed as an annex to the articles of agreement. These quotas amount in the aggregate to $8,800 million. The United States quota is $2,750 million, the British $1,300 million, the Russian $1,200 million, the Chinese, $550 million, the French $450 million, the Indian $400 million and the Canadian $300 million. All the quotas are expressed in terms of United States dollars. The actual payments of the subscriptions to the fund are, however, not in United States dollars but partly in gold and partly in the national currency of each member. The gold subscription is to be either 25 per cent of the quota or 10 per cent of the country's independent reserves of gold and United States dollars, whichever of these is less, with the balance payable in national currency.

The fund as originally constituted will therefore consist partly of gold and partly of national currency. It is believed that originally about $1,800 million of the fund's assets will consist of gold, and the balance of various national currencies. Members have the right to buy foreign exchange from the fund in amounts equal to their quota plus the amount of gold they originally subscribed. This right is subject to certain limitations of both a quantitative and qualitative nature. Thus, unless the fund waives this condition, purchases in any single year may not exceed 25 per cent of a member's quota, and a country having substantial international reserves of its own must use these reserves to meet adverse balances to the same extent as it draws on its quota. Moreover, if the fund finds that a member is making use of its resources in a manner contrary to the purposes of the fund, it may, after due notice, suspend it from making further use of them. These provisions for exchange transactions with the fund are a very central part of the fund agreement. It will be seen that the fund's resources are a revolving fund, and international pool of credit which is available to member countries to meet adverse balances in their international payments and which allows time for adjustments to be made. It is this element of assured access to credits which provides the necessary flexibility in the system and which enables the countries adhering to this international standard to do so without fear that they are hereby entering a strait-jacket.

Under these arrangements, a country which suffers a temporary deficit in its balance of international payments due, say, to a crop failure at home or a recession in its principal export markets, will know that it can draw on the fund to see it over the payments difficulties. It will therefore be relieved to that extent of the necessity of taking immediate steps to adjust its payments position —such steps, for example, as exchange depreciation, or import restrictions which would have a depressing effect abroad, or measures of internal deflation which would have a pressing effect at home. The knowledge that the fund is there in cases of need should make countries more willing to use their own reserves to meet temporary deficits in their balances of payments. In short, by increasing the amount of international money, the international monetary fund introduces an important factor of flexibility which provides countries with the assurance that they will not, on each occasion of adversity, be confronted with the choice between cutting themselves adrift from the world economy or abandoning domestic policies aimed at high employment.

I believe that in these four points I have covered the highlights of the international monetary fund, though members will no doubt wish to have more detailed explanation of certain features at a later stage. I can deal with the international bank for reconstruction and development more briefly because, though it is no less important than the fund, it is less novel in conception.

I have already outlined the broad general purposes of the bank which are to aid in the reconstruction of war-devastated countries and in the development of economically backward areas. The bank is, of course, not intended to provide all, or nearly all, the capital required for these purposes. It is intended that private international investment should in due course supply the bulk of the funds required but it is recognized that for a while private investors in the creditor countries may hesitate to make foreign loans.

The bank is to have a capital of $9,100 million, subscribed by the forty-four countries represented at Bretton Woods. The subscription of each country to the bank is approximately the same as its quota in the fund. The Canadian subscription to the bank is $325 million. The subscription of each member is payable as to 2 per cent in gold and 18 per cent in national currency. The remaining 80 per cent of the capital subscription remains uncalled as a surety fund against obligations guaranteed by the bank or moneys borrowed by it. If it becomes necessary to call up unpaid capital in order to make good on an obligation of the bank, the call will be made proportionately on each member.

The bank will engage in activities of three types. First, it may make direct loans out of its own subscribed capital resources; second, it may guarantee loans raised through the private investment market; and third, it may make loans out of funds raised through the issue of its own obligations. Loans will be made or guaranteed only if the bank is satisfied that they increase the productive capacity of the borrower and are within the capacity of the borrowing country to service and each loan will have to be guaranteed by the government of the country in which the project is located or by the central bank of that country. The bank will charge a commission of 1 to 1¾ per cent on loans made or guaranteed by it.

Mr. HACKETT: Is that an annual charge?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; it is what is to be paid in initially. Eighty per cent of the capital is uncalled. Only twenty per cent is called, and that is payable as to two per cent in gold and eighteen per cent in national currency.

As regards the original eighteen per cent of the capital subscription put up by each member in its own currency, this may be loaned by the bank only to make purchases within the country concerned. No such condition may be attached, however, to loans financed by the bank through the issue of its own obligations nor is the bank authorized to impose as a condition of its guarantee that the proceeds of a loan should be spent in the territory of any particular member or members. It should be noted, however, that the bank may borrow funds or guarantee loans only with the approval of the country on whose market the funds are raised. Outstanding loans made by and guaranteed by the bank may not exceed the unimpaired capital, reserves and surplus of the bank.

The most novel feature of the bank proposal is perhaps the way in which it recognizes that while only certain countries are in a position to lend abroad, namely those which have surpluses in their current account balance of payments, the process of foreign investment, through its effect in raising productive efficiency and living standard, is one from which all countries derive benefits—and that it is therefore right that all should share in the risks attached thereto. The risks involved in the bank's activities will be shared proportionately by all the participating countries since all will be called upon to make good any losses which occur.

I wish to turn now to the specific obligations of Canada under the fund proposals and their specific advantages to us. First, our financial obligations. Under the fund our quota is $300 million in terms of United States currency; we shall be required to put up $75 million in gold and the balance in Canadian dollars. To whatever extent the fund does not require Canadian dollars for its operations we may, under the articles of agreement, substitute non-interest bearing non-negotiable notes redeemable at par on demand. The fund would require redemption of these notes only when other members had an excess of payments to Canada and there was a net demand for Canadian dollars which the fund was called upon to satisfy. In these circumstances we should be obliged to raise funds to redeem the notes and a financial burden would arise. But it is important to note that the burden arises because we have a favourable balance of payments and not because we are members of the fund. Without the fund the favourable balance would give rise to accretions to our foreign exchange reserves which also would have to be financed. Or alternatively, if there were no fund, foreign countries might reduce their purchases in Canada because they were short of means of payment here. In that case our financing problem would be reduced but our economic problem would be aggravated.

The important thing for members to bear in mind is that the only thing that can happen to the Canadian dollars which we put into the fund is to be spent in purchasing goods and services in Canada. While they are being spent in this way and the fund's holdings of Canadian dollars are being reduced, we are in effect extending credit to foreign countries through the fund. But it is credit which need not remain outstanding any longer than suits us, for if we wish to take repayment in the only practical form, namely goods and services, we shall have an import surplus which we will be in a position to finance through the fund.

As for the non-financial aspects of the fund agreement, I venture to think that there are few countries in the world which have a greater interest in securing orderly exchange arrangements and expanding world trade on a multilateral basis than Canada. Foreign trade remains a most vital element in our economic system and it cannot prosper under conditions of widely fluctuating exchanges, blocked accounts and bilateralist and discriminatory trade and currency practices. The structure of our balance of payments, with our chronic surplus of sterling and chronic deficiency of United States dollars on current account transactions, is such that we must have multilateral clearing and be able to offset the one against the other if we are to prosper in this country. While the Bretton Woods proposals do not ensure multilateral clearing at once, they do hold out the best hope that has been offered so far that this will be adopted by all countries as their common objective to be achieved within a reasonable period of time.

I should like to make a few general observations by way of conclusion. I think that the house, in considering these proposals, should have a proper appreciation of the seriousness of the foreign situation and of the nature of the real alternatives to the general approach towards the organization of international economic relations represented by Bretton Woods. The economic systems of half the countries of the world have been turned topsy-turvy as a result of the war. Capital equipment of all sorts—roads, bridges, factories, transport systems—have been destroyed, rich farm lands have been inundated, millions of persons have been separated from their ordinary place of employment. Currency systems have been weakened by inflation. Production has been reduced to painfully low levels. The network of normal trade relationships built up over past years has been destroyed. With regard to parts of Europe there is such a complete black-out that we can only imagine the degree of economic disorganization.

Members of the house will have clearly in their minds the way in which the economic dislocations caused by the last war remained to plague us in the 1920's and 1930's. The extent of the dislocation this time is infinitely greater and anyone who believes that it will be possible to introduce order and prosperity into international economic relations in the present state of the world by small, unimaginative measures is living in a fool's paradise. Generally speaking, the attempts the world has made in the past generation to maintain a functioning world economic system have been of the patch-work variety: the motto has been "too little and too late." Past experience is not a good enough guide as to what we should be doing now because the experience of the past has on the whole been unsatisfactory. There is no use relying in 1945 on the expedients that were tried and failed last time. We have to base our policies not only on an appraisal of past experience but also on an appraisal of present requirements.

Bretton Woods is an attempt to organize international monetary cooperation on a national basis for the common good. I believe that it marks a great step in advance. But it is only one step and a great deal more than Bretton Woods will have to be agreed to if we are to make real progress. In particular, some means will have to be found of dealing on a constructive and imaginative basis with the transitional balance of payments difficulties facing the United Kingdom and other countries whose foreign position has been weakened as a result of the character and extent of their contribution to victory. I do not believe that there is any economic issue under discussion to-day which involves higher stakes than this problem. If the approach to it is hesitant and inadequate, then the world can look forward with assurance to economic conflict and economic distress for a long time to come.

What will happen if adequate steps are not taken to deal with the transitional balançe of payments problems? The countries whose economic systems have been disorganized and which are short of foreign means of payments will be obliged under the pressure of necessity to impose restrictive controls of every type on their foreign transactions. They will go in for restrictive import licensing and prohibitions, exchange discrimination and every sort of regimentation to keep their foreign expenditures, particularly of the "hard" dollar currencies, within the limits that they feel they can afford. They will do everything in their power to keep consumption of foreign goods from rising and will pursue policies aimed at national self-sufficiency. These measures will provoke retaliation elsewhere and we shall find ourselves treading the path of which we caught a glimpse in the 1930's. The main difference as compared with the 1930's will arise from the fact that the world's knowledge of the technique of restriction and retaliation has been considerably improved in the interval.

It is difficult to believe that countries like Canada, the United States and the United Kingdom will stand ready to risk this type of development because they fail to grasp the magnitude of the issues involved or the grievous consequences of lack of imagination and courage. There is no question here of generosity or lack of generosity. All that is required is understanding of the direction in which their own long-term interests lie. For all these countries, that direction is an expanding world economy based on liberal and non-discriminatory principles. It would be a major tragedy to have this escape their grasp because it was felt that one month's war expenditure was too high a price to pay for economic peace.

I have not hesitated to paint a somewhat gloomy picture of the world outlook. I have felt conscious of a responsibility in asking the house to approve this measure, not to promise more from these institutions than they will be capable of delivering. Bretton Woods makes an important contribution to the solution of the problems confronting us but it does only part of the job. Surely it is not too much to hope that with the knowledge gained and the experience acquired during the past twenty years, the countries whose policies are of decisive importance will this time approach the task of world economic reconstruction with proposals which are on a scale commensurate with the problems involved. Surely it is not too much to hope that we shall not once more fall into the trap of "too little and too late."

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I am sure I express the feeling of every hon. member when I thank the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) for giving us this interesting and comprehensive statement of this all-important question. I think it is impossible to overstate the importance of this.

I have no desire to detain the house in discussing any of the technical features, because I understand from the minister that there may be an opportunity to do that later if the need arises, but I wish to make a few remarks on the general situation.

The terms "Bretton Woods" and "Dumbarton Oaks" have been thrown freely about the world now for a great many months. I suppose Dumbarton Oaks registered deeply in our minds because it was concerned principally and primarily with the question of trying to create a framework of a peaceful world. We have all in our own persons or the persons of our families and our friends understood during these last years what war is, and we were all desperately anxious that when the San Francisco conference met and gave approval to the proposals of Dumbarton Oaks it would succeed.

However, for reasons present in the minds of us all we have gone through months of disappointment; that is not a strong enough term, we have an overwhelming anxiety. We find ourselves on the verge, in the immediate aftermath of one war and having gone through anxieties which seemed greater than we could have imagined; in some ways we feel at the moment that we are facing even greater anxieties, because we are dealing with things which are largely unknown, unpredictable and almost beyond imagination in their scope and power.

Now we have the other side of the approach to peace. As the minister very truly said, are we and other countries to organize and cooperate for peace? We all agree that economic organization can do a great deal for peace. No doubt we all agree that it is because we organized ourselves so badly in an economic way in the years between the two wars that we fell into the second war. I suppose I would be making a correct statement if I said that what we are now trying to do through this agreement is to seek to avoid the cataract of unfortunate things—I was going to say disasters—that piled on us after the last war. Let us go over them briefly.

First, there was the terrible inflation in Germany, coupled with the tremendous credits from the United States to Europe, and, most illogically, the raising of the United States tariff—two things utterly inconsistent. We go on to later events in that dismal decade: the new German mark set up in 1924, the British pound overvalued in 1925, and that uneasy five years when we seemed to be having prosperity, at any rate, on this continent and when we could not foresee what was coming, although we should have been able to foresee it, because of the things the minister has already described. In 1929 or 1930 came another raising of the United States tariff, followed by our own 1930 tariff, which must have been very unpalatable to many who voted for it but which was in line with the times. In 1931 we had Britain going off the gold standard, a step precipitated by the series of disasters, the failure of the chief Austrian bank in that year, and then the welter which followed, culminating in the ill-fated world economic conference in 1933, and by no accident, accompanied almost to the very day by the appearance of Hitler in 1933. The world was ready for him; we had done a good job to prepare the world for him.

Now we are trying through this device, as the minister said, to organize ourselves at this time for peace. Do not let us be frightened by the technicalities—sometimes we think it is the jargon—of the language of foreign exchange and imagine that it is something which does not enter into the life of each one of us. I do not think it is an exaggeration, when one considers Bretton Woods, and that this financial arrangement is based on the presupposition that there will be trade arrangements—otherwise I think the minister will agree that it has no chance of life—for us to conclude that this proposed arrangement goes to the very root of the matter, and that if it should fail our prospect will be very gloomy indeed.

What is the prospect we would have? Let us make no mistake about the seriousness of it to every nation, perhaps more to our own nation than to any other. What is the alternative? We use the terms "multilateral" and "bilateral" trade. They are long and complicated words. The minister, I think, has helped to make them clear this afternoon. We know what multilateral trade is. We had it in the years before the war and, with it, a reasonable degree of prosperity. Nations as a whole through their trade arrangements did good to each other, whereas in the thirties each was seeking to do the maximum harm to the other, or at least taking steps which had that effect. As the minister has indicated, we may not have any doubt about the effects of bilateralism and in particular we need not have any doubt, if this Bretton Woods agreement fails, what will happen to us in a regionalized world dominated by the sterling and the dollar blocs.

Let us be clear what the sterling bloc means to us. We do not fit into the sterling bloc, but most of our competitors are in it—the Argentine, the Scandinavian countries, Australia, New Zealand. Let us be realistic about this. It means that since they are in the sterling bloc they have all the advantages, which we have learned to know only too well, of trade which comes from common currency arrangements. The minister has emphasized that already, and not a bit too strongly. He has referred to the chronic situation which we had in the past of a surplus of sterling and a dearth of dollars.

If we look back we can see that the prosperity of Canada has been based upon and has presupposed intimate and extensive commercial relations between the United States and the United Kingdom. As far as I can see, we never have and never can have prosperity if that does not exist. So that is the meaning of bilateralism; that is what the sterling bloc means; that is what we face, as I see it, if Bretton Woods fails.

What is the other side? Bretton Woods, as the minister very truly said, is an attempt to create a world where we can continue in peace some of the cooperation we had in war. I know there is a certain amount of irony in talking about cooperation when we are also going to compete. But we have the two things side by side in sport; we have them in various other fields. Cooperation and competition are not so mutually exclusive as they sometimes appear. What do we seek in a new world economic organization? We seek a world where there can be at least as great a degree of freedom in trade as there was before the first world war. How is this to be achieved? There is, as I understand the situation, only one possible way of getting it. That is why we have been all watching, I suppose with almost feverish anxiety, what has been happening in Washington, hoping that the United States have learned at long last that trade is a two-way street, and that they cannot live alone economically any more than they can live alone politically. I hope that the announcement in the newspapers this morning, which all of us were glad to read, is an indication that they are coming to that view, although we know we cannot count on it too confidently, because there are many there who have not yet been convinced. Nevertheless I think it is fair to say we can assume that the conversations which went on at Washington, while primarily connected with finance, and while issuing in this agreement of which we have read this morning, did not ignore trade. It would be "the play without Hamlet" for a financial discussion to ignore trade, and I think we can assume, indeed we have been told day after day in the newspapers, that the vital principles of trade were, as they had to be, constantly considered at Washington. Therefore, while the agreement announced this morning does not include trade arrangements, I hope—indeed "hope" is not a strong enough word—I pray, in the interests of the whole world, and primarily of our own country, that it does mean that various broad considerations and agreements with regard to the future of trade have been accepted, and that this substantial loan is the first step in facilitating their operation.

What are the chances of this succeeding? We used to hear a great deal in the early days about various technical proposals. There was the White plan, which we understood involved a substantial return to the gold standard; the Keynes plan, which leaned substantially against it because of the lesson Britain learned in going on the gold standard in 1925, and other things; and then our own Canadian plan, of which we heard something, and which came in somewhere between. At any rate, I believe that we have a remarkably encouraging prospect in the fact that forty-four experts agreed. That is a wonderful thing. I have scarcely ever seen four experts who could agree, and for forty-four to have come to an agreement was a great tribute not only to themselves but to their belief in the seriousness of the problem which they were discussing.

Now there is an agreement and the Minister of Finance comes and asks us to approve it. I suppose some people will say, can we afford this large amount of money? My answer is that we cannot afford not to afford it. I say that because in my opinion—and I wish to avoid repetition—our position in this country is at present one of very great danger. I say that at the risk perhaps of repeating what I have said before, but I shall be brief about it. I say that this country has prospered only when we have had comparative freedom of trade and export. We are a country that has specialized. What have we specialized in? In wheat, in nickel, in aluminum, in newsprint and I suppose in a dozen other things which I cannot think of at the moment. What does that mean? It means in plain words that we produce a great deal more of these things than we can consume.

Take first of all the question of wheat. If I may, I would remind the house of what I said the other day, and I was sayng only what a hundred other people have said. When we talk about the internal reorganization of our own economy we should ask ourselves first of all since we can only consume 25 per cent of our own wheat what we are to do with seventy-five per cent of the people who grow wheat. I will not pursue that. I wish, however, to make the position clear. That is what I mean by saying that if we cannot have multilateral trade the prospect for this country is indeed bleak.

I come therefore to this position. I have tried to indicate what in my opinion is involved, the two alternatives. Multilateral trade means primarily that the United States is prepared to take a different tariff attitude. I speak of the United States because that country is so much bigger than the rest of us, and I hope that the people of the United States have at last realized that even they cannot prosper without foreign trade and are therefore prepared to cast their bread upon the waters and that they are prepared to do so not only so far as Great Britain is concerned, but for the good of others as well, because China needs rehabilitation and the world needs rehabilitation; and so far as I can see, unless peoples are prepared to face a drastic reorganization of their economies, unless we in Canada are prepared to contemplate such a drastic reorganization. I see no hope for prosperity in this country of the kind that we have had and the kind that we shall not have again until we have multilateral trade. I say no more about the sterling bloc. That is the alternative.

I now come to a few comments on the present situation. I should like to say what I think of certain aspects of our own action. For the last three months negotiations have been going on at Washington and they have been fraught with tremendous importance to us. The aim was to see whether the United States, the great "have" country, the great natural-resource country, the great financial country, was prepared to take steps which would enable Great Britain to see its way to adherence to the Bretton Woods agreement; for, as I understand it, if Great Britain does not adhere we shall not get the sixty-five per cent and the thing will not click.

As indicated by the Minister of Finance, and as indicated in the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) yesterday, we have stood by. I have no intention of becoming controversial, but I wish to point out one or two things which, in my opinion, have some substance in them. I think it is a great pity that we felt that we had to stand by in these last three months. I have seen various statements from competent people, one of them appearing in a responsible paper a day or two ago, another being that very statement which the Minister of Trade and Commerce read yesterday, with reference to the heavy and indeed the disastrous import restrictions which Great Britain has felt it necessary to impose upon us by reason of the scarcity of dollars. The statement to which I have reference is that the alleviation of these restrictions will depend upon the amount of financial assistance coming from abroad. They did not say the United States; they said "abroad", and that was interpreted, and I believe rightly interpreted, by a competent commentator as meaning the United States and Canada. That is what I believe the word meant, and that is what I think anyone would presume it to mean.

It has been very unfortunate that we have not been in trade consultation during the last three months, but I think I know the answer. The answer made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce was that we had to await the outcome of the United Kingdom-United States conversations. Personally, I do not accept that explanation; I do not think that was necessary. I believe we made a mistake in that regard and I hope it is not a costly mistake. At any rate, I wish to say this. I want to go back to one comment I made a day or two ago in this house, namely, that there is great danger that in these negotiations we may rely too much on meetings of experts behind green doors.

I am not decrying the experts. No one has a greater belief in them than I have. But I suggest earnestly that there is grave danger of the public being kept out of their own business. I am not suggesting that you can make a trade treaty by having a debate. I am not suggesting that at all; I have enough sense to know that it cannot be done. I suggest, however, that this trade situation with Britain has been tense. In fact, we all know that it is. Tenseness is in the air, and now we have this sudden action by Britain. Apparently it was sudden because Mr. Attlee did not seem to know about it when he was here. The situation, at any rate, has resulted in these sudden restrictions which Great Britain has imposed. I do not blame them; maybe there was no other way out. But the public was taken by surprise, and I am not at all sure that the responsible officials and the ministers were not also taken by surprise. Certainly, we the public, were taken by surprise.

I suggest that this is a case where public opinion should have a chance to express itself. I believe that the people of Great Britain realize the part that Canada has played with them. I am not suggesting eleemosynary arguments; not at all. I believe that the people of Britain have a great feeling against regionalism, and I think that if they had had a chance to know the situation it would have been better. It would have been better if we had seen fit to debate the matter in this house, but instead we have been sitting here for three months, not always profitably occupied. Had we seen fit to debate the matter, some good might have been done.

I am not overlooking the fact that in April the government issued a white paper in which they enunciated what seemed to me to be a wise attitude toward foreign trade; but that does not seem to me to be the same thing as having a debate in this house, taking the views of the house, having the press of the country express its views, and having the public apprised of the situation. I think the public was taken terribly by surprise when the thing happened a week ago. The people were inclined to feel harshly about it. I did until I pulled myself up and began to realize the situation. But when you read the memorandum which the Minister of Trade and Commerce submitted to the house yesterday you cannot blame them. You can only say, why was not something done about it?

Well, was there nothing that could be done to prevent it? My contention is that there was something that could have been done, and I repeat, it is a pity that in these last three months we have not been in negotiation. Maybe that part can be remedied, but I seriously suggest that there is force in the other point I made, that, after all, the people primarily interested in this are the public in Canada and in Great Britain.

Experts have their place, and it is an important place too.

Looking back on it I am not able to see why it would not have been possible to have the policy enunciated. I asked the minister the other day whether our policy was formed. I think he said "no." I asked him whether our policy in this matter should not be formed, and again, as I recall it, he said "no." I am coming back to that and asking—and this is really my last point—whether it is not possible even yet for the minister to give us—without disclosing any secrets, or invading the field of the experts—an opportunity before the house prorogues, to discuss this matter, which is literally a matter of life and death to us.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I think in all probability the resolution which is now before us, and the bill which the resolution foreshadows, may be one of the most important matters which have come before this house in many a long day. I agree with the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) that public opinion should be thoroughly informed of what this agreement really means.

I have read the agreement; I have read various articles concerning it, and I confess that the complexity of the agreement is such that without the expert advice which one lacks in a party such as this, one feels that some more information is needed. I do not propose to put any obstacle in the way of the minister getting this resolution through the house, but I hope and believe that he will enable those of us who wish to carry out all the obligations implicit in the building of an international organization to be able to support the bill when it comes before the house. In order to give it that support, however, I must make it very clear that I want to understand what we are doing. My colleagues and I do not want to be in the position of voting for such an important agreement unless we are absolutely familiar with its broad principles and probable effects. Therefore I am hoping that the minister will carry out, and I believe he will, the proposals that have been made in this house not only by myself but by others that the bill will go before the banking and commerce committee where we can get the expert opinions that the experts have expressed elsewhere, regarding this matter and that they will give us the benefit of all the opinions, knowledge and advice which we can get. If that can be done, I can assure the minister that we shall facilitate this particular resolution.

Mr. ILSLEY: I agree that that ought to be done. I intend to move that the bill be referred to the banking and commerce committee. I would hope it would be given second reading and referred. I do not think the house loses any rights in doing that.

Mr. COLDWELL: No; as long as we have the assurance that this bill will be referred to the committee we are not going to oppose this resolution. That is the understanding I want to give the minister and the house at this time.

I recognize, as did the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, and the minister when he introduced this measure, that we are faced with international chaos unless we can build some international system which will not only prevent future war, but prevent economic conditions from arising which will make future war more or less inevitable, and these conditions often arise. I am not going to say they always arise, because I do not intend to enter into an argument regarding the influence of economics and social developments on war, although I have a point of view regarding that matter. I merely cite it as one of those sets of conditions that from time to time seem to lead to war.

I was present as a delegate at the San Francisco conference, and I am grateful for that experience. I know the difficulties of obtaining consent from sovereign nations to anything which may seem to impinge upon their sovereignty. If I may add this other personal experience, only last week-end I attended a conference which I considered to be perhaps even more fascinating, and to some extent more instructive and certainly more terrifying than the great conference I attended at San Francisco. At the conference I attended in New York last week-end I had an opportunity of listening to scientists, many of whom had studied and developed atomic energy and produced the atomic bomb. I wish to say that those scientists, not politicians, came to the conclusion that many people in the political lives of our countries are being driven to, namely, that somehow or another, and as rapidly as possible, we must build a world organization which will be able to give mankind government at the international level, in order to solve the great problems of peace and war which might arise in the future.

It is quite true, as the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario said a few moments ago, that world trade channels and conditions have changed considerably in the last quarter of a century. One reason that makes me desire, perhaps more than any other, to get a clear view of what this means is that in effect I believe we are to a large extent under this agreement linking our own fortunes as a nation and the fortunes of the world to the economy of the United States.

Before the great war, Great Britain was the principal trading nation of the world. She relied upon what was called the unfavourable balance of trade, which enabled her to make tremendous purchases overseas and to receive goods produced in every part of the world, and which gave her what appeared to be an adverse balance of imports over exports. Then the world producers were able to find outlets for the goods which they produced. But that has all been changed by two wars, and to-day we are in a very different position. The nation which to-day controls, shall I say—and I am not sure of my figures in this regard—practically half the great capital assets of the world—I did not say "owns" them; I said "controls" them—and is in receipt of the highest national income many times over is the United States. After the first great war we saw the United States, having become a great creditor nation, refusing to accept the obligations of that position. She refused to accept the imports that were vital to the welfare of the rest of the world. Consequently to-day we wonder if there has been a change in the conception of international trade and if the United States is prepared to do what is necessary in order that the nations of the world may trade, and trade with her. In reality is she prepared to receive payments in the only form in which payments can ultimately be made, namely, in the form of goods and services? If she is, I think the complexion which may be placed upon this Bretton Woods agreement is a much more optimistic one than we might otherwise think.

We have to bear this in mind: When I say this about the United States, let us remember that Canada, too, is a creditor nation, and the policy which our country must follow is that of agreeing to international trade. I think that was implicit in the remarks of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, who is sitting with a party which has been historically a high-tariff party, but which to-day, if we can follow what the hon. member said, is prepared as a party to revise that point of view fundamentally. If that is so, I believe that it will be a good thing for our country. Indeed, if we can reach the unanimous conclusion that Canada is in favour of receiving payments in goods for the commodities that we export, and we use our imports to improve the standards of life of our own people we shall progress. After all, it seems to me the only object of trade is to assure results that are mutually advantageous to all who trade. If the trade of Canada is to be mutually advantageous, then the exports we send abroad must be paid for by the receipt of some things in return; and those some things, if I may adopt that phraseology, must be used not for the enrichment of a small group of people but to raise the general standards of living for all. On that basis international trade is sound and acceptable.

I have just glanced at the evening newspaper. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario did not have that advantage; it was brought into the chamber while he was speaking. I am glad to note, and it makes me feel a little easier about this agreement, that if unofficial dispatches from Britain can be believed, as I think in all probability they can be believed in this instance, there is great hope that the United States will cooperate with Britain and the rest of the world in freeing the channels of trade to a large extent, and reducing those tariff barriers that bedevilled the world prior to the war. If that is so, then Canada as a great exporting nation must also assume her proper place as a great importing nation and use the imports we are able to get for the produce we export to increase our standards of living.

But I would not want to leave my thought at that, Mr. Speaker, because I think we have to look beyond our own selfish, nationalist point of view and the good of our own people. I remember one evening at San Francisco the statement was made that before the war two-thirds of the population of the world, that is two persons out of three, never had a sufficient amount of food with which to fill their stomachs day by day. That was not during the war, remember, but before the war. I believe that in a Christian civilization such as that in which we boast we live we must pay some heed to these other countries. Therefore I hope and trust that in this Bretton Woods agreement, when we come to study it, we shall find ways and means of enabling the areas of the world where these conditions exist, which we sometimes call the backward regions of the earth, to raise their standards of living. If we do so, then we make our own standards of living more secure, because no nation and no group of people can keep up their standards of living permanently if a very large portion of the world remains on much lower standards. So that as far as this agreement seeks to achieve that end—and that is the problem I want to see investigated to some extent when this bill is before the committee—it may be very worthy of our support, but I want to know about that before I say that the agreement will receive our support.

Since the bill is going to committee I do not think there is very much more I wish to say now. I really rose to ask the minister the question which he answered. I am glad to have that answer, and I hope that when we go into this bill the doubts we may have in regard to tying the world to the United States dollar or the United States economy or the modified gold standard will be resolved. Perhaps I should say that I know this is not tying the world to the gold standard as we knew it in days gone by, because the factors entering into this agreement are not the gold standard factors. My understanding of the old gold standard was that a nation's currency had a fixed value in terms of gold, that its currency was always interchangeable in terms of gold and convertible into gold on demand. This agreement, I know, does not restore that. The old gold standard compelled each nation to allow gold to move freely between itself and all other nations of the world. We do not have that here, but as the minister indicated we have something else. This agreement is in two parts. I am not going into them, although I had intended to do so if this had not been going to committee. The first part has to do with the stabilization fund, and incidentally it has been interesting to me to see where the opposition has come from in regard to this Bretton Woods agreement. The stabilization fund has been strenuously opposed by the American bankers' association. They do not like it because it places some three billion dollars in an international pool over which the American bankers' association really will have no control. On the other hand, the more progressive elements in the world have favoured the stabilization fund. As far as the international bank is concerned, the American bankers' association and other bankers do like it, because it is more orthodox and they perhaps understand its implications and intend to use that bank for their own advantage, while the more progressive elements have not liked the idea.

Mr. QUELCH: Ernest Bevin opposed it, too.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is quite right; I said that the more progressive forces did not like it, and if Ernest Bevin is not one of the more progressive forces in the world, I do not know who is at the present time. But the thing that strikes me is this. We may all find something in this agreement that we feel is advantageous to the world and to Canada; we may all see something in this agreement which we think is disadvantageous to Canada and to the world, but it seems to me that when this bill goes to committee and is thoroughly investigated our final judgment must be rendered on balance of its advantages and disadvantages, as I said in this house once before. We shall come to our conclusions then.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) for the only really intelligent speech on this measure this afternoon. That may sound an extreme statement, but I believe the investigations of the committee will prove the truth of much of what the hon. gentleman said.

May I refer for a moment to the remarks of those who have already spoken. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) gave us an excellent dissertation on the subject and presented the case for the Bretton Woods agreement just about as admirably as it could be presented by the most highly skilled experts in the world. I presume he had the assistance of the very best available experts in preparing his speech. May I refer to the various things he said? In the first place, he wisely acknowledged that economics are a fundamental cause of war. Let us in this house never forget that for a moment. If we are to remove war from the world we must remove the economic cause of war; and fundamentally the economic cause of war is not various modifications and manipulations of a nation's money but the fact that some nations are unable to sell as much goods as they need to buy. That applies to all nations likely to be debtor nations. The other nations are able to sell far more than they buy, and they become creditor nations. The difficulty which confronts the world at this time is to achieve some equalization between such countries as the United States, with its colossal productive capacity, and such countries as Britain which, because of the exhaustion of war, finds itself in an abject position from the point of view of productive potential.

The minister said another thing which is entirely worthy. He said the main issue before us is peace. I agree. And I think this house will discover that the main objection to Bretton Woods is that there is not a single phrase in it which by any kind of interpretation can mean any move toward peace in the world. As a matter of fact, it is one of the most complete and perfect guarantees of which the mind of man can conceive, that there will be war.

The minister mentioned institutions which were to be used, and referred particularly to the united nations charter. I am not going to discuss that. We will take his word upon it.

Then he turned to the economic aspect of the world situation, and told us that thus far we have three measures which are designed to solve the economic problems of the world. He named UNRRA, the food and agricultural organization and Bretton Woods. I am glad he named those, because by naming them he proved the absolute mental bankruptcy of the men who provide the whole set of measures which are proposed to be used to guarantee peace; for there is not a single thing in any one of the three of them, or in all put together that will overcome the fundamental economic difficulties which confound the world at the present time.

He said that we need prosperous economies in the world. True. Bretton Woods will not produce prosperous economies. Bretton Woods will produce absolutely ruined economies everywhere in the world, except in the United States, Canada and Russia.

He mentioned export credit arrangements. Yes, but export credit arrangements only put nations more deeply into debt, and the thing which is destroying them at the present time is unrepayable debt.

He mentioned that Bretton Woods is designed to be permanent. That is a warning to us. He gave us the outline of the features which were involved in Bretton Woods—four of them—and I shall not refer to them in detail. He painted a gloomy picture—yes. But one does not clear away the gloom in a picture by talk, even if the talk is in Bretton Woods.

The minister has said that Bretton Woods does only part of the job. I ask the minister, and I think the house must demand that the minister show us who and what are to do the rest of the job, and how it is to be done. That does not at the present time appear in any proposal before the house.

For a few moments I should like to refer to what was said by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell). I wish he were in the house, because he needs a lot of instruction. He, too, talks about a gloomy picture. Once more may I point out to him that he cannot clear up a gloomy picture by talking about it. He must find some way or another by which he can enable debtor nations to pay their debts, remembering they can pay their debts only in goods or services. How in the world can they pay their debts to a nation like the United States, if the United States stubbornly refuses to accept their goods? That she is likely to do exactly that, one may reasonably conclude from the fact that she persistently refused to accept goods in repayment of the debt which Great Britain had to carry as a result of the last war. And the United States was not even honest enough to tell her own people what the situation was. She led her people, almost the whole rank and file of them, to believe that Britain had dishonoured her debts when, as a matter of fact, the United States had dishonoured Britain's debts by putting up tariff barriers which prevented Britain's goods from entering the United States.

Is there anything in Bretton Woods which will overcome a thing like that? Is there anything which will cause any ordinary man, any ordinary elector in the United States to allow the administration of that country to make a change in policy such as would be necessary in order that they might accept goods from Great Britain? These are questions which hon. members must ask themselves, and must insist that the minister answer.

The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario speaks about destroying the sterling bloc. He did not exactly say that he advocated destroying it, but I gathered from the general purport of his remarks that he favoured the destruction of the sterling bloc. Well, what is it there for? It is there to protect a number of these debtor nations. And one of the fears we need to have about Bretton Woods is that it is designed to destroy the sterling bloc.

The question we must ask is this: How is the sterling bloc to protect itself if Bretton Woods does destroy its defences? Not a word is said as to how that is to be done. I challenge the minister or anyone else to show in Bretton Woods a single line which indicates how the sterling nations would protect themselves if the sterling bloc were destroyed.

He asks: What does it mean to Canada? Well, we will grant that we Canadians would like to have the sterling bloc destroyed, perhaps, so that Canada might dump her goods, and have members of the sterling bloc more and more deeply plunged in irrepayable debt to Canada.

In the last analysis, what good would that do us? These are things we have to look at. It is purely an economic problem.

The minister should ask himself, and all hon. members ought to ask themselves what will happen to Britain and what will happen to these other members of the sterling bloc if something is not done to change the economic attitude of the creditor nations of the world. He spoke of the trade street being a two-way street. I thought the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) did admirably when he pointed out that if trade is to be a two-way street for the United States she must take measures to see to it that she imports goods, where necessary, to pay for the goods she exports. I think one could look all through United States papers and through the statements of United States public men and see absolutely no indication of any determination to change. The people of that country simply will not allow their administration to accept goods—beef and other commodities—which will compete with their own. This means that it is impossible for the United States administration to change their attitude.

At the same time, if we introduce Bretton Woods, as the United States has clubbed Great Britain into accepting Bretton Woods, we shall destroy utterly the means of protection, which is the only thing left to those debtor nations. It is true that trade must be a two-way street. But the nations in the world that are able to make it a two-way street are such as the United States and Canada. Other nations cannot do so. Therein I say, lies Canada's greatest responsibility, as we face this whole Bretton Woods question.

The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario spoke about Canada's specializing in wheat. We grant that she has specialized in wheat; we grant that she has specialized in dozens of other things. But the impressive thing about Canada is that while she has specialized in wheat and other primary products, she also proposes to specialize in the production of automobiles, agricultural implements, textiles and a great many other commodities. We know that Canada is not prepared to accept those commodities from Great Britain or any other country, with the result that it is more and more difficult for her to accept goods in return for those she wishes to sell. The same is true of the United States.

One of the noteworthy things about the United States is that she is almost self-sufficient. I do not mean absolutely, but certainly in a large measure that is so. Canada, too, is capable of being largely self-sufficient. The more capable a country is of being self-sufficient, the more reluctant it is to allow goods from another country to enter its market; and the more it is in a posiiton to forbid the entrance of those goods.

If the United States and Canada are really honest in this whole matter, then the very first thing they will do is to bring down their tariff barriers and say, "We will accept so much goods, and so many other things." Then Great Britain may take more comfort. But merely to say they will, and at the same time to want Great Britain to sign on the dotted line is one of the most callous and wicked things any nation in the history of the world has ever done.

That may be strong language, but while I am on that subject I shall say a word or two more. I shall have something more to say about the United States before I have finished. I have noticed that since 1942 there have been appearing in the ordinary periodicals of the United States outlines of the terms of victory or conquest they were going to dictate to Great Britain. One would think that the people who caused the war, who attacked the other nations, was Britain. The terms they were going to dictate to her were simply terrible. Here we have one of them—Bretton Woods. This is one of the terms dictated by a conquering nation upon a helpless, conquered foe—Britain. Britain, which as we all know stood and defended Americans, is to be crucified by a callous administration not knowing what it does. That is what we see to-day. That is what we see in the statement from Washington to-day. Think of a noble nation like Britain clubbed into a position which she knows herself means her utter economic destruction. Then to have the Minister of Finance of the elder dominion in the empire advocate in this house that Canada, eldest daughter in the British family, pick up the club and go and help the United States beat the motherland to death. That must be comforting news for the empire's centre, all in one day!

I should like to turn just briefly to the speech of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. I have no criticism to offer of his speech, but I wish to point out I believe there is in the mind of every hon. member who is doing me the honour to listen to me, as so many are, a stirring question, "What in the world are we going to do?" Do you favour having Canada discontinue the manufacture of agricultural implements, for example, so that we can import them from Britain? Do you favour Canada discontinuing the manufacture of shoes so that we may import them from Britain?

Mr. MacNICOL: Or sugar?

Mr. BLACKMORE: You could go right down a long list, and I judge that the answer from practically every hon. member would be "no." The member for Lethbridge says "no" also. Then the question arises: What are we going to do? What can the United States do? The lease-lend arrangement showed what can be done and the Mutual Aid arrangement which Canada used for years showed what can be done. These people will say, "You surely do not favour our embarking upon a policy of perpetual gifts to the nations abroad, do you?" May I refer to the words of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, and I hope he will correct me if I have not their sense correctly. He said that trade should be mutually advantageous; that it should be a blessing both to him who gives and to him who receives. Surely selling wheat to Britain which puts Britain into an irrepayable debt position to Canada is a blessing only to Canada; it certainly is not a blessing to Great Britain. I agree that trade should be placed on a new basis. In order to understand how it can be put on a new basis, we shall need to revise our financial thinking.

I am not going to discuss the financial principles which are advocated by this group, but I am going to lay down as a sort of general challenge at the present time for hon. members to be thinking about for the next two or three days, this problem: You tell me how the problem can be solved, unless you can learn how to finance Mutual Aid and lease-lend arrangements in perpetuity without creating debt and increased taxation for the nation. If you cannot find out how to do that without social credit, may I suggest that you promptly study social credit.

I had intended to say some other things. Possibly I had better say some of them. All these matters were just the result of my reflections when I heard some of the remarks, the desolate, gloomy and hopeless remarks, made by the first two speakers. As this house proceeds to deal with the Bretton Woods proposals involved in this resolution, parliamentary government itself is on trial. This particular Canadian parliament is on trial. The question is raised whether we are capable of finding a solution in this our darkest need; whether we are capable of clearing away the smoke-screen obstruction which has been built up to hide from us the essential features of Bretton Woods and then reject the thing as we ought to do.

On the day that Canada accepts the Bretton Woods proposals she locks upon her limbs the fetters of perpetual bondage; she betrays her trust to the 650,000,000 people of the British commonwealth and empire. She fails mankind in the world's hour of desperate need. I think what I have said already indicates the truth of what I say there.

The Bretton Woods proposals centre around two main features, as the minister has pointed out. First, there is the international monetary stabilization fund, the governing body of which is called the fund. Second, there is the international bank ostensibly set up—mark you, I said "ostensibly", and it is true—to lend money to needy nations to aid them in rehabilitating themselves.

The international monetary fund agreement is merely a device for tying up the currencies of the world to the United States dollar based on gold. The fund agreement is merely a device for forcing the world to borrow and use the huge masses of United States gold now lying idle and worthless in United States vaults. That is all it is fundamentally. This agreement is purely a mechanism for bringing the nations of the world, except Russia, humbly and helplessly, cap in hand, to beg the right to live at the feet of the little gang of questionable characters who now hold the title deeds to the gold of the non-Russian world. They have $23 billion of it down there in the United States. It is no good at all; they do not know what to do with it. This whole Bretton Woods thing is a scheme to put that idle gold to work.

The fund is a mechanism for binding the moneys of all the nations to the United States dollar. The United States dollar is and will be based on gold; it is tied immovably to gold. The supply of United States dollars will be completely controlled by the federal reserve system of the United States, and the federal reserve system is utterly controlled by the holders of United States gold. The set-up under Bretton Woods will be perfect for the holders of gold. And those gentlemen in the main are international financiers. I would ask you to call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair, perhaps the house will permit me to make a statement regarding the agreements that have been reached in the economic and financial discussions between the governments of the United Kingdom and the United States. The statement was made by those two governments at half-past five this afternoon. I have long teletype messages which I have not had time to read, but the effect of them appears to be about as follows.

These governments have made public this afternoon the text of a financial agreement between the two governments under which the government of the United States proposes to extend a line of credit of $3,750,000,000 to the United Kingdom on terms which are specified therein. They have also made public the text of a joint statement regarding settlements for lend-lease, reciprocal aid, surplus war property and other claims of the two governments arising out of the conduct of the war for which an additional loan of $650,000,000 is provided. The secretary of state of the United States has made public a document setting forth certain proposals for consideration by an international conference on trade and employment, and the governments of the United States and the United Kingdom have made a joint statement regarding their understandings on the proposals of commercial policy set forth in this document. The proposals have the endorsement of the executive branch of the government of the United States, and the government of the United Kingdom expresses its full agreement on all important points in these proposals and accepts them as a basis for international discussion. The two governments have announced that they will begin preliminary negotiations at an early day between themselves and with other countries, for the purpose of developing concrete arrangements to carry out these proposals, including definitive measures for the relaxation of trade barriers of all kinds.

As I have already said, I have not yet had an opportunity of reading these documents. I do not propose to make any comments upon the substance of them, but I wish to say that I welcome and I think that this house will welcome the fact that Britain and the United States have reached agreement, both on these financial matters and on the basic principles and methods of approach to the reduction of trade barriers.

While I have not had time to read the proposals on commercial policy, they have resulted from discussions among officials that have extended over two or three years, in some of which our officials have participated, and I am happy to see them put forward as the basis for general consideration and action.

Copies of the documents have been received and will be made available, in convenient form, to the house next week; perhaps before that, if I can arrange it.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is a total loan of $4,400 million, then?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Speaker, before the house took recess I was dealing with the matter of Bretton Woods. The things which I had to say concerning the importance of Bretton Woods and the effect of it upon the world would lose meaning, I believe, unless I brought some evidence to show that the Bretton Woods agreement involves the gold standard. May I read a quotation from an article reprinted by kind permission of the Daily Express from Britain of Thursday of August 10, 1944, by Paul Einzig, author of "Currency after the War." He is one of the greatest authorities on money and finance in the world to-day. The title of his article is: "1925 and All That, Only Far, Far Worse. A Plain Man's Guide to the Menace of Bretton Woods." The excerpt I desire to read is as follows:

> Yet, once the plan is translated into intelligible English and is denuded of all camouflage, every layman of normal intelligence is bound to realize that it is the gold standard, the full gold standard and nothing but the gold standard.
> Admittedly, it is a different gold standard from the one we abandoned in 1931, just as the gold standard adopted in 1925 was different from the one suspended in 1914. But the changes are, for the most part, considerably for the worse.

Then he gives five reasons to support his contention, which reasons later in the debate will be listed for the consideration of the house. I believe we are safe in assuming that the proposals of Bretton Woods mean the return to the gold standard. Once under Bretton Woods, the greatest nations would be mere doormats for the dirty feet of the international financiers.

What the world needs is not so much monetary stabilization as trade stabilization, trade equalization. By this I mean that any given nation—France, Holland Belgium, any given nation—shall be free to repay with goods for the goods which it buys, also that any given nation in the world, if it is unable to produce the raw materials which it needs, or unable to manufacture the goods which it needs to exchange for the goods which it requires from abroad, shall be free to obtain goods surplus in other nations on a lend-lease or mutual aid basis, so that the high-sounding ideals expressed in the Atlantic charter may become realities, and that a nation shall be literally free from fear and want.

Once these two conditions are observed in the world, then we can have trade equalization, that is to say, a condition in which any given nation shall be able to pay for the goods which it requires from abroad with goods of its own. Without trade stabilization, trade equalization. Continued increase in world trade, except for the United States, is impossible; rising world standards of living are impossible; freedom from want and fear is impossible; and freedom of religion and of speech will soon become impossible.

Monetary stabilization can be obtained by voluntary conversations, understanding and conventions. There need not be any overruling, all-powerful central dictatorship with power of life and death over whole states. National money can be stabilized upon price indexes of goods. This principle has been well illustrated in what has been called managed money during the past decade. The same principle can be used to obtain international currency stabilization. Once trade is equalized and stabilized, no nation would think of allowing its money to fall out of step with the world's monetary procession. No nation would have any reason for getting out of step, for the only reason why nations get out of step to-day is that they find themselves unable to pay with their own production for the goods which their people are buying from abroad. They therefore adopt monetary devices for their own protection. Any nation would have every reason for keeping in step if trade were stabilized. Having plenty of productive capacity to supply all its needs, any nation would be able to stabilize its price level by four simple devices, all of which have been illustrated to the house: first, plenty of production; second, price discounting with compensation; third, price subsidizing; fourth, price regulation if necessary.

A stabilized price structure means automatically a stabilized money, and if all the nations agree on a standard at which they will keep their money in step, so to speak, they will voluntarily maintain monetary stabilization.

What this house should now be considering is an effective mechanism for trade stabilization, trade equalization. The terror of all nations to-day is the United States. The United States has an appalling productive potential, largely developed since world war I. She towers aloft industrially, a colossal giant among the nations. She stamps about among the other nations literally a Hercules among pygmies.

The generous, noble, idealistic people of the United States do not realize their strength, do not recognize their weight, do not apprehend the fearful damage a careless move on their part can do. The people of the United States therefore do not appreciate their limitless responsibility in these times. Britain is fully aware of these things. Britain has been manœuvring desperately to escape destruction. United States officials meanwhile have been endeavouring to club Britain into accepting Bretton Woods, and the mere fact that Britain has stood out so long and so earnestly against Bretton Woods ought to be evidence that she realizes that it is certainly to her great detriment. But United States officials have at last bludgeoned and threatened to starve her into accepting the Bretton Woods proposals.

What should Canada's part now be? To take up a club and help the United States to demolish Britain, or sound the alarm, parry the blows, reason with the United States, and try to restrain her recklessness? The social credit movement is sounding the alarm. The supporters of Bretton Woods will argue: "Surely the United States would never have accepted Bretton Woods merely to please a handful of holders of gold. There must have been other reasons." Well, there were. The United States political leaders dread unemployment. They have been told that they are likely to have twenty million unemployed shortly after returning to normal. They see the possibility of dealing with this threat of unemployment only by selling abroad. Bretton Woods would break down the defences against American goods, against American investments, against American economic warfare, against American industrial imperialism. Therefore American politicians favour Bretton Woods. American politicians see in Bretton Woods an instrument to help the United States to export her unemployment and dump it in the luckless laps of her neighbours all over the world, no matter where or what the loss to those neighbours so long as the United States can rid herself of her problem of unemployment.

American manufacturers, too, like Bretton Woods. They see too little purchasing power among post-war Americans to buy American goods. They see too few markets. Like Canadians, they stubbornly refuse to adopt a financial system like social credit that would distribute American goods abundantly among American people, a system like social credit that would distribute American goods abroad in such a way as would help and not hinder the people concerned. They will support, therefore, a Bretton Woods to help Americans cram their goods down the world's neck, regardless of whether the world lives or dies. Yes, American industrial imperialists also favour Bretton Woods.

American rich men also support Bretton Woods. They would like to lend abroad. They would fear to lend lest they lose their money as they did in the roaring twenties. The Bretton Woods bank will lend to the poorer nations loans that might be lost. Behind the Bretton Woods bank Americans would rope in forty-three sucker nations to help absorb the losses. Then American rich men can lend to safer risks, loans that cannot be repaid, because the United States will not admit goods that will repay them. Attractive prospect, is it not? Attractive for all but the victims. Yes, informed American rich men support Bretton Woods.

Anti-British Americans also would back Bretton Woods; those numerous millions of Americans pandered to by the Hearst publications; those Americans who take delight in twisting the British lion's tail; those Americans who fail to appraise correctly the sacrifice of British heroism that guarded the United States in the deep, dark days of war; those Americans who fail to perceive in Britain and in the British nations the greatest guarantee of human security and freedom through the years that yet must be.

Yes, anti-British Americans also back Bretton Woods. Considering all these matters, Mr. Speaker, it is easy to see why the United States adopted Bretton Woods. Considering these same matters, it ought to be easy to see why Canada ought to reject Bretton Woods.

I have spoken plainly about the United States in relation to Bretton Woods. Plain speaking is by no means an indication of any unkindliness in me toward the United States. We are living in fateful times. Men must uncover the facts affecting one another. United States people have always been shrewd bargainers. They should take no offence if their neighbours indulge in a little critical thinking and speaking, too.

I value United States friendship. I appreciate the help she has given us through the years. I desire that British and Americans continue to be friends. To do so we must understand each other. Most Americans have no desire to hurt the British or any one else. All they wish is to help themselves. They would expect us to look after our own interests. We should be weak, if not recreant in our duty, if we permitted the Americans unwittingly to destroy their best friends. Destroying the British commonwealth they would be setting the stage for their own destruction.

Notwithstanding all the disadvantages to which I have referred, we might regard Bretton Woods with some favour if it provided any means whereby to solve the present economic problems of the world; or if it offered any worthwhile advantage to Canada. But Bretton Woods contains no hint of such a solution, no suggestion of any worthwhile advantage.

The promoters of Bretton Woods will challenge my remarks. I stand ready to prove to the hilt what I have said on the floor of this house and before the members of this house in open committee. The economic problems of the world all stem from adverse trade balances, or the fear of adverse trade balances. Adverse trade balances result in unrepayable debt, in economic conquest and ultimate economic devastation and ruin. To guard against such disasters nations resort to protective tariffs, to exchange control, to quotas, to devaluation of currency, currency irregularities, and other irregularities which Bretton Woods is supposed to be designed to prevent or to overcome. These so-called trade restrictions are mainly, if not wholly, protective devices to ward off annihilation. In all its clauses Bretton Woods contains not one phrase suggesting how adverse trade balances can be avoided, not one stipulation that might protect weaker countries from ruinous price competition of stronger economies, not one regulation requiring stronger economies to accept goods in repayment of debts, even debts unavoidably incurred through inability to resist aggressive competition.

Bretton Woods gives all its advantages to creditor nations, those that require no advantages. To the weaker nations it offers no appreciable help—only hindrance. Follow through Bretton Woods, read it for yourselves, you will find all the things that I have said amply justified and supported there. I and my group will point them out. It leaves the world's economic problems exactly where it found them, except that it aggravates them. Meanwhile it proposes to put the nations in a financial strait-jacket, impairing what little freedom they might have to help themselves. I know that this afternoon the minister said that it did not put the nations in a strait-jacket. We are going to give the minister ample opportunity to prove what he said before we finish this debate.

Bretton Woods is not a happy compromise. It is the total maintenance of United States economic bargaining power coupled with complete renunciation of bargaining power of the debtor nations. It will therefore benefit only the United States, and perhaps Canada to the extent to which Canada becomes a creditor nation.

Upon the members of the house, upon the people of Canada, upon all British peoples everywhere I urge the warning: Beware the menace of Bretton Woods.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to say a few words on this Bretton Woods agreement which grew out of a conference there in New Hampshire in July last. It was not a treaty; it was a conference held at what is known as Bretton Woods. The proposal is to establish by an agreement first an international monetary fund, and second an international bank for reconstruction and development. It is a charge of over $700 million on the consolidated revenue fund of this country over the head of parliament.

These are very grave times financially for the people of Canada. I am not opposed to an international monetary mechanism being established to solve the economic conditions which are growing out of the war, but I am opposed to the present proposals and I propose to show the reasons why and give the view of two great British chancellors of the exchequer, Sir Kingsley-Wood, who died during the war, and Sir John Anderson, a brilliant administrator of many public departments in the old land before and during the war. If I mistake not, he was here the other day and sat with the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) the day Mr. Attlee and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) were here. This was not, by the widest stretch of the imagination, a conference of forty-four governments. It was held at a place called Bretton Woods, away up in New Hampshire; and when history is written fifty years from now it will refer to the babes in the woods who formulated this proposal, because as I say, in the end it will mean the dissolution of the British empire. We are at a critical period in the history of this country and the history of the British empire. I have referred already to the extent to which the mother country suffered during the war, in common with the dominions and the whole civilized world. We had a similar proposal at Dumbarton Oaks and a new united nations policy made at San Francisco, at a conference of the same forty-four bodies which grew up together. Now they have moved on to London, England, and we shall see what happens there. At Bretton Woods there was a large delegation from Brazil; there were delegations from many other countries, but they overlooked one thing. They did not have Sousa's band with them when this agreement was being discussed away up in the woods. In the olden days hardly a public meeting was held at which on all national occasions a brass band or a fife and drum band did not put in an appearance. Sometimes we see these bands on March 17, sometimes on that other great national holiday, July 12.

I want to point out the great objection to these proposals. This was an original idea which Lord Keynes got about 1942 or 1943. He thought he could get up an international financial mechanism that would cure all the financial mistakes from which the world is suffering. Mind you, there is a very large body of public opinion in England which believes in some of the policies which hon. gentlemen to my left have supported in this house for some time. What I have to say will be in part quoted and taken very largely from a British white paper and a white paper issued in the United States, together with a few quotations from a great British financier, Mr. Richard Boothby, who has been a great economic leader in England, following the work of this and other world affairs, and who was one of the advisers to the late Churchill government, with comments of my own on the whole agreement and the errors I see in it.

These are not at all new proposals; they have been made after other wars. Like the proposals for collective security, they have been made from the time of Philip of Spain, Louis XIV and Napoleon, and we have heard them twice in our generation. The agreement seeks to set up an international monetary fund. Look at some of the things that have been done in the past under these international proposals. Do not forget the league of nations, Locarno, the Young plan, the Kellogg notes, the Dawes plan, and all the rest of it. Do not forget those who supported all such agreements and, when war came, were not prepared to let off even a fire-cracker or a sky-rocket to support those who were prepared to back up the allied cause. Now it is proposed that we enter upon another financial policy that is going to cost $700,000,000. Well, as I said to my hon. friend the master of ceremonies, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) the other night, when you get up into the clouds do not forget and old Scot proverb, to keep one foot on the earth. I believe the Minister of Finance would do well to heed that good Scots advice in connection with these proposals and the astronomical altitude of these figures.

As I said, this was not a conference of forty-four nations at all; it was a conference of what I would call economists. Well, the woods are full of economists. I come from Toronto, and lately I have seen more economists than ever before in my life; economists high and low, rich and poor. They have brought forward many proposals; I remember them all when I had to float bonds for $100,000,000 in connection with public utilities in our city. We hear of many financial war proposals, but when they are weighed in the balance most of them are found wanting. What did they do down at this great place called Bretton Woods? Oh, there were great financial plans and carryings on in the woods in old New Hampshire. I saw pictures of these delegates in the Saturday Evening Post, in Life and in many other magazines, showing views of the representatives of these forty-four nations who were having the time of their lives there. Now here we are to-night, going over the heads of the people of this country and putting on a mortgage of $700,000,000 to be paid out of the consolidated revenues of this country on such a half-baked scheme. Why, we are not only going to bankrupt Canada; if this proposal goes through it will mean the liquidation of the British empire and cause dearer money, and I say that without fear of contradiction. I call to my support statements appearing in the British Hansard by members in the debate of 1943 and in the records of the senate and congress at Washington.

At Fort Knox in the United States they have all the gold in the world piled up. I saw a picture of it in a magazine. Why, the pyramids of Egypt are not to be compared in magnitude or astronomical height with the gold piled up there! That is a celebrated fort and a celebrated state, from which a great general came during the war between the north and south. You know, Mr. Speaker, this proposal reminds me of a scene from Pinafore, with act I, act II and the final act now before us. Act I is the preliminary, to get the actors ready. I remember the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) in private theatricals. When I was interlocutor at a minstrel show I could ask my end-man some questions. Then in this agreement they have the final act; they are going to ring down the curtain. That final act is to be performed to-night; we are to vote $700 million. Why, it gives me a headache even to think of that much money. If we have a few cents in our pockets we are very lucky. I see more gold on some of the uniforms walking up Sparks street than some Canadians ever had in their pockets. But the final act is not really the final act at all, because the proposals of Lord Keynes are not applied.

At this conference they had delegations from Bolivia, Brazil and, in fact, from all over the world. I have not heard the names of some of these countries since I studied geography in school, and I cannot pronounce them all now. No doubt these were all good people, but when you get down to brass tacks, how many of these countries are going to put any cash into the bank? Remember these countries who were in default to the league of nations. Do not forget the man who broke the bank at Monte Carlo. He was just as good a financier as some of those dealing with this problem, and I would have as much confidence in him as a financier. The final act on the white paper now before us of these experts is one of the most confused articles I have ever read. It contradicts itself; it is obscure; and as a state paper it will cause historians to wonder what kind of parliaments we had here and in all the other forty-four countries, to pass a half-baked scheme like this under which Canada is to put up $700 million. Canada, though, is to put up $700 million. The Tupper government which in my opinion, was a very good government—and I am entitled to my opinion, the same as the educated hon. gentlemen to my left and to my right—required only $36 million to run this whole country in 1896. But here this evening in one vote before the House of Commons, with no bill and only a resolution, we are faced with an expenditure of $700 million out of the consolidated revenue fund. If we go on piling up that kind of debts and capitalization on our consolidated revenue fund, not only will the country be bankrupt, but the banks will be bankrupt, and the so-called international monetary bank that is being proposed will not be successful.

Mr. Morgenthau, the former secretary of the treasury, is one of the very able gentlemen in Washington. He has said that San Francisco, Dumbarton Oaks and Bretton Woods are all interrelated. So they are. Even so, I fail to see how they are going to solve the questions of international debt, international credit and international reconstruction after the war. They are not going to be able to solve by the Bretton Woods agreement the building up of the devastated countries of Europe, and countries throughout the world. I fail to see it.

Then, I should like to say a word or two about another matter. First of all, we are going to get back to the gold standard at exchange rates fixed at the level between March and November 1945. That is what the white paper says. We are not allowed to go off it again. They devalue our currency up to ten per cent—a most doubtful expedient under modern conditions. Under the old gold standard you could lose gold once and for all, and, if necessary, suspend payments by a simple decision of the government. Under the proposed gold standard we have to win back the gold equivalent that we may lose over two or three years in order to avoid charges which can apparently be fixed at the discretion of the fund. The implication is that these charges would be made penal.

If we do not do what we are told under this international authority there is power to enforce penalties and sanctions, if deemed necessary, against the people of Canada for a charge in one year amounting to $700 million, and all this for the benefit of some of the Latin republics to the south, and other peoples of forty other countries in the civilized world, some of whom may be in default themselves, as some were in payments to the old league of nations, while Canada always, paid up.

I see a banker right before me in the house, and I venture to say that if I walked into his bank I would not get money on such credit as that. The hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Ferguson) is a banker, and I doubt if he would lend me a dollar on that kind of credit, based on such security. I can tell you this, that if you get money into some of the banks it is extremely hard to get it out. I know that.

If we do not do what this international authority tells us to do under the Bretton Woods agreement, we are to be penalized, and sanctions will be enforced against us. We will remember the sanctions passed against Ethiopia on similar occasions. We will recall that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) rose in his place and spoke in favour of imposing sanctions against Ethiopia. If sanctions were imposed the government would have had, by the covenant of the league to send an expeditionary force. That was the position taken by us at the league of nations. But did they send a force? No, they did not. A respected minister, and a lovable man, the late Minister of Justice, Mr. Lapointe, rose in his place and repealed all those sanctions. They were tossed out to the four winds of heaven. That was the kind of sanctions they applied, and all within forty-four hours, or forty-eight hours, I believe it was. I have not very much respect for such penalties and sanctions. This is just like those of the old league of nations when imposed.

Let us face the fact that, until the main lines of commercial policy and of reconstruction policy have been settled, it is idle even to discuss an international currency scheme. Our declared economic objectives—stable prices, full employment and cheap money—are not at present those of the Untied States. There is bound, therefore, to be a sharp divergence of view as to what constitutes a fundamental disequilibrium.

The issues at stake are of immense importance. In 1929 do not forget Britain and we in Canada to a lesser extent were dragged to the depth of an unparalleled economic depression, simply because Britain was tied to a gold standard and therefore to Wall street. It could happen again; it will happen again, if Bretton Woods goes through. As another plan to Bretton Woods, we, through the development and consolidation of the sterling area within the empire and in western Europe, coud build up an economic unit policy, and the achievement of full employment and a rising standard of living within the empire ourselves. Any such project would be killed finally by Bretton Woods.

There was an article recently in the London Times, which stated the following:

> The problem before Britain, and the world, cannot be that of a return to the status quo ante 1939, 1929 or even 1914. It is the establishment of a world economic system which, in the completely altered situation of 1944 and 1950 or 1960 can help mankind to move step by step toward the goal of rising standards of well-being and productivity which a generation twice plunged into catastrophe is resolved to achieve.

By that standard Bretton Woods must be judged. By that standard it falls. The final act of Bretton Woods invites us to throw away the only real asset Great Britain and Canada possess in the post-war world, namely the purchasing power of our own home market. That is a most important matter. Whatever else may happen, as Mr. Robert Boothby has so ably said, the Americans are not going to balance exports with imports. When all is said and done no country will depart hurriedly from that position, where it is forced to place a most substantial measure of control on its own productive capacity in order to have international trade.

Is Great Britain going to import goods with no plan, indiscriminately in the hope that somehow or other she will get enough gold to pay for them, or is she going to use her purchasing power and productive capacity to ensure that she gets imports which she needs? Is she going to subordinate the maintenance of employment and of essential services to a half-baked international currency scheme which will never work. Is Great Britain going to import goods freely with no plan and just trust to luck, and pay for them in the manner indicated? I say no. Is she going to permit the maintenance of imports to carry out that scheme? No.

Then, another point arises in connection with bilateral trade agrerements. Some hon. members will recall when Canada had preferential trade agreements some years ago. A treaty was made about twenty years ago with some thirty countries, I believe it was. All that will be extinguished if this goes through. The bilateral trade agreements will be extinct. In the future they will be turned into regional agreements.

There are many other aspects of this agreement, Mr. Robert Boothby says, "that cause anxiety." I will mention only one:

> The proposed agreement, if implemented, would result after a transition period of doubtful length in curtailing the existing convertibility of sterling within the sterling area. This must lead to the complete blocking of all existing sterling balances and, therefore, to the end of the sterling area which is to-day the main source of our economic strength. Here we leave the realm of pure economics for that of politics.

What is the long-term policy of Great Britain to be under this proposed Bretton Woods agreement? What is to be the long-term policy of the United States? We have been trying to learn what is to be the long-term policy of Canada. We have been trying to learn what the policy of this country is in connection with our relations within the empire. What is the long-term policy of Canada in connection with this agreement? Seven hundred million dollars will have to be raised, partly out of income, partly out of capital and partly from the sale of bonds. If the people of this country had known about this agreement three weeks ago it would have affected the sale of victory bonds throughout Canada.

Seven hundred million dollars is to be paid out under this agreement which like the Locarno treaty, the Kellogg pact, the Ethiopian sanctions, the Young and Dawes plans, the league, the finance league and all the rest of them, will turn out to be nothing more than a scrap of paper after we pay in our money, if default comes. That is all we are getting under this one. They have not considered Canada's long-term policy in connection with this agreement. What are they doing by this agreement? There is an absence, as the author I quoted says, "of any directives to the Bretton Woods conference which results in the general muddle and confusion in which we now find ourselves. Are we going to get back to the economic system of the nineteenth century? Is free multilateral trade, laissez-faire and a free convertible international currency based on gold the ultimate or the most desirable objective? That system presupposed five conditions; an expanding world population, expanding frontiers, the free migration of human beings, a continuous reduction of tariff barriers and continuous fresh discoveries of gold. None of these exist to-day."

The British can be pretty sure that whatever else they may do the United States are not going to balance exports with imports, reduce tariffs or control the export of gold. Oh, no, after all this they will erect the highest tariff wall in the world. Devaluation is no substitute for import control. What we want is the assurance of a sufficiency of imports of raw materials to maintain our available factors of production at a high level of activity.

In conclusion, I should like to refer to what was said by the late Sir Kingsley-Wood, former chancellor of the exchequer. I intend to quote from a white paper published by the British government. Sir Kingsley-Wood said, speaking in the British House of Commons in 1943, on his budget:

> We need a policy of expansion so that employment is maintained and production serves the ends of consumption.

He went on to give the reasons for that policy. Two plans were proposed. The first was the British plan; the second was the United States plan and they had a head-on collision at Bretton Woods. That was the last of the two plans. The British plan was contained in a document entitled "Proposals for an international clearing union." This international clearing union was to be based on international bank money which would be accepted by all member states for the purposes of payments arising out of international trade. Lord Keynes was closely identified with this scheme for an international clearing union. The government decided to publish this document as a preliminary contribution to the solution of one of the problems of economic cooperation after the war. The government stated that any proposals for a satisfactory international monetary mechanism after the war could be framed only after full consideration of all aspects of a difficult problem.

What about the United States plan? The United States document was entitled "United States proposal for a united and associated nations stabilization fund." The plan, which was closely associated with Mr. Morgenthau, secretary of the United States treasury department, and Mr. White, an assistant secretary, aimed at establishing an international stabilization fund made up of contributions from member countries. The fund would act as a clearing house for international trade movements carrying out the functions in exchange management of the member nations, with all their accumulated knowledge and resources. Like the British document, the United States proposals were not an expression of the official views of the United States government. The introduction to the document emphasized that the proposals were in every sense tentative, intended as a basis for discussion and exchange of views.

A debate on post-war international currency took place in the British House of Commons on May 12, 1943, and the late Sir Kingsley-Wood, who opened the debate, defined as follows the three aims of the policy: First, to provide a mechanism by which international balances should be freely settled; second, to provide that national exchanges should be reasonably stable, so that goods and services can be marketed with knowledge of the value they command; third, to provide that countries, whose economy has been gravely dislocated or damaged by the war, should have some temporary international monetary facilities to enable them to start trading without undue delay.

The united nations monetary and financial conference was held at Bretton Woods between July 1 and July 22, 1944. Forty-three nations, including Great Britain, attended the conference. The proposals are before the house. The minister explained them to-day. He described the international monetary fund and the international bank for reconstruction and development. Both those proposals were recommended to congress in a message by the late President of the United States.

Sir John Anderson, chancellor of the exchequer, in the budget debate and white paper dealt in some detail with the proposals put forward at Bretton Woods. He was a great chancellor with the background he had. He said with regard to Bretton Woods:

The Bretton Woods document explicitly recognized that while we might agree on objectives and methods when the world's trade was settling down, countries like our own had to face an extremely difficult period of transition in which they must keep their hands free to deal with their difficulties as they arose.

There is one point that I must bring to the attention of some of the critics of the final act. I mean those who appear to think that the line of safety for us after the war is to reserve our full rights to enter into discriminatory commercial and currency agreements, not only as a temporary measure during the transitional period, but permanently.

And again:

Under article VII of the Mutual Aid agreement, the master agreement under which we have received assistance of prodigious amount, we agreed to work for the elimination of all forms of discrimination in international commerce. The only qualification was concerned with imperial preferences. We are bound by this agreement and we are going to honour it.

Good. That last word is my own. I continue:

Quite apart from the Mutual Aid agreement, by our commercial agreement with the United States of 1938 we also accepted a policy of non-discrimination in trade. I would ask those who recommend what is in essence a barter system as the basis for our international trade; do they really wish us to follow a course which goes back on what we have agreed with the United States and flouts one of the principles of international commerce to which the United States government attach importance, and which, as a matter of fact, I believe in our own interest is a sound principle? If we discriminate, other people can discriminate. If we indulge in barter, other people can indulge in barter.

I am also told that the Bretton Woods conference means a return to the gold standard. I doubt whether those critics who use the words "gold standard" as a term of opprobrium always have a perfectly clear idea of what they mean, but perhaps one can assume that what they are thinking of is a system under which the external value of sterling was fixed, and the internal credit policy was made subservient to the maintenance of that value. To that system, if it ever existed in such a crude form, we do not propose to return.

The Lord Chancellor refers in conclusion to the problem of stability of exchange rates:

I do not go the whole way in believing that the greater part of our troubles between the wars was caused by unstable exchanges. Nor do I believe that countries with a major interest in international trade lightly alter their exchange rates. Those alterations disturb internal as well as external values. But there is no doubt that the instability of the exchange rates of some important countries at some periods between the wars was a disturbing factor in international trade.

His conclusions are expressed in the following two paragraphs:

The Bretton Woods document follows a middle course in this matter. So far from imposing a system of rigid exchange rates, it expressly recognizes the need for adjustment of exchange rates to correct disequilibrium. If we believe it is in our own interests to have a reasonable stability of exchanges but at the same time to have a method for the orderly adjustment of exchanges when the occasion arises, I do not see very well how one could have a very different principle from that stated in the Bretton Woods document.

It is, of course, true that to a certain extent we would bring our exchange policy under review by an international body on which we should be represented. But so would every other country. We would not surrender any ultimate right to follow our own policy, but we would accept an obligation to recognize that the adjustment of the exchange value of sterling, or of any other major international currency, is a two-ended process, and that we owe it to the general interests of international trade to consult with an international institution before we make a change which will affect our commercial, as well as our financial, relations with other countries.

Those are the views of two British chancellors of the exchequer.

My opinion, Mr. Speaker, is that the time has not arrived for such a proposal. We should deal as our first task with the great questions of trade, defence, migration, and preferential trade within the empire. I will contend first, last and all the time that the primary matter for us to consider and predicate in any agreement that we sign in this connection is, that we shall stay within the British empire. That empire, functioning along the lines I indicated to-day, is strong enough to stand any strain or stress of war, peace or reconstruction.

I say further, in conclusion, that it will be far better to make agreements with our own dominions along the lines of the united nations council; we should then have an empire council of the same general character as the united nations organization and decide first our own empire policies. Unless we do that the states of the empire will be divided and broken up, for if the dominions do not hang together they will hang separately. Together they are the strongest in the whole world and self-contained in a financial, material way and in a constitutional, social and economic way, to withstand the world.

Where do we in Canada stand? We have heard a great deal to-day about international policies, and this apparently is one of them. They are much in favour with some hon. gentlemen. But where do we stand at this critical hour in relation to the British empire? If we are to proceed far along these separatist lines we shall, I fear, lead to the dissolution of the British empire in a period of time. This Bretton Woods agreement will, in my opinion, lead to restricted trade and dearer money, and also, as Mr. Churchill has said, "to the dissolution of the British empire".

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): I believe this is one of the most important and dangerous measures ever to be submitted to this House of Commons. In all seriousness I say that I look upon this measure as being an act of treachery not only to the British commonwealth of nations but to every peace-loving nation in the world to-day.

A short time ago we endorsed in this house a charter for the united nations, the main purpose of which was to maintain international peace and security, to develop friendly relationships among nations, and to encourage respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms. If the measure now before us passes, I believe that we shall be making a mockery of the charter, because you cannot make political agreements to maintain peace at the same time that you institute economic agreements to declare a form of international trade war. The result, I think all hon. members will agree, must be international friction which will greatly menace the success of any charter of peace. Therefore, if the final act of the Bretton Woods conference is to be regarded as the cornerstone of interational economic cooperation, it is essential that it receive the most careful consideration by all hon. members of this house. I am well aware that there are those who will argue that this measure has already received the careful attention of Canadian experts, and that these men are far better qualified to judge of the merits or demerits of this measure than we are. Well, as I have remarked before in this chamber, I judge a man by his record; and the record of these men is not an impressive one.

Mr. JAQUES: "By their fruits shall ye know them."

Mr. QUELCH: These are largely the same men who were responsible for systematically sabotaging the resources of this country in pre-war days. These are the men who must take the responsibility for maintaining production in this country at less than fifty per cent of its capacity, by allowing half a million people to be unemployed and a million to be on relief. These are the same men who must largely assume the responsibility for the pitiable condition in which Canada found herself upon the declaration of war, when thousands upon thousands of men were rejected from the army because they were medically unfit, due very largely to malnutrition. I would ask, is that a record to inspire confidence?

Furthermore, their war record is no better. We have heard a number of people praise the financial record of the government in the war, but is it one which will bear close scrutiny? I recall that in 1939 the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) stated that the war financial policy of the government was to be as far as possible a pay-as-you-go policy; and yet what has happened? We have expanded the national debt by over $10,000 million, in spite of very heavy taxation and quite strong controls. I ask hon. members, if you were hiring experts to run your business would you be satisfied with references of that type, records of past failures? So that we in this group are not prepared to accept these proposals just because they are endorsed by a number of thoroughly discredited experts.

We consider that a thorough explanation of these proposals should be given to the house before second reading, because on second reading you endorse the principle. The minister has no right to ask the members of this house to endorse the principle of a measure which he himself admits is very complex and hard to understand. I doubt whether more than two or three per cent of the members of this house understand it; I would put the percentage even lower, because I doubt very much if even the experts themselves understand it. I think this is quite evident when one finds that men like Maynard Keynes and Morgenthau disagree as to exactly what the act means. In England the people are told that it is not the gold standard; yet in the United States it is represented as the fruition of the treasury's gold policy.

Mr. JAQUES: Gold-plated.

Mr. QUELCH: The late President of the United States, Franklin D. Roosevelt, sent a message to be read before the senate on February 12, 1945, relating to the Bretton Woods agreement. It read in part as follows:

> If we are to measure up to the task of peace with the same stature as we have measured up to the task of war, we must see that the institutions of peace rest firmly on the solid foundations of international political and economic cooperation. The cornerstone for international political cooperation is the Dumbarton Oaks proposal for a permanent united nations. International political relations will be friendly and constructive, however, only if solutions are found to the difficult economic problems we face to-day. The cornerstone for international economic cooperation is the Bretton Woods proposal for an international monetary fund and an international bank for reconstruction and development.

That is just about the same thing that the minister said when he was introducing the motion before the house. Therefore, if the agreement is to be part of the foundation upon which we hope to build world peace, it must be of such a nature as to promote friendship and good will among the nations of the world, and it is upon that basis that I intend to discuss the final act this evening. Is the Bretton Woods act likely to help to promote good will among the members? If not, I believe that all members of this house will agree that it should be discarded. In article I, the purposes of the act are defined, and I should like to read the purposes of the international fund, section 1:

(i) To promote international monetary co-operation through a permanent institution which provides the machinery for consultation and collaboration on international monetary problems.

(ii) To facilitate the expansion and balanced growth of international trade, and to contribute thereby to the promotion and maintenance of high levels of employment and real income and to the development of the productive resources of all members as primary objectives of economic policy.

All members will agree with the purposes outlined in sections 1 and 2. I wish to comment upon 3, 4 and 5:

(iii) To promote exchange stability, to maintain orderly exchange arrangements among members, and to avoid competitive exchange depreciation.

(iv) To assist in the establishment of a multilateral system of payments in respect of current transactions between members and in the elimination of foreign exchange restrictions which hamper the growth of world trade.

(v) To give confidence to members by making the fund's resources available to them under adequate safeguards, thus providing them with opportunity to correct maladjustments in their balance of payments without resorting to measures destructive of national or international prosperity.

The questions that must come to the minds of hon. members are these: Why do nations indulge in exchange depreciation? Why do nations impose foreign exchange restrictions? Why is there unbalance of trade between nations when both parties are endeavouring to export goods? I would say that we must have the answers to these questions before we can judge of the adequacy of the proposals in this act.

Article I, section II, states that the purpose of the fund is to facilitate the expansion and balanced growth of international trade. Unfortunately, the fund concentrates on bringing about a balance of money between nations, with all the emphasis on gold and on United States dollars, ignoring the fact that in the long run you cannot have a balance of money without a balance of trade, except of course by the steady growth of debt between nations, and that is provided for in article 7 of the act. I will quote section 2 of article 7:

The fund may, if it deems such action appropriate to replenish its holdings of any member's currency, take either or both of the following steps:

(i) Propose to the member that, on terms and conditions agreed between the fund and the member, the latter lend its currency to the fund or that, with the approval of the member, the fund borrow such currency from some other source either within or outside the territories of the member, but no member shall be under any obigation to make such loans to the fund or to approve the borrowing of its currency by the fund from any other source.

(ii) Require the member to sell its currency to the fund for gold.

That is to say, if the United States consistently refuses to accept imports in exchange for its exports, thereby depriving other nations of dollars to pay for imports, then the fund can borrow or buy with gold, dollars from the United States to enable the debtor nations to balance their payments. But, mark you, it would be done by going into debt instead of by balancing trade and having an exchange of goods. Therefore one of my main arguments against the fund is that, in attempting to bring about balance of payments, instead of ensuring that it shall be done through a balance of trade it attains its object by expanding the debt of the debtor nation.

Let me ask hon. members this question: Is that a sound basis upon which to attempt to promote friendship and good will among the nations of the world, by forcing a nation to go into debt in order to obtain the goods it requires when it has goods on hand which it is willing to exchange? The express purpose of the fund is to facilitate the expansion and balanced growth of international trade. Then what is the main or real purpose of international trade?

Every time I hear the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) speak, I get the impression that the main purpose of trade is to export goods. I have never once heard him emphasize at the same time the even greater importance of importing goods in return. Does anyone really think that a nation can become prosperous by exporting goods? You merely remove goods from the nation and lower the standard of living to that extent, so that export trade by itself cannot bring prosperity unless exports are used for the purpose of bringing imports back into the country.

And so, reducing international trade to its simplest terms, we say that it is the exchange of those goods which we cannot consume for those goods which we cannot produce, thereby bringing about an improvement in the people's standard of living. It should be an act of mutual advantage to the parties concerned. Therefore to the extent that you expand foreign trade on that basis you improve the nation's standard of living. But when you maintain your foreign trade on the basis of trying to maintain a favourable balance of trade you are lowering the standard of living of the people to that extent. Unfortunately that has been the basis for foreign trade in the past.

Highly industralized nations have endeavoured to export more than they were prepared to take back in imports, thereby lowering the standard of living, the reason being the lack of buying power internally and not because the people do not need the goods.

I wish to quote from a statement made by Reginald McKenna to the banker's association, on October 5, 1922. I have quoted it on previous occasions, but it has a direct bearing on this question and therefore I should like to quote it again at this time:

> For over two centuries, British capital, that is, credit had been lent to other countries, year by year England produced more than she either consumed herself or could exchange for the products of other nations, and she could not obtain a market for the surplus unless she gave the purchaser a long credit. Foreign loans and foreign issues were taken up in England and the proceeds were spent in paying for surplus production. British factories and workshops were kept in good employment, but it was a condition of their prosperity that a part of their output should be disposed of in this way.

Note that, according to Reginald McKenna, the prosperity of England depended upon her being able to sell more goods abroad than she brought back in return. In other words, that was the old idea that a favourable balance of trade maintained prosperity. But what did it really mean. It meant that owing to the deficiency of purchasing power that existed in England, and by maintaining a favourable balance of trade, the wages that were paid out in the production of those goods which were exported and for which no imports were brought back in return helped to create a demand for the goods that were left within the country and, as McKenna stated, it maintained a certain degree of prosperity in England. I would not say that it maintained prosperity for the people of England. Nobody who knew conditions in England in those years would suggest that all people were prosperous, but it did maintain prosperity for the industrialists.

It is true that it served the industrialists and the manufacturers of England well during the two centuries prior to the last war. What happened in the later years? Shortly before the last war other nations were also starting to become industrialized and to raise tariffs to keep British goods out, because they also were finding themselves in a position where it became necessary to maintain a favourable balance of trade in order to maintain employment within their own borders. The year 1914 saw the end of that type of policy. I remember in the years 1906, 1907, 1908, 1912 and 1913 watching the marches of the unemployed in the city of London. I say that any nation that attempts in the future to maintain prosperity within its own borders by that policy is bound to fail. Not only will it fail, but it will help to create throughout the world a condition which will bring about unrest, international friction and war.

That was also the policy between the two wars, the war of 1914-18 and the war of 1934-45, with the difference that after 1929 the United States, while giving credit for trade exports, demanded payment not in goods but in gold or foreign securities. We know what the policy was in 1929 and during the thirties. It caused one of the most violent depressions the world has ever seen, because at that time the nations were on the gold standard, and as gold was withdrawn from those countries their gold reserves were reduced and a general restriction of currency took place in all countries.

We find to-day that all highly industrialized nations are prepared for a fight for foreign markets after the war. For example, both Canada and the United States feel that in order to maintain the full development of their resources they will have to make large-scale foreign investments after the conclusion of hostilities.

I hold in my hand a booklet which is an address delivered by Mr. William C. Clark on post-war goals and economic reconstruction at New York university on December 15, 1943. On pages 221 he states:

> We feel also that adequate arrangements are essential to make possible a substantial volume of long-term international investment, and we trust that the technical and political difficulties involved in consummating these may soon be surmounted.

Mr. HANSELL: Who is Clark?

Mr. QUELCH: He is the deputy minister of Finance. Those members who were on the reconstruction committee last year will remember that when we were discussing these monetary stabilization proposals I asked him whether or not he considered foreign investments a long-term solution, and he admitted that they were not a long-term solution. While I feel that at this time we should be prepared to develop policies that would be a long-term solution, on the other hand is there justification for them even as a short-term solution? Is there any justification at the present time for Canada going into a large scheme of foreign investment. I know we have certain moral obligations, but aside from that I would say there can be no justification for such a policy until we have completed or have well advanced the development of our own country.

I think it is time that we had a little more investment in roads in this country, especially in western Canada. Why not invest money in the development of our north country? Why not invest money in irrigation in western Canada? Why not invest in a real live, wide housing scheme in Canada? Why not make greater investments in the greatest asset of this country, Canadian youth?

Fortunately, Mr. Speaker, public opinion is beginning to realize the fallacy of prosperity by foreign investment. I should like to quote from a speech made on June 7, 1945, by the governor of New York. This is what he said:

> We in the United States will emerge from the war with overwhelming power, financial and industrial. There is no question of the huge demand for our exports that will exist. The great question is whether we are prepared to accept payment for these goods in the only sound way that payment can be made—by taking in exchange the goods and services of other nations. The American people have made clear their determination to join with other nations in a world organization to maintain peace; but real peace cannot be achieved merely in the political field. All of the work being done at San Francisco will mean tragically little if economic conflict is to divide the nation.

The London chamber of commerce, probably one of the greatest organizations of its kind, has emphasized this question time and again. I have quoted it in the house, and therefore I am not going to take the time to quote it again at this moment, but I should like to quote from a statement of the London Economist because it is generally considered an orthodox publication. I quote from the London Economist of August 11, 1945, page 182:

> The condition of full employment as it is now universally recognized is that the economy should generate a sufficiently large flow of effective demand to purchase the whole of the gross national product. In simpler language, somebody has to buy the volume of goods that full employment will produce, or they will not be produced.

That is to say, if a nation's purchasing power is adjusted so as to enable the people to buy the total production of the nation, or at least all the goods that they desire, then a nation will be willing to accept imports in return for its exports. So that the first step toward any sound scheme for international trade is for each and every nation to set its own house in order and expand the purchasing power of the people to the point where they are able to buy the total production of the country, or the production of other nations for which their own production can be exchanged. It is futile to hope that any form of international stabilization can maintain international trade on a sound basis until each nation is first of all prepared to set its own house in order. Therefore I would emphasize that the responsibility must rest with the Canadian government to expand the purchasing power of the people of this country to the point where they are able to buy the total production of the country. I am not going to take the time to show how that can be done. When speaking the other day, the leader of this group gave a clear way in which this might be brought about. We have referred to it on various occasions, and no doubt will do so in the future. I think the house is familiar with the proposals that we have set forth from time to time by which the purchasing power can be expanded to maintain an effective demand.

Unfortunately it has been customary in the past to regard the cause of an unbalance of trade as arising from a nation buying more than it can afford or borrowing more than it can repay. Apparently it is only recently we have come to realize that, a creditor may be and very frequently is to blame, that it arises from a creditor nation attempting to dump its unemployment problem upon the doorstep of another nation by exporting abroad far more goods than it is prepared to accept payment for in imports from the world at large on a multilateral basis. Obviously, if some nations insist on exporting more than they are willing to accept in return there are bound to be some nations forced into debt in order to obtain the goods they require, even though they have goods to export in exchange. In other words, if some nations insist upon maintaining a favourable balance of payments, other nations must find themselves in the unfortunate position of having an unfavourable balance. As a consequence, nations suffering from an unfavourable balance of trade have resorted to currency depreciation and foreign exchange restrictions as necessary protection against being forced into a state of unpayable debt. For example, a nation depreciating its currency by twenty per cent is able to undersell another nation by twenty per cent, and thereby encourage other nations to buy more of their goods, thereby hoping to readjust the balance of payments. For the same reason a nation may impose foreign exchange restrictions to prevent the flight of capital, which would lead to still further unbalanced payments. Therefore we feel that before taking these protective measures away from a nation or even curtailing them, we must take the necessary steps to remove the cause of the unbalance of trade. In other words, we must recognize the responsibility of the creditor nation to accept payment in the only way a debtor nation can make payment, namely in goods and services, unless of course the nation happens to be a producer of gold; and there are very few nations, comparatively speaking, that are producers of gold.

I wish to examine the Bretton Woods agreement in the light of those facts. The act comprises the articles of agreement of the international monetary fund and the international bank for reconstruction and development. I believe hon. members who have studied the act will agree that it is very hard to understand exactly what is meant by the phraseology used. I doubt if a single member of the house to-day, even including the Minister of Finance, would dare say he can explain exactly what every section of this act means. Therefore it is not surprising, as I stated a while ago, that different interpretations have been given by Maynard Keynes and Mr. Morgenthau. I stated in my first words that Mr. Morganthau had said what this meant. In presenting his report to congress on international finance he stated: "The Bretton Woods plan marks the fruition of the American treasury's gold policy," while Mr. Keynes in England stated it did not mean the gold standard at all. Apparently they have different interpretations of the same thing. Certainly I would suggest that any hon. member studying articles IV and V would immediately agree that it is a return to the gold standard. I do not say it is the gold standard of 1925, any more than the gold standard of that year was the same as the gold standard of 1914; but how can anyone argue that it is not the gold standard when these words are used in section 1(a) of article IV:

> The par value of the currency of each member shall be expressed in terms of gold as a common denominator or in terms of the United States dollar of the weight and fineness in effect on July 1, 1944.

The leader of the C.C.F. party said in his remarks that he would be opposed to this agreement if it meant that the currency of a nation was to be based upon gold. Here it definitely states that it is to be based upon gold, and I do not think even an expert lawyer could wriggle out of that phrase.

To come back to the question of an unbalance of trade, article VII deals with a nation that persists in selling more abroad than it buys. Provision is made for the fund to borrow from the currency of that member nation, provided that the member is agreeable, or the fund may buy its currency for gold which, as I stated before, can only result in the nation having to obtain that currency by means of borrowing and going still further into debt. On the other hand, a very different attitude is taken toward a nation that imports more goods than it is able to pay for with its exports. Section 8 of article V imposes very severe penalties upon a nation finding itself in that awkward predicament. I should like to quote part of that section:

> (c) The fund shall levy charges uniform for all members which shall be payable by any member on the average daily balance of its currency held by the fund in excess of its quota. These charges shall be at the following rates:
> (i) On amounts not more than twenty-five per cent in excess of the quota: no charge for the first three months; one-half per cent per annum for the next nine months: and thereafter an increase in the charge of one-half per cent for each subsequent year.
> (ii) On amounts more than twenty-five per cent and not more than fifty per cent in excess of the quota: an additional one-half per cent for the first year; and an additional one-half per cent for each subsequent year.
> (iii) On each additional bracket of twenty-five per cent in excess of the quota: an additional one-half per cent for the first year; and an additional one-half per cent for each subsequent year.
> (d) Whenever the fund's holdings of a member's currency are such that the charge applicable to any bracket for any period has reached the rate of four per cent per annum, the fund and the member shall consider means by which the fund's holdings of the currency can be reduced. Thereafter the charges shall rise in accordance with the provisions of (c) above until they reach five per cent and failing agreement, the fund may then impose such charges as it deems appropriate.

Imagine any man signing a mortgage under which his interest rates will go up by one-half per cent per annum and then, when they reach a certain amount, if he cannot come to an agreement with the mortgage company the company can charge any rate it likes. Does anyone really think terms of that kind are going to bring about a spirit of good will in this world? The full weight is placed on the debtor nation; no pressure whatever is exerted upon the creditor nation, although to-day we all agree that each nation has a certain responsibility, whether it be a debtor or a creditor nation, in order to maintain an even balance of payment.

Time is going, Mr. Speaker, and I wish to shorten my remarks. As I have stated, the inevitable consequence of such a policy will be that, in order to get the goods they require, certain nations, being unable to get other nations to accept their goods in payment, and not being producers of gold, will be forced further and further into a state of unpayable debt, while on the other hand the creditor nations, in order to continue exporting more goods than they are prepared to accept payment for in imports, in order to dump their unemployment problem on the doorstep of another nation, will continue to pile up foreign credits which they will endeavour to use for foreign investments. To-day I think we have a very good example of United States imperialism at its very worst.

So I come back to my original question: can such a policy as the Bretton Woods agreement create a feeling of good will and friendship? I would say that the inevitable consequence must be international friction leading to war. I have often been asked this question: "Why would nations join the fund if the conditions are as you state them to be? They say that nations join on a voluntary basis, and if conditions are as you have mentioned, surely no nation would join." I think it is true that so far only two nations have signed, but the agreement has been signed in behalf of the nations by the experts of some forty-four nations. I would say that the weaker nations joined as a result of economic pressure. I do not think it is fair to say that they have signed on a voluntary basis. They have signed because they have been practically compelled to do so, in order to exist. My suspicion regarding this question was first aroused when resolution No. 12 was first passed at Atlantic City limiting the functions of UNRRA, to all intents and purposes striking out the second "R", and making it a straight relief project, so that no help could be given for reconstruction or rehabilitation. Then, when nations wished to know where they could get help to rebuild industries they were told that they could get it by becoming members or parties to the Bretton Woods agreement.

I was very much struck by an article which appeared in the Fundy Fisherman, of August 29, 1945, which read:

> The lend-lease agreements which the various nations were obliged to sign before obtaining supplies contained a provision which was not in the legislation enacted by congress. This laid down that the debtor nations were to enter into agreements directed to the expansion, by appropriate international and domestic measures, of production, employment and the exchange and consumption of goods, etc. The international money plan is the first of these measures. It is one thing to consider the plan on its merits. It is another matter altogether to discover what the consequence of rejection will be.

I received another article of great interest from The Liberator Council of England, recognized as a monetary reform organization. Sir Charles Morgan-Webb is one of their advisers, a man of world renown as an authority on gold and sterling. This pamphlet, which was circularized among members of parliament in England, states in part:

> One of Mr. Winston Churchill's secret and unpublicized actions after assuming power in 1940, was to promise President Roosevelt that he would do all in his power to bring Britain back to a gold standard suitable to American ideas.

I am not criticizing Churchill for that statement, because I realize that England was in a position of life and death in those days. England had to get supplies. And if in order to get help under lend-lease, as is suggested in the article in the Fundy Fishermen, they had to agree to become a party to the gold standard or Bretton Woods, then no doubt Churchill was justified in giving in to the United States to get the help they required. But I do not think action of that kind redounds to the credit of the United States. It is most interesting to note that, while making an agreement of that kind, Churchill knew very well what the significance of the gold standard would be, because in 1932 he bitterly denounced it. I shall not take time to read his statement. They have been quoted in the house on various occasions.

However, I should like to quote the statement made by Mr. Ernest Bevin when he set out the attitude of the British Labour party regarding the Bretton Woods agreement. This is taken from the parliamentary debates for Monday, June 4, 1945, and he said:

> One last word about Bretton Woods. I have never been finally convinced about Bretton Woods. I take the line, and my party takes the line that, neither directly nor indirectly, will we again be anchored to gold in any circumstances. I shall never be a party to any international agreement, which, either as a result of the fluctuation of exchange, speculation or international action of that kind—which is not always of the highest moral standard—would prevent me from insulating the home market from the violent repercussions which will break down the home price level when these wide fluctuations take place on the international price level. However, I will join with anyone in finding a rational basis for an international price level, properly organized, provided it does not reflect itself in depressing the standard of life on the home market. As yet, neither the chancellor nor Lord Keynes has ever been able to persuade me that there are sufficient safeguards in the Bretton Woods proposals to achieve that object.

That was the attitude of the British Labour party in June, 1945. But, as I say, when sufficient pressure can be forced upon a nation they are likely to renounce their principles. I should like to quote from the London Economist of July 21, 1945, where it speaks about the Bretton Woods agreement:

> As a matter of plain economics, there would seem to be a clear balance of argument against the Bretton Woods scheme—that is against the monetary fund.

Mind you, the London Economist is a most orthodox paper. Yet they say there is a clear balance of argument against the Bretton Woods agreement on economic grounds. The article continues:

> But as a matter of politics or, if the word is taken to imply something sinister, of amicable relations between governments, there is almost everything to be said in its favour. How much economic hazard is a reasonable price for continued generosity and friendship or at the least for avoidance of American disappointment and resentment. It all depends upon the size of the hazard and the intensity of the friendship.

One might interject, what friendship! Apparently the price Great Britain has had to pay to get three and a half billion dollars has been the signing of the Bretton Woods agreement—although it has been condemned by the party in power to-day, through Mr. Ernest Bevin.

In closing, I wish to ask this question: Did the Canadian government help the British government to resist coercion in regard to the signing of the Bretton Woods agreement? Is it fair to say that the Canadian government added its pressure to that of the United States government in order to try to persuade the British government to become a party to the Bretton Woods agreement? I understand that the Canadian government is one of those governments which to-day are pushing forward the Bretton Woods agreement. In other words, we have merely become the Charlie McCarthy for Uncle Sam.

Some people will argue, "Well, why worry? Even if a nation joins, it can withdraw." That is true. That is mentioned in the act in several places, namely that a nation can withdraw. But what happens to a nation that withdraws? Article XI deals with that and, although I have not time to quote it, I suggest that every member should read it. It would be seen that the article states that if a member withdraws and is no longer a member of the organization, other members may be advised to institute a boycott against that nation. Just visualize what would happen if England were forced to withdraw from this fund, and were no longer to be a member, and the rest of the nations in the British empire placed a boycott against Great Britain!

Was I exaggerating when I said that to my mind this act is nothing more or less than an act of treachery against the British commonwealth of nations? What effect will the act have upon a nation's sovereignty? I am not prepared to say that Bretton Woods will to any extent affect the sovereignty of a creditor nation or a nation that is a gold producer. But in the committee stage I shall prove, I think, without shadow of a doubt, that it does destroy the sovereignty of a debtor nation. Just because she will not suffer loss of sovereignty as a result of this act, so long as she can maintain adequate gold reserves, is Canada justified in trying to impose upon other nations a conditon which will mean the destruction of their sovereignty?

Then, in closing, to those hon. members who have emphasized—especially the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario—that it is a matter of Bretton Woods or chaos, or the setting up of a bilateral system which in his opinion would be chaos—and probably it would be—I would say that there is a logical alternative. This is an alternative that has been put forward by the London chamber of commerce, which is undoutedly the greatest organization of its kind anywhere in the world. And if this matter is referred to the committee on banking and commerce we should call Mr. Leigh the secretary, before that committee, as a witness.

When the deputy minister of finance appeared before the committee on reconstruction, I asked him if he would be willing to tell us what his views were on the London chamber of commerce proposals. He was not prepared to do that then, but I met him in the corridor afterwards and I asked him again what his views were. He said that the proposals were quite good but that the main difficulty would be to get other nations to agree to them. I asked him what nations he thought would disagree with what was known as the twentieth century system. I asked if he thought Russia would disagree, and he said he did not. It finally boiled down to this, the nation which he thought would not agree to them was the United States of America. In other words, the nations of the world are binding themselves to the gold standard in order to meet the good will of the United States of America. The proposal put forward by the London chamber of commerce—

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Tremblay): I am sorry, but the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. QUELCH: I have about eighteen words to complete my remarks. The proposal put forward in the twentieth century system is a multilateral system of trade using the national currencies of the nations concerned based upon the price index level of their goods.

Mr. ILSLEY: What is the authority for the hon. member's statement that the United States forced a promise from Mr. Winston Churchill that he would lead the United Kingdom back to a gold standard satisfactory to the United States?

Mr. QUELCH: I explained at the outset what my authority was. I was giving it for what it was worth.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. QUELCH: Before you laugh, listen. The pamphlet was signed by Mr. Eric Troward, president of the liberator council and it is headed:

> This memorandum has been specially prepared for the benefit of new members of parliament, many of whom have not had the opportunity of studying the trend of international financial development during the past two years.

In regard to the liberator council, I would just like to point out that the chief adviser is Sir Charles Morgan-Webb, late chief secretary of the Burma government, who is a world authority on gold and the sterling group. So it is not a pamphlet that can be dismissed lightly. I do not think a man like Sir Charles Morgan-Webb would have anything to do with an organization distributing a pamphlet making that charge unless there was some proof of it.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend is basing its authenticity upon the alleged standing of the adviser to this liberator council. As to who the gentleman is who made the statement, I do not know. I just want to say that I do not believe the statement.

Mr. QUELCH: The minister will agree that the fact that Britain has agreed to Bretton Woods is pretty good backing for that statement.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I do not believe that the dominions of the British empire are joining in this treachery to themselves. I think that is ridiculous.

Mr. QUELCH: They are being forced by the United States to join; pressure is being exerted.

Mr. RODNEY ADAMSON (York West): Mr. Speaker, in view of the violent language that has been used against this resolution it would seem that one is at some personal danger in supporting it at all. However, I feel that Bretton Woods is a pious hope to establish multilateral trade by the establishment of an international exchange medium. It hopes to overcome the international monetary chaos which led directly to the restriction of trade which brought about unemployment, despair and eventual dictatorship, and of course war, in the despair decades of the twenties and thirties of this century.

Naturally any agreement of this nature must impose restrictions upon the signatories to the agreement. No matter what agreement you enter into, by the very nature of its being an agreement you agree with certain other people to do certain things. By its very nature there must be certain restrictions. One of the great visions is the hope that the international trade banditry as practised after the last war will be put an end to.

Probably it will be impossible completely to curtail international trade banditry; it will probably be impossible to overcome many of the dark practices in which international trade indulges from time to time, but this at least is a hopeful step in the right direction. During the period following the last war all kinds of methods were used to import goods, to cut prices, to give drawbacks, and to make secret agreements. One instance was in the timber industry. The Soviet Union said that during the year they would meet any price at which importers could buy in any other country in the world. That is just typical of the practices that went on.

A little later on we had the sale of South American securities in the United States, securities which in many cases represented no real value. They were sold, not because they were going to purchase real goods or provide real services, but because in many cases the vendors could find a market for the securities. I happened to be in Vienna when the Oesterreich-Credit-Anstalt failed, and that brought about the failure of one bank after another and eventually caused the bank holiday in the United States in 1933. It was all brought about by a desire to export and not import, and the sharp practices which resulted, that were carried on in international trade and the type of trade that was done. The restrictions of imports, high tariffs, blocked currencies, different types of currencies, all had a part in bringing about the eventual complete destruction of international trade at any level or the eventual cessation of international trade of magnitude at any level. United States banks failed, and thus the richest country in the world found itself with a bank holiday and a real condition of panic.

In his first inaugural address the late President Roosevelt said that the only thing we had to fear was fear, and yet the entire world was in an economic panic. I do not think there is any other word for it. It was in an economic panic because there was no international regulation. This is at least an attempt to prevent history from repeating itself. As such I think it is a step very much in the right direction.

We had as we know an entirely fictitious value put on the money of European countries. The German mark, the Italian lira and the Russian ruble may have been worth anything, but as exchange media they were virtually valueless. They were used by the governments of the countries in question for unfair practices and international trade banditry. That is the only word I can think of to describe the practices that went on during that time.

We at the present time may fall into the danger of comparing conditions after the last war with conditions now. While history repeats itself, it does not repeat itself exactly; and while there are many similarities between conditions after the last war and conditions after this war, there are sufficient differences, I believe, to be worth mentioning and seriously considering at the present time.

The first difference between the aftermath of this war and that of the last war is that after the last war the United States put on one tariff after another; first of all the emergency tariff, then the Fordney-McCumber tariff, and then the Hawley-Smoot tariff, and they virtually excluded the goods of the world from their country. This was the first really retrogressive step. Then, with the restriction of imports, they followed a course of extreme isolationism. They refused to sign—this is ancient history, everybody knows it—the Versailles treaty, and they declined to join the league of nations and withdrew completely into isolationism. From then on things went from bad to worse, and little hope remained of world trade.

At the present time conditions are quite different. The United States is no longer the abundant storehouse she was in 1918; she is becoming a "have-not" country; she is beginning to notice her great depletion of raw materials and to be frightened about it. I refer particularly to some of the non-ferrous metals, copper, lead, zinc and manganese. Of these, the United States, at the rate of consumption which prevailed from 1935 to 1938, has between two and thirty years supply; in most cases, much less than thirty years. The United States will find that she must have these metals for her industries; and we in Canada are, in every case excepting manganese, the greatest producer or potential producer, or at any rate our potential is as great as that of any other nation. Therefore, instead of our being excluded from the United States market as we were after the last war, it is probable that the Americans will need our base metals.

Further, the Americans have now become almost completely deficient in such vital metals as tin, antimony, chrome and nickel. Of course they never did have any nickel, but they had some of the other metals. They must now import these things in order to carry on their industries. It is possible that the natural source of some of these metals will be Canada, and our past desperate need for United States dollars will probably not be as great as it was after the last war. There used to be a saying in the United States, which had an almost world-wide circulation, "export or die". The present condition is very nearly the reverse; it is "import or perish", because, with these great deficiencies, the United States finds she must import not only for her own safety but to run her industries in general. I submit, therefore, that there is a very great difference between the situation after the last war and the situation at the present time.

Another singular fact worth noting in this connection is that at the present time fewer than two million Americans are working in industries protected by a tariff. We used to think that all United States industry had tariff protection, and during the Hawley-Smoot era most of it had. But now—I will quote my authority for this in a minute—there are fewer than two million Americans who are working in tariff-protected industries, which is a significant figure. So that I think we can discount the theory that this agreement of Bretton Woods is some scheme by which the United States hopes to "put a fast one over" the rest of the world. I do not believe that that is so; in fact I am certain that it is not so. I wish to quote one paragraph from an article from Percy W. Bidwell about the United States deficiency at the present time. It appears in the current issue of "Foreign Affairs" at page 98:

> Americans will not die, nor will the United States cease to exist, if we fail to increase our imports. But we shall not live as well as we might, nor as safely. This is a rich country. The high productivity of our industry gives us abundant supplies of purchasing power in foreign markets. Unlike Britain, we are under no pressure to restrict imports in order to bring our international accounts into balance. On the contrary, we cannot hope to balance them without expanding our purchases abroad. Yet, with all our riches, we have persisted in playing the miser, spending in normal years less than one per cent of our national income on consumers' goods of foreign manufacture. Instead of reaching out for the useful, appetizing and beautiful things which foreigners are so eager to supply, we put up tariff walls to protect ourselves against prosperity and abundance. If we will adopt a new attitude toward imports, if we will accept them and make the most of them, we shall increase national security, we shall provide the competitive stimulus necessary to maintain our free-enterprise system at a high pitch of efficiency, and we shall enable our people to attain the high cultural standards befitting a rich and powerful nation.

I do not think that policy sounds as if this Bretton Woods agreement was a sinister United States scheme to restrict imports. They are beginning to realize that they have to "import or die".

Let us now look at the peculiar position of Canada. Canada, as has been so frequently said, was during the war and is at the present time probably the greatest per capita producer of goods for export. I have not the statistics before me, and the minister will correct me if I am wrong; but in normal times, on a per capita basis, Canada was the greatest exporter in the world, with the possible exception of some smaller countries which had greater agricultural exports. I am referring to our exports among manufacturing countries. There were smaller countries that had greater agricultural exports.

Mr. ILSLEY: Such as New Zealand.

Mr. ADAMSON: Yes. But—and this is a very singular fact—Canada is also a great exporter of capital. Canadian enterprises supported by Canadian capital are world wide. I need mention only one or two. The International Petroleum company, while its capital is largely American, is nevertheless a Canadian company with a good deal of Canadian capital, and the Brazilian Traction company is another concern I might mention. It is probably the largest single unit among public utilities in the world. All through South America you will find Canadian capital. You will also find that not only does Canada export capital; she is an exporter of services. Take her transport services, for example. One might cite the Canadian Pacific Steamships on the Atlantic and the Pacific, and Canadian cargo vessels ply the waters of the Atlantic on a competitive basis. While they may be registered in London, nevertheless the bottoms are Canadian.

As a small country we have built up great services. Our Canadian banks, our international banking system, which astounds many of the Americans, has branches all over the world. The same is true of Canadian insurance. One of the amazing things about Canadian insurance companies is the amount of business they do in the orient. These are peculiar things about our Canadian economy, and in order to maintain this very high level of international trade, we need some kind of control of currency, or some kind of international stabilizing agreement; otherwise we shall suffer in Canada far more than any other nation in the world.

We have been singularly blessed in that we have given to our workers a great amount of power. The Canadian workman has at his hands many more horse-power than virtually the worker of any other country. Productivity per man is high, and we have been able to produce per man-hour a very large quantity of goods.

The great problem with us in Canada now, as it will be for some time, is how to balance our imports with our exports. By reason of our peculiar position we are far more of an exporting country than an importing. We export many times the quantity of goods that a country of slightly over twelve millions could ever expect, under present conditions, to consume at home. That is, of course, a problem of population.

I should now like briefly to mention one or two of the clauses in the Bretton Woods agreement. I am not on the banking and commerce committee, so that this will be my only chance to discuss this vital matter. In the preamble six basic purposes are set out. I will quote only the first sentence of each:

(i) To promote international monetary cooperation.

(ii) To facilitate the expansion and balanced growth of international trade.

(iii) To promote exchange stability and maintain orderly exchange arrangements.

(iv) To assist in the establishment of a multilateral system of payments in respect of current transactions between members and in the elimination of foreign exchange restrictions which hamper the growth of world trade.

(v) To give confidence to members by making the fund's resources available to them under adequate safeguards . . .

(vi) In accordance with the above, to shorten the duration and lessen the degree of disequilibrium in the international balances of payments of members.

Nothing could be more praiseworthy than these objects, and in the final clause of the agreements in annex C, under the heading, "the international monetary fund", it is stated:

Since foreign trade affects the standard of life of every people, all countries have a vital interest in the system of exchange of national currencies and the regulations and conditions which govern its working. Because these monetary transactions are international exchanges, the nations must agree on the basic rules which govern the exchanges if the system is to work smoothly. When they do not agree, and when single nations and small groups of nations attempt by special and different regulations of the foreign exchanges to gain trade advantages, the result is instability, a reduced volume of foreign trade, and damage to national economies. This course of action is likely to lead to economic warfare and to endanger the world's peace.

Those are the basic purposes of the agreement, and surely no one will quarrel with them.

Fault has been found with the method of establishing currencies on a gold basis or on a basis attached to gold. Well, what does the agreement say with regard to par values of currency? Article IV states:

The par value of the currency of each member shall be expressed in terms of gold as a common denominator or in terms of the United States dollar of the weight and fineness in effect on July 1, 1944.

That is merely another way of saying "gold". Then it says that all computations relating to currencies shall be on the basis of their par value. It states that foreign exchange dealings shall be based on parity—section 3—and that gold purchases shall be based on par value. Then section 4, article IV deals with obligations regarding exchange stability. Each member undertakes to collaborate with the fund to promote exchange stability. Each member undertakes, through appropriate measures consistent with the agreement, to promote within its territories exchange transactions between its currency and the currencies of other members. All these are basic fundamental rules of international trade.

There is, however, the method by which the parity of exchanges shall be fixed, and that appears in article 20, section 4. It merely states that each country shall settle its own parity of its own exchange. That is to me, Mr. Speaker, the crux of the whole question—the method of arriving at parity or of arriving at the currency exchange value in gold of the various members of the agreement. At the present time the huge majority of currencies have a fictitiously high value in terms of the United States dollar, in terms of gold and in terms of the Canadian dollar. I believe the franc is valued at two cents; but its actual purchasing power, according to the soldiers who have come back, is about one-eighth of a cent. The lira and all the other European currencies have been given, I think unwisely, a fictitiously high value.

Before we can arrive at some degree of currency stabilization, there must be a period during which the currencies will be allowed to find their own value in terms of gold. I do not believe this can be done quickly; in fact it is a comparatively long-term operation; but before the agreement can become operative that has to be done, and it will be an extremely difficult matter to arrive at. To me that is the great difficulty in the whole working out of the Bretton Woods agreement.

When the last workable gold parity was arrived at by the Herschell committee in the seventies of the last century there was a free gold market. That free gold market had been working for twenty or twenty-five years. They tied the pound and the dollar to gold at the then level of eighty-four shillings and sixpence, which had been the approximate mean value for some years past. That became known as the gold standard and brought tremendous prosperity to the countries which adopted the gold standard at that time. I think they were Great Britain, the United States, Germany and France. I do not know whether Italy came in or not; I think she did later, to a degree. But the gold countries virtually ruined or did not allow the great expansion they enjoyed because of their expanded international trade to the rest of the world which lived on the silver standard, namely, the continents of Asia, Africa, India and certain parts of South America. There was not the tremendous industrial expansion; there was not the great trade boom in the silver countries that there was in the gold countries. Silver was manipulated, changed in value, and many times there were great crises in China and in India because of the manipulation and variation in prices of silver as compared with gold.

I do not propose at this time to talk about bimetalism, but I wish to say this, that while the monetary conference at Bretton Woods put in one paragraph concerning bimetalism, serious consideration must be given to providing the rest of the world with stable currencies convertible into the hard currency which will eventually be arrived at under this agreement. It is going to take many years, but it must be considered on this North American continent, particularly by Canada, which is a large gold and silver producing country and also a country which trades to a large extent with the silver standard countries of the world, Asia and China.

We in Canada are dependent upon a stable exchange. Probably we are more dependent upon stable rates of exchange than any other country in the world at the present time. We are in the focal point, situated between the sterling bloc, the gold exchange currency of the United States, and, by geography at any rate, the closed economy of Russia. If we as a small country cannot come to some arrangement by which our currency and our trade is not at the behest of the great trading nations which can control managed currencies, and which, because of their great wealth, can jockey with international currencies to our disadvantage; if we as a long-term exporting country cannot be sure that we trade in a currency which is convertible, stable and exchangeable, our future is extremely dark. Therefore I say that the Bretton Woods conference and the working out of the Bretton Woods proposals probably mean more to us than to any other country in the world. If we cannot get stable exchange; if we cannot provide our industries and primary producers with a medium by which they can make long-term contracts, then we are going to live from hand to mouth, be at the beck and call of managed currencies, return to international banditry, and as a great producer of primary products and capital goods we shall suffer more than any other country I can think of.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, in the present debate on the Bretton Woods agreement I do not hope to be able to add a great deal more to the arguments which have been advanced by my colleagues, the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) and the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch). I regard their arguments as indisputable, and I believe that we have a right to expect, before this debate closes, that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) will attempt to answer the arguments of both these hon. members. If he does not then he is not doing justice to the people of this country.

Leading off in the debate the Minister of Finance gave an excellent speech. He certainly did impress the house with the immense importance of this Bretton Woods agreement. I can only state that if the Bretton Woods agreement is as important as he led us to believe it to be—and I am inclined to agree with him—then he owes it to the people of this country to permit this house to go to any length, leaving no stone unturned, in the most thorough investigation of everything involved in this agreement. I said the other day in another debate I was convinced that the present financial system, which is international and knows no boundaries, was on its last legs. There is no question but that prior to the war circumstances proved that the present international financial system was a failure in this modern age of scientific production. I have no doubt that as a result of the breakdown of this system the war was brought on. I am not satisfied that the root cause of war is simply a lust for power on the part of some individual, just arising at the moment. The reasons for war are deep-rooted. War has a background; there is a cause for it, and, as the hon. member for Lethbridge adequately expressed it this afternoon, the cause lies in the economic field.

In saying that the present financial system is on its last legs, that it has perhaps destroyed itself, I am reminded of a snake attempting to eat its own tail until it eats itself all away, if that could be possible. That is the way the present financial system seems to have worked. But those in charge of high finance say, "No; we must save this system. We must bring about something or other that will force it to work." I believe an attempt is being made throughout the world to force what I regard as an obsolete financial system to work. My logic, which I do not think is faulty, would lead me to believe that if we are to force the present financial system to work, then we must force people to obey its dictates; and as we do so, we take from the peoples of the world their right to freedom. There is no question about that. I am perfectly convinced that the various world moves that are being made, dovetailing as they seem to do into each other are an attempt to set up a dictatorship which will be nothing more or less than a glorified world state. Speaking from the economic viewpoint, I regard the Bretton Woods agreement as part of the machinery to bring into being that glorified world slave state.

May I now make another and slightly different observation. I have always regarded the British empire as a bulwark of Christian democracy. Some people ridicule that statement. I am not concerned about their ridicule; a conviction is a conviction. As one lives, as one thinks, as one reads and studies, one forms certain convictions. One conviction I have formed is that the British empire is a bulwark of Christian democracy, which means freedom of the people. There is no doubt in my mind that there are forces abroad in the world to-day—I do not know how one could personify them—which may be involved in systems or movements, things like this measure, which are brought into existence for the purpose of destroying the British empire; for as long as the British peoples stand for justice and freedom and the kind of Christian democracy I visualize, then there cannot be a world slave state.

At the present time I do not despair of the situation, but there is no doubt that Great Britain is in most terribly straitened circumstances. She had the fortitude to suffer and come through the war on top. She has been pounded almost to death. If the same thing had happened to some other nations I am sure they would have gone under long ago. The industries of Great Britain have been almost destroyed, and it will be a long time before they are rebuilt. Her production is low; the capital equipment of her factories has been largely destroyed. Although in the early days of the war she stood alone, she has emerged as one of the victorious nations. Yet to-day as far as Europe is concerned Great Britain is in danger of becoming a second, third or fourth-rate power. That is one danger. The other danger is that under such measures as we have before us to-night she may become a second, third or fourth-rate economic power in the world. If that be so, I ask: can the Canadian people, as part of that commonwealth of nations, think for one moment of aiding and abetting the destruction of that empire? I do not see how we can. I say to the minister that he should do everything in his power to give this agreement the closest scrutiny and to give this parliament an opportunity to investigate it thoroughly. After all, I think the experts are doing work upon it and have been for some time. Parliaments come and parliaments go, but the experts seem to remain forever. Finance ministers come and finance ministers go, but their deputies and their experts behind the scenes seem to remain forever.

It is all very well for the minister to place upon the doorstep of parliament at this late hour a measure such as this and say, "Well, the experts have gone through it, and my advisers have advised me that everything is all right." But, remember, it is parliament that has to act and to say whether or not Canada is to subscribe to the agreement. The experts are absolved from that responsibility. Since we are talking about experts and about responsible government, it surprises me that the present government is so anxious to do things on an international or a world scale, when I do not believe the minister can point to one thing the government has solved successfully on a national scale.

We did a magnificent job during the war; I know all about that. The minister is quite likely to say, "See what Canada did in the matter of finance during the war." Well, what happened was this: A war breaks out, and the green light is given to the financial institutions to expand their credit. And of course, when there is an expansion of credit through a process of debt, you can do almost anything.

It is true we have done a magnificent job and, we might say, in a way, a magnificent job financially. But our problem is not solved, because the minister has done that job by plunging the nation into irreparable debt. Personally I hold no hope whatsoever that the national debt of Canada will be ultimately paid. I do not wish to be misunderstood. I do not say that Canadians who hold war bonds will not be paid. Of course those bonds will be retired through some sort of process of refunding; eventually the banking institutions of this country will hold the debt, and the people of Canada will pay toll for the rest of Canada's existence. That is my personal opinion.

I say that I do not see one national problem in the financial field the government has ever solved. One hon. member whispers to me: Look at old age pensions. Well, that is a financial problem. Is it solved? One could go on and on naming them. Yet the government seems so anxious to launch out into some great international scheme, apparently supposing that by making the problem larger they can solve it more easily.

Well, one does not wipe out crime by joining together two penitentiaries. One must get at the root of the problem, and tackle it at home first. Make a success of it at home, and then the government will be able to say, "We are now qualified to tackle things on an international scale."

As I said a minute ago, I urged the minister to make way for the house to give every possible consideration to every possible detail of the measure. I am suggesting that he should send it to the banking and commerce committee. I do not know if that is his intention.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE: He said so earlier to-day.

Mr. HANSELL: I thought possibly the minister meant committee of the whole.

Mr. ILSLEY: No; the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. HANSELL: Very well. That satisfies me, and I can shorten my speech by another ten minutes. However, the hon. member for Acadia points out to me that the intricate problem with which we are faced is that we shall be asked to endorse the principle of the measure before it goes to the committee. We absolutely do not like the principle.

When at the last session of parliament we were discussing the San Francisco conference—not the charter—I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) a number of questions. While in the main those questions did refer to the proposals of the San Francisco conference, they were closely entwined with the Bretton Woods agreement. I should like at this time to quote from Hansard one or two of the questions I asked.

At page 309 of Hansard for March 28, 1945, the Prime Minister, answering certain questions I had asked him, said:

I think I have come to the end of what I have found it necessary to say this afternoon in answer to questions raised in this debate; but I recall that my hon. friends of the Social Credit group also directed a number of questions to me. Last evening the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) asked a number of questions and requested that I reply to them to-day.

Then the Prime Minister made certain answers, for which we thank him. Here are some of the questions and answers:

If the proposals are adopted, would the control of this nation's currency and credit remain within our own power? In other words, would we retain absolute control over our own currency and credit?

The Prime Minister answered as follows:

I might say that before my hon. friend asked that question, I had prepared an answer to give to his leader in relation to what he had had to say on the Bretton Woods proposals, and I will give this answer to both hon. members and to their party at this time.

A word as to the speeches made by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) and the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore). The contribution of these hon. members to the debate consisted very largely of an attack on the resolutions of the united nations monetary and financial conference, generally known as the Bretton Woods proposals. I confess that I am somewhat surprised to find the Social Credit party bringing aid and comfort to the more reactionary international bankers who have been the chief critics of the Bretton Woods proposals.

I might say that the hon. member for Lethbridge answered that later on. Then the Prime Minister continued:

The hon. member for Acadia asked: Does approval of section 3 of the resolution before the house imply an endorsement of the final act of the Bretton Woods agreement? The short answer to that question is, no—

Of course it refers to the San Francisco conference.

—the house is not in this resolution being asked to endorse the Bretton Woods proposals. At the same time, I am convinced that collaboration among nations in the economic and financial field is a vital part of any effective system of international security.

He does not say that we are being asked to endorse Bretton Woods; but he certainly says, by inference at least, that he is in favour of the proposals. I shall not take the time to read the whole column, but later on—I am not taking it out of its text—he goes on to say:

We should be making a very poor approach indeed to the great problems to be dealt with at San Francisco, if we failed to take a constructive attitude toward the proposals which the delegates of forty-four united nations assembled at Bretton Woods have, after long study and deliberation, put forward for the consideration of governments.

The next question is:

Do any of the proposals and principles involve the return to the gold standard?

I know that technically the Prime Minister is talking about San Francisco, but the two have become so linked together that I do not see how you can separate the one from the other. At least this is what the Prime Minister said:

The answer to that question is, no.

Then a little later on in the same page:

Mr. Mackenzie King: The next question is:

If so, will the government, as far as it is concerned, oppose such a step?

What did the Prime Minister say? Here are his words:

So far as I am concerned that is answered by the previous reply.

So that he was going to oppose any step if it meant a return to the gold standard. I think the hon. member for Lethbridge and the hon. member for Acadia have to my satisfaction, and I think to the satisfaction of anyone who will look into their arguments, made out a case for these agreements meaning an absolute return to the gold standard.

Mr. ILSLEY: What does my hon. friend mean by the gold standard?

Mr. HANSELL: I know the minister will try to get me on some technical point.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We will say, whatever it means.

Mr. HANSELL: Whatever it means, I do not care.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We do not want gold at all.

Mr. HANSELL: It is in the agreement, as was noted by the hon. member for Acadia. I think it will stand repeating. Article IV on page 20 which is headed "Par values of currencies", reads:

Section 1. Expression of par values.

(a) The par value of the currency of each member shall be expressed in terms of gold as a common denominator or in terms of the United States dollar of the weight and fineness in effect on July 1, 1944.

If it is not a return to the gold standard, why is that clause in there? The minister may ask me a technical question, but let him answer that question when we are in committee.

Mr. ILSLEY: I certainly will.

Mr. HANSELL: I should like to quote now from a man who should know. The minister questioned one authority who was quoted to-night, but I should like to quote Paul Einzig. I think he is well known as one of the experts, and in an article which appeared in the Daily Express of August 10, 1944, entitled, "A plain man's guide to the menace of Bretton Woods"—evidently he regarded Bretton Woods as a menace—he made this statement:

> It must be clear to those who understand the meaning of the report of the Bretton Woods international monetary conference, published in a white paper before the bank holiday, that the experts of forty-four nations have agreed on a return to the gold standard after the war.

The minister had better ask Professor Einzig what he means by the gold standard. He goes on to say:

> Unfortunately, very few laymen can possibly understand the report. If the public were to realize what it is being led into it would raise its voice in a powerful protest, instead of allowing the experts a free hand to do their worst, as they did in 1925.

Perhaps I had better say who Paul Einzig is. He is a doctor of science in political economy. He was educated at Brasov, the oriental academy of Budapest and the university of Paris. He was Paris correspondent of the Financial News in 1921; foreign editor in 1923; political correspondent in 1939. He became a British subject by naturalization in 1929. His publications are: "Le Mouvement des Prix," 1923; "International Gold Movement," 1929; "The Bank for International Settlements," 1930; "The Fight for Financial Supremacy," 1931. I will not read all the dates. He wrote the "World Economic Crisis", "Behind the Scenes of International Finance," "The Tragedy of the Pound", "Finance and Politics", "Finance and Politics a year later", "Montagu Norman", "The Comedy of the Pound," "The Economic Foundations of Fascism," "The Sterling-Dollar-Franc Tangle", "Germany's Default", "France's Crisis," "The Future of Gold," "World Finance since 1941", "Bankers, Statesmen and Economists", "Exchange Clearing", "Monetary Reform in Theory and Practice," "The Theory of Forward Exchange". I am just half through. Is the minister satisfied?

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not think my hon. friend liked experts.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It takes an expert to catch an expert.

Mr. HANSELL: We have to pit one expert against another. His recreations are given, but I do not think we need go into that. It is stated that this gentleman likes music, reading and walking. He certainly has gone places anyway. In the same article he makes this strong statement:

> In 1925 the gold standard was, at any rate, restored in the full light of publicity. The public knew what was happening. It had only itself to blame for having failed to heed the advice of the lone voice crying in the wilderness—that of the Daily Express prominently among them—warning the country against the consequences of the proposed step.
> In 1944, on the other hand, the public is only too well aware that a return to the gold standard would be unmitigated evil, spelling ruin and misery. It would now be politically impossible to reintroduce the gold standard openly.
> But it is being introduced just the same, this time in disguise, under another name.
> The public is lulled into a false feeling of security by being told again and again that the new system is not the gold standard.

And again:

> Yet once the plan is translated into intelligible English and is denuded of all camouflage, every layman of normal intelligence is bound to realize that it is the gold standard, the full gold standard, and nothing but the gold standard.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Explain that away, now.

Mr. HANSELL: Now, Mr. Speaker, it is nearly eleven o'clock, and the next part of what I had to say would lose its continuity, if I stopped at that hour, but I once again urge the minister to help us. We are not here merely to put over some particular theory; all of us, I am sure, are interested in the preservation of our people and in the maintenance of real democracy in the world; and if it is probable, as Paul Einzig and others say it is, that this document is dangerous, let the minister not be a victim any more than the rest of us; let us in the banking and commerce committee give the act the full light of day. I would ask him to consent to call the greatest experts. Let us call, if need be, Mr. Morgenthau, who was one of the United States representatives. I refer to him because he is near at hand; I do not expect they are going to send to Norway, or the Netherlands, or some other remote place. But let them call Lord Keynes.

One other thing I wish to say in the minute or two I have left. Is it not surprising, since the minister has told us of the tremendous importance of this document, that he has left it until now, December 6, to bring it before parliament, when it should be signed before the end of the year, and the deadline for the closing of parliament is supposed to be December 15. I do not want to impute motives, but does it not seem strange that this act was printed by the Printer to the King's Most Excellent Majesty in 1944; yet the matter has not been open for discussion; it was not sent to the banking and commerce committee, which in the spring of this year did not have anything to do, and now, at this late hour, such an important document as the minister himself claims it to be is left on our doorstep. That proceeding should be resented by every member of this house, and the committee should call the greatest experts, no matter where they have to be brought from.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Experts on both sides, too.

Mr. HANSELL: Yes, let us have the facts and nothing but the facts. I urge the minister so to do.

On motion of Mr. Case the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie the house adjourned at 10.56 p.m.

Friday, December 7, 1945.

The house met at eleven o'clock.

NATIONAL WAR FINANCE COMMITTEE

TERMINATION OF ACTIVITIES IN OBTAINING FUNDS FOR PROSECUTION OF THE WAR

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I wish to announce to the house that the national war finance committee has recommended the termination of its active life. I have accepted this recommendation. It is not possible at this time to decide the nature of further campaigns for the sale of government securities which may be required in the future. It is therefore appropriate that the great organization set up to obtain funds for the successful prosecution of the war should end its career on the conclusion of its greatest achievement, the ninth victory loan. The final figures for this loan will be in excess of two billion dollars, of which amount approximately $1,200 million represents investments by individuals.

It is not my intention to outline the accomplishments of the national war finance committee in detail, but I think it is fitting that the house should take note of the end of this organization and that the record should show the names of the major organizations which contributed to its work.

As members are doubtless aware, much of the executive personnel of the national war finance committee was drawn from the ranks of the investment dealers of Canada. They have supplied in large measure the working machinery for the operation. Other groups in the Canadian financial world have made substantial contributions. Among them, the chartered banks of Canada assumed a large burden in connection with the sale and delivery of bonds. The Life Officers Association and the Life Underwriters of Canada have also facilitated the building of a sales organization. Leaders in agricultural and labour organizations have provided advice and assistance. Among these groups appear the names of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, Canadian Congress of Labour, Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, the Canadian and Catholic Federation of Labour and the General Conference Committee of the Standard Railway Labour Organizations.

In the sales structure evolved by the national war finance committee certain special war organizations were required to meet special circumstances. The victory loan committees of the armed forces are a case in point. The results achieved by this group were a substantial element of the total sales reported from individuals. Further, the armed forces provided important aid to public events to stimulate general public interest. Mention should also be made of the accomplishments of the civil service in organizing and promoting their internal canvasses.

Finally, the sales organization of the national war finance committee was greatly benefited by the leadership of business executives in facilitating the canvass of their employees, and in stimulating public response. The executive personnel of the Canadian Pacific Railways and the Canadian National Railways provide examples of this type of leadership, which was repeated thousands of times across the country.

Although I have mentioned some of the organizations assisting in the sales operations, the accomplishments of the national war finance committee would not have been possible without the help of the Canadian publishers war finance publicity committee, a joint organization representing all publishers of Canada which has given invaluable advice and recommendations with reference to publicity. Associated with this committee, the advertising agencies of Canada have rendered expert service. The national radio committee, representing the Canadian Association of Broadcasters, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the advertising agencies of Canada, has performed a similar function in the field of broadcasting. The war services committee of the Canadian motion picture industry and its affiliated organizations in the United States provided essential assistance in their field, both in the production and distribution of special films, and in the placing of their establishments at the disposal of the national war finance committee for public gatherings. The national film board was of major assistance in the production of special films and in respect to distribution of films, particularly in the 16-millimetre circuits. We are also indebted to the Outdoor Advertising Association and to the Canadian Street-car Advertising Company which gave their support in generous measure.

These and many other institutions and individuals gave powerful impetus to the work of the national war finance committee. I shall not attempt to name them all at this time because of the urgent affairs which claim the attention of the house. I believe, however, that the members will agree that the main credit for its success should go to the thousands of loyal workers throughout the country who have constituted plant victory loan committees or who served as chairmen of units and subunits, and in countless other assignments necessary to the success of our war financing programme. They have rendered a great service to their country. And finally I should say that the work of all these people would have been of little avail if the Canadian public had not been willing and anxious to assume their full financial responsibility for the winning of the war.

Suggestions have come to me from many quarters that suitable facilities be provided by the government for a continuing savings programme to commence next autumn when final instalments in the ninth victory loan have been paid. I should like to advise the house that this matter is being given careful study. In the meantime, war savings stamps and war savings certificates will continue to be available through normal channels, probably until the fall of 1946.

I do not wish to conclude without reference to the effective efforts of hundreds of voluntary workers, many of them women, on behalf of the sale of war savings stamps and certificates. The gross sales of war savings certificates before redemption since May 1940, and the unredeemed stamps still in the hands of the public, amount to the combined total of approximately $365,000,000, a substantial sum indeed to obtain from small savings over this period. School teachers have inspired thousands of school children to invest savings which are included in this total. War savings stamps are still being purchased steadily through the operation of the current school savings plan. It is my intention to ask each province for their views on a continuance of this plan as a means of teaching regular savings habits to students. If they so desire, it will be continued in a form suited to the new circumstances.

But my main purpose to-day is served by announcing the cessation of the national war finance committee. I know all members of this house will join me in expressing deep appreciation of its work. It has been an important factor in the winning of the war and in anchoring the economy against the shock of war. The results may well be an even more important influence for the future well-being of the Canadian people.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to add my word of commendation to that already extended by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) to the national war finance committee which the minister has announced is being discontinued. I am sure we all feel that that organization has performed an outstanding service to Canada during the last half dozen years. We are all agreed that all those associated with it, from the Minister of Finance and the chairman of the committee down, including the officials and the workers in whatever capacity, deserve the unstinted praise and thanks of this house and of the Canadian people.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I think we can all agree with what the leader of the opposition has said. Our thanks go out not only to those who organized the campaign, but also to the hundreds and thousands, yes, millions of Canadians who supported the campaign so overwhelmingly. I am particularly glad to note that the minister referred to the teachers in the schools. He suggests that inquiry is to be made of the departments of education with regard to the continuation of something of this kind. While the teachers willingly gave support to the war-time loans, I doubt whether it is proper and fair to ask them to continue this activity into the peace years, having regard to the burdens that they are carrying in the schools at the present time.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in the statement which the Minister of Finance has just made to the house he was too modest to say anything about himself. I am sure that members of the house, irrespective of party, would wish to have him know how deeply we all appreciate the services which he has rendered to the country in the whole-hearted manner in which he has assumed responsibility for the conduct of the work of the war finance committee, and the supervision he has given its efforts. I of course agree with all that the Minister of Finance has said with regard to the work of the war finance committee. I have already expressed in writing to the committee the government's appreciation. It is a pleasure indeed to realize that all members of the House of Commons are only too ready and happy to acknowledge the great services that all connected with that body have rendered.

TRADE AND FINANCE

UNITED STATES-UNITED KINGDOM LOANS AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance arising out of a statement he made when the house rose at six o'clock last night in connection with the loan agreement between the United States and the United Kingdom announced yesterday. Will the minister lay on the table as soon as possible—he may or may not have it now—a copy of the official statement issued by the officials of the two governments?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will lay it on the table at the first opportunity.

Mr. BRACKEN: I have one other related question. It was reported this morning that a white paper has been issued by the United States and sent to all governments with the exception of Argentina and Spain. It has to do with proposals relating to reductions of trade barriers, building up of trade and employment, an international trade conference next year, and the establishment of an international trade organization. Will the minister lay a copy of that document on the table at the earliest opportunity?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think we have the white paper; we have long teletype messages which I undertook last night to lay on the table just as soon as I could get them copied. I said early next week, and perhaps sooner; but I shall certainly give that to the house as well as the white paper just as soon as it comes into our possession.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Production Service:

15. Production service administration, $35,445.

Mr. WRIGHT: These estimates were last before the committee prior to the conference held in Ottawa with regard to agricultural production for the coming year. That conference is over now and I believe certain decisions were reached with respect to production. Can the minister tell us what those decisions were? I should like particularly to have something said in regard to the production of wheat, as to whether under present world conditions we are to continue our production at the same rate or whether that production is to be increased. It was reported also to have been suggested to the various organizations represented at that conference that we should have an increase in the production of pork during the coming year, and I should like to ask the minister what steps the department is taking to bring about that increased production. It does not seem to me they are likely to get it unless some definite steps are taken toward that end. During the war years we demonstrated just what could be done with respect to increasing agricultural production in any particular branch if the government were prepared to make price concessions, and I have doubt whether we shall get any increase in the production of pork unless some change is made in government policy. I think the minister should give us a statement as to the conclusions reached at this conference.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Last evening the hon. member for Haldimand asked if I could have a statement prepared with regard to the findings of that conference. I have three copies of that statement, and will send one to the hon. member for Haldimand and the other to the hon. memebr for Melfort; and if I have the consent of the committee this statement might be placed upon Hansard so that every hon. member may be able to see it; it covers about two pages of foolscap.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

As hon. members will see, there is very little change in what is being asked for this year as compared with last year. With respect to wheat, we are asking for exactly the same acreage in 1946 as in 1945. We are asking for a slightly decreased acreage in oats, 99 per cent of last year's acreage. On barley we are asking for 109 per cent as compared with last year. In mixed grains we are asking for the same thing. In husking corn we are asking 148 per cent, but in the total amount of feed that does not mean very much; it is the difference between 237,000 acres and 350,000 acres. Rye is the same; summer-fallow is the same; hay and clover are the same; alfalfa hay is the same.

This means that we are asking for the same acreage of practically all crops, particularly the important crops as related to live-stock production, and of course it also means that we would not be justified in asking for any great increase in the production of live stock. I do not know that it is correct to say that in connection with any of these estimates we are requesting the farmers to do a certain thing. They are an indication of what we hope and expect the farmers will do. You will note that in connection with hogs, cattle, calves and sheep the figures are for marketings, not production; and we estimate that the marketings of calves will be 112 per cent of the marketings this year. All that means is that farmers are getting down in their cattle holdings, that they will be marketing more calves in 1946 than in 1945, which means they are not going to finish as many cattle in future as they finished this year and probably last year. We are estimating the cattle at about the same, 100 per cent of this year, and the hogs at 104 per cent. That is an indication that farmers have perhaps reached the bottom in their intention to reduce hog marketings or hog production; or on the other hand it may mean that they are still marketing some of their sows and getting down even lower in their holdings of hogs.

As I said earlier in the session, all that is related to the amount of grain we have in Canada. It would be useless for this government to establish a policy for the purpose of increasing hog production before the grain is harvested in 1946, which does not occur until two-thirds of the year have gone. There is no possibility of increasing live-stock production in Canada at the present time because we have an embargo on the American boundary line, from one end to the other, to keep grain in Canada to feed the live stock we already have. The only alternative would be to do what it has been suggested should not be done, that is, still further reduce the amount of wheat available for human consumption. Just before the war we were using about 40,000,000 bushels of wheat for feeding purposes. Last year we used about 130,000,000 bushels for feeding purposes.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

In other words we are feeding 90 million bushels more wheat than formerly. That being so, appeals have been made to us on this continent to feed less wheat and send some of that wheat overseas for immediate consumption. Of course that is possible because it is the quickest way to get it. But at the same time an appeal is made to us to relieve Britain of the monotonous ration which she has had during wartime. Now that monotonous ration has had nothing to do with a shortage of wheat or a shortage of flour. About the only food which Britain has never had to ration is bread; they have had all the bread they wanted to eat during the war. On the day we met in conference we had a cabled message from Sir Ben Smith, the Minister of Food, thanking Canada for what we had done and asking us to continue in this year to assist in making it possible for them to be relieved of the monotonous ration which they had had during the war. That can mean only one thing. It means that they are hopeful that we will send them increased supplies, or at least maintain our present supplies, of dairy products and of meat products. So we are suggesting that farmers should go on producing this year as they did last year; and we are saying that these amounts which are stated here, these marketings, will make it possible for us to maintain the present exports to Britain only if we keep on our present restrictions on consumption in Canada. If we do not produce—and I suggest that it is impossible for us to do so—any more beef and pork in 1946 than we produced in 1945, with the grain supplies we have, the only way we can meet the suggestion which is made from Britain is to continue to restrict the consumption of meat in Canada. So the meeting of their suggestion would be subject to that kind of restriction.

Coming to dairy products, we are suggesting that the marketings of milk will be about 102 per cent of what they were in 1945. That is an increase from 17,600 million pounds to 17,900 million pounds. In creamery butter, we are suggesting that we might be up five per cent. The production of cheddar cheese, we expect, may go down two per cent. Evaporated whole milk will be the same as this year; condensed milk, the same; whole milk powder, the same; skim milk powder, the same. Eggs we are estimating will go down a little to 96 per cent of what they were last year. Speaking from memory, our exports of eggs, powdered and shelled, last year were 85 times as great as they were in the last year before the war; in other words we increased from one million to 85 million dozen.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What percentage of that would go in powdered form?

Mr. GARDINER: Probably I should put this whole statement on the record. It is a statement which was put before the conference the other day.

Egg production in Canada for 1945 is now estimated at 395 million dozen, the highest figure in the country's history, and exceeding the previous year by 34 million dozen. Quantities purchased by the special products board in fulfilment of the British contract totalled 90 million dozen, exceeding 1944 by 10 million dozen. Domestic use, estimated at 291 million dozen, was heavier than the 1940-44 average by 37 million dozen.

Production estimates for 1946 are based on chick hatches and sales in the 1945 season. There is now a carry-over of matured stock and anticipated early hatchings in 1946 from which fall eggs in 1946 will be produced. It is estimated that 1946 production will be 17 million dozen less than in 1945 and 18 million dozen more than in 1944. Hatches in 1945 based on approved hatchery figures were fourteen per cent under 1944. All provinces showed a decrease with the exception of Prince Edward Island, which recorded an eight per cent increase. An increase is anticipated for 1946, particularly in early hatches.

Eggs available for export in 1946, after allowing for a continued heavy domestic use, due to meat rationing, are estimated at 88 million dozen. The quantity will be approximately sufficient to fill the 1946 contract with the British ministry of food. Under this contract it is provided that the special products board will use its endeavours to provide up to 1,750,000 cases, that is 52,500,000 dozen shelled eggs, and 5,000 long tons, that is 11,200,000 pounds of dried eggs. Reduced to terms of shelled eggs the latter figure is equivalent to 1,087,000 cases; that is 1,087,000 cases of dried eggs as against 1,750,000 cases of shelled eggs, a difference of about 40 per cent. The total contract, therefore, requires 2,837,000 cases—85,110,000 dozen—shell eggs.

Shipments of shell eggs are to be made as closely as possible in accordance with the following schedule: Fresh eggs, winter and spring 900,000 cases; fresh eggs, autumn shipment 250,000 cases; storage eggs, autumn shipment 600,000 cases.

In operations under the British contract grades A large and medium offered to the special products board from September 15 to May 30 are shipped fresh in the shell or stored for autumn shipment. Other grades throughout the entire year, and all eggs during the summer months are used for drying.

Since the inception of the British ministry contracts in 1940, up to and including 1945, a total of 267 million dozen Canadian eggs have been shipped to Britain in shell or in dried form. That is the information with regard to eggs.

To give the figure for the past year, the year we are just in, the offerings of eggs in car lots, special products board, from November 24 to October 31, almost a complete year, for the 1945 season, for exports to Britain in shell, 1,431 car lots; for conversion to powder, 2,507 car lots; for fall storage, 948 car lots; for the same date in 1944 for conversion to powder, 4,259 car lots.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Is there any floor under egg prices?

Mr. GARDINER: This agreement which we have with Britain does set a floor.

Mr. FAIR: I am glad that the minister is getting closer and closer to those of us who sit in this corner, and I hope he continues this policy. The dominion and provincial governments are to be commended for the discussions which have been carried on recently. I hope they will realize their ambition, but mother nature may have something to say about all their plans. It does not make any difference how ambitious your plans are on paper, one night of frost or fifteen minutes of hail will destroy all your good intentions.

In order to aid nature in carrying out this programme something should be done in the way of increasing prices of the different farm commodities. The minister has told us on many occasions that at the present time we are receiving above parity prices for many of our farm products, but I should like to remind him that the period taken as a base for parity is 1926-29 when the farmers were receiving only 16·6 per cent of the national income. That is not a good enough percentage of the national income upon which to figure parity prices. If we took the prices that existed in 1915-19 as a parity base the farmers of Canada would get to work and do something worthwhile in the production of live stock, grain and other farm products. Until that is done I do not think the government can expect the farmers to get right down to business and produce as they should produce during the coming year.

Take wheat for example. When the export price reached $1.55 a bushel, a ceiling was placed on the price, temporarily at least. By that method the farmers were expected to make enormous gifts to other countries which are using our wheat. Those gifts should be made by the people of Canada as a whole. The farmers of Canada should be paid the full present price. I realize that we have a floor under the price which will prevent it from dropping below $1 per bushel basis Fort William until after the end of August, 1950. But that is not good enough, because deliveries will be restricted and many of us will not be able to take advantage of the $1 per bushel basis Fort William. The government will have to revise radically its programme and do something to put the price up to where it properly belongs. We have been fooled in the past, at least some of us have, by being told that we were getting parity prices or above parity prices; I do not think that policy is going to carry out any longer. The production records show that the farmers are not doing their utmost and will not do their utmost until prices are radically raised.

Mr. HERRIDGE: To the best of my knowledge, the Minister of Agriculture has never made an official visit to my constituency of Kootenay West, and on behalf of the agricultural organizations of that riding I want to extend a hearty invitation to the minister to visit us. In the interior of British Columbia there has been in recent years a great expansion of poultry production and in the organization of poultry producers. Throughout the war there developed an unsatisfactory situation with regard to the egg inspection service. Far too many ungraded eggs are being sold in the interior of British Columbia, and the organized poultry producers consider this to be a most unfair situation. They have not pressed the matter previously because they realized there was a shortage of staff due to the war, but I should like to ask the minister what he intends to do to correct this situation.

Mr. GARDINER: May I suggest to the hon. member that he leave this until we reach the item having to do with marketing. All the inspection services having to do with quality come under marketing.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: In recent years the Department of Agriculture have subsidized the shipment of coarse grains and other grains to eastern Canada. This has been continued to the extent that it is no longer profitable for farmers in the west to raise hogs, and production has gone down at a terrific rate. What does it cost the Canadian government to ship this feed eastward? Does the Canadian government intend to continue the policy of having the Canadian taxpayer pay the cost of shipping this feed to eastern farmers when there are many farmers in the west who would like to use their feed in the raising of hogs?

Mr. GARDINER: There are one or two things I should like to correct in the statements that have just been made by the hon. members for Yorkton and Battle River. However, before I do so I should like to carry out a promise which I made the last time my estimates were before the committee. I promised the leader of the opposition that I would place on Hansard details of the subsidies that have been paid, and they would include the feed freight assistance subsidies just spoken of. The statement is as follows:

Mr. BRACKEN: Has the minister extra copies of that?

Mr. GARDINER: I have just the one now, but there may be more available later. The total amount paid for feed grain assistance from January 1 to December 31, 1944, the last complete year, was $14,565,607. The total amount paid in the first six months of this year, from January 1 to June 30, was $7,376,324. It is approximately $14,500,000 per year.

Mr. WRIGHT: Does that include the ten and fifteen cents rebate?

Mr. GARDINER: No, that is just the freight. It is not a ten and fifteen cents rebate, although that is stated over and over again; it is a ten and fifteen cents subsidy on grain to the producer on oats and barley.

It is not a rebate to anybody. It is ten and fifteen cents paid to the grain producer on oats and barley.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Does that include the amount paid to eastern Canada millers?

Mr. GARDINER: That amount is purely freight, but it includes freight on bran, of course, and on mill feeds.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: If the miller has brought wheat eastward and ground it into feed, he is allowed the freight on the amount of bran he sells?

Mr. GARDINER: It includes all the freight that is allowed on feed coming east.

The correction I want to make is this. There is no authority anywhere, east or west, who would say that it does not pay the farmer who produces the grain in western Canada to feed grain to hogs. Anybody feeding grain to hogs can make more money that way, and some claim to be able to make fifty per cent more, depending on the kind of hogs they have and on their facilities for feeding them. Most hog producers say that they can feed at a considerable profit. There is no authority anywhere, so far as departmental officials are concerned, and they are the real authorities, who would say that it does not pay to feed grain to hogs. We are feeding hogs at our experimental farms under test. The one place where we are feeding them consistently is on the farm in Alberta, and all the reports from there indicate that hogs can be produced to advantage even at the present prices of grain. I feed hogs myself; I would not do so if I did not think I could make more money feeding hogs than by selling the grain.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: There is a fifty per cent reduction.

Mr. GARDINER: Because there is a fifty per cent reduction in feed grain. I cannot understand why those who discuss this question will not get down to the practical side.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Are you not shipping grain eastward?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, and hogs are being fed in the east to as great an extent as in the years before the war.

Mr. WRIGHT: In the section of the country in which I live there has been no shortage of feed grain in the last four years; our production of grain has been just about the same. Nevertheless the farmers have reduced their hog production by thirty-five per cent. That is the real test, whether the farmer considers the price advantageous. If he does, he will continue to produce, but hog production has dropped in the area I represent. It is not a shortage of grain which has stopped hog production, because the grain is there to feed. The reason is that the farmers do not consider that there is a reasonable margin.

Mr. GARDINER: If my hon. friend and I at our age were asked to feed hogs we probably would not think solely of the profit we were going to make out of it, particularly if we had been making a little profit in the last five or six years and had got ourselves into fairly good circumstances as compared with other times. We would probably say: We are not going to feed hogs this winter but will take a little rest. A lot of farmers are saying that. It is not because they cannot get more for their hogs; they know they can. My hon. friend knows he can get more for the grain fed to hogs, if he feeds them properly, than he can get by selling the grain. Every practical farmer knows that. But many farmers are getting older and they feel they do not want to feed hogs. There are also those who are coming back to farming who were accustomed to producing grain before the war, and they want to continue to produce grain rather than feed live stock. Some of those are not going into the feeding of live stock.

We rather feel this way about it, that we can produce in this country only the number of hogs and cattle that we can feed with our own grain. Some countries import grain and feed live stock on imported grain, but our markets are too far away for that. We do not import grain for the purpose of feeding live stock. We know that we cannot feed the live stock that we have on our farms at the present time on the average production of grain; everyone knows that, and you have to consider that, when you are considering the amount of live stock you are going to feed in Canada. We feel that in the years ahead of us we are not going to market outside of Canada more hogs than we are marketing outside Canada now. We probably could for another year, maybe two years, market more outside Canada, but we certainly are not figuring that we shall be able to market more hogs outside Canada in the future than we are marketing now. In addition, we do feel that we shall market many more hogs in Canada than we are marketing at present, because we have been restricting the marketing of hogs in Canada all though the war in order to send the hogs to Britain to help them, and we have cut down the consumption of hogs in our own country. So it probably would not be right to say that we cannot market more hogs than we are producing at the present time. When you take the two markets together, the home and the foreign market, we may be able to market more hogs than we are now producing.

We feel that there are many farmers in Canada who want to produce hogs. There are many others who do not want to produce hogs. There is a greater percentage in eastern Canada than in western Canada of farmers who either want to produce hogs or feel that they must produce hogs if they are to exist on their farms. There are in western Canada areas like the Melfort district, of which the hon. member spoke, of which that is not true, but the Melfort district is the best hog-producing area in Saskatchewan, and one of the best in western Canada. So we are hopeful, and I think we have reason for expecting our hopes to be fulfilled, that the farmers in that area will still continue to produce hogs. When we come to the drought area, where the drough is extreme, we can expect many of those who have been producing hogs under pressure in war time not to continue to produce hogs to as great an extent in the future.

So, as we go across Canada, we feel that we shall have to encourage some people to produce grain which they themselves are not going to feed, and to ship it to some other part of Canada where farmers either want to feed hogs or feel they must feed hogs because it pays them better. It is only by a proper distribution of the grain that we can produce the type of hog we want. We do not say to every farmer: We want you to feed all your grain. We say that on the whole we want a production of grain that will make possible the peak of hog production, and we want the grain distributed in such a way as to keep the man producing hogs who feels that he can produce at a profit and is producing the type of hog we want for the markets we have to supply, more particularly the British market, where we are in competition with Danish producers.

The other statement I wanted to correct was the one made a few moments ago with regard to wheat.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Just before the minister leaves the question of hog production may I ask a question? Have not the income tax exemptions been one reason for the decreased hog production on the prairies? The Minister of Agriculture may not want to answer that question directly, but he knows that under the income tax law, married couples where the wife is working in a factory are allowed an exemption of $1,800. It is admitted that this is wrong in principle, but it was simply to increase war production. The people on the farms have been allowed only $1,200. I repeat what I said the other day, that the income tax collectors have done a real job of collecting in my province of Manitoba in the last three years. They have gone to the municipal offices and I have been there when farmers were there and I have heard farmers say, "When I go home I am not going to raise any hogs." Farmer after farmer has taken that attitude. Owing to the fact that he can make a fair living in the production of grain, he and his family are not likely to work long hours before daylight and hours after dark in an effort to produce hogs when they are exempt on $1,200, while their city friends have been exempted to the extent of $1,800. That has had more to do with the decline in hog production on the prairies than anything else, and I am sure the minister will agree with me in that regard.

Mr. GARDINER: That, I believe, is really part of the answer to the question raised by the member for Melfort. He asked me why it was that men in that district were going down in hog production, notwithstanding that they had grain with which to feed hogs in that area. I am not going to presume to suggest what the farmer's reason is. I can only give the reason which he gives me and which no doubt he has given the member for Souris. I believe I have more letters in which it is contended that the income tax is responsible than I have letters assigning the cause to any other factor. I think that is part and parcel of the situation. Anyone who has made out an income tax return knows that all the profit is not taken away from him. When a man says it is because he has to pay income tax on the hogs produced or on the butter he produces, that is not quite correct. You cannot say that you will put it all on wheat, because it is easier to produce wheat than the other commodities. After all, when you make up your income tax, you take your wheat, butter and everything else, put them in together and get the total income, so that only part of the profit and not all is taken.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I did not say it was all taken.

Mr. GARDINER: I am not saying that the hon. gentleman did. I am answering the suggestion made that the reason is the income tax. It is income tax to this extent. A man says to himself: I have been working hard at this and I have done fairly well. At the beginning of the war I was not in the income tax brackets at all and now I am and I have to pay income tax. There is no doubt that he gets probably only sixty per cent of the profit he would otherwise get, and that has something to do with his quitting the production of hogs. But the real reason is that he feels he is getting along fairly well without producing hogs; that much greater labour is involved in hog production than in producing grain; that he is now in the income tax brackets paying income tax; that he is living better than he did at one time; and in short that it is not worth the labour at his age to go in for hog production. In most cases that is why he says: "I am not going to work just to pay income tax." He puts it that way, but we all realize that the income tax does not take all his profits from him, because he still makes a profit on top of what he would otherwise make if he did not feed hogs.

I wish to call the attention of those who are speaking about reductions and increases in different places to the figures, which they will find at page 32 of the annual marketing review for 1944. That was the year of top production, so that it gives the widest margins. Take Ontario. In 1940—I will give round figures so that there will not be too much confusion—the inspected slaughterings of hogs, the numbers coming to market to inspection plants, was 1,800,000. The highest figure was in 1941, 1,900,000, and the lowest was in 1942, when it was 1,700,000. In 1944 it was 1,800,000, just where it was in 1940.

Mr. BENTLEY: According to the figures I have from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, as at June 1, 1945, there was a peak of 1,970,000 odd.

Mr. GARDINER: These are marketings at inspection plants, and that does not necessarily mean that these hogs were produced in the provinces. Ontario produced in 1940, 2,191,000, or approximately 2,200,000, and the figure for 1944 was 2,100,000, so that it is about the same proportionately as the other figure. As regards hogs marketed at inspected plants in Quebec and the maritimes, the figure in 1940 was 953,000, and that went down to 689,000 in 1942 and went up to 1,222,000 in 1944.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Have you the figures for this year?

Mr. GARDINER: No, I have not that figure. This is the annual report. As regards Manitoba, it will be admitted that many hogs are marketed in that province out of Saskatchewan, but there would be just as large a proportion in 1940 as in 1944. In 1940 the number was 992,000, in 1942 it was 1,200,000, and in the year 1944, 1,900,000. In other words, they are double. In Ontario they are approximately the same. The maritimes and Quebec are up about fifty per cent. In Saskatchewan the figure in 1940 was 344,000 and in 1944 it was 1,181,000. They are about three times as high in Saskatchewan. In Alberta the figures are respectively 1,200,000 and 2,300,000. In British Columbia the figures are 128,000 and 211,000. Taking Canada as a whole the figures in 1940 were 5,400,000 and in 1944, 8,766,000. They are up by about sixty per cent in the whole of Canada.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I agree with a number of things the minister has said in regard to hog production, but I think he has overlooked one fact, and that is that in some of the northern areas of Saskatchewan and Alberta quite a large number of farmers decided that they wanted to go into hog production and they built what you might call brooder houses, going to a bit of expense to produce hogs. I am questioning whether the production of hogs next year will not drop below the figure that we shall need. We shall need a good many hogs next year and, in my opinion, some of the things the government has done have discouraged hog production to a considerable extent in some of those areas. Most of the men who went to the expense of putting up those buildings have their own grain. If they feed their own grain they lose the bonus. They feel that they are discriminated against in that respect; they believe that they are discriminated against so far as marketing is concerned. They think that the packing houses have too much control. The packing houses practically control what is to be paid for those hogs.

Around the middle of October I received a number of complaints. I hold in my hand a telegram which I received from a municipality —not a farmer. When a municipality goes to the trouble to send a resolution to their member of parliament they must feel that something is wrong. This telegram reads as follows:

> The council of this municipality wishes to register its protest against the price reduction on hogs on Winnipeg market for the week ending October 13, amounting to $2 per hog. It appears that with the export price set this reduction in the price to the producers should not be necessary.

On receipt of that telegram I got in touch with the marketing services and asked why it was that the price of hogs had dropped on the Winnipeg and western markets and had not dropped on the other markets in Canada. They informed me that the government had requisitioned a certain number of hogs from those markets and possibly that was the reason why the price had dropped. I then put these questions on the order paper:

> How many hogs were requisitioned for the export market from each of the prairie provinces during the week ending October 11, 1945 and what price was paid? Would this price involve any loss to the prairie farmers had they received the domestic price? How many hogs were requisitioned for export from each of the other provinces during the same period, and at what price? How would the export price compare with the price for domestic use? Has the government considered making good any losses sustained by prairie farmers whose hogs may have ben requisitioned?

I received an answer to these questions which indicated that practically as many hogs were requisitioned on the other markets as on the western markets, but the fact remains that the price dropped in the prairie markets and did not drop very much in the other markets. I shall give the committee the exact drop. In Toronto the drop was practically nothing. In Montreal the grade A hogs dropped from twenty-five to thirty-five cents a hundred, and in grade B from thirty-five to twenty-five cents a hundred. In Winnipeg they dropped $1.25 a hundred; in Calgary they dropped $1.40 a hundred; in Edmonton they dropped $1.30 a hundred. In Prince Albert they dropped $1.25; in Moose Jaw $1.25; in Saskatoon $1.15 to $1.25; in Regina $1.20 to $1.25; in Vancouver from nothing to forty cents, and in Moncton ten cents.

Through these questions I tried to find out why that drop had taken place. The answer told me that they had no record of domestic prices and that they could not give me an answer. The farmers in those prairie provinces are making a gift of around $2 a hog. That is one of the things that is discouraging farmers from producing hogs. I know of a lot of farmers who are not going to breed a sow at all for next year. I am afraid if the government do not do away with some of these discriminations, if they do not allow us to have a board of live stock commissioners where we can sell our hogs, if they do not allow the farmers who grow their own feed to get the same benefits as the farmers who buy their feed, we are going to go short of hog production next year.

Mr. FAIR: Were packers paid the same price by the meat board for the hogs that they bought at the reduced price which has been quoted by the hon. member for The Battlefords as they were when there was a fairly level market?

Mr. GARDINER: Perhaps I had better take a few minutes to discuss this question briefly. The answer to the last question is that the packers are paid the same prices for all the bacon that goes to Britain, and that is all the bacon with which the government has anything to do. The packer sells bacon and all other kinds of pork products on the home market. When the packer buys a hog it does not all go into bacon, and not all hogs go into bacon. The prices at the present time are about the same as prevailed when there was the same floor on bacon all through 1944. The average price at Toronto in 1944 was $17.25. That is the yearly average. The yearly average for Montreal was the same, $17.25. The yearly average at Winnipeg was $16.40. Everyone who markets hogs knows that there is always a difference between eastern and western markets because of freight and things of that kind. The market at Calgary was $15.98; Edmonton, $15.92; Prince Albert, $16.03; Moose Jaw, $16.05; Saskatoon, $15.99; Regina, $16.03; Vancouver, $16.69 and Moncton down on the eastern coast, $17.22. These are the markets across Canada for which we have records. These are the average prices. If I were to go all through the months I would find some variations. In Toronto, for example, it varies from a high of $17.63 in December to a low of $17.11 in January of that year. The variation there is about fifty-two cents a hundred.

As I understand the question, it is why we have these variations at all. The question asked by the hon. member for The Battlefords is as to why we had a drop in the fall of this year. I think the question he ought to ask me is, why did we have a rise in price? There has been no change whatsoever in the floor price created by the contract which we have had with Britain since the beginning of 1944. The average price in Toronto in 1944 was $17.25; in Winnipeg, $16.40, and that price or a little better price than that prevails at this moment. That is the price which is made possible by the sale of a certain proportion of the hogs under the British contract, which is the floor price, and a certain proportion of the hogs on the Canadian market at the ceiling price. We have been discussing whether we should not have ceilings and floors. We do not want the floor too far removed from the ceiling. The spread on hogs between May and August of this year, upwards, not downwards, is a spread that is not provided for at all in the difference between the floor and the ceiling. The average price paid for hogs from May to August was a price that no one could figure as having been paid by anybody under the ceiling price for pork products in this country. In other words, it means one of two things; either the pork products were marketed above the ceiling, or someone was taking a loss during a certain period of that time or taking less profit than he might otherwise have had during a certain period of that time.

I see one hon. member smiling; because he is Irish he can smile at anything and change his mind. I imagine he thinks that is a ridiculous thing for a packer to do. I say this to him: in my experience with packers and every other person in business I find that the best of them take losses occasionally. They have to do that in order to keep their customers satisfied and in order that they may perhaps make a little more profit at some other time than they otherwise would get. During that particular period of time they did take losses occasionally. I have talked to most of them, and my information, for what it is worth, is that they all had losses during that period. A man who will not believe that of course will not accept what is the ordinary practice in connection with business of all kinds. People occasionally do take losses rather than be unable to supply their customers at all. As a matter of fact if there was somebody on the black market who had a sale for the product and was out bidding for it, so that another man was not going to be able to stock his shops with that product at a time when we were letting people in Canada eat all they liked of it, he would probably say, "Well, I have to pay more and take a loss in order to get hogs," and some of them may have done that. I am not going to question wether they did or not. If a man takes a pencil and sits down to figure it out he may not be able to account for the price being as high as it was in some of those weeks. There is no difficulty in figuring what the floor should be and what the ceiling should be, but nobody can figure such a wide margin between the floor and the ceiling. When we resumed rationing of meat in Canada the situation immediately began to adjust itself. We said we were going to take most of this product off the Canadian market; the price of hogs went back to about the level of 1944, and that level is somewhere between the floor and the ceiling. The floor may be pretty well represented by the figure of $17.11 at Toronto in a certain month, and the ceiling is pretty well represented by the $17.63. In other words the real margin that should exist is probably somewhere around 50 cents rather than the $1.50 it reached during a certain period at certain points this year.

That is the explanation. It is a matter of our taking ninety per cent of all the A's and B's off this market in the fall and sending them overseas and allowing only ten per cent to go on the Canadian market, as against an earlier period when we were letting thirty-five, forty or fifty per cent go on the Canadian market and sending the remainder overseas. By making the adjustment between the ceiling price a man could get and the floor price he could get, and averaging the price somewhere in between, the price goes back to the old level provided for 1944, and it is still maintained.

Mr. CAMPBELL: The minister asked me why the price of hogs went up. I think that is quite clear. It went up because there was a tremendous demand and people were willing to pay higher prices.

Mr. GARDINER: On the Canadian market.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: Then the price went down because we sent the hogs to Britain instead.

Mr. CAMPBELL: The question I want answered is this. When the price of hogs rose to the ceiling the government stepped in and took ninety per cent of them by means of an arbitrary seizure, you might say, at the floor price, which to me means that the farmers who produced those hogs lost about $2 per hog, or gave that amount to Britain themselves. I do not object to Canada giving goods to Britain at lower prices, but I say if there is going to be a loss somewhere that loss should be distributed. There is another question I should like to ask—

Mr. GARDINER: May I just answer that part first? I realize that I did not answer the main question my hon. friend asked, which was why there was a greater variation in the west than in the east. As I remember it, the hon. member's statement was that the price went down on the western markets but did not go down in Toronto. I do not think that is a complete statement of the case, because I have had many complaints from Ontario and elsewhere in the east about price variations during the same period. I have not followed that situation closely enough, nor have I the figures, to state definitely what the difference was, but there would be some difference. The reason is that under normal conditions the market for all the hogs produced in Ontario may be in Ontario, but all the hogs produced in western Canada cannot be marketed there; they have to be shipped somewhere else. In other words if you just leave the market alone and do nothing at all about it the eastern farmer is bound to get the advantage of the fact that he has a home market right at his door, and I do not know that we can deny him this advantage. If the Ontario farmer just produced enough hogs to supply the Ontario market, and all his hogs were marketed in Ontario, then we in the west would have to take a price lower by at least the difference in freight. And if it is a fact that the Ontario market does absorb all the Ontario hogs, then we must ship our hogs to British Columbia or the maritime provinces, wherever there is a shortage in Canada, or to Britain; and our cost becomes that much higher. I know there are people who think somebody should do something about that and level it all up, but I am afraid if we started doing that around the world we would have a problem on our hands.

Mr. KNIGHT: I am interested in this question to some extent from the point of view of the Canadian consumer of Canadian bacon, and I want to address a question to the minister. To what extent are we sacrificing the quality of our bacon for home consumption in order that we may send the best of it to Britain?

Mr. GARDINER: Before we go further with this may I point out that this discussion is all about marketing. We have not reached the marketing estimates yet. When you start talking about prices and grades and the numbers marketed, that has to do with marketing, and we can discuss all those matters when we get to the marketing items. Then I will have the officials here who have all the information, and I can better answer my hon. friends. If we could pass the production items we could get on to marketing.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I am interested in the question of production, but the minister did not answer one question. Why could not the man who feeds his own grain get the benefit of the subsidy?

Mr. GARDINER: That comes under marketing. Let us get to marketing and we will discuss all these matters.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. TOWNLEY-SMITH: In the final analysis the price factor will determine just how much production there is going to be.

Mr. GARDINER: Then discuss production as related to price when we get to marketing, because I have not before me the officials who have that information.

Mr. HATFIELD: Did the minister say the maritime provinces did not produce enough hogs to supply their own market?

Mr. GARDINER: That is right.

Mr. PEARKES: I think this question has to do with production. Does the list of subsidies which has been tabled include the subsidies on feed grains to British Columbia? On November 27 the minister promised to make a statement on that.

Mr. GARDINER: I can give the statement on British Columbia, though it is all included in the other statement.

Mr. PEARKES: Then I will see it there.

Mr. GARDINER: The total amount paid from October, 1941, to the present time is $5,437,508.

Mr. PEARKES: And those subsidies will continue?

Mr. GARDINER: I cannot say definitely that they will. That is a matter of government policy. The present order in council leaves it indefinite; if nothing is done about it the subsidy goes on.

Mr. HODGSON: I should like to know why the minister has not brought in both ceiling and floor prices on all farm commodities. If he has not had time to do so, or there is any other reason, will he bring in something of that kind at the next session of parliament?

Mr. GARDINER: A ceiling price on all farm commodities?

Mr. HODGSON: Ceiling and floor prices?

Mr. GARDINER: The ceiling price is on the meat product, for example, in connection with hogs. There is neither a ceiling nor a floor on hogs, but there is a ceiling on the different cuts of pork.

Mr. HODGSON: I was more particularly interested in floor prices.

Mr. GARDINER: And there is a floor price which is put on through the contract we have with Britain. Our inspectors keep checking on the relationship of pork prices to the price of hogs.

I think we can say that since we started these contracts the price has never been for any period of time beyond, perhaps, a day or so, below the floor price.

Mr. HATFIELD: I should like to ask when the floor prices board is going to function.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, the legislation we were discussing yesterday has some bearing on that. If we in this house had decided that the War Measures Act was not going to be continued, or the principles of the act were not to be continued, we should have had to bring the floor prices measure into effect immediately. But as it is now, it will depend somewhat upon when controls are taken off the marketing of farm products.

Mr. HODGSON: I do not think the minister answered my question. I should like to know more about floor prices. Will the government bring in some form of floor price measure at the next session of parliament?

Mr. GARDINER: We did that a year ago. We brought in a bill which provides for floor prices. I think I have stated twice before to the committee how these floor prices will be arranged, and I answered the question just now to the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton. I cannot give an exact date as to when the board will start to operate under this act. So long as we can maintain the present position under the legislation we now have, I assume we shall go on under that legislation.

Mr. BENTLEY: We are dealing with subsidies on freight. I wonder whether what I am going to ask is related to a subsidy or a freight differential. I believe that in Lethbridge there is a firm which makes a product known as Alfa-Lasses. I have a letter from someone in my constituency to the effect that this product is delivered to a farm at Steveston, near Vancouver, at $20 per ton. Vancouver is much further from Lethbridge than is Swift Current, but this same farmer, getting the stuff at Swift Current, has to pay $32.50 per ton for it. Is there a subsidy paid to the feeder at Vancouver which is not paid to the producer in the prairie provinces, in the matter of concentrates and feeds?

Mr. GARDINER: There was a subsidy paid some years ago, but it was for making the product, not for delivery. But that subsidy has been discontinued.

Mr. BENTLEY: This difference must be a matter of freight differentials, and would come under transport.

Mr. GARDINER: I should think so.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Earlier this morning the minister indicated that there was something wrong in a statement I made. I do not think he will find anything in my statement which indicated that the farmer was being compelled.

Mr. GARDINER: No. The part of the statement I referred to, and which the hon. member may have made inadvertently, was that it did not pay farmers to produce hogs with grain at present prices. I think it does.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The fact that farmers are going out of hogs is probably an indication that it does not pay to raise them, otherwise they would be produced. I know of farms where hogs were being produced up in the hundreds, but they have gone completely out of them. The point is that it is costing Canada more to grow hogs by shipping the feed from western Canada to eastern Canada than it would cost to raise these hogs in western Canada, without the government paying a freight subsidy.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think it is costing Canada as a whole any more to do it one way or the other. I think it is probably about the same.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: If you are increasing the cost by shipping the feed from one place to the other, the cost of raising hogs must be greater.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not like to use my own case, but I have a farm in the east and another in the west, and I want to say in the first place that I make more money feeding hogs on my Saskatchewan farm than I do on the eastern farm. In the second place, under the provision which has been made for moving grain east the grain costs exactly the same on the eastern farm—to my surprise. When I moved a carload from my farm in western Canada to my farm down here, it cost just the same to feed the grain on the eastern farm as it did on the western farm. That is, the grain stood me the same price when I got it down here as it did out there.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: With the government paying the freight?

Mr. GARDINER: With the government paying the freight in the east, and the fifteen and the ten cents in the west.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I think that proves the point I wanted to make.

Mr. BRACKEN: Will the minister have a statement prepared with respect to the total subsidies paid out, so that when the committee meets again we may have it. I am sure it would help us in the discussion.

Mr. GARDINER: Oh, yes; I asked a minute ago to have it put on Hansard.

Mr. BRACKEN: Well, we won't see Hansard until to-morrow, and probably the minister will be going on with his estimates this afternoon.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think I shall be going on this afternoon, but probably this evening, and it will be in Hansard if I do not go on to-day. If I do I will get some copies made.

Mr. BRACKEN: We shall not see to-day's Hansard until to-morrow.

Mr. GARDINER: Then, if we are coming back to-night, I will have some copies made.

Mr. BRACKEN: I understood the minister to say that the present production of hogs in Ontario is about equal to what would be consumed in Ontario. Am I correct in that?

Mr. GARDINER: If we took off all the regulations and let people eat whatever they liked, they would probably consume most of it.

Mr. BRACKEN: Would that apply to Quebec?

Mr. GARDINER: Well, to practically all. I might say this, that probably Ontario and Quebec and the maritimes, all put together, if everything was left alone, would pretty well balance out.

Mr. BRACKEN: I gather that the point the minister was making there was that normally the amount produced in eastern Canada would be consumed in eastern Canada and that there would not be much export from this portion of Canada. Was that his point?

Mr. GARDINER: That was the point, yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: One other question, on the minister's earlier statement this morning. Would he say that the Canadian people consume more or less meat when there is rationing on?

Mr. GARDINER: All I can say is that when we had rationing before, we probably consumed more, but that was because—in 1943, I believe it was—we were rationing to take care of distribution. That is, it was found that if you did not ration, cities like Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver and Winnipeg would be short of meat. Of course the fact that there is a shortage of meat made the consumption lower, because that is where the big consumption is—in those cities. When you ration it and let them get equal amounts, the fact that you put meat back on these big markets results in more meat being consumed in Canada. But at the present time they are not rationing for that purpose; they are actually putting the ration down below what people do consume, and it is expected that that will reduce the consumption this year.

Item agreed to.

Health of Animals:

16. Administration of Animal Contagious Diseases Act and Meat and Canned Foods Act, $1,924,443.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am sure the minister and the committee will be interested in knowing that I had a forty-minute speech on this item, which I am not going to deliver. I understand that the minister is going to the old country very shortly, and I think all hon. members agree that his business is so important that his estimates should not be held up indefinitely. I just want to say that I attach a great deal of importance to his visit. The fact that we have gone through the war actually consuming more food than we ever did in our history places, I believe, a special responsibility upon us to reduce our consumption if possible and make more food available to Great Britain and to Europe during these critical months ahead. I hope that when the minister returns he will be able to help us to supply more food than we are supplying at the present time to people who have been feeling the impact of war so much more than we have.

Mr. JUTRAS: For a moment or two I should like to refer to a cattle disease known as mastitis which is markedly cutting down milk production in Manitoba as well as affecting the quality of the milk. The department has tried to help relieve this situation by making serum available to the farmers, but the main difficulty is that the causes and cures are still unknown to our department and apparently to the departments in other countries. Extensive research work is being done in the United States and I understand the Department of Agriculture here are doing what they can to relieve the situation. I would ask the minister to have the appropriate officials in his department make aggressive efforts to find the causes of this disease and the possible cure. It is causing grave losses to many farmers, especially those in southern Manitoba

Mr. BROOKS: I understand that the department of health has passed certain regulations regarding cheese production in Canada. I understand that these were made necessary by the disease just referred to by the previous speaker. The cheese producers in New Brunswick have been under a great handicap because of the regulations passed by the department of health and agreed to by the Department of Agriculture. Is there any possibility of relaxing the restrictions which have been placed on the production of cheese? I understand that the regulation is that cheese must be kept for sixty or ninety days at a certain temperature and the cheese boards are not allowed to sell their product until after that period. As I say, this is working a great hardship on the small cheese producers in New Brunswick because their storage facilities are limited. It also means that the farmers must wait a considerable time before receiving pay for their milk. I have a letter here from the New Brunswick cheese board which states, among other things:

> Our regular monthly meeting was held here on May 22, at which order in council No. 2131 requiring cheese to be held for ninety days was discussed and fully considered. All cheese board members viewed the enforcement of the above regulation with some misgiving and firmly believe it will result in the ruination of the New Brunswick cheese industry.

They finally drew up a resolution with instructions to present it to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. If diseases of cattle prevalent in certain parts of the dominion which require the department of health to take a certain stand, I should think that the veterinary should be able to treat the disease in the animal itself, so that stringent regulations to apply in all parts of Canada would not be necessary. I should like to know just what is being done in this connection.

Mr. GARDINER: This matter really should come up under item 24, dairy products, but as the explanation is short I will give it alongside the question. The reason for the regulation which was put on recently was an epidemic of typhoid; it had nothing to do with diseases of animals. This occurred in Alberta and was traced back to cheese as the carrier, to a person who was supplying milk to make cheese. It has always been claimed that cheese is a safe food because the process of curing kills germs, but that requires at least ninety days. The regulation really means that cheese must be cured for ninety days from the time it is produced. Naturally the cheese can move along while it is being cured; it does not necessarily mean that it must be held at the one point. I do not think there is as much hardship as there might appear to be, but on the other hand it is a question whether you can afford to have cheese become a carrier of a disease like typhoid. If it did, I am afraid it would affect not only the production of our cheese but its marketing in many places. That is the explanation for this regulation. If there is any further discussion on the matter, perhaps we can leave it until we reach the proper item.

Mr. BLAIR: I am interested in this item because unfortunately in the constituency which I represent we have had altogether too much Bang's disease. This is a cheese producing county, in fact it was due to the advertising received from a mammoth cheese constructed in Lanark county that we owe our present export trade in cheese to the British isles. It was back in 1893 that this large cheese was manufactured for publicity purposes. It weighed eleven tons and was exhibited at the world's fair in Chicago. It crashed through the floor there and created more attention than ever. Later on it was exhibited in London, England, and it was through the publicity and advertising that it obtained that our export trade with that country was started.

The cheese producers and live stock breeders have had a lot of trouble because of Bang's disease. The exact time and manner in which cattle contract and spread Bang's disease or infect each other is not always an easy matter to establish. The disease is generally first introduced into a clean herd through unknowingly obtaining infected cattle from another herd. Once this happens the disease will go through a herd like a storm, and it may spread through a whole township or district. During the storm stage of the disease the highest losses are experienced. The usual experience is that during the first two or three years of the appearance of the disease many victims are claimed, but the casualties become reduced each year unless new stock is introduced or young stock are growing up, which in turn would become infected.

The cattle seem to develop a natural immunity, and the active losses are not so noticeable. When the disease does become acute the owner of the herd suffers severe losses in young stock, a drop in value occurs and he has difficulty in disposing of his herd. In order to determine whether animals are infected with this disease it is necessary to have them blood-tested and the specimen examined at a laboratory. If a large number of reactors are found it may be desirable to keep the herd intact, consider it an infected unit and deal with it under combined methods of sanitation, segregation and the inoculation of calves in an endeavour to build up a clean herd from the offspring.

The cost of this examination is paid for by the herd owner, that is, he must have the veterinary withdraw the blood and make the examination, although the laboratory people will do the work. In Ontario there are no provincial regulations regarding the sale of animals afflicted with Bang's disease, but it has been a common custom among pure-bred herd owners not to buy animals unless they are negative as to blood test. The best breeders strive to have negative herds, but in spite of all precautions the disease will find its way into the herd, with consequent financial loss to the owner.

The reason I am interested in this matter is that unfortunately the disease does not stop with the herd. Human beings may acquire the disease through handling infected cattle or using raw milk. In the human being it is called undulant fever. It is a rural disease, eighty per cent of the cases reported having occurred among farmers and their families. Butchers, truckers, veterinary surgeons and travellers account for the remainder of the cases through handling infected cattle or using raw milk. In Ontario, and I have studied this disease particularly in this province, the disease is highest in the counties of Middlesex, Waterloo, York, Oxford, Perth, Elgin, Simcoe, Essex, and is prevalent throughout eastern Ontario. During the past four years 321 cases of undulant fever have been reported in Ontario, with ten deaths. This is a reduction as compared with the years prior to the advent of pasteurization when 515 cases and twenty deaths were reported from 1934 to 1938. In connection with these statistics, which I obtained from the Ontario Department of Health, I would say of my own knowledge that for every case reported there probably would be five or six not reported. Sometimes the people affected with this disease are sick for months, and it may go on for years. They do not know what is the matter with them and many do not consult a doctor.

I have here some statistics showing the incidence of undulant fever in Ontario in the years 1934 to 1938, which I should like to place before the committee: In 1934 the Ontario Department of Health lists 97 cases of undulant fever, with three deaths, and a morbidity rate per 100,000 of 2·7 per cent; 1935, 86 cases, five deaths, morbidity rate 2·4 per cent; 1936, 127 cases, two deaths, morbidity rate 3·1 per cent; 1937, 104 cases, seven deaths, morbidity rate 2·7 per cent; 1938, 101 cases, three deaths, 2 per cent.

Since pasteurization—and all the milk in Ontario is not pasteurized—there has been a marked drop since October 1, 1938, in the incidence of undulant fever, as is shown by the figures I have before me. With the consent of the committee, Mr. Chairman, I should like to have the whole table printed in Hansard.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The hon. member for Lanark has read some figures and requests the leave of the committee to place the whole statement on Hansard. If he read the entire statement, then of course no permission is needed, but if what he has read does not cover the entire statement he must have unanimous consent.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Agreed.

Mr. BLAIR: The table follows:

UNDULANT FEVER IN ONTARIO

Incidence of Undulant Fever—1934-1938

Year	Cases	Deaths	Morbidity Rate per 100,000
1934	97	3	2·7
1935	86	5	2·4
1936	127	2	3·1
1937	104	7	2·7
1938	101	3	2·
Total	515	20

PASTEURIZATION, OCTOBER 1, 1938

Incidence of Undulant Fever—1940-1944

Year	Cases	Deaths	Morbidity Rate per 100,000
1940	64	3	1·7
1941	68	0	1·7
1942	69	3	1·7
1943	65	2	1·7
1944	55	2	1·6
Total	321	10

This disease of undulant fever causes marked weakness and may run a course of two of three years. People afflicted with it suffer a most serious illness and during the more acute stages are confined to bed. They run a temperature for weeks and months, and the course of the disease is most debilitating. It is doubtful whether those who get it ever regain normal health; the effects may show themselves in later years. There is no doubt that a disease with such debilitating effects and lasting for such a long period takes a severe toll from the human body. There is no specific treatment for undulant fever; even penicillin has been tried with very little result. A medical man called in to treat a disease of that type can give only symptomatic treatment. He is helpless because we have nothing to stop the incidence of the disease. The table of statistics from the Ontario Department of Health shows that we are dealing with a disease that cannot be taken lightly. From 1940 to 1944 there were 321 cases reported, with ten deaths. If an accident occurred in any Canadian city, injuring 321 people and causing ten deaths, it would be headlined in the press throughout America as a tragedy.

In order to cure or get rid of undulant fever we have to go back and tackle Bang's disease. The control of this disease, with its tremendous loss to stock owners and the infection of human beings with a morbidity rate of 1·6 per 100,000, I maintain is a problem for the federal Department of Health. It is clearly shown in the Animal Contagious Diseases Act that this is a responsibility of the federal Department of Agriculture. If this disease, which causes tremendous loss to stock owners and the infection of human beings to the extent I have mentioned continues to be dealt with in the manner in which it has been dealt with by the federal Department of Health, we shall have the disease rampant throughout the province.

I suggest that more money should be spent in the research branch of the Department of Agriculture to study the disease and to find methods of combating it. Dairy herd owners should receive assistance by free blood-testing of their herds under the supervision of the federal Department of Agriculture, and there should be more rigid control in segregating animals in infected districts. Other measures such as the inoculation of young stock should also be free and carried out by the Department of Agriculture. Some financial compensation should be given to owners of the infected herds for losses sustained. This disease has been talked about for years and nothing done, so that we must approach it progressively. Clean herds should be kept clean; under the present situation they are not.

We believe the time has come when we ought to build up some protection against this disease by the vaccination of calves. We think the methods used in dealing with T.B. in cattle, whereby when seventy-five per cent of owners in a good area sign a petition asking the government to establish an area of segregation it becomes operative, should be followed in connection with this disease, and that all heifer calves in the area should be inoculated for immunization.

The objection to signing the form that is now required by the department, where all animals found to be infected must be slaughtered, is that in many instances the owner of a herd would lose the work of a lifetime in building up blood lines in pure-bred herds. Such owners—the Pure Bred Breeders' association—would approve calf vaccination, realizing that it is the only insurance against the disease. We admit that this is being done by some herd owners at their own expense, but where they are surrounded by careless farmers, their effort is nullified. The scheme I propose would be of value to the whole country in eliminating the disease.

I should like to quote from the Ayrshire Digest of October 15, 1942, which describes a new law in force in the state of Connecticut, where compulsory vaccination of calves has been adopted. The article reads:

> With the passage of a law that virtually requires compulsory vaccination of all calves except members of herds that are enrolled in the so-called test and slaughter plan, the state of Connecticut has undoubtedly put into effect the most revolutionary of all Bang's legislation. The new Connecticut bill was "born with teeth," for it specifies that any person refusing to have his calves vaccinated shall not be permitted to move any of his cattle from his premises except for slaughter-purposes, unless such cattle react negatively to a state approved blood test for Bang's disease. The foregoing statement practically places an embargo on movement of cattle from farms that are not enrolled in either calfhood vaccination or the test and slaughter plan. In fact in order to move cattle that are not under one or the other of Connecticut's two plans, it is necessary to send them to slaughter or to spend time and money in testing, and with no prospects of indemnity in the event that they react.
> Apparently Connecticut authorities are ambitious to establish Bang's control measures that may be given state-wide adoption.
> Theirs is a programme for the masses and should prove to be in direct contrast to the results attained in many states where millions of dollars have been spent by owners and governments without appreciably reducing the hazards of this costly disease.
> The first step toward popularizing calfhood vaccination was made when astute legislators of the "Nutmeg" state wrote into their bill the statement, "calves shall be vaccinated at state expense by an approved licensed veterinarian who shall be assigned by the commissioner." The foregoing sentence is preceded by the following, "the commissioner of domestic animals shall cause all calves to be vaccinated against Bang's disease when they are between the ages of four and eight months, except calves in those herds under the state and federal cooperative herd test plan also known as test and slaughter method, which calves need not be vaccinated unless the owner desires." The foregoing includes these boiled-down directives that should go a long way toward developing a state-wide programme; first, the "commissioner shall cause all calves to be vaccinated," and second, "calves shall be vaccinated at state expense."

The majority of the herds in Connecticut have not been tested, so to continue the plan Connecticut's new legislation will discourage private vaccination of calves for the simple reason that privately vaccinated animals will have no official status. The reason for this is their feeling that the injection of vaccine was rendered impotent because of exposure or careless handling. It was not properly done. From fifty to sixty of Connecticut's practising local veterinarians will be employed in the work, for which an appropriation of $125,000 has been made.

I suggest that we bring this matter under discussion, and from my own knowledge of it I think that something will have to be done about it in this country. The disease is spreading, and it is very hard for any live stock breeder to attempt to do anything with it with a careless farmer on either side of him, because the disease spreads rapidly.

Mr. GARDINER: I thank the hon. member for Lanark for having given as complete a review of this disease and its effects as he has. He knows the problem better than those of us who are not so closely associated with it, but I may say that a great deal is being done. Let me mention one fact to substantiate that statement. In Ontario there is a total of 2,150 herds, and the listed herds in regard to which something is being done number 1,531. The latter are declared clean. I would say at the same time that a great deal must be done along the line suggested by the member for Lanark, and we have been waiting for the end of the war to bring down for the estimates before deciding upon a larger programme, more closely related to what we are doing with tuberculosis. Some thought will be given between now and next session to the points raised by the hon. member, and when our estimates come down we shall try to do something.

Progress reported.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

VETERANS' LAND ACT

INCORPORATION OF PROVISIONS OF CERTAIN ORDERS IN COUNCIL

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the Veterans' Land Act, 1942, to make it conform in several respects with the act to amend the War Service Grants Act, 1944, passed at the present session of parliament, by incorporating in the measure the provisions of certain orders in council passed under the War Measures Act and by extending and clarifying in several other respects the application and operation of the act, as recommended and reported by the special committee on veterans affairs.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Mr. Chairman, with the consent of the committee I should like the same procedure adopted in connection with this resolution as we adopted with regard to the War Service Grants Act, namely, to allow the resolution to be carried in committee, and then I shall give a detailed explanation of the bill itself on the first or second reading, as the house desires. I want to say once again that this is a unanimous report of a committee consisting of sixty ex-servicemen of this house, who have done a splendid job and worked harder than I have ever seen a committee work in the fifteen years I have been in parliament.

I thoroughly understand that some members of the committee have certain reservations. I want to give the assurance that as soon as the house meets again the same terms of reference will be used and this act can then be reconsidered with reference to certain features that were advocated and which are not included in this measure. With the understanding I think the committee could very well advance the resolution, and upon second reading I shall be glad to explain briefly the amendments which were suggested by the special committee on veterans affairs.

Mr. CHURCH: Is it considered ample to maintain the families?

Mr. MACKENZIE: This is an amendment to the Veterans' Land Act, which embodies the orders in council already passed by the government over a certain number of years and two or three other changes recommended unanimously by all parties in the house.

Mr. BROOKS: I want to understand this thoroughly. The minister said that there would be an opportunity given to discuss this on the first or second reading.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes, that is right. On the second reading of the bill I intend to make a short statement, and hon. gentlemen will have ample opportunity to discuss any suggestions for future alterations, or any references to the bill which will be placed before the house.

Mr. WRIGHT: I thought the minister gave the impression that we were unanimously in favour of the bill as it stands. I want to state definitely that so far as we are concerned we are not unanimously in favour of the bill as it stands. There are certain definite recommendations with respect to it which we intend to put forward at the proper time. We have the minister's assurance that we shall be given that opportunity to discuss it when he makes his statement, and that at the next session we shall be given an opportunity to make certain recommendations with respect to changes which we believe should be made in the act. With this assurance, we of this group are prepared to expedite the business of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I thoroughly understand the position of my hon. friends, and I definitely give the assurance that at the next session the reference will be as wide as possible, and he can then advance the suggestions which he has advanced at this session.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): With that understanding we are quite prepared to facilitate the passing of this resolution, but we have certain reservations. We want to facilitate the passage of this measure as quickly as possible, for the benefit of the soldiers.

Mr. MUTCH: I have no desire to say anything other than that all the reservations are not on the opposition side of the house.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Mackenzie thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 233, to amend the Veterans' Land Act, 1942.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NATIONAL EMERGENCY

BILL TO CONFER CERTAIN POWERS ON THE GOVERNOR IN COUNCIL

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved the third reading of bill No. 15, to confer certain powers upon the governor in council during the national emergency following the war.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion? Carried.

Mr. BRACKEN: You have not called for a vote, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I asked if it was the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion, and I understood the motion was adopted.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: On division.

The house divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division.

WAR CHARITIES ACT

INCLUSION OF WAR MEMORIALS AS PROJECTS ACCEPTABLE FOR REGISTRATION—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National War Services) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to bill No. 13, to amend the War Charities Act, 1939.

Mr. McMASTER: I notice that the senate have deleted certain words from the bill, and I should like to ask the minister what effect that will have on the bill. There was a great deal said in this house about whether or not this bill would affect municipal institutions, and I notice that the same question arose in the other house. I am referring to buildings or memorials erected by municipal institutions which are authorized under provincial legislation. No public appeals are made for these buildings.

Mr. McCANN: My understanding is that the amendments affect more the generality of the class of war memorial rather than those which might be regarded as individual undertakings. Certain memorials could have been designated by regulation as a class of war memorial, but now each application for permit will have to be dealt with individually rather than as a class. In answer to the hon. gentleman, may I say it is my opinion that the type of memorial he refers to will come within the meaning of the act.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND—INTERNATIONAL BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT

The house resumed from Thursday, December 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Ilsley that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to grant authority to accept on behalf of Canada an dto carry out the obligations of Canada under the articles of agreement for an international monetary fund and an international bank for reconstruction and development prepared by the united nations monetary and financial conference held at Bretton Woods in July, 1944; to authorize the payment of the subscriptions required from Canada out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund to an amount not exceeding seven hundred million dollars; and to authorize the borrowing under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, of sums not exceeding seven hundred million dollars.

Mr. W. GARFIELD CASE (Grey-North): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with some concern to the contributions made to this debate, particularly by members of the Social Credit group. Some harsh language has been used, and I doubt very much if that is the proper course to pursue. The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) and the hon. member for Macleod, (Mr. Hansell) appeared to be concerned about their monetary theories; in fact they were allowing their concern to overshadow, as it were, their better judgment.

The discussion which has taken place in this house has tended to emphasize the great patience which must have been exercised in seeking this Bretton Woods agreement. Forty-four nations were gathered together from all parts of the earth, and no doubt there was the language difficulty to contend with. Yet they could agree on a method of procedure and finally come to an agreement. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to read one paragraph from Annex C, summary of agreements of Bretton Woods conference:

> This conference at Bretton Woods, representing nearly all the peoples of the world, has considered matters of international money and finance which are important for peace and prosperity. The conference has agreed on the problems needing attention, the measures which should be taken, and the forms of international cooperation or organization which are required. The agreement reached on these large and complex matters is without precedent in the history of international economic relations.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to hon. members of this house that that message, subscribed to by forty-four nations gathered together in conference, is indeed most inspiring.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the hon. member mention the pamphlet from which he quoted?

Mr. CASE: It is entitled "Monetary Conference, Bretton Woods, 1944," and I quoted from page 68.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the hon. member tell us the author of that pamphlet?

Mr. CASE: I obtained it from the parliamentary library, and on the title page I find this: "United Nations Monetary and Financial Conference, Bretton Woods, New Hampshire, U.S.A., July 1 to July 22, 1944, Final Act." It is an official document, printed by the King's Printer and authorized, I presume, by parliament.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would we be justified in assuming that the hon. member is reading from the Final Act, from the report of these men?

Mr. CASE: Yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Of course they would support their own ideas.

Mr. CASE: Whoever is responsible for this document, at least they knew something about it, and I am inclined to accept it as authentic, and as coming from the conference itself. It does not indicate the grave concern which was indicated by the members of the Social Credit group in this house.

Mr. JOHNSTON: The hon. member does not even know who wrote it.

Mr. CASE: Probably the hon. gentleman can find out for himself, and if he wishes to challenge its authenticity or authority he will have an opportunity later.

I should like to predicate my remarks on the thought: Without Bretton Woods, then what? Should we by our action here cause the nations of the world to be called together again in order to devise a better plan than the one which has been subscribed to by the forty-four nations which participated in that conference? Are we to allow old suspicions and old doubts to creep into our minds at this time, when a new world is seeking to be born? We do know, if we look back to the days prior to the war, that the general economic condition of the world played havoc with our sense of security. That came about largely because of doubts and a lack of confidence in the world, particularly on the continent of Europe. With war overhanging the universe, business men could not make long-range plans. And so, Mr. Speaker, I am not particularly concerned about the $700,000,000 which is called for by this resolution. I am rather inclined to adjust my thinking and to realize that a nation which could afford to spend billions of dollars for war can indeed afford to take this risk to promote peace. Surely we must recognize that this is an approach to a solution of one of the greatest problems that the world has ever faced. Students of economics have long recognized that for the world again to get on to a trading basis, there must be some central bank or clearing house in order that monetary values and the media of exchange can be adjusted. After all, Canada is a trading nation, and a highly productive nation stands to gain a great deal by the machinery set up in a central clearing house. It will help us to dispose of our goods.

I do not think it is fair to say that the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) did not refer to imports because, if I remember rightly, he spoke of trade being a two-way street. Trade usually results in bringing about a better understanding between the nations of the world and in promoting friendships. We are usually more friendly with those with whom we trade. The world has grown smaller because modern means of communication have made the world a more compact, closely-knit unit. We know that the fruits of the earth are sufficient to maintain the peoples of the world, and we must seek to distribute the products of our industry, of our fields, our forests and our farms.

Reference has been made to a return to the gold standard. I do not think there is anything wrong in a return to the gold standard. The one great fault of the gold standard, as we understood it in days gone by, was that it was too rigid, but if we do return to the gold standard I have every reason to believe that it will be made more flexible. Most students of world affairs and of economics agree that we must have some reasonable standard of values and that it must be reasonably durable. I do not see why we should hesitate to give consideration to a return to the gold standard. In other words, may I pose this question. Suppose we were not returning to the gold standard while the great powers of the world were seeking to do so. Do you suppose we could defeat their purpose? After all, we are a gold producing nation, and I should like to see that one precious metal, one of our greatest natural resources, used to a large extent for the benefit of the people.

When I listen to speakers addressing themselves to this problem of Bretton Woods I cannot imagine anyone holding a gun at Britain's head or attempting to force Britain to become a party to a pact if she felt that it would result in a situation such as has been indicated by hon. members of the Social Credit group. It is true that the Bretton Woods conference was held while the war was still in progress, and some have suggested that it was because of Britain's dire need that she was willing to accept the results of that conference. But many hon. members will recall that the Right Hon. Mr. Churchill, when he was Prime Minister, said in one of his memorable talks that one of the great weaknesses of the Versailles treaty was that the war had been concluded, that the allied nations had not the same things in common, and that they would have done well if they had approached the problems of peace while the war was still going; and he expressed the hope that the united nations on this occasion would approach the problems of peace while they were still comrades in arms. I think that is one of the strongest features of this conference.

As a matter of fact, I do not think that the question of survival was in doubt; we confidently believed that sooner or later victory would be ours, though we knew that the struggle would be a long and trying one. We knew the weaknesses of the old league of nations; we knew that it provided nothing in the way of trade to hold the nations together; we knew that there must be some compensating value for that which was being contributed. I feel therefore that Bretton Woods is an attempt at least to provide the answer, and that never again shall we be required to drench the soil of Europe in the best blood of Canada, something that has happened twice in our generation.

I do not necessarily accept the advice of the experts. I do not pose as a statistician. I am more inclined to listen to the voice of reason and to seek if possible to bring about a greater understanding, friendliness and comradeship among all peoples of the world. I believe it was Darwin who expounded the theory that like begets like, and I feel that if in a moment of ill-considered judgment or haste or concern we use harsh words to describe the attitude of our great and friendly neighbour; if in a misguided moment we seek to destroy that feeling of good will and concern that should be mutual, and which I am sure now exists, we can do a great deal of harm. We should be guarded in our language. I hope that before this debate concludes we shall have composed our differences and that when the bill goes to the banking and commerce committee any technical aspects of it that need adjustment will be attended to.

For a moment I should like hon. members to look at Europe to-day. In my opinion this is indeed the gravest moment possible in the world's history. Those people in Europe are starving. How many of us realize that a hundred thousand people still lie buried beneath the rubble of Warsaw; that five millions are homeless in Poland, living in trenches and in caves with perhaps a mere shelter over them, some roof to protect them from the elements, from the rigours of winter; that these people are very poorly clad; that disease, indeed tuberculosis, is rampant and thousands are dying? Consider the caloric content of their diet. It has been raised to 1,520 calories a day, whereas UNRRA fixed as an objective 2,250; and we know on the authority of scientists that a diet of around 1,400 is considered a starvation diet. Yet these people are existing under such terrible conditions. What is it that keeps them alive? Merely hope; and if we do anything to destroy that hope, chaos and despair will be the lot of Europe.

It is interesting to reflect for a moment upon what the terrible realities of war have meant to that great continent. In one centre were there is located one of the largest steel industries in the world, with two hundred odd blast furnaces, only two are in operation. Why? Because in France alone ten thousand bridges are down; their railroads have been destroyed, huge locomotives lying over embankments; and their transportation is difficult. Indeed, they can transport only sufficient coke and coal to this huge steel industry to keep two of these furnaces going, while steel is so badly needed.

A story was told the other night which gives us an inkling of the hope and the courage of these people. A seventeen year old Yugoslav girl was looking over the ruins of her small community where between 500 and 600 persons resided before that place was destroyed. She said, through an interpreter, to a member of UNRRA, that her parents had been killed, her family completely destroyed, and she was the only one left. "But," she said, "I will rebuild my community." She will not however rebuild that community, no matter how courageous she may be, unless we keep her from becoming a victim of disease, unless we can provide food for the sustenance of her body and the preservation of that courage which is so necessary to-day. Let me say to you, Mr. Speaker, that if the great continent of Europe, with its hundreds of millions of people, slips into the abyss of despair, people on this continent and elsewhere throughout the universe will suffer; because we have surely arrived at the point where we recognize the fact that you cannot have prosperity in one part of the world while another part is in dire stress and starving.

We should recognize and pay attention to the words of the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson), who is a world traveller, and who brought a message to us last night which would indicate that the United States is approaching the period when she will be a large importer because she is gradually exhausting her natural resources.

What is needed more than anything else in this world to-day is a wave of Christianity and good sound Christian thinking, such as that which swept England during the days of John Wesley, when that country stood at the very door of paganism. From that great period came Lord Shaftesbury, the emancipator of labour, who sought to remove children from the industrial slums and to have women return to their homes. I hope the time is not too far distant when in this country and in other lands women will recognize that woman's highest ideal indeed is that of motherhood. I also think of Dr. Barnardo, the father of fatherless children.

To-day we stand at the crossroads. We, and we alone, can determine our future course. We shall never build a world society if we allow our minds to inject into our thoughts suspicion, doubt and discord. Our hope for civilization is a world at peace for a long time, so that civilization will have an opportunity to rebuild those moral forces, to strengthen its courage. With that determination we can indeed approach the future with confidence.

We are citizens of the world, citizens of the world society. When Bretton Woods was presented to this house I had hope that at least Canada, one of the great trading nations of the world with much to gain—I do not want to use that language in a selfish sense, because I hope that we shall be big enough to share our prosperity with the world; we have too much at stake to do otherwise—would give unanimous endorsation to the pact and that at least we might try to bring abotu a semblance of orderly trade and exchange. I do not believe we can do that without having some central clearing house, and I have confidence enough in this pact to believe that Bretton Woods will provide just exactly that. Therefore I say to hon. members, let us not be hasty in our judgment.

I recently read a statement of Mr. Attlee, the present Prime Minister of Great Britain, in which he said that Great Britain desired to have friendly relations with all nations of the world and to know their neighbours better. I cannot feel that those who were inspired to bring about this approach to world problems were entirely guided by selfish motives and ideals, because I believe that the great war has taught us a tremendous lesson. Society on all levels have lived together in Great Britain in trying circumstances and have grown to appreciate each other more and more. It is for us in our generation to be big enough and broad enough in our vision that our children and our children's children will find that we indeed have kept alive that hope, that we have lit a new beacon which will shine and encourage future generations not to copy our example, our hatred and warfare, but to copy our example of bringing about as rapidly as possible the ideals of the brotherhood of man that we in this country can particularly understand and appreciate.

I am satisfied that given the opportunity to survive, great good can come from Bretton

Woods. There is no perfect formula. How can you expect forty-four nations to gather together and devise a perfect plan? But let us at least seize this opportunity to give effect to something which has a semblance of hope, a degree of understanding and an approach to the world's problem of deciding our future course, in the hope that there will come peace and security to a tried war-torn and troubled world.

Mr. W. F. KUHL (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, I do not lay any claim to being an expert, either amateur or professional, on international exchange, foreign trade or kindred matters. I do not believe that one needs to be an expert to pass judgment on the subject now before the house. If one has an understanding of the simple elementary principles which operate in the economics of the countries of the world, it is a sufficient guide to one to indicate whether the measure is sound or unsound. I agree that the Bretton Woods agreement involves all the iniquities referred to by my colleagues who have already spoken; but in addition to that, this whole scheme is nothing less than a red herring to distract the attention of the peoples of the various countries of the world from the real issue. It is a scapegoat for the sins, not only of omission but of commission, of the various governments of the world. No international organization framed along the lines of Bretton Woods and designed under present circumstances can bring about world prosperity. All these schemes for international organizations, Bretton Woods and any others, are based on a false premise. Unless the premise on which any organization is based is sound and true, then the organization which is built upon it cannot serve the needs of humanity.

The conditions to which the minister referred, which prevailed in the pre-war days and which have been mentioned frequently by practically all hon. members who have spoken thus far, were not causes; they were effects. The minister stated, at page 3041 of Hansard:

> The characteristic features of world economic relationships before the war were high and discriminatory tariffs, import quotas, export subsidies, depreciated currencies of uncertain value, discriminatory clearing agreements, multiple currency practices.

It is true that those conditions prevailed, but I assert that they were symptoms of the disease and not the disease itself; they were effects, not causes. I think the most convincing proof that tariff arrangements or any kind of trade relationships which may be suggested will not bring about prosperity may be found in what has taken place in the United States of America. There we have a union consisting of forty-eight states. There are no tariff barriers between them, no inhibitions to trade, no obstacles, nothing in the way of the freest possible exchange.

Mr. BLACKMORE: They have the same money, too; stabilized money.

Mr. KUHL: They have almost everything that is required to bring about the greatest possible prosperity within the boundaries of that nation. They have a common language; they have one money system common to all. Yet in the pre-war days they suffered from the depression as much as any other country in the world, if not more. If adjustments in tariffs or the abolition of tariffs and the elimination of all these other things to which the minister referred as the causes of depression are the cure, then why was there a depression in the United States, when these things were absent from its internal organization? So I say the conditions and circumstances referred to by the minister and by other hon. members are the symptoms of disease and not the cause; and the thing we must do is to discover and eliminate the cause. Then the symptoms will take care of themselves.

In my opinion Bretton Woods will fail, and so will every other similar organization that may be attempted, because they are based upon a false premise. What is that false premise to which I refer? Why has there been and why is there now again suggested this constant drive for foreign markets? On every side we hear that we must export, export, export. What has been the reason that the exporters in various countries of the world have agitated so strongly for exports? Simply because they believe that the people within the country either do not desire the goods or cannot consume them. The whole drive for foreign markets is predicated on the assumption that the people at home either do not wish the goods or are not physically able to consume them, and I say that is a false premise. It is true that those who have referred to foreign trade in this debate have said that trade must be a two-way street, that it must work both ways; but the mere exchange of goods between one nation and another does not guarantee that the people of those countries will be able to enjoy the goods when they receive them. The chief reason that the people of Canada desire to export—and this is true of the people of the United States and almost every country in the world—is not the fact that they do not desire the goods, but it is largely that they are unable to purchase them. In days gone by many articles have been exported by Canada that we could have consumed here if we had possessed sufficient purchasing power, and the same would apply to every country in the world.

I have before me a page from the Canada Year Book giving the statistics in regard to Canada's exports for the year 1938-39. I readily grant that we produce many commodities in Canada which we could not hope physically to consume, but we have also exported many things which Canadians would have been glad to enjoy themselves if they had possessed sufficient purchasing power. These items are arranged in order of importance, and I notice that the sixth most important export at that time was planks, boards and lumber, which we exported to the amount of $37,000,000. We all know that in those days prior to the war, as is the case now, many people would have bought that lumber if they had been able to do so. One only needs to take a trip across this country to discover the tremendous need that exists for new buildings. We could have used every stick of that lumber in this country. The next item in the list is meats. I am not suggesting that Canadians could physically consume all the meat products we produce, but there are many people in this country who would gladly avail themselves of much greater quantities of steaks, hams and all the other meats that are processed in this country if they had the ability to purchase them. People cannot afford to eat many steaks at a cost of $1.25 or $1.50 per meal. So I say that in pre-war days as well as post-war days we could consume in Canada far more of the commodities we produce in this country.

I see that automobiles are eleventh in this list of twenty-five items; in that year we exported 58,849 automobiles. What in the name of common sense are we exporting automobiles for when there are so many people in this country without automobiles and a great many more running around in worn out jalopies tied up with haywire? So one could go all the way down the line. In the past we have exported products which could very well have been consumed here at home, and I say the reason they were not so consumed was not that the people did not desire them, but purely and simply that their purchasing power was not equal to their producing power. I have already said that it seems to be taken for granted on the part of those who are constantly talking about foreign trade that if we export a million dollars worth of commodities and then bring back in exchange a million dollars worth of commodities the people will be automatically able to buy those imported goods. That is a false assumption. A word as to the reason why it is false, why the premise on which I claim the whole scheme is based is a false one.

One of the objectives which it is hoped to attain through the use of the Bretton Woods agreement and many other measures which have been adopted, both national and international, is the achievement of what is described as full employment. The minister stated several times in his address that that is an objective they are hoping to achieve. The term has been used frequently, indeed incessantly during debates in this house and, doubtless, elsewhere: we must "cure unemployment". I wish to challenge that contention. There is only way that unemployment in this modern world, this power-machine age, will ever be cured, and that is by setting up a slave state. Personally I do not want to see unemployment cured. Unemployment is not a disease. It is the greatest sign of progress which we have yet witnessed.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is a new theory.

Mr. KUHL: Unemployment is a sign of progress and not a sign of decay. It has faced this country and it will face us again. Statistics were quoted by an hon. member of this group, yesterday I believe, indicating that the United States is expecting 20,000,000 unemployed by the time the reconversion period is over. I am satisfied that that will be the condition in every country in the world, particularly in those countries which have the greatest development in technology. The reason for this unemployment must be obvious to everyone; yet it is ignored continuously. Not only do hon. members and economists who talk and write on the subject ignore the fact that we have been and are now in a power-machine mass-production age, but they ignore the fact that we have now entered the atomic age. The unemployment which prevailed prior to the war and which will occur again, once we get through the reconversion period, is merely technological; it indicates that man has used his head to save his back, and I think he is entitled to do that. Personally, subscribing to the philosophy that I do, I do not want to see unemployment cured, I want to see more unemployed.

Mr. MacNICOL: You want to see more unemployment?

Mr. KUHL: Yes, more unemployment.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is a terrible doctrine.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): More leisure, he means. Call it "leisure"; it sounds better.

Mr. KUHL: The hon. gentleman says that that is a terrible doctrine.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Better come down to Nova Scotia if you want to see more.

Mr. KUHL: Why, the hon. gentleman has been trying all his life to become unemployed; so have I; so has every hon. gentleman in this house. It is the secret ambition of every individual to get out of all the work he can.

Mr. JOHNSTON: We are not so successful as some hon. members over there.

Mr. MITCHELL: That accounts for some being members of this house, I suppose!

Mr. KUHL: That does not mean that those who have that ambition desire to loaf; it means simply that they desire to reach a position where they can choose their activity instead of being forced to take it. That is the difference between work and leisure. I say that it is a false objective to endeavour to cure unemployment by providing work either nationally or internationally. What is the difference between that philosophy and the philosophy which Adolf Hitler followed? I see no difference.

I say that Bretton Woods will fail because nations, governments and those who speak on behalf of governments fail to recognize the impact of the power-machine age and—now—the advent of atomic energy. More and more we shall have power-machine production, and eventually the application of atomic energy when it is commercially feasible. When extraneous energy displaces human labour, it displaces the pay cheque; and when it displaces the pay check, obviously people have not purchasing power to buy the goods which machines make. Hence has arisen the drive to export those goods which would otherwise in large measure be consumed right at home. I believe this truth must be recognized by governments and those who speak on their behalf before we shall make any progress either in preserving peace in the world or in bringing about prosperity. We certainly shall have peace in the world only after we learn how to distribute our abundances. The greatest contribution which we as Canadians could make to the cause of peace would be to demonstrate how we can distribute our abundances here at home without mortgaging the lives of those now living, or the lives of future Canadians, to those who issue the money of the nation. If we can demonstrate how it is possible to distribute our own goods and avoid economic warfare with other countries then I consider we shall be making the greatest contribution that Canada can make.

I assert that Canadians have the first claim to Canadian goods. All goods produced in Canada are produced with Canadian labour and by Canadian effort. Therefore Canadians have the first claim on Canadian production. Once we have passed through the transitional period, I am not in favour of exporting a single article until Canadians are first satisfied completely. I agree that during the transitional period we have a moral obligation to rehabilitate those countries which have been overrun by the enemy, but as my colleague, the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) indicated, this should be an outright gift and should not constitute a debt. I repeat that we as Canadians should rehabilitate the war-stricken countries of the world with some of the superabundance of goods that we have. But once they have been rehabilitated, once their machinery of production is brought back to the place where they themselves can provide almost all the things they need, we shall then be faced with the problem of disposing of our so-called surplus. That makes it imperative that all countries, particularly the United States and Canada, should institute within their countries a system which will enable the people at home to consume to the maximum of their own goods.

I assert that we must eventually come to the place where we accept one of the major proposals in the social credit philosophy, the bonusing of consumers or, in other words, a national dividend. I do not propose on this occasion to elaborate on that; but I am convinced that only by a national bonus, only by increasing the ability of the consumer to buy his own production, and that which may be brought in in exchange for genuine surpluses, can we ever bring about prosperity of a substantial nature. An hon. member over here has said that it is a case of Bretton Woods or chaos. I would suggest another slogan—a national dividend or chaos.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Ontario): Would that be free of income tax?

Mr. KUHL: Yes, definitely. Taxes decrease rather than increase the purchasing power. I shall not be satisfied until all taxation is abolished. Those who think that taxation is necessary simply do not understand the a-b-c's of the relationship of money to goods. It is assumed constantly that consumption always equals production, but that is the greatest fallacy that can be assumed by any one. As long as we in Canada assume that when we produce a billion dollars worth of goods we automatically have a billion dollars of purchasing power we shall make absolutely no progress. On previous occasions I have shown by statistics, and anyone can demonstrate it by examining the books of his own business, that in every business of this country there is only approximately half as much distributed in purchasing power as is produced. The thing we need is an increase in purchasing power, not a redistribution of it, and that is why I say that taxation should be abolished.

Even under a system where we enable the consumer to acquire up to the limits of his capacity to consume of our own production, I grant that there will be genuine surpluses which we can not physically consume. Those would be available for export. To-day when we have a surplus, whether genuine or not, we think immediately of exporting it. I think the reverse should be the case. When we have a genuine surplus, whether it be wheat or newsprint or aluminum or any other commodity, and we have satisfied Canadian consumers to the limit, we should import an equivalent amount from the other countries of the world.

By following that process we would put in an order to other countries for goods of an equivalent amount. Will they be ready and willing to sell to us? Of course they will. That would turn the wheels of industry in those countries and thus generate purchasing power which would enable them to put in orders for our surplus. In that way trade wars would be overcome, or at least we would be doing our part to eliminate such trade wars. When those goods come into Canada, let us see to it that the Canadian consumer has sufficient purchasing power to acquire them. Merely exchanging goods, merely bringing back one surplus in exchange for another, will not automatically guarantee distribution. As I have already said, we must tackle the question of distribution within our own country and consider it the fundamental basis of the success of any international arrangement.

If that is done it will mean that those who now have a stranglehold on this nation and other nations of the world will have to give up some of their powers. To-day the economy of Canada is absolutely in the hands of those who create and issue money. Those who create and issue the money of the nation control the nation; the government does not. The government is helpless to effect any vital changes in the economy of the country as long as the power to create and issue the money of the nation is in the hands of private individuals. Before any country, whether it be Canada, the United States or any other, is in a position to enable its own people to consume its own production, it must first restore to the crown its most sacred prerogative, that of creating and issuing the money of the nation.

By that I do not mean that I favour the nationalization of the chartered banks, because I do not. I believe that when the government goes into the banking business the people will be obliged to do business with politicians instead of with business men. I want to see the private banks remain in private hands so that business men may do business with business men, and not with politicians. But the power to create and issue the money which the banks now enjoy must be taken from them and restored to the crown, and then the crown must use that privilege on behalf of the people to enable the people to consume their own production without adding to the debt and without an increase in taxation.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Would the hon. member say that he was dealing with politicians when he took a ride on Canadian National Railways?

Mr. KUHL: There is a vast difference between running a bank and running a railway. Far more judgment is required in a bank manager, who has to decide whether an individual is credit worthy or not, than is required of a man driving an engine or one engaged in any other form of railway work.

I was asserting, Mr. Speaker, that if we are to make Bretton Woods a success we must in Canada restore to the crown the powers which will enable it to enable the people to consume their own production; that is, we must restore to the crown the power to create and issue the money of the nation. In this connection I should like to quote a statement made by Abraham Lincoln, who said:

> Money is the creature of law, and the creation of the original issue of money should be maintained as an exclusive monopoly of the national government. Such needs can be served by issuing national currency and credit through the operation of a national banking system.
> The government should create, issue, and circulate all the currency and credit needed to satisfy the spending power of the government and the buying power of consumers. The privilege of creating and issuing money is not only the supreme prerogative of the government, but it is the government's greatest creative opportunity.

That is a statement of great significance. That is what should be done in Canada; that is what should be done in the United States; that is what should be done in every country; and until that is done, and until that privilege is used by the state for the benefit of the people, Bretton Woods will not succeed in bringing about prosperity or peace in the world.

I consider that the refusal by those who are responsible to restore to the crown its sacred prerogative constitutes one of the greatest betrayals that have ever been made of the people of this country or of any country in the world, and my suspicion is this in connection with Bretton Woods. My colleague the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) on various occasions has suggested the operation of a power behind the scenes. I concur in his fear of this power. But whatever that power is, and whoever are the indviduals who possess that power and attempt to exercise it, it is in the final analysis the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) and the ministry who are responsible. They must take the responsibility for whatever actions are done by this power. If anyone is getting away with murder in the realm of finance it is the responsibility of the Minister of Finance. He is the one on whose doorstep we must place the responsibility.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. H. G. ARCHIBALD (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take a few moments just to compare two things: the actual, with the hope that was expressed last night. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), in introducing the Bretton Woods resolution yesterday, said, as reported at page 3040 of Hansard:

> The main issue which is at stake in the Bretton Woods proposals is the same as that involved in the united nations charter which this house recently approved by so overwhelming a majority. That issue is: are we and other countries to organize and cooperate for peace, or is each nation going to use its strength and resources at the expense of others in a struggle for survival?

This country is extending loans to countries over in Europe, and the actual thing is that we are going to get a rate of interest back by any means possible. Let me read a clipping from this morning's Ottawa Journal. The heading is, "Give Dutch Troops Canadian Equipment", and the item reads:

> Amsterdam, Dec. 6—(Reuters). Dutch authorities are equipping four divisions with Canadian army equipment, for immediate service in the East Indies, the Netherlands news agency Aneta reported to-night.
> Canadian army headquarters at Appeldoorn announced the sale of $11,000,000 worth of army equipment to European governments, the Dutch being the chief buyers. They have bought 1,500 trucks and other material and negotiations are taking place in Ottawa for the purchase of tanks and field artillery worth $5,000,000. The report said 44 tanks now in Britain, 170 anti-tank guns, 26,000 Sten guns, 3,000 Brens, 42,000 rifles and bayonets and 1,200 mortars are involved.
> The "mammoth base ordnance depot" equipment at Bordon, Hampshire, England, has been sold by Canada to the Netherlands government for $500,000 together with two Canadian army workshops in Antwerp with full equipment, it was stated.

Mr. Speaker, this allows the nations once again to collect the rate of interest by the good old-fashioned method—at the point of a bayonet.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, before I begin I wish to correct a statement which I made the other day. I said that a man by the name of Leslie Roberts was present at a meeting at Chatham House in London last winter. Mr. Roberts informs me that he was neither at Chatham House nor in London at the time. So I am glad to make that correction.

This debate undoubtedly is the most important that has been held in this house not only in this session but in any session outside of the declaration of war. Yet whom do I see in this chamber? Just a handful of members on the government side. I am glad to see that there are four or five members of the government in their places.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the others?

Mr. JAQUES: Yes; what about the others? It is a strange thing that in a debate of this importance, that while the two major parties have been at one another's throats during the session, this is, one might say, quite a love feast. I do not think there will be found much disagreement between them on this occasion. Not only is it a love feast, but one might say that they are actually dining off the gold plate. The minister said yesterday that no country was willing to revert to the gold standard. More than that, he said that prosperity, that is national prosperity, depends on export trade, and he also said that export trade will be controlled by gold. That is definite enough, so that our prosperity will be controlled by gold.

Mention has been made of tariffs, and governments are always blamed for raising tariffs out of pure cussedness. It never seems to penetrate these people that tariffs are not a cause but a result. As a previous speaker said, it is because no industrialist country can afford to consume its own production, nor can it afford to consume the production of other countries in exchange for its own, and therefore in order to defend themselves they put on a tariff so as to export as much as possible and import as little as possible. In other words, they export their unemployment. That is so elementary that I apologize for mentioning it at this time.

We are told that all the experts were agreed. I do not know that that is very remarkable. No doubt they were all hand-picked and had already agreed; otherwise they would not have gone there.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Agreed beforehand.

Mr. JAQUES: Yes; and who are the experts? Most of them, those who were used are the product of the London School of Economics, a socialist college or school of which the presiding genius at the present time is Professor Lasky. That college is responsible for the experts whom you people over there, who pride yourselves on being Liberals, are going to vote to support. I do not know whether hon. members have read Hayek's "Road to Serfdom." Here I should like to acknowledge an unknown benefactor. I did mention this book at the beginning of the session. I quoted from the "Road to Serfdom" and suggested that it would be a good thing if every member of the house would read it. A few days afterwards a copy was sent to me, and I understand that every member in the house received one as well. I do not know who sent it, but whoever he is I take this opportunity of thanking him. He is a generous man, and a great benefactor if the book has been read.

The London School of Economics was founded fifty or sixty years ago by Fabian socialists in London, and some time before the last war it was endowed with some five million dollars by the late Sir Ernest Cassel, the German international financier. When asked by Lord Haldane why he had bestowed those millions on this college he said his reason was that it was the purpose of the London School of Economics to train the bureaucracy of the future world socialist state. That is the purpose of the college, and that school has turned out a stream of economists, gold-plated economists, and subversive professors who have taught the youth of the empire to lose faith in the empire and in our power to govern ourselves as free peoples. And that work still goes on, and Bretton Woods is one rotten egg that has come out of that school, whether you believe it or not.

I do not pose as an expert, so may I quote Mr. Smith, congressman from Ohio, speaking in the United States congress in 1943 with reference to Bretton Woods. He said.

> We are apt to be led to believe from the newspapers, radio and other reports that this scheme emanates from a few individuals. Mr. Harry D. White, special assistant to the secretary of the treasury, is being credited as the prime mover of the United States contribution to the plan. Professor Maynard Keynes is being credited as the prime mover of the British contribution to this plan. Now, of course, we would be naive indeed if we were to believe that the officials of our treasury had undertaken this task on their own initiative or that Professor Keynes and perhaps a few of his associates had inaugurated their part of the scheme on their own accord. We may rest assured that back of this move are the most powerful international monied interests and financiers of the world. Furthermore, we may be certain that world power politics are playing a prominent role in promoting this movement.

I should now like to quote a man against whom I do not think anybody in this house will have much to say, namely, the Right Hon. Winston Churchill. I shall not apologize for quoting him. How are we to judge an expert except by the results of his expert advice? By their fruits ye shall know them. Listen to Mr. Churchill. In the House of Commons in 1932, as a private member he said this. I shall not read it all. He reminded the house that in 1925 when he was the chancellor of the exchequer he took the advice of the highest experts, men of great ability, indisputable integrity and sincerity, to the effect that if they returned to the gold standard they would anchor themselves to stability and reality. He accepted their advice and he went on to say:

> I take for myself and my colleagues of other days whatever degree of blame and burden there may be for having accepted their advice. But what has happened? We have had no reality, no stability. The price of gold has risen since then by more than seventy per cent. That is as if a twelve-inch footrule had suddenly been stretched to nineteen or twenty inches; as if the pound avoirdupois weight had suddenly become twenty-three to twenty-four ounces. Look at what this has meant to everybody who has been compelled to execute their contracts upon this irrationally enhanced scale. Look at the gross unfairness of such a distortion to all producers of new wealth, and to all that labour and science and enterprise can give us. Minor fluctuations might well be ignored but I say quite seriously that this monetary convulsion has now reached a pitch where I am persuaded that the producers of new wealth will not tolerate indefinitely so hideous an oppression.

The man who made that statement was man enough to admit his mistakes; he, more than any one man, saved the world in 1940. I think we would do well to-day to listen to what he said then. He said that he was advised by the best experts, men of undoubted integrity and ability. He took their advice, and what happened? Chaos and ruin. It is not too much to say that it was one of the main causes of the late war. And now we are going to do the same thing again. We have the same lot of experts who have never apologized and have never admitted their mistakes.

I should like to go back a couple of years to a personal experience in this House of Commons. In 1943 I was speaking on international financial policies and the discussion turned to gold. I made the statement that eighty-five per cent of the gold under Fort Knox in the United States was owned or controlled by private interests. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) was in his place, as he is to-day. He took exception to my statement and said:

I should like to correct one misstatement of fact by the hon. gentleman. He said he would stake his reputation on the statement that eighty-five per cent of all the gold at Fort Knox was owned by private interests, and not by the government of the United States. I have sent for the federal reserve bulletin of July, 1943, and the annual report of the secretary of the treasury on the state of the finances for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1942. At page 638 of the federal reserve bulletin I find a table headed: "Analysis of changes in gold stock of the United States," from which I find that in June, 1942, the stock of the United States of America was $22,737,000,000 odd.

His final statement was:

The records are prefectly clear, that the gold stock of the United States is owned in its entirety by the United States treasury.

Is the minister equally sure to-day as he was when he made that statement? I staked my reputation on my statement. Is the minister equally sure to-day as he was then that all the gold under Fort Knox is owned in its entirety by the government? I should like the minister to answer that question.

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps we had better wait until we get into committee. We are not in committee; no one is obligated to answer except in committee. If the hon. gentleman has evidence to the contrary I should be glad to have it. I shall look up the facts myself if he would like me to.

Mr. JAQUES: When I made my statement I had not seen a copy of the annual report of the treasury. At page 594 there is a table headed: "Condition of the treasury." It says "Assets: gold, $22,736,503,160.69." Below that in another column there is this statement: "Liabilities: gold certificates, gold certificate fund—board of governors, federal reserve system, $17,735,182,989.18." Then on page 638 of the same report there is a table which shows the stock of money in the United States treasury. The first column is "Stock of money, 1942, $35,840,908,000." Then the fifth column is headed: "Held for federal reserve banks and agents, $17,750,403,000." Who owns this? How can a thing be an asset and a liability at the same time? I admit that I am not enough of an expert to understand that.

Mr. ILSLEY: It does not say that the same thing is an asset and a liability. It says that the gold certificates are liabilities, and the gold is an asset.

Mr. JAQUES: Well, on page 638 it gives the stock of money in the United States as $35 billion; but the amount held for federal reserve banks and agents is $17,750 million. It is just as though an elevator contains 100,000 bushels of wheat. There is the wheat, all right, but 80,000 bushels have been deposited by farmers who have grain certificates against it. I think that is the real position of the gold in the United States. I mention that because I consider it to be of fundamental importance. People get the idea that Bretton Woods will be all right because the people own the gold. I maintain that the people do not own the gold; they do not control it. Of course, when my colleagues and I criticize the policies of the United States, both their financial policy and their anti-British policy, it is understood that we are not criticizing the people of the United States at all, because they are perfectly innocent and, I may add, largely ignorant of what is going on.

When I was in England the winter before last I put a question to an authority there, whose name I am not at liberty to mention in public because this was a private conversation, but I am perfectly certain that no hon. member would question his knowledge, and if they are interested I should be pleased to give his name in private. I asked this gentleman if he had happened to read a certain debate, which I mentioned, in the Canadian House of Commons, and he said that he had. I said, "Well, was I right or wrong?" He replied "Jaques, you were absolutely right; there is no question about that." I said, "Well, if I was absolutely right, how do you account for the fact that the minister must have been wrong?" His reply was, "I am quite certain that the statement was not made to deceive anybody, but he just did not know." So that even the experts do not know; that is the position.

I should now like to go back to the year 1943. In April of that year a Mr. Sandwell addressed a meeting of the league of nations society somewhere in this city, and according to the report which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen the next day he predicted a supranational authority with power to settle questions of immigration, natural resources, the protection of minorities, the repudiation of debt, finance and other questions. Then he went on to say that the loyalty of Canadians must be weaned away from the crown to an authority wider than Canada, wider than the empire and wider even than democracy. I thought that was something which should not have been said, especially in war time, and I brought it to the attention of the house on a question of privilege. Immediately I was assailed in the press right across Canada and called every name they could print. I was accused of wasting the time of the House of Commons. Particularly was I assailed by the Winnipeg Free Press. A week later there appeared a dispatch from Washington, as follows:

Secretary Henry Morgenthau disclosed to-day comprehensive administration plans to stabilize post-war currencies and fix their value in terms of gold. The plans involve:

1. Creation of an international stabilization fund by the united nations and their associates.
2. Fixing the value of currencies in terms of gold.
3. An agreement among participating countries not to devalue their currencies without consulting other members of the stabilization fund.

Both plans entail the establishment of a stabilization fund to be managed by an international bank, vitally important because it would mean that participating countires would lose control over the value of their currencies for world trade purposes. This control would be vested in the bank, not in a parliament or a congress, and if a country wanted the rate lowered or increased it could only appeal to the bank, not take action itself.

That was the first intimation of the Bretton Woods plan, and the speaker at the meeting of the league of nations society here in Ottawa prepared the way for it by telling the people they would have to surrender their loyalty to the crown. In other words, they would have to surrender their sovereignty, and to what? To international bankers and the gold standard. Is that what we fought the war for? It is not what I rose in my place in this house in 1939 to support.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Our boys did not die for that, either.

Mr. JAQUES: No. What about the Atlantic charter? We do not hear much about that to-day. Let me refer to a recent debate in the British House of Commons, when they were discussing conditions in Europe at the present time. One hon. member said that instead of the united nations charter, "since Potsdam something different has been added; we are contracting into a country very little larger than the United Kingdom over sixty million people. It appears that something like the fiendish Morgenthau plan is being carried out." Who is this Mr. Morgenthau? He is a former secretary of the United States treasury and connected with Kuhn, Loeb and other international bankers. He is also the sponsor of the international monetary plans agreed to at Bretton Woods. It was these same international bankers who financed Japan's war against Russia in 1904 and German and Japanese rearmament for the second world war, while the British empire and America were kept in a state of depression and unpreparedness. Now, according to the Morgenthau plan, war-torn Europe is to be weakened by division, starvation, hardship and the liquidation of democratic leadership until reduced to a Balkan standard of living, and eastern Europe will be added to the "new democracies" within the power-complex orbit of the Soviet Union.

I should like to refer to an article published in a well-known magazine by Doctor Ludwig von Mises. We are told at the end of the article that Doctor Ludwig von Mises was recently professor of international economic relations at the graduate institute of international studies at Geneva, previously professor of economics at the university of Vienna, and author of "Socialism". Speaking of international finance between the two wars, he makse this statement:

The state of things which prevailed in the last decades can be characterized as a complete surrender of the rights of the creditors and of the investors. Every nation successfully made use of its sovereignty to the disadvantage of foreign creditors and investors. Every nation exercised its power to expropriate foreign investments directly or indirectly by discriminatory taxation, to debase the currency, with which loans had to be repaid. The history of international financial relations has, in the last twenty years, been one of almost continual embezzlement. The governments of the debtor countries behaved like swindlers for the benefit of their own treasury and for the benefit of pressure groups within their population.

The new covenant of the league of nations—

One might say that instead of the league of nations we have got Dumbarton Oaks and Bretton Woods and the united nations.

—will therefore have to include a rigid limitation on the sovereign rights of every nation. Unilateral measures which affect the essentials of the contractual obligations, the currency system, taxation and other important matters have to be rendered unlawful. The debtor countries should not have any rights which are denied to private debtors.

And he went on to say:

All these provisions will have to be efficiently enforced by international tribunals and by sanctions which the league must apply with a greater measure of success than in the past. Without some kind of international police power such a plan could not be carried out. Coercive measures are indispensable in order to make reluctant debtor countries pay.

We have had Mr. Churchill's statement about the doubling of the debts by the gold standard, and, as a consequence, the impossible conditions in which the debtor nations found themselves. Now, under this scheme, under Dumbarton Oaks, under the united nations set-up, it is suggested that we should have an international police force. You can see the beauty of the scheme. First of all you put the world on a gold standard so as to double and treble the debts, and then, when private individuals and countries find it impossible to carry out their contractual obligations, the bailiff will enter the country and will be supported by an international police.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And atomic bombs, likely.

Mr. JAQUES: Yes, and atomic bombs.

Speaking of atomic bombs and the activities of experts generally, both financial and other experts, I believe it is a good time to say that experts should be on tap, not on top. It is the experts who produced the atomic bomb. Is it the experts who are to tell us when to drop it, and on whom? That does not lie with experts. It does not need experts' advice; it needs only common honesty, which the vast majority of people have and would apply rightly if only they knew the truth.

Speaking locally, I have in my hand a little pamphlet setting out the farmers' action programme of the Alberta Farmers' Union and the United Farmers of Canada (Saskatchewan section). Most farmers are familiar with it. I am going to quote only three or four lines on page 6 under the heading "Financial Policy":

> The people of Canada must have complete control of the nation's money system which must be operated under the direction of parliamentary policy with a national finance committee in charge, under the chairmanship of a person who shall have the power of a judge of a superior court.

I put this question to every hon. member in this house: Under the provisions of this act of Bretton Woods, if it is adopted, will the people of Canada have complete control of the nation's monetary policy? That is the question hon. members have to decide when they come to vote on this proposal. Are they going to vote for these ideas of internationalism, international government, international controls, or are they going to vote for the people who sent them to this place? That is the decision we have to make. It is a decision which I have already made, or I would not be speaking this afternoon.

A word about gold mining. I cannot help thinking—and in saying this I am not attributing anything in the nature of dishonest motives—that most of the speakers who have defended the Bretton Woods proposals are speaking on behalf of the gold mining industry of Canada. I repeat that I do not attribute improper motives at all; perhaps the majority, or an important section, of the constituents of some hon. members are themselves gold miners. Mention has been made, quite recently by the last Progressive Conservative member who addressed the house, of the tragic and terrible conditions which exist at this moment in the greater part of Europe. We are officially told by Sir John Orr, who, I believe, is president of the united nations food organization, that more people will die this winter in Europe from starvation and hardship than were killed in the whole six years of war. Of those who preach the virtues of gold mining in this country as a means of producing employment and wealth, I would ask: How much food, how many clothes, and how much shelter will all the gold in the world produce for those people? Can they eat it? Can they wear it? Can they warm themselves with it? There it is, down in a hole in the ground, absolutely useless; yet we go on mining more and more gold, under the delusion that by doing so we are getting rich. If lunacy can go farther, I do not know in what direction.

Mr. ANTHONY HLYNKA (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, as the minister will no doubt have gathered, the Social Credit group is definitely opposed to any gold standard, camouflaged or otherwise. Gold has never reflected the real wealth of any nation, or of the world for that matter. I believe it would be well to define what is meant by wealth. We in this group believe that wealth is goods and services provided to the people when and if required. To us gold has the same meaning as any other metal which might be used in the making of rings, jewellery and so forth, and it should sell for about $2 an ounce and no more.

Yesterday the minister made a good speech in presenting the case for Bretton Woods, but in making his statement I think he was perhaps too confident of the success of this measure. I think he felt that it would go through without any opposition or perhaps without any discussion. In his presentation he made this statement:

> In the measure now before it, the house is asked to express its approval of Canadian participation in the two new international financial institutions considered at the united nations monetary and financial conference held at Bretton Woods.

Let me repeat what he said, "The house is asked to express its approval." Apparently he did not think the house might not care to approve the measure; he took it for granted that it would approve. Even though he may be right, I still think the minister should have said that these proposals were placed before this house for approval or disapproval. That is the stand I take. Then he went on to say:

The proposed institutions are intended to be part of the permanent framework of international collaboration in the monetary field.

In the next column he continues and says:

The main issue which is at stake in the Bretton Woods proposals is the same as that involved in the united nations charter which this house recently approved by so overwhelming a majority. That issue is: Are we and other countries to organize and cooperate for peace?

Then he continues a little farther on:

In many parts of the world there is evident a keen awareness that if peace is to be maintained and if prosperity is to be achieved it will be necessary to plan for a higher degree of international collaboration than we have ever achieved in peace time in the past. In pursuit of this purpose, the united nations are in process of creating a number of institutions which are to serve as the instruments of such collaboration. The central institution is, of course, the united nations organization embodied in the San Francisco charter. This, it is hoped, will provide the political basis of security. But it is recognized that security also has an economic basis and that economic instability and poverty and unemployment provide a background conducive to political dissension among nations.

In other words, the minister chose to present this measure by way of making an appeal for the promotion of peace. I happen to have been looking over some of the statements which have appeared in various publications, and I find that this propaganda has been going on for some time, certainly since the beginning of the war. The words used are practically identical with those used by the Minister of Finance in speaking to this motion. I find that the supporters of the so-called "Union Now" or federal union also claimed that we must have peace at any price. They asked the nations of the world to subscribe to the establishment of an international government and to relinquish their national sovereignty. This international government was to have control over, first, the monetary policies of the countries in the union; second, the armed forces of the countries in the union; third, an international police force; fourth, citizenship rights of the people in the union; fifth, postal and other means of communication and, sixth, the regulation of foreign and other trade. It is rather striking that the approach they used is almost identical to the one used by the Minister of Finance in dealing with this peace problem so-called. The minister continues and says:

The international monetary fund is primarily concerned with securing orderly exchange arrangements, while the bank is intended to help in the restoration of economies which have been destroyed or disrupted in the course of the war and, over the longer period, to encourage and facilitate the international flow of capital for productive investment.

I should like to quote from an article which appeared in the "Voice of Austria," published in August, 1941, in New York. The author of the article is Ludwig von Mises, who is described in the publication as being a recent professor of international studies at Geneva, a previous professor of economics at the university of Vienna and the author of "Socialism and Economic Analysis." The article says:

. . . if there is any hope at all that foreign capital can be procured for the post-war reconstruction of Europe, then a new legal system for the safeguarding of these investments and loans is essential. No country which stubbornly wishes to maintain its full sovereignty in this field can expect to attract foreign capital.

Do not the two statements read very much alike? Let me read what the minister said:

The international monetary fund is primarily concerned with securing orderly exchange arrangements, while the bank is intended to help in the restoration of economies which have been destroyed or disrupted in the course of the war and, over the longer period, to encourage and facilitate the international flow of capital for productive investment.

The article in the "Voice of- Austria" continues:

The new covenant of the league of nations will therefore have to include a rigid limitation on the sovereign rights of every nation, which intends to borrow abroad or to obtain foreign investments. Unilateral measures which affect the essentials of the contratcual obligations, the currency system, taxation and other important matters have to be rendered unlawful. The debtor countries should not have any rights which are denied to private debtors. No country should have the right to inflict harm on foreign investors.

All these provisions will have to be efficiently enforced by international tribunals and by sanctions which the league must apply with a greater measure of success than in the past. Without some kind of international police power, such a plan could not be carried out. Coercive measures are indispensable in order to make reluctant debtor countries pay.

Of course, this is equivalent to a very rigid limitation on national sovereignty. But there is no other way to make international capital transfers possible again. The nations involved will have to choose between the renunciation of the aid of foreign capital or this abandonment of their unlimited sovereign powers.

It appears to me that the whole crossword puzzle is gradually being put together piece by piece. Parts of this scheme are embodied in various bills and presented to parliaments of the various democratic countries of the world. Of course they are made to appear very innocent and humanitarian in purpose. But these measures are being put through, and eventually we shall wake up one morning to find ourselves rounded up and with a world police force on the throne.

The Minister of Finance said:

On the political side, the keystone in the structure of institutions being set up for this purpose is the united nations charter. On the economic side we have, to date, three main pieces.

Then he mentions as No. 1, UNRRA, the united nations organization to deal with urgent problems of relief and rehabilitation; No. 2, the food and agriculture organization, and No. 3, the Bretton Woods agreement. Then he continues:

The structure of international collaboration will be by no means complete when the fund and the bank are established.

Which goes to prove that the whole system is being put together piece by piece and, as I have already pointed out, we shall wake up one day and find ourselves governed by an international police force. The minister says:

Nor does the establishment of a monetary framework conducive to liberal commercial policies in itself assure that liberal policies will in fact be followed. For this, separate agreement is necessary.

The minister is promising that he will bring in further measures to complete the puzzle. All we have to do is to look over some of the utterances and writings of the men prominent in the economic affairs of the world to see at once what striking similarity there is between their statements. I have a clipping from the Glasgow Herald of June 19, 1941, which quotes Sir Victor Sassoon, British merchant-banker who had arrived in Los Angeles the day before, en route to Shanghai. It reads as follows:

Sir Victor Sassoon said there was no other way to stop Hitler but to form a world federation of democracies, with Britain, Canada and Australia becoming a part of the United States.

"The United States," he said, "needs Britain, Australia and Canada to consume the exports of South America.

"It is now obvious," he added, "to business men of the world that the federal alliance of Britain is so necessary that it hardly bears discussion.

"Britain must come into the democracy of the United States with full rights of statehood.

"It is also obvious that such an arrangement would mean that Britain would relinquish her traditions and institutions of government."

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is her reward for winning the war.

Mr. HLYNKA: Yes. I maintain that it is not in Canada's interests to see the United Kingdom reduced to the position of a second class nation. I maintain that it is in our interests to have the British commonwealth of nations remain the strongest power in Europe. But it is evident to all, I think, that if these schemes are successful the British people will be placed in a secondary position, or perhaps worse.

Yesterday, the minister argued with the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) that the Bretton Woods proposals perhaps did not mean a return to the gold standard. He did not say whether the Bretton Woods proposals were or were not a return to the gold standard, but he placed the onus of proof on the hon. member for Acadia. It would appear to me that it is up to the minister to tell us definitely whether it means the gold standard or not.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And prove it.

Mr. HLYNKA: And prove it. In that connection I should like to quote from an article which appeared in the Victoria Daily Times of British Columbia of January 25, 1941, written by Major A. H. Jukes, D.S.O., O.B.E., of Victoria, B.C. He said:

What does it mean to surrender our national citizenship, our control of finance, armaments, fiscal policy and judicature, and return to the gold standard?

That is what federal union proposes we should do. In return for what? Greater economic freedom for the individual? If so, we must have safeguards.

Promises are not enough. We should know: Who sponsors it? Who pays for it? And, above all, who will benefit by its adoption?

Is this another attempt to consolidate under a new name that age-old enemy of individual freedom, centralization of power, with its absentee ownership and control? Can we recognize in it any concealed instrument of repression? Its advocates stress its sentimental value without explaining what we stand to lose.

I maintain that it is up to the minister to explain what Canada stands to lose if we subscribe to these proposals, and it is also up to the minister to explain what we would gain by accepting them. To make a general statement on the proposals, which are said to constitute the most important measure to have been introduced in this house in many a year, and discussing them in an ordinary manner, will not be satisfactory to anyone. It does not satisfy me at any rate.

I need hardly say that the position of this group has always been clear in reference to monetary matters, and I should like to quote from a press release which was issued by the Hon. William Aberhart, late premier of Alberta, two or three years ago. Mr. Aberhart denounced the federal union proposals, and, of course, the whole scheme as it is being put over us at the present time. This is what he had to say:

The proposals involve the federation of the British nations, the U.S.A. and other democracies in a union under a central authority. This central authority would have absolute control over (1) the armed forces of all the countries involved in the union, (2) finance and (3) citizenship.

Control over finance would give the central authority power over every aspect of the economic life of every country within the federation. As I have pointed out before, "those who control the things that people want control the people." So that the central authority would have absolute power over the lives of all the people in the union.

Suppose that the people of Canada were dissatisfied with the economic conditions being imposed upon them by the operation of the union's financial system, they would be powerless to do anything about it. Control over the money system would be vested in the central authority, and it would be beyond the jurisdiction of Canada's parliament to reform it.

Further, suppose that conditions became intolerable in Canada. Well—the international authority would have all the armed forces under its control, so the people could do nothing about it.

This all powerful central authority, with absolute totalitarian control over the people's lives, would be the executive of the union's legislative bodies, on which the British empire would have minority representation and Canada would be impotent, for all practical purposes. Under such conditions it is more than likely that the British people would find themselves under outside domination.

As a scheme to secure the centralization of power on a vast scale for the purpose of divesting every democratic country of its sovereignty, destroying the British empire as a commonwealth of free peoples, abolishing existing democratic constitutions and substituting an international dictatorship by the money power, the proposals of "Union Now" could not be improved upon.

I maintain, however, that any loyal British subject, with a love of king, country and the precious democratic rights which are our inalienable inheritance, cannot but view with revulsion and alarm the open advocacy of a scheme which would rob us of all the things we hold dear, and for the preservation of which we are engaged in a life and death struggle against the menace of totalitarianism.

The late Premier Aberhart was an outstanding student of economic and political affairs, and that is the statement he made. Mr. Speaker, may I ask you to call it six o'clock?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has still five minutes.

Mr. HLYNKA: Very well, Mr. Speaker.

I should like to put on record the stand of the democratic monetary reform association which was adopted in the fall of 1941 in the city of Edmonton. Monetary reformers got together and drafted certain resolutions, and the one on foreign trade has this to say:

Whereas the peace-time struggle for foreign markets is basic because of international strife, and is the disastrous outcome of manufacturers and producers being—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member appears to me to be out of order and has been for the last fifteen minutes. Throughout that time he has been reading from the same book. Standing order 41, section 293, paragraph (i) states that no member shall:

use his right of speech for the purpose of obstructing the business of the house.

I do not say that the hon. member is doing so, but I have had sufficient experience of debate, both in the House of Commons and in the legislature, to know that it is not permissible for an hon. member to read continuously from a book. If that were permitted, any hon. gentleman could make a speech by simply quoting from a book for forty minutes. I must rule that it is not in accordance with proper procedure.

Mr. HLYNKA: Mr. Speaker, I was only quoting from pamphlets and books in support of my contention.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would point out to the hon. member that, notwithstanding the fact that he has quoted different writers, he has been reading from the same book for fifteen minutes.

Mr. JOHNSTON: That is not right.

Mr. HLYNKA: I have various booklets here, Mr. Speaker. One of them is "Federal Union Exposed"; another is a report; another is "Debt-and-Tax Finance Must Go" and a fourth is "Prepare Now".

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not wish to enter into a discussion with the hon. member, nor do I think he wishes to debate the matter with the Chair. It is my duty to see that the debates are conducted in accordance with the rules. I have listened to the hon. member; I have also looked at him while he has been reading, and he has been quoting from the same book for fifteen minutes.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. CHURCH

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT IN OTTAWA JOURNAL

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I rise to a question of privilege to call the attention of the house to an article in this evening's Ottawa Journal. The article is headed, "'Tommy' Church Slipped." I never slipped in my life. All I want is a modern plant to clear the sidewalks on parliament hill. I want efficiency in road and sidewalk cleaning. I object to the article. It says that a veteran employee told the writer of the article that some years ago I slipped on an icy spot and that I have raised hell about winter conditions of walks and roads around the hill ever since. I never made such a statement. They have now a modern plant in Toronto that can clean all the snow from the streets and walks in eight hours after it has fallen, and that is all that I ask here to make the walks safe for the public on parliament hill.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think the question of privilege is profoundly well taken, and would suggest that we now move to private bills.

HAROLD JAMES CHESTERMAN

The house in committee on bill No. 188, for the relief of Harold James Chesterman—Mr. Maybank—Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. CASE: I want to ask whoever is responsible for these bills who bears the cost of having these divorce bills put through the senate. After all, as I sit here listening to these bills just going through like a machine I believe we are making a mockery of the whole thing. I understand that some 179 divorce bills have been dealt with by the senate, of which about 177 come from one section of Canada where they have no divorce courts. It seems to me we should amend the constitution or do something so that we shall not have to deal with these bills in this fashion. Where is this thing going to lead?

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

Bill reported.

HERBERT LAWRENCE LOUCKS

The house in committee on bill No. 230, for the relief of Herbert Lawrence Loucks—Mr. MacLean—Mr. Golding in the chair.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the bill? Carried.

Mr. HANSELL: Before this last bill is reported I desire to make one or two observations; and I do not choose this particular bill for the purpose, but rather what I have to say would apply to all of them. I do not rise to discuss the constitutionality of these matters or whether they should be dealt with by parliament or by a court, but after one has been here for a few years it becomes obvious that these bills are on the increase. Each year there are a few more, and here we have bill No. 230. I do not know how many divorce bills that would include, perhaps over two hundred, and that is far too many. There must be a reason for this.

Mr. MAYBANK: There certainly is.

Mr. HANSELL: I know there certainly is, and we are all quite cognizant of it. The thing is a little too serious to pass over in a rather jocular fashion. I rise simply to say that the causes of these things must be removed if at all possible; and if in a small way one small voice crying in the wilderness might bring this matter to the attention of the people and institutions concerned, whether they be church or reform organizations, as to whether anything can be done to eliminate the cause, it must be all to the good. Every divorce meas a broken home, and in many cases children are involved. Does it mean that society on the whole is on the downgrade? Surely we should be alarmed at the situation if that is the case.

I notice, in reading some of the evidence in these cases—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HANSELL: Yes, I sometimes pick them up and remark to some of my colleagues, "Now I am going to read my bed-time story."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HANSELL: That is about what the picture is, in most of them anyway. I notice that almost invariably there is liquor connected with these cases. And when one goes to a moving picture-show, one hardly sees a picture these days which does not show someone, maybe in two or three or a half a dozen scenes, taking a drink.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame.

Mr. HANSELL: That sort of thing must have some influence upon our younger generation; I do not believe that we should treat these matters with too much levity. If society is going down—down—down, we had better look out for our Canadian institutions, our Canadian life, and our nation. Someone had better become alarmed about it all. Evidently hon. members are not very much alarmed. All I can say is, that they had better be, because the same thing may happen one of these days to one of their own children. I am not overmuch impressed with the position regarding constitutionality. I believe Quebec is doing something to try to stop this thing; I honestly do. It may not be the way I would do it, or the way someone else would do it, but the fact that they do not want a divorce court is an indication that they do not want divorce. That is certain. It is about time that someone in Canada sounded a note of alarm.

Mr. LaCROIX: I have been listening for years to discussions in connection with these divorce cases, but I have never heard any practical suggestion in this house to solve the problem. From my humble point of view there is only one way to settle it, and that is, to kill all these divorce bills through our vote. Then there will be no more divorce bills next session.

Mr. MAYBANK: I thought at first that the hon. gentleman who has just sat down was going to say that we should kill all the adulterers before they committed adultery. That would be conclusive, just as hanging stops murders. However, I wish to make two or three suggestions which have come to me in looking over some of these bills and listening to the arguments which have gone on from year to year.

I cannot see that there is very much object in discussing whether or not these bills are on the increase here in parliament. I am under the impression, for what it may be worth, that they are not, although this year there is a larger number than usual.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is later in the year.

Mr. MAYBANK: This is a year when one may expect a considerable number of "saved-up" divorces. There have not been quite so many over the war years as there were before, but there has been a great deal of unnatural living of Canadians during these war years, and quite a lag—if one may borrow a term we use regarding industry—with respect to the bringing of divorce suits. That accounts in part for the larger number of divorce bills which are now before parliament, just as there is a larger number before the courts. I think that condition will continue for two or three years; then the outraged spouses will have caught up with the demand for divorce and things will become normal again.

Some reference has been made to the evidence in these cases. I am not at all satisfied with the divorce procedure as it obtains in the houses of parliament, although in any remarks I make in this respect I want it understood that I am not criticizing any persons in another place who conduct the divorce hearings. But it seems to me, as I read the evidence in these cases, that there is a great deal of illegality, aside from the adultery, behind all these cases. If one takes a page out of one case and puts it into another case there will not be any difference; you would never know as you were reading that you had run into another case; they are all so similar. The evidence in case A, if you tore out the title page, would seem to relate to case B. When you find that degree of similarity in divorce evidence you are bound to conclude that there must be collusion behind these cases. For that reason alone I do not think it is satisfactory to carry out the divorce business the way the houses of parliament are doing it at the present time.

When this matter came up a few days ago the Minister of Finance remarked that he thought some person ought to make a concrete suggestion as to what should be done, and not merely to inveigh against this practice from year to year; and that is what I desire to do. I have three proposals. The first is, that parliament simply stop being used as a divorce court. I see no reason why a spouse living in Quebec should expect the houses of parliament to go into action on his or her account merely because he or she has made a bad choice in marriage. I do not think parliament should be used for the purpose of passing special laws for special cases. However, there will be many who will think that that recommendation is too drastic. If that be so, I would suggest that a court be set up. I do not say you have to foist courts upon Quebec; there is another way of doing it. At any rate we should get these cases away from the houses of parliament and into the courts where there is machinery for checking up with reference to the honesty of the evidence. Again, if it be not desired to make that decision immediately to set up a court, the third suggestion I make is that early in the next session of parliament the government set up a committee composed of members of both houses to consider the whole question and to bring in recommendations as to how we can get rid altogether of this business, which is liked by nobody in either house.

Mr. HACKETT: Mr. Chairman, I have very definite—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I do not think we can allow a lengthy discussion on the bill. The bill was carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. HACKETT: I submit that the bill has not been carried. I should like to associate myself to some extent—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The bill has been carried and there is nothing before the house.

Mr. HACKETT: I submit that the bill has not been carried.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. HACKETT: When was it carried? We have listened to three or four speeches. I protest that the bill has not been carried. We have been sitting here waiting for an opportunity to speak.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I must disagree with the hon. member. The bill was carried and I asked if I would report the bill. That was carried and then the hon. member for Macleod said a few words, but we cannot allow a general discussion on divorce at this time.

Mr. MacINNIS: On a point of order; if the bill was carried and the discussion was out of order, then the hon. member for Macleod and the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre should have been declared out of order, or the hon. member for Stanstead should be allowed to speak. I agree that he can say what he wants to say on the third reading and he cannot be stopped then.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The hon. member for Vancouver East is quite right. We should have stopped any discussion. However, hon. members can discuss these bills on the third reading if they wish to do so.

Mr. BRACKEN: With all respect I suggest that you have already allowed two members to speak and you should let the third one speak.

Mr. HACKETT: I was about to say that—

[Mr. Maybank.]

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. If the hon. member wishes to discuss these bills he can do so on the third reading. I will report the bills.

Bill reported.

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre) moved the third reading of bill No. 116; bill No. 133; bills Nos. 163 to 171 inclusive; bills Nos. 179 to 186 inclusive; bills Nos. 188 to 216 inclusive; and bills 219 to 230 inclusive.

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add just a few words to what has been said by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) and by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell). I think the way in which divorce bills are being treated by parliament is not doing a great deal to enhance the respect of the Canadian people for parliament. If there has ever been a time since this dominion has existed when we should maintain respect for our institutions it is now when they are being so sorely tried.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has suggested that a committee be set up to study the question of divorce as it presents itself to parliament. I should like to suggest that that committee go even farther. We are confronted with a menace to the life of our country. I doubt if there is a man within sound of my voice who does not agree that divorce is undermining our society. If that be true, then parliament should be interested in attempting to allay the evil. Some people may say that that is not the function of parliament, that that is the function of our schools, our churches, our homes or other bodies, but I submit that anything that is so important, anything that has cast such a blight upon the national life should be considered, and considered promptly, by parliament.

Merely to ascertain where divorces are to be heard will not go to the root of the evil. When we attempt to stamp out malaria we do not merely kill the mosquitoes that carry the virus about; we go to the swamps where it originates and try to dry and cleanse them. That, I submit, must be done if we are to be freed from this evil. If the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre is considered—and I think it is a subject worthy of the consideration of parliament—the question to come before the committee should go to the root of the evil and not merely stop at considering the inconveniences caused to parliament and the indignities heaped on parliament through having to deal with these matters as we have been dealing with them to-night and in the past few years.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, divorce has been increased in latter years as after every war. I suggest that the minister should consider appointing a legal committee to deal with this whole matter of divorce. At every sitting of the high court of justice in Ontario the judges are loaded down with these cases; at times there are two or three hundred standing on the record. The fees in a few cases are sometimes exorbitant and many poor people cannot pay them. Then they must wait for six months before the final order is issued. I think a legal committee on legal bills should consider the whole question involved herein at the next session. The Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) should also consider introducing some amendments with regard to procedure.

It was stated in the house the other evening that divorce through the courts would be cheaper than in the senate, but in my opinion the law court method is about as dear, because you have lawyers on both sides and a file of pleadings, and a big bill of costs would be run up. I think there should be a fixed fee for divorce, say fifty or seventy-five or one hundred dollars, and divorce should be transferred from the jurisdiction of the high court to the county courts for the reason that at the assizes held in many cities and towns there is a large expense for the grand jury. I suggest to the Minister of Justice that during the parliamentary recess he consider the appointment of a legal committee because we have many legal bills coming up, and it would save a great deal of time.

Mr. L. A. MUTCH (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, I just wish to say that I have been four times credited with having made a contribution to this debate, and I am not guilty.

Mr. J. H. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, this discussion indicates that many members of the house are deeply concerned about this great menace to our national life and quite a number have asked what can be done about it. I am not so much concerned about the saving of time of parliament, because I think that what we are here for is to spend our time in discussing issues of national importance, and anything that is a menace to our national life is the business of this house.

Some hon. members have mentioned different causes for this disease that is in our national life to-day. The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) has spoken of the liquor interest. That is only one thing. I think the cure goes far deeper than any committee of this house could bring about. It goes beyond the work of the churches. You have to go into the home of everyone in this country, and we as fathers and mothers should endeavour to instil into the hearts and minds of our children a proper regard for the vows that married people take, vows made before God, not just a vow to be taken to-day and lightly cast aside to-morrow, and that divorce is not to be as easily obtained in the future as in the past. I read somewhere quite recently, and I was intrigued with the suggestion, that in Russia they are making it increasingly difficult for people to get married, and I think that is one of the lines along which we shall need to travel in the future. As it is to-day, two young people meet each other; they feel that there is a certain compatibility between them, and without consideration of what the future may hold or whether they will be congenial companions for life, and perhaps supported by a few drinks of liquor, they go out and get a licence and say, "Let us find a preacher and get married." That is all that many young people think about marriage.

I believe that in the home, in the church, in our schools, and in all our social organizations we should endeavour to instil into the minds of our young people a deeper regard for the sacred contracts into which men and women enter.

Then there is, I think, a work that parliament can do. I venture to say that at the next session, if not at this one, we should consistently demand a recorded vote on every one of these divorce bills that come up, and let the members of this house stand up and be counted so that we shall know just where they stand on this matter. The members of the other place will then find that we are beginning in this house to regard divorce with something of the seriousness that it demands.

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to reiterate what I have said in former sessions of this house in opposition to the method of handling divorce which we have had illustrated here this evening. It is nothing but a farce, and I think this house should rid itself of the responsibility of giving its assent to divorce bills in the way it is being done here to-night and has been done on former occasions. I therefore approve of the recommendation of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) and think the suggestion made by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) might very well be incorporated in the work of the committee. At any rate our first and important duty is to get rid of the present unsatisfactory method of granting divorce. None of us knows the details of any of these cases, and we are quite incompetent to say whether the parties applying should be given their freedom. Although I would not for one moment suggest that we impose on the province of Quebec a court to deal with divorce if they do not want it, I think the people of that province who wish a divorce could very well come to a court in the city of Ottawa where they could seek relief by the regular process of law. I protest against the present procedure and hope that something will be done at the next session to remedy the situation.

Mr. SPEAKER: Shall the motion carry?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Carried, on division.

Mr. PIERRE GAUTHIER (Portneuf): There are five members standing, Mr. Speaker, and we want a vote. We are entitled to it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Call in the members.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Mr. Speaker, it is an established rule according to British practice that one may rise to a point of order after the division has been called. My point of order is this, that for years the House of Commons here has been, as a matter of convenience, putting through a great number of divorce bills on one motion. I submit that for the purpose of this vote the protest can be against only one specific bill or measure and not a number of bills en bloc. I think that is reasonable; I think it is sound and I think it is sensible.

Mr. TUCKER: On the point of order, I would suggest that the matter goes even farther than that, the taking of the vote on other than the first bill being out of order. Had they not all been put at one time, perhaps the division would not have been asked for. Perhaps each hon. member asking for the division may have had different bills in mind. Therefore I submit that the whole request for a division must be out of order. Obviously when thirty-eight bills are put at the same time it cannot be said that each member who rises is rising on the same bill, or the first bill; he may be rising on the second, the third or the fourth. Therefore I submit that the whole request for a division must be out of order and we must start over again on the motion for this reading of these bills.

Mr. HANSELL: On the point of order, may I say this, that I concur in the remarks that have been made by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) and the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker).

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Standing order 8 says definitely:

When members have been called in, preparatory to a division, no further debate is to be permitted.

If the house insists on the point of order I must say that I have already put the question to the house and have called for the members. Therefore, according to the rules, I do not think I should permit any debate on the motion itself. If it is the desire of hon. members to prove to the Chair that they have a right to discuss the point of order I may give them that opportunity, and if I am not sure of the decision that I should give I shall reserve it until later.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): On the point of order, I believe that divorce is rather a point of disorder, and if we call for a vote it is because the majority of the province of Quebec are opposed to divorce.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Probably I have not made myself understood to the hon. member. I could not permit a debate on divorce or on the motion. The Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) raised a point of order and said that a single vote should not be taken on all the divorce bills which have been reported by the committee of the whole, but that it should be taken on one bill at a time. I wonder whether I can permit a debate on that point of order. If the minister insists on a debate I shall reserve my decision and give my ruling a little later. Therefore we shall not have a vote now.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I thoroughly concur in your judgment, Mr. Speaker. I think it might be of advantage to the whole house if you would reserve your decision and we shall proceed to the next order of business.

Mr. COLDWELL: On a point of order, is the suggestion of the leader of the house in conformity with the rules of the house? After a motion has been put, is it possible to raise a point, reserve the decision, and take a vote at a later hour? I would ask the Speaker for his ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is what I do not know.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am grateful to the house for its applause, but they will see very plainly in the rules of the house that it may often happen that the Speaker is not sure and not in a position to give a ruling; but as the house is master of its own rules the Speaker asks the house for permission to reserve his decision to study the question and to give a ruling which will have the approval of the house and which will be fair to all.

Mr. MacINNIS: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I agree that perhaps your action is the correct one at this time, because we are dealing with a matter that has never come before the house since I have been a member of it. If the point of order raised by the leader of the house is correct, that the vote must be taken on only one bill, it does not get us very far unless we take it as a precedent for a decision in all other cases. I submit, Your Honour, that a proper bill must receive three readings in this house; and if there is a division called for on any of those readings then a division is in order; otherwise there is nothing before the house. Every bill must go through that procedure, and these bills legally are no different from any other bill. While I agree with your decision to reserve judgment until some future time, and until you have had an opportunity to go into this question, I cannot agree with the point of order which was raised by the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the hon. member for Rosthern.

Mr. SPEAKER: I should like to call the attention of the house to paragraph 107 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, at page 53:

> In all matters of doubt, the Speaker will consider attentively the opinions of members of experience, or sometimes, instead of expressing his opinion on either side, may ask instructions from the house or reserve his decision on the point in discussion, or suggest that the house may, if it think proper, dispense with the rule in a particular case. In doubtful cases, he will be largely guided by circumstances.

Mr. STIRLING: May I ask whether the matter now stands until eight o'clock on Tuesday evening?

Mr. MACKENZIE: It stands until His Honour has made his decision and it is convenient for all hon. members of the house to proceed again with the consideration of these divorce bills. The time will be announced and due notice will be given to all hon. members.

Motion (Mr. Maybank) stands.

[Mr. Speaker.]

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND—INTERNATIONAL BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

> That it is expedient to present a measure to grant authority to accept on behalf of Canada and to carry out the obligations of Canada under the articles of agreement for an international monetary fund and an international bank for reconstruction and development prepared by the united nations monetary and financial conference held at Bretton Woods in July, 1944; to authorize the payment of the subscriptions required from Canada out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund to an amount not exceeding seven hundred million dollars; and to authorize the borrowing under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, of sums not exceeding seven hundred million dollars.

Mr. HLYNKA: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose for the dinner recess at six o'clock I was trying to place on record the stand of the democratic monetary reform organization on this problem of gold, but since Your Honour raised an objection to lengthy quotations I shall refrain from quoting anything more and proceed with my remarks.

I should like to say that I personally do not know how any international control of money will assist Canada in distributing the goods and services we produce among our own people. I say that to try and pretend that we can solve great problems on a world-wide scale is pure and simple shadow-boxing, and that the practical and sensible thing to do would be first to put our own house in order and endeavour to solve our own problems within our own boundaries. Surely this nation has reached the position where the leaders of government should be able to find ways and means of distributing the goods and services which the people of Canada produce, but of course we always hear appeals and speeches telling us that the only way we can solve our problems is to get into the world arena of international finance and tie ourselves to the gold standard and other international organizations. Strange as it may seem, since the beginning of the war, great pressure has been applied in every field to endeavour to get us to join various international organizations. Instead of hearing speeches and discussions in this house as to ways and means of preserving democracy, we hear speeches and appeals from the government benches to tie ourselves to international organizations, because this country seems to be too small for us.

The slogan of this group, Mr. Speaker, is that that which is physically possible and desirable must be made financially possible. How in the world can we make everything that is physically possible and desirable financially possible within our own country if we tie ourselves to some external force or authority? The people of this nation, and particularly those who advise the government, should be in a position to find ways and means of making financially possible that which is physically possible and desirable.

I have said that we must endeavour to put our own house in order before we embark on an international scale. I hardly need say that during the period from 1929 to 1939 the gold standards and all the other devices they could think of failed dismally in this country. Why did not the gold standard system or scheme prove a success at that time? Why did we have to abandon the gold standard during the war? Simply because we knew that to tie ourselves to this mechanism or this scheme would not solve the problems of the nation. Now, in the peace-time period, no system which will tie Canadian currency and credit to any basis of gold will help Canada to distribute her goods and services, rehabilitate her returned men, and assist in putting this nation on its feet economically.

I will add only one other thought. I consider that all these international schemes are carefully and cleverly aimed at reducing the power of the British commonwealth of nations. For centuries the British empire has been the bulwark of freedom and democracy, and we must not permit any scheme to be introduced, piece by piece, until we finally realize that we have surrendered our sovereignty and those liberties for which the British people have fought for more than a thousand years.

If this measure is as important as the minister says and as other hon. members who have supported it claim that it is, it should receive the fullest scrutiny and the most careful consideration; and I for one cannot see how we can examine the proposals as closely as we should, or discuss them as thoroughly as we should, in the short space of time remaining at our disposal. I fail to understand why the minister did not bring in this measure at the very beginning of the session. It is one of the most important measures. Why has it been postponed until practically the last week of this session? I do not wish to impute motives to the minister or his advisers, but I suppose it was expected that during the dying days of the session the measure could be rushed through this house without much trouble and of course the government would not have to put up such a very strong fight.

Therefore, in closing, Mr. Speaker, I urge the minister, even at this time, to give the most careful consideration to this suggestion. I do not believe he would lose much if he postponed the discussion of this issue for a time, or left it over to the next session, so that the people of the nation may be better informed upon it and hon. members have had ample opportunity to discuss it as thoroughly as they should.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): If I thought there would be no further discussion of this order I do not think I would take the time to discuss it; but if we are to carry on discussions I suppose that what I have to say may have as much weight as the views of somebody else. The proposal which was made yesterday that the matter be referred to the banking and commerce committee was a perfectly reasonable one, and we should have accepted it. After we had heard from those who are familiar with the terms of the Bretton Woods agreement, and any other experts—I almost hesitate to use the word—then, if we were not satisfied, the proper time for a debate such as this would be when the bill comes back from the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It would be too late then.

Mr. MacINNIS: No, not a bit later than it is now.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It would be all signed and delivered by that time.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think my hon. friend is afraid that he would be convinced.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We would be hog-tied.

Mr. MacINNIS: This bill, when it comes back from the banking and commerce committee, is really no closer to enactment so far as the powers of this house are concerned than before it goes to that committee.

In my opinion the issue before us is very simple, although the Bretton Woods agreement is very complex. We are not now asked to approve the Bretton Woods agreement; we are asked to approve the principle embodied in the Bretton Woods agreement, and then to send it to the banking and commerce committee so that it may be investigated section by section, and so that hon. members who are later to vote on it will have an understanding of what they are voting for. The real issue before us is, do we want international cooperation in the matter of trade and finance, or do we want to "go it alone"? That, as I see it, is the issue involved in either accepting or rejecting this agreement.

To-day and yesterday I listened to speeches on the dangers of international control, and fears that we might lose our sovereignty and have an international police force imposed upon us. That, to me, seems a strange fear, after having been engaged for six years in an international war. It would be better, perhaps, to accept an international police force than to engage in another international war in a few years. We have come to the point where the choice is, international cooperation for peace, or international cooperation in war.

Mr. KUHL: Even cooperation.

Mr. MacINNIS: Even cooperation. But my hon. friends did not object to that cooperation during the six years of war. I am not finding fault with them for that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What does the hon. member mean by that?

Mr. MacINNIS: My hon. friends did not object to Canada associating herself with other nations throughout the world in order to destroy the forces that were destroying the world. My position is that, having done that, having given our blood and treasure in bringing about peace, are we now to let all that go by and each country take its own way with its own affairs in opposition and competition to all other countries? That would end as it must end, as it has ended twice in a generation, in another world war. That seems to me to be the simple position with which the people, not only of Canada but of the world, are confronted.

We have heard a great deal of talk about national sovereignty. Will some one tell me how many countries have to-day any national sovereignty that is worth while? I think I could count them pretty well with the fingers of one hand. We have reached the stage where if we are to have peace; if we are to have that measure of cooperation that will bring about prosperity, not only for ourselves but for others, we must be ready to give up a great deal of our national sovereignty. Indeed that is the way world progress has been made. Not only have people given up things, but privileges have been taken away from sections or from groups in order that those privileges might be extended to even larger numbers of people. That is the way democracy has developed in nations, and that is the way it must develop in the international sphere.

Reference has been made to the danger to the British empire and the British commonwealth of this agreement. To-day in London, right in the heart of the British empire, a measure of this kind has proceeded even farther along than the road to enactment than this bill. I understand it has reached first and second reading. That measure is to approve the Bretton Woods agreements. Do my hon. friends to my left believe that the British government has taken that action in order to destroy the British commonwealth or the British empire?

Mr. BLACKMORE: They were clubbed into it yesterday.

Mr. MacINNIS: My hon. friend says they were clubbed into it. The fact is that they have taken another step on the road to international cooperation.

Mr. BLACKMORE: International slavery.

Mr. MacINNIS: We shall have to differ on those points. I must associate myself with the people who are dealing with these matters not on a narrow basis, a basis that is provincial to-day, national to-morrow, and then perhaps narrowing down to one city or one county. Let me say again that this Bretton Woods agreement is a very complex document. I do not say that at the moment I approve it; if I were asked to make a snap judgment I would say that, on balance, as far as I understand it I approve it. Some of the doubts I had in regard to it were removed yesterday to some extent when the Minister of Finance spoke. In the committee, if we do not fully understand it we can ask questions and have things explained to us, provided that we do not go into the committee with the feeling that we know everything and that we shall have to explain things to the people who drew up the agreement.

Let me say a word in regard to the experts. I agree that experts can be wrong the same as ordinary people can be wrong. Considering the field that must be covered by the average member of parliament in carrying out his activities; considering the great magnitude of the matters he must deal with, he cannot possibly carry on unless many things are explained to him. In many cases he must accept what he is told and use whatever intelligence he has to deal in the circumstances. It is rather funny to hear my hon. friends to the left object to experts. I remember a few years ago, when the late Mr. Aberhart was alive, when anything was asked about the social credit programme and how it would work the answer given was, "It is none of your business; you could not understand it; leave it to the experts."

I remember the stock illustration that was given. We were told that when we entered our bedroom and pressed a button to turn on the light we did not know how the dynamo operated or how the electricity was generated in order to provide that light. But yet we made use of it. That was the argument we were faced with. Now when we come to a question that is as extremely complex as this one we must rely on experts, and I suppose there can be experts in finance as well as experts in electrical engineering or any other kind of engineering.

It is not a question of having a perfect thing either one way or the other. It is not a question of black or white. I think the position the intelligent man must take is to examine the problem that comes before him, accepting what is good in it and rejecting what is bad as far as he can see it. Then he can indicate the way he wants to go. I submit that if we let this question go to the committee on banking and commerce we can come back here and those who favour it can be stronger in their support. If the experts or those who know most about the agreement do not make out a case in the committee, then those who are opposed to it can come back with their opposition much stronger. Why not let the agreement go to the committee so that we can act intelligently?

Mr. PATRICK H. ASHBY (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, there seems to be some doubt in the minds of many members as to whether Bretton Woods is on or off the gold standard. I submit that Bretton Woods has set up a new gold standard. We are as much as told that we can either take it or lump it. Here it is on page 31:

> Par value of the currency of each member shall be expressed in terms of gold as a common denominator or in terms of the United States dollar of the weight and fineness in effect on July 1, 1944.

There it is, as bold and as impudent as it could be. It may have had a little dirt washed over it, but it is the same old carat; it may have been increased to sixteen carats, but it is still there; it is the same old gold standard. I do not claim to be an expert on gold. I personally put very little value on gold. Most certainly this metal has an increasingly minor role to play in the economics of most nations. What I am concerned with are results.

At page 205 of the Fortnightly Review for December, 1944, is an article written by one of the leading authorities on gold and finance. In fact, he was the co-editor of two Paris economic weeklies from 1935 up to the outbreak of the war and economic consultant to various British and French firms in Paris, a graduate of Lausanne university, a doctor of social science, and he has contributed articles and political subjects to journals in Paris, London and New York. If he were not an authority this publication would not publish any statements from him. He said, at page 205 of the Fortnightly Review, under the heading, "The Role of Gold":

> Bretton Woods set up a new gold standard. Any attempt to explain away the provisions of fund agreement article IV section 1 (a) on this point is condemned to failure. It may be better or worse than its pre-1914 or 1925 predecessors. That is open to argument. What is not open to argument is the fact that its reintroduction is in the overwhelming interest of the United States of America which, with a gold stock of $20,000 million dollars, is fundamentally concerned in preventing its demonetization.

It may be better or worse, but it is still a gold standard, and I feel sure that it is worse. When we speak of the United States of America we do not mean the people of the United States of America. What we mean are the financial dictators called financial experts, with their vaults of gold, who control the lives of the people of that country and who hope to control the world. They are the supreme yet hidden power whose methods they are determined shall be upheld and maintained at all costs. This insane gold standard is wrong. It does not matter what system or standard we use; if the results are not what we want the wrong methods or the wrong standards are being used. The gold standard has never given and will never give us the results we desire. It always has and always will produce fear, poverty, wretchedness and insecurity, with ever-increasing debts and taxation, breeding crime and vice and ending up in periodic wars of ever-increasing violence. It is not the duty of the people we represent to adjust their lives and living conditions to a gold standard or to any other method or system whatsoever. It is our duty, sir, as representatives of the people to learn what results our people desire and want and then to instruct the experts whom we have appointed to devise ways and means that will produce those results. The people must hold us, the members of this parliament, responsible for all sickness and for all deaths in Canada caused by a lack of any food, clothing or shelter. They should hold us responsible for all crimes committed for financial gain. They should hold us responsible for all conditions of poverty and suffering as long as the materials required are not available or potentially available in Canada.

Likewise we must hold our appointed experts responsible, and it is our duty to our people to transmit to them the names of the individuals who are responsible for the financial system and for even attempting again to introduce and fasten upon us another gold standard. It is the duty of this parliament to remove from office any expert who does not obey our instructions. We must not serve finance but serve our people, who have chosen us in good faith to represent their will. It is the duty of the experts first to obtain from this parliament instructions as to what the people want, and then make their plans accordingly.

In this Bretton Woods agreement these international financial dictators responsible to no one have, without any instructions from us, devised a certain system and standards, with full knowledge, we must admit, of what the results will be; they have introduced a new gold standard for a purpose, and the purpose or result they know must follow is not one, I can assure this house, that will create a happy, contented and prosperous nation of people. It is designed, I feel certain, to repeat in a more drastic form the conditions which the gold standard has always brought about.

I spent some time when a student at Oxford in studying money and discovered that the whole system was based on fraud. Until we replace this system with an honest method, the results will always be disastrous. We must learn to distinguish between means and end, between methods and results. We do not want par value of currency expressed in terms of gold or old umbrellas. What we want is corned beef and cabbage. In other words, we want what we want when and where we want it.

In 1894 it was clearly stated by some of the world's keenest economists that the gold standard means inevitable war. But once war is brought upon us, gold is abandoned and money as required for destructive purposes is created in abundance. The gold standard means inevitable war. We know that. We have had several wars during the lifetime of many hon. members now present. Modern wars do not just happen. We are being ruled, not being served, by those who worship gold.

I wish the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) would not look so glum. Let us be cheerful about the matter. We have not lost yet. In fact, if this government only realized it, they stand to-day in a position which could be used and long remembered by humanity for many generations to come. In the hungry thirties I decided to go off the gold standard and to go on a standard that was backed, but not by worthless metal. I decided to go on a standard backed by real assets. I went off the gold standard and on to the turkey standard. I believe in that old slogan, a chicken in every pot; but my slogan in the hungry thirties, when we could not sell our turkeys, was a turkey on every table.

What we want to-day is not counterfeit money, but genuine money, money backed by the real available assets created by the people. As I have said, I went off the gold standard and on to the turkey standard. That is true. In the hungry thirties I received bills as usual. At first it was just an ordinary bill, and I would set it to one side hoping I might be able to meet it the next month. When the next month came, a word was added to the bill, the word "please"; and then the next month still more words were added, "please remit". "Past due" would appear on the bill the next month, and so on, until finally many of them gave up hope of ever being able to collect from a farmer who possessed untold wealth in the form of food which nobody could buy.

Consequently I started in to make some money myself. I know that the chartered banks had greater facilities than I had. They made beautiful bills, some of them highly coloured, and on each of them was the picture of the president or the vice-president. My bills had to be made of common ordinary paper, but I wanted mine to look fairly good too. Indeed I tried to embellish them. Now, whose picture should I put on my bills? Well, money is nothing but a joke, and the greatest joke in the funny papers was old Major Hoople, so that I cut out the picture of that notorious gentleman and pasted it on my bills, one of which I now hold in my hand. On the left-hand side is a picture of Major Hoople, the big joke, and on the other side is his wife Martha; for my money, if it amounted to anything, had to have some force and push behind it, and she was the one who was always pushing the major around. As it looked a little bare, I also stuck a tuberculosis seal on it.

Armed with about $75 of this money which I had made myself I went to town to pay my bills. I did have a little difficulty at first, but I explained that my bills were genuine money, the only genuine money in circulation, that my money represented real available assets. I explained to people that my bank would never have to close its doors, that I was not afraid of running my bank, because there were goods at any time available to all who wanted them in the form of turkeys, whereas a bank, if too many begin to collect their money, will close its doors since it has nothing back of its money, nothing whatsoever but pure unadulterated bunkum.

I explained and read to them what my bill said, and I shall read it to the house. "This piece of paper represents real assets, is not issued as a debt, and is non-interest bearing." After I explained that this was actual, genuine money it was quite readily accepted. In fact, so readily was it accepted that I had no further difficulty in getting rid of it. I went to a newspaper; I may as well mention it, a very commendable newspaper, the Edmonton Bulletin, because they had implored me to continue reading the Bulletin; otherwise I could not have followed up the antics of Major Hoople nor could I have read news about this government. Well, I went into their office and told the clerk I wanted to renew my subscription to the Bulletin. "Yes, sir," he said, and he immediately wrote out a receipt, thinking I was going to put my hand into my trousers pocket and pull out counterfeit money to pay for the subscription. Instead of that I reached into my coat pocket and pulled out one of my own bills—

An hon. MEMBER: Genuine money?

Mr. ASHBY: Yes, genuine money, and I presented it to him. I said to him "Here is genuine money. This is what it says: 'Will give to the order of the Edmonton Bulletin thirty pounds of A-1 turkey valued at six dollars, payment for the Bulletin for one year.'" There was a "6" all over it in case anybody could not read. The clerk looked at it for a while. He looked at Major Hoople; then he looked at me, wondering—

An hon. MEMBER: Which was which.

Mr. ASHBY: Which was which; wondering if it was my likeness. I saw him glance at the other pictures, thinking perhaps one might have been the Minister of Finance or even the Prime Minister himself. "Well," he said, "I really have no authority to take this money; I shall have to see the editor or someone." So he went into one of the other offices. In a few moments he came back. Before that there was not a smile on his face; now he was happy; he was contented. He was smiling all over when he said, "We will accept your money." I went home and left that bill in the office and I received the Bulletin for one full year. The date was changed because they were extending it for another year. Later on, after this transaction I have spoken of, a man telephoned me and said, "I have one of your Hoople bills. Is it any good?" "Why, man alive," I said, "read what it says on it." "Well," he says, "do I have to come to the farm to cash it?" I said, "I am not a banker. You do not have to come to my doors. You do not have to wait until you see me. Just let me know whenever you want to cash it and I will deliver the goods." Then I said, "But where did you get the money?" He replied, "I received it as part payment for my wages." One of those bills bought goods, and then it extended on and paid wages. This man was then about to buy some of my produce with it, and he did, after I delivered it to him. I hold that bill in my hand now. It has the stamp of the Edmonton Bulletin on it. It is marked "paid" and endorsed on the back by the man who finally bought the turkeys from me. Mr. Speaker, that is really all that money is, a permit to buy goods.

Mr. BLACKMORE: A claim to goods.

Mr. ASHBY: A claim to goods. Surely we can find experts who can see to it that our money is backed not by some metal buried in caves or vaults, but by the assets made available by the people, backed by goods. I am certain that this will be done in time. It is inevitable. That time is coming when real money shall be created and issued in terms of public need. If we do not do that I am sure we may perish.

That government, no matter what party may be in office, nor in what country it may be, which has the courage and the initiative to-day to take this step will go down in history as the greatest reformist for good in modern human history. The present Liberal government here and now will get our wholehearted support if they do that, and they now have that opportunity.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): I feel somewhat under an obligation to say a few words because I was a delegate from Canada to the conference at Bretton Woods. In view of that fact I considered that I should make a few comments on some of the speeches which have been made. First, in regard to our own experts who attended that conference, it is well known to the members who were there —their names are to be found in the final act of the united nations monetary and financial conference at page 6—that our experts were the equals of any there. I watched those experts in action, and I came to the conclusion that Canada had economists who were certainly able to hold their own in discussion with economists from any other part of the world. I feel that I would not be doing justice to our own outstanding economists who attended that conference if I did not say that.

Further they played a more vital part in the conference than those from many other nations, because of Canada's position with reference to the United States of America and United Kingdom. When from time to time it appeared that there was some conflict between the United Kingdom viewpoint and the viewpoint of the United States, the Canadian delegation more than once performed the very great service of helping to reconcile the viewpoints of the two parties.

With regard to the suggestion that Great Britain has been clubbed into accepting Bretton Woods, I take it that that is based upon the idea that Great Britain did not agree to enter Bretton Woods until the loan of over four billion dollars was actually agreed to. It was well understood at the time of the conference that this international monetary fund could not possibly hope to function unless Great Britain was given a loan which would enable her to tide herself over the difficult period which it was known would follow the war. That was well understood by everybody there. Naturally, Great Britain could not possibly hope to carry out her obligations under Bretton Woods unless the interval after the end of the war was bridged by a loan which would enable her to get on her feet once more and begin to be able to pay for her necessary imports by exports. Therefore any suggestion that she was clubbed into submission, or anything of that sort, is not well founded.

There is this further thought; having watched Lord Keynes and his associates on the United Kingdom delegation in action, I can say in all sincerity that I do not think for a single minute that a man such as Lord Keynes has shown himself to be, one of the outstanding economists of the world, or his outstanding and able associates would agree to anything that would harm their own country and the British commonwealth of nations.

There is some suggestion that this is going to tie the nations of the world to gold. It was well understood in the British parliament before Lord Keynes came across to attend this conference, that Great Britain would not permit her currency being tied rigidly to gold. That was one of the reasons why the conference took longer than was originally expected. In other words, there had to be a formula whereby Great Britain would be able to have elasticity in her internal set-up, and should not be tied rigidly to gold.

When my hon. friends of the Social Credit party, for whom I have the greatest amount of friendship, suggest that, when a man like Keynes starts out from the United Kingdom pledging himself that he will not permit his country to be tied to gold at this conference, and when he says after he goes back that he has not, that he has carried out his promise, he has not done so, that in spite of that we are tied to gold, then I submit that they are saying something which in their own minds they must find it very hard to believe.

Mr. BLACKMORE: They will prove it.

Mr. TUCKER: The hon. member says that they will prove it. This is a most complicated agreement; it is a complicated mechanism, and for anybody in this house to take that mechanism and by citing a clause here and a clause there without citing the qualifying clauses and the escape clauses, and try to arouse fear on the part of the people who cannot possibly have a chance to study this in all its implications, he is not fulfilling the responsibility which I think we owe to those who sent us here to work for them.

From the best study which I was able to give this matter at the time I attended the conference and since I say that when Lord Keynes said that this agreement does not mean that we are tied to gold, in my humble opinion I believe he is telling the truth and nothing but the truth. There were people at the conference who were just as anxious that they should not be tied to gold as my hon. friends can possibly be. For example, the representatives from Australia and New Zealand were very much exercised about this matter. I refer to men like the Right Hon. Walter Nash, a man just as anxious about it as my hon. friends are, and who believes in their ideas to a certain extent, who watched from this viewpoint the working out of this agreement very carefully. I submit to my hon. friends, who often have spoken with approval of the opinion of the Right Hon. Walter Nash, that he would not have agreed to the Bretton Woods conference findings if he had not been satisfied that the freedom of action of New Zealand to build up a high level of employment within her own country was fully preserved even after they agreed to adhere to the Bretton Woods decision.

There is one other matter on which I feel I should say something. There has been some suggestion that in its attitude to the international monetary fund and the international bank for reconstruction and development the United States is motivated by some scheme of imperialism, of getting control of the rest of the world. In reply to that suggestion I would say that the conference was called by the late President Roosevelt, who sent to it as his representatives some of his best economists and closest friends. When the conflicting viewpoints were being discussed and it was proving difficult to reconcile them, one always felt the driving force of that great humanitarian President of the United States behind the suggestion that the conference must not fail. Remember, the war was not yet won; Dumbarton Oaks had not yet occurred; we did not have the united nations organization set up. This was one of the first attempts to establish a scheme of cooperation among the nations of the world. We heard more than once that it was the wish of the President of the United States that the conference should succeed in its work in working out a basis of agreement in regard to setting up a clearing-house for the currencies of the world and also for the setting up of a bank which would help rebuild the war-torn world. To hon. members who suggest that in some way this is aimed at the British commonwealth I say, that in its darkest days the British commonwealth had no greater or more valuable friend than Mr. Roosevelt. When it is suggested that he would lend his great position, prestige and power to the drawing up of an agreement concerning this plan with some ulterior motive in view, some imperialistic motive, with the intention of destroying the British commonwealth, I say that suggestion comes with ill grace from anyone on the floor of this Canadian parliament representing a people who were touched to the heart with gratitude when in the darkest days of the war they heard that great president say that his great and powerful nation would not stand idly by and see us overrun and conquered by a foreign nation. I should like it made perfectly clear, in all fairness to the honoured memory of that great leader of mankind, that he could not possibly have had in mind any thought of dominating the rest of the world or of breaking up the British commonwealth when he arranged for this conference and urged those representing him there to reach an agreement.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me remind you that the way of mankind down through the ages has not been easy. It was not easy during the war that is just over. I have spoken to people who have seen what has happened in Europe, and they say the things that happened there are so terrible it is of no use trying to describe them, because the ordinary human mind cannot conceive of these things happening to fellow human beings. During the first great war those who wanted to escape the direct impact of war felt that all they had to do was remain neutral, and the war would not touch them. Well, some of the nations which adopted that policy during the first great war were among those who suffered most terribly in this war. And the people who suffered were the ordinary working people of the world. It is they who pay in large measure the price in human suffering and human misery.

To those who oppose this agreement I say that, like any international agreement, it cannot wholly satisfy every nation that adheres to it. The main thing is that mankind should come to international agreements in all phases of activity. If we learn to work together in the conduct of economic affairs, the settling of international disputes, the settling of disputes in regard to the use of raw materials, the setting of fair prices to primary producers the world over, the fixing of fair wages for all the workers of the world, the controlling of cartels and combines, and in regard to all the other things that require international action; if we achieve real success in dealing with them, we are well on the way to enduring peace. I suggest that it would be a most retrograde step, when forty-four nations have agreed on these proposals, for Canada, which depends perhaps more than any other country in the world on international trade, to be the one country questioning the motives of the power which originated this plan and which is making the greatest contribution to its success. I say that we owe it to the past and to the future to see that this step is taken, and to see that it is not the last step toward international cooperation in all fields of human endeavour. We must press forward along the way to ultimate world peace in all realms of human activity.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I would not have spoken on this matter but for some things that were interjected into the debate this afternoon and particularly this evening, which I think require that I take a few minutes of the time of the house to discuss. I am sorry that the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) is not in his seat at the moment, because I have someething to say to him in particular. In the course of his brief remarks he made the statement that he for one would support giving up a great deal of our Canadian sovereignty in order to obtain peace and prosperity. The difference between the hon. gentleman and myself and this group—and, thank heaven, a good many other in this house—is that we value freedom along with peace and prosperity, and we shall always value freedom. I can quite well understand that the objective of the hon. member may be peaceful prosperity. So is that our objective; but I say to him, and I think it ought to be quite obvious to all hon. members, that men can never be satisfied and happy if they have to give up their right to choose, which is the most sacred right they have and the one they value most, in order to obtain peace and security. I wish to point out to hon. members that an inmate of any well-run gaol in this country has the four freedoms and has them in abundance. No one can deny that a man in any well-run gaol or institution in this country has freedom of speech. He can talk all day and all night if he wants to, and nobody denies him.

An hon. MEMBER: It depends on how loud he talks.

Mr. LOW: They talk pretty loudly too. No inmate in a well-run gaol in this country is denied freedom from want. He has all the food and shelter required to keep him healthy and strong.

Mr. WHITMAN: How do you know?

Mr. LOW: I have investigated a good many of them, without being an inmate. Furthermore, nobody can deny that they have freedom from fear. They have armed guards during the day to keep their enemies away—that is something which we do not have. They are behind walls of steel and concrete at night to keep their enemies away—and that is something we do not have. They have freedom of worship. In a well-run gaol the authorities will supply assistance by way of priest or rabbi or minister of the gospel to any man to help him to worship in his own way without molestation. But there is one thing which men in these well-run gaols do not have, and that is freedom of choice whether they will stay inside the gaol or go outside; and that is the reason why so many take their lives in their hands to break gaol and get out. They want that freedom; and all the other freedoms and security they have inside the gaol mean nothing to them without freedom of choice—real freedom. I for one will not give up my freedom, without tremendous struggle, for any security.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. LOW: I want the hon. member to know, too, that there are a good many in this house who feel the same way. All that surrender of sovereignty he talks about on an international scale can easily become surrender of sovereignty on a personal scale. We stand for the greatest possible amount of individual freedom along with security and peace.

One other thing, Mr. Speaker, referring to experts. We have not made light of the experts, but we have pointed out that experts have differed greatly in opinion about Bretton Woods. They have differed so radically that it arouses in thinking men suspicion and a determination to go into this thing and find out what it is really made of. If there were a preponderance of acceptance on the part of the experts I would not be questioning it, but we can quote as many experts as can be cited by hon. members opposite. Just as many experts as those who hold that Bretton Woods would be a good thing for us, will be found to say that it will damage us and will be a detriment to the recovery of the world after the war. It is because of that fact that we question the finality of this expert opinion. We can agree that it is necessary to have expert opinion and we are glad to have it. But it is the responsibility of members of this house to find out for themselves. Experts can be wrong, and they have been wrong. I point out to my hon. friend what Winston Churchill confessed about what "experts" deluded him into doing in 1925. He stood up like a man and told us that he had expected peace and happiness and security following the return to the gold standard in 1925, but that these expectations were delusions, and that prosperity could not return under that rigid system of tying money to gold.

So much for experts. I turn for just a minute to the speech of the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), who stated that he was sure Lord Keynes would not have had agreed to something which would harm his own country. Well, it must be obvious to anybody that he made the very best deal he could and he broke his health in the three months that he was trying to make it. He was there with his cap in his hand, and he could not afford to take any chances in the success of his mission. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. WRIGHT: Does the hon. member think that England ever goes to anybody with her cap in her hand?

Mr. LOW: Yes; she has had to do so now.

Mr. WRIGHT: Crazy!

Mr. TUCKER: I did not hear what the hon. member said.

Mr. WRIGHT: I asked the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) if he thought that England ever had to go to anybody with her cap in her hand.

Mr. TUCKER: I do not think so.

Mr. WRIGHT: I do not think so either.

Mr. LOW: I will give you the chance to find that out in just a moment. The true test would be this: why did not the United States of America advance the three billion-odd dollars to the United Kingdom without forcing them to accept Bretton Woods?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think they forced them.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It was in the press yesterday.

Mr. LOW: All the press reports emanating from England since last night intimate that that was a necessary condition of the granting of the loan. That being the case, Mr. Speaker, I say to you that it would have been a much better support for the argument of the hon. member for Rosthern had he been able to say, when the United Kingdom came over and presented their case and the whole matter was investigated, that the United States was willing to grant those advances without the necessity of agreeing to Bretton Woods.

The hon. member for Rosthern also quoted the case of New Zealand. I should like to make it abundantly clear that here was another country coming cap in hand, another country, which had been accustomed for many years to go to England and there getting down on her knees for loans to keep her solvent in an economy which had been wasted on foolish experiments; an economy with the highest per capita debt in the whole world, and with her finances shattered. Certainly she came with her cap in her hand. She was in exactly the same position as was Great Britain.

Mr. TUCKER: If my hon. friend will listen, I may say a word on that.

Mr. LOW: I will give the hon. member a chance when I get through. He can make his answer at a later time, but I should like to continue and finish this line of thought which I am following.

The hon. member observed that Walter Nash would not have accepted a condition which would be detrimental to his own country. Well, what better chance had Walter Nash to get to understand the full implications of Bretton Woods than had some of the other experts of the world? For twenty-one days they met at Bretton Woods, as I recall it, from July 1 to July 22, 1944. The hon. member said that he saw Lord Keynes and Walter Nash and some others in action. That is fine. But Professor Paul Einzig, with plenty of opportunity to study this whole thing, makes a statement like this:

> And the text of the measures with the aid of which sterling is proposed to be wedded to gold has been made so obscure and complicated that even the expert with the specialized studies of a lifetime behind him has to read it many times before fully grasping its true meaning.

If Paul Einzig, with all his experience and training and understanding behind him, had to read it many times before understanding the full implications, what chance had Walter Nash to understand it in twenty-one days?

An hon. MEMBER: Or Walter Tucker.

Mr. LOW: Or Walter Tucker either.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. LOW: The hon. member for Rosthern —excuse me.

This measure requires the most careful study, because the results may be most disastrous, first to the debtor nations, and then ultimately to our own and other creditor nations. The very fact that authorities differ so widely not only in their interpretations of Bretton Woods but also in their conception of the whole thing, that some say it is related to the gold standard and others that it is not so related, that one group says it will solve our problems or resolve some of our national and international difficulties, and another group says it will not, but that it will aggravate them, should give us ample reason for pause. It ought to make us determined not to rush headlong into an agreement like Bretton Woods, without ample opportunity for full investigation and debate. There have been a good many things introduced into this house this session of far less importance than Bretton Woods, that have occupied far more time than it appears this will have, and it is high time that we changed that order of things and got down to important matters and gave them their proper place in the business of this house: That is why I think a vote of censure ought to be passed on this government for having failed to bring in this measure earlier and for having held it up until the dying days of this session and then trying to rush it through the house. That is not a thing they can be proud of.

There are literally hundreds of questions about Bretton Woods that require full answers before anybody could possibly be in position to judge whether it is a good thing or not. I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver East that this measure should eventually go to the banking and commerce committee for full investigation. We would then have a chance to call in witnesses, examine them, get their views and straighten it out. I am prepared to go to the committee with my mind open. When I have heard what all the witnesses and members have to say I shall then be in position to judge whether it is a good thing or not. But to get those answers I say will take time, and plenty of time.

Some people, including the hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Case) who spoke this afternoon, seem quite willing to commit Canada to Bretton Woods on the strength of the agreement of the experts from forty-four nations who met at Bretton Woods. I have already pointed out that experts can be wrong. Many times in the past they have been wrong, and we are reaping to-day the results of the great mistakes that the so-called experts have made.

They can very well be wrong in this instance, more particularly because in approaching this question of opening world trade on a multilateral basis so that every nation may have access to a fair share of it, they have not approached the matter in any new sense at all. They have made a slight modification of the old approaches. It looks to me as though they have attempted to put crutches under the tottering old economic system of scarcity. Any time that they attempt the same old approach we can expect the same old results. That is why I question very much the basis of this whole agreement.

It seems to me that the system which they are trying to bolster up by introducing this Bretton Woods arrangement has failed us so dismally in the past that the people of the world generally are seeking honestly for a new approach that is based on the real Christian principle, "thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself." That is the only principle that we can ever depend upon to get us out of our difficulties.

The Minister of Finance ought to be anxious, and I pay him the compliment of thinking he is anxious, to give the members of this house full and complete answers to the many questions that arise in our minds about Bretton Woods so that all of us who are the representatives of the people can feel reasonably sure that whatever we do in the end about Bretton Woods will be the right thing, not only for Canada but also for the rest of the world. It is our responsibility to get the answers to those questions. That is why we should have had the resolution and the bill before us weeks ago. However, it is here now, and I hope that no one will attempt to discourage the fullest and freest possible discussion on the measure.

If the minister can prove clearly in his rebuttals that Bretton Woods will assure to every nation access to a fair share of the world's trade; if he can show at the same time that Bretton Woods will facilitate payment by debtor nations for their imports without piling up against them burdens of unpayable debt and interest; if he can prove that Bretton Woods will contribute to the maintenance of world peace and of peaceful prosperity, then I say to him that I will give him every support of which I am capable to get the measure through this house at the earliest possible time.

[Mr. Low.]

We in the house should examine Bretton Woods and all the arguments and the agreements in connection with it mainly from the point of view of the debtor nations, whose economic welfare these agreements are designed to promote in the first place. We should not worry ourselves too much about creditor nations and their welfare at this time. The creditor nations can be expected to get along quite well even if neither the international monetary fund nor the international bank for reconstruction and development ever come into being at all.

I was reminded when the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Ashby) was speaking of another part of the same article from which he quoted. He was quoting R. P. Schwarz who had written an article which appeared in the Fortnightly Review of October, 1944. I should like to take a moment or two to point out what I think is something of great importance to the house in connection with the economic preponderance of the United States in this world. I think the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) mentioned that matter in his speech yesterday. Just as a passing reference I should like to mention it, now that the matter has been raised. Mr. Schwarz stated:

> Do the Bretton Woods agreements reduce the economic preponderance of the U.S.A. to bearable proportions by ending excessive economic inequalities between nations which, in the long run, must of necessity produce adverse political reactions?
> To answer this question, it becomes necessary to examine somewhat more closely the special economic position of the U.S.A. For, clearly, the dominant role it has acquired in the world economy since the first world war makes it the key factor in all future developments. All relevant facts and figures for that purpose will be found in the "United States in the World Economy," a publication issued by the bureau of foreign and domestic commerce of the United States department of commerce.

That was printed and published in 1943 by the United States government printing office in Washington. Here are some of the facts given in that document:

> These figures show that in 1929 the U.S.A. accounted for 15·6 per cent of world exports, the highest percentage of all countries; for 12·2 per cent of world imoorts (second place, after the United Kingdom); that during 1925-29, the net value of its industrial production represented 46 per cent of the total value of all countries included in a comprehensive league of nations index; that its national income, in 1929, equalled that of twenty-three other countries combined (including the United Kingdom, France and Germany); that between 1919 and 1929, the United States investment market supplied 7,500 million dollars' worth of loans to foreign countries—more than the total of foreign loans floated in all other lending companies combined; that, finally, the United States gold reserves expressed in present fineness rose from about 3,400 million dollars in 1919 to about 18,000 million dollars in 1939 (and have since risen further by another ten per cent).

Mr. MacNICOL: They have risen higher than that.

Mr. LOW: Perhaps, but at least ten per cent.

Mr. MacNICOL: To 23,000 million dollars.

Mr. LOW: Mr. Schwarz concludes by saying:

This dominant position was achieved in the short period of fifteen years after the outbreak of the great war.

On motion of Mr. Low the debate was adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS

DECISION OF MR. SPEAKER ON POINT OF ORDER—THIRD READINGS OF DIVORCE BILLS

Mr. SPEAKER: I wish to give my decision on the point of order raised this evening. I have considered the point of order raised by the Minister of Veterans Affairs with regard to the reading en bloc of the divorce bills reported to-night from the committee of the whole. I do not deny the minister the right to raise a point of order at the stage of the proceedings at which he raised it, but his point was that under our practice the question for third reading should have been put separately in each of these bills.

After mature consideration I have come to the conclusion that an objection to the question cannot be raised after the members have been called for a division; the objection should have been raised before that. It may be noted that the motion is that these bills be now read a third time. An affirmative vote will mean that they are read now. On the other hand, a negative vote would leave it open to any member to move that the third reading of one or more of these bills take place at a later date. Of course, such a procedure is seldom resorted to; nevertheless it is sound practice as shown in paragraph 756 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, second edition, which is a citation from Bourinot, pages 509-510, and reads as follows:

When the motion that the bill be now read a second time is negatived, the bill disappears from the order paper, but it is competent for a member immediately to move without notice: "That the said bill be read a second time on—next." On this motion being agreed to, the bill takes its place on the orders. The same practice obtains with respect to the bill, at any previous or succeeding stage.

So I will ask the Sergeant-at-Arms to call in the members.

Mr. MACKENZIE: On another point of order, Mr. Speaker, leading the house for the time being I gave a guarantee to the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) previously this evening that when Your Honour had come to a decision, due and proper notice would be given to the opposition of when this matter would be resumed.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): In view of what the minister has just said, it would be most unusual to take a vote now, because a great many members have left on the understanding that a vote would not be taken to-night.

Mr. SENN: I understand that the minister did give that undertaking, which I think should be observed.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Mr. Speaker, with all respect I must insist on the word I gave to the opposition being observed.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the minister speak a little louder so that we can hear him?

Mr. MACKENZIE: My point is this. During the debate on the point of order I gave a personal guarantee to the hon. member for Yale, who was then leading His Majesty's loyal opposition, that there would not be a final disposition of this matter until due and proper notice had been given to the other parties in the house after His Honour had had time to consider his decision. I regard that undertaking as an obligation of honour which should be observed.

Mr. BOUCHER: Mr. Speaker, what the minister stated is quite right, but I think he voluntarily gave that undertaking. I do not think it was at the request of any member of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes; the question had been asked me.

Mr. BOUCHER: Was it asked that the minister give that undertaking?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. FRASER: Mr. Speaker, on a question of order, is it not correct to say that these bills should have been taken individually instead of holus-bolus?

Mr. SPEAKER: I put the motion before the house that these bills be now read a third time. Objections were raised and some hon. members asked for a division, so I called in the members. That was the only thing the Speaker could do after five or more members had risen in their places.

As I have stated in my decision, the hon. minister raised a point of order. I have studied it and have arrived at the conclusion that I have only one thing to do, and that is to proceed with what I had already decided before the point of order was raised by the minister, namely, to call in the members. I think it is my duty now to call in the members, but since the house is master of its proceedings, if it is the unanimous desire of the house not to proceed with the vote to-night but at a later stage, the Speaker being the voice of the house I shall do what the house desires me to do. But I repeat that unless I have unanimous consent not to proceed with the vote to-night it is my duty to call in the members to vote.

Mr. SENN: The hour for private bills has long since expired, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I clear up that point? There is no such thing now as a private bills hour as the rule was suspended for the session.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Speaker, I am not going to pass any opinion on whether Your Honour should or should not call in the members and proceed with the vote, but I recollect very well that the minister told the hon. member for Yale, who was then leading the opposition, that before a vote was taken, some time would intervene for notice to be given before the vote was called.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Would it meet the convenience of hon. members if we disposed of this matter first thing to-morrow at eleven o'clock?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am entirely in the hands of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: If I have not unanimous consent, I must proceed with the vote.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Proceed.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the unanimous desire of the house that the vote be postponed until to-morrow?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER: Call in the members.

Mr. GARIÉPY: Mr. Speaker, as a motion to adjourn is always in order, I move that we adjourn.

Mr. SPEAKER: No member can put that motion to the house. The question before the house is a motion moved by Mr. Maybank, seconded by Mr. Croll, that bill No. 116; bill No. 133; bills Nos. 163 to 171 inclusive; bills Nos. 179 to 186 inclusive; bills Nos. 188 to 216 inclusive; and bills 219 to 230 inclusive, be now read the third time.

[Mr. Speaker.]

The house divided on the motion which was agreed to on the following division:

VETERANS AFFAIRS

ALLOWANCES FOR TEMPORARILY UNEMPLOYED—VOCATIONAL OR EDUCATIONAL TRAINING—UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure, as recommended and reported by the Special Committee on Veterans Affairs, to provide rehabilitation allowances to temporarily unemployed veterans or their dependents and to veterans undergoing vocational or educational training with provision also for the application of The Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940, for the veterans' benefit by contributing the amount of the combined employer's and employed veteran's contribution into the unemployment insurance fund, from moneys appropriated by parliament. Provision is also made authorizing the governor in council to take such measures as may be necessary to remedy any depletion of the said fund resulting from the payment out of such benefits.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

FIREARMS

POSSESSION AND USE—ACTION WITH PROVINCES TO CHECK CRIME

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice on a matter to which he gave an answer some days ago. On November 2, in reply to a question of mine, the minister indicated that the government had under consideration amendments to the criminal code which would help deal with the present outbreak of crime and violence in many sections of the country, and went on to say that consideration was being given to the passing of a special order in council designed to deal with the situation until legislation could become operative. Would the minister tell the house the result of the consideration which has been given by the government, and what are the present plans?

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, a draft recommendation was prepared for study. After very serious consideration of that draft it was not found to be one that it would be advisable to ask his excellency to approve. The matter was again gone over by the law officers, the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and other officials whose opinion on this matter we value, and consultations are being held between representatives of the commissioner and the attorneys general of the provinces in that regard. The stage has not yet been reached where anything definite has been decided upon.

HOLIDAY TRAVEL

INQUIRY AS TO REDUCED FARES FOR STUDENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport; I regret I did not have time to give him notice. Have representations been made to the minister in regard to the restoration of holiday rates for students travelling to their homes by rail, bus and steamship during the Christmas holidays? In the representations made to me this seems to be considered very important by returned veteran students.

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): No representations have been made to me so far as I am aware, but I shall ask my officers for a report and give my hon. friend a reply on Monday.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS RESOLUTION—PROCEDURE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I think this would be a suitable opportunity to make one observation in regard to the course of business of the house, and I am speaking now of the Bretton Woods resolution. I cannot speak in the debate at this stage unless I conclude the debate, and it is still in progress. I would make an appeal to those who are opposed to the resolution to cooperate with the government in concluding this debate. I would not say this if there had not been abundant opportunity for discussion. I am proceeding on the assumption that it is not the wish of those opposed to the resolution to oppose it by the consumption of time; rather I understand they wish to oppose it by argument, and there has been abundant opportunity for that. If this morning we could finish the resolution it would give me an opportunity to introduce the bill, have it given first and second readings and referred to the banking and commerce committee, and I am informed that this committee could begin its sittings on Monday. The committee is the place where the most satisfactory progress can be made in examining the provisions of the bill, rather than by an extended debate in this house.

I am simply making this appeal to hon. gentlemen. I think they have had an opportunity of expressing their views and, while I am not suggesting this, if they wish to make their position known by their vote I would have no objection, so long as the debate is concluded and the measure sent to the banking and commerce committee. As the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) said last night, there will be more than one opportunity for them to argue the case again when it comes back into this house; and if they see fit to vote against the bill then they will have that opportunity. My concern is to get this matter to the stage where we can really make progress.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): If I may ask the minister a question, will not an opportunity be given to make known our opinion on the bill through a vote when it comes back from the banking and commerce committee? I think many hon. members are undecided on this measure and will facilitate the sending of this resolution to the committee by voting for it, but without committing themselves to the provisions of the bill when it comes back to the house.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct. The hon. member will recall the course we took here in connection with the revision of the Bank Act. The members of his party are opposed to the principle of our banking system in one sense, but they are not opposed to the principle of a bank bill. When this goes to the banking and commerce committee they can vote against the provisions of the bill; when it comes back to the committee of the whole they can vote against it; when third reading is moved they can vote against it. There is opportunity after opportunity to oppose it, but the important thing is to get it to the banking and commerce committee as soon as possible, where progress really can be made in discussing its provisions.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is what I wanted to have clear on the record.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): It should be remembered, however, Mr. Speaker, that when the vote is taken on the second reading of this resolution hon. members will be endorsing or opposing the principle of this whole measure. That is something we must keep in mind, and that is why we have been so anxious that a full dress debate should take place before the matter goes to committee, in order that hon. members may have a chance to decide whether or not the principle of the bill is one they can endorse.

Mr. COLDWELL: I disagree with that view.

Mr. ILSLEY: On behalf of the government I will say that we will regard the principle of the bill as being set out in the objects of the Bretton Woods agreements, with which everyone is agreed, rather than as contained in the provisions of the Bretton Woods agreements.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): A day or two ago I asked the Minister of Finance if he would let us have as soon as possible the white paper issued by the United States, and also the joint statement issued by the United Kingdom and the United States at the time the loan arrangement was announced. The minister advised the house that he did not have the complete statement of the two governments, nor did he have the white paper. I think it would help in the consideration of the merits of this proposal if we could have whatever information the minister can give us with respect to these two documents.

Mr. ILSLEY: After I made the statement in the house I found that the United States ambassador had delivered to the Department of External Affairs a United States publication embodying the trade conference proposals. That is a United States publication, and I am informed that there is doubt as to the propriety of tabling it. But this is being printed by the king's printer, and the other agreements are also being printed, and I was informed yesterday by an official of the Department of External Affairs that they expect to have them in a position for tabling on Monday. That is, everything will be tabled on Monday. The only thing I could do at the moment would be to lay one copy of the United States publication on the table, and I doubt the propriety of doing that. I could do this to-day: I could get copies of that printed United States document and send them to the leaders of the various parties.

Mr. BRACKEN: Personally I should like to have that, and as soon as the other information can be laid on the table I am sure it will be appreciated.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND—INTERNATIONAL BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT

The house resumed, from Friday, December 7, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to grant authority to accept on behalf of Canada and to carry out the obligations of Canada under the articles of agreement for an international monetary fund and an international bank for reconstruction and development prepared by the united nations monetary and financial conference held at Bretton Woods in July, 1944; to authorize the payment of the subscriptions required from Canada out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund to an amount not exceeding seven hundred million dollars; and to authorize the borrowing under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, of sums not exceeding seven hundred million dollars.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Before I resume what I was in the process of saying about this matter last night, I should like to make one comment which I think should be considered by every member of this house. The Minister of Finance has stressed the objectives in the Bretton Woods plan. I quite appreciate that these objectives are worthy, and perhaps every member of the house will share that appreciation, but I want it definitely understood that we are concerned about the means by which the objectives are attained, and properly so. It is all very well to say that the best way to cure a headache is to cut off the patient's head, but we are opposed to cutting off the patient's head, and that is exactly the reason why we are trying to direct the attention of hon. members and of the people of the country to the means involved in bringing about the objectives that have been so admirably set out by the Minister of Finance.

When the debate was adjourned last night I was bringing before hon. members evidence of the industrial and economic unbalance between the United States and the rest of the world. I pointed out some statistical summaries that were published in the Fortnightly Review by Mr. R. P. Schwartz, an eminent authority on these matters. He concluded his statistical summary in connection with the matter of unbalances and the terrific economic industrial preponderance of the United States, in a world of smaller economies, by making this statement:

Upon the disappearance of this industrial and economic unbalance as between the United States and the rest of the world depends the economic recovery of the world.

If anyone has any doubts left in his mind concerning this economic unbalance and concerning what my hon. friend the member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) said the other night, when he referred to the United States as a giant among pygmies, as a Gulliver among the Lilliputians, when he said that this Gulliver, this tremendous giant in the world of economic and industrial affairs, would have to be very careful how he moved his foot lest some of the pygmies be crushed inadvertently, let me refer briefly to some further evidence of this great economic and industrial preponderance of the United States of America.

I have in my hand a treatise "America Conquers Britain", by Ludwell Denny, an eminent authority, and I suggest that the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright), particularly, pay attention to what this author says. The hon. gentleman last night called me crazy when I said that the United Kingdom came cap in hand to the United States last September in her efforts to get assistance for post-war rehabilitation in that country. I suggest therefore that the hon. member read what Mr. Denny has to say and get the evidence which he presents in this book, "America Conquers Britain". If he does he will find out whether I was crazy. I suggest that to the hon. member for Melfort, who apparently is still living in the same fog that clouded his vision and understanding at the time that Britain needed our help in Canada during the early days of this war. I will quote briefly some of the things that Mr. Denny brings out.

I have heard members of the party to which the member for Melfort belongs decry, and rightly so, the grasp which the United States industrialists are securing in other countries. I have heard them mention, and rightly so, International Nickel, and many other things which United States industrial power is doing in our own country, Canada, and of the great control that they exercise over the Canadian economy. I want it definitely understood that the process of industrial conquest has been going on for many years in Britain and other countries until the United States economic and industrial power has conquered Britain and many other parts of the empire with it.

Mr. Denny points out that in the United States during the boom period prior to 1929 the financiers were busy effecting great company mergers. He records that more than 1,000 public utility company mergers took place in the United States in 1926. In the period from 1927 to 1929 there were fifty bank mergers in New York alone, "creating an ever larger concentration of capital for domestic and foreign use," and he mentions that the National City bank had 98 branches in 26 foreign countries. What does that mean? From 1925 to 1928 United States loans to foreign countries averaged $1,100 million a year. Seventeen American corporations operating in foreign countries floated bond and stock issues in 1928 totalling $147 million. For what purpose? What would they be doing with this huge mobilization of the American public's money.

Mr. Denny supplies innumerable instances of what they are doing with it, of which the following are good examples. In 1929 General Motors of the United States bought the controlling interest in the Opel Motors of Germany. By March, 1929 American General Electric had bought sixty per cent of the stock of British General Electric, a controlling interest. Early in 1929 the leading electrical manufacturing concern in Britain, namely British Thompson Houston, Metropolitan Vicars, Edison, Swan, and Ferguson Pailin, were fused into the Associated Electrical Industries in which the principal shareholder was American General Electric.

I should like the member for Rosthern particularly to hear what I am saying because this should be impressed upon his mind after the demonstration he gave in this house last night.

Mr. MacNICOL: Exhibition would be a better word, would it not?

Mr. LOW: I suppose exhibition would be appropriate. In 1928 Electric Bond and Share, subsidiary of American General Electric, more than doubled its investments—from $108 million to $285 million—in Britain through these and other concerns. General Electric is said to control fifty-two per cent of the United States total power production. The Bond and Share Subsidiary controls public utilities of eleven foreign countries and has large holdings in six other foreign countries.

Another point that Mr. Denny brings out forcibly is this. In Italy American General Electric is said to have large holdings in Italian Super Power, which is making that country independent of British coal and has undoubtedly brought about a deterioration in the coal trade from Britain, which has brought her almost to her knees. American General Electric further interlocks with Radio Corporation of America, which in its turn is a huge trust with world-wide domination over wireless, the greatest means of mass communication in the entire world; and further, British Marconi Company is now tied up with Radio Corporation, of which I have just spoken. In 1929 American Power and Light Corporation brought up the entire common stock of greater London Counties Trust, a trust controlling seven of the chief power companies of Britain and supplying power on a monopoly basis to ninety-five cities in England and Scotland. It also controls Edmundson Electrical Corporation owning a number of electrical supply companies in Britain. A British government inquiry was made into this United States ownership of the motive power of British industry but it lamely reported that the ownership was unimportant. The late Lord Birkenhead was set up as a representative of the United States owners.

I could go on and enumerate hundreds of cases brought to light by Ludwell Denny showing and proving conclusively the almost complete conquest of Britain and the British commonwealth by United States industry.

Just at this point I should like to emphasize for the benefit of the hon. member for Rosthern and the hon. member for Melfort that when we speak of Britain coming to the United States with cap in hand, when we speak of the tremendous preponderance of United States industry and productive capacity, we are not attacking Mr. Roosevelt, the late revered president of the United States. No one in this group has ever done so. I think the hon. member for Rosthern could have saved himself the wear and tear of his outburst last night in that connection. What we have tried to emphasize is that the preponderance of the United States in world industry and production has made it absolutely necessary that something be done to remove the unbalances, otherwise inadvertently they may cause the destruction of lesser countries of the world. I would remind the hon. member that when he speaks of Mr. Roosevelt as being a friend of Canada, I agree that he was. He was also a revered friend of Great Britain. But I should like to ask the hon. member for Rosthern, or anybody else for that matter, whether he thinks it would have been humanly possible for President Roosevelt, with all the multitudinous affairs of state that he had to look after, to go deeply into the implications of Bretton Woods and know all of them.

I suggest that that would be foolish. President Roosevelt had to depend upon his advisers. I would like to know who those advisers were. I would like to know if Bernard Baruch was one. I know Morgenthau was one and there were several others. I suggest that those men were certainly looking after the welfare of the United States.

In that connection I am going to quote for the benefit of the hon. member for Rosthern what Mr. Morgenthau said at the Bretton Woods conference. I am quoting from the united nations monetary and financial conference Final Act, and related documents where Mr. Baruch is quoted on page 8. I suppose the hon. member for Rosthern was there and he probably heard him say this:

> The American delegation, which I have had the honour of leading, has at all times been conscious of its primary obligation—the protection of American interests.

I suggest that the United States delegation have always had foremost in their minds the protection of United States interests. No one denies that they have been mighty hard bargainers in the past and they have not yet got over that mental complex by any means. That is the reason why this thing must be subjected to the most careful scrutiny to see to it that our interests have been carefully looked after. One question which I think ought to be answered in this house is whether the Canadian delegation amply and completely looked after Canadian interests.

I should like to know also whether the Bretton Woods agreements have any provision for reducing the preponderance of the United States in the industrial and productive fields to bearable proportions by ending existing economic inequalities between nations, which in the long run must of necessity produce not only adverse political reactions but adverse economic reactions throughout the world.

Mr. TUCKER: That is the basic idea underlying the whole agreement. When my hon. friend talks like that it makes me think that he has not studied the agreement at all.

Mr. LOW: The hon. member for Rosthern will have plenty of opportunity to present his evidence. I make the suggestion right now that he be ready to present that evidence in committee.

Mr. TUCKER: It is in the agreement itself.

Mr. LOW: I do not want him to do this from any hidden conception he may have in his own mind, but from the Final Act itself. Does Bretton Woods provide and ensure that the United States will buy enough and can buy enough from its customers to give them regularly that supply of dollars which they require for their purchases from the United States? Upon a satifsactory answer to that question will depend whether I can support the measure. If the hon. member can show that it does, then fine.

Let me examine for just a moment the United States employment prospects, which reveal some very significant things. Competent authorities in the United States expect a very large unemployment problem by 1946 unless something adequate is done to prevent it. The Falk Foundation and other investigations carried on in the United States indicate that they expect unemployment to reach as high as 20,000,000 unless some very effective means are taken to provide relief. I suggest that if the United States is to avoid mass unemployment a far greater total of goods and services will have to be produced and consumed by Americans than ever before in peace time. Mr. Vinson, the new secretary of the treasury of the United States, recently described this—he shows by his statement that he understands the situation—as "the pleasant predicament of having to learn to live fifty per cent better than ever before." That must mean that he understands at least one great problem that has to be resolved before Bretton Woods can possibly be made to work.

The problem I say is one of matching expenditures to potential production. I suggest that it is not an insoluble problem, but it does require new vision and a new type of thinking. I have been much interested in some of the figures that have been given with respect to the prospects of full employment in the United States and also their great productive capacity. I should like to quote some figures which were recently published by the department of commerce with respect to the gross national product of the United States. I find that in 1929, this gross national product measured in terms of market prices total $99·4 billion; by 1944 that had risen to $198·7 billion. It had almost doubled. In other words, the United States is producing to-day nearly twice as much goods and services as she did in any time of peace.

The explanation is not far to seek; it simply must be that there were unexpected and unexplained margins of employment where they could have put men to work and where in many instances they could have doubled the capacity of existing factories and industrial concerns. I am convinced that if the United States is to avoid unemployment, far larger totals of goods and services will have to be produced and consumed in America than ever before in peace time.

What was their consumption in peace time? In 1929 the total consumption of gross national product in the three fields of ordinary consumption, government consumption and capital consumption was only $87·7 billion. That was at the peak of the pre-war years. The consumption in 1944, which included war consumption, had risen to $171·2 billion. These recent surveys indicate that if the United States is to solve the unemployment problem that will face her as she goes into peace time she will have to keep up her gross national production to approximately $170 billion.

That poses a problem. It means that if the United States is going to keep her people busy, is going to give them what she pleases to call full employment—and I understand she is determined to do that—she will have to train her people to consume at least 50 per cent more goods and services within the country than they have ever consumed in any previous year. It means that the United States of America will have to find means of distributing equitably among its people purchasing power or consumer demand to enable them to consume those vast extra quantities of goods and services. Further, they will have to change a good many of their habits in some parts of the country to be able to do that, and this poses a problem that will have to be tackled before Bretton Woods can even start on the road to success.

In addition, even if the United States of America maintain a yearly gross national production of the $170 billion required to take care of the employment situation, and even if they train their people and make it possible through the distribution of effective consumer demand for their people to consume 50 per cent more than they have done in any year previously, there will still be left a great volume of goods, estimated variously at from four to seven billion dollars, that will have to go into the export market. If they do not make effective demand available to all the people of the United States and thus help to increase their internal consumption, it follows that a far larger total of the gross national production of the United States will be dumped into international trade channels, and when that happens in quantities greater than ever before, I suggest that it will bring about a very difficult problem in world affairs. I say that the solution of that problem cannot be found anywhere in Bretton Woods. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and through you the hon. members who are sponsoring this measure, what provision Bretton Woods is making to see to it that the people of the United States will receive internally, sufficient effective consumer demand to enable them to consume 50 per cent more per year than they ever consumed in their lives before. I suggest that there is nothing in Bretton Woods which indicates any attempt to make that possible.

In a lesser degree Canada is in the same position as is the United States. Canada, if it wishes to maintain full employment from now on, will have to increase the gross national production and the gross national consumption. The only way that can be done is to find some means of distributing effective consumer demand in this country to the people who need it so that Canadians can consume. Otherwise all this talk of adjusting trade on a multilateral basis is just so much quibble. If I can be assured that Bretton Woods provides some means whereby the United States can consume within that country most of the goods she produces, or if it provides that the great exportable surplus that must be available if they put their men to work, may be given away or put into the hands of the peoples of the more unforunate countries of the world without piling up against them unpayable burdens of debt, I will support it.

Much has been said about gold and the gold standard. I am not certain in my own mind what kind of gold standard this might introduce. But it does seem queer that concurrently with the drive to get Bretton Woods adopted by the house and by the government, there has been a protracted programme of propaganda on the part of K. V. Gamble Company in Toronto to show that a gold standard is necessary. That may be just accident; I do not know. Here are some of the headlines: "Gold is the Balance Wheel of International Trade"—"That Off The Gold Standard Urge"—"A Herculean Task Requires Herculean Methods"—"The Old Lady Goes to Work," and so on. Of course, it may be just accident that these pamphlets appear just at this time; I do not know.

There are five points in connection with the gold standard which I should like hon. members to consider. The five points follow: Whether Bretton Woods means the introduction of a gold standard similar to the one of 1925 or 1914 I do not know, but the fact remains that:

(1) Under the old gold standard the value of sterling was legally fixed in terms of a given weight of gold. This will be precisely the same under the new gold standard.

(2) Under the old gold standard our monetary authorities were under the obligation to buy and sell gold freely at a fixed buying and selling price.

This will be the same under the new gold standard, with the difference that gold will not be available for internal hoarding.

(3) Under the old gold standard sterling was allowed to fluctuate within a range of about one per cent. Under the new gold standard its range of fluctuations has been rigidly fixed at one per cent.

(4) Under the old gold standard there was no limit for the fluctuation of the price of sterling for future delivery. In this respect the new gold standard is much more rigid, for under it a limit will be set also to the fluctuations of "forward" sterling.

(5) Under the old gold standard it was possible for this country to suspend the system or to devalue sterling to any extent by simple government decision, subject to confirmation by parliament, without having to ask for the permission of any outside body, indeed, without having to consult anybody about it.

Under the new gold standard, on the other hand, it will be necessary to obtain the permission of an international board, on which our trade rivals will control the majority vote for any devaluation in excess of 10 per cent.

These are not my opinions; they are the opinions of an expert. The five points I have just quoted are the opinion of Professor Paul Einzig.

May I assure the minister in conclusion that I am prepared to support what he has asked. No further speakers from this group will take part in the debate at this stage, but I should like the assurance on a matter of such importance as this not only that it will be given ample consideration by the banking and commerce committee but that we shall be given the opportunity for full debate also in this house in committee of the whole when the measure comes back from the committee.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. IRVINE: With your permission, Mr. Speaker, and the permission of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Low) I should like to ask him a question, not in any spirit of opposition, because I agree with a great deal of the data which he has placed before the house and which I think is not open to question. But I think there is a point of difference between my hon. friend and myself in the matter of philosophy. I think he has come a long way toward my views, and I want to make sure whether I am right. The hon. gentleman made much in his argument of the ownership of industrial control by the United States of America, and made special reference to the ownership by the Americans of a large proportion of the electric power available in Great Britain. My understanding of his philosophy is that he takes the position that in Canada it does not matter who owns anything so long as those who do own it produce, that so long as we get the goods it does not matter who owns anything. If it does not matter who owns anything in Canada, by what reasoning, I would ask, does he arrive at the conclusion that it makes any difference who owns anything in the other nations of the world?

Mr. LOW: It ought to be obvious to the hon. member that in the international sphere the ownership can create these unfavourable trade balances which Bretton Woods is supposed to be ready to cure. But internally, that is nationally, I would say that the government of this country ought to be in a position to provide the capital to buy out international cartels and combines, and afterwards sell them into the hands of private ownership, to see that they are properly run.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is socialism.

Mr. LOW: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: Social ownership.

Mr. JOHNSTON: You did not get the last part of the sentence: "in the hands of private ownership", he said.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Ilsley) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I was paired with the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Lalonde). Had I voted, I would have voted for the resolution.

Mr. HACKETT: I was paired with the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott). Had I voted, I would have voted for the resolution.

Mr. MacNAUGHT: I was paired with the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Coyle). Had I voted, I would have voted for the resolution.

Mr. BOUCHER: I was paired with the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Robinson). I do not know how he would have voted, therefore I did not vote.

[Mr. Johnston.]

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I was paired with the hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Breithaupt). Had I voted, I would have voted against the resolution.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald, (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. QUELCH: When I spoke on December 6, the Finance Minister asked me the following question at the conclusion of my remarks:

What is the authority for the hon. member's statement that the United States forced a promise from Mr. Winston Churchill that he would lead the United Kingdom back to a gold standard satisfactory to the United States?

I replied:

I explained at the outset what my authority was. I was giving it for what it is worth. The pamphlet was signed by Mr. Eric Troward, president of the liberator council, and it is headed:

This memorandum has been specially prepared for the benefit of new members of parliament, many of whom have not had the opportunity of studying the trend of international financial development during the past two years.

In regard to the liberator council, I would just like to point out that the chief adviser is Sir Charles Morgan-Webb, late chief secretary of the Burma government, who is a world authority on gold and the sterling group. So it is not a pamphlet that can be dismissed lightly. I do not think a man like Sir Charles Morgan-Webb would have anything to do with an organization distributing a pamphlet making that charge unless there was some proof of it.

Mr. Ilsley: My hon. friend is basing its authenticity upon the alleged standing of the adviser to this liberator council. As to who the gentleman is who made the statement, I do not know. I just want to say that I do not believe the statement.

Mr. Quelch: The minister will agree that the fact that Britain has agreed to Bretton Woods is pretty good backing for that statement.

Mr. Ilsley: No, I do not believe that the dominions of the British empire are joining in this treachery to themselves. I think that is ridiculous.

I want to deal for a few minutes with the two points raised by the minister in this question. I should like to take the last statement first, in which the minister said he did not believe the dominions of the British empire were joining in this treachery to themselves, that it was ridiculous. Just to make sure there is no misunderstanding of what I might mean by the term "treachery" I should like to give the definition from Webster's dictionary, which says it is a violation of faith and confidence, or perfidious action, and of course I was referring to it in that sense. I believe I can justify my stand in that regard. I am not suggesting for one moment that the people of the dominions are betraying themselves, but what I do suggest is that the governments, under the advice of certain experts, are taking action that will be highly detrimental to the countries concerned, and to that extent will unquestionably be a breach of the confidence they have from the people. As to who advises the experts of course I am not in a position to say. I think the committee would be very glad if the minister would explain exactly how this whole thing originated. Who was responsible for this? Did it come from the government in the first place, or did it come as a recommendation from some other body? I understand that the government participated in certain agreements at London and Washington to set up some form of monetary stabilization, and some time ago I asked what were the terms of reference upon which our experts worked. Did they go there with a completely free hand to agree to an international standard based upon gold, or was it recommended that they advocate a multilateral system of trade using the national currencies of the countries based upon index price levels rather than in terms of gold? I believe later on the minister should explain that point; I have asked the question before, but up to the present have not been able to obtain an answer.

I think the minister will agree that in the past there has been every reason why, not only in this country but in every country in the world, we should have a good deal of misgiving in regard to the actions or recommendations of so-called experts. I am going to give the minister two or three notable examples of what I am referring to. First of all I should like to mention the statement in Mr. Churchill's speech in 1932, when he said:

> When I was moved by many arguments and forces in 1925 to return to the gold standard I was assured by the highest experts, and our experts are men of great ability and of indisputable integrity and sincerity—

Then some one said, "And they are always wrong." Mr. Churchill went on:

> The hon. member is not always right—that we were anchoring ourselves to reality and stability; and I accepted their advice.

What did he find?

> I take for myself and my colleagues of other days whatever degree of blame and burden there may be for having accepted their advice.

He takes responsibility for having accepted the advice and goes on to say:

> But what has happened? We have had no reality, no stability. The price of gold has risen since then by more than seventy per cent. That is as if a twelve-inch foot rule had suddenly been stretched to nineteen or twenty inches; as if the pound avoirdupois had suddenly become twenty-three or twenty-four ounces instead of—how much is it?—sixteen.

I need not put more of that statement on record. I quote it to show that Mr. Churchill took the advice of men supposed to be real experts, and the advice proved to be faulty. Then I recall the actions of one man of world renown, the former governor of the Bank of England, Montagu Norman. I have not his statement here, but I have quoted it in the house before and I will just repeat it from memory. I took it from the British Hansard in 1939. He stated that he had made loans to Germany and said, "We may never get those loans back, but it would be better to lose that money than to see the fall of nazism." Imagine the head of the Bank of England, one of the chief advisers on monetary affairs, saying they had made loans of money to Germany and might never get the money back but it would be better to lose it than to see the fall of nazism! Was that sound advice? Would not the minister consider that was unquestionably treachery to the nation? I do not say that at the time Montagu Norman made that statement he intended to commit an act of treachery or to betray England. He may have held that there were other dangers and therefore it was better to build up Germany as a bulwark, but in view of what happened later I think everyone will agree that his action rebounded against Britain, because within a short time we had to defend ourselves against Germany.

Mr. ILSLEY: Could we not shorten this discussion by my admission that experts are sometimes wrong, and by my hon. friend's admission that they are sometimes right?

Mr. QUELCH: I do not need the second part of that statement, but I am very glad to hear the minister make that admission, and I hope he will impress that fact upon the hon. member for Rosthern, who on two occasions in this house has told us what a marvellous man Keynes is, and that as far as he is concerned if Keynes has said this is not the gold standard he is prepared to accept it.

Mr. TUCKER: I think Keynes is one of the outstanding economists in the world today, and is so regarded by other economists.

Mr. QUELCH: Yes, and so were these other experts whose advice Churchill took in 1925.

Mr. TUCKER: He did not take that advice from Keynes.

Mr. QUELCH: Norman was supposed to be an outstanding expert. In reference to Keynes I believe the hon. member was in the house when the then hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard quoted a statement by Keynes; and we all remember the reply given at that time by Mr. Dunning. I do not have it here, but you will remember he said in effect: Why should we be asked to accept the word of Maynard Keynes? He has gone back on all his former convictions.

Mr. TUCKER: As the hon. member knows, I did not happen to agree with Mr. Dunning in that attitude.

An hon. MEMBER: Who has the floor?

Mr. QUELCH: Let him talk; probably I would not have thought of that if the hon. member had not been talking. However, the Minister of Finance has given in rather easily on this point, and I am glad to have his admission in regard to the experts.

Mr. ILSLEY: I should like to have yours.

Mr. QUELCH: We will give you ours before we are through; we have given our views before, but in view of the fact that undoubtedly this bill will eventually reach the banking committee I think perhaps it would be better for us to wait until it is there before we do give our views. In the meantime we have many questions to ask, for the simple reason that we should like to have a statement from the minister before we are asked to give our views on the matter. After all, this is his responsibility. He has accepted the advice of these people, and he must be prepared to back up the action he has taken. Therefore we want to see whether his replies correspond with those of the experts.

Perhaps I should say a further word in regard to the statement made just now by the minister that the experts are not always right. Let me remind him of what happened in this country. The minister said we could give our advice, too. Well, we did give our advice in 1936 and 1939, and events proved that our advice was right and that the advice given by the experts was totally wrong. Let us remember what happened back in 1932, when Germany and Japan started to rearm. Russia was arming also, because she knew that eventually she would have to defend herself against Germany and Japan, but what did the British empire do? It took the advice of experts and imposed a deflationary policy. It cut down employment, increased unemployment, put people on relief, and as a result when war came thousands of men had to be discharged because of malnutrition. Was that just an accident? When our potential enemies were all rearming, was it simply an accident that we imposed a deflationary policy and deliberately sabotaged the resources of the empire? I cannot believe it was entirely accidental. I think there was something definitely sinister behind that procedure.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Sinister is right.

Mr. QUELCH: I am not suggesting that the experts in the department were responsible, but I believe that there are experts from whom they obtained further advice.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Or instructions.

Mr. QUELCH: I recall that some time ago I asked that certain correspondence between the Bank of Canada and the Bank of England be tabled and I was told that it would not be in the interests of the dominion to table it. It was probably not in the interests of the banks to table that correspondence, but it might have been in the interests of Canada to have it brought down. I recall when talking about reconstruction once I pointed out that we were definitely paving the way for the restoration of gold and the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) rose in his place and said no. Is he prepared to say that to-day?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. QUELCH: Does he say that we are not going to establish currency at the par value of gold?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Which gold standard is my hon. friend referring to—gold exchange or gold reserve?

Mr. QUELCH: I am not referring to 1914 or 1925. I am referring to the fact that article IV, section 1, states that the par value of the currency of each member shall be expressed in terms of gold as the common denominator, or in terms of the United States dollar, and so on. As one hon. member said the other night, that is not the standard that he wishes to go back to; the gold standard for him is the turkey standard that he established in depression years. The member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) eulogized at some length the work of the experts at Bretton Woods. I do not doubt that there were very capable men there. The hon. gentleman said that he had seen them in action. Apparently the jargon of the experts rather hypnotized him, and after listening to that jargon he became very greatly impressed. I can quite understand that when some experts get going the effect is hypnotic. I was not on the banking committee last year because I was serving on the committee on reconstruction, but I remember going one day to one of the meetings of the banking committee and there I saw in action a gentleman by the name of Tompkins, I believe. I do not know his exact name. Well, he was a wow. Acrobats on the stage had nothing on him. I had seen acrobats on the stage tie themselves into knots, but they were always able to get out of their difficulties. They could untie themselves. This gentleman, however, kept tying himself into a tighter and tighter knot and he was never able to get out of it. I am satisfied that if he had been asked to give a definition of a straight line, instead of defining it as the shortest distance between two points, he would have defined every other sort of line he could think of and in the end would have failed to define a straight line. Everyone who was on that committee will, I believe, agree with that statement. I think the Minister of Finance will agree that the statements made by that expert were about as confusing as they could possibly be. Every time he made a statement it took an hour or two for the members of the committee to understand what he was driving at. That is all I have to say about experts.

Now I should like to say a few words about the Liberator Council. I am not blaming the minister for being sceptical. Perhaps he has never heard of this council but in view of the fact that it is a body of men who have been doing excellent work in England, working in close cooperation with the Economic Reform Club, I suggest that no one should dismiss their views lightly. I have already mentioned Sir Charles Morgan-Webb. Perhaps I might give the names of the five men comprising the council: Sir Geoffrey Bracken, Mr. William Brown, Mr. G. H. Stock, Sir Charles Morgan-Webb and Mr. Eric Troward. They have put up a fight against Bretton Woods from the start. They organized meetings all across England and some time ago organized a large meeting known as the Bayswater conference at which Mr. Craven Ellis, M.P. and Mr. Stokes, M.P., participated in the debate. At that meeting they discussed four alternatives: The Twentieth Century economic plan of the London Chamber of Commerce; the Volens System, the McCarron Plan and the Liberator system. I have read all these, but the only one I have tried to understand is the London Chamber of Commerce plan, because I find it easier to follow. At the meeting in the evening session there were over 350 persons present, with 44 diplomatic and consular representatives. There were 28 nations represented altogether, so that the minister will agree that it was no fly-by-night concern but a reputable organization doing a great deal of very valuable work.

And now I should like to say a few words on the gold standard. Article IV, section 1, provides that the par value of the currency of each member shall be expressed in terms of gold as a common denominator, or in terms of the United States dollar of the weight and fineness in effect on July 1, 1944. Section 3 states that the maximum and minimum rates for exchange transactions between the currencies of members taking place within their territories shall not differ from parity, in the case of spot exchange transactions by more than one per cent, and in the case of other exchange transactions by a margin which exceeds for spot exchange transactions by more than the fund considers reasonable. It is also provided that there shall be a change in par value of members' currency up to ten per cent without any need of consulting the fund, but if a nation goes beyond that, the fund must be consulted. I was interested to know what the orthodox definition of gold standard would be, and I looked up the Encyclopedia Britannica and I found that a nation's money, paper bills and silver coins, when that nation is on the gold standard, are redeemable at a fixed weight of fine gold for each monetary unit. One might say that is not true in all essentials of the Bretton Woods agreement.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not in any essential. Why does my hon. friend crawl out and say not in all essentials?

Mr. QUELCH: Let me finish my sentence. The main point is that the results of the operation of the system will have very much the same effect as the gold standard, for this reason. Under the automatic clause of the gold standard in the old days if a nation had an unfavourable balance of trade, gold went out of the country, with the result that there was a credit restriction and the price level fell, and then as a result of the fall in price level, which was supposed to encourage other nations to buy their goods, the price level in other countries went up and after a while nations stopped buying their goods, with the result that they had an unbalance of trade. It was supposed to act as an automatic regulator. But what happened if a nation was not willing to reduce its price level? It might have been all right in olden days to tell a nation that if it did not have gold it would have to reduce its price level no matter how great its powers of production might be. That was all right then, but people are not quite so foolish as to believe that argument any more. Mr. T. E. Gregory, in his book "The Gold Standard and its Future," points out what happens, and I quote from page 32:

> Thirdly, the world economic structure has become rigid to an unprecedented degree. Owing to the much greater pressure which organized business and labour interests can bring to bear on government, there has been a general advocacy of "stability" which has in practice meant that particular groups could stabilize their own position without any, or enough, attention having been paid to the result of such stabilizing action on other parts of the economic field or to the long period results of such action. Raw material producers have been allowed, with the aid of governmental or quasi-governmental assistance, to "stabilize" the prices of particular raw materials, without regard to the fact that consumption might thereby be discouraged and production encouraged. In industry and distribution there has been a growth of large-scale organizations which have not always been willing to adjust prices to the trend of the market, thus adding in the end to the losses which had to be suffered on stocks when liquidation finally became necessary. In the sphere of labour there has been in certain countries a development of unemployment insurance schemes or similar relief measures which have prevented wage rates from falling, whilst in others public opinion, reinforced by government propaganda, has had very much the same effect. In a word, there have been tendencies at work in many countries preventing a rapid adjustment of the level of money incomes to changes in the general economic situation.

When people refuse to allow prices to fall then the gold standard is no longer able to operate automatically. If a nation continues to have an unfavourable balance of trade, the only alternative is to borrow money or to obtain gold. It can use the gold it has on hand, but if it does not have gold it will have to go further into debt. What is the effect under this agreement? If a nation has an unfavourable balance of trade it can borrow and go into debt. It can draw on its quota but when that is exceeded by 200 per cent it has reached the limit and it cannot borrow any further. It would not have any gold and the result is that in all probability it would cease to use the fund.

Neither under the gold standard nor under the Bretton Woods agreement does the creditor nation accept any responsibility for helping to balance the trade between nations. After all, the only way in which a debtor nation can pay is with its own goods. All a debtor nation should have to do is to say to a creditor nation, "We owe you $100 million; we have placed to your credit in the bank $100 million; with that you can buy any goods we have." That is all that nation should be required to do. Unfortunately that has not been the case and the result is that nations have been forced into a state of unpayable debt.

I am quite aware that under the Bretton Woods agreements when a nation's currency becomes scarce, provision is made for the fund to buy that scarce currency with gold, but that does not ease the situation so far as the individual nations are concerned. The only way they will be able to get goods is by going into debt if they have no gold with which to buy currency. I will quote article VII which deals with this question.

Mr. TUCKER: When the hon. member suggests that that is the only resort set up under this agreement, he is saying less than what is correct. The fundamental basis of this organization is that if a currency becomes scarce then the country whose currency has become scarce will be advised by the officials of the fund that they must take steps to enable other countries to sell their goods in the country of the scarce currency, and they would advise that country that they must be prepared to correct that fundamental unbalance of trade. The whole basis of this agreement is designed to promote understanding between countries in order to permit balanced trade and the keeping up of high standards of living in all countries.

Mr. QUELCH: If the hon. member can show me any clause in the act that compels the creditor nation to do that, I shall be glad to see it. All it provides for is the rationing of scarce currency.

Mr. TUCKER: Does the hon. member suggest that this international body should interfere with the sovereignty of this country and compel us to do something rather than just urge us to do it?

Mr. QUELCH: I am suggesting that as long as it has the power to take action against a debtor nation, it should have the same power to take action against a creditor nation.

Mr. ILSLEY: It has no power to take any action against a debtor nation. No debtor nation has to buy currencies from this fund.

Mr. QUELCH: What is the purpose of the fund? To expand trade?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is expected that they will, of course.

Mr. QUELCH: To expand trade on a multilateral basis. If a creditor nation refuses to buy goods in exchange for its exports, how is a debtor nation going to pay? You must make it possible for the weaker nations to be able to pay for their imports and exports, and yet this does not provide for that. All it does is to impose penalties on the debtor nations. Doctor Clark admitted in the committee that there is nothing in here to compel a creditor nation to buy goods.

Mr. ILSLEY: What committee is that?

Mr. QUELCH: The reconstruction committee.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is this another conversation the hon. member had with the deputy minister?

Mr. QUELCH: The minister will find it on the record.

Mr. ILSLEY: I want to protest against the hon. gentleman talking about conversations that he had with the deputy minister in the corridors. I am not going to take the time to go back to the deputy minister to find out what was his recollection of the conversation. We had the hon. member for Wetaskiwin telling us last night that he could not break a confidence, that he could not tell us who his anonymous informant was about the ownership of gold in the United States. I want to say right now that I stand by what I said two or three years ago. I have given my authority as against the anonymous authority which the hon. gentleman has quoted. Yet the hon. member for Acadia stands up here and retails corridor conversations with one of my officials.

Mr. QUELCH: Wait a minute. The reference I made to the corridor conversation was not in any shape or form detrimental to Doctor Clark, and I am satisfied he would be quite prepared to have me repeat the statement. In committee he was asked a question by Senator McGeer and he said he would study the London chamber of commerce proposals and give a report on them. Apparently lack of time made it impossible for him to do this and I merely asked him what his recollection was. He certainly did not tell me that he was speaking in confidence. He said he thought the proposals were quite good but the main difficulty was that several nations would not agree to them. I am quite sure that he would not object to my having repeated that statement. I asked what he thought of Russia, and he went on to say that he thought the country that would most strongly object to the proposals was the United States of America.

So far as the statement I am giving now is concerned, any member who was present in the reconstruction committee will recall the conversation with Doctor Clark. He said that he did not think we should impose, just as the hon. member for Rosthern is saying, conditions upon creditor nations.

Mr. TUCKER: May I ask a question?

Mr. QUELCH: Let me finish with the other question the hon. member asked. Section 8 of article V deals with the member nation which is unable to meet its obligations. Perhaps I had better read the whole section, otherwise I shall be charged with taking something out of its text. This section reads:

(c) The fund shall levy charges uniform for all members which shall be payable by any member on the average daily balances of its currency held by the fund in excess of its quota. These charges shall be at the following rates:

(i) On amounts not more than twenty-five per cent in excess of the quota: no charge for the first three months; one-half per cent per annum for the next nine months; and thereafter an increase in the charge of one-half per cent for each subsequent year.

(ii) On amounts more than twenty-five per cent and not more than fifty per cent in excess of the quota: an additional one-half per cent for the first year; and an additional one-half per cent for each subsequent year.

(iii) On each additional bracket of twenty-five per cent in excess of the quota: an additional one-half per cent for the first year; and an additional one-half per cent for each subsequent year.

(d) Whenever the fund's holdings of a member's currency are such that the charge applicable to any bracket for any period has reached the rate of four per cent per annum, the fund and the member shall consider means by which the fund's holdings of the currency can be reduced. Thereafter, the charges shall rise in accordance with the provisions of (c) above until they reach five per cent and failing agreement, the fund may then impose such charges as it deems appropriate.

I suggest that that is a very severe penalty to impose on any debtor nation, to say that as you are not able to meet your obligations, the fund when your debt rises to a certain point can charge you any rate of interest it likes. If the members want me to do it I will read the whole of section 4.

Mr. TUCKER: The whole purpose of that section is to discourage a member from trying to finance a very heavy excess of imports over exports out of the fund. In other words the fund is to finance current transactions, not to finance capital expenditures. Its whole purpose is to discourage that very thing and to have it done by balancing trade.

Mr. QUELCH: How can you balance trade if one nation insists on exporting more than it imports? There is a mutual obligation.

Mr. TUCKER: The very fact of the nations coming together and making this agreement presupposes their willingness to balance their exports and imports. That was the basic supposition on which they met.

Mr. JAQUES: Where is all the gold?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): May I ask a question?

Mr. BLACKMORE: These members don't know shucks about this thing. Let them live and learn.

Mr. QUELCH: Let me proceed. I quoted from a statement made by Doctor Clark the other day showing what Canada aims to be. The member for Rosthern says that the whole idea behind Bretton Woods is the balancing of trade. Here is what Doctor Clark said in a speech that he made in New York:

We feel also that adequate arrangements are essential to make possible a substantial volume of long-term international investment, and we trust that the technical and political difficulties involved in consummating these may soon be surmounted.

I agree that there is justification for investment on moral grounds, to help certain backward countries, but we know how in days past there have been trade wars because nations tried to force their goods on other nations and then raised high tariffs to prevent those debtor nations from paying them with goods. The white paper on reconstruction which was issued last year by the Minister of Reconstruction stated that Canada in all probability would be a creditor nation. So apparently it is not expected that we are going to balance our trade but rather that we will maintain a favourable balance of trade and make loans through the international bank.

Mr. TUCKER: These are loans to be made for reconstruction and development to enable a country to increase its productive power and raise its own standard of living so that it will be able to pay for its imports from other countries. They are productive loans.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Provided that it could sell the goods.

Mr. QUELCH: That is a lovely story, but I read how England had maintained her prosperity and that Mr. Reginald McKenna said that the reason England was prosperous for two centuries before 1914 was that she had been able to maintain a favourable balance of trade. The money paid for her goods exported abroad enabled her to maintain an effective demand for the goods retained internally. Owing to the fact that without exports there was no effective demand internally, Britain, in order to maintain full employment, found it necessary to export her surplus production abroad. Now the hon. member for Rosthern says that all we have to do is to make it possible for other nations to produce goods, and then there will be more prosperity. How are we going to export more abroad if we put other nations on a self-sustaining basis?

Mr. TUCKER: Each nation will make the goods it can best produce. That is the basis of international trade.

Mr. QUELCH: Have we in the past been able to maintain an effective demand against our production? Has the United States? The United States to-day is looking for large export markets. Why did Doctor Clark consider that it was necessary to make adequate arrangements for long-term foreign investments? Because he knows that we in this country are not able to maintain an effective demand against our total production, and so long as that condition obtains the only way in which we can maintain full employment is to export abroad a certain amount of our production in excess of our imports.

Mr. TUCKER: Does not the hon. member admit that if we helped to set up China and develop her production and a high standard of living there, she could absorb all our export food products without any difficulty?

Mr. QUELCH: On the condition that we accept in return payment from China in manufactured goods; and if we have a deficiency in purchasing power in Canada to buy our total home production how are we going to be able to buy those imports from China? It has not been done in the past. We have argued, and this is the whole basis of our philosophy, that you have to maintain production at full capacity and then maintain an effective demand against that production, or against the production of other countries for which your own can be exchanged. But that has not been done in the past.

Mr. TUCKER: The Bretton Woods proposals do not in any way interfere with the promotion of your doctrine within the country.

Mr. LOW: Nor with any other doctrine that will distribute goods.

Mr. QUELCH: If the hon. member is really sincere in his argument—and I think he is, although I doubt the sincerity of some people behind Bretton Woods—if the idea behind it all is to bring about a balance of trade, then the creditor nations as a sign of their sincerity should be willing to have included a section such as that which is included in the London chamber of commerce proposals, and the same suggestion was made in the Keynes plan. He mentioned that there should be an obligation on the part of creditor nations to accept payment in goods. There is nothing in these proposals at all to compel a creditor nation to accept payment in goods. But there is provision in here to force a debtor nation to pay any rate of interest that the fund sees fit to charge, after the debtor nation has gone into debt by a certain amount and for a certain period of time.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): May I ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member who has the floor will permit a question it may be asked.

Mr. QUELCH: I have had a lot of questions asked me and now I should like first of all to ask the Minister of Finance a question. I think the Minister of Finance will agree with the soundness of the argument that there is a dual responsibility in regard to international trade, that it should be a two-way street. It should not merely be the purpose of international trade to dump our unemployment problem on the doorstep of some other nation. If we export goods we should be prepared to accept payment in imports; for that is the only way in which other nations can pay. Is the minister prepared then to say that there is an obligation to raise the purchasing power of the people of this country up to the point where they can buy the total production of Canada and the imports of other nations exchanged for our exports? If the minister will announce that as a policy for the future, and if the government will say to the industrial concerns throughout Canada that from now on they can expand their production to the full capacity, and will guarantee a market for their output, we shall have the greatest expansion the country has ever seen. And you would never need to worry about unemployment in the future, because you would put money into circulation so that the people could buy the goods which industry could produce

Mr. ILSLEY: The government has repeatedly announced that it is its policy to encourage enterprise and develop full employment.

Mr. BLACKMORE: But how is it going to do it?

Mr. QUELCH: That does not answer the question at all. "Encourage"!

Mr. BLACKMORE: Will it give a dividend?

Mr. QUELCH: I am not now asking a question as to the dividend. All I am asking for is a clear-cut statement from the government that they recognize a joint responsibility, as between the creditor and the debtor nations, to balance trade; that they recognize that the only way in which that can be achieved is by a nation setting its own house in order so that it will be willing and ready to take an equal quantity of imports for its exports, and so that the people will be able to buy the total production of the country. Is the minister prepared to agree to that?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is different from the last question.

Mr. QUELCH: No, it is the same thing. I put the questions slightly differently, but they are the same.

Mr. ILSLEY: And it is not clear, either.

Mr. QUELCH: I will state it again.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is my hon. friend asking that we recognize an obligation with respect to any particular country with which we are dealing, to take the same volume of imports that that country takes of exports from us? If so, we do not recognize that obligation at all. That is bilateralism, so-called.

Mr. QUELCH: I am not advocating bilateral trade. The minister must be familiar with the London chamber of commerce proposals. No doubt he has read them. I know that his department has studied them. because the deputy minister told me so. The London chamber of commerce proposals are a multilateral system. Money is not based on gold. It is tied to the price index level. Every country agrees to maintain its price level stable. Every country agrees to balance its trade and to maintain a stable rate of exchange between its currency and the currency of another nation. In view of the fact that a country agrees to maintain its price level stable, then when it buys any goods from another country, thereby obtaining that country's currency it knows that its money will buy a certain quantity of goods to-day and the same quantity a year hence. There is a definite undertaking to balance trade, and therefore any nation which over a period of seven years refuses to accept payment in goods has its credit wiped out. Then there is an international exchange established, and representatives of foreign exchange controls in every nation will sit on that exchange, exchanging their blocked credits for the blocked credits of other nations, and the nations will always know in which countries they have credits, so that they will endeavour to accept more imports from that nation. But it will be on a multilateral basis, because the representatives of the foreign exchange controls will be sitting on this exchange, trading the blocked credits. They will not have the power to change the value of a nation's currency. The exchange rate will be fixed in terms of the nation's price level, and gold will not enter into the question at all.

Mr. ILSLEY: What is the question now? Is it changed?

Mr. QUELCH: The question is whether or not this government is prepared to guarantee to the industry of Canada that it will maintain the purchasing power of the people on a level which will make it possible for them to buy the total production of the country, and the production of other countries for which our own production may be exchanged.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is a guarantee that the government will issue money to the people of Canada if they require it to buy all the goods they need from this country or other countries; is that it?

Mr. QUELCH: Not necessarily. Repeat that.

Mr. ILSLEY: I don't know whether I can repeat it. My hon. friend can never repeat his questions in the same language.

Mr. QUELCH: I am putting it in another way—

Mr. ILSLEY: I am wondering what sort of guarantee my hon. friend is asking me to make on behalf of the government. It sounded to me very much like this, that we would issue money—

Mr. BLACKMORE: He did not mention "money".

Mr. ILSLEY: Does it mean that? I think that is what it means, and I think if I said "yes", that is what he would say we were committed to.

Mr. QUELCH: That all depends. The government would estimate the total production of the country. They would estimate the approximate amount of labour required to produce the goods the people needed. They would know how much labour was available for various national projects. They would place a fair price on agricultural products. They would guarantee a minimum standard of living to all people; we will say, in the initial stages, $1,200 a year. They would, as the leader of this group stated, grant old age pensions at sixty years at $50 a month. They would make grants available to all people up to the age of twenty-one, or any age necessary to complete their training so long as these young people showed that they had the ability to continue their studies. Then they could watch the effect; and if they found that demand still lagged behind supply, say that over a period of six months they found that production was still going ahead of consumption, they could establish a discount, which would be nothing more than a sales tax in reverse, in order to bring about a balance. In other words, using figures, if the amount of goods available during a period was equal to $10 million and the demand against those goods equal to only $9 million, showing a lag of ten per cent, for the next period a ten per cent discount would be established to bring demand up to supply, that is to establish equation. That would cover your exports and imports. So far as the issuing of money is concerned, the issuance of money would be only to the extent to which taxation failed to meet government expenditures; in that event national money would be used. If taxation was sufficient it would not be done. But the government would not be trying to limit its expenditures to the amount of money it could tax from the people's pockets.

On that basis the government talks a lot about "full employment", a lot about "a new social order". They talk about "encouraging" this or that. Is it not time we have a government which would guarantee that it could take certain definite steps in order to promote the full development of the resources of the country? I think the minister will agree that the only way you can maintain full development of the country's resources is to guarantee a full-time market. The minister will agree that industry cannot continue to produce unless it can sell the goods it produces. Is the minister prepared to say that the government will in the future underwrite an effective demand in Canada? If a government will not do it, nobody else will.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the purport of the hon. gentleman's question is to commit the government to the detailed programme he outlined there, I say no. It is a long list of discounts and dividends and bonuses—

Mr. QUELCH: I never mentioned dividends.

Mr. ILSLEY: —and so on. We cannot commit ourselves to that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Then you are heading for chaos.

Mr. QUELCH: I am not asking the minister to commit himself to all this. The minister asked me what I suggest. I am giving him a suggestion. I am not tying him to details; the government can use any technique it likes. All we are interested in is results. The people are interested in seeing that their standard of living is maintained at the highest level that the production of the country can provide. What has happened in the past is that when effective demand fell, prices were not reduced to a level where people could buy the production, but secondary industries reduced their production in consequence of the inadequate buying power. Then what happened? Well, we know what happened from 1935 to 1939. All I am asking the minister is whether the government will, by any technique they choose, underwrite an effective demand against the production of the country. We are not indulging merely in negative criticism. At any time that we criticize the government we are prepared to put forward some alternative suggestion.

Mr. MacINNIS: May I ask a question? I understand that my hon. friends of the Social Credit group are opposed to socialism and in favour of free enterprise. How would free enterprise operate within the policies which were outlined a moment ago by the hon. member for Acadia?

Mr. QUELCH: It is one o'clock, and there is no use in my starting off on another phase. I can go on if it is the wish that I should go on. But I have twenty or thirty questions which I want to ask, too.

Mr. JAQUES: I have several.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it is obvious that we cannot get this resolution out of committee to-day. I cannot be here this afternoon or to-night, for most excellent reasons, so we shall have to take this up on Monday and try to get to the end of it at some time or other. But it is the government's intention to see that these matters are brought to a vote this session, and, I may say, whether the session has to be prolonged beyond the expected date or not.

Progress reported.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Production Service—Health of animals—
17. Compensatiion for animals slaughtered, $372,620.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Would the minister give us some idea of the incidence of hog cholera during the last year?

Mr. GARDINER: There were no serious outbreaks of hog cholera during last year. There was an outbreak in Manitoba. A number of hogs were slaughtered in Ontario during 1944-45 because of hog cholera. The figures are as follows: 1944-45, 494; 1943-44, 67; 1942-43, 3,415; 1941-42, 6,437. The figure was very much higher in 1940-41, 33,793. It will be noted that the tendency has been downwards.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): In what part of Ontario was the disease prevalent?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not certain as to the exact place, but I think the greater part of it was in the southwestern section of Ontario. The figures for Manitoba are as follows: In 1942-43, 83; 1943-44, 330; in 1944-45, 1,753. It will be noted that there is an increase there rather than a decrease.

Mr. SENN: Cattle prices have increased materially during the past few years. Has the department given any consideration to changing the amounts that are paid to individuals whose cattle are slaughtered under the tuberculosis regulations? The amounts paid at the present time are comparatively small, something like $40 for a grade animal and around $100 for a pure bred animal. Has the department given any consideration to the matter, or does it intend to do anything about it?

Mr. GARDINER: No, we have not done anything about it. The amount has remained about the same over a period of about twenty years. Experience has shown that while the maximum amounts which may be paid have remained constant, the amount which the farmer receives for anything that he can market goes up with the increase in the price of the animal. When prices are high he is able to sell part of the animal which has been condemned at a much higher price than when prices are low. We have had arguments when the prices were low and high to the effect that the amounts should be changed, but we have maintained the level over about a twenty-year period, and at the moment we are not considering changing it.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I was hopeful that the department might take under advisement next session the matter of changing this compensation in view of the fact that prices are relatively high at the present time as compared with the twenty-year period of which the minister speaks. What is particularly running throuh my mind at the moment is the reference which was made by the hon. member for Lanark with regard to Bang's disease and tuberculosis contracted by humans from cattle. Compensation paid for these diseased cattle ought to be given some consideration so that we may clean up the unhealthy spots from which the disease emanates. If that were done it would benefit the general economy of Canada.

Mr. GARDINER: I think the whole question with regard to whether we are going to pay for Bang's disease as well as tuberculosis should be considered along with the other question when it comes up. Probably this is a matter to which we might give some consideration in the future. The hon. member for Frontenac-Addington intimated to me that he was going to ask a question with regard to the testing of cattle for tuberculosis in the area immediately surrounding Kingston. I do not see him in his place at the moment, but I understand, from the records which I have looked up since he spoke to me, that the township of Pittsburgh, immediately outside of Kingston, is pronounced clear until April, 1946. I am not in a position to state whether immediately after April we can go on with testing, but it is high up in the list of counties and townships to be tested again just as early as possible.

Mr. SENN: Are any new areas being tested at the moment for restricted areas?

Mr. GARDINER: Those being tested for the first time are the districts of Algoma and Cochrane in Ontario, the district of Churchbridge and the municipality of Grant in Saskatchewan, being No. 372, and Camrose, No. 427 in Alberta. Thus it would appear that there are two in Ontario, two in Saskatchewan and one in Alberta which have been tested recently.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What are the prospects for enlarging this work in the near future? I understand that there has been a let-down during the war years. Several people want to organize now to carry on.

Mr. GARDINER: Our main problem is staff. At the present time we are spending all the money on this that we have staff to make use of. We are hoping we shall have more staff as we get further beyond the war period. I know quite a number of men who were available at one time have been serving in other capacities during the war, and we may have them back. If so we can do more of this work.

Mr. McLURE: I know the minister is anxious to get through his estimates, but the hon. member for Brant, who was called away to-day, had prepared an excellent address on the health of animals branch. If the minister should not get through all his estimates to-day would he allow the hon. member to reopen that subject later?

Mr. GARDINER: My understanding is that the supplementaries have not yet been brought down, and there will almost certainly be an item in the supplementaries in regard to contagious diseases, on which he could bring up that matter.

Mr. FAIR: A programme was in effect last year and perhaps before that of vaccination for the prevention of Bang's disease. What progress is being made in that regard?

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. GARDINER: It is still being carried on in the same way as it was a year ago. Does the hon. member want the statistics in regard to it?

Mr. FAIR: I should just like to know whether it is proving successful.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, it is proving reasonably successful. The story told the other night by the hon. member for Lanark I think illustrated very well the usefulness of the method in tending to eradicate Bang's disease, and we are having much the same experience with it.

Mr. FRASER: Has the department experimented with streptomycin for Bang's disease? If so, has it been indicated that this drug will cure Bang's disease as well as shipping fever?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I know a bit about this new and scarce drug, which is used in very rare diseases. It is in extremely short supply in Canada to-day. Only the other day I had a request from my own city of Vancouver for some of it, for someone who is ill there, and it is very difficult to obtain.

Mr. FRASER: Was that person suffering from undulant fever?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I could not say.

Production service—

18. Live stock and poultry, $762,925.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Can the minister give the committee a statement as to the policy of the department in respect to establishing a herd of beef cattle at the experimental farm at Nappan? This has been discussed in previous sessions, and if I remember correctly the minister expressed himself as favourable to the idea. Perhaps I should have brought this matter up under the appropriation for experimental farms, but I should think it might be discussed under this item also.

Mr. GARDINER: It would have been much better, of course, if it had been brought up under the experimental farms vote, because unfortunately I have not the official here at the moment who is acquainted with that matter. As the hon. member knows, I did visit that farm a few years ago, and the question was brought up while I was there. We have not been making any material changes in the herds at the different farms during the war period; we have been carrying on much as we were. I am not aware that any particular advance has been made in that direction at Nappan, but I am not sufficiently acquainted with the matter to say nothing has been done.

19. Plant products—seeds, feeds, fertilizers, insecticides and fungicides control, including grant of $18,900 to Canadian Seed Growers' Association, $601,294.

Mr. WRIGHT: Can the minister give some indication of the supply situation with regard to clover seeds and other small seeds this year, and whether there will be any restrictions on the export of these seeds? Have we available more than we shall need in Canada? What is the situation?

Mr. GARDINER: The supply of seeds this year is low as compared with other years. We are short of alsike and red clover; we have some alfalfa for export but nothing like what we have had in some previous years. The supply of seeds is down.

Mr. WRIGHT: Will there be restrictions on exports?

Mr. FAIR: I should like to ask about the supply of fertilizer, and whether any experiments have been conducted to find out whether artificial or chemical fertilizers have any detrimental effects on the land on which they are used. In my part of the country quite a lot of this fertilizer is being used and some people now have the idea that it is detrimental to the land. If it is, we should know something about it. If it is not, we shall be able to give the answer to some of these rumours.

Mr. GARDINER: Canadian production of fertilizers, particularly nitrogen and phosphoric acid fertilizers, is still going on at full capacity of the plants, and as a result the united nations, through the combined food board, are obtaining hundreds of thousands of tons of ammonium sulphate, ammonium nitrate, ammonium phosphate and cyanimide for allocation to the many countries, particularly in liberated Europe, which require them for the production of food. That is, our production is sufficiently high to enable us to export considerable quantities of these fertilizers to countries that need them. The supply of fertilizers for Canadian use is allocated by the combined food and materials boards of the united nations. These boards have a fertilizer committee with headquarters at Washington, and the administrator is the Canadian representative on that committee. The boards have allocated to Canada sufficient fertilizers of the various kinds for the entire Canadian demand next spring, provided that the demand does not again increase substantially. That is, they have provided for some increase, but if there is a great increase there may not be as much as is required. The consumption of fertilizers in Canada has increased from approximately 300,000 tons in 1940 to 650,000 tons in the calendar year 1945, or more than double. Despite this, however, we have been fortunate in obtaining an increased supply to meet the increased demand.

In reply to the other part of the question, my information is that in any of our experimental work it has not been found that these fertilizers do any particular harm. Probably the effectiveness of the fertilizer in producing results is somewhat dependent upon weather conditions.

Mr. FAIR: I realize that unless we have plenty of moisture one is further ahead to leave the fertilizer in the sack. If no experiments have been conducted so far, could that not be done, in order to find out if they have any detrimental effect?

Mr. HATFIELD: Are any fertilizer chemicals being exported other than ammonium nitrate?

Mr. GARDINER: In the statement I have just made I said the Canadian production of fertilizers, particularly nitrogen and phosphoric acid fertilizers, is still going on at the full capacity of the plants, and as a result the united nations, through the combined food board, are obtaining hundreds of thousands of tons of ammonium sulphate, ammonium nitrate, ammonium phosphate and cyanimide for allocation to the many countries, particularly in liberated Europe, which require them for the production of food.

Mr. WRIGHT: Are export permits required for the export of clover seeds and other small seeds this year?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, they are required, and they are all being handled through the special products board.

Mr. SENN: I should like to ask the minister a question or two in regard to this seed situation, which is a serious one. The account that was given yesterday of the deliberations of the dominion-provincial agricultural conference shows that the production of grass seeds, particularly alfalfa and red clover, has been very much lower this year than in former years. We do not want to be left in the position, particularly in eastern Canada, of running short of these seeds, because there will be a very heavy demand for them next spring. On previous occasions measures have had to be taken to see that enough was retained in Canada to supply the needs of the eastern market. Alfalfa particularly is in short supply in Ontario. The farmers will need a great deal of it for seed and we shall have to depend to a great extent upon western production. The same is true of red clover, though not to the same extent. Are any measures being taken to see that a sufficient supply is being kept in the Canadian market? I would ask the minister to tell us whether the export board with headquarters at Lindsay has made any contracts for the shipment of seed overseas for the British authorities.

Mr. GARDINER: At the conference which was held earlier in the week we suggested that there should be a material increase. From 7,450,000 pounds we are asking for 15,000,000 pounds this year, or more than double the quantity. That is not altogether under the control of the farmers, because weather has a great deal to do with it. We are paying freight on alfalfa seed from Winnipeg to eastern Canada in order to encourage the shipment of seed from Winnipeg to the east rather than from Winnipeg south, the object being to retain as much seed as possible in Canada.

Mr. SENN: I have figures to show that in 1944, production in Canada was 9½ million pounds. Last year, 1945, it was only 6½ million pounds, which would indicate that this coming spring there will be a shortage of seed for seeding purposes.

Mr. GARDINER: There is a shortage.

Mr. SENN: We want to be assured in eastern Canada that we shall have sufficient seed, because many of the meadows have been killed and there will be a large amount of land sown to grass seed in the spring. Measures should be taken to see that Ontario and Quebec will have sufficient seed. I do not think there will be any difficulty about the price, because Ontario will pay as good a price for the seed they need as can be obtained for export seed. Some provision should be made, before exports take place to any great extent, to see to it that Ontario and eastern Canada generally have a proper supply.

Mr. GARDINER: The matter of export has been under control all season and still is. It is impossible to export any of it unless a permit is obtained, and that permit is issued only where it is essential that the seed should be exported. The effort is to keep seed in Canada, and we are assisting in shipping it from Winnipeg east to make sure that it will come to this part of the country.

Mr. SENN: Has the export board any price set for seed for export purposes up to the moment? They generally have.

[Mr Senn.]

Mr. GARDINER: For 99 per cent purity, 90 per cent germination seed, it is 33 cents at Winnipeg.

Mr. WRIGHT: Has the government taken action, on the recommendation of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, with respect to the Calgary plant for the production of fertilizer?

Mr. GARDINER: The plant at Calgary produces ammonium nitrate. It has been operated as one of three plants during the war, the product having been utilized largely for the production of explosives and things of the kind. Representations were made by the farm federation to the effect that this plant ought to be taken over by the government and operated to produce fertilizer now that the war is over. The plant has been operated by the Department of Munitions and Supply. But my understanding is that of the three plants, the one that will probably be operated as a government plant is most likely to be the one in the eastern part of Canada in the Niagara peninsula, for certain reasons which have to do with supplies that are to be provided to some of the allied countries having something still to do with munitions. There has been however a tendency to consider the policy of disposing of the plant at Calgary. The question whether it should be disposed of to some private concern or to a farm cooperative or some other organization of the kind is under consideration. I am informed that the department has no set views in the matter. If the farmers' cooperative desires to have the plant operated, or if it can make arrangements to that end, its wishes will be facilitated. However, that is under discussion and there is nothing more I can say about it.

20. Grants to fairs and exhibitions, in the amounts detailed in the estimates, $62,690.

Mr. PEARKES: These grants, I believe, are made in part for the purpose of encouraging the improvement of live stock throughout the country, and in furtherance of that policy many of the associations hold race meetings during the time of the annual fairs. Included on the race programmes are events for Canadian-bred colts and fillies. It is necessary for a Canadian-bred colt in order to run in these races to be registered with the New York jockey club because we have no Canadian stud book for Canadian-bred horses. During this session we have discussed such questions as a Canadian flag for Canada and a nationality bill for Canadian citizens. Would the minister give consideration to a Canadian stud book so that Canadian colts may run by right on the tracks of the land in which they were born?

Mr. GARDINER: It is the intention of the department to promote the breeding of horses of the type mentioned, and we intend to get some stallions and have them placed under clubs. I understand that the department obtains stallions and puts them out to the clubs and the clubs pay for them over a period of years. The last part of the question, having to do with the registration of horses in New York in order that they may run on tracks, is another matter. We do register colts here the same as any other live stock is registered in the records branch, but the question whether they will be permitted to run on tracks is one that I cannot answer. It is pretty much under the control of those who operate the racing clubs and of the breeders. I am not too sure that there is much I can do about it. As a matter of fact the department does not directly operate the records branch. We simply give a grant to the records people and they record all the animals that are bred, whether they are dogs, cattle, pigs or whatever they may be. They have done such a good job of it up to date that we have hesitated to interfere.

Mr. FAIR: What will be the policy of the government with regard to grants to classes A and B fairs during 1946?

Mr. GARDINER: I am speaking from memory, but I think during the first war we started giving grants to A and B fairs, and possibly some others, with certain ideas in mind. In between the two wars there was always a great deal of discussion as to whether we ever should have started them. It was argued by many people that the money could have been used to better advantage in some other way, but we continued to make the grants and entered into arrangements or understandings with the provinces from time to time. Sometimes we designated a certain class of fair as being one which would receive a certain class of grant, while others were left to the counties or the provinces to encourage.

Early in the war we struck off practically all grants that were paid by the Department of Agriculture except those to boys and girls clubs. We have under consideration in the preparation of our estimates for the next session the question whether they should be reestablished. Within the last month we have had delegations here from the different organizations that are represented suggesting that we should continue the grants. We have said to each of them that the question would be given the fullest possible consideration between now and the time the estimates for next year are completed.

Mr. FAIR: I should like to add my voice to the voices of those who have already made representations that these grants should be continued. I think they should be extended if possible. The minister will agree that our A and B fairs, as well as some of the smaller ones, have been of great assistance in improving the quality of our live stock and grains and other farm products. I know that some people take advantage of them and consider that they are simply a place to spend a holiday to see the side shows and all that, but the people who are really the salt of the earth, if I may use the expression, take great pride in their fairs and use them as a method of improving the quality of our farm products.

Mr. WRIGHT: Is it expected that the Ottawa and Toronto exhibition grounds will be available for fairs in 1946?

Mr. GARDINER: I have no information as to that; they are still occupied by troops.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): What are the plans with respect to the maritime winter fair at Amherst? There is a vote of $5,000 to cover improvements, which is contributed to by the three maritime provinces. It is generally expected that the maritime winter fair will be reopened in 1946. I think the minister should make some announcement of policy so that the interested people may have as much notice as possible.

Mr. GARDINER: I believe the hon. member is referring to the agreement that we entered into some years ago with the organization that runs that fair. We agreed to pay $5,000 for building purposes, and each year we have been paying that, even right through the war. We will continue to pay it until the agreement is completed. There is no suggestion that those grants will be discontinued. This is the type of grant that is made to fairs right across Canada by way of agreement. We have been carrying out those agreements and will continue to do so.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): If it is proposed to reestablish the maritime winter fair in 1946 there will have to be a grant in next year's estimates for the purpose. Can the minister give any indication as to what policy will be followed?

Mr. GARDINER: That is what we were discussing a few moments ago. Communications have been received from the Toronto winter fair and other fairs across Canada, as well as the exhibition associations, asking what we have in mind. I have told them practically what I told the committee a few moments ago, namely, that the policy we followed prior to the war had been set up after negotiation with the provinces and that some understandings had been reached between ourselves and the provinces. At the moment we are having a dominion-provincial conference at which the collection and expenditure of revenues are being discussed. Until that gets a little further along I do not think we are in a position to announce a definite policy for the future. The policy is being worked out, and all those who are interested are keeping a close touch with us in regard to it. It will be made known at the earliest possible day.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I understand that the maritime stockbreeder's association wants this maritime winter fair reopened in 1946 and are making representations accordingly. I think it is desirable that a declaration of policy be made as early as possible.

Mr. FRASER: During the noon recess I picked up a book on agriculture and was surprised to find that the first agricultural and cattle exhibition in America was held at New Amsterdam, United States of America, on October 14, 1641. That is just over three hundred years ago, sixteen years after the settlement of Manhattan.

Mr. HEON: Before the war the federal Department of Agriculture made a substantial grant to the Lachute fair, but during the war this grant was discontinued for the reasons just given by the minister. The Lachute fair is acknowledged to be one of the best in eastern Canada. I should like the minister to consider the resumption of that pre-war grant in 1946.

Mr. GARDINER: The Lachute fair received a grant because it was in the appropriate classification. If grants are paid under any policy that is announced in the future, this fair will receive its grant.

Mr. SENN: The minister has referred to classes A and B fairs as being those in receipt of federal government grants. There has been a certain amount of agitation to get grants for fairs not in those categories. Will the minister tell the committee just what is a class A or class B fair? I think it depends somewhat on the amount of the prizes given, but I am not sure.

Mr. GARDINER: They were classified according to the amount of live stock showing that was done, the attendance, and all that kind of thing. The class A fairs would cover such fairs as Toronto, which is the greatest of them all, and the one at Vancouver and—

Mr. BOUCHER: Ottawa?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. There is a group of fairs in the A classification, and then there is another group in the B classification. I could get the whole list, but I think those who live in the communities know pretty well what they are.

Mr. SENN: There are a number of fairs that feel that the larger fairs in A or B classes do not need grants to the same extent that the smaller fairs do. These smaller fairs are doing good work throughout the country. I was just trying to find out what would put a fair in a class lower than B and thus bar it from a government grant.

Mr. GARDINER: They were based on the amount of prize money paid. I quite agree that it might be true that the larger the fair, the less it needs assistance. But there is another side to the picture. The more localized a fair is, the less is the argument that assistance should come from the federal treasury. In some places the assistance comes from the county, and in other places it comes from the provinces; then there are those fairs where it comes from the dominion. In some cases assistance is given by both the dominion and the province. These things will all have to be worked out in the arrangement between the provinces and the federal government and our grants will be made where they will be the most effective.

Marketing service—

22. Marketing service administration, $111,742.

Mr. REID: May I ask what steps are being taken to continue and enlarge our market for eggs in Great Britain? As the minister knows, but perhaps many members do not, the egg and poultry industry of British Columbia has greatly increased, so much so that this fall the largest shipment of eggs that ever left the shores of Canada left the port of New Westminister—294 million British Columbia eggs in one shipment. That is 24 million cases, or seven eggs for every man, woman and child in Great Britain. The poultry keepers of British Columbia are wondering what is going to happen when that great British market begins to be supplied from the continent of Europe. They have built up their plants in British Columbia, and although they realize that a market is assured in Britain for 1945 and perhaps half of 1946, they would like to know what steps are being taken by the department to cover the period following the end of the agreement.

Mr. GARDINER: I had all the egg statistics with me the other night and put some of them on Hansard. I do not seem to be able to put my hands on them now. I can only repeat what I said the other night. Prior to the war we were marketing about 1,000,000 dozen of eggs in Britain each year. This last year we marketed 85,000,000 dozen; in other words the increase has been 85 times during that period. I do not know that it can be claimed that that would have happened in any event, even if the government had done nothing about it, but the government did try to promote agreements with the British government for the purchase of eggs right from the beginning of the war, and we were able to bring about an increase in their purchases. Then, too, we developed in cooperation with the British and others the process of dehydrating eggs, which allowed us to ship over seven times as much by weight of eggs in a given space in dried form as we could in the shell. That was at a time when it was essential that we should get out shipments into as small a space and down to as small a weight as possible. So a large portion of the shipments that we have made, as indicated by the figures I put on Hansard the other night, was due to the dehydration process which was developed and which made possible the shipment of eggs in powdered form.

There was also a process developed for which British Columbia is entitled to the credit—the dipping of eggs in oil, a process I do not fully understand. By the use of that process it is possible for eggs to be kept fresh for a long period of time. At the beginning of the war these eggs were classified as storage eggs. We were insistent at that time that they should be classified as fresh eggs when shipped from this country to Great Britain, and now these eggs are accepted as fresh by Britain as a result of our experience during the war. This British Columbia process of supplying eggs in the oil-dipped form has resulted in a greatly increased shipment of what are now known as fresh eggs to the European market, particularly Britain. That in itself will bring higher returns to Canadian egg producers right across the country, the classification of these eggs as fresh rather than as storage eggs.

Mr. CAMPBELL: When these estimates were before the committee yesterday I brought to the attention of the minister two cases of what we considered discrimination. The minister dealt with one case, but I did not get an answer in respect to the other. My question was, why could not the farmer who raises hogs and wants to feed his own grain to them get the same bonus as the man who buys his feed for hogs?

There is another matter I want to bring to the minister's attention, and it has been brought to his attention many times in the last few years. For a long time the farmers of this country have not been satisfied with the methods of marketing live stock. Through their different organizations they have on many occasions asked the government to set up a live stock commission for the handling of live stock. I want to put on Hansard a statement that was issued by the United Farmers of Canada in September last in connection with the selling of live stock. It reads as follows:

Live stock producers are entirely at the mercy of the packer buyer, who has sole command of the only market for live stock disposal in Canada, and the price for live animals is whatever the packer buyer chooses to make it, whether in the packer's yard or the packer's drover agent on the producer's farm or ranch.

Previously the producer had at least four main markets for his cattle:

(1) The feeder buyers in his own or neighbour provinces;
(2) The eastern feeder buyer;
(3) The American feeder buyer and market;
(4) The Canadian packing companies.

Numbers one and two markets are gone through owing to the feed situation and policy uncertainty. Number three is closed. Number four therefore is in supreme command, and as they are in control of a market with competition almost entirely eliminated, and as there are no floor or ceiling prices on live animals producers must take their price whether delivered individually, through a drover, through a commission firm or by their own cooperatives, which can only benefit them by reducing assembling costs.

On the other hand packers have two inexhaustible markets at their disposal with fixed prices; first, the domestic market for which they receive the wholesale ceiling price, which is widely different to the price received by producers; second, the Canadian meat board, which agency will buy any volume of beef from the packers at fixed prices based on grades.

Producers will only get fair prices when animals are in short supply but never above the packer's ceiling price; then when the flow of cattle becomes heavy the purchase price paid to producers has been and will again be below the packer's fixed floor price.

The government has a multitude of live stock and meat boards and committees with little policy cohesion, and the chasm between the man who raises the animal and all others engaged in the service and in the industry is as wide as the seas.

During the past few years, great strides have been made to improve and increase the industry of animal production in Canada, and producers have hitherto been very patient, but they now feel that their industry has been kicked around enough and that perhaps official advisers and those with an assured profit in the industry could for a change start producing and determine their own profits.

In another debate in the house this session, a member of this group, urging the government to set up a board of live-stock commissioners, quoted from a brief presented to the government by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture in February, 1944, as follows:

This federation desires to repeat its request of former years that the federal government should establish a board of live-stock commissioners, with powers and duties similar to those of the board of grain commissioners. It requests that the said board be empowered to administer under the Department of Agriculture, the Live Stock and Livestock Products Act, and that the members of the board shall be appointed in consultation with organized agriculture. The Live Stock and Livestock Products Act should be amended and consolidated with other legislation in order to vest in the board the power to license, regulate, and control the facilities for assembling, transporting, yarding, slaughtering, processing, and packing, together with the facilities for grading and selling all live stock and carcass products designed for human consumption.

I think that shows defiinitely, Mr. Chairman, that the government should really take into consideration again this matter of a board of live stock commissioners. I notice that the minister in another statement in this house suggested that there were obstacles in the way, but I think that these obstacles should be overcome; he can find a way of getting around them.

Mr. McIVOR: About thirty-five years ago I heard a student at Manitoba university by the name of James Gardiner debate the question of free trade. He upheld the negative side, and he won by a splendid margin. I congratulate him upon his statement at the recent agricultural conference here. It shows that he is still in favour of free trade, with the United States at least, so that he is growing in wisdom and in practical usefulness. Free trade should run north and south just as well as east and west. We should tell the United States government that we are not only practical neighbours as far as friendship is concerned, but real neighbours as far as tariffs are concerned. It should work both ways—not one thing for the United States and another thing for Canada; let us show the world that we are real neighbours.

Mr. MacNICOL: You would put every factory in Port Arthur out of business.

Mr. FAIR: I have no hesitation in supporting my Irish friend and former Irish neighbour across the floor. I have on many previous occasions brought up the question of guaranteed prices for producers of live stock, and again I must appeal to the minister to do something in the way of giving that guarantee to the producer. As has been shown on many occasions, the markets fluctuate, and these fluctuations are all to the benefit of the packers at the expense of the producers. It was shown, I think, that in October last the packers had a margin of about two and a half dollars on each hog shipped, and all that was at the expense of the producers. It is about time something was done to protect the producer against the fluctuation of the markets.

Mr. FRASER: Are there any regulations in regard to the inspection of peaches which are shipped to market. I understand that the only regulations are as to size, and that there are none as to the condition of the peach, as to how green it is. This has been the trouble with the marketing of peaches during the last five or six years, and perhaps longer. The peach must reach a certain stage before it will ripen after it has been shipped. Despite the fact that shippers have little tags in their baskets which say, "When these peaches are received in your home, spread them out on something flat so that they will ripen," during the last five or six years green peaches have been shipped which would never ripen, and the Canadian consumer has been fooled; there is no doubt of that. Now there must be a remedy, and I understand that that remedy is for the minister's department to put in the proper inspection at the shipping point, and also see to it that all fruit is inspected which is taken away from the peach orchards. A great deal can be said for this, and I believe the real peach grower would be thankful if the government would do something in that regard.

Mr. GARDINER: May I ask that those who are interested in this question reserve their remarks on it until we get to item 26?

Mr. FRASER: I brought it up on marketing service administration.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, but if we take these items which concern any particular subject and deal with them at the appropriate point, we can confine the administration item to general remarks.

Mr. FRASER: Very well.

Mr. GARDINER: Take what has been discussed on live stock, just a moment ago: it would be much better if we could discuss that under the item, live stock and live stock products, or the marketing item which follows it, because at that time I shall have all the information in front of me, and I can give a better answer than I could give at the moment.

Mr. KNIGHT: I asked the minister a question, I think it was yesterday, and he advised me to wait until this item was reached. To what extent are we as consumers here in Canada sacrificing quality in our home-consumed bacon in order to send the best to the British market?

Mr. GARDINER: Would the hon. member mind leaving that until we get down to live stock and live stock products?

Mr. KNIGHT: The minister stopped me yesterday and said that I could ask it on item 22.

Mr. GARDINER: I said, on marketing, which begins with item 22. If you look at the headings you can pick out the item on which you should discuss the matter. If it is live stock, discuss it under live stock; if it has to do with fruit, bring it up under the fruit item.

Mr. KNIGHT: It is difficult to get into this discussion. I thought after the second time I would hold my ground.

Mr. GARDINER: If it is a general discussion on administration, bring it up under this item.

The CHAIRMAN: I wish to draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that in committee remarks must be strictly relevant to the item under consideration. At the present time we are considering marketing service administration. Shall the item carry?

Mr. TOWNLEY-SMITH: No. I wish to make a few remarks on this matter of marketing. Every once in a while a letter on Canadian live stock products is issued by the industrial and development council of Canadian meat packers. This is dated October 8, 1945, and it contains an interesting table concerning the cost of producing and marketing bacon carcasses.

Mr. GARDINER: I am sure we can get along much more quickly if hon. members will try to cooperate. There is no one sitting at the table at this moment who has the facts with regard to the marketing of bacon. Mr. Pearsall will be here in a few moments, when we get down to live stock and live stock products. I could give the hon. member a general answer, if that is all he wants, but it would not be nearly as satisfactory.

Mr. TOWNLEY-SMITH: It is not really a question; it is a statement.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, a statement on marketing of live stock products ought to be made under item 27.

Mr. TOWNLEY-SMITH: Thank you.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Yesterday I asked the minister whether it is proposed to correct the situation with regard to the egg inspection service in the interior of British Columbia. Could the minister give some information on that?

Mr. GARDINER: Just as soon as we get down to live stock and live stock products, yes.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Yesterday the minister told me to bring up this matter under the marketing administration item.

Mr. GARDINER: I said, bring it up under marketing, but what we are dealing with now is item 22, marketing service administration. I do not think it is going to hurt anyone to wait a few minutes until we get to item 28.

23. Agricultural economics, $129,980.

Mr. ARGUE: I believe I am in order in discussing under this item the matter I have in mind. As the minister knows, there is a dominion economics department located in the university of Saskatchewan, and a number of university students taking the course in farm management find it convenient to do temporary work with the dominion economic department. It provides the students with good training and some funds toward paying their way through university. What rate does the dominion economics department pay temporary help? Has consideration been given to raising those rates? I believe I am correct in saying that two years ago the rate paid to temporary help, which included senior students for the most part, was thirty-five cents an hour, which I think is shameful.

Mr. GARDINER: I am sorry, I have not the information with me at the moment. Would the committee go on with something else until I get the information?

24. Dairy products, $401,719.

Mr. WRIGHT: When we were considering the publicity and extension division I endeavoured to bring up the matter of advertising of Canadian dairy products in Great Britain. I referred not only to advertising but to making our products available to the British public in a form which would be suitable to them. Will the minister explain just how our cheese is marketed in Great Britain? It is my understanding that between the two wars New Zealand captured a great deal of the Canadian market for cheese in Great Britain. My information is this was largely because she made her cheese available to the British market. She had cold storage plants there where the cheese can ripen and be available at all times. Have we such cold storage plants in Great Britain? What is our policy with respect to the marketing of our cheese and the maintenance of the market which we now have? It is very important to a large section of our dairy industry that we should retain that market, and we can do so only by having supplies always available there in the form in which the British public want them, rather than having them available only at certain seasons of the year.

Mr. GARDINER: The suggestion that the New Zealand people did capture a considerable part of the British market between the two wars, is, of course, in accordance with the facts. We were heavy producers of cheese which was required in the British market, and we were sending it to that market prior to the last war and during the war. But at the end of the war we took the attitude, which some people seem inclined to take at the end of this war, that our product had a certain value and we would not sell it for any less. The result was that the British began buying New Zealand cheese in greater and greater quantities.

As I remember the story, the New Zealand people accepted the price for their cheese which they were offered, and produced it in large quantities and sent it over. It is true that they did have facilities to handle it, but they did more than that; they advertised it thoroughly, so that by 1936, when I had my first experience with it personally, they had made great strides. I was over in Britain discussing the possibilities of greater marketing of farm products, and everywhere one looked he saw New Zealand cheese advertised, but in 1936 Canadian cheese was not advertised anywhere. As one walked out on the Strand from the Savoy hotel and looked about half a mile down the street where the street had been widened and there is a building extending out across the sidewalk, he saw on the top of that building: "Eat New Zealand Cheese". More people walk that half mile going to work every morning and two or three times a day than any other half mile in the world. This sign was in front of them all the time, but nothing about Canadian cheese, nothing about Canadian products of any kind. The same situation was true of the buses. Every bus that passed you on the street had a sign on it reading: "Eat New Zealand Cheese", and nothing about Canadian cheese. I came back to Canada and sent six men over to Britain to look into the matter, and then I asked them to get out a pamphlet. After I got that pamphlet out I remember I had considerable trouble, not with the people in Canada, not with the people in Britain, but with some people in the house; with the result that probably it was not as widely circulated as it should have been. Nevertheless it said just what my hon. friend has been suggesting in the last few moments. It said that our cheese and other farm products were not being advertised in Britain, and it proposed ways and means of getting that advertising.

In the years between that time and the war, Canadian farm products were greatly advertised. It was not done under the agricultural department direct; it was done under the Department of Trade and Commerce and in a measure through external affairs. But it was done, and we came into the war with much more of our Canadian cheese on the British market than we had in 1935 and 1936. During the war we have gone on pushing first the production and then the marketing of cheese in Great Britain, with the result that in 1942 we obtained the largest production we ever had in the history of Canada. We got up to over 200 million pounds, and we sent 140 odd million pounds to Britain. We are in a favourable position at this time.

I quite agree that one of the things we have to continue to do, now that the war is over, is advertise our product in Britain. We have before the government at the present time consideration of a policy of extending our facilities for the handling of not only cheese but other products on the other side, as New Zealand has done. It has been suggested in the first place that we should improve our cold storage facilities on the wharves in this country; that we should improve our cold storage shipping facilities on the railways across Canada, and thus put our product on board ships in good condition. We should improve our refrigeration facilities on boats going across to the other side, and then we believe we should have some facilities on the other side for the proper storage of Canadian bacon, cheese, and other food of the kind that we are sending over, in order to maintain them in a reasonably good condition until they are placed on the market in Britain.

I quite agree that the suggestion which has been made is one to which we should give some thought, and that is being done at the present time.

Mr. BOUCHER: Could the minister give us some idea as to the government's policy of continuing the bonus on cheese? This is important to the cheese industry, as they say it takes a year from the time of planning to the time of marketing. I notice in the estimates that the total bonus paid on cheese last year was not equivalent to the bonus on apples. It does not seem to me that that comparison is a favourable one for the cheese industry.

Mr. GARDINER: The premium that we pay on cheese was, of course, being paid before the war started. It continued through the war and so far as I know will continue indefinitely. We pay a premium on 93 and 94 score cheese, and that we shall continue to pay. That is the only direct subsidy we pay on cheese. At the present time we pay a subsidy on milk which enters into the production of cheese, which is much the same thing as paying it directly on cheese. Of course that subsidy will be considered when we are making any change from the policy now carried out under the War Measures Act to the policy which may be carried out under the floor prices legislation. At the moment I am not in a position to say what the nature of it will be, but the endeavour during the transitional period will be to maintain the relationship between the price of cheese and the prices of the commodities the producer of cheese has to buy, as has been stated here on a number of occasions. In addition one must keep in mind the fact that we have a contract with Britain which will continue until the spring of 1947 and which guarantees the present floor price of cheese for that period of time. The premium is on as well, and the only thing we are not absolutely assured of is the milk subsidy. So far as I know that will be retained for some time, but I do not know just how long.

Mr. BOUCHER: I should like to emphasize that point, because I think the minister will appreciate the fact that cheese production is an important matter in Canada and of great concern to war-torn Europe and to Britain. However, to enable farmers engaged in the manufacture of cheese to produce the quantity and quality desired, considerable guidance must be given before the cheese production season comes along, so that they can plan in advance how to dispose of their milk, whether to the cheese factories, the dairies, or the creameries. In other years we have criticized the minister for being a little late in giving the farmers the information they require, and if we could get these directions earlier than we have been able to get them in past years it would be of interest and benefit to the farmers and to the country as a whole.

Mr. CARDIFF: I should like to ask the minister just what standing our cheese has in Great Britain, so far as quality goes, as compared with New Zealand cheese, for instance.

Mr. GARDINER: Our cheese has been right at the top of the list so far as quality is concerned. That is indicated by the fact that we have always enjoyed a premium of two or three cents a pound as compared with New Zealand cheese, and that was so even before the war. Our cheese is recognized as being right at the top in the matter of giving the quality they require in Britain.

Mr. BROOKS: Yesterday I called the minister's attention to a protest from the New Brunswick cheese producers' association in reference to the regulation of the board of health which requires that cheese mature for a period of ninety days. At that time I understood there was not very much that could be done in that connection, though I think it is a serious threat to the cheese industry in our province. In New Brunswick they seem to like their cheese quite green, and they sell principally to their local market. Personally I have not acquired a taste for green cheese, but this is a serious matter down there. One of the great difficulties we shall encounter if this regulation remains in force is in connection with storage facilities in the small cheese factories. I believe the larger factories are given a subsidy for the construction of storage space, but in the small cheese factories no such provision is made. I should like to know whether some arrangement could not be made for the storage of cheese at some central place. The town of Sussex in my constituency is the centre of the cheese industry; as a matter of fact I believe about eighty per cent of the cheese factories in the province are in Kings and Queens counties, which form the constituency of Royal. I believe these cheese producers will be in a serious position unless something is done. A few minutes ago the minister spoke about storage facilities having been constructed across Canada, I should like to know if it would not be possible to provide some storage facilities in the town of Sussex. We have them now in Saint John and also in Moncton, but they are not sufficient to accommodate our cheese production if it has to be held for ninety days.

Mr. GARDINER: Of course we do assist those who are putting up storage facilities, in New Brunswick or wherever it may be, to the extent of thirty per cent of the cost.

Mr. BROOKS: That is in connection with the factory itself?

Mr. GARDINER: No, not the factory. There are two provisions. There is the old act, which I think has been in existence since at least 1922, which provides that wherever storage facilities are built, whether by a co-operative, an individual, a corporation or whoever it may be, and that cold storage is available to the public, we pay thirty per cent of the cost. One-half that thirty per cent is paid in the year in which the plant is built, and the other half is spread over four years. That provision is available to anyone anywhere in Canada who puts up any storage facilities. Then under the act we passed in 1939, at the time we put a premium on the production of high quality cheese of 94 and 93 score, we agreed to pay for the cost of putting cold storage facilities right in the plant where the cheese is made, in order to assist them in raising the standard of their cheese. We are doing that right across the country, too.

As to the other question having to do with the curing of cheese, speaking subject to correction because I am not too certain of our legal position in the matter, I think matters of health are largely under the control of the provinces. If the product is to be shipped out of the province of course it comes under our control and we can check the shipment of it. We brought in the regulation as the result of an epidemic of typhoid which broke out in Alberta, where the germ was traced back to a carrier who was providing milk for the production of cheese at a certain plant. Curing the cheese for a period of ninety days kills that germ, so it was stated that cheese had to be cured for ninety days as protection against the spread of typhoid. If those facts are correct I think everyone will agree that this is the thing which should be done.

To come back to the point raised by the hon. member, however, so far as we are concerned I should think we could only enforce that in connection with the cheese that is shipped out. If the people of New Brunswick want to eat green cheese and things of the kind I am not too sure we could do much about it under that regulation. It is only when we have the full cooperation of the provincial authorities, as I think we have had up to the moment, that we can enforce the regulation both provincially and interprovincially. I would hesitate to suggest that we could change the regulation. Certainly I should not want to do so without very strong representations from all the provinces.

Mr. BROOKS: I quite agree with the minister from the point of view of health, but I was asking about the cold storage facilities. Do I understand that 30 per cent of the cost is paid by the government if the cold storage facilities are maintained in the factory?

Mr. GARDINER: No; any place.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. BROOKS: Then if the New Brunswick cheese producers' association set up a cold storage plant of their own the government would provide 30 per cent of the cost?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. HATFIELD: Is there not some chemical that could be used in cheese to kill the germ mentioned by the minister, without having to cure it for ninety days?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not too sure whether there is such a chemical, but this is considered to be the simplest way of doing it. As a matter of fact I think it is one of the strong arguments for eating cheese, that curing it in this way makes it safer.

Mr. CASE: There is an item here of $1,500 for lawyers' and analysts' fees. Are these lawyers who are employed by the department, or does this represent fees and retainers paid to outside lawyers? And what about the analysts. I do not suppose the lawyers are analysts, though they are lumped together in this item.

Mr. GARDINER: That just provides for the occasional services of lawyers and analysts. We apply to the Department of Justice for the appointment of some local man to do some particular thing for us; it may be a prosecution under the act.

Mr. CASE: And how about the analysts?

Mr. GARDINER: The same thing applies there; we employ them when we need them.

Mr. MENARY: Could the minister tell us how much poultry was exported to Britain in 1944 and so far in 1945, and also whether any honey has been exported?

Mr. GARDINER: I shall have to ask the hon. member to wait until we get to the live stock division. I have not the information now.

23. Agricultural economics, $129,980.

Mr. GARDINER: The question of grants made in connection with economic surveys was raised a few moments ago by the hon. member for Wood Mountain. These are really salaries paid to individuals taking part in this work and they range from $1,260 to $1,800 a year. These men are provided for under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act vote. They are not provided for under the vote stipulated here. Most of them—I believe practically all of them—come under the P.F.R.A. grant. They operate in different places and in different ways. I have a list of the group here, a little more than a page, which I could put on Hansard if the hon. member wished to have it.

Mr. ARGUE: I am not interested in that list. I am really interested in the wage rates paid temporary help in the winter time by the dominion economics department.

Mr. GARDINER: We have no arrangement with regard to that. It will be understood that the agricultural colleges associated with the universities in the two provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan are run by the provinces and we give assistance. In some cases it is a matter of our engaging individuals and paying them. That is true of the group I have here ranging from $1,260 to $1,800. The other work which is done may be temporary and is perhaps paid for by the university authorities under some arrangement with the provincial government. The whole administration is under the province.

Mr. BENTLEY: The hon. member for Battle River made reference to a certain survey with regard to the effect of commercial fertilizers on soils and I do not see anything here for that particular work. I do not see any estimates in connection with R.O.P. publications. All pure-bred associations issue in their journals a record of production and the department also issues an extensive one, which must call for quite a bit of money. If some of that money were diverted to other purposes it would add to the services that are being rendered. It does not seem necessary for the government and the breeders' associations to issue material as extensively as they do, and the breeders' associations appear to be the proper ones to do it. I should like to see the minister's estimates increased, because he has not enough money for the work of his department. I would suggest, therefore, the diversion of some of this money to other purposes.

Mr. GARDINER: I am not certain where the R.O.P. pamphlets are published.

Mr. BENTLEY: It would be under economics.

Mr. GARDINER: It would be under publicity and extension or under production somewhere. It may be that the pamphlets the hon. member has in mind are put out in the records organization, which is not a department of government, but a set-up provided by the breeders' association to which we make a grant. But their publications will be theirs and not ours.

Mr. BENTLEY: Would it not be better for the department to make a grant for that purpose instead of having these activities duplicated?

Mr. CASE: Under salaries there appears provision for cost of living bonus. I understand that this has been done away with and that it will be incorporated in the regular salaries. That was carried out in 1944-45 and, I believe, in 1945-46. Another item is travelling expenses under various heads. What is the over-all travelling expenses total of the department? How are they accounted for? At the moment I am seeking information about the cost of living bonus, and I should like to know why it appears in that way. I understood it to be incorporated in the regular salaries.

Mr. GARDINER: The decision has been made to incorporate it in the regular salaries and we are going through the process in the different departments of bringing that about, but so far as these votes are concerned, it is still as it was. I do not know to what extent the incorporation has taken place in our department, but surveys are being made by the civil service commission to bring it about.

Mr. CASE: What about the over-all travelling expenses of the department?

Mr. GARDINER: The total of all given here would indicate what the total expenses are, but I have nothing under my hand to show it.

25. Subsidies for cold storage warehouses, under the Cold Storage Act, and grants, in the amounts detailed in the estimates, $338,477.
Marketing service—

Mr. WRIGHT: There is a considerable reduction, the reason being, I presume, that the facilities have been paid for now, and therefore it is not necessary to continue the vote. Can the minister give some information regarding the extent of cold storage facilities built by the government during the war in various places in Canada or the handling of production in Canada? Has there been any building of that description by the government? If so, to what extent and where are the facilities situated?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think we have built any cold storage as a government. I am running over in my mind hurriedly, but I do not remember any that we constructed during the war. We did discuss the possibility of doing so in connection with the apple industry in Nova Scotia, but no construction was made. As a matter of fact we advised them that we had been paying up to thirty per cent of the cost of cold storage across Canada and suggested their proceeding on that basis, but up to date I cannot recall any cold storage put in by the government itself.

26. Fruit, vegetable and maple products and honey, including grant of $5,000 to Canadian horticultural council, $567,000.

Mr. FRASER: I was speaking before under vote 22 and I was told to bring up under this item the question of inspection of peaches. I understand that at present the peaches are inspected or graded only as to size. As I said before, I understand that the peach must reach a certain stage of maturity if it is to ripen after it has been shipped. Has the minister any suggestions to make, or could he tell us what they are doing along that line? I am quite sure the peach growers would welcome a proper type of inspection, because at present peaches that have not reached the proper stage of maturity when they are shipped do not ripen when received by the consumer; they rot and they are a total loss to the person who buys them.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not want to appear to be passing the buck to the provinces in connection with this matter; I am simply stating the facts. The grading of farm produce of different kinds, whether it is fruit or any other commodity, comes under the provincial authorities if the product is sold and marketed inside the province. We have no legal authority over that whatsoever. In so far as peaches are concerned, the grades would be established under the Fruit, Vegetables and Honey Act, which is a federal act. Those grades are reenacted under the provincial legislation. In the case of Ontario this is the farm produce grading and sales act, which covers provincial enforcement. They have an act and we have an act. We have set up certain grades and certain qualifications and they have reenacted them. In most instances they employ our inspectors; they say that our inspectors are their inspectors in order to legalize the acts of our inspectors. When our inspectors are working within the province in connection with business carried on inside the province they are working under the provincial legislation, not under ours.

I think the situation in Ontario this last year was created largely by weather conditions. It was probably most difficult to supply the market there was for peaches with the highest grade of peaches. I think it is perfectly right to say that last year a great many peaches went on to the market which were supposed to be up to grade but which were not up to grade. I do not know to what extent such peaches got outside the province, but I have had no complaints from persons outside Ontario with regard to peaches that they obtained from Ontario. But I have had a lot of complaints about peaches sold in Ontario. Whether it was our inspector or the provincial inspector who made the inspection, the inspection would be made under the provincial law. As I understand it, their grading would be just as high as ours and the inspected peaches would be the same whether marketed inside or outside the province, but because of the difficulties which occurred, much closer attention will be paid to grading and marketing during the coming year.

Mr. FRASER: I have had reports of peaches that went into Quebec which were not ripe but which rotted in the bottom of the basket. I understand that there have also been complaints from Quebec with regard to the pink or red gauze put on top of the baskets. This pink gauze is put on top of green peaches, and it makes them look as though they are ripe and the purchaser buys them with that understanding. The department should have some regulation governing the grading. I do not think the minister has answered my question in regard to the grading as to greenness or quality. As I understand it, they are graded now only as to size. The dominion government is the agency that should see that they are graded properly. When a basket of peaches is marketed as being grade 1, it should be grade 1, instead of being a basket full of hard, green rocks.

Mr. GARDINER: I think that question arises from the definition of "mature." The act states that unless otherwise defined, "mature" shall mean fruit that has reached the stage of development which ensures the completion of the ripening process. Probably that term will have to be more clearly defined before we can meet the situation.

Mr. FRASER: That is exactly what I was trying to get at.

Mr. GARDINER: It has been assumed that when one picks a peach or any other fruit it will be picked at that stage of ripeness which will ensure that in a reasonable time it will ripen, or by the time the cook comes to use it. I think it was found this year that the fruit was picked a little too green and it rotted very quickly. This caused a great deal of trouble right across the country. But as I say, that definition seems to be the source of the trouble and probably we shall have to try to make it tighter.

Mr. HANSELL: We are being asked to vote a little over half a million dollars under this item. I have no objection to that, but I should like the minister to throw some light on a little problem that I have had brought to my attention on several occasions by correspondents in the southern part of my constituency. This has to do with the marketing of perishable fruits by British Columbia growers outside that province. When I received this inquiry I went to the hon. member for Yale who helped me out. I remembered that he had been in the government when the Natural Products Marketing Act was first passed. The minister knows that that act was sent to the courts and declared to be ultra vires; it was taken to the privy council and they supported the decision of the courts. But that does not explain the position to the people who are interested. People in southern Alberta, and perhaps in other parts of the country, are unable to purchase fruit from an individual grower at a cheaper price, and some individual growers do not understand why they cannot sell outside the province and receive a little better price. The grower would get a better price and the consumer would have to pay less. I am not asking for a lengthy statement, but I wonder if the minister could take a minute or two to explain this problem.

Mr. GARDINER: This question has been discussed, I think every year since I have been here, and I do not know that we have been able to get very far with it. Many years ago the provincial government of British Columbia passed a marketing act which gave authority to the organizations which control fruit in British Columbia to hold fruit off the market under certain circumstances. Among other powers which I do not wish to discuss this afternoon, they were given the power to hold certain species of apples from the market until other species had been entirely marketed. They also set the dates on which the apples shall be shipped. I stated once before on the floor of the house that a man came into my hotel room in Regina once and said to me, "Why cannot I buy such and such a species of apple?" I said, "Can't you?" He said, "No, I have been into a number of stores and cannot buy an apple, and I finally bought a case of oranges." I said, "That was your own decision. What are you suggesting I should do about it?" There is nothing I know that we can do. It had been decided that those apples of a certain species would not be marketed until a certain date until other apples had been got out of the way. That had been decided in British Columbia and there was not much I could do about it. I said, in discussing this matter before, that later on it might have the effect—it did not have that effect during the war—of making people want to eat something else or go somewhere else for their apples. However, it is British Columbia legislation, and it has gone to the privy council, where it was decided that the legislation was within the powers of the province to pass and enforce. It has been enforced there and as British Columbia has decided that it is in their own interests I would hesitate to criticize it.

Mr. CASE: To come back to travelling expenses, I find that the travelling expenses over-all amount to $1,170,709. I am not criticizing that total because I have no doubt that it can be justified, but it would appear that this is a substantial travelling department. Do they use motor cars or railway passes, or do they have to pay the regular fares?

Mr. GARDINER: The travelling expenses for this particular branch are $59,000, or ten per cent of its expenditure. Our expenditures here are a little over $10,000,000, and the hon. member said that the total travelling expenses were $1,170,709, or a little over ten per cent, which is the same proportion that $59,000 bears to the expenditure for this particular branch. So that the travelling expenses seem to run about the same all through the department. I have not examined other departments to find out how our travelling expenses compare with theirs, but I would be surprised if ours were not higher. The reason is that we have to deal with the affairs of 750,000 farmers, and our inspectors have to go right out on the farms and into all the markets for their products of those 750,000 farms, into creameries and everything of that kind all across the country, so that I would be surprised if our travelling expenses are not higher than those of other departments because our administration could not be properly carried out if that were not so.

Mr. STEPHENSON: Is there any overlapping between the provincial and federal departments of agriculture in the matter of inspection? I have received a letter from a dairy in my town, and this is the complaint the writer makes:

> We have twelve or fourteen inspectors calling on us at present, namely, local health inspector, provincial health inspector, provincial milk test inspector, provincial milk control board inspector, provincial producer's inspector, scale inspector, smoke inspector, excise tax inspector, income tax inspector, unemployment insurance inspector . . .

And so forth. That is what they have to go through, although I know that some of these inspectors do not come under this department. But is there not overlapping between federal, provincial and municipal inspections?

Mr. GARDINER: That list indicates that not very many of those inspectors were attached to the Department of Agriculture, but we take the blame for our share. I repeat what I said a few moments ago, that there is a definite araringement between the provinces and the federal government that all through these services, the dairy branch, the fruit branch and I think in every case, the same inspectors are used for both federal and provincial inspection. What they do is to appoint our man to do the inspections required by the provinces. We try to avoid overlapping. In fact, at each of our agricultural conferences that we have had in the past ten years that has been one of the outstanding questions, and it has been agreed that everything possible has been done to avoid overlapping in the inspection service.

Mr. CARDIFF: You have a milk inspector, a cheese inspector and a butter inspector. I can see no reason why one man could not inspect all three products, instead of one man being sent around the first of the week and another man around the last of the week. Surely, if a man knows something about milk, he should know something about cheese and butter.

Mr. GARDINER: There are two sides to that. A specialist in cheese is not necessarily a specialist in butter, and in many cases you probably could not use the same man. Again, the big cheese producing area is from Ingersoll straight through to Three Rivers. Some butter is produced in that area too, but western Ontario is more of a butter-producing area than a cheese-producing area. There may be the occasional cheese factory in that area. A cheese specialist would only be competent to visit a small percentage of the plants in that area unless he was a butter expert too, and they do not necessarily come that way. One man specializes in cheese and another in butter, and you have to have a competent man to give a satisfactory inspection.

Mr. STEPHENSON: I should think one man would be competent to inspect butter, cheese and milk. If you call in a doctor, he can deal with measles, mumps and other ailments, and surely to goodness a man can be trained to inspect butter, cheese and milk instead of one man being sent to inspect cheese, another butter and another, milk. The dairymen have enough to put up with without all these inspections.

Mr. GARDINER: We want a specialist when we are very sick. But apart from that, cheese and butter inspectors seldom meet in the same factory, although you will find that in the province of Quebec. It is not a case of two or three men dropping in to the same place but of two men dropping in to two different places.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. FRASER: The only complaint I have heard about inspections in my district is that the inspector, who comes from Belleville, goes to just one dairy in the Peterborough district and takes a sample of milk to see if there is enough cream in it or too much. Then he goes back to Belleville and checks it, and then comes back the next day for another sample. Belleville is a long way off, seventy-five miles away.

Mr. GARDINER: Perhaps he thinks some man there is crooked and he tries to drop in unexpectedly.

Mr. BARRETT: I should like to refer to the red netting that is used on peach baskets. Rightly or wrongly the public suspect that it is being used by unscrupulous peach-growers to camouflage green peaches, but from what I can learn the reputable peach growers are not particularly in favour of the red netting. Is any action contemplated in regard to the use of it?

Mr. GARDINER: The matter of disallowing that kind of covering on peaches is being considered, and I understand there is to be a largely attended meeting on Saturday of next week in order to give consideration to that question along with many others.

Mr. KNIGHT: Are we on live stock and live stock products?

The CHAIRMAN: We are still on item 26.

Mr. KNIGHT: The matter I wish to bring up is perhaps not so very important, but the minister's persistence in keeping me to my turn made me equally persistent to get in.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. We are still on item 26.

Mr. GARDINER: No; it is carried.

27. Live stock and live stock products, $631,507.

Mr. KNIGHT: You cannot beat a man at his own game, and I know the minister is right. He must know my little preamble almost by heart by this time.

What I was talking about was the horrible quality of the bacon products we have had to consume in this country, and with good reason, over the last five or six years; but one of the questions I wanted to ask the minister was, to what extent are we sacrificing quality in our home-consumed product in order to send the best to the British market? As I intimated before, perhaps we should not talk about the matter with any accent on sacrifice, because our sacrifices have been infinitesimal in comparison with what the consumer overseas has put up with.

I was overseas just prior to the war, and I made it my business to look into this matter of Canadian bacon. I wonder now what percentage of our home-consumed bacon comes from sows, stags and heavies. I know that to compete with Irish and Danish bacon we have to send our best over there. I was amazed, however, when one of my colleagues —I take it we are all colleagues here—on the Conservative benches talked about our having to do something about the matter because the Danes were "stealing" the British market for bacon.

Mr. FRASER: They certainly are.

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes; I think it was the hon. gentleman who has just spoken who said that the Danes were stealing the British market for bacon. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that the Danes are merely coming back into their own.

Mr. FRASER: They are getting their own and ours too.

Mr. KNIGHT: We never had the British market for bacon.

It is not only in proximity to the purchasers that the Danes and the Irish have the advantage. The minister said, perhaps yesterday, that you had to have grain to raise pigs. The minister also knows that the less proportion of grain in a pig's diet, the better pork you have and the faster you can make it. The Irish peasant who has only one pig feeds it on buttermilk, boiled potatoes and whatever small amount of grain he can get; he raises the best pork in the world, and raises it faster than it is raised any other place I know. The same is true to some extent of the small Danish farmer, because he uses a large proportion of tankage and skim milk which he has available from the fact that he goes in for dairy products.

Just before the war I looked somewhat into this matter of Canadian bacon in Belfast, and from the point of view of quality. I was interested to hear the minister say that Canadian cheese held a unique place on the British market. I am glad to hear that. He knows. But I found that Canadian bacon was occupying at that time a very poor fourth place on the British market. As a matter of fact, I may say, I was able to buy bacon over there sliced and ready for the table—strange to say, Canadian bacon—at fifteen cents a pound less than my wife was paying in the city of Saskatoon, for the same brand of bacon which was being cured just 100 miles from that city.

The Irish people do not like Canadian bacon. I must state that frankly. Many of them had not heard of it, and those who had did not like it because it did not fulfil their requirements. What is the trouble in that particular situation?

That brings me to the packers. If we are to go on eating the kind of stuff we have been eating—sows and stags and heavies —for the last five or six years here, I want to know that we are eating it to some purpose. That meat is as nourishing as the meat we send to Britain, so that when the minister sends it over he must have in mind not only the nourishment of the British people but, as our hon. friend would say, the capture of the British market and the holding of as much of the British market as we can hold in view of the better competition of the Danes, the Irish and the English farmers themselves. I should like to be sure that the packers are not now doing what they did six years ago, being quite careless and dilatory in the matter of filling their requirements for the British market. I found this, for instance. I found out that the British market likes what I would call short-cured bacon; I think the proper term is "mild cured" bacon. I do not know what we do with our bacon or what chemicals we put on it, but we certainly make it so that it will keep well, perhaps in order to keep it in the hot weather. The British do not like that sort of bacon; they like a mild cured bacon; and I would like to be assured—and I think I am, by something the minister said yesterday—that he is looking into the matter of increased cold storage facilities by which that bacon can be taken over in a greener or milder stage to fill the British requirements.

Another thing I discovered about British opinion of Canadian bacon was this, that they could not be sure of any uniformity when they got bacon. When they bought bacon from one Canadian packer they got bacon of a different cure than when they bought it from another Canadian packer. You know how conservative the British are in their tastes. When they want bacon of a certain kind they want bacon of that kind, and that is the only kind they will buy. It was astonishing to me to find that our bacon, which I had thought was pretty good, was, as I say, a very poor fourth on the British market. So that, if we are to make the sacrifice which we are making—and hon. gentlemen know that the quality of the bacon we, have been eating is something terrific; you cannot get decent bacon any more; I fancy we are eating about 80 per cent of the rough bacon here. I should like to know from the minister what the percentage is.

That is about all I have to say on that matter. I should like, however, to direct three questions to the minister. I might add that during the war we did not mind eating that sort of bacon. If we thought we were doing our British brethren any good we would eat that kind of bacon or eat no bacon at all; but now that the war is over, the British will not be willing to take anything we care to send, or at any rate not for long. Just now they are in a condition where they are glad to take any piece of "sow belly" they can get their hands on.

Boiling this down to three questions, I should like to ask: first, what proportion of the bacon available in our Canadian stores to-day is rough meat of the kind I have described; second, what precautions are the packers and the department taking to see that there are proper facilities for taking to Britain the kind of bacon the British people want to buy; third, in a matter which the minister touched on to-day, relating to cheese, have we a thorough scheme of advertising in an attempt to hold the British market for bacon which our hon. friend says is in the process of being stolen from us?

Mr. GARDINER: I will answer the last question first, with regard to advertising, while it is fresh in my mind. With regard to advertising, during the war it was illegal to advertise any food in Britain. Britain bought all the food, took possession of it whether it came in from the outside or was produced inside, and distributed it.

Mr. KNIGHT: I am assuming—

Mr. GARDINER: I am telling what the facts are up to the moment. We were not permitted, neither were the Danes nor anyone else, to advertise. The food products belonged to the government and were distributed by the government. They did not permit anybody to advertise any particular product. They said that the people had to take what they could get.

With regard to the quality of the product, we have standardized the bacon during the war. The different packers are not permitted to make their own brand and send it to Britain; they must make bacon of a cure that is set, and that was established during the war. We hope to maintain it. Whether we shall have the authority to maintain it after the war is over is another question. I doubt very much that we shall have much opposition to maintaining it. We hope we shall be able to maintain the standard.

[Mr. Knight.]

With regard to the quality of what we have been sending over during the war, that is one of the reasons why I am most anxious to get over to Britain at this time. There is still bacon there which was shipped over during the war period. The hon. member is quite correct in saying that we had a rather heavy cure on our bacon during the war. We had to have that. In the first place, boats were irregular, and in the second place food had to be got to Britain and stored. Whether it was good policy as a rule to do that with bacon or not, it had to be put there in great quantities so that they could have it if there was a blockade. Therefore we had to put bacon over there which would keep. When they said they were going to have a ration for a certain period of time they wanted to know that it would be available before the announcement was made, and it required to be kept over a long period. Well, we were afraid of that condition at the end of the war, because stories started coming over that the Danish people were getting back into the market in Britain. They have not got back to any great extent yet, as one would expect, but they were getting back in a manner which would have done harm to this country. They started immediately to make their mild cure bacon, and send it to Britain. They did not need to advertise. As has just been said, the British people like that kind of bacon and all the Danish people needed to do was to put it there. We sent Mr. Pearsall over to Britain to go into that question immediately it started, and we got a definite understanding then that the Danish bacon which was put on the British market would be cured like our own, a heavy cure, so that it could be stored alongside our own as long as ours could be stored, and that the two bacons were going on to the market in the same way. In other words, we said that if the Danish bacon were to go on mild, then we had better start shipping ours over mild too, in which case it would have to be consumed immediately it got there. An arrangement was made, and I think it has been working out satisfactorily since, so that our bacon is cured in the same way as the Danish bacon, and they go on the market on the same basis.

As to what we can do in the future, I do not think we can maintain the position that the Danish people must always put their product on the market so that it will keep just as long as our product. We start ours moving from Edmonton through to Halifax or to Montreal and we put it on a boat and ship it across the ocean. We are shipping our commodity in cars and at times along with other commodities. Foods take on taints perhaps quicker than anything else.

We have not the same facilities for loading it in the boats that they have over there. Then their boats just carry bacon. They are built to do nothing but carry bacon. They take it across the North sea to Britain and unload it into facilities which are properly prepared for it. Their commodity does not suffer any great changes in temperature from the time it is first turned into bacon until it arrives on the British market. We must do that as nearly as we possibly can, but we cannot eliminate the distance which exists between Edmonton and London as compared with the distance between Denmark and Britain. Therefore we shall be at a disadvantage to that extent.

When I was over there in 1940 I met a man who I think is as good an expert as one could hope to meet. He was living in Glasgow; he was in the business and was appointed as the Scottish representative of the food ministry to handle all the food which came to Scotland. He told me definitely, as I said in this house before, that he had been eating Danish bacon prior to the war and never hoped to eat anything else, but for three months up to that time he had been eating Canadian bacon and that he would never go back to the Danish. He considered that Canadian bacon was as good as, and probably a little better than, the Danish, and he was going to continue to eat it for the rest of his life. I have no doubt that many people have come to that decision.

One or two statements were made with regard to the product which I do not think are borne out by the opinion of the experts. For example, it was said a moment ago that these rougher forms of bacon or cured meats were just as good from the point of view of feeding people, giving them what is necessary for their nourishment as the higher quality, or what we call the higher quality of product. One thing is self-evident, whether one is an expert or not. The kind of bacon which the Danish people supplied to Britain, and the kind we tried to supply is a strip of fat and a strip of lean, a strip of fat and a strip of lean. The kind of product that we have been eating in Canada during the war lacked that extra strip of lean. If it is oil you want you can buy lard for twelve cents a pound. You do not want to pay forty-five cents a pound for fat. What you are really paying forty-five cents a pound for is the properly cured lean that is in the meat, and that is where the real food value is. It was not the fault of the packer that this other product was on the market. As a matter of fact, the packer prefers to put the best quality he has on the market where most of his product naturally goes. There has been great competition among packers. There are two groups of packers. There is one group which exports, and another group which does not. Early in the war they were in competition with one another to the extent that they would come here and ask us to pass legislation for one group, which, if passed, might put the other group out of business. We said: "No, we will not do that kind of thing." but that we would have regulations which would make it possible for both of them to carry on, but they must carry on in competition.

I think that was best illustrated to me one day when I was out in the constituency of Humboldt trying to prevent the present hon. member for Humboldt from coming here at all. I was not successful, and that was his good fortune; but I was in a certain hotel one day and I thought the hotel-keeper was not any too friendly. He was sort of shying off to one side. Finally I went out and was going to go across the street. He joined me. When I got out across the sidewalk he became a little more friendly, and when we got in the middle of the street he stopped me where nobody on either side could hear what we were saying. He said to me: "I am a good friend of yours; I am a good friend of the government." He said, "I would not risk asking this question inside the hotel, which I am going to ask you right here in the middle of the street." He said: "We are getting nothing to put on our hotel table now but bacon that is made out of sows"—sow-belly, as my hon. friend said a while ago. He said: "Do you know that?" I said, "Yes, I know that." He said: "Who is responsible for that?" I said: "We are responsible for it. We told the packers that they had to send all the other pork over to Britain, and if we want to eat what we call bacon in this country it must be made out of something else for the time being. We take the responsibility for that." He said, "All right; I will explain it in that way. I was afraid to explain it in that way before."

I am not afraid to make that explanation. I know that sometimes even on trains, where you expect to get the very best, you got a little three-cornered piece of what looked like bacon and was cured like bacon. I made some inquiries to find out where that came from, and I was told that it came from the jowl of the pig, off the jaw, and did not come from where the bacon usually comes at all. But we were eating it; we were getting a certain amount of oil out of it and a certain amount of lean meat, which to some extent at least met our requirements. I quite agree we should not have to eat that sort of meat after we get a little farther away from the war; but I repeat what I said yesterday, which some newspapers took to be a prophecy in connection with rationing, although I did not intend it in that way. All I said was that if we were to be able to supply Britain with as much meat as we did last year, we must have some restrictions on consumption in Canada. One of the restrictions we had some time ago meant that if we wanted to eat the same number of pounds of meat that we had been eating we would have to accept the things we were not sending to Britain. Some people conceived ways and means of curing portions that were not previously made into bacon in such a way that they tasted something like bacon and perhaps gave the same service to a degree. But if that kind of thing is to be carried on, probably we shall need along with it what we had during the war, and that is a certain amount of control over the prices of the different cuts. I do not know how long we can continue that; but in any event our effort would be to get for Britain as high a quality and as great a quantity of bacon as we possibly can during at least the next twelve months, and at the same time we shall try to keep on our own market food sold in accordance with its real food value. That is about all I can say at the moment.

Mr. KNIGHT: The minister did not answer my first question, although I think it can be answered in a few words. I am well aware that we were not advertising Canadian bacon during the war; for one reason, even if we had been permitted we did not have to, because the Danish bacon was going to Germany and the British had no other place from which to get bacon. My question was whether or not the minister was going to take steps now to advertise our good Canadian bacon, as he has told us he has made plans to advertise cheese. My first question, the one I asked in the beginning, was as to what proportion of the meat on our home market is this rough meat, such as the minister has described.

Mr. GARDINER: Last month we were sending ninety per cent of all the high-grade bacon and ham to Britain. That percentage changes from time to time. I think I said yesterday that in the period when the price went down we were sending ninety per cent of the high-grade bacon and ham to Britain, but that extended only over a short period.

Mr. HERRIDGE: In the legislature of British Columbia last March I brought to the attention of the provincial minister of agriculture the necessity for a better egg inspection system in the interior of that province. I pointed out that large quantities of ungraded eggs were being sold by the unorganized egg producers, and that something should be done about the matter, although very little had been said during the war by the organized producers. At that time I was told that this matter should be brought to the attention of the federal government, that it came within their jurisdiction. Well, I am here now, asking the Minister of Agriculture what can be done in the near future to remedy this situation.

Mr. GARDINER: That matter was brought to the attention of the proper officials of the department, and they now have under consideration the matter of putting in a better inspection system in British Columbia.

Mr. TOWNLEY-SMITH: To come back to the meat business for a moment, we have heard a great deal about the profits which have been made by western farmers, particularly, in the raising of hogs. I have always regarded those profits with some suspicion, for in my own case they were rather nebulous. I have a letter from the council of Canadian meat packers containing a table of hog production costs headed, "Is hog production profitable at present prices?" I wonder if hon. members would be interested in hearing the farmer's break-down of some of these figures. I will accept them without argument, because there is not time to discuss them. At any rate they show that it costs $17.20 to feed a hog to the marketable stage. Up in my country last year the young pig, the weanling, was worth $5 when it was six weeks old. Some sold for a little more, some for a little less, but $5 was the average price. So that if we add $5 to $17.20 worth of feed we get a total of $22.20. According to the figures contained in this table, a grade B-1 carcass—and most of our carcasses are B-1—is worth $28.40, which gives the farmer a leeway of $6.20 between what he receives for the carcass and the cost of the pig and the feed.

This $6.20 has to take care of various things, such as chopping the feed; the interest on the outlay for buildings; occasional losses, because even pigs occasionally die; the hauling of pigs to the market and the hauling of feed, as well as the labour. If we apply that amount of $6.20 to labour alone we find that it covers a period of four and a half months or eighteen weeks during which the pig has to be fed. If you divide 18 into $6.20 it works out to thirty-four cents a week, or roughly five cents per pig per day, and that has to tak care of all these things. However, since this form was printed the market has fallen by roughly $2 per animal, so that we have to revise our figures, and instead of having a leeway of $6.20 we have only $4.20. That works out at twenty-three cents a week or 3½ cents a day, to take care of labour, chopping, outlay on buildings, occasional losses and hauling. Therefore, when the farmer comes in at night and breaks down this 3½ cents under all these headings and figures out his income tax, he learns what profit he has made.

Mr. FULTON: I have waited for a long time to reach this item; I have not tried to make this statement on something else so that I hope the minister will hear me now. What I have to say has to do with the price of hogs. I have a letter enclosing an article from the Western Producer of October 25 calling attention to the fact that immediately after the government announced that ninety per cent of all available bacon would be taken for export to Great Britain the price fell $1.25 per hundredweight. In order to explain this situation I wonder if the minister could tell me how the price for what we ship to Britain is set. I understood—and I hope the minister will correct me if I am wrong—that the price paid the packers for overseas shipments is set by the meat board. If that is correct, will the minister explain what relation this price set for overseas shipments bears to the price which prevails in the domestic market, and how that price is arrived at. If the minister will answer that I will follow it up with another question.

Mr. GARDINER: I think I dealt with that the other day; probably the hon. member was not here.

Mr. FULTON: I looked through Hansard and saw a reference to quantities but not to prices.

Mr. GARDINER: The basis of the price the packer obtains is set not by the meat board but by an agreement entered into between the meat board and the British government. The meat board, acting for the Department of Agriculture here, enters into an agreement with officials of the food ministry in Great Britain that a certain price will be paid by the British food ministry for bacon, laid down at the port. They took delivery of it at the port and assumed all the risks from there on, getting it across the ocean. That has been the established policy during the war. The way in which that price has been set since 1940 is this. We went to Britain in 1940 and took the officials of the meat board with us, and we sat down with the food ministry in Britain and discussed the whole question, what they would require and what they could pay for it. At that time they said they would not pay more than eighty-one shillings per hundredweight for bacon laid down at Saint John. It would not have made any difference what we thought; we could not get any other price. They said, "That is all we have to pay for it, and that is what it must be." We started from that basis. We said, "That price will result in our bacon going to the United States long before the end of this year." They replied, "We will deal with that situation when we come to it."

In May, 1941, our bacon would have gone to the United States, but the British government raised their price from eighty shillings to eighty-five shillings, and they intimated that that was the most they would be able to pay for the product during the war period. They said that if we were to give them bacon, the Canadian government would have to deal with any additional allowance that would have to be paid in order to keep it from going to the United States. That was before the United States came into the war.

We then paid as high as $3.50 per hundredweight in order to keep hogs in this country instead of having them go to the other side. When the price got up to that figure we came to the conclusion that we could no longer pay out of the treasury and therefore we placed an embargo on hogs going to the United States. We would not permit the export of hogs there at all. We took possession of the product and sent it to Britain. All I can say with regard to the price is that it eventually reached 113 shillings and we took care of it out of Mutual Aid. I would emphasize the fact that this statement of subsidies that we have here does not include things like that at all.

We have a list of subsidies paid on farm products running up to $258 million, but it does not include the amount of money taken out of Mutual Aid to make possible farm prices in Canada which we have experienced since the British came to the point where they could not pay more. That is true not only of bacon but of cheese and of nearly every other product that we have shipped. Much of that amount is really subsidy taken out of the treasury and paid to the farmer to establish that price. That is the basis of the price, and that covers the part of the question asked as to whether this price was set by the meat board. That is the floor price. We buy everything anyone attempts to sell, at a lower price than that, in the way of bacon and ham, which is the greater part of the hogs; that establishes the floor price on hogs, and that price has never been below a reasonable variation between the price of hogs and the price of pork since the time we first entered into these agreements.

In addition to that, we have had a ceiling price since 1941. That is on pork products and not on hogs. In 1941, when we were back at the stage where the price of bacon laid down was at the lower levels I have spoken of, there was a very wide margin between the floor and the ceiling, and every year we increased that floor upward until we got it last year to where the variation between floor and ceiling on hogs amounted to thirty cents. The only variation you could have between the ceiling and the floor was about thirty cents a hundred on hogs.

As has been suggested, last summer, for a while, there was a margin of $1.25 between what had been established as the floor before and what was actually the ceiling. In other words, there was somewhere around ninety cents which people found it difficult to explain. Most of that is explained by one of two factors, and it lasted for only a few weeks and therefore did not affect greatly what had been happening during the rest of the year.

There could be only one of two answers. One is that somebody was bidding against the packer who supplied the bacon for overseas, for hogs in order to get the pork for the home market where there was a demand for it, where they could sell it above the ceiling; and if that were true, then there was a black market in Canada just as there was in the United States in the same period. We are not responsible for that; we tried to prevent it as far as we could. On the other hand, people were asking for bacon at the ceiling price. They were asking for pork products at the ceiling price; and the purchaser of these products being a packer, if you like, whether of the type that ships to Britain or of the type that markets his product in Canada, was saying, "We have had certain customers for a period of time and we want to keep them." There was nothing that said that there should be a ceiling or a floor in respect of hogs. It was established by the policy being carried out. But there was a ceiling on pork. The assumption is that, unless people were breaking the law, some of those purchasing hogs did pay prices higher than would be reasonable, if the ceiling on pork controlled the price of hogs, and so they got it to $1.25 above where it had been previously.

As I said the other day, the explanation called for is not as to why it came down but as to why it went up. The price is now on the same level as it was in 1944, and if it is maintained on that level we cannot say that the packer or anyone else is breaking the law in relation to it. We believe that somebody got outside the regulations in the short period of two or three months when we all ate all we wanted in Canada.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. FULTON: The explanation given by the minister has done much to clear up the point, but it raises another question. If I understood the minister correctly, he said that the basic price is set by the price arrived at between his officials and Great Britain. They indicated to the meat board the price they would pay and that went up as high as 113 shillings a hundredweight.

Mr. GARDINER: That is where it is now. It has been that way since February, 1944.

Mr. FULTON: That was the basis for hog prices throughout Canada, and I believe the minister said that if anyone was quoting hogs at a lower price than that the department bought them at the equivalent of 113 shillings.

Mr. GARDINER: I had better make that clear. We were prepared at all times to buy all the bacon in Canada cured in inspected plants on that basis, and the hon. member will agree with me that no packer would sell it for less when we were prepared to buy it at that figure. That established the floor.

Mr. FULTON: This is where a further explanation may clear up the point. I find that 85 shillings a hundredweight comes to $18.72 and 113 shillings comes to $24.75.

Mr. GARDINER: It is $22.50, to be exact. I was speaking in terms of 112 pounds, which is the British hundredweight, and that makes a difference. The actual figure is $22.50.

Mr. FULTON: Can the minister explain how that is related to the figures, quoted on the markets here for grade B, which is the general run, of $18.06 in September—which was the high for this fall—and $17.33, which was the low for this fall? That low followed the announcement that 90 per cent of all production would be used for overseas, and the producer cannot understand why, when the government takes hogs for overseas shipment at the comparatively high price the minister has disclosed, there should be a sudden drop immediately after the government announces that 90 per cent of all bacon produced would be sold at that price.

Mr. GARDINER: Ninety per cent of the bacon is not ninety per cent of the hog. That bacon is made out of what are known as Wiltshire sides. You lop off the head and the feet and trim off a lot of other meat, and then what is left is called the Wiltshire side. You would require to have figures on all the different cuts that do not go into the Wiltshire side and what they were sold at.

Mr. FULTON: This article in the Western Producer states:

Two weeks back, the meat board announced it would take ninety per cent of the hogs slaughtered at inspected plants (excepting sows and stags) for export to Britain. The prices paid producers by the packers immediately slumped $1.25 per hundredweight.

Not ninety per cent of the bacon, but ninety per cent of the hogs slaughtered.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not know what article the hon. member is quoting, but what was taken was ninety per cent of the A and B hogs. Those are the hogs from which we wish to take the British bacon. We took ninety per cent of them off the market for a period of time in order to supply that extra amount which was asked for by the ministry of food. It would be difficult to take it and apply it to the total marketing of hogs in Canada in order to figure it out. The annual marketing review of 1944 summarizes it over a four or five year period.

Mr. FULTON: I still am unable to understand why that drop should take place in view of the fact that the price set, in accordance with the minister's figures, was very much higher than that which prevailed immediately after the announcement was made. Immediately the announcement was made the price dropped, according to the Department of Agriculture figures, by an average of seventy-three cents.

Mr. GARDINER: The fact is that the price dropped because it went up. It is another case of what goes up must come down. The price went up between May and August by exactly the amount my friend says it came down. It started at a level between the floor and the ceiling for 1944 and the first four months of 1945. At the end of that time we said that we were not going to have rationing in Canada, that they could sell all the pork they liked. Immediately those who were buying hogs started to pay more for them because they could sell them, not at the floor or not at the average but at the ceiling. Everybody in the business started buying hogs and selling them. There were no restrictions as to where they could sell them. A man would sell them out in the country to somebody who would bring them in to Toronto. During that period of time the price went up $1.25.

When we came back into the market again, in September I think it was, and said that we were going to have rationing, that we were going to have controls, these people could not sell hogs wherever they liked. They had to be graded under certain classes and this all brought the price back to the level where it was before. As I say, at the end of the period it came down when these controls were put on again. Instead of selling most of our product in the home market at the ceiling, we were selling most of it at the floor in the British market.

Mr. FULTON: I am not trying to be smart, but as far as I have been able to follow the minister's argument it would appear that the packers were getting away with something before he stepped into the market in September. That is the only explanation I can give for the fact that prices went up in the way that has just been described, and then came down again. Will the minister say whether that is correct?

Mr. GARDINER: I would say that by any figuring we have been able to do the packers must have been losing money for a few weeks. They were supplying us with meat at a price at which they could not supply it when they were paying those prices for hogs. As I tried to explain a while ago, a business man will sometimes do that when he knows the price will eventually come back. I have not been able to make some other people believe it, but I believe myself that the packers did lose money.

Mr. BURTON: Possibly I should have made my remarks a little sooner, but I just wish to assure the Minister of Agriculture that the next time he feels like coming to Humboldt to give our people information similar to what he has been giving the committee this afternoon, we shall have a better place for him to meet us than the centre of the street. I was pleased with the success of my friends in smoking out these questions into the open even if that had to be done in the middle of the street.

For many years I have had an opportunity of discussing the bacon situation, both domestic and export, with friends of mine. Some of them were born and raised in England, have been over here for many years but have gone back home for visits. Others still live in England. When I ask them what they think of the possibility of Canadian bacon taking first place on their market their answer invariably is, "You will have to send us different bacon from the shrivelled stuff you are sending now." They tell me that the bacon which comes from Canada is thin and not the type that they want. I believe the minister and many other hon. members realize that a hog which is properly fed will give better bacon at 250 pounds weight than it will at 200 pounds weight. Many of the experts disagree as to that, but in my opinion I think a mistake has been made to emphasize getting thin hogs on to the market at too early a stage in their growth. I agree with the minister when he says that you do not want to pay forty-five cents a pound for fat or grease when you can buy lard at twelve or fourteen cents a pound, but I know that many a slice of bacon off a 200 pound hog has just as much or more fat than a slice of bacon from a 250 pound hog and there is not the same amount of lean meat.

I was wondering if the officials of the department could not help this situation by finding out what is the trouble. In my opinion the trouble is that we farmers, through force of circumstances, have been compelled to rush thin, young hogs to the market before they have reached their proper maturity and had got up to a certain weight. When those hogs are sent to the market you do not get the kind of bacon that the hon. member for Saskatoon City was calling for. I just wish to draw this matter to the attention of the minister. I know he cannot do anything about it now, but I think this is something that should be given consideration if we are to compete with the Danish people in the British market.

Mr. GARDINER: Our weights are exactly the same as the Danish weights. In order to compete we made our weights the same.

Mr. BURTON: Is that all that is concerned in it?

Mr. GARDINER: No; they are right and we are right.

Mr. BURTON: This is not just an isolated case. The British consumers of our product are complaining that they do not like the thin, shrivelled up stuff we are sending them. Denmark may have some system by which that weight is attained with a month or two added age. They would thus get a different type of meat.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Would the minister explain why the bonus is not paid to the farmer who feeds his own grain?

Mr. GARDINER: First, I do not know of any way in which it could be done. I know of no way whatever in which you could prove to the auditors of the department that a man had fed a particular amount of grain to a pig or a steer. But that is not the reason why the position is taken. We are paying a far higher subsidy on meat or dairy products that are produced from the feeding of the grain than we are paying on the grain itself over and above the basic price, not only through what we got out of Mutual Aid but through these other subsidies that were put on Hansard yesterday. That makes it not only unnecessary but inadvisable to our mind to pay a subsidy on what is fed to the animal. We pay the subsidy on the animal itself. We pay the farmer to feed the grain to the hog. We do not want to pay him, on top of that, another subsidy on the grain that he is feeding to the hog. The man who buys the grain also gets the subsidy, but nearly all of them are in eastern Canada; and to that extent it may be true to say, as one member did the other day, that some advantage is probably being given to the eastern feeder. If there is a feeder near Winnipeg or Edmonton or anywhere else out there feeding grain to his hogs, we make some allowance on the grain just as well as to the prairie farmer on the grain he buys. We would have had a greater outcry than we have over this if we had not done that.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I still do not agree with the minister. The department knows to a pound how much grain it takes to feed a pig.

Mr. GARDINER: Nobody here will admit that we know because they are all asking whether it pays or not.

Mr. CAMPBELL: The fact remains that the farmer who feeds his own grain is under a handicap.

Mr. WRIGHT: Since the matter of subsidies has been raised I wish to make myself clear lest what I said the other day be misinterpreted.

A subsidy is paid on grain to producers in western Canada and a subsidy is paid on the freight to eastern Canada. I am not objecting to these subsidies either on the freight or on the grain produced in western Canada, but when we start to pay subsidies we very often upset the balance between our economies in different parts of the country, and that is just what is taking place with respect to these subsidies. Take cattle, for instance. At the present time the government is paying the freight on feeder cattle brought from western Canada to eastern Canada. The government also pays the freight on the feed grain brought east to feed those cattle. It seems to me that you are giving an advantage to the feeder in the east in that respect unless you are prepared at the same time to pay the freight on the finished product, that is on the cattle fed in western Canada and then brought to eastern Canada. If you are paying these two subsidies, the price of cattle should be the same on the eastern and western markets. There is no justification for the difference in that price when the production in the east is being subsidized.

I would ask the minister to take this matter into consideration, because it does place the western feeder and the man who has fed his cattle on the farm in western Canada in a different position from the man who has fed his own cattle on his farm in eastern Canada. I think they should both be on the same footing if we are to pay subsidies at all.

Mr. GARDINER: What we are doing is dealing with a particular problem. We say to the farmer in Ontario, Quebec and the maritimes: If you will go out into the drought area and buy cattle direct from the farmer who has not the feed to feed them and bring them east, we will pay the freight. That is done just because there is a lack of feed in that area, and we limit it to that area. I have no hesitation in saying that we also help to pay for the feed that comes here to feed those cattle. We are dealing with a temporary problem that has to do with the drought area. We would not want to apply that principle to the cattle that come east.

Mr. FERGUSON: I would ask the minister if there is a penalty on packers buying pork hogs below the ceiling price?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. FERGUSON: No. Is there a penalty for selling pork above the ceiling price?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. FERGUSON: There is no penalty for buying at low prices standard hogs on which a ceiling price is set?

Mr. GARDINER: There would be a penalty if the packing plant did not carry out that undertaking. We would not buy their bacon, and that would be the biggest penalty you could inflict.

Mr. FERGUSON: I understand from farmers in my district that their prices fluctuate. If the packing house did buy below the floor price, is the only penalty on the packing house that you would not buy their product?

Mr. GARDINER: That is the only one I know of, but it is the biggest one you could inflict on them.

Mr. FERGUSON: If a case of a packing house buying below the floor price is brought to the attention of the government, what would the penalty be? Would the government refuse to buy any of their products, or would it refuse to buy say just two sides of bacon?

Mr. GARDINER: Under the authority given to the meat board, to which some members of the house apparently were opposed the other night, the meat board can absolutely close up the packing plant?

Mr. FERGUSON: The minister's memory must be better than mine as to what happened the other night, because everybody on this side was unanimous that controls on feed prices should be retained. There are other controls that were objected to, but no one objected to controls on food prices.

Marketing service—

28. Marketing of agricultural products, including temporary appointments that may be required to be made, notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act, the amount available for such appointments not to exceed $15,000, $25,000.

Mr. FARQUHAR: The farmers are very anxious to know just what is going to happen to farm prices now that the war is over. They have not forgotten what happened after the last war when prices dropped so low that many farmers never recovered from their loss. The farmers want assurance that this will not happen again. The minister has encouraged increased production of farm products, and the farmers have done everything possible to comply with his request until agricultural production has practically doubled. Farmers now find their barns filled with live stock. There are more live stock on the farms to-day than ever before in the history of Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: Hogs, too?

Mr. FARQUHAR: Are we to have losses on a scale similar to those we experienced after the last war? That is the question the farmers are asking to-day. I have a list here of the monthly average for the years immediately following the war. In June, 1920, the average price for good butcher steers was $15.02 a hundred; in November, 1921, that price had dropped to $5.57. That is, in less than a year and a half prices had fallen almost two-thirds. I consider that the farmers have a right to ask, are we to have a guarantee that this will not happen after this war? The only way, in my opinion, that it can be prevented is by floors under farm products.

I was greatly surprised at an article which appeared on December 1 in the Ottawa Journal, the Toronto Globe and Mail, and other papers, reporting an interview with Hon. T. L. Kennedy, minister of agriculture of Ontario. I am not going to read all the article, but only a small portion of it. The heading is:

Will demand agricultural controls end.

It goes on:

Toronto, November 30.—T. L. Kennedy, Ontario minister of agriculture, said to-day that he will demand immediate abolition of all war-time controls on Ontario agriculture when he appears next week before the agriculture committee set up by the dominion-provincial conference in Ottawa.

He said in an interview that the time had come to abolish price ceilings and price floors and let the farming industry find its own natural floor and ceiling.

That is, the minister says, in effect, "I don't want a guaranteed price on farm products; I want them to find their natural floors."

As I pointed out, that was the course of affairs after the last war. Prices found their natural floors, with a drop of almost two-thirds from the selling price during the war.

May I point out briefly what the government of Great Britain is doing in an effort to assist the farmers by guaranteeing prices for farm products. Mr. Williams, in the House of Commons, said:

The government will establish assured markets and guaranteed prices for the principal agricultural products,—milk, fat live stock, eggs, cereals, potatoes, and sugar beet . . . The existing system of fixing prices for fat live stock, milk and eggs will be developed to cover the period after June, 1948, when the present guarantees would cease to operate. For these branches of food production, a new system of overlapping four-year periods with reviews will be established. Thus, in February, 1946, minimum prices will be established for the period ending June, 1950, and in 1948 prices for the period 1950 to 1952 will be set.

That is a guarantee price for seven years, to be continued from that time on.

There are some 20,000 applications for farm loans by returned men in the Dominion of Canada to-day. These young men who are buying farms are purchasing their stock and equipment at very high prices. According to Mr. Kennedy, if these prices are to find their floor in a natural way, how many of these soldiers will be able to pay for the farms they have bought? Surely these returned men, as well as other farmers, are entitled to some protection in the way of guaranteed prices. I trust that the government and the Minister of Agriculture will pay no attention to the unwise and surely thoughtless demands of the Ontario minister of agriculture and that floor prices on farm products in Canada will be continued.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think it is desired to introduce certain measures just before we adjourn at six o'clock. I therefore move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Marketing service—

28. Marketing of agricultural products, including temporary appointments that may be required to be made, notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act, the amount available for such appointments not to exceed $15,000, $25,000.

Mr. CASE: In reply to the hon. gentleman who was addressing the committee when we adjourned I wish to say that the Hon. Tom Kennedy, minister of agriculture of Ontario, is a practical farmer who enjoys the confidence of farmers in particular and, I think, of the people in general, and it is pretty hard to judge his remarks on the basis of a news report. I wish to make this statement for the benefit of my hon. friend.

Mr. DESMOND: What is to be the future of some of the specialized products of western Ontario? We have some problems there which are peculiar to our district. First, I would refer to our beans. As the minister well knows, a ceiling was fixed on beans early in the war, and it was fixed too low. Then we were subsidized to the extent of fifty cents. Later we were granted a price for the domestic consumption on the basis of participating certificates. The exportable surplus of our crop, which we had committed ourselves to send to Britain, was paid for at the rate of $3, and we have been settling our participation certificates at the rate of nineteen cents. This afternoon one hon. member referred to floor prices, and I would associate myself with the statement made by my colleague the hon. member for Grey North in regard to the remarks of the minister concerning ceilings, floors and controls. When these controls are taken away, what will be the future of the Ontario farmer?

For a moment I should like to deal with another problem which is very close to us in western Ontario; that is, the matter of tobacco. Certain controls were set up in 1933 under the Natural Products Marketing Act. When that act was discarded in 1935, the growers, who were well aware of the extent to which they had benefited under it, organized themselves on a purely voluntary basis, on which they have been carrying on ever since. The successful marketing of our product was due largely to our control measures. It is true that we had a small exportable surplus, but the greater part of our product was consumed in Canada. We had production control. That may or may not be popular with the minister, but in connection with some of our specialized products it is important to the primary producer. So that I should like to ask the minister what is to be our future, since in order to cooperate with all the regulations which apparently were necessary during the war, and in order to make a contribution to the whole country, we willingly gave up the control measures under which we had been working. When these prices come back, with our controls taken away, what assurance shall we have that we shall be given certain protection in the years that lie ahead?

We have another problem as well, if I am not going too fast. I mentioned that we had suffered because of low ceilings. I have mentioned the fact that we gave up our production controls. Hon. members have listened to a great deal of talk about wheat, but there has not been a great deal of talk about Ontario wheat. The price of our wheat was frozen at a level at which it is not economically sound to produce it in western Ontario. We produce wheat for the straw, silly as that may sound. To-day that wheat is selling at $1.09, and it costs more than that to produce. What are we to do in the future? Must we come back to the government and ask for the reinstatement of the control policy, which was acceptable both to the companies and to the growers? I may be rambling from one product to the other, but these are problems which are very close to the farmers of western Ontario.

If I may come back to tobacco for a moment, as I have said we were willing and glad to give up our production control for the sake of the war effort; but we convinced the people of one thing. In nine years of operation we increased the price received by the producer by from seven to nine cents; we maintained the level of dividends to the shareholders of the company, and we did not increase the cost to the consumer by one iota. We thought that was quite an accomplishment. If this system is to be discarded; if the companies are not convinced and will not play ball with the primary producers, it is time that these matters were brought to the attention of the government, because we are coming into days that will be extremely competitive. We do not know exactly what Great Britain will do in the matter of preferential tariffs, and so on, so that I would ask the minister if there is any assurance that in future these specialized products will be protected.

Mr. GARDINER: The question raised by the statements just made is one that is vital to agriculture in this country. I think I should repeat what I said the other day to the conference of representatives of the nine provinces and the farm federation. I may be wrong, but I do not know of any line anywhere in the world more completely closed against the international marketing of products than is the Canadian-American boundary line against the marketing of farm products. During the war, because of restrictions which were found necessary in order to retain food in this country either for our own use or for the use of our allies, particularly Britain, we completely closed the United States boundary line. You just cannot ship anything out of this country into the United States. As against that, it can be said that if you were to open the boundary line to-morrow, with conditions as they are at present, inside of one week we would be pleading for food in every part of this country. The food would just disappear from this country within a week. It would go to the markets of the United States and be sold there, unless we did something about our price levels as related to those in the United States.

In my opinion that is the present situation. I believe it is recognized by everyone that with beef prices, I think it is reasonable to say, three cents higher in the United States than they are here, and with prices of all other products similarly higher, if you were to open the market and let everybody ship their products to the United States, then food would just disappear from this country. We would have great difficulty in maintaining enough food here to feed our own people. We probably could not do so. I think we are all agreed that that is a condition which could not continue very long. We have been listening to a discussion here for the last two or three days, and as Minister of Agriculture I have not had sufficient time to give adequate study to the question debated, but there are a few essential principles which I think apply at all times and some of these have been under discussion. I think it is obvious that we have to find something that will stabilize our values in the different countries at some early day. I am not prepared to say whether that should be the gold standard, or what it should be; but I think I have benefited sufficiently by the experiences of the last six years, when everything has been done by putting on controls of one kind or another to satisfy a particular group in some particular country for the time being in order to meet their own situation, to recognize that if we are to be afflicted now with that sort of thing after the war is over, if we are to go on without a regulator of some sort, there may be some danger ahead of us much more serious than even the gold standard. We might encounter some serious difficulties in getting back to the position to which we wish to revert in the period of peace. At any rate that situation exists to-day, as far as agricultural products are concerned. There is a difference between the marketing of agricultural products in the United States now as compared with five years ago, a difference in values placed on everything as between one side of the line and the other, and beans is one of these commodities.

When my hon. friend and his delegation started to come here first to talk about marketing beans, the price of beans in Michigan was double what it was in this country, and if it had been possible to sell beans in the United States the price would have immediately gone up. But in the negotiations then going on to meet the situation in the United States and Britain we were asked to export our own beans and we went directly to Britain and arranged a price. That price was satisfactory to the bean growers in western Ontario as long as they could buy what they wanted at the prices arranged for under present price controls, but it would not be satisfactory if they had to pay the same prices for what they wanted to buy as paid on the United States side of the line.

That is what we are talking about when we speak of the transitional period. That period will not come to an end until these questions are dealt with by somebody somewhere, and in the meantime it is my conviction that we have to maintain the position that exists in western Ontario and everywhere else at the expense of all the people of Canada until such time as we can get the situation adjusted to the place where we can trade as we used to trade and where we shall have values equalized on the two sides of an imaginary line such as exists from one coast to the other of this continent.

One can speak of relationships with Great Britain. There are other factors that operate there, and all these have to be adjusted. While they are being adjusted, we expect to apply the terms of what is generally known as the floor prices act passed in the last parliament preceding the election. We intend to see to it that the position of people such as the bean growers and others is safeguarded so long as it is necessary to safeguard it during the period when we are adjusting this condition which has been created by the war and for which the people themselves, who feel the effects of it, have had no direct responsibility.

The governments all over the world have done the things they thought necessary to win the war, and now that the war is won we have to give consideration to these matters that have been brought to our attention by the hon. member whether they deal with special products or the products that we are producing in greater quantities and are being consumed. That is the intention of the act passed a year ago and the spirit of that act will be applied. We believe that if we apply it in that spirit we can maintain a relationship similar to that which has prevailed in the last two or three years.

Special—

29. Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and water storage, $2,000,000.

Mr. IRVINE: There is a question which I wish to ask the minister. It has reference to a serious situation in the Peace River block. If we were not so pressed for time, I would go into details, but I will content myself for the moment with reading a resolution I have received from the Peace River Improvement Association. It will bring the matter to the minister's attention, and I can then ask the question which I should like to have him answer. The resolution reads:

Whereas, farmers throughout Canada are being urged to produce the maximum of beef, pork, lamb and dairy products, and, whereas, the farmers of the British Columbia block of the Peace River district have responded to the extent that in 1944 over one million dollars worth of live stock were shipped from the block.

And, whereas the aforesaid farmers are anxious to maintain and increase that production.

And, whereas, this objective cannot be reached owing to the drastic shortage of water for stock and even for domestic use.

And, whereas, these farmers have been contributing to the P.F.R.A. since it was started.

And, whereas, the aforesaid farmers are financially unable to bear the entire costs of constructing stock-watering dams and dugouts.

And, whereas, people of this district have learned with considerable interest, of the very valuable work and assistance in this respect, given to farmers and ranchers of the prairie provinces,

Therefore, be it resolved that we, the members of the Peace River improvement association, respectfully urge the Hon. J. G. Gardiner, Minister of Agriculture for Canada, to make provisions of the P.F.R.A. Act applicable to the province of British Columbia, in order that farmers and ranchers in this province be afforded the very great advantages and benefits which could accrue to them from policies that are available under the act, with particular reference in our case to the plan of assistance in locating suitable sites for and in the construction of stock-watering dams and dugouts.

The question I wish to ask is this. Can the minister extend the benefits of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act beyond the limits of the Palliser triangle without further amendment to the act itself? If not, has he given consideration to the extension of the act beyond the prescribed limits or the application of it to all the provinces? Would the minister make a statement?

Mr. GARDINER: I think I can state in a few words what the present position is. As the name of the act indicates, it was intended only to deal with prairie farm rehabilitation. The act does not say definitely that it must be applied to the Palliser triangle, but it does suggest and the spirit of it is that it shall apply only to what is generally known as the drought area, and we try to confine it pretty much to the Palliser triangle. We were approached by all the provinces, and it certainly was recommended by a committee of the house during the last session that we should extend the principles of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act to all Canada. If we were to do that, it would involve a material change in the responsibilities of the provinces in relation to a number of problems as compared with the responsibility of the federal government.

I think everything we are doing under the P.F.R.A. is, under our constitution, the responsibility of the provinces. The only reason that responsibility was accepted by the dominion when the act was first brought in in 1935, and when I brought in amendments in 1936 and 1937, was that we had induced people to go into an area that we knew to be exceptionally dry, and having induced them to go in we had a responsibility to reestablish them, now that the situation which we had reason to expect at the beginning had been proved to be true. So we started out to reestablish them and we said that, irrespective of the fact that these were provincial obligations to people who had established themselves on land within the boundaries of the province, we would do this particular thing.

If we are to assume new responsibilities in all the provinces, it seems to me that that question would be bound up in the larger question which is now being discussed at the dominion-provincial conference. It has been submitted to them and it is under discussion at the present time. If it is determined that there is to be a redistribution of funds and the sources from which funds come as between the provinces and the federal government, and that takes a certain direction, then I assume that we shall take on some of these obligations in a dominion-wide way. If that is done, then it would be quite reasonable to expect to extend the areas in the three western provinces into the north outside of what is generally known as the drought area, as well as to extend them into other parts of Canada.

I should like to make myself perfectly clear on that. I do not think an act such as the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act could be extended to all Canada. Probably, if that policy were followed, we would have to have the present Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act renamed and perhaps redrawn and apply it to the four western provinces. Then we would have to have another piece of legislation which would apply to the provisions east of the great lakes. I think the administration of works which would be carried on in western Canada under a policy of that kind would have to be in western Canada, probably where it is now at Regina which is pretty central. We would then have to have another administration set up in eastern Canada to deal with eastern problems under a separate act. I doubt if we could administer the whole thing under one piece of legislation, because the problems here are so different, although the principle is the same. That is all I care to say at the moment.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am going to refer only to the last two words of the vote, "water storage." In doing this, I should like to refer to an article which appeared recently in the Moose Jaw Times-Herald of September 17, which referred to an article which had appeared in the Regina Leader-Post of September 15. These articles refer to a serious condition that exists in connection with the water supply of Regina. The Moose Jaw Times-Herald, in referring to the proposal to build a dam on the Saskatchewan river which would permit the taking of water to Regina, says:

> The project is a large one, and it is not primarily proposed as a means of supplying the cities of Moose Jaw and Regina with a visible and abundant water supply. The primary purpose is to provide water for irrigation of an immense acreage of farm land and the development of hydro electric power.

The article in the Regina Leader-Post of September 15 is headed, "City near limit of water supply," and reads:

> Regina has pretty well reached the limit of her present water supply, J. W. D. Farrell, waterworks superintendent, said Friday.
> Deep artesian wells from which the city has been taking its water give between 5,500,000 and 6,000,000 gallons a day on the average. This summer the city could have used 7,000,000 gallons a day, if the quantity had been available.

What I have to say has to do with the water supply for these two cities. I have made a most extended survey into the problem as it affects these particular cities, and I maintain that the Dominion of Canada is responsible for this lack of water. I am not blaming the minister because I realize that he has done a job in solving problems, quite apart from the P.F.R.A. work to which I am not going to refer. An effort has been made during the last few years, I have no doubt under the minister's orders, to supply water to Moose Jaw. I think what has been done proves that water can be taken from the river to the city. During the past summer water was pumped over the bank of the river near Riverhurst to a total of 1,375 million gallons. But of that quantity only about 191 million gallons reached the Caron basin from which Moose Jaw draws its water. That showed a loss of the difference between 1,375 million gallons and 191 million gallons. This was due to the fact that an open ditch was used. I am not finding fault with that; I am simply urging the minister, now that it has been proved that water can be taken from the river to Moose Jaw, to provide an adequate and proper system. That is what these two newspapers ask for in their articles and I am going to support them.

They referred also to irrigation, but I am not going to touch on that problem tonight. However, I wish to say that I am in favour of irrigation between the river and Regina. I suppose before the dominion government could really enter into such an irrigation project there would have to be agreements with the three provinces that control the Saskatchewan river. This could be carried on under a Saskatchewan river authority. When the construction of Regina, and perhaps Moose Jaw, was first started, permission was given to take 100 cubic feet a second out of the Saskatchewan river, which is a much larger amount than these two cities are using to-day. As I said before, Regina is using at the moment about 5,500,000 gallons a day, and I presume Moose Jaw would use between 3,000,000 and 4,000,000 gallons a day, provided that they can get it, but that is not always the case. That would be less than twenty cubic feet a second, so that the original agreement entered into when these provinces were set up and which allowed 100 cubic feet a second would be ample.

I should like to see the minister bring in an item, not for $2,000,000 but for between $10,000,000 and $20,000,000. It should be at least $10,000,000, because to build a dam on the Saskatchewan river would cost $6,000,000 in any event, and perhaps a little more under present-day prices. I would suggest that if the minister does bring in a vote in another year to build a dam on the South Saskatchewan river, he keep before him a dam at that point which in the future could provide water for irrigation purposes for the district between the river and Regina, or right down to Estevan. The dam would be amply large enough to take care of that, because the reservoir behind it would be approximately 75 to 100 miles long, and would conserve a large number of billions of tons of water. The water supply situation of Regina and Moose Jaw is serious. Regina is taking water from three different areas, from Boggy creek, from Mallory springs and from Mound springs. Some time ago I read an engineer's report which stated that by the constant drawing of water from those areas and the deepening of the artesian wells that receive supply from the whole prairie roundabout, the water plane of the whole prairie roundabout is being lowered. If that is true, it must have an effect on the farms roundabout. In my judgment, we should not delay in overcoming the lowering of the water plane, and I will support any reasonable vote which the government brings in to relieve that situation. The sooner we commence, the better.

I would suggest to the minister that he bring in a vote that will be sufficient, first of all, to build the dam which the engineers say they have found a base for out there, and there is no trouble in building a dam if you build the base wide enough, as they did on the Tennessee river. The dam should be built large enough not only to provide a reservoir of ample water for these cities for all time to come so long as the world lasts but to provide irrigation water if and when the proper body is set up to see that these irrigation works are carried out. It does not require a special body to be set up to construct a dam or to construct conduits from the dam to Moose Jaw and Regina. The department can do that itself through P.F.R.A., but legislation would likely have to be brought in to construct irrigation works between the river and Regina or right down to Estevan. I would urge first that we build the dam, and, second, construct conduits. The water would have to be pumped over the river bank. I would not recommend a dam 310 feet high at that point, because there would be too much pressure, but a dam 150 feet high could be constructed, and I would recommend that the water be carried in a conduit built of British Columbia cedar or pine; I forget just which is used in the building of conduits, but British Columbia timber is used in making irrigation conduits in that country. When British Columbia cedar is used the frost has no effect, but a conduit made of steel would be affected by frost.

As an easterner who in my business life profited greatly, not personally, but through the company with which I was associated and others, by the opening up of these cities in the west and through the effect which that had on the development of the prairies, I consider it my duty to urge the minister to bring in a vote for whatever amount is required to place these two cities on a proper foundation as far as their water supply for domestic purposes is concerned and as far as their water business requirements are concerned. See what happens to-day! The cost of the water for Moose Jaw, for instance, is much higher than it should be, through no fault of the department and no fault of Moose Jaw. If Moose Jaw and Regina could obtain water for domestic purposes at a low rate it would induce manufacturing concerns to establish themselves there; that would help to build up the west, and the more the west is built up through the development of cities, the better it will be for all down here in the east. That is the doctrine I have preached right along, because I have been through it. I have seen how business has profited in the east and in the country generally through the opening up of the west, and I am convinced that if we could put these two cities on a proper basis as far as their domestic water supply is concerned their populations would be tripled and quadrupled in number as they should be, and that would help to develop the whole country.

I say to the minister: Do not hesitate; do not be too humble in asking for sufficient to do that job. Give these two cities a chance to live by supplying them with an ample water supply. If that is not done, the water plane all roundabout may go down and down and down, and that can all be prevented by bringing the water from the river.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Mr. Chairman, I have availed myself for several sessions of the opportunity offered by this vote to discuss particular problems in the maritime provinces, at the head of the bay of Fundy. I would refer to our marshlands. I do not believe that there has been in this house a proposal which has received such unanimous support and one about which so little has been done. I know that the minister himself has expressed his approval of framing a policy to deal with these marshlands, comprising from 100,000 to 150,000 acres which require protection from the sea, drainage, and to be reclaimed. That word which we use so much in the post-war period, rehabilitation, certainly applies to this area. We have now arrived at the point where there should and must be some declaration of policy as to what is to be done with respect to this undertaking. Our people and the owners of the land want to know what is to be done, and it is certainly in the interests of the entire eastern part of Canada that there be a decision soon. We expect that it will be favourable.

Not only has the minister himself expressed his approval of the purposes and objectives of this undertaking but also the officials of his department, including the deputy minister, and the director of experimental farms, who comes from eastern Canada and who is so capable and understands the special problems in the east. These men have given it their approval. The director has authorized special development work and experiments at the experimental farm at Nappan. The superintendent is Mr. W. W. Baird, who has done special work in draining and cultivating this land, and with exceedingly satisfactory results, securing three to four tons per acre of the very best hay for fodder purposes. Up to the present nothing has been done except to expend a few thousand dollars in conjunction with the provincial governments and the marsh owners in restoring breakages in the dykes. The Nova Scotia legislature has gone on record unanimously as favouring the reclamation of these lands. The New Brunswick legislature has done the same. Ex-premier the Hon. A. S. MacMillan, of Nova Scotia, came to Ottawa and gave evidence before the committee on reconstruction and reestablishment. Hon. John A. McDonald, now Senator McDonald, who was minister of agriculture, came here and gave forceful evidence in this connection. Mr. McDonald was probably the most energetic minister of agriculture of any province in Canada. He never spared himself in advancing the interests of agriculture, and he strongly recommended action. The matter was dealt with before the committee on reconstruction and reestablishment in 1943, and a unanimous report was brought in recommending that something be done. That report, which was brought down to the house on January 26, 1944, and unanimously adopted, states that the committee has given a great deal of thought to the economic situation of the maritime provinces. It recommends that improvement be brought about "through assistance to the farming community, by the application of the provisions of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act." The argument made before that committee was that with an expenditure annually of $2 million, aggregating up to the present time $20 million, valuable work had been done in the west, and that work should be done on these fertile marsh lands in the east. That was the conclusion in a unanimous report of the committee, submitted to parliament and adopted unanimously.

We also have reports and recommendations from boards of trade and other public bodies, along the same lines. We had a visit by the leader of the Progressive Conservative party (Mr. Bracken). He made a thorough personal investigation of the conditions. He went down on the marsh to look through these aboideaux, and made inquiries, and examined the land. I am going to read from a statement made by him. Although I have not his authority to repeat it here, it is on record. The leader of the opposition said:

> As a long-range policy, we propose to have the present Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act extended throughout the farming areas of Canada, so that it will become national in scope. Just as drought areas are being reclaimed in western Canada, so, under a revised act, marshlands may be reclaimed from flooding in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.
> You have a big problem in the marshlands at the head of the bay of Fundy and other places, an area comprising some 150 thousand acres of marshlands . . . We propose, however, that the dominion share with the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick the cost of continuing this reclamation.
> Any present surveys should be reviewed; any necessary further surveys should be made at once. We shall share with the provinces the cost of such studies and we shall assist by generous financial aid the reclamation of these lands.

A brief was submitted to the royal commission, known as the Dawson commission of Nova Scotia, from which I am going to read some recommendations. I do not say that these are final; I do not say that they should not be modified, but they constitute the basis of the representation made to the Dawson commission, and I understand that the commission reported favourably upon them, although I have not seen the report. The brief was presented on behalf of the agricultural society and on behalf of the board of trade of the town of Amherst; it had also the support of the board of trade of Sackville, the adjoining town. The chief requirements are:

(a) The opening up of the main drainage rivers and canals, now blocked by sediment and vegetation. This is a machine job and should be done by the federal authorities.

(b) Dykes and aboideaux should be built and strengthened. This was formerly done by hand labour, but now must be largely a machine operation and the federal government should assume considerable responsibility.

(c) The main vent ditches must be reopened and new ones dug. This too is now a machine job and might well be assisted by the provincial government.

(d) Small drainage ditches must be dug wherever the marsh is cropped. The owners should have this responsibility but special ditching machines should be designed and supplied by the provincial government on a moderate rental basis.

(e) A large supply of lime and some special fertilizer should be made available at low cost.

(f) The land would in great part have to be ploughed and reseeded by the owners.

(g) The marsh roadways require rebuilding and maintaining and the provincial government should assist in this work.

(h) Marsh areas should be organized into as large bodies as possible, having natural boundaries and similar conditions.

(i) The more remote acreage in considerable sized blocks in different districts should be taken over by the government and improved for use as community pastures, such as has been done in the west.

These are general recommendations. I am not expecting that they will be adopted verbatim. They should be the basis upon which a policy should be decided by the federal government with the cooperation of the provincial governments and in collaboration with the marsh owners, whereby this land would be reclaimed. It means not only the cropping of these fertile marshlands which grow three tons and more an acre of the best possible hay and clover and grain, but the building up of the uplands to the extent of two and three acres for every acre of marshland. Instead of retrogression, there would be development and prosperity where one finds nothing now but decay, a blot on the whole countryside. As to the amount of money which is asked for, and which I believe I can quote the minister as saying that he favours it is a very small amount in comparison with the sums we are voting at this time. A few days ago we voted $750 million in export credits in order that we may trade and assist other countries; and under the Bretton Woods agreement, which is still before the house, it is proposed to vote $300 million for an international monetary fund for world stabilization, and the establishment of an international bank for reconstruction and development—an additional amount of $325 million, plus United States exchange. So that the amount we ask for, $250,000 to $300,000 a year for that whole area at the head of the bay of Fundy, is a small amount in relation to the enormous expenditures being provided in this parliament, and in relation to the enormous amounts that we of the eastern provinces have supported and voted for under the prairie farm rehabilitation schemes since 1935. Up to the present time they have amounted to $20 millions. What the people at the head of the bay of Fundy, the provincial government, the municipalities and the marsh owners want is some declaration of policy, some prompt action in order that something may be done to enable them to know what to plan for. It is not something that can be done in a day or a year; it is a policy that should be put into effect and applied over a considerable period of time, so that the people in that whole area may gradually build up and reestablish what is one of the best stock raising centres in eastern Canada.

When we were dealing with the estimates of the Minister of National Defence, Army, I requested that some of the explosives which were being destroyed, because we have no further use for them, be used in opening up some of these drainage ditches. Some of the newspapers did not take my suggestion seriously. I wrote to the department of agriculture in Washington and they sent me the United States department of agriculture "Farmer's Bulletin, No. 1606." I shall quote a few sentences from that report. On page 5 we find the following:

> While ditching with dynamite is possible under almost any conditions, it usually is economical only for making small ditches or cutoffs in stream channels, in soils other than gravel and dry sand. The most economical size of dynamite ditch is about three feet in depth and eight feet in top width; much larger ditches can be built in this manner but the cost per cubic yard of excavation increases rapidly with the size. The ideal material for dynamite ditching is a saturated sedimentary soil that is firm but not as stiff as the hardest clays and is free from stumps and large roots.

The marshlands contain ideal soil in which to use this explosive for that purpose. I go on:

> Many excellent ditches have been blasted under conditions quite different from these, but at increased cost. Where conditions are such that the work is adapted to any one of the several types of ditching machines, it generally is not advisable to use dynamite, but usually it is much cheaper to dig ditches with dynamite than with hand labour.

Then on page 6 we find the following:

> The proper size and spacing of charges to give a clean-cut ditch of the desired depth must be determined experimentally for each set of conditions. This can best be done by firing a number of single charges, and when a size of charge is found which gives a smooth crater of the desired depth, a little less than the half diameter of the bottom of the crater will be the proper distance between charges . . . The proper distance between charges . . .

Then farther down:

> The cost of ditch excavation by dynamite varies greatly. Under favourable conditions a pound of dynamite will blow out from one to two cubic yards of earth, making the cost for the explosive from fifteen to thirty cents per cubic yard. Very little labour is required for such ditching. A gang of four men will load and shoot about six hundred linear feet of single-row charges per day. It is usually necessary to remove debris and smooth the sides and bottom of the ditch with shovels after blasting. This work should be done as soon as possible, and if done promptly should not cost more than one cent per linear foot of ditch. This method is very useful for straightening streams.

I am not going to say anything more except that we have enormous quantities of surplus explosives in this country. Much of this explosive must be destroyed. I ask the Minister of Agriculture and the department if they will not make an inquiry to see what can be done toward utilizing this waste explosive in opening up these drainage ditches on our marshland. I ask the minister and the department to announce their policy—I know he cannot do so now, but in the near future. For myself, I am going to support this vote to-night. I have supported it ever since I came to the house; but if something is not done in order to do justice to eastern Canada, to reclaim the mashlands at the head of the bay of Fundy, which contain 100,000 to 150,000 acres of the most fertile land in Canada, if I am here next session I shall move that the vote for the prairie farmers be reduced from $2,000,000, or whatever it is, to one dollar. I plead with the minister, the house and the government to take some action to announce some policy in conjunction with the provincial governments, and the marshland owners.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I just say a word. To-night we have wandered from Peace river and the prairies down to the Atlantic coast. Everybody who has spoken has had a pretty good case to put before the Minister of Agriculture in relation to water conservation or drainage. I suggest that when the next session comes around there should be a thorough discussion in this house or in the agriculture committee regarding the possibilities of water conservation, of irrigation and of drainage in various parts of Canada.

Some years ago in 1937 or 1938, I went into the problem of water conservation in Saskatchewan, and made a speech in this house which was criticized because it involved large sums of money, $30 or $40 millions as I remember it. I was glad to hear the hon. member for Davenport raising the problem of the utilization of the waters of the South Saskatchewan river and the use of that water not only for supplying the cities of Moose Jaw, and Regina with a good water supply—and I mean a softer water supply than Regina has—but for irrigating a large section of the country particularly south and east of the South Saskatchewan river.

When I was looking into the matter with a view to saying something in the house I remember that I had an opportunity of being shown by engineers the contours of the country from the place where the hon. member for Davenport suggests a dam should be built right down as far as Weyburn and Estevan. It was amazing to see that natural channels could be used for that water and the irrigation of a large section of Saskatchewan which I was told at that time could be done economically.

As far as the water of the cities is concerned, I had not seen this newspaper report from Regina. I know the condition in Moose Jaw. I happened to be on the city council when the last water supply was brought in from Mound springs. I think one of our dominion officials assured the council at that time that we were obtaining enough water then from Boggy creek and other sources for 125,000 people.

[Mr. P. C. Black.]

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Where is Mound springs?

Mr. COLDWELL: It originates in the Maclean watershed. Apparently what happened is that the pumping of the artesian wells, which was also advised by another engineer, but not one of our own departmental men, has depleted the water in that natural reservoir. These are problems for Moose Jaw and Regina, but problems which are linked up with the whole of the water conservation policy of our country. To my mind, the thing we should do is to endeavour to get a thorough understanding of what we can do in this prairie region in the way of irrigation. I would say that the minister has introduced into western Canada a useful water conservation policy in the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. However, it is too small, although probably it was as much as the country would accept at that time and as much as this house would accept then. With the fertile land we have, which at times lacks water to produce crops, I believe there is a very fine field for reconstruction projects following the war, for the giving of employment and so on.

Before I sit down, may I just say to the hon. member for Cumberland, who has made the plea he always makes, and properly so, on behalf of the marshlands of the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, that I hope he will not suggest at any time that the amount appropriated for P.F.R.A. or any other project which is valuable to any section of Canada should be reduced. We remember, of course, that the two maritime provinces mentioned have received very considerable subsidies over a period of years for coal freight rates and other things, and we never objected to that because we believed it to be in the interests of the economy of Canada or we would not have supported it. And because we believe this water conservation proposal is in the interests of Canada we are prepared to support it and to urge it in this parliament. I am suggesting to the minister that at the next session the experts in his department and those in the Department of Mines and Resources, where I believe there are some persons interested in conservation, perhaps together with some of the young men who have done a great deal of investigation into the soils of western Canada and their probable productivity if properly supplied with water, be brought before the committee and we try to formulate, in cooperation with the government and then in support of a government policy, a water conservation policy for western Canada and a policy of reclaiming the marshes of the maritime provinces, so that we may make the whole country more prosperous and give many of the young men who are coming back an opportunity to earn a decent living on the land.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am sorry to be so much in agreement with the leader of the C.C.F. party and to be even so slightly in disagreement with the hon. member for Davenport, whom I and all the other people in western Canada believe to be the eastern statesman most sympathetic toward our part of the country; and I hope he heard me use the word "statesman" rather than "politician." We have heard a great deal about supplying Regina and Moose Jaw with water. I was in Regina when they got their first water supply; my father was mayor of that town, as it was then. The first wells were drilled at Boggy creek, six or seven miles to the east. We were rather worried about ourselves for a number of years, because they were drilled on a farm belonging to a Mrs. King. The people of Moose Jaw, who were jealous of us because they had no water then, said that we in Regina were drinking Mrs. King's water, and that is how the thing came about.

This scheme to bring water from the Saskatchewan river at a point near Riverhurst is not new, but I am going to make a suggestion to those people who want this government to spend that money. If the government appropriates money to give the cities of Regina and Moose Jaw a water supply, why should they not do the same for any city, town or village in Canada that requires it? I say this in the interests of the minister, because there are differences in jurisdiction. If we are to centralize everything here, then let us vote the money, which after all is the money of other people since not much of it belongs to us; let us vote it and do all these things, but let us realize that there must be a limit somewhere to government spending. I wish I could think of something in my own constituency for which I could ask the minister. I see the hon. member for Lethbridge almost glaring at me now, but we are rather a perfect constituency and do not need anything. You see, we kind of look after ourselves rather well. That, of course, is an exaggeration.

We have heard a great deal in this house about irrigation. I am all for it; let there be no misunderstanding about that, but let us take the history of irrigation in western Canada. It begins and ends largely, I think, in the province of Alberta. The Canadian Pacific Railway company began it. They spent their money and had two districts, the eastern district, which is the Brooks area, and the western district, which centres on the towns of Strathmore and Gleichen, just east of the city of Calgary. What has happened? They did their best with it; their engineers did an excellent job; but about eight or ten years ago the Canadian Pacific Railway company were very glad to give to what we now know as the eastern irrigation district everything they owned: ditches, houses, machinery and land, the whole works and $400,000 in cash to help them carry on. It is true that it is well operated and getting well on its feet, and this is the reason. While the farmers in that area would not pay the C.P.R., the directors of that show see to it now that everybody pays his water rates and taxes, so that it is a successful show.

Keep on a bit to the west and you come to the western block of that district. What happened? I was before the committee of the whole in the Alberta legislature, I think within the past year. What is happening there? Again the C.P.R. are giving to a newly formed district the whole works, everything they own, together with an amount in cash. I cannot remember the exact figure, but in any event it is somewhere between $300,000 and $400,000.

We speak of irrigating from the Saskatchewan river through Regina and Moose Jaw down to the Weyburn and Estevan area. I have no doubt the slope of land is there, or the engineers could not have found it. But take that western block. Not five per cent of those persons who originally paid water rates are paying them now. Why? Because they do not need the water. The rains came, and that has been a prosperous area. So that within the past year, with Mr. Brownlee in the lead, what have they done? They had to go to the government to have this thing formed. There were certain persons who had paid their water rental and who, for the lifetime of their contracts, which was almost forever, wanted to make the C.P.R. supply them with water. So they had to go to the provincial legislature and the C.P.R. were relieved of their contracts with those very few people who were using that water.

We will go to the Lethbridge northern, if you like. Water was laid on there and it is a splendid area; and you can take the one out of Medicine Hat running down south of the Bow river; I think it was the Canada Land and Irrigation. Take those four projects; we all know they went broke and have been carrying on with assistance from here and there.

Do not think I am arguing against irrigation. I am not, but I know that if a man is going to work an irrigated farm he will have to work harder than I ever did or than I hope I ever shall. When a man makes a success of an irrigated farm you know you have a really hard-working man on that job. It is not easy to handle a six-foot shovel, with rubber boots, in mud up to your knees, keeping those ditches open, with a load of mud on your shovel to start with, trying to get one foot up and cleaned off so that you can get out another shovelful. That is what working in an irrigated farm means. I am all for irrigation, but neither this government nor any other government in Canada should go into this business on the basis of any minimum cost. The four projects I have named all came to grief. They are doing infinitely better now; they are on their feet, but if we are to spend money to build that dam on the river which the hon. member for Davenport has been seeking for so long, let us not go in on a two-dollar basis. If we are going to go into this thing, let us not go in on a two-dollar basis. It is a sixty-four dollar question. Do not let us make it lower than that. May I ask who is in charge of P.F.R.A. and what his salary is?

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. George Spence is in charge in western Canada and his salary is $6,000.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Where is Mr. Gray?

Mr. GARDINER: He is under Mr. Spence handling the water part of it and he gets $4,500.

Mr. ARGUE: The remarks I have to make on this item will be brief, since previous speakers have covered a good deal of the territory I had previously planned to discuss. I agree with the Minister of Agriculture when he says that the prairie areas are the areas in which the P.F.R.A. should have commenced, this being the dry section of Canada and the place where people have been settled, so that it rightly fell to the government to see that they were given some security against crop failure. I wish to assure hon. members from the maritimes who have spoken that we in this group are not attempting to keep corralled for our own particular use anything that is good for all the people of Canada. I believe the marshlands project which one hon. member has described, is, from the small amount of study I have made of the subject, certainly a thing the government should consider.

[Mr. A. L. Smith.]

In my opinion the whole of the P.F.R.A. might be lumped into one title, or one project, namely land utilization. I believe the P.F.R.A. is attempting to direct settlement to and use of land to the extent that it will have its optimum use. In some areas that might be land under forest crop; in other areas it might be land under grass; still in other areas it might be land under rotation; and in other areas again, as in southwestern Saskatchewan, it should probably be alternate crop and summer fallow.

P.F.R.A. has been lumped under three divisions. One is cultural work. Under the cultural work division are formed the agricultural improvement associations. The agricultural improvement associations are an organization of farmers working together, thinking out their own problems, and at the same time they are given technical leadership by agricultural men both in the Department of Agriculture and in the universities. In our own particular area agricultural improvement association work has been directed mainly against the prevention of soil drifting, and with the help that farmers have been given through their associations they have gone a long way toward the control of soil drifting. The agricultural improvement associations are something that could be extended to all Canada, and I suggest that the minister should take that into consideration.

Under the land utilization part of prairie farm rehabilitation come the community pastures. I would suggest that P.F.R.A. be given some cash for buying land from farmers who hold title to land in areas which are perhaps to be formed into community pastures. I have seen the situation, and no doubt the minister has seen dozens of them, in which one particular farmer does not want to leave his land; a fence is put around it, he stays in the community pasture and his neighbours are gone. It is an expense to P.F.R.A. So that P.F.R.A. should have a sum of money for the purpose of purchasing land from people who do not wish to leave areas that are made into community pastures, or alternately the money should be used for the purpose of buying good farms which in turn can be traded to owners of land that is to be used as community pasture.

We have heard a good deal to-night about water development, and the main emphasis has been on large irrigation works. I do not minimize the necessity for and the value that comes from large irrigation development, but I feel that if there is to be only a small amount of money devoted to P.F.R.A. it should be used almost entirely for small water development.

I believe I am correct in saying that the amount of money P.F.R.A. to-day pays for a small dug-out is $125. In our area a number of dug-outs were built this year. Into that area came men with proper machinery and they would construct the farmer a dug-out which cost him $250. He could obtain $125 from P.F.R.A. There was crop failure in that area this year, and there are many farmers who need dug-outs but who have not the extra $125 to pay the contractor to build the dug-out. I would ask the minister if he is taking into consideration the question of increasing the amount that will be paid for small dug-outs. The small dug-out, of course, can provide farmers in that area an assured supply of water, both for home use and for the use of live stock. The farmers then, by having the dug-out, can keep increased numbers of live stock and obtain the benefits that come from diversified farming.

It is estimated by Mr. George Spence, the P.F.R.A. director, that there could be engineered from 5,000 to 7,500 small water developments each year for a period of ten years. He estimates that the cost of that programme would be three-quarters of a million dollars each year. I would strongly urge the minister, while he has not seen fit to increase the amount allotted to P.F.R.A. this session, that he certainly increase it by much larger amounts next session.

A small irrigation project can give the farmer an assured supply of vegetables. If the farmer can irrigate an acre or two he can have a good garden and perhaps a small orchard. More than that, if he has any number of acres irrigated he is assured of adequate supplies of feed. P.F.R.A. officials estimate that an acre of irrigated land will stabilize fifteen to twenty acres of land. In other words, in the dry areas of Saskatchewan a farmer can grow enough feed on an acre of irrigated land to carry through the winter the live stock that he can pasture in the summer on fifteen to twenty acres of land. I believe the advantages of small irrigation developments are even greater than those I have mentioned. It would reduce to a considerable extent the present trend toward larger farms. If we can arrest that trend and maintain a denser population in our agricultural communities, it will mean better community life, better social services, better recreational facilities, better health services and, all in all, a much better life for our farmers.

I contend that the money which would be spent on small irrigation developments would be self-liquidating. We all know what happened in the thirties. It cost the various governments in Canada tens of millions of dollars to buy feed to ship in to the farmers in the dried-out areas. If we could provide 75,000 small irrigation projects they would to a great extent ensure our farmers against crop failure; they would ensure our farmers adequate supplies of feed and make it unnecessary in the future for the government to spend millions of dollars on relief, to the embarrassment of all concerned.

I was going to refer in detail to the larger irrigation developments, but I shall make my remarks on that phase of the matter quite brief. It is estimated by Mr. George Spence that the cost of feasible irrigation projects in Saskatchewan would total some $86,000,000. It is estimated by the P.F.R.A. officials that the feasible projects in the prairies, including some possible developments in Alberta, would total about $111,000,000. Irrigation developments have many advantages, one of the most important being that they would provide a great deal of employment to people who are now unable to find work. We hear reports of tens of thousands of young Canadians who cannot find work. Going home last night on the street car, I overheard a conversation by a young returned soldier who had been discharged. He could not find a job and had no prospect of a job. He was single, and he went on to say that the married men were being given the preference. He had joined up in 1940 when he was quite young and had no experience in any particular line, and he found that experienced veterans were given the preference. I admit that that is just one case, but I think any one with foresight who looks into the near future will be dismayed at the prospects for full employment in Canada.

A few months ago the Minister of Reconstruction gave us a glowing report of the labour situation in Canada. He said that there were twice as many jobs as there were workers for the jobs. I wonder what the figures are to-day. I have been told that it is estimated that there are about 70,000 unemployed in Canada to-day. We should not consider irrigation projects solely from the point of view of whether they will pay or whether the government can hope to get back its investment. We are dealing with people and with the happiness of people. If we can provide irrigation facilities for thousands of farmers, we shall increase the happiness of thousands of people on those farms. If a veteran taking land in western Canada under the Veterans' Land Act knew that he could carry on irrigation even on a few acres, he would be more willing to become a farmer and his chances of security on that farm would be much greater.

The government was given a mandate by the people of Canada, and that mandate to a large extent calls for jobs for all. I do not think the government should measure the money cost of jobs for all Canadians. In considering any comprehensive programme to provide full employment, the government must get away from a niggardly figure of $2,000,000 for farm rehabilitation. Surveys that have been made to date by P.F.R.A. officials show that feasible programmes would cost something like $125,000,000. The cost of labour calculated into that estimate is at the rate of forty cents an hour, which I say is far too low. Wage rates should be increased for P.F.R.A. work. Possibly $150,000,000 is more like the outlay that should be made on the prairie farm rehabilitation programme, which, if spread over the next ten years, would mean an annual expenditure of $15,000,000.

I suggest that the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act be made to cover all Canada and that adequate surveys be made for proper land utilization throughout our nation. It may be that after these surveys have been made we shall need $50,000,000 a year for an adequate Canadian farm rehabilitation programme.

Mr. STANFIELD: I should like to support my colleague, the hon. member for Cumberland, in his strong plea that something be done about the marshlands in Nova Scotia. The minister knows that there is not too great an area of land in Nova Scotia suitable for farming as farming is carried on to-day. Farming has changed in Nova Scotia the same as it has in many other places. The early settlers settled on the tops of hills so that they could see what was coming, but those farms have had to be abandoned. In many instances whole settlements and districts have had to be abandoned, and this has placed the rural population of Nova Scotia under great hardship. Our farms are now mostly concentrated along the river valleys and along the marshlands to which my colleague refers. I shall not speak about the river valleys at this time. They, too, have their problems at certain times of the year, and sooner or later something will have to be done to curb the flood waters on these rivers.

The marshlands in the counties of Cumberland, Colchester, Hants, Kings and Annapolis are the large producing areas in Nova Scotia. It is along these marshlands that the bulk of the farming is done. Years ago they were having a little problem keeping the dykes and sluices open and the drains dug, and keeping the water off these areas. To-day some areas are having a great deal of difficulty and some of the land has been abandoned altogether. That is largely due to the fact that in the old days there were many men on the farms and in the communities roundabout who had been accustomed to putting in dykes and keeping the ditches open under the supervision of men who knew what they were doing, but these practical men are all gone now and there are few men left who understand the putting in of brush heaps and the building of dykes and sluices.

I suggest to the minister that what is required is an engineer who will study the situation and have working under him a group of men and the necessary machinery with which to do the work that is required. It is not an expensive project. No doubt it would take a little while to get such a crew organized and in operation. I do not suggest that the whole cost should be borne by the dominion government. I firmly believe that the property owners of the marshlands would be willing to bear their share, and I should like to see something of that kind set up. Then, when a sluice goes out or some drains have to be dug or brush heaps put in, the engineer could go and look over the situation and go ahead and do the work. I would suggest that the cost be borne in equal shares by the federal Department of Agriculture, the provincial department of agriculture and by the marsh owners.

As I said before, the cost would not be so very big. In these days we are appropriating money for huge projects running almost into billions. Only the other day we were asked to approve a project whereby $750,000,000 would be devoted to the setting up of an international bank. It is hard for the ordinary person like myself to grasp such figures. But this project that I am advocating would not be expensive, and for the sake of the farmers of Nova Scotia along these fertile lands I would ask that the government grant a few thousand dollars to reclaim these marshlands. I do not think that is asking too much, and I urge the minister to take into consideration the organization of a body of men under a competent engineer to take this work in hand.

Mr. QUELCH: The Minister of Agriculture is aware that there is a great deal of interest in the east central part of Alberta in a scheme known as the Red Deer river diversion scheme, which is a modification of the William Pearce project.

On October 1 last I moved for the production of papers containing a report on the progress of the surveys that had been made in connection with the scheme and I should like to quote a paragraph from sessional paper No. 215 dealing with the possibilities of this project. It says:

This project will provide settlement, permanent homes and means of livelihood for 7,500 families in a section of western Canada from which over ninety per cent of the original settlers were forced by drought; it resettles an area now practically depopulated; the area will support between thirty and forty thousand people.

It will provide irrigation for approximately 500,000 acres of land suitable for irrigation. This land is not now in production and is largely publicly-owned. It will give constant flow to approximately 1,200 miles of dry creek channels traversing an area containing 12,000,000 acres of range lands and will materially increase the live stock carrying capacity of such lands.

It will rehabilitate twenty-four urban communities now practically depopulated from the years of drought.

The most important feature of this project will be stock watering rather than irrigation, because most of this land is used for grazing, and there is a serious shortage of water in that area. During the past years of successive drought the rivers and lakes have dried up, and very few of the dug-outs are holding water to-day because there has been little or no run-off in the last few years. The dam built a few years ago held only enough water this year to let water down on the irrigated land just once. So that until water is diverted from the river into this area the situation will continue to be a serious one in years of short rainfall.

I asked when it was intended to develop this project, and the reply that was brought down was "not yet determined."

I should like to point out that the interest in this scheme is a lively one, and during the last election it reached fever height. The Liberal party certainly got the people so excited about this project that I had a hard job to persuade people in that area that work on this scheme had not already been started. When I announced that I hoped it would be started I was told that I was talking through my hat. Some people had seen men working on the dam down the Red Deer river and thought that work on the scheme had actually started, but these men were only carrying on surveys. I am convinced that many people still believe that the scheme has been started, and they will be disappointed because it will not be started this year and in all probability will not be done next year and possibly the year after. But I express the hope to-night that work will be started in the very near future, because it is not in the category referred to by the hon. member for Calgary West. There is no question that, if put into operation, this scheme will be of immediate service to the farmers in the area. Unfortunately at the present time there seems to be a great deal of confusion between the federal government and the provincial government as to whose responsibility it is to make an investigation regarding the development of power. Paragraph (c) of the reply that was brought down to my question states:

The possibilities of power development are being investigated by the province of Alberta but no report on the subject has been received as yet by the dominion government.

That point was given a great deal of publicity in the newspapers throughout western Canada and I have received many inquiries. So I sent an airmail letter to the deputy minister of trade and industry in the government of Alberta to find out how far their investigation had gone. I should like to quote from that letter to show the minister the confusion that exists and to ask him whether he would not clarify the situation. The letter addressed to myself and dated Edmonton, December 4, 1945, reads:

Dear Mr. Quelch:

On receipt of your letter under date of November 22 asking for information on the proposed Red Deer diversion scheme I referred the same to Mr. B. Russell, director of water resources for the province.

You will perhaps remember that Mr. Russell before coming to this government was, for a number of years, closely connected as an engineer with the P.F.R.A. In fact for a larger part of his experience he has been closely connected and informed regarding both irrigation and power possibilities in Alberta and Saskatchewan, and I know of no one who can speak with closer authority from all angles in this matter, and particularly with regard to the best interest of the province of Alberta herein.

Mr. Russell has written a complete memorandum summarizing the situation at present as far as we know it in Alberta, this under date of November 28. Mr. Russell suggests that this memorandum will perhaps give you the information that you need, and I have pleasure in enclosing copy herewith.

I might say, and I am quite sure, that Alberta will be only too glad to make definite recommendations on the question of power developments or any other aspects of these proposals if the necessary particulars were made available to the proper officials of this government, with the intimation that the views of the province were desired.

Then he includes the recommendation and the submission by Mr. Russell, which I will now read:

I have your memorandum of the 26th to which is attached a letter dated November 22, from Victor Quelch, M.P.

The following is briefly a summary of the situation to date:

On March 5 last, Mr. George Spence, director of P.F.R.A. wrote to the Hon. D. B. MacMillan to which was attached a sketch plan showing the route now referred to by Mr. Quelch; the advantages and other general data was also attached.

Mr. Spence in his letter expressed the opinion that the P.F.R.A. had then gone about as far as it should go in its studies without having the consideration of the province and the usual application for investigation. Mr. MacMillan was requested to take this question under advisement.

In the material submitted, while power development was referred to, there was no indication as to how such power could be developed, nor in fact any plans or information in sufficient detail from which any part of the proposal could be intelligently considered. We therefore wrote to Mr. Spence requesting certain additional plans and other material and at that time proposed other alternatives which we considered should be further investigated.

In the meantime, however, although we did not think that such a permit was necessary, we issued to the P.F.R.A. a preliminary permit required under the Water Resources Act to enter into and upon any lands for the purpose of making such investigations and surveys as may be necessary for the preparation of plans and estimates. I understand that these investigations are still in progress.

With regard to the power development particularly, this is a matter which has not yet been considered in sufficient detail either by the P.F.R.A. or the province to determine conclusively its feasibility, and we have no requests on file from the P.F.R.A. or any other body for permission to develop the water power site.

The view of this department is that incidental to the development of irrigation from the Red Deer river there are very good possibilities for the development of water power and that no plan of irrigation which will destroy these power possibilities should be permitted. On the other hand, the P.F.R.A., while interested in the development of irrigation, is not much concerned with the power possibilities of the river. However, as a result of a conference I had with Mr. Gray and engineers of the P.F.R.A. last spring, a plan was discussed whereby the irrigation works could be so designed and located as to provide immediately the facilities for diverting water for irrigation without interfering with the power possibilities, but rather would create the conditions for power development later on when required. The P.F.R.A. undertook to make the necessary investigation and surveys to determine such possibilities but I have not yet received any report or plans from which to judge feasibility but I would infer from the paragraph quoted by Mr. Quelch that a combined irrigation and power development is now proposed. In this case the P.F.R.A. has never advised this office regarding this or requested the cooperation of the province with regard to power development or irrigation development.

The minister will note that in the concluding paragraph it states:

In this case the P.F.R.A. has never advised this office regarding this or requested the cooperation of the province with regard to power development or irrigation development.

Yet in the order tabled in the house it stated that "the possibilities of power development are being investigated by the province of Alberta but no report on the subject has been received as yet by the dominion government." There seems to be some confusion there, and since there is so much interest in this question in Alberta I was wondering if the minister could say anything to clarify the situation. There seems to be some confusion as to whether the P.F.R.A. is conducting the investigation. Apparently the view of the province is that it is, while on the other hand the federal government appear to believe that the provincial government are conducting it. I think we should try to clarify that situation so that progress can be made. Can the minister give us some information?

Mr. GARDINER: I am just answering the questions that were asked with regard to it. My understanding is that the development of the Red Deer project will cost somewhere in the neighbourhood of $6,750,000, based on the same estimates which were referred to a few moments ago by the hon. member for Wood Mountain, and which, he said, were at wage rates which he thought would be too low; so that if the wage rates there are increased in proportion to what he was suggesting, I suppose the cost would be considerably more than that.

The position which I understand exists there is this. Investigations have been made which indicate that there could be certain storages of water created, and that if you were to use all the water which is stored there for the purpose of developing power, it would reduce very little the amount of water which could be used for irrigation purposes; and vice versa; so that when one is talking about all the land which can be irrigated if you utilize all the water which can be stored in that dam, and then proceed to talk about all the power that can be developed if you use the water for the purpose of developing power, both things cannot be done to that extent.

It may be correct to say that nothing whatever has been done to determine just how much power could be developed there, but I have had reports over a considerable period of time that certain power development could take place; but engineers are careful, as they ought to be, not to put their names to reports which would indicate that something can be done until they are definitely sure. As a matter of fact, the reports which we have are made by the same man who made the other reports. Our reports are made by Mr. Russell, who up to a few months ago was employed by us and who is now employed by the Alberta government. I assume that whatever information we have, they have, because the same man has done the work for both. I have not any reason for believing that the provincial government have gone any farther in considering a power development, but that they simply took the figures which Mr. Russell has possession of, as we have possession of them, and which indicate that a certain amount of power could be developed there, and to that extent they are probably giving consideration to it. We are giving consideration to it to the same extent.

One or two projects are taking precedence over that project at the present time. One is the St. Mary's project in the southern part of Alberta, for which we hope to get some money voted in supplementaries in the present year. We shall not be able to spend all we get in the supplementaries because of the nearness of the end of the financial year, but we hope to get sufficient to make a start, and have a revote, if we are not able to spend it all, in the succeeding year to go on with that development.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the Minister of Agriculture give us an idea of about how much he expects to have appropriated this year?

Mr. GARDINER: I would rather wait until the supplementary comes down. I know how much we have recommended, and I think the amount we have recommended will be in it. But we shall not be able to spend as much as we got this year.

Mr. BLACKMORE: When does the minister expect that to come in?

Mr. GARDINER: Well, the supplementaries will be in in a few days, if we expect to get through by the end of next week.

Mr. QUELCH: The people in that part of the country realize that the St. Mary's power project will have priority, on account of the international situation; but can the minister say that there is every reason to believe that when that project is completed the federal government will be proceeding with the Red Deer development scheme? That would be some encouragement.

Mr. GARDINER: I would say that that is one which is on the list to be given consideration at as early a day as possible. I do not know just when that day will be; it depends on so many things, the amount of labour available and the question of making final engineering explorations in connection with it. It is just possible that when we get to the stage of making our report, those who have to take the responsibility for supplying the money will say, "We want another firm of engineers", or something like that, before we proceed with the work. If they do so, it will take longer; therefore I am not in a position to say when we shall start, but we shall start as soon as possible.

Mr. QUELCH: I was not suggesting for one minute that there was any friction between the federal and provincial governments. Is the federal government depending upon the provincial government for making any further investigation in relation to power development, because it will be noted that in the letter from Mr. Russell, he states:

> However, as a result of a conference I had with Mr. Gray and engineers of the P.F.R.A. last spring, a plan was discussed whereby the irrigation works could be so designed and located as to provide immediately the facilities for diverting water for irrigation without interfering with the power possibilities.

Apparently they have found a scheme whereby both irrigation and power development can be carried out. Am I to understand that as far as the power development is concerned the minister is expecting the provinces to carry out that investigation and P.F.R.A. will only proceed with the work of irrigation?

Mr. GARDINER: I would not say definitely that is the case. So far as I am personally concerned I think the more authority that those who are providing the money have in connection with matters of this kind to create the work that they do themselves, the more likely the thing is to be done. I find in negotiating with two or three different authorities that it takes just about three times as long to get started.

Mr. QUELCH: The minister will be investigating the whole thing?

Mr. GARDINER: I think what should be done in this instance is that we should discuss the matter with the provincial governments. We should find out definitely whether they would utilize in some way or another the water supplies that we provide them. Then we should proceed up to a certain point in making the storage of water possible, put the storages there. After that, we can deal with whatever authority is going to use the water; it may be a provincial authority; it may be simply the local irrigation organization set up for that purpose. But I would think that if we simply tied it up to a definite agreement between this government and the provincial governments, it would slow the matter up. All we want is to get along with it as quickly as possible. I would hesitate to say that we are going to make an investigation in regard to power development for the provinces. I would hesitate to say we shall not do it if the provinces want us to undertake it.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): May I ask one question arising out of what has been said about power development on the Red Deer river? I know the Red Deer river very well. There is a gradual slope through the prairies. Has any investigation been made to show that you can get power from water storage anywhere on that river cheaper than you can get it right now in the town of Drumheller which is using this waste or slack coal? It is all right to talk about power from water storage. I am very much of an amateur in this business, but I have very grave doubt of any power scheme on the Red Deer which could produce power as cheaply as it is now produced at the power plant which is using this waste or slack coal at the present time. Has any investigation been made?

Mr. GARDINER: That is a question which has to have great consideration. I do not think there is any doubt in anyone's mind that you can develop power on the Red Deer river by spending a certain amount of money. Reports have been made on that from time to time. But then the question arises, as has just been indicated, as to whether the money ought to be spent there for the development of power. I think it is admitted by all that you could spend money there to good advantage to develop irrigation.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That is my thought.

Mr. GARDINER: I think that is pretty well proven. If we have to decide the question now as to whether the government ought to use that water for irrigation or power we would say, use it for irrigation; and I would be quite certain that if it did develop that as a result of the investigation which had been made you could develop that power cheaper in the town of Drumheller with the use of coal, that would be the deciding factor. I would think that if you develop it cheaper than by the use of water we would use the water for irrigation, and use the other for power. Those are the things that I do not think are fully determined, and we would not proceed to provide for the development of power until they were fully determined.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): In other words, do you think it possible that you could do both from the water? Irrigation means that you must take water from a high place and spread it over some place lower. Power from water means that you have the weight of the water coming from a high place to a low place. Perhaps that is an amateur's way of putting it, but it seems to me it is a simple fact. Does the department think you can build dams where you can do both things? I would have a bit of a doubt about it.

Mr. QUELCH: I point out that in earlier surveys it was shown that there could be power developments from the water developments on the Saskatchewan and Clearwater rivers.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That was called a stock-watering scheme.

Mr. QUELCH: Yes, I think it provided for irrigation of one and a half million acres.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Yes, that was the William Pearce scheme.

Mr. QUELCH: Yes, but it provided for a power development.

Mr. McKAY: It seems to me that almost everyone in the house to-night is anxious to inform the minister on various situations pertaining to water conservation and irrigation throughout the country. Some of the speeches have given instructions. It is not my purpose to add to that number. I wish to ask the minister one or two questions pertaining to a project which is partly in my constituency, and which is of direct concern to Regina. I asked the minister a question about it a little while ago. Is he prepared to-night to say whether or not there have been any recent developments in connection with the water conservation project which is located south of the Wascana creek involving an area which we know as the Tyvan area? Is the survey completed, and does it involve a conservation project that may have to do with government policy on which the minister may not be prepared to give an answer to-night?

Mr. GARDINER: As the hon. member knows, the Wascana scheme has been under consideration for a long time, almost as long as the project referred to by the hon. member for Calgary West, who must have been standing very close to where I was standing many years ago, because I was standing there when they turned on the tap and let the water into the reservoir at Regina. At that time his father was mayor of the city. This other thing has been talked about for almost as long as they have been talking about the water up in the Wascana in order to replenish the water in the artificial lake at Regina. That was the first use they proposed to make of it. We have got right up to the point of the building of the dam there so often and then have decided not to build it that I should not like to make any promises at this time. We have carried out further investigations, and those investigations have resulted in a more optimistic report than we had the last time we investigated it. I would say that if we do not run into too many risks created by local people as to why we should not do something we might get along with it some time, but I think we have all the information that is necessary to proceed with it.

Mr. McKAY: Would the minister indicate whether or not an official survey has been made?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. The P.F.R.A. made an official survey and report this year which suggests that there are possibilities there.

Mr. HAZEN: I support the request made of the minister by the hon. member for Cumberland and the hon. member for Colchester-Hants for assistance to reclaim the marshlands and to rebuild the dykes in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. In passing, may I say that the first of those dykes was built a great many years ago by settlers from old France who came into what was then Acadia. Longfellow in his peom "Evangeline" refers to these dykes and marshlands.

In the Acadian land, on the shores of the Basin of Minas, Distant, secluded, still, the little village of Grand-Pre
Lay in the fruitful valley. Vast meadows stretched to the eastward, Giving the village its name, and pasture to flocks without number.
Dykes, that the hands of the farmers had raised with labor incessant,
Shut out the turbulent tides; but at stated seasons the flood-gates
Opened, and welcomed the sea to wander at will o'er the meadows.

These are the dykes and meadows that have been referred to this evening.

During the course of his remarks one hon. gentleman mentioned the aboideaux, which are gates in the dykes that permit the water to run off the marshlands but stop the sea from running in. I refer to it in passing because the word "aboideau" is perhaps the one word that has been contributed to the English language by the province of New Brunswick. If you will look at the word in some of our dictionaries you will find that it has become an English word and that it originated in New Brunswick.

Some of those lands and dykes are situated in the constituency which I have the honour to represent. It is a sad sight to drive along a road in the county of Albert and look down over these marshlands. You should see green, fertile fields, but actually you see nothing but a brown, muddy waste. I drove through what is known as the parish of Harvey not very long ago. I stopped my car and looked out over the marshes. The tide was high and I counted twenty-four barns completely surrounded by water, which of course meant that those meadow lands were of no further use. The hon. member for Colchester-Hants has referred briefly to the reasons for these marshlands and dykes going down. I do not propose to pursue that line of thought, but I should like to state briefly my own views as to what should be done.

It seems to me that if these lands are to be brought under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, or any similar act, it will be necessary to show that the money spent by the dominion government will be a reasonably sound expenditure economically, taking a long view of it. My own feeling in the matter is that it will do no good for the dominion government to spend a great deal of money in reclaiming dykes unless some plan is worked out for the proper use of the land after it has been reclaimed. Unless enterprise and cooperation are shown by the owners of the land; unless the provincial governments are prepared to assist the scheme and help develop a plan that will make these lands of economic value, it does not seem to me there is much use in the dominion government going in and spending a great deal of money, for it will be only thrown away.

If this plan is to be successful there must be cooperation between the owners of the land, the provinces concerned and the dominion government. I understand that last year in New Brunswick about 5,000 feet of dyke were constructed under a plan whereby the owners paid one-third of the cost, the provincial government paid one-third and the dominion government paid one-third, and that this year about a similar length of dyke has been constructed under the same plan. If I am wrong in that, perhaps the minister will inform me.

Mr. GARDINER: That is right.

Mr. HAZEN: If the dyke owner himself is willing to put his money into the scheme it seems to me it shows he is really interested and is prepared to do his bit to make the lands of value again. But I think we have to go farther than the owners of the lands themselves. The provincial and dominion governments have to work out a plan if the money expended is to produce results and not be wasted.

Something else must be done as well. The marsh acts, as they are sometimes called, or the marsh laws in the provinces have to be revised, codified, brought up to date and made workable, so that once the dykes are rebuilt they will be maintained. The regulations must be such that one dyke owner cannot say, "Well, I am not going to pay," and have the thing drag on so that finally the dyke commences to deteriorate. Unless a better commission is set up or somebody has power to deal with the dyke laws and see that they are properly enforced, we are not going to get anywhere.

These are just one or two suggestions I am offering to the minister. I think it is almost a crime to see these productive lands being destroyed and going to waste, and that process seems to be continuing. But I believe the only way to bring them back is through cooperation between the owners, the provincial governments and the dominion government. It will be no good for the dominion government just to put money in there by itself; the provincial government and the land owners themselves must be ready to cooperate.

I was going to ask the minister one other question about this item, if I may. The total amount is $2,000,000. Of this I see that wages account for $671,000, including temporary assistance and so on; buildings and lands, $621,000, travelling expenses, $186,000, and so on. How much of the money voted for prairie farm rehabilitation was actually spent in doing the work of putting in these small or large water developments? About how much of the total was actually spent for that purpose?

Mr. GARDINER: The amount voted annually during the war years has been $2,000,000, and approximately the whole amount has been spent each year. What are called wages and, to a certain extent, salaries are really part of the work.

Mr. HAZEN: That includes labour?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, it includes the labour and the engineering. The engineering has to be carried out first, together with some exploration. All that is really part of the cost of the projects which are carried out. I could give the exact figures, but I do not think that is necessary.

Mr. HAZEN: I do not want the details. What is covered under "buildings and lands"?

Mr. GARDINER: We have to put up buildings in connection with many of the projects, and we have to buy lands where we are going to flood them. When we dig ditches in order to carry water through the land of other people, we have to buy the right of way. All that involves the purchasing of land and sometimes even of buildings. In some cases we have put up the buildings. If one were to describe the different projects this would be fully understood.

The discussion this evening has led me to review in my own mind the meaning of the term "can be constructed economically." If it means what most people have in mind when they use it, I would suggest that if the government were to take that as its reason for starting any of these projects we would never start. For example, we had a statement made a few moments ago by the hon. member for Calgary West, and everything he said was absolutely correct. The Canadian Pacific built an irrigation system at Brooks and tried to run it as a purely business proposition. They lost money all the time. They tried, when they sold land to a farmer, to charge a price which eventually would pay for the project, so that if the farmer made his payments year by year, and paid his water rates, eventually they would get their money back. They found that could not be done, and that has been found in every scheme of irrigation ever tried. It is the case in the United States and in all our plans. We have found this—and it is the basis on which we work—that you cannot charge a farmer more than $10 an acre for land which you will irrigate and then charge for water and expect him to pay for it. That is the basis on which the Brooks scheme is now operated by the farmers to whom it was turned over by the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): At $1 an acre; they raised the ante.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. They were given $400,000 to take it.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): They are charging $1 an acre instead of fifty cents.

Mr. GARDINER: The people there will sell land for $10 an acre. We went south of that project. We found 50,000 acres of land south of the Brooks project, owned by that organization. We took over those 50,000 acres. We could put water on 25,000 acres because there was only half of the land there of such a level that water could be put on it.

Mr. MacNICOL: Irrigable.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; we put water on 25,000 acres and we said to the farmers: "If you were ordinary farmers you would have to pay $10 an acre, but we will take steps which will warrant the Brooks set-up in selling the land to you at $8 an acre." In other words, we put up $2 an acre.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Does the minister mean $8 for the land with water right?

Mr. GARDINER: They had to pay for the water from the Brooks project. They pay a water rate, but they get the land at $8 an acre. We went into the drought area and did just what the hon. member for Wood Mountain said we ought to do. We persuaded the farmers to move away from that place, actually driving them from where they were to the rolling hills area. We showed them the set-up there, and we said to them, "If you want to go there, if you want to get out of this drought area, we will take down your buildings and move them for you. We will stand the expense of moving your equipment and buildings from where you are to the place where you want to go, and we will pay you $8 an acre when you get there." That place has been filled by people who have moved from the places they occupied previously. When I was last there I saw buildings of various colours because the boards had been taken out of the old buildings and were utilized in putting up new structures, and they had not been painted.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): They are doing very well.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; they are doing very well. There are two or three kickers, but you get them anywhere. There are one or two who have not made good, but the great majority of the people there have succeeded and they would not go back to any other district. But you cannot put that on an economic basis and say that if you spend so much money on the land you will have to get it back within so many years.

Mr. MacNICOL: You get it back in taxes.

Mr. GARDINER: The point can be better illustrated by taking the marshlands. If we did what they wanted us to do on the marshlands it would cost from $125 to $150 an acre, and if you went into that district and asked anyone if he was prepared to buy the land there at that price he would say no. If you wait until you get into the position where the position is considered economic you will not do anything at all, but we have done some experimenting there. It was started under Mr. Bennett's government and I was in that district the first year I took over the department. I found that they had reached the point of taking over the land. I was confronted with making the decision whether we would go ahead, and we took so many acres of land alongside the experimental farm of Nappan and developed the same programme that anyone would have to develop on the rest of it to improve the land. My information is that the land was producing three-quarters per ton per acre of alfalfa and other hays when it was left alone. Under our experimentation we are producing four tons to the acre. In other words, the economic decision from my point of veiw, is that you can increase production of that land from three-quarters of a ton per acre up to four tons by treating it in certain ways, and the last time I was there I was surprised. To stand and look at the land across the road would make one weep to think that people could put up with a condition such as that without doing something about it when they compared it with what was taking place right opposite them.

The same thing is true of Valmarie. There were some people in that district who would not allow us to touch their land. In 1937 that land was as bare as this floor. On one side of the road there was land growing forty bushels to the acre, and on the other side it was all bare notwithstanding the fact that the people there had a demonstration of what could actually be done. I was there last summer and some of that land is still black and the people who own it are sitting there.

The point is that we have to get men who are inspired with the possibilities of what can be done on any of these schemes if you are to accomplish something.

Let me now take a third one, the mucklands. This is something that affects the central provinces, and I may say that as far as I am concerned it may be called a ghost story. I have recollections of that land when I lived in Ontario as a boy. When I lived here as a boy I lived on a road where there was a swamp, and the thing I remember most about it was the stories I heard men telling about the will-o'-the-wisp they saw in the swamp and about pulling horses and cattle out of the muck in that swamp. Men delighted in telling exaggerated stories, and the result was that when I went by that swamp, especially at night, I ran past it.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): And there was no General Chisholm.

Mr. GARDINER: What has happened to that land, however, the transformation that has taken place in it, is no ghost story, and perhaps I might mention a name which some people may not like. But anyone who wants to see what can be done with muckland should visit the farm of Mitch Hepburn.

Mr. MacNICOL: In Kent county.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I was there on Friday.

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend will know that there is a bit of muckland there out of which they used to pull horses. They used to spend Sunday afternoon pulling horses and cattle out of that muck. That land was absolutely useless as muckland because it entailed work and yielded nothing. Well, the last time I was there I saw sixty men engaged in growing onions and other things on that land. That is the difference to-day. Between forty and fifty acres of land had lain there black, saturated with water, humid soil that would grow vegetables as nothing else would, and yet it had been left there for generations without having anything done about it. He has drained the water out of that land and provided a water supply for the protection of the buildings which is just as good fire protection as afforded in any city in Canada. Moreover, he has an artificial lake where he can have a summer resort at home. And the water is running out of the mucklands past his own buildings down to the lake, creating a beauty spot on the farm.

That kind of thing can be duplicated all over Ontario and Quebec. Instead of having three or four men in an area trying to raise a few steers and hogs such as we have been talking about, you could have sixty men working a garden and producing other necessaries of life, and they could make as much money and live as good a life as those three or four who were doing limited work on the same area.

These are the considerations we ought to have in our minds when we are discussing the subject and not merely what the land will be worth per acre. These works that will be put in to protect the marshlands in the maritimes will do something to improve land that would stay there 100 years without having anything done to them. It is not a question what that land will be worth next year if it is sold; it is a question of what it will be worth, not only to that community but to the Dominion of Canada for the next 100 years. In other words, one has to get the same vision that Theodore Roosevelt had in the United States at the time he was president. He had lived as a cowboy out in the western part of the United States and he knew what that country could be developed into. When he became President of the United States he said what I think needs saying here. He said, "There have been millions upon millions of dollars spent in building harbours to make it possible for ships to come in to get the commodities of this country; there have been millions of dollars spent to build stations for railways and all that kind of thing; we ought to spend millions of dollars in order to make it possible to produce more commodities to pass through these ports and over these railways." If we get that kind of vision, then I think all the things we have been talking about to-night ought to be done by somebody. I agree with the hon. member who says that we ought to have some discussion with regard to it. We are having that discussion now with the provinces in the dominion-provincial conference that is being held from time to time.

I hope we shall get around to considering the whole question. I assure the hon. member for Davenport that there is no one in the House of Commons who will ask for more money than I have asked for already. Ten years ago when we were discussing the same matter it took me three days to get the bill through the house which provided for the spending of a very small sum of money upon P.F.R.A. projects. Hon. members who were here then will recall that when I tried to increase the sum from $4,750,000 and provide that it be unlimited, I had to discuss the question for more than a day. I was asked, "What are you going to do with all that money? How much money is it going to take?"

Mr. NICHOLSON: "Where are you going to get the money?"

Mr. GARDINER: I do not know that they said, "Where are you going to get the money?" But they said, "What are you going to do with it when you do get it?" "How much are you going to want?" I said I wanted at least $20,000,000. "When are you going to want it?" I said I wanted it just as fast as they would give it to me and I would take it at whatever rate they would give it to me. I am now standing here ten years later. We have spent $20,000,000 and I have not heard one word of criticism to-night about that expenditure. You have simply said that we have not spent enough and you want to spend more. There never was $20,000,000 spent in this country that gave more satisfaction to the people where it was spent than that $20,000,000. If we spend $100,000,000 over a period of time, as has been suggested by the hon. member for Davenport, I am sure the same thing will be said at the end of that time.

I appreciate the fact that every one who has risen to-night to speak on this item has urged that more money be spent than we are proposing to spend and that we ought to spend it in all parts of Canada rather than in one section only. I hope in due course we shall be able to do that.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I should like to correct one statement the minister made. He said that the cost would be from $125 to $150 per acre but that would apply only to certain small areas and not to the entire 100,000 or 150,000 acres of marshland.

Mr. GARDINER: The acreage is 69,000 acres and the proposed cost is $4,000,000. The hon. member can figure it out for himself.

Mr. McCUAIG: I am not going to take up very much time because other hon. members have dealt most ably with this matter. After hearing the remarks of the minister, I about came to the conclusion that I would not have to say anything at all. I was glad to hear what he had to say. I know of nothing that would be of greater national importance and of more lasting value than this water storage we have been talking about tonight. I would be prepared to multiply many times the amount to be spent. I think the spending of a billion dollars would be the best kind of investment for Canada.

I come from a part of the country that has had some benefit from this water storage, and I think it is the finest thing that was ever introduced into that part of the country. I should like to ask the minister if he has in mind as a future programme the continuation of the irrigation projects at Eastend, Valmarie and Maple Creek. I think every drop of water that is stored in western Canada is of real value. It raises the water level in the wells of the farmers. At the present time wells are beginning to run dry, and I should like to know if the minister intends developing these projects.

Mr. GARDINER: Of course there are some projects where you reach the point where you cannot do much more. In irrigation you can only use the water you have. As my hon. friend well knows, under the irrigation plan at Maple Creek we were only able to flood the land there once this year. If we had been able to flood it twice we would have been able to grow two crops of alfalfa instead of one. All the water stored at Maple Creek has been used this year, and it would be foolish for us to enlarge the area unless we could get more water.

In the Eastend scheme we have dammed the waters of Cypress lake and we have raised the level some eight or ten feet. Dams were constructed at both ends of the lake. When I was at Valmarie or Eastend this year I was a little worried about the water supply. We were irrigating practically the whole valley at Eastend and Valmarie, and there are some six thousand acres under irrigation at the bottom of the dam. We used most of the water that was available this year, and I think nearly all the land that we can irrigate in the Valmarie district is under irrigation. Most of the land that we can irrigate at Eastend is under irrigation as well. I do not know that it is a case of further development there. There are other places where further development might be carried on.

We are certainly going to continue what we are doing there. We are going to grow alfalfa at all these places. These projects were started to make it certain that people could live in that country no matter how dry a year there was. When I went there this year I found the country dried up, and I found those who were in charge of the plots on which water had been put trucking hay out of the area. They were going up the road as I was coming down to look at it. They were taking the hay into Swift Current and other places where it was to be shipped away to make powdered protein feeds. That was not the purpose of making that irrigated area. The purpose of putting irrigation there was to make it possible for people to raise live stock and live there themselves.

I was delighted the other day when a young man wrote to me who was just back from overseas. Most hon. members would know the family if I mentioned his name. This man said that he had been in training at Medicine Hat during the war and had definitely made up his mind to come back to start farming in the Medicine Hat district. He said that he understood there would be an irrigation scheme started there, and it is under discussion. He said, "I was disappointed when I came back to find that it had not been started." He wrote me to say that his vision was a home on an irrigated piece of land in that country, with a large pasture near it into which he could turn his cattle. He wanted to raise cattle in that way, and he is one of the most capable producers of cattle we have in western Canada. I wrote back to him and said: "You go down to Regina and get Spence to drive you out to Valmarie and Eastend. Ever since this project has been put in I have been wanting young fellows with just the vision this young man has, and I told him that if he would start farming out there it would not be long before twenty or thirty or forty other young fellows would be out there doing the same.

An hon. MEMBER: Has the land been taken up?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; it has been used for growing alfalfa, which was put up in bales and shipped out to plants and made into something else. I hoped that this young man would go there and take a quarter-section of land to grow feed for his live stock. We have 110,000 acres of pasture right alongside that is all fenced in and with water on it for live stock. I want him to go out there, take a piece of land, go on it and live there, turn his cattle into the pasture, and pay the small fee for running his cattle there. That is the dream I have had in mind for that part of the country, and I hope that many of these young fellows who come back will take advantage of it.

Mr. McKAY: In the southern part of Saskatchewan, as the minister knows, there is considerable submarginal land. What acreage of this submarginal land has been taken out of production and placed in community pasture, and is that programme to be extended there?

Mr. GARDINER: Approximately 1,350,000 acres have been taken out, but not all taken out of cultivation. Part of it was being used for pasturing in the form of ranches. We have taken that land over, fenced it in and made absolutely certain—in fact we have title to the land—that it will not be broken up again and will not be pastured to the extent it had been pastured, where it looked almost like summer fallow.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to express to the minister the gratitude of my constituency for the construction of the Leavitt irrigation district west of Cardston. I am also informed that the contract has been let for the construction of the Aetna irrigation district? Is that correct?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wish to express our gratitude for that project and to tell the minister in the presence of the committee that these two projects will be successful. The Leavitt project has been successful, and generations after generations will be blessing the minister for making the necessary expenditure under P.F.R.A. for bringing water into an otherwise fertile area which occasionally suffered because of a shortage of rainfall. The same will be true of the Aetna project.

Mr. BENTLEY: Is consideration being given to the application of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act on an individual basis? If the answer is yes, I need say no more.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. GARDINER: Consideration was given to it at the time the scheme was first set up, but it was found impossible to apply it in that way. Our constitution does not permit of it. To apply it on an individual basis, it would have to be on an insurance plan, and that is impossible even if it were desirable The position we take is that even if it were possible we doubt the advisability of it. The people of Canada are putting three dollars into that project for every one dollar that is paid in by the people concerned, and in order to persuade them to do that we have had to suggest to them that we are not encouraging people to stay on submarginal land. We are not condemning the man living right in the middle of a district who, because of his methods, produces when other people do not. But instead of putting it on an individual basis we put it on the basis of a block of land and say that everybody in that block will be treated alike under the weather conditions that prevail throughout the year. I could not have got the bill through council or through the house in any other way.

Mr. BENTLEY: I am not quite satisfied with the minister's explanation. I am not blaming him for the conclusions he has arrived at. I know some of the difficulties he has in administering the plan. At the same time his conclusions are not correct when he says that some people by their methods of farming can produce crops when others are not doing so. I know the part of the country from which I come pretty well, and the lay of the land sometimes makes all the difference between having a shower. If hon gentlemen will look at this map which I have here, it shows one township on the south side of the Saskatchewan river, with highway No. 4 running through it. The white spaces on the map indicate the crop land of that year, 1941; the black spaces, the summer fallow; the green spaces, the pasture land; and the red spaces are the low crop farms of that year. Where the crop failure was is marked red on the map. Some of the land is pasture land. In the township there are thirty-eight farmers. Of those thirty-eight farmers, four had 13·4 bushels to the acre; twelve had 7·11 bushels to the acre, and twenty-two had 3·18 bushels to the acre.

Mr. GARDINER: That is all wheat? Does it include wheat or everything?

Mr. BENTLEY: There were practically no coarse grains that year.

Mr. GARDINER: That is the whole point. The payments are not paid on the basis of wheat at all. I do not know why people will not study the act and really know what it means.

Mr. BENTLEY: Pardon me; that was an error. This gives the total crop production in 1941.

Mr. GARDINER: The estimate is made on the wheat production. That is only to show how dry it was.

Mr. BENTLEY: Oh, no.

Mr. GARDINER: It is. I know. I have been administering the act ever since it was set up. I drew it up in the first place.

Mr. BENTLEY: Very well; we will take your word for it. The total crop average was 5·5 bushels to the acre, and twenty-two farmers having less than that had to suffer because the average was over five bushels to the acre. It is not a bad piece of land. There are a lot of good farmers there, and when they get rain they can produce a crop. In the years when they do not get rain they have to have something to carry them over. That is the whole purpose of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, to carry people in these semi-arid areas when they do not produce a crop.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is that between Saskatchewan Landing and Swift Current?

Mr. BENTLEY: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: That could be irrigated from the dam on the Saskatchewan river.

Mr. BENTLEY: I shall not go into that, because it is a big project and it would take time to discuss it. I am not asking the minister to enter into a debate with me about this to-night, but to consider taking it to the dominion-provincial conference or to initiate by any other method discussions with the provinces to introduce a crop insurance measure. If that requires provincial legislation, make arrangements for it to be done. If it requires that the farmers pay the cost, make that necessary to be done also. We do not ask the people of eastern Canada to do this job on a crop insurance plan.

Mr. GARDINER: It cannot be done in any other way.

Mr. BENTLEY: Very well; I believe it can, if you can maintain the present price level.

Mr. GARDINER: Some people tried for forty years to do it in that way and it could not be done. Statistics were produced every time it was brought up, and it was turned down. It operates in this way—

Mr. BENTLEY: It operates as a relief plan, to take people off relief.

Mr. GARDINER: No, it does not.

Mr. BENTLEY: That is what it is, nothing more or less than a relief plan. It takes them off the municipal relief roll and puts them on relief in this way. So far as any investigation is concerned, that is a matter of opinion also. You can have other data which will cause you to come to a different conclusion. The point I wish to get at is this: If you can stabilize agricultural prices somewhere near what is being asked for and where some of them are at the present time, it is possible for the farmers to pay enough that you will not need to charge the rest of the dominion the other $3 to provide something for a plan of this kind, nor would you find it necessary to charge them to put in an actual crop insurance plan, based on something better than relief figures.

Mr. GARDINER: What percentage would you suggest they should be charged?

Mr. BENTLEY: It depends entirely on what you, your government, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and so on, decide are the proper price levels over a period of years.

Mr. GARDINER: How much do you think could be collected?

Mr. BENTLEY: If you were to assure the farmers of the west that the price of their wheat would never fall below $1.25 a bushel, not many would raise much complaint if the charge was 10 cents.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Ten cents for what?

Mr. BENTLEY: I do not think you will need that much. It has not been tried.

Mr. GARDINER: You would have to have about 20 cents to do what we are doing now.

Mr. BENTLEY: I do not think so.

Item agreed to.

Special—

31. To provide for wheat acreage reduction payments; for administration expenses in connection therewith, and for temporary appointments that may be required notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act, $600,000.

Mr. WRIGHT: With respect to this item I should like to know when it is expected that finality will be reached in the matter of wheat acreage reduction payments. Several cases have been referred to me not so very long ago with regard to payments on breaking which was done in 1941-42, and the lands were inspected over a year ago, but apparently these payments have not come through to date. Would the minister give us an estimate, at least, of when these payments will be made and when this matter will be finally cleared up?

Mr. GARDINER: Practically all the payments are made. There is a provision for $600,000 this year which we expect will be the final payment. As soon as that money is released, the payments will be made on the lands to which we are referring, the breaking. I may say that that is one case where the governmenit itself examined into what had been done and realized that some people had not been paid as they should have been paid, and, without any urging from anybody, established the basis of the extra payments which require this additional $600,000 to be paid out.

Item agreed to.

Special—

34. To provide for administrative expenses, Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944, $50,000.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I wish to ask this one question, and I am sorry if it is not under the proper item. I want to make a correction on behalf of the province of British Columbia—I think it is a matter which comes under this item—and pointing to the Toronto Globe and Mail, in connection with peaches.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Carried.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It is the only item I can bring it under. I wish to commend the minister, instead of condemning him, as most members from the wheat belt do, and I think the rest of the members from British Columbia will join in commending him.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Carried.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Just a minute. It is in connection with these little boxes that they put the peaches in. As I understand the situation, according to the Globe and Mail —and the statement must be right, being in the Globe and Mail—the federal government have condemned that camouflage, which the C.C.F. and Fraser Valley do not approve at any time. They have condemned the sale, as I understand it, in Ontario, of baskets with this covering. But it says here, and to this I take strenuous exception, that British Columbia and Michigan peaches had to be repacked in that to market them in Ontario. Imagine British Columbia peaches having to be repacked in anything to be marketed anywhere! Even the hon. member for Vancouver East will agree with me in that. We do not have to camouflage our stuff to sell it anywhere.

[Mr. Wright.]

Mr. MACKENZIE: Carried.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Wait a minute. We do not need this red stuff. I am going to make a speech now.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Just a minute. I have not taken up any time. I come from the most important agricultural riding in British Columbia, and the finest one in the Dominion of Canada, and I have taken up no time in discussing these items, but I should like the minister to know that we do not want our peaches, or anything else we sell from our agricultural production, camouflaged in order to sell it. But we commend the minister for enforcing the laws. Again I give my hon. friends of the C.C.F. credit. I want the minister to know that British Columbia does not approve this pink gauze, and that I strongly resent any inference which is made in the Globe and Mail that our peaches have to be offered under that guise in order to be sold, even to the people of Ontario.

Item agreed to.

Special—

35. Agricultural research special projects, $200,000.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What are these special projects?

Mr. GARDINER: The agricultural research item is the $200,000 which we have been voting now for the last two sessions, for doing special research work in agriculture. One of these projects is being carried out at Morden; another is being carried on at Portage la Prairie, in connection with flax.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What is being done at Morden?

Mr. GARDINER: I shall have to look it up.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Never mind just now.

Mr. GARDINER: Anyway, one is being carried on at Morden. It has something to do with fruit and vegetables. The one at Portage la Prairie is on flax, and the one out in Alberta is on wool.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

330. Departmental administration, $167,000.

Mr. BURTON: Would the minister make a statement in connection with that, before he proceeds?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I was hoping that I would not be asked to make a statement tonight. I am prepared to make one, but I do not think any statement I can make now will expedite the handling of the estimates at all, because everything that I would have to say will come up under the various items.

Mr. BURTON: We realize that the hour is late, but at the same time I am disappointed that the minister has not seen fit to give us a detailed explanation of the items. We realize that during the war years much of the trade of the country was so channeled that there was very little for the minister's department to do to encourage trade, either imports or exports. Now that we are reaching the reconstruction stage I am looking forward to the minister's department having greater influence in the lives of the people of this country. We are interested in various phases of the department's activities. We should like to know whether there are any plans for increasing the number of our trade representatives in the various countries, and where they are to be located?

Mr. MacKINNON: May I interrupt the hon. member for a moment? I had prepared a statement along that very line, that I thought I might give to the committee. If the committee will give me ten or fifteen minutes I should be pleased to make it.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do it under the next item.

Mr. BRACKEN: We have had a very long week.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am inclined to agree with the leader of the opposition. We have had a successful and strenuous week. Everybody has worked hard. With the consent of the committee I would move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

The house met at eleven o'clock.

TRUST COMPANIES ACT

LENDING AND INVESTMENT POWERS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the first reading of bill No. 231 (from the senate) to amend the Trust Companies Act.

47696—202½

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. ILSLEY moved the second reading of the bill.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Can we not have a statement from the minister in reference to this bill?

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): I had hoped that an explanation would not be necessary at this time; it is not a very important bill, and a full explanation will be given when it goes to committee. However, if the leader of the opposition wishes a statement I am prepared to make it.

Mr. BRACKEN: I was not asking for a full explanation, but surely we should have some explanation when we are asked to give the bill second reading.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must call the attention of the leader of the opposition to the fact that it is not usual to give explanations concerning bills coming from the senate, because they have been printed and distributed and are referred to the committee to be discussed. If the hon. gentleman insists, however, I will ask the hon. member to give an explanation, but it is not the usual practice.

Mr. BRACKEN: Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to insist if the procedure has been established of not doing it, but I do not think second reading should be proceeded with unless we have an explanation.

Mr. MAYHEW: Section 1 of this bill is designed to correct an obvious misprint in the present revised statutes, subsections (3) and (4) of section 3 of chapter 29. Section 2 of the bill is intended to make uniform the lending and investment powers of all trust companies, regardless of the date of incorporation. The Trust Companies Act was first passed in 1914, and applied as a whole to companies incorporated after the date it came into force. It had only a limited application to companies incorporated earlier, the limitation being set forth in subsections (3) and (4) of section 3, in which two groups of sections, 62 to 88 and 83 to 90 are stated to apply to companies incorporated before 1914. These two groups overlap so that it is impossible to say what is intended as respects section 81. It seems probable that 88 is a misprint for 80, and that section 81 is not made applicable to those companies.

The amendment in section 1 of the bill will make it clear that section 81 applies to all companies.

Section 2 of the bill will make uniform for the future the lending and investment powers of all companies. The reference to the Companies Act in the section, inserted by section 2 of the bill, is made necessary for the following reasons:

The special acts incorporating the older trust companies contain a provision making the former Companies Clauses Act, or part II of the Companies Act, revised statutes, 1906, chapter 79, applicable to the company incorporated and in the said act or part there was one section (revised statutes, 1906, chapter 79, section 167) declaring that the company should not lend any of its funds to any shareholder. This restriction still applies and is found in section 189 of the present Companies Act, 1934, chapter 33.

By amendments to the Trust Companies Act in 1922 (chapter 51, section 8) and 1924 (chapter 71, section 4) it was provided that all such restrictions on investment powers should be repealed, but unfortunately those sections were not carried into the groups of sections in section 3 of the act declared to apply to the older companies.

The Companies Act, section 146, still provides that the restriction in section 189 shall continue to apply to the older companies unless "expressly varied or excepted by the special act".

There has been an amendment proposed in the other house, in which the word "to" is changed to "by". That is the only change.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

MAPLE PRODUCTS

AMENDMENT OF ACT RESPECTING DEFINITIONS, ETC.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved the first reading of bill No. 232, respecting the manufacturing, inspection and sale of maple products.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. GARDINER moved the second reading of the bill.

Mr. SENN: Is this bill now before the committee on agriculture?

Mr. GARDINER: This is one of the bills of which we gave notice early in the session. At that time however it was thought necessary to advance some other bills as quickly as possible, and this bill was sent to the senate. It was first dealt with there. It has been fully discussed in the senate, and has been before their committee. The discussions are on the records of the senate. It was not thought advisable to send it to our committee. As a matter of fact it is just a revision of the present act, with special reference to that part of it which deals with impurities in maple syrup products.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—short title.

Section stands.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CHANCE BROTHERS AND RESEARCH ENTERPRISES LIMITED

Mr. BRUCE:

For a copy of the agreement made between Chance Brothers and Research Enterprises Limited, on June 1, 1941, and a copy of any subsequent agreements made between these parties.

EXPLOSION AT BEDFORD BASIN NAVAL MAGAZINE

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

For a copy of all orders in council, legal opinions, correspondence and other documents in the possession of the departments of National Defence for Naval Service, Justice and Solicitor General, in connection with the inquiry into claims for damages resulting from the explosion at the naval magazine at Bedford Basin, Nova Scotia, in July, 1945. Also a statement showing, all claims submitted; payments recommended; claims rejected, and total expenses of the inquiry.

Mr. MAYHEW: Negotiations are still going on in connection with the settlement of claims at Halifax. It would be impossible to give the hon. member a complete answer at the present time. If there is any specific matter upon which he would like information, we will try to get it, but it would take some months to give the complete information, even after all claims had been settled. I would ask that this motion be dropped and rewarded.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I will accept the offer of the parliamentary assistant, provided that I get a statement of the total claims for compensation and of those which have been settled already. I am anxious to get the instructions that were forwarded to the board of inquiry by the solicitor general's department. I am particularly interested in a claim for 129 pounds of broilers. This shipment was delayed and the chickens were completely spoiled. This was a loss just as definite as if you had put your hands—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): —into the farmer's pocket and took out the money.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

[Mr. McCuaig.]

Mr. MAYHEW: What the hon. member has proposed will be taken into consideration and if it is possible to give the information, it will be done. The motion should be dropped.

Mr. FRASER: Carried with amendment.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I would ask for the partial return, but I do want a copy of the instructions from the solicitor general's department to the board of inquiry or whatever it is styled.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There is no solicitor general's department; there is a Department of Justice in which there is a Minister of Justice and a Solicitor General. The Department of Justice could not and would not be disposed to table copies of any opinions delivered to another department. That would be quite contrary to the principle of professional secrecy between a client and his solicitor. If there is an opinion which it is sought to have tabled by the client who received the opinion, that might be another matter, but I would not like the impression to get about that the Department of Justice, upon being consulted by other departments of government, does not with respect to opinions it gives observe the rule of professional secrecy that prevails in all domains everywhere with respect to relations between a client and his solicitor.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I do not think the explanation given by the Minister of Justice covers this case. I have here the original letter from H. G. Cochrane, the administrator of the Halifax explosion claims. I should like to quote one short paragraph, as follows:

We have a number of cases similar to the one mentioned in your letter—

That is the case of Joseph Waurock of Oxford.

—involving loss on shipments of perishable goods—

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman. I have allowed a certain latitude in the debate, but it is against the rules, because a motion for the production of papers is not debatable.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I am not attempting to debate it. If you will allow me to read this other sentence—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MAYHEW: So far as the order in council goes, the information will be given to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I should like the permission of the house to read part of this sentence. It reads :

—which we have referred to the Solicitor General at Ottawa—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

—and have received his opinion that the order in council did not permit payment of claims in such cases.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. If it is the wish of the house that the motion be carried subject to the remarks made by the parliamentary assistant, I would note the motion as being carried subject to the remarks that have been made.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): That is satisfactory.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know how a motion can be carried with qualifications which contradict the motion. There is no legal opinion from the Department of Justice of which I have any knowledge whatever. I am willing to discuss it with—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the motion should be dropped and reframed.

Mr. FRASER: Carried as amended.

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not hear what the minister said.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think this motion should be dropped and reframed because the qualifications are so contradictory to the motion that it leaves a result that does not mean anything. To begin with, there are no legal opinions from the Department of Justice. The motion calls for the production of a statement showing all claims submitted, and the hon. gentleman does not propose to press this so long as he gets the totals. Surely the way to do this is to drop the motion and then reframe a motion with which we can comply.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): On a point of order, sir, you gave a ruling that this was carried subject to amendment, and I want the house to acept your ruling. It was satisfactory to me, and it was satisfactory to the parliamentary assistant who has the matter in hand. I think that your decision should prevail.

Mr. SPEAKER: A motion for the production of papers not being debatable, no point of order can be raised in connection therewith. If the motion is opposed, I must put the question.

Mr. FRASER: It is carried already.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Dropped.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. FRASER: Carried with amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house that the motion should carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Dropped.

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS

DETENTION IN CAMPS—RATE OF PAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Is it still the policy of his department to order conscientious objectors back to the camps and pay them fifty cents a day?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The answer is yes.

PRIVILEGE—MR. McIVOR

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT IN TORONTO "GLOBE AND MAIL"

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I am reported in the Globe and Mail as having played "The Protestant Boys" on the fife. That is incorrect. I played "The Girl I Left Behind Me" on a toy whistle. I am sorry the Globe and Mail has not a better understanding of good music on a toy whistle.

HOLIDAY TRAVEL

INQUIRY AS TO REDUCED FARES FOR STUDENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): On Saturday of last week the hon. member for Vancouver East asked if I had received representations from certain student bodies, graduates of universities, colleges and the like, in favour of a reduction of fares on railways during the holiday season. I have personally received no such representations other than those from my hon. friend and from the hon. member for Vancouver South, and a resolution which the hon. member for Vancouver East sent me this morning.

I have canvassed the situation carefully, and I find that conditions with reference to the railways are such that it would be impossible to grant the request. In fact, the equipment, services and man-power of the railways to-day are taxed to such a capacity that it would, I think, at this season be a mistake to consent to the request. I am this day making a press release on the whole situation and I would like to call the attention of the house to one or two features of it. It points to the fact that the Queen Elizabeth is arriving at New York on December 27, having on board some 13,000 troops, and that will require movement from the port of New York to various parts of Canada of about twenty-five full trains, including sleeping cars, diners, baggage cars and day coaches. Arrivals at Halifax include the Puncher on December 21, with 800 service men; the Lady Rodney on December 25, with 500; the Duchess of Bedford on December 29, with 3,000, and the Mauritania on January 3, with 6,000. It will take, to transport these troops from Halifax to various parts of Canada, every bit of available equipment. The army, air force and navy authorities are granting five days' leave at Christmas and New Years to fifty per cent of the armed forces, and that, together with the very heavy volume of freight traffic then moving in all directions and to the seaports particularly, makes the position a very serious one.

While I sympathize keenly with those who have made this request, the university and college students, I am sure that hon. members and the house will agree that under the circumstances priority must of necessity be given the armed forces.

CHARLOTTETOWN HARBOUR

REPRESENTATIONS WITH RESPECT TO NEED OF IMPROVEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. What action has the minister taken with reference to the resolutions from the Charlottetown city council and the Charlottetown board of trade urgently requesting that the necessary money for harbour improvements at Charlottetown be brought down in the supplementary estimates?

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): This question was discussed on my estimates, and if I remember rightly I said that we had noted an amount for the ordinary estimates of 1946-47. Since that time I have asked my officials to prepare supplementary estimates to call for tenders a little sooner.

Mr. McLURE: Thank you.

POTATOES

QUESTION AS TO SHORTAGES AND AVAILABLE SUPPLY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. This morning I received a notice of a serious shortage of potatoes in the north country, particularly in the Peace River area. Will the minister let the house know what the situation is with regard to the potato supply in Canada.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The potato supply is short, but I will get information with regard to the northern part of Alberta.

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND—INTERNATIONAL BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT

The house resumed from Saturday, December 8, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

That it is expedient to present a measure to grant authority to accept on behalf of Canada and to carry out the obligations of Canada under the articles of agreement for an international monetary fund and an international bank for reconstruction and development prepared by the united nations monetary and financial conference held at Bretton Woods in July, 1944; to authorize the payment of the subscriptions required from Canada out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund to an amount not exceeding seven hundred million dollars; and to authorize the borrowing under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, of sums not exceeding seven hundred million dollars.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The stand which our group is taking is based in part on the assumption that there is no real reason for rushing this measure through. There is no real reason for using any kind of high pressure methods in order to secure the passing of the Bretton Woods agreement. I am not implying that this has been done, but we do not think that there is any urgency about the matter. In fact, we are inclined to believe that a royal commission should be appointed to consider the whole question of the Bretton Woods agreement. We have just had sitting in Canada a royal commission studying the question of the taxing of cooperatives. That commission has been at work for months. It has had the power to call witnesses and examine them. The taxation of cooperatives is so insignificant, in contrast with the question of the Bretton Woods agreement, as to be almost contemptible comparatively. Yet we are supposed to be crowding this thing through. We have had royal commissions on various topics and they have sat for many months, though they have not been nearly as important as the question we are considering, nor has the truth been so difficult to arrive at. We believe that we are working in the best interests of the government in this matter.

In days to come this country, if it rushes precipitately into the acceptance of the Bretton Woods proposals, could be accused of helping to bring pressure to bear upon Britain in making her decision on the agreement. I do not wish to emphasize too strongly what I am about to say, but I am almost afraid that lurking in the minds of hon. members is the belief that for some reason or other Canada is bound to go through with this undertaking, that something terrible will happen if she does not accept the Bretton Woods proposals, that there is perhaps a threat of some kind on the part of some person or persons. I do not know. If the government is behaving as it is behaving because of external pressure brought to bear either by nations outside or by people within those nations it is an exceedingly serious matter, and all I can say is that Canada ought to know. If we are to be hanged by someone, we ought to know who that someone is and why he intends to hang us, and we certainly should not be expected to go up docilely and put the noose round our own necks and draw it tight.

Canada is in the best possible position to oppose Bretton Woods. Except for the United States, of all nations that are being, I am afraid, high-pressured into the acceptance of the proposals Canada is the most nearly self-sufficient. Canada is therefore more able to offer successful resistance to any sort of attack, or any attempt to force her, than any other country. She is in an immeasurably better position than Britain, and consequently we should have courage enough to take a stand. Furthermore, she is the eldest of the sisters in the commonwealth. What she does will have a special significance all over the world and particularly in Britain.

I suggest therefore that the government should act with the greatest discretion and moderation in considering this measure. I would even suggest that it would be well advised even now to withdraw the Bretton Woods agreement and give the house time enough to study the whole matter, at any rate until the next session. But if the government has made up its mind that it does not intend to withdraw this resolution we must go on with the problem before us. I want it clearly understood that this group is not necessarily putting up any fight against Bretton Woods. That is not the object of our action at all. The impression is being created in the country that the Social Credit group in the House of Commons is engaging in a filibuster, but that simply is not true.

An hon. MEMBER: Tut, tut.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We can back up that statement, and if the hon. gentleman has any objection let him raise a question and not smack his lips. We can say that every speech delivered the other afternoon by this group contributed definitely to the matter under discussion. There were not very many of those speeches, only about five or six. Considering the silence of this group while the Progressive Conservatives were simply rampaging about the war expenditures measure, which they could not do a thing about except play politics; considering the way they carried on and the hours and days they took up while this group remained silent; considering that I think anyone with a sense of justice will grant that this group is fully justified in spending time on the important measure before us without being accused of carrying on a filibuster or of having any other ulterior or objectionable motive.

The Social Credit group merely desires to make certain that Canada reads the mortgage contract before she signs on the dotted line. It would be a most interesting question, Mr. Chairman, if it could be asked and honestly answered, exactly how many of the members of this house have read through the Bretton Woods Final Act. It would be an exceedingly revealing question and exceedingly revealing set of answers. If hon. members have never read the act through, or have read it through only once, it would be an exceedingly interesting and thought-provoking question to ask how in the world they can possibly understand this act and all its implications, when Paul Einzig, a recognized international authority, has declared that the expert, with years of experience behind him, must read through the act many times before he understands what it means. Yet an appalling number of hon. members of this house are prepared to vote recklessly on this measure without giving attention to the final results of their actions—

An hon. MEMBER: Speak for yourself.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Well, I should say the number of hon. members who are in this house at the present time is the best possible answer to the hon. member. They are not familiar with it; they do not want to be familiar with it; they do not care a bit about this thing. That is an appalling thing. A photograph of this chamber at the present time, showing the number of members in their places when this all-important measure is under discussion, would make mighty interesting reading about twenty years from now.

Mr. COLDWELL: Some of us are hoping to discuss the matter before the banking and commerce committee, it must be remembered.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is so, and I recognize the hon. gentleman's very sincere interest. However, I want to make clear the position of the Social Crediters.

Public servants can be guilty of culpable ignorance, culpable negligence and culpable cowardice. In regard to the Bretton Woods agreement it is dangerously easy to be all three. At the present time as far as members of parliament are concerned it is dangerously difficult not to be culpably ignorant, culpably negligent and culpably cowardly in respect to the Bretton Woods agreement. I have read through the Final Act a dozen times at least. It is long; it is dry; it is technical and abstruse. It deals with matters unfamiliar to all but those with the most highly specialized knowledge and training. It bears evidence of having been drafted by a past master of the art of tricky phrasing to confuse the mind, becloud the real issues and conceal the real purport behind the document. Paul Einzig points this out very definitely in a statement which I think we have put on record already and to which hon. members can refer. He says the return to gold has been covered up in this document, and goes on to talk about the almost incomprehensible jargon that is used.

Continuing to deal with the diffculties an hon. member faces in regard to this matter; the resolution was introduced on December 6, only nine days before the date agreed upon for the closing of parliament and only fifteen sitting days before Christmas. Let us just recall the number of days an ordinary royal commission spends considering the taxation of cooperatives, for example, and contrast that with the position of this house or the position of the banking and commerce committee, if the resolution gets to it. The resolution was introduced in the closing weeks of a three months' session of a new parliament, including a very large percentage of new men attending their first session of parliament and consequently naturally unable to catch very much of an impression as to what it is all about, if they are anything like I was when I first came here. The Bretton Woods matter appears on a crowded and heavy agenda on which were such weighty matters as the Aeronautics Act; the housing and central mortgage act; the citizenship measure; the flag resolution; bill 15; the war appropriation bill and the united nations charter, a matter which alone should have occupied the house steadily for at least one month. I have not previously expressed my definite opinon with regard to the united nations charter and the way this house dealt with it, but I am going to say now that the way we dealt with the united nations charter was a positive reflection on this house and on parliamentary government the whole world over. Each of these considerations was a difficult matter, involving fundamental issues and unpredictable implications. Most of them required intensive reading and rigid concentration. And while the house was grinding its way through this repelling programme each member was literally beset with letters raising various problems requiring most careful attention and effort. How could the average member find enough energy and the opportunity to sufficiently study the problem of Bretton Woods?

Then we come to the next aspect of it. It is unpopular to oppose Bretton Woods. Every hon. member who has been in this house for any length of time knows how difficult it is to keep one's foot on the ground and maintain a cool head when he begins to get letters, begins to read editorials, begins to read attacks reflecting upon his stand in the house and telling him what he should do. I repeat, it is unpopular to oppose Bretton Woods. Propaganda agencies have laboured assiduously for five years conditioning public opinion. The hon. member for Peace River referred to this in his speech the other day. Starting with "union now" and "federal union" and a whole library of books and periodicals they began to build up public opinion for this very measure. People have been lashed into almost a frenzy about war and peace; they have been stampeded into the obsession that only the surrender of sovereignty would guarantee peace. The hon. member for Wetaskiwin pointed out the other night a number of cases in which obviously an attempt was being made to stampede public opinion. The people have been thrown into such a state of panic over their disease that they were prepared to swallow any suggested medicine without even examining the label or the directions on the outside of the bottle. In this day of free debate, this day of the radio and large scale methods of conveying information, this is astonishing; it is amazing that a people could be so much affected. But there it is. Anyone who calls for even a sense of caution is likely to be accused of committing some sort of sacrilege. This was quite obvious in the united nations discussions. One was not supposed even to talk about it. One mentioned it with bated breath, as he would the name of the divinity.

That sort of thing is not conducive to sane, reasoned behaviour. We find it in this instance. Members of parliament are faced with every temptation to neglect their duty in respect of Bretton Woods. Naturally they desire to get through and to go home. I want to get through and to go home too. I have just as lovely and pleasant a fireside to go back to as has any other hon. member. I want to be there. But I can remember when my boys were in the army—as one of them still is. They could not go home when duty called. And I might say, incidentally, that my boy who died did not do it for such a base betrayal as Bretton Woods. My boy died for the British empire, that it might be great and free. And this wretched Bretton Woods thing has been foisted upon us—almost before he was buried.

These are matters of serious import. The government's whole attitude, as we gather from the minister's excellent speech, is based upon a fallacy. This may come as a shock to some people, but it is one of the best evidences that this house should proceed with the greatest possible caution.

May I refer to a passage in the minister's speech—and I am sure he will follow me, and will correct me if I draw any false conclusions. I ask hon. members to tell me if I draw any false conclusions. At page 3089 of Hansard we find this:

> When the great depression struck, each country had to cope as best it could with the situation. For all, the prime consideration was to deal with unemployment, and the means of domestic recovery which appeared most practicable consisted of measures whose effect was to thrust the burden of the depression abroad.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

With that there can be no fault. It is correct. The question which naturally we would raise is: What would they have done if Bretton Woods had been in? I appreciate what the minister has remarked about that. The result of what?—the depression? That is not made clear.

Mr. ILSLEY: The measures.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The question is: What should have been done about the depression? The depression had not been cured, it was still in effect in 1939, when we went to war. The depression was upon us in its intensity when this Liberal government took office in 1935. What should the people have been doing? What were the measures which should have been adopted to meet the depression? What, but tariffs, quotas, restrictions? Here is where the fallacy in reasoning begins. Something is assumed for which there is no justification.

I read on:

> The result was the strangulation of world trade, and the mutual impoverishment of all countries.

The "strangulation of world trade", was that the result of protective measures, or was it the result of the depression? Well, I say a careful examination of the facts will convince anyone that the strangulation of world trade was the result of the depression, primarily not of protective devices. When prices fell in the United States, so she could no longer buy goods she produced, or goods she imported, that was the beginning of the strangulation of trade. You see the fallacious reasoning there, all the way through.

I shall read again, so that the minister's words may be exactly quoted:

> The result was strangulation of world trade, and the mutual impoverishment of all countries. The characteristic features of world economic relationships before the war were high and discriminatory tariffs, import quotas, export subsidies, depreciated currencies of uncertain value, discriminatory clearing agreements, multiple currency practices.

With that we can all agree. The important questions for us as responsible members of the house to ask ourselves is this: Were those practices the cause or the result? They were the result of the depression, and so long as the depression continued something had to be done, something like such measures had to be employed.

The question is raised: If Bretton Woods had been in operation throughout the world at that time, would Bretton Woods have stopped all that? This is an important question. And until it is completely cleared up, this house had better proceed with the utmost caution.

Mr. ILSLEY: The answer would be: not of itself, but it would have helped.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I think it is doubtful whether it would have helped. However, I accept the minister's statement. I doubt whether it would have helped, for reasons which I shall indicate.

Let us deal with the causes of that depression. The minister will tell me whether I am correct. I think I have covered this matter with considerable care, and I have obtained my information from a number of sources which I believe to be accurate. The minister is a most honest man, and I know he wants to have everything exactly straight. So am I an honest man—at least I like to think I am. I can learn from the minister, and perhaps between us we can improve our standards of understanding.

What was the cause of the depression? Well, the first important cause was the cessation of United States foreign lending. At the moment that the foreign lending, which during the roaring twenties had been so extensive, began to diminish, and the foreign lenders began to worry about their lending, they began to withdraw. Immediately many of the great business concerns in the United States which had been assured of markets abroad now saw where their markets were to be restricted. The result was that they began immediately to restrict their operations, and the banking system began to retrench. That was the first step toward the depression.

The second step is one about which there has been some discussion, and I am sure the minister will tell me whether he thinks I have been correctly informed or otherwise. Of course we must depend upon the works we read. The information I get is that the second step in the depression was the raising of the rediscount rate by the federal reserve board in the United States. Certainly that took place. What effect did it have? Well, the very moment that the rediscount rate was raised by the federal reserve board, the banks automatically began to recall their loans and to restrict their credit. This began to precipitate the deflation which resulted in falling prices, and all the other ills which came naturally with the depression.

The third cause of the depression was a loss of confidence in securities by speculators. Hon. members will recall that in 1928 and 1929 the first sign of illness was the flutter on the Wall street stock market.

Mr. MacINNIS: What was the cause of that loss of confidence?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have already said that the first one was when foreign lending began to ease off.

Mr. MacINNIS: And what was the cause of foreign lending easing off?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I shall answer that, in time. I am happy to have the hon. member ask questions, and just as happy to answer him.

Mr. MacINNIS: One of us apparently does not know much about this matter, because we do not agree. I am not saying which one it is.

Mr. JOHNSTON: The answer is obvious.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We will leave it to the house to decide.

The CHAIRMAN: May I draw the attention of hon. members on all sides to the fact that remarks from the floor must be directed to the Chair.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I appreciate your intervention. I wish to restate that I have no desire at all to say anything that is not entirely true. I want hon. members of the committee to follow with me and tell me whether I am right or wrong. The hon. member for Vancouver East asked what had caused the flutter in the securities market. Naturally it was the two causes which I have already given. First, there was a cessation of foreign lending on the part of prominent people in the United States and, second, there was the raising of the rediscount rate by the federal reserve board which made it much more difficult for banks to get money with which to lend money. The result was that those who were dealing in securities were unable to get credit; they became cautious and they tried to get rid of their holdings. The result was a general lack of confidence in the securities market which caused a catastrophic fall in prices generally. I am speaking from memory, and the minister will correct me if I am wrong, but as I recall what Irving Fisher said in his "One Hundred Per Cent Money," of the $23 billion of purchasing power which was out in circulation in the United States at the beginning of the trouble, $8 billion were withdrawn, leaving only $15 billion of purchasing power or money in circulation to do the work which $23 billion had done. This was the result of this loss of confidence in the securities market.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Can the hon. member say to what extent the United States tariff, particularly the tightening of it in 1929 or 1930, had to do with the difficulties that arose?

Mr. BLACKMORE: It may have had considerable to do with it, but I am not prepared to discuss that at present. That is a most pertinent question and I shall be happy to go into it. May I commend the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario for asking a question of that kind. It indicates an honest and sincere endeavour to work one's way through to an understanding of the whole situation, an understanding upon which an intelligent estimate of the whole Bretton Woods question can be developed.

The fourth step in the coming on of the depression was the calling of loans and the withdrawal of circulating mediums. As I have indicated, $8 billion of United States circulating mediums were withdrawn. Fifth, was the fall in prices which resulted in $200 billion of value in the United States being destroyed through the fall in prices of farms and all that sort of thing.

I would like to ask hon. members of the committee this simple question: If Bretton Woods had been in full force at that time, would Bretton Woods have had any power whatsoever to prevent those developments in the United States? I think practically every hon. member of this committee will have to agree it would not have had any power. It must be obvious that Bretton Woods would have been useless as a remedial or protective measure against that situation.

What resulted? The United States economy was so powerful, it filled such a tremendous place in the world's economy, that the minute this terrible depression developed in the United States it was able to throw out of gear the economies of all other countries. What happened in Great Britain was the natural result of what happened in the United States. Great Britain began to use exchange controls, currency regulations and all that kind of thing to protect herself in some measure against the condition of the United States.

Let me give a simple illustration. The prices of primary commodities fell in the United States, commodities such as beef. If beef had been shipped to England in 1931 or 1932 at the prices prevailing in the United States, unquestionably it would have displaced British beef and upset the whole economy as far as agriculture in Great Britain was concerned. The only possible means by which Great Britain could prevent that sort of thing was some sort of exchange restriction or some sort of tariff or some sort of quota or some sort of anti-dumping measure. If Bretton Woods had been in operation at that time she would have been denied the privilege of using all those.

What good would Bretton Woods have been? No good at all. It must be obvious to every member of the committee how completely fallacious is the reasoning that the minister has used here, or that the experts who wrote that speech have used in that particular passage. I am not reflecting on the minister at all, and I want hon. members to understand that. The marvel to me is that the man can live with the amount of work he has had to do. I am positively amazed that he can live. I am astounded that his health has not been smashed all to smithereens long ago because of the terrific pressure of work that is on him.

Of course he has to get the best expert advice he can in preparing his speech. That is a foregone conclusion. He is different from us. I wish to relieve the minister of complete responsibility. How in the world can the Minister of Finance be so well informed on everything that he can do every kind of work that is to be done? He must depend on experts. One of the main lines that this group has followed and is following is that those experts are wrong and, consequently, the minister, following the advice of the experts, and this house, following slavishly and docilely the advice of the minister, will be wrong. It becomes the duty of this house to be critical in the highest degree of the recommendations of these experts. That is not necessarily a reflection on the experts; it is a reflection probably on the training which they have had and which has not equipped them to cope with new situations. No one ever had to face such a depression as the great depression until it came along and the experts did not know how to deal with it.

Mr. JAQUES: They caused it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: How could they be expected to tell all about the causes? We must realize that we are dealing with fallible men, men with limitations. The whole argument of Social Credit is to advocate that we should in the name of reason and common sense act like men and not accept slavishly every suggestion which is offered by the minister on the advice of his experts. Let us try to find out something about the problem ourselves, so that we may be intelligent in our own conclusions. The fallacy in the passage which I have indicated must be completely obvious to every single member of the committee.

Let me go a little bit further to show that this fallacy upon which the government is working is deep seated. The first definite pronouncement which the government made, so far as I know, on the question of Bretton Woods was made in a white paper called Employment and Income which was presented to the house in April, 1945, by the Minister of Reconstruction. May I suggest to hon. members that they take that white paper and turn to page 7 and read what is said regarding Bretton Woods and Dumbarton Oaks. I quote as follows:

Having regard to the widespread character of our trade, the government attaches special importance also to the reconstruction of multilateral trade on a permanent basis and arrangements under which the proceeds of our exports may be spent wherever we desire to obtain our imports.

With that no one can quarrel.

It is with these objects in mind that the government has participated in the development of the plans for the international monetary fund and the united nations bank of reconstruction and development on which agreement among experts was reached at Bretton Woods in July last.

I am not questioning that the government entered into the Bretton Woods agreement with full sincerity and actually believed that the Bretton Woods agreement would constitute a remedy or provide remedial action in the situation. What follows is significant in connection with our discussion:

The monetary fund plan would assure comparative stability of exchange rates and, where change was desirable, would substitute for competitive depreciation of exchanges an orderly process of change following international consultation.

That is all right, but it is a bit general to be of any value. Notice this next sentence, which reads:

It would outlaw the discriminatory currency practices which turned trade into economic warfare.

May I pause to point out to the members of the committee that right there the fundamental fallacy creeps in. The statement is positively made that it was the currency practices which brought on economic warfare, when as a matter of fact it was the economic warfare resulting from the depression which produced the currency practices. That is obvious. Just as soon as prices fell in the United States and she had to dump her goods and take other protective measures, the economic warfare resulted which produced these currency practices. That is abundantly obvious. Yet this statement is made by the experts, a statement which is an absolute and unquestionable fallacy. May I read it again:

It would outlaw the discriminatory currency practices which turned trade into economic warfare. When it was fully in operation, it would assure the convertibility of the proceeds of our sales abroad into whatever currencies we required for our current needs.

No one will quarrel particularly with that statement. It goes on:

It would give to each member country for the purposes of its current balance of payments an assured, though limited, line of credit to serve as a buttress to policies directed to the expansion of employment.

I do not need to read the next two paragraphs but I feel that if I do not, somebody will say that I am distorting by quoting paragraphs out of their context. So, if the committee will permit me, I will read the next two paragraphs, just to be completely fair to the writer of this article:

The regular transfer of capital from surplus to deficit countries for purposes of reconstruction and development is essential to the expansion and stability of international trade. The Bank of Reconstruction and Development would provide through an international institution for a needed revival of international investment.

I doubt that. I doubt whether the existence of the international bank and international stabilization fund would have caused those lenders in the United States to continue lending in 1928-29 when they began to realize that they could not get their money back because the United States had a tariff that would prevent imports from coming in to pay for the interest on the loans, much less the loans themselves, as the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario said. Does anyone imagine that United States public opinion as it is at the present time would allow the administration in that country to lower their tariffs sufficiently to allow goods to come in to compete with United States goods? It just is not common sense. So you see once more the fundamental fallacy of that whole attitude, the fundamental and inexcusable error and fallacy. It goes on:

In the interest of Canadian and world prosperity and of peaceful collaboration among nations, the government endorses these plans and hopes that parliament will in due course approve the draft agreements. In reaching this view, the government is mindful of the possibity that Canada might, as a member of both institutions, occupy the position of a "creditor" nation.

I am deeply sorry, Mr. Chairman, that that statement was made. It is correct but it means this, as the member for Acadia so well pointed out the other day. The thing which destroys confidence, the thing which ruins the lives of nations is this, that they have goods thrown on to their markets by dumping, export subsidies and all that, which completely puts out of business their industries and throws men on the street as unemployed. That is the trouble. It is the fact that they have to import more goods for one reason or another than they are able to export that constitutes economic warfare, and the creditor nations are in large measure responsible for that condition. They are the ones who are producing much more goods than they need and at much lower costs than other countries can produce them, and so they are able to engage in economic aggression and economic penetration and put other nations in an unfavourable position. I pointed that out definitely in my first speech and the words I used then were not recklessly used; they were studied, and so far as I know, they are scientifically accurate, every single one of them.

I think all members of the house and the committee can see very clearly that the government is proceeding on a false assumption, and upon that false assumption is drawing a false conclusion in this whole approach to Bretton Woods. Obviously the Canadian government is not the only government in the world that has done that very thing. The United States has done it. May I read a quotation from a speech by Henry Morgenthau to the Bretton Woods delegates on July 22, 1944. Members will find this speech in the parliamentary copy of the monetary agreement. Unfortunately the speech is omitted from the copies issued to members of the Canadian parliament. That is regrettable, because the speeches of the late President Roosevelt and of Henry Morgenthau as introductory are very significant and would give the members of this house much reason for considerable reservation in their approach to this whole Bretton Woods affair. May I read the quotation from page 9 of the parliamentary copy?

The CHAIRMAN: I must remind the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Chairman, I am not going to discuss this question now because I do not know enough about it. But in reply to the hon. member for Lethbridge who said that the members of this house were docilely following the advice of the Finance Minister, let me say that it was clearly understood that in sending this measure to a committee we were not voting for or against the principle but that the whole question was to be gone into fully before the banking and commerce committee. Is not that right?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. The principle would be international cooperation to prevent us from getting into economic troubles in the future. It is so general that it would not be binding anybody to support this bill or this agreement in the banking and commerce committee or thereafter.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. ROSS (Souris): But before we are asked to pass this measure it will be considered in the banking and commerce committee?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I happen to be a member of that committee. At the moment I am not in a position to vote for or against this measure and I think it is not yet well understood in the country either. I have been a member of many committees of this house and I know that they do excellent work. Whether the public realizes it or not, we are not allowed to call expert witnesses before us here in this chamber; that can only be done in a committee, where witnesses can be called and examined. Then when the bill comes back into the house we can much more intelligently discuss the principle of the measure, after it has been threshed out in a committee of the house.

Mr. BLACKMORE: But if the majority of the banking and commerce committee vote against calling witnesses, they cannot be called.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That is true but I have found that the committees have always been very fair, and I have sat on many of them. I have also found that on the committees there is much less partisan discussion than takes place in the house. That is true of every committee of which I have been a member

I do not want to be misunderstood in this matter at all. I agree with many of the principles advocated by the social credit members in this house; there is no argument about that, but on this question I am in exactly the same position as I was on the Canadian flag. I thought it was good business to have a committee discuss that matter and call witnesses and then report back to the house. That puts the member of the house in a much better position to debate and vote intelligently. Most members of the social credit group have already spoken on this Bretton Woods agreement, and it seems to me that we are not making much headway by prolonging this discussion in the house and that it would be far better to let the bill go to the banking and commerce committee, where witnesses can be called and the whole question threshed out. We shall be in a much better position to vote intelligently upon it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Chairman, as another speech has intervened I am at liberty to have the floor again. But first I wish to deal with the hon. member's remarks. I appreciate what he has said, and appreciate his sincerity. I have the highest regard for the hon. member in every respect, for his integrity, his intelligence and every other quality he possesses.

Now may I discuss this question of the banking and commerce committee? I am very glad the minister gave the definition of the principle of the bill. I wanted that on record. Would it be out of order to ask the Hansard writer to read back to the committee the definition which the minister gave? I should like to hear that again.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

An hon. MEMBER: Ask the minister.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Well, it is all right; I will repeat it and if I am wrong the minister will tell me. The principle of the bill—I am not using the minister's words but I want to know whether I am expressing his thought—will be international cooperation among the nations for the stabilization of economic conditions.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Very well; I am going to ask the members of this committee whether they think that the real principle of the bill is going to be that beautiful objective, with which everybody agrees, or is the principle not whether the Bretton Woods agreement is the right way to attain that objective?

An hon. MEMBER: That is for the committee.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There is the point. That is where the danger lies. Let me tell the hon. member for Souris that I have been a member of the banking and commerce committee for a long time; I have seen it in action and I have seen other committees in action, and I do not believe, unless this discussion had been brought about, there would have been one single pronouncement from anyone telling this house what was the principle of the bill until the house had—hastily—passed the first and second reading, approving of the principle of the bill. I will say this, that the men who designed Bretton Woods and the government that brought it in here are fundamentally trying to establish this principle, that the Bretton Woods agreement is the system by which to attain international cooperation. I will not disagree at all with the beautiful objective which the minister has announced. We of this group are all ready to have international cooperation; we all agree it is necessary. But does that mean that we have to assume that this horrible Bretton Woods mechanism is the means whereby we can bring about that cooperation? Well, the very farthest thing from the truth is this second proposition, that the Bretton Woods agreement is the way to accomplish it. The whole purpose of my argument here to-day has been along the line that the Bretton Woods agreement simply will not accomplish the objective, and the whole argument of the hon. member for Acadia was to the same effect. The problem which has to be solved will not be touched by Bretton Woods; at the same time the nations will have been deprived of their sovereignty in the interests of something which has no value at all. That is a serious condition.

Now, may I deal for just a moment or two with what the hon. member for Souris said, in the light of what I have just said, and the definition which the minister gave of the principle of the bill? I wonder how many hon. members would feel completely safe in accepting the principle of that bill, with the necessary rider or adjunct or appendix or conclusion that the Bretton Woods agreement is the means of accomplishing the objective. There is where the danger lies—fallacious reasoning again. We are not going to vote on the question of cooperation—not at all; we are going to vote on Bretton Woods, every single offensive detail of it. That is the point. Now, Mr. Chairman, that is a mighty serious matter.

Turning again to the subject of the banking and commerce committee. Suppose the house approves what is enunciated as the principle of the bill by voting for the second reading. The bill goes to the banking and commerce committee. Probably that committee is not given rules telling exactly its terms of reference, they are not specifically stated; it does not know exactly what its functions are; and I have not been in a banking and commerce committee yet where they did know exactly what their terms of reference were. Supposing then the chairman says, to start with, "Now, gentlemen, the house has already decided on the principle of the bill, so we are not to be occupied at all with the principle of the bill". The members then say, "Well, what in the name of common sense are we to be occupied with, and what is the principle of the bill?" Let me point out to the hon. member for Souris that in a situation like that there is only one man who can determine what shall be the procedure in the committee, what witnesses shall be called, what kind of evidence shall be permitted, what kind of remarks shall be deemed to be in order; and that man is the chairman.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): No.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Just a minute. I have been on this committee, and I am making that statement. Hon. members do not need to agree with it.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I should like to say, Mr. Chairman, that that is hardly correct. The chairman guides the procedure, and that is his duty; but I have sat during this session at as many as four or five meetings a week in committee. I know that we have reversed on certain occasions definite ideas and views expressed by the Chair, and his actions are governed by a majority vote of the committee.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am glad the hon. member said that. I expected him to make just that statement. Let me point out that the majority of the members of the banking and commerce commitee will be Liberals and will be put there because they can be implicitly trusted by the Liberal government. What will they tell the chairman to do? There is not a doubt in the world that the attitude of the Progressive-Conservative party, as thus far expressed by those hon. members who have participated in the debate, would be identical with the attitude of the Liberals.

Mr. JAQUES: And the C.C.F.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The hon. member for Broadview is not present, but may I say that in the debate the other day he spoke right along the lines expressed by the group the hon. member for Lethbridge represents.

Mr. BLACKMORE: He was an Independent Conservative, was he not?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): No.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not want to get into a political squabble, because the matter is too important. If hon. members object to anything I have said in this connection, I withdraw it, because I have some very important things to say. But I would point out that the hon. members for Muskoka-Ontario, York West, Grey North and others who participated expressed ideas that were identical with the Liberals in their attitude on this matter.

Mr. JAQUES: So were the C.C.F.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The result is that they would vote with the chairman, and that would mean that all these progressive ideas—

Mr. MacINNIS: Isn't that democracy?

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. ADAMSON: Mr. Chairman, may I say that I advocate the establishment of a free gold market so that we may return to a gold standard in the shortest possible time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not know how a man could have played into my hands any better. One of the arguments we were making here recently, one of the differences between ourselves and the Liberals, was that we contended that this meant a return to the gold standard, and they contended that it did not.

Mr. ADAMSON: I do not dislike it. I think it is definitely a step in the right direction. In fact I think it is fundamentally the only step towards the recovery of international trade which can now be taken.

Mr. IRVINE: Let us have order; one at a time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Chairman, it does not hurt me to have these interruptions. The more questions, the better I am satisfied. But let me say this, that anyone reading Hansard, or sitting in this chamber looking on, can tell what chance Social Crediters would have of getting their point of view put before the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE: They are doing pretty well this morning.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Before this committee, but I am speaking of their position in the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman had no difficulty when he was there before in getting his point of view expressed.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Well, yes, the hon. gentleman did have difficulty. Time and again in the last banking and commerce committee the member for Lethbridge was ruled out of order when it was all-important that he should say the things he wanted to say. I say this just to show hon. members what they will do if they let this measure go out of this committee and pass the second reading. They will tie their own hands and they will smother all possibility of intelligent and effective discussion. Not only that; by passing the second reading of the bill they will tie the hands of the banking and commerce committee so that it will be unable to act properly, because of the simple fact that they will have approved the principle of the bill. If this measure were to be referred to, say, an impartial royal commission whose members would vote in accordance with what they conceived to be right, and the vote were based upon their findings, that would be an altogether different matter. I am warning the committee that what I have said is true. If this measure goes past this committee, where we can freely discuss it and ask each other questions and get all the information necessary, this house will have tied its hands and smothered effective discussion of the bill. Of course the minister wants this measure to go through. Surely. He wants to get it out of this committee. Who would not, if he wanted to get the thing through? He wants to get first and second reading over so that he can put the measure into the Liberal-dominated and reactionary-dominated committee. Of course he wants to have the banking and commerce committee handcuffed when it undertakes discussion of the bill, and I suppose anyone in the house would if he wanted to get the bill through. But the question I ask is this: Is that what hon. members want, or do they want a frank and intelligent discussion back and forth over the floor of this house so that we may get at the facts?

Mr. MacINNIS: The hon. member has asked if that is what members want. My understanding of procedure in this house is that when a measure of this kind comes before it, it receives consideration here and in order that it may receive greater attention, where witnesses can be called and outside evidence brought in, we refer the matter to a standing or special committee. I do not know of any important measure that has come before this house in the fifteen years that I have been here that did not follow that procedure.

Mr. QUELCH: What about the united nations charter?

Mr. MacINNIS: The united nations charter, perhaps, did not; but if my friends had asked that it be referred to a committee—I was not here when it was discussed in the house—I have no doubt it would have been. As a matter of fact, standing committees and special committees are part of the British parliamentary procedure which we follow, and, if we discussed the matter there the discussion would be just as futile as it is here, since we have been considering this measure. The member for Lethbridge has said that the Bretton Woods proposals are not the means by which we can restore and maintain economic prosperity. Well, I should be inclined to agree with him. I do not say that it can in itself. He has also put his position clearly before us, and the position of his party. His party has a programme that would restore and maintain or bring about economic prosperity.

Mr. JAQUES: That is not the question at all.

Mr. BLACKMORE: With freedom.

Mr. MacINNIS: All right, with freedom. I am agreeing with the hon. gentleman. But he is in pretty much the same position as I am. I believe that I too have a programme that would bring about prosperity with freedom, and it is not the same as my hon. friend's programme. Our position in this house, however, is that the majority do not agree with either of us. I believe that the majority are foolish in not agreeing with me, but as reasonable men, members who were elected not only to put our own programme into effect, not only to state our own programme in this house, but to take every advantage of the opportunities that offer to do as much as we can to improve whatever is put before us, I cannot—

Mr. JAQUES: On a point of order, the discussion from this group has had nothing to do with Social Credit. We are not talking Social Credit. We are discussing Bretton Woods, and the member for Vancouver East, in his anxiety to close off the discussion—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member has not raised a point of order.

Mr. MacINNIS: I must apologize for my lack of understanding, but in all the discussion that has taken place from that corner my understanding of it was that it was definitely associated with the Social Credit policy.

Mr. JAQUES: Not at all.

Mr. MacINNIS: I may be quite wrong—

Mr. JAQUES: You are.

Mr. MacINNIS: —but I can be excused when the member for Wetaskiwin is speaking. In this house we have an obligation to put forward our own point of view; but, according to the rules that we follow, a certain party in the house forming the government has been given a mandate to carry on the business of the country, and the business of the country, particularly to-day, in relation to the world conditions with which we are confronted, is tremendously important, so important that no group in this house, unless it is a matter of profound principle, and I am not saying that it is not so for my friends, should hold up the business.

Mr. BLACKMORE: On a point of order, may I say that there is no attempt on the part of this group to hold up the business of the house. I ask the hon. member to withdraw that remark.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not going to withdraw anything of the kind.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. member must withdraw.

The CHAIRMAN: There has been no reflection on any member.

Mr. BLACKMORE: He used the expression, holding up the business of the house.

The CHAIRMAN: There has been no reflection on any member of the house. The statement is made with respect to a group and not any individual member.

Mr. MacINNIS: The point I make is that no one has a right to hold up the business of the house, and no one who does not hold up the business can find fault with that.

Mr. JAQUES: Who is holding up now?

Mr. MacINNIS: Surely if we followed the democratic procedure in all other cases, and if that is considered part of the freedom we enjoy, we should extend that freedom to this particular subject that is now before us and place the matter in such a position that we can bring outside evidence to bear. Some members of my own group, in discussing this matter, said that when it did go into committee we would have difficulty putting forward our own point of view because others would monopolize the whole time of the committee.

Mr. BLACKMORE: On a point of order—

An hon. MEMBER: He did not say you.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I had the floor and the hon. member rose with my permission, but he will talk past one o'clock and keep me from replying.

Mr. MacINNIS: The hon. gentleman asked a question and I am trying to reply, and now he does not like the answer. He wants me to sit down. My suggestion is that we should follow the ordinary procedure, because if we did so we could get more information in the committee than in the house.

Mr. BLACKMORE: My contention is that the hon. member is one hundred per cent wrong, as he is on practically everything. The only way to get the truth is to stay here.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am sure I am one hundred per cent right when the hon. gentleman says I am one hundred per cent wrong.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Article IX of the Bretton Woods agreement, if put into force, would make it impossible for the hon. member to bring in socialism—absolutely impossible—because the fund could get control of the movable goods or immovable property in the dominion and it would be impossible for any government to pass regulations with respect to it. The hon. member knows that much about Bretton Woods. If he does not, I suggest that he read that article.

Mr. TUCKER: The hon. member has stated, and he is quite sincere in his statement, that he wants information. He can hear the evidence of witnesses. I submit the way to do that is to have this matter go to the banking and commerce committee, where it can be thoroughly studied and gone into. Then if the hon. members are not convinced, it has to come back into this house and go through committee of the whole; it has to be given third reading, and they will then have had ample opportunity to cross-examine witnesses and go into the thing very fully. I suggest the experience of the banking and commerce committee is such that everyone will have an opportunity there to go into the matter thoroughly. For the sake of getting on with the other business of the house I urge that before one o'clock this matter be permitted to go to the banking and commerce committee, which probably can meet at four o'clock and get started upon orderly consideration of the matter. Then if hon. members still are not convinced, they will have the same chance to fight this thing after it has been studied in the banking and commerce committee as they have to-day. I urge upon them that they give consideration to this suggestion and let the measure go to the banking and commerce committee right now.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I must tell the hon. member for Rosthern that when he says we would have just as good a chance to discuss this matter when it came back again, he is telling us that which is absolutely wrong. And I would draw to the attention of the hon. member for Vancouver East, who said it was traditional British parliamentary practice to refer these matters to committees, the fact that it is traditional British parliamentary practice to ask the minister all kinds of questions at the resolution stage, when in committee of the whole in order to gather all the information hon. members need in order to enable them to form a sound decision with respect to the principle of the bill. That is why these questions are being asked, and why this discussion must come right here in committee of the whole.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Chairman, before the committee took recess at one o'clock I was discussing the general attitude of this group toward the measure. I was pointing out that those who maintain that this group is in any way endeavouring to block the measure, or carry on what is commonly known as a filibuster, is entirely not in accordance with the facts. All this group aims at is to have a full and thorough investigation of the whole matter of Bretton Woods. It is our opinion that this whole proposal is a pernicious one, and we think that the committee should give it most earnest consideration before even considering such a thing as adopting it.

At one time in my remarks I was pointing out the fundamental fallacy which is to be found in the government's position in the matter. I quoted a passage from the speech of the Minister of Finance, and also referred to a statement which is found in the white paper called Employment and Income, which was presented to the house in April, 1945, by the Minister of Reconstruction. Then I was about to read a passage from the speech of Henry Morgenthau, Junior, delivered to the delegates at Bretton Woods, in their closing plenary session in July, 1944. My object in reading this passage was to give the committee the background of the whole question, and to help show the attitude of the United States to the whole situation.

Before reading this passage may I point out once more in different language that there simply is no use in trying to apply what is supposed to be a cure or a remedy for a malady the nature of which we have not discovered. There is no earthly use, for example, in trying to prescribe a cure for the pimples of smallpox, until one finds out what is the cause of smallpox. If you wish to cure smallpox, you find out the cause, and then attack that cause. The same applies to great international problems. We will grant that the world is suffering from a malady, and that it was suffering from that malady as far back as 1925. The Bretton Woods proposal is supposed to be an important part of the remedy for that malady. We maintain that it has nothing whatsoever to do with the remedy for the malady. The malady must be remedied by measures altogether different from anything found in Bretton Woods.

May I now read the passage from Henry Morgenthau, Junior, where he says:

This is the alternative—

The alternative to Bretton Woods—

—to the desperate tactics of the past—competitive currency depreciation, excessive tariff barriers, uneconomic barter deals, multiple currency practices and unnecessary exchange restrictions—by which governments vainly sought to maintain employment and uphold living standards. In the final analysis, these tactics only succeeded in contributing to world wide depression and even war. The international fund agreed upon at Bretton Woods will help remedy this situation.

He says it will help to remedy the situation. He does not maintain that it will be a complete remedy. We will grant that. But I wish to concentrate the attention of members of the committee on that second to last sentence, where he says—

In the final analysis, these tactics only succeeded in contributing to world-wide depression and even war.

As I said when dealing with the passage in the minister's speech, the things which caused the great depression—and I am going to list them once more, for the benefit of members of the committee who happened to be out of the chamber when I did it before—the causes of the great depression of 1929 on were as follows. First, Mr. Chairman, I am afraid there are some members in the committee endeavouring to out-talk me.

An hon. MEMBER: That would be hard to do.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I grant that; but why do they try? The causes of the depression of 1929 on, were, first, the cessation of United States foreign lending. May I comment upon that, to this extent: The United States were lending money to borrowing nations to enable them to buy United States goods. It was a most preposterous proposal, but it was an idea indulged in for about ten years by the United States when they believed they could make themselves prosperous by lending foreign nations the moneys with which to buy United States goods. This helped them to keep up their rate of profit, and to keep employment on a fairly high level. But the time came when they began to lose confidence in that method; and as soon as they did, there was a cessation of foreign lending, which constituted the first move to bring on the depression.

The second cause of the depression was—

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Why did they lose confidence in that method of finance? I have heard that statement two or three times, that they lost confidence in that method of lending money. Would the hon. member give us his opinion as to why it was that they lost confidence?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I shall be glad to. I shall take time to answer; the hon. member is one of the new members, and is entitled to an answer. Let us suppose that the hon. member himself is lending money on a large scale to, let us say, Argentina. The only hope he would have of gaining remuneration from that loan would be this: He would have the hope that Argentina would be able to pay back to the United States the interest on the loan. Let us suppose, further, that Argentina offers beef to the United States, in payment of the loan, and that the United States refused to accept that offer. Then Argentina may offer wool, and again the United States may refuse to accept, because she already has too much wool. Let us suppose Argentina then offers shoes, but that the United States refuses to accept those shoes, because she already has too many shoes. Before long the total number of commodities Argentina could offer would have been rejected by the United States, by means of high tariffs, absolute quota restrictions, or an anti-dumping law. Then all the products which Argentina could trade to the United States, through a multilateral trade arrangement, may have been refused by the United States, through a policy of high protection. It would soon appear clear to the hon. member that lending money to Argentina in the hope of getting a return which would have to come in the form of goods and services—returns which would be rejected by the United States—would be simply throwing good money away. The result is that the hon. member would begin to lose confidence—and the same would be true in all similar situations.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I am sincere about this, and would ask what method the hon. member would suggest instead of the method which he says has been discredited.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I would be afraid to say too much about that, for fear of being called to order. But I shall say just this, that the alternative is lend-lease or mutual aid. We have to come to a stage in which, if the nations of the world are to have enjoyment of freedom from want and fear, great producing countries like the United States and Canada will trade off all the goods they can trade off for goods they need in their respective economies; and their surpluses they will be prepared to offer to the world on a lend-lease or mutual aid basis. And they will pay for lend-lease goods by using their national credit, through a debt-free money system. Just as soon as that system is adopted by all the nations of the world, it is obvious to the hon. member, I believe, that the surpluses of all the nations of the world would be rendered available in a great international pool. From that pool the nations could draw in accordance with their need. That is the gist of the Social Credit proposal for international trade. The hon. member can see that with the adoption of an attitude of that kind by all the nations of the world there would be the end of competitive trade. The United States would not still be trying to penetrate the market of Great Britain and undersell her produce. Is that not obvious? There would be no more object in underselling nations like Britain and putting her people out of employment. The trade of the world would then go on a cooperative trade rather than a competitive trade basis. I think the hon. member can see that that would have a great advantage in bringing about peace in the world.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Would the hon. member say the key to the whole problem is the use of debt-free money?

Mr. BLACKMORE: The key to the whole problem is debt-free money both internally and externally. If I am permitted I should like to say a word or two along in that regard, because I think it is in order. The need of the situation to-day is distribution of goods internally and internationally. As the hon. member will recall, the hon. member for Acadia the other day asked the minister if he was prepared to bring about a complete effective demand in Canada for Canada's production. Suppose Canada had twelve billion dollars' worth of production in a year after the war. The maximum need would be twelve billion dollars' worth of purchasing power in Canada available to buy that production. If Canadian people did not wish to buy all the production of Canada's wheat, for example, that surplus could be traded for bananas or other things which Canadians need, and Canadians would be able to buy those goods when they arrived. Do I make that quite clear to the hon. gentleman?

I was pointing out the causes of the depression. Number one was the cessation of foreign lending. I thank the hon. member for asking me that question. I welcome questions of that kind from any member in the house, because Social Crediters are not condemning this proposal without offering an alternative. They condemn this proposal, and they condemn the whole present orthodox financial system, on the ground that it is absolutely impossible for it to distribute the goods of the world and to eliminate competitive trade, which means economic warfare, which in turn means military warfare in the end.

The second step toward the bringing on of the depression was the raising of the rediscount rate by the federal reserve board. The minute the rediscount rate was raised by the federal reserve board the banks were unable to obtain money as easily upon which to base loans for large investments, including security on speculations. That meant there was retraction of money immediately all over the country. That was the second step in the bringing on of the depression.

The third step was the loss of confidence in securities by the speculators. Those who were ready to pay large sums for mining stocks, gold stocks and stocks of lumber mills and all that kind of thing began to be afraid because they said, "We may lose." They then began to hesitate and began to try to sell, which immediately brought on the depression, and the consequence was a complete collapse of the economy of the country.

The fourth step was the calling of loans. The withdrawing of circulating medium naturally resulted all over the country, because the lending policy of the banks is intimately bound up with the lending policy of the banks to those who wish to deal in securities. Does the hon. member get that?

The fifth step was the fall of prices which naturally resulted from a withdrawal of purchasing power throughout the country. I was speaking from memory when I mentioned this a while ago, but I think I am right. According to Irving Fisher, a great economist, in his book called "A Hundred Per Cent Money", eight billion of the twenty-three billion dollars in circulation in the United States in 1929 were withdrawn, and this brought on a fall in prices and in values all over the United States.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Oh, that kind of thing doesn't do a bit of good.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. BLACKMORE: You know, I lived too long in the backwoods to be afraid of wolves when they call. In reading the passage from Morgenthau's principles I made it quite clear that the United States is proceeding on the basis of the same fallacy which is at the bottom of the whole Canadian government's policy. In other words, the United States, if it is honest and sincere, and you must suppose it is, is proceeding to apply a remedy which is not a remedy, a remedy which would only make the malady worse.

I have a little more to say at this time. I merely wish to make clear the position that I occupy. The leader of this group called me about two weeks after the session opened and asked me to take charge of the organization and conduct of the inquiry on the Bretton Woods question in this house. The result is that I am responsible for the conduct of this inquiry. The object of the inquiry is to elicit the facts. Long ago the great Creator said: "And ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." If hon. members of this house will not know the truth, it is impossible for them to be free. Consequently the very first step for this house to take is to learn the truth. It is my humble desire that I might aid in the divulging and eliciting of the truth. I have no conceivable motive for doing what I am doing but the object which I have indicated. I can gain nothing politically, because the people all over the country think that any one who opposes Bretton Woods must be crazy. They think that because they do not know about it, because they have been deceived by the press. I can gain nothing politically. If I were the leader of the group, it might be thought that I had some ulterior motive in taking the stand I do. I have nothing to gain in that respect. I simply stand as a plain citizen of the Dominion of Canada, a plain member of this house, a plain ordinary man. I represent those who have made sacrifices in two wars, and who ask that there shall be found something or other which will eliminate the causes of war. I represent the men whose sons have died in this war, and I myself have given a son and risked the life of another in this war. And as I said in the early part of the debate, my son did not die for such a sordid betrayal of the interests of all nations as Bretton Woods constitutes. My son died for a condition in which there will be free men and a free and great British commonwealth of nations, a free and great nation of the United States, a world in which there shall not be trade competition among nations, but a world in which men will discover how they can cooperate and trade their surpluses for each other's surpluses in a genuinely cooperative manner.

I wish to say no more at this time. The hon. member for Wetaskiwin was unable to finish his speech the other night. He had some important things that he wished to say on this general subject that is now under discussion. I should like to hear him speak. And then personally I should like to see the hon. member for Acadia go on with the fine work he was doing.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Carried.

Mr. BLACKMORE: No.

Mr. JAQUES: I am not going to make any apologies for speaking here this afternoon.

Mr. PROBE: We are glad to hear you.

Mr. JAQUES: There seems to be an indecent haste to end open discussion on this measure.

Mr. KNIGHT: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. JAQUES: No, I prefer—

Mr. KNIGHT: Is this a discussion?

Mr. JAQUES: It certainly is.

Mr. KNIGHT: It is the kind of discussion I hear in church; I am in the pew and the preacher is in the pulpit.

Mr. JAQUES: There is considerable criticism from my hon. friends to my immediate right of the time we have taken over this measure.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. JAQUES: On every subject that has come up in this house hon. members of the C.C.F. have taken all the time they wanted; they talked incessantly. You cannot say that about the members of this group. We have reserved what we might have said on less important subjects—

Mr. COLDWELL: This is going to a committee.

Mr. JAQUES: —so that we might have our turn on this measure. With regard to putting this measure before the committee on banking and commerce and calling in the experts—

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. JAQUES: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I do not mind reminding the committee that I would not be speaking did I not feel it my duty to do so. Those who are not interested might just as well remove themselves; they would not be missed.

Let me say this about calling in experts. I am not interested in the experts, not in the slightest.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not?

Mr. JAQUES: I do not believe in suicide. Those who do believe in it can call in any experts in suicide they like, but they are not going to convert me to the idea of suicide, and I do not care whether it is painless or otherwise. The experts are not going to convince me against my own convictions.

So far this has been a one-sided debate.

An hon. MEMBER: Right.

Mr. JAQUES: That is quite right. But we have established at least two or three principles in this discussion. One is that Bretton Woods means a return to the gold standard. We have also established the principle that foreign trade will be controlled by an international gold standard, and that foreign trade will control national prosperity. That has been admitted in so many words. We have also established the fact that Bretton Woods means the surrender of sovereignty to an international government, and Bretton Woods is supported for that very reason by some members of this house, just because it means a surrender of national sovereignty. The other day the hon. member for Vancouver East, for instance, had this to say:

> We have heard a great deal of talk about national sovereignty. Will some one tell me how many countries have to-day any national sovereignty that is worth while? I think I could count them pretty well with the fingers of one hand. We have reached the stage where if we are to have peace; if we are to have that measure of cooperation that will bring about prosperity, not only for ourselves but for others, we must be ready to give up a great deal of our national sovereignty. Indeed that is the way world progress has been made. Not only have people given up things, but privileges have been taken away from sections or from groups in order that those privileges might be extended to even larger numbers of people. That is the way democracy has developed in nations; and that is the way it must develop in the international sphere.

I consider such a statement as that, in face of the actual conditions of the world, nothing short of criminal lunacy. There are only two or three nations that have preserved their national sovereignty, of which Canada is one, thank God! It is only in those nations where national sovereignty has been maintained that the people can meet in their parliaments and exercise freedom of speech. Let me remind hon. members of what the British secretary for foreign affairs said recently in the parliament at Westminster. But first let me remind hon. members of the Atlantic charter. It guaranteed four freedoms: freedom of speech, freedom from want, freedom from fear and freedom of worship, and as a guarantee of these freedoms the charter pledged to seek no territorial changes except by the freely expressed wishes of the people concerned and to see national sovereignty and self-government restored to those who had been deprived of them. That is the Atlantic charter. It guaranteed that sovereign rights and self-government would be restored to those who had lost them. Yet hon. members of this house get up and advocate the surrender of sovereign rights! To whom and to what?

Mr. MacINNIS: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, surely when we accepted the united nations charter it meant that we were prepared to give up some of our sovereign rights if the charter has any meaning at all.

Mr. LOW: What is the point of order?

Mr. MacINNIS: That is the point of order.

Mr. LOW: That is no point of order.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is a point of privilege then.

Mr. LOW: It is no point of privilege.

Mr. JAQUES: In a moment I shall quote what the British Foreign Secretary said. More than four years have passed since Churchill and Roosevelt on a British battleship, somewhere in the Atlantic, on behalf of all peoples, offered to the world that charter of justice and liberty in whose faith millions have since died. But president and Prime Minister stepped ashore to find that this charter of freedom was not approved by the real "bosses", and its sponsors were forced to admit that their charter was not to be taken seriously, it was merely wishful thinking. In these past four years the Atlantic charter, and its four freedoms, have been torn to pieces at the four conferences of Moscow, Teheran, Yalta and Potsdam.

Now, Mr. Bevin said this recently in the British House of Commons:

> There are two kinds of hunger in Europe today; one is a physical hunger, and the other is the awful black-out, creating a spiritual hunger. If every country could get free parliaments and free expression without dictatorship or orders, and if people could express themselves freely we might be able to make a better world for the future.

How are you going to guarantee any of these things if you surrender your sovereign rights? What has happened to those who have surrendered them? Another British labour member told parliament at Westminster:

> Since Potsdam something different has been happening—we are contracting into a country very little larger than the United Kingdom, over 60 million people. It appears that something like the fiendish Morgenthau plan is being carried out.
> The Russians already have stripped their zone of all industrial equipment. They are carrying out land reforms so as to get rid of the German Junkers but, unfortunately, their reforms are reducing this former food exporting area to a strip-farming proposition with disastrous results for future food production. Millions of refugees from Russian-controlled countries are flooding into that area and are dying from exposure and lack of food. These policies are being carried out with the most appalling ruthlessness and inhumanity.

Similar statements were made by other members, many of whom spoke as eye witnesses of the tragedy. That is the meaning of the surrender of national sovereignty. That is what happens. You become slaves to the biggest gangsters in the world. That is what is happening to-day. Who is this Morgenthau, the author of this Bretton Woods plan? He is a former secretary of the United States treasury. He is the sponsor of the international monetary plan agreed upon at Bretton Woods. He is the author of the plan to reduce central Europe to a subsistence level. Furthermore, what right has any member of this house to advocate the surrender of what does not belong to him? Has this government, this house, or anybody in it? Have they received a mandate from the people of Canada to hand over Canadian sovereignty to an international government of international financiers? All I know is that I have not, and I am not going to do it if I stay here until this time next year.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. JAQUES: Carried? No.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Have we forgotten to believe in free speech?

Mr. JAQUES: We have heard a lot in the past about the "iniquity" of International Nickel, but did you hear from the socialists about the iniquities of international gold? I never did. What a lot of people do not understand is the partnership between international finance and international socialism. It is a partnership which too many fail to realize, that the one is merely a partner of the other, and that at the present time the world is in the position of a nut in the nut-crackers, one jaw of which is international finance and the other is international socialism, or communism, or whatever you like to call it—totalitariarism.

When I was speaking before in this debate I mentioned a statement I made two or three years ago with regard to the ownership of the gold reserve in the United States, and I quoted a certain authority I met in England when I was there the winter before last. I am sorry I am not in a position to give his name publicly, but as I said the other day, if anybody is interested I shall be only too glad to give him his name. More than that, if it is kept off the record and the press do not report it I shall be perfectly willing to give his name in this chamber right now. He is a man whose knowledge few people in this house would care to challenge. Now, I want to make this statement perfectly clear. Here is the annual report of the secretary of the United States treasury for the year ended June, 1942. On page 638 the statement appears, in plain English: Money held in the treasury, 1942, $22,596 million. That is the total amount of money. In the next column is the statement: Held for the federal reserve banks and agencies, $17,750 million. Can you say that you own a thing when you are holding it for somebody else? That is the point. So what I said two years ago is true, that 85 per cent of the gold in the United States is not owned and controlled by the people of the United States; it is owned and controlled by the federal reserve banks, which are private institutions. I believe that any intelligent man in the United States would agree to that statement.

We have heard a lot about experts. I should like to recall the appointment after the first world war of a committee of experts, for the same purpose that this committee of experts sat at Bretton Woods last summer, namely to restore the prosperity of the nations in the post-war period. Let me read the names of this committee: Chairman, Lord Cunliffe, Governor of the Bank of England; Sir Charles Addis, Hong Kong and Shanghai Banking Corporation; the Hon. Rupert Beckett, Beckett and Company, bankers; Sir John Bradbury, K.C.B., Secretary to the Treasury; Mr. G. C. Cassels, Bank of Montreal; Mr. Gaspard Farrer, Baring and Company, bankers; the Hon. Herbert Gibbs, Anthony Gibbs & Sons, bankers; Mr. W. H. N. Goschen, chairman of the clearing bankers' committee; Lord Inchcape, chairman of the National Provincial bank; Mr. R. W. Jeans, Bank of Australasia; Mr. A. C. Pigou, professor of political economy, Cambridge university; Mr. G. F. Stewart, ex-governor of the Bank of Ireland; Mr. William Wallace, Royal Bank of Scotland; Mr. G. C. Upcott, of the treasury and ministry of reconstruction.

That was an all-star committee; I do not think the present committee could match it. When one talks of experts, if these men were not experts I do not know where experts could be found. What was the result of their recommendations and their advice? We know what happened—years of depression. Of course anyone can be wise after the event; most people's hindsight is better than their foresight. But always there arises the odd man with the ability to foresee the result of any policy. Such a man was Mr. Arthur Kitson, who was the author of a book which I have in my hand, and which I obtained from the library of parliament, called "The Bankers' Conspiracy." He presented in 1918 a brief before this committee on reconstruction, and in it he foretold exactly what would be the result of their policies if they were put into effect. He said afterwards:

> If the present world crisis can be traced to the currency deflation policy pursued by the central banks of the great industrial nations since the war, Great Britain must be held mainly responsible for having taken the lead in the adoption of this suicidal measure. And the men who should be held responsible to the British people for urging the government to embark on this reactionary course are the members of these two committees.

But Arthur Kitson foretold exactly what would happen if the advice of the Cunliffe committee were adopted by the government —a government, let me say, just as intelligent as this present government, and advised by experts just as capable as any experts which could be brought before any committee formed in this house. I say that if we follow the advice of these experts there is every reason to believe that we shall go the same way as we went after the last war.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. JAQUES: No; you will have to carry me out first.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Not a bad idea.

Mr. JAQUES: The statement is frequently made that money is international. It is not, and the attempt to make it so is part of a deep laid plot, a plot on the part of international financiers to control the world politically, industrially and financially by means of an international bank. This scheme would enslave all the people to a soulless dictatorship by anonymous international finance. This is what these planners are saying to the world, and what they have been saying for a long time: "Do you want another depression? Do you want to go back to the conditions that prevailed before the war?" Of course people say no; then the planners blackmail them by saying, "All right; then surrender your sovereignty to us." And the totalitarians, the international socialists are saying. "Do you want another war?" No; of course not. That is the last thing we want. Then the international socialists blackmail people and they say: "All right; you surrender your sovereignty to us or you will have another war and another after that." The world is being blackmailed by Shylock and Marx, and it is about time we faced the fact.

Does anyone think that after the war we wish to hand everything over to the very people who caused the war and who are the authors of the economic miseries that we have had for the last thirty or forty years? The member for Vancouver East talks about the progress of the world. I do not know what he calls progress. Compare for one moment the condition of Europe to-day with what it was at the turn of the century and before that. Is there any comparison? Three-quarters of the people have lost their sovereignty and their freedom. If that is progress then I say, in the words of an old Latin saying, "facilis descensus Averni", easy is the descent to hell. That is where Europe has gone and where we are in danger of following it.

Let me quote one of the principal authors of this scheme, Mr. Maynard Keynes, or Lord Keynes as I believe he now is. Speaking of the clearing union he says:

> It might become a pivot of the future economic government of the world. It might set up an account in favour of an international policing body. It would provide excellent machinery for enforcing a financial blockade, and we have here a genuine organ of truly international government.

These are the words of Lord Keynes. I do not recall the occasion on which they were spoken, but I think I am correct in saying that the present Minister of Finance admitted much the same thing during a debate in this house, if not last year, probably the year before. I do not remember the date, but I remember the occasion.

I believe that the big idea of the last decade or in the last decades has been largely this—and it applies more particularly to Europe, though it is spreading now all over the world. The first step was to confiscate by taxation. That is the scheme, the big idea of Shylock and Marx. I mean by Shylock the moneyed interests, high finance. People are at liberty to put whatever interpretation they like upon the word Shylock and they will not frighten me. I say Shylock and I stick to the word, and if they do not like it they can lump it. Their scheme has been to confiscate the land by taxation and death duties, forcing the land owners into the hands of money lenders, so that their political power would pass over to high finance. That is what happened in Great Britain. The second has been to tax manufacturers and traders so that they are forced to go into debt to the financiers, who thus gain control of industry. The third has been to tax the middle class so as to demoralize them by fear and reduce them to servitude and impotence. The fourth has been to tax the workers so as to prevent them from exercising their independence and to force upon them conditions calculated to drive them to communism, which also is controlled by anonymous high finance.

That very briefly is the scheme that has been working since the turn of the century and before that. It is certainly working now, for we have taxation that amounts to confiscation and I cannot see any prospect of its reduction.

We Social Crediters say that sovereignty is the quintessence of freedom and liberty, and we are absolutely convinced that that sovereignty and freedom are threatened by Bretton Woods. That is why we are making the stand we are. Neither this government, nor the Liberal party, nor the Conservative party, nor the C.C.F. party, nor the Social Credit party has any mandate, nor taken collectively have they any mandate, from the people of Canada to surrender the liberties of the Canadian people to any body or control outside the dominion. That is the stand we take, and it is no excuse to say that the people do not know because that is our fault. We should make it clear to them. Instead of trying to smother this debate, why do not some of the other members get up and strike a blow for the liberty of the Canadian people?

A little while ago we had a discussion on a Canadian flag. We were going to have a national flag and a national anthem, and at that time I said: When we talk of a flag for Canada and an anthem for Canada let us be sure that we have the sovereignty that goes with them. Some people say that we should have a maple leaf on the flag. I am perfectly agreeable to putting anything Canadian on it, but my opinion is, and it is shared by the rest of my group and by many more people, that if Bretton Woods goes through the only suitable thing you could put on the Canadian flag would be three brass balls.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Pawn shop.

Mr. JAQUES: You may take the union jack off, or take off what you like; but if this thing goes through all you should put on are the three brass balls. I do not know what will sting some members into a sense of their responsibilities. I can only suppose they are so cowed and so controlled that they dare not raise their voices. Already they have lost their will to defend their freedom and their sovereignty. Well, we Social Crediters have not, and we do not intend to lose them if we can prevent it.

Now let me quote a statement made in 1894, a long time ago. Anyone can be wise after the event, but it takes a good man to foretell the future, to judge a policy and the results of that policy. This is what Mr. Arthur Kitson wrote in a little book called "A Scientific Solution of the Money Question" back in 1894, or fifty-one years ago:

> The gold standard means inevitable war. Nations cannot possibly exist for long under it. The children born of it are fire and sword, red ruin, and the breaking up of laws.
> The repudiation of debt will become inevitable. Nations must strangle this monster or it will strangle them. The gold debts of the world cannot be redeemed in gold. Although gold does not enter in the slightest degree into those things that sustain life, by building industry upon this fickle basis, our civilization is in danger of being swept away. It is not a mere abstract question of economics. It does not merely concern statesmen, and students of finance. It is the greatest moral, the greatest social question which mankind has ever had to consider. It concerns the lives, fortunes and happiness of every human being in society, and of generations yet unborn. All other questions sink into insignificance compared to this one. It is the "fin de siècle" problem, and our answer to it will determine the character of the drama we shall shortly have to witness, and upon which the curtain of the twentieth century is about to rise.

I would ask those hon. members who are indulging in levity to think over those words and ask themselves whether they are true or false. What has happened since they were written? We have had two wars and two or three terrible revolutions. Red ruin. I suppose I am not exaggerating when I say that at least a hundred million people have been killed since those words were written. If nothing else will bring hon. members to a realization of the question we are discussing to-day; if they are careless about themselves then let them think of those who have died as a result of this and all those who may be called upon to die in the future.

Mr. IRVINE: I am not going to make a speech, but I want to ask the minister a question or two just for my own satisfaction and in recognition of the fact that hon. gentlemen to my left want to make sure just what this thing means. I think we have been very patient with them in that regard, recognizing that this parliament wants to give them and all other hon. members a chance to get as much information as it is possible to get on the legislation we pass here. Before putting my question I might say that I do not think the hon. gentleman who just resumed his seat strengthened his position by the views he expressed. For instance, if this were an international socialist movement I should be voting for it with both hands, and so far I have not had the opportunity to do so. In the second place, if it implies the yielding of a portion of our sovereignty to ourselves as we are represented in an international agreement, I would be all for it. I am sorry the hon. gentleman did not quote what Mr. Bevin had to say a few days ago about the necessity for international government. I believe that would have been a very important quotation to give in this connection.

The point I want to make is this. Has this parliament any power whatsoever to alter the agreement made at Bretton Woods by one iota? If it has not, the only thing we can do is vote for it or against it, and in order that we may be able to vote for it or against it intelligently we should have all the available information on the matter. Then I should like to ask the minister how many nations already have passed legislation similar to that we now have before us, endorsing this agreement; and, if he knows it, how many nations have signed as members of the international bank. I believe the final date in that connection is December 31 of this year. Then, since this is going to a committee, and my own group has agreed to vote for it in order that it may go to the committee, I should like to ask if the minister will assure hon. members that in that committee we shall have an opportunity to investigate it thoroughly. This raises a further question. Must this legislation be passed at this session of parliament? If it must, then to send it to a committee at this late hour seems farcical if we expect to make any study of the matter. These are some of the questions I should like the minister to be kind enough to answer.

Mr. ILSLEY: As to the number of nations who have ratified or indicated by their action they are going to sign this agreement, I shall have to get that information, and I think I can do so in a few minutes. The only nation I know of that has done so up to date is the United States, but the agreement is now before the British parliament, and in that regard may I say that I read that three days have been assigned as the time for consideration of this agreement in the British parliament, not only the agreement but also the financial arrangements recently concluded with the United States.

Mr. LOW: That is in the house, not before a committee.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right, but I think it will be concluded then. I believe three days is the time assigned for consideration of this agreement.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Poor Britain.

Mr. IRVINE: Order. Let us have the answers.

Mr. ILSLEY: While I am on that point, for some hours or some days I have felt that I should say something about our own course in bringing this matter before the House of Commons when we did. I want to remind hon. members that the draft of the Bretton Woods agreement was concluded and made public about fifteen months ago, and during all that time there has been an opportunity to study and discuss it. I also want to point out that this government announced its adherence to the Bretton Woods agreement as a matter of policy last spring, when we published the white paper on reconstruction and employment. Again, in August, I stated to a press conference that legislation would be introduced at this session approving the agreement. Then, in the speech from the throne it was stated again that legislation would be introduced at this session. The resolution was placed on the order paper early in the session—I do not remember the exact date.

I should have liked to bring the resolution before the House of Commons before December 6; but it must be remembered that there is a difference of opinion among members of the house as to what is most important. Bill 15 was regarded as very important by many hon. members of the house. The budget was regarded as important by myself. The war appropriation measure was regarded as extremely important, as was also consideration of the civil estimates. We were constantly torn between the conflicting claims of various measures for proper consideration in the house. It never occurred to me that anyone would take the position that if we had a few days for discussion of the Bretton Woods resolution, under conditions which assure that no one in Canada could be taken by surprise, there would be objection. As I have said, there was over a year in which it was discussed in the press, and there could be no doubt that the agreement contained the policy of the government in this respect. This has been known since last spring. It never occurred to me that anyone would take the position, here in this month of December, that more than a few days would be required for the discussion of this matter, and that it could not be disposed of in that time.

We want full discussion, but not necessarily excessive discussion. There are thirteen members of the Social Credit party, eight of whom have made full-dress speeches on the subject; and some of those speeches have been repeated in committee. I believe I understand all those objections. I believe I have noted all of them, and I think every other hon. member has too. It is of great importance to us, we think, that this measure be passed.

Answering the question of the hon. member as to the time that could be consumed before the committee on banking and commerce, may I point out it would certainly be the determined endeavour of the government to get this matter back into the House of Commons at this session and have it voted upon and disposed of in one way or another.

Arrangements were made to have the committee on banking and commerce meet at four o'clock this afternoon. I do not know of any reason why it could not sit fairly long hours, so that the matter could be discussed fairly fully.

If this were something coming on for the first time I would not suggest that a few days before the banking and commerce committee would be long enough. But this is not something that is being brought up for the first time. It is not like some of the bills I bring before the house, and which hon. members do not know anything about before they see them. This is something the whole country has had an opportunity to examine for about fifteen months.

I should hate to have Canada fall down in the matter of disposing of this question this year. The arrangement is that if before the end of the year nations representing sixty-five per cent of the quota had not given their assent to the Bretton Woods agreement—and in respect of Canada, assent would be given by this legislation—it will not go forward. If the government is right in its stand with respect to this agreement, then Canada has an interest in it, and it will be most beneficial. On the other hand, members of the Social Credit group take the stand that it will be injurious to Canada. We hold the view that hon. members would be taking a great responsibility if they made themselves parties to a delay in disposing of the measure, one way or the other. If they feel it is bad, and convince the government that it is bad, that is one thing. If we are so convinced, then we say "It is bad; we will not sign it ourselves, and hope it will not go through". But to let it go along without having any disposition made of it at this session would, I suggest, expose everyone lending himself to that course to a great measure of criticism in the future.

These matters will come up; things are likely to happen which this agreement would have prevented. I should not like to be the person who took the responsibility of staving it off.

Mr. HANSELL: The minister did not answer the question of the hon. member for Cariboo as to whether parliament can change an article or section of the act itself.

Mr. ILSLEY: It cannot change an article of the agreement. Parliament must vote either for it or against it. That does not apply to the act which will be introduced. It will be a matter for discussion. But the agreement must be either accepted or rejected.

Mr. QUELCH: I am sorry to note the attitude of the committee toward the endeavours of this group. I look back to the days frittered away in this session on matters of little or no importance; then when we come to a matter of this kind, which all must admit is of the greatest importance, we are criticized because we want to take a little time to discuss it. When I say a little time, I do not think a few days is more than a little time. I suggest to the minister that had the government taken a fair and reasonable attitude on this whole question, this might not have taken place. Let me remind the minister that when the government sent a delegation to San Francisco they deliberately left out any representation from this group. When they sent members to Bretton Woods they did not send any members from this group at all. Had we been there, perhaps we would have been influenced in the same way the hon. member for Rosthern was influenced. Apparently after sitting in that committee and watching the experts, be became converted. If one of us had gone down, perhaps we would have had the same opportunity. But the government was most careful to see that we had no representation whatsoever, from this group, in respect of either San Francisco or Bretton Woods, or the conference which took place in England. I ask the minister if he thinks that is a fair way to deal with members of this House of Commons, or the different groups comprising it.

With regard to letting this matter go through to the banking committee, how many days can we spend in committee? Does not the minister think that the only fair way to deal with a matter of this kind in committee is to have in attendance experts representing both sides of the question? Does the minister think there is time to have experts before that committee, who can give both sides? Certainly the government can have its experts, to explain their side of the matter. But we have men we would like to have called, and I do not know if it will be possibe to call them. The minister will have experts to persuade the people to believe one thing, but no experts will be there to show the other side. Is that a fair way to handle this question?

There is no reason why this matter could not have been brought up at the beginning of the session and put before a committee, so that we could have had several weeks to discuss it and plenty of time to get witnesses.

We did a glorious job from 1914 to 1918 in winning the war. Everybody realizes that our politicians and diplomats made a ghastly mess of winning the peace. Again we have won another war. But we have to be most careful that they do not make the same ghastly mess that was made after the last war, or this second war will have been won in vain. We have endorsed the United States charter for peace. Let me emphasize the fact that it is of no use to make a political agreement for peace if at the same time we make economic agreements which are a declaration of economic war, as I consider this to be.

Before I concluded my remarks on Saturday I was asked a question by the hon. member for Vancouver East. He wanted to know whether the proposals which I had outlined by which an effective demand might be maintained against the production in the country could be put into effect without socialism. Let me emphasize that when I outlined that programme I outlined it as it would be instituted under private ownership. If the hon. member is thinking of the question of the nationalization of the chartered banks I say that so long as the chartered banks are prepared to cooperate with the government I believe we can carry on the privately owned chartered banks. I believe this government feel that they have cooperated with them. Whether the chartered banks would cooperate in the same way if the government brought about certain changes in the financial system I am unable to say. Maybe they would or maybe they would not. I certainly do not think it is right to judge them before they have had a trial.

When the C.C.F. brought in an amendment to the budget I was surprised to see that they used the words "utilization of national credit" rather than "nationalization of chartered banks," because on every other occasion on which we have used the term "national credit" they have invariably moved an amendment to nationalize the chartered banks. When I was speaking I mentioned that, and the leader of the C.C.F. said the reason they had not done it was that they had already moved a motion during this session.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I just say I was in error at that time.

Mr. QUELCH: I am glad to hear the hon. member say that. As the record stands today it looks as if I were making a false statement. I am glad to have his explanation. Anybody reading Hansard would think that I was deliberately making a charge which was not true.

The other day the minister criticized me for making statements in this house which had been made in certain committees without quoting the exact words. Probably he was justified in that criticism because I know it is easy to distort a statement when you give it from memory. Therefore in order that there may be no misunderstanding and in order that nobody may charge that I deliberately distorted statements made by any member of this house or any civil servant, I should like to put on record the one or two statements to which I referred.

The hon. member for Rosthern has gone to some length to eulogize Maynard Keynes in this house. In the past I have been a student of Maynard Keynes. We all appreciate that he is a great writer, but we also realize that some years ago he made quite a change about in some of his views. I mentioned that fact to the hon. member for Rosthern. I pointed out that whilst he apparently had great confidence in Maynard Keynes, that confidence apparently did not rest with the former minister of finance or with the former leader of the Conservative party, although I did not mention the leader of the opposition at that time. Therefore I should like to quote from page 3563 of Hansard of 1936, when Mr. McGeer, now Senator McGeer, was making a statement. At that time he was referring to a book entitled "A General Theory of Employment, Interest and Money." All hon. members who have read that book will agree that it showed a tremendous advance in the thinking of Maynard Keynes. Mr. Bennett made this interjection with regard to Maynard Keynes:

He goes back, in terms, on all his previous opinions.

Mr. Dunning: And says so.

Then Mr. Dunning goes on to make this statement which I wish to read to show that the hon. member for Rosthern has no justification for suggesting that just because Maynard Keynes says that this is so and so the members of this house should accept it. He did say himself that Maynard Keynes said he would not support a return to the gold standard, and that the hon. member was prepared to accept Maynard Keynes' statement. Now, I shall read what Mr. Dunning had to say on June 9, 1936:

My hon. friend surely forgets that John Maynard Keynes, to my certain knowledge, has been writing authoritatively on these subjects each year. He did not start with the days of the ox cart; he has been gradually developing and instructing his readers, of whom I am one and my hon. friend is another, all in the twentieth century. In the book to which my hon. friend refers Keynes says he knows it is competely out of line with all that he has formerly taught us. I have no objection to a man changing his mind, but surely if we are to look for light and leadership from my hon. friend from Vancouver-Burrard to-day we do not expect that the day after to-morrow he will be telling us something definitely contrary to the opinions expressed to-day, and still expecting us to regard him as progressive and sound because he has done so. I am not criticizing Keynes, but I am saying that a teacher who changes virtually overnight in some of his cardinal teachings, I would hesitate to quote personally as an authority to-day as readily as I would before I read that book, and I say this without derogating at all from his right to change his mind. I am referring rather to his reliability as a teacher either yesterday or to-day.

I put that on record because some members might suggest that the statement I made the other day regarding Mr. Dunning was not quite correct.

While I am on the subject of Maynard Keynes I should like to refer to a press dispatch dated December 9, 1945, which is taken from the Globe and Mail. The statement has to do with the agreement which has been reached between Britain and the United States. It reads as follows:

Lord Keynes obviously felt that the Washington agreement was not completely satisfactory to the British viewpoint, and that he would meet severe criticism when he returned to London. However it was clear that he believed no such problems could be settled to the entire satisfaction of either side, and that the concessions made by both American and British negotiators would not cause its rejection by either congress or parliament.

Therefore we do not want even to suggest that Maynard Keynes is over-enthusiastic about the agreement. He got the best agreement he thought he could get.

The point to which the minister really took exception was my reference to the deputy minister of finance, Doctor Clark. May I say in explanation that when I started on Saturday I did not believe the debate would carry on in the way in which it did. I did not start in that direction. The Minister of Finance and the hon. member for Rosthern kept asking me questions that I had not intended to touch on when I started to speak; otherwise I should have had the references with me. I refer to the fact that Doctor Clark had taken a certain stand in regard to the treatment of a creditor nation. In all fairness to Doctor Clark I think I should put his words on Hansard, as recorded in the report of the special committee on reconstruction and reestablishment dated Wednesday, March 8, 1944. In order that the committee may have an understanding of what his statement referred to, I shall quote my statement which brought forth his reply. It will be found on page 38 of this committee report. It reads as follows:

Perhaps Doctor Clark would like to say whether he agrees with the proposals put forward by the London chamber of commerce? No doubt Doctor Clark has made a study of those proposals.

Doctor Clark merely said in that regard:

I do not think I should be asked to go on with the London chamber of commerce programme this morning. If I were to do that I would want to do it at some length, and it is a long time since I read the programme. I would like to have it more fully in my mind again, and would not like to start on another long discussion at this stage when I have talked for so long already.

The next opportunity I had to speak with him was when I accidentally met him in the corridor. I asked him his attitude regarding the London chamber of commerce, and it was that which I put on record. Now to get on with the question of the creditor nation Doctor Clark said this:

Mr. Quelch also made a point about the difference in the treatment between debtor and creditor countries under the plans, suggesting that the treatment of debtor countries was far more strict and mandatory than in the case of the creditor countries. I do not think that is really a fair reading of the three plans. I think all three plans recognize very clearly and emphasize very strongly the obligation that the creditor country is under to do the things that will get it out of that chronic creditor position and enable the world really to function as a whole. In the case of the creditor countries I might read very briefly what I said in this address about what is provided in respect to creditor countries.

All three plans recognize that surplus countries may be equally responsible with deficit countries for creating disequilibria in international exchange. To illustrate the general application of the plans to surplus countries, let me take the major provisions of the Canadian plan. When the union's operations have resulted in net sales of the currency of any member to the extent of 75 per cent of its quota, the union may attempt to arrange with that country a programme of capital investment or securities repatriation in order to increase its reserves of the currency in question. When net sales of a currency have reached 85 per cent of a country's quota, the union has the authority and the duty to render to that country a report analysing the causes of the depletion of its holdings of the particular currency and making recommendations in regard to monetary and fiscal policies, exchange rate, commercial policy, and international investment, believed to be appropriate in order to restore the equilibrium of the international balances of the country concerned. The union has also the right to enter into arrangements with any country to borrow additional supplies of its currency on mutually satisfactory terms, and, when the board believes that the anticipated demand for any currency may soon exhaust the union's holdings, it is required to propose a method for the equitable distribution of the scarce currency together with suggestions for helping to equate the anticipated demand and supply. When it finds it necessary thus to ration a scarce currency the board is required to reexamine prevailing exchange rates and recommend such changes as it may believe appropriate to the changed circumstances.

Might I interject here that the question of scarce currency is dealt with in article 7 of the Bretton Woods agreement. He goes on to say:

True, several of the provisions I have read are, as Mr. Quelch says, of an advisory character; but if the fund had the power to enforce on a creditor country all these measures or had other equally drastic powers, I am afraid Mr. Quelch would say that we were suggesting a plan which too greatly impaired the national sovereignty of a country. So you could easily go too far in that direction, and I think what is provided for in these plans goes much farther than anything that has ever been done in the past to solve the problem of the creditor country, to bring the creditor country to a realization of what it must do if it is going to solve its own problems and not be a drag on the prosperity of the world.

The provisions are largely in the category of an advisory nature. He wants to know whether I would expect them to suggest that we should impair the sovereignty of a creditor nation. My argument is that we should treat the creditor nation in the same way as we treat the debtor nation. We have no right to impose conditions on the debtor nation and let the creditor nation go scot-free, but should recognize that they both should have a mutual obligation to try to balance their trade. I replied to Doctor Clark in this way:

Before we adjourn I would like to take up the question of impairing the sovereignty of a nation, because I agree entirely with Doctor Clark on that point. To my mind one of the main objections to these proposals is due to the fact that while they do not intend to impair the sovereignty of a creditor nation, they do so in the case of a debtor nation, and I say a creditor nation would be largely to blame because if the creditor nation refused to buy a debtor nation's goods the debtor nation is at its mercy.

Doctor Clark agrees that foreign investment is not a solution, that it just tides over the period of unemployment for the time being, that it cannot be considered a long-term solution.

I should like to quote a statement from the London Economist to show that people who have studied this question generally agree that foreign investment is not a solution but merely a temporary expedient. The London Economist of January 22, 1944, says:

Loans, unless the word is to be a euphemism for charity can never be a permanent solution. Interest has to be paid on that and in due course they have to be repaid. The world has tried once before to buttress the metallic system and the results do not encourage repetition of the experiment, especially as it would have to be a larger programme.

That is just what we are proposing to do under the Bretton Woods agreement.

In connection with the international stabilization of currency, I should like to show that Maynard Keynes recognizes the fact that the creditor nation has a responsibility, and he actually went so far as to say that if a creditor nation refused to accept imports its credit should be cancelled. I quote from section 3, page 10, of this pamphlet on the international stabilization of currency:

It is not contemplated that either the debit or the credit balance of an individual country ought to exceed a certain maximum—let us say, its quota. In the case of debit balances this maximum has been made a rigid one, and, indeed, counter-measures are called for long before the maximum is reached. In the case of credit balances no rigid maximum has been proposed. For the appropriate provision might be to require the eventual cancellation or compulsory investment of persistent bancor credit balances accumulating in excess of a member's quota.

I repeat that phrase: "the appropriate provision might be to require the eventual cancellation."

Just to show that that line of thought has been followed by many other people besides Keynes, I should like to quote a recommendation of the London chamber of commerce on this proposal. So that there may be no misunderstanding may I say that I have here two pamphlets, one of the report of the London chamber of commerce on "General Principles of a Post-war Economy", and the other a pamphlet entitled "A Twentieth Century Economic System," on the front page of which I read this:

> The author has decided to remain anonymous, in the hope that his fellow citizens will insist, on this occasion, on doing their own thinking, and will consider these proposals on their merits, uninfluenced by the names and reputations of the protagonists on either side.

The reason I link these two together is because on page 11, section 27, of the London chamber of commerce report, I find this:

> The chamber, having considered whether there is any system which would achieve, wholly or partially, the solution of all the above problems, generally accepts the principles laid down in "A Twentieth Century Economic System," especially in respect of blocked credits for the payment of international obligations.

I had better quote a paragraph from "A Twentieth Century Economic System" dealing with this very question. It gives an explanation of bilateral trade on page 25, and then goes on to say:

> The above is a simple example of bilateral trade, but multilateral trade could be provided for by the exchange controls of the participating nations having representatives at an international exchange where blocked credits in one country could be exchanged for those in another at the conventionally fixed exchange rates: the primary responsibility for establishing a contra account, by importing from the country to which a sale had been made, would remain with the exporting country. If it did not wish to do so that would be its affair and not that of the importing country, which would have done its part by establishing the necessary credit. The importing country would be entitled to cancel the credit, under a statute of limitations, if it were not used within seven years. The principle is that with which we are all familiar in internal trading: if you have a credit with a shop, you cannot take it out in cash but you clear it when you take goods.

A further comment regarding international exchange is shown at the bottom of the page. Perhaps I had better quote it, because several hon. members have the idea in their heads that we advocate bilateral trade. We have never advocated bilateral trade. We realize the benefits of multilateral trade; but we do feel this, that when a nation establishes a credit with another nation it should be under some obligation to see that that credit is cleared. Therefore, if we establish a credit with France, and want to buy goods from Germany, if Germany is willing to take goods from France there is no reason why we cannot take goods from Germany and Germany can take goods from France. Here is a quotation indicating how goods could be traded on an international exchange:

> The international exchange would be in no sense an international bank nor would it be the body with which all the nations would hold their debits and credits. Psychologically it is important that each nation should know in which countries it has uncancelled credits, so that it may take steps to clear those credits either by taking more imports or by restricting its exports to them. The responsibility which this scheme places squarely upon each nation to keep its own imports and exports in equilibrium, must in no circumstances be transferred to a central international clearing bank. If a central international bank were entrusted with this task instead of each nation being free to solve its own domestic problem in its own way, we should once more be back to the old condition of financial war to control a central monetary authority which, in its turn, would control the domestic affairs of so-called independent nations. In practice, such a system of central international monetary control means that whilst effective pressure cannot be put upon the strong creditor nations to take payment in goods against their wishes, great pressure can be brought to bear upon the weak debtor nations to lower their prices in an attempt to force their goods over the tariffs of creditors unwilling to receive payment in the only way open to the debtor, namely in goods.

The hon member for Rosthern interrupted when I was speaking on Saturday and tried to give the house the impression that provision was made in the Bretton Woods agreement for putting a very great deal of pressure on a creditor nation; and really, when I read his remarks in Hansard I was amazed that he would make a statement of that kind, because after all he did go to Bretton Woods, and therefore he should know what he is talking about. Where he got this statement I do not know, because it certainly is not in the Bretton Woods agreement. Let me quote what he said—I am sorry the hon. member is not in his place at the moment—as reported in Hansard, at parge 3146:

> The fundamental basis of this organization is that if a currency becomes scarce then the country whose currency has become scarce will be advised by the officials of the fund that they must take steps to enable other countries to sell their goods in the country of the scarce currency, and they would advise that country that they must be prepared to correct that fundamental unbalance of trade. The whole basis of this agreement is designed to promote understanding between countries in order to permit balanced trade and the keeping up of high standards of living in all countries.

It is all very well to say that that is the understanding; but when you use the word "must", I think one would assume there should be something definite about that in the agreement itself. I would, however, invite hon. members to note what article VII which deals with the question of scarce currencies, really says in regard to relationship with creditor countries. There is no compulsion, with the exception that they must be ready to sell their currency for gold. That is the only compulsion in the whole thing. I am quoting from article VII in order to show how far afield from reality the hon. member for Rosthern had got when he said that they must do this and they must do that:

If the fund finds that a general scarcity of a particular currency is developing, the fund may so inform members and may issue a report setting forth the causes of the scarcity and containing recommendations designed to bring it to an end.

That is the furthest they go. They issue a report containing recommendations; but for some reason or another the hon. member for Rosthern jumps to the conclusion that they must do this or they must do that. I continue to quote:

A representative of the member whose currency is involved shall participate in the preparation of the report.

Then, quoting from section 2 of the same article:

The fund may, if it deems such action appropriate to replenish its holdings of any member's currency, take either or both of the following steps:

(i) Propose to the member that, on terms and conditions agreed between the fund and the member, the latter lend its currency to the fund or that, with the approval of the member, the fund borrow such currency from some other source either within or outside the territories of the member, but—

Here is the important point:

—no member shall be under any obligation to make such loans to the fund . . .

They cannot even compel a creditor nation to lend its currency or to approve the borrowing of its currency by the fund from any other source. The only reference to compulsion is in subparagraph (ii), which states that the fund may:

. . . require the member to sell its currency to the fund for gold.

Apparently the aim of the creditor country is to get as much gold as it can; I do not think it is putting much compulsion on the creditor nation to say that it must accept gold in return for its currency. What is lacking there is that there is no provision whereby the creditor nation can assist the debtor nation by enabling it to pay in the only way it can, namely by accepting its goods and services. Under this system and under the gold standard the results are the same. When a nation has an unfavourable balance of trade, it has either to meet the unbalance of trade by gold, if it cannot get any currency by selling goods, or to accept a loan, and if it has to accept a loan, after a period of time the creditor nation will just be buying up its capital assets.

Mr. JAQUES: They have no gold.

Mr. QUELCH: If they have no gold. They would be advised to take a loan from the international bank of reconstruction and, maybe, give it security on their railroads and other capital assets. Systematically the creditor nations would be obtaining a stranglehold on the smaller countries. I would say that it is a modern form of imperialism by monetary penetration rather than by force of arms.

There is another point here. Not only does it not penalize a creditor nation, but it actually rewards the creditor nation for being such and penalizes the debtor nation for being a debtor nation still further, beyond an increase of interest rates; because if we look up the question of voting, referred to in section 5 of article XII, we find out how the votes are apportioned between the various members. I read section 5 on this point:

Voting.

(a) Each member shall have two hundred and fifty votes plus one additional vote for each part of its quota equivalent to one hundred thousand United States dollars.

(b) Whenever voting is required under article V, section 4 or 5, each member shall have the number of votes to which it is entitled under (a) above, adjusted:

(i) by the addition of one vote for the equivalent of each four hundred thousand United States dollars of net sales of its currency up to the date when the vote is taken, or

(ii) by the subtraction of one vote for the equivalent of each four hundred thousand United States dollars of its net purchases of the currencies of other members up to the date when the vote is taken.

So we find that under that section the further into debt a nation gets, the less is its voting power; the greater creditor a nation becomes, the greater the amount of loans made by a creditor nation, the greater the number of its votes becomes. Therefore, after a period of time you find a great change in the voting strength. You will find that creditor nations are gradually accumulating more and more votes and debtor nations are getting fewer and fewer; and when you think of the possibilities of the future, the amount of money which in all probability the United States, for example, will be lending, you can see that the voting power of that country will be tremendously increased. No doubt the government has given some consideration to the question I am about to put to the minister. Has the government estimated what the voting strength will likely be five years from now, when the great programme of expansion has taken place? Will he tell us what the voting strength will be when the fund starts out and what he estimates it will be four or five years from now when we have gone a long way toward helping to reestablish the devastated areas?

On Saturday we were discussing three points, and I was trying to get the minister to give me an answer to the questions I was asking him. He accused me of constantly changing the question. That may have been true. I did not have anything on paper. It was the same thing that I was in effect asking for, although I may have changed the wording. To make sure that I do not repeat that mistake, I have written down certain questions which I will read to the minister and in reply to which I will ask him for answers. He is familiar with the questions I am going to read, because in essence they are the same as those I asked on Saturday.

Does the minister agree that we should be prepared to accept imports in payment for our exports as soon as the transition period is over? Does the minister agree that in order to make this possible the government must underwrite an effective demand in Canada for our production and the production of other nations for which our own production may be exchanged? Is the minister satisfied that the final act of the Bretton Woods agreement does ensure that countries will be willing to balance their accounts with the world in terms of goods and services?

Can the minister answer those three questions before I proceed further?

Mr. ILSLEY: Will the hon. gentleman send them over?

Mr. QUELCH: Yes. In the meantime, if the minister wishes to have time to consider them, there are other questions that I should like to ask him. Perhaps I had better wait until he answers those questions.

Mr. ILSLEY: The first question the hon. gentleman asks is: Does the minister agree that we must be prepared to accept imports in payment for our exports as soon as the transition period is over? There may be conditions in which a country will desire, and in which it will be advantageous for that country, to continue to borrow money for development as well as for reconstruction purposes.

Mr. QUELCH: I say, must be willing to accept imports. If a nation wanted a loan we would be willing, but I say that we must be willing to accept imports.

Mr. ILSLEY: Must be prepared to accept imports in payment.

Mr. QUELCH: If the debtor nation needed a loan, that would let us out.

Mr. ILSLEY: Generally speaking, I think it is true that we must expect, over a long period, to accept imports in payment for our exports. That is true generally speaking, with the qualification I have mentioned.

Mr. QUELCH: Will the minister agree that in the past we have not been prepared to do that? That was not the policy from 1935 to 1939? I am speaking from memory, but I think I am right when I say that on the average we maintained a favourable balance of payments of $219,000,000 a year for five years, and yet at the same time we had half a million people unemployed, a million on relief, and industry operating only to fifty per cent of capacity. When the governor of the Bank of Canada appeared before the committee on banking and commerce, I asked Mr. Towers whether, in view of the fact that we had a favourable balance of $200,000,000 odd a year, the government would not consider issuing $200,000,000 to provide work for the people, so that the money paid out in those services would give the people money with which to buy imports that could be brought in in exchange for the credit represented by the favourable balance of payments. The reply that Mr. Towers gave at that time was that it was a matter of government policy. That is why I am not so keen about these banking committees. When you get into a committee with a bunch of experts and you ask them a question they tell you that it is a question of government policy and you do not get any answer. The only place in which you can get an answer is here from the minister. You cannot get an answer from experts because they will simply shirk the responsibility and put it on the government. This is an important point. It is fundamental, and I do not think we shall solve anything until we get down to it.

Mr. ILSLEY: For a long time we had unfavourable balances of payments—

Mr. QUELCH: Before 1935.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, and then we had these years of favourable balances of payments which helped to pay our indebtedness abroad. Now the hon. gentleman is suggesting that we should not pay off our indebtedness abroad?

Mr. QUELCH: No. If the minister will say that in future, now that we are no longer a debtor nation, we shall be prepared to balance our trade, I shall feel a great deal better about the whole thing. But at that time our production was only up to fifty per cent of capacity, and I contend that we could have expanded that production to the full extent so as to pay our debts and still increase the standard of living. Why did we maintain a production of fifty per cent of capacity when we had a debt abroad which we could have paid? We could have expanded our production and paid that debt and increased the standard of living of the people.

Mr. ILSLEY: In the first place the hon. gentleman refers to us as a creditor nation. We are not.

Mr. QUELCH: The white paper on reconstruction states that Canada will probably be a creditor nation under the Bretton Woods agreement. I am not sure of the terminology, but she aspires, or expects, or hopes to be a creditor nation under the agreement.

Mr. ILSLEY: In respect of current transactions.

Mr. QUELCH: It does not say that, does it? It says she will be a creditor nation.

Mr. ILSLEY: But we are not a creditor nation. The figures speak for themselves. The people of this country owe more to the people of other countries than the people of other countries owe to the people of this country. That can be demonstrated.

Mr. QUELCH: Could the minister give us any idea whether that would be a matter of one or two or three or four billion dollars?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I cannot.

Mr. QUELCH: It would not be above four billion dollars, would it?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know.

Mr. QUELCH: I think we owe Britain somewhere in the neighbourhood of a billion dollars. The minister will remember that when we were discussing Mutual Aid I urged that before making that gift we should repatriate our securities, and I remember that the minister was quite harsh, accusing me of being somewhat un-British. On the other hand, I understand that South Africa has abolished absentee ownership of her gold and diamond mines by repatriating her securities. Among the Canadian securities held in Britain were large holdings of C.P.R. stocks and bonds. We could have brought those back to this country; then, after we had repatriated those securities, we could have gone on and given Britain all the money she wanted. But what has happened to those securities to-day? I understand that instead of Britain owning them the United States has taken them.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, no.

Mr. QUELCH: Is that wrong? I am very glad to have that assurance, because that has been stated.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, that is not correct.

[Mr. Quelch.]

Mr. QUELCH: To what extent have these securities been so dealt with?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is a very small fraction.

Mr. QUELCH: Does that apply to all other Canadian securities as well?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, a very small fraction.

Mr. QUELCH: A small portion has been turned over to the United States?

Mr. ILSLEY: The Canadian Pacific securities that eventually moved to the United States came back to Canada and were then sold by Canada to United States purchasers, but it is a very small percentage in relation to the total. The same movement has gone on to some extent, I think, in relation to certain other securities, but the money obtained for these British securities is applied in reduction of our $700,000,000 debt, which has been substantially reduced by the sale of securities.

Mr. QUELCH: Then we have practically repatriated all the securities held in Britain?

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, in that sense. There are some purchases of those securities by Canadians, and the money the British get for the securities is used to reduce the debt which Great Britain owes to Canada; but then Canadians sometimes sell these securities in the United States.

Mr. QUELCH: Then our main debt to-day is to the United States?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that is right.

Mr. QUELCH: Then did the minister think it the part of wisdom on our part to keep expanding that debt all during the war? I understand that every time there is a victory loan the United States buys bonds in this country. The minister has always emphasized the fact that the purpose of a victory loan is to curtail spending. Surely when the United States buys victory bonds it does not reduce the amount of money in circulation. Actually more money comes into existence and defeats the very thing you are trying to accomplish.

Mr. ILSLEY: We do not encourage those purchases.

Mr. QUELCH: But you do not prohibit them?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. QUELCH: Can you not prohibit them?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, we cannot. I cannot give the complete list of reasons, but we have discussed them time after time and decided it would do more harm than good to impose a prohibition on the movement of Canadian securities to the United States.

Mr. QUELCH: At the same time I think the minister will agree that it is not to the benefit of Canada to have that take place.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, it is not in the interests of Canada. If the hon. gentleman were to ask me why it is not in the interests of Canada the only reason I could give would be financial rather than economic. That is, we lose the interest when Americans buy Canadian securities. Canada is liable to the holder or holders of the securities for the interest payments on them. The money we obtain for the securities is United States exchange which we add to the holdings of the foreign exchange control board, which are dead; that is, they earn no interest. Therefore there is a loss of interest to the extent that these securities go to the United States; otherwise I do no see that there is any disadvantage. We have the United States exchange and they have our bonds, that is all. We have an equivalent asset for the asset with which we part. We discourage it, as I say, for that financial reason alone, as far as I know; and if it reaches high dimensions there is that current loss of interest.

Mr. QUELCH: Then to come back to the original point, before the war why did we allow our production to run at only fifty per cent of capacity when we had foreign debt to pay off? We maintain a favourable balance of trade, you say, mainly to pay off our indebtedness; at the same time we had quite a low standard of living in this country, with a million people on relief. Surely with a foreign debt there would have been every justification for raising the standard of living in this country and expanding our production so that we could have paid off the debt and at the same time raised the standard of living of the people.

Mr. ILSLEY: That statement assumes that a government can expand its production just by some easy method. It may be that governments were wrong before the war, but I think the argument is fairly good for the position that the mere distribution of money to the people does not necessarily set all the people to work.

Mr. QUELCH: But you will remember that as soon as war was declared you borrowed $200,000,000 from the chartered banks in order to increase employment or to do certain things in connection with the war, and that did increase the demand for goods. Supposing before the war you had borrowed $200,000,000 from the chartered banks—not from the people, because that would merely have withdrawn money from circulation—it would have meant an expansion of money. Then supposing that money had been used for national projects; what would have happened? The money paid out for national projects would have been distributed among the people, and would have stimulated a demand for goods. Is it not logical to suggest that just as soon as you expanded the demand for goods through those national projects, industry would have started to employ more men to produce more goods? Certainly that happened in war time and I think it would happen in peace time.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is just a matter of opinion; it is not self-evident. I know all through the years the Social Credit party have argued that this would have happened in time of peace, but in time of peace you have a different set of conditions from those that exist in time of war. In time of war you have a unified national purpose, and it does not deter industrial or agricultural activity at all for the government to spend large sums of money, put up taxes, increase the credit and to some extent inflate, because there has been some degree of inflation during the war. That does not alarm or retard investment and enterprise. But when you do not have that set of conditions that may not be the result. Therefore you have various schools of thought as to the best means to adopt to get all your people working with fair incomes. The C.C.F. has one view. They think it is a matter of the government taking over at least quite a lot of the big business of the country, that if you take it out of private hands you are more likely to get full employment. The Social Credit party I think believe that the application of the monetary remedy is sufficient of itself.

Those are the questions, and they are questions as to which there is a great difference of opinion. I do not think this is the proper occasion for us to get into a debate, which can be very far-reaching, as to what is the best programme to adopt to keep all your people gainfully employed. Certainly we have not been silent in the last twelve months as to the means we are seeking to adopt or aiming to adopt. They are set out in the white paper on reconstruction on "Employment and Income," and they were fully publicized during the election campaign, and in speeches since that time. We would propose to do it by a variety of steps, not by one alone.

I think that fact has a bearing on the second question asked: Does the minister agree that in order to make this possible the government must underwrite an effective demand in Canada for our production, and the production of other nations for which our own goods may be exchanged? If I understand that question correctly it is predicated upon the assumption that by simply placing in the hands of the people of the country enough money, or seeing that they get—

Mr. QUELCH: Not necessarily.

Mr. ILSLEY: —enough money, either from private spenders or ourselves, that will achieve the result which is desired, or that that will keep our production up and keep markets for our production. Well, I do not want to give an answer to that question, which is based upon the assumption that the monetary exchange is the only remedy. What the hon. member is seeking is some policy which will keep all our people gainfully employed, or properly employed.

Mr. QUELCH: I do not mention financial matters at all. I just asked what the government's policy is, for example, in regard to controls, and any other things necessary to maintain an effective demand.

Mr. ILSLEY: The suggestion is that the government must underwrite an effective demand in Canada for production. I do not know that I just admit the repsonsibility for underwriting. It is not a very definite term. We have repeatedly admitted responsibility for using every method within our power to maintain a stable level of employment, sometimes referred to as full employment. That has been set out in our white paper on reconstruction and employment, and otherwise in the ways I have mentioned.

Mr. QUELCH: If I used the word "responsibility" rather than "underwriting", would the minister be willing to agree?—"accept the responsibility for maintaining"? That is, he would accept the responsibility for maintaining an effective demand, rather than pass that responsibility on to the provinces, or to some private enterprises.

Mr. ILSLEY: There may be a division of responsibility between the dominion and the provinces. The provinces may wish to assume and to undertake certain portions of responsibility. But I would be reluctant to assent to language which I do not fully understand. I would rather refer my hon. friend to what we have said in the document to which I have referred, namely our white paper on employment and income.

At page 23 thereof we say:

> The government has stated unequivocally its adoption of a high and stable level of employment and income, and thereby higher standards of living, as a major aim of government policy.

And again, at page 7:

> The government has pressed and is continuing to press actively for a wide collaboration in the reciprocal reduction and removal of trade barriers, especially trade barriers of an arbitrary and discriminatory type.

And a little later:

> Having regard to the widespread character of our trade, the government attaches special importance also to the reconstitution of multilateral trade on a firm basis and arrangements under which the proceeds of our exports may be spent wherever we desire to obtain our imports.

And at page 9:

> In the view of the government, appropriate terms for repayment of these credits would recognize unequivocally the dependence of such international debt payments on the expansion of world trade and ample markets for the exports by which credits must be repaid.

Then the third question: Is the minister satisfied that the final act of the Bretton Woods agreement does ensure that countries will be willing to balance their accounts with the world, in terms of goods and services? I do not suppose it does absolutely ensure it. I do not think that anyone ever contended that it does ensure it. But it encourages that development.

Mr. QUELCH: Does it even encourage it?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I believe so.

Mr. QUELCH: What pressure is exercised on a creditor nation to do it? There is pressure on a debtor nation; but I cannot find any on a creditor nation.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member read sections 1 and 2 of article VII. But the effective provision with respect to scarce currency is—

Mr. QUELCH: It gets worse as you get down there.

Mr. ILSLEY: It states:

> (a) If it becomes evident to the fund that the demand for a member's currency seriously threatens the fund's ability to supply that currency, the fund, whether or not it has issued a report under section 1 of this article, shall formally declare such currency scarce, and shall thenceforth apportion its existing and accruing supply of the scarce currency with due regard to the relative needs of members, the general international economic situation and any other pertinent considerations. The fund shall also issue a report concerning its action.
> (b) A formal declaration under (a) above shall operate as an authorization to any member, after consultation with the fund, temporarily to impose limitations on the freedom of exchange operations in the scarce currency.

In other words, the authority which is given to the country in need of a scarce currency, after consultation with the fund, to impose limitations on the freedom of exchange operations in that currency, operates as a pressure on the creditor nation. Then:

> Subject to the provisions of article IV, sections 3 and 4, the member shall have complete jurisdiction in determining the nature of such limitations, but they shall be no more restrictive than is necessary to limit the demand for the scarce currency to the supply held by, or accruing to, the member in question; and they shall be relaxed and removed as rapidly as conditions permit.

That sentence, while protective of the creditor nation, is not unreasonably so.

Mr. QUELCH: Actually what would happen would be that the debtor nation would impose restrictions so that they would lower their standard to the extent that they no longer brought such imports in, and the creditor nation that had been exporting such goods would probably have more unemployment and conditions would get worse. Unless the creditor nation were prepared to change their policy to one of expansion; unless they were willing to develop an expansionist policy internally, why do they have to wait until currency is scarce before they do that?

We might as well face the fact that the greatest menace in the world to-day is the policy of the United States in trying to export its unemployment problem upon the world. I cannot see that this will help the situation. It would just mean that the exports from the United States would be reduced, while the standard of living would be reduced in the debtor nations. If the exports were reduced, then the United States would have that much more unemployment.

Mr. ILSLEY: The basis on which the United States comes into this arrangement is the desirability of avoiding import and exchange restrictions by other nations, the blocking of currencies and so on by other nations. If that looms up and is authorized under this provision the United States will try to avoid it. The hon. gentleman is suggesting some compulsory provision in the fund—

Mr. QUELCH: Acceptance of imports.

Mr. ILSLEY: —which will operate against a country. I think that would be quite an interference with sovereignty. There is no compulsory—

Mr. QUELCH: I merely suggest a business transaction. When we establish a credit in another country by selling it goods we have a definite responsibility to accept goods in payment, or at least to provide that if we take goods from another country that country will utilize the credit which we have established in the former country. Surely it is not a question of sovereignty; it is a question of fair and square dealing. I would point out that the provision which the minister has read would not operate if a creditor nation sold unlimited sums of its currency for gold. Then the debtor countries could obtain the currency which the creditor country sold, and they would still be going steadily further into debt. By the creditor countries selling their currency for gold the debtor countries would obtain currency from the fund, but they would go further into debt. I do not understand why anybody would advocate that. Keynes recognized the danger and so did the London chamber of commerce. I think we all recognize the danger of the creditor nation not being under obligation to accept payment in goods. I cannot understand why that provision is not in the Bretton Woods agreement, whilst it was not in the Morgenthau plan, the Keynes plan or the Canadian plan. I am speaking from memory; I believe they provided for a slight tax upon the creditor nation. Under this plan there is absolutely no pressure on the creditor nation apart from the two sections which the minister read, and that is a slight pressure.

There are one or two points with which I should like the minister to deal. I think he will realize that it is something that should be dealt with.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I must draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that his time expired some time ago. He cannot continue unless he has the unanimous consent of the committee.

Mr. QUELCH: I am satisfied that if the Chairman read Hansard he would find that I have not spoken for anything like forty minutes. There were many interruptions. I was asked a number of questions. The minister will be speaking next, and I wish to ask him one or two questions to which I should like some answers. I know that very few members in the house know what this is all about. I will admit that I myself have only a hazy idea of just how this is going to operate. As far as I understand it, normal trade will be carried on without utilizing the fund at all. The fund comes into the picture only when a nation has an unfavourable balance of trade. Let us suppose that the fund has opened its doors for business. What is the immediate effect upon Canada? In the first instance do we immediately have to establish a gold backing for our money? Before the war we had a twenty-five per cent gold reserve. Is that reestablished immediately, or shall we carry on the way it was?

Mr. ILSLEY: Just carry on.

Mr. QUELCH: What will be the procedure if a nation has an unfavourable balance of trade? Will the transaction be carried on between the central bank and the fund? Would the minister explain what takes place.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman seems to be talking about some transaction between our central bank and the fund.

Mr. QUELCH: The central bank of any nation which has an unfavourable balance of trade. If a nation should not have a central bank there will have to be some authority to deal with that situation. I should like to know how that operation is dealt with. The Bretton Woods agreement states that it will be done through the central bank or some other organization.

Mr. ILSLEY: That country buys from the fund the currency which it needs. If it desires currency to pay for goods and cannot get it otherwise it buys it.

Mr. QUELCH: As I understand it, it issues a cheque to the fund; a cheque will be issued against its own central bank. Suppose Canada was a debtor nation; the Bank of Canada would issue a cheque to cover its unfavourable balance of trade and deposit with the fund.

Mr. ILSLEY: A debtor nation.

Mr. QUELCH: Suppose Canada was a debtor nation.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. QUELCH: And we had an unfavourable balance of trade of $100,000,000, or an unfavourable balance of payment. We would issue a cheque on the Bank of Canada and deposit it with the fund; is that the procedure?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is oversimplified.

Mr. QUELCH: If we needed the currency of a particular country to pay for imports from that country we would issue a cheque? That is how we would do it, is it not? We would not take a bunch of dollar bills and pay them over. We would issue a cheque on the Bank of Canada, and that cheque would be deposited in behalf of Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. QUELCH: We would not have to send currency. I think all members are interested in this point. We would look like a bunch of nitwits if we went back to our constituencies and were asked to explain this agreement and could not tell them how it works. Let us proceed and examine section 8 of article V. May I use Canada as an example. I do not for one minute ever expect Canada to be in this position; but suppose Canada got further and further into debt and subsections 1, 2 and 3 were applied. Then finally section (d) was applied and the rates of interest were increased to four per cent. It goes on to say:

> The fund and the member shall consider means by which the fund's holdings of the currency can be reduced.

In all probability what would be the means?

Mr. ILSLEY: To what section is the hon. member referring?

Mr. QUELCH: It is found on page 36, and reads as follows:

> Whenever the fund's holdings of any member's currency are such that the charge applicable to any bracket for any period has reached the rate of four per cent per annum, the fund and the member shall consider means by which the fund's holdings of the currency can be reduced.

Would the minister consider the most likely recommendations to be a reduction in the price level; that is, would it be a deflationary policy in order that the creditor nations would be more likely to buy their goods.

Mr. ILSLEY: I could not give an exhaustive list of means. I should think that a depreciation of their currency might be one. That would encourage their exports, discourage imports and help their exchange position.

Mr. QUELCH: The minister thinks that would be employed rather than a deflationary policy.

Mr. ILSLEY: A deflationary policy would work the other way, would it not?

Mr. QUELCH: No; if the price level were reduced internally it would be apt to encourage other nations to buy those goods which would offset the unfavourable balance of trade.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know.

Mr. QUELCH: Theoretically it should. I admit creditor nations might set up tariff walls to make sure our goods did not come in. I should now like to go a step farther. What happens if that does not work out, and I think it would not. The section goes on to say:

> Thereafter, the charges shall rise in accordance with provisions of (c) above until they reach five per cent and failing agreement, the fund may then impose such charges as it deems appropriate.

I think that is a most vicious section. I cannot understand a section like that being in the agreement. Imagine anybody signing an agreement that if they could not meet a certain obligation in a certain period of time, then the creditor can charge any rate of interest he likes. If I read it rightly, that is what it means.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is to prevent an indefinite use of this fund by a country for financing purposes; that is all.

Mr. QUELCH: Surely the logical way would be to say to the creditor nation, here is a nation which has a surplus of goods. It is prepared to pay you in goods. It is up to you to accept payment in goods. Surely that would be the logical thing to say. It would be a different thing if that nation were buying more than it could pay for. That would be one thing; but supposing it were a nation which had the goods to pay, but which the creditor nations would not buy, and that may easily happen; under an ordinary multilateral system that is apt to happen. Let us say that England bought one million dollars worth of goods from us under it. We might turn around and use that money to buy from the United States. Who is going to buy from England? There is no guarantee at all in a multilateral system of this kind that there will be a fair distribution of the credits. Some countries may be left out entirely unless there is a definite obligation on us that a creditor nation clears the credit with the debtor nation. I find no obligation in this agreement to that effect. I cannot find any obligation in this act.

Mr. ILSLEY: Would the hon. gentleman not be tying up a trade agreement with a currency agreement if he did that If we had some provision here by which a nation agreed that it would take a certain quantity of goods, would that be an appropriate provision in a currency agreement? This agreement states repeatedly that it is not complete, that it is only a part of the picture. It is to facilitate trade. I just want to make that clear, because it seems to me that a lot of the discussion is based on the assumption that this is designed to be a cure-all It is not that at all. One of the resolutions passed by this united nations monetary and financial conference, to be found in article VII of the Final Act contains this:

Whereas, in article I of the articles of agreement of the international monetary fund it is stated that one of the principal purposes of the fund is to facilitate the expansion and balanced growth of international trade, and to contribute thereby to the promotion and maintenance of high levels of employment and real income and to the development of the productive resources of all members as primary objectives of economic policy;

Whereas, it is recognized that the complete attainment of this and other purposes and objectives stated in the agreement cannot be achieved through the instrumentality of the fund alone;

Therefore the united nations monetary and financial conference recommends:

To the participating governments that, in addition to implementing the specific monetary and financial measures which were the subject of this conference, they seek, with a view to creating in the field of international economic relations conditions necessary for the attainment of the purposes of the fund and of the broader primary objectives of economic policy, to reach agreement as soon as possible on ways and means whereby they may best:

(1) reduce obstacles to international trade and in other ways promote mutually advantageous international commercial relations;

(2) bring about the orderly marketing of staple commodities at prices fair to the producer and consumer alike;

(3) deal with the special problems of international concern which will arise from the cessation of production for war purposes; and

(4) facilitate by cooperative effort the harmonization of national policies of member states designed to promote and maintain high levels of employment and progressively rising standards of living.

My hon. friend may say that there are no teeth in that, and there are not; and to the extent that you do have teeth in these provisions you do deprive member nations of their sovereignty. But I can think of some imports into Canada that certain members of the hon. gentleman's own group would not let us bring in if they could avoid it, and if we started forcing other nations against their will there would be a terrible rumpus in this house of the ground of the destruction of local agricultural effort. You can only go so far in forcing nations to do these things. This is a statement of principle and an undertaking on the part of the member countries not to rush into this competitive depreciation of currencies and so forth that had such bad results in former times. I think we are bound to try to organize the world so as to avoid as much of that as possible.

I am sorry that I have not been able to get alarmed at anything that my hon. friends in their speeches have outlined as bad consequences likely to follow from this agreement. All I can get out of it is that it is not perfect, that it may not do the whole job. But what harm it is going to do anywhere, I do not know.

Mr. QUELCH: You try to stabilize currencies; and you try to prevent nations from imposing restrictions. In other words, you remove their defences from them against the very thing that made it necessary for them to impose those restrictions. That is what the London chamber of commerce charges. It says:

It is the gravamen of the chamber of commerce criticism that the international monetary fund does in fact seek to deprive the nations of their defences whilst failing to remove the perils which called them into use.

That is exactly what you are doing. If we are to say to a nation that she cannot devaluate her currency in the future, we should make sure that it is not going to be necessary. The only reason for it is to balance their trade in the long run.

Mr. ILSLEY: The perils the hon. gentleman mentions are to be removed by trade agreements rather than by this, are they not?

Mr. BLACKMORE: What guarantee have we that they will be?

Mr. ILSLEY: We have not any guarantee.

Mr. QUELCH: If the fund is going to act as referee to see that every nation that establishes a credit for another nation will have it cleared, I would be assured.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. QUELCH: Then are you not placing nations in an impossible position where they will be forced into debt and then have these excessive charges applied against them? Remember, this fund is apparently a law unto itself, immune from all action. Just to whom exactly is it responsible? If a nation feels that it is not getting a square deal, to whom can it appeal?

Mr. ILSLEY: It can withdraw.

Mr. QUELCH: Then article XI applies. Let me read article XI:

Each member undertakes:

(i) Not to engage in, nor to permit any of its fiscal agencies referred to in article V, section 1, to engage in, any transactions with a non-member or with persons in a non-member's territories which would be contrary to the provisions of this agreement or the purposes of the fund;

(ii) Not to cooperate with a non-member or with persons in a non-member's territories in practices which would be contrary to the provisions of this agreement or the purposes of the fund; and

(iii) To cooperate with the fund with a view to the application in its territories of appropriate measures to prevent transactions with non-members or with persons in their territories which would be contrary to the provisions of this agreement or the purposes of the fund.

I think we all realize that Great Britain is going to be in a most difficult position. Suppose they are not able to meet their obligations and in order to defend themselves they devaluate sterling beyond the limits allowed and as a result have to withdraw from the fund. Then under this agreement the rest of the dominions have, to all intents and purposes boycott Great Britain, as they cannot participate in business with any country contrary to the fund. The other nations would not be able to enter into transactions with her. If the British pound were devaluated, beyond the limits allowed, then for a nation to do business with her would be contrary to the laws of the fund.

Mr. ILSLEY: If it were contrary to the provisions of the agreement.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There is no telling what the stipulations of the fund are.

Mr. QUELCH: To whom can they appeal if they feel that the decision is not fair?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. QUELCH: I am not making a speech, Mr. Chairman; I am asking questions.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): It is not in order for an hon. member to take the length of time that the hon. gentleman has taken.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that you read the first part of standing order 58. It would be good for you to read that. That gives an individual an opportunity to speak as often as he wishes in this committee; and the hon. member has been asking questions of the Minister of Finance, and has had those questions answered. There stands the rule; it is the greatest safeguard of democracy and freedom in parliament, and if that rule is broken we are on the way to the destruction of democracy.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I wish to read another rule. Paragraph 306 of Beauchesne states:

It is not in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or communications emanating from persons outside the house and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the house.

Mr. QUELCH: Have I done that? I have not read one document covered by that section. The documents I have been reading have emanated from the house itself, Hansard, the reconstruction committee—

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. member is completely in order.

Mr. QUELCH: As for suggesting that I have spoken for forty minutes, I have not spoken for five minutes at a stretch. I have said a few words for two or three minutes and asked questions of the minister, and he has replied. However, if that is your ruling, Mr. Chairman—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The hon. member will agree that he has been occupying the floor for almost an hour and a quarter.

Mr. QUELCH: I have not been on the floor for anywhere near an hour and a quarter. However, if that is the ruling, the hon. member for Lethbridge can take the floor. I want to stop now. I am only asking questions, and I can put through this series of questions in about a quarter of an hour.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The hon. gentleman can ask a question.

Mr. QUELCH: My question is: if a disagreement occurs between a debtor nation and a creditor nation on account of section 8 of article V, to whom can that nation appeal?

Mr. LESAGE: You will get your answers in the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. QUELCH: That is just where we will not get them. I have been in the banking and commerce committee probably more than the hon. member has, and I know what the answers are in these committees. The minister is probably the one man, on behalf of the government, who can speak with authority. The experts will be just giving their opinion; there will be no backing behind it. I have a good deal of confidence in the minister; I would far rather have his word than that of any departmental official. I should like to refer him to article IX, page 28, which states:

Section 1. Purposes of article
To enable the fund to fulfil the functions with which it is entrusted, the status, immunities and privileges set forth in this article shall be accorded to the fund in the territories of each member.

Going to section 3:

The fund, its property and its assets, wherever located and by whomsoever held, shall enjoy immunity from every form of judicial process except to the extent that it expressly waives its immunity for the purpose of any proceedings or by the terms of any contract.

In other words, this fund is a law above all the governments of the world. Is that not right or am I exaggerating?

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is above the united nations charter.

Mr. QUELCH: What is the relationship between this fund and the united nations charter? Is it under the authority of the security council? Is it not a law unto itself? Is it subject to the decisions of the international court of justice? It seems to be above all law. Here we are setting up an organization which is a law to itself, above every other government in the world, and above every court. It is immune to action in any court. It is an absolute and complete dictatorship. Yet hon. members are suggesting that we should endorse a principle of that kind.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is no more so than any other agreement between nations. There is an authority set up here to decide on a dispute between a member and the fund; that is, the governing authority of the fund itself. When we make an agreement with the United States of America—

Mr. QUELCH: Yes, but you can rescind that type of agreement. Here is something which, when one nation rescinds the agreement, the rest of the members are obliged to apply a kind of boycott against it.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, no, not a boycott at all. The members who stay in the fund must not use a non-member as a means of defeating the purposes of the fund; that is all. That does not mean a boycott against them.

Mr. QUELCH: Just explain what it means, then, because the provisions are pretty stringent, and there has been a great deal of objection to article XI. What is the purpose of putting it in there? Just let me read the views of certain authorities in Britain who consider that this agreement may affect them adversely. Again I quote from a man who the minister will admit is quite an authority—Sir Charles Morgan-Webb. He has this to say:

Britain need have no fear for the revival of her export industries if the entanglement of Bretton Woods can be avoided, and if her overseas pounds sterling are kept off a gold basis. As long as they are redeemable in goods, they provide an expansive currency capable of meeting all the requirements of an expanding world trade. But if they are made redeemable in gold they become a deadweight deflationary burden that can never be redeemed. The linking of the war debts of the first world war to the capricious medium of gold inevitably made them unpayable. The linking of the present overseas cash debts owing by Britain to gold, as proposed at Bretton Woods, will transform them from an obligation to redeem them in exports into an unpayable obligation to redeem them in gold. As they stand, they are payable in British exports. Transformed into gold obligations, they will fulfil the expectations of American high finance, and drive Britain into default.

As soon as Britain got into a position where she had exceeded her quota by 200 per cent, the only way this scarce currency could be obtained would be for gold, and Britain would be forced still further into debt. A man of this writer's standing would not make such a statement as I have quoted without ample justification.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not asking for this; but if speeches have to go on, I should like to have someone point out the disadvantage of this to Canada, instead of to some other country, all the time. The case of a country in a different situation from Canada is being argued all this time.

Mr. QUELCH: We will take that up in a minute.

Mr. ILSLEY: Let the hon. member not get excited. My hon. friend is quoting British authorities all the time who want Britain to be in a position to discriminate, and to discriminate against Canada, in favour of the sterling bloc, and so my hon. friends are supporting it. We are trying to get a different kind of world—trading world and monetary world—from the kind of world in which these authorities which my hon. friends are supporting believe. It is true that perhaps our interests in these matters may run a little more parallel to the United States than they do to Great Britain. But after all, this is Canada; this is not Great Britain.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. QUELCH: I think the minister will be sorry for this statement when he reads it later on. Personally I do not want to take any part in helping to liquidate the British empire.

Mr. ILSLEY: Neither do I.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is exactly what you are doing.

Mr. QUELCH: The Bretton Woods agreement is definitely the first step to doing it.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is designed to destroy it.

Mr. QUELCH: The minister says, why do I not talk about the advantages to Canada? I will make it quite plain—and I am sure this statement will please the minister—that in so far as Canada is concerned I do not think the Bretton Woods agreement will do it any harm. I have studied carefully, shall I say, tried to find some place where it might be detrimental to Canada, but I do not think the Bretton Woods agreement will in itself be detrimental to the Canadian economy. Apart from the fact that we are supposed to be keen on maintaining peace in the world. We have sacrificed thousands of lives to secure peace; we have endorsed the united nations charter; we have signed a political agreement for peace. Well, I do not think it would be advantageous for Canada to sign an economic agreement which may stir up international friction and lead to another war. After all, the greatest benefit to Canada will be to help build up an economy in the world which will maintain peace. To that extent Bretton Woods will be detrimental to Canada along with the other nations of the world, in that it is bound to lead to international friction, which is one of the root causes of war.

Mr. ILSLEY: If you do not have something like this, the kind of trading practices you are going to get between countries are the kind which Germany had—the Schacht practices. That is what you will get; and a lot of these authorities in England who are opposed to Bretton Woods want just that.

Mr. JAQUES: No, they do not.

Mr. ILSLEY: They want that. And let it be borne in mind that in speaking thus I am not attacking Great Britain or the majority in Great Britain; I am attacking a group there. I believe that the larger group are in favour of the Bretton Woods agreement, because they believe in multilateral trade practices instead of bilateral, and they believe that they are more likely to have peace under multilateral practices than under bilateral ones.

Mr. QUELCH: Have I said one word in favour of bilateral trading? I have criticized bilateral trading and advocated multilateral, but I have been advocating that form of multilateral trading whereby all nations will be obligated to clear their credits. Does the minister suggest that the proposals endorsed by the London chamber of commerce are bilateral? I have tried hard, and Senator McGeer has tried hard, to get an expression of opinion from the deputy minister regarding these proposals. We have tried to get an analysis of them.

Mr. ILSLEY: The London chamber of commerce proposals?

Mr. QUELCH: The twentieth century system is endorsed by the London chamber of commerce and the proposals will be found in the booklet entitled the "Twentieth Century System." Senator McGeer gave the deputy minister a copy of it and asked him for a report on the book. I do not know whether he got one, but I have never got one. Will the minister tell us what his criticism of the twentieth century system is? Why is he opposed to it? That system is multilateral; it is divorced from gold, and it places the responsibility fairly and squarely on the creditor nation to clear its credits by taking goods or trading credit to another country that will take the goods of the debtor nation.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know what the proposals of the London chamber of commerce are; I am not in a position to discuss them. Is it not significant, however, that the British government has not advocated or suggested them, that the United States government has not advocated them, nor has any other government that anyone has ever heard of advocated them? What possible good would there be in the dominion starting out with some twentieth century plan or chamber of commerce proposals and endeavouring to convert forty or fifty nations of the world to those proposals? Where would we get? Could we waste our time more flagrantly than by trying to do that? Why not adopt something that has some chance of succeeding?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Certainly not Bretton Woods.

Mr. QUELCH: The minister knows why Britain has not advocated such a system as is outlined in twentieth century. He knows why Britain has accepted the Bretton Woods agreement. The last time I spoke I quoted Ernest Bevin who was critical of Bretton Woods, but in order to get certain benefits from the United States, the British apparently have given in on Bretton Woods, partly for the cancellation of war debts, and partly to get the money which they require. That is the price they are paying for these benefits. The price is their coming in under the Bretton Woods agreement. Maynard Keynes, in his book "International Stabilization of Currency," makes it clear that he is not keen about the idea of gold entering into the scheme, but he points out that it would no doubt be impossible to get the United States to agree to any programme that did not bring gold into the picture. He makes that clear. He points out that nations are agreeing because of the insistence of the United States. Appeasement in the past has always failed. We got ourselves in a mess from 1935 on as a result of trying to appease others. We shall get nowhere now, I suggest, by trying to appease the United States at this time. In doing so we are only laying up trouble for ourselves in the future, and I am quite satisfied that the result is bound to be international friction. The minister asks me, will it be detrimental to Canada? I say, so far as our trading is concerned, no; but so far as helping to destroy peace in the world, I say definitely yes. I would remind the minister that these experts and international financiers, in whom apparently he has such faith, have been harsh taskmasters in the past. I have here a copy of what occurred. I do not think I need to read from it, but I would remind the minister what happened when the Niemeyer mission went to Australia in 1939. This shows the kind of treatment a nation gets when it places itself in the position outlined by section eight of article V. This is the treatment it will get from Otto Niemeyer. Perhaps it is just as well for me to put this on the record. Hon. members will find it written in a book, by J. T. Lang, leader of the Labour party in New South Wales. The book is entitled "Why I Fight":

> The mission consisted of Sir Otto Niemeyer, a representative of the bank who had acted in the similar capacity of official assignee in the case of many European countries; Professor T. E. Gregory, of the London school of economics and Mr. R. N. Kershaw, former Australian Rhodes scholar, designated as "liaison officer".

Then I quote.

> Extracts from Sir Otto's address make interesting reading after an interval of four years; "It is a serious problem," he said, "the practical solution of which is not rendered any easier by the natural optimism of the Australian. So long as it is generally believed in Australia that there is an unlimited market abroad for Australian goods, and that something will turn up, it will be difficult to face the realities of the position."

Australia had an unfavourable balance of trade. Sir Otto points out that they had a surplus of goods, but they are in difficulties not because of scarcity of goods, but because they could not get creditor nations to take those goods. This committee, the Niemeyer mission, met with the premiers of the various states of Australia and this is what happened:

> Submissively the premiers carried a series of resolutions at the dictation of Sir Otto, declaring:
> (a) their fixed determination to balance their respective budgets for the financial year 1930-31—

I had said 1939.

> —and to maintain a similar balanced budget in future years;
>
> (b) that no further overseas loans would be raised until current short-term indebtedness was dealt with;
>
> (c) that future loans will be for reproductive works only.
> These were the steps which the mission assured the conference were essential to "place Australia on the road to prosperity". Time has surely proven them to be steps of the treadmill.

That is the kind of difficulty you get into when you put yourself under the dictatorship of a certain kind of authority. I should like an answer from the minister as to what recourse nations will have from action by the stabilization fund. Surely the stabilization fund is not a superior law above every government in the world. Does the minister suggest to the house that he accepts the idea of the stabilization fund as constituting a supergovernment above the united nations charter, above the security council, above the international court of justice?

Mr. ILSLEY: Article XVIII is the one to which the hon. gentleman probably refers. It will be found on page 36:

> Any question of interpretation of the provisions of this agreement arising between any member of the fund or between any members of the fund shall be submitted to the executive directors for their decision. If the question particularly affects any member not entitled to appoint an executive director it shall be entitled to representation in accordance with article XI, section 3 (j).

(b) In any case where the executive directors have given a decision under (a) above, any member may require that the question be referred to the board of governors, whose decision shall be final. Pending the result of the reference to the board the fund may, so far as it deems necessary, act on the basis of the decision of the executive directors.

(c) Whenever a disagreement arises between the fund and a member which has withdrawn, or between the fund and any member during the liquidation of the fund, such disagreement shall be submitted to arbitration by a tribunal of three arbitrators, one appointed by the fund, another by the member or withdrawing member and an umpire who, unless the parties otherwise agree, shall be appointed by the president of the permanent court of international justice or such other authority as may have been prescribed by regulation adopted by the fund. The umpire shall have full power to settle all questions of procedure in any case where the parties are in disagreement with respect thereto.

From that I gather that in the normal course matters of disagreement would be settled by the executive directors or the board of governors, and that if a member felt it was unjustly treated it might withdraw from the fund. But the members have the right to representation; they participate in the selection of this board, and it must not be thought that these executive directors and the board are some authority outside the membership of the fund at all. They are acting for the membership of the fund, and to me there would seem to be nothing unsatisfactory in that respect. When you make agreements with other countries you assume that those other countries will carry them out.

Mr. QUELCH: If possible.

Mr. ILSLEY: You do not go to law about it if they do not, because there is no way to go to law. They usually do carry them out; in fact I cannot remember instances where they have not. There have been disputes from time to time, but usually they are settled by discussion. Here they are settled by the executive directors or by the board of governors of the fund.

Mr. QUELCH: Is this one of the special agencies referred to in the united nations charter?

Mr. COLDWELL: It may become so, but it is not as yet. Is that not right?

Mr. QUELCH: That is what I wanted the minister to answer, as to whether it may be one.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. QUELCH: If it may become one, does it then become subject to the regulations of the united nations charter?

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot answer that.

Mr. QUELCH: I think it is quite obvious that it cannot become one, due to the fact that it is practically a law unto itself. How could it possibly come under the united nations charter when you have article IX, which gives immunities and privileges as follows:

To enable the fund to fulfil the functions with which it is entrusted, the status, immunities and privileges set forth in this article shall be accorded to the fund in the territories of each member.

The fund shall possess full juridical personality, and, in particular, the capacity:

(i) to contract;

(ii) to acquire and dispose of immovable and movable property;

(iii) to institute legal proceedings.

Mind you the fund can institute legal proceedings against anyone, but no one can institute legal proceedings against the fund. It is immune from all legal action.

The fund, its property and its assets, wherever located and by whomsoever held, shall enjoy immunity from every form of judicial process except to the extent that it expressly waives its immunity for the purpose of any proceedings or by the terms of any contract.

Property and assets of the fund, wherever located and by whomsoever held, shall be immune from search, requisition, confiscation, expropriation or any other form of seizure by executive or legislative action.

The archives of the fund shall be inviolable.

To the extent necessary to carry out the operations provided for in this agreement, all property and assets of the fund shall be free from restrictions, regulations, controls and moratoria of any nature.

It is to be free of all regulation and restriction within any country in the world; yet we are seriously giving consideration to setting up a body which is to be above all laws and all governments and apparently even above the international court of justice. The only provision is that arbitration may be carried out by a member of the fund, the fund itself and a third person appointed by the court of international justice, but no legal action can be taken against the fund. Surely in view of the fact that we are setting up an international court of justice a nation should have the right to take legal action against the fund before that international court. Does the minister not agree that there should be some possibility of action in that regard, and that a nation should be allowed to take legal proceedings against the fund? In recent years we have been very bitter in denouncing dictatorships and totalitarian states; but those were only the dictators of nations. We are now proposing to set up a dictator of the whole world. Then, when I raise a protest in this house and say that this is one way of liquidating the British empire, the minister suggests that I am reading quotations from British authorities.

An hon. MEMBER: No; you are obstructing.

Mr. QUELCH: Well, the Liberal party are quite expert at obstructionist tactics. I think we should page the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, who talked out resolution after resolution on private members' days. So let not any hon. member on that side begin to talk about obstructionist tactics, because they are experts at that job and I have never indulged in that sort of thing.

I suggest to the minister that in the dying days of the session it is not fair to send a bill of this kind to the banking and commerce committee, on which they will have their experts, while it will be impossible for us to call experts whom we should like to have present the other side of the picture. I know two or three men I should like to call, but I also know very well there will not be time for that to be done. Then, what right has the government to say, "You can have a free discussion in the banking and commerce committee," when they know very well that just one side of the story will be told? Does the minister consider that British justice? Is that giving hon. members a fair opportunity to hear both sides of the question? Many hon. members even object to our trying to give the house what we consider to be the true picture of this measure.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And how can the minister possibly consider that he is being fair to the members of this house in asking them to vote on the principle of this resolution on second reading, when the resolution contains so many dangerous stipulations and is obviously just bristling with uncertainties? Did anything like this ever occur in all the history of parliament? I am really astonished.

Progress reported.

TRADE AND FINANCE

WASHINGTON AGREEMENT AND UNITED STATES PROPOSALS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a brief statement. I take the earliest opportunity to inform the house that over the week-end discussions were held with representatives of the United Kingdom who had participated in the recent negotiations in Washington. We received from them full explanations of the terms of the financial agreement reached in Washington and of the course likely to be followed by the further discussions of trade policy envisaged in the United States proposals for expansion of world trade and employment, which I expect will be tabled to-morrow.

The United Kingdom representatives have engaged also in exploratory talks with Canadian officials on the financial arrangements between the two countries with a view to preparing for more formal discussions as soon as possible after the beginning of the new year. Particular attention was given in these discussions to the implications of any financial arrangement for immediate and future trade relations between the two countries. It is planned to give more detailed consideration both here and in London in the next few weeks to the problems causing immediate concern.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND—INTERNATIONAL BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT

The house resumed consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

That it is expedient to present a measure to grant authority to accept on behalf of Canada and to carry out the obligations of Canada under the articles of agreement for an international monetary fund and an international bank for reconstruction and development prepared by the united nations monetary and financial conference held at Bretton Woods in July, 1944; to authorize the payment of the subscriptions required from Canada out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund to an amount not exceeding seven hundred million dollars; and to authorize the borrowing under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, of sums not exceeding seven hundred million dollars.

Mr. HANSELL: Before six o'clock the hon. member for Acadia had been discussing certain features of the final act of the Bretton Woods agreement. He called the attention of the committee to article IX, which refers to status, immunities and privileges.

Perhaps hon. members may think that we in this corner of the chamber seem to be particularly incensed at this agreement; but when attention is called to some of the tremendous powers granted to this central organization, we have indeed reason to be alarmed.

In the matter of immunities, the hon. member for Acadia has already pointed out to the committee that the fund is here personalized, according to section 2, which states:

The fund shall possess full juridical personality and, in particular, the capacity . . .

And so on. We must consider that they have almost all power, and that no other organization, no other nation and no other sovereign power have the right to sue them In other words, no nation has any recourse, no redress, when once those in charge of the fund have made a decision. That is an alarming thing.

May I call the attention of the committee to some other sections under this article, so that hon. members may see the extent to which we are handing over authority and power to this fund, without having any right of redress whatsoever, even as a nation. In section 8 we find the heading "Immunities and privileges of officers and employees". The section states:

All governors, executive directors, alternates, officers and employees of the fund
(i) shall be immune from legal process with respect to acts performed by them in their official capacity except when the fund waives this immunity.

I am not so much concerned about that clause, because perhaps an individual cannot be permitted to be sued, if it is the decision of the entire body. But look at the next clause:

(ii) not being local nationals, shall be granted the same immunities from immigration restrictions, alien registration requirements and national service obligations and the same facilities as regards exchange restrictions as are accorded by members to the representatives, officials, and employees of comparable rank of other members.

I hope I understand that. Perhaps I do not; but it appears to me that you have men in control of this fund who can travel all over the world, and that we, as a nation, cannot even ask what right they have here. That seems to me to be tremendously irregular.

I am often reminded that when some visitor goes to the United States, our good neighbour to the south, very often an hon. member will rise here and ask if the government has taken any action to invite such person to this country. That has been done on a number of occasions. When that is done I often feel like asking myself, "Well, since when do some of these other nations rise in their legislative assemblies and ask if the government have invited any of our men to look over what they may have to show?"

Here is a section under which these people may come and go as they wish. That seems strange to me. Are we to permit it? If we sign the agreement it looks as though we will.

Paragraph (iii) says:

(iii) shall be granted the same treatment in respect of travelling facilities as is accorded by members to representatives, officials and employees of comparable rank of other members.

If I have not got that right, I would ask the minister to say where I am wrong.

But one of the most startling sections of all, to my mind, is section 10. I want the minister to read that. I suppose he has already done so, but I suggest that he should refresh his memory. The title of that section is "Application of article," and it begins in this way:

Each member shall take such action . . .

"each member"; that is, each nation which signs the agreement and becomes a part of the whole. Each member, each nation, shall take such action. It does not say "may" take such action. "Shall" seems to me to be obligatory. It states:

Each member shall take such action as is necessary in its own territories for the purpose of making effective in terms of its own law the principles set forth in this article and shall inform the fund of the detailed action which it has taken.

It seems to me that if Canada signs this article we are signing away our right over certain of our own laws and our own legislative powers, and that the moment we sign the agreement we must then readjust any legislation on our statute books that may, in any way, hinder the smooth functioning of this fund.

To me that is strange language. It is strange if we cannot be master of our own legislation. It means that if we have on our statute books legislation which is considered in the interest of our nation but is found to conflict with the operations of this fund, as part of the agreement we are forced to change our law. We are forced to change our laws so that we can be told by this outside power what to do. If that is not the right interpretation of this section I want the minister to tell me what is wrong with it. We have heard a good deal about sovereign rights, which I believe in, but surely it is going too far toward giving away our sovereign rights when we give some other body the right to say what legislation we should have and to permit that outside power to say that we can or cannot have this or that legislation.

The other day we were asked to give power to our own government to control certain matters. What are we being asked to do here? If our government goes too far we can check them; we have some recourse in this parliament; but when this is done we are giving away our sovereign rights and power to an outside authority with regard to certain legislation. We shall have no control over that power, and I think that is a serious matter. I do not think we can be blamed for being as incensed as we are in a matter of this kind.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. BLACKMORE: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. BLACKMORE: No. If hon. members want to spend half an hour saying "carried" they are welcome to. What nonsense for grown men to indulge in!

I wish to ask the minister several questions based on the remarks he made in the discussion. Our object is to find out whether the minister can really defend this measure. We have no desire to be extreme in regard to it, but on the face of it this measure looks to me to be the most preposterous thing ever conceived in the mind of man.

An hon. MEMBER: That is your opinion.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And it is a pretty good opinion. The hon. member cannot give a single reason why it is fallacious. In fact I wish to say that the hon. member who spoke knows nothing at all about the act. I will challenge him to show that he knows one specific thing about the act.

An hon. MEMBER: Who is the hon. member talking about?

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. member who spoke over there. It is easy enough to let the head rattle, but to get something in it is a different matter.

I should like to ask the minister two or three questions pertaining to certain aspects of the fund. In his discussion with the hon. member for Acadia the minister read a passage which appears in the final act. I read it over several times before I believed such a thing as that could be put into an act which was accepted by intelligent men, brought along and proposed to be adopted by an intelligent legislative body. May I read from page 17 of the act which was distributed in the house. The minister read portions of it before the dinner recess. I am going to read the recommendations, so that those who read Hansard will know just exactly what is here. They read as follows:

Whereas, in article I of the articles of agreement of the international monetary fund it is stated that one of the principal purposes of the fund is to facilitate the expansion and balanced growth of international trade, and to contribute thereby to the promotion and maintenance of high levels of employment and real income and to the development of the productive resources of all members as primary objectives of economic policy;

Whereas, it is recognized that the complete attainment of this and other purposes and objectives stated in the agreement cannot be achieved through the instrumentality of the fund alone; therefore

The united nations monetary and financial conference recommends:

To the participating governments that, in addition to implementing the specific monetary and financial measures which were the subject of this conference, they seek, with a view to creating in the field of international economic relations conditions necessary for the attainment of the purposes of the fund and of the broader primary objectives of economic policy, to reach agreement as soon as possible on ways and means whereby they may best:

(1) reduce obstacles to international trade and in other ways promote mutually advantageous international commercial relations;

(2) bring about the orderly marketing of staple commodities at prices fair to the producer and consumer alike;

(3) deal with the special problems of international concern which will arise from the cessation of production for war purposes; and

(4) facilitate by cooperatitve effort the harmonization of national policies of member states designed to promote and maintain high levels of employment and progressively rising standards of living.

If those four recommendations could be implemented they would simply attain the promised land so far as social crediters are concerned. If we could only learn how to attain those objectives all would be well. The minister must have given this a good deal of attention, and surely the experts who went down there so nobly and performed so ably for twenty-two days and did this wonderful thing in drafting the Bretton Woods agreement, must have reported to him something about this. How does the minister propose to reduce obstacles to international trade and in other ways promote mutually advantageous international commercial relations? Will the minister tell us how that is proposed by any measure other than Bretton Woods?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Exactly what does he conceive to be the meaning of this? How is it to be attained? What mechanism is proposed to attain it? What progress has already been made? Why was this matter not taken care of before Bretton Woods was drafted? Obviously the harness was got before either the cart or the horse. We often hear of that cart being brought out before the horse; but here the harness has been brought in before the cart and before the horse. The harness is all ready to bind us hand and foot, but we have not the horse or the cart. Will the minister answer these questions? I shall repeat them for him. The first one has to do with the reduction of obstacles to international trade and in other ways promote mutually advantageous international commercial relations. It is recommended by the committee that that be attained. Will the minister tell us exactly what he means by this?

Mr. ILSLEY: The outstanding one was United States government, with the approval of the British government, indicates the methods that will be adopted to reduce obstacles to international trade and in other ways promote mutually advantageous international commercial relations. Then a trade conference is to be held looking to the reduction of trade barriers.

Mr. BLACKMORE: By that I gather the meaning is just a reduction of tariffs; is that it?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the main thing, but in this reciprocal trade agreement there are also provisions about quotas. There is a wide variety of provisions. I forget exactly what they are. Our trade agreement with the United States and Great Britain contains provisions other than strictly tariff provisions. But the reciprocal trade agreements will be the main thing under No. 1.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am trying to get a toehold so that I can really get hold of this thing. Is there anything different in these trade agreements from what we have had in the last ten or twenty years? What is there new in what is here proposed as compared with what we had in 1928 or 1927? All that the minister has said is that these proposals will mean reduced tariffs. That does not mean very much. That is a very general thing. The minister knows that the Liberals in this country have been talking about reducing tariffs ever since there was a Liberal party, and when they have got into power they have raised the tariffs. Merely talking about these things does not accomplish anything. I know that some of the new Liberal members do not know that they have the highest tariff structure there ever was in Canada, that they out-tariffed the high Tory tariffs by a substantial margin, and that probably will merit their investigation. Just talking about lowering tariffs does not get us anywhere. I want to know whether or not some new principle has been brought in, different from the principles obtaining in the last twenty years.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not send the hon. gentleman the United States statement, but I sent one to his leader.

Mr. LOW: Yes, I have one.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the hon. member for Peace River will just show that document to the hon. member for Lethbridge he will see how far-reaching are the proposals that are made for a multilateral reduction of tariffs and with reference to subsidies and quotas and all kinds of things that would interfere with the flow of trade. I should like my hon. friend not to make such loose statements about the high tariff structure in Canada. The idea that we have the highest tariff structure the country ever had is highly incorrect.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have heard that stated on pretty high authority. In any event it is not necessary to accept that as being 100 per cent correct in order to discuss the question at issue. I seriously doubt and I am asking the minister to prove that there is any substantial difference whatsoever between the proposals now being made for tariff reductions and what obtained in 1925 in trade relations between the United States and Great Britain.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know just what the tariff level was in 1925, nor can I be expected to.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If the general principle is that we are to have lower tariffs, what we need to know is who is to lower them and how far. Great Britain was virtually a free trade country until after the first great world war, and the United States has always been a high tariff country. If the United States undertakes to lower her tariffs and Britain lowers hers a little, what advantage will that give? That is what we want to know.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does the hon. gentleman think it should not be tried? It is all right for a member of this house with no executive responsibility to sit back and pour cold water on what the nations are trying to do to improve international conditions. Those who do have some sense of responsibility and some authority have to do the best they can, and these proposals of the United States, concurred in by Great Britain, are a basis for far-reaching trade discussions for a reduction of trade barriers.

My hon. friend comes along and says that the Bretton Woods agreements should have waited until the other was done, that to proceed with the monetary agreement first was an illogical course. I think nearly everybody thought the contrary, and I think the contrary. I do not think there is much use in entering into trade negotiations and arriving at trade agreements until some machinery is set up for preventing competitive depreciation of currencies, discriminatory trade practices, and so on, which the Bretton Woods agreements are designed to prevent.

Mr. BLACKMORE: This question may be a little off the beaten track, a little off the point we are discussing, but can the minister tell us which nations have indulged in these discriminatory currency practices?

Mr. ILSLEY: Before the war?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: The outstanding one was Germany, as the hon. member knows.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We have destroyed Germany, and now we are trying to destroy Britain. Did Britain engage in these discriminatory practices to any extent? If so, would the minister give us some examples so that we can understand.

An hon. MEMBER: Don't answer him.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Of course—anything he can't answer, don't answer. But if there is a general understanding in the Liberal party of the fundamental principles of international economics they should rejoice in having questions like that asked of the Minister of Finance, because he should be able to name instances right off if he knows all about these matters. Surely it is a proposterous situation, may I tell the members of the Liberal party, to have here a minister who has at his service a highly trained staff of experts who have specialized on this matter and can give him information instantly at his call, and yet the minister is unable to answer the questions of a person who has never specialized in that kind of thing but is just an ordinary member of parliament.

Let me say once more that I represent the man who pays for these wars; I represent the man whose son dies in war; I say here and now that the kind of people I represent have just seen their sons die in war, and they want to find out whether the measures we now propose to adopt will not produce wars rather than cure the cause of wars. How are we to determine whether they will produce wars or cure the cause of war unless we can examine the fundamental economic basis upon which wars are built up? That is all I am asking the minister. Here the Bretton Woods delegates recommend that the nations adopt measures to accomplish four objects which are set out on page 17, and if hon. members will turn to them they will be astonished at their generality. I should like anybody on the Liberal side to tell me the real difference between recommendation No. 3 and recommendation No. 4. It is a collection of high-sounding phraseology that might pretty nearly mean anything under the sun. What I am trying to do is to find out whether there is definitely any meaning, so far as the finance minister is concerned, in this first statement, and whether anything has been done beyond talking about these matters. That is what I want to find out. There is nothing unreasonable in my question. If the minister cannot answer it, and if the Liberals cannot answer it, it is evidence that they do not know enough about the situation to be able to handle it at all.

Mr. DECHENE: What a man! What a man!

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am glad you are beginning to appreciate it. The minister ought to be able to tell us something about what has been done, instead of leaving it in these general terms.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend knows as well as I do that quite a large number of countries during the thirties adopted discriminatory trade practices.

Mr. BLACKMORE: In economic self-defence, was it not?

Mr. ILSLEY: It may have been. I do not know whether it was self-defence.

Mr. BLACKMORE: As a result of the depression.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman wanted me to give a list of these countries?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Just one or two. Never mind a list.

Mr. ILSLEY: I named Germany.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Well, we have destroyed her.

Mr. ILSLEY: There were a number of other countries. I would have to brush up my recollection on that. I do not think that one is expected to have a complete recollection of it, because everybody knows what happened. It has been repeated a hundred times in this house; I have heard it often. People have talked about the export of wheat to European countries being prevented because several or many of them put on embargoes and import quotas and subsidies of their own production, in some cases export subsidies, and milling quotas, and of course exchange restrictions, which interfered with the importation of goods into those countries and made trade terms more favourable in respect of some countries, countries with which they made a bargain, than with others. The hon. gentleman knows that; everybody knows it. It has been talked about for the last ten or fifteen years.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I agree with that. What I want from the minister is this: Why did those nations adopt those measures? Why, for example, would Holland, why would Belgium, restrict the importation of Canadian wheat and subsidize the production of their own wheat? Simply because Belgium—to take one case—had to become as nearly self-sufficient as she possibly could in case of war, which would disrupt her trade, and she had by some means or another to avoid importing more goods than she could pay for with her own exports. She knew that if she imported more than she exported she would go into debt, and that debt would be unpayable. Does the minister agree with that?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is only one reason. Often there was the pressure of local interests that desired higher prices for what they could produce and wished to get the local market and had to have higher prices than the goods could be bought for if they could be imported. We had a lot of that in this country. Sometimes countries wanted to develop self-sufficiency in case war should come; and there were, I think, other reasons as well. I do not pretend that the list of reasons is exhaustive. Sometimes there were people who believed in self-sufficiency as a national as well as an economic doctrine or creed.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Now, then, what I want to ask the minister—and he is well informed in these matters, and I am not entirely unfamiliar with them—is this: would the Bretton Woods arrangement propose to destroy the ability of Belgium so to protect her internal economy?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, the Bretton Woods agreement does not. That is a matter of trade agreements or commercial arrangements. In fact, the paramount necessity of something of that kind is recognized and has been recognized by everybody throughout. But that is not enough in itself. There has also to be a monetary agreement, and that is provided for in the Bretton Woods agreement.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is a very good answer and I am well pleased with it. That is the kind of thing I want to get. Now what I want to know is this: if the Bretton Woods agreement presupposes, which apparently it does because of this recommendation, that adequate reductions of tariffs and international trade restrictions shall be made, it must presuppose that there is to be another agreement which will come under recommendation No. 1 and which will oblige Belgium to cease to protect her economy. Does it presuppose that? To me, one of the dangers of Bretton Woods is that it presupposes that there shall be, for example, another convention—I do not know what they will call it this time—in which these tariffs and exchange quotas and all the other means by which Belgium tries to protect her economy shall be abolished, leaving Belgium unprotected in the trade of the world. If that happens, how will Belgium's economy be protected? That is something we have to ask ourselves. If Belgium's economy is not protected, Belgium will begin to fall into unpayable debt, and the first step to war will be taken, because Belgium cannot continue indefinitely to go into debt, under Bretton Woods or under any other arrangement.

Mr. ILSLEY: Bretton Woods proposals do not presuppose free trade.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Then obviously the whole meaning of this recommendation is uncertain, is it not? It does not propose free trade. If a nation is to protect its economy at all, tariffs will have to come in to a certain extent and exchange controls and quotas will have to come in, and, in fact, every other kind of protective device which the nations have had to employ in the past; otherwise something else must come in to take the place of that protection. The fundamental position which social crediters take and which new economists generally take is that there must be a distribution of goods in the world under a system which will render it possible to aid nations like Belgium so that they will not have to impose these restrictions. If we could find a single hint anywhere in all the deliberations of all committees which are at work to-day, that there is any idea in their minds as to how that distribution of goods could be brought about, we would be reassured; but I cannot find any sign of that; I cannot find a hint of it. So that I say, as far as I can see, unless something is explained more than has been explained up to the present time, this first recommendation is just pure piffle and does not have any effect at all. It talks of reducing the obstacles to international trade, at the same time that everybody knows perfectly well that they cannot be reduced without the destruction of the world's weaker economies. If they cannot be replaced without the destruction of those weaker economies, then certainly the cause of war is not being removed, and to bring in Bretton Woods and make it still more difficult for them to protect their economies is simply to aggravate the situation. Surely that must be plain to every hon. member in the committee. What we are arguing is that there is in Bretton Woods no solution of the problem. The problem is international trade war, and the devices the nations have adopted to protect themselves are the devices which we are supposed to remove, without giving them any means whereby they can remove the need for protection. There is the difficulty. If the minister can give us any reassurance on that matter we should like to have it.

May I just illustrate this for the committee, to give us something to put our teeth into. In the 1930's Japan managed by a device which she was using to bring down the price of her goods for export. I have read this, although I am speaking entirely from memory, that Japan enabled herself to offer a bicycle for $5.75 for which we would charge $50 here in Canada. If we had not adopted a method of practical embargo, of absolute exclusion against Japan, we people in Canada and the United States, with all our productive potential, would have found ourselves buying Japanese goods, and the first thing we knew our people would have been unemployed and the Japanese would have been employed producing our goods. The minister knows that is the case. The minister knows that Japan invaded the British markets until she undersold British manufacturers right in Britain. She did the same thing in India.

That occurred in 1934 and 1933, and the only possible means of resisting it was the embargo and the quota method. How would you propose to deal with a situation like that? What Japan did was this. She had a population who were able to live on a ration of rice, so that she could produce ever so much more cheaply than the rest of us. We could not reduce our people in North America to the level of a rice diet. That is plain common sense. Not only that, but Japan discovered a means of subsidizing exports; she used her national credit for that purpose, so that her exporters could undersell all the rest of us. The result was that she beat us in every market of the world, and the fact that we adopted the system of quotas and embargos, which stopped her, was what seems to have driven her to war.

What would you do with a situation like that under the Bretton Woods agreement if you did not use quotas and embargos in the United States and in the Dominion of Canada? That is what I am trying to get at. The minister, I think, sees that is impossible. He said that he did not propose to interfere with freedom of trade. It cannot be proposed that we have trade entirely free from quotas or trade restrictions, or entirely free from other kinds of protective devices, for if we adopted such a system we would immediately put a great many nations in an impossible position. Would the minister comment on that aspect of the matter so as to remove our anxieties on that score?

From the information I have I am positive that the cause of the last war was traceable to these very things. It was traceable to the fact that there were certain economies in the world that were unable to protect themselves successfully against stronger economies, and so they went to war. That is my information regarding the economic basis of the war. What does the minister think? Is it really feasible that any real teeth can be put into this first recommendation about reducing the obstacles to international trade and in other ways promoting international commercial relations that shall be mutually advantageous? Is there any hope of that?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I think so.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The minister thinks there is.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Chairman, I rise to take up just three or four minutes of the time of this committee, and really for one reason. I would not want the House of Commons to think we are all that way.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There is no anxiety; we have never claimed you.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Please do not misunderstand me. I have a wonderful admiration for the hon. gentleman, so that I say to him, do not become bad tempered. In the speech made by the last speaker, or one of the many speeches made by the last speaker, I have observed certain things—and those which I have not heard I have read. There is one thing I do love and that is an intellectual approach to idealism. Let us not lose that. The hon. gentlemen in the far corner are to be credited, I think, with making that approach, and the only criticism, a soft criticism, I make is that they utterly forget realities in endeavouring to put forward certain theories. That is not a harsh criticism; I think the hon. gentleman will agree with me there.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Very gracious.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Thank you; I appreciate that. Addressing myself to the minister, may I say that I am sorry to have heard the statement that we destroyed Germany, and the question, do we want to destroy Britain? Surely all of us in this House of Commons credit one another with the intention of doing the best we can for this Dominion of Canada and for Britain and the commonwealth of nations. We are entitled to our differences, but our ideals being the same —and they must be the same or we would have no right to be here—the only respect in which we can differ is in matters of method. That, I think, is a fair statement as between the government side on the one hand and, on the other, our group and the two groups of hon. gentlemen to my left.

I am not a financial expert; very far from it. The only achievement I have had in that way is to have made a reasonable income and probably spent ten per cent more every year than I earned. But that is ordinary government financing; it is what we call debt financing, as I understand that expression. What is Bretton Woods to a very humble person like myself who is not en famille, or en raport or en something or another with all these fancy fellows who write books and pamphlets? I have the largest waste-paper basket in the House of Commons. I do the best I can to read these things, which are gratuitously sent me—I do not pay for any of them—and yet that basket seems to grow day by day. The strong man who empties it must be a man indeed.

Here is my only thought of Bretton Woods, from my humble point of view. It is far from perfect. It has not these sanctions and so on. It does not compel one country to deliver such and such goods. What is it? It is a meeting of the minds of many nations. You do not get the end result there; but you perhaps get a start, and to me that is all that Bretton Woods is. It is a start in the control of exchange or currencies, so that, that start having been made, other trade agreements, multilateral I hope, may flow from it. I wish it had gone farther. I am sure there is no one in this House of Commons who does not so wish. But when you get all these people together you do not expect the maximum; you may get the minimum, but you expect the greatest amount of agreement that can be attained. I am for Bretton Woods for that reason. I have either listened to or read everything that has been said, and I have not yet heard one definite alternative to Bretton Woods.

It is all right to talk theories. We are told we should get all nations together and have an agreement of this or that kind. We had them together and this is the agreement we got. I am not for a moment discussing certain theories, and I probably could go a great deal farther with them than some hon. gentlemen to my left believe. They will at least admit that in the province of Alberta, in which I have lived all this time, I never made one public utterance against social credit until the election that took place on June 11. At least I can say that in friendliness to those people down there.

An hon. MEMBER: Why?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Why? There is a very good reason for it. For a good part of the time I was crown prosecutor, and I felt that in my position I would not create the slightest impression of a breach of faith, So I did not do it. That is a fair answer to whoever asked the question. He may not be able to justify it, but I have at least given an honest answer.

Are we in this House of Commons not in this position, to be very practical. We cannot have a new Bretton Woods conference, so that in the interests of this country itself there is only one thing to do, and that is to go along with the other nations which have gone this far in trying to make a beginning in the handling of the situation. Anyone who suggests that we can go back to the old conditions which prevailed after the last war has, in my judgment, not learned anything in the last twenty-five years. I am one of those people who believe that economically we are in a new era, and I am sure my hon. friends will agree with me in that. We cannot go back and make trade agreements with A, leaving out B, and making other agreements with C and D but not with G and probably Q; we cannot do that without destroying not only our own economy, because we would be the last to go, but the economy of the whole world.

Therefore I am with the minister in this. It is not a cure-all, and no one ever suggested it was. But I am with the Minister of Finance in saying that if we in this House of Commons do not go with the other nations as far as they have gone—and remember, Bretton Woods was not developed under the new British government—then what are we doing? We are putting a spoke in the wheel of progress. This country and the world cannot wait. We must progress. To turn down this proposal now means that we start all over again; we gather the nations together again, and in my judgment by that time it may be too late.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have only the deepest respect for the hon. member for Calgary West and I appreciate his remarks, but let me tell him that Bretton Woods is not a step forward; Bretton Woods is a step backward. It is a device for forcing the old system on people so that they cannot change at all. Every hon. member within the sound of my voice will some day acknowledge the truth of what I am saying.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): You believe chaos is inevitable, do you?

Mr. BLACKMORE: No.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): It is chaos without Bretton Woods. If it is chaos with it, let us have it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I believe that with Bretton Woods you will have chaos.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): And you will have chaos without it?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Of course.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Then chaos is inevitable.

Mr. BLACKMORE: You will have chaos unless you adopt a sound system of distribution.

An hon. MEMBER: What is your system?

Mr. BLACKMORE: It would not be in order for me to tell you now what the sound system is; I would be out of order. The first great thing is to point out the fearful dangers of adopting Bretton Woods. Even those who drafted the agreements recognized that Bretton Woods is dangerous unless these other four recommendations can be implemented, but they make no suggestion as to how these recommendations can be implemented, and the minister has not a suggestion, not a single idea. All he can tell us is that there are arrangements for tariff reductions, but he cannot give a detailed answer to questions in connection with any of these matters. He cannot show that Belgium, for example, to protect its economy will not have to use every one of these trade restrictions to keep out cheap goods from the United States. He cannot say that Great Britain will not have to adopt all these devices to keep the United States from literally flooding the British markets, putting the British people out of employment, and gaining such a control of British money that they can buy up British fixed assets to such an extent that they can own Britain outright. He cannot show us that this will not be necessary. Then to jam Bretton Woods in at a time when he cannot show that these things will not be necessary is simply for us to put on a strait-jacket when we should be giving nations freedom at least to fight for their existence.

Now may I say to the hon. member for Calgary West—and I did admire the speech he made—it is true that we have gone into a new age; and the new age we have gone into is an age of abundance. But unless we so manage our affairs that we can enable all the people in the world to partake of that abundance, the abundance itself will smother and strangle us.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I agree with you; do not get mad.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am not mad. Unless we properly manage our affairs, that abundance will strangle us; and the anxiety which is filling the soul of virtually every individual in the world with dread to-day is the fear that we shall not be able to handle our abundance. The minister referred to this document which was sent over to the hon. member for Peace River just a moment ago. I must confess that, realizing I had to face the whole of parliament in a struggle of this kind, I have been concentrating to some extent on the sort of things I would have to do to bring out the truth—and I think a good deal of that truth has been brought out to-night—so that I have not had the chance to read this pamphlet, but let me read some of the things which are in it. I will just turn to the page at which it opens as an example, to let the committee see the kind of thing being advocated. I am reading from paragraph 3 on page 6:

During the transition, it may be necessary to restrict production . . .

Now do hon. members see the kind of thing these men are thinking about? There is no reference to a means of making our abundance available to the peoples of the world, but to a means of restricting production. It is the same old mentality which caused them to shoot swine and drop them into the river, to burn mountains of oranges; exactly the same mentality, the mentality of scarcity. Where could you get a greater condemnation of the whole thing? I suspected that I would find some pretty shabby timber down under this fine veneer. All we have here is just a beautiful veneer, which could make it appear a fine, solid piece of furniture; but dig down under the veneer and you find nothing but jackpine. I am reading from page 6 of this little pamphlet, "Proposals for expansion of world trade and employment," which was sent over to us. I suppose it is one of the pamphlets that have been issued in evidence of good faith that this first item here, this first objective, is to be implemented.

Mr. IRVINE: Read the rest of the paragraph.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am going to complete the paragraph. It is not all as bad as that first part, and I had not intended to leave it incomplete:

During the transition, it may be necessary to restrict production or exports, to fix prices, or to allocate shares of markets among producing countries.

In this there is not a hint of increasing markets by increasing the purchasing power of the people. They are going to take the present markets and divide them up. Can one think of anything more desolating? And that is supposed to be guaranteeing freedom from want. Now I read on:

Controls of this sort should not be applied in any case unless the need is real and serious—

No one knows when it will be considered real and serious, how many people would have to be starving to death before it was considered such.

—affecting many people, and not curable by the normal process of competition—

There is no hint here of cooperation; it is all competition again, and competition is the thing that has brought on wars in the past. Competition means cutthroat competition and economic war; yet the men who wrote this pamphlet, who are supposed to be introducing the new era, are thinking of nothing in the world but the past. How can anyone, including the hon. member for Calgary West, suppose that what is being proposed here is a step into the new order? It is a step backward, and we could not get better evidence than this. I am glad someone sent this to the hon. member for Peace River. Let me read on:

And when they are set up they should be strictly temporary, lasting no longer than required to carry out the necessary shifts.

But what will happen when the tremendous productive capacity of the United States is liberated and they find they are not able to sell their oranges among their own people? Will they pile up mountains of oranges again and burn them within sight of the needy? What will they do when they find themselves returning to the conditions of 1935, when they were able to produce enough goods to supply every family in the United States with $4,400 worth a year and they actually had 23,500,000 people on relief? What will they do when they get a condition like that?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What has Bretton Woods to do with that?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Bretton Woods is supposed to be one of the measures which are to introduce a new order. It is supposed to be one of the steps of progress. I am just showing how shabby that progress is.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The hon. member said that it was a backward step.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The way you paint the picture, you cannot go back farther than that—the $25 million worth of oranges. It cannot be worse; so Bretton Woods cannot be backward. It might be static, but otherwise it must be forward, surely.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. BLACKMORE: A very fine question. And might I offer this challenge to anyone in the committee who thinks that it must.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I will take it, before you tell me what it is.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is the kind of men we produce in Alberta. These are the people who fight for what they believe is right. Since the hon. member for Calgary West has accepted the challenge, I am going to ask him to tell me what Bretton Woods would do to help the United States to distribute her abundance in 1935?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): And I will tell you. In 1935—yes, I will go back to 1935, and farther if you wish.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If there had been a Bretton Woods in 1935, what good would it have done to the United States?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): In the first place it is not supposed to distribute goods. But even that does not matter. I will tell you what it could do back in 1935. We had a depression. It was a world depression. It was the first one we ever had—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Oh, yes, it was. You can go back to 1929, if you like; I am not going to argue over a year or two. But go back and find out what brought on the depressions in this world, in the various countries. What happened. Labour moved here and there. And they were always able to borrow money outside. That depression you have been talking about is the first one this world ever knew where governments could not borrow money outside. Just take a good slant at this picture. You ask: What would Bretton Woods do in 1935? Perhaps nothing.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is what I think.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Oh, please let me finish. You know we could not borrow money over there in 1935. We borrowed in London and in New York; practically all our borrowing was done there. I agree with you—do not misunderstand me—when you say there should be no hungry people in the midst of plenty. Well, I was called a big-shot once, but I am not one of them. I am not one who has argued otherwise. I agree with that; I have no doubt about it. Certainly there should not be hunger in the midst of plenty.

But what have we done? We have an economic system which did certain things. But that system got us hospitalization; it got us radio; it got us telegraphs; it got us railroads; it got us a lot of things—a lot of social services. So why damn it and throw it out the window? Just remember that it improved civilization up to that time.

Do not just throw it away like an old shoe. My view is that we can take the absolutely good things in the system, and we can take care of 1945. You ask, how? I say, by government intervention and by government guidance. What we can do is this: We can work on the good things in the system, and never have another 1935. That is where the government comes into the picture. That is my view of it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What I am going to have the hon. member for Calgary West tell us is this: What are the good things in our system which we would keep, and what changes should we have to make?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Well, keep one of the things you want—and that is individual enterprise. You have that, so that is not too bad.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What next would you have? Remember, we are talking about the United States for a few minutes. Let us remember that the United States started the depression. Yes, it started right in the United States. There were five steps which caused it, and which I have outlined.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): And I do not agree with them. I doubt them.

Mr. BLACKMORE: As soon as you can prove they are not correct, come along. I will prove that they are correct.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I think I had better come to your room to finish this.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes, I can understand that. The trouble is we have not the time to go on talking now. But this is an important question. We have to ask this: What would have to be done in the United States, first of all, to avoid having that depression come on? Remember, she started it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I told you she ceased foreign lending. Is anyone in this chamber prepared to challenge the statement that the cessation of United States foreign lending started the depression?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am prepared to challenge that statement at any time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I will refer you to the banking and—

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): But I would rather go to your room and do it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I refer you to the banking and commerce committee of last year, in which Mr. Graham Towers, president of the Bank of Canada, positively said that was the beginning of the depression.

Mr. MacINNIS: And you do not agree with him?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I gave those steps before.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I know what started the depression.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I must again remind hon. members in the committee that remarks must be addressed to the Chair.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question, question.

Mr. McIVOR: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If I were wasting the time these hon. gentlemen are they would be accusing me of blocking.

Mr. McIVOR: Mr. Chairman, if you will pardon me; I said "carried", because I like to make a short and intelligent speech. I have not been making any all day.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If the hon. member would like to have intelligence in his words, I would suggest that he learn another word, one different from "carried", because that is very foolish.

While we have had a little good-natured passage this evening, I believe there is essential value in this question. What would the United States have to do, first of all, to prevent an onset of another depression? If Bretton Woods would not help the United States, or prevent her from going into a depression, then it cannot help the rest of the world from going into a depression. And if the rest of the nations went into a depression, they would be forced to adopt every one of the trade restrictions which they would have to use to save their economies, and to save the lives of their people—instead of Bretton Woods. Then just imagine what would happen. There just is no answer to that, at all.

I pointed out, and showed this morning what the causes of the depression were, and that they came on in the United States. Bretton Woods would have no effect whatsoever on them. I think we showed the absolute futility of Bretton Woods.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Well, then, it is just futile—no harm.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The chief trouble is that it is suggested there was no harm. I say that it will do harm because it is designed.

after all, to establish a monetary fund with a great deal of control of every nation of the world.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): How can you have currency stabilization, without control? Tell me that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Such a fund as that with a lot of control will certainly hamper nations. They will find that, in their effort to protect themselves.

And now, if we have finished with number one, I shall turn to number two. The minister has not done much for us on number one. I do not think any of his staff can do anything for us. As a matter of fact, I will challenge the best authorities that sat in Bretton Woods, and the best authorities of the government to show how any substantial change in the world's trade can be made, and still go on from generation to generation, as an implementing of the suggestion made in number one.

Mr. ILSLEY: Would the hon. member tell me, frankly: Does he intend to keep this up all evening? How long does he intend to keep this up? I should like to know. I have made my plans pretty clear. I wanted to get this measure before the banking and commerce committee, by four o'clock. The hon. member would not accommodate me, although I think others in his group were willing to do so. Does he mean to keep at it indefinitely? I should like to know. I shall have to make different arrangements.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wish to make it abundantly clear—and I have already done so twice to-day—that I am not attempting to block or hold up the committee. I am attempting to elucidate the facts. A lot of them have certainly come out here to-night. I will wager that few enough people, whether they were in this country or not, knew what the causes of the depression were.

An hon. MEMBER: Did you?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Those causes of depression have a tremendously vital bearing on this question, because this is supposed to be one of the means of preventing war, and the war came on because of the depression. I think there is hardly any doubt about that.

I have scores of questions which I think have a vital bearing on this whole question that I should like to put to the minister.

Mr. PROBE: Send him a letter.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I may be presumptuous in doing so, but I believe if I ask those questions and if hon. members would listen to them they would find food for thought in them, whether they would find any truth or not. I have given considerable attention to this matter for a number of years. I do not approach this matter entirely without information. I believe it is the duty of those who understand something of these things to ask these questions and elicit the information which will aid the people generally throughout the country to come to a better understanding, to get more truth. Therefore I am answering the minister in this way. I am going to ask him questions to elicit the truth and what information I can get. As soon as I am satisfied that he cannot tell me any more I shall go on to another question. I am satisfied he cannot tell me anything more about number one. What he has told us indicates that he knows almost nothing about it. He has not had the—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is perfectly true. I will defend that statement. As an example the minister has not shown how under Bretton Woods the United States could protect her economy from imports from Japan in 1933. If Japan offered bicycles at $5.50 or $7.75 each, the United States would have to shut them out by an embargo, and that would be a quota; she could do no other thing, because no matter how high a tariff she put up she could not keep them out.

The world faced a serious danger with respect to Japan of having that country take over the manufacturing business of the world. Japan could have and would have done so because of the peculiar nature of her people.

Mr. COTE (Matapedia-Matane): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes.

Mr. COTE (Matapedia-Matane): Forty-five nations have subscribed to Bretton Woods.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes.

Mr. COTE (Matapedia-Matane): Has the hon. gentleman the pretension to say that if the house followed the advice of him and his group it would change in one iota the structure of the world; that the Bretton Woods agreements with regard to the world would not be carried forward? If not, why carry on this discussion any longer?

Mr. BLACKMORE: My hon. friend is a Christian, is he not?

Mr. COTE (Matapedia-Matane): Yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Suppose after the death of the Saviour the Christian world had asked such a despairing question as that, do you suppose that Christianity would ever have advanced?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BLACKMORE: All right. Take the Chartists. We shall go to politics now. We shall have you all saying, "oh, oh" about this in a minute. Let us go back to the Chartists' proposals in 1848.

Mr. TUCKER: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am answering the hon. member's question.

Mr. TUCKER: This is a debate on the question whether we shall approve the signature of the international monetary fund and the international bank of reconstruction and development. My hon. friend is dealing with items on page 17 of the final act. Those items set out certain things which should be be done to promote further the purposes of the fund. In other words, the fund is designed to do certain things in the way of promoting prosperity in the world. This was a further recommendation to promote the purposes for which the fund is also to be established. It is a recommendation in order that certain things shall be done. You might just as well discuss the criminal code in regard to this act, because you must have a certain measure of honesty and integrity in the country if you are to have prosperity. You might just as well discuss anything that might come before this house on this question of an international monetary fund as to discuss the principle of social credit as to whether this fund should be set up or not.

If we look at this thing carefully it will show that by asking questions about things set out on page 17 of this final act my hon. friend has deliberately got away from the discussion as to whether this monetary fund should or should not be set up.

I wish to read it to you, Mr. Chairman, to satisfy you that it is definitely out of order. It reads as follows:

> The united nations monetary and financial conference recommends:
>
> To the participating governments that, in addition to implementing the specific monetary and financial measures which were the subject of this conference, they seek, with a view to creating in the field of international economic relations conditions necessary for the attainment of the purposes of the fund and of the broader primary objectives of economic policy, to reach agreement as soon as possible on ways and means whereby they may best:
> (1) reduce obstacles to international trade and in other ways promote mutually advantageous international commercial relations.

Note, Mr. Chairman, it says this:

> That, in addition to implementing the specific monetary and financial measures which were the subject of this conference, they seek, with a view to creating in the field of international economic relations conditions necessary for the attainment of the purposes of the fund and of the broader primary objectives of economic policy . . .

In other words, what my hon. friend is discussing is something that is outside the international monetary fund altogether, something that is outside the international bank for reconstruction and development. He is seeking to discuss the broad question of economic policy within the country, the question of international trade and all those other matters which this conference said should be dealt with in order to help promote the purpose of the fund. The fund is just one means whereby this purpose may be promoted; my hon. friend is definitely out of order, Mr. Chairman, when he seeks to discuss this other means whereby this objective is sought to be promoted, and I ask you to rule him out of order on this discussion. I definitely say to you that when he is seeking to take this attitude; when he knows that the purpose of this house has been expressed by a definite and overwhelming majority that this nation wishes to adhere to this fund and he seeks to prevent us by talking and talking and refusing to go to the committee where he can get the information which he claims he wants, he is seeking to frustrate democracy in the only way in which it can work, namely, by putting this thing to a committee where it can be studied. For that reason, when this house has definitely shown its intention, I ask you to—

Mr. BLACKMORE: On a point of order, I ask the hon. member to withdraw.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I ask him to withdraw. The hon. member has attributed a motive to me which he has no right to do.

Mr. TUCKER: If I have said anything that offends my hon. friend—

Mr. BLACKMORE: On a point of privilege I request the hon. member to withdraw his statement. He attributed to me the motive of seeking to thwart the purposes of democracy.

Mr. TUCKER: I said that the effect of what the hon. member was doing was that very thing. I repeat, that is what he is doing.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. member said that I sought to do it.

Mr. TUCKER: The hon. member knows very well that unless at least those nations contributing sixty-five per cent of the total subscription adhere to this by December 31 this attempt at an international project is going to fail. More than that, it may very well be that the failure of Canada to adhere to it by December 31 may mean the destruction of this great work to promote international cooperation in this field.

My hon. friend knows just as well as he is sitting there that the overwhelming will of this parliament is that Canada shall do its share in this great international work. If he by talk, knowing that the time is limited, seeks to prevent our democratic country from doing its part in this work, although he knows the vast majority wants it to be done, he is certainly thereby thwarting the will of democracy. It has been suggested that I attributed motives to my hon. friend. I said that what he was doing was to prevent the will of democracy as represented in this parliament from prevailing. I do not think my hon. friend would want to prevent democracy from functioning, but in the Evening Citizen of December 10 I find this:

> Parliament will be here till Christmas if the government doesn't withdraw the Bretton Woods bill, declared Solon Low, Social Credit leader, to the Evening Citizen this afternoon.

They know that if it is the will of parliament to adhere to Bretton Woods it must do so before December 31. What are we to say to a group in this house, Mr. Chairman, who say that they will sit here and prevent us from carrying out the will of the majority of this parliament?

Mr. HANSELL: It does not say that.

Mr. TUCKER: I will read it again.

> Parliament will be here till Christmas if the government doesn't withdraw the Bretton Woods bill, declared Solon Low. . . . This was his comment on the filibuster the Social Credit party is waging against the government.
>
> "We are prepared to fight this thing right through till after the New Year," he asserted.
>
> The government introduced the Bretton Woods bill last week. This would enable Canada to participate in an international money agreement. The Socreds want none of this at all.
>
> "We're out to kill it," said Mr. Low. "We want to kill it in the best interest of Canada, the best interest of the commonwealth, the best interest of Britain." . . .
> "We believe we have a plan which is better for everybody—"

And so on. I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that if that is correctly quoting the leader of the Social Credit party he is saying that this little group he leads to-day is undertaking to thwart the will of the majority of this parliament, representing as it does the people of Canada. That, I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, is the essence of dictatorship. It is the very denial of the democracy in which we believe. As has been well pointed out by various members of the opposition, the Social Credit party were not elected by the Canadian people to conduct the government of this country, and having put forward their views, if they now seek to thwart the ordinary functioning of government and continue to do so—

Mr. HANSELL: We are not doing that or seeking to do that at all.

Mr. TUCKER: That is the very thing that brought France down in ruin and destruction, the unwillingness to let the majority conduct the business of the country, the insistence on using any power they had to make their will prevail against the will of the majority. The will of the majority has been expressed by the overwhelming majority of all the members of this house, joined in by all parties in the house except the Social Credit group. I appealed to them this morning and I appeal to them now: Show that you do believe in democracy, that you do believe what you say, that you are asking just for information by letting this measure go to the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Where it can be all hidden.

Mr. TUCKER: Where everything can be brought out fully. Let it go to the banking and commerce committee, and then, after you have heard it discussed there, if you are still not convinced, I suggest that you have a certain duty to the people of this country if you believe in democracy. If the majority will of the people is to go through and Canada put her signature to these agreements in time to do her part to bring into effect this great international effort at cooperation, I suggest to hon. members of the Social Credit group that if they believe in democracy they should not attempt to thwart this measure because the time is short.

Mr. LOW: I am sure that the hon. member for Rosthern could very well have saved a good deal of wear and tear and could have approached this matter in a calmer and more dignified manner.

I want to say right here and now and with all the finality I can give it, that there is no such thing as a motive on the part of this group to obstruct. But I will tell you, Mr. Chairman, that if this matter has reached an impasse and is embarrassing the government, as it obviously is, it is nobody's fault but their own. They have been in session here since the 6th of September. They have had plenty of opportunity to bring in this measure early; in fact, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar in the debate on the address asked the government to bring down the Bretton Woods agreements at the earliest possible day. But the government disregarded that request.

I quite well appreciate that, with the Prime Minister away and heavy duties falling upon the shoulders of the Minister of Finance, he had perhaps more than he could look after, but that is no excuse for having delayed bringing down this resolution until the dying days of this session. As I said the other day, and I will continue to say it, a vote of censure should be passed on this government for holding up this measure until these last days. The people in this country will be the judge—

Mr. MACKENZIE: They were.

Mr. LOW: I know they were, but they did not know about Bretton Woods then; they were not told anything about Bretton Woods. It would have been a simple matter for the Minister of Finance to have brought this resolution down in the early days of the session or even six weeks ago. Then he could have got it into the banking and commerce committee where we could have had three or four weeks to examine this measure, which is of such far-reaching consequences. The penalties for the failure of this measure are of such grave concern that we should have been taking four or five weeks in the banking and commerce committee to get all the information we possibly could, so that we could make up our minds. I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that the government is bringing down upon itself exactly what it asked for in withholding this measure. I am not going to impute any motives, but the people right across this country will probably be doing so in connection with the government's trying to rush this thing through at the last minute. I have sitting around me a group of men with deep convictions who have been anxiously awaiting the bringing down of this resolution, and I do not like to see motives imputed to them.

Mr. TUCKER: Did the hon. member make the statement that I quoted from the Evening Citizen?

Mr. LOW: Yes, I did. I am not saying that I used the exact words quoted, but I said that this group are determined to fight this thing to the bitter end. I do not know, nor does any member whether the majority of the people of Canada want Bretton Woods; but I say that it is our duty as the representatives of the people of Canada to find out for ourselves whether it is a good measure, and if we do not we are derelict in our duty. We are trying to do our duty so that in future decades we shall not have to look upon a mess that we did not warn the people about in this country.

I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that the Minister of Finance and his experts answer the questions that have been asked. They can be answered and should be answered if the government are anxious to get this measure through. Some attempt should be made to elucidate it and to tell the house and the country what it is all about and what the government hope to gain by it. I have sat here and expected that the answers to these questions would be forthcoming, but the minister is either unwilling to answer them or he does not know. That is what we are complaining of. We are not getting the information.

A word further in connection with what was said by the hon. member for Calgary West. I deeply appreciate the fact that the people of this country are anxious for some form of international cooperation, and when the proper time comes we shall be able to propose in its entirety a complete plan for international cooperation and the alleviation of the great difficulties that have arisen in connection with international trade and what-not—and it is not the Social Credit programme either. It is the programme of the London chamber of commerce, proposals similar in many ways to ours, which will remove many of the difficulties embodied in these Bretton Woods agreements. We have that in our hands. The minister, I am sure, has seen it. His deputy has seen it. It is quite true, I admit, that it will be somewhat difficult perhaps at this stage to get the support of all the other nations. But may I ask you this, Mr. Chairman, would it not be far wiser to start with something we know is sound and good and has a fair chance of success, than to commit ourselves to something which is questionable, and in which we can have only at the very best a fifty-fifty faith? There are three or four more questions which have to be resolved before it is humanly possible for Bretton Woods to work; and that is what we are trying to get over to the committee. If we wait to get it over, then I am quite willing, and so is my group, to submit to the will of the majority, but we demand a fair opportunity to discuss this matter.

Mr. ABBOTT: You have had it.

Mr. LOW: The Minister of National Defence says that we have had it. I should just like to ask the minister how much longer we have taken on this than the government took on some most inconsequential matters.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The war appropriation bill.

Mr. LOW: Particularly, the matter in which the hon. member for Rosthern helped to talk out a resolution which was of very great importance—talked for a solid hour, during which he said nothing.

Mr. TUCKER: I said in fact what the legion in Saskatoon, the Saskatchewan legion, recently agreed to and carried by resolution.

Mr. LOW: I do not like to hear hon. members, such as the hon. member for Rosthern, who live in a glass-house accuse us of tactics of which he has been guilty.

Mr. TUCKER: I ask the hon. member, did he say this:

Then after we all have spoken in the commons . . .

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. TUCKER: The hon. member made a statement, and I should like to ask him this question—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member for Rosthern may ask a question, with the permission of the hon. member for Peace River.

Mr. LOW: Yes, Mr. Chairman; certainly I will permit a question.

Mr. TUCKER: It is reported in the Ottawa Citizen, in quotation marks, that the hon. member said this:

Then after we all have spoken in the commons this time, we shall talk again in the banking and commerce committee. As a matter of fact, we intend to call witnesses before this committee from Great Britain.

Also in quotation marks:

With vehemence he exclaimed: "We're going to fight, fight, fight—right to the last!

"We're prepared to sit right through till next January if necessary to stop this bill."

Mr. LOW: Mr. Chairman, essentially those are my words; and that comes from the definite conviction on the part of the members of the Social Credit group that they are determined to do their duty until they have been overwhelmed.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is obstruction.

Mr. LOW: Just a minute. I did not say in so many words that we would talk again; I said that we would fight in the committee; and so we will.

Mr. ILSLEY: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: I really did not realize, until I heard that, that the hon. gentleman who represents Peace River and leads the Social Credit party had publicly stated that he would conduct a fight until after the 31st of December in order to kill this. If he does that, he is—

Mr. LOW: I did not say that.

[Mr. Low.]

Mr. ILSLEY: If he is taking advantage of a time element there it makes his action reprehensible.

Mr. LOW: Again, sir, I say that there is a glass-house and those who live in those houses ought not to throw stones. I did not say that we were fighting this in an attempt to hold it over until after the 31st of December.

Mr. TUCKER: You have just mentioned it.

Mr. LOW: I said that we would fight to the bitter end, until we are overwhelmed.

Mr. HANSELL: And we are prepared to.

Mr. LOW: We are prepared to sit, if necessary, until we have had it proved to us definitely that this is a measure we should adopt. I do not go back on that for one second. I had a chat with the minister to-day, and I, to say the least, was disappointed that I was not able to convince him that this matter should be held over until another session. I still do not see why this thing has to be rushed through. The fund will not be held up. The progress of this thing will not be delayed because a nation like Canada, in the seventh place on the list, has not signed and indicated the ratification of the resolution by the 31st of December. If the other nations are prepared to go ahead, let them go ahead and indicate their good faith; but it does not sound like good faith to me, when one nation —and that the United States, which stands to gain the most—is the only one which has ratified it to date.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will correct that. I will give the hon. member the facts.

Mr. LOW: Go ahead. If I am wrong I should like to have them.

Mr. ILSLEY: I was asked that question to-day.

Four countries have speeded legislative action toward ratification, and it now remains for the executive to produce that instrument. They are the United States, China, the Philippines, and Venezuela. Two countries have stated that executive action is pending in that case and have promised it; they are Cuba and South Africa. South Africa indicated its willingness to submit its system to ratification when it would find company in doing so. Yugoslavia has indicated that it is prepared to ratify; whether by executive process or by immediate legislative action is not known. Colombia: a committee of the chamber of deputies has reported the agreement to the chamber with unanimous approval. France: the committee on foreign affairs of the consultative assembly has recommended the agreement to the constitutive assembly when it meets. It is understood that the constitutive assembly is now in process of discussing the agreements. The agreements are at present before the United Kingdom House of Commons.

With regard to the delay, I do not know whether my hon. friend was in the chamber this afternoon when I dealt with that matter. But I want to point out that this agreement has been public; it has been before the people of Canada, and of the world for that matter, for about fifteen months; and in this country it has been known that it was part of government policy since March or April of last spring, when we issued our paper on reconstruction and employment. In August it was stated by myself at a press conference that legislation would be introduced for its ratification at this session. It was foreshadowed in the speech from the throne; a resolution was placed on the order paper at an early stage in the session, and the reason it was not reached until now is that other legislative matters, which appeared to be of at least equal importance, were taken up.

The opposition led by the hon. member for Peace River is only one opposition in this house. Other oppositions felt that other matters were more important, and we did deal with some extraordinarily important matters. Bill No. 15, the emergency powers bill, the budget, the War Appropriation Act, the San Francisco conference; and these were things which in the minds of most hon. members had as much importance as this measure.

I wish to point out, now that we are censured for not bringing this on until now, that we brought it on before it was brought on in the United Kingdom. I wish to point out also that in the United Kingdom it is not felt by the opponents of the Bretton Woods proposal that they must take week after week in an endeavour to defeat it. Three days are assigned there for a discussion of the Bretton Woods proposal and the loan agreement with the United States.

If we are to cause parliamentary institutions to command the respect of the people we must restrain ourselves a little bit in these discussions. It is not for me to advise the Social Credit party, but it seems to me that if I had been connected with the Social Credit party when this came up I would have had two or three of the best speakers to make speeches on it and then I would have let it go forward; because the performance, with the course which is being taken now, whatever my hon. friends will say and however much they will deny that they are obstructing this, coupled with the December 31st date and the statement of my hon. friend, will mean that, if anything happens to this proposal and this agreement fails as a result, the Social Credit party of Canada is taking the responsibility of sabotaging a proposal which in the years to come we shall be very sorry we have not approved.

Mr. LOW: There are one or two things left that I wanted to say. I appreciate the answer which the Minister of Finance has given, because when I talked to him he did not have that information. The United States, I thought, was the only nation that had ratified the agreement. I am prepared to accept the answer given and I am glad to have it, but it only bolsters my argument that they do not need Canada in order to complete the sixty-five per cent of the fund. If all these nations have already ratified or are prepared to ratify, it is all the more reason why Canada should have ample opportunity to go into the matter thoroughly and ascertain whether it is worth ratifying. That is the position we have taken from the start, and we came to that conclusion only after my failure in conversation with several officials of the government to get consideration for the suggestion of standing the matter over until we have had such time as to go into it completely. We have only had a short time to discuss it in committee. Indeed, the time at our disposal would be regarded by the people of Canada as a travesty. We could not take it into committee at this late stage and bring it out of the committee with a recommendation that it be adopted. That could not be done in the short time at our disposal, and that is why I made that statement. If the government will still give us the right to call our witnesses and have the committee go as fast as possible, after we are through with this discussion we are prepared to stay as long as it is necessary instead of rushing the matter through. That is what I meant when I talked to the newspaper man to-day. We do not want to block it; that is not our intention at all. But I would not feel that our group had done their duty if they did not take this stand and try to get the support of the committee. We are only a small group, but small groups have been known to do great things for their countries in times past. History is full of proof of that statement, and the people of this country, I am satisfied, will rise in their admiration for a group that will stand by their convictions and fight to the end, even if the government thinks we are obstructing. We are fighting on the ground of deep conviction, and I want that known. We feel that very important matters have to be resolved before Bretton Woods can begin to do what it is claimed it will do, and those matters we are trying to get before this committee. That is all. I am sure that in due course we shall get them.

One word about the banking and commerce committee. I have not been able to get an assurance from anyone that when we get into that committee there will be ample opportunity for discussion. I have seen these committees work before. I appeared before that committee once and I know what a difficult task I had. I came here in 1940 and appeared before the committee with a request for a charter for an Alberta bank, and I was there for two solid weeks with that matter, which was called inconsequential. What hope can we have of being able to complete the evidence in a short time with respect to a matter of such wide implications as Bretton Woods, where we are asking for a world bank. We are expected to dispose of such an important subject in three or four days. It is ridiculous. That is all I have to say.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not know where we are exactly on this question. A point of order was raised, but I do not know whether a decision has been given upon it. If the decision has not been made, I should like to say a few words. I believe my hon. friends to the left, according to parliamentary rules, have every right to carry on as they are doing, but whether they are justified in the national interests is something that they will have to decide. Until we change our rules, or use the rules that we now have for the purpose of ending the debate, they have a perfect right to carry on. The strongest point was made just a moment ago, and if it had been made by somebody else it would have had some force. That point is that the minister of Finance should have introduced this legislation earlier. That point was raised by the hon. member for Peace River, and yet when it was suggested that the matter should go to the committee on banking and commerce, the hon. member for Lethbridge said that was just what he did not want to have done.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Because it would be hidden there.

Mr. MacINNIS: Then why blame the Minister of Finance for not introducing the legislation earlier, with a view to having it go to the banking and commerce committee, when at the same time you do not want it to go to the committee? That is the kind of argument we have had during this debate. In lieu of this measure my hon. friends have a programme of their own which they want to put into effect. But how long would that take? First of all, they would have to convince this parliament that their programme was one that parliament should accept. After that was done this parliament would have to convince the majority of the other important nations that it was a good programme. Then there would have to be another monetary conference, and that conference would have to deal with that programme and approve of it. Then, finally, it would have to come back here again, and perhaps there would be another group in this house ready to oppose it.

Time and time again I have heard the statement that the proposal before us is preposterous. Well, if there is anything more preposterous than that sort of argument I should like to know what it is. As I have said before, and as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, the leader of this party, has said, we are prepared to let this go to the banking and commerce committee and we are prepared to vote for it as approved by the committee. In my opinion it has one virtue if nothing else, and that is, it brings the nations together in cooperation in dealing with economic and monetary problems. Unless we have that, each nation will be dealing with its own problems as best it can. Each nation will be trying to advance its own interests, regardless of whether it defeats the interests of other nations. Surely the mere fact that we are bringing the nations together where the concern of one nation will be the concern of all is a factor of such importance that we should allow this matter to go to the committee where we can get the evidence. I admit the time is late, and if the point had been raised by some other hon. member, that legislation should have been introduced into the house long ago, that point would have been exceedingly well taken. But it is not well taken by my hon. friends to the left because of their refusal to refer it to the banking committee.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Chairman, you have not ruled on the objection raised by the hon. member for Rosthern. He endeavoured to get you to call me out of order. If you, sir, took such a responsibility as to do that, I would lose a great deal of the high esteem for you that I have so far displayed.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I must remind the hon. member that I cannot be concerned about the esteem that any member has for me. I must abide by the rules that govern debate in committee. This committee at the present time is considering a certain resolution to carry into effect an agreement with respect to an international monetary fund and an international bank for reconstruction and development. Standing order 58, section 2, reads:

Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

Perhaps in the debate that has so far taken place I have allowed too wide a latitude and too much freedom of discussion. Since the hon. member for Rosthern has brought certain matters to my attention, I take it to be the feeling of the committee that in future I should see that the attention of hon. members is kept directed to the rule that speeches must be strictly relevant to the item under consideration.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If hon. members will turn to the resolution now under discussion it will be seen that this house is asked to consider the expediency of adopting this resolution. What do we mean by "expediency"? One of the questions I am going to ask the minister after a while, when we get around to it, is what he means by "expediency." May I read the first two or three lines of the resolution?

Resolved, that it is expedient to present a measure to grant authority to accept on behalf of Canada . . .

And so on. What do we mean by "expediency"? My definition of "expedient" is this, that it is in the interests of those who are considering the proposal. In the speech he delivered the minister himself laid a good deal of emphasis on the fact that the one matter we are considering above all others in this connection is peace. Do I misrepresent the minister's stand? The minister laid a great deal of stress on the fact that our objective in these considerations was peace, did he not?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Then, if the minister was arguing along the right line we should judge of the soundness or otherwise of the Bretton Woods proposal by reference to its ability or non-ability to ensure peace, and the very thing I was discussing when the hon. member for Rosthern went off on a tangent was the question of whether this Bretton Woods thing could guarantee peace. My contention is that it is impossible for this measure to guarantee peace. As a matter of fact, it is the greatest guarantee of war and revolution that one could conceive. The argument I was following was absolutely pertinent and relevant, because I was considering the whole matter of the possibility of the Bretton Woods proposals meeting the difficulty which brings about war. If the hon. member for Rosthern thinks he can argue that away I will give him an opportunity to try. What is the use of passing a thing that we are told is going to help bring about peace when all those who know about actualities in the world as they are to-day know perfectly well that this thing has no chance in the world of guaranteeing peace? What is the use of doing that? Why delude ourselves? We should be like those misguided people who placed such implicit confidence in the league of nations after the last war and, by reason of that fact, allowed themselves to fall into a fatuous policy of unpreparedness which almost resulted in the complete destruction of the British empire. Are we now to be deceived again so soon after the cessation of the second great war, and repose our confidence in a measure like this which cannot possibly accomplish the objectives it purports to accomplish? That is the question. Let the hon. member for Rosthern answer that if he thinks he can.

Mr. TUCKER: I still think the hon. member is out of order.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am not out of order; I am strictly in order. Everything I am saying is directly relevant to the word "expedient."

Even, if I understood the minister's remarks aright the other reason he urged to establish the expediency of this measure was that it would give Canada a certain advantage. I am going to turn to that matter now. Up to the moment the minister has not shown this committee a single, solitary respect in which this measure can give us any advantage whatsoever. He said that it would, but he has not shown it. Saying a thing will do something and proving it are two entirely different things.

If you, Mr. Chairman, will permit me to go on with the line I was following, I should like to take up the next matter. My general line of argument was that if the people who drafted Bretton Woods, the experts from forty-four nations, saw that this agreement could not possibly succeed in attaining its objectives unless four other proposals were implemented, then the first thing they should have done was to concentrate their attention on how to bring the other four principles into operation and then bring in Bretton Woods. The line I was following just before the hon. member for Rosthern interrupted was simply that the other measures are not being introduced, and nothing is known about how they are to be introduced. The result is that Bretton Woods is to be passed and allowed to dangle in the air with all its objectionable features obvious and none of the advantages which it purports to obtain for the country.

I am now going to ask the next question. The second proposal these experts say should be implemented is this: to bring about the orderly marketing of staple commodities at prices fair to producer and consumer alike. That again is so broad it has no meaning at all. Does it mean prices within Canada? Does it mean a policy should be adopted within Canada the application of which will result in prices of wheat and wool and mutton and other primary products in this country going up to the level at which they should be, and prices of manufactured goods coming down to a level which will bring about price parity as between primary products and secondary products? Is that what this thing means? Is it meant to apply to prices within our country, or is it meant to apply to prices as between countries? I wonder if the minister would be able to tell us that. Does this have reference to prices within countries, or does it have reference to prices as between countries?

Mr. ILSLEY: I would think it referred primarily to international arrangements such as wheat agreements, or something of that kind.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Well, you see it is not definite, is it? It must be obvious to all hon. members that the minister's experts have given almost no consideration to this matter. Here is one of the four proposals which the experts at Bretton Woods themselves foresaw would have to be implemented, and here is the Minister of Finance of Canada proposing that we adopt Bretton Woods without having given any attention whatsoever, apparently, to the possibility of implementing that second proposal. Well, does that not show that altogether too little thought has been given this whole matter? If the Bretton Woods proposal is not likely to succeed without the implementing of these four proposals, as the experts tell us, and if apparently the nations concerned have not given any attention to the implementing of those proposals, then obviously to pass Bretton Woods is reckless procedure. Why not go to work on the other four proposals? Social Crediters will be the very first to shout "Hear, hear" with respect to the second proposal I have mentioned.

We are constantly emphasizing the need for just prices—giving fair prices to producers and to consumers. But up to the present time, as the minister knows, in this country our primary producers have just been tortured by the fact that there has been a spread between our primary prices and our secondary production prices, a spread which has been ruinous to our farmers and primary producers. The government has not been able to cope with that situation. They have not been able to cope with the situation in the United States. I do not know of any government in all these connected with the Bretton Woods agreement which has been able to cope with the situation. Yet they imagine that somehow or another, by joining their problems together, and taking away some of their freedom of action, they will be able to solve this problem. Where would you go to find more recklessness in public men?

Here we apparently propose to rush blindly into this matter, without giving full consideration to such wide considerations as that.

Let us have the third one:

3. Deal with the special problems of international concern which will arise from the cessation of production for war purposes.

We do not know anything at all about what that means. Maybe the minister can give us some enlightenment on that. What is being done, internationally? Is there any international machinery contemplated to deal with that particular subject? What would be the nature of that machinery, if it were implemented? How would it affect the ordinary man in Canada? How would it affect our employment problems? Has the minister heard of any international arrangements for implementing that principle?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Carried.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman is asking me questions, but not on the Bretton Woods agreement. These are objectives, which are very important, and with which he says he agrees. He is asking me to outline what is to be done under these. This particular item No. 3 is to reach an agreement in respect of ways and means whereby they may best deal with the political problems of international concern which will arise from the cessation of production for war purposes. That was written in 1943, I believe.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It was 1944, was it not?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that is correct—1944. Of course the war did not end until 1945. There is no doubt that problems do arise from the cessation of production for war purposes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We agree.

Mr. ILSLEY: And I believe, although I cannot give my hon. friend particulars, that with respect to property owned by the United States in Canada, arrangements are made between the two governments with regard to its disposition. I should think this means that anything that covered the disposition of surplus production, built up to a high level during the war, and then brought down to a lower level as a result of peace, would be properly the subject of international discussion.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Before the minister sits down, would he tell us what discussions have been conducted on this problem—discussions of which he is aware?

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot give my hon. friend any information on that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is exactly why I think this whole procedure is simply wrong.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, we have had discussions with countries as to the disposition of surpluses we own in those countries.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What were some of those discussions, what were your decisions; and what were the problems you discussed?

Mr. ILSLEY: The problem of military equipment in the Netherlands, for example, was one. But it is futile for the hon. gentleman to ask me about something outside the Bretton Woods agreement entirely, not in the Bretton Woods agreement at all. I would just have to send for the information, and then try to answer the questions. And this, with respect, is not the forum in which to do that. Where does my hon. friend hope to get, if he does that?

Mr. BLACKMORE: What I am trying to do is to find out whether there are conditions which the Bretton Woods authorities themselves said would be necessary in order that Bretton Woods should succeed—whether those conditions have been complied with. If the minister will refer to the recommendations, from which he himself read, he will find that they say:

> To the participating governments that, in addition to implementing the specific monetary and financial measures which were the subject of this conference, they seek, with a view to creating in the field of international economic relations conditions necessary for the attainment of the purposes of the fund . . .

Obviously these four sets of purposes have to be implemented, before the objective of the fund can be achieved. We judge that, from the very words.

Mr. ILSLEY: No; that is not what it says. It does not say that to enter into agreement under each of these four headings is necessary before the fund will be of any good, or before the fund should be instituted. It does not say that. It does recognize that there are conditions necessary—

> . . . for the attainment of the purposes of the fund, and of the broader primary objectives of economic policy.

It does recognize that. Then it says that it is recommended that the governments seek—> . . . to reach agreement as soon as possible on ways and means whereby they may best—

Do these things. Number 3 is a prospective thing—long before the end of the war. It was passed in 1944. I do not know just what has happened there. Hostilities ceased in August 1945, and there has been dealing among governments as to surpluses, in the various countries.

But, again, what is to be gained by digging out a lot of details about the disposition of those surpluses, when dealing with the Bretton Woods agreement?

Mr. BLACKMORE: May I read once more the words. Remember, this is a special committee appointed by the Bretton Woods people, the people who have their experts, to make certain supplementary recommendations, as I recall it, after having read it two or three times. This committee is giving advice to the various nations. And it says specifically this:

> Recommends:
> To the participating governments—

And Canada would be one, if she joined this group.

> —that, in addition to implementing the specific monetary and financial measures which were the subject of this conference, they seek . . . to reach agreement as soon as possible on ways and means whereby they may best—

Do certain things. They seek this:

> . . . with a view to creating in the field of international economic relations conditions necessary for the attainment of the purposes of the fund, and of the broader primary objectives of economic policy, to reach agreement as soon as possible on ways and means whereby they may best—

And then these four recommendations are given. If we pass this Bretton Woods agreement before we deal with these four recommendations, look at the position we shall be in.

Mr. ILSLEY: What position are we in?

Mr. BLACKMORE: We are in the position of trying to get the harness before we have the cart.

Mr. ILSLEY: You have to start somewhere.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Why not start with the horse and the cart instead of with the harness or the halter? We started with the harness and the halter before we had the horse or the cart. It is obvious that the minister has not given a great deal of attention to these four recommendations. I will wager that the other nations have given just about as much attention to them as that. In other words, they are simply not going to do what they recommend. Then they expect the whole thing to succeed. They will tie us up to the obligation of Bretton Woods, but they will not do the other things that are necessary to make Bretton Woods a success.

May I deal for a moment with No. 3 and state what I had in my mind? I may be all wrong. No. 3 says:

> Deal with the special problems of international concern which will arise from the cessation of production for war purposes.

I would say that the chief interest to the world to-day arising from the cessation of war production is unemployment. Does the minister think I am very far out when I make that statement? We of this group have already gone on record to the effect that the Falk foundation in the United States has made an estimate that there will be 20,000,000 unemployed in the United States by the time a return to normal conditions has been reached.

Mr. TUCKER: Mr. Chairman, again I rise to a point of order. This resolution sets out:

> That it is expedient to present a measure to grant authority to accept on behalf of Canada and to carry out the obligations of Canada under the articles of agreement for an international monetary fund . . .

And so on. It does not say "to carry out all the resolutions of the Bretton Woods conference"; it just says that it is expedient that Canada should adhere to the international monetary fund agreement. It is quite true that the Bretton Woods conference passed a subsidiary resolution which said:

> Whereas, it is recognized that the complete attainment of this and other purposes and objectives stated in the agreement cannot be achieved through the instrumentality of the fund alone.

Therefore we recommend these additional measures. When all that we are being asked to do is to adhere to the international monetary fund, by what manner of reasoning can the hon. member bring in these other recommendations? It is true that a subsidiary resolution was passed that we do certain other things to carry out the same purpose; but by what reasoning can the hon. member say that he is in order when he persists in discussing these other subjects which the Bretton Woods conference recommended? They recommended the international monetary fund; they recommended the international bank for reconstruction and development. Then they said it was realized that this could not carry out all the purposes which the conference had in mind, and therefore they recommended these other things.

When my hon. friend persists in discussing these other recommendations he is not discussing the international monetary fund and the international bank for reconstruction and development. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, when he is discussing these subsidiary resolutions which were to promote the same objective and which had no other connection except they were passed at the same conference, when he persists in discussing these collateral matters I suggest that he is out of order.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Before you make your ruling, Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. member whether or not he gathers from the language used in the recommendations that the fund will be a success without the four recommendations?

Mr. TUCKER: I gather this, that it will contribute to the welfare of Canada and to the nations of the world and that these other things will also contribute to that end. You have to go one step at a time. To-day this parliament is being asked to approve one step only, and my hon. friend is seeking to discuss all the other steps which this conference said that it would be desirable to take.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the hon. member answer the question I asked? I ask the hon. member if in his opinion and in the opinion of the committee these recommendations indicate that the men who drafted them believed the fund would succeed without their being implemented.

Mr. TUCKER: I shall read the actual resolution:

> Whereas, it is recognized that the complete attainment of this and other purposes and objectives stated in the agreement cannot be achieved through the instrumentality of the fund alone.

In other words, they said that complete attainment of the high objectives of Bretton Woods could not be attained by the fund alone. They also recommended the international bank for reconstruction and development. Then they went on to recommend the other four measures which my hon. friend is discussing. In other words, they recommended several things. All that parliament is being asked to do to-day is to approve the adherence to the international monetary fund and the international bank for reconstruction and development. My hon. friend is trying to discuss these collateral issues which are designed to promote the same objective, but which by no means will prevent the monetary fund from doing a great deal of good, whether they are carried out or not.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The point the hon. member persists in disregarding or sidestepping is this: Does he believe that the fund can succeed without these other four recommendations being implemented? From his remarks I gather that he is agreed that the fund will not succeed without these other four principles being implemented.

Mr. TUCKER: I say it is the opinion of the representatives and the experts of the forty-four nations that the complete purposes and objectives which the fund strives to work for cannot be attained without some of these other things, but it says actually—

Mr. BLACKMORE: All these other four.

Mr. TUCKER: —a complete attainment of these purposes cannot be achieved through the instrumentality of the fund alone; that is all. It can do a great deal of good. All we are doing is seeking to go one step at a time. We are asking parliament to approve this international monetary fund and international bank for reconstruction and development. At this particular moment we are not asking parliament to approve these other four recommendations. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that when my hon. friend persists in discussing these other four recommendations he is definitely out of order.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I say a word. What are we discussing? Is it not a resolution which begins in this way:

That it is expedient to present a measure . . .

It is either expedient to present the measure, or it is not. Most of us in this house take the view that it is expedient to present the measure in order that we may understand what the measure contains, and that when the measure itself is referred to the banking and commerce committee, which we hoped would be done quite early in this debate, then all of us who are interested in certain features of this proposed measure would have an opportunity or inquiring into those features. It seems to me that this debate is running along on the assumption that we are discussing the measure when, as a matter of fact, we are merely discussing whether it is expedient to give authority to the government to present the measure. I suggest that what we should do is to allow the government to do that. By our vote on second reading we indicate that we should allow the government to present that measure, to send it to the committee where we can call the people who were involved in the drafting, if you like, of the measure, so that we might understand it more thoroughly.

At the rate we are going here we are really understanding nothing about the measure. We are discussing broad principles, and we have not yet seen the bill that the government proposes to introduce following the resolution. I wish we could proceed and get down to some real understanding of this matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, hon. members will recall that some days ago I made a statement to the house as to the business for the remainder of the session. That statement was made after a conference I had with the leaders of the three groups of this house as to how we might best expedite the business so that it might be possible for this particular session to be prorogued about the 15th of this month.

My recollection is that at the time we considered carefully in a general, but not in any final way, how much time should be allotted to different measures. At the same time the government was asked to make a statement to the house as to what measures, if any, might be dropped from the sessional programme so as to help ensure the prorogation at the time I have just mentioned.

Some days later I stated to the house that there were certain measures we were prepared to drop. I recall at the moment that the important measure respecting citizenship was one. I also mentioned that if another bill, the emergency powers bill were passed, it would be possible for us to do by order in council with respect to certain measures that were desired by the Department of Veterans Affairs what otherwise it might be necessary to have done in the form of legislative enactment. It was agreed then that we would endeavour to bring forward the emergency powers bill before we brought forward some other measures. That has been done and that measure has left this house.

Mention was also made of the resolution which is now before the house, and unless I am greatly mistaken there was a general understanding that this bill based on this resolution would go to the banking and commerce committee, and that until after it had gone to the banking and commerce committee there would not be prolonged discussion at the resolution stage. If I am wrong in that I hope I shall be corrected. But that was the understanding as I recall it, and we have all been working toward it. Cooperation of the kind is the only way in which the House of Commons, especially now that it is composed of four parties, can get through its work; that is, by working together in accordance with a general understanding.

I would appeal to my hon. friends of the Social Credit group to recall what was said at that time. In the first place may I point out that they have already adopted a course in regard to this resolution which is most uncommon, namely, that of long debate on the first reading of the resolution. The house gave an expression of its view on the first reading of the resolution. The house was divided on it and the division was no uncertain one. As I look at the record, the vote was 124 to 12 in favour of the resolution. In the light of that expression by the house, I would submit that my hon. friends ought to realize that the House of Commons as a whole is anxious that progress should be made, and made with this particular measure. There can be no objection at all to my hon. friends registering their opposition as strongly as they may wish to register it, but there is nothing to be gained by repeating and repeating and repeating; much less is there anything to be gained by unnecessarily straying to some extent beyond the motion which is before the committee for discussion and following also a course of procedure which causes many points of order to be raised.

I think it is essential and important in the business of parliament and in the interests of every hon. member of the house that at this time I should make plain that while the government is anxious to get through its business by the date I have mentioned, we are quite determined that what I have stated would be the remaining legislation for the session must be carried through before we prorogue. If we cannot conclude our work this week we shall have to go on before proroguing, and the government will have to consider whether we shall continue next week, or adjourn until after the Christmas recess, or until after the New Year. But we do intend to proceed with the rest of the measures I have said would be gone on with. That was understood and must be adhered to. In saying this, I am not saying anything that has not been already stated. It is not some new device to hasten the progress of any particular measure. It is simply to put the position clearly to the house.

What I should like to say to my hon. friends of the Social Credit group is this. The house knows now that they feel very strongly about the enactment of this measure. They have shown that, by opposing the resolution on the first reading, and they are showing it by debating it at considerable length on the second reading. They have made their position very clear. But as the leader of the C.C.F. party has said, the bill itself has not yet been introduced, and my hon. friends know, particularly the hon. member for Lethbridge, that the right place at which to receive full information and details in regard to any bill, if it is going to a committee of the house, is before that committee, when the minister can have present the experts he may wish to have present, and where information can be given in detail. But it is not customary in the procedure of the house to take up the time of the house by seeking to get details on the resolution which precedes a bill, when it is understood that the bill itself is to go to a committee.

May I say one word further as to procedure when the bill comes before the committee. The government is placing no restriction on what may be done before the committee. Hon. members may seek all the information they desire and propose any amendments, and then when the bill comes back to the house from the committee it will go before the committee of the whole of this house. The government is placing no restrictions at all on what is to be discussed in the committee except the restrictions that the rules impose. There will be opportunities there for hon. gentlemen to express further their views and if they so desire to propose amendments. Again there is an opportunity for debate on the third reading of the bill, at which time, if hon. members feel necessarily so disposed, they can move amendments and vote against the measure.

With all that opportunity before them and realizing what the position is at this particular stage and what they know to be the wishes of hon. members generally, I ask my hon. friends of the Social Credit group if they could not be content, so far as this resolution is concerned, to register their position at this stage once and for all, and, having done so fully, allow the resolution to pass, the bill itself to be introduced and as it is now understood it will be, sent, after second reading, to the banking and commerce committee. Unless they adopt that course I am afraid that their position will be understood by this house to be one of obstruction and will be so viewed by the country.

Up to the present time it has not been necessary for this government to take advantage of some of the rules which are intended to prevent obstruction.

I noticed in listening to the remarks of my hon. friend the member for Vancouver East, who is an old parliamentarian, that he said there were rules to stop unnecessary discussion. I hope I shall never have to suggest to the house that we take advantage of certain rules to shorten unnecessary debate. That is the last thing the government would wish to do. But if debate does reach the point where it ceases to be debate and becomes by endless and unnecessary repetition and irrelevancies obstruction, the rules are there to protect the house and may have to be applied.

I again say to my hon. friends that I hope they will cooperate with all the other members of this house in enabling us to make progress at this stage. We can take only one stage at a time.

Mr. LOW: I should like to say just one word with respect to the understanding that was had among the leaders of the groups who met with the Prime Minister. I think the group around me have respected that understanding. In fact I believe, sir, if you look over Hansard, you will find that we have built up a pretty substantial bank account on which to draw in respect of this measure. We have tried to observe that understanding and we did, I am sure, with respect to all the measures that preceded this one. But, I recall that at the time the further business of the house was discussed I asked that this measure be held over. I also suggested that it would probably touch off a pretty heavy discussion. I believe both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance will recall my mentioning that.

My recollection of a study of parliamentary procedure tells me that we have been drifting farther and farther away from what used to be one of its ancient and honourable practices, that of having the fullest possible discussion in just such a committee as this. Here is where the finest discussion can take place, and here is where the ministers who are under fire, as it were, are supposed to answer the questions that are put to them by the members. Otherwise how in the name of common sense can anybody ever determine whether or not the principle of a measure which is to be introduced is worthy of being introduced? That is exactly what we are trying to establish. It is not obstruction. All the information we have tried to obtain is relevant to the whole problem. I believe I did make this statement a few minutes ago, and I wish to go this far in impressing it on the committee, that three important things have to be resolved before Bretton Woods can hope to have even an even chance of success.

The first is this: can the United Kingdom, for which we are very much concerned, pay its way with or without being relieved of the nightmare of its huge war debts?

An hon. MEMBER: What about Canada?

Mr. LOW: Well, Canada is in the same position in a way.

The second thing which has to be resolved is this: can the United States find ways of increasing the stream of spending within its domestic economy sufficiently fast to employ its new-found producing power, indisputable evidence of which I presented in this chamber last Friday night and Saturday?

The third question is: can the the United States create an import surplus large enough to prevent a chronic shortage of dollars?

I suggested that these questions ought to be weighed extremely carefully, because the penalties of the failure of Bretton Woods will be extremely heavy penalties for succeeding generations. It is in that spirit that we are attempting to establish here a basis of judgment; so that when the measure is brought before the banking and commerce committee we can have something to go on, some information which the minister is in a position to supply, in order that we can elicit from the witnesses there information which will enable us to make up our minds.

I would say this on behalf of my group: I will attempt to facilitate the business of this house to the utmost of my capability; but since I have around me men of undoubted integrity and deep convictions I cannot bludgeon them, and I do not intend to try to bludgeon them in this matter. They have the right to speak; it is their undoubted right in a committee of this kind to speak and get the information which is necessary for them to make up their minds and to know definitely what the situation is. I will do my best to facilitate action; I just ask the committee to give us a bit more time to round up the case, and we will see what we can do about getting this out of committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thank my hon. friend for his promise of cooperation. My purpose in rising is to touch a little further on a point of procedure which he himself has raised and which is the main point I am raising at the present time.

My hon. friend has said that this house is drifting, that we are getting away from ancient and honourable tradition. May I point out that this may be true, but if it is true it is the fault of his group, for this reason, that the ancient and honourable tradition of this house is not to debate a measure of this kind on the resolution; it is to debate it on the second reading of the bill or when the house is in committee on the bill or on the third reading of the bill. It is not the tradition in this house, nor has it been the tradition in the British House of Commons to debate a measure at length upon the moving of the resolution which precedes its introduction. My memory goes back a certain distance in this house, and I can remember quite well that Sir Wilfrid Laurier—as far back as that, and there were also others before him—took very strong exception to the house spending its time in debating a resolution before the introduction of a bill. The custom has changed to some extent, but I just want to say that I hope we shall not drift farther in that direction, especially when we have four parties in this house; otherwise we shall never get through its business. What I am pleading for is the fullest opportunity of every party to make its position perfectly plain, but that we follow if we can the custom of the British house, which is based on ancient and honourable tradition, and do what they do there: fix as largely as possible, a limit of definite time within which a debate is to take place. In a most important debate such as has been mentioned by the Minister of Finance to-night this very subject of Bretton Woods, combined with the great question of financial relations between the United States and Britain, only two or three days has been set apart. It is the only way business can be carried through. We have taken nearly three days, as I understand it, on the resolution, and we have still to send the bill to the banking and commerce committee and to deal with it when it comes back from the committee. I do not wish to cause any hon. member to hesitate to speak; I do not think it will be thought I am attempting to bludgeon anyone; I am seeking to persuade hon. members to follow a course prescribed by the rules, which is in their interest as much as it is in the interest of all hon. members of the house to have strictly followed.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Until this session, as hon. members know, I have been leader of the Social Credit group in this house. Now I am going to ask if the Prime Minister or anyone in this house can accuse me of having been non-cooperative here with the government in its efforts to get through the business. I think no one will raise a word against the record which our party has in this house. Indeed, we have been so cooperative that one man, whom I would name were it not for the fact that he has passed beyond the veil, went out into the election campaign in Alberta and told the people of that province that we were a weak and ineffective lot who did not really make our opinions felt. That alone ought to be sufficient answer to the Prime Minister, and it ought to be sufficient justification in this house for the amount of attention we are giving this measure.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

It just happens that, because of the peculiar nature of the social credit movement, it has become necessary for that movement to understand finance and trade. The result is that this particular measure is one upon which we are more or less specialists.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BLACKMORE: A fine lot of reward a person gets for being cooperative! I say that we see in this measure dangers which the ordinary individual in the house does not see because he has not had the training we have had.

In answer to what the Prime Minister said—of course he has not been in the chamber during this discussion—I am going to ask hon. members of the committee on any side, what were the Social Credit group doing during the long and tedious days of wrangling over the war appropriation bill? Were we talking or were the Progressive Conservatives doing the talking?

Mr. HOMUTH: Well, now, wait, and do not bring us into this argument, or this will certainly go on.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If the hon. member wants to take the floor I will sit down. The point is, as the hon. member for Peace River says, we have a substantial time bank account, which we have carefully preserved. We sat still during the long discussion on the war appropriation bill, because we doubted whether it would make a bit of difference to the conduct of the administration. In other words, in our opinion the discussion that went on there was utterly idle and a waste of time, and the bill after all did not affect the country except so far as taxation was concerned.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Surely it is not permissible in this debate to resurrect argument made in another debate on an entirely different subject.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is permissible to point to the records of the various groups in this house.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Chairman, may I ask for a ruling on that point. It is the only way we can get this stopped; I am sure of that.

The CHAIRMAN: Some question has been raised as to the amount of time taken up, and perhaps the hon. member is not entirely out of order in pointing out how much time he and his colleagues have consumed. I think he has already done that, however, and I would again call his attention to the rule

I previously quoted, standing order 58, section 2, which states that discusson must be relevant to the matter under consideration.

Mr. BLACKMORE: When it comes to discussion of the Bretton Woods agreement I am perfectly at home. I will turn to the speech which the minister himself gave, which surely is relevant to the question under discussion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has made a reference to myself, and before he proceeds I should like to supplement that I have said by quoting from Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, page 168, section 439:

The object of the resolution recommended by the crown is to give the house a first opportunity to discuss the advisability of making a certain expenditure. The details of the projected measure are not then disclosed and debate is confined to the resolution, which should not be lengthy, although care must be taken that the terms used are sufficiently wide to cover the whole of the bill which will be subsequently introduced.

It is perfectly clear that the rules of the house are that a resolution is simply to give members an opportunity to discuss the advisability of making certain expenditures, reserving for other stages fuller discussion. That is all I ask my hon. friends to do.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I must be impressed by any reading of the rules of the house; yet I wish to read another rule. Before I do so, however, I would call the Prime Minister's attention to the fact that the item under discussion at the present time is not money that is to be spent—not by any means. If it were an offer to spend five billions I would not object. It is not the spending of money; it is the risk of liberty—that is the point—and the risk of war. We are not discussing a money problem at all. If we were, the rule which the Prime Minister has read would apply. But since we are discussing what we are, may I read to the house standing order 58:

The standing orders of the house shall be observed in the committees of the whole house so far as may be applicable, except the standing orders as to the seconding of motions and limiting the number of times of speaking.

If that rule does not indicate quite clearly that the committee of the whole, on a resolution, is for the purpose of allowing members to ask every kind of question they deem advisable, in order to get information of every kind which they desire to obtain from a minister, then I should like to know why the rule is there. I think that is an answer to the Prime Minister.

Let me now turn to the speech which was made by the minister when discussing Bretton Woods. I would quote from page 3040 of Hansard, and I will ask the minister for explanations of certain terms which he uses. I presume that the speech which the minister gave in the house was designed to convince the house of the expediency of the measure. It is important to know what he meant by the terms he used when he said:

This conference was held after a couple of years of intensive discussion among the treasury officials of a large number of united nations.

May I ask the minister who originated the Bretton Woods agreement. Was it originated in Canada, and, if so, by whom? In the United States, and, if so, by whom? Or in Great Britain, and, if so, by whom, and at whose instigation, so far as is known?

Mr. ILSLEY: It originated as set out in the papers that were tabled in this house, the document entitled, "International stabilization of currencies", which was printed and tabled in this house, I believe in 1943. There were two or three papers prepared. The document contains the text of a paper setting out proposals by British experts for an international clearing union, and the text of the statement on international stabilization of currencies presented to the United States senate committee on April 5, 1943, as well as the text and draft outline of a proposal by United States experts for united and associated nations stabilization fund. Then the Canadian experts produced, about that time or shortly afterwards, a document entitled "Tentative draft proposals of Canadian experts for an international exchange union".

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is very good, but what I wish to know is which one of the nations originated this thing. Did Canada? Did the United States? Did Great Britain? Or did the thing spring up like an epidemic?

Mr. ILSLEY: The British and Americans were both working on the proposals about the same time and they came out about the same time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Which one came first?

Mr. ILSLEY: They were within a day or two of each other.

Mr. QUELCH: When I spoke the other day I asked the minister to give me the terms of reference under which the Canadian experts first of all drew up their plans.

Mr. ILSLEY: There were no formal terms of reference.

Mr. QUELCH: Surely the minister does not mean to say that he called a number of men together and told them to draft plans for some sort of monetary stabilization fund. Were they advised to draw up a plan on the basis of gold, or were they advised to draw up a multilateral plan on the basis of national currencies or on the basis of an index of prices? There must have been some instructions.

Mr. ILSLEY: The United States plan and British plan came out and there was a wide divergence between them. We thought we could render some service in devising plans which would not be the same as either but would give to some extent the views of our experts. They were instructed to go to work on it and see what they could produce.

Mr. JAQUES: What was the date of it?

Mr. ILSLEY: The 9th day of June, 1943; that is the Canadian plan.

Mr. JAQUES: I should like to remind the minister that in April, 1943, Mr. Morgenthau published his plan.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. JAQUES: I brought the matter to the attention of this house, and I was blackguarded from one end of Canada to the other by the press. So that this idea goes back a little longer than the minister is saying.

Mr. ILSLEY: No. I stated that the British plan and the United States plan came out before the Canadian plan was prepared. I stated that the Canadian plan was published in June, 1943, and the others were somewhat before that. As a matter of fact, the United States plan was published in April, 1943. I do not know when my hon. friend was blackguarded or what for.

Mr. JAQUES: The plan to surrender the sovereignty of Canada was certainly started by April 1, 1943, if not before, because Mr. Sandwell addressed a meeting of the league of nations society and said that the loyalty of the Canadian people would have to be weaned away from the crown to an international authority, and a few days later Mr. Morgenthau published his plan in Washington which called for an international bank that would be above parliament and above congress. I brought that to the attention of this house and was roundly abused for so doing.

Mr. QUELCH: Will the minister say whether Canada to-day is definitely committed to this Bretton Woods agreement?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is government policy, yes.

[Mr. Quelch.]

Mr. QUELCH: Is Canada committed? Have any definite commitments been made to the United States in regard to the Bretton Woods agreement?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, no. We cannot do anything like this, except subject to the approval of parliament.

Mr. QUELCH: Could the minister tell the committee exactly what the experience has been in regard to the attitude of Russia? I remember that when we had the London and Washington conferences Russia refused to participate. They sat in, and that was all. Then finally I understand at Bretton Woods they gave in, shall I say, or at all events signed the agreement. To-day Russia is a signatory as far as her exports are concerned, but has the Russian government signed the Bretton Woods agreement or definitely committed itself to it?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, not as far as I know.

Mr. QUELCH: Have they asked for any special consideration in regard to this agreement? I received notification from London that they had refused to have their internal currency tied up to gold in any shape or form. Has Russia asked for any different treatment from that to which the other nations have agreed?

Mr. ILSLEY: Not to the knowledge of the Canadian government.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the resolution?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. BLACKMORE: No; it is not anywhere near carried. I wish to find out what the minister meant by certain expressions he used in his speech, but I will tell the committee what we in this group think with respect to the origin of this whole matter. We believe that this thing originated in the United States; we believe that certain powerful citizens in that country got the ear of the administration and caused that administration to originate these proposals. We believe that from the beginning the proposals were definitely for the United States, and that probably the only reason the British brought out a plan was that they were terrified at the possible impact of the United States proposal and brought out one of their own in self-defence, for the United States proposal is based upon gold and the British proposal is based upon goods and services. The British proposal was sane in that respect. If the minister can give us any information that would dispel these fears, it would help. As a matter of fact, I have a source of information which I think justifies me in believing that this whole proposal originated with the administration of the United States. Can the minister give us any information on that?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. My impression was, and I always thought, that the British started working on their proposal at least as soon as the United States government started working on its proposal; in fact, if I had not checked when the question was asked me I would have said that to the best of my knowledge the British started first. Certainly they started about the same time. We have no reason to think this originated with certain individuals in the United States. I do not know the individuals to whom the hon. gentleman is referring; I have no idea.

Mr. QUELCH: There is one article that is of considerable importance to the debtor nations; that is article VIII, section 4. This is another section which undoubtedly will greatly embarrass the debtor nations, and I quote:

> Convertibility of foreign-held balances.
> (a) Each member shall buy balances of its currency held by another member if the latter, in requesting the purchase, represents
> (i) that the balances to be bought have been recently acquired as a result of current transactions; or
>
> (ii) that their conversion is needed for making payments for current transactions.
> The buying member shall have the option to pay either in the currency of the member making the request or in gold.

The question I should like to ask the minister is this. If a member does not possess gold, how can it buy its currency with gold? It merely states that a member shall buy its currency in gold. Who is to provide that nation with gold if it is not a gold producer? That is all very well for nations like Canada, the United States, Russia and South Africa and the nations that are heavy gold producers, but what about those nations which are not gold producers? How can they buy currency with gold if they do not possess any?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the hon member pardon me? I have to interrupt him for what I have in mind. I know the committee is anxious to have this business concluded, and I wonder if hon. gentlemen would agree to have the committee sit after eleven o'clock in order that we may make progress.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then I would move when the Speaker is in the chair that Mr. Speaker do not leave the chair at eleven o'clock. Perhaps we would have it understood that we will conclude the debate on the resolution this evening and get this measure to the committee.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have no objection to extending the sittings of the house, provided that we can get through to-night.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That would be the understanding.

Mr. COLDWELL: But if we are not going to get through to-night I see no object in sitting any longer. If there are just a few more questions that have to be asked and we can finish in half an hour or so I would be quite agreeable, but if we cannot get that understanding I am going to say no to the suggestion.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has intimated the truth. It will not do any good to stay here until two o'clock; we will still be here asking questions. As long as the house remains here and discusses Bretton Woods we are going to be here asking questions, until all our questions are answered. I think the new set of questions we started on, as to who originated this plan, are eliciting information which should be of great interest to hon. members. So that I suggest we rise at eleven o'clock.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

FIFTH AND SIXTH REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Fifth report of the standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Cleaver.

Mr. HUGHES CLEAVER (Halton) presented the sixth report of the standing committee on banking and commerce, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE—MR. LOW

REFERENCE TO REPORT IN OTTAWA "CITIZEN" OF DECEMBER 11

On the orders of the day:

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I should like to rise to a question of privilege. I hold in my hand a copy of the Ottawa Citizen for this morning, December 11, on the front page of which appears an article written by Torchy Anderson, Citizen parliamentary writer. This article is headed "Leader S. Low Seems Facing Party 'Revolt'", and goes on to say:

Following last night's abortive effort to advance legislation by which Canada would participate in Bretton Woods financial undertakings, corridor rumour had it that Solon Low, Social Credit Leader, faced something of a revolt within the ranks of his party. It was said that as late as yesterday afternoon Mr. Low had assured other leaders that the first stage of the debate could be finished.

My point of privilege is this: In the first place, Solon Low does not face any threat of party revolt. I endorse completely the action that was taken by hon. members who were speaking, asking questions and trying to get information here until eleven o'clock last night. I repeat that I endorse that completely.

Secondly, I did not at any time give any undertaking to anybody that the debate could be finished. I have repeatedly assured the leaders of other groups that I would do my best to see that the business of the house was advanced—and I am doing my best. But at the same time I am trying to do my best for the people of this country. And I want it definitely known that the writer of this article is trying his level best to read something into the actions of this group that he has no right to read into them.

Furthermore, when anybody in any article of this kind tries to impress upon the public that the Social Credit group is engaged in a filibuster for the assured purpose of blocking the business of this house, that is not true. I wish it definitely known that thus far this group has questioned only six out of the twenty-six articles in the Bretton Woods agreement, and there are hundreds of questions remaining that could be asked with respect to it.

MAPLE PRODUCTS

AMENDMENT OF ACT RESPECTING DEFINITIONS, ETC.

The house resumed from Monday, December 10, consideration in committee of bill No. 232, respecting the manufacturing, inspection and sale of maple products—Mr. Gardiner—Mr. Golding in the chair.

Sections 1 to 10 inclusive agreed to.

On section 11—Use of licence number restricted.

Mr. HAZEN: How are licences issued under this section? Where is it provided that a licence shall be issued?

[Mr. Low.]

Mr. GARDINER: Subsection 6 of section 10 reads:

Every manufacturing or packing plant and every sugar camp shall, when licensed, be assigned a licence number for use on labels and containers of maple products.

Then subsection 1 of section 10 reads:

All manufacturing or packing plants shall apply to the Department of Agriculture at Ottawa for registration.

And subsection 2:

Any manufacturing or packing plant shipping maple products from one province to another or exporting such products shall obtain a licence from the minister.

And subsection 3:

Such licence shall remain in effect until the 31st day of March following the date of issue—

Section 10 provides for the issuing of the licences, and then section 10 provides that any person who unlawfully places, or causes to be placed, any number purporting to be a licence number issued to him under this act and regulation on any label shall be liable to a punishment.

Mr. HAZEN: Have any fees for licences been fixed?

Mr. GARDINER: Section 18 covers that.

Mr. SENN: Subsection 4 of section 10 reads:

Any sugar camp from which maple products are exported or shipped to another province may be required by the minister to obtain a licence which shall be issued without fee.

Mr. SENN: There are a lot of sugar camps which put up their product in cans or in other saleable form which goes into the trade. The owner of the sugar camp would not know whether that eventually goes into another province. Would he be liable if he had not a licence and the product went into another province through the trade?

Mr. GARDINER: He would be liable if he himself shipped it. It refers to manufacturing or packing plants. Those who are handling the product must comply with the act. Any person, whether he is the original producer or a packer or in business, who ships out of the province without a licence, is liable to a fine.

Mr. SENN: Would the owner of a small sugar camp with perhaps five or six hundred trees be liable?

Mr. GARDINER: If he exports.

Mr. SENN: He would not be liable if his product went into the trade and then into another province?

Mr. GARDINER: Not if he did not export it himself.

Mr. HAZEN: Were these amendments taken up with the sugar producers in the different provinces?

Mr. GARDINER: They would be discussed with the sugar producers in the different provinces. I may say that the gentleman who piloted the bill through the senate, where it was before it came here, is a sugar producer in the province of Quebec. This bill was discussed fully by those who are concerned with it.

Section agreed to.

Sections 12 to 19 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

WAR SERVICE GRANTS

INCORPORATION OF ORDERS IN COUNCIL—RECOMMENDATIONS OF VETERANS AFFAIRS COMMITTEE—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE: (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to bill 176, to amend the War Service Grants Act.

He said: These amendments are purely typographical in character and will be found on page 445 of Votes and Proceedings. The hon. member for Royal has gone through them and is satisfied that there is no change in principle. I move that they be concurred in.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND — INTERNATIONAL BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT

The house resumed from Monday, December 10, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair:

That it is expedient to present a measure to grant authority to accept on behalf of Canada and to carry out the obligations of Canada under the articles of agreement for an international monetary fund and an international bank for reconstruction and development prepared by the united nations monetary and financial conference held at Bretton Woods in July, 1944; to authorize the payment of the subscriptions required from Canada out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund to an amount not exceeding seven hundred million dollars; and to authorize the borrowing under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, of sums not exceeding seven hundred million dollars.

Mr. QUELCH: Mr. Chairman, I am sure that all hon. members hope to be clear of the woods before long. I come from the prairies and quite frankly I admit that I shall be glad to get out of the woods and back to the prairies. It has been suggested that we have been trying to obstruct this measure, but I would point out that if we were we could quite easily do it until the new year. We have raised questions on only about six articles, and there are thirty-one. We could ask questions on every single one of those articles, and then in addition there are the schedules. It cannot be said that we have received answers to all the questions that we have asked at this stage. When we are in the committee on banking and commerce we will be justified in asking for an explanation of every subsection of every section of every article; that is, a full explanation of just exactly what those sections and articles mean.

Just before eleven o'clock last night I was asking the minister if he would explain what section 4 article VIII means. I will read it to him so that he can get the purport of my question.

Section 4, article VIII reads:

Each member shall buy balances of its currency held by another member if the latter, in requesting the purchase, represents

(i) that the balances to be bought have been recently acquired as the result of current transactions; or

(ii) that their conversion is needed for making payments for current transactions.

This is the point. It goes on:

The buying member shall have the option to pay either in the currency of the member making the request or in gold.

If a nation had an unfavourable balance of trade it would not be able to pay in the currency of the other member nation and it must buy its own currency in gold. Where does it get the gold to buy that currency?

Mr. ILSLEY: Would the hon. member go on with something else until I get that worked out? It is a complicated question.

Mr. QUELCH: I asked the minister yesterday afternoon this question: Suppose the fund has opened its doors for business, what difference would it make in the operation of the business of a country? Will it necessitate a gold basis or gold reserve? Would the minister say no?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. QUELCH: There is no question that it means that every nation will have to have a gold reserve, because it is compelled to buy its own currency; therefore every nation must set up a gold reserve. Where are they going to get the gold if they have not got it?

Mr. ILSLEY: Where is there anything to say they have to pay in gold?

Mr. QUELCH: In section 4 of article VIII, which I have just read. It says:

> The buying member shall have the option to pay either in the currency of the member making the request or in gold.

How can it get the currency of the member making the request except by trading with that nation, and if that nation refuses to buy its goods it cannot get its currency and therefore it has to get gold.

Mr. ILSLEY: It would get the other nation's currency from the fund.

Mr. QUELCH: If its quota is exhausted it cannot get it from the fund.

Mr. ILSLEY: If it has exhausted its quota in the fund it does not have to do this.

Mr. QUELCH: Section 8 of article V deals with the question of a nation having exhausted its quota, in which case it cannot borrow any more from the fund. The nations that have its currency begin to get scared and they want to get rid of that nation's currency, and they demand payment, and the only way in which it could pay would be in gold.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is not the answer found in section 4(v) of article VIII?

Mr. QUELCH: That is different.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is what the hon. gentleman is talking about—convertibility of foreign balances.

Mr. QUELCH: You still have the difficulty that under section 8 of article V, when a member nation can no longer use the resources of the fund, it has to have gold. In view of the fact that there are several clauses in the articles of the fund requiring gold I think the minister will admit that for the successful operation of the fund each member must carry a reserve of gold.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I do not admit that.

Mr. QUELCH: The minister will remember that when I started I said that I would try to prove that this was not merely a form of the old gold standard but that in many respects it was worse, and I will refer to the various reasons why I made that charge.

But first of all let me point out that no doubt the intention of the scheme is to try to provide for a redistribution of the large amount of gold that is held by the United States. I think the minister will agree with that. A large amount of that gold will be made available to the various nations of the world. If the minister says no to that, we can only wait and see whether that is done, but I am satisfied that that is what will happen. There is no question that this fund will give the United States a very great power in the world, and its voting power will steadily expand, as its sales of currency increase and the voting power of other nations will decrease as they purchase United States currency. That is provided in the voting powers, so the United States will have a certain power when the fund comes into operation, and everything points to the fact that as time goes on that voting power will increase. If the United States had given an example to the world of how a country might be run on model lines, there might be some justification for suggesting that the United States should have greater power in the world to-day. But when we look back upon the record of the United States in between the two wars and remember the great amount of racketeering that took place therein, the extreme poverty which existed in many areas of the United States, especially among the sharecroppers—I think we shall have to admit that as an example—the United States cannot be the model upon which the whole world should be built. Until a nation has demonstrated to the world that it has set its own house in order and has shown how good conditions may be made available to all classes of its people, it can hardly contend that it is in a position to say how the world should be run.

As I pointed out to the minister when I first spoke in the committee stage, this is definitely a form of the gold standard, and in many ways worse. I should like to draw the minister's attention to these facts: article VII, subparagraph (ii) of section 2, provides that a nation, on demand by the fund, must buy gold when its currency is scarce, and that a nation, on demand by a nation holding its currency, must be prepared to sell gold—that is when currency is surplus. I say this is worse than the ordinary gold standard, for this reason. Severe penalties are imposed on nations when they get into a position where they have exceeded their quota and can no longer draw from the fund, when they have exceeded their right of drawing currency from the fund, and when their rate of interest has gone up to five per cent; and if a nation withdraws from the fund the other nations are pledged to discriminate to a certain extent against that nation. As to the extent to which they would discriminate, it is impossible to say; it will all depend on the conditions that exist at that time.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is incorrect. There is no obligation to discriminate against that nation.

Mr. QUELCH: It says that the members must not trade, on conditions other than the fund permits.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, they shall not use that nation as—

Mr. QUELCH: Contrary to the purpose of the fund; if a withdrawing nation is operating contrary to the fund they cannot trade with it.

Mr. ILSLEY: That certainly is not so.

Mr. QUELCH: It certainly is so. The words "contrary to the fund" are there. If you want me to, I will read the whole thing again.

Mr. ILSLEY: But it will not lead to that conclusion, and it does not lead to discrimination.

Mr. QUELCH: It cannot mean anything else. Perhaps I had better read article XI:

Section 1. Each member undertakes:

(i) Not to engage in nor to permit any of its fiscal agencies referred to in article V, section 1, to engage in, any transactions with a non-member or with persons in a non-member's territories which would be contrary to the provisions of this agreement or the purposes of the fund;

(ii) Not to cooperate with a non-member or with persons in a non-member's territories in practices which would be contrary to the provisions of this agreement or the purposes of the fund; and

(iii) To cooperate with the fund with a view to the application in its territories of appropriate measures to prevent transactions with non-members or with persons in their territories which would be contrary to the provisions of this agreement or the purposes of the fund.

If the nation which has withdrawn has devaluated its currency without the right allowed by the fund, surely the action is contrary to the fund, and the nations will not trade with it, otherwise they would be trading in a currency which has been devaluated contrary to the intentions of the fund.

Mr. ILSLEY: Wait a minute. Is not my hon. friend misreading that section entirely?

Mr. QUELCH: I don't think so.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is such a strained interpretation.

Mr. QUELCH: A "strained"—?

Mr. ILSLEY: A strained—yes—and an improper interpretation. This is the way he is reading the section: "Each member undertakes not to engage in nor to permit any of its fiscal agencies referred to in article V, section 1, to engage in any transactions with a non-member or with persons in a non-member's territories which would be contrary to the provisions of this agreement or the purposes of the fund." He is reading it as if it means that the engaging in transactions would be contrary to the provisions of this agreement or the purposes of the fund, and that there is a provision against engaging in any transactions with a non-member or with persons in a non-member's territories. Now, that is not the true interpretation or construction of the section. The true interpreation is that a member is not to engage in transactions which would be contrary to the provisions of the agreement or the purposes of the fund. That is to say, if a country leaves the fund, the countries which belong to the fund have to carry on their original agreement with the fund and not engage in transactions with the member which would be contrary to the provisions of the agreement and the purposes of the fund. The people who stay in are not to use the member country that absents itself as a means of frustrating the purposes of the fund. It is simply a sort of avoidance of what might be called black market operations, contrary to the agreement which the party enters into. That is the true interpretation of the section. The "which" applies to transactions; it does not apply to engaging in transactions with the member.

Mr. QUELCH: Well, of course a great deal rests on what the purpose of the fund is. But the fund considers it necessary to prevent a member from devaluating its currency, to maintain stabilization of exchange rates. Then surely it is obvious that, if a member is expelled from the fund because it devalues its currency, does not stabilize its rates of exchange, and if other members continue to trade with that member, they are helping to defeat the purpose of the fund.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, no.

Mr. QUELCH: The minister can say "no, no". He can say that black is white, but that does not make it white.

Mr. JAQUES: That is why you want an international police force.

Mr. QUELCH: The other reason why I say that this condition is considerably worse than the gold standard is that the gold standard never provided for the setting up of an international authority which had powers in excess of any powers of government, of any court of law, even apparently the international court of justice.

Mr. ILSLEY: What powers? They have not very many powers. The powers are extremely limited.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Every power on earth.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not at all.

Mr. QUELCH: I think you will find they have very great powers. When you remember how it was possible for the little mission that went to Australia in 1930 to compel that government to balance its budget and curtail its social services, merely through their monetary technique, if they could do it in those days, imagine what they can do under a set-up of this kind.

I think I have fully justified my argument when I say not only is it a form of the gold standard but in many respects it is infinitely worse.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Just to show how serious is the contention which the hon. member for Acadia is making, let me read the purposes of the fund. Where the trouble lies in this whole argument is that the people who are supporting this measure have never taken the trouble to interpret accurately the statements which are made in the various parts of the final act or to weigh the implications of the powers and stipulations which are found therein. As soon as they do they will realize how serious the situation is. Let me read the purposes of the fund and show how these would work out in the practical management of a nation, say under the present set-up we have in Canada:

> The purposes of the international monetary fund are:
> (i) To promote international monetary co-operation through a permanent institution which provides the machinery for consultation and collaboration on international monetary problems.

Let me stop there and ask the minister this question. Suppose now that the very devices are employed which are being used in Canada, or were used in the war, to bring down the cost of production of, we will say, any ordinary commodity. Let us suppose it is automobiles, or trucks, or anything of the kind; we know that the government has subsidized or relieved from tariff restrictions or in some way aided manufacturers to get raw materials at a lower rate. Assume this kind of thing is done with the object of bringing down the cost of a particular commodity which is manufactured in the country, thus enabling that commodity to be sold at a lower price than the corresponding commodity in another state.

Mr. ILSLEY: To be sold in Canada at a lower price?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Either in Canada or outside. Or suppose it is just inside Canada. Bringing down the price of that commodity affects the value of the Canadian dollar, does it not?—because the lower the price of the commodity offered, the higher the value of the Canadian dollar, just as correspondingly the higher the price of goods the lower the value of the Canadian dollar. That simple device, which I think every member in this committee will recognize as a thoroughly legitimate one, could be interpreted as being contrary to this first purpose of the fund, because it would be said that there is no international monetary cooperation. Suppose Canada used her tremendous resources and began to use debt-free money, the possibilities of which I do not think the minister has even canvassed. Suppose she began to use debt-free money to subsidize the price of manufactured goods, bringing it down so as to produce price parity. She would certainly raise the value of the Canadian dollar, and that could be condemned by any body of people who were opposed to that idea as contrary to the purposes of number one, and the only absolute authority that could sit in judgment on that dispute would be the fund itself.

Mr. ILSLEY: They have no power to do anything about it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Then what is all this agreement for, if they have no power to do something? What is the whole act for, if it does not give power to the fund to do something?

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman cannot find in the act any provision giving the fund power to do something about the situation he has suggested, and that situation would not be contrary to number one, the object of which is to promote international monetary cooperation through a permanent institution which provides the machinery for consultation and collaboration on international monetary problems. That has nothing to do with the internal subsidy policy of a government.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Does the minister think that it has nothing at all to do with internal price structure?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. There is no power there to do anything to prevent a government from subsidizing prices down.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The minister will be astonished to find that there is power to do that.

Mr. ILSLEY: Where is it?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have just raised the question, and I am not prepared at the moment to argue it because I do not wish just now to revert to the particular passages of the act.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman cannot find it and cannot cite it, and I say it is not there.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I say it is there.

Mr. ILSLEY: Let us have it, then.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have some good authorities who say it is, but I am not prepared to press it at the moment because I do not intend to deal with this aspect.

Mr. ILSLEY: Hon. members will appreciate some of my difficulties when my hon. friend complains about my failure to answer questions. He is a specialist, self-confessed, on this subject, having studied it for the past several months, and he cannot answer that question. Where is the power to prevent subsidizing prices down?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Now take number two.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Some members would like me to come back later on with the proof. If so, I will do it.

An hon. MEMBER: We shall be surprised.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes, you will. Now take number two:

To facilitate the expansion and balanced growth of international trade, and to contribute thereby to the promotion and maintenance of high levels of employment and real income and to the development of the productive resources of all members as primary objectives of economic policy.

Would anyone argue that bringing down the price level of manufactured goods in Canada could not be interpreted as a measure militating against the development of balanced trade among the nations? Suppose we take Japan as an illustration. I used that illustration last night. She brings down her price level, thereby putting her goods into the world's market and displacing the goods of other nations and in turn their industries, putting their people out of employment. Would that be contrary to the second purpose of the fund? I do not know how you could get something more contrary to the fund, if you had a device by which one nation was taking the whole of the manufacturing business of the world, as Japan was threatening to do, and as she would have done had she not been prevented by rigid quotas. Surely that would be interfering with the balanced growth of international trade. No other interpretation could be placed upon it, and if the fund has not the power to prevent such a thing the fund is not worth having.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, there are other ways in which it can operate, and they are spelled out.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Take the third purpose of the fund:

To promote exchange stability, to maintain orderly exchange arrangements among members, and to avoid competitive exchange depreciation.

This is the provision with regard to which there has been the most discussion. Then take the next three:

To assist in the establishment of a multilateral system of payments in respect of current transactions between members and in the elimination of foreign exchange restrictions which hamper the growth of world trade.

To give confidence to members by making the fund's resources available to them under adequate safeguards, thus providing them with opportunity to correct maladjustments in their balance of payments without resorting to measures destructive of national or international prosperity.

In accordance with the above, to shorten the duration and lessen the degree of disequilibrium in the international balances of payments of members.

Number six is practically an omnibus purpose; for under it anything could be condemned to which any nation could resort. In order to realize how serious this might be, all one has to do is to recall what was done with regard to Alberta legislation some years ago when the supreme court began to work upon it. The supreme court managed to destroy provincial autonomy completely, destroying the province's power over property and civil rights, since it declared ultra vires acts passed by the province with respect to property and civil rights. All that anyone needs to do is to go back over the record of the decisions of the court on matters respecting which the provinces have legislated over the last twenty-five years to see the wide range of possibilities which this measure before us opens up for any fund, or any judicial body acting on behalf of a fund, in dealing with situations that may arise in the world. That is where the difficulty will present itself—in the broad, general meaning of these terms.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I said yesterday that I felt it was the duty of this group to ask questions in order to elicit information which would enable the house to form a sound judgment with respect to this bill. At that time I felt it was our duty to ask many questions, and I still do. I feel that this is the committee in which those questions should be asked. But during the last twenty-four hours certain things have taken place which have led me to feel that I was not quite such a free agent in the matter as I had been before. I therefore believe that possibly the wise thing to do, so far as I am concerned, is to defer further questioning until we get into some other division of parliament where we can continue the consideration of this bill.

Mr. JAQUES: I was one of those who had been accused of a filibuster. I am one of those whose intentions have been questioned and I just wish to say two or three words.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Can we count on that?

Mr. JAQUES: My whole purpose in the stand I have taken can be put in very few words.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): But you won't.

Mr. JAQUES: It is obvious that a majority in this house believe entirely in the fetish of foreign trade and the worship of gold. For these two things they are prepared to surrender the sovereignty of their country; I am not. That may be the difference between us. To my mind anybody who works for and advocates the surrender of the sovereignty of this country is guilty of treason. To my mind it does not make any difference what reason may be advanced for so doing. We have an example of that right now in Mr. Amery. I believe he was an honest man. He believed that the reasons he advanced for the actions he took were good reasons, and that what he did would be to the advantage of his country and of the world. Unfortunately for Mr. Amery he backed the loser, and now he has to pay the penalty. That is the only difference between us. The reason I have taken this stand is that beyond question we have established that Bretton Woods means the return of the gold standard; it means that our national prosperity is to be controlled by foreign trade, and that any foreign trade will be controlled by the gold standard. It means a surrender of the sovereignty of this country. That is the reason why I am opposed to it, and the reason why I shall continue to be opposed to it.

Mr. LOW: Before this group finishes its case at this stage may I just sum up in about three minutes the position we are taking. I contend that the minister has failed to bring forward arguments to refute our contention. He has failed to establish any sound reason why Canada should become a party to Bretton Woods. Therefore this group is still convinced, first, that ratification of Bretton Woods by Canada means reintroduction of the gold standard with all that it implies as an inevitable cause of future war and human suffering; second, that the ratification of Bretton Woods by the government will mean that we shall surrender a substantial measure of our sovereignty and therefore to that extent become subject to international government; third, that ratification of Bretton Woods by Canada will mean that we lose effective control of our own currency; fourth, having lost effective control of our own currency in Canada to an international financial dictatorship, we are convinced that neither Canada nor the United States could possibly make the internal arrangements required to increase the standard of living of their own people; fifth, if the effective control of our own currency is lost, then that worthy objective of full employment either for the people of the United States or of Canada that was so ably set out by the minister in his speech is impossible; and sixth, if full employment is rendered impossible through the surrender of some measure of our control over our internal currency, then nations like the United States will have to resort to the export of their unemployment, which will mean trade wars, the inevitable precursors of military wars.

It is clear, Mr. Chairman, that the minister has given the committee about all the information which he is capable of giving or is willing to give at this stage. But since it may be possible for us to get further information in the banking and commerce committee by questioning witnesses, we are now prepared to move on into that committee to renew our fight on that ground.

In agreeing to transfer our attention to the bill in the banking and commerce committee I should like to make it clear that we are in no way agreeing to support the principle of Bretton Woods. We still think it is wrong, and unless and until we are proved to be wrong in our stand, we shall struggle against it with all our might in later stages of the proceedings through the committee and in this house.

I would say, Mr. Chairman, that telegrams urging us to continue our fight are pouring in from all over this country, because the people are beginning to realize that this is not the measure which they want; it is not the thing which they think will bring peaceful prosperity to Canada.

Mr. BRACKEN: I am not rising to discuss the merits of this resolution, but rather to say just a brief word or two with respect to the situation in which the committee finds itself at this time. It is now several days since the resolution was passed by the house and consideration of it begun in committee of the whole. Since that time we have had a long and sometimes interesting discussion in the committee. What I shall say I had planned to say before I knew what the hon. member for Peace River was going to say. I want to commend him for his action in the last few minutes. Up to that time the question before us was how much longer it would be wise for us to remain in committee of the whole discussing this subject. In this connection let me refer to two matters which have been referred to by others in this house. There was a conference of leaders of different parties in this house a few days ago. It was suggested last night that it was there agreed that we would endeavour to get through the work of the session this week. That is true. I want to say, however, with respect to the attitude of the Social Credit group, that the leader of that group did point out that one of the measures on which his associates would want to make a strong protest was the measure which is now before us. He specifically excepted that measure from any effort unduly to hurry up the work of the house.

Speaking for myself, and I think for many others in the house, I want to say that the discussion we have heard, led chiefly by the members of the Social Credit group, has been characterized by sincerity. It has all the evidence of thorough study. On their part I think a good deal of merit has been shown in the arguments they have brought forward. Having said that, I wish to say one other thing. The Social Credit group has made its protest. There is no question that its members feel strongly on this subject. The protest has been well made. During more than two decades in another assembly in another part of Canada I have seen protests of this kind on several different occasions, and I do not remember one that was characterized by more sincerity or more evidence of study on the part of the group making it. Personally I want to commend the Social Credit members for presenting the other side of the story of the Bretton Woods measure.

It is obvious that the government wishes the measure to pass at this session; it is evident it is not disposed to postpone it. We supported the government on this resolution. While the arguments advanced by the Social Credit group have impressed us, they have not changed our minds. We still think that the balance of argument is in favour of the measure, in so far as its application to Canada is concerned.

Having said that, I again wish to commend the leader of the Social Credit group for not pressing this matter to the point where some arbitrary action on the part of the government would have to be taken. They have made a good case. It has impressed us all. They will have further opportunities to present their views. Their present action having been taken, we can now look forward to finding it possible to conclude our work this week.

Mr. COLDWELL: I believe the proper procedure has been followed, and wish it had been followed earlier—that of sending this matter to the committee on banking and commerce. There are many hon. members who have questions which remain unanswered. As I have always said, this committee is not the right atmosphere or the kind of place in which we can get the answers to the questions we desire to ask.

I too am grateful that the discussion has reached the stage where the bill to be introduced will be sent to the committee on banking and commerce. There the good features of the measure, as well as those of which we are not so sure, can be discussed. It seems to me this is a question upon which members of the house will have to decide on balance. I do not think all will agree with everything contained in these long schedules. To do so would seem impossible. But I do believe that we must appraise this measure, both in committee and when it returns to the house, with balanced judgment. How much is good and how much is not so good? If the good outweighs that which we consider not so good, then the house should support the agreement.

So far as the international aspect of the matter is concerned, I wish to make it abundantly clear that I believe that any measure in the interests of the people of the world, in which Canada can participate for the good of the people of the world, ought to receive the support of this parliament. I do not take the view that international arrangements are bad; because I believe, even more certainly than I did a short time ago, that responsible government at the international level must come ultimately—and the sooner it comes, the better for the peace of the world.

Resolution reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: Moved by Mr. Ilsley, seconded by Mr. Mackenzie, that the said resolution be read a second time and concurred in. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. BLACKMORE: On division.

Mr. LOW: On division.

Resolution read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 238, for carrying into effect the agreements for an international monetary fund and an international bank for reconstruction and development.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the said bill be read a second time?

Mr. ILSLEY: Now.

Mr. ILSLEY moved the second reading of the bill.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Question.

Mr. BRACKEN: Will the minister explain his wish with respect to the procedure from now on?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have moved that the bill be read a second time; it will then be referred at once to the committee on banking and commerce, which will sit at four o'clock this afternoon for the purpose of beginning consideration of the bill. If it is reported back to the house, the procedure will follow that which is usual in respect of a bill. That is, it will be referred to the committee of the whole; then, if it comes out of committee of the whole, it will receive third reading.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Put the question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. LOW: Will you please put the question?

Mr. SPEAKER: I have put the motion for second reading, and then I will put the motion that the bill be referred to the committee on banking and commerce.

Mr. LOW: No; with all due respect I suggest the procedure should be to put the question for second reading of the bill.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is right.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. MACKENZIE: On division?

Mr. SPEAKER: Those in favour of the motion will say "yea."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yea.

Mr. SPEAKER: Those opposed will say "nay."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nay.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. SPEAKER: In my opinion the yeas have it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Carried on division?

Mr. SPEAKER: Call in the members.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Ilsley) which was agreed to on the following division:

ALBERTA TAX AGREEMENT

PROVISION FOR PAYMENT OF INCREASED COMPENSATION AND SUBSIDY

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of bill No. 218, to authorize the Minister of Finance, with the approval of the governor in council, to enter into an agreement with the province of Alberta to amend the agreement entered into with that province under the authority of the Dominion-Provincial Taxation Agreement Act, 1942.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Sections 1 to 4 inclusive agreed to.

On the preamble:

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): On the resolution stage, Mr. Chairman, I was able to compliment the minister and the government and the province of Alberta for their cooperation in arriving at this agreement. I overlooked at that time a number of people, and they were fine people, and the result proved it—those who looked after the interests of the bondholders in connection with this whole arrangement.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

INCREASE IN APPROPRIATION FOR LOANS AND GUARANTEES

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the National Housing Act, 1944, and to provide more particularly for an increase in the appropriation for loans and guarantees under part II of the act for the payment out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund of loans and losses in respect of loans, not exceeding in the aggregate one hundred and fifty million dollars, and in respect of guarantees, up to an aggregate principal amount of one hundred and twenty-five million dollars of investments guaranteed;

That under the said measure expenditures may be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund to an aggregate amount not exceeding five million dollars incurred under or in carrying out the provisions of part V of the act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in the main the amendments to the National Housing Act, 1944, which this resolution seeks authority to introduce, are of a technical nature, made necessary either by reason of ambiguities in the law or by recent developments which were not entirely foreseen when the act was drafted last year. They do not affect the underlying principles of the legislation. It was for this reason, and because of the need for immediate action, that the government felt justified in making several of the amendments effective by order in council under the War Measures Act before parliament assembled.

The amendments may be grouped under four general headings. First is a group of minor verbal changes which are necessary in order to clarify the intent of certain sections of the act. Most, though not all, of them were made effective by order in council P.C. 392, dated January 18, 1945.

Next is a group of amendments made effective by order in council P.C. 5794, dated August 30, 1945, which were necessary in order to clear the way for large-scale emergency operations by the life insurance companies in the field of rental housing. I referred to these when the bill creating the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation was under discussion, and explained their general purpose. I shall give a detailed explanation later when the clauses are reached in committee.

The third group of amendments relate to the appropriation sections, and, again, are in the nature of clarification rather than of modification in principle. They will be explained fully at a later stage. It is sufficient for me to say now that the enlargement of the appropiation under part II of the act removes certain unnecessarily rigid restrictions on operations under the act which had not been intended by the government, or, I think, by parliament. At present the $50 million appropriation under part II covers loans, losses and guarantees in respect of rental housing projects. To illustrate how inadequate this is I would point out that this appropriation would be insufficient should the full insurance companies' programme at present under consideration be approved. The appropriation has therefore been increased to $150 million to cover loans and losses. In addition, authority is given to guarantee investments up to $125 million, which is about the theoretical limit of life insurance companies' investments under the act. It is also proposed to appropriate $5 million under part V to provide a specific allotment of funds for housing research and community planning.

Finally, one amendment is being proposed arising out of the legislation creating the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, which has the effect of permitting the delegation of certain of the powers of the Minister of Finance under the act to the new corporation when it is set up.

In conclusion, my suggestion is, if the house will accept it, that we spend very little time on the resolution, because I have the bill ready to introduce and it is not going to be possible for hon. members to give intelligent attention to our proposals unless they have before them a bill. We are at the stage where, it seems to me, the purposes of all would be best served if it goes to committee on the resolution, and the resolution is passed and given second reading. I may be given an opportunity to-day to introduce the bill; the bill will be distributed, then any questions can be raised on the second reading of the bill or in committee on the second reading of the bill, which will be taken up promptly. It cannot be taken up to-day because there should be an opportunity for hon. members to see it.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Speaking for this section of the house, we are glad to expedite this measure in this way. I understand that the minister wishes to go into committee of the whole now and deal with the resolution.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. BRACKEN: I suggest that before second reading we might have the bill, and that there be some delay before we are asked to proceed with the second reading.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): I have a few remarks I should like to make, Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair.

I feel as strongly regarding this problem as my friends of the Social Credit group do regarding the matter which has been before the house for the past few days, but I do not propose to hold up the business of the house.

The members of this group welcome any legislation which will make more money available in this very important matter of housing, but we must register our protest that these amendments are being brought in without adequate provision for the people in the lower income groups.

In this morning's Ottawa Citizen, for example, I notice advertisements which indicate how serious is the problem of housing in the capital of the dominion. I have looked over some of the other papers across Canada, and this sort of advertisement appears everywhere:

Returned soldier, 2 adults, desire flat, 2 or 3 rooms, kitchenette, furnished, Jan. 1 or 15.

The next advertisement:

Overseas veteran and wife, no children, permanent Ottawa residents—

Since they have no children they may have a chance of getting a small place. Next:

Urgently required, apt., furnished, unfurnished, by ex-serviceman and bride; references if required.

The first advertisement is for a bachelor apartment for two girls, and the next eight or nine advertisements are from men who fought to save their homes and find, with Christmas just around the corner, there are no homes available.

In a copy of the Ottawa Journal a few days ago the first one under "apartments wanted" is:

Rope needed! committing suicide, December 15, if don't find accommodation, preferably flat, 2 bedrooms. Permanent force officer and wife; drink, smoke, have parties, raise the dickens, have nasty little 6-year-old boy and saucy dog.

He gives an office number and a residence number. In the Toronto Daily Star a whole series of advertisements appear. I notice in the Saskatoon Star Phoenix of Saturday rewards offered, such as $50 for anyone who will give information leading to the finding of some place to sleep in the wintry weather out on the prairies.

An hon. MEMBER: Haven't you any?

Mr. NICHOLSON: No, I have no accommodation to offer. People who are looking for homes in all parts of Canada are finding it practically impossible to obtain them; and unfortunately, although these amendments are being brought down, the minister has not seen fit to make adequate provision so that the people of lower income brackets will have at least some hope of getting living quarters under some government-sponsored plan. According to a recent issue of the Financial Post:

> It now appears that projects being investigated by the new insurance corporation (Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation) are likely to run between $40 and $55 a month for rentals . . . There is no suggestion that life insurance companies will not go ahead with their projects. What is being pointed out here is that this project cannot be expected to make available rental houses for veterans in the so-called "low" rental field . . .

Mr. FRASER: That newspaper is not the Financial Post, is it?

Mr. NICHOLSON: No, it carries a quotation from the Financial Post. I do not happen to have the Financial Post before me.

The government report on housing and community planning, brought down some time ago, states that in the lower income brackets the average income is $703 per family. On the basis of that income the maximum rent which should be paid, assuming that not more than twenty per cent of one's income should be applied to this purpose, is $12 per month, and in Canada we have not houses available in that income range. On page 115 of the same report are statistics, covering twelve metropolitan cities in Canada, showing that people in the lower income brackets should not be paying more than $11.72 per month, assuming they pay twenty per cent of their income, but they are paying $19 per month, which means that they are denying themselves food, clothing or health services to the extent of about $8 per month in order that they may have some place to live.

It has been found in almost every country in the world that the only way to provide housing for those in the lower income brackets is for the government or some government authority to step into the picture and make funds available over a long period of years at low rates of interest.

Previously I have discussed some of the housing projects in the United States, where the federal government has bridged the gap between the amount the individual can pay and what is an economic rent. I have described some of the beautiful apartments available in the city of Boston, where the rents range from $14 per month, which includes light and heat, for people receiving incomes of around six or seven hundred dollars a year. If you have an income of $1,300 a year you pay more. You pay according to your ability. But the federal authority has recognized that abolishing slums and providing congenial living quarters is a national objective which should have the support of all the people, and from a long-term point of view it is cheaper to eliminate these slums and give the people decent living quarters. In some of the public housing projects in the New York area, rents range from $8.43 in the Harlem river area, $8.42 in the Williamsburg district, $5.41 for the Red Hook houses, and $5.60 for the South Jamaica houses. The people living in these publicly-financed houses have incomes that range from $800 to $1,200, but those who live in the larger community have come to the conclusion that it is important for the future to wipe out these homes and provide more adequate houses.

All during the war I have tried to urge the administration to look forward and plan for our country, not only as far as the war effort was concerned but having regard to the future as well, by using a larger share of our raw material and man-power in providing houses for our people. I was able to cite statistics from the United States, compiled from the last war, to show how the efficiency of the people is reduced by workers being compelled to travel fifteen or twenty miles to work each day, and to carry on in the uncertainty of having living quarters. I found that in the city of Windsor, where the Secretary of State lives, some of the landlords were able to require the filling out of a questionnaire before anyone could come in. You had to prove that you were a Christian, that you did not talk too loudly, that you did not use your radio too much, that you had no children and no expectancy of any, that you did not use liquor, that you did not allow your guests to stay too late at night.

These were the conditions that prevailed all across Canada during the war, and the administration in my opinion failed to attach sufficient importance to the problem of providing houses for our people. Now we find ourselves with returning men who have been away for four or five years, some of them married before they left. They are coming home to their wives and families. Often the wife has been living with the family, and now these people feel, and rightly so, that they should have a place of their own to live in. I believe it was the member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt)—who distinguished himself by winning the Victoria Cross in this war—who found it so difficult to obtain living quarters that, as reported in the press, he felt that it might have been as well for him to remain away from the country. The situation is so critical that the minister at this stage should make provision for an appropriation so that the money can be spent on building. A start should be made immediately to provide living quarters for the people in the lower third of the income brackets in Canada, who cannot possibly look forward to having anywhere to live if they are to depend on the legislation as it now stands on our statute books.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Tremblay in the chair.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 239, to amend the National Housing Act, 1944.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

ALLOWANCES FOR TEMPORARILY UNEMPLOYED—VOCATIONAL OR EDUCATIONAL TRAINING—UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure, as recommended and reported by the special committee on veterans affairs, to provide rehabilitation allowances to temporarily unemployed veterans or their dependents and to veterans undergoing vocational or educational training with provision also for the application of The Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940, for the veterans' benefit by contributing the amount of the combined employer's and employed veteran's contribution into the unemployment insurance fund, from moneys appropriated by parliament. Provision is also made authorizing the governor in council to take such measures as may be necessary to remedy any depletion of the said fund resulting from the payment out of such benefits.

Mr. BRACKEN: May I ask the minister what his intentions are with respect to proceeding with this bill from this time forward?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Exactly the same procedure will be followed as was followed in regard to the War Service Grants Act dealt with about a week ago. There has been a unanimous report from the committee of sixty members of this house with respect to various benefits under the post-discharge reestablishment order. It is new legislation as far as the House of Commons is concerned. These provisions were all enacted previously by order in council, and the committee has now recommended to the house that we proceed to enact in statutory form what was already in force by way of orders in council, with certain additions which I shall explain on second reading .

Mr. BRACKEN: Does the minister wish to have the second reading of the bill to-day?

Mr. MACKENZIE: If there is no objection. It can be done only by unanimous consent, and I should like to move the second reading later.

Mr. BRACKEN: Does the minister say that the committee was unanimous with regard to all the provisions of the bill?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I was not there all the time, but I believe they were unanimous in regard to all those that are contained in this bill, though they have made certain reservations with respect to further recommendations at the next session of parliament.

Mr. BRACKEN: If the committee was unanimous with regard to all the provisions of the bill, we will offer no objection to getting it as far forward to-day as possible.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Mackenzie thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 240, to provide rehabilitation allowances for veterans.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. MACKENZIE moved the second reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The veterans rehabilitation bill, so far as parliament is concerned, is new legislation. The services to be provided under it have, however, been in effect since October 1, 1941, under the post discharge re-establishment order, which was approved by order in council under the authority of the War Measures Act.

The bill now before the committee has been recommended by the special committee on veterans affairs, whose recommendation, with the draft bill annexed, appears in Votes and Proceedings of this house under date of December 4.

The post discharge reestablishment order, originally adopted in 1941, was substantially revised by P.C. 5210 of July 13, 1944, and its terms have been widely publicized. It is probably the best known of all the country's rehabilitation measures. It is under this order that the Department of Veterans Affairs is authorized to assist former members of the forces in the matter of vocational training and interrupted education.

The order permits the payment of allowances, graduated in proportion to family needs, to veterans, both men and women, under the following five condition:

1. That the veteran is willing and able to work, and has been unable to find suitable employment.

2. That the veteran is unemployed through temporary physical incapacity.

3. That the veteran has entered upon a business, farming or professional undertaking under his own proprietorship, and requires money for his subsistence while awaiting a first crop, or a living return from the enterprise.

4. That the veteran has been awarded a vocational training course for the purpose of assisting him to obtain employment, or better employment.

5. That the veteran has been awarded an educational course of university or professional grade, either in the under-graduate or post-graduate field, or, by a comparatively recent addition to the order, for the purpose of qualifying for admission to a university.

In the case of training and educational benefits, the cost of tuition is also borne as a public expense.

There is a sixth provision giving the benefits of the Unemployment Insurance Act to veterans who enter insured employment. For the purpose of calculating unemployment benefit, time spent in military service is counted as if it had been spent in insured employment. In order to make this practicable the government pays into the insurance fund the contributions that would have been made during the time of the veteran's military service.

The post-discharge reestablishment order has been, and must continue to be, the backbone of the whole rehabilitation programme. Although all veterans may not have occasion to claim assistance under this legislation, its benefits are available to all. When originally adopted the order in council offered assistance, far beyond anything ever attempted in the past, for the purpose of promoting the civil reestablishment of a country's demobilized fighting forces.

Other countries have followed Canada's lead, and Canada has greatly broadened the terms of her own legislation. Close comparison with measures adopted in other countries is not possible, because each country has attuned its measures to its own local conditions. Nevertheless, I believe Canada can take pride in the fact that in this field her legislation is unsurpassed by that of any other country in breadth, scope and flexibility. For this very reason, because we were breaking new ground, and it was recognized that changes and modifications would probably be dictated by experience, it was considered advisable that the measure should be initiated by order in council. Subsequent developments have justified that decision.

The original order in council has been amended and broadened repeatedly, in order that we might keep abreast of developments and meet unforeseen difficulties as they arose. I have always considered however that so important a measure should have the sanction and authority of parliament, and I have, on a number of occasions, announced my intention at the appropriate time of asking parliament to convert this order in council into a statute. That step is now being taken. It has been taken in accordance with the procedure authorized by this house earlier in the session, when it appointed the special committee on veterans affairs to review all veterans' legislation, and recommend such action to the house as might be found appropriate.

The bill now before us differs from others which have already been dealt with, in that it is not an amending bill, but will lead to the enactment of a new statute. For the reasons already indicated, the bill has been designed to preserve the flexibility, so that unforeseen problems may be met promptly and effectively. The bill confers authority upon the government to pay allowances to veterans under clearly defined conditions.

With respect to members of Canada's armed forces, the bill contains no important additional benefits beyond those contained in the order in council. There is, however, one important new substantive provision permitting the unemployment insurance benefit to be extended to veterans of the armed forces of allied nations, under certain conditions:

1. That the veteran was domiciled in Canada before the war; and

2. That the nation, in whose forces the veteran served, undertakes to make the same contribution to the unemployment insurance fund as that which the government of Canada makes with respect to our own veterans who enter insured employment.

As with most of our legislation, the order in council and the bill permit the benefits of the act to be conferred upon veterans of pre-war Canadian domicile who served in the forces of His Majesty, other than Canadian forces.

The bill contains one or two minor provisions not heretofore found in the post discharge reestablishment order. For instance, wide discretion is conferred upon the minister in the matter of extending the time limits for training, in the case of disability pensioners. Experience has shown that the need for retraining of disabled veterans frequently arises long after discharge. The department has had this power for many years under its treatment regulations, but with the enactment of legislation on the subject of training it seems desirable that this provision should be brought under the Veterans Rehabilitation Act.

Another new provision allows correspondence courses to be given to patients still in hospital, without sacrifice of their subsequent training rights.

The select committee reviewed the draft legislation with meticulous care and, as with former bills, was able to render valuable assistance in redrafting some of the clauses so as to give greater protection to the veterans for whom the legislation is designed. The rates of allowances are not dealt with in the bill. These are left in the hands of the government, under the customary powers of regulation, in order that adjustments required by changed economic conditions in the country may be made without undue delay.

The adoption of this bill by parliament will necessarily lead to the drafting of a new order in council containing regulations pursuant to the act. The post-discharge reestablishment order, as it stands to-day, contains a great deal of subject matter which is now being transferred to an act of parliament. The new order in council will consist of the regulations which the bill authorizes the government to make.

No substantive changes in the existing regulations are contemplated at this time, but the department will always be prepared to recommend such changes, consistent with the terms of the act, as progressive developments may require in the interests of ex-service personnel.

[Mr. Mackenzie.]

Mr. BROOKS: Mr. Chairman, in keeping with the desire of the committee, it is not my intention to make any extended remarks on this bill. The minister has already given a resume of the measure which we shall study later section by section. As one of the members of the veterans committee, I wish at this time to express my appreciation of the warm praise the minister has given the committee on various occasions. He has said it was one of the hardest working committees of the house. I think he might very well have said it was the hardest working committee, during this session.

It is also pointed out that this is a new bill rather than an amendment to an old act. It puts in statute forms the post-discharge rehabilitation orders in council that have been passed.

The bill had the general approval of the committee, not because the committee felt it was an end in itself but because the committee thought that the bill would assist toward the great end they had in view, the rehabilitation of our men who have returned from overseas. Our experience for the past twenty-five years, as the committee knows, has taught us that most veteran legislation is subject to change. We have worked more or less on a trial and error basis. I have no doubt that many changes will be necessary in the bill which is before us this afternoon. It was agreed in the committee, not only with respect to this bill but with respect to other legislation affecting veterans, that if amendments were necessary later they could be made in future meetings of the veterans' committee.

The act is to be entitled the Veterans' Rehabilitation Act. We had very little time to discuss the title in committee; as a matter of fact it was decided on only in the last moments of the last meeting of the committee. Frankly I think it can hardly be called the Veterans' Rehabilitation Act; I think it could better be called the veterans' rehabilitation assistance act, for that is really what it is. Upon looking up the definition of "rehabilitate" I found that it means to restore to former status, capacity, right, rank or privilege. This bill only assists in doing that.

The word "rehabilitation" I think has a deeper meaning for everyone. It represents the hopes and ambitions of the 750,000 to 1,000,000 men of our different services who have returned from overseas. It represents the personal and social readjustment of those people. It represents to the people of Canada and to their elected representatives their bounden duty to assure to these men who fought for their country that they will be properly rehabilitated and restored into the civil life of this Dominion of Canada.

There are certain things which are particularly necessary for rehabilitation, and they have been mentioned in this committee on previous occasions. First and foremost, if we are to rehabilitate our soldiers they must have jobs. That is something about which I think we are all agreed. The soldier must have a job which is suitable to his peculiar talents and which affords him an opportunity to better himself as time goes on. Next, the man who has returned must have a home in decent surroundings where he can educate his children and bring them up to be good citizens of this country. The third requirement of rehabilitation to my mind is that the soldier's mind must be free from worry. He must have reached the stage where he feels he is once more a citizen of this country rather than an alien among a hostile crowd of civilians.

Taking into consideration these three things —jobs, homes and minds free from worry— what is the condition of the men who have returned to Canada? What do they find when they disembark from the boats at Halifax or New York, or when they return to Montreal, Winnipeg or wherever their homes may be? These men find that from one end of Canada to the other jobs are scarce, there are no opportunities for the reemployment of our men, there are thousands of them walking the streets, there are strikes all across the country. These men find that the prospects of reemployment are less bright to-day than they have been in quite a number of years. They find that there are 36,500 returned men who are without work at this time.

This morning when the hon. member for Mackenzie was dealing with the question of housing he quoted newspaper advertisements inserted by returned service personnel who were looking for a place to live. An address was given over the radio by Mr. Woods, deputy minister of veterans' affairs, requesting the people of Canada to open up their homes to returned men. It was an eloquent appeal, and I hope it is one which will be taken to heart and acted upon by the people of this country.

This afternoon the minister stated that this bill will provide out-of-work benefits, and I think it does so in a fairly generous manner. But the young men who have returned from overseas are not looking for out-of-work benefits, they are looking for work. They do not want to come under the Unemployment Insurance Act or under this legislation. This country cannot be built up by paying unemployment insurance or out-of-work benefits.

This bill provides for the man who has taken up business. If such a man is getting no return from his business for a period of twelve months he can obtain benefits under the act. While this may be and is very necessary, this country is not going to be built up if men have to sit back in their businesses waiting for returns for a year or possibly longer. These men would like to see the wheels of industry turning so that they can get goods on their shelves. A man who has a garage or is in some other business would like to see production under way so that he can get tools and equipment to work with at once.

I repeat that this is not a rehabilitation measure; it is simply an act for the assistance of rehabilitation. The minister referred to assistance to be given to college students and men taking vocational training. This is a wise provision. I have been pleased to hear from the heads of universities in different parts of the country that returned men who have taken up university and vocational training are showing themselves to be better than average when compared with the men in civilian life. This shows the great interest our returned men are taking in rehabilitating themselves for the days to come.

The minister spoke of the flexibility of the allowances. It is wise not to set hard and fast allowances for college students or for those receiving the other benefits. We do not know what the situation will be perhaps three or six months from to-day. Before the war a young man attending college could get board for $6 or $7 a week, but I understand that to-day in many cases he must pay $12 to $14 per week. Some provision may have to be made by way of regulation later on to increase the benefits and allowances to be paid to men attending our universities.

What we want to-day is an opportunity for our young men to go back to work. We want our young men back on the farms; we want our young men back in the mines; we want our young men back in industry; we want our young men back in all the activities of this country. In this great young country there are many opportunities for the young men of Canada. There has been much talk about locating the returning young men in and around the great industrial centres of Canada. We are building houses for them—at least we plan to do it; we have not done it yet. What we need also is to develop our northern areas. A great mineral industry awaits development there. We have the only frontier which is left in the world to-day, and there are no better men to develop this frontier than those who fought along the English channel at Caen and Falaise, in France, Holland, Italy and other countries. An opportunity must be provided for these men.

We are fortunate in having to administer the act Mr. Walter Woods, the deputy minister, a man who has earned the confidence of the veterans of this country from one end to the other by his fair administration of the Veterans Allowance Act. We have also General Burns, who is director of rehabilitation. I had the pleasure and the honour of meeting General Burns overseas just a little over a year ago, and from talking with men from different parts of Canada and with those I met overseas I know that he is highly respected and honoured by the soldiers generally. I am satisfied that he will do a splendid job. But it is not the men at the head that we have had difficulty with in administering acts for the benefit of the soldiers. It has been the underlings, if I may call them so, from one end of Canada to the other. I hope that General Burns and Walter Woods will inspire these men with the same sense of fairness as that by which they themselves are animated, so that we shall not have the criticism of this act that we have had of other veterans legislation.

I repeat that this measure does not provide for rehabilitation but for assistance in rehabilitation, and the more money we have to spend on out-of-work benefits while a man is awaiting returns from business under this act, the less in adverse ratio shall we have contributed to the rehabilitation of our young men.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Chairman, I was a member of the committee in which the bill and the regulations were gone over, and I think the committee did as good a job as possible in the time at their disposal. There is no doubt that when the committee sits again, as we all hope it will next session, the experience gained in administering the act in the interval will enable us perhaps to open it up again and make the necessary adjustments.

This bill of course is not all-inclusive so far as the veterans' welfare is concerned. It is merely a bill to provide, for the time being, assistance, both financial and in the educational field, in the reestablishment of returned service personnel. We do not want to forget for a moment that it is a temporary measure, to assist the veteran in the transition period from war to peace. We must not make the mistake of thinking that by passing this legislation we have provided wholly for the veterans; for unless the entire economy of the country is healthy the veteran will suffer with the rest of our population in an economy that does not provide for all our people.

The bill itself is clear. There can be no mistaking the intention of those who drafted it. But the test of any legislation is in its administration. We realize that fault can be found with the administrative machinery that is set up across the country. I think the department in Ottawa is doing a fairly reasonable job, but the machinery across the country is new and is just getting under way, with personnel being trained and all the rest of it, and there is considerable room for improvement.

There is one thought in particular that I would leave with the minister. I have met those who are working in the field on veterans affairs, in connection with vocational training, vocational guidance, and so forth, and I must say that those I have met are of a very high type with exceptional qualifications and with adequate training for the job. But the salaries paid to the office staff are very low and leave much to be desired. I have talked to several men in the offices whom I knew personally. They are capable men whom the minister would find it very difficult to replace. I know one married man with eight children who is receiving a salary of only $156 a month, yet he is working at least fourteen hours a day. When he is through at the office for the day he interviews a line-up of young veterans calling upon him at his home. So he is continuously on the job. He provides his own transportation, and he has to get around quite a bit. I do not see how you can hold that type of person on the kind of salary he is getting. There is room for an adjustment of salaries all along the line for the type of person you are getting to-day and the importance of the work they have to handle. The staffs are short-handed too. They have not enough personnel, as is quite apparent.

The members of our group were fairly well represented on the committee. The bill has been gone into thoroughly, and now we are quite willing to let it go through on the understanding, first, that there should be an adjustment in the salaries of those who are assisting in administering the act, and as well an improvement in the administrative machinery right along the line; and second, that we do not make the mistake of thinking we are settling with the veterans permanently by this legislation. It is only temporary, and our whole economy needs to be restored before the veteran can fit into it and make his maximum contribution to the welfare of the country.

Mr. CROLL: In discussing the bill which is now before the house may I point out that we have always in the past said that we have the best veterans legislation in the world. When you speak of something that is better than something else, it is well to look closely at the comparison that is being made.

As previous speakers have already indicated, this legislation deals with the interim period, just as the country is going through an interim stage. This legislation, while a benefit, is not intended to be a substitute for a job. It was never intended for that. But it has some advantages at this particular time, and I should like to make a few comparisons for the benefit of the committee. Perhaps the best comparison would be with our neighbours to the south.

Let me compare what we call in this country a gratuity with what the Americans call mustering-out pay. Our gratuity for a private after two years' service in Canada is $611 for a single man and $711 for a married man; in the United States the private receives $300.

As to the matter of preference in civil service jobs, in Canada the soldier with overseas service gets the preference. That amounts to a monopoly of jobs. In the United States they have a preference, and also a qualified preference. This may be something we shall have to consider later.

Out-of-work benefits in Canada amount to $50 a month and it has been recommended that the amount should be increased to $60. In the United States it is $20 a week; but when it is applied to a man and one child the Canadian benefits immediately rise above those of the United States. So far as educational and vocational training benefits are concerned, both in Canada and the United States they are of the widest eligibility; but the subsistence allowance in Canada is higher than it is in the United States. The disability pension for 100 per cent disability in the United States is $115 a month; in Canada it is based on rank and dependents and it is higher than in the United States.

These are just a few observations and a few figures which I wanted the committee to have, mainly for the purpose of pointing out that both the minister and the officials have a flexible mind on this problem; they have been not only ready but eager to make changes to meet the wishes of the committee, and I think that that augurs well for the future of veteran legislation.

Mr. FAIR: I was not privileged to be a member of the special committee dealing with veterans affairs, but our group had three members on the committee, and I think they contributed their fair share to the discussions. We have had reports from time to time and have read many of the discussions. I believe there is no need for our taking up any time now. I believe the committee has done good work as far as it has gone, but we hope that in the near future, as soon as the new session opens, we shall again have an opportunity to go into these matters when there will be more time, and perhaps we shall have further suggestions to make.

I realize, and it has been pointed out already, that very good legislation can be nullified to a large extent by poor administration. Under a new head, under the guidance of a man who has the interests of the veterans at heart, we may reasonably hope for satisfactory results. I believe that under the old administration some of the staff were not giving 100 per cent satisfaction. I trust the minister will see to it that their record is improved to the utmost in the interests of the veterans rather than that of the public treasury.

Mr. MERRITT: This bill is one of a series which in the speech from the throne was foreshadowed as the "veterans' charter". When I first addressed this house I ventured to point out that legislation is only one-half of the duty of this government, and that an equally important half of its duty is to use its executive power to carry out the intent of the legislation passed by parliament so that the benefits of the measures we pass shall go actually to the people. It is to that aspect of the matter that I wish to address myself to-day, and particularly, to the serious situation in Vancouver with regard to unemployment.

The facts of that situation are these. On November 23—using round figures, and quoting the reports of the Department of Labour—there were 13,500 applicants for jobs and 4,000 vacancies, leaving 9,500 job seekers for whom there was no job existing. Of that 9,500—again by official figures—4,700 were veterans of this or the last war. The situation in Vancouver is more serious than in any other part of the country if you compare the figures for the various districts—more serious for the percentage of unemployed, and also for the small number of jobs available.

There is one impression I want to correct in the minds of hon. members. It has been said quite often in the press recently, and I should not be at all surprised if it has been said in this chamber, that there is a great deal of work in the woods for those who want to go to it. I have taken the trouble to look into that situation as it affects Vancouver and British Columbia, and I find that very recently —within the last two weeks—there were only eighty-five jobs open in logging and lumbering for people in the Pacific districts, and on another day there were about 103 jobs open in those pursuits. That compares very ill with the 9,500 out of work, and I think it conclusively shows, Mr. Chairman, that the suggestion that men are not willing to go to work in the woods does not apply in British Columbia. There may be many jobs open in the future, when skilled men are found for special jobs which allow the opening of other camps and mines, but at the present time these jobs are in the potential stage only and do not actually exist. I understand that the great field for jobs in the woods at the present time is in northern Ontario and not in British Columbia.

Now, let us not be under the impression that in the spring when these key men are found there will be thousands and thousands of jobs in British Columbia. I have a newspaper clipping here, quoting a reliable source close to the logging industry, that it is anticipated that in the spring there will be 1,500 jobs opening up in the woods, and roughly, the situation in Vancouver is, I repeat, that 4,700 veterans at present are out of work.

Mr. MITCHELL: What is the source of the hon. member's estimate of 1,500 jobs?

Mr. MERRITT: The source is a newspaper clipping, a reporter of a Vancouver paper talking to someone engaged in the logging industry. I hope, with the minister, that it will be many more than 1,500, but I simply throw that out as a warning.

Turning for a moment to the question of housing in Vancouver, we find the same deplorable position. A recent statement issued by the emergency shelter authority shows 4,143 persons listed on the books of the administration as having no or unsuitable housing, and of that number, 3,483, or more than three-fourths, are ex-servicemen. In the month of November there were 833 placements only.

Another significant thing about these figures is that, of those placements, 450 couples were couples of whom the husband enlisted in Vancouver or in British Columbia, and in the case of 237 couples the veteran had come from some other part of Canada and is now trying to settle in Vancouver. So that there again we find that the benefits we hope to put on the statute books are not now getting over to the veterans.

I want to say something very briefly about the causes of this situation. We all know that out in British Columbia we have the most wonderful climate in Canada, and that it attracts people from all over the country. That, of course, is actual fact, but as a result, as I will show, we have very many more people in the province than we had before the war. But offsetting that, our industry is pretty well primary industry—lumbering, mining and fishing—and the openings for employment, particularly in Vancouver, are probably not as extensive as they are in the big cities of the east. Again, with respect to seasonal work in our mines and logging camps, there is always a shut-down around Christmas time, and that is contributing to the situation as well. Of course, we have a shortage of key men; but, as I have pointed out, this business about people being unwilling to go to the woods does not apply in Vancouver, where only 103 jobs are open. Other things have contributed to the difficulty at the present time. In the first place, it is estimated that forty per cent more than the number who enlisted are taking their discharge from Vancouver barracks, that the total being discharged from the armed forces at the present time is 2,500 a month or more —I believe it was 3,500 in November—and that there was a war-time influx into our war industries, shipbuilding and aeroplane building, which have completely shut down now, of some 90,000 from the prairie provinces. That figure is an estimate, and it may be a little too high. But in addition, the figures I have from newspapers show that there are about 300 people coming into Vancouver every month from the prairies or from the east; they are all closing in on that city looking for jobs, and the "job base," if I may put it that way, is one of the narrowest in all Canada.

I should not want to have it thought that the citizens of Vancouver are doing nothing to cure the situation, because as a matter of fact they are doing a great deal. They started a citizens' committee and a caimpaign "Invest in the Veteran." They set out in the hope of being able to get each one of the 2,500 businesses and industries in and around the city to take on at least one veteran, and larger enterprises to take on many more indeed. That is of course the best possible way in which a situation such as this can be solved, because it is upon private industry that we depend almost entirely for employment in this country. I want to call attention to the efforts of the citizens' committee, because it is a very creditable move indeed and it is the way in which the problem of unemployment in the final analysis can be solved in every part of the country—the only way. But while I say that private industry is the body which gives employment in this country, I do not relieve the government from responsibility in this connection. Although private industries are the actors on the stage, the stage setting which enables the actors to carry their play through successfully is the responsibility of the government, and there are many ways in which the government can assist in that stage setting which as yet I have not seen them undertake. One of these ways is this present bill, but that is not enough by any means.

I suggest that there is not a sufficient lead from the government in this connection, and there has not been in the government's policy sufficient flexibility to deal with a situation in a particular locality in Canada, even though the general over-all picture may not be nearly as bad as the local situation. I would ask the government now to give that lead and to provide that flexibility. With this in mind, so that it will not be thought that I am talking vaguely and in generalities, I have specific suggestions which I wish to make to each of seven or eight ministers of the crown. Since they are not all in their seats at the moment I will address these suggestions to the Minister of Veterans Affairs, whose job it is of course—it must be his principal job—to coordinate all activities of the government which can be of benefit to veterans.

We have had from the Minister of Reconstruction the statement that there is to be no public works programme to relieve the situation in Vancouver, although that has been asked for. I have no particular objection myself to no public works programme, chiefly because I am quite sure that it would take so long to get it actually started that the situation must be met by more expeditious means. I do not think the government is right in withholding public works generally at the present time. The shelf project is all very well; but it might also be a very good idea not to cultivate the squirrel habit when you put things on your shelves. If these public works were prepared they could be used to advantage in Vancouver to-day. However, let us assume that we shall not have public works, since that has been definitely stated by a minister.

Then we have the Minister of National Defence, who is responsible for dischare policy in the armed forces. We have had it from the minister that people may be discharged in whatever part of Canada they may wish. Again in general I have no particular objection to that but I do object, when an emergency situation such as this arises, when everyone is crying in Vancouver for work, that no change is made in that policy at the present time. It is ridiculous that the government should go on discharging in Vancouver people who did not enlist there, knowing that there are no jobs to be found at the moment and that as soon as they have used up their month's pay and started on their reestablishment gratuities they will be back on the labour market, using their credits for living expenses, which I am sure was never the intention of the government, and certainly not the intention of parliament. This is definitely the time when the discharge policy should be reviewed with the object of stopping temporarily the discharge of service personnel in Vancouver if they did not enlist there or if they have not a definite job to go to.

Let us combine that question of the discharge of men with the Department of Reconstruction on the matter of housing. I have given the housing situation in Vancouver. It is very serious indeed. Over 3,400 veterans are improperly housed. If we are to go on discharging men in Vancouver at the rate of 140 per cent of enlistments, I suggest that the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Reconstruction could well get together and give Vancouver a greater priority for housing materials for veterans, thereby getting these people under cover and providing a greater chance of employment.

I turn now to the Department of Labour, By all means, let us stop this influx of 300 a month from the prairies. Let us advertise in the papers on the prairies and bring the full weight of the Department of Labour to bear in order to show men that it is useless to go there now and add to the unemployment situation. Let us tell them that if they go out they will be doing the veterans who are at present in Vancouver, a bad turn by competing with them for the few available jobs. Let us impress upon people the unwisdom of going out to Vancouver at the present time. People will respond to that kind of thing. They are not fools, and if they get sound advice from someone they respect I am sure the Canadian people will follow it.

I wish to commend the Department of Labour for having agreed to pay the fares of those moving out of Vancouver who are going to jobs in some other part of the country. It is a thoroughly commendable step to take, and it is one of the things that each department of the government should be thinking of, because all these little nickels that each minister can throw in, if I may call them that, will make a dollar by the time the whole cabinet has put in its contribution, and will go a long way towards solving the problem that we are now discussing.

May I now turn to the Department of Mines and Resources and to the Department of Fisheries. There is much work to be done in the future in each of these departments. Perhaps the dominion-provincial conference is holding up progress at the moment because no agreement has been reached. But when an agreement is reached between the dominion and the provinces there will be a tremendous expansion of the work of reforestation and the propagation of fish. There will be a large field for trained foresters, hatchery men and the like. Hon. members are aware of the fact that we are short of trained men in these fields. We have large numbers of veterans, the best men you could possibly get, who have been outside and living that kind of life for four or five years. They are ideal men for these jobs. They could be taken in hand and put in training schools so that when an agreement is reached between the dominion and the provinces that work would not be further held up for lack of trained men.

Another job which could be done immediately, particularly in Vancouver, comes under the Postmaster General. We have not yet got back to double delivery of mail in Vancouver. Air mail which comes in in the morning is actually held over until the following day because of the lack of afternoon deliveries. I have had several resolutions from various bodies in Vancouver. One of them came from the citizens' rehabilitation council, which deals with veterans. It urged that a second delivery be inaugurated. I have made reference to the committee of citizens in Vancouver which is sponsoring this campaign for jobs for veterans. Is this government going to lag behind in these matters? Where there is useful work to be done in the whole community, does the government intend to leave until next spring or some time in the future the employment of additional men on the postal routes? It will not be as valuable then as it would be now, because in addition to taking several hundred of these veterans off the out-of-work rolls in Vancouver it would give inspiration to the committee there. They would know that the federal government is taking an active part in the citizens' campaign which is making such a great effort to help to employ more men. I suggest to the Minister of Veterans Affairs that this matter be taken up with the Postmaster General—not next week, not after Christmas, but now; and that instructions be sent out, to-day if possible, that these men be taken on the postal staff and that a second delivery be instituted at once. This is not a matter of relief; this is not employment for employment's sake; it is a necessary job and it should and must be done right now.

I now come to the Department of Finance. There is much that they can do. They can throw in their nickel's worth too. I have two principal suggestions to make here. My first one is decentralization. At the present time prices are fixed in Ottawa. Hon. members are aware that because Ottawa is three thousand miles away the people here do not fully know the conditions on the coast. They know only what they are told by their branch offices out there. In actual practice it has been found that it takes two months to get a price fixed for a new commodity. Think of what that has done to the reestablishment of civilian trade. Think of what it has done to the Christmas trade; think of what it has contributed to the present unemployment situation in Vancouver. There should be decentralization now; there should be some flexibility in this price fixing. If the people on the spot were given at least some measure of price fixation, within certain limits laid down in Ottawa, they would be able to do the job perfectly well and still prevent inflation, and at the same time get things moving.

Recently in this house we heard the Minister of National Health and Welfare say that his family allowances could not operate unless they were decentralized. He has only seven employees in Ottawa, and that is the kind of thing I suggest should be considered by the Minister of Finance at once in the hope of getting some speed in this matter.

The second principle that I suggest the Minister of Finance should look into is that of flexibility. I can give the committee an illustration which will show what I mean. At the present time there is a shortage of lath in the building trades. I have it from sources in Vancouver that mills are cutting up wood for firewood instead of making it into lath because under the vagaries of the wartime prices and trade board they get more for wood than they do for lath. If that is so, does it not show that there is need for someone from the wartime prices and trade board being on the spot in these various centres, someone who will go round, ferret things out and correct these maladjustments which are holding back reconstruction?

I know this, from having been told by an officer of the wartime prices and trade board, that during the war that body worked on the principle that if the fixing of prices forced a man out of business they did not mind. That was all right during the war because there was an inexhaustible demand for labour in war industry, and if someone was forced out of an inessential trade he could get a job at once in a war industry. Now the circumstances are entirely different. You cannot afford, by your price control mechanism, to force anyone out of business, and you cannot afford to force him out of essential lines into other and less essential lines. Decentralization would tend to greater flexibility and provide more jobs.

Everyone in the house knows that deflation is one of the causes of unemployment. In our attempts to prevent inflation do not let us go to the other extreme and deflate and cause unemployment. Let us look at the situation and see whether in fact there are elements of deflation in the activities of the wartime prices and trade board. I know that everyone in the house is for price control, but it must be borne in mind that we have taken away the price incentive to do business. If we are to undertake to control the economy of the country in this way, then we must not do only half a job. We must do the other half by providing some incentive other than the price incentive to keep business going and to keep on expanding. I suggest that that must be looked into very carefully by the Department of Finance, particularly in relation to the situation in Vancouver.

Finally, I come to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I suggest that his function is to co-ordinate the activities of all these other ministries, to hold out the bag so that they can put their nickels in and by that means get something done in connection with this matter. "Get cracking!" Finally, I urge upon the minister with all my strength that he should go out to Vancouver—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Nothing I should like better.

Mr. MERRITT: —and see, on the ground, what the circumstances are. He should talk to that citizens' committee and find out what the government can do to assist them; he should talk to the veterans and find out what their troubles are. And, having made that personal inspection, having talked to the people, he will come back here with many more ideas than I have been able to give him this afternoon—and I believe I have given him a few.

The most effective way in which problems such as those existing in Vancouver can be solved is by a minister of the crown making an investigation and, while he is doing so, getting behind the local movement and giving it the greatest possible boost. Let him show the employers that this civic effort is not some crazy man's idea but a great national effort to which all can contribute on behalf of the veterans.

The limit to which the government can go, in my view, was set out by Mr. Churchill at the time V-2 bombs were falling. He was asked what he was doing to stop them, and he answered in this way: "I was inspecting the damage done by one of the bombs the other day, when a man who lived in one of those houses came up to me and said, 'What are you doing to stop these things?' I answered him by saying, 'I am doing everything humanly possible'." This, I suggest, is the only limit this government can accept in a situation such as that which confronts the veterans this winter. When the government has done everything humanly possible, it has done enough. I do say, however, that at this time, and certainly in connection with the situation in Vancouver, very little has been done. Certainly not enough has been done, and that which has been done has not been sufficiently publicized out on the Pacific coast. At the present time the people out there are angry because veterans are unemployed. But, as I said when I first came to the house, they are just as angry because they do not seem to get any response from Ottawa when they attempt to lay their difficulties before the government.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say only a word in this connection. I had not intended taking up much time at this stage, because all parties in the house were represented on the committee. I must however say a word about the speech just delivered by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard. I appreciate, as he does, the situation in which returning men find themselves, and I understand that in Vancouver the situation is probably worse than it is in any other part of Canada. But when any hon. member suggests that appeals should be made by one part of the country to another asking that people stay out of certain fields of employment so that veterans may be employed, I suggest that such procedure would not be for the welfare of the country as a whole. If the unemployed people in the prairie provinces, about whom he spoke, were to take his advice and stay home rather than go to Vancouver to seek employment, I do not know what they would do. Surely that is not a solution of the problem. I should expect the hon. member to have greater vision than that. Temporary relief of unemployment in Vancouver certainly will not take care of the unemployment problem across Canada. I have no doubt the suggestion was made in the veterans committee that these returned men should be cared for and kept on full pay and allowances until such time as they might be properly rehabilitated. I should think that would be much more to the point than the suggestion that unemployed people in the prairie provinces should not go in search of employment, to Vancouver or anywhere else.

Mr. MERRITT: Does the hon. member know that those who are going out there are unemployed? It is my understanding that they are not, and that they are people who prefer to live on the west coast.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I think there may be some like that, but certainly not enough to create an unemployment problem in Vancouver. Surely that goes without saying. I do not know all the people in the prairie provinces, but I do know a good many of them, and I do not know many who are sufficiently wealthy to move to Vancouver just for the sake of participating in your pleasant climate. I know you have good weather out there; but I have been there and I have always found it costs a great deal of money to live in that part of the country.

I have only one further word to say in connection with veterans problems, and it will be a repetition of what I said when we were discussing housing. The government could do the veteran a great service if, in its veterans' housing plan, it would take precautions to see to it that the houses, when completed, offer the veteran something for his money. I have taken an interest in the building project in the last few years. I have watched the three different types of houses under construction, and I apologize to no one when I say that the houses being built under the veterans' housing plan will not give value for the money expended. The houses built under the veterans plan are of such materials that they will not stand up for any length of time. The materials being used are inferior by far to the materials used under the national housing plan. Even if the government has to add another thousand dollars to the cost of a veteran's house, it should be prepared to offer that amount as a grant to the veteran in order that he may have a better house. These men ought not to be expected to invest their gratuities in houses when they cannot receive value for the money they have invested.

[Mr. Johnston.]

I shall not speak at greater length at this time, because I understand the house is desirous of getting along with its work. So far as I know, members who served on the veterans committee did a good job. Certainly the reports we received from those of our group who were on that committee have convinced us that the committee did a worth while job, and that the legislation proposed will be a great improvement upon that which we have had. However, all depends upon the administration.

Mr. TUCKER: Mr. Chairman, our veterans committee was to meet at four o'clock. It would be my understanding that the committee would adjourn until we had completed discussion on this legislation.

Mr. SKEY: Mr. Chairman, I am the sixth member from this side of the house to speak on this measure, and it is significant that all six have seen fit to mention one aspect of the legislation, namely its administration and operation. I am sure it was the matter of efficient administration and operation that the committee had in mind, when it included the section granting the minister such wide powers. While hon. members realize that those powers add greatly to his duties, I believe they were inserted so that he might be permitted to interpret the spirit of the legislation and to implement the views of the committee.

Perhaps it was a certain uneasiness in the minds of all six hon. members which prompted them all to call attention to the unnecessary delay in granting benefits, narrow legal interpretations, tight rulings by the department, and close decisions by the treasury board. I know that such things were not intended by the veterans committee. I hope that great vigilance will be exercised by the members of this house in the interpretation of the spirit of this legislation; that the members will assist the minister in the exercise of his wide powers, and that the members will also include in their vigilance the Veterans' Land Act and the legislation having to do with gratuities and disability pensions.

On section 7—Allowance during vocational or technical training.

Mr. LOCKHART: I do not intend to criticize unnecessarily what is in the bill, but I should like to point out one thing to the minister. I may be misinformed, but I am told that special emphasis is being laid upon certain types of vocational training to the detriment of other essential services which are necessary.

Mr. MITCHELL: What has the hon. member in mind?

Mr. LOCKHART: I am going to prepare a memorandum about this. In my own line of business, I find that there are very few men taking up the type of work that would fit them into the building industry. We are going to be desperately in need of such men, because there has been no apprenticeship carried on for many years. Then there are men who prior to enlistment were engaged in lake transport and work of that kind. The other day the hon. member for Cape Breton South referred to the men who were not returning to the coal mines. I have tried personally to induce men who before enlistment had had training of this kind to go back to the same type of work, but many of them seem to be thinking about work in factories. I would urge upon the minister that strong representations be made to these men to the end that as far as possible they take up work in which they had some preliminary training prior to enlistment and not create bottlenecks in one particular line to the possible neglect of other essential services.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am grateful to the hon. member for his constructive advice, and I should appreciate receiving a memorandum along the lines he has suggested. We have two types of counselling service. The first is the in-service counselling which a man receives before he leaves the service, and then we have trained 1,500 personnel counsellors through the cooperation of the Department of Labour, the Department of Veterans Affairs and the three services. These men are trained to be expert in giving the best possible advice to veterans. I should like to be advised if there is any inadequate advice being given, and if so it will certainly receive attention.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): In connection with these three sections I should like to know if the allowances vary in the different cities?

Mr. TUCKER: There is no variation.

Mr. PROBE: I should like to ask the minister a question with respect to the new hospital wing for veterans at the Regina general hospital. I have just received a written communication, the second of the kind that has come to me, with respect to the physiotherapy facilities at the Regina general hospital, which is under the Department of Veterans Affairs. I am informed that there is a large basement room available for physiotherapy purposes but there is no equipment. A question was asked of Doctor M. A. Carmichael, chief medical officer of the Department of Veterans Affairs, with respect to obtaining this necessary equipment. His answer was:

> We've been trying to get equipment for a long time but you just can't get if there's none to be had. This is a big show, there are forty or fifty other places demanding equipment from the government and they need it as badly as we do in Regina.

This newspaper article states as follows:

> Two weeks ago Docor Hartley Wilson, director of physical medicine, Ottawa, was in Regina and he promised to rush equipment as soon as it was available. Doctor Carmichael said he thought equipment would be coming through within a week or ten days.

This condition of affairs has existed for three or four months, as no doubt the minister is aware. The letter which I have received states that at the present time there is ample physiotherapy equipment in Dundurn military hospital to meet the needs of this particular wing of the Regina general hospital. Could the minister say whether steps have been taken to supply this equipment?

Mr. MACKENZIE: If they have not, they will be taken right away.

Mr. TUCKER: This matter was brought to my attention yesterday. I brought it to the attention of our medical treatment branch and urged them to investigate the possibility of moving this equipment from Dundurn military hospital.

On section 19—Regulations.

Mr. LOCKHART: I should like to make one general observation in connection with housing for veterans. So far as I can find out, no houses have been completed under the provisions of the Veterans' Land Act or the rehabilitation act.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes, but not many.

Mr. LOCKHART: I am told that it will be February, March, April or May before a good many of these houses will be available.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is hoped that 2,700 will be completed shortly after the end of March.

Mr. LOCKHART: I am told that in certain parts of the country—I am not speaking so much of my own part—there is a growing opportunity to get possesion of more wartime houses. The situation to-day is that 4,000 returned men are out of work; thousands more are coming back week by week, and some 1,500 to 2,000 war brides are expected in the early part of the year. It would be a boon if these wartime houses could be occupied to the greatest extent possible, even if only temporarily. The situation is such that legal separations are even taking place caused by the lack of proper housing, and I would urge the minister to cooperate with other branches of the government service to make more houses available as quickly as possible.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I appreciate my hon. friend's comments. The matter was discussed by the committee when dealing with the veterans land bill. As my hon. friend is well aware, there are four housing agencies in Canada—in my opinion too many: the National Housing Act, Wartime Housing Limited, small holdings, housing under the Veterans Land Act, and private enterprise. I am speaking now not for the government; I think the first thing to do is to coordinate those four agencies into one. I do not think housing belongs to the Veterans Land Act at all. That is my personal opinion. We have 3,000 houses now in the course of construction, and 6,000 are projected for next year under the Veterans Land Act, I would hope that before long some central agency would coordinate all these enterprises. I think it would make for greater progress and better results.

Mr. KNIGHT: Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether I am in order in introducing this matter, but I am interested in the Canadian Corps of Fire Fighters. I presume that they come under the minister's care in the capacity of veterans. Is it true that the committee has reported favourably on their case? I should like the assurance of the minister that something has been done in committee for these fire fighters, or is in preparation. I feel that I owe that to them at least.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The fire fighters were in the first place under the Department of National War Services. Several orders in council have been passed providing benefits for them; not one hundred per cent in every case but eighty-five per cent of the benefits extended to those in the fighting forces have been extended to the fire fighters who were overseas. The committee will be completely free when it meets again next session to review the benefits extended to the fire fighters. I have had several interviews with them and have always found them very fair indeed.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I understood that it was practically agreed in the committee that the case of the fire fighters would be reviewed by the committee next session. I have representations to make on behalf of the fire fighters, and I have in the meantime passed them on to the members of our group who are members of the veterans committee, and who have informed me that the whole question of the fire fighters is to be gone into thoroughly next session. If not, I have representations to make to this committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The assurance I gave was that the terms of reference to the committee next session would be as broad and as comprehensive as the terms this session in regard to the welfare of any of those who served overseas during the trying time of war.

Mr. JOHNSTON: That is what I understood.

Mr. KNIGHT: I think the minister said that the matter would be reviewed next session. What I am interested in is an improvement in the lot of the fire fighters. It was my understanding that the committee was prepared to recommend an improvement, putting the fire fighters on practically a basis of equality with other returned veterans.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The committee is free to consider the whole situation.

Mr. KNIGHT: If that should not be so, I have a brief to present on their behalf at this time.

Mr. GREEN: I think the minister has not made the situation clear with regard to the fire fighters. Unfortunately the majority of the committee decided that they would not consider their representations during this session. Now the position is that the matter will be left over until next session.

Mr. TUCKER: Shortly the committee will meet to make its final recommendation, and this matter will be considered before it makes its final report. One suggestion I had thought of bringing before the committee was that they might recommend in their final report that an interdepartmental committee be set up to assemble full data on matters that we did not have time to deal with this session, so that everything could be got in shape to enable them to be dealt with expeditiously next session. The things we have not had time to deal with this session will of course be taken up by the veterans committee next session. If such a small committee is set up to assemble data on matters that have been left over until next session, there will be included in them of course the submissions of the fire fighters and of those interested in their welfare, and that will be considered by the special committee.

Mr. ADAMSON: I understand that these are permissive regulations with respect to the passing of orders in council to meet the conditions which were adduced in evidence during the lengthy sittings of the committee; that the matter will be further studied and orders in council brought down and eventually incorporated in the statute as amended next session.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is right.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Have the orders in council that have been passed with respect to the fire fighters been tabled?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. SKEY: I notice that clause 2(n) says that "veteran" means

A person who has been on active service in the Canadian forces . . . including a person who has served in the Canadian Women's Army Corps.

Is that intended to apply also to the women's division of the Royal Canadian Air Force and to the Wrens?

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

VETERANS' LAND ACT

INCORPORATION OF PROVISIONS OF CERTAIN ORDERS IN COUNCIL

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of bill No. 233, to amend the Veterans' Land Act, 1942.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—"Minister"; "veteran".

Mr. MACKENZIE: This bill, of which the second reading has just been endorsed by the house, is a bill to amend the Veterans' Land Act. Like the bill amending the War Service Grants Act, with which we have already dealt, this bill has been recommended to the house by the select committee on veterans affairs.

Mr. MacNICOL: Unanimously?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes. The committee's recommendation, which includes the draft bill, was presented on Monday, November 26, and appears in the Votes and Proceedings of that day. The act which it is proposed to amend was adopted in 1942, also upon recommendations of a committee of this house.

The amendments now offered represent for the most part orders in council adopted under the War Measures Act arising out of administrative experience and designed to increase the scope of settlement opportunities.

With the end of the war it has been deemed desirable that the legislation should be reviewed by a select committee of this house and that amendments having their sanction in orders in council should be embodied in the statute with the full authority of parliament. The select committee was also authorized by this house to consider the whole field of veterans' legislation and was invited to suggest additional amendments which might be deemed appropriate. These instructions the select committee has acted upon.

The bill now before us includes not only those provisions which had already been adopted by order in council but two or three additional clauses. The bill as recommended by the committee has been accepted by the government and is before the house in the form of a government bill.

Aside from orders in council, the two principal amendments recommended by the select committee are: first, a more precise definition of the service qualifications required of applicants for settlement under the act; second, a specific assertion that the acceptance of the benefits conferred by the act shall not disqualify a veteran from taking his seat in parliament. With respect to the definition of service, it has been decided to follow the very carefully considered language of the War Service Grants Act. The desirability of the second new provision arises from the fact that numbers of members of the forces were members of parliament or have been elected to parliament. It did not seem in the public interest that veterans should be deprived of their reestablishment rights by reason of the fact that the people of Canada had chosen them to be their representatives in parliament. The other amendments, with one exception to which I shall refer, are those which had been adopted by order in council as the result of administrative experience.

One group of such amendments increases the ceiling prices for contracts of settlement. The original act, as passed in 1942, provided that the maximum cost of an individual settlement should not exceed $4,800. It was found that the administration could not acquire a sufficient number of satisfactory farms and suitable small holdings within that maximum. The new ceiling which has been in effect for some time is $6,000. Needless to say, there are some areas of very high quality land where farms and settlements cannot be acquired even at this price. However, by actual experience the director has been able to acquire close to five hundred thousand acres of farm land suitable for settlement within the ceiling now prescribed and, in addition, approximately twenty thousand acres of carefully selected sites for small holdings. The provision regarding ceilings recommended to the house by the select committee is, in form and substance, identical with the powers which the director has already enjoyed for some time under a series of orders in council.

The other major subject covered by this amending bill is the provision for enabling settlement to take place on provincial crown lands, upon Indian lands, and upon land within national parks or otherwise vested in the crown in right of the dominion.

To understand the history of these amendments, it is desirable that we bear in mind the fundamental purpose of the Veterans' Land Act. That purpose is the reestablishment of veterans, in this case the reestablishment of veterans with farming experience or a farming background, in farm homes, or upon small holdings where the cultivation of the soil contributes jointly with some other occupation to the maintenance of the veteran and his family. In order that this statement may not be incomplete, I should mention that commercial fishing is dealt with on a parity with farming. The important point in this context is, however, that our dominion legislation in this field is aimed specifically at the reestablishment of veterans on the land under conditions which offer reasonable assurances of success to the average industrious practical settler.

The Veterans' Land Act contemplates a loan and, under certain conditions, a free grant of a certain proportion of the value of the enterprise.

It was considered essential—and this was repeatedly emphasized by members from all parts of the house—when the act was under debate in 1942, that each individual settlement project should be carefully scrutinized from the point of view of both the qualifications of the veteran and the suitability of the land.

Provincial governments are also interested in settlement from the point of view of the opening up of new and unsettled lands in frontier areas. Representations were received from several of the provinces urging that the Veterans' Land Act should be modified so as to be of assistance in this regard.

There is, of course, nothing in the act to prevent settlement upon crown land where, in the judgment of the director and his advisory committees, the project offers reasonable assurance of success. It is well known, however, that a great deal of provincial crown land is wild land outside the settled areas, and that the man who undertakes to bring a tract of wild land under cultivation faces a certain element of risk. In practical experience we find very little such land that constitutes in its present condition adequate security for a loan such as is contemplated under the standard provisions of the Veterans' Land Act.

While the dominion and the provinces, for the reasons indicated, necessarily approached this whole subject from quite different directions, we considered that there need be no irreconcilable difficulty about combining the two purposes.

The legislation was designedly drafted in flexible form, because the proposals of the several provinces differed greatly from each other.

The contribution to settlement, which the dominion is prepared to make under these agreements, is a dircet grant not exceeding the maximum free grant, which accompanies a standard settlement contract on a developed farm.

The amount is $2,320, and the act requires that this sum shall be used for one or more of a variety of purposes set forth with great clarity in the section of the bill which is now being introduced. It is open to the provinces to make some additional contribution to the settler's success, and several provinces have indicated their intention of doing so.

The order in council, which it is now proposed to incorporate in the act, has been at least partly justified by experience. Three provinces have already entered into agreements with the dominion and negotiations with three others are in an advanced stage.

The result is that the substantial number of Canadian veterans who were reared on our northern frontiers can, if they wish to do so, return to that part of the country whose ways and resources they know and understand. They can return to the frontiers and receive a substantial measure of state assistance under terms that are broad enough to permit them to undertake careers in which farming, fishing, forestry, trapping or a combination of several of these typical Canadian occupations, may contribute to their livelihoods.

An almost exactly similar provision was adopted with respect to Indian veterans who wish to settle upon Indian lands. Such lands cannot be given as security for a loan, but the Minister of Veterans Affairs is authorized to enter into an agreement with the Minister of Mines and Resources for the purpose of ensuring that members of our Indian bands, who have served nobly in the war, shall not be denied assistance in settlement upon lands within Indian reserves.

While these clauses were under consideration by the select committee, another problem arose which was dealt with in the same way. Numbers of members of our armed forces were born and brought up in such towns as Banff and Jasper, which are situated within national parks. It is dominion government policy that such lands may not be alienated, and cases arose where residents of park lands were unable to enjoy the benefits of the Veterans' Land Act by reason of this fact.

Accordingly the select committee has recommended—and the government has accepted the proposal—that the Minister of Veterans Affairs shall be authorized to enter into an agreement with the Minister of Mines and Resources providing for settlement on park lands or, indeed, any other crown lands for which the Minister of Mines and Resources is responsible.

I am advised that the provision is broad enough, for instance, to cover settlement in the Northwest Territories, if such a case should arise.

In submitting this bill to the committee, I think we should endorse without the slightest hesitation the recommendations of the very able committee of this house who gave their fine consideration to the measure.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The committee agreed to recommend this measure unanimously, in so far as it now stands, with certain reservations, on the understanding that at the next session the committee could be reconvened and then offer any further amendments that might be necessary to take care of provisions not now contained in the bill. As pointed out, a committee of sixty ex-servicemen gave lengthy and detailed study to the matter, under the able chairmanship of the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) and the discussions were at all times non-partisan.

The original Veterans' Land Act was set up, as the minister has stated, after a careful study by a special committee of the house in July, 1942. The preamble made it clear that the proposed measure did not restrict its terms to full-time agriculture, and although the principal objective was for full-time agricultural settlement, a veteran might secure a holding and be assisted in settlement even though he had other employment.

The total expenditure per settler was at that time $4,800, of which $1,200 might be for stock and equipment; section 13 has been amended to provide a maximum of $6,000, the rate of interest being three and a half per cent; and after ten years of settlement under the contract a maximum of $2,320 of this $6,000 becomes a grant to the settler.

The bill was founded on the principle that the veteran should have a substantial equity in the land. Mortgage companies used to contend that a farmer should have a fifty per cent equity in his land in order to be assured of success. The central mortgage bank was founded on the basis of a twenty per cent equity, and this bill provides a forty-three per cent equity, including ten per cent paid down by the veteran when he procures settlement.

Post-war farming has been considered, first, as a way of life and, second, as a business. There is a difference there because, after all, it has been considered by governments in the past that it was essential to have a number of people decentralized to settle on land. First, let us look at farming as a way of life. When it comes to business there are difficulties that crop up periodically. Great changes have taken place in agricultural production in the past few years. Mechanization has displaced many farm hands. During the war years British agriculture has become the most highly mechanized in the world. That is something different from the condition which obtained a few years ago.

There is no provision in this bill for settlers to purchase power equipment cooperatively, and $1,200 will not go far in that direction.

That is something which I should have liked to see attended to, but I do not wish to make an issue of it at this time. We must recognize, however, that if the scheme is to be successful the principle of parity must be taken into consideration. In this connection I would quote briefly from a statement I made in July, 1942, when the act was set up. I should like to read what I said in regard to the question of parity:

May I say at the beginning that if it were not for the fact that I have some faith in the future, and a hope that agricultural parity will eventually be established in Canada, I would not have been able to support the bill even in principle. In the great nation to the south of us, the United States, there has been parity between agricultural and other products for a year now, and under the Washington wheat agreement of June 27, 1942, signed by the Argentine, Australia, Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States, the representatives of these nations have recognized the basis of a parity price for wheat which will return a fair remuneration to the producers as well as being fair to the consumer. On the basis of these agreements, and having regard to what has been done in the United States, I think we may hope that we are doing these settlers justice by establishing them on the land, because we hope that they will be able to carry on under parity prices, in the future at any rate. As I say, if it were not for that hope I for one could not have supported the bill.

As I said then, if it had not been for that hope I could not have supported the bill in July, 1942. I regret that the pious hope which I had at that time has not materialized effectively. During the past three and a half years we know what has happened in connection with wheat agreements, and how international conferences have fallen down in this respect. Agricultural producers in western Canada alone, as has been pointed out in other debates, are receiving, as a result of controls, approximately $255,000,000 less for this year's grain crop than they would have received on the open markets of the world, and live stock and dairy produce are on a par with grain. We have taken from one-third to fifty per cent less, while the implements of production which these settlers must purchase are on the basis of open world market prices.

According to western real estate men who appeared before the veterans committee, land values have risen twenty-five per cent since the beginning of the war. Now the ceiling price on grain is on the average a little better than twenty-five per cent over our present floor prices. You can see, therefore, the necessity of some basis of parity. No provision is made for that in the present act, should we enter into another depression, and these settlers will be caught in a deflationary set of circumstances. There is no provision to assist the veteran to start in business. That should have been taken care of in the rehabilitation act. If a young veteran with financial means of his own wishes to start up in business, he finds under the controls that are in force to-day, and the priorities, that he cannot procure the necessary goods without being forced into partnership with someone who is already established. This applies to men and women alike.

Section 35 was amended to facilitate the negotiation of agreements with the various provinces for the use of their provincial land to provide for assistance to veterans. These agreements provide assistance to veterans as farmers, as small holders, for forestry establishments, for commercial fishermen, for trappers and so on, with a grant up to $2,320.

As mentioned by the hon. member for Royal, speaking of the north country, I believe that in this great dominion we are fortunate to have vast undeveloped natural resources, mining, lumber and so on, and this provision certainly assists the veterans along these lines. There are great possibilities in this respect.

With regard to administration, the director stated that some of the delay during the first years of this war had been deliberate on the part of the administration. As the committee will realize, wives must appear with the husband before the settlement committee. The committee must be assured that the wife is qualified to carry on as the husband. Many thousands of our men married overseas. Many of those men are home and their wives cannot as yet obtain passage to this country. There are many embarrassing situations, and with the present unemployment in Canada the veterans are here and the wives overseas. The men are spending their allowances of one kind and another looking for work or settlement. A small article appeared in one of the last issues of the paper from the veterans' department, carrying this heading:

Wife a Burden?

A veteran applying for benefits under a section of the Veterans' Land Act which authorizes a loan at three and one-half per cent to pay off a mortgage on property already owned, was told to bring in a list of his encumbrances. He brought in his marriage certificate.

There is really a lot to that. It is an encumbrance to the poor chap under circumstances as they exist to-day. There are many thousands of such cases. While I would not urge that our men should stay overseas, I would hope that some transportation could be made available to get those wives back to this country as soon as possible. That is very important.

The original intention of this act was for land settlement rather than small holdings. In my opinion, the efforts of the administration have been directed more to centralization of small holdings near, and in some cases, within large cities, than land settlement. We all realize that everything possible must be done to provide housing for the veterans and their dependents.

My colleague, the hon. member for Royal, made an urgent appeal to the people of Canada along that line, and I trust it will be heeded by them. The cost of constructing these houses has risen from 35 to 50 per cent since the commencement of the war. We all know how difficult it is to get houses in this country to-day. We have wartime housing, national housing and our Veterans' Land Act, and all centralized. I do not think we should follow the principle of setting up communities in this country. I know it is difficult at the present time to do otherwise because of controls. It is necessary that materials and all that kind of thing be purchased in the mass through cooperation, and therefore it is difficult to get away from controls. But I am afraid it does not augur well for the future of this country. I should like to see decentralization take place along that line as quickly as possible. Personally I am opposed to centralization of these veterans' settlements, especially when there is no assistance at present in this set-up for individuals who want to get back to the place from which they enlisted, the small village or town in the country. While provision is made to improve the present difficulty, at the present time it is almost impossible to carry out the arrangement.

I was reading some of the debates that took place in 1942 when this act was under discussion. At that time some hon. members of the government pointed out they hoped that centralization of veterans' communities would never take place in this country. It may well be that the administration of land settlement and small holdings will have to be separated in Canada, because it is most important that we provide housing for those people, and to have both phases properly carried out. It may be necessary to separate them and to set up two boards of administration.

On November 1, 1945, there were 18,705 applications for qualifications for establishment under the act either for farming or for small holdings. It is estimated that by the end of 1946 there will be over 35,000 applications in the dominion. Of these it is estimated that 17,400 will be established by the end of 1946 as follows: 6,420 as farmers; 10,225 as small holders and 825 as commercial fishermen.

In my view this new bill is good as far as it goes. It is an excellent bill and a great improvement over the old Soldier Settlement Act. But as I have already pointed out, there are shortcomings. We wish to facilitate the passing of the measure just as quickly as possible to assist the veterans and their dependents. The veterans' committee of the house have worked hard and given of their best. We have the assurance that such a veterans' committee will be reconvened immediately after the commencement of the next session of parliament, and that further amendments covering the points I have raised will be permitted. All of us who have been close to this situation realize that within the next two or three years new problems pertaining to the rehabilitation of our veterans and their families will be cropping up, and that members associated with that work in this parliament will be called upon to give close attention to this committee for the next two or three sessions of parliament.

Mr. WRIGHT: As the minister has said, this bill was reported unanimously from the veterans affairs committee. There were several reservations in the minds of hon. members, not only in the group with which I am connected but in other groups in the house, as to the sufficiency of all the sections of this bill to meet the purposes for which it was passed, namely, permanently to establish returned men in civilian life on farms. I believe that was the original purpose of the act, although, as the last speaker and the minister have said, there was another clause introduced in the act, namely, the small holdings clause which, while not displacing the main part of the act, has assumed an important place in it. Personally I think it has a place in Canada and should be encouraged.

While in some of the things I say with respect to the bill as it stands at present I may appear to be critical, I want it clearly understood that I believe that this bill is an improvement on the old Soldier Settlement Act. I had a lot to do with that act, and with the people who settled under it, and I am sure that this measure is an improvement over the old act.

I have three main objections to the bill, which I believe caused the failure of the old Soldier Settlement Act, and they have not been entirely eliminated in this bill. In the first place, under the old Soldier Settlement Act land, stock and equipment were bought at inflated prices. They were bought in 1919 and 1920 when, as everyone knows, prices in Canada were inflated. As a result, under that act the settlers found themselves in great difficulty. In the second place the failure of the old Soldier Settlement Act was due to the fact that in settling under that act the soldier did not have sufficient equity in his land. He made a ten per cent payment and the rest of the debt was charged against him. As the hon. member who has just taken his seat has said, no mortgage company will accept loans on that basis. No mortgage company would grant a loan of ninety per cent on the land. In most cases fifty per cent is the maximum that they will accept. In the third place I believe that the old Soldier Settlement Act failed because the soldier settling under it did not have enough capital to make a success of his business. In many cases he was operating an uneconomic unit.

Let us see what we have done to eliminate these three main causes of the failure of the old act. When this act was drawn up in 1942—and I was on the committee along with some other members of this house who reviewed it—we made certain suggestions with respect to improvements in it. Some of them may have been accepted, but others have not. I believe that they will eventually have to be accepted before the act can be the success which we all hope it will be.

Are we settling settlers under this act at inflated prices? I believe that we should ask ourselves that question. Is the land that we are buying for the soldier settlers under this act being bought at its true value, or what may be its future value in Canada? The evidence given by real estate dealers who appeared before the committee of the house was that land prices had increased by approximately twenty-five per cent. Some who appeared before the committee were unable to express an opinion, but of those who did, that was the lowest figure at which they placed the increase in the value of land over the 1940 value.

My personal experience is that, at least in the better farming areas of Canada, there has been an increase to an extent of at least fifty per cent over farm land values which existed in 1940. Again we are settling our returned men on lands which are being sold at values considerably enhanced over those of 1940. This would be all right if we had any assurance that land would remain at those prices, or that agricultural prices would remain at their present levels. Under those circumstances land values would become stabilized at present levels.

But we have no such guarantee. As a matter of fact, the floor prices which now exist in respect of cereals, and which have been established by the government, are at least twenty-five per cent below present prices. If we allow the prices so set to become permanent floor prices, then certainly we are faced with a deflation in farm values. Many of the soldiers who are being settled, under these circumstances, would find their equities disappear within the next few years.

For the moment let us consider stock. When the men come back they will have to buy stock. Any hon. member who has had any connection with agriculture will know that the present price of a milch cow in Canada is from $150 to $200. That is the price for any reasonably good animal. Similar animals could have been bought in 1939 or 1940 for from $75 to $100. Again, when we proceed to buy stock for these settlers, or when they spend their $1,200 for stock and equipment, they will be asked to spend it in an inflated market. While we have made some attempt to stabilize prices in Canada, and have had a certain measure of success, those prices will not remain stable unless we maintain for our agricultural products floor prices at or near present price levels, or the present selling prices of those products.

Let us now consider the second point, namely the equity the soldier will have in his land. In this respect the present measure is a great improvement over that which was found in the old soldier settlement scheme. The original act passed in 1942 set aside $3,600 for land and buildings and $1,200 for stock and equipment. The $1,200 was a grant to the soldier, provided that he retained possession of the land for ten years. He also received a rebate of 33⅓ per cent of the $3,600. This left him an equity of about fifty-five per cent in the land and equipment under that agreement after he had made his ten per cent initial payment.

We stated at that time that we did not believe $3,600 would buy a proper unit for farming purposes in Canada. The director, and some others who appeared before the committee in 1942, seemed to think we were wrong. However, when the act was put into operation they found they could not secure land at that price, with the result that by order in council the amount for land and buildings was increased to $4,800. It was found later that even this would not buy the necessary amount of land, and another regulation was passed allowing the $1,200 granted for stock and equipment to be used for the purchase of land.

I am reasonably sure that those men who are out to-day buying land under the authorization of the Veterans' Land Act are getting very little more in land value for their $6,000 than was obtained in 1942 for $3,600. There has been an increase in land values to approximately that extent.
