I would ask: Why should either of us suffer ourselves to remain passive in this respect, when by an active effort such as I refer to, on the part of each, a bright future awaits us and now available, which by delay may pass from our grasp.

At present men's minds are widening by the troubles in South Africa, and we realize our position from an Imperial standpoint, and not from an isolated or provincial one, and it appears particularly favourable at this juncture to favour the rounding off of the Dominion by adding to Canada on the east the most ancient of Britain's colonies, the Island of Newfoundland. I feel confederation is not complete without this being done, and I consider there is no more opportune time than the present, when the feeling of loyalty runs high to have Canada with the sister colony united or consolidated.

When the matter of Newfoundland becoming part of the Dominion was mooted in Canada some five years ago, it was regarded purely by Canadians from a provincial standpoint, and the question of $16,000,000 as the debt of Newfoundland, which was larger per head than our own, weighed heavily on the minds of many, and to assume that amount by Canada appeared larger than any corresponding advantage Canada would be receiving by having Newfoundland with us, which was, unfortunately, a mistake on our part, forgetting for the time that the advantages that would result to both countries, by the removal of a hostile tariff, and by dealing with a colony that was taking from us at that time upwards of $2,000,000 worth of goods each year, would counterbalance the assumption of her debt and remove in a short time by the development of her industries all the difficulties, such as deterred Canada from taking Newfoundland in with us.

At present we can, as I have said, were Newfoundland confederated with us, be an arm of strength to each other, and a great support to the empire of which we form a part, and thus be better able to dispose of that vexed question, 'The French Shore,' which has been a disturbing element with our sister colony for a long time.

We could also better control the nefarious traffic of intoxicating liquors from St. Pierre brought into the maritime provinces, on which little or no duty is collected, hence lost to our revenue.

Again, were we having Newfoundland with us, we could each look for advantages from an Imperial standpoint, without a fear of being assailed by a foe from without, and at the same time, I repeat, be unhampered in the sale of our goods by a hostile tariff, and besides, we could foster, and better protect the coast and deep sea fisheries in common with our own, so valuable to both of us, as a food product, and an article for export, the very life, stay and support of the fishermen of the maritime provinces, as well as an important source of revenue to each.

In conclusion, I would say that now is a propitious time to unite. Let us avail ourselves of the opportunity to cast in our destinies together, so that Newfoundland remain no longer isolated, but form part of the confederacy of Canada, ever happy, loyal and prosperous.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). It is an indication of wonderful devotion to public business to witness the government benches opposite when a motion of this kind is submitted for the consideration of the House. I doubt, Sir, if a more important motion could be laid before this parliament. Unfortunately, I was prevented from hearing all that has been said by the previous speakers, but I was in early enough to hear the cogent and unanswerable arguments of my hon. friend from Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach). Apparently, the government treat this question with sovereign contempt, since they have, I may say, no representation on the floor of the House to-night with the exception of the two ministers, which, I take it, is an evidence of the utter contempt with which they regard the proposition of bringing Newfoundland into this confederation. Of course, I do not underate the importance of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and of the Minister of Inland Revenue; but I hold that they do not constitute a proper representation of the government of Canada on an occasion when one of the most important subjects which this House can be called upon to consider has been brought before it. Although the preceding speakers may have better stated the case than I am able to do, still I may take advantage of the opportunity to say a few words upon it. The Island of Newfoundland lies at the mouth of the St. Lawrence, in a position to dominate Canada. It is the only portion of British North America that is not to-day a part of the confederation of Canada. I need not say that in view of the common interest which Newfoundland has in the fisheries of Canada, she is in a position to seriously interfere with the commercial interests of Canada. That is a danger with which we have been threatened in the past, and a position which she should not be left in. The island of Newfoundland, like the other provinces of this Dominion before confederation, is an autonomous colony, self-governing to the fullest extent; she is, therefore, in a position, by uniting with Canada, greatly to promote the interests of this Dominion, or, on the other hand, is in a position to take a line of action that will be most inimical and most injurious to this Dominion. Consider it from a defensive point of view, and it is impossible to overrate the importance of making Newfoundland a part of this Dominion; and, in my judgment, it is not more important to this Dominion to have Newfoundland a part of this great confederation than it is to the people of Newfoundland themselves. I believe that no step that can be conceived would more suddenly lift that island from the position we have often had reason to deplore, and there is no question, in my judgment, that is more calculated to be of benefit to every inhabitant of the island of Newfoundland. In becoming a part of this confederation, they would share in that great and abounding prosperity and progress which Canada now enjoys, and which is going on by leaps and bounds. There is no part of this confederation that was influenced more by hostility to the subject of confederation than the province of Nova Scotia; and yet, every intelligent man in Nova Scotia now recognizes the fact that the greatest benefit that ever happened to that province was in becoming a part of this confederation. That province fought bitterly against the scheme; but every hostile attitude they were induced to take up towards confederation has been proved to be utterly illusory and without foundation; and there is no part of this wide Dominion to-day more heartily in unison with the rest of this great Dominion than the province of Nova Scotia. Exactly the same thing would have happened in the Island of Newfoundland had it become part of confederation. At the Quebec conference in 1864, the Island of Newfoundland was represented by two of the ablest and most important public men that that island has ever had, the late Sir Frederick Carter, whose death I was sorry to see occurred a very short time ago; and another gentleman, who, I am happy to see, is still alive, Sir Ambrose Shea. Both of these gentlemen, intimately acquainted with its interests from long association in the management of its affairs, entered heartily into the project of confederation at the Quebec conference; and had the policy of that conference been carried out, a policy that the question of confederation should be referred to the legislatures of the different provinces, as was done in every instance, except that of New Brunswick, which was a mere accident—had that policy been carried out, had it been referred to the existing legislature of Newfoundland, I have no doubt that that island would long ago have become a portion of this great confederation, and all the ground of hostility which kept that island out of confederation would long since have proved as delusive as the objections that were entertained in the province of Nova Scotia have since been proved to be utterly without foundation. As I said before, this is a result which, of course, in its present position, can only be attained by the action of the government of this Dominion and the government of the Island of Newfoundland.

As to the importance attached to that measure, I hesitate to go into details, I hesitate to say to this House, because, it would perhaps be turned into account in a hostile way, how vitally important to the Dominion of Canada and how important to the island, situated as it is, both commercially and from a defensive point of view, it is that it should become a part of this confederation. I believe that if the question were taken up by the two governments, they could arrange terms that would be mutually beneficial, that would be of great value to Canada, and that would be sufficiently liberal to satisfy the objections of the great mass of the inhabitants of Newfoundland. The result of Newfoundland becoming part of the Dominion of Canada would be to give it the same abounding prosperity in which we now rejoice. I only regret that the government consider this subject so utterly unworthy of their notice, or of their attention, that there is no representation of the government here to-night, and that the party supporting the government seem to be fully imbued with the same sentiment. Nothing that can be brought before the House can hope to attract the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite except it be some party measure, some means to get an unfair advantage by breaking down the franchise of the country, a redistribution so as to enable a decided minority to have the means of electing a majority to this House. It is only measures such as these, that are assumed to be of great party advantage, that can obtain the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite. We had the benches filled the other night, by hon. gentlemen opposite, listening to a harangue in regard to which no person now can form any judgment as to what was intended. Have the government fallen so low that they must put up one of their supporters on the back benches to propose a motion of confidence in them? There seems to be no other excuse for such a motion as was moved, no doubt, at the instance of the government, by one of their subservient supporters, than that it was for the purpose of preventing them getting to supply and proceed with the public business before the House. Then, we could find these hon. gentlemen cheering to the echo all those fallacies that were presented to the House, while to-night, when we have a measure of really national importance put before the House, the government mark their contempt for any such question as that by being conspicuous by their absence, so that hon. gentlemen are obliged to address themselves to empty benches. I believe the day is near at hand, from what I know of the overwhelming public sentiment of the Dominion, from sea to sea, when this government, or any government, controlling the affairs of this Dominion, should give full and fair consideration to this important question, instead of wasting the time of the House by bringing forward measures that can have no object except to prevent the progress of public business. I will not say more on this subject because we will wait until the papers are brought down, but I may say that a more important question has not engaged the attention of this parliament since the first hour it was elected. Yet, we can estimate how much importance is attached to it by hon. gentlemen opposite by the fact that none of them consider it worthy of the slightest attention.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). Mr. Speaker, I think that no one appreciates the importance of Newfoundland more than the government does. I think, at the same time, that the hon. leader of the opposition, and the government of which he was a member did not show that they appreciated the importance of Newfoundland. There is no evidence that any effort was ever made by these hon. gentlemen to carry out such an arrangement as might result in the union of Newfoundland with Canada. As for the attack that the hon. gentleman chose to make upon the government in saying, that, instead of giving their attention to an important question of this sort, they could only attend to party politics, I think my hon. friend did not hear the explanations given by hon. members on his side of the House, as he came in after these explanations had been given. He did not hear them, but we did hear them, and I think the hon. gentleman might have spared the attack he made upon the government, by saying that we had no attention for anything but party questions. The best way we can show this is by not opposing the motion which has been made to-day. It asks for the papers, and when the moment comes to act on this information perhaps the government will show sufficient activity.

Mr. N. CLARKE WALLACE (West York). Mr. Speaker, before the motion is put I wish to make a few observations. I am amazed that when a question of such great importance to this whole Dominion, that when a question of such vital importance, in many ways, is brought before the House we have, at the present moment, out of 88 seats, on the other side of the House, only two occupied by ministers. I am sorry that the right hon. First Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) is not here because this is a matter in which the government, through the First Minister, must feel interested. The hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) tells us, in his statement on behalf of the government, that there was no attempt made by the opposition, when they were in power, to secure the union of Newfoundland with Canada. The hon. gentleman was not here at that time, but, I am sure he must know that in 1895, the government made every effort in order to come to terms, but, they found the government of Newfoundland distinctly hostile at that time. I know very well, as the House knows, that Mr. Bond was not favourable to the union of Newfoundland with the Dominion of Canada.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He is the present Prime Minister.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, and that is a point that I am going to call attention to before I sit down. As to the importance and the necessity of the joining of Newfoundland with our Dominion, convincing evidence is presented in the speeches to which we have listened. As the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) has pointed out, the history of Nova Scotia would be repeated in the case of Newfoundland. The same predictions had been made in Nova Scotia as to the disasters that were sure to follow confederation, but, to-day, every prediction that was made in that regard has been belied by the events, so that to-day, Nova Scotia is a satisfied and contented member of confederation. Not one of the evils that were predicted has ever come to pass and the same would be the case in Newfoundland. But how about the Dominion of Canada? Do we not know that they are joint owners of the fisheries? Do we not know that these gentlemen on the Treasury benches were pledged to make complete reciprocity negotiations with the United States government, which they said was necessary for Canada, and yet they have been four years in power and they have accomplished nothing. They know how the present leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) had settled these difficulties with regard to the fisheries many years ago, and had established the modus vivendi. For four years these gentlemen on the Treasury benches have accomplished nothing, and now that they are about to step out of power, and when they feel the reins of government slipping out of their hands—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, and all we are met with from them now is a vacant laugh. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), laughs, but he knows that the government have not redeemed their pledges, and he knows that they have neglected to attempt any negotiation with Newfoundland. The government of Newfoundland sought negotiations with the United States government, and these were found to be most injurious to the interests of Canada, because if they had been carried to a conclusion, and a treaty had been made, the Americans would have become joint owners of our fisheries, without our being consulted. And, Sir, as these gentlemen opposite have for four years failed, so they must fail for the few remaining months they will be in power, for they make no pretense that they will institute negotiations with Newfoundland before the general elections. If, in the interim, the United States and Newfoundland should come to an arrangement, see how the interests of Canada will be detrimentally affected? The people of Newfoundland can well tell us: Your Canadian government promised to negotiate a treaty, we went down with you to Quebec, and to Washington, but failed to do business, and now we will see what we can do for ourselves. Nobody knows better than the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that the government of Sir James Winter were tooth and nail bound up in the union of Newfoundland with Canada, and that they were the warmest advocates of that union. He knows too, that when the Conservative government was in power, we had to confront the Bond government of Newfoundland, who came to Ottawa hostile to the idea, and he knows as well, that Sir James Winter was ready the moment the hand was held out to him, to do all in his power to bring Newfoundland into confederation. Why did not the Liberal government of Canada, take advantage of that most favourable circumstance? Owing to internal dissensions, the government of Sir James Winter went out of power recently; but, outside these internal dissensions they were a dominating power, they had a large majority in both houses, and that government was a unit for federation with Canada. If the Dominion government had exerted themselves in the smallest degree to bring about that union, there would have been no difficulties in the way of its accomplishment, and if difficulties should arise, they could have been satisfactorily adjusted. To-day a new government has come into power in Newfoundland, and these gentlemen opposite tell us to-night that the government of Newfoundland is hostile. Why did the Dominion government neglect its duty when there was in power in Newfoundland a government favourable to the scheme? The Liberal government of Canada failed in its duty in a matter of the most vital importance to our future relations with the United States and to our future commerce, because, growing as we are, into a great maritime nation, nothing could be of more value to us than that there should be included in the population of the Dominion, the thousands and tens of thousands of hardy fishermen of Newfoundland. From whatever point of view you look at it, the Dominion government was derelict in its duty. And, why did they stay their hand? There is no use shirking the question, for the best plan is to meet it and tell the truth about it. This government failed in its duty, because the French shore question was not settled. What are governments for? Is it the mission of a government to shirk difficulties. No, Sir, the duty of a government is to meet difficulties and to settle them. I believe that the Newfoundland government held a just and a moderate view on that French shore question. In fact, I do not think they pressed their claims firmly enough, but they were a weak power. Had they been part of the Dominion of Canada, then this great empire of the west, this great dominating force, as it is going to be in the councils of the nation, this rich country, peopled by six millions of all sorts and conditions of men, with its vast agricultural interests, its great manufacturing interests, its vastly developing mining interests; this great country with all its force could make representations to the British government that would be attended to, and the French shore difficulty might be settled to-day. Sir, I say that the French shore question can be best settled by a united Dominion, with Newfoundland a part of it. This Liberal government was afraid to touch the question of union with Newfoundland until the French shore difficulty was settled. Sir, I believe that if the whole force and power of the Dominion of Canada, with Newfoundland included, were to present the case to the British government, the French shore question could be settled honourably and equitably. As the leader of the opposition has pointed out, when it comes to a demonstration only to delay the business of the country, hon. gentlemen opposite can turn out in full force. When it comes to a railway scheme, in which hundreds of thousands or millions of the people's money is to be thrown away into the hands of grabbers or despoilers, there is a majority of fifty or sixty to back up the government. But, this matter, in which the vital interests of the Dominion are concerned, the government take so little notice of, that we have only two ministers of the Crown here, barring our friend, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), who has just come in, and who has not realized the importance of this debate.

Mr. TALBOT. The Minister of Agriculture was here before.

Mr. WALLACE. I beg the hon. member's pardon. The hon. member himself was not here, and could not tell. Neither he nor the Minister of Agriculture were here.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I was here for a long time.

Mr. WALLACE.

Mr. WALLACE. Who was speaking when the hon. minister was here?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. member from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Martin), the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), and the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach).

Mr. WALLACE. And the hon. gentleman went out then, and stayed out until a few moments ago. I say that the government have let the favourable opportunity pass which they ought to have seized in the interest of the people of Canada, and in the interest of the integrity of this great northern empire of ours; because I contend that while such a union would be beneficial to Canada, it would be of still greater importance to Newfoundland. Newfoundland's business would increase, its prosperity would be on a stable basis, and the financial arrangements would relieve it of those necessities which have been the cause of great disturbance and difficulty to that country. The financial arrangements could easily be adjusted. But, Sir, the government have absolutely ignored the whole question during the four years of their power, although a government favourable to confederation was in power in Newfoundland. That government has now gone out, Mr. Bond has come into power again, and that favourable opportunity has been lost. The government have failed in their duty in this matter; and to-night they have shown by the absence of themselves and their supporters from the House how little care they have for so important a matter. This is a matter that deserves and must receive the careful and earnest attention of parliament, because we are going to have the union of Newfoundland with confederation, and if these gentlemen on the Treasury benches cannot bring it about, the people will endeavour to put in a government that will.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Mr. Speaker, I think it is wholly gratuitous and unjust to assume that because the benches have been empty to-night, that indicates an indifference on the part of the members of the House to the great subject that has been dealt with in to-night's debate—the union of Newfoundland with Canada. The motion is a simple one for papers, and it is not being resisted, but on the contrary, is being facilitated by the government. No one had any reason to expect that there was going to be a debate at any length on this question. If the opposition knew that there was going to be a debate upon it, they are more responsible than any one else. It is very refreshing to hear the leader of the opposition. He was not here to-night when the motion came up. He did not do the member who made the motion the honour of listening to a word he said. He did not listen to the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), who made a lengthy speech. He came in when the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach) was speaking. The hon. leader of the opposition sits there alone; he has not a lieutenant with him. During the greater part of the time, with the exception of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), the whole row of front benches on the opposition side were vacant. There was not a baker's dozen of the members of the opposition here.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will my hon. friend allow me to make a remark on that point? I had no idea that this motion would be reached until very late, because I assumed that the one that stood before it on the order paper would occupy the attention of the House, and I had no desire, I confess, to hear the discussion on that motion.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. So the hon. gentleman was not here, his lieutenants were not here, his followers were not here, and according to his own reason, he did not care about the subject at all. Four or five members of the government were here off and on during the evening. I was here during the whole debate, and as was also the Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), was here most of the time, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) was either on the floor or within hearing. I ask these hon. gentlemen opposite, therefore, to pull the beam out of their own eye before they attempt to pull the mote out of ours. The hon. leader of the opposition said that he would not discuss the question to-night because he feared his remarks might be misunderstood. In that he was very wise. This is not the time for Canada to press Newfoundland unduly to enter the Dominion. Whatever our views may be, we all know that Newfoundland will not be asked to come into this Dominion unwillingly. We are perfectly desirous that she should come in on fair terms if they can be arranged; but there is not a man on either side of the House who wishes to use any undue means to bring her in. The time will come when she will come in; but, as my hon. friend has remarked, the leader of the government in Newfoundland to-day, Mr. Bond, is bitterly hostile to union with Canada. The negotiations undertaken by the late government to bring about such a union collapsed and failed miserably. Sir John Macdonald stated in his place in this House, near to where I stand, a few years ago that he doubted very much whether it was desirable to bring about that union until the unfortunate foreshore question were settled. Every man who has taken cognizance of what has been passing in the last three or four years knows that, if we are to believe the newspapers, Lord Salisbury has given this question a great deal of attention, and that negotiations have taken place between the British government and the French government in regard to it. It may be that that difficulty will soon be removed, and then we shall be in a position, if both countries desire it, to consider the financial and other conditions on which a basis of union can be formed. But I repeat that the politicians neither of Canada nor of Newfoundland should endeavour to force this question on either country, until the people are thoroughly satisfied and in favour of the union. I for one would not give my consent to Canada taking the initial step in this matter until we believed that the people of Newfoundland were thoroughly satisfied that it would be to their interests to come in. I believe myself that the day is not far distant when they will come and rap at our door for entrance, because they will see that it will be to their interest to come, and when they do come I am sure that they will receive a cordial reception at our hands, whoever may be at the head of this government. So far as this motion is concerned, it is what my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) called the other day an academic motion. It is a motion rather for papers, what the hon. gentleman called one of those academic motions and we will not oppose it. When the House is in possession of the papers, hon. members will be in a better position to form a judgment. In the meantime, I think the less we say, which may be twisted by the people of Newfoundland into a belief that we are endeavouring to force or drag them into a union, the better on the merits of the question.

Motion agreed to.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, March 20, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PRIVILEGE—MR. BERGERON.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to say a few words on a question of privilege. And, if necessary, though I think it will not be necessary, I will conclude my remarks with a motion. I find in La Patrie, Montreal, the organ of the government, and particularly of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), an article which I translate as follows :

Mr. Clarke Wallace, the ally of Mr. Bergeron, and Mr. Taylor, the whip of the Tory party, have manifested the intention of presenting to the House of Commons a resolution having the effect of pledging the Canadian government in advance to participation by Canada in all the wars of England in the future, with or without the consent of parliament, and to engage the Federal treasury for the complete payment of all expenses that such participation will entail.

The 'Herald,' of Montreal, combats this movement of the Tory party as inopportune, and as having been conceived with the sole object of hurting Sir W. Laurier and embarrassing the government, and not with the object of helping the cause of the empire. We share the sentiment of the 'Herald,' and say with that paper that the Tory chiefs are doing a very dangerous work. If they wished to sap the foundations of the edifice of confederation, they could not have taken a better way of doing it than they are taking to-day.

This, as I say, is an editorial article in La Patrie. It would be useless for me to say in this House that there is not a word of truth in it. It is not written for this House, it is written for the public at large. Consequently, I think it my duty, so far as I am concerned, to put this article on record in Hansard, and to couple with it some of the expressions that fell from the lips of the right hon. Premier (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), which, I hope, will be reproduced in La Patrie, and given to their readers.

In a speech delivered in this House, the Premier said :

But if the day should come—which God forbid—if the day should ever come—which I again say God forbid—when England should have to repel foes, I am quite sure that all British subjects, all over the world, would be only too glad to give her what help they could—all British subjects all over the world, not only British subjects of her own blood, but British subjects who are not of her own blood, but who have received from her the inestimable blessing of freedom.

I find in the last speech delivered by the right hon. gentleman in this House—and a very good speech it was, one that was heralded throughout England, as showing to the whole British Empire, a most patriotic utterance from the Prime Minister of England's greatest colony, and a speech that was applauded on this side of the House, as well as on the other—the following words :

No, Sir, we were not forced by England, we were not forced by Mr. Chamberlain or by Downing Street, to do what we did, and I cannot conceive what my hon. friend meant——the right hon. gentleman was speaking of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa)—

Mr. BERGERON.

—when he said that the future of this country was not to be pledged by this government. When and where did we pledge the future of this country? We acted in the full independence of our sovereign power. What we did, we did of our own free will, but I am not to answer for the consequences or for what will take place in the future. My hon. friend says the consequence is that we will be called on to take part in other wars. I have only this to answer to my hon. friend, that if it should be the will of the people of Canada, at any future period, to take part in any war of England, the people of Canada will have their way.

I need not go any further. My desire is just to point out that these beautiful sentiments expressed by the right hon. the Premier in this House, were not mentioned in the paper which is trying to continue in Quebec, the course it took in the month of October last, when it was doing everything in its power to prevent the government of Canada doing what it has since done. I desire that their leaders may see what the Premier of Canada has said since then, since the time that the right hon. gentleman declared to the Globe newspaper that he could do nothing for England under the circumstances. I want to put myself right, both in this House and before the country, and to show that I hold to-day the same position that I did ten months ago, and to show the people who read those newspapers that the editors are putting us in a false position. These things only go to show the country the kind of political warfare which our opponents are carrying on in the province of Quebec, and I think it my duty to call the attention of the Premier to their action. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WALLACE. I will only add in addition to what the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) has said, that I refuse to make La Patrie either my organ for the expression of my views, or my father confessor in any way.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR (South Leeds). Before the motion is put, I just wish to join in the sentiments expressed by the ex-Minister of Customs (Mr. Wallace), that in so far as I am concerned personally, I do not care how far La Patrie goes on abusing me, because it does not have much effect in my constituency. The object La Patrie has in view is not to influence Ontario, but the object it has steadily pursued for the last six months is to raise trouble in the province of Quebec. Every person who reads that paper between the lines can easily see that that is its only motive. That paper being the organ of the government, I think the Prime Minister, if he is sincere in what he said the other day, that his object in life is to cement the races of this country, and his boss, I may say, the Minister of Public Works, who controls the paper, and whom he can direct—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. TAYLOR. Who is out of order? I say let him instruct that paper to moderate its tone if he wants to carry out what he professed in this House in his speech the other day. But, his speech is not intended for the province of Quebec, it is intended for the province of Ontario, and he expects La Patrie to do the work in the province of Quebec. But, if he is sincere in the statement that he made here, from this day forward he will muzzle La Patrie, the organ of his government, and compel it to conduct itself on respectable lines, and in a manner that will cement the races of this country.

Mr. JAMES McMULLEN (North Wellington). I desire to say a word on this question. If there ever was a man who occupied a distinguished position in Canada that has been maligned, and abused, and vilified, and misrepresented, it has been the right hon. leader of this government by the Mail and Empire of Toronto and by the Montreal Star. Hon. gentlemen opposite talk about the press of the Reform party. Sir, the Montreal Star and the Mail of Toronto have never ceased day or night for the last four years to malign everything the right hon. gentleman has said or done. There never was a man who has been submitted to more unjust criticism than he has been. While I am not prepared to defend any attempt to misrepresent men holding public offices, I do say, on the other hand, that it becomes hon. gentlemen opposite when they call upon hon. gentlemen on this side to muzzle their organs, to keep them within proper limits—I say it becomes them to look to their own organs and prevent them from indulging in the misrepresentation and abuse to which the government have been subjected by the Mail and Empire and by the Montreal Star.

Motion (Mr. Bergeron) to adjourn, negatived.

SUPPLY—PREFERENTIAL TRADE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply, and the motion of Mr. Russell in amendment thereto.

Mr. PETER MACDONALD (East Huron). Before the resolution which was moved by my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) is voted upon by this House, I beg leave to express my opinion upon it; and in doing so, I will endeavour to confine myself as far as possible to the question under discussion. I will not attempt to follow the meanderings of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken on the other side, nor to pursue them into the wild excursions they have taken. I will confine myself as far as possible to the tariff, and during my discussion of that question, I will refer to the general tariff of the party, to the preferential tariff; and I think I will also give some attention to the policy of quid pro quo of the Liberal-Conservative party. My first duty will be to show what we did in 1897, when we assumed the reins of power. We promised the people of this country that we would readjust the tariff in the interest of the general consuming classes of the community. We believe we have done that to a very large extent; and I want to point out, not in detail, but in a general way, what the Liberal party did in 1897 by the Fielding tariff. In the first place, we readjusted the various duties so as to impose a moderate duty upon the necessaries and comforts of life, and to place a heavier duty upon the shoulders of those people who are better able to pay taxes. In the first place, we reduced the duty on about two hundred articles, all told; we increased the free list to the extent of about fifty articles; and we largely eliminated the specific duties against which we had frequently protested in this House, believing those specific duties to press hardly upon the quality of goods used by the working and middle classes. Then, in addition to that, we had a clause in our policy offering to Great Britain a preference in the Canadian markets for the first year of 12½ per cent lower than the ordinary duty; and in the second year we reduced that preference to 25 per cent. Now, that is, in a general way, what we accomplished in 1897. But, it is well to pause for a moment to consider what was the Liberal policy that we announced in that year. Those of you who were present will remember that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) made a very able and comprehensive exposition of the policy of the Liberal party at that time; you will remember that the Conservative papers throughout the country passed judgment upon that policy so enunciated by the Minister of Finance; you will remember also that the leader of the Conservative party in the House, during a long and able speech, passed his opinion upon that policy. Neither the members of the Conservative party nor the leaders of the party claimed at that time that this was a policy belonging to themselves, as they did claim afterwards.

I want to point out some expressions and prophecies that were made by one of the leading papers of the Conservative party. I refer to the Montreal Star. Now, every one here knows that the Montreal Star is certainly the leading organ of the Conservative party, that it is largely subsidized by the Conservative party for the purpose of putting before the country the opinions held by the Conservative party; and when those opinions are expressed in the columns of that paper, it is reasonable to infer that those prophecies or expressions are uttered as being those of the party which it represents.

Now, I want to draw attention, before I deal with the opinion of the Star, to an expression made use of by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) the other day, in regard to the reductions in the tariff. He made use of this sentence, looking across towards the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) :

The right hon. Prime Minister smiles a smile of dissent. Will he tell me an article on which the farmers of Canada to-day pay less taxes than they did when hon. gentlemen upon this side of the House were in power?

That question signifies, to my mind, one of two things : first, that he put that question knowing, in his own mind, that he possessed the means of arriving at the answer for which he asked the Prime Minister, or, in other words, it signified an ignorance on his part in regard to the reductions made in favour of the farmers, because, I find that on the following articles reductions were made : wall paper, cut nails, wire nails, wood screws, wire fencing and cutlery. On these articles, largely used by farmers, as well as others, there was a reduction in the general tariff of 26 per cent.

Mr. CLANCY. Are they 26 per cent cheaper now than they were ?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). That is one of the foolish questions put by hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) knows very well that if the same conditions prevailed to-day as prevailed when these reductions were made, the prices would be less, but, as he knows very well that prices have gone up on every market in the world. Steel and iron and many other things have gone up, and when the hon. gentleman puts such a question as that to me, when the conditions are entirely different from those that existed in 1897, it shows that he is neither honest—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Politically honest.

Mr. CLANCY. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald, Huron) has no right to say I am not honest in asking that question.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Very well, I will put it in another way.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I have no intention at all of insulting any one. I have no intention of insulting the hon. gentleman, but, if he is honest—

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) has no right to discuss the matter.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I have no right to say that you are honest. I do not say that you are dishonest, and I have no right to say that you are honest. But, I certainly say the hon. gentleman cannot be sincere—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I withdraw the statement.

Mr. SPEAKER. I understand the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) to say that he withdraws the statement ?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Certainly, but I must say that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) could not be sincere in asking that question, because he knows that the conditions that prevailed a few years ago have changed, that prices have advanced in the markets of the world, and, therefore, his question has no point in fact. We also reduced the duties on the following articles : files and rasps, adzes, cleavers, hatchets, hammers and picks. These articles are largely used by farmers, and we reduced the duties 14½ per cent below the tariff that existed previously. Then, we reduced the duties on window shades, socks and stockings, collars, farm rollers, road rollers, wind-mills, horse powers, portable engines and threshers 16¾ per cent, and I might just here recall the fact that the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) stated that the government had reduced the tariff on no article with the exception of potato diggers and post-hole diggers. That indicated that he had not made a very careful inquiry into the reductions that have been made. We have reduced the duties on manure spreaders, axes, hand rakes, feed cutters, potato diggers, grain crushers, fanning mills, hay tedders, sythes, sickles, reaping hooks, pronged forks, snaths and post-hole diggers, 28 4-7 per cent.

This will show, Mr. Speaker, that we did make large reductions along these lines, and if I were to take the time I could show hundreds of articles the duties on which were reduced in the interest of the farmers, as well as in the interest of other industrial classes in the country. Now, I want to refer to what the Star said in regard to our policy in 1897. This is one of the prophecies made by that paper :

The wages of all operators will fall.

Has that prophecy been fulfilled ?

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Will any hon. member on the opposite side of the House say that that prophecy has been fulfilled ? The wages of operators were never higher and operators were never so continuously employed as they are now.

The money in circulation all over Canada will shrink until scarcity of money will be a national cry.

Has that prophecy been fulfilled ?

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). In 1896, we had a circulation of bank notes to the extent of $29,416,000, and in December last, under the policy of the Liberal party, we had over $42,000,000 of bank notes in circulation, or over $13,700,000 more bank notes in circulation in 1899 than in 1896, which indicates a prosperity and an activity in business which did not prevail under the old national policy. Then, the Star says :

The positions available for clerks, bookkeepers, cashiers and salesmen would diminish, to the utter destruction of thousands of lives.

Has that prophecy been fulfilled? Every person sitting on the opposite side of the House will say that that prophecy has not been fulfilled, but that there is more room in the industrial avenues of this country to-day for clerks, bookkeepers and office men than ever before in the history of Canada. Then, we were told that :

Americans, Germans, Swiss, will immediately invade the country as a slaughter market, and when the factories and shops have been destroyed, and Canadian mechanics driven from the country, will put up the prices of all imported goods, with the certain result of increased expense to every family.

Has that occurred? Have the Germans, the Swiss or the Americans made of Canada a slaughter market? Have they succeeded in closing up the factories and industries of Canada? We have more industries in Canada to-day than we ever had before; there is greater prosperity in Canada to-day than ever there was before; they are employing more operators than ever before, and the scale of wages is higher to-day than ever it was before.

Bank and joint company shares will suffer impairment.

Is that true?

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Are bank stocks higher or lower than they were in 1896? Let me give an illustration. I will take all the best banks in the Dominion of Canada and compare the value of their stocks as between what it was in 1896 and what it was last year. I will take the Bank of Montreal, the Bank of Toronto, the Standard Bank, the Imperial Bank, the Merchants Bank, the Bank of Hamilton, the Molson's Bank, the Bank of British North America, the Dominion Bank, the Ontario Bank and the Bank of Commerce. The average value of their shares in 1896 was 173½. The average value in 1898 rose to 193½. Does that prove that the banking institutions of this country are suffering from the policy introduced in 1897 by the Liberal party of Canada? No, Sir. That prophecy has utterly failed of fulfilment. Let me look at another evidence from the banking returns. You all know that the volume of the bank clearings is an indication of prosperity; if the bank clearings of one year are larger than those of the previous year, it is an indication that the year of the largest bank clearing was more prosperous than the other. The bank clearings in 1897 amounted to $1,175,000,000, and, in 1898, one year afterwards, they amounted to $1,390,000,000, or an increase of $215,000,000 for the one year. The Montreal clearings alone, increased by $130,000,000; the Toronto clearings increased by $78,000,000; and the Winnipeg clearings increased by $7,000,000, proving beyond the possibility of contradiction that these institutions are in a prosperous condition under the new regime.

Mr. MCGREGOR. It is the same all through Canada.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Then, Sir, let us look at the condition of the trading companies of Canada. The Montreal Star said that the stocks of our trading companies would be reduced under the policy introduced by the Liberal party, but I will take ten of the principal trading companies of this country, and see how that prophecy has been falsified. I will take the Bell Telephone Company, the Montreal Street Railway Company, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the Dominion Cotton Company, the Toronto Street Railway Company, the Montreal Cotton Company, the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company, the Montreal Telegraph Company, the Coloured Cotton Company, and the Dominion Telegraph Company. You will notice that these mercantile companies cover various industries in this country, and when I look at the average value of their stocks, I find that in 1896, it was 111, and in 1898, the average value of the stocks of the same companies was 140. Let me give you another evidence of the prosperity that prevails in Canada under the regime of the Liberal party. Let me look at the loan companies. You will bear in mind that the object of the loan companies is to lend money to those persons who wish to borrow. Our farmers, it must be admitted, fell into debt in the province of Ontario, to the extent of about $275,000,000, under the national policy. They were not able to pay this. Their lands fell in value; so much so, indeed, that some of the loan companies had not sufficient security for the amount of the money they had loaned on the farms, although the loan was only about two-thirds the value of the farm at the time the loan was made. It is natural to suppose that when the farmers of this country became more prosperous, when the lands increased in value, and the prices of their products increased, and, with many things flowing into them that did not accrue to them under the national policy, you would naturally suppose, I say, that they were better able to clear off this indebtedness and that they did not require to borrow as much money as they formerly did. This, of course, would consequently have a prejudicial affect upon the loan companies; for they could not so readily secure investments for their money, and especially could they not realize so much interest as before. Now, I have the following eleven loan companies before me: The Canada Permanent Loan Company; the Freehold Company; the Western Canada Company; the Canada Landed Credit Company; the Imperial Savings Company; the London and Canadian; the Dominion Savings and Loan Company; the London and Ontario Loan Company; the Hamilton Provident Company; the Huron and Erie Company; and the Manitoba Loan Company. The average value of the stocks of these eleven companies, in 1896, was 117; but under the prosperous time that came with the accession of the Liberal party to power—the times were not prosperous for them, because the people had money now, and did not borrow—the average value of their stocks in 1898 fell to 99½. That indicates that there was not so much borrowing on the part of the farmers and labourers throughout the country as formerly, and the result was, that a larger number of these companies had to amalgamate and place themselves under one management, so as to reduce expenses; which all goes to show that prosperity had come to Canada under the influence of the policy inaugurated by the Liberal party. Let us come to some more of the prophecies made by the Montreal Star:

It will take twenty years, even with the abolition of the condemned revenue tariff, to climb again to the post where Canada stands to-day, and we believe tens of thousands of families will be pauperized beyond the possibility of recovery.

Sir, during no period in the history of this country, have there been less paupers and less poor people, than at present. No previous period in our history has seen the families of Canada in so good a position in their homes, as that which they enjoy to-day. No period in Canada ever saw the labourer of this country earn more money; to make his home happier and better, than under the present Liberal regime, and, therefore, this other prophecy of the Montreal Star has not been fulfilled. But, it may be said that the Conservatives are not responsible for what a paper may say, even though it is the organ of the party, and, so I shall draw attention to the language of the leader of the opposition, when this policy was announced by the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding), in 1897. This policy came fresh before him (Sir Charles Tupper); he knew how much the Liberal party had cut down the tariff; he knew about the preferential treatment of Great Britain; and he expressed his opinion of that policy. His tune is changed in later days, because he now tells us that we stole his policy. Just think a moment, Mr. Speaker, of the opinion which that hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper), had of the Liberal policy at that time, which he now says is the policy which was stolen from him. Speaking in this House, the leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) said:

The result is that this tariff goes into operation, and the hon. gentleman knows that the industries of this country are already paralyzed in consequence, while hon. members gloat over the destruction of Canadian industries. I was reading the wail, the sorrowful wail, of those industries in the Montreal 'Gazette,' where one manufacturer after another declared that those industries were ruined, that their mills must close, and that they saw staring them in the face a return to the deplorable state of things that existed when the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House was in charge of the fiscal policy of this country. I say that a deeper wrong was never inflicted upon Canada.

What wrong was inflicted on the country, if it was the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party that was continued? What industries of this country could be destroyed if it was the policy of the Conservatives that was established by the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding), in 1897, as the leader of the opposition now says it was. But, the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper), continued:

I feel that so far from rejoicing at it from a party standpoint, I deplore from the bottom of my heart the ruin that is going to be inflicted upon the best interests of Canada and upon its great industries. Still, I unhesitatingly say that, from a party point of view, the hon. gentlemen are doing our work; they are showing the people of this country that no reliance can be placed upon the most solemn declarations that they make either in the House or out of it; they are showing the people of this country that, having obtained power, which was all they wished for, they are now prepared to abuse that power at a cost of a sacrifice of the industries of Canada.

Have these industries been sacrificed, Mr. Speaker? Not at all. Are our industries not in a better condition to-day, than they were during any one year under the national policy? Have they not increased the number? Have the hands they employ not increased in number? Have there not been fewer failures among the industries in the country, than there were before?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question. Is he quoting from me?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Yes.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that he is quoting from a speech of mine in reference to the present tariff—the tariff of 1898? The speech he has quoted from was with regard to the tariff of 1897, which was as unlike the tariff which now exists as day and night. The tariff introduced in 1897 was a free trade tariff, according to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who stated that it was the intention of the government to carry on that policy until they had complete free trade. That policy was completely abandoned in the tariff of 1898. Under the first tariff the preference was open to the whole world; under the tariff of 1898 it was restricted to Great Britain.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The hon. gentleman will remember that this speech was delivered in answer to the speech made by the hon. Finance Minister in 1897.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Precisely. If the hon. gentleman will read the resolution which I moved on that occasion and the statement that preceded it, he will find a complete refutation of the argument he is now addressing to the House.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I am not addressing an argument to the House: I am simply reading what the hon. gentleman said. I have not put an argument into his mouth. I am repeating his actual expression of opinion in reference to the policy that was laid down by the Liberal party in 1897—a policy which has not been changed since.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Radically changed, completely changed in all its features.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The reduction in the duties, the increase of the free list and the preference to Great Britain are essentially the same, with the exception of a very few changes made in the following year.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There was not a word of preference to Great Britain in the tariff of 1897. The preference in that tariff was open to the whole world. The tariff of 1898 limited the preference to Great Britain; but Great Britain could not have the slightest preference under the tariff of 1897.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Great Britain received a preference under that tariff, on the 23rd of April, 1897, and the hon. gentleman knows it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman knows nothing of the kind. The Minister of Finance in his speech at Sheffield long after declared that there was no preference.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The Minister of Finance never declared such a thing.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have quoted his words to that effect, and he cannot deny them.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman has never quoted his words to that effect, for they do not exist.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). If the hon. leader of the opposition will put himself to the trouble of reading the speech of the Minister of Finance, or that part of it referring to this question, he will find that the tariff of to-day is substantially the same as that referred to in that speech; and that the preference to England is to-day substantially what it was at that time, with this exception, that in the first year only 12½ per cent of discrimination was made in favour of Great Britain in the Canadian market, whereas one year afterwards there was to be a discrimination of 25 per cent. That was foreshadowed in that speech as clearly as language could convey it. It was in reference to the policy laid down in 1897 that that speech was made—a policy which has not in any material degree been affected since.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman read to the House the resolution offered by the Minister of Finance in regard to the preferential tariff of 1897? He will not find one word there with regard to England; but he will find that the preference was open to the whole world, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce made it; and that was completely and radically changed by the policy of 1898.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). That is merely a subterfuge put forth at the present time to blunt the sharpness of this argument against the leader of the opposition. It can be shown that he strongly and explicitly condemned the policy inaugurated in 1897, but that when he found that that policy was in the interest of the Canadian manufacturers and every class of the Canadian people, then he claimed that it was the national policy of the Liberal-Conservative party which had yielded all these fruits.

Now, Sir, I want to prove to the hon. gentleman that his statements were not based upon facts, and that his prophecies with regard to this tariff have not been fulfilled. For instance, we find that the present tariff instead of destroying the factories, has put them on a better footing than they were on before. This is made evident by a comparison of the number of failures that took place in Canada among the different classes in business since this tariff has been in force compared with a few years previous, during which the country had the full advantage of the national policy of the Liberal-Conservative party. The number of failures among the manufacturers of this country in 1894 was 494, in 1895 441, in 1896 590, and in 1897 459, or an average number of failures in those four years of 496. Now, compare that with the number of failures among the manufacturers during the years we have been in power. In 1898 there were only 303, and in 1899 318, an average in the two years of 310, or nearly 38 per cent of a decrease in the number of failures among the manufacturers whom it was asserted our policy of 1897 would ruin.

Now, take the failures of men in commercial business outside of manufacturing. In 1895 there were 1,891, in 1896 2,118, in 1897 1,809, or an average for those three years of 1,972. Now, under our policy the number of failures of commercial men in 1898 was 1,300, and in 1899 1,287, or an average for those two years of 1,293, as compared with an average of 1,972 under the tariff of the Liberal-Conservative party; or, in other words, a reduction in the number of failures among commercial houses of 34 per cent; showing that our policy, instead of destroying the industries of Canada, has had the effect of upholding and upbuilding them. Now, let us look at the number of failures of trading companies. In 1896 there were 1,401, and in 1897 1,315, or a total for the two years of 2,716. Under the tariff policy of the present government there were in 1898, 564 failures of trading companies, and in 1899, 950, or a total for the two years of 1,514; or a reduction in these failures under the new administration of no less than 44 per cent. These facts prove beyond a doubt the beneficial influence of the policy that was established in 1897, both in regard to the people generally, and in regard to those engaged in manufacturing and commerce. But we are told that our policy has not been beneficial with regard to our trading with the different countries. Indeed they go so far as to say that our policy has been the cause of the reduction of our trade with Great Britain. One hon. gentleman said the other day that our trade was gradually being reduced with Great Britain. It was the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), I think, who made that statement, and if he will say that I am not correctly quoting him, I will make no further reference to it.

Mr. SPROULE. What statement is that?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). That our import trade with Great Britain was continually declining.

Mr. WILSON. For the past three years.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Well, I will take the suggestion of the hon. member for Lennox and compare the past three years with the previous three.

Mr. WILSON. I just wish to say that what I mean is that our imports from Great Britain were less during the past three years than during the previous three years.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I will come to that point in a few minutes. The aggregate trade of the Dominion in 1880, the first year in which the national policy was in full vigour—the aggregate trade of the Dominion with the world during that year was $159,700,000. In 1896, seventeen years later, under the ægis of the national policy and with the stimulus of all the efforts the Conservative party could make to increase our trade with the world, it had increased to the sum of $231,600,000, or an increase during the seventeen years of $71,900,000. That is all hon. gentlemen opposite were able to accomplish in the way of extending the trade of Canada during all those years. In 1896, as I have said, our aggregate trade with the world was $231,600,000. In 1899, it was $312,948,000, or an increase during those three years of $91,348,000, or, in other words, $20,000,000 more in these three years than the Conservatives succeeded in bringing about in seventeen years under the influence of the national policy.

Now I come to our aggregate trade with Great Britain. During the years 1894, 1895, and 1896, it amounted to $299,915,000, or a yearly average of $99,972,000. But during the years 1897, 1898 and 1899, under Liberal administration, it increased to $380,291,000, a yearly average of $126,764,000, as compared with a yearly average of $99,972,000 during the previous three years of Conservative rule, or an annual increase of $26,792,000 in favour of the Liberal administration. The hon. gentleman can figure out as much as he likes from the official records, and he will find that is correct.

Mr. WILSON. Would the hon. gentleman give us the imports?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Yes, I have everything here for you just at hand. Our imports from Great Britain had annually been declining for a great many years. Under the regime of the national policy, the Conservative party made rather a bad mess of our import trade with Great Britain, for we find, on looking back to 1883, that our import trade from Great Britain was in that year $52,052,000. In 1884 that declined to $43,418,000. In 1885 it fell still further to $41,406,000. In 1886 it still came down to $40,601,000; and ten years later, in 1896, it fell to $32,979,000. Or it fell during these years from 1883 to 1896, $19,083,000. When the Liberal party came into power, they had to deal with a declining trade, and you will readily understand that it was difficult to get a declining trade to come to a stand at once and still more difficult to make it take the opposite direction and increase. The first year we were in power, in 1897, the decline still went on because our policy at that time was not fully carried out, so that in 1897 our import trade from Great Britain only amounted to $29,412,000. But then came the preferential treatment given to Great Britain to the extent of 25 per cent. Under its influence, the decline ceased, and a start was made in the other direction. In 1898, instead of a decline below $29,000,000, our imports from Great Britain went up to $32,501,000. We not only stopped the decline but began an increase, and the following year, 1899, we had an import trade with Great Britain of $37,060,000, or an increase during those three years of $7,500,000. I challenge the hon. member for Lennox (Mr. Wilson) to look over the records, from the beginning of confederation down to the present, and he will find that our import trade with Great Britain was declining down to the time the present government took hold of the tariff, and, by applying the preferential rate to Great Britain, stimulated the imports from that country to this.

My hon. friend, the hon. member for East Grey—

Mr. SPROULE. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, he either misunderstood me, or else I failed to make myself clear. I understood him to say that I had stated that our trade with Great Britain had gone down from the time this preferential tariff was introduced. I said that the imports from Great Britain had gone down while the imports from the United States had gone up, but as England was our natural market we had exported nevertheless more to England.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I was dealing with the statement of the hon. gentleman regarding the imports, and he made this statement in his speech :

From the time this tariff has been introduced, our trade with the United States has been growing greater and greater.

That is true.

And our trade with the mother country is going down. What we import from Great Britain is growing less, and what we import from the United States is growing more.

Mr. SPROULE. Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The hon. gentleman was perfectly correct in saying that our imports from the United States are increasing, but he was entirely incorrect when he said that our imports from Great Britain, under the present regime, were decreasing. They are increasing. As I have shown, they have increased $7,500,000 in two years of our administration, whereas during the thirteen years of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, from 1883 to 1896, they declined $19,083,000.

I come now to take up our imports from the United States. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to think that the increase in our imports from the United States is a bad sign for Canada. It appears to me that any one who comes to that conclusion has not given this subject any thought whatever. For a large number of articles that we import from the American side are raw material which form the basis of the manufacturing industries in this country, so that the more we manufacture in this country the more we require of that raw material, and the greater quantity imported from the American market this year indicates greater prosperity in our manufacturing institutions. In the last three years of Conservative rule, the imports from the United States were as follows :

1896	58,754,000

Total $166,242,000

Average per year $ 55,414,000

Now, hon. gentlemen opposite will notice that there had been a gradual increase in the imports from the United States under their own regime, but there has been a greater increase under ours, as the figures will show :

1898	78,705,000
1899	93,007,000

Average $ 77,788,000

This shows an increase of net imports under Liberal, as compared with Conservative rule, in three years of $22,373,000. The whole of this increase is largely owing to the activity and prosperity of the manufacturing industries of this country. I am in a position to show that we import from the United States more of the raw material which goes to make clothing, cotton and a thousand and one things turned out by our manufacturing industries. As has just been remarked to me, that these articles that we call raw materials we cannot get from England. In many cases England does not produce them, and in other cases, even where England does produce them, we cannot afford to carry them across the water. Now, that coal is a raw material is evident to everybody. It is used to run our railways, to raise steam power for our manufactories, to propel our steamboats on the lakes and our barges on the canals. The more business we do in these lines, the more coal do we require. The railways of our country did more business last year than they have ever done in any single year before. The same is true of our manufacturing industries. The increase in the import of coal in 1899 over that of 1896 has been 22 per cent. It will not be inferred for a moment by any person who understands the question that this is against the interest of this country. Then, again, we have large furniture factories in this country ; and last year and the year before have been the two most successful years of their career. We are now manufacturing furniture not only for the home market but for the markets of Great Britain. I live in a manufacturing centre of that kind, where we have four factories turning out furniture ; and I wish to tell you that while they have been working overtime, they have not been manufacturing so much for the English market, because they have been too busy trying to catch up with the demand in the Canadian market itself. We must import large quantities of those kinds of woods that are used in the manufacture of furniture and are not produced in this country. As everybody knows, oak is the fashionable wood for furniture just now, and this has to be imported from the United States, particularly from the state of Ohio. The increased importation of oak set forth in the Trade and Navigation Returns indicates the prosperity and activity of the furniture manufactories of this country. And when I tell you that we have increased the importation of oak from the United States no less than 115 per cent over that of 1896, it will be clearly seen that we must have increased our output of furniture, and, increasing our output of furniture, we must have employed a greater number of hands in that industry. Instead of this increased importation being an argument against the policy, it is an argument in its favour. We manufacture largely of woollen goods in this country; and if I can show you that we import more wool, that will be equivalent to showing that we have manufactured more woollen cloth. We imported 10 per cent more wool than we did in 1896, and it was imported as a raw material for our industries to change into the finished article—indicating increased prosperity in this line of manufacture. Raw silk is imported to be made into undergarments, that being the line of manufacture in which this material is principally used in Canada. We find that the increase in imports of raw silk in 1899 over 1896 was 39 per cent. Pig-iron is a raw material worked into many forms, and we increased our import of pig-iron 10 per cent. We have a large number of cotton factories in this country. My hon. friend sitting opposite me (Mr. Bergeron) has a town in his constituency where they manufacture cotton very largely. If I can show him that we increased our imports of raw cotton from the United States, that will indicate very clearly to his mind that we have increased the manufacture which turns that raw material into the finished article and have given employment to a large number of hands. That increased output of our cotton manufactories we sell in the Canadian market or send it to other markets, and bring back a return in the shape of imports. So, when we import these raw materials more largely than under the regime of hon. gentlemen opposite, they will see at once that this indicates prosperity, advancement and development in our Canadian industries from one end of the country to the other. Let me show you the character of the articles that we import from the United States, and you will see that we cannot get them from England, and that in the nature of things, if our manufactories are to continue in a condition of prosperity, they must be imported from other countries and mainly from the United States:

Coal, gravel and sand, fence posts, railway ties, lumber, logs, pitch, pine, walnut, white ash, timber, tobacco (raw), asphalt, fire brick (for manufacturing purposes), coke, cotton waste, raw cotton, shingles, wood for fuel, raw furs and skins, hides and skins, wool, broom corn, Indian corn.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what do you think is the value of these raw materials—very raw materials—brought in to be used in this country? No less than $30,000,000, which indicates an increase, as I said before prosperity in the industries of this country.

Now, having dealt with that, I wish to deal for a short time with a very important question, and I hope the House will be patient with me, because I wish to put this question in a nutshell to show how it stands.

Mr. BERGERON. Did my hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald, Huron) refer to me when he spoke of cotton manufacturers in the county of some hon. gentlemen on this side?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I was speaking about a factory in your county as one of them.

Mr. BERGERON. Is not the duty on cotton higher to-day than it was under the old regime?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). There is no duty on raw cotton at all.

Mr. BERGERON. Oh, yes, on yellow cotton.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). There is no duty on raw cotton.

Mr. BERGERON. The duty on a certain kind of cotton is higher to-day than it was four years ago.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I am talking about raw cotton coming into this country and forming the basis of manufacture.

Mr. BERGERON. My hon. friend some years ago said the duty on cotton should be abolished altogether; whereas it is higher to-day than it was before.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I never said the duty on cotton should be abolished, and if the hon. gentleman will find any such expression of mine in the Hansard in any speech that I ever delivered, I will give him a sovereign.

Mr. BERGERON. I do not want to earn the sovereign, but if my memory serves me well my hon. friend made long speeches in the old times to prove that the duty on cotton should be abolished.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). My hon. friend's memory usually serves him well, but it is in default at this moment. Now, as I was saying, it is frequently urged on public platforms that we might to-day have a preference in the English market for our goods provided our party had done their duty. It is stated that the leader of the Liberal party had been offered a preference in England if we would accept it; such is the charge made by the press of the Conservative party and by the leader of the opposition. The object of this is to prejudice the people against the Liberal party for not accepting what it is said had been offered to Canada. But I want to call attention to what their quid pro quo policy is. I want first to say that the Mail and Empire, which is a Conservative organ, has spoken out vigorously against the leader of the Liberal party for refusing to accept the offer which, they say, was made by Mr. Chamberlain and others, and I want to read what he has said himself upon this point so as to give you an idea of the kind of attack that is made upon us. On the 24th of February, 1899, the Mail and Empire editorially said :

By Mr. Chamberlain, who wanted to draw British interests into closer touch, and, as he said, to reinforce sentiment by material advantages, it was proposed that duty should be levied on foreign produce entering Britain, and that colonial produce should go in free.

To our First Minister, who opposed this proposition, the United States owes its position in the British market to-day, and as a result of that position, a large measure of the prosperity now enjoyed.

Then, in another editorial on the same day, it says :

The proffered preference by Britain refused by Sir Wilfrid, because it implied a departure from free trade, and because it interfered with a reciprocity which the United States will not concede, must be sought once more and must be accepted.

Now you see, Mr. Speaker, the charge is made there against the Liberal party, and particularly against our leader, for refusing to accept something which was offered to him in the nature of preferential treatment of Canadian goods in the markets of Great Britain. Now, it is thought that the people of this country ought to know exactly the truth of this matter in order to enable them to form a conclusion based upon the facts ; and I intend this afternoon as briefly as I can to give a true statement of the case. We all admit that a preference in the markets of Great Britain would be of great advantage to us if we could accept that preference without compromising our own position, or placing ourselves in entanglements which would not be beneficial to the Dominion of Canada. A preference has only been indirectly offered, and under conditions which, in my opinion, could not be accepted and would not be accepted by either party in this country ; and I think when I have shown what was offered, it will be conceded by both parties that we could not accept the conditions therein contained. During the year 1896, the Colonial Secretary, the Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, delivered several speeches in which he referred to the agitation by the Fair Trade League in favour of preference treatment from Great Britain to the products, and especially the food products of the colonies. The reference in these speeches was no doubt made to prepare the English mind, and to prepare the minds of those who in the following year would visit England for the purpose of taking part in the celebration of Her Majesty's Jubilee. The Premiers of all the colonies were expected to be there the following year, and when Mr. Chamberlain drew attention to the agitation going on in reference to this question, it was to prepare the minds of those gentlemen who would visit England the following year. Now, we must bear in mind that Mr. Chamberlain has a remarkable gift of clearly expressing his opinions. No man in public life in England surpasses him, and very few equal him in the perspicuity of his language. That is an important fact to bear in mind in examining his utterances on this question. We must also bear in mind that the Hon. Joseph Chamberlain goes a great deal further on this question of offering a preference to the colonies than, I believe, do any of his colleagues or any members of the party to which he belongs.

Now, let us see what he said in 1896, speaking before the Associated Chambers of Commerce of the empire. He pointed out that there were only three lines of action, three lines of progress, which had been or could be suggested. The first was the proposal of the free traders that the colonies should form free trade arrangements between themselves. But, he pointed out, there are two objections against that. The first objection is that that would lead to a cosmopolitan rather than an imperial commercial union ; and the second objection was that the colonies would have nothing to do with it. And it is a fact that the colonies would have nothing to do with it. There is not a single member on the other side of the House who would agree to a free trade policy between the colonies. I know that Canada would not, and I do not think that there are ten men in the Dominion who would agree to enter into a free trade treaty with the other colonies. We could not do it ; we would place ourselves in such entanglements, we would surround ourselves with such environments, we would surrender our independence of action in behalf of the interests of Canada, which would make it out of the question. We would preclude ourselves from making any change in our tariff which the interests of Canada might dictate from year to year. Therefore we can exclude altogether from consideration the proposal of the free traders.

Now, there was a second proposal, and that was suggested at the Intercolonial Conference held in Ottawa, suggested by the leaders of the Tory party. They pressed upon the other members of the conference coming from the other colonies, a few years ago, when that conference met in Ottawa, a proposition something like this : The colonies should be left free to impose what protective duties they liked upon foreign countries and British commerce, making a small discrimination in favour of British trade in return for Britain undertaking to change her whole system and imposing duties on food and raw materials imported from foreign countries. That is the meaning of the proposition that was laid down before the Intercolonial conference and which was discussed here. I think the present hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) was present at that conference. This is the proposition that was impressed upon the conference by the Conservative party, that was impressed upon the people of this country, and this is the proposition that the Conservative party continued to impress upon the British public and upon the statesmen of Great Britain. It will be interesting to know the opinion of the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, Secretary of State for the Colonies, in regard to this proposition. In speaking in reference to it, he is reported as having used these words:

Well, I express my own opinion when I say that there is not the slightest chance that, in any reasonable time, this country, or the parliament of this country, would adopt so one-sided an agreement.

Then he goes on to give his reasons for this conclusion. He says:

The foreign trade of this country is so large and the foreign trade of the colonies is comparatively so small, that a small preference given to us upon that foreign trade by the colonies would make so trifling a difference—would be so small a benefit to the total volume of trade—that I do not believe the working classes of this country would consent to make a revolutionary change for what they would think to be an infinitesimal gain.

Is not that definite and conclusive? Does not that show beyond the cavil of a doubt that Mr. Chamberlain was absolutely opposed to the proposition made by the International conference delegates to the British government and which received this denial. Then, again, we have an opinion upon that proposition by another very able man, a man whose opinions have a great deal of importance attached to them, a man who never speaks until he weighs all the facts in connection with the proposition upon which he is expected to give his opinion. I refer to Lord Ripon. In his despatch of June 28, 1895, referring to the proposition made at the conference, he said:

The material results of this proposal would be even more prejudicial than appears from the general statement of its more obvious results. In the case of Great Britain the bulk of the imports from foreign countries and almost the whole of our imports from the colonies, consist of food or raw material for manufacturers.

To impose a duty on food means at once a diminution of the real wages of the workingman.

If in addition to this a duty were imposed on raw materials, a further encroachment would have to be made on the wages to enable the manufacturer to compete with his rivals in countries where there are no such duties.

Is there anything so plain or so reasonable as the statement that Lord Ripon has made there? He says that if they impose duties upon the necessaries of life, upon the food supplies of the people and increase the price of living, they, to that extent, reduce wages, and that, upon the other hand, if there is an import duty placed upon raw materials, used by manufacturers, in British factories, British manufacturers cannot manufacture as cheaply without reducing the wages of the factory hands. It will be done by increasing the price of the food supply and by a reduction of wages. But, supposing their wages were not reduced, by the manufacturers, then the result would be that the manufacture of British goods would be more costly; they would have to sell them at higher rates in the British market and this would compromise English exporters in the neutral markets of the world because these goods would be manufactured under a higher state of living. As to the two propositions, the one of the free traders and the one of the Intercolonial conference, we would not accept the first at all and the second was rejected by the Colonial Secretary in definite and absolute terms. On the other hand, the proposition formulated by the Intercolonial delegates at Ottawa was strongly pressed upon the government, and such was the answer which we have received. But, Mr. Speaker, there was a third proposition which came before the attention of the British people, in regard to this question. That proposition came from the Toronto Board of Trade, and it was crystallized into a resolution in the following terms:

Resolved, that in the opinion of this congress, the advantages to be obtained by a closer union between the various portions of the British Empire are so great as to justify an arrangement as nearly as possible of the nature of Zollverein, based upon principles of the freest exchange of commodities within the empire, consistent with the tariff requirements incident to maintain the local government of each kingdom, dominion, province or colony now forming part of the British family of nations.

That was the proposition made by the Toronto Board of Trade. That proposition came before Mr. Chamberlain for his consideration and he expressed an opinion upon it. This proposition involves a very similar condition to that prevailing among the German states and to that which exists among the American states. In regard to that proposition. Mr. Chamberlain said:

That resolution (of the Toronto Board of Trade) I understand to be one for the creation of a British Zollverein or customs union, which would establish at once practically free trade throughout the British Empire, but would leave the separate contracting parties free to make their own arrangements with regard to duties on foreign goods, except that this is an essential condition of the proposal—that Great Britain shall consent to place moderate duties upon certain articles which are of large production in the colonies. Now, if I have rightly understood it, these articles would comprise corn, meat, wool and sugar, and perhaps other articles of enormous consumption in this country which are at present largely produced in the colonies, and which might, under such an arrangement, be wholly produced in the colonies and wholly produced by British labour. (Cheers.) On the other hand, as I have said, the colonies, while maintaining their duties upon foreign importations, would agree to a free interchange of commodities with the rest of the empire, and would cease to place protective duties on any product of British labour. That is the principle of the German Zollverein, that is the principle which underlies the federation in the United States of America, and I do not doubt for a moment that if it were adopted it would be the strongest bond of union between the British race throughout the world.

Hon. gentlemen will see that Mr. Chamberlain does not say that he is in favour of the proposition or opposed to it. He simply says that if it could be brought about it would be a bond of union between the different portions of the empire. Under this proposition, what the colonies would have to agree to would be to a free interchange of products between the various portions of the empire. Are we prepared for that? Are we prepared to have a free interchange of products with Australia, with Africa, and with New Zealand? Are the Conservatives prepared for that? Then, another condition was that protection was to be eliminated and that the duties placed upon articles for revenue would be simply revenue duties. Who shall decide that; whether it shall be Canada or England I cannot tell, but, I may point out that they have a different idea as to what are revenue duties from what we have. There would, no doubt, be a conflict of such a character that we would embargo ourselves with conditions and surroundings that would be far more prejudicial to us than all the advantages that would be realized from getting a preference in the English market.

Mr. BERGERON. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) allow me to interrupt him now.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Yes.

Mr. BERGERON. This is a speech made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) on the 13th May, 1895, in which he says:

I will give the House an illustration. I will take a few articles, commencing with cotton. We manufactured last year cotton to the value of $9,000,000, as was estimated by hon. gentlemen opposite, although hon. members on this side of the House give a somewhat higher estimate. That cotton is increasing in price by reason of the duty to the extent of, say, 25 per cent, or $2,250,000, which amount the consumers have to pay on the home-manufactured article by reason of the duty. In 1894 we imported cotton to the value of $4,007,000, on which a duty was paid of $1,140,000. Now, we take the profit of the importer and retailer, say 40 per cent, divided between the two, which amounts to $446,000. Add these together, the increase of price on the home-made article, the duty paid on the imports and the wholesale and retail profit on the duty, and the result will be $3,836,000, of which only $1,140,000 goes into the revenue of the country. The balance of $2,696,000 comes out of the consumers and goes into the pockets of the middlemen and the manufacturers.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) further said:

Let me sum up and give you the amount on those few articles taken from the people of Canada in ten years by reason of bounties, duties and profits on duties by importers and retailers to protect the following industries:

1. Cotton	$ 38,360,000
2. Pig iron	5,851,000
3. Manufactures of iron and steel	59,398,000
4. Boots and shoes	45,800,000
5. Coal oil	12,992,000

Grand total $162,401,000

Mr. Speaker, how much of that immense sum of $162,401,000 goes into the revenue? Just $43,600,000, and the other $119,401,000 comes out of the pockets of the Canadian people without adding one single dollar to the revenue, but goes into the pockets of manufacturers, middlemen, importers and retailers.

It was a very nice speech, and I remember listening attentively to it while I was sitting in the Chair, as Deputy Speaker of this House, and his concluding words were:

So it is with the national policy. The best thing the national policy could ever do for this country is to die, and let me tell hon. gentlemen on the other side: it is now in a moribund condition, it is in the last stages and throes of death, and if you only went to the country a few months ago the national policy would be dead now.

Just let me remind my hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald) that the tariff on cotton is higher to-day than it was when he made that speech.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The object of quoting that was to try to show to the House and to the country that I was in favour of removing the duties on cotton altogether. That is what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron) undertook to prove, and he did not prove that or anything else.

Mr. BERGERON. I proved that what my hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald) said then is the reverse of what he is saying to-day.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Not at all. I maintained at that time that the duties were so high on cotton that they enabled the manufacturers to impose, not a duty but an increased price on their output, so that only a very small proportion of the tax went into the revenue and the increased price went into the pockets of the manufacturers. That is perfectly easy to be understood, but to say that I advocated the placing of cotton on the free list is to state something which I never said, because so long as we have to get revenue by a customs duty, then there must necessarily be an incidental protection, and it is wrong to give an incidental protection to one industry and to take it off from another. I always took the position in this House that it was wrong to place certain industries on the free list, whilst others were placed on the dutiable list whereby they received protection. Although I have been in favour of reducing the customs duties placed on certain commodities, yet I never said in the House, nor did the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron) ever hear me state out of the House, that I would put this article on the free list.

Mr. BERGERON. Why, I read your speech.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I challenge you to find any such statement in my speech. It was to prove that that you sent for the Hansard, and when you did not find it there, you read something else that had nothing to do with the case.

Mr. BERGERON. I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend, but the whole case is stated here, and the argument is against him. The national policy is not dead, notwithstanding the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) years ago told us it would die.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). There was no reason for this interruption and the only object the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron) had was to thrust it into the middle of my speech. When I was interrupted I was proceeding to quote what Mr. Chamberlain said in regard to the proposition of the Toronto Board of Trade a few days after he made his other speech. He said :

But the principle I claim must be accepted, if we are to make any, even the slightest progress, is that within the different parts of the empire protection must disappear.

I now ask the leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) would he accept that proposition as laid down here by the Hon. Joseph Chamberlain? Would he accept the proposition: That protection in all parts of the empire must disappear, because Mr. Joseph Chamberlain has said that unless that is agreed to no progress whatever could be made in such negotiations. If that proposition cannot be accepted by the leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) or by the leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) then how could we make progress in obtaining a preference in the markets of Great Britain?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). According to their plan.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Yes, of course, according to the plan set forth by the resolution of the Toronto Board of Trade. Mr. Chamberlain goes on to say:

Protection must disappear, and the duties must be revenue duties, and not protection duties, in the sense of protecting the products of one part of the empire against those of another part.

I maintain that neither of the political parties of Canada to-day, is ready to accept that proposition. There is no party in Canada to-day prepared to accept a proposition to enter into an agreement to have free trade between all parts of the empire. What we want to do, if we can do it, is to get a greater advantage in the English markets on our own merits as Canada, and on the other side, that we will give Great Britain a preference in the Canadian markets. We do not want to bind ourselves in the entanglements that this proposition would lead us to, so that we could not move hand or foot in our fiscal policy without consultation, and by the consent of the other parts of the empire. We want to remain free. We are working out our own destiny, and we can work it out with that energy and force which is characteristic of Canadians. Give us freedom and remove the restrictions from us and we can work out a happy and prosperous future for our young nation. My hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) who is now looking at me so intently will not dare to say to this House nor to the country that he would accept that proposition according to the meaning placed upon it by the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, Colonial Secretary. Why, then, try to make political capital in the country and in parliament against the Liberal party, because our leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) refused that proposition, which was placed before him when he arrived in England two years ago. Were the leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) in England and were he offered a proposition of that kind, he too would refuse to accept it in the interests of Canada, because the exigencies of our financial and commercial needs would prevent us from entering into an arrangement of that kind which would bind us hand and foot in our onward progress to a higher state of prosperity than we now enjoy. I wish to get into handy-shape the opinions expressed on the matter by men on whose judgment we must place the greatest confidence. And, Sir, I will quote the language of a man noted the world over as possessing a complete grasp of the financial affairs of Great Britain. I refer to Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, a Liberal-Conservative, who, speaking at Bristol to his constituents, a few years ago, said :

To resort to the nostrums of free trade and protection would only obstruct the process of relief by restricting our intercourse with the markets of the world. In economics as well as in mechanics, to increase freedom of action and abate friction, are the conditions of effective working.

Is not that true? Give us freedom of action and abate friction and we can do far more than if we were crippled for want of freedom. I shall now quote from the London Times. You all know that the London Times does not profess to belong to either political party, but it professes every day to express the prevailing opinion of the day in Great Britain. It is an independent paper, and when its opinion is given it is given by probably the wisest journalists that can be found in Great Britain, expressing, as they believe, the opinion of the people of Great Britain. The Times makes reference to the speech of Sir Michael Hicks-Beach from which I have quoted, and speaking of the agitation of several parties in England in favour of Great Britain putting these import duties on foreign goods and giving an opportunity for goods from the colonies to come in free, it says :

Not only have the leaders of the Liberal Unionists, Lord Hartington, Mr. Bright and Mr. Goschen, entered a protest, promptly and energetically, against mischievous delusion, but Lord Salisbury and the principal members of his ministry, including Mr. Chaplin, the peculiar champion of British agriculture, have disavowed the movement set on foot by some ambitious mediocrities at Oxford. Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, addressing his constituents at Bristol on Tuesday night as an independent Conservative, declared that in his opinion, the adoption of fair trade and protectionist theories, 'if it were possible, would only aggravate our present difficulties.' What is to be feared, indeed, is not the deliberate acceptance of protection by any body of well-informed and reflecting public men, but the adoption of it, without conviction and in the teeth of the most solemn declarations, by politicians in pursuit of a majority. It is when the masses of the people are suffering from such depression as that which has weighed on the country of late years, that they are open to the influences of political and economical quackery, and in such a condition of the popular mind it requires a certain rigidity of virtue on the part of the leaders of parties to refrain from offering what is believed to be pernicious, but is known to be pleasing to the many.

And it ends its editorial by quoting what I have already read from Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, namely :

To resort to the nostrums of fair trade and protection would only obstruct the process of relief by restricting our intercourse with the markets of the world. In economics as well as in mechanics, to increase freedom of action and abate friction are the conditions of effective working.

There is the opinion of the Thunderer, the great newspaper of the world, the exponent of the public opinion of Great Britain to-day, in reference to what the Liberal-Conservative party is urging the people of Great Britain to grant—something which they are not in a position to grant, something which the sentiment of the country is strongly against granting; yet, some of us, at least, are craven enough to urge Great Britain to change her fiscal policy in favour of Canada.

I am going to give you the opinion of another great man on this question. I am sorry that my hon. friend from North Bruce

(Mr. McNeill) is not here to-day so as to have an opportunity of hearing an opinion so adverse to the policy which he so ably maintains in this House. We all know that the leader of the Conservative party in England is a very great man, a man of large capacity, a man of deep philosophy, a man of large experience, a man who never expresses his opinion without knowing all the ins and outs of the question on which he expresses that opinion. He is a man who keeps himself in touch with the great electorate of the country, and, therefore, when he speaks, he speaks with authority; so that his opinion on this question may be accepted as one of great importance. Speaking in the House of Lords, on a motion made by Lord De la Warr, Lord Salisbury, as reported in the English Hansard, volume 323, page 1888, said :

I have simply to say, with respect to the question of protection, that this country has adopted the opposite system after a controversy unexampled in its length, in its earnestness, and in the decision with which the ultimate issue was arrived at. If we are to understand the re-examination of that question, it must not be done incidentally, by insinuation, by allusion, by hints. You must firmly walk up to the fortress that you have to attack and lay siege to it in form. . . . In my belief the economical arguments in favour of free trade are very strong, but they are not the strongest with which we have to deal. If he (Lord De la Warr) will look back upon the debates of 1846, and read the speech of Sir Robert Peel when introducing his great proposal, he will see that the political argument weighed more heavily than even the economical arguments in his mind, and I believe that the political argument has lost none of its force. I utterly disbelieve that it is in your power to introduce protection. If it were, I think it would be introducing a state of division among the classes of this country which would differ very little from civil war.

Is not that opinion strong enough against what hon. gentlemen opposite claim we could get? Let me give you Lord Salisbury's opinion as expressed on another occasion, when he was wiser, because he was older. He had learned what the fair traders had done; he had heard their arguments from the different platforms in the country; and three years afterwards, speaking to a motion made by Lord Dunraven, in favour of inviting the colonies to send representatives to a conference to consider the advisability of preferential trade with Her Majesty's dominions, Lord Salisbury expressed himself as follows :

I ask him to look at the state of opinion in this country, especially the state of opinion in our commercial, manufacturing and industrial classes, the state of opinion, above all, among the capitalists and the most educated classes, and say if he sees the slightest chance within any period to which we have a right to look forward, of such a modification of opinion in this country as will enable any statesman, whatever his opinions may be, to propose the establishment of retaliatory duties. It seems to me to be absolutely out of the question. If you wish to set up a discriminating system in favour of the colonies as against the rest of the world, just consider what are the goods on which you would have to levy a heavy duty in this country in order to make that discrimination felt. They are grain, wool and meat. What chance have you of inducing the people of this country to accept legislation which would make these essential articles of consumption susceptible of such tariffs? I see no probability whatever of it. That being the case, I think we should be hardly behaving respectfully to the colonies if we asked them to send representatives to a conference to discuss the question, when we know that the answer which many of them, at all events, many of their statesmen, would give must be met immediately on our part by the information that such a thing is absolutely impossible.

Is not that definite enough? In the face of that statement, and the other statements which I have read, would not Canada be behaving disrespectfully to the British government and the British people to ask for something which the leaders of both parties have repeatedly declared they were not in a position to give? I think it would. If the agitation goes on and gains strength, and the people of Great Britain become convinced that a duty placed on foreign importations, and the free admission of the products of the various colonies, would be of advantage to themselves, no one in this country would be more glad than I, if I should live at that time, though I am sure I shall not live to see it. If the conditions were such as we could accept, it would be a great boon to this country for our products to be admitted into the British market free, while a duty of eight or ten per cent were placed on the imports from other countries. We should have that much advantage over other countries; but in the end it would not be advantageous to Great Britain. It costs Great Britain 2,000 millions a year for her food supply, of which 1,600 millions comes from foreign countries and 400 millions from the colonies. If she placed a duty of ten per cent on the 1,600 millions coming from foreign countries, it would entail an additional cost of $25 a year on every family to live. The farmers of Great Britain, for a year or two, would gain an advantage, but that would be taken away from them, because the landlords would increase their rents, and labourers would require higher wages, because it would cost them more to live. Factory hands would demand higher wages, because they would have to pay more for the maintenance of their families; and manufacturers would have to get higher prices for their goods, because they would have to pay higher wages for labour and higher prices for raw materials. They would have to sell their goods in the English as well as the foreign markets at a higher price, and that would injuriously affect them in selling these goods in the neutral markets of the world, where they would have to compete with other nations, and, consequently, work injury all round. So that, when you look at the question from that standpoint, we cannot look to the day when English public opinion will be so changed that we may expect the establishment of such a preference in favour of the colonies.

Let me refer you to the opinion of another prominent man in England, the late Sir Thomas Farrar, Baronet, who gave a special study to the fiscal and financial policy of Great Britain and the effect moderate duties would have on the interests of that country. In his very able work, entitled: 'Fair Trade versus Free Trade,' you will find this statement:

In the last century (eighteenth) we alienated our colonies from the mother country by taxing them. In this century (nineteenth) our colonial Conservatives or protectionists wish to alienate the mother country by making her tax herself. They seek to bind our colonies to us by leaving them free to tax our products, whilst we are not only to abstain from taxing theirs, but are to burden ourselves with the worst of taxes, in order to give them an exclusive monopoly of our market. Surely if there is a policy which could make the mother country hate her colonies, it is this. But it is idle to talk of such proposals as these. England certainly will not contract her sources of supply to such an extent. Nor will she make a sacrifice at all where she gets nothing in return.

Such is the opinion of Sir Thomas Farrar. I have given you, Mr. Speaker, the testimony of the ablest man of Britain to show how impractical is this question of the mother country taxing her food imports for our benefit. It is a question which does not come into the politics of that country, it is a question that at present is outside the pale of practical politics.

Holding this view, the Liberal party in 1897, came to this conclusion: We cannot get this preference in the English market; we will, therefore, give the people of Great Britain a preference in the Canadian market. We believe that such a policy will give us a prestige in Great Britain that nothing else would. We believe it will bring us thoroughly into notice in the old country, and that it will have the effect of increasing our trade and prosperity.

The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), said the other day, that there is no sentiment in business, but that business is simply business. I do not think he could have been sincere in making that statement. I do not think that his own experience in his own profession would lead him to believe in it. We know that sentiment is a force in business, and no mean force either. The merchant who has got the favour of the people about him, does more business than his neighbour who has not gained that popularity. That applies particularly to a doctor. I have known frequently of doctors being called in altogether from sentiment—not because they were the wisest and most skilled, but because of the sentiment in their favour, and the man of skill and experience was passed by. You might make the circuit of every business in the country, and you would find that the sentiment prevails to a very large extent in all lines. The hon. gentleman himself refuted that argument before he got through his speech, for he said that in sending the contingents to the Transvaal, we did more to build our country up, and to unite us with Great Britain than anything else the colonies ever did. I endorse that opinion, but how is the sending of the contingents going to build us up? Just through sentiment. There has been created in Great Britain a very strong sentiment in favour of Canada, because Canada, partly through generosity to Great Britain, and partly through generosity to herself, gave Great Britain a preference in our market, and that sentiment has been increased by our policy in sending forward the contingents. Has that preference to Great Britain done us any good? I think it has. An hon. gentleman laughed, when I said that we sold more meat, and butter and cheese to Great Britain on account of it.

Mr. BRODER. They are shipping butter from England back to Canada.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). That does not touch the kernel of the question at all. I was going on to remark that the British dealers in butter to-day label their butter 'Canada butter,' and their cheese 'Canada cheese,' and so on, and there are hundreds of people in England to-day, who buy Canadian cheese, and butter, and bacon, and fruit, and other things, on account of the sentiment in favour of Canada, that has been aroused by our generous treatment of Great Britain in our policy of 1897, and there will be a still further increase in our trade with Great Britain, through the stand we have taken on behalf of British interests by sending the contingents to South Africa.

But, there is a considerable benefit derived by ourselves from the operation of this preferential rate. Let me point out the effect of the preferential tariff in controlling the prices of our importations from other countries outside of Great Britain. We purchase, for instance, common glass in Great Britain and Belgium. Last year we purchased $121,830 worth in Great Britain, and in Belgium we purchased $830,750 worth. On the imports from Great Britain we paid 15 per cent, and on the other 20 per cent. The Canadian importer is, therefore, in a position to say to the Belgium dealer: I can get a thousand dollars worth of glass in Great Britain, on the payment of $150 duty, but on the same value of your glass, I have to pay $200 duty. If you will make a rebate in the price to the extent of the difference, I will buy from you. Is it not evident that the Belgium manufacturer has to reduce the price, by reason of preferential duty in favour of England? Take gloves and mitts. We buy those from Great Britain, Germany and France. Last year we bought $127,000 worth from Great Britain; $180,000 from Germany; and $120,000 worth from France. On what came from Great Britain, we paid 26½ per cent; on what came from Germany, we paid 35 per cent, and from France, 35 per cent. Now, the Canadian importer can say to the French importer: I can get $1,000 worth of gloves and mitts from Great Britain, on paying $262 duty, but I have to pay $350 duty, or $87.50 more, on the same quantity of your goods. If you will make a rebate of $87.50 on a $1,000 worth of your goods, I will give you the preference. Thus, it will be seen at once, that by reason of the preference we give England, we can force down the prices of goods imported from other countries.

Take another. We import ready-made clothing from Great Britain, from Germany and from the United States. We imported last year $392,000 worth of ready-made woollen clothing and underwear from the British manufacturers, $263,748 worth from Germany, and $157,687 worth from the United States. We paid on the British goods 26½ per cent, and on the others 35 per cent. That is $1,000 worth if it came from Britain would cost $1,262.50 to bring into the port of Montreal, not counting the freight. Of the goods from other countries, $1,000 worth would cost us $1,350. We would say to the manufacturers in the other countries: If you reduce your goods so as to enable us to get them into Montreal as cheaply as the Canadian goods can be laid down there, we will accept yours, but, if not we will have to buy in Britain. And so I might go through them all. Take every article that we import from Great Britain and from other countries, and you will find that, by reason of the preferential duty, the prices from other countries are reduced.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think I have detained you sufficiently long. I have placed this matter before the House in order that hon. members may read it over and consider the points I have brought forward. I may recapitulate in a few words: In the first place, we said we would readjust and rearrange the tariff. This we did. At the beginning, the Conservative party said that that rearrangement would destroy the industries and institutions of this country; after that they said the policy was their own. We have gone on steadfastly during the years that are passed. We have made the country prosperous. We have increased manufacturing industries. We have increased wages and increased the number of hands employed. We have reduced the number of failures in the different lines of commerce. We have shown the absurdity of the quid pro quo policy of the Conservative party in respect to getting preferential treatment in the English market. We have created a sentiment in England in our favour. We have brought ourselves prominently and favourably into notice. Otherwise also our preferential treatment of the mother country has been beneficial to Canada in reducing the cost of goods, not only those that we import from England, but those that we import from other countries. If you look upon the whole scene, you will see that the policy of the Liberal party is one that deserves the endorsement of this country; and in a few months at latest that endorsement will be given by a larger vote than we had in 1896.

Mr. T. DIXON CRAIG (East Durham). Mr. Speaker, there is one thing we know, and that is that the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) is satisfied with the tariff policy of the Liberal government. I do not think I have learned very much more from the hon. gentleman's speech, although I have listened rather carefully, because, I think, most of the members of this House have heard the greater part of that speech before. The hon. member for East Huron devoted a great part of his speech, I think about half of it, to proving what nobody denies—that this country is prosperous. If the hon. member had belonged to the Conservative party when they were in power, he might have felt called upon to spend some time in trying to prove that, because the Liberal party constantly denied that the country was prosperous, no matter how conclusively we proved that it was. No matter how we showed that employment was general and wages good, it did not make any difference to the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright); he always insisted that the country was going to the dogs on account of the national policy, and that settled the whole question so far as he was concerned. The farms were covered with mortgages, the black flags were flying over the farms of this country. These were some of the expressions used. But the members of the Conservative party, though in opposition, are not so derelict in their duty as to run down the country. When the country is prosperous, they are willing to say so, though hon. gentlemen opposite, when on this side of the House were never willing to admit it. Those hon. gentlemen only found the country prosperous when they got into power. I do not intend to spend time over that. We admit that the country is prosperous and are glad of it. But it is most absurd to say that the tariff of the Liberal party has made the country prosperous. I do not think their tariff has increased the prosperity of the manufacturers of agricultural implements, for instance. Not that it has hurt their business very much, for they did not either raise or lower the duty on those goods. They talked a good deal about it and sometimes moved resolutions that agricultural implements ought to be free of duty or reduced to 10 per cent. But as soon as they got into power, and realized that the principal makers of those implements in this country belonged to the Liberal party, they left that tariff alone—and, as an hon. member near me remarks, that is the way they fulfilled their pledges. While I do not wish to spend time talking about prosperity, I mention the matter merely to show how absurd is the argument of the hon. member for East Huron that this prosperity has been caused by the tariff policy of the Liberal party. For this prosperity is not confined to Canada; it is world-wide. I believe the United States has never been so prosperous before as it is to-day, and the same is true of Great Britain. That neutralizes in some respects the effect of this preferential tariff upon our manufacturing industries. When times are good all over the world, you do not need a protective tariff; it is when times are dull outside of your own country and comparatively dull in your own country, that you need a protective tariff, so that your country will not be flooded with goods from outside. Now the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald, Huron), thought he made a great point by quoting the leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) to show that that hon. gentleman had predicted disaster from the tariff of 1897. But, as the leader of the opposition pointed out, when he made these remarks, he was referring to the tariff as it was introduced in 1897, with a preferential clause which was open to the whole world. This point the hon. member for East Huron did not touch upon. He says the tariff is the same now as it was then. I say it is not. The preference to-day is confined to Great Britain. When it was introduced in 1897, it was open to other countries to take advantage of, and many of them did take advantage of it. Then it was found good policy by the government, after they had got the most favoured-nations treaty abolished, to confine the preference to Great Britain. So, in 1898, the tariff was changed in that respect. The remarks of the hon. leader of the opposition were quite justified as applied to the tariff of 1897. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald, Huron), said there were very few failures in this country. When we admit that the country is prosperous, we admit that there are few failures. The hon. gentleman attributed this small number of failures to the adoption of this tariff. But the hon. gentleman says that this is a revenue tariff. That being the case, I would like to ask him how it came that there were so many failures under the policy of the Mackenzie government from 1874 to 1878, they having also a revenue tariff? Nearly all the merchants in the country were failing at that time. It is plain, then, that, whatever the reasons were, the number of failures is not reduced by the fact of having a revenue tariff.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Would the hon. gentleman allow me to say that he and his party had said that the tariff would destroy the industries. Now, by destroying industries, it will increase failures. Then, if it had the power of increasing failures from the standpoint of the Conservatives, would it not have the power on the other hand, if it worked harmoniously and in the interests of the manufacturers, of decreasing them? The hon. gentleman must take either one horn or the other of the dilemma.

Mr. CRAIG. I do not know whether the hon. member means that we said that about the tariff of 1897, or whether we said that the policy of the Liberal party, when they got into power, would have that result. I know we did say that the policy enunciated by the Liberal party, when they were in opposition would have the effect of destroying the industries of this country, and I am sure it would have had that effect if they had carried out what they said was their policy. But they did not do this, they in effect, maintained the national policy. They made some reductions, certainly, they had to do something; and they made some increases too, and they adopted this preferential tariff in 1897, which in 1898 they confined to Great Britain. So they minimized, as far as possible, the bad results which we might expect to flow from the tariff which they said they were going to introduce, if they got into power. We took the hon. gentlemen at their word, but we found they did not keep their pledges, and, we are very glad that they did not, because, if they had kept their pledges, all these disastrous results we prophesied would have come to pass.

The hon. gentleman talks a great deal about the increase of trade in the last three or four years. I want to say that there ought to be an increase of trade any how, when there is prosperity all over the world. There ought to be an actual increase of trade here, as well as elsewhere. But, the hon. gentleman forgot to mention that the great North-west is filling up rapidly, and increasing their exports every year. The quantity of wheat raised there for export, is increasing every year. If the Liberal party should be defeated at the next election, and the Conservative party come into power, as some of my friends say they will, and as I hope they will, and as I think they will—well, Mr. Speaker, if that should happen, the North-west will still continue to fill up and trade will continue to grow; and we should find the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald), if he happens to be in the House at that time, constantly saying that trade is not growing, or that if it is increasing, it would increase a great deal more if the Liberals had remained in power. Then we have British Columbia, a great mining country, growing rapidly. The resources of the country are extending, and so foreign trade must grow naturally.

The hon. gentleman made some quotations from Mr. Chamberlain, from Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, and from the London Times. I merely want to say, in the words of the Minister of Finance, that the world moves. When an hon. gentleman said it was impossible to have a real preferential trade, such as the Conservative party wished to bring about, the Minister of Finance said: I do not say it is impossible, because the world moves. I want to say also, that the world moves; I want to say further, that Mr. Chamberlain, and Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, and the London Times, in a few years, will learn a great deal from the United States, as they are learning to-day. We know that this highly protective country is making greater strides to-day than any other country on the face of the globe, in manufactures as well as in agriculture. I was a little surprised that the hon. gentleman should say that the Conservative party were cravens, for asking that they should get this world preferential trade. That showed me that his own party will never ask it, and if they never ask it, they will never get it. So we have nothing to hope from them in that matter.

I wish now to make a few remarks upon the general question brought forward by the hon. the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell). I consider it rather strange, that the government should put up one of their own men to move an amendment on a motion to go into supply. That is rather an unusual thing. It would not be strange at all, if some one on this side of the House moved the amendment; but, when the Minister of Finance moves to go into supply, the government put up an hon. gentleman on their side to move an amendment. Well, we are led to ask ourselves, what this means? I asked myself, what is the reason? I think one reason might be, and one reason, no doubt is, that they are not ready to go on with the business of the House. Here we have been from the 1st of February in this House, and we have practically done nothing, the government are not ready. They advocated, when in opposition, that the House should be called together earlier than the Conservative party some times used to call it, and, so they have called it earlier this year, because they called it late last year. Now, we have come here, over 200 men, and we are practically doing nothing, we are waiting for the government to bring down some business to do. Day after day is passing, and no business of much moment is being done, just because the government is not ready with their measures. We ought to have had the budget speech before now. The country is waiting for that, and just when we might expect that speech, the government put up a gentleman on their own side to move an amendment, and then put up their own members, one after another, to keep the discussion going on. They seem to be perfectly interested in the discussion, and I suppose they are so. Now, what is the object? As I say, one object is merely to mark time, they have nothing to do, and they want to make a show before the country of doing something, and so they have brought up this discussion. And, this, Mr. Speaker, is a business government, a government of business men. We have been told that over and over again. I wish, then, they would come down to business, and give us something to do.

The hon. member for Halifax has argued that the government have kept their pledges. Well, I think he must have been asleep. If he imagines that they have kept their pledges since they got into power, I must tell him that I never heard anybody else who thought so. I have talked with a good many Liberals, and they did not seem to think so. Perhaps he thinks the people of this country are asleep. He says the government have kept their pledges. Now, what pledges have they kept? First of all, the tariff. The hon. gentleman who spoke this afternoon, has argued that they have kept their pledges on the tariff. Now, Mr. Speaker, I say that if the present government did anything when they were in opposition, they led the people of this country to believe that if they got into power, they would reduce the tariff very materially. I was looking the other day into the time when the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), made reductions in the tariff. The present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), in making his speech, ridiculed those 'paltry reductions,' he said, they ought to have made four or five times as much. Well, perhaps that is the reason that he is not the Minister of Finance at present. I suppose that is the reason, because, I believe, that if the present Minister of Trade and Commerce had been Minister of Finance, he would have tried to carry out some of the pledges that he made when he was on this side of the House. But the very fact that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is not Minister of Finance, is a proof, to my mind, that the government did not intend to carry out the pledges that they made, and they had to set them aside, and get some one else to take that place. They found that the country was afraid to have that gentleman Minister of Finance of this country, after the pledges that he had made to destroy protection root and branch, after he had called the manufacturers of this country 'robbers great and robbers small.' Well, the manufacturers of this country quietly told the present Premier, when he was leader of the opposition, that they would not give him any support at all, if he took the present Minister of Trade and Commerce into his cabinet as Minister of Finance. There is no doubt of that at all. So the Premier had to set him aside, because he intended to break his pledges, all these pledges he had made throughout the country about free trade and about freer trade. Why, we are now told they never promised free trade. Well, I know this, that many Liberals throughout the country think they promised free trade. I know a great many Liberals with whom I talked, had that idea, and a great many opposed me because I was not in favour of free trade like the Liberal party. They thought the Liberal party were going to give free trade, they were going to cut down the price of everything and make it cheap.

Well, I leave hon. members to judge how they have done it. They were wise, I think, not to do it, and as an hon. member of that party said, in this House, upon one occasion: Don't think that we are a parcel of fools and that we are going to do that. I do not think that they are such fools as to carry out their pledges. These pledges were made not to be carried out, but to get into power upon and then to be thrown aside. I have here an amendment moved in 1893 by the present hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), which I will read for the delectation of the House:

That the present customs tariff bears heavily and unjustly on the great consuming classes of the Dominion, and should be at once thoroughly reformed in the direction of freer trade and—

Mr. McMULLEN. Hear, hear.

Mr. CRAIG. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) will just swallow this part of it.

--and that the amount of taxes collected be limited to the sum required to meet the necessities of the government efficiently and economically administered.

Mr. McMULLEN. Hear, hear.

Mr. CRAIG. I thought the hon. gentleman would say 'hear, hear' to that, because he is so economical, especially since the present party has got into power. He will not say a word since the present party has got into power, because he has forgotten all about his principles of economy. But, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, in 1893, moved that the amount of taxes collected should be limited. The hon. gentlemen do not want to limit them now. They are bragging about all they are getting in, and they are getting in so much that they can spend a great deal. The hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) says: We are making lots of money and we can spend lots of money. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, in 1895, spoke something in the same way. At that time the estimates amounted to $38,517,000, and the hon. gentleman moved this amendment:

That inasmuch as enormous sums of money are now exacted from the people of Canada which are not paid into the treasury, and inasmuch as the burdens of the people are thereby greatly and unnecessarily increased—

I wish he would think about the poor people now.

—and it is of the utmost importance to the well-being of the community that not only should the present extravagant expenditure be diminished—

That is $38,517,000. He thought that extravagant in those days. I wonder what he would think of it to-day?

—that not only should the present extravagant expenditure be diminished, but that the burthens should be reduced as largely and as speedily as possible, it is expedient that in making provision to restore the equilibrium between revenue and expenditure, as recommended in the speech from the Throne, the existing tariff be so modified that it may be made a tariff for revenue only.

That is a very nice amendment and the people gathered from it that when this party got into power they would spend less than $38,500,000. In that case they must have been very much disappointed, especially those that did not get a part of the money. I suppose those who got a part of the fifty millions are not disappointed, but on the contrary, that they are quite satisfied. I have a little more to quote from the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I quote him because he represented the Liberal party in their financial policy. An hon. member asks me whether he does now. I do not think he does now, although he tried very hard to do so in Massey Hall a short time ago. In 1895, in the budget debate, the hon. gentleman made a speech. Before I read what he said, I will say that I was a little surprised when the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) spoke about the position of the United States in 1896 in the way he did. He talked as if they were going to war at once at that time and as if the party to which he belongs were determined to have nothing to do with them at all, but to turn to Great Britain to give them our trade. In short, the hon. gentleman spoke as if they were done with the United States entirely. They were talking about war with Great Britain, and so, we were to be done with them. In 1895, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce said:

Here I will say one word as to the possible remedies for this state of things. I do not hesitate to say here that as regards any advantage or immediate relief to the farmers of Canada, I know of but one remedy, and that is the obtaining of access on fair and reasonable terms to the markets of the United States.

The hon. gentleman, in 1895, knew of only one remedy. What a revolution after they got into power a year or so and when they found out that this was no remedy at all! I do not know if he has changed his mind, but there is no doubt that some members of his party have changed their minds on that question, because, they want to make us believe that they will not have anything to do with the United States, and that they are ready to trade with Great Britain.

Sir, I advise that we learn prudence and economy.

I think this is very good advice and it is the advice that I would give to the present government. Then, the hon. gentleman went on to speak about the manufacturers:

As to the manufacturers, I desire to say most emphatically that we have no ill-will on our side of the House to manufacturers as a class.

He said, a little further on:

It (the tariff) must be something which is fairly and honestly framed for the purpose of bringing revenue into the treasury, and not at the dictation of protected manufacturers' associations, for the purpose of enabling them to divide with the government the plunder unjustly obtained from the people.

He does not talk that way to-day about the manufacturers. The government want to get the votes of the manufacturers to keep them in power, and so they are quite willing to do everything they can for the manufacturers. Things have changed. They thought the manufacturers were supporting the Conservative party, and they thought they might be able to win them over and there is no doubt that they are willing to treat them with fairness now, instead of calling them plunderers and robbers. The hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) in the face of these things says that the government have kept their pledges. If the government have kept their pledges as to the tariff I do not know what keeping pledges means. They might keep their pledges in regard to anything if they have kept their pledges in regard to the tariff, and I think that if it can be said that they have kept their pledges in regard to the tariff the same might be said of anything else. They made a pledge of economy. Economy was the great watchword of the Liberal party in opposition. The Conservative party, according to these hon. gentlemen, were most extravagant. It was a terrible thing that they should take $38,000,000 from the people and spend it in a country like Canada, which had so many burdens. Sitting on the other side of the House and listening to the speeches of these hon. gentlemen, I used to think that the government of that day were extravagant. I thought that, perhaps, they ought to curtail their expenditure, and I was considerably surprised when I found this economical party, after they got into power, talking about spending fifty million dollars instead of thirty-eight millions. If this is the way they have kept this pledge, I think they will not keep any of their pledges at all. Then, there was the pledge about the independence of parliament. The present hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) was very anxious that parliament should be independent and that no member of parliament should receive an office from the government in power. But, now he has changed all that. We have seen a great many members pass from their transitory positions in this House to permanent offices. I do not blame them for taking these positions, but this is another proof that the government have not kept their pledges. I was going to say something about the pledge in regard to prohibition.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Hear, hear.

An hon. MEMBER. Preferential tariff!

Mr. CRAIG. I am coming to the preferential tariff all right; this is only preliminary. The hon. junior member for Halifax introduced this subject himself, and if he had not done so, I would have left it out. The hon. gentleman spoke to us about the United States and said that they did not want to give them any privileges at all. I think they have given them a great many privileges. I find that they have made corn free. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), himself, after he had been down to Washington, as a member of the commission, said that in doing so, the government had made a mistake. The Conservative party, when in power, said to the United States: Make barley free and we will make corn free. But as soon as the Liberal party got into power the hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) said they wanted to retaliate upon the United States to pay them up for talking about going to war with England, and so they said: We will make corn free, and they took the duty off corn and punished them in that way. I do not think the United States object to punishment in that way. Let me ask the government: Was it for the sake of the farmers of Canada that they made binder twine free? Well, if it was, it has not turned out in that way. I would like that the farmers could purchase their binder twine cheaper because the duty was taken off, but I am afraid there is a combine in this article. From the manner in which the binder twine manufactured in the Kingston penitentiary was sold to supporters of the present government, there seems to be a combine in various quarters in this country to prevent the farmers getting their binder twine at a lower price. This government reduced the duty on coal oil, and they made certain regulations as to its importation, but the result is that coal oil, instead of being cheaper, is a good deal dearer than it was before. I do not blame the government for the mere fact that coal oil is dearer, but I do blame them for not listening to the advice of the former hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister), who told them that this would be the result of their policy. I also blame the government, and blame is merited by them, that they constantly, while in opposition, got some of their supporters to rise in the House to move that coal oil should be free of duty, and then, when they got into power, not carrying out that policy, but adopting in its stead a policy which made coal oil a great deal dearer than it was when the Conservatives were in power—and in addition to being dearer, I am told it is not as good quality. I have taken up a very few minutes in proving that the government have broken their pledges, and I will now deal with the preferential tariff.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Call it six o'clock, then.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. CRAIG. When the House rose at six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I was speaking about the remark made by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), that the Liberal party had kept all their pledges; and I think I proved that such was not the case. I shall now deal with the amendment of the hon. member (Mr. Russell) in reference to the preferential tariff, and the first question I ask myself is: Was this preferential tariff in the best interests of Canada? I have no doubt that members on the other side of the House would answer in the affirmative; but there are certain facts in connection with it that cannot be denied, and which I intend to present concisely to the House. One fact is, that the Conservative party all along advocated preferential trade relations within the empire. I feel sure that no hon. gentleman opposite will rise to deny that this was one of the planks in the platform of the Conservative party. My hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) was conspicuous in his advocacy of such a policy. He held that it was for the best interests of Canada that we should cultivate closer trade relations with Great Britain, and he contended that we might look forward to obtaining this preferential trade. Now, Sir, while the Conservative party were for years working in this direction and turning their eyes constantly across the ocean to the mother country, in what direction was the Liberal party looking? I would be satisfied to let them answer that question themselves; but I shall answer it for them by saying that during all this time the Liberal party looked to Washington. They were not looking across the ocean at that time. They seemed to forget that there was a country across the ocean that would take our products, and they laid down the proposition that the great thing for this country to do was to work to secure free access to the markets of the United States. From the principal speakers of the Liberal party when in opposition, we constantly heard of the sixty-million market, and about what would be accomplished if we could only get into that market. We heard ridicule cast on the efforts that were made to obtain trade in Australia and in other distant countries while we neglected to secure trade concessions from a country right at our doors. So that the positions of the two parties at that time were directly contrary to each other. The Conservative party were looking to the mother country and trying to cultivate trade relations with her, and were cultivating trade relations with her. They were doing all they could to encourage transportation and to educate the farmers to ship to the mother country products which would suit that market. The Liberal party, on the other hand, were discouraging all these efforts, and were doing all they could to turn the thoughts of the farmers of Canada to the United States of America. This is a fact that cannot be denied, and I propose to ask this question, which is a most important question. To-day the Liberal party are boasting of this preference which they have given to the mother country; and I suppose that when we on this side of the House vote against the amendment which they have got the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) to move, expressing appreciation of their preference tariff clause, they will say we are not loyal. Well, Sir, I want to ask this question: In what condition would this country be now, and where would the Liberal party be now, if they had carried the elections of 1891? Why, Sir, it is a matter almost too serious to contemplate. What did they advocate at that time? They had been advocating commercial union. In 1891, they went to the country on the policy of unrestricted reciprocity.

Mr. MILLS. Unless they had swallowed themselves, as they do now.

Mr. CRAIG. In 1891 they went to the country on the single plank of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States of America. In fact, they almost carried the country on that plank. They had so indoctrinated the farmers with the idea that this was their only hope of salvation, they had so portrayed to them the great prosperity that would come to them if we could only secure that trade relation with the United States, that a great many men who before that had supported the Conservative party, were tempted to support them. I repeat the question, in what position would this country be, and in what position would the Liberal party be, if they had carried the elections at that time? It has been suggested by an hon. member that they might swallow themselves as they have done since the elections of 1896. But I am afraid they would not have done that. They were not sufficiently educated at that time. They received their education afterwards. The elections of 1891 taught them that no party which advocated discrimination against Great Britain could succeed in this country; and they seem to have learned that lesson well, because to-day they talk altogether about the mother country, and the junior member for Halifax talked about the United States as if we did not want to have anything to do with that country.

If the Liberal party turned from the United States to Great Britain, it was because the Conservative party forced them to do so. I think that statement is incontrovertible; they were compelled to do so by the Conservative party. They were overthrown in the elections of 1891 with a great deal of difficulty, after almost superhuman exertions on the part of the late Sir John A. Macdonald, who was afraid of what might result to the country if they succeeded, and who made a great appeal to the people of Canada on the ground of loyalty to Great Britain. If they had not been overthrown then, you might have seen a strange state of affairs in this country. But, they were forced from that position by the victory of the Conservative party then, and by the conduct of the Conservative party since that time; so that, they deserve no credit to themselves for what they have done. In this matter, as in many others, they have not led, but have followed. As the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) stated not long ago, the Prime Minister is not the man who has led, but the man who has been pushed by the leader of the opposition.

Now, Sir, I think it will not be denied by any one that real preferential trade relations within the empire would be a great boon to Canada. The gentlemen who have spoken on this question admit that. We on this side of the House have always contended that; we have always held out to the people of this country that this is what we should look for and strive for; we have felt that it was worth striving for, and not only worth striving for, but worth waiting for. We have felt that it was well not to be too impatient, not to be in too great a hurry. The world moves, and while some of the statesmen in Great Britain two or three years ago, perhaps expressed opinions against this project, we have thought it possible that they might change. The world not only moves, but it moves quickly. Great changes come about rapidly in this age of the world. I hold that preferential trade would not only benefit Canada, but be a great benefit to Great Britain herself. I wish now to speak particularly about its benefit to Canada. One way in which it would benefit Canada would be by filling up the North-west. We have spent and are spending a great deal of money on immigration agents in order to induce settlers to go to Manitoba and the North-west. That country is gradually filling up; but if we had the right sort of preferential trade with Great Britain, whereby the products of Canada would receive preferential treatment in Great Britain, we would find the North-west filling up rapidly with good settlers from both Great Britain and the United States. Then, by filling up our North-west, it would render the empire independent as to its food supply. There are some people who think this is not a very important matter; but I hold that it is a most important matter, that the British Empire should not be to any extent dependent upon foreign nations for its food supply. This is a matter that has been spoken of and written about a great deal by Col. Denison, of Toronto, who has devoted much attention to it, and impressed it most indefatigably on the Imperial authorities, and this object would be brought about by preferential trade. It would also create an enormous market for manufactured goods, and in this way it would benefit the British people themselves. The market for manufactured goods would be immensely enlarged; and as they would receive a preference in our markets in return for the preference Great Britain gave us, the benefit would be entirely reciprocal.

I do not think I need say any more to prove my proposition that this would not only be a great benefit to Canada, but also to the British Empire. Some people hold that the adoption of this policy would be injurious to the interests of the British Empire. I think just the contrary would be the case. While this policy might lead to some disadvantage at first, in a short time the British people would be able to obtain all their food supply from this country and other countries within the empire, and these same countries would be able to absorb nearly all the manufactures of Great Britain.

It is hardly necessary to argue that the adoption of this policy would be a good thing, but what is the great argument against it. What is the great argument against this real preference which the Conservative party is advocating and has advocated so long? The great argument is that it is impossible. We had quite a lengthy effort this afternoon to prove that contention. One would think that the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) had a brief from some parties in England to talk against this preference, he was so anxious to show how bad it would be for the people of England. Instead of showing its good points, he was trying to show all its bad points. I do not consider that that is the proper duty for an hon. member in this House. It should be our part to show the good points and let the English people find out the bad points if there are any, and I maintain there are not. There may be arguments against the policy, but these can be satisfactorily refuted. The great argument used in this House is, that it is impossible, and that therefore we should cease advocating it. I hold that we do not know what is impossible to-day. While we may not succeed at once, if we can succeed in having this policy adopted by the English people in ten years hence, the result will justify all the trouble we will have taken to obtain it. To those who claim that the policy is an impossible one, I would refer them to what was said by the right hon. the First Minister himself, when leader of the opposition, and when speaking in the city of London, Ont., in 1896. He did not say then that this was an impossible policy. On the contrary, he held it up to the people of London as very desirable. He dilated on the advantage it would be for us if our butter and cheese and eggs and other products were given a preference in the British markets. He did not say then that such a consummation was impossible. Instead of saying that it was impossible he argued that it was fraught with great possibilities. Of course he was then going to the country and wanted the popular support, and he sought to delude the people by holding out to them the prospect of obtaining this boon if they would return the Liberal party to office. But, he said, in order to obtain it we must have a revenue tariff. We cannot obtain it so long as we have a protective tariff. Therefore, put me in power and turn out Sir Charles Tupper, who is a protectionist, and I will give you a revenue tariff and obtain for you this preference in the British markets which he, with his policy, will never be able to do. That certainly was no way for a statesman to talk concerning this policy, if he thought it an impossible one. But in my opinion he did not then think it was impossible, or else he was deliberately misleading the people, which I am very loath to believe. The words he then used are on record, namely, that all that was necessary to acquire this great advantage in the English market was for us to adopt a revenue tariff. The hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) said this afternoon that the conditions under which we could obtain this preference were such that Canada could not accept it, if it were offered to us. The only condition, he said, under which we could obtain it was to adopt the policy of free trade. But this is not the condition which the right hon. First Minister laid down as essential to our obtaining it. He said that if we were to get this preference at all, we would have to adopt a revenue tariff. Our tariff would have to be considerably reduced, but it does not follow that it would have to be reduced to any country except those within the empire.

However, when the right hon. First Minister went to England in 1897 to attend the Jubilee celebration, a great change came over the spirit of his dreams. He completely changed his attitude. The stand he took in England was that Canada did not want any preference at all, that Canada did not want any favours. Why did he take this stand? Simply because he was among free traders, who made a great deal of him, and so he accommodated himself to their views. It seems that the leader of this government has the faculty of the chameleon of taking his complexion from his immediate surroundings. In 1896, when talking to protectionists and manufacturers, he said: We are not going to hurt you a bit; we may have to make some changes in the tariff, but we will make them gradually and you need not be afraid. But when, out in Winnipeg, talking to men who wanted the tariff reduced, he said: I will give you free trade as they have it in England. And when talking in the city of London, Ont., in 1896, he said: Put me in power, and I will give you a revenue tariff, and then there will be no difficulty in our obtaining preferential trade with England. We will then be in a much better position to get it than Sir Charles Tupper is in now. But when he went across to England and found himself among free traders, he changed completely and became an absolute free trader. He said: I do not want this preference at all, because if you give it to us there will be something of protection in it, and I do not want England to have protection at all. I am not only endeavouring to drive protection out of Canada, but I also want to keep it out of England. Therefore, you need not make us any offer of that kind, because we do not want it. Well, for taking this stand, he obtained his reward. He was decorated with the Cobden medal. That medal was given to him because he repudiated the idea of protection being at all adopted by England. He waived aside entirely this idea of giving Canada a preference in the English market, because that implied the adoption of the principle of protection to some extent by the mother country.

The hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) and perhaps some others, charge us with declaring that the Prime Minister in England refused positively the offer of preferential trade. I do not know that such a charge has been made at all. I did not make any such charge. But I say that what he did was to prevent the possibility of any such offer being made by telling the English government and people distinctly in advance that we did not want it. He said to the English people: I am going to make you a free gift: the people of Canada will give you something for nothing; we do not want you to give us anything in return; we desire that you should not; we do not want you to do anything that has the slightest tinge of protection in it, and I ask you therefore, on behalf of Canada, not to make any offer of preference to us at all, but at the same time we are willing to give you a preference in our market on the goods you send us.

I intend to vote against this amendment.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CRAIG. I suppose some hon. gentlemen are surprised at that. Well, I would be just as much surprised if any of those hon. gentlemen on that side were to vote against it. I propose to give a few reasons for the vote I intend giving. The first statement in this amendment is this:

That it has already resulted, and will in an increasing measure continue to result, in material benefit to the mother country and to Canada.

I cannot vote for that statement because it is not true. The increase has been very small in our imports from Great Britain during the time this government has been in power, in spite of this preferential tariff. The natural increase will be just as much as this increase which hon. gentlemen credit to that preference. The advanced prices within the last couple of years in a great many lines have, apart from any increase, swelled the returns and made them appear larger than they really are. Besides Canada is growing and her trade is naturally increasing, and it is absurd to claim that because there is a small increase in the short time this government has had office, that increase is due to this preferential tariff. I deny that the first statement in the amendment is based on facts at all. On the contrary, it has been shown conclusively that the facts are just the other way. There is another statement in this resolution—that this preference has already aided in welding, and must still more firmly weld together the ties which now bind Canada and the mother country together. Well, Mr. Speaker, if it is the fact—that this preference has already aided in welding and must still more firmly weld the ties that bind Canada to the mother country, that would be a good argument. But I wish to make one or two remarks on that point. The first is that this is a strange view to come from a party which urged commercial union, unrestricted reciprocity and that sort of thing for years, which urged discrimination against Great Britain in favour of United States, and which was prepared to adopt a policy and tried to induce the country to adopt a policy which Edward Blake declared would finally lead to annexation. I maintain that the Conservative party is the party in this country that has aided materially in welding the ties between Canada and the mother country. While I think that in some ways it is unfortunate for the country that the Liberal party got into power in 1896, I must confess that one good thing has resulted from it, and that is that it changed their whole attitude toward Great Britain. Before that, their eyes were turned away from Great Britain, but now their eyes are turned toward Great Britain. I believe that if they had been defeated by the Conservatives in 1896, they would have been looking to Washington still. For that reason, I am not sorry they got into power, for I believe that, even if they are turned out of power at the next election, they will surely not have the hardihood to turn toward the United States and away from Great Britain again.

Another clause of the resolution is to the effect that the House 'desires to express its emphatic approval of such British preference having been granted by the parliament of Canada.' The reason why I cannot agree to that is that the granting of this half preference, this one-sided preference, as I was charged by one hon. member with having called it—and as I did call it and as it is—has postponed for a great many years the securing of a real preference. That is the only reason why I should oppose this. I cannot express approval of this so-called preference. I was opposed to it at the time. While I would do a great deal to show my good feeling and gratitude to the mother country, I do not feel that I am called upon to grant this half preference when there was a prospect that in a few years we might obtain something far better, better not only for Canada, but for the British Empire. This amendment is very plausible. I believe that the real object of it, if it is not to waste time, is to afford a basis for a cry of disloyalty against members on this side if we vote against it. The loyalty cry is a very popular cry to-day: and hon. members on the other side have been a little afraid about their position on that question for some time, and now they want to see if they cannot put us somewhat in the position they have been occupying for years before the country. I am not afraid of that. Whatever the position of the Liberal party of this country—and I am not going to say anything about it, except that for years they looked to Washington instead of to Great Britain—the Conservative party have had but one position as long as I can remember, they constantly looked to the mother country and constantly tried to cultivate better trade relations with the mother country. They felt in doing that they were building up Canada, and in building up Canada, they were building up the empire, for Canada they felt was a very important part of the empire, and anything that tended to build up Canada made the empire stronger and greater. We have seen the result of it all, in our contingents going to South Africa—contingents from Canada, from Australia, and from the other colonies—showing that the empire is one and will stand together. There is one thing more I have to say, and that is I think this amendment is moved at a most unfortunate time, in fact, I think that no more unfortunate time than the present could have been chosen. I think the feeling in Great Britain toward Canada is such that, without much solicitation, without much urging, it might have been possible for the government to secure preferential trade relations with the mother country. But what do hon. gentlemen opposite do? They seem to be afraid that Great Britain would do this for them, and so they get a member on their side to rise and move an amendment declaring to the British government: We are satisfied as we are; do not give us any preference. The Premier in 1897 said that, and now the Premier and the government wish the Liberal party to say it again. All this shows the country that if we are ever to have better trade relations with Britain, if we are ever to have real preferential trade, getting a preference for Canada as well as giving a preference by Canada, we need not expect it from the Liberal party because they are satisfied with a one-sided preference. But when the Conservative party come into power, I hope that they will continue their efforts to get a real preference, securing a preference for the products of Canada in the British markets as well as giving a preference to the manufacturers of Great Britain in this Dominion.

Mr. C. B. HEYD (South Brant). I have noticed that the speeches that have been made in this debate have digressed very materially from the purport of the resolution; and, in order to bring back to the House the object that is engaging our attention, I will read the resolution; and, having read it, I shall try to confine myself exclusively to the subject. The resolution reads as follows:

That this House regards the principles of British preference in the Canadian customs tariff as one which in its application has already resulted, and will, in an increasing measure, continue to result in material benefit to the mother country and to Canada, and which has already aided in welding, and must still more firmly weld together the ties which now bind them, and desires to express its emphatic approval of such British preference having been granted by the parliament of Canada.

That is the resolution; and it is evidently one that our friends on the other side have no sympathy with. They were surprised, they were astonished, they were troubled when it was first introduced into this House; and they have been in trouble ever since. They do not like it, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Craig) who has just sat down says that it is a resolution that should not have been moved, and that it was a strange thing that a government supporter should be put up to move a resolution of that kind. I do not look at it in that light. With me, the question is: Does the resolution tell the truth? If it does, I am quite prepared to support it; and if those gentlemen on the other side believe it does not convey the actual truth, they are justified in voting against it. But no attempt has honestly been made to show that the resolution does not express actually what has happened in the past. My hon. friend from East Durham (Mr. Craig) is not satisfied with it, because the preferential tariff which the resolution approves is not the kind of preferential tariff that he himself would like. In his mind's eye he sees a preferential tariff that is going to fill up our great North-west with happy and prosperous farmers. He realizes that they will, under his preferential tariff, get five, ten, fifteen, twenty cents a bushel more for their grain, than any other people in the world. He sees in his mind's eye, British gold flowing over into this country of ours, and he is happy under a condition like that. He does not realize that he is discussing an entirely problematical question that there is not the slightest prospect of seeing become an actual fact within the lifetime of any man in this House. He lectures the British people, because they do not buy all their grain from their colonies. Why should they buy all their grain from their colonies? Why should they give their colonies a preference over the nations of the world? Why should they tax the great consuming masses of Great Britain, in order that the producers of Canada might derive from five to twenty cents a bushel more for their grain? That has never been the policy of Great Britain, it is a policy that she will never adopt, because that great trading nation can never be convinced that to tax the food of the great consuming masses, will ever result in advancing her interests as a whole. He tells us that the great Conservative party have always turned their eyes towards Great Britain. Of course they have. They turned their eyes toward her when it was to their advantage to do so, and when it was to their advantage to turn their backs on Great Britain by introducing the national policy, they were only too ready to do so. They did not care anything about Great Britain then, and their leading newspaper said: If the national policy hurts British connection, so much the worse for British connection. That same principle is implanted in the heart of almost every member on the other side of the House. This loyalty cry, which, as he says, we are about to engage in, is a thing the Conservative party had the monopoly of in days gone by. We do not propose to do anything of that kind. We have never accused our friends on the other side of being disloyal, we have never claimed that we were the possessors of the loyalty of this country. The idea never entered into the mind of a Liberal to conceive himself either as loyal or disloyal, because his loyalty was always regarded as a matter of fact. This loyalty cry has always been the possession of the Conservative party, it has always been used in the interest of the Conservative party, and never in the slightest degree has it ever been used in the interest of the great mother country.

Now, I would like to follow my hon. friend a little further in his arguments, but as he did not confine himself to the resolution, and as I do not desire to be drawn away from it, I will be compelled to leave him, and confine my attention for a few minutes, to the speech that was delivered by the leader of the opposition. I do that in order to bring to the attention of this House, the loose quality of talk that is indulged in, even by men who occupy an exalted position in this Canada of ours. If there is one thing that we have a right to expect from leading men of this country, it is, that they will state the absolute facts, in connection with any particular case, and not try either to misrepresent or falsify them, or to produce a false impression in the minds of their hearers. Now, I turn to the speech of the leader of the opposition, who wanted to make a little capital for his side, and speaking of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), he said:

Does he not know that history is repeating itself? Does he not know that when the Liberal party came into power in five years, the imports from England fell, under Liberal rule and a very low tariff, $37,500,000?

Is that statement correct? Any hon. gentleman can ascertain whether that statement is correct, whether it shows an honest intention on this part, to instruct the people of this country who have not the opportunities of informing their minds, as well as he has. The facts are entirely contrary to what the hon. gentleman stated. It is true that the imports from Great Britain did fall under a Liberal administration, but was it because of the Liberal administration that that took place? I do not want to weary the House nor to deal largely in figures; but a brief review of the trade and navigation returns will show any one that this statement, made by the leader of the opposition, does not honestly state the facts of the case, and does not convey a correct idea to the people who may not have access to the blue book. For that reason, I intend, briefly to set the facts before the House. In 1873, the imports for the preceding five years, were $251,000,000, or $50,000,000 a year. In 1878, after the Mackenzie government had been five years in power, the imports had fallen to $47,753,000. Now, that was not at all caused by the fact of the Liberal party being in power, but it was the result of a condition of affairs that has been going on ever since in an increasing ratio. Five years after the Conservative party got into power, the imports from Great Britain had decreased to $42,000,000; five years after that they were $40,000,000; five years after that they were $42,000,000. In the year 1895, they were $31,000,000; in 1896, $32,000,000; in 1897, on the 30th of June, they were $29,400,000, the smallest sum ever reached in the history of Canada, since confederation. Now, the leader of the opposition, in order to make a point against this government, finishes his survey with the expiry of June, 1896. But the preference did not begin its operation until the 11th of April, 1897, the following year, and then only to the extent of 12½ per cent. Now, what are the facts in connection with that matter? I will read what the hon. gentleman said:

To be honest, he should have said 1895, 1896 and 1897, because these were the last three years under which that condition of affairs operated, and since then the preference began. My object is not particularly to find fault with the hon. gentleman, but to place the facts as they are before the members of this House, and I hope in some measure, before the country. He said :

During those three years of depression, from 1894 to 1896 inclusive, our average imports from Great Britain amounted to $34,276,249. Take the last year, and they had the benefit of that. Why, Sir, the startling fact appears that in 1897, 1898 and 1899 there was an average importation from Great Britain of only $32,991,076, a decrease of no less than $1,285,173 per annum, or a decrease of 3·90 per cent.

Now, that is again trying to convey a false impression to the members of this House. What are we trying to bring out? We are trying to show that under the preferential tariff, our trade with Great Britain is increasing, and increasing rapidly. Now, the only way to find that out is to compare the years under which it has been in operation, with the corresponding number of years during which it was not in existence, and we will find that in 1895, 1896 and 1897, the imports from Great Britain were $93,000,000, or an average of $31,000,000 a year. In 1897, the last year of the old condition of affairs, they were $29,000,000. But, in 1898, under the operation of the preference to the extent of 12½ per cent, the importation increased to $32,000,000; in 1899, it increased to $37,000,000, an increase of $8,000,000 in two years. That is a fair and candid statement of the facts, and instead of there being an actual shrinkage of 3·90 per cent, there was an actual increase of our trade with Great Britain to the extent of 32 per cent. Those are the facts, those are the facts that we want to lay before the people, and we do not want such statements as have been made, even by the leader of the opposition, to be spread broadcast throughout the country to the effect that the actual operations of the preferential tariff has been to decrease the imports of Great Britain to Canada, when the contrary is the fact.

Now, our hon. friend, the leader of the opposition is not singular in that respect. He was followed by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), who also expressed his disapproval of this British preferential law.

What did the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) say :

As to its being satisfactory to Canada, on what ground does the hon. member for Halifax ask us to say that? Has this half-way, one-sided Imperial preference done anything for Canada? Will the hon. gentleman tell us of a dollar of taxation that it has saved to anybody?

Mr. HEYD.

That is a practical question; that is a question that he has a right to ask us. Can we convince ourselves, can we convince the House that this preferential tariff has saved money to the people of Canada? I think it is quite an easy matter, because, we know now what the preferential tariff is. It gives a 25 per cent preference to certain dutiable goods that are imported, and it gives it exclusively to Great Britain. How much did the imports amount to that came in under that preferential clause? During last year the imports that came in under the preferential tariff were valued at $26,835,000, and the duty amounted to $5,885,000, or an average rate of duty of 22 per cent, while the average rate of duty that was collected upon the general imports into the country amounted to 30 per cent, there being a saving of about 7½ per cent. I shall omit the hundreds of dollars, in giving these statements, in order to condense my speech and to make it a little more intelligible and satisfactory to those who listen. The hon. gentleman says that not one cent of taxation is saved. Under the preferential tariff $26,000,000 worth of goods were imported, on which the duty was five million dollars, or a total of thirty-two million dollars. This was the cost of these goods to the importer in Canada. The duty remitted amounted to about two million dollars, or about 6 per cent of the entire cost of these goods was remitted when they came from Great Britain. Does anybody mean to tell me that when we import $26,000,000 worth of goods from Great Britain, pay five million dollars in duty and receive a rebate of $2,000,000, or one-sixteenth part of the entire cost of these goods, it is not going to affect the selling price in the market? There has been a direct saving to the people of Canada of two million dollars per annum, and not only of two million dollars per annum, because these goods come into competition with $62,835,000 worth of goods of a similar class that come from other parts of the world, and therefore, the same proportionate saving was effected on the whole class of goods, because, the lowest price at which these goods can be obtained in the markets of the world, whether in England, France, or the United States, is the price at which they will be bought. It is the price that regulates the value of the whole, and if the purchase price of the $26,000,000 worth of goods has been reduced in value by two million dollars owing to the preferential tariff, the $62,000,000 worth of goods that came in from foreign countries was also reduced in value to a similar amount, or by four million dollars more. This reduction applied not only to those goods that came in under the preferential tariff, not only to those goods that came in from foreign countries, but also, to the domestic product of the country that came in competition with the goods that were imported, and if we assume that the home-made article was equal to the imported article the whole saving amounted to $12,000,000 or $12 to each family of five persons in the country. That is the actual result of the preferential tariff looked upon from a financial standpoint. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) goes on to say :

Will he tell us of a single settler whom it has placed on the fields of the North-west Territories, which would be filled to overflowing to-morrow with hardy toilers if we had the proper preferential trade with the mother country.

That is another easy matter. He is away up in the clouds again. If you allow the hon. gentleman to arrange the terms of the preferential tariff, there is not the slightest doubt that he will have the plains of the North-west Territories occupied by industrious settlers within a few years. But, the hon. gentleman did not give us any evidence of anything of the kind. He goes on to say :

Will he tell us of one individual who has gone there as the result of that policy? Will he tell us of any way in which this half-hearted, one-sided preferential tariff has provided a market for our products?

That is another very difficult thing to do, but there is one thing we can do; we can look and see whether, under the operations of this preferential tariff, the trade of Canada has really increased and it is a very easy thing to do, because, we find by a careful reference to the situation that for five years, ended June 30, 1897, the average annual exports from Canada to Great Britain amounted to $61,000,000; in 1898, under the operation of the preferential tariff, they measured to $93,000,000. In 1899, they were $85,000,000, and for the first half of the present year there is a greater increase still.

Mr. SPROULE. Surely the hon. gentleman will not say that it is due to the preferential tariff.

Mr. HEYD. The hon. gentleman will not admit that this is due to the preferential tariff. I am not prepared to take the credit to the preferential tariff for this wonderful showing. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that it is due to the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, that it is due to the construction of our magnificent system of canals; they say it is because they have turned their eyes lovingly for the last 18 years to Great Britain and that is the reason that Great Britain has turned her attention to us. But, it is a singular thing, that during all those 18 years we find that no movement had been made to increase our trade with Great Britain by the hon. gentlemen who managed our affairs. There was no increase in our trade with Great Britain during these 18 years. It was positively decreasing when we take into consideration the increase in the number of people in this country. So soon as the Liberal government came into power our trade with Great Britain went up by leaps and bounds and we have a reasonable assurance that the good will which was generated in the hearts of the people of Great Britain had something to do with this increase of trade. I do not give it as a matter of fact, but, we have as much right to account in this way for this growth in our trade during the past two years during which the Liberal government has been in control of our affairs, and during which a preferential tariff has been in existence, as the Conservatives have to say that this increase is in consequence of our canals, which are not completed yet, and which could not possibly have any effect on the question. The hon. member for Haldimand gets up into the clouds; he is a man of an artistic temperament, he is not as practical as a business man would be, but, the hon. gentleman gets roaming around the realms of fancy as he delivers a speech, musical in its delivery, pleasant to listen to, but which, when sifted by the logic of facts, is found to have not very much of it. While he is a sinner in this respect, he is not the only one. I think that the greatest sinner of his party is the one from whom we would least expect such things. The hon. leader of the opposition is possessed of a Miltonian imagination and he often repeats things and believes they are true. The hon. member for Haldimand is too liable to follow in his wake, but, when we strike the hon. ex-Minister of Finance, a man of sober judgment, a man with great reasoning powers, a man who is always logical, unless his logic comes in contact with his personal bitterness, we have a right to expect from him a more correct statement of the actual condition of affairs. The hon. gentleman has laid before the House a speech that was supposed to be a reply to the one delivered by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) in Toronto, and surely more false statements in the short space of six lines could not be found than in the six lines of the speech which I have before me. If hon. gentlemen have the Trade and Navigation Returns here they can verify the statements I am now about to make. That speech was not on the impulse of the moment, but it was carefully prepared, re-read and looked over before it was printed. I have it here, and this is the language used :

If they say that they have reduced the tariff rate. I answer: (1) on most articles in the former tariff you made absolutely no change; (2) on many articles you actually increased the rate; (3) on the majority of those you reduced you threw the advantage to the United States market for no return whatever; on nine-tenths of the articles the preferential rate does not apply, as the importation is almost wholly from other than preferred markets; on that portion to which it practically does apply, the effect has not been to appreciably increase the imports, and lastly, the percentage reduction, 71-100 of 1 per cent in the whole, is so small that the consumer gets practically little or no benefit.

The six lines I want to call your attention to are these beginning with the words :

The preferential rate does not apply to nine-tenths of the articles that are imported into this country.

Well, it is a very easy matter to find out whether that statement is correct or not. Our friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) says that on nine-tenths of the articles the preferential rate does not apply, but if you turn to the Trade and Navigation Returns, page 191, you will see that if he refers to dutiable goods, the entire dutiable imports amounted to $89,000,000, and the preferential rate applied to $26,597,000, or 30 per cent of the entire total dutiable imports. And yet the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) has put it on record that the preferential rate applies to only one-tenth. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) were a man not capable of finding out for himself the exact facts, I would not find fault; but when a statement like that comes from a man who has been the Finance Minister of this great Dominion, and we find he is out over 20 per cent in his calculations, it does not say much for his veracity, or for his studiousness in trying to get at the facts. Now, that is his first error, and it is a pretty big one. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) goes on to say:

The imports are almost wholly from other than preferred countries.

Let us see if that statement is true. The total imports amounted to $154,000,000, $26,000,000 worth of which were under the operations of the preferential tariff, or 17 per cent; which is almost 17 per cent more than the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) admits. In that statement he was also wrong. He goes on:

On that portion to which it directly does apply the effect has not been an appreciable increase of imports.

What are the facts there? Well, Sir, it applies to $25,697,000 worth out of $37,000,000 worth of imports, or about 70 per cent. Now, we have no table with which to compare that, but if we apply the 70 per cent to the imports of two years ago which amounted to $29,412,000 worth, it leaves us $20,000,000 worth of goods which are affected by the preferential tariff, or, there has been an actual increase of $6,000,000, and yet our hon. friend (Mr. Foster) says there has not been an appreciable increase. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether $6,000,000 is an appreciable increase or not, but I fancy that if it were added to the very small fortune I have in this world, I would regard it as a matter of considerable gratification. Anyway, it amounts to 20 per cent of the entire trade that is affected by the preferential rate. All these misstatements are within the short space of about six lines of the speech of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster). $6,000,000 is the amount our trade has increased, and apply the 70 per cent rule to both and you have

Mr. HEYD.

22 per cent. The hon. gentleman goes on to say:

And the consumer gets no benefit.

I have already alluded to the benefit the consumer got, when I stated that the rebate which the importer obtains amounted to $2,000,000, and on the goods they came into competition with—the other $64,000,000—it would amount to $4,000,000 more. On the domestic goods they all would come into competition with—and assuming they are as great as the imported goods, and I think they are a great deal larger, it would amount to $12,000,000, and yet the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) says that the preferential rate has not reduced the cost to the consumer. That is another mistake of his. It amounts to at least $10 to the advantage of every family in the land. More than that, as there is a reduction on these goods to the extent of 6 per cent, the importer is able to sell these goods to the retailer at 60 cents less on every $10 worth he buys, and the retailer is able to sell these goods to the consumer at 60 cents less on every $10 worth of goods he buys. And yet, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) deliberately gets up in this House and tells us that the reduction of that amount has no appreciable effect upon the price that goods are sold at. I do not believe that the hon. gentleman from Halton (Mr. Henderson) was sincere in his statements, because he is a merchant and he knows that when he can buy $1 worth of goods for 94 cents, he can sell these goods cheaper than if he paid $1 for them. He is too honest a man to try and get 20 per cent extra on the dollar. He would put the 20 per cent on the 94 cents and take $1—14 cents for his goods, and would not charge his customer $1.20. I have no doubt of his honesty, and I know he would do that. Yet, he gets up in this House and he says what is not correct, just in order to say something in the interest of his party. It would appear, Mr. Speaker, that morality, religion, patriotism and everything else goes to the wall where party is concerned. The strongest influence, apparently, which animates some men in this House, is to get up and make some statement in the interest of their party, no matter whether that statement be true or not.

And why this attempt by hon. gentlemen opposite to misrepresent the preferential policy? I do not suppose that outside of this House and outside of the politicians and the newspapers who are interested in the success of the Conservative party, that you will find more than one man out of one hundred who does not believe that the preferential tariff is a blessing to Canada, and that it has been a strong factor in uniting us to Great Britain. During the two years this preferential tariff has been in force, I have never yet met a Conservative who was not pleased with the preferential tariff. I wonder how these honest Conservatives will feel when they find out that their leaders in this House say that the preference to Great Britain is a humbug, a fraud, and a deception. I do not believe that such statements will have any influence at all with the great mass of the Conservatives of this country, because they know better. Our friends on the other side of the House will have a hard job before them, if they try to convince the intelligent, hard-thinking people of Canada that a 25 cent preferential rate on $20,000,000 worth of goods is of no benefit to the consumers of this country.

But, Mr. Speaker, those gentlemen opposite have another object in view. They see that there has been a great change for the better in this Canada of ours since the preferential rate has been in existence, and jealous of our success, they want to belittle that policy. Sir, this policy inaugurated by the Liberal party marks an epoch in the history of Canada. It puts an end to the time when lip loyalty and flag waving took the place of actual work. The day has gone by for professions; the day has come when action is supreme. This policy of the Liberal party gave Britain a real preference for the first time in her history. For the first time, from friend or foe did the mother country ever receive an unsolicited concession. It paved the way for that magnificent demonstration in London, in which our gifted leader took such a prominent and creditable part. He has the eloquence, the imagination, he has the physical perfection that appealed to the best spirit of the British people. As a French Canadian he came amongst English speaking people; he came as a Roman Catholic to a people the majority of whom are Protestants, and with the preference to Great Britain as an introduction, the British people took him to their hearts. Yes, this preferential rate paved the way for that magnificent demonstration, because it opened the eyes of the English people to the fact that there was a Canada in existence of which they knew nothing. The Canada that they formerly knew was a Canada that said:

If the national policy hurts British connection, then so much the worse for British connection.

The Canada that the British people knew was a Canada that said, so late as 1896:

We think that to defend this portion of the empire is all that can reasonably be expected from us.

It was the kindness of this preferential offer that caught the British heart, and Canada at once assumed new proportions in British eyes. For a thousand years Britain turned her front to a hostile world on sea and on land, meeting diplomacy with diplomacy, statesmanship with statesmanship, statecraft with statecraft. She had completed treaties with foreign nations, sometimes getting the better, sometimes getting the worst. But, it was a new experience for Britain to receive a voluntary concession from another nation. It was not much: it only represented $2,000,000 per annum, but it was a great deal, because it was offered in the right spirit. We did not go there haggling and nagging and trying to get $10,000,000 from the British people for the $2,000,000 we offered, but we went and we made them a present of it. It was the way in which the thing was done that gratified the people of the motherland. They opened their hearts to us and they took us in, and they saw that they had a new Canada in the empire. Three years ago it was said that in defending this portion of the empire we were doing all that Britain could expect us to do. It was a true statement then, because the people of Canada at that time would be astounded if they had been asked to fight the wars of Great Britain anywhere but on this soil of ours. But, Sir, three years have gone by, and what is the result? The patriotic feeling and the feeling of mutual respect and admiration that exists in the motherland also exists in this country. The seed which our honoured leader has sown, of peace and good-will towards men, of doing away with the prejudices that separated the French from the English and the religious differences that separated the Catholic from the Protestant, has created a new Canada; and in three years the conditions have been so changed that the people of Canada, who not long ago would have been shocked at the idea of helping to fight Great Britain's battles, have to-day sent 2,000 of their sons to shed their blood on the kopjes of South Africa in defence of the empire. It is because of this that hon. gentlemen of the opposition are decrying the preferential tariff. They realize, and if they do not, ninety-nine out of every hundred of the people of Canada realize that the preferential tariff was the first step, the jubilee procession was the second, and the sending of these 2,000 Canadian patriots to defend British liberty and justice in South Africa was the third; and these hon. gentlemen wish to kill off this influence which they realize is inspiring the Canadian people from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from our southern border to Dawson City, with one universal feeling of patriotism. Members of the government, as well as many of the farmers and merchants of this country, are sending their sons from their homes for the first time in their history to lift up their arms in defence of British liberty and justice. This is the inevitable result of all this outburst of loyalty which our friends of the opposition are trying to stamp out. That is the reason why they malign and misrepresent the preferential tariff; and why they denounce the men who have done more than any others to bring it about, as traitors to this country. These are the men who never did anything for twenty years but shout and wave their hands about their loyalty, and try to enrich themselves at the expense of the country. During that time they had an opportunity to send their sons to the front, but they never made a move. But now, when we have at the helm a new government which sends its sons to fight the battles of the empire, these hon. gentlemen call its members traitors. I am surprised at the cheek of these men who, having done nothing themselves, are enraged and disappointed at seeing the tide turn against themselves, and asperse the patriotism of men who are more patriotic than they. I regret, Mr. Speaker, to have taken up so much of the time of the House; but if I have succeeded in convincing my friends, and in sowing a little truth in the minds of our hon. friends on the other side of the House, I shall not feel that I have misspent my time.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, if any of us had doubts as to whether or not the advent of the Laurier government to power in 1896 had any beneficial effect on the country, I think all doubts have now been removed. It would have been absolutely impossible for the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House to have made that magnificent patriotic speech in the days when his party were in opposition. I do not think that he himself would at that time have undertaken to utter the sentiments which he has so eloquently expressed to-night. The victory of the Liberal party has not been altogether in vain when we find so many patriots and such magnificent patriotism on the other side of the House. There are one or two corrections, however, which I wish to suggest to my hon. friend, more particularly in his eloquent peroration. He said that before this government came in power England only knew Canada as the Canada which had said that if the national policy hurt England, so much the worse for England. Now, would not my hon. friend be inclined to concede this, that probably the Canada which England knew in those days was the Canada which said that we owe England nothing but forgiveness for her blunders? Would he not be willing to substitute that for the remark he made? He sits behind the leader who used that language, and who not many days ago said in this House that he had not a word of it to take back. I would like also to correct another statement the hon. gentleman made, that is, that the Englishmen opened their hearts and took us in. I would like to suggest, instead of that, that when the Prime Minister of this country went to England, he opened his heart and took us in. Does the hon. gentleman not think that would be a fair substitute? The right hon. gentleman went over there pledged to endeavour to obtain for us preferential trade, for which Sir Charles Tupper had fought so long, and he ended by giving us away and handicapping us in that effort for a great many years in the future. Therefore, I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that that would be a fair amendment of that particular portion of his speech.

The hon. gentleman was very severe on the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster). He discussed with considerable severity the want of logic of that hon. gentleman. He said that he did not expect much logic from the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), nor from the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), but he did expect it in the ex-Minister of Finance. Now, I would like to invite the hon. gentleman's attention to his own logic. I infer from his speech that he attributes the increase of $8,000,000 in our imports from England in the last two years to this tariff. If I am wrong, the hon. gentleman will correct me. I am right, because he does not interrupt me. But in the first part of his argument, which he did not appear to have remembered, he said that the diminution of trade during the time of the Mackenzie administration was not in any way to be attributed to their trade policy, but to the conditions of trade all over the world at the time. Therefore, we are to have one mode of reasoning with regard to the Mackenzie administration, which held office during a period of trade depression all over the world, and another mode of reasoning with regard to the Laurier administration which happened to come into power when trade began to boom all over the world. That is the hon. gentleman's idea of logic. I fancy the hon. gentleman must have taken his idea of logic from my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), who gave us some lessons in that subject in a very notable speech which he delivered last year. I suppose the hon. gentleman is sincere in asserting that the increase in our imports from England to the extent of $8,000,000 during the past three years, from $29,000,000 to $37,000,000, an increase of 30 per cent, is due to this tariff; and I suppose that the hon. gentleman would be willing to stake on his reputation as a business man, a manufacturer, and a man of common sense, that no portion of that is due to the enormous development of trade which has taken place all over the world. Do I understand that to be his argument, or does he say that any portion of it is owing to the development of trade that has taken place all over the world? I am willing to give the hon. gentleman an opportunity to say yes or no to that, if he desires to do so. Apparently he does not desire to make any observation in regard to it. If he says that is all owing to the tariff, and is not owing to the development of trade all over the world, what does he say to the increase of our imports from the United States from $61,000,- 000 to $93,000,000 during the same period? The increase in our imports from the United States was from $61,000,000 to $93,000,000. Does he attribute that to the development in trade all over the world? Apparently not, because he is not willing to say that the increase in trade from England is due to that cause. Therefore it logically follows, according to the hon. gentleman's own argument, that this tariff, and it alone, has had the effect of increasing our imports from the United States from $61,000,000 to $93,000,000 during the same period, an increase of 52 per cent, during the same period in which they increased to the extent of 30 per cent from England. Is the hon. gentleman prepared, with these facts before him, to stand up in this House and say that it is the preferential tariff which has increased our trade with England as compared with our trade with the rest of the world? Our trade with England and the United States amounts to about $275,000,000, out of a total of $317,000,000, so that practically you may eliminate the rest of the world altogether in dealing with a question of this kind. Then, looking at the United States and England alone, you have this precious tariff, for which the hon. gentleman has so many words of praise, increasing our imports from England to the extent of 30 per cent, or $8,000,000, and our imports from the United States to the extent of $32,000,000 or 52 per cent. Yet the hon. gentleman is prepared to support a resolution which attributes the entire increase of our imports from England during that period to this precious preferential tariff, and he regards himself as an extremely logical and businesslike man in taking that standpoint. I do not pretend to understand very much about this trade question, but I should suppose that any man of ordinary business ability and common sense would have come to the conclusion that the increase in the trade of this country, both from England and the United States, was not due to this tariff at all, but due, to a very large extent, to the increase and development of trade throughout the world. I fancy that any man of ordinary business ability will come to that conclusion, and I am prepared to agree to a considerable extent with what my hon. friend said concerning the Mackenzie administration. I do not think that Mr. Mackenzie's policy was a very good one for Canada. I think that the national policy was a much better policy, but I would not for a moment pretend that the depression in trade which took place under the Mackenzie administration was due entirely to a bad trade policy. I would rather be inclined to agree with my hon. friend that a considerable portion, or some portion at least, of the falling off of trade during that period was due to the depression which undoubtedly took place over the whole world.

I would like to call the attention of the House to just what this tariff has done for us in the period during which it has been in operation. In 1896 we imported from England to the extent of $32,979,000, and from the United States to the extent of $58,574,000, or we have an excess of imports from the United States over England of $25,994,000.

Mr. FROST. How much free goods?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not understand what the question of free or dutiable goods has to do with the point I am now discussing. I am discussing the volume of our trade with England and the United States. We pay for the goods we get from the United States, whether they come in duty free or not. Does the hon. gentleman not see that?

Mr. FROST. No.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). We get our goods free then from the United States that we do not pay duty on? If that is the case with the hon. gentleman, he enjoys an advantage over all the rest of us. In 1897 we imported from England $29,412,188 worth of goods, and from the United States $61,649,041 worth. The excess of imports from the United States over those from England advanced from $25,594,282 in 1896 to $32,236,853 in 1897. In 1898 we imported from England to the extent of $32,574,024, and from the United States $78,705,590 worth. Or the excess of imports from the United States over those from England amounted during that year to $46,204,673. In 1899 we imported from England $37,060,123, and from the United States $93,007,166 worth, so that the excess of imports from the United States over those from England during that year amounted to $55,947,043. Thus the excess of imports from year to year of English goods over those imported from the United States, during the time these gentlemen have been in power, is as follows:

In 1896	$25,594,282
In 1897	32,236,853
In 1899	55,947,043

So that the excess of imports from the United States over those from England increased by the amount of $30,000,000 between 1896 and 1899, and yet my hon. friends on the other side deal with this tariff as if it were one which had the effect of promoting and cultivating trade with England instead of with the United States. In the face of the figures I have just given, how is it possible to make such an argument seriously?

Some hon. gentlemen talk about dutiable and non-dutiable goods. I am talking about the volume of trade between the two countries. Every one knows that the volume of trade must comprise goods on which we pay duty as well as those on which we do not. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Frost) shakes his head. Well, he will have an opportunity of convincing the House of the contrary. I am dealing with the total amount of our trade, and the excess of our imports from the United States over our imports from England was $30,000,000 more in 1899 than it was in 1896.

Let us test the question in another way. The resolution which my hon. colleague from Halifax (Mr. Russell) has offered to this House is one which he could just as well have submitted to this House in 1882 as in 1889, and I will show the reason why. From 1877 to 1879 the imports from Great Britain to Canada were as follows :

1878	37,431,000
1879	30,993,000
	$107,996,000

In 1880 the national policy came into force, and our imports amounted to $34,461,000 :

In 1881	$ 43,583,000
	$128,641,000

So that, taking the three years before the national policy came into force, you have an aggregate importation from England to Canada of $107,996,000, and taking the three years after the national policy came into force you have an aggregate import from England to Canada of $128,641,000, or an increase of $20,000,000. Therefore, the resolution which my hon. colleague from Halifax has ventured to put before this House would be more applicable to the effect of the national policy in 1882 than it is to this preferential tariff which was introduced by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. Does the Finance Minister or my hon. colleague from Halifax say that increase of $20,000,000 in 1880-1-2 was due to the national policy? If not, how can they venture to say that the $8,000,000 for which my hon. friend from Halifax claims credit is due to this preferential tariff? On what basis shall we discriminate between the two? I would like some hon. gentleman on the other side who proposes to deal with this question to look at it from that standpoint and answer these figures if he can. If we deal with the exports to England during these years, we find the same thing. Our exports were as follows :

1877	$ 41,567,000
1879	36,295,000
	Total
	$123,803,000
1880	$ 45,846,000
1881	53,571,000
1882	45,274,000
	$144,691,000

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax).

Making a total increase in our exports to England during the latter period of $20,788,000. Therefore, both, so far as imports and so far as exports are concerned, the resolution which my hon. friend from Halifax has ventured to put before the House would be equally applicable to the effect of the national policy during these three years. Will the Finance Minister or any one else point out the reason you cannot as justly attribute the increase during these three years to the national policy as you can attribute the $8,000,000 of increase during the past three years to the policy inaugurated by the present government?

I do not wish to detain the House longer with respect to that point, because there are a great many hon. members who are more familiar with the business of the country and much more capable of dealing with it than I am. But, I would like to say with respect to the motion of my hon. friend from Halifax that it does seem a remarkable thing that a government of this country coming down to this House panting with eagerness, to get supplies voted for the ensuing fiscal year, should see fit to pull a string and have one of their own supporters move an amendment to supply. It seems strange; and I am going to quote a high authority on that subject. I have here a speech of the hon. leader of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), and this is the language in which he characterizes such a resolution :

He now offers us, not a practical motion, but an academic, abstract and rigid motion which can be debated, which can be affirmed or denied, but which cannot be amended, and which, by the rules of this House, has either to be swallowed whole or rejected whole.

I would commend the remarks of the right hon. Premier, which were applied to the motion of my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) to my hon. colleague from Halifax. We suppose that his resolution was conned over by the Finance Minister and the leader of the government. So far as the leader of the government is concerned, it must have been forgotten by him, or he would not have used the language I have just quoted, which is so strongly applicable to the motion of my hon. friend from Halifax. The only explanation that I can give is that the right hon. Premier must have forgotten that my hon. friend from Halifax intended to move this resolution.

I probably should not have said a word if my hon. friend from Halifax had not devoted some attention to myself in his speech. His remarks were in somewhat of a lecturing tone. But, I must say that I am not the only person to come in for a lecture at the hon. gentleman's hands. He lectured to Lord John Russell, who negotiated the German and Belgian treaties. Before I read my hon. friend's speech, I had imagined that Lord John Russell was a man of some ability, that he had been a somewhat prominent figure in English affairs, that he had been Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs for a number of years, and that his career was looked back upon as that of an able and successful man. But, after reading the criticism of my hon. friend from Halifax with regard to this Belgian treaty and German treaty, I must dismiss any such idea that I may previously have entertained. Because, my hon. friend, speaking of the treaty which Lord John Russell negotiated, used this language :

—which may have been the sublime achievement of some understrapper or routinist in the Foreign Colonial Office in the days of ignorance that God winked at.

Mr. TAYLOR. Who said that ?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). My hon. friend and colleague from Halifax said that in regard to Lord John Russell. But, I have heard my hon. friend adopt that lecturing tone before. In the campaign in Halifax he delivered a rebuke to the Privy Council on the subject of their judgment in the school case, which, I am sure, the Privy Council have not got over yet. And if Lord John Russell were not so fortunate as to be dead, I am sure he would be equally distressed by the criticism passed upon him by my hon. friend. Therefore, it would seem invidious for me to complain about being lectured, for it is a compliment to be lectured in such high company. To what my hon. friend did say with respect to myself, I ask the attention of the House for just a few moments :

I think, Sir, that it was a most ungracious and wholly unnecessary task which my hon. friend and colleague (Mr. Borden, Halifax) imposed upon himself when he undertook to argue the cause of our opponents and plead for the further continuance of the enthrallment of the parliament of Canada.

That rebuke was administered because of a plea I undertook to make in this House with respect to the power of parliament to pass an Act which I thought in violation of treaties made by Great Britain with Germany and Belgium. If hon. gentlemen have any recollection of my speech—and I do not suppose many of them have—they will recollect that I took three points : The first was that Her Majesty had power to make a treaty binding on Canada ; the second was that the German and Belgian treaties were binding on Canada—there was no doubt about it, because I read the language of the party—and the third was, that no legislation was necessary, or was, in fact, enacted for the purpose of bringing these treaties into force either in Britain, Ireland or Canada. These were the only propositions I contended for, and I say that no proposition I contended for has any less application to the parliament of England than to the parliament of Canada, and I will challenge any hon. gentleman to controvert that. If he desires to do so, let him first look up the constitutional authorities on that point. This is the constitutional authority on which I relied and on which I rely still :

It is a peculiar function of sovereignty to make treaties, leagues and alliances with foreign states or princes; by the law of nations it is essential to the validity of a treaty that it be made by the sovereign power, for then it binds the whole community. In the British Empire this sovereign power is vested exclusively in the Crown, acting under the advice of its responsible ministers.

The Crown is at perfect liberty to make a treaty binding on Great Britain and Ireland without consulting parliament. It has the same power to make a treaty without consulting the parliament of Canada. The only difference is that in England, if parliament does not approve it, parliament cannot turn out the ministry that made the treaty. We cannot turn out the ministry who made the treaty, because they are not under our control. But, does my hon. friend pretend to think that a change in our relations with the empire such as he suggests should be effected by our sitting silent in this Chamber when an argument is addressed to this House in contravention of all constitutional principles ? Why, you might just as well say, that if Sir Louis Davies, whom he compliments on this subject, should get up and argue that this parliament had a right to amend the British North America Act, and if some one should venture to get up and dispute that, it would be an endeavour to trammel the parliament of Canada ; exactly the same argument would apply. The veriest student of constitutional law knows that changes of that character cannot be affected by our sitting silent in this parliament. Any change in the constitution which gives a right to turn out the advisers of the Crown, because they have negotiated a treaty, cannot be effected by our sitting silent in this Chamber. The hon. gentleman sees fit to get up and argue, that power is vested in this parliament which no one before the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), made the argument which he did, had even ventured to assert. Now, Sir, as I said before, I will say exactly the same thing about the parliament of Great Britain and Ireland, as I said about this parliament. If the parliament of Great Britain and Ireland passed legislation in contravention of a treaty which Her Majesty had made with Germany and with Belgium, they would be doing a very wrong thing. Parliament might pass a resolution calling upon the Crown to denounce those treaties, that would be a proper procedure ; but for parliament to pass legislation in contravention of those treaties would be just as wrong in England as it is here. Sir, I regret that I have had to detain the House at such length. I can only say in conclusion, that looking at this resolution as an abstract resolution, as a resolution to which no amendment can be offered, as a resolution which is not offered for the purpose of advancing business, but is offered purely for party and partisan purposes, I for my part, will feel myself in duty bound to vote against it, and to vote for such a resolution as I hope will be offered later on in the session, declaring the views which gentlemen on this side of the House entertain with regard to this preferential tariff.

Mr. FIRMAN McCLURE (Colchester). The discussion upon this question, seems to be confined to no particular field, as every speaker has chosen to discuss it from a different standpoint. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Borden, Halifax), while he has given us many figures bearing upon the trade of this country, I regret to say, could not finish his speech, without doing what is too common among the leaders of the party to which he belongs, and he cast a sneer at the professions of loyalty made by the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Heyd). He told us that that hon. gentleman could not have made such a loyal and enthusiastic speech in the days when the Liberal party were in opposition. Well, to a certain extent, I think that is true. When the Liberal party were in opposition, the material was entirely wanting upon which such a speech could be based, as the hon. gentleman made here to-night. We did not then have the trade of the country in that prosperous and buoyant condition in which it is to-night; the relations that existed between Canada and the mother country were not of that cordial character which they are to-day, in consequence of the policy of this government. If, therefore, the hon. member for South Brant did not, in the days when the Liberals were in opposition, make such a speech as he made here to-night, it was because the government of the day failed to provide the country with the material facts, upon which such a speech could be based.

Then the hon. gentleman poses as a critic of the logic of the member for South Brant. I must say that for a professor of logic, he has indulged in some very peculiar kind of logic himself. He told us it was very inconsistent in the member for Brantford to say that the improved trade between the mother country and Canada, was due to the reciprocal tariff, and to say at the same time that the depression of trade which existed during the Mackenzie government, was due to world-wide depression. Is there anything inconsistent in the two statements? I fail to see it. The hon. gentleman seems to think there is great inconsistency. Then he went on himself to state emphatically that when the leader of this government went to England, he went pledged to get for us the kind of preferential trade, which the leader of the opposition had been agitating. Will he quote his authority for the statement? Will he give us a line of authority for such a statement? Coming from one who poses as a professor of logic, I think it is incumbent upon him to give us authority for such a statement as that made in this House.

But, what kind of a logician is the member for Halifax? I recollect very well, that during the campaign in Nova Scotia, in 1896, that hon. gentleman made a number of speeches. It was alleged against him, how truly I do not know, that his conversion to the faith of the Conservative party, had been of a very recent character, and he was asked to explain his reasons why he had left the fold of the Liberal party, and was found a candidate of the Conservative party. The reason that he publicly gave, was that he was driven out of the Liberal party, because the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), of this Dominion raised the repeal cry in Nova Scotia. But, to-night we learn to our astonishment, that he has all along been an admirer of the national policy, and that he never believed in the policy of Mr. Mackenzie. He stands up to-night to laud the national policy, when, during all the years it was in force in this country, or a great many of them, he was giving his support to the opponents of that policy. Is that logic? It may be, but it is not the kind of logic we expect to hear from members of this House.

Then the hon. gentleman was at a good deal of pains to demonstrate to this House that the argument he made here with reference to the German and Belgium treaties was sound. Well, I am not going to enter into that question. I am not going to bandy words with the hon. gentleman, as to whether that argument was sound or not. But, I put this proposition to him: Suppose every argument that he made was absolutely sound, I ask him if that was an opportune moment for him to present those arguments to this House? When this country was contending for the right to regulate its tariff in the way it pleased, was it an opportune moment for a representative of the Canadian people to get up and argue on behalf of the opponents of that principle, that we could not regulate our tariff as we pleased, because of a treaty made years ago, in the making of which we had no voice, and in reference to which we had no interest? Was it opportune? Was it a patriotic step for the hon. gentleman to take, to use his extensive legal knowledge to place arguments in the mouths of our opponents upon that question? I ask him how does he defend his position? It has been admitted by all leaders of both parties, that Canada has an absolute right to regulate her tariff in the way she please. To such an extent has this been contended that when the Conservatives were in power, as we have been reminded here to-night, they were taunted with having, in the arrangement of their tariff, discriminated against Great Britain. They said: It makes no difference, we have a right to look after ourselves. If England is hurt, so much the worse for England. Now, if that be true, how is it possible for hon. gentlemen to go on and argue that a country that is free to regulate its own tariff, still has its hands bound by a treaty in the making of which it had no voice?

Now, hon. gentlemen who have addressed themselves to this question have taken a great deal of pains to show that the Liberal party have been insincere in their professions and promises in reference to the trade question and in reference to every other question that has come before the country.

The hon. leader of the opposition, in his address the other day undertook to refer to the platform and principles of the Liberal party and to demonstrate, to his own satisfaction, that all of these principles had been violated and that their platform had been entirely discarded. This hon. gentleman must think that the people of this country have very short memories if he expects them to forget that not only the Liberal party, but the Conservative party as well, made professions and promises in 1896 when they went to the country. What were the issues of that campaign? What were the issues that were decided upon that occasion? The trade question was one of them. There was another question that occupied considerable attention in the country upon that occasion and one which the hon. gentlemen opposite assured us was an issue of the most vital importance. The hon. leader of the opposition, when he was in this House, in the very session preceding the last general election, introduced a Bill, and in moving the second reading of it, he used these remarkable words:

Since I entered the legislature of my province, during the whole of that period I have never stood face to face with a question to which I attach the deep, the vital, the overwhelming importance that I attach to this question.

That was when he introduced the famous Remedial Bill. At a later period he declared:

The question now submitted to the consideration of the House is one which, in my judgment, transcends in importance any measure that has been submitted to the House during its existence.

Still further along, as the discussion got warmer upon it, we find him declaring that:

The government has felt compelled, in order to maintain the law and constitution of the country, to lay this measure before parliament, and I say we will exhaust all the physical force we possess to pass this measure—at the risk of health—it may be at the risk of life, and at my time of life, I may be permitted to say that if it were necessary to sacrifice life itself, I should feel bound to do it, as it is perhaps not improbable that may be the result, looking at the vital importance attached to this question.

This was not an ordinary question of policy. It was not a mere question of procedure.

Speaking in Toronto on the 19th of June, 1896, the hon. gentleman is reported, in the Mail and Empire, as saying that the Manitoba school law had violated the fundamental principles of the constitution of Canada. Again, he declared:

We have taken our lives in our hands, and we will maintain that great cardinal principle which Sir John A. Macdonald throughout his whole career upheld as the very essential point to bind the people and the country together. If I had known that it would involve being driven out of public life, if I had known it would involve the downfall of my party, I should have said we must do right though the heavens fall.

Well, the heavens have not fallen, the constitution of Canada has not changed, the Manitoba school law is still in existence, and yet the hon. gentleman is silent. No, he is not silent. He is content to go, in the recent campaign into the province of Manitoba and to state, as reported in the Telegram of the city of Winnipeg, the Conservative party organ:

If Sir Wilfrid Laurier thinks the Manitoba school question is settled, he is the only man in Canada who thinks so.

Yet the hon. gentleman, who, a few short years ago, pledged his life, if necessary, to settle that question, says it is not settled and he gets up in this House and says: I wash my hands of all responsibility. These are the men who taunt us with deserting our principles; they charge us with inconsistency, they tell us that we have not carried out our pledges, and they are horrified at the thought that a party, before they came into power would make professions and pledges and not fulfil them. If hon. gentlemen opposite were successful in getting into power, they promised and pledged the people that they would do certain things, but because the people voted against them, they repudiated their promises and principles, although they were fundamental principles of the constitution. They refused to go forward. Would it be unkind of me to say, as the hon. leader of the opposition said, that this was a platform to get in on, and not one to stay in upon, and that when it failed in its usefulness in this respect they discarded it altogether?

We were told the other day that the Liberal party had not been true to its pre-election promises on the trade question, and we were given to understand that the pledges of the party upon that question were very clear and distinct. The hon. leader of the opposition used this language the other day in reference to the position of Sir Wilfrid Laurier previous to 1896:

No man ever stated in stronger, clearer and more emphatic terms what his policy was going to be.

That is not the position that the hon. leader of the opposition took in the campaign of 1896; that is not the language that he used then. The charge which he brought against the Liberal party in 1896 was a very serious one, I admit, if it were true, but it is not the charge which the hon. gentleman made the other day. In an interview, published in the Mail and Empire of June 6, 1896, just shortly before the election, the hon. gentleman is reported as saying :

We have what amounts on the part of the Liberals to a refusal to place definitely and squarely their fiscal policy before the electors. Speaking at Galt on June 21, just two days before the election, the Mail and Empire reports him as saying on the trade question :

There was an entire absence of information as to what policy the Liberals would pursue should they be successful, in the present question.

That was the language used and the argument made to the country in 1896, and yet the hon. gentleman gets up and tells us that never was the policy of any party stated more clearly and distinctly than the policy of the Liberal party in 1896. These are the hon. gentlemen who taunt us with inconsistency. They tell us that we have gone back on our pledges, but they cannot be consistent for a single year. Not only did the Liberals make professions and promises in 1896 in reference to the trade policy, but, the Conservative party also pledged themselves to certain definite policies ; they also made many promises in reference to the trade of this country in regard to what they would do if entrusted with power. Fortunately, they were never given an opportunity to carry out these promises, but, nevertheless, they must be held bound by some of the predictions made upon that occasion. On this trade question, in 1896, the Conservative press and the Conservative leaders were very confident, and very loud in proclaiming the disasters which were sure to follow if the Liberals came into office. On the 13th of June, 1896, the Mail and Empire declared :

Laurier respectfully requests your vote and influence in favour of hard times.

Have hard times come ? Is that prediction made good ? Have hard times followed the advent of the Liberal party to power ? On the 21st June, 1896, two days before the election, the same paper declared :

Liberal success means five lean years.

How lean have the five years been ? Has the country prospered since then ? Hon. gentlemen taunt us with not carrying out our pledges, but I ask them have their predictions been fulfilled ? Their predictions have not been fulfilled, but, they say, this is because you stole our policy—because you adopted the national policy. These hon. gentlemen must be very forgetful. They certainly are not very considerate of their own offspring, if they did not know it for a year after it was introduced into this House. The national policy was their offspring, it was their peculiarly favourite child, it was the offspring of their loins, and they were prepared to die for it. The government introduced its tariff policy, and it took gentlemen opposite a whole year before they could recognize its features. It was presented to this House by the Liberal government in 1897, and it was at once attacked by the leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), and by the financial critic (Mr. Foster). It was denounced in this House, and it was denounced throughout the country by the Conservative press and by Conservative politicians. On the 23rd of June, 1897, the hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster), used this language :

My hon. friends have kept the principle of protection, but they have made some interference with it, which I am afraid will be fatal to the industries themselves.

Well, they did make some interference with the national policy ; and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) said it would be fatal to the industries themselves. He went on to particularize, and he told us where this policy tariff would injure the prospects of the country, but he was deceived in his predictions. He said :

My firm belief is that with 5 cents a pound off, and simply 35 per cent left on, we may bid adieu to the greater part of the woollen industry in this country.

Has the woollen industry of Canada died in consequence of this tariff which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) says was calculated to kill it. Let me give you an example. During the campaign of 1896, down in the town of Oxford, N.S., there was a big political meeting, and there was no building in the place big enough to hold the people who wished to attend, except one. What was that building ? It was a gigantic woollen mill lying there idle at the time, and they threw it open to the public, and in it they held their meeting, to laud the national policy and sound its praises before the people of Cumberland. Let the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) go to the town of Oxford now and he will find that not only is that mill working overtime, but that they have had to enlarge their premises and increase their machinery. That is the way the preferential tariff killed the woollen industries in this country, which it was the firm belief of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) would die in consequence of this policy which he did not then recognize as the national policy. He went on to say :

The same remark applies to buggies, to carriages, to confectionery, to shirts, and to collars and cuffs.

And he told us he could enumerate others, but he did not care to do so. Speaking on the 26th of April, shortly after the tariff came down, the leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) said :

The result is that this tariff goes into operation, and the hon. gentleman knows that the industries of this country are already paralyzed in consequence, while hon. members gloat, vindictively gloat, over the destruction of Canadian industries. I was reading the wail, the sorrowful wail, of these industries in the Montreal 'Gazette,' where one manufacturer after another declared that their industries were ruined, that their mills must close, and that they saw staring them in the face a return to the deplorable state of things that existed when the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) that last addressed the House was in charge of the fiscal policy of the country. I say that a deeper wrong was never inflicted upon Canada.

Inflicted how? Why, he told us the other day that we had adopted his policy and foisted it on the country. He did not recognize it then as his policy, but he described it as a policy which would work ruin on Canada from one end to the other; and the Conservative press outside took up the cry. I was a little amazed the other day when the leader of the opposition was describing how the leader of the government had stolen his horse, to find how emphatically the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) was contradicted in that statement by his own party press. On the 28th of April, 1897, just after they had long enough time to study the details of the tariff, the Mail and Empire came out with this statement:

The whole scheme is simply a free trade scheme, with a British varnish, that rubs off with the first touch.

That is what the Conservative party organ thought of this so-called national policy when it was brought down to this House. Now these gentlemen opposite have discovered that it is not a free trade scheme at all, but that it is their own peculiar child, the favoured national policy. Surely, these be parents to be proud of. Again on the 26th of April, the Mail and Empire wrote:

In some quarters it is assumed that the ministers have stolen the Conservative trade policy. Such, however, is not the case. The new tariff makes a bitter assault upon many industries.

The Mail says that the Liberals did not steal the national policy, and the leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) says they did. We must accept one or the other. I would be glad to know which is the right one to accept, but for my part I would prefer to accept neither. On the same date the Mail says:

What considerations induced Mr. Fielding to take off a good deal of protection—

Here is a statement that Mr. Fielding took off a good deal of protection, and yet we were told here the other day that the Liberals have actually increased the protection.

What considerations induced Mr. Fielding to take off a good deal of protection to millers, to iron-workers, to woollen manufacturers, and yet keep up the duty on the coal they used. . . . No, the Conservative policy has not been stolen.

Was there ever a more emphatic contradiction than that of the statement made in this House by the leader of the opposition.

I would ask these gentlemen opposite to remember when they make the charge so very emphatically: that every pledge given by the Liberal party has been broken; I would like them to remember that they have left a little history behind them on the public records of this country which is liable to criticism. I would ask them to be sure that their own hearth stones are clean before they attack their opponents. There is probably no branch of the Liberal party policy which has been more thoroughly vindicated in the face of the country than that particular branch which is dealt with by this resolution. I would ask the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Borden, Halifax), to consider that when the Liberal party came into power the trade with the mother country had not been increasing. In spite of hard times, in spite of restrictions, in spite of all the trammels which were thrown upon it, our trade with the United States had necessarily and per force increased. As Jos. Howe said years ago: We are and always will be a commercial people, and naturally our trade, when the shackles were thrown off it—with the improvement of trade throughout the world we may grant, and by wise regulation of the tariff of this country—naturally trade began to flow more freely. Trade like everything else runs in the channel of least resistance, and if there was a greater increase of the trade with the United States than with England, does that prove anything against the policy of preferential trade with England. Not at all. But, if there was any increase with England when there was no increase before, and if there is no other cause to attribute it to except the preferential tariff, then I think the logic is very fair that attributes it to that tariff. In adopting this policy the Liberal party were doing exactly what they pledged themselves to do in the platform adopted at the conference held in this city years ago. We notice that while the leader of the opposition referred to that platform, he did not dare to quote a single sentence from it, but talked in glittering generalities about the pledges there given. One of these pledges was that the Liberals would do all in their power to encourage trade with the mother country. Sir, that pledge has been fulfilled, and if that and the other pledges I have referred to have been fulfilled, then what becomes of the oft-repeated challenge of the leader of the opposition to name a single pledge given by the Liberal party which they have not repudiated. But even if it be true—and I do not admit it—that Canada has not prospered to the extent of one cent in consequence of the adoption of this policy I nevertheless maintain that it has been to the advantage to Canada that that policy should be adopted. It was to the advantage of Canada, because it led as nothing before it has ever succeeded in doing, to the removal of the restrictions placed on our trade by the German and Belgian treaties. That of itself was reward sufficient for the adoption of this tariff. But surely it is absurd for gentlemen opposite to argue that this tariff is of no benefit to Canada or to England. The people of Canada are buying goods every day from England, and when they buy these English goods, and pass them through the customs-houses of this country, they pay, in consequence of the preferential rate, less duty than they otherwise would. We do not need to argue the question as to whether the importer or the exporter pays the duty. Some one pays it, and as it is paid at a lower rate, then either the exporter or the importer must in the first instance get the benefit. It will puzzle the hon. gentleman's ingenuity to go to the dry goods merchants and importers of this country, who are daily entering goods at our customs-houses, and getting the benefit of this 25 per cent reduction, and convince them that they are not profiting by that fact. It will also puzzle him to convince the people who go to these merchants and buy these goods at a reduced price in consequence of this tariff, that it is of no benefit to this country. Therefore, I say that by adopting this resolution we are affirming a principle which has found an echo in the hearts of the people of Canada and in the hearts of the people of the mother country, which has done much to increase the good feeling in this country, which has done much to encourage trade, which has done much to place Canada in a proper position as a part of the empire; and I think it is only proper that this parliament should clearly and emphatically give such a declaration of opinion on this question, as is involved in the resolution moved by the hon. member for Halifax.

Mr. A. H. MOORE (Stanstead). Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to occupy more than a very few moments in the consideration of the important question which has been submitted to this House by the hon. member for the city of Halifax (Mr. Russell). I have listened with a great deal of interest to the speeches which have been made on that side of the House, and I have to come to the conclusion that the hon. member for Halifax has presented the strongest argument which has been yet advanced from that side in favour of the resolution. It was a well-wordsed, academical discussion of the question; but, while I admired his style and his easy flow of language, I must confess that I was very much surprised at the great gap there was between his statements and the facts as we on this side of the House understand them. He told us that the country had made great strides under the Liberal administration, and was in a most prosperous condition, and he attributed that prosperity to the government's modification and reduction in the tariff. When we look at the accounts that have been submitted to this House, we find that the modification and reduction in the tariff to which he attributes the great prosperity of the country amounts to just 71-100 of 1 per cent. Dog fanciers tell us that they cut off the end of a dog's tail in order to strengthen his back; so that when the government cut off just 71-100 of 1 per cent from the tariff, we cannot feel that they have very materially weakened the protective feature of the tariff which they so strongly condemned. We think that had just about as much to do with the prosperity of this country as the Premier had in bringing snow to Sherbrooke. When he and his colleagues went to Sherbrooke to influence the electors there to vote in favour of the party he represented, there happened to come on a snowstorm. There had been so little snow that the lumbermen throughout the country had been complaining bitterly; and the right hon. gentleman is reported to have said that he had brought snow to Sherbrooke. It has been blowing, snowing and freezing ever since, and I am told that there is five feet of snow on the level, and that it was still snowing up to a few days ago; so that if he is to be credited with having brought snow to the lumbermen in the beginning, he should be charged with the damage the excessive snow is doing to business in all that part of the country. It reminds me of a man who was a cripple with a very short leg. An itinerant Christian Scientist who was travelling through the country told him that if he became a convert to his doctrine, he would cause his leg to grow. The man made an arrangement with the Christian Scientist, but he said, 'You are not going to be here.' 'No,' the Christian Scientist said, 'but one of our principles is that we can give absent treatment.' This was done, and the leg began to grow, and it continued to grow out until it got to be as long as the other leg; but the Christian Scientist was not there to stop it growing, and for all we know it is growing yet.

The hon. gentleman attributed the great prosperity of the country to the reductions which the government have made in the tariff, amounting to 71-100 of 1 per cent, something very infinitesimal. I think we could point to something that has had more effect in producing the prosperity which enabled the representative of our noble Queen in this country to congratulate the people upon the prosperity which we enjoy at the present time. It was, Sir, in consequence of the national policy, that policy which gave to the producers of Canada the control of the Canadian market. The carrying out of that policy by the present government in almost all its details has been the cause of the great prosperity about which we are congratulating ourselves at the present time, and not the reduction of 71-100 of 1 per cent in the tariff. The hon. gentleman told us that the government had made a momentous departure in the general policy of the country, and that is the extent of their momentous departure from the general policy which had been carried on for eighteen years by the Liberal-Conservative party.

In the next place, he told us that they were pledged to a certain line of policy. We admit that is the case, that the Liberal party through their leaders, previous to the elections of 1896, were pledged to a certain line of procedure. What was that line of procedure? They were to reduce the number of ministers; have they done that?

I think their record show that there are more ministers now in the cabinet than we ever had under a Liberal-Conservative administration.

One of the planks of their platform was their pledge not to pay out any of the people's money without the authority of the people's representatives. But have not millions of dollars been paid out and contracts let and obligations entered into by this government without first getting the authorization of parliament?

Did they not promise not to infringe upon the independence of parliament? Did not the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) condemn the principle of appointing members of this House to offices of emolument under the Crown? But let me call attention to what these hon. gentlemen have done. They appointed Mr. Bechard, a member of this House, to the Senate. They appointed Mr. King, member for Sunbury and Queens, N.B., to a senatorship. They made Mr. Forbes, member for Shelburne and Queen's, a judge. They appointed Mr. Devlin, member for Wright County, to an immigration agency. They appointed Mr. Lavergne, member for Drummond and Arthabaska, and Mr. Langelier, member for Quebec, to judgeships. They gave Mr. Fiset, member for Kamouraska, a senatorship, and they appointed Mr. M. C. Cameron, member for West Huron, to a lieutenant-governorship. They raised Mr. Lister, member for Lambton, to the bench, and also Mr. Choquette, member for Montmagny. They gave Mr. Yeo, member for Prince Edward Island, a senatorship, and Mr. Rinfret, member for Lotbinière, an inland revenue inspectorship, and Mr. Beausoleil, member for Berthier, they made postmaster of the city of Montreal. There we have thirteen instances in which these gentlemen violated the Independence of Parliament Act as they understood it when in opposition.

Another pledge of these hon. gentlemen was to raise the standard high of political morality in this country. But, if we read the record of the investigations before the courts in Ontario and other portions of this country, we cannot fail coming to the conclusion that there never has been disclosed in any civilized country more reckless and corrupt acts than have been brought to light in these investigations, committed by the government and its supporters.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). What about South Ontario? What about Mr. Smith?

Mr. MOORE. What about Huron and Brockville? Tell us something about these elections. Let us get at the facts. Do not obstruct us in bringing to light what has been done in these counties and concerning which this government is preventing an investigation.

These hon. gentlemen pledged themselves to bring in a prohibitory liquor law. They posed as temperance men when in opposition, and they told the people that the old Tory party would never give prohibition. They made the churches and temperance organizations throughout Canada believe that the only possibility of getting prohibition lay in turning the Tories out and putting the Liberals in. They promised prohibition, and the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) said that the Liberal party could be trusted to carry out their promises. The right hon. the leader of the government said his party would carry out its promises even if that should lose power to it for ever. Well, Mr. Speaker, have they given us a prohibitory liquor law? If not, they have not carried out the promise they made the people, in spite of the fact that the majority of the people declared themselves strongly in favour of such a measure.

In the next place, they promised to reduce expenditure. They complained that $38,000,000 was a monstrous expenditure. But what have they done? They have increased that expenditure by over $8,000,000 a year. They told us that they would reduce the public debt, but instead they have increased it over $6,000,000 a year. They told us that the country was groaning under the burden of taxation and that if returned to power, they would relieve the people of a considerable portion of the burden. Well, they have increased the burden by over $3,000,000 a year.

The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) told us that this government have carried out every promise they made with regard to the fiscal policy of this country. He said that the government had never advocated free trade, or free trade as it is in England. He said:

The charge against the present government, so far as it related to this question, is in substance that they promised the country free trade, and have, on the contrary, adhered to the fiscal policy of their predecessors.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am glad to hear hon. gentlemen opposite say 'hear, hear.' It shows that there can be no difference between us on that point. Now, Sir, I absolutely and emphatically deny both branches of the charge.

The hon. gentleman there denied that the policy of the Liberal party was free trade. He further stated that the policy of the leaders of the Liberal party during the campaign was precisely that which they carried into effect when they got hold of the reins of power. Let me read a few extracts to show what the leaders of the party did promise previous to the elections. On the question of discrimination against Great Britain, the right hon. First Minister made in Boston this statement :

The proposition which we make involves the position that we would offer to the American people that which is denied to the rest of the world. In so doing, I do not forget that I am a subject of the British Crown.

Mr. Edgar said :

It is hopeless to expect reciprocity with the United States which will not involve discrimination against Great Britain.

Sir Richard Cartwright declared :

If it does discriminate against Great Britain, we have a right to. We owe Great Britain nothing but charity for her atrocious blundering against our interests. There never was a time that Canada could not have bettered her position by joining the United States.

I defy any hon. gentleman opposite to quote any such expression of disloyalty uttered by any hon. member on this side during the last twenty-five years. If any hon. gentleman on this side should give utterance to any such sentiment, the cry of disloyalty would go up all over this country, and yet, such disloyalty was given expression to by one of the most prominent members of the present administration.

The Toronto Globe of February 4th. 1891, declared :

If free trade with the United States will be good for us, let us vote for it, though it should involve discrimination against Great Britain twice over.

The right hon. First Minister, then Mr. Laurier, said at Montreal :

Upon that question, I need not tell you that we stand at the very antipodes of the Conservative party. The Conservative party believe in protection. All their hope is in protection. The Liberal party believe in free trade on broad lines such as exist in Great Britain, and their immediate object is a revenue tariff—a tariff to be derived from customs, but which will levy no duties except for the purposes of revenue.

Gentlemen, the only way in which Quebec can recover its old-time prosperity as a maritime city is by adopting the policy of freedom of trade as it is in the mother country, old England.

Is not that free trade as it is in England that the hon. gentleman from Halifax disputed so strongly, declaring that no gentleman on that side had advocated free trade as it is in England, or free trade, pure and simple? Again, Sir Richard Cartwright declared :

Our policy, from first to last, has been to destroy this villainous protective system by free trade, a revenue tariff or continental free trade. Sir Richard Cartwright stated at Pembroke:

Mr. MOORE.

A small ring and clique of combiners and protected manufacturers, who, as I have told you, have been permitted for years past to make a prey and plunder of the people of Canada.

I would like to ask hon. gentlemen opposite, if there has ever been a time in the history of Canada, and in the record of the two parties, when the people of this country suffered so much through the burdens of combinesters and trusts, as they do to-day? I remember when the government first came into power, and submitted their reform tariff, they exulted over a very ingenious device, which they had, to prevent combines being formed in Canada. This was the clause which appears as section 18 of the Act to consolidate and amend the Acts relating to duties of customs :

Whenever the Governor in Council has reason to believe that with regard to any article of commerce there exists any trust, combination, association or agreement of any kind among manufacturers of such article or dealers therein, to unduly enhance the price of such article, or in any other way to unduly promote the advantage of the manufacturers or dealers at the expense of the consumers, the Governor in Council may commission or empower any judge of the Supreme Court or Exchequer Court of Canada to inquire in a summary way into and report to the Governor in Council whether such trust, combination, association or agreement exists.

And, in case they found out that these existed, they took power to reduce the duty or abolish it altogether. But, can any hon. gentleman point out to me, one single instance where this government has put in force the power given by this parliament. Look at the combinations under which the people of this country are suffering. Take the case of coal oil. One of the principles of hon. gentlemen opposite, as enunciated in 1893, was that they would lightly tax the necessaries of life. This is one of the necessaries of life, something needed in almost every household in this country, and, especially among the farmers and poorer classes, who cannot afford the luxury of gas, and electric light, or are not in a position to have them, but must depend on coal oil. Here is a government that has pronounced protection, that denounced a high tariff upon imported goods, taking to-day two hundred per cent upon an article of household necessity of the people of this country. I would like to know how they can reconcile this with their promises. They were cautioned year after year, with regard to this great Standard Oil Trust encroaching upon Canada. They were told that its greedy eyes were turned upon Canada, and that it designed to get control of the coal oil industry in this country. And, what has that company done? They own every refinery in Canada. They bought nine refineries and tore down all but two of them. They have perfect control of the coal oil industry of Canada. And, what is the result? I have affidavits from many individuals to tell us what the result is. Coal oil has advanced 7 cents a gallon, and as the people of Canada consume some twenty millions of gallons a year, that increase amounts to over a million dollars a year, taken out of the pockets of the farmers, of the labouring men, and the artisans of this country, for the benefit of the Standard Oil trust, a foreign company which has so enhanced the price as to take out of the pockets of the farmers and poor men of this country more than a million dollars a year and put them in the pockets of combiners and millionaires in the United States. Yet, though the people are thus unjustly deprived of $1,200,000 a year, the government has not lifted its finger to put into force this Act, that they bragged over so much, as being so ingenious, and so perfect a means of preventing the formation of combinations in this country. I have had in my possession, petitions from Hamilton to Prince Edward Island, from thousands and thousands of people, asking this government to interfere to stop the discrimination of rates on the railways in regard to this matter, to break up these trusts, to abolish the duty upon coal oil, in order that the poor people of this country may buy it at a reasonable price. I am afraid under the ruling, that I shall not be able to reach the notice of motion that I have given on that subject. Therefore, I take this opportunity to say that I have presented these petitions to the government, and I am trying to advocate, as well as I can, such change in the tariff, such changes in regard to the control of rates on railways, and such laws concerning combines, as will make this article cheaper to the poor consumers of Canada.

We have been told that hon. gentlemen opposite were not pledged to free trade in this country, but I think I have quoted enough to prove that free trade as it is in England, or the antipodes of protection, is what the leaders of the party advocated previous to the elections of 1896. Hon. gentlemen will all remember how these old walls rang with denunciations of the protective tariff. Hon. gentlemen opposite brandished their political swords and swore, if they got into power, death to protection. I ask them if they have killed protection? They are practising the policy that we inaugurated and carried out, and have thereby admitted that the success of this country is dependent upon carrying out the policy that they condemned for eighteen long years, when in opposition.

In regard to the preferential tariff, they claim that it is one of the greatest moves ever made in this country. I claim that it is the greatest move ever made in this country, if we wish to kill the industries of the country. It is the most fatal step ever taken, in view of the efforts that had been made by Sir Charles Tupper, Sir Mackenzie Bowell and others to secure preferential trade with England. If we can get preferential trade with England, if we can send the produce of Canada, and receive higher prices than foreign nations receive in that country, it will be the greatest boon ever conferred on a people situated as we are. We have three hundred million square miles of land that never has been scratched by the plough or tickled by the hoe, ready for immigrants from foreign countries. We should look to secure immigrants who will take up our vacant lands to the advantage of the country. Not Doukhobors. We do not want a class of people who could not be permitted to land in the United States—the captain of a vessel who endeavours to land such would be fined and they would be sent back to their own country at his expense. By having a preference trade we can induce the tenant farmers of England to come here; and we could repatriate some of our French Canadians who have gone to the United States, if we would treat them as generously as this government have treated the Doukhobors in the North-west. What would it do? It would people our western lands, it would increase our population, and this population would give customers to the manufacturers and stimulate all the industries of this country. But, Sir, we expected if we got a preference in the British markets for our produce—we would have to reduce the tariff upon our importations. Instead of that, what have the government done? They have given England a preference in our markets by reducing our tariff without asking for any equivalent preference in her markets for our products; therefore, I say that the effect of the preferential tariff has been to prevent us from getting any advantage in the English markets. I can see no way out of this difficulty except to turn the Liberal party out of power and place the Conservative party in power. We know that the Conservative party is pledged to carrying out preferential trade, while the Liberal party have failed to procure for Canada any advantage in return for the preference which they are giving to British manufactures in our markets.

Mr. A. W. PUTTEE (Winnipeg). I do not know for what reason the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) introduced this motion. It is a peculiar motion, both because of the time and the manner of its introduction. If it is to prepare us for some future announcement of an increased preference by 20 or 25 per cent, then, I think we can well afford to spare a little time for its discussion. The leader of the opposition told us a story in which he compared the tariff policies of the two parties to a horse race in which he claimed that one horse was only 71-100ths in the lead of the other horse. I do not think we are going to see any race, and the reason is because there is only one horse. I prefer rather to compare the tariff policies of the two parties to two umbrellas held up over special interests. It must be admitted that there is not a great deal of difference in the size of these umbrellas, but the people who are between them get very wet. Gentlemen on the opposition side of this House go into this debate with a light heart, and they have a right to do so. They believe in protection, they have fought for it, they believe that it is the right thing for this country, and they are taking part in this debate without finding their principles very seriously strained. They tell us that the manufacturer has been considered in adjusting the tariff, and they know how he was considered in the past. But, I am quite willing to take their word for it that the manufacturers do enjoy a great deal of consideration, too much consideration, in fact exclusive consideration, in fixing tariffs in the Dominion of Canada. It is significant, indeed, that the Manufacturers' Association of the city of Toronto, I believe, say that it is unnecessary any longer to pay attention to this matter of protection, because both parties are pledged to it. I think they are right, I think they have no longer any particular need to pay attention to this matter.

But, Sir, if the manufacturers find no reason to pay attention to the tariff, the same cannot be said of the producer and of the worker of this country; these men still need to keep this matter in mind. I propose to examine for a moment only the tariff policy and the immigration policy. I want to see how they work out to the benefit of the worker and producer, and if it is in their interest they have been put upon the statute-books. I suppose I can take it for granted that a protective policy increases the price of an article. That is not usually contradicted. If a man goes and buys an article that is on a protected list, he pays more for it; and if he is a good patriot he will buy the foreign article, because then he will contribute directly to the revenue of his country. But, if he buys the domestic article he still pays the same price for it. If he pays a larger price for it, the purchasing power of his money is reduced by that much. If he cannot purchase so much with his money, it is equivalent to a reduction of his wages. Therefore, he finds that the market where he buys his goods is protected against him. That, at all events, is the way the protective policy works out.

The immigration policy works altogether in a different direction. I think, at all events, that the government can be congratulated on the success of their immigration policy. I do not say that it is a good one, nor that it is the best one, but certainly the government are entitled to credit for the fact that it does bring immigrants into the country. I think the last time an appeal was made to the country, both parties promised a vigorous immigration policy. While the immigration policy of this government has been successful in bringing immigrants in, I think it has worked very much on the same lines as the tariff policy. Let us see how the bonusing of immigrants affects the wage earner and the worker. He has only one thing to sell, that is, his labour. The government bring in large numbers of immigrants and place them at different points. Although the object may be to get them to settle on the land, we know as a fact that we find them in the city, in the labour market, competing against labour. The competition in the labour market means lowering that market. The man who has his labour to sell finds the market not only open, but actually bonused against him. Then, he finds that the market where he buys his necessaries is also protected against him. That is, at all events, one view of the way these two policies work out. I think I am right in saying, as hon. gentlemen on the other side have maintained, that the protective policy is guided by the manufacturers of this country, and I think that the immigration policy is also inspired by other interests than those of the ordinary working people.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) I do not propose to engross the attention of this most interested House for any length of time. In fact, the great feature of this debate has been the intense interest which gentlemen on the government side have manifested in it. It has been stated that this resolution was introduced in order to serve as a subject for discussion, which should inform the general public with reference to the beauties of the tariff policy particularly of this government, which they adopted in 1897-8 and which has been in operation since.

If that was the purpose of the resolution, I must say, that so far as the interest of hon. gentlemen opposite has been shown, it does not seem to have appealed to them as being a very important matter; at least, they have not availed themselves, with a great deal of vigour, or to a large extent, of the opportunity which has been so generously afforded them. One or two things may be said in reference to this resolution. One is the extraordinary character of the resolution and the time at which it was introduced. Here you have the government, which is composed of men, heading a party, who, for the last eighteen years, at least, have been laying down before the country the great lines of policy which they thought to be correct and which they proposed to put into practice when they came into power. They get into power and in the course of a year or so they enact their policy in the shape of law and of statute. It is, after having crystallized the results of eighteen years of party professions into statute and kept that on the statute-book for two years, all the time professing that it was just the thing and the only thing, most surprising that an interruption should be given to the whole course of the government business in order to allow a supporter of the government to introduce a resolution declaring that what the government has done has been the best thing it could have done, and a good thing to have done. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), who introduced the motion, started off with a great assumption of fairness. I wondered at the time he started, if he would evince that sense of fairness which he expressed as being so essential in the early part of his speech, all the way through his address in support of the motion, but I am afraid it cannot be said for the hon. gentleman that his performance practically came up to what was his profession at the beginning of his address. What is it that he particularly asked for? He particularly thought it well that a clear expression of the opinion of the House should be made in reference to the preferential part of the government's policy. Now, does the hon. gentleman propose to get a clear expression of the opinion of the House by, without consultation with the House at all, preparing his view, putting it in the shape of a resolution and launching it at a time and in a place where not an 'I' can be dotted or a 'T' crossed? Does the hon. gentleman think that he gets a clear expression of the opinion of the House by moving a cut-and-dried resolution, which cannot be amended or altered in any way, and which, at the best, can simply express the opinion of the mover and that of those on his own side of the House who believe as he does upon that particular line of policy? If the hon. gentleman had been anxious to have obtained a clear expression of the opinion of the House he would have moved a resolution which could not only have been criticised, but altered, if need be, in order to express the opinion of the House as a whole. That the hon. gentleman entirely avoided. The resolution is peculiar in another sense that it only takes up a part of the government's general tariff policy and declares it to be good and beneficial. The government's policy is not only made up of this preferential feature, but it has also the other features which hon. gentlemen opposite and the government leading them have embalmed in their legislation so far as the tariff is concerned. Why did not the hon. member for Halifax in his resolution, express the same approval of the other part of the government's tariff policy as well? The whole thing seems to have a good deal of this appearance, that, after the government has made its professions of policy, laid down its platform, the policy that it was elected upon, the professions that it has made and then has embalmed this policy in legislation, the government begins to feel a certain qualm of conscience itself as to whether it is right, and it asks its own side of the House, if it cannot get anybody else, to prepare a formal affidavit that what the government has done is good and right and true and the best thing it could have done. The hon. member for Halifax, when he introduced even this portion of his resolution, was brave, almost to the point of hazard and to the point of recklessness, when he dragged into his speech another matter and made an attempt to show the House and the country that the government had been true to their professions they had made in reference to the tariff and to the trade of this country when it was seeking the voice of the electorate. I supposed that the hon. gentleman would have been pleased to put in the shape of a formal resolution his belief that the government had actually performed the promises which it made to the electorate when it was attempting to get into office and get the reins of power. But the hon. gentleman's boldness hardly goes so far as to make a formal assertion that the government had fulfilled its pledges. I am not going to take up the time of the House in order to combat that part of the hon. gentleman's contention. This part of his speech has been dealt with by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and dealt with thoroughly. You cannot point out a reasonable minded, sensible intelligent man in this country, from one end of it to the other, who will venture the assertion that the present government has performed the promises and kept the pledges which it made to the people of the country when it was carrying on its canvass preparatory to the elections of 1896. It is all very well to quote one or two expressions, expressions from Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the leader of the opposition at that time, or from Sir Oliver Mowat, who joined his forces with those of Sir Wilfrid Laurier at that time, to take certain expressions from these two hon. gentlemen and to make them appear as the pledge of the party as a whole and to be bound by them in regard to the trade and tariff policy, but the assertions of the convention of 1893 and the assertions of these leaders of the party, of gentlemen who are now leaders of the government, delivered in many cities and counties, and published in the newspapers, have been heard by the people, and the people know right well, that, not only the distinct promises, but the whole trend of the argument and of the persuasion of these gentlemen, have been violated entirely by the performances they have made in reference to these things since they came into office. There is not a minister who sits on the Treasury benches, and they are not often found sitting on the Treasury benches, even while this most important discussion is going on—there is not a single one of them who does not know that he made promises to the electors which he and his colleagues have violated by non-performance since they became ministers and have been carrying on the government of the country. What passes belief, what passes the bounds of human credulity is that these hon. gentlemen can rise in their places, before the people who have heard them speaking upon these lines, that I have been speaking about, and declare, with set faces, that they have carried out all the promises that they have made to the electors. The Minister of Customs, speaking at Winnipeg, declared that the government had fulfilled every promise they had made, with the exception of one, and that was the reformation of the Senate, and they proposed to carry that out. The Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) made the same assertion only a few weeks ago at Owen Sound, and, as reported in the Toronto Globe, he went over one by one the promises that had been made, and declared that every one of them had been fulfilled. Now, it is no use arguing with hon. gentlemen in this way. There have been the years of their assertions, and here is the modicum of the professions that they have accomplished, and the two records are before the intelligent people of Canada, and the intelligent people of Canada know that these gentlemen have not kept the promises that they have made. Take this one subject referred to in this resolution now before the House. Why did the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) deem it well to ignore one of the definite promises which was made upon this subject by the Prime Minister? What was that promise? At the risk of re-reading what has been read again and again, let me draw the attention of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) to that one definite plain promise which was made by his leader, whom he has lauded so much as keeping all his promises. When the election campaign was on, and this question of preferential trade—not the preferential trade which is spoken of in this resolution; not the preferential trade which is claimed to be in the legislation that the government have put upon the statute-book, but a preferential trade which was mutual in its character—when that was brought before the people of this country by many an advocate, prominently by Sir Charles Tupper, and then taken up by the leader of the then opposition, Mr. Wilfrid Laurier; what was the preferential basis which he discussed at that time? Let us deal honestly with each other. Was it a one-sided preference? There is not a gentleman in this House who will rise and say it was. The preference that Sir Charles Tupper advocated was a mutual preference. The preference that Sir Wilfrid Laurier, then in opposition, advocated and pledged himself on, was also a mutual preference. There is no doubt about that. Has the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) any doubt about it? If he has, let me read what Mr. Laurier himself said in London, Ont. He took up that canvass of Sir Charles Tupper's with reference to the preference, and as an offset to it, he said:

But I want to point out to you, my fellow-countrymen, upon this occasion, that in addition to the many reasons which we had up to the present time, there is now another reason which must strongly appeal to the sense of the Canadian people at large: preferential trade. That is a new idea of having within the British Empire preferential trade with all parts of that empire. Goods of English make would be admitted free to this country, and our goods would be admitted free to England as they are now, but in addition to that we would have for our goods a preference which would not be given to the goods of another nation.

Now, that would mean that we were to have a preference on the ground of free trade for free trade, or a preference on the ground of reduced tariff for reduced tariff, or either of these. That was the idea of Mr. Wilfrid Laurier then. His idea was that the preference was to be mutual and not one-sided. There is no doubt in the world that that is what he was speaking about then. He goes on to say:

Now, the statesmen of Great Britain—

Aha! not simply unimportant persons.

Now, the statesmen of Great Britain have thought that the governments of the colonies have come to a time when a new step can be taken in their development. What is it? That there should be a commercial agreement between England and the colonies. That practical statesman—

You see the term that is applied here.

That practical statesman, Mr. Joseph Chamberlain has come to the conclusion that the time has come when it is possible to have within the bounds of the empire a new step taken which would give to the colonies in England a preference for their products over the products of other nations.

That is not the windy argument of some enthusiast; that is the idea of a practical statesman, Mr. Laurier says. That is not a one-sided preference. It is to be a preference in which the colonies would have a preference for their products over the products of other nations.

What would be the possibilities of such a step if it were taken. We sell our goods in England, we send our wheat, our butter, our cheese, all our natural products, but there we have to compete with similar products from the United States, from Russia, and from other nations. Just see what a great advantage it would be to England if the wheat, the cheese and butter which we would send to England should be met in England with a preference over similar products of other nations. The possibilities are immense.

Who denies that Mr. Laurier said that in London, Ont. If the English language can speak plainly there is no doubt about the kind of preference he meant. That was the idea of Mr. Laurier at that time. When? When he was trying to get himself and his party into power, and making his pledges as a leader in this country. He goes on:

Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, the new and progressive Secretary for the Colonies, has declared that the time has come when it is possible to discuss that question.

So said Sir Charles Tupper.

But, Sir, if England is going to give us that preference—

Now comes in the argument—

—England will expect something from us in return.

What is the idea there? Does not he make it as clear as man can that there is to be a preference in one case and a return for that preference in the other. We are not quibbling now on words. We are taking just the plain sense of the English language spoken by a sane man, spoken by the leader of a party, when he was endeavouring to gather the people of this country to him, and to put his party in power on broad lines of policy. He continues:

England would expect that we would come as closely to her own system of free trade as it is possible for us to come. England does not expect that we should take her own system of free trade such as she has it; but I lay it before you that the thing the English people would expect in return is that, instead of a principle of protection, we should adopt the revenue form of tariff, pure and simple. These are the conditions on which we can have that boon.

So, Mr. Laurier, if not going so far as absolute free trade, was certainly advocating nothing less than a revenue tariff. Granted that he was not arguing for a free trade tariff pure and simple. He says he was not. The hon. member for Halifax says he was not—that it never was promised. You could point out sentence after sentence in Mr. Laurier's own speeches made then, in which he told the people that what he was going for was free trade as it was in England. But, give him the benefit of that doubt, and it will take even more assurance than that of the member for Halifax to arise in this House and state, what would be the greatest slander on honest men that ever could be stated, that his party leaders at that time advocated anything less than a revenue tariff. They stood against the iniquity of protection in principle and practice. To say the least, they stood for a tariff based on revenue alone, and that is the point of Mr. Laurier's then appeal to the electorate of this country; we shall be in a better position to get that preference in the British market—why? Because we are the men who advocate a revenue tariff, and England will expect that although we do not go the whole length of free trade, we shall go as closely as possible to a tariff for revenue purposes only. Therefore, he says, put me and my party in power, because we base our action in trade matters on a revenue tariff; that is the leverage with which we shall go to England, to get what the practical statesman, Joseph Chamberlain says is now ready for discussion, between the British government and this government. And what else did he say, at the end of that statement, as plainly as a man could make it? Where the preference is a mutual preference, there are better chances of its being got by a revenue tariff party, than by a protective tariff party. Mr. Laurier stood before the people of London, and the people of this country, and said: If you put us in power, I promise you that one of the first acts of the government will be to send delegates or commissioners to England to take this matter up with the British government. Now, is that denied? Let us be honest with each other; have I been right in my statement of these facts? Does anyone in this House deny them? If he does, let him deny them now. Was the promise made? If it was not, let us be honest with each other and say that it was not. Was it made on that basis and under those circumstances? Come, now, did Mr. Laurier ever send a commission to England to enter into communication with, or to sit down and talk over the matter with the commissioners of the British government? That is a question of historical fact. I put it to the member for Halifax: can he cite any fact of history in corroboration to show that Mr. Laurier whilst making this promise—did propose a commission to Great Britain to talk over this matter, and endeavour to gain that boon which he pledged himself before he got into power, to endeavour to gain? That is a matter of pure fact or otherwise. Where is the right of it? Am I right in my statement of it, or have I been misled, or am I stating a myth? Therefore, I say to the member for Halifax, that he would have been more discreet and more honest, if I may use that expression, if he had cleared up that difficulty, or else if he had not gone the length of declaring that they had performed every promise which they had made. There is no excuse for leaving out an important matter like that, because the hon. gentleman was dealing entirely with the preferential side of this business in his resolution. Does he deal with the question without being master of the facts? Does he consider that it is the right and reasonable thing to do, having become master of the facts, to leave out the principle fact, when he is endeavouring to put in a reasonable and proper way a theme before any audience at all? Does he conduct his lectures in Dalhousie College on that principle? Is he a descendent and disciple of Plato, and all the philosophers of light and reason, from that time down to this, who will make himself a complete master of all the facts when he sets out to form the opinions of those to whom he lectures, and, then leave out the main fact, which, if it were known, would make his position entirely untenable, and make it the exact opposite of what he is endeavouring to hold? Surely my hon. friend must be constituted somewhat wrongly, or he would not have approached this subject in the way he has, in the light of his great desire that there should be a clear expression of the opinion of this House, on the question of preferential trade. So much for that. Have the promises been fulfilled? Why, it is all a matter of history. Mr. Wilfrid Laurier not only did not attempt to fulfil his promise, not only did not appoint commissioners, but, Sir, the first thing he did when he landed on English soil, was to cut out one-half of the whole statement that he had made to the electorate beforehand—to blot out entirely one-half of the mutual preference, and right there and then to forestall the whole question before he sat down with Mr. Chamberlain or any other member of the British government. He simply said, I will have none of the mutual preference; I will simply give to you something, and I will counsel you not to give anything in return, which would destroy the fabric of free trade on which you have built your greatness, and to which I am so passionately devoted. Passionately devoted?—and yet in his own tariff, which he brought down to this House, and put through this House, and which he maintains in the country, is as far removed from the policy of free trade which he counselled Great Britain always to retain, as the policy to which he declared his undying aversion, because it was the bane and curse of any country into which it was introduced; and that pet aversion of his he keeps in the statutes, and operative in this country. What are you going to do with a man, or a set of men who, in the light of these facts, calmly stand up and say by their solemn affidavit, a resolution?—Well, no; the member for Halifax was not quite brave enough to put that into his resolution; but he, as well as every member on the opposite side, who has spoken, have declared that every pledge given by the leader of the government and the Liberal party has been carried out.

What a wide divergence of opinion there is between some of these hon. gentlemen. The Minister of Customs, in his western speeches, declared that you could not bind the party by the utterances of this man and that man and the other, but you must go to the convention utterances of 1893. The member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), not having the fear of the Minister of Customs before his eyes, or of the Postmaster General and various others who made the same assertion, declared that the party was bound, not only by its convention utterances of 1893, but by its leader's utterances, and he would bind it by the utterances of its two leaders, Sir Oliver Mowat and Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Those are the two whom he quoted, and it was from the utterances of these two gentlemen that he endeavoured to establish the first part of his thesis, namely, that what had been pledged had been carried out in the performance. But, while, as every body knows, the hon. member for Halifax is nearer right than the other gentlemen, these other gentlemen, even though they confine themselves to the 1893 platform, cannot find that the party pledges have yet been carried out. Everybody knows that a party is bound, not only by its convention platform, but by the declarations of its acknowledged leaders. And it is impossible, as the hon. member for Halifax has said, to sever the party responsibility from the utterances of the acknowledged leaders of that party. And what Mr. Wilfrid Laurier, as leader of the opposition, pledged himself to in the name of the party, is a pledge the party cannot repudiate. They may repudiate a pledge made by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), who is one of those rather irresponsible men that they talk about, but it is impossible for them to do so with the leader of their party, and with what you may call the strong foremost men of their party, who go out and speak in the name of the party, and, consequently, make the party responsible for their promises.

Now, will the hon. member for Halifax say to-night, or at any time, that the leader of the government did not promise that coal and iron should be free in the tariff which he and his party would make? That is a matter of history which cannot be denied. No man would have the hardihood to get up and deny it. Those were not two unimportant items. They typified a great principle, as well as being most important items themselves, and the right hon. gentleman's deliberate promise was that when his party came into power these raw materials, as well as cotton and wool, would be free. Are they free to-day? If they are not free, and if the promise was made that they would be free, has that promise been fulfilled? There is no use pursuing this further, but you can pursue it through the whole list.

Who does not know that every single-minded, honest, confiding man in this country, who listened to Mr. Wilfrid Laurier and the leaders beside him, believed that if that party got into power there would be no undermining business going on with reference to members supporting the government for offices in the gift of the government. But has it not been going on? Have not men been bought and sold, to use the choice vocabulary of these same gentlemen when they sat on this side, and offices were bestowed on the other? There is no use taking up the time of the House going through the whole list, but why cannot we be honest to each other and admit these facts which are patent as the light of day? Why is it we found resolutions on statements that facts never existed which everybody knows have existed and do exist?

It was only the last five minutes of the hon. gentleman's speech that had anything to do at all with the subject of his resolution. Will the House attend to the peculiar method of reasoning which the hon. member for Halifax used? Now, the hon. gentleman is an educated man, he is a thinker, he bears the lofty impress of a thinker on his brow; meet him any where, in the busy mart, on the street, in the philosopher's grove, you would pick him out in an instant as a thoughtful reasoning man. The old flavour of the groves of Greece clings around him, the atmosphere in which he has been brought up, which is natural to him, in student's halls, in university halls—all stamp him as a man who loves reason for its own sake and who would not for the world violate a canon of logic in the presentation of his case. But how does the hon. gentleman prove his thesis. By as complete a non sequitur as ever was invented. Here is his reasoning. Why should I say, he asks :

That this House regards the principles of British preference in the Canadian customs tariff as one which in its application has already resulted, and will, in an increasing measure, continue to result in material benefit to the mother country and to Canada, and which has already aided in welding, and must still more firmly weld together the ties which now bind them, and desires to express its emphatic approval of such British preference having been granted by the parliament of Canada.

How, says the hon. gentleman, shall I prove that by unanswerable logic? This is how I will do it. I will take the trade statistics, and I will make this statement, that in 1897 we imported dutiable goods from Great Britain to the value of 20½ million dollars. I will add to that the statement that in 1898 we imported 22½ million dollars worth, and in 1899, 27½ million dollars worth. And now I will draw my conclusion. There are two importations, and making the mathematical calculation. I find that 1899 shows 22½ of an increase over 1898. Having made that calculation, I now draw the irrefragable conclusion. What is it? It is that the preferential clause in the enactment of the government has been the reason and the cause of this increase of 22 per cent in the importations from England. But, is it not a rule of logic that you must prove that a thing could not have been caused by anything else in order to establish satisfactorily that it has been caused by the one thing which you maintain did cause it? The hon. gentleman's rule is exactly the reverse. Let us apply that rule in a little wider field. I will read a set of figures. I will say to the hon. gentlemen that in 1897 we imported of dutiable goods from Germany five and one-third millions, that in 1898 we imported five and one-third millions, and in 1899 we imported six and two-thirds millions. Now, make the mathematical calculation that there is an increase of 24 per cent in the imports from Germany in 1899 over the imports from the same country in 1898, and I draw the conclusion, which everybody must agree with, who agrees with the hon. gentleman that it is the preferential clause with reference to Great Britain that has caused that increase of 24 per cent. Is not my reasoning as good reasoning as that of the hon. member from Halifax? It is exactly the same. Now, if hon. members will read the speech of the hon. gentleman from Halifax, he will find that that is the only thing on which he bases the statements made in that resolution of his. Why, there is no use in carrying this any further. I am led again to ask myself: Does the hon. gentleman treat his classes in the university in that way? Surely, Dalhousie authorities ought to look into this matter. I think it will become necessary for me to send a marked copy of the hon. gentleman's peculiar reasoning and logic upon this matter to the authorities of Dalhousie, in order that if such methods are put in practice there, they may be as speedily as possible eliminated from that noble institution of learning.

Now, I am not going to keep the attention of this House any longer. I am not going into the general discussion. I have tried to elucidate the two points, and I think I have done it satisfactorily. Whether I have convinced everybody or not, I think I have at least placed the facts properly before the House. If the hon. gentleman started out with the idea of getting a clear expression of the opinion of this House by moving a motion in amendment to supply, he took the wrong way to accomplish his object. It is impossible that there should be an alteration in this resolution. There may be something in it that we would agree with; there may be a good deal in it that we would not agree with. It is impossible for me and other hon. gentlemen on this side to vote for that resolution. And they do not propose to vote for it; they propose to vote against it. They have to vote for it or against it, and they propose to vote against it. But in their own time they propose to place before this House their views with reference to this policy. Those views they propose to present in a notice of motion which I will read in order that it may go on record side by side with the amendment on which we are called to vote:

That this House is of opinion that a system of mutual trade preference between Great Britain and Ireland and the colonies would greatly stimulate increased production in and commerce between these countries, and would thus promote and maintain the unity of the empire, and that nothing which falls short of the complete realization of such a policy should be considered as final or satisfactory.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). This debate has already taken a very wide range, the range that is usually taken in the course of a budget debate. Indeed, so much the character of a budget debate has this one taken that one wonders where the material is to be found for an extended budget debate at a later stage. I do not intend, especially at this late hour, to follow any of the hon. gentlemen over the wide field that they have covered. I desire to confine the very few observations I shall make on behalf of the government to the particular question that has been brought to the notice of the House by the amendment of my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Russell).

I regret that hon. gentlemen opposite have found occasion to take exception to that motion, because I think it is a motion that should have commended itself to their judgment and enlisted their support. I think there was strong reason why such a motion should be made. The question of preferential trade is one of the utmost importance in the affairs of Canada to-day. It is a question of the utmost importance as part of the present fiscal policy of Canada; and it is eminently proper that the positions of the two political parties on that question should be fairly defined. Has it been defined in recent years? I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the House, and to the public, that the position of the Conservative party on that question has not been defined, but that there was a studied attempt to avoid placing on record the position which they occupied on that great question. What have we been told by one hon. gentleman on the other side? He said that when the preferential tariff was brought down, it was a most fatal step to the interest of Canada. What will the people of Canada think when I remind them of the fact that, from the moment that tariff was brought down, down to this hour, no hon. member on the other side has dared to challenge a division on that subject? Hon. gentlemen opposite have not hesitated to challenge divisions on questions of comparatively little importance; but here we have an acknowledgment from a prominent gentleman on the other side, that they regarded this question as of great importance, as one in which the government had taken a fatal step: and here we are to-day, three years after that step was taken, and, down to this moment, there is no record on the journals of this House to show where hon. gentlemen opposite stand upon it.

True, we have occasionally heard from them on the subject. We have heard their leaders indicate in one way or another that they were opposed to the preferential tariff, but when they avoided placing their position on record in this House, their purpose was clear enough. They desired to be in a position to attack the preferential tariff in some places where they thought that could be done with safety, and, at the same time, they wished to be able to point to the fact that, after all, they had never opposed this tariff. I think that upon a question of such vast importance, it was right and proper that the Conservative party as well as the Liberal party should be called upon to define its position. And it will stand on record and be well understood that these gentlemen have been playing fast and loose on this question, that they have been shrinking from the issue, and that they only face it now when they have been brought up to the ring-bolt by the motion of my hon. friend (Mr. Russell).

We have had two kinds of preferential trade advocated in this country. One is the kind of preferential trade which the government has put in operation; the other is the kind of preferential trade that my hon. friends opposite talked about for many years, and which we now find they are ready to talk about again, but concerning which they never made the slightest progress toward anything tangible or practically beneficial to the people of Canada. But these hon. gentlemen ask my hon. friend from Halifax why, in moving an amendment to supply, he did not propose a motion asking the House to support and approve the whole policy of the government. Because, Sir, we recognize that on general questions of policy, even on some phases of the tariff question, there is ground for reasonable difference of opinion; and, if my hon. friend had brought into the House a motion approving of the policy of the government generally, or even of the tariff policy generally, then a way out would have been afforded to hon. gentlemen opposite. But the hon. member for Halifax did a better thing. He confined himself strictly to the question of the British preference. He did not even raise the question of the portion of preference, whether it should be 5, 10, 15, 20 or 25 per cent. His motion simply declares that the preferential feature, the giving of an advantage in our markets to the products of the mother country over the products of foreigners, should be approved of by this House. And now, after the lapse of three years, after their playing fast and loose with the question, we have hon. gentlemen, not very cheerfully and not very pleasantly, I must say, declaring that they are going to face the music, and that at last we shall know where they stand. They are going to declare, as they have done in their speeches to-night, they are going to declare by their votes against this resolution, that if they had been in power in the year 1897 they would not have given England a preference in trade. They are going to declare that if perchance they should be brought back to power at the next general elections they will repeal the preferential tariff, and they will deprive the empire of the splendid achievement which Canada and the Liberal party in Canada have given to it in relation to preferential trade. They are going to go back now to the old ground on which they stood for so many years.

Sir, what was ever accomplished on the old ground which they took up? Those who were members of this House long before I came to it, and those who followed the discussions, know that year by year motions were made in this House, speeches were made in this House, and conferences were held, and everything of the sort, but what came of all these movements for preferential trade? Down to the moment when this government came into power, no substantial step had ever been taken in the direction of preferential trade. At every move they made they found themselves confronted with the German and Belgian treaties, and that seemed to be a sufficient answer to every request they made. The Belgian and German treaties had to be got out of the way. Sir, they would never have been got out of the way in a thousand years if hon. gentlemen had continued their policy. It was only when the question was approached in another way that the British public appreciated the position of Canada on this question and were willing to remove those hitherto insuperable obstacles to the liberty of Great Britain and the colonies dealing among themselves. What were the Belgian and German treaties? They contained provisions that Canada or any other colony should not be at liberty to admit the products of Great Britain on better terms than the products of Belgium and of Germany; and if the colonies were to admit them on special terms, then the goods of Belgium and the goods of Germany had to be admitted on even terms with those of Great Britain, and then it followed that under the favoured-nation treaties many other nations also would be admitted to the same privilege. It was indeed a serious obstacle to preferential trade.

But the point I desire to make is that so long as the hon. gentleman attached impossible conditions to the demand for preferential trade, so long they made no progress. They did attach an impossible condition. I do not say it will for ever be an impossible condition, but I say that in the years when they demanded that Great Britain should, for the sake of Canada and the other colonies, impose a tax upon the breadstuffs of foreign countries, it was something that at that time, and in later years, and at this time still, could not and cannot be granted by the British people. Those who have given attention to the long struggle for the abolition of the corn laws know well how the people of England feel on that question. There are those who have stated in this House, some hon. gentlemen have said in this debate, that they do not believe that England will ever change ground on that question. I have never gone so far. I have again and again declared that it was quite possible that a change might be brought about in British public opinion on that question. But I have said before, and I repeat it now, that if that change is ever brought about, if the British people should become willing to put aside the strong views which they hold on that question and tax food, if they shall be found willing to accord a preference by taxing the goods of foreign countries, while still admitting the goods of Canada free, that result will never be achieved by a huckstering policy. It will only be achieved by the generous policy which this government has adopted, it will only be achieved by getting the British people to grant us that privilege not as a matter of bargain, but as one result of that splendid Imperial spirit which is to-day swelling over the British empire. That is the point wherein we differ from hon. gentlemen opposite. They fall back upon the old ground: You must get something for something; you must give no concession to Great Britain unless she will give you something in return. What if she has opened her ports to you for generations? What if she has expended blood and treasure for the defense of her colonies all over the world? We are to deal with her in the same spirit as we would with a foreign nation, we are to drive a hard bargain, and say that unless she will give us this great concession we on our side will do nothing. Sir, we submit that is not the right spirit in which to deal with our English brethren at home. We submit that we have the evidence before us now, evidence that ought to be satisfactory to every reasonable man, that the step that we have taken, while it has not brought about that preference by the statutes of Great Britain, while we have not got the preference by law that the hon. gentleman demanded, we have a voluntary preference in the hearts of the British people to-day which is of substantial value.

But, hon gentlemen say, What have you accomplished by it. Why, Sir, we were told by the leader of the opposition in several public speeches that there had been no increase of trade between Great Britain and Canada. That statement was made in public speeches as reported in one of the papers, particularly with regard to imports; I am not sure that the hon. gentleman's statement went beyond that. Well, Sir, the public records show that there has been an increase, the public records show that the imports from Great Britain under the national policy, in the last four or five years, dropped from about $43,000,000 down to $29,000,000; and the same records show that from the year 1897, when this tariff was passed, down to the present moment, these imports have increased from 29 million dollars to 37 million dollars. The leader of the opposition said, and the member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) tried to emphasize the same point to-night: There has been a general expansion of trade, and therefore the growth of this British trade to which we on this side refer is merely a part of the general expansion of trade. Turn back to the records and you will find that there was an expansion of trade in the last two or three years of the late government. The imports of the country increased in those years by several millions, but there was no corresponding advance in the imports from England. On the contrary, those imports fell off, and therefore, the very principle that hon. gentlemen cite is against their contention.

I do not wish to go into the matter at a great length, but I cannot avoid calling attention to the fact that the preferential trade that hon. gentlemen opposite talk about is in one sense even to-day a myth. The time may come when it may be possible, but I do say that no statesman of the first rank in the mother country has placed himself on record in recent years as being willing to grant that preferential trade. There are some people in England, enthusiasts in this matter, men whose Imperial spirit overrides considerations of political economy, who take another view. I am far from saying anything against them. It would be a good thing indeed if we could obtain that preferential trade which the hon. gentlemen talk about. But the great difference between us is this, that that which they talk about is not practical. I repeat the statement that no public man of the first rank in Great Britain has said that that can be done. Frequent references have been made to the Hon. Mr. Chamberlain. Hon. gentlemen opposite have not been able to quote a line from Mr. Chamberlain which says that he would approve of the policy which they advocate. Mr. Chamberlain did at one time suggest something in that line, coupled though with the condition that within the empire they should have freedom of trade, which hon. gentlemen opposite would not grant, and which we on this side probably would not grant either. Then for some time hon. gentlemen paraded the country with the statement that the Duke of Devonshire had offered the right hon. Premier this great boon when he was in England. The Duke of Devonshire, we were told, had in a public speech, declared his willingness as one of the public men of the country, as a member of the Imperial government, to give this concession to Canada; and I believe that for some months the hon. gentleman did persuade some people that there was something in it. My hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), with that habit of getting right down to the bottom of a question, which is characteristic of him, went direct to headquarters on the subject. He addressed a letter to the Duke of Devonshire, stating exactly what had been said of him in Canada, and asking him if that was correct. We have on record the statement of the Duke of Devonshire that he never offered anything of the sort, that he never intended to offer anything of the sort, that he had no authority to offer anything of the sort; and so the whole thing crumbled like a house of cards.

Now, I say that hon. gentlemen opposite are not going to impose upon the country by talking of a preferential trade which they know is not practically before the country. We say that so long as you make a demand upon Great Britain for a tax upon the breadstuffs of foreign countries, just so long will you make no progress in the direction of securing preferential trade with the mother country. I do not say it will never be done; I do not say that it would not be a good thing. It would be a good thing for Great Britain to grant to Canada, but it would be a mean thing for Canada to demand as a condition of preferential trade. That may be the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, but it is not the policy of this government. We can apply the proverb quoted the other day by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell): 'There is that scattereth and yet increaseth and there is that withholdeth more than is met, but it tendeth to poverty.'

I believe that by the step taken by this government, not demanding anything in return; but giving this preference in a generous spirit, in recognition of all that England has done for us, we have touched the hearts of the English people, as we could have done in no other way. I believe that we have advanced our standing in the empire, and I believe that we have advanced our material prosperity, because, as I said a moment ago, by giving a preference to Great Britain, I believe we have gained a preference in the hearts of the people of England, which is shown by the fact that they are taking more goods from us than ever they have done before. We will have to submit to the taunts of hon. gentlemen as to this measure being a delusion. It is a trick, says the hon. leader of the opposition, but, we know that the press of Great Britain and the British Empire generally hailed it with great joy and satisfaction. It is a deception, says the hon. leader of the opposition, but, we know that Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen deemed it worthy of notice in Her speech from the Throne. It is a fraud, say hon. gentlemen on the opposition benches, but we know that the United Empire League of Great Britain, and the British Empire League of Canada, of which the hon. leader of the opposition is, I believe, a member, have recognized the step taken by Canada, as one of vast importance. It is a sham, says the hon. leader of the opposition, but the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, acting on behalf of Her Majesty's government, did not say it was a sham. In an official despatch, he said:

I desire to add, in conclusion, that the action of the Dominion government and parliament in this matter, although, unfortunately, its full effect will be temporarily postponed, has been warmly welcomed and appreciated by Her Majesty's government and the people of this country as a measure which cannot fail to result in material benefit to the mother country and to Canada, and to weld together still more closely the ties which now unite them.

That is the very language of the motion which the hon. gentleman condemns, and which he and his friends say they are going to vote down. We can let the matter stand there; cheered and encouraged by the press of the empire, with the words of our Gracious Sovereign before us, as seen in an official despatch, we can stand the taunts and jeers of hon. gentlemen opposite, and on the issue between the Liberal and Conservative parties on this question of preferential trade, we appeal with the fullest confidence to the electors of Canada.

Mr. JOHN McMILLAN (South Huron). Mr. Speaker, I intend to speak on this question for only a few minutes in reply to some of the things that have been said by hon. members of the opposition. It has been said that the farmers of this country have not been benefited by free corn. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), was honest enough to say that the farmers were benefited in his riding during the hard times of the summer when feed was scarce. He made the admission that free corn was a benefit to them. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson), mentioned free corn and he said that it had injured the farmers in the sale of their coarse grains. I am not going to speak long, but I want to give a brief statement to show the benefit that free corn has been to the farmers of Ontario. During last year we imported 23,000,000 bushels of corn, and we exported up to within 7,192,000 bushels of that amount which we kept for home consumption. Let us take the 7,192,000 bushels that we kept for home consumption and convert it into tons, so as to see what a ton of corn is worth. There would be 210,378 tons of corn in that 7,192,000 bushels. At 41 cents a bushel, a ton is worth $14.65. Peas in Toronto, at the present time, are selling at 60 cents a bushel, and a ton of peas is worth $20.10, so that there is a margin of $5.45 between the value of a ton of peas, and the value of a ton of corn. Taking barley at 47 cents a bushel, there is a margin between the price of a ton of barley, and the price of a ton of corn of $4.84. Oats have been selling at 31½ cents per bushel, so that there is a margin of $3.76 between a ton of corn and a ton of oats. Let the farmers of Ontario sell a certain number of bushels of coarse grains and purchase the same number of tons of corn, and what is the result? Let me say, that during the last two or three years, the farmers in the northern part of Ontario, and last summer, those in the southern counties, derived great benefit as the result of the government allowing corn to come in free. What was the result of selling that amount of coarse grains, peas, etc., and purchasing corn in its place? The result was that $1,198,199 was saved to the farmers of Ontario as against peas, as a consequence of the government admitting corn free. I state positively that there is no injury done to the farmer in respect of his coarse grains. In the United States, where they have such an enormous corn crop, it has not reduced the price of these other grains, and it will not reduce the price of them in Canada. Take barley, there is $4.84 of a difference between the price of a ton of corn and the price of a ton of barley, which would give to the farmer $974,679 of a benefit as a result of the government allowing corn to come into the country free. There is also, on oats, a saving of $757,000, because the farmers of Canada sell these oats and purchase corn to feed to their animals. I know from experience that corn is a most valuable feed, and that is one of the reasons why the United States, in selling their beef in the old country, are able to produce an article which excels our Canadian beef. I hold that this is one of the greatest boons that the government has afforded to the farmers, in giving them the benefit of free corn, and I am happy to say that no farmer, knowing the needs of farmers, has got up in this House, and made his statement in opposition to that policy. These criticisms have come from hon. gentlemen who pretend to know a great deal about farming, but who really know very little about it. I was amused by what the hon. member for Halton said. He told the House that it was on sickles, and ploughs that the duty was reduced. While, he said, that the duty was reduced on wind-mills, he explained that the farmers did not grind grain by wind-mills, and in this he showed exactly the amount of agricultural information he is possessed of. The hon. gentleman does not know that farmers grind their grain, cut straw, and pump water with wind-mills. We have been told over and over again that the majority of these changes in the tariff did not tend to the benefit of the farmers in the Dominion. I have here a list of twenty-three articles which are classed as agricultural implements on which the government has reduced the duty by 28½ per cent. There are axes, straw-knives, hand-rakes, forks, scythes and snaths. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson) showed the immense amount of knowledge he possesses about the implements the farmers use, when he said that a scythe and a snath were not used by our farmers to-day. One of the strongest statements he made was that when a merchant went to the old country to purchase goods, the first question put to him was: What do you pay for such goods in the United States? Did any one ever hear such old woman's talk in this House? To think that the wholesale merchants of Great Britain would ask such a question. When the hon. gentleman states that where the duty is reduced from 25 per cent to 12½ per cent, the consumer does not get the benefit, he states an entirely new proposition in political economy. I have read a good many works on political economy, but I have never heard that theory advanced before. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson) can prove that to the civilized world, and if he writes a book and gets a copyright on it, he will confer a benefit on civilization, and will make a fortune for himself. We have horse forks used on every farm, and we have root cutters, and root pulpers, and expensive clippers for de-horning cattle, and potato diggers, which my hon. friend says are not used in his county, for the people there plough the potatoes up and gather them in their fingers—why, he lives in the backwoods. We have fanning mills, hay tedders, self-loaders, feed cutters, corn planters, we have post-hole diggers, but he says they do not use them. Why, Mr. Speaker, he is one of the most advanced agriculturists I ever met in my life. He must have fallen asleep as Rip Van Winkle did and did not awaken for twenty years, and then he was half asleep still. We have draining machines, turnip drills, scufflers and hoes, all reduced from 35 to 25 per cent. Here are twenty-three implements reduced 18½ per cent on the former duty, and yet the hon. gentleman tells us there was no reduction in duty. We have farm rollers reduced from 30 to 25 per cent. We have wind-mills reduced from 30 to 25 per cent, and wind-mills are put up on every well managed farm to-day. We have portable engines which are becoming more and more in use amongst the farmers when they do not use the wind-mill. We have threshers reduced from 30 to 25 per cent. We have horse-powers reduced from 30 to 25 per cent, we have sleighs and pumps, reduced from 30 to 25 per cent. There are eight implements all reduced from 30 to 25 per cent. We have manure spreaders, reduced from 25 to 20 per cent, and we have tread-mills, reduced from 30 to 25 per cent; but, Sir, that is not all. All the plant that goes into our creameries, our separators, our curd cutters, and a great many other implements, are all reduced from 30 to 25 per cent, beside that we have binding twine and barbed wire free, and wire for fencing, Nos. 9, 12 and 13, are made duty free to the farmer. Gentlemen on the other side ask us: Do you get these things cheaper to-day than you did before the duty was reduced, but these gentlemen do not consider that pig iron has advanced from $10 to $26 a ton, and that we cannot expect to get our implements as cheaply as formerly. There is one thing however, that the government has done, and that is, that instead of paying $3,000,000 on bounties, they have reduced the bounties on iron largely, and they will cease altogether in 1905. They have also reduced the duty on pig-iron from $4 to $2.50 per ton. There are a large number of other benefits conferred upon the farmer which I could enumerate. I heard the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) tell us the other day, about his exploiting the old country market when he was Minister of Agriculture and sending $2,000,000 worth of eggs into that country. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) took very good care to steer clear of butter. He did not ask what the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) had done in respect to butter. I can remember that when a certain gentleman was Minister of Agriculture he took it into his head that he would purchase a quantity of butter and send it into the English market, and after it had gone to that market, he had the audacity, backed up by the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) to come before the people of the province of Ontario and tell them that that butter had been sold in the British markets, and that every cent had been returned to the Treasury. That is a legerdemain feat of financering that never was performed in this country before, because when we got the true statement we found that the government paid 21 cents a pound for that butter and that only 13½ cents was realized. Was the quality of that butter calculated to raise the standard of Canadian butter in the English market? Not at all. I hold in my hand a return from the wholesale house that handled a portion of that butter, Andrew Clement & Son, a firm well known in Manchester, Glasgow and London, and here is what they say about some of these samples of butter. One was:

Good texture, highly coloured, turnipy, and too old.

That was the class of butter the Conservative government sent over. Another sample was:

Old and turnipy.

Another:

Very salt and rank.

Another:

High coloured, too salty.

Why, Sir, the effect of sending such butter to the English market in 1895, by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), then Minister of Agriculture, was to give such a bad name to Canadian butter that it took it years to overcome. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) had better, therefore, not touch butter. The ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) is also a Rip Van Winkle as regards the methods adopted by farmers in the present day. Did he not tell us that all the farmers' implements were made from wood taken from his own farm? Did he not tell us that the farmer's cloth was made by his own fireside, out of his own wool, and when some person said: What about nails, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) made fun of the farmer having to pay a little duty on nails, that being, as he said, the only thing he had to pay duty on. Did ever any Finance Minister in Canada try to humbug the simple farmers of the country in the manner the late Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) did? He knows it, and the farmers know it, and they have consigned him to the position he occupies to-day, and they will long remember that so long as he introduced a tariff into the House of Commons, it was not the tariff of the government, but the avowed tariff of the Manufacturers' Association of the Dominion of Canada, which had a committee that prepared the tariff and handed it to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), who submitted it to the House almost word for word as they prepared it.

But the farmers of Canada have the proud satisfaction of knowing to-day that we have a Finance Minister who does not go before the Manufacturers' Association for his brief. Now, this is what I read about the condition of the butter: While we assert that the 56-pound box is the best package to use, we give the preference to the 112-pound box if it can be got exactly as used by the Danes; but if it should be recognized as Canadian, it could not be sold. There is the condition to which these gentlemen brought our butter on the British market; and yet they tell us that in the present condition of the British market, although we sent 20,000,000 last year and 23,000,000 during the first six months of this year, we are putting it in such a condition on the British market that it will not be purchased if it is not recognized as Canadian butter. They tell us that the fact that our butter sells so well in the British market to-day is a result of their policy. Was that policy the cause of sending such stuff as I have described as compared with the excellent quality of butter which we send to-day?

That is not all the benefits which this government have conferred on the farmers of this country. The trips of the Minister of Agriculture to Washington with the Minister of Agriculture of Ontario, have done us more good than the whole Conservative government did when they were in power. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) declared that the interests of the farmers lay in the markets of the United States. They do yet to a very large extent. In 1896 we sent to Great Britain 97,040 head of cattle, and to the United States 1,646 head; in 1897 we sent 120,063 head to Great Britain and 35,998 to the United States; in 1898 we sent 122,106 to Great Britain and 87,908 to the United States; and in 1899 we sent 115,311 to Great Britain and 93,000 to the United States; and I speak advisedly when I say that of these cattle going to the United States there was at the very lowest calculation $5 more per head paid for them on account of the change in the quarantine regulations, which would give an increased value to the cattle sent to these 93,000 cattle, of $465,000. But that is not all. Besides these animals, there were 555,583 cattle sold or slaughtered in the province of Ontario, and the value of these was also increased to the amount of $5 per head. That would amount to $2,777,000, which, added to the $465,000, would make over $3,000,000, which went into the pockets of the farmers of Canada on account of the quarantine regulations having been changed between the United States and Canada.

It was also promised that this government would reduce the expenditure; and a great deal has been said from time to time with respect to the number of civil servants and their salaries. The government have carried out their promise in that respect, for I find by the public accounts that in 1896 there were 4,109 civil servants, whose salaries amounted to $3,537,059, whereas in 1898 there were only 3,741 civil servants, a reduction of 268 in number, and a reduction in salaries of $259,966. Then, we have always had reason to complain of the management of our Dominion lands office. During the last year there was a saving of $18,000 in that item, and for the first time, under the blessed policy which hon. gentlemen opposite make so much of, the revenues from the lands are more than the expense of managing them. In the management of our debt the government saved $36,218 last year, and in civil government they saved $7,033. Instead of our butter not selling in the British market if branded Canadian, and a great deal of the produce of Canada being in the same position, what do we find the British people saying to-day? They say, brand everything you have got as Canadian, for it stands at the head of the market, and we will pay you the best price for it. Was it the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite that brought our goods to such a condition that they could not be sold on the British market as Canadian? Then, the government have established cold storage stations throughout the length and breadth of the land, which have enabled our farmers to put their butter and other perishable products on the market in the best condition. That is something that was never attempted by the late government. I was rather astonished to hear my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) admit that we had not brought the cold storage to great perfection, and that it is yet in its infancy. It is so, but yet it has accomplished a great deal of good during the last few years. Then, hon. gentlemen opposite say a great deal about the bribery and corruption connected with elections. The hon. member for East Grey said he had never in his life before seen such a time of corruption as he saw during the last election. If the hon. gentleman saw a saturnalia of corruption, and did not go before the courts and expose it and have the corruptionists punished, he was aiding and abetting them by keeping silent. Although the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) said that the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Holmes) held his seat by corrupt means—

Some hon. MEMBER. Order.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am only going in the direction that hon. gentlemen opposite have gone before. As far as the constituency of West Huron is concerned, I know that constituency from beginning to end. I was not in it at the last election, but as soon as I heard that the Conservative whp and the leader of the Conservative party and the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) were in that county, I told my friends to keep away from it because these men would do more good for the Reform party than all the speeches they could make. I thought that the election was secure and so it was. What did the whip of the Conservative party do, when he went into West Huron. Let me deal with him first. Here is Mr. Saunderson's letter :

Dear Sir,—I notice that the speakers for Mr. McLean are telling the farmers what the Tory government would do for them if they got in power, yet, strange to say, the story they tell on the other side is entirely opposite.

I had a call from Mr. McLean and his henchman, Mr. Taylor, the Conservative whip in the Commons, at my office on Wednesday morning, and during our conversation Mr. Taylor said: 'What we want, Mr. Saunders, is more protection to manufacturers. The government is doing altogether too much for the farmer. If we (the Tory party) were in power we would raise the duty on agricultural implements to 45 per cent, and there would be no free binder twine or barb wire. It is the manufacturer we want to help. What is the use of pandering to the agricultural vote? The present government is doing too much of that.'

'Well,' I remarked, 'that is a proper story to tell me, Mr. Taylor, but it would not do to talk that way to the farmers.'

The above shows the kind of men who are helping Mr. McLean in his campaign.

A. SAUNDERS.

The attempted denial of Mr. Taylor to this statement received no credence in West Huron.

Mr. FOSTER. Is this in order ?

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. ex-Finance Minister, if you will allow the men behind you to bring up these things, you must not complain if you are getting too much of your own medicine.

Mr. FOSTER. The point of order, Mr. Speaker, which I wish to raise, is that the hon. gentleman is travelling entirely outside the motion before the House. If that is to be allowed, we shall have to stay here two or three days or more discussing these things, but I submit that we have certain rules that you, Sir, ought to enforce.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not dispute the fact that the debate has taken a wide range and gone largely beyond the motion before the House, but when my hon. friends opposite have wandered from Dan to Beersheba, surely they will not take the point that the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) is to be confined within the strictest limits.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think it is exactly as the hon. Finance Minister has said. I must say that the first offender who travelled outside the motion was the hon. leader of the opposition, and I think that my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) will recollect that he opened a wide field by discussing the bribery and corruption in North Grey. It seems to me, therefore, unfair to stop another hon. member from replying to the charges that were thus brought up, although, if you ask me as a matter of strict ruling, I must say that the hon. member who now has the floor has gone outside the question.

Mr. FOSTER. Might I ask are you, Mr. Speaker, going to enforce the rules or not ?

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes, if the House asks me to strictly enforce the rules, as a general principle, I shall certainly attempt to do so to the very best of my ability, but I shall endeavour in that case to begin at the beginning, and as far as I possibly can keep everybody within the closest limits of debate. But after the House has travelled all over the record, I think it unfair to close the door against any hon. member at this stage in replying to what has been said on the other side.

Mr. McMILLAN. The hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Moore) brought up the very same subject to-night, and there was a nice smile on the face of the ex-Finance Minister when he brought it up. It makes all the difference in the world whose bull is gored. The following letter from Mr. Saunders speaks for itself :

I notice in to-day's 'Mail and Empire' that George Taylor, M.P., tacitly admits the truth of the statements made to me in my office.

Mr. FOSTER. I again rise to a point of order. I ask in all sincerity whether we are going to have any rules or order enforced in this House or not. If hon. members are going to be allowed to travel altogether beyond the subject before the House, even when the attention of the Speaker is called to it, then we may as well be absolutely without any rules of order at all. I must say that we are getting into a very loose method as regards order in this House, and things will not get better unless some way or other a stop is put to this abuse at once. I do not say that you, Mr. Speaker, can keep all members at all times just strictly to the line of discussion, but I do not think there could be a more flagrant wandering away from the subject in hand than that which is taking place just now.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) spent fifteen minutes wandering away from the point under discussion altogether.

Mr. SPEAKER. I understand that the House has an objection to any man reading his speech, but I have always observed that the House has given a good deal of freedom to members in reading quotations and extracts. I can only appeal to the good sense of members to make their extracts as short as possible.

Mr. FOSTER. If you will allow me, Sir, I did not raise the point with regard to the hon. gentleman reading an extract, and I hope you did not think that that was my point of order. My point was that the hon. gentleman was discussing a subject which has no earthly relation to the case in hand. We are discussing a motion having reference to preferential trade, and the hon. gentleman is dragging in the West Huron election case.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Will my hon. friend not admit that many members opposite have departed from the subject under debate, and would it be fair now to ask the Speaker to prevent others from replying?

Mr. FOSTER. I may ask my hon. friend where we may expect to stop. Are we going to degenerate into a mob or to remain a respectable House that has rules of its own and will see that they are enforced?

The PRIME MINISTER. I did not follow this debate, and cannot say what has taken place; but I appeal to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), and to other hon. members, if I am not right in saying that, again and again, in past parliaments, wherever a subject was introduced foreign to the motion before the House, and the matter was allowed to proceed, then, invariably, the Speaker allowed an answer to be given to the statements thus made. And that seems to me to be right and fair. Of course, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) holds by the strict rule, he is right, and I approve of that—we should in all cases keep to the subject in hand. But, sometimes a speaker deviates, perhaps, unwittingly, from the subject, and, under such circumstances, it has been the invariable practice—and I appeal with great confidence to the recollection of my hon. friend on this point—Mr. Speaker has allowed an answer.

Mr. SPEAKER. Looking at the hour in the morning at which we have arrived, I think I can fairly appeal to the hon. member (Mr. McMillan), without any ruling in the matter, to drop, for the time being, the discussion on these subjects.

Mr. McMILLAN. I have only a few words to say—

Mr. SPEAKER. I think it is in the interest of the House—and I think I may ask my hon. friend (Mr. McMillan) to come back to the question before the Chair.

Mr. McMILLAN. I will come back to the question, Mr. Speaker; but I may say that I am in a position to show more shameful and glaring cases of bribery and corruption than ever were shown in Canada, not merely by electors, but by an ex-member of this House, who admitted that he was guilty of such conduct. I have only been replying to one out of five or six members on the other side. It is very seldom I trouble the House, and when I do, I do not call a pitch fork a hay rake. I say a knife is a knife and an axe an axe. If hon. gentlemen opposite will draw down upon their own heads the weight of their own arguments, instead of objecting, then, let them remember to hold their tongues upon these questions in the future.

I am convinced as I am of my existence that Canada has been benefited by this preferential tariff, and I think I have some evidence here that will go far to establish that fact. The ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) states that no benefit has accrued to this country through the preference; but I do not believe always what he says. As we know, he has his moments of weakness, and I am sorry that he seems to have one of them to-night, or he would not have stopped me. I have here a few figures showing the duty that has been actually paid upon British imports and what would have been paid under the old tariff. The value of goods, dutiable and free, entered for consumption from Great Britain, less coin and bullion, in the year 1898, was $32,243,061. The amount that would have been collected in duty, under the old tariff rate of 22.42 per cent, is $7,184,143. The amount actually collected, less estimated refund of $100 on account of preferential tariff, was $6,549,428. That is to say, on that amount of goods there was $634,715 less paid than would have been paid but for the preferential tariff. The hon. member for Halton admitted that there was $2,000,000 saved by the preferential tariff, that it had taken a great many years to do that. But, what percentage is $2,000,000 on the amount of customs duties paid last year, about $25,000,000? You will find that $2,000,000 is 8 per cent of that amount, so that there is that amount of reduction in the duties paid. That is a considerable reduction for one time. As the hour is late, and as hon. gentlemen opposite have got a little more of their own medicine than they could swallow and digest, I will take my seat.

Mr. G. E. TAYLOR (South Leeds). I will only occupy a moment—

Mr. SPEAKER. I may suggest to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor), whether it will not be better to speak at another time?

Mr. TAYLOR. No.

Mr. FOSTER. The accusation has been made.

Mr. SPEAKER. But the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), insisted on my stopping the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan).

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McMillan), who has just taken his seat, should have done me the honour to give my denial of the statements he read.

Some hon. MEMBERS. He did.

Mr. TAYLOR. He did not do anything of the kind, let me tell hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. McMILLAN. Let me say a single word. I was stopped, or I would have showed that the hon. member (Mr. Taylor), had given a denial.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McMillan), read the article, giving the interview with Mr. Saunders. I was in the constituency for a week. After I had left the constituency, and when I reached Toronto, I was shown the papers containing the interview with Mr. Saunders. I immediately gave an interview to the reporter of the paper, which the hon. gentleman has not read. I stated that the statement made by Mr. Saunders was manufactured out of whole cloth, there was not a word of truth in the statement.

Mr. TALBOT. He gave his affidavit.

Mr. TAYLOR. He did not give an affidavit.

Mr. TALBOT. He did give an affidavit.

Mr. TAYLOR. I challenge Mr. Saunders to make affidavit that his statement was true, because a gentleman was with me who wrote that he would make affidavit that Mr. Saunders's statement was false, and I will make the same. There was not a word of truth in the statement, and my hon. friend (Mr. McMillan), ought to have done me the credit, to read the interview I gave. He simply stated that I had contradicted Mr. Saunders's statement, but did not give the contradiction. I give it here. That is all I have to say.

House divided on amendment (Mr. Russell.)

THE LATE MR. BERTRAM, M.P.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). It is my sad duty to have to announce to the House the death of one of our esteemed colleagues in the person of Mr. George H. Bertram, late member for Centre Toronto. After a protracted and very severe illness, Mr. Bertram has been relieved of his sufferings and is now no more. Everybody will admit that the House loses in him one of its most useful members. Mr. Bertram was still a young man in years, and young in parliamentary life ; but, both sides of the House will agree with me that in his short parliamentary career he had impressed every man who had the pleasure of being acquainted with him or of listening to him, with a sense of his great ability. He had made an impression upon the House, as we all remember, as having great power as a speaker, as a thinker and as a business man. Upon all questions of business, especially, he was an acknowledged authority ; and had he been spared he would certainly have become one of the most useful members we have had amongst us. His loss is felt very severely, especially by his political friends, and I am sure the mourning is shared also by those who were his political opponents. I feel certain that every man in this House will join in conveying to his wife and to his family the sincerest expression of our appreciation of the great loss they have suffered, and which we share in common with them.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). I am quite sure every member on this side of the House will join most heartily in an expression of sympathy to the wife and family of our late respected colleague (Mr. Bertram), whose sad death has created a loss in this House that will be felt by every member. I sympathize with my right hon. friend the leader of the government in his appreciation of the great loss that he and his party have sustained. I feel that it is not only a party loss, but that in the death of Mr. Bertram this House has been deprived of the presence of a gentleman who was an ornament to it. His intimate knowledge of business affairs, his great ability in expressing clearly and succinctly the opinions which he held, as my right hon. friend has well said, made a strong impression upon every member of this House. We all join in deploring his untimely death, for it is an untimely death, inasmuch as he was just in the prime of life, and one year ago he was apparently enjoying a measure of health and vigour that any man might envy. I concur in every word that has fallen from my right hon. friend, and am sure that the death of Mr. Bertram will be felt by every member of this House as a serious loss to Parliament, and to the city and country to which he belonged.

FRANCHISE ACT AMENDMENT, 1898.

Mr. H. G. CARROLL (Kamouraska) moved for leave to introduce a Bill (No 105) to amend the Franchise Act, 1898. He said : The object of this Bill is to provide for the preparation and revision of the voters' lists in those territories not yet organized into municipalities. As the House is aware, we have adopted the franchise laws of the several provinces, and this amendment is called for in Quebec, to which province alone it will apply. In that province lists are prepared under 59 Vic., chap. 9, sec. 17 only in municipalities, that is to say :

In every municipality of a parish, or part of a parish, of a township or part of a township, of united townships, of a village, of a town existing under the operation of a municipal code, and every town or city municipality, incorporated by charter or by special Act.

Now, there are districts in various parts of the province of Quebec which are not organized into municipalities in this sense, consequently, no lists are made for such unorganized territories. The object of my Bill is to provide for the preparation and revision of lists in these unorganized territories.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (East York). Mr. Speaker, in connection with this Bill, there are other counties that I do not think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Carroll) has referred to. The Franchise Act of 1898 provides that members of parliament shall receive copies of the voters' lists for their respective ridings. To-day I sent down to the Queen's Printer, and asked him when I could have a copy of the voters' lists for East York. I was told that the voters' lists had not yet reached the Queen's Printer, although these lists were prepared in October last. I think, in connection with this Bill, we should have some explanation in regard to the question which I have raised.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), has raised a most important question, and its importance is felt by a great many members of the House in the absence of any franchise law, for we have no franchise law at present in Canada, since the change made by the government in regard to the franchise, by delegating that question to the local legislatures, making this House dependent upon the officers of the local government, who are not under the control of the Dominion. At this moment it amounts to a scandal that it is impossible for hon. members of this House to enjoy the right which is provided for by law, that the hon. gentlemen, representing each county and the opposition candidate at the last election, should be promptly supplied with the electoral lists. Some hon.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

members of the House had the electoral lists placed in their hands, as the law requires, months ago, and others are at this moment, absolutely without them. I think it deserves the very prompt attention of the right hon. leader of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), so that, if the government are not clothed with the power to compel municipal officers to do their duty, and to furnish these lists to the government, a short Act should be passed that would give to the government plenary powers, under which it would be possible to carry out the law in a way that would be satisfactory to all the members.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I may observe to the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), that he has his remedy in another way. If he has not received the lists, he can always get them from the municipal officer who prepares them. That ought to be sufficient, although it is more desirable that we should have received them from such officers.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Has he any power to obtain them from the municipal officers ?

The PRIME MINISTER. Certainly, he can obtain the lists from the provincial officers. I am not speaking so much in regard to the province of Ontario, as in regard to the province of Quebec, with which I am familiar. I know that it is possible for any man in the province of Quebec to get the lists from the municipal council which prepares them, and from the registrar who has the custody of them. But, we have been making a special effort to endeavour to induce, or to force, the provincial officers to send in these lists. Hon. gentlemen will remember that the information which I gave in the House the other day, was to the effect that these lists have been received pretty generally, and that only some twelve, or perhaps, not more than twenty constituencies were still behind time. Since that time I am informed that the lists are coming in generally, and that they are being printed as soon as they come in.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). Mr. Speaker, I would be very glad, if the government could be induced by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Carroll), to change the whole Act. I want to say one word in answer to what fell from the lips of the right hon. leader of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I do not think it is putting members of the House in a fair position, to answer, as the right hon. gentleman did to the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), that he could obtain the lists from an officer of the local government, when we have this law which provides that the lists shall be furnished to us free of charge and printed. I was supplied with the printed lists, but hon. members should not have to run all over, in order to get these lists such as I have received. The only other way of obtaining these lists, is to go to the registrar's office, see the officer who is custodian of the lists, and pay him to be allowed to copy them, which would be a pretty extensive work, in the case of a constituency like East York, where there are a great many voters. I would like to ask the hon. member for Kamouraska where these unorganized districts are in the province of Quebec, to which this Bill refers?

Mr. CARROLL. I may say in answer to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron), that they are in the county of Rimouski, Kamouraska and Temiscouata.

Mr. BERGERON. I do not understand how that is, because Kamouraska is one of the oldest counties in Quebec. I do not understand how there are still unorganized territories in this county.

The PRIME MINISTER. There is quite an amount of colonization going on in Kamouraska.

Mr. BERGERON. I am aware that there is a great amount of colonization in the north of St. Jerome, and there the country is all organized. I do not understand why there should be unorganized districts in Kamouraska.

Mr. A. B. INGRAM (East Elgin). Mr. Speaker, during the present session, an hon. gentleman thought he would make a little political capital out of the Franchise Act that was repealed by this government, by showing the cost of printing the Dominion lists under the late Franchise Act. I would like to know by what authority this government have overridden the law that was passed in 1898, which states:

Immediately after printing such lists the Queen's Printer shall send, by registered mail, twenty copies thereof to the sitting member for the electoral district to which the list belongs, and twenty copies to the defeated candidate at the last Dominion election therein; and the Governor in Council may, by regulation, provide for the issue to members and candidates of such additional copies as are thought proper.

If the hon. gentlemen opposite would carry the law out as they have placed it on the statute-book in 1898, hon. members of this House would have been supplied with twenty copies of the voters' lists last year, instead of waiting for the lists, as they are doing now. The right hon. leader of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), speaks about it being in the power of the registrars of the different electoral districts in the province of Quebec to furnish members with the names on the list, and to provide them with copies, but as far as the province of Ontario is concerned, this Act does not meet with the requirements because the Clerk of the Peace, or the County

Crown Attorney, in some counties, is the custodian of the voters' lists. The municipal clerks in municipalities are the custodians of the voters' lists, and so is the judge in electoral districts. The Act does not specify from which one of these three persons you can obtain the lists. At the opening of the session, the government announced that they intended to bring in some amendments to the Franchise Act of 1898. They have not done so. What is the cause of this delay? Is it because they think the Act is so complete that it is unnecessary to make any amendments to it? On the contrary, the Act is most incomplete. When this Act was passed in 1898, I pointed out that the government would find it unworkable, and it has proved to be unworkable. The Department of Justice should bring down their amendments, so that hon. members of this House may have an opportunity of discussing the measure, and trying, as soon as possible to provide such improvements in the Act as are necessary.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). In answer to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ingram), I may say that a Bill to amend the Dominion Elections Act, and also, incidentally, to amend some of the provisions of the Franchise Act, has been prepared, that it is now in the hands of the printer, and will be introduced at an early date.

Mr. INGRAM. By what authority have we been deprived of these voters' lists?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman has not been deprived of them. The right hon. leader of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), stated the other day which of the lists have been received from the different ridings in Ontario, and those which have not been received. Of course, we have never had all the copies, and steps have been taken to procure all of them.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). I am told that a large number of these lists have been received by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and have not yet been sent to the Printing Bureau. They have remained in the office of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery for days and days, and I would like to know on whose authority they are held there?

Mr. MACLEAN. I understand that the lists for my county were transmitted to Ottawa last October. Again I ask the Premier, how is it that the lists for East York have not been printed, while the members from Quebec province all over happen to have their lists? The fact is that we have a law in the Dominion of Canada which places us at the mercy of provincial officials. We have not a universal law for the Dominion as we ought to have.

We made a great mistake when we put the control of the franchise for this Dominion in the hands of the provinces. It is the worst surrender ever made in this country.

The PRIME MINISTER. I cannot, of course, answer that question off-hand, but I will inquire and give an answer to-day.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON (Three Rivers). Everything that has been said in the House in connection with this matter, shows what a great mistake it was to give up the inherent right of the first parliament in Canada to control its own franchise. I could understand the provinces not having a franchise of their own, but for this Dominion parliament not to have its franchise is certainly an anomaly. The fact is that the law passed by these gentlemen on the Treasury benches is a law impossible to work. It has placed the parliament of Canada absolutely in the hands of provincial officials whom we are not able to control to any extent. That is a mistake which should be rectified as soon as possible. I do not believe that the present Franchise Act is much more economical than the old Act, and moreover, there is the very objectionable feature that the new Act places us entirely at the mercy of provincial officials.

Mr. N. CLARKE WALLACE (West York). The answers given by the First Minister and by the Minister of Marine are absolutely unsatisfactory. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) tells us, that a Bill for the amendment of this Act has been prepared and is now in the hands of the printer—so are the voters' lists in the hands of the printer, and they will both stay there as long as it suits the convenience of the government. For seven weeks to-day this parliament has been in session, and now the Minister of Marine and Fisheries tells us that the government have graciously prepared a Bill to amend the Franchise Act, and that this Bill is being printed. What were we called here for, anyway? Was it to await the pleasure of the government? We all know that the measures promised should have been prepared before we were called here, and that we should not be compelled to be kicking our heels around the corridors or discussing academic motions in order to mark time for the convenience of these gentlemen on the Treasury benches. The government have no reason to be proud of the announcement, that at the end of seven weeks this Bill has reached the stage that it has gone to the printer. But the First Minister tells us, that if we feel aggrieved that we have not these voters' lists (which the law says we are entitled to) then we have the remedy in our own hands. I have not been able to even see a single copy of the voters' lists for West York under the new Franchise Act passed two years ago. The First Minister tells us that we can obtain them from the municipality or from the registrar.

Mr. MACLEAN.

Very well. I want the voters' lists for West York, but I have no power to compel the clerks of the municipality to give them to me. It is true they have furnished me with a printed list of eight or nine months ago, but that list has been revised in every municipality, names added and names struck off. What I want and what is only of use to me is an up-to-date and correct list. If I go to the Clerk of the Peace, who is the custodian in the province of Ontario, he tells me there are ten or twelve thousand names on the voters' lists for West York, and that he will furnish a copy of the list, but it will cost me several hundred dollars and it will be all manuscript. Those are two very objectionable features. I do not want it in manuscript, and I do not want to pay several hundred dollars for it. Now, I ask the Prime Minister, is it fair to compel me to pay money for a manuscript list which is practically of little use to me, because I want it in more convenient form. The law provides that each member shall be furnished with twenty copies of that list with all convenient speed, and on this 21st day of March, 1900, I want the list for 1899, that list which the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) tells us was sent to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery at least five months ago. It is our privilege and our right to have that list, but after the lapse of five months during which time it has been hanging up in the office here, the hon. member (Mr. Maclean) tells us that the Queen's Printer has not received the copy yet. That shows the pure uselessness of this law. Suppose an election comes on, where are we? A general election may come on at any time, and we are told that it is not far off.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It comes like a thief in the night.

Mr. WALLACE. It comes like a thief in the night, as the leader of the opposition says, and it is apparently coming along in that manner now. The minister told us last year that we could take the last lists to be found anywhere, and that would be the list used as provided by a clause in the Act. Why, we actually do not know what lists will be used at an election. Even if we were ready to pay $200 to the Clerk of the Peace for a certified copy, we have no certain means of acquiring that copy. We are therefore completely at sea. We are told that the lists for some of the counties are out, but that only proves that the door is left open for the government to supply lists for the counties where they want them, while in those counties where they do not want the lists, they can relegate them to a back seat. I do not say, of course, that the government would do that, but the law gives them the opportunity to do it, and I do not want to place any such temptation in their way, because I believe they would not be able to resist the temptation if party interests were to be served by yielding to it. The Franchise Act itself is so crude and unsatisfactory as to be either unworkable or purposely made to serve party ends. The parliament of Canada should completely control its franchise. That is the proper basis of a Franchise Act. The working of the machinery may perhaps be more simplified than it was before, but the great principle that should govern a franchise for the parliament of Canada is, that it should be completely controlled by this parliament.

Mr. ARCH. CAMPBELL (Kent). This seems to me to be a case of much ado about nothing. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) complains that he has not received the voters' list for his constituency. He knows that the Ontario law compels the clerk of each municipality to send him ten copies of the voters' list of the municipality.

Mr. WALLACE. Unrevised.

Mr. CAMPBELL. No, the revised. The clerk of the municipality is required to send ten copies to every member and ten copies to every defeated candidate. I have not had a voters' list for the county of Kent, but I have had ten copies from every municipality, and they serve every purpose.

Mr. WALLACE. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman a question.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have got the floor. Hon. gentlemen opposite are continually howling about the extravagance of the government, and yet they want the government to spend $30,000 or $40,000 to print a list that is of no earthly good at all.

Mr. BERGERON. There is a law passed to that effect.

Mr. CAMPBELL. If these hon. gentlemen would practise what they preach, they would not raise such a hubbub about a little thing like that. There is no one suffering for the want of these lists, and in due course they will be printed when they are required.

Mr. DAVID HENDERSON (Halton). The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has made a statement which I think should not go unanswered. He has stated that the clerk of each municipality in the province of Ontario is bound by law to deliver to every member or defeated candidate ten copies of the voters' list of the municipality. I desire to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the clerks of the municipalities are not bound by law at all to furnish even one copy of the list to a member or a defeated candidate. The list is the revised list. The first list is only a draft. It is never considered a list until it is revised, and all we get from the clerks of the municipalities is simply a draft which may be modified in a hundred different ways in every municipality.

Mr. COWAN. How in a hundred different ways?

Mr. HENDERSON. We have no means of securing the voters' list unless we go to the clerk and procure it as set forth in the Franchise Act by paying for it. Under the Franchise Act we are entitled to twenty copies of the list for every polling division; but even if we did get the lists from the clerks of the municipalities, we only secure an average of two for each polling division. Why should we be put off with only two copies for each polling division. Why should we be deprived of the other eighteen copies which the Franchise Act says we are entitled to? The number printed by the municipalities is very limited indeed; and in the case of a general election there is no possibility of securing the requisite number from the clerk of the municipality. Therefore it is an unfortunate circumstance that this delay should have occurred in the printing of the lists. These lists should be in the hands of members; we should have had the lists of 1898 as well as those of 1899. But the difficulty we are to-day complaining of will not perhaps be an unmixed evil. I believe that it will show to this House and the country the absolute necessity of returning to the former state of affairs and again placing the franchise of this House in the hands of this House instead of delegating it to another corporation which has no interest in it nor no right to deal with it.

Mr. JAMES McMULLEN (North Wellington). My esteemed friend from West York (Mr. Wallace), has developed into a gigantic fault-finder. He has drawn the attention of the House to the fact that this is the seventh week of the session, and that the proposed amendment to the Franchise Act has not yet been introduced. Allow me to draw the attention of my hon. friend to the fact that in 1885, when he was a member of this House, and the government of that day introduced a Bill for the purpose of amending the Franchise Act, the parliament met on the 30th January and the Bill was not proceeded with until the 16th of April, a period of two months and two weeks. The hon. gentleman complains of the delay. The Franchise Act is a matter of very great importance, and I have no doubt that the government are giving it careful consideration, and that when it should be proceeded with it will be brought down. With regard to the printing of the lists I agree that every member should be able to get the list for his riding; but in past years we did not get the lists at all. When it was not revised for two or three years, all we got was the list which had been revised at the last revision, and the years when there was no revision, all we got was the municipal list. Under the Ontario law the clerk of every municipality is required to send a registered parcel containing ten copies of the voters' list of the municipality to the member. These lists are very valuable and convenient. I have examined them on several occasions, and I have found them to be very accurate. The only errors are that some names are on the municipal list which are not on the Dominion list, because in many cases persons who have a right to vote in school elections have not the right to vote in Dominion elections.

Mr. JOHN G. HAGGART (South Lanark). This debate has taken, perhaps, a rather wide range; but I wish to call the particular attention of the government to a remark of the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell). The law, which they put on the statute-book and which requires that the lists should be published every year, and a certain number of copies furnished each member, the hon. member for Kent, Ont., (Mr. Campbell) states is a useless law, entailing a useless expenditure of money, amounting to about $40,000 a year. I would ask the government to give some heed to these remarks and return as soon as possible to the only sensible plan, and that is a Dominion franchise. There is no doubt that these hon. gentlemen, in their speeches before the election of 1896, pledged themselves to adopt the provincial franchises, but I must have misunderstood the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), when he introduced the Bill last session, if his soul was in it. He, at any rate, saw the absurdity of it, and if he could have had his own way, he would instead have amended the Dominion Franchise Act, if amendment were required, and not have adopted the provincial franchises. We are told now that the law is openly violated, because it entails a useless expenditure of $40,000 a year, and we are told that the government are perfectly justified on this account in violating the law which they themselves put on the statute-book.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Under the old law, had we the lists every year?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I draw your attention Mr. Speaker, to the fact, that the hon. gentleman has already spoken.

Mr. G. W. GANONG (Charlotte). It is rather a ludicrous exhibition to see the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) get up and kick against this infamous Franchise law. He is not the only kicker on the government benches. It is not only a question of the cost of printing the lists that is involved, but the cost to each individual member of the House, chasing up those lists from year to year and having them properly revised. If, as the hon. Minister of Marine (Sir Louis Davies) says, the government intend introducing an amendment to this law they had better make it so as to give notice to the country three months before the elections, so that the lists may be revised immediately, before the people are called on to vote, and thus save all the expense and trouble from year to year, the hon. member for Kent so sadly complains of.

So far as the New Brunswick lists are concerned, we have none printed. If you want a copy, you have to apply to the county clerk and pay him $10 or $25 for a copy of a list which, under the law, we were to be furnished with free of charge. On the 14th February last, the hon. member for Kent, N.B., (Mr. McInerney) made an inquiry with regard to the lists for the province of New Brunswick, and in reply, the right hon. the First Minister said that, among other counties, the lists had been received from the county of Charlotte, which I have the honour to represent, and were being printed at that moment. Shortly afterwards, I applied to the Queen's Printer for a copy of the lists, because, I presume, that as they were being printed at the time the right hon. the First Minister gave this reply, I should be able to obtain them. But, in reply, I received, about the 1st of March, a notice stating that I must have forgotten that I had already received my lists, because they had been sent to me the September previous. How am I to reconcile this reply of the First Minister, on the 14th of February, that the lists for the county of Charlotte were then being printed, with the reply of the Queen's Printer that they had been sent to me the September previous? Evidently, should we have an election soon in New Brunswick, we are going to vote on the electoral lists of 1898 instead of 1899.

Mr. JOHN CHARLTON (North Norfolk). I am somewhat surprised at the position taken by hon. members opposite in laudation of the Franchise law of 1885. I am somewhat surprised to hear that law characterized by the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) as the only sensible plan, and by other members of the opposition as a law calculated to meet the popular requirements and protect the interests of Canadian citizens. We managed fairly well under the Dominion franchise law from 1867 to 1885. The franchise then was left in the hands of the provinces, and the elections in this Dominion were held upon the voters' lists which were provided by the machinery that the different provinces put into operation. When the Dominion government stepped in and substituted the franchise law of 1885, I always felt that the object of that movement was to secure political advantage, and I am certain that, whether such was the object or not, the result was to give a very important political advantage to the party in power. We had revisions of the lists—not annually, because we had no lists provided annually—but we had revisions of the lists, and when these were made, the Liberal members were called on to pay the expense of attending to that revision, while the revising barrister did the work for the Conservative members.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes, this was an outrageous provision, one entirely subversive of the principles of liberty and one of the worst features of that law. The lists, we all know, were revised at rare intervals. We had, I think, four revisions between 1885 and 1897, when that law was repealed, and we held the elections of 1891 upon a list two years old, and in those elections there was no individual of the Dominion under twenty-three who had a vote. That was one of the beautiful features of this franchise law of 1885. We held an election again in 1896 on a list two years old, which disfranchised all who were between the ages of twenty-one and twenty-three. The expense of forming these lists was enormous. The country was subjected to an expense of over $1,000,000 for four revisions. The machinery was complicated, and, so far as my knowledge of public sentiment goes, the law was most unpopular with the electors at large. Of course, those members who were on the government side did not feel the pressure of expense, because they had the services of the revising barrister, who were the paid and political agents of the government, appointed without being subject to impeachment, and holding their positions at the pleasure of the government, and I can conceive of no legislation more outrageous in its practical operation than the franchise law of 1885.

With regard to the provinces controlling the franchise, I have always held that the franchise is a civil right, and that, as the provinces of this Dominion have jurisdiction in all matters pertaining to civil rights, it is a constitutional privilege and function of the various provinces to provide the voters' lists that shall be used in the elections for this House. We do not come here to represent the interests of the provinces to which we do not belong, except in a general sense. We represent the various provinces where we reside.

Mr. MACLEAN. No.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes, and we are sent here through the exercise on the part of the electors of a civil right, the franchise. The township lists, as has been truthfully said, are easily obtained. It may be that some slight irregularity has occurred and that greater promptitude is desirable in the printing of these lists. I have nothing to say about that, but whatever may be the irregularities that exist, certainly the present method of adjusting the franchise is infinitely superior to the one that preceded it, and I apprehend that hon. gentlemen opposite, when defending the old and the iniquitous franchise of 1885, take a position which I do not believe the good sense of the electorate will bear them out in taking.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (East Simcoe). It is always charming to hear the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) lecture the House, all the more so because there is variety in his lectures. He read the Premier a lecture the other night on what he was pleased to call the depravity of the present House. Now, he is reading the House and the country a lecture on the depravity of the old Franchise Act. But he starts off with a statement that is hardly consistent with the facts. Referring to his own riding—and it is fair to suppose that it is like the others—would the hon. gentleman say that the revising officer was not a responsible judge, but that he was some hireling of a Conservative government. The hon. gentleman having made that statement, he must have based it on something that he knew of the circumstances. I ask the hon. gentleman to say whether it was a hireling of a Conservative government who revised the lists in his own constituency?

Mr. CHARLTON. I may say, in explanation, that I impute motives to no revising officer; but I say that the system was calculated to secure the services of men, who would naturally, so far as they could do so, throw their influence in favour of the government to which they owed their appointment. And, while I accuse no revising officer, so far as my own knowledge of his discharge of his duties is concerned, of being guilty of improper conduct, I say that the system was one calculated to promote such a thing. The system was one that held out inducements for the creation of such an evil, and therefore, should not receive the sanction of the free and independent electorate of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT. I remember one night in this Chamber, several sessions ago, the hon. member for North Norfolk making a most uncalled for attack on the superintendent of the Printing Bureau. On that occasion, he claimed that the lists of his own constituency were tampered with, that names were changed and gross alterations were made. And now he is charging the county court judges in the province of Ontario with being hirelings, and with having manipulated lists in favour of the Conservative party; and, when brought to task, he turns around and says he never said anything of that sort. But the House heard the hon. gentleman even if he did not hear himself. I will be bound to say that the judge in his county revised the lists, and that he was the same gentleman who revised the lists last year for the local election. First the hon. gentleman endeavoured to mislead the House and the country into believing—

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Order.

Mr. BENNETT. Well, I will change it to this: The remarks of the hon. gentleman

(Mr. Charlton) will have the effect of misleading the House and misleading the country—it is very easy to turn that—and the effect of the statement would be that those who read the hon. gentleman's speech and who are not acquainted with him would be apt to believe that in the administration of the Franchise Act in the past, the county judges were not the men to whom that work was entrusted. The county judges were entrusted with that work—

Mr. GIBSON. All over ?

Mr. BENNETT. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gibson) can name to me one case in the province of Ontario where it was not so, I shall be obliged to him.

Mr. GIBSON. In the city of Hamilton, because the late Judge Senkler was a Liberal, Mr. Duff and Mr. Bell were appointed revising officers because they were Conservatives.

Mr. BENNETT. I cannot speak of the particular case of the city of Hamilton. If there was such a case as the hon. gentleman speaks of, he and his friends had a right to bring that case up in the House. But I will be bound to say, and the record will show, that neither the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) nor any other hon. gentleman never made an attack on either of the two gentlemen who were revising officers in the city of Hamilton. As I say, the first statement of the hon. member for North Norfolk is misleading. The county is having the benefit of the revision of the voters' lists by almost exactly the same gentlemen—the county court judges—as were entrusted with that duty in the past. The hon. member for North Norfolk says there would be a great saving of expense, but clearly there is no saving here. These lists were printed in the department before, and they are to be printed in the department under the present law, the expense in this case also being the same as before. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) says that the present lists are going to be free from taint of fraud. Let us look at the facts. These lists are first printed and distributed throughout the county, being handed to certain gentlemen who are entitled to receive them under the law. These lists are supplemented by the changes made by the judges when the courts are held. The hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) says that the lists are prepared and that is the end of it. But I can tell him that that is not the case in the riding of North Simcoe or in the riding of East Simcoe, for in both of these, hundreds of appeals are heard. The county court judge has to be paid by the municipalities for going about holding these courts of revision, and, in addition, the province pays the county court judge for the duty he discharges in that connection. The municipality may be saddled with a huge bill for the expense of perfecting these lists. In one constituency, I know, these expenses run as high as $75 or $100 in a single municipality. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) made a complaint that the lists were not furnished by the clerk of the peace in his riding. I do not blame the clerk of the peace for not furnishing the lists, because, under this Act, there is nothing to compel him to furnish them, and the remuneration afforded to him for doing so is inadequate. They expect, in a riding with 10,000 names on the list that the clerk of the peace will furnish this list for $25. He will not take up his own time in copying 10,000 names into a book ; so he employs a lad to copy them out. And, as every clerk of the peace in the province of Ontario is appointed by the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite, that clerk of the peace need not be too careful as to whether the names are all on the lists that he has returned or not. There is nothing in the law to compel him to put in a complete list. And when the hon. member for Kent protests against the printing of these lists at Ottawa, it must be because he sees these chances for fraud that are afforded. What will be the result ? Take the case of the county of Elgin, for instance. Everybody knows what the clerk of the peace in the county of Elgin resorts to. He is the gentleman who compromised and stifled the prosecution in the West Elgin case. That worthy clerk of the peace—

Mr. SPEAKER. I will ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) to omit reference to that branch of the subject. It is not pertinent to the question before the Chair.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, I am speaking strictly of what is possible under the Act. The Act says that the clerk of the peace shall do certain things, and I was simply showing what he may do, whether he is clerk of the peace in Elgin county or any other county. He has first handed to him a list by the county court judge in which there is written hundreds and hundreds of names that have been inserted during the holding of the courts of revision. And when the hon. member for Kent says that the lists are printed and perfect, let me read him a few samples of the courts in my own riding, which will give a fair idea of the changes made. Take, for instance, the town of Penetanguishene. 'When the judge goes to that town, he finds his work cut out for him, with 190 appeals. In Orillia township, there are 288 appeals for alleged wrongful omissions and insertions. The result is that these lists as they are corrected by the judge and afterwards printed bear hardly any resemblance to their former selves. Now, these lists, in this mutilated condition, with all these additions and with all these alterations, will be handed over to the Clerk of the Peace for the county ; it is quite plain that under the Ontario Act he is the custodian of them. Now, Sir, this is the point I wish to come to. The Clerk of the Peace, under the Act, takes the list of changes handed to him, and he causes to be written out a list; and as the remuneration is so trifling, only $25, for writing out 10,000 names, it is natural to infer that he will employ some person to do it, and that person may be some partisan, willing to do crooked work. The Clerk of the Peace is bound under the law to return a complete list. He may add what names he likes and he may omit what names he likes; he is responsible to no person except his employers in the local government. That list is sent down to Ottawa. There is nothing in the world to prevent that list from being tampered with while it is in the printing department here, or while it is in the keeping of the Clerk in Chancery, nothing to prevent some person stepping in and adding as many names as he likes to it. Why, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) should feel a little outraged that when this list is being handed from one person to another, irresponsible parties to a certain extent, because the law cannot impale them for wrong-doing—the names may be changed and altered. And what is the result? The result is, so far as expenditure goes, that all the cost of the old Act so far as printing is concerned, is to be incurred in the printing of the present list. But in the next place, while under the old Act a lump sum of about $1,000 was paid to each revising barrister of each riding, now the municipalities have to contribute that amount. What is the result in the case of a city? Take, for instance, the city of Brantford. I presume the revision there costs $200 or $300. That was paid by the Dominion government, but now the expenditure is shifted on the shoulders of the local municipality. So here we have an Act that is not a saving compared with the old Act, the only difference is that the cost is shifted from the Dominion to the municipalities. Furthermore, the present Act affords every facility for fraud, every facility for wrong-doing. But with all that, the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) is not satisfied, and he is to-day, I presume, urging upon the government behind the backs of the House that these lists may not be printed at all, but that friendly Clerks of the Peace may send down a mutilated and wrong list upon which every fraud can be practised afterwards. I am glad to hear that the government are going to introduce a Franchise Act before the close of the session; and as when this Act was first introduced we prevailed upon the government to print the list and prevent a great deal of fraud or opportunity for fraud being afforded, so perhaps when the present Act comes down the government may be prepared to make further concessions to us.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

LONG WHARF, ST. JOHN.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

What is the cost, to date, of removing the railway trestle crossing Long Wharf, St. John, N.B., and what is the estimated further cost? What are the tenders, and for what amounts, received for the construction of the warehouse on the new Long Wharf, St. John, and which has been accepted? What is the total cost of the elevator as completed at same place?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. The cost, to date, of removing the railway trestle crossing Long Wharf, St. John, N.B., is $23,500. The work is completed and there is no estimate of further cost. The names of parties tendering for the construction of the new warehouse on Long Wharf, St. John, N.B., and their respective tenders are as follows :

Willard Kitchen, Fredericton	$30,000
G. S. Mayes, St. John	28,890
Rhodes, Curry & Co. (Ltd.), Amherst....	31,795
J. B. McManus, Memramcook.....	33,500
Geo. A. Appleby, Nauwigewauk	27,800
F. E. Sawre, St. John	28,900
Wm. Langstroth, Hampton.....	29,191
Andrew Duncan Donald, Moncton	27,795

The tender of Mr. George A. Appleby was accepted. The cost of the elevator, to date, $142,000; it is not yet ready for operation.

MILEAGE DRAWN BY SENATORS AND MEMBERS.

Mr. DECHENE asked :

1. Is the government aware that the late Hon. Senator Temple, of Fredericton, N.B., drew for mileage $162.40, whereas Hon. Senator David Wark, also of Fredericton, draws but $116?
2. That the Hon. Senator David MacKeen, of Halifax, draws for mileage $192.60, and that Hon. Senator Almon draws for mileage $192.60, whereas the member for Halifax, Dr. Russell, draws but $175, as shown by the Auditor General's Report, 1897-8?
3. What explanation can the government give?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The government have no control over this expenditure. We cannot give any information as to the extent of the payments made; and if the other House is perfectly satisfied, there is nothing which may not be perfectly consistent with the rules of honour.

DAIRY EXPERTS IN THE WEST.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

1. How many dairy experts were permanently employed by the government last year in Manitoba and the North-west Territories in travelling around and instructing the people in the art of butter-making?
2. What was the total cost of their salaries and travelling expenses for the year 1898-9?
3. Will the government appoint two dairy experts this year to attend exclusively to British Columbia; the one for the island and the other for the mainland?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). 1 and 2. None were employed; but the Dominion government managed twenty creameries and fifteen tributary stations in the North-west Territories. There was a superintendent for such of these creameries as are in the eastern division, that is, east of Moosejaw, and a superintendent for those in the western division, west of Moosejaw. These two experts, besides supervising the running of the creameries, held meetings of farmers, and gave instruction in butter-making and general dairying. One of them visited British Columbia and addressed a series of meetings there. In the province of Manitoba the provincial government employs a superintendent of dairying, and the Dominion government does not employ a dairy expert in that province. 3. The Dominion government will arrange to send again a dairying expert to British Columbia to visit creameries and to give other assistance in the development of dairying there this year.

HOMESTEAD ENTRIES.

Mr. FRASER (Lambton) asked :

1. How many homestead entries in Manitoba and the North-west Territories have been made in each of the years since July 1, 1898?

2. What is the acreage covered by such entries?

3. How many patents for lands have issued in each of said years?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Department of the Interior is not in a position to furnish categorical replies to the questions as put, for the reason that up to 1894, the year for the purpose of the recording of homestead entries and the issue of patents, ran from October to October, and since 1894, the records have been kept for the ordinary calendar year. The following statement will, however, give the hon. gentleman information bearing upon the questions :

	No. of Homesteads	Area.	No. of Patents.
July 1 to Oct. 31, 1889.....	1,248	199,680	1,094
" " 1890.....	2,955	532,800	3,273

REDUCTION OF RATES ON THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. FRASER (Lambton) asked :

1. Is there any provision in the contract for the construction of the 'Canadian Pacific' which prevents the government applying to the Canadian Pacific Railway the general provisions of the Railway Act which entitles the government to reduce railway tolls or rates?

2. If there is such provision, does it apply to the whole Canadian Pacific Railway system? If not, to what portion does it apply? To what lines, owned, leased or operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway does such provision not apply?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Both of these questions involve a proper legal interpretation of existing contracts and Acts of parliament, and I would not feel like taking the responsibility of expressing a legal opinion upon these questions. I think they would have to be dealt with as they arise in each individual case, and then probably each would have to find its way to the courts for determination.

Mr. SPKOULE. Have we not a Minister of Justice who could give his opinion upon them?

PAYMENTS TO ADAMS BROS., TORONTO.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

(1) How much money was paid to Adams Bros., Toronto, in 1898-9; (2) for what services, and (3) how much under contract after public tender?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. $166,991.20. 2. On account Oliver equipment, $149,842.15; on account saddlery, $16,952; on account of dubbing, $181.25; repairing waist belts, $15.80. 3. All except $197.05.

AMOUNTS PAID FOR OLIVER EQUIPMENT.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

What was the total amount paid for Oliver equipment and to what parties, in detail?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden) :

Colonel Oliver, for royalty.....	$ 5,000 00
Adams Bros., Toronto.....	191,269 95
Knight & Munro, Halifax.....	32,274 55
Inspection boards 'Monthly'.....	2,384 00

Total..... $230,928 50

AVERAGE IMPORT PRICE OF COAL OIL.

Mr. BERGERON asked :

What was the average import price, as shown by the trade statistics, of coal oil in 1896? What is it to-day?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). The answer furnished me in this matter is: 1896, 8.66 cents per gallon. From July to December 31st, 1899, 8.13.

THE ONDERDONK AWARD—CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. McMULLEN (by Mr. Gibson) asked :

Who were the arbitrators in the case of taking over the rolling stock from Mr. Onderdonk on the completion of his contract of a portion of the Rocky section of the Canadian Pacific Railway? What was the amount of their first award? Why was the award first made not accepted? Who instructed the arbitrators to reconsider their award? What was the amount of the second or amended award? What was the opinion of the Minister of Justice as to the responsibility of the government under the contract to take over the rolling stock? Why was the rolling stock taken over in view of the opinion of the Minister of Justice?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. The names of the arbitrators were: W. C. Reid, Esq., mechanical superintendent Canadian Pacific Railway, Winnipeg; Peter Clark, Esq., mechanical superintendent Northern and North-western Railway, Toronto; M. J. Haney, manager of works for Mr. Onderdonk, Yale, B.C. 2. The amount of the first award was $72,635. 3. The first award was not accepted because it was considered by the then government that the valuation had not been made according to instructions. 4. The amount of the second award was $199,535. 5. The opinion of the Justice Department was that it was permissive for the contractor to transfer the rolling stock to the government and likewise for the government to purchase same, but that government was under no obligation to do so. 6. I am unable to say what the reasons were which induced the late government in this matter.

EXPORT OF CATTLE TO GREAT BRITAIN AND UNITED STATES.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

What was the number of cattle, produce of Canada, exported to Great Britain and the United States yearly from 1890 to 1899, one year and under and over one year old, and the average price of each?

CUSTOMS REVENUE COLLECTED.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

What is the amount of customs revenue collected in each year, from July 1, 1890, to date?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). The answer is as follows : Customs revenues collected for fiscal years ending 30th June, 1891, $23,481,069.13 ; ending 30th June, 1892, $20,550,581.53 ; ending 30th June, 1893, $21,161,710.93 ; ending 30th June, 1894, $19,379,822.32 ; ending 30th June, 1895, $17,887,269.47 ; ending 30th June, 1896, $20,219,037.32 ; ending 30th June, 1897, $19,891,996.77 ; ending 30th June, 1898, $22,157,788.49 ; ending 30th June, 1899, $25,734,228.75. From July 1, 1899 to March 15, 1900, $20,341,316.08.

EMPLOYEES IN DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. MONTAGUE (by Mr. Taylor) asked :

What is the number of permanent employees at present engaged in the Department of Agriculture? What is the number of temporary employees so engaged?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). Number of permanent employees, 42 ; number of temporary employees, 30.

COST OF COLD STORAGE SERVICE.

Mr. MONTAGUE (by Mr. Taylor) asked :

What amount of money was spent by the Dominion government in each of the following years, viz.: 1894-5, 1895-6, 1896-7, 1897-8, 1898-9, in the development of a cold storage system in Canada, in connection with both the Canadian railways and Atlantic steamships?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). The following are the sums which were paid to railway companies for cold storage service in the various years mentioned :

1896.....	2,526 37
1897.....	4,189 49
1898.....	3,734 17
1899.....	3,275 52

(The Canadian Pacific Railway account will be about $700 more).

The following are the sums which were paid to steamship companies for cold storage service in the various years mentioned :

1895.....	$10,294 38
1896.....	7,718 09
1897.....	26,000 00
1898.....	33,090 78
1899.....	38,695 61

Mr. TAYLOR. I thought it did not commence until after 1896 ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. There was a one-horse little affair before that.

THE PER CENT OF DUTY COLLECTED, 1890-9.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

What was the per cent of duty collected on merchandise imported for home consumption into Canada, taking dutiable and free combined, from July 1, 1890 to 1899, inclusive?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). The answer is : 18.25 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. That is not the answer I require to the question. The hon. gentleman will see that what I wanted is the percentage for each year. Perhaps the minister would let the question stand.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Very well. I suppose the officials thought that you wanted the average for these years. The hon. gentleman had another question in which he inserted the word 'average' for each year, and as it was omitted here, it was probably understood in this way. The question will stand.

THE PROCEDURE IN REFERENCE TO PUTTING QUESTIONS.

Mr. SPEAKER having called question No. 20 on the Order paper by Mr. Mills (Annapolis)—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read.

Mr J. B. MILLS (Annapolis). Do you want the whole question read ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes, read.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Read the question.

Mr. MILLS. Why should I have to read this question, when other members in this House are not compelled to read their questions ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Drop it then.

Mr. FISHER.

Mr. MILLS. I will not drop it. I am following the rule that has been pursued for years in this House, and while I am here, I shall not be treated differently from any other member.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. You are different.

Mr. MILLS. I am pursuing precisely the same course as other hon. gentlemen who put questions on the paper, and who are not forced to read them.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills), will be within his right to claim the same treatment as is accorded other members of the House, if he follows the rules of the House. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills), has put seven pages of closely printed matter in this question, and if he takes that course, I certainly shall insist on having the rules of the House complied with. Under the rules of the House, I believe that every question put, should be read.

Mr. MILLS. If it is the rule of the House for me to read the question, and if the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), is very anxious to mark time, I will read the question. If I have erred in any way, shape or form—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, read.

Mr. MILLS. If I have erred with reference to this question, then the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), has doubly erred. Some of the friends of the ministers have put very lengthy questions to fill up the Order paper—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MILLS. Those other members have not been asked to read their questions, and I am doing what I consider to be my duty in this regard. I am asking whether an account—

Mr. SPEAKER. I must ask my hon. friend not to make a speech on it.

Mr. MILLS. It is necessary sometimes to make a speech.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) This is a question of order, or if not a question of order, a question of procedure. A change has taken place in the last few years with reference to the method of asking questions. Formerly no numbers were attached to the questions, and each member rose and read his question. Then, the English custom was adopted, by which each question was numbered, and from that time to the present it has been the invariable rule, that when the Speaker called the number of the question, the hon. gentleman in whose name it stood, simply rose and the question was put without reading it.

Mr. BERGERON. That has been done every time for several sessions.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, are we going to break the rule which was meant for the convenience of the House, and the despatch of business. If the Premier insists on the reading of a question in one case, then any member of the House has an equal right to insist that every question shall be read. Does the government wish to waste the time of the House in this manner, or does it wish for the despatch of business? The right hon. gentleman says that there has been a violation of the rules, or of the constitutional practice or something of that kind in putting so long a question. But the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), knows that this business was commenced, not by the hon. member from Annapolis (Mr. Mills), but that it was commenced by the hon. member from Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis), who put on the Order paper, page after page of quotations from the report of the Postmaster General. So far as my opinion goes, this spreading of questions on the Order paper, merely for the purpose of spreading them out, was not contemplated, when the idea originated of asking questions for information. But the Prime Minister will see that he cannot allow his own people to play that kind of game without inviting reprisals. That is exactly what has taken place in this case.

The PRIME MINISTER. I have only this to say to my hon. friend, that if the privilege is abused in any way, I have no objection that the same rule should be applied on both sides of the House, and that every member should be called upon to read his question.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). Mr. Speaker, I might remind the hon. gentleman—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question, question.

Mr. SPROULE. Then, I move the adjournment of the House, because I wish to have the same right to speak as other hon. members.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). You cannot move the adjournment when we are on questions.

Mr. BERGERON. Yes, at any time.

Mr. SPROULE. When the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has the common courtesy to give to every member that attention which he expects for himself, I will go on with my speech. The late Speaker consulted the House as to the wisdom and propriety—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Has not the hon. member for Annapolis got the floor?

Mr. MILLS. If you want to raise the point of order, why do you not get up on your feet?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Well taken.

Mr. SPROULE. I was saying that the late Speaker, after consultation with the House as to whether it was agreeable to adopt this rule or not, namely, to call the question by number without reading it, the House assented, and from that time the rule has been followed. Therefore, I regard this as much one of the standing rules of the House as any of the rules embodied in Sir John Bourinot's book or in any other.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, chair.

Mr. SPEAKER. Although the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) has made his statement, he has not moved the adjournment of the House. I understood the Premier to ask the question to stand.

An hon. MEMBER. No. Read.

Mr. SPEAKER. As to the reading of the question, I am in the judgment of the House, but I think the practice latterly has been correctly stated by the leader of the opposition—that we have grown into the practice of calling the number of each question, and having the question asked on that call. I am not aware, however, that that has in any way superseded the rule, except by consent of the House.

Mr. MILLS. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will just say this, that so long as I am in the House, every question shall be read.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; read.

Mr. MILLS. Is it the order of the Speaker that the question be read?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). I rise to second the adjournment of the House, in order to discuss a very important question. I was not in the House at the beginning, but I understand that my right hon. friend has called on the hon. member for Annapolis to read a question contrary to the recognized practice of the House, as established between the Chair and the House by the late Speaker. Assuming that that arrangement was entered into for the purpose of saving time, I do not understand how it can now be departed from, unless we are going virtually to abandon it altogether and require that every question shall be read. I think there has been great convenience in adopting the present plan, and I am very sorry to see what I think is a great abuse—I do not hesitate to say so—with reference to questions becoming practised in the House. I think that no encouragement should be given to anybody to put a question upon the paper that is not for the purpose of obtaining information which is not in the hands of hon. members. That is the object of questions, and I think a very deplorable departure from that sound practice was taken when the hon. Postmaster General allowed pages of the question paper to be taken up by re-petitions of what had already appeared in the public prints, and was, therefore, within the reach of every member of the House. It was a great misfortune, and I think that the sooner we abandon what I regard as an abuse of the privilege of asking questions, and confine them to questions which are necessary for the convenient conduct of public business, the better. I hope, therefore, that my right hon. friend will not insist on departing from a rule in the case of my hon. friend from Annapolis, which, I understand, has been deliberately adopted between the House and the late Speaker.

Mr. WM. McCLEARY (Welland). I just want to call the attention of the House to the attitude of your predecessor, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the asking of questions in this House. On the 16th of September, 1896, immediately after the House opened, he made these observations :

I desire to draw the attention of the House to a small change which has been made in the printing of routine proceedings by my direction. The questions to be put by members are each numbered. This is in accordance with an English precedent, which has been established since 1880, and I think it will in several ways work beneficially. In the first place, hon. members may either refer to a question by its number when asking for an answer, or, if they choose, they may read the question, as usual.

Not at the dictation of any other member of the House.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). He could not make a rule of the House.

Mr. McCLEARY. Let us go a little further. He went on to say :

In the next place, it has been quite apparent that, when an hon. member has a number of questions placed in his name on the Order paper, it is very difficult for members of the government to know which one they are replying to. With each question distinctly numbered, I think the business of the House will be facilitated very much.

No one will question that that was a proper and efficient rule to lay down. Whether it is in the compilation of the rules of the House or not, it has operated beneficially in facilitating the work of the House, and has never been departed from since it was laid down by the late Mr. Speaker Edgar until this hour.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (East York). I hope the right hon. leader of the House will not insist on this question being read, if for no other reason than that the first notice of motion to-day is a proposition by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) for dealing with the whole question of the conduct of business in this House and looking to the more rapid despatch of business. On this very day we propose to go back to the old system, which took up a great deal of time, and did not facilitate the transaction of business. I, too, regret the spreading out of questions on the Order paper, which has been done both on this side and on the other side; but in justice to ourselves and for the despatch of business, I hope the leader of the House will withdraw the demand that the question be read.

The PRIME MINISTER. It is acknowledged by everybody in this House—and I quite agree with the remarks that have been made by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition—that the system of spreading on the paper matters that can be found in the blue-books, has grown to an abuse. The remedy is in the hands of hon. members opposite as well as members on this side. If there are any other questions on the Order paper which are objectionable, as the one under discussion is, it is open to my hon. friend to ask the hon. member, in whose name the question stands, to read it and obtain a remedy in that way.

Mr. MILLS. Is it the ruling of the Chair that this question should be read ?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is a rule of the House and not a ruling of the Chair.

Mr. SPEAKER. We are discussing the question that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MILLS. I have the right to speak on that question, and I ask your Honour if it is your ruling that this question shall be read in full ?

Mr. SPEAKER. I am not aware of any ruling. The English practice is pretty much our guide, and on page 273 of Dennison & Brand's decisions, I find the following :

An hon. member calling attention to the time occupied in reading questions, and asking whether it was incumbent on members to read them—Mr. Speaker, in answer to the inquiry of the hon. member—I have to state that there is no absolute rule on the matter to which he refers. It has been the general practice for many years for hon. members, in putting questions, to read these questions, and it has been generally found to be a convenient course. There is, however, as I have said, no rule on the subject.

Again on July 8th, 1880 :

Mr. Speaker said it was formerly the practice for members to read their questions, and that practice has generally prevailed down to the present day; but I am bound to say that latterly the practice has prevailed of putting questions of such extraordinary length, that I am inclined to think the House will do well to depart from it.

But there is no rule, it is simply a matter of practice. In August of the same year, the same question came up again, and the Speaker said :

The House, by its action with reference to putting questions in the House has saved very considerable time in that process, because the House has, by its own action, called on members having questions on the paper not to read those questions. No doubt, if the House thought proper to go still further, and require that notices of questions should not be put at full length, but brought to the Table, a still further saving of time might take place.

In all these statements there is no decision, and apparently it is still open to the House to have the questions read or to dispense with the reading of them as the House thinks fit.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Might I suggest that as there is no rule, it is for the member who puts the question on the paper to read it or not. There is no intimation in anything you have read, Sir, to indicate that it is in the power of any other member to call for the reading of the question.

The PRIME MINISTER. We have certain rules which, for convenience sake and the sake of expedition, we do not insist upon. For instance we have a rule requiring that motions be read in French, and if any hon. member insists upon this being done, the rule must be complied with, but the practice is simply to read the motion in English.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think that that is perhaps the correct position. I am inclined to think that if the House insists, every question must be read.

Mr. JAS. SUTHERLAND (North Oxford). Your attention, Mr. Speaker, has been called to the suggestion of the late Sir James Edgar, our former Speaker, that the questions should be numbered for the convenience of members of the government, and that instead of reading the question the member putting it should simply indicate it to the attention of the government by number. This practice was adopted with the unanimous consent of the House, but it did not do away with the rule. I understand that no remarks can be taken down in Hansard, according to the rules of the House, unless expressed, and neither can any motion be put to the House unless read, but the House by unanimous consent can depart from its own rule. A member of the House, for instance, is allowed to put a question which stands in the name of another, when that other member is not present, but that can only be done by the consent of the House, and it is quite within the right of any member of this House, in any one of the cases I have cited, to insist upon the observance of the rule. The House will notice that this question is entirely out of order. As the leader of the opposition has tersely put it, the object of putting a question on the Order paper is to obtain information. That cannot be said to be the object of putting this question at such length, for all these details that are contained in it might have been just as well indicated by a reference to the Auditor General's Report. I do not think any one will pretend seriously that this question has been spread over seven pages of the Order paper simply with the view of obtaining information, when that information could have been obtained by putting the question instead in a few lines. This is certainly against the spirit of the rules of the House, and against the facilitating of the business of the House. And if the exercise of our right to insist that such questions be read would have the effect of putting a stop to this abuse, I think any hon. member is justified in insisting that the rule be observed.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia). What I object to is this. We are having a repetition of what we have witnessed in this House again and again—making fish of one and flesh of the other. If you will turn to the Hansard of March 14th, you will find a question composed of extracts from the Postmaster General's Report of 1896—

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). Read it.

Mr. DAVIN. I see there is a great deal of sardonic humour in the hon. Minister of Customs asking me to read it, but he did not ask the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) to read it, nor did the Prime Minister, who is such a stickler for rules. That question covers nine pages of Hansard, repeating information which is in the blue book, and yet no one objected to its being put without being read. But the moment the Conservative member—

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Why did not you raise it?

Mr. DAVIN. For this reason—that there are depths of meanness that we do not stoop to. For this reason—that there are certain tricks that the Conservative party have never stooped to. We have stood in this country on policy, on honest administration of the departments—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, and on the manly management of parliament. But here we see a government trembling in its shoes; not knowing what to do; putting up, in order to make campaign literature, the ruck and rump of the party to put questions giving pages of information which are in the blue books already. Turn to March 7, and you have precisely the same thing. And there are other cases as well. One of the reasons why my hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr. Mills) put this question on the paper, no doubt, was to show the government that the game they were playing could be played by this side as well. But the moment the engineer is about to hoist with his own petard, when the medicine that the government of the day has been administering is to be administered to the right hon.

gentleman himself, he falls back on the rules of the House and says, 'For goodness sake'—like some baby afraid of its castor oil—'do not give me that dose.' He falls back on the rules. The fact that in the notable instances I have quoted, as well as in others, one of these members has been allowed—I suppose I could not dare to say that he was prompted, but he has been allowed—to abuse the Order paper, as is now admitted, should have prevented the right hon. gentleman from appearing in the light he now puts himself in before this parliament and before this country. No leader of the House can lead the House with authority unless he has the respect of the opposition. And how can any minister have the respect of the opposition when he has one rule for his own followers and another rule for us? And why does he cry out the moment my hon. friend from Annapolis puts this question on the paper? Because it is very inconvenient. He is sending this Mr. Perrault to Paris. Who is he? Is he the tail, one of the joints in the tail, of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte)? I thought it was a petticoat court that the hon. Minister of Public Works was taking with him. I thought it was only grandes dames that we were to have following the minister. But, it appears we are to have this Mr. Perrault also. It is not a useless thing to call attention to the fact that the gentleman he is sending over to supplement the work of the Minister of Public Works in Paris is the man who will order champagne by the dozen, choice wines by the dozen, and pay $20 for 'Annie.' I am not sorry that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) has put the question on the paper; and I am not surprised that hon. gentlemen do not like to give an answer. I have contemplated this government in all its gyrations for the last seven weeks—a government not knowing what to do, flying hither and thither, thinking now to dissolve and then to put off dissolution and presenting a spectacle that justifies what I said three years ago that it was a government even then, with the colour of death in its face. Now, it really looks as if the right hon. gentleman had ordered coffins for the whole seventeen. What a spectacle has this government presented for the last seven weeks. We were brought here seven weeks ago, and since then we have had nothing to do. The right hon. gentleman reminds me of a play that used to be very popular here called 'The Gilded Age.' The hero of the play invites a friend to dinner and the guest comes expecting a sumptuous repast. The dishes are laid out with covers complete. But, when the covers are removed nothing is found but cold turnips. And the host gives his guest a lecture assuring him that there is nothing so good for the digestion as cold turnips. For seven weeks here we have been sitting down to cold turnips. One of the supporters of the right hon. gentleman has taken the trouble to calculate how many hours and days I took up in speaking during one session. He calculates that this House costs $5,000 a day. But they called us here seven weeks ago, when they had no reason for bringing us here. They had nothing prepared for us to do. And we saw them the other night doing what? Putting up one of their own followers to propose a motion that could be regarded, if you like, as a motion of want of confidence by themselves in themselves. Or you can look at it—

Mr. SPEAKER. The field is pretty wide, but I do not think it takes in a previous debate.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I am speaking on the motion to adjourn. If I am transgressing I will come within the bounds so quickly that you will see that my soul is steeped in obedience. But let me point out that my hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr. Mills) was about to ask a question in the usual way, a question that would probably take a quarter of an hour to read while the answer would not take one second. He was asked by the Prime Minister to read that question. Then the question came up: Was not that request on the part of the Premier backed up by his followers, taking up the time of the House unnecessarily. Therefore, it is a question of the time of the House, and I think I am strictly ad rem when I point to the fact that seven weeks have been thrown away by these gentlemen, and that nothing has been placed before us. It is true, we had the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) giving us a poor, wretched Bill and it was—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Question.

Mr. DAVIN. Where is the question? Here is the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) with his hand shading his shamefaced countenance and interrupting me. I am talking to the question raised about the delay to the business of the House, the taking up of the time of the House; and I say here, it is a proper thing to point out that we have been seven weeks here and these hon. gentlemen have not yet shown the country or parliament why they brought us here.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DAVIN. I see now the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) with the air of a bully, calling out 'order'—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would ask the hon. gentleman to—

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, sit down.

Mr. DAVIN. Who says sit down? I will withdraw the expression that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) is like a bully. For my part, I believe he can be one of the most courtly of gentlemen, though I have not seen it myself—

Mr. SPEAKER. I will ask the hon. gentleman to confine himself to the question.

Mr. DAVIN. I think I am speaking directly to the motion. The question is about taking up the time of the House, and I say here that it is a wrong thing on the part of the Prime Minister to insist on this question being read. If he insists upon it it will not raise him in the opinion of this House, it will not raise him in the estimation of the country.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of Mr. Sproule to adjourn.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to ask question 20—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read it.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR (South Leeds). I rise to a point of order. I ask your ruling, Mr. Speaker, on the rule which says that an hon. member may call the question by number of, or read it if he likes. Does the rule say that any hon. member has the right to make him read the question. I wish your ruling on that point. Does the rule say that any member has a right to make him read the question? I want that ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am in the judgment of the House, but according to English precedent, the question appears to me in this position, that the House has not established a rule, but it has grown into the practice of accepting the question as asked when the number is called. But, I think, it is perfectly competent for the House to ask for the question to be read.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not at all question your ruling. But, I wish to point out that a member can either read the question or answer to the number, and the House can direct which shall be done. But, there is nothing in anything you have quoted as an authority that appears to me to show that any one member of the House can lead the House in that regard.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The departure from the rule can only be sanctioned by general consent of the House. Unless there is some rule which says that you are not obliged to read it, then, the presumption must be that the question shall be read, and we can only depart from that rule by unanimous consent.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Long established precedent becomes a rule in regard to procedure, and we have had a long established practice, deliberately entered upon by the late Speaker of this House with the entire concurrence of the House. Now, it remains for the hon. gentleman or any person else to show that which you have not shown from any authority you have quoted, that while it is competent for the House to direct the House in a particular course, there is nothing to show that the precedent regularly pursued for years shall be departed from, unless some rule can be shown for doing so. There is no rule which says that any member of this House can change a precedent.

Mr. SPEAKER. I may be misunderstood by the leader of the opposition, but the view I took of the question was this: Our former practice was that the question should be read. A few years ago we dropped into the practice of calling the number, and accepting the question without being read. But there is no rule establishing that new practice, and we are now in this position, that if the House chooses to ask that a question shall be read in the original form, it has a right to do so.

Mr. MACLEAN. The House has not yet ordered that the question be read.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must ask the members not to discuss the question any further. It must remain with the judgment of the House to say whether the question should be read or not.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I wish to understand your ruling. Do you rule that any member of this House can ask that a question be read, or do you rule that only a majority of the House can ask that a question be read?

Mr. SPEAKER. I think in all these cases I am in the judgment of the House. Of course, the House knows the position that we are in. We have in the past dropped from the old practice in many cases. Take, for instance, the reading of a question in French. Our rule is that it shall be read in French, but we have dropped away from that practice; still, if any one member asks that it shall be read, the rule then comes into operation. I look upon the present case as similar.

(Mr. Mills having read the first four items.)

The PRIME MINISTER. Now that the point has been carried, I ask that the reading be dispensed with.

Mr. MILLS. I insist upon proceeding with the question.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I hope my hon. friend will dispense with the reading. I am satisfied that this discussion which has taken place will do a great deal of good.

Mr. MILLS. Well, I will only do so at the request of my honoured leader.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). In reply to the question of the hon. gentleman, I will say that Mr. Joseph Perreault is one of a number of commissioners to the Paris exhibition; that Mr. Joseph Perreault was not the chief commissioner to the Philadelphia, and that, consequently, the rest of this question has no sensible relation to the first part of it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think we must have a better answer than that, and I would, therefore, move the adjournment of the House for the purpose—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is out of order, he cannot move that motion at this stage.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. All I want is to call the attention of the House to the fact that the answer the hon. gentleman has given is a perfect evasion.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend's answer is quite relevant. Mr. Perreault was not chief commissioner to the Philadelphia exhibition, and, therefore, is not responsible for that expenditure.

Mr. MILLS. The last portion of my question was not answered, asking whether the statement is a correct statement.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must remind my hon. friend that the minister has given his answer.

Mr. MILLS. He will get the question again, that is all.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is perfectly competent for the hon. member to renew the question in another form, but he has no right at the present moment to do so when the answer is given.

EXPENDITURE ON IMMIGRATION.

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Bergeron) asked :

What amounts have been expended by the government for immigration in each of the following years:

1. For the year ending June 30, 1897?
2. For the year ending June 30, 1898?
3. For the year ending June 30, 1899?
4. How many officers and agents has the Immigration Department in its employ in the United States, Canada and other countries?

5. What are the salaries?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. 1. For the year ended 30th June, 1897, the amount expended on immigration was $127,438.14. 2. For the year ended 30th June, 1898, the amount expended on immigration was $261,194.90. 3. For the year ended 30th June, 1899, the amount expended on immigration was $255,878.88. 4. One hundred and eight persons are employed in the immigration service in Canada, the United States, and other countries. 5. Their salaries amount to $101,165.95 per annum.

EXPENSES OF COMMISSIONS OF INVESTIGATION.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

What is the amount paid from July 1, 1896, to date, for investigation into the cases of alleged partisanship against government employees; to whom have these amounts been paid, and how much to each commissioner for services and expenses respectively?

What amount of money has been paid since July 1, 1896, to date, for investigating the affairs of penitentiaries, to whom paid, and how much to each for services and expenses respectively?

What amount has been paid to date, since July 1, 1896, for services and expenses respectively, and to whom, on account of commissions for investigating and securing information concerning the tariff?

What was the similar expenditures for similar purposes paid from July, 1890, to July, 1896?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). As the question of my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) refers to the transactions of a number of departments it would be inconvenient to give the answer to the question in its present form, and I would prefer that he should make it the subject of a motion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He would have to do that on going into supply in order to get it passed.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). We will reach it next Monday.

Mr. SPEAKER. Dropped.

PAYMENTS FOR COMMISSIONS AND INVESTIGATIONS.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

What is the total amount paid since July, 1896, for all commissions and investigations authorized by the government, distinguishing between payments for services and expenses, and detailed so far as to show amount for each commission or investigation?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). That, I think, is involved in the same point, and I will have to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), to make a motion.

Mr. SPEAKER. Dropped.

DISMISSAL OF EMPLOYEES FOR ALLEGED PARTISANSHIP.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

How many employees have been dismissed or retired from the service of the government on account of alleged partisanship since July 1, 1896, and what is the number for each department? In how many cases was the dismissal or retirement preceded by an official investigation?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). That would be included as the hon. gentleman asks three questions, all really on the same subject.

Mr. FOSTER. In reference to question No. 28, I do not think the reason given by the hon. Minister of Finance is a good one, taking into consideration the grounds of answering questions hitherto pursued by hon. gentlemen opposite.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We have in a number of cases made the same answer.

Mr. SPEAKER. Dropped.

REPRESENTATION OF CANADA AT PARIS EXHIBITION, 1900.

Mr. GANONG asked :

What are the names of the different officials appointed by the government, up to date, in connection with the Paris Exhibition?

When were the several appointments made?

What are their respective duties?

What are their respective salaries?

Are any further allowances to be made to any of these officials? If so, what amounts are to be allowed to the several appointees and for what purpose or purposes?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). Lord Strathcona and Mount Royal has been appointed the representative of Canada on the Imperial British Commission for the Paris Exhibition. He has no salary or living allowance.

Hon. Jos. I. Tarte, M.P., Chief Commissioner, appointed 13th March, 1900 ; no salary.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) what we are to understand by Lord Strathcona being appointed British Imperial Commissioner ?

Mr. SPEAKER.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Lord Strathcona was appointed at the request of the Imperial Commission to the Paris Exhibition, to represent this colony on the Imperial Commission. The Imperial Commission is a committee charged with the colonial exhibits and Lord Strathcona has been named, or chosen, chairman of the committee, and chosen as the representative of the Colonial Committee on the executive committee of the Imperial Commission.

Mr. WALLACE. What was the answer that the hon. minister (Mr. Fisher) gave as to the allowance of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte).

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I said there was no salary.

Mr. BERGERON. What about his allowance?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. His expenses are to be paid.

THE MONTREAL STAR.

Mr. ETHIER asked :

1. Is the government aware that Mr. George Taylor, M.P., is using his privilege as a member of this House to frank through the mails daily to all parts of Canada thousands of copies of the Montreal 'Star' newspaper?

2. Is the government aware that car-loads of the Montreal 'Star' are being shipped to Ottawa to the said George Taylor, M.P., to be franked by him through the mails to the electors of Canada?

3. Is the government aware that the proprietor of the Montreal 'Star' has organized a staff of his employees to co-operate with the said George Taylor, M.P., to assist in the work of addressing and franking immense quantities of the Montreal 'Star' through the mails?

4. Is the government aware whether the said George Taylor, M.P., in order to more effectually accomplish the work of franking the Montreal 'Star,' has caused facsimiles of his signature to be prepared on stamping machines, and has entrusted the use of such stamping machines to others to be used in franking the Montreal 'Star'?

5. Is the government aware that the reputed proprietor of the Montreal 'Star' is also interested in another paper recently established in Montreal, called 'Le Journal,' issued in the French language, and printed in the office of the Montreal 'Star'; that the Montreal 'Star,' published in English, is being so franked to English-speaking electors by the said George Taylor, M.P., and that 'Le Journal,' published in French, is being distributed amongst French-speaking electors?

6. Is the Postmaster General aware whether the said Montreal 'Star' is sending free from Montreal to the said George Taylor at Ottawa large quantities of the Montreal Daily 'Star,' to be distributed free from Ottawa through the mails? If so, does the government consider it a proper use to make of the mail? If not, what action does the government propose to take in the matter?

7. Does the government intend to adopt any, and if so, what steps, to prevent the said George Taylor, M.P., franking broadcast throughout Canada, at the expense of the whole people, the Montreal 'Star'? If not, why not?

Mr. MONK. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that this question was objected to by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain), and you have his objection under advisement.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have eliminated all from the question, which refers personally to the Star.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Let the question stand.

MONTREAL TURNPIKE TRUST.

Mr. MONK asked :

1. What amount of bonds of the Montreal Turnpike Trust is now held by the Dominion government?

2. What rate of interest do the bonds carry?

3. Has the interest been paid up to date upon said bonds or debentures?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). 1. $195,000. 2. 3½ per cent. 3. No interest has been paid since 1st January, 1897.

INDIAN AGENT AT DUNCAN, B.C.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

1. Has a successor been appointed in place of the late W. H. Lomas, Indian agent at Duncan, B.C.?

2. If so, who is it?

3. What applications have been received for the position—and on what dates were they received?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. 1. No. 2. The answer to the first question includes the answer to the second. 3. Several applications have been received; but the government does not consider it desirable to announce the names of the applicants, while the matter of the appointment is under consideration.

VOTERS' LISTS FOR VICTORIA, B.C.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

1. Have the provincial voters' lists for the electoral district of Victoria, B.C. (being the lists for Victoria City, part of Esquimalt district and part of South Victoria district), been received yet by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery?

2. If so, have they been or are they being printed?

3. If not received, what is the reason of the delay?

4. When may the printed lists of same be expected to be ready for delivery?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). 1. Victoria City and Esquimalt lists have been received. South Victoria has not yet been received. 2. They have not been printed, but are being printed. 3. Not yet been forwarded by the collector of voters. 4. Cannot give that information; the Queen's Printer has instructions to hasten the printing of the lists with all possible speed.

WAREHOUSE ON LONG WHARF, ST. JOHN, N.B.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

What were the names of the parties tendering for the construction of the new warehouse on Long Wharf, St. John, N.B., and the respective tenders handed in, and which was the tender accepted?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). That has been already answered.

Mr. FOSTER. Not the second part of it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes. The answer to the first question was, that it was not finished. The next question has been answered also.

ST. LAWRENCE CANALS EXPENDITURE.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

1. How much money has been expended from July 1, 1896, to date on the St. Lawrence Canals system—

(a) On account of contracts current on July 1, 1896?

(b) On account of contracts made since July 1, 1896, for work covered by contracts running on that date, but which contracts have been replaced with others?

(c) On account of contracts made since July 1, 1896, for work not then covered by contract?

2. What contracts existent July 1, 1896, were included in those referred to in the speech of the Hon. Mr. Mulock at Owen Sound, in which he is reported in the Toronto 'Globe,' January 30, 1900, as saying: 'We tore up the contracts and recast the whole situation, thus giving a uniform depth of fourteen feet.'

3. Did the contracts existing on July 1, 1896, contemplate any less depth than fourteen feet?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. (a) $2,789,758.41. (b) $1,179,940.84. (c) $4,200,403.63. 2. I prefer not undertaking to interpret or explain statements or references which I did not make myself. 3. None on the St. Lawrence canals.

MAIL FROM LUMSDEN, N.W.T.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

Whether the Postmaster General has received a memorial or memorials from the people of Tregarva, praying for two mail services a week from Lumsden? Whether the Post Office Department contemplates supplying three offices by courier from Regina, to wit, Wascana, Tregarva and Craven? If so, what is the reason for such a step? Would not such a courier, in the main, parallel the railway from Regina to Prince Albert? Whether the Postmaster General has received letters on this subject from the member for Western Assinibola? What course has been decided in? What is the reason for that course?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Petitions have been received for a semi-weekly mail from Lumsden to Tre-garva, which has until recently been served weekly from Craven. Having caused inquiry to be made, the Postmaster General learned that Lumsden would be preferable to Craven as the distributing point for Tregarva, and authorizing the change of distributing point. The question of serving Wascana, Tregarva and Craven from Regina was brought to the attention of the department, with a representation that the mail days on the Regina and Prince Albert branch railway were inconvenient for the delivery of mails to the settlers. The question is under the consideration of the department.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—THE ROYAL CANADIAN REGIMENT.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

(1) Whether the militia authorities have decided to recruit and send a sufficient number of men to fill vacancies which have occurred in the Royal Canadian Regiment in South Africa? (2) Whether several officers are to be sent? (3) Whether it is not so that when the first contingent was being formed, permission was given in Militia General Orders for officers to revert to the ranks and volunteer as privates? (4) Whether a number of officers who did revert to the ranks are not now serving thus in South Africa? (5) Would it not be only right that the government should show its appreciation of the zeal of these officers now serving in the ranks by filling such vacancies as is necessary by promoting them?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). The Minister of Militia and Defence left me the following answer to the question: 1. Reinforcements to the number of 3 officers, and 101 non-commissioned officers and men for the Royal Canadian Regiment, sailed from Halifax, on the 17th instant. 2. Answered by No. 1. 3. Yes. Officers were allowed to resign their commissions to enable them to enlist as privates. 4. Yes. 5. These officers would have to be recommended by their commanding officers, in the usual way, to fill such vacancies. The department is not aware of their being so recommended.

CUSTOMS COLLECTOR, MR. EDGAR H. PORTER.

Mr. MILLS asked :

Did the Minister of Customs, in compliance with his implied promise—see page 8452 of 'Hansard' of 1899, vol. III—ask his inspector of Nova Scotia to investigate the matter of Edgar H. Porter, sub-collector of customs for Thorne's Cove, in the county of Annapolis, and report whether or not said Porter was involved in party politics?

If so, has said inspector made his report, and what is his report?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). This matter was mentioned in the House, by the hon. the member for Annapolis, on July 25th last. On the 27th, Mr. Porter was written to, informing him of the tenor of the hon. member's remarks, and he was asked for an explanation. On the 4th August, he wrote stating that in response to a very influentially signed requisition in November, 1898, he was a candidate at the municipal election, and was elected by a large majority. He stated, however, that he had no idea that his acceptance of the honour, would in any way conflict with his position in the customs. As a magistrate, he had occupied a seat at the court of sessions, which the municipal council superseded, and which discharged exactly the same functions. He had examined the Nova Scotia statutes, and found that Dominion officials were not disqualified, and he saw nothing in the Customs Act that shut him out. He stated further that if he had been requested to run a local or Dominion election, he would have no doubt as to his duty, but as the county council was not a political organization, and did not legislate in the interests of a party—the warden being of one political faith, and the deputy warden of another—but were simply a body of men selected to conduct the business of the county, without reference to party—he could see no possible objection to his accepting the office. He was also aware, he said, that the warden of the county was a Dominion official holding a more important position than he did. All things considered, he said, he was perfectly innocent of any intention to disobey any rule of the department. The inspector of customs for the province was not called upon to report in the matter; the collector having made such a full statement.

BINDER TWINE—KINGSTON PENITENTIARY.

Mr. McMILLAN asked :

What was the price paid by the penitentiary authorities at Kingston for each quality of raw material purchased since July 1, 1898, giving the price of New Zealand, manilla and sisal separately?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Yes; the time has been extended to the 1st of May.

SHIPPING MASTER AT YARMOUTH, N.S.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax) asked :

(a) Is Norman L. Trefry shipping master at Yarmouth, N.S., or elsewhere? (b) What is his salary as such?

THE MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). (a) Yes. Mr. Trefry is shipping master at Yarmouth, N.S. (b) He has no salary, but is paid by the fees of the office.

INDIAN CORN STATISTICS.

Mr. CLARKE asked :

1. What quantity of Indian corn has been imported into Canada since June 30, 1899?

2. What quantity of Indian corn has been entered for consumption in the Dominion since June 30, 1899?

3. What quantity of Indian corn, not grown in the Dominion, has been exported since June 30, 1899?

4. What quantity of native-grown Indian corn has been exported since June 30, 1899?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). 1. 13,026,147 bushels to 31st December, 1899. 2. 12,843,196 bushels to 31st December, 1899. 3. 9,723,639 bushels to 31st December, 1899. 4. 629 bushels to 31st December, 1899. The above information is given to the latest date for which the department has any returns.

MOUNT TOLMIE POST OFFICE.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

Have the residents of Mount Tolmie, Cedar Hill and Gordon Head districts sent in a petition to the hon. the Postmaster General, praying that the Mount Tolmie post office be removed to a more convenient site on the Cedar Hill road?

Is it the intention of the Postmaster General to accede to this request?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Such a petition was received and referred to the inspector for his report, which was recently received, and is now under consideration.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

BRANDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY.

House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 25) respecting the Brandon and South-western Railway Company.—(Mr. Morrison.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. W. J. ROCHE (Marquette). I would ask the promoter of this Bill if he would be kind enough to allow it to stand over until after next week.

Mr. AULAY MORRISON (New Westminster). If the hon. gentleman had suggested that before the committee sat, I might have had an opportunity of conferring with some of the people who are interested in the Bill; but it has stood now several times, I think, for nearly two weeks. I am not advised in the matter; and I think that unless some cogent reason is given, it would be very inconvenient and I think unnecessary to let the Bill stand over any further. I certainly do not like to disoblige the hon. gentleman. At the same time, I cannot consent, so far as I am concerned, to any further delay; I do not wish to take that responsibility. It strikes me as being an ordinary Bill for a charter, presenting no difficulties.

Mr. ROCHE. If the hon. gentleman allowed the Bill to stand over until another day, would he have an opportunity of consulting the parties concerned, to see whether he could let it stand over until after next week.

Mr. MORRISON. If the hon. gentleman desires to have it stand over, I think he should give some reason why he wishes that.

Mr. ROCHE. I will give my reason. It is that the local legislature meets a week from to-morrow, and it is the beginning of a new parliament. The transportation question is the live question in the west at the present time, and the local government have to bring down their railway policy. At the earliest possible moment they will probably present a resolution to the legislature setting forth that policy, and I do not think it would be wise for this parliament to go contrary to the wishes of the local legislature. That would serve as an indication to us of what the feelings of better judges are, for certainly the members of the local legislature are in a better position to judge as to what railway policy should be adopted for that province. That is the reason I am anxious to have the Bill stand over until after next week. I have had communications from Manitoba, stating that they are very anxious that this Bill should not be pushed forward. I do not think any harm would result from postponing it, and I think that we could then discuss the Bill more intelligently and in the interest of that country.

Mr. MORRISON. On the third reading of the Bill my hon. friend can indulge in all the discussion that he thinks necessary, and move any amendments that he deems desirable. Speaking for myself, I do not see what we have to do with any course the local legislature may take in respect to transportation matters. That point was referred to in the committee, and I think the committee expressed a rather adverse opinion as to any action the local legislature might take in respect to these matters. If the hon. gentleman would allow the Bill to go through the present stage, when it came up again, we could consider what bearing the action of the local legislature would have on this particular Bill. I would ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw his request, for I would like to oblige him, and do not want to be put in the position of refusing his request.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The ground my hon. friend (Mr. Roche) takes is that possibly a policy may be laid down by the Manitoba legislature which would induce him to reserve any consideration he might wish to give to this Bill until after they had pronounced. But those of us who have been a few years in politics, as he has been, know well that when a new parliament meets, as the Manitoba legislature will in a short time, a considerable time will necessarily elapse in passing the Address—probably a week, possibly a fortnight. Perhaps the end he desires would be as well met if he allowed the Bill to go through committee to-night, and make some arrangement with my hon. friend, whereby on the third reading he could bring up the discussion of any principle in the Bill to which he is opposed or any details. When the Manitoba legislature meets, there will, in all human probability, be a prolonged discussion on general matters, so that it will be a long time before their policy is brought down. Even supposing the proposition of the hon. gentleman were admissible, it would be desirable that we should go on and let the Bill take another stage, as otherwise it will be stranded.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). The trouble would be that no important amendments could be effected on the third reading unless previous notice were given. Unless it were understood that notice may be dispensed with, it would be unwise to put the Bill through the committee stage now.

Mr. ROCHE. I have word from the minister in Manitoba that at the earliest possible day the government will give the required information. If there is a strong objection to having this Bill stand over, I have no objection to letting it go through committee, provided the hon. gentleman promoting it will guarantee that he will give us the opportunity, at a future stage, of proposing any amendments we may desire.

Mr. JAS. SUTHERLAND (North Oxford). I am of the opinion that the reasons given by the hon. gentleman to delay the Bill should not have any weight. If the provincial legislature is going to adopt any legislation that would call for action by this House, it will surely be some legislation that would apply to all railways alike and not affect this Bill more than any other.

Mr. SPROULE. That does not necessarily follow. I have a very distinct recollection that one branch of this proposed road is not more than from four to six miles, at any portion of it, distance from the Northern Pacific. It is claimed by some that it crosses the Northern Pacific once or twice within twenty miles and runs alongside of it, and is believed by some to be intended to choke off the extension of the Northern Pacific in a locality where competition is required. I understand that the local government are opposed to that portion of the Bill, but have not signified what they intend doing. If the Bill went through the Committee of the Whole, it is possible that the local government might take exception to some one extension of this road and not object to extensions of other roads.

Mr. D. TISDALE (South Norfolk). This Bill was fully discussed in committee, and

I have heard no new points raised here. The committee almost unanimously passed it. I would be very sorry to entertain the proposition that any local legislature can control matters of this kind in this House. We have distinct jurisdiction given us by the Railway Act, and if we get into the habit of holding up these Bills from time to time, with no new matter before us, we do not know where that will stop. If the local legislature had representations to make, they had every opportunity to make them in the committee. There was no division in that committee at all, which effects any question now raised, and it would be very unusual to hold the Bill back now in case the Manitoba legislature might have something to say about it. If there is anything to be brought up against the Bill, let it be brought up on the third reading.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman must forget, when he said there was practically no objection to the Bill in the committee, that there was a very strong opposition to the Bill, and there were two votes taken on it, and a very large vote was given on each side. At one time it was thought that the amendment proposed was carried. Instead of passing the committee unanimously, the very reverse was the case. It seems to me that we should wait and give an opportunity to the local legislature of Manitoba to express its views. There is a new government in Manitoba, and since the Premier of that government has signified his desire that this Bill should stand over until such time as he can announce his railway policy, I do not think we should ignore that request. No doubt he will avail himself of the very earliest opportunity to declare his policy, and if we hold the Bill over, we will be able to deal with it in the broad light of day and not be dealing with it in the dark as we would be if we were to put the Bill through now on the information before us.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (East York). What has happened in Manitoba recently with regard to railway matters is a revelation. Within a week, we will have the policy of the new Manitoba government announced, and it would be only fair to wait until that policy is declared. The Bill will not be delayed if allowed to stand over a few days.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I would feel a good deal of reluctance in insisting on the hon. gentleman who is promoting the Bill allowing it to stand until a later stage. I have not heard that any member intends proposing an amendment, which has not been already considered and fully discussed by the Railway Committee. Moreover I feel reluctant to ask for further delay, because already, on three different occasions, I prevailed on the hon. gentleman in charge of the Bill to consent to an adjournment because some gentlemen had intimated to me their desire to oppose it in some form or other. And I do think it is not treating the hon. gentleman who is in charge of the Bill with fairness to urge that, for a reason which connects itself with the possible action of some other legislature which is not now in session, and which will not be in session for some days, and which, after it is in session, may not take up this question for a considerable period, we should delay the consideration of the Bill. I would not like to say that I would be indisposed to consider—to consider on its merits—any suggestion that might emanate from any of the provincial legislatures. But, I should be very sorry to feel that we, as a parliament, are bound, as the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) has said, by any policy that they may lay down. I think in all these cases we must be governed by our own best judgment as applied to the suggestions that are made to us, no matter from what source. I would be as ready, perhaps more ready, to act upon a suggestion from a provincial legislature, than upon a suggestion from an ordinary corporate body, because the legislature would be supposed to have a better knowledge of the general effect of the proposed legislation or policy than any corporate body. But, to say that we are bound by it, I think, would be laying down a principle of guidance which we could not act upon with wisdom or propriety. I hope, therefore, the hon. gentleman will act upon the suggestion made that the Bill might now be considered in committee and that an opportunity—I suppose the hon. gentleman would not ask any delay that would be unreasonable—that ten days or a fortnight should be allowed, after the Bill is disposed of in committee before it is taken up for the third reading, that he might have the opportunity he desires of having any suggestions considered that might come from the province of Manitoba.

Mr. ROCHE. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) guarantees that we shall have an opportunity such as he speaks of and will postpone the third reading for a fortnight, I am willing that it should be advanced a stage to-night. Unless we have that stipulation, I would not care to agree.

Mr. N. CLARKE WALLACE (West York). In view of what the hon. minister (Mr. Blair) says, I think it would be better to leave the consideration of the matter in committee until the time he speaks of. A new government in Manitoba will lay down a new policy, and, from the indications we have had in the public press, it seems not impossible that they may undertake the construction of these roads themselves. In that event the House here might reconsider the whole of this Bill. That could be done more effectively while the House is in committee on the Bill. So, I think we might ask the hon. minister to consent to the postponement of the consideration of the matter in committee.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is not my suggestion; if the hon. gentleman in charge of the Bill is willing—

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals evidently thinks that the suggestion of postponement is a reasonable one and favours the postponing of the third reading. But, I think he might go one step further and leave the whole matter over. That would leave the House more latitude to take any course it might desire. At the third reading stage, the discussion is more restricted and amendments would be more restricted also, because we cannot move an amendment on the third reading without giving notice of it—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Oh, yes.

Mr. WALLACE. In any case, more latitude is allowed in committee. So, judging it in every way, I think it would be fair and reasonable to ask the promoters of the Bill to leave the consideration in committee until that time. It will not delay the passage of the Bill, but it will enable the House of Commons to legislate with the better understanding of the question than we have to-day.

Mr. WILLIAM GIBSON (Lincoln). I would like to ask the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) if he is aware that the promoters of this railway have already spent between $17,000 and $18,000 in the construction of the road and surveys on the line. If the government of Manitoba become owners of the railways in that province, some consideration should be given to these gentlemen who have put their money into this line.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gibson) allow me to point out that not a dollar has been spent on the road, so far as I know.

Mr. WALLACE. I was going to ask the hon. member for Lincoln a question, if he will allow me. Do I understand him to say that the promoters of this line have spent $70,000 or $80,000 on this enterprise?

Mr. GIBSON. Yes.

Mr. WALLACE. What have they done?

Mr. GIBSON. It has just been denied that that amount of money has been spent. But, I have the assurance of the gentleman who has spent the money and the members of the House who are familiar with the matter. Some consideration should be given before the promoters are dispossessed of this railway by the province of Manitoba.

Mr. WALLACE.

Mr. WALLACE. Have they constructed any part of the line?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I understand that under the former charter some expenditure has been made upon the line.

Mr. GIBSON. That was the statement by the hon. member for West Hastings (Mr. Corby)—that Mr. Waddell and others connected with him had spent a large sum of money.

Mr. WALLACE. I understood it was $17,000 or $18,000, not $70,000 or $80,000.

Mr. CORBY. I said that some $17,000 or $18,000 had been spent in running the line and making the survey under the old charter.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would not like to be in the position of asking further delay in view of the extreme courtesy of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) in granting several delays already. But, the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Roche) has brought up a new issue. He has stated that he has received word from the government of Manitoba that if the Bill is held until the legislature meets, at the earliest possible time, the legislature will be asked to pronounce as to the railway charters. There are two charters before parliament with regard to railways in Manitoba which are of extreme importance. They embrace a combined mileage of something like 1,500 miles. If these two charters go through, the House will see, every available foot of land in the province of Manitoba where a railway can be constructed will be pre-empted. I made the point in the Railway Committee, when the Bill was before that committee, that, in my opinion, a great change had occurred in the attitude and views of the people of Manitoba in regard to the railway question. There is a strong feeling, I think no person will deny, in that country in favour of government ownership. When I speak of government ownership, I would not like the House to understand that I mean that the government of Manitoba intends to purchase all the railroads in that province. As I understand the question, the people have reached the conclusion that it is about time that the government, either the Federal government or the provincial, should control at least any new roads that are to be built, if they do not operate them. I think the view in the west is that at least they should control them, and control them effectively. Now, as I said in that committee, a new government has been returned in the province of Manitoba, and very largely, in my estimation, on that issue. Now, if this parliament grants these charters—this is only one of them—you are going to render ineffective the voice of the people of Manitoba altogether. It seems to me that when these matters affect the people of Manitoba they have a right to be heard. It is a case of provincial autonomy. Why should not the people of Manitoba have something to say with regard to the railways that are to be built within the province? If this were a charter extending beyond the province into the North-west Territories, then I would not care to intercede at the present time. But this is a charter designed to construct a series of railroads within the province of Manitoba, and the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Roche) makes the reasonable request that we should delay this for, say, a week or ten days in order to hear what the province of Manitoba, as represented by her legislators may have to say, and I am disposed to believe that that legislature will be unanimous on the question. I feel sure that this parliament does not wish to impose upon the people of Manitoba any charters that they do not desire. After all, what is government for? Is it not for the purpose of making the will of the people prevail? If, therefore, the people of Manitoba ask through their provincial government that a delay of ten days, or twelve days at the most, should be granted in order that the legislature, which represents the people of Manitoba may pronounce in regard to this charter, surely that is a reasonable request. I cannot see the force of the point made by the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), that we should pass it through the committee stage, and it might then be held for consideration when the third reading comes on. The House will see the futility of that proposition, because if we decide, as I think a reasonable House would decide, that the will of the people of Manitoba as expressed by their legislature should be listened to, it will be unnecessary to consider the Bill in committee at the present time. Now, we do not ask anything that is going to destroy the Bill, or throw it out; it is only for a delay of eight, ten, or twelve days at the most. Anyway, I think this House should see what the people of Manitoba desire with regard to the Bill, and then we will be in just as good a position twelve days hence as we are now, either to pass the Bill or to reject it.

Mr. J. G. HAGGART (South Lanark). This Bill is merely the extension of a charter already given for the purpose of constructing the road. Are we going to delegate to local legislatures the powers which we have to build roads? If there is any objection to the construction of this road in a particular manner, or if there is a question of policy involved, then perhaps we might delay for the purpose of getting the opinion of the local legislature on the subject. This Bill appears to be merely a Bill giving powers to the company to build a road, and if there is no question of policy involved in it, there is no reason for delay. There is nothing but a simple power to grant a charter. The result of delaying a Bill of this kind for a fortnight would probably be to fling it over altogether. The same principle applies, I suppose, to every railway Bill which is being considered from the province of Manitoba at the present time. I see no reason whatever why the Bill should not be considered in committee, and if there is any question of policy suggested by the local government, that will be a matter for the House to consider.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Allow me a word of explanation. The hon. member says this is just a renewal of a charter already granted. Let me give a brief history of this charter. A charter was obtained, I think, in 1890, for the purpose of constructing a line seventeen miles long, from Deloraine down towards the boundary.

Mr. HAGGART. It is a renewal and extension.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Well, that was the original Bill. Now we have a Bill tacked on to it which is like a St. Bernard dog tacked on to the tail of a Skye terrier puppy. The road, instead of being seventeen miles long, runs a whole circuit around the province, over 400 miles. Now, it is a very serious matter. If it was only granting an extension of time for a little road running down to a supposed coal field, I would not offer any objection. But it is a much more serious matter than the hon. member suggests. He says that we might pass the Bill, and when we hear what the province of Manitoba desires through their legislature, then the House will be in a position to do what it requires. But in the meantime we have allowed the horse to escape. What is the use of locking the door after the horse has escaped? Now is the accepted time, there is no time like the present to deal with these matters. Does this House desire that the will of the province of Manitoba should be listened to or not? If it desires that it should not be listened to, then I have nothing further to say.

Mr. ROCHE. I cannot see what possible objection there can be to allowing this Bill to lay over for a fortnight. Suppose the suggestion of the Minister of Railways and Canals is adopted, and I think the promoter feels like adopting that suggestion, we tie our hands to a certain extent. The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), the chairman of the Railway Committee, seems to have a strong objection to allowing this to stand over.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think the hon. gentleman is very unfair. What I said was addressed openly to the Chair. I have nothing to say behind the backs of the committee.

Mr. ROCHE. I saw the hon. member for North Oxford prompting the member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) on this question when he was not addressing the House.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The hon. gentleman is quite mistaken, and it is very improper of him to make any such suggestion. There is not one iota of foundation for the suggestion.

Mr. ROCHE. I see no reasonable objection to delaying this Bill. The hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart) says that we should not delegate our powers to the local legislatures. We are not asking the House to do that at all. My own personal views are that those hon. gentlemen who have been such great sticklers for provincial autonomy in the past and always solicitous for provincial rights, should at least consult the local legislature of Manitoba in this case, who are in a better position to judge of the requirements of the province in regard to railways than are the members of this House. I take the stand that our local legislatures have power to grant charters to provincial railways built within the boundaries of the province, that the granting of these charters should be left to the local legislatures. But if the House objects to that principle, then at least, I think, the House should take the opinion of the local legislature of the province involved. To be sure, we have the opinions of the government now. A member of the cabinet was down here a week ago interviewing the members from the west, some of them at any rate. Upon his return he interviewed the local Premier, and the result was that the Premier asked that this step should be taken in order that the local government might have an opportunity of consulting the whole people as represented in the legislature. I think, as the member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) states, there would be an unanimous expression of opinion in the legislature that would be a good guide to us in our action here. Now, if the suggestion of the Minister of Railways and Canals is adopted to allow this to advance a stage to-night, and take the amendment into consideration on the third reading, the Bill would not be any further advanced than if we discussed them at the present time.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Oh, yes; it would be a very great deal further advanced.

Mr. ROCHE. I am not going to offer any great objection to allowing this Bill to be advanced a stage if the promoter will guarantee that we will be allowed an opportunity of bringing in these amendments in a fortnight. Let it stand for a fortnight.

Mr. J. G. RUTHERFORD (Macdonald). Mr. Chairman, I think it would be well to go rather slowly in regard to this charter. I do not know that there is so very much in the argument of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) in reference to the new Manitoba government owning all the railways in that country.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is not what I said.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. That is what you meant.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. There is perhaps, a more serious and more weighty reason for delaying this charter than that which has been mentioned by the hon. member who has just taken his seat, and that is, that there is a clause in the original charter granted to this company, which gives them power to:

Enter into an agreement with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, or to convey or lease to such company, the railway of the company, hereby incorporated, in whole or in part, or any rights or powers named in this Act.

And so on. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company are applying for several charters, covering, as it was said by the hon. member for Lisgar, a considerable extent of territory in the province of Manitoba, at the present time. The term 'blanket charter,' has been used in regard to the privileges which are being sought by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in Manitoba at the present time. Then, we have the Manitoba and North-western Railway Company, which is also Canadian Pacific Railway and which is applying for extensions in Manitoba. We have the Great North-west Central Railway Company, which is also Canadian Pacific Railway, and we have this Brandon and South-western Railway Company, which describes a zig-zag course all over the province of Manitoba, apparently, when you take the lines by themselves, in a most aimless manner, but, it may be, that there is method in the madness of the gyrations of that railway across the province of Manitoba, and that they intend to hitch on at various points of the railway system, and that we will have this young Brandon and South-western Railway blossoming out, as did the Great North-west Central, and as the Manitoba and North-western is about to do, as a portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway. We have no particular objection, in Manitoba, to the Canadian Pacific Railway. I do not believe in standing up in this House and trying to make political capital by abusing the Canadian Pacific Railway, or any other corporation, but, we must admit that the Canadian Pacific Railway, judged as a railway corporation, like any other corporation is not there from philanthropic motives, but from business motives, although it may not be any worse than others of the same kind. Still, it is not a good thing and we cannot look forward with equanimity to seeing the province of Manitoba placed in the hands of one railway company. We want to have competing railways. I have heard it said, in this House, and in committee, that railway competition does not compete. I simply wish to say that such is not the case, because, any one who lived in the province of Manitoba prior to the advent of the Northern Pacific Railway and since that time, is well aware of the fact that railway competition does compete. Just here I wish to call attention to a little error which crept into the published reports in certain newspapers of the discussion which took place in the Railway Committee on this question the other day. I was quoted as having said that I knew that the Canadian Pacific Railway had two schedules of rates in Manitoba, one for points where they entered into competition with the Northern Pacific and one for points where they did not enter into such competition. That, I did not say at all, because I do not believe that such a state of affairs exists; but what I did say was that the Western Retail Lumberman's Association had two schedules of rates for lumber, that one of those schedules of rates was in vogue at such points as were touched by the Canadian Pacific Railway only, and that the other was in vogue at points which were touched by the Canadian Pacific and the Northern Pacific. In view of the fact that we desire to have railway competition in Manitoba and in view of the fact that this clause exists in the old charter, empowering the Brandon and South-western Railway Company to amalgamate with the Canadian Pacific Railway, to convey or lease to that company all their rights and privileges, I think it would be well for us to go slow. While I do not attach very much importance, nor give very much weight to the reasons adduced by the hon. member for Lisgar and the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Roche), still, I think that in this matter, which I have brought before the notice of the House and which, perhaps, might possibly have been overlooked, we have very good reason for delay. I would move that this Bill be recommitted to the Committee of Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines with the object of having clause No. 10 of the original Act struck out.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I am afraid that the motion made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Rutherford) will not be in order now. We are now on the preamble of the Bill, and the only question is as to the preamble.

Motion (to adopt preamble) agreed to.

On section 2a.

Mr. MACLEAN. Mr. Chairman, I beg to move:

That the bonding powers of the company be limited to $7,500 per mile.

It is well known now that these railways, especially in a prairie country, can be built for $8,000 or $9,000 a mile. It is also well known that by these excessive bonding powers and the excessive issue of stock that has taken place in the past, the railway company is compelled to put charges for its freights away up above what they should in order to pay interest on the bonds and interest on the stock. All the traffic that the road carries has to bear charges which are too heavy and the time has come, as has often been said in the Railway Committee, when the bonding powers ought to be limited. Here is a road that will not cost $8,000 a mile to construct—

An hon. MEMBER. How do you know?

Mr. MACLEAN. From the experience of the past we know what it has cost to build other roads. Railways in the North-west can easily be built for from $8,000 to $9,000 a mile, and it is in the interest of the public that the bonding powers should be limited.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment of which I gave notice some 48 hours ago in regard to the bonding privileges. It was only necessary to give 24 hours' notice, but, I gave 48 hours notice. Those hon. gentlemen who were present in the Railway Committee, when the Bill was originally discussed, will recollect that I, then, suggested that the bonding privileges should be $12,000 per mile, but the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), thought that $12,500 would be a reasonable amount, but the committee eventually decided to make it $15,000 per mile. As to the cost of constructing a railroad in that portion of the country, I have had what appears to be reliable information from contractors, that railroads have been built there at from $7,000 to $8,000 a mile, which, of course, does not include equipment. We had that discussed when the Bill was before the House on a previous occasion, and the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), participated in the discussion, and some important information was furnished. I feel that, inasmuch as they have power to stock this road to a very considerable amount, that if they have bonding powers for $12,500 a mile, that would be more than sufficient to construct the railroad. It is extremely important that we should limit these companies in their bonding privileges, because the question of the fixed charges has a very important bearing on rates. I, therefore, move:

That the bonding power be reduced to $12,500 per mile.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Shall I report the Bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Not yet, I have another amendment. Hon. gentlemen may have forgotten the fact which I stated some time ago, that there exists a clause in the original charter of this road, to enable them to amalgamate with the Canadian Pacific Railway. That is exactly what we do not want to allow. I have nothing to say here or any other place against the Canadian Pacific Railway, because I have a great admiration for the ability displayed in its management, but so far as in my power lies, I want to protect the interests of the people of Manitoba, as I see these interests, and I, therefore, beg to move:

That the company shall not amalgamate with or dispose of its interest to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the Northern Pacific Railway Company, or any other company, without first obtaining permission from the legislature of Manitoba to do so.

Surely the House will not refuse to accept that amendment.

An hon. MEMBER. Say, with the permission of the Governor in Council.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If I had the unanimous permission of the House, I would not object to adopting that suggestion.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Shall I report the Bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Not yet, I have yet another amendment. Probably these amendments will be better understood later on, when we come to the third reading, and when we get a record of the votes on this important question. As I do not wish to block the Bill, I shall not enter into a lengthy discussion of the amendment, which I am about to make, and I, therefore, move:

That during the construction of this road, all books, accounts and records stating the actual cost of construction and equipment, shall be open to inspection by the government, in order that if it be subsequently determined by the Dominion government or by the government of Manitoba, to acquire the railway or any portion of it, it may be so acquired with a knowledge of the actual cost, and at a figure from which may be deducted any bonuses given.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There seems to be a desire that I should explain this amendment, and I will do so briefly. I believe that the people of Canada will decide before a great many years, that it is desirable in the interest of the country to control the railways of Canada, instead of allowing the railways to control the people, and the object of this amendment is to enable the government at any time if it desires to take possession of this railway, to do so at a price which they can arrive at from knowledge of the actual cost of the road during its construction.

Mr. WALLACE. This is an amendment which requires the most careful consideration of this House, because a revolution is taking place in the minds of the people of Canada in regard to all public franchises. That feeling extends to other monopolies, as well as to railways, which are a monopoly, and which should be a monopoly in the sense that where there is business for only one railway, it is a waste of means to construct other roads. The true policy is one of two things: Either that the government assume the ownership and control, or, that when they give the ownership and control and the franchise to a company, or to an individual; then the government should have the most complete control over the company to which they gave these enormous powers. And what powers do the government give? It gives power to go on the land or property of private persons, to pull down their houses, to make the road wherever it suits the convenience of the railway company, whether it be convenient to the private citizen and to the community, or not. Then, they have the power of running trains, of controlling freight rates, and of collecting passenger rates. If a railroad company receives these enormous powers, it should be under the most complete control of the government of the country. It is more and more becoming to be felt that we give too wide powers to these railway companies, and the idea is prevailing that the government should largely assume these powers themselves. In the province of Manitoba—I happened to be up there a few months ago—

Mr. BENNETT. What were you doing?

Mr. WALLACE. I happened in just at a time when there was a general election pending, and they induced me to remain for a few weeks.

Mr. FOSTER. How did you come out?

Mr. WALLACE. I came out better than the other chaps. I found that this railway question was a very large issue in the local elections. The province of Manitoba is peculiarly adapted for experimenting on this question of the government ownership of railways. In the province of Ontario, with its lakes and rivers, its natural conformation, and its established towns and cities, there is not the same opportunity for making such an experiment as there is in Manitoba. The people up there realize that and they are determined to make the experiment, and I think we should give them an opportunity to see what a government can do. The local government are apparently going to undertake the construction of railroads themselves, if they cannot find companies who will undertake to do it under the restrictions and conditions which they are going to lay down. I read an interview or a speech of the Premier of Manitoba the other day in a newspaper, where the principle was laid down as the one that was going to guide him in the government. That being the case, we can see the importance of the proposal made by the hon. member for Lisgar, that in all these matters the most careful and accurate statement of the accounts and expenditures of the railway should be kept; so that, if the government decided to assume the ownership and control of the roads in any case, they might know the exact facts of the case. In the past we have been a little too reckless in these matters. We have given bonding powers to railway companies beyond what was necessary; we have been giving bonuses quite liberally, and, probably, quite properly in the past. But, I think we should restrict the bonding powers to low and reasonable figures. I hope that this House will agree to the proposal made by the hon. member for Lisgar, and that in future it will require every railway company which receives a charter to keep an accurate account of the cost of construction. It will have a beneficial effect in other ways. We are told that in some cases the railway companies give bogus contracts or contracts in large amounts to favourite individuals for the construction of the roads.

(The time for the consideration of Private Bills having expired, the committee rose.)

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to bring up the matter of answers to returns. A few of the orders that have been made by the House have been honoured by the government; but they are really in such a state that they do not serve the purpose for which they are asked. The first is a return to an order of the House of the 7th of February, 1900, for copies of all reports, orders in council, papers and correspondence relating to the admission of United States vessels to coasting privileges on the Canadian lakes in the year 1899. This return, for the purpose for which I wish it, is almost completely useless, simply because it does not give me any of the information which I wanted. All I find here is the bare order in council which takes up about one page of typewritten matter. Then, there are the telegraphic instructions by the Commissioner of Customs to the different ports. There is, then, on an entirely different subject, a return signed by the Minister of Customs. After that I find nothing except some copies of telegrams that passed between the Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries and two gentlemen in Winnipeg.

I imagine that the government would not take an action of that kind, violating a law, without having a request made to it and some grounds set forth; and after having those requisitions and those grounds put in a report of the minister. There is no report of a minister, nor a memorial, request, or grounds set forth which would come to the ministry naturally and necessarily before they would be expected to take action at all. All that is left out. There is none of the correspondence which took place between the boards of trade and the marine associations. I know, of course, that these associations in Toronto and other cities made lengthy communications, and put their views forward against the action of the government. There is not a word of that here. It is a fragmentary and insufficient answer to the order of the House. So much for that, which is number one. I have been favoured with another return from the Minister of Railways and Canals to an order that calls for all tenders accepted, tenders and departmental agreements for supplying steel rails for the government railways, detailing quantities and prices, the date and places of delivery, and the quantities delivered on those dates and at those places, from July 1, 1896, to date. The latter part of the information is not given at all. There is no information given as to the dates and places at which the deliveries were made, and the quantities delivered at the different times. That was essential for the inquiry I wished to make.

Then I asked for another paper—one from the Minister of Customs with reference to the case of Mr. H. A. Lemieux, assistant inspector of customs in Montreal, alleged to have taken part in the 1896 elections in the Magdalen Islands, under the assumed name of Lamirande. The return was to contain the correspondence and investigations and reports and departmental action. In the correspondence brought down, there is none with the Minister of Justice. There is not a scrap of the correspondence which took place between the Minister of Justice and the party who brought this matter to the attention of the government. That is most important, because the matter is one on which the Minister of Justice would be supposed to give an opinion and take action. I find not a word of the correspondence between the Minister of Justice and the party who brought the accusation, or the Minister of Justice and the Customs Department, if any such took place.

Out of all the returns I have asked for, those are the only three that have come down. I desire specially to get two returns from the Minister of Militia—one with reference to the staff course of instruction at Kingston. Ever since parliament was opened, we have been endeavouring to get the facts in that case, but without success. I do think it is trifling with this House, not to comply with its orders, but when returns are brought down, I would implore the government to have them complete. It is adding insult to injury to bring down a long desired report in an incomplete fashion, so that it is only a sham, a delusion and a snare.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I have made a special note of the hon. gentleman's remarks, and I will call the attention of the Minister of Customs to the two returns which the hon. gentleman says are missing. I will also lay his complaint before the Minister of Militia, who has been absent in Halifax for some time.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, but his officers are here.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I will call his attention to the return with respect to the staff course at Kingston.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. As to the returns ordered from my department, they were prepared by an officer of that department, and I supposed were complete. On looking through them, however, I find that the places of delivery are not given, and will call the attention of the clerk in the department to the fact and have the omission supplied.

GRAIN TRANSPORTATION TO THE SEABOARD.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Bennett :

That, in the opinion of this House, it is advisable to take a definite line of action with regard to the question of transportation of the grain and other commodities of the North-west Territories, Manitoba and the United States, with a view of centreing the same to the greatest possible extent in Canadian channels.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The lengthened period which has elapsed since this resolution was first submitted, makes me feel a good deal of reluctance in further protracting the discussion, but seeing that the subject is one which comes particularly under the cognizance of my own department, and as some of the criticisms made by hon. gentlemen opposite on the conduct of the government with respect to the deepening and enlargement of the canals are calculated to leave an erroneous impression, I feel that I will be permitted by the House to devote some little attention to this question.

I did hope that the gentlemen who were to take part in the discussion would have avoided dragging party political considerations into it, and would have discussed it on its merits and not from the standpoint of opposition to the government, because it appeared to me that the deepening and enlargement of the canals is a question in which the country generally feels a very deep interest, and on which it could not be said that any one party had expressed its views or aired its policy more than any other. I therefore, thought it would be possible for us to have conducted the discussion of this question from a broader point of view and with the sole desire to throw light, as far as possible, on it. My hon. friend who moved the resolution was, I think, somewhat of a sinner in this particular. At all events, the hon. gentleman who preceded me in the Department of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart), sinned very gravely. He travelled a good deal outside of and beyond the question of the extension of canals, and made what was intended by him to be a severe attack on the government, entirely outside the question of the St. Lawrence canals. I shall have, before I conclude what I have to say on the general subject, to make some reference to these remarks. In the first place, I think I ought to recall to the attention of the House the terms of the resolution moved by the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) :

That, in the opinion of this House, the time has arrived when a fixed and definite line of action should be undertaken on the question of the transportation of the grain and other commodities of the North-west Territories, Manitoba and the Western States, with a view to centreing the same to the greatest possible extent in Canadian channels.

Now, if the object of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) in moving this resolution was to evoke a discussion upon this question—and I agree at once it was a very important question—I would have no fault to find with the terms of the resolution. It would be a matter quite immaterial to us, speaking in a general sense, what the particular terms of the resolutions were, if it were simply the desire of the hon. gentleman to open a discussion which he hoped might be useful and might tend to throw light upon this matter, with a view, at the conclusion of the discussion to withdraw the motion and not ask the House to commit itself to any definite opinion in the terms of the motion. But I have not been able to gather from what the hon. gentleman said, and I have read it carefully since his speech was delivered, that the hon. gentleman has that intention in view. Therefore, the House may possibly be called upon to pass, yea or nay, upon the resolution which has been moved by him. If that be the hon. gentleman's intention, then, I do feel that a great deal of exception can be taken to the motion he has presented. The motion states that, 'the time has now arrived when a fixed and definite line of action should be taken' on the question of the transportation of grain and other commodities of the west so as to centre this trade in Canadian channels. Now, I am free to confess that I do not quite understand by what process and reasoning or upon what grounds the hon. gentleman thinks that we ought to declare as a parliament that 'the time has now arrived' when we should take a definite line of action. I confess, I had rather been of the opinion—I certainly had been of the opinion since I had the honour of a seat in this House—that parliament had, after due consideration, determined upon a definite line of action with respect to the deepening and enlarging of the canals. I venture to affirm that the hon. gentleman has not given us any good and sufficient reason for subscribing to the proposition that the time has now arrived when we should determine upon a definite course of action. For many reasons, I think I am justified in saying this, not the least cogent of which is that the resolution itself would imply that we have been proceeding without any definite or fixed object in view, and that the hon. gentleman now feels it is his duty and has taken upon himself to call us to account for our indefinite, our loose, our vague, our ill-defined purpose, and to demand of us that we should tell the House where we are going and what our policy is in respect to this important question. I think the House ought not to subscribe to such a resolution based as it is upon the presumption I have stated. The hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) has been a member of this House for a number of years. He was a member of this House for several years before the change of government took place; and during those years, I apprehend, he found no fault with the policy and conduct of the late government. That government professed—though I think they were proceeding very sluggishly in carrying out their idea—to have a definite policy in view. They declared that their policy was to deepen the St. Lawrence canals throughout their length to 14 feet, so as to bring the western products to the sea. Well, does the hon. gentleman tell us that he supported the government in that course without having any such understanding of their policy, without knowing or realizing that it was the design of the late government to deepen these canals and equip them in such a fashion that they would be suitable for carrying the western traffic? The hon. gentleman has led us rather to infer that, and, in so doing, I think either he has failed to express his own opinions accurately in the past, or he has rather created or is seeking to create an erroneous impression in this parliament on the question.

It appears to me that the enormous outlay that has been made in the act of deepening and enlarging the St. Lawrence canals imposes on us the duty of continuing that expenditure until the work of deepening and enlarging shall have been fully concluded. What does the hon. gentleman mean? Does he mean that we should call a halt, as he insists in the speech which he addressed to the House in support of that resolution? Call a halt for what? We have spent between fifty and sixty millions of dollars in deepening and enlarging these canals. Why did not the hon. gentleman call this halt years ago? Why did not he demand of the government which he supported that they should stay their hands in this enormous expenditure? Why, Sir, this calling of a halt, it appears to me, comes at a very unseasonable time. If his views are correct, it might have been done with advantage many years ago. But it is too late to call a halt now; and I think my hon. friend can hardly seriously expect that this government or this parliament will accede to this demand to call a halt until they are satisfied that we have concluded these works in a thorough and satisfactory manner, until we have laid out every dollar of money that is necessary to finish the proper deepening and enlargement of the canals. There is no doubt that in the opinion of many to-day, some other course might have been followed with equal or even greater advantage than the course of deepening and enlarging the canals. On the other side of the House, as well as on this, no doubt, the view will find expression that it would have been better if we had taken up the construction of the Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal, rather than spend fifty or sixty million dollars in deepening and enlarging the St. Lawrence system. Possibly, that may be a very sound view. Possibly, the hon. gentlemen who hold that view may be justified in entertaining it. But, Sir, I do not think it possible or proper that we should now stay our hands and withhold the trifling expenditure—because I contend that it is trifling—that is necessary to complete the work to which, years ago, we committed ourselves, in order to consider another project, another class of undertaking which is of very great magnitude, even though it is admittedly of very great importance. There may also be some who are to-day of opinion that it was a great mistake for us to have spent our millions in order to make a sufficient channel in our great St. Lawrence waterways. They may be right; but, Sir, it is too late to put forward that view now. The opinion is expressed that railways will furnish a successful means of handling the western traffic and securing a larger portion than we now secure of the business which goes through the United States and to the ports of the Atlantic seaboard. Possibly these gentlemen who hold this view may be right, but I do not think they are. I think that a case cannot be made out. I think the evidence is abundantly clear the other way, as against railways being successful competitors of the waterways of the Dominion. That is my view. But the hon. gentleman may be right, though if he is there is no reason in the world why he should call upon the government to halt in the final step which we are taking towards completing these works, because possibly a doubt may exist in the minds of some of us, or possibly all of us, as to whether, if we had substituted railway construction, either under government ownership or otherwise, bonused by government or otherwise, we should have accomplished as satisfactory results. It is too late, in my opinion, to stop to consider that question. If we are to turn to account the outlay we have already made, if we are to use the system so far as completed, we are bound to go on and finish it.

Mr. MACLEAN. Will the minister tell us when he thinks the St. Lawrence canals will be deepened so as to give 14 feet of water?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I intend to devote some attention to that question before I conclude my remarks. Now, I have read the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Bennett's) speech very carefully, and I am compelled to conclude that the hon. gentleman looks upon the prospect of our securing any substantial proportion of the western traffic through Canadian ports as against United States ports, as being practically hopeless. That is the conclusion to which I think my hon. friend's argument has pointed. In other words, the hon. gentleman is preaching to us now after we have advanced almost to the last stage, after we have laid out millions of money in improving our waterway, the hon. gentleman is preaching to us a counsel of despair. Sir, I cannot for the life of me see upon what grounds, by what process of reasoning, for the hon. gentleman does not disclose it, he has arrived at that conclusion. This is what he says at page 461 of his remarks:

It is well for the House, in view of the huge expenditure made in the past, and the large expenditure that must of necessity be made in the future, that a halt should be called in order to arrive at what should or should not be the system to be followed for all time to come.

Well, Sir, I apprehend that it will be a very large undertaking for this parliament to determine what shall be or ought to be done for the countless ages that are to come, what the policy is that we should lay down for all time to come. The hon. gentleman invites us to consider and determine it now. I am not prepared to do that, nor I believe, is this House prepared to do that in view of all that has been done to finish the work we have undertaken, before we start out upon any new policy or undertaking. My hon. friend justifies the hopeless view which he takes of the situation upon several grounds. He assumes that the St. Lawrence Canal policy was inconsiderately determined upon, he more than assumes it, he actually states it. The hon. gentleman says that it was entered upon and has been continued without due consideration or discussion, when votes passed through parliament. Now, the hon. gentleman is a member of this House of considerable experience. He sat behind the late government for a term of years. He was in their confidence, as I have said; he was thoroughly cognizant of the action which was being taken, and thoroughly aware of the aim which the government of that day had in view. The hon. gentleman supported and sustained them in that policy, knowing all that he knew, and informed fully as he must have been upon it. The hon. gentleman tells us now that the government of that day never considered this question fully or carefully, they had not studied the immeasurable consequences of what they were doing, they did not realize the magnitude of the work they were undertaking. He says on page 462 that they were influenced by considerations which I will not say they were influenced by political considerations, that they acted so as to secure political support, that they plunged into this scheme and carried it along 'heedlessly,' he does not use the word 'recklessly,' but he implies it, and leads us to suppose that the government of that time had no fixed purpose, no well considered object in view. They were simply influenced by what they thought would be to the political advantage of the moment. As I say, I do not charge that against the late administration. My hon. friend may be correct. I will say this, however, that in my opinion the discussions which took place in parliament from time to time, beginning when the Mackenzie government were in power and initiated the policy to deepening and enlarging the Welland canals, show that from that time down to the present, the policy of successive governments has been uniformly in one direction, has been well considered, though, as I said a moment ago, it has not always been pushed with the vigour with which it ought to have been pushed. There has been sluggishness in the prosecution of the work, yet I think there is no reasonable ground to assume that the country was not fully aware and did not cordially approve, through both political parties, the general policy of deepening and enlarging the canals.

Sir, finding that this work had been dragging its slow way along, the present administration concluded that it was its duty to push it more vigorously. We felt that the outlay which had already been made was so vast that we would be justified in increasing the efforts to complete the work, that we might begin to realize some advantage from the enormous sum already been expended. We have endeavoured to push the works with all vigour, no time has been lost, and I am glad to be able to inform the House that upon the opening of navigation this spring there will be a complete and satisfactory channel of 14 feet all the way through to Montreal. The hon. gentleman who moved this resolution explained to us in the following terms where his difficulties arose, and indicated, though not, I think, with a great deal of clearness, why he thought we should pause in our operations for more mature consideration. He says :

I contend that, from the outset, we have always been hampered to a great extent in connection with the Welland system. First of all, the depth of water was such that it was impossible to carry boats and other craft down that waterway of sufficient size to make it pay. Experience has demonstrated, on the great lakes, that the day for the small carriers has gone by, and the vessels, a few years ago, which were able to carry 25,000 to 40,000 bushels of grain are to-day a thing of the past.

This explanation of the hon. gentleman fails entirely, it appears to me, to support his argument, and affords no reason why we should call a halt. He found, as everybody found, that the deepening of the Welland Canal alone, was not sufficient to enable us to secure the western traffic, or to divert it from United States ports. It was for that reason, and for that reason alone, that the government of that day, and parliament supporting the government, decided upon deepening some and constructing other new canals of sufficient depth to give the required channel. The hon. gentleman tells us that we ought to stop because the Welland Canal has always been a trouble to him, and is, to a great extent, one of the difficulties in the way of reaching the seaports. That is the reason why we should go on, instead of being a reason why we should stop. Everybody knew that the Welland Canal did not give a clear way to the sea, that while we had fourteen feet of water in the Welland Canal, we had not fourteen feet in the other canals. These vessels from the west, from the lakes, could get through the Welland Canal if they only drew fourteen feet of water and could get to American ports on the lower lakes, but they could not get to Montreal, and, therefore, they could not carry cargoes to Canadian sea ports. Therefore, it was that the government decided, and properly decided, upon the reconstruction of the lower canals. Possibly the hon. gentleman is right as to the day of small craft on the lakes being past and gone, and that we have to make provision for vessels of a heavier draft. I do not know but that there may come into use, as a result of the completion of our canals, a class of vessels which would be able to enter the canals from the west, without transshipment at Port Colborne. That may possibly be. There are those who are of the opinion that such a class of vessels will be constructed and largely used, but I can agree with the hon. gentleman to this extent, that while vessels with a draft of fourteen feet might be utilized in the lake trade, the larger vessels will for some time to come do the business, as they are doing the business almost entirely to-day. Sir, the very fact that large vessels have come to monopolize the lake traffic, that the grain reaches Buffalo on vessels of the larger class, drawing eighteen, nineteen and twenty feet of water, is a reason which appears to me to make it necessary that we should go on and complete our work rather than a reason why we should stay our hand at the present moment. How otherwise, is the hon. gentleman going to secure that trade? How is he going to turn to account this enormous expenditure we have already made, if he is to stop where we are, and if he is correct in his proposition that large ships will carry the grain of the west either to Buffalo or other lake ports; how is he going to secure any portion of the traffic unless Port Colborne is put in the position to receive the larger class of ships? It is because we are of the opinion that transshipment can take place at Port Colborne that we have asked parliament for, and that parliament has given us, the means of making the necessary improvements at that point, and that we have already embarked upon the work. I think the hon. gentleman's arguments, and I have read them carefully, will justify the conclusion, that it was a mistake for the late government, for this government, for this and for previous parliaments, to have entered upon the policy of deepening the canals. That is the conclusion which, I think, may fairly be drawn from the arguments of the hon. gentleman.

I take it further that the hon. gentleman does not approve of the expenditure which is proposed at Port Colborne, and that the hon. gentleman does not look with favour upon that project. He says that our proposition is not only to deepen Port Colborne, but to make a harbour there. Well, that is true. It is necessary that we should deepen the entrance and make other improvements at Port Colborne. There is no question in my mind upon that point. I do not think, for one moment, that it is a debateable alternative that we should depend upon Buffalo as a harbour for Port Colborne. I do not think this country will give its sanction to such a policy, nor do I think myself, that there is the slightest probability that a considerable amount of traffic would ever reach the lower St. Lawrence, or the port of Montreal through that channel. We have to have a harbour of our own.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We have to have proper accommodation at the entrance to Port Colborne.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the minister indicate what these works are?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I shall before I finish. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) said that the government showed they had no faith in the canal route. But, the hon. gentleman has given us no reasons for this opinion. I can truly assert that the government has every confidence in the ultimate success of the St. Lawrence route as capable of securing a considerable portion of the traffic which now reaches New York.

Mr. SPROULE. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair), refer to me, or to the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I refer to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett), who introduced the motion.

Mr. BENNETT. I mentioned that for this reason: It was anticipated, I always understood, that when the 14-foot canal was constructed, the boats would pass from the upper lakes clear through to Montreal, and, in that way, there would be a keen competition with the Buffalo route. The position of the minister on the contemplated expenditure at Port Colborne, is, that it will not pay to carry on a 14-foot channel from Fort William through to Montreal, but that you perhaps may be able to make it pay by taking a 250,000-bushel boat from Fort William to Port Colborne, and then transferring the cargo to a smaller barge at Montreal.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not wish the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett), to quote me as saying that I have abandoned the idea that the smaller boats drawing 14 feet, will not do business at a profit, carrying from the western lake ports to Montreal without transshipment. I do not express the opinion that that may not be a profitable mode in the future of shipping grain from the west. There are gentlemen thoroughly acquainted with the lake shipping business, who are confident that that class of vessel will be very largely used in the future. They may be right, or they may be wrong, but, I am discussing this question altogether from the standpoint from which the hon. gentleman presented it, which was to the effect that there was every reason why we should not make any of these improvements; that we should call a halt in our work, and that we should not do anything at Port Colborne. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett), is right that the large vessels will monopolize the traffic on the lakes to the exclusion of the smaller vessels, then I say it is ten times more important that we should have Port Colborne equipped so that the transshipment can be made from these large vessels to the smaller craft for carriage to Montreal. I am adopting this line of argument, assuming that the hon. gentleman is correct in his predictions, and, if he is, it leads me to an entirely different conclusion from that to which it has led the hon. member (Mr. Bennett) himself. He says:

Instead of using fourteen-foot draft vessels, it will bring large vessels of the capacity of 250,-

Mr. BLAIR.

000 bushels, instead of 60,000 bushels capacity, to Port Colborne.

I think the hon. gentleman is in error there. We are not proposing to bring vessels of any particular kind to Port Colborne. What we propose to do is to afford facilities there, so that vessels of any size coming to that port can be unloaded, or can tranship, or can get through, as the case may be, so that there will be no loss of time, so that the expense will be minimized, and so that we will have our route placed in as advantageous a position as is the route from New York via Buffalo. We unquestionably hope to attract business from Buffalo and from other towns along the lakes, but we never could attract it, unless we are equipped for the purpose.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I cannot help believing that any one who studies the situation carefully, who familiarizes himself with existing conditions, who inquires into the cost of the water carriage, and railway carriage and the expense of transshipment at the various points; will see that with Montreal properly equipped, there is no reason in the world why we should not be able to offer sufficient inducements to the shippers of grain from the west to prefer the St. Lawrence to any other route.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett), in the course of his remarks, said that we proposed to spend $5,000,000 upon Port Colborne. I think that statement has been more than answered by gentlemen who have already spoken on this side of the House, but, I can say, that no such large outlay has been contemplated by government. I know that there is no occasion at present—possibly there may not be any occasion for some years to come—for making an outlay anything like as large; anything like half as large, as the hon. gentleman has stated. I believe that the deepening of the entrance to Port Colborne; I believe that the erection of such a moderate number of piers as will be necessary, and the building of a sufficient breakwater will not cost much, if anything, over $2,000,000. I think $2,000,000 ought to be sufficient for the purpose, not to speak of $5,000,000. Last year, when the vote was taken, I explained what our views were upon the question. I said that we were of opinion that the entrance of the channel must be deepened to 20, 21 or 22 feet. Perhaps, while we are at the work, it would be wiser to deepen it one or two feet more than at the moment may be imperatively necessary, because the cost of the additional deepening then would be relatively less when once we have our arrangements made, and the contractors at work. At all events, it must be deepened to 20 feet, in order that we may be in a position to accommodate vessels of the draft which now go to Buffalo.

Then, in addition to the deepening and widening of the entrance, we require an extension of our existing piers, with some further wharf or pier accommodation to enable at least two vessels at a time to lie and tranship at the entrance, so that at that point, and upon these piers, an elevator—one or more elevators, if required—can be constructed to facilitate transshipment. That is imperatively necessary, and I shall, before I resume my seat, tell the House why we have reached this conclusion. We have not come hastily to such conclusion; we have not reached it without due consideration; we have not reached it relying on our own opinion and judgment; we have not reached it without taking counsel with those who are the best qualified to advise us on this question; we have not reached it and determined upon it without having taken into our confidence and conferred with men who are engaged and interested in the shipping business, and who desire to see such works carried on and such arrangements completed as will best secure the transfer of this traffic by the ports on the St. Lawrence. The hon. gentleman says that if you spend your millions, you will not be in any better position at Port Colborne than you are at present. I entirely dissent from that proposition. Why does the hon. gentleman say that? In completing the works of the character and to the extent that I have indicated, why shall we not be in a better position? Consult with the superintending engineer of the Welland Canal, and ask him what he thinks about the position there. He will tell you that in the absence of a sufficient breakwater there is no safety or security for either large or small vessels. The large vessels cannot go in and the smaller vessels will not go in without a breakwater. I do not care whether small or large vessels enter the canal, a breakwater is required, in the opinion of all the engineers whom we have consulted. I consulted necessarily, Mr. Thompson, as engineer of the canal. As the next best person, whose knowledge, experience and judgment I thought would be in every way worthy of credit, and on whose opinion I could rely, I consulted Mr. Keefer, and he is of opinion that a breakwater at Colborne is a necessity. I am free to confess that he would rather favour transshipment at Port Maitland, a port fifteen or twenty miles away. That is Mr. Keefer's view, and no doubt it is one that deserves consideration; but I have been forced to the conclusion, after having heard Mr. Keefer—and Mr. Thompson and the chief engineer of my department together, discussing the question fully, that Port Maitland was not to be considered alongside of Port Colborne under all the circumstances.

Mr. CLARKE. For what reason?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. For many reasons. I would be very glad to furnish my hon. friend with the reasons, but it would not perhaps be germane to the present discussion, and would take me rather longer than I think I ought to take at this time.

Mr. BENNETT. If the hon. minister will read carefully what I said, he will find that I did not make the statement that the Port Colborne improvement would be worthless; but I said that the difference would be the percentage of advantage you might have there in transferring from a 250,000-bushel boat to a 60,000-bushel boat, as against the advantage we now have of transferring from a 60,000-bushel boat to a 20,000-bushel boat at Kingston. I do not wish to be understood as saying that the expenditure at Port Colborne would be worthless.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If the hon. gentleman had followed me, he would have heard that I did not say that he had stated that the expenditure would be worthless, but that if we expended the millions we proposed—he put the amount at over $5,000,000—we would not be in any better position than we are at present at Port Colborne. I will read from Hansard just what the hon. gentleman did say, referring to the alleged proposition to spend $5,000,000:

That proposition means so large an expenditure of money that, I contend, the government should hesitate and think twice before they plunge into it, especially having regard to the fact that, even if you do accomplish all this, you will not be, by any large percentage, in a better position than we are at the present time, when the sixty-thousand-bushel boat goes to Kingston, and its cargo is transferred to the fifteen-thousand-bushel boat.

I say that the hon. gentleman is entirely in error in that. We shall be in a very much better position. We have to-day no fit harbour at Port Colborne. We require one there. We require it supplied with a sufficient breakwater, so that vessels may come in safely, and when they get in may remain safely; and in the absence of a breakwater you cannot secure those two conditions. Vessels will not attempt to enter the canal if there is not a breakwater there. You will not find a single shipper on the lakes who will tell you that in some weathers which prevail on Lake Erie, they could be induced to take a vessel of any size into Port Colborne, unless we had a proper breakwater there. They would go on to Buffalo, they have gone on to Buffalo, and they will continue to go on to Buffalo until we make these improvements. I do not know of any reason why Port Colborne as a port might not, with the expenditure of the sum I have named, be as favourably situated as the port of Buffalo. The port or harbour of Buffalo is not a natural port or harbour; it has been made. We can make Port Colborne, as the engineers and other persons who profess to know tell me, at a less expenditure; and even if we had to spend as much money as was spent at Buffalo, we should be in as good a position to invite vessels of all classes to enter that port to tranship their cargoes as they are at Buffalo.

Mr. CLARKE. Might I ask the hon. minister if he has any plans available to the members of the House showing the contemplated improvements to be made at Port Colborne harbour, involving an expenditure of $2,000,000, together with the reports of the engineers? We have not seen those yet.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Undoubtedly there are plans showing just what the department designed with respect to the improvements at Port Colborne. I am speaking now only of my own department.

Mr. CLARKE. We had plans last year, but they involved an expenditure of over $5,000,000. We have not yet seen the plans of which the minister is speaking, which contemplate the expenditure of $2,000,000.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I made no statement, nor did I exhibit any plans last year showing that there would be an expenditure of $5,000,000.

Mr. CLARKE. But the engineer of the Department of Public Works, who made the survey plans of the harbour, for the purpose of completing it and equipping it, submitted plans contemplating an expenditure of over $5,000,000.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think it was very fully explained to hon. members last year that the plans that were brought down to the House were brought under circumstances which show that they had been determined on by the department or confirmed and approved by the government. The engineer of the Public Works Department was sent to make plans and suggestions as to works at Port Colborne. We know that engineers' idea often are to do these works on the most extensive and sometimes the most expensive scale; and when the item was under consideration in Committee of Supply, my hon. colleague who had charge of the Public Works estimates sent to the department for the plans, and they sent those plans which had been originally designed by one of the engineers, but which had not been approved and which I do not think ever will be approved.

Mr. CLARKE. Might we see the plans which have been approved for that expenditure of $2,000,000?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Certainly, I shall have great pleasure in exhibiting to hon. members the plans to which I am now referring, and which give the entrance and the piers. My department has nothing to do with the question of the breakwater; but I am warranted in saying that a breakwater is absolutely necessary and can be put there to answer every present purpose, and until business shall enormously increase, at a less cost than a million dollars.

Mr. SPROULE. Does the contemplated expenditure cover not only the breakwater, but the piers and the deepening of the entrance?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. $2,000,000, I think, would be amply sufficient—$1,000,000 for deepening the entrance and for the piers, and another $1,000,000 for the breakwater.

Mr. SPROULE. And the elevator?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There is no proposal that we shall build an elevator, but we will give facilities to anybody who desires to build one. There will be plenty of room to build not one but more.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood the Minister of Public Works to contemplate the building of an elevator by the government.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am inclined to think that the hon. gentleman misunderstood him. The government have had no intention to build elevators, down to the present, at all events.

Mr. CLARKE. Does the work of dredging and deepening the harbour belong to the hon. gentleman's department?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Dredging the harbour does not belong to my department; but if it happened that the dredging of the entrance to a sufficient width means to any extent dredging the harbour, then, it would come within my jurisdiction. There is sometimes an overlapping of jurisdiction in these matters. The entrance to the Port Colborne Canal would naturally be included in the harbour generally, and so far as making the entrance is concerned, we would be dredging a part of the harbour in dredging the entrance.

Before taking up this work of the Port Colborne entrance, we conferred with the shipping men. I think there is scarcely a firm of either ocean or lake shippers in Canada that has not expressed an opinion that it was necessary for the purposes of lake traffic and securing the carriage of these grain cargoes through to Montreal, to have this work done at Port Colborne. I have received letters and petitions and memorials from many people, very strongly favouring this policy. There has been a very general consensus of opinion on the part of those interested in the business in this direction, and I have yet to find any one who is either interested in the lake shipping or the shipments of lake products from Montreal, who is not of that opinion, and who does not entirely endorse these proposals in a general way.

Following the hon. gentleman's further observations in support of this resolution, I find that, despairing of our making a success of the St. Lawrence route, ignoring the fact, it seems to me, that this wonderful river, this great stretch of water passes through our country and finds its outlet below Montreal and Quebec—the hon. gentleman—turned away from this route altogether to railways, and rather appears to conclude that, after all, railways are our main dependence. The hon. gentleman said that we are brought face to face with the fact that the expenditure of private capital has succeeded in diverting more trade into Canadian channels than the expenditure of $70,000,000 on the St. Lawrence by the Canadian government. This statement, if it means anything at all, means the conclusion that we should practically throw all our hopes and expectations with regard to the St. Lawrence to the winds, and rely upon what the railways can do for us. In support of this view, the hon. gentleman tells us that a great deal has been accomplished by the Canada Atlantic Railway, and I think he referred also to the achievements in the same direction by the Canadian Pacific Railway and Grand Trunk.

Mr. BENNETT. The Grand Trunk Railway.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, from Midland. I am not prepared to say that under some conditions and at some times, rail transport may not possibly compare favourably with water transport.

Mr. POUPORE. Very rarely.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am inclined to think very rarely, and I think under exceptional conditions. I do not think that, taking one year with another and one season with another, they are to be mentioned in the same connection. You can carry across the Atlantic from Montreal to Liverpool a cargo of grain at a lower rate than you can bring it from any point west of Winnipeg to Fort William. You can bring from the centre of Europe across the Atlantic to Montreal goods at rates of freight cheaper than the rates at which you could send the same goods from Montreal to London, Ontario. Water must invariably have the advantage.

Mr. POUPORE. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Water has the advantage under all ordinary conditions, and the circumstances must be exceptional when a railway can be the successful rival of a water route.

It may be that the Parry Sound Railway has been carrying grain at a profit from Parry Sound. I would be very sorry to say a word which would suggest that it has been doing that business at a loss. I am prepared to admit that it may have been doing it at a profit, but I do not know that it has. The business is not one which has been established. I hope it may prove eminently successful in the interests of the people who are engaged in it. There is nothing which would give all of us more satisfaction than to know that Mr. Booth, in that particular development of his enterprise, had achieved splendid success, but it is not demonstrated, and I doubt if it will be. At all events, it is perfectly clear that the experience of the wide world over justifies this statement, that while there are some who are prepared to believe that railways can compete with water, that is not accepted as a fact. It is not established—that is clear. The question of rail as against water which the hon. gentleman seems—I do not wish to overstate his argument, but to do it full justice—which he seems rather to think is established against water and in favour of rail, is an open question to-day, if it is not decided absolutely against the railways. And the subject is not one that has not been thought about, it is not one that has not been thrashed out, it is not one that has not been considered by the most capable men on both sides of the Atlantic, nor is it one that we have not had very pronounced opinions upon from very competent sources. Why, if canals had been defeated by railways, should we have found the conditions existing which we know exist in Europe to-day? Certainly not. There has been a wonderful growth of canal construction in Europe, in countries which are very much like our own in that the canals are closed during a portion of the year. In Russia there has been an immense increase in the canal mileage. They have not abandoned the canals by any means. In Austria and Germany they are building canals all the time. What does that prove? That proves that the contest between rail and water has not been determined, at all events against water, for otherwise canals would not be constructed.

There has been some very recent and very important evidence upon this question. In the state of New York, as has been mentioned by one or more gentlemen who have spoken on this question, a commission was appointed by the Governor of the state a year and a half or two years ago. The members of that commission were selected by the Governor of New York with the utmost care, from among the men who were considered to be the most competent to investigate and report on this question. When the personnel of the commission was made known, the press on all sides admitted that a better, wiser choice of commissioners could not have been made. These gen-men took a year to study the question, whether it was or was not worth while to continue the extension or deepening of the canals, whether it was better to go on with canal construction in the state of New York or to drop such work, whether it would be an advantage to the country to modernize their canals or whether railways could outdo canals in competition. The commission did not confine their inquiries to this side of the Atlantic, to Canada and the United States; they went to Europe and elicited the information which I have in part communicated to this House as to the canals on that continent. The commissioners reached a unanimous conclusion, and it is not unfitting that I should call the attention of the House to the conclusions which were arrived at. The question which was put to them to answer for the information of the public and the Governor of New York State was: Shall our canals be abandoned? We know that their Erie Canal is a very small affair indeed. Its capacity would probably be about one-tenth or perhaps one-twentieth the capacity of our canals. The question was whether this canal should be abandoned, and the answer that the commissioners gave to the question was an emphatic no. They came to the conclusion that the canals might be enlarged with profit, that they might be enlarged with advantage to the country. Even though the enlarging and deepening would cost a large amount of money, that expenditure would bring direct results. They figured out with care and with a great deal of particularity, just what the financial results will be from the expenditure of the money they recommended to deepen the canals so as to give 12 feet clear on the mitre sills. The question is, as I say: Shall the canals be abandoned? This is the answer they give:

In our judgment, water transportation is inherently cheaper than rail transportation. It varies slightly with the size of the vessel and the construction of the waterway.

They go on to elaborate this conclusion, but this is the main point—'in our judgment water transportation is inherently cheaper than rail transportation.' They say that canal transportation, with a 12-foot channel, can be reduced to two-thirds of one mill per ton mile. Now, that is an extraordinary statement, but they establish by the most conclusive calculation that that is a result which can be counted upon with confidence.

Mr. CHARLTON. How much would that be per bushel from Buffalo to New York?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I will give the figures a little later. I have them made up here. They say:

The changes in rates fixed in 1889 were as follows, per bushel: Wheat, 3½ cents; rye, 3¼ cents; corn, 2¾ cents; oats, 2½ cents. The rate of 3½ cents per bushel on wheat is about $1.17 per ton, or 2½ mills per ton mile. . . . The argument in favour of the railways is that private enterprise and private capital will, at an early date, produce on the railroads as low a freight rate as can be produced on the canal by the expenditure of large sums of public money.

If this argument were correct, it is needless to say that no further money should be spent on the enlargement of the canals, but that they should remain in their present condition until plans could be carefully matured for the disposal of them. In our judgment, the argument is not correct. It would carry more weight if it were advanced or approved by practical railway managers—

Now, I ask the attention of the House to this statement:

—and we, therefore, sent the article to the presidents of the New York Central Railroads, of the Illinois Central Railroad and of the Pittsburg, Bessemer and Lake Erie Railroad, the last of which was specially built under the most favourable circumstances for the express purpose of carrying ores and low grade freight at a minimum cost from Conneaut, on the lakes, to Pittsburg. The reply of Mr. Fish is explicit that there is no probability of a rate of one mill per ton mile by rail in the near future. The reply of Mr. Callaway, while not so positive, leaves no doubt in the mind of the reader that the New York Central Railroad has no expectation of quoting any such rate. The reply of Mr. Reed states that during the past summer nearly a million tons of ore were hauled from Conneaut to Pittsburg at an actual cost for transportation alone of 1½ mills per ton mile, the freight rate being 3.65 mills per ton mile.

Now, here is a judgment which we may assume was honestly given by the presidents of three great railway systems appealed to, that they saw no reasonable prospect that the time will arrive in the near future when they will be able to carry freights for one mill a ton mile, and yet it is established by the evidence which these gentlemen furnished, by the calculations they have made, that grain and other freights can be carried on the canals for half a mill per ton mile.

It will, of course, be noticed, that the references which are there made are made to railroads that are constructed under exceedingly favourable conditions, without any serious grades to overcome, with the heaviest rails and the most solid beds, with the largest possible engines, and with the equipment in other ways, in the highest degree, suitable for the carriage of all commodities at a low rate; yet, one mill per ton per mile, is the lowest they hold out as the rate for which freight can be carried. Now, the railways in Canada are not as well situated. If the presidents of these railways could see that in the near future there was a prospect of a reduction of the rates upon their line, there is no ground upon which we in this country could hope to be able to carry our grain at anything like as low rates, because our railways over the same portion of the route which would be traversed in the shipment of these cargoes, have heavy grades and are, therefore, more expensive routes.

Mr. SPROULE. The argument I was endeavouring to present to the House was this, that if you built an elevator at Port Colborne, and if there must be a transshipment there, assuming that the great bulk of the grain would be carried on large vessels to Port Colborne, the transshipment could be easily and as cheaply be made at Parry Sound, or Midland, or Owen Sound, as it could be at Port Colborne. Then with the short railway haul from the Georgian Bay to Montreal. I thought grain could be handled about as cheaply as by the canals. There are only 365 miles in one case, and 375 in the other of railway haul, and the transshipment and loading into elevators would cost about as much at Port Colborne as it would at either Midland or Parry Sound.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I followed the hon. gentleman very carefully, and I refreshed my recollection of his argument by reading the report in the Hansard, and, I understand that was the view that the hon. gentleman presented. But, I do not think that it would justify the conclusion the hon. gentleman would have to draw, that even under these conditions, freight could be carried from the lake points west of Montreal, at anything like as low a rate as it could have been carried all the way by water. The fact is you have to make two or three transshipments, one from your vessel into the car at Parry Sound, another from the car at Coteau on to barges, and another from the barges into the steamer. You have three transshipments as against two.

Mr. SPROULE. I did not take that into account, I presumed the railway would run to Montreal.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am speaking of what has been done at Parry Sound. They do not carry their grain into Montreal, they do not carry it across the United States boundary. If it is for shipment at Montreal, they tranship at Coteau. Now, I will just make one further citation from the report of the New York Commission :

The state of New York must be prepared to face from this time on a serious competition in the export trade over the St. Lawrence route.

It is quite clear that these competent gentlemen do not look upon the St. Lawrence route as anything less than a dangerous rival. They look at it seriously, from the New York point of view, and do not consider the case hopeless for the St. Lawrence route by any means. They say :

The Soulanges Canal, which was the last link in the improvements around the rapids of the St. Lawrence River, has been completed during the year 1899, and nominally opened for business. It will be actually open for business with the spring of 1900. This chain of improvements gives a waterway from Lake Erie through the Welland Canal, Lake Ontario, the St. Lawrence River and its canals capable of carrying boats or barges of about 2,200 tons capacity; the size of the locks is 270 by 40 by 14, admitted vessels 255 feet long, and 12 to 14 feet draught, depending on the advantage of Lake Erie. The expenditures for construction and enlargement of this route during the last fifty years have been over 56 millions dollars, a sum which bears the same ratio to the wealth of Canada as 100 millions would bear to the state of New York.

Further on, they say :

Already propositions have been submitted by a group of Chicago and Buffalo capitalists to the harbour commissioners of Montreal and accepted by the latter, the result of which will be to divert about 35 million bushels of grain from the New York route. These propositions involve the immediate construction of at least fifteen barges of the maximum size which can be used on the canal, and costing $100,000 each, in addition to elevators, warehouses and other structures in the harbour of Montreal, costing more than four million dollars. These propositions contain no exclusive privileges, and it is open to another group of capitalists to make similar arrangements for the diversion of other large amounts of the grain which now passes through New York.

Now, that is the view which is entertained by this commission upon the St. Lawrence route, and upon the character of the competition which the St. Lawrence route is going to offer to the Buffalo and New York route. Let me now proceed to examine the question of freight rates and first I will call the attention of the House to a statement of the prevailing rates, as between the west and New York by Buffalo, on the one hand, and via the Welland Canal and Montreal, on the other hand. If hon. gentleman care to refer to it, they will find it on page 3 of this report. The prevailing rate for the carriage of grain on the lakes from Chicago to Buffalo, they say, for the last two years, has been 1½ cents per bushel; the cost of handling at Buffalo, is put by them as 6¼ mills per bushel; the cost of handling at New York is at 14¾ mills per bushel, making 2 cents and 10 mills as the cost of handling grain at New York and Buffalo alone. The present freight rate from Buffalo to New York is 2½ mills per ton. The hon. gentleman, a while ago, asked me what that was per bushel; it is 3½ cents per bushel.

The rate, therefore, from Chicago to New York, during the past year—there are necessarily times, or periods, when it will vary—the prevailing rate, the rate that you can count upon generally, the actual cost of shipping a bushel of grain from Chicago to New York is 71-10 of a cent. The rate to Port Colborne, we can say, will be the same as the rate to Buffalo, 1½ cents. It will cost, if proper facilities are provided, ½ cent a bushel for transhipment at Port Colborne. It will cost 2 cents from Port Colborne to Montreal. Even though you have to pay canal tolls and Montreal harbour dues, amounting to another cent, and taking into account that it will cost half a cent for handling at Montreal, you can get the same grain from Chicago to Montreal, with our canals deepened and with proper facilities, even though you exact a toll and even though you have to pay harbour dues at Montreal, for less than 6 cents a bushel, as compared with 71-10 cents a bushel. Even though we could only count upon one-quarter of a cent advantage; I would say that with even less than that, the advantage would secure us the traffic if we have arrangements for properly and speedily handling the traffic at Montreal when it reaches that port. I agree with those gentlemen who have expressed the opinion and with my hon. friend who argued it so strongly, as to the imperative need of having proper facilities at Montreal. I am hoping that the arrangements which have been entered into between the harbour commissioners of Montreal and what is called the Conners Syndicate will give us, some, if not all, of those needed facilities. I am in hopes they will, if that work goes on, and I am assured it will, although, of course, one can never be positively certain of anything until it is accomplished. It is necessary that something should be done to provide facilities at Montreal, and if we have proper facilities there, from all the information I can gather, there is no reason in the world why we should not be able to make a great saving in time alone, as between the port of Montreal and the port of New York sufficient to give us the advantage of a good rate of freight. It takes from 6 to 7 days for a steamer in the port of New York to unload, load and clear, while at Montreal, with proper facilities, that business can be done in less than three days. Taking into account a probable reduction in insurance, in time saved, at the port of Montreal, I am sure that there will be the best results if those things which are required in Montreal shall be supplied.

Mr. SPROULE. There should be a reduction in insurance rates.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I agree that there is some need for that and I think the chances of improvement in that direction are not hopeless. I believe that the additional lighting which is being provided by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) will favourably impress Lloyds in England and shipowners generally, and I believe that the additional works which are in progress under the direction of the Department of Public Works will make the channel in due time everything that can be desired during a large portion of the year. The ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart) who,

Mr. BLAIR.

I am sorry to say, is not here, told us that there was very little advantage after all to be hoped for by securing a large part of the traffic which now goes via Buffalo, because, he said, that it is not of such volume, or magnitude, that it is worth securing, or worth taking very much trouble about. He went on to state to us that the shipments that were made from the port of New York were nothing like what we imagined they were. He said that they did not exceed, altogether, in grain and flour, 75,000,000 bushels, and in grain only about 19,000,000 bushels. The point of his argument was that if there were only 19,000,000 bushels of grain shipped from New York every year, it is evident that the rest of the grain that reaches New York via Buffalo goes into home consumption, and that there is no particular advantage in making any effort to capture a part or the whole of the traffic because the quantity is so trifling. I have taken some pains to ascertain whether the hon. gentleman was quite correct in the statement he made in this respect and I did not find that he was. I did satisfy myself, that, during the year 1899, to which he referred, there was a smaller volume of grain shipped from the port of New York than usual. These things, of course, occasionally occur, but they are no evidence at all that the falling off is permanent unless in the shipments you can make a comparison between that port and others to show that while the port of New York had fallen off in the volume of its grain shipments, other ports had increased. The argument might, perhaps, be made. I think that you would make a better comparison if you took a series of three or four years. I have done that, and I find that shipments have been constantly on the increase from New York for the three years, 1896, 1897 and 1898. They were 150,000,000 bushels, in round numbers, in 1896; 188,000,000 bushels in 1897; and 195,000,000 bushels in 1898. That is grain received at the port of New York, not shipments from, but grain received at that port, so that the grain which arrived, at all events, during these years, increased in volume. How is it with the grain that was shipped out to foreign ports to which the hon. gentleman referred? In 1896, there arrived at New York, for export, and which was actually exported, 69,000,000 bushels in round figures; in 1897, 117,000,000 bushels, and in 1898, 124,000,000 bushels and upwards, a continuous increase during these three years. I did not go back beyond 1896, but, I am pretty well assured, that, had I done so, I would have found that the total shipments were less than they were in either of these years. They show a continued growth in exports of grain products from this port, and the statement goes to show that enough export of grain does take place to justify us in making considerable efforts to secure a part. There we have an average of 104,000,000 bushels of grain each year sent out during these three years. In the summer, which has just closed, the amount did not exceed over 88,000,000 bushels, but, even if only 88,000,000 bushels were usually supplied via Buffalo to New York for foreign export, I think we would be justified in making an effort to secure a portion of that traffic as we assuredly will do. If we could secure 50,000,000 bushels, or even half of it, we would not be justified in making light of the business. The extent to which the traffic is growing upon the lakes is scarcely realized by our people, and while I admit, with the hon. member (Mr. Bennett), that there has been no considerable increase, or perhaps rather a falling off in the amount of tonnage in Canadian bottoms, as compared with some years ago, yet, we are not going to be at all confined to Canadian shipping for traffic through our canals. We would open our door, and have opened our door to all steamers plying on the lakes, and invite them to take their cargoes through the canals. The growth of the lake shipping has been stupendous, and the character of that growth, is such as to more than justify the opinion, that if we fit ourselves out to do business, we cannot help but get a very substantial part of it. In 1851 the vessel tonnage on the lakes amounted to only 215,000 tons, and in 1875, it had grown to 600,000 tons. Shortly after that the Sault Ste. Marie Canal was constructed, and that gave such a great impetus to lake shipping, that in 1890, the vessel tonnage on the lakes had grown to 1,000,000 tons, and in 1898, it was 1,500,000 tons. The opening of that canal had the effect of encouraging the building of larger vessels and the use of steamers in place of other craft, so that the freight tonnage showed a much greater increase than even the vessel tonnage. In 1885, the freight tonnage on the lakes was 19,200,000 tons; in 1890, it had grown to 37,500,000 tons, and in 1898, it had grown to 62,500,000 tons. In thirteen years it had almost quadrupled itself. There is this striking fact, which I think may well be remembered as an argument in justification of the deepening of our canals. After the Sault Ste. Marie Canal was deepened, the actual tonnage increased in far greater proportions than it ever did before. In 1890, 9,000,000 tons passed through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, and in 1898, 18,000,000 tons. In these eight years the tonnage through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal doubled itself.

Mr. COWAN. Has the hon. minister the Canadian tonnage as distinct from the American tonnage in the years mentioned, 1851, 1875 and 1898?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, I have not the Canadian tonnage. This is all American tonnage. The effect of canal competition upon railway rates is really very significant, and, if we had no other reason for deepening our canals than that it would give us a check and control over railway rates, we would not need any other justification for that expenditure. In 1868, the rate by rail from Buffalo to New York, was 14½ cents a bushel, and to-day the rate does not exceed 3·40 cents. On the canals the rate in 1868 was 11·15 cents per bushel, and to-day it is 2·82 cents per bushel. The canal rates have always kept a little below, and they will continue to keep below the railway rates. I am speaking now of the Erie Canal, which, in my belief, will continue to be quite an important competitor with the railway, but its effect has been more, on account of the influence which it has had upon railway rates, than in any other direction. With a view of showing just what traffic is open to us to compete for, when we are put in shape to do this business, I shall call attention to the extent of the grain and mill products which reached the various points on the lake system, and a portion of which we might very well invite to seek an outlet by our route. We can, I think, enter into successful competition with Ogdensburg, with Oswego, with Buffalo, and possibly, even with Erie or Cleveland, which have all been doing a very considerable business. Buffalo unquestionably handles a very large amount of this freight. The tonnage of grain and mill products handled at Buffalo in 1895, was 4,300,000; in 1896, 5,500,000; in 1897, 6,500,000; and in 1898, 7,000,000.

Mr. McCLEARY. Are you quite sure these are bushels?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Oh, no, they are not bushels; they are tons. You will observe that in Buffalo, there was a continued and substantial increase in the growth of their business. The tonnage received at Buffalo in 1898 was almost double that received in 1895. The amount of business done at Ogdensburg in 1895, was 166,000 tons; in 1898, 243,000 tons. The amount of business done at Erie in 1895, was 419,000 tons, and in 1898, 709,000 tons. It is apparent from these figures that Buffalo is the point and the port which we must make our main object of attack, and it is the point which has the business worth capturing, and that we can well devote our attention in that direction.

The references which were made by the hon. member for East Simcoe to what is called the Connors agreement were, I think, quite unfair. I do not think the hon. gentleman has sufficient information with regard to that subject to enable him to criticise it, much less to justify him in condemning it. I do not believe that he had ever read the contract which was made when he undertook in the most unqualified manner to condemn the transaction as discreditable to all parties concerned, and particularly discreditable to the government. Now, there is nothing in that transaction which the government has any occasion at all to be ashamed of. There is nothing in it to which they might not invite the very closest scrutiny. On the contrary, the agreement is one which, if it is effective and it is carried out, if it results in the construction of the works contemplated, cannot fail to be of enormous advantage to the port of Montreal. My hon. friend was in error, in the first place, in connecting the government with it to the extent he did. The government had nothing to do with it further than when the Board of Harbour Commissioners of Montreal applied for approval of the arrangement, the government had it in their power to withhold approval if they saw fit, or to approve. We had that discretion. We had no part in the making of the contract; we had no part in adjusting or fixing the terms of the contract. That was done by men who were entitled at all events to be considered as competent to deal with it, men who had the interests of the port of Montreal at heart, men who would not be likely to sacrifice the interests of the port for any consideration that would be offered to them, men who certainly gave no end of time to the negotiations, who studied the question, as I am credibly informed, from every point of view, and who exhibited the most earnest anxiety to have an arrangement come to which would be to the advantage of the city and port of Montreal. My hon. friend did not hesitate to sit down on the port of Montreal and everybody connected with it and condemn them in the most unqualified manner. Why did he do that? Upon the strength of what information did the hon. gentleman do it?

Mr. BENNETT. May I ask the minister this question: Was not resort had to the courts to restrain the Board of Montreal Harbour Commissioners from entering into the contract which they did enter into?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not know that. I am not informed.

Mr. BENNETT. It is in the newspapers.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am just now informed that there was such an application made, and that it was dismissed, and I have no doubt very properly dismissed. But the hon. gentleman assumed that as somebody was dissatisfied, because these works were going on, the arrangement was bad. I can conceive of many persons who would be dissatisfied. I do not want to blame anybody, but I can conceive that there were people who had an interest in condemning the old state of affairs, and if the arrangement could be postponed even for a year, it would be a great pecuniary advantage to some of them, I have no doubt, and they would therefore move in that direction. But whether they did or did not, the fact of a lawsuit proves nothing. The question is, did the hon. gentleman take the trouble to inform himself of what the terms and conditions of that contract were? Did he know what he was condemning when he was condemning it?

Mr. BENNETT. Will the minister allow me to ask him a question? Under the terms of the contract, is there a completion of it on the part of the Connors company, if they effect a carrying trade of 30,000,000 bushels per annum?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think there is something of that kind. I think they will be held to comply with their contract if they put up certain works and provide two elevators at the points indicated; and if in the first year that the works are in operation they transfer twenty-five or thirty million bushels of grain. If they do that, they will duplicate the output of the port of Montreal in one year, which is no mean thing to accomplish, and which is an object very desirable to see effected. And does the hon. gentleman imagine that people who are going to spend, if they do spend, four or five or six millions of dollars in order to enable them to transfer twenty-five million bushels, are not going to add to this all the business they can secure? Will it not be to their interest to increase the business, and the public will be protected when they have to carry it on under supervision and control of people who will be alert, and whose interest it will be to see that no improper advantages are permitted as against others interested in the trade? When my hon. friend undertook to condemn the government, he did so without warrant. We had no more hand nor part in it than I have indicated, and I think it would have been a grave responsibility for this government, after the Montreal Board of Harbour Commissioners had considered the question and come to a complete agreement upon it, to take upon itself to say, We will not give it our imprimatur, but we will defeat your negotiations, we will defeat this enterprise, we will leave the port of Montreal unequipped for another year or two, until some other person comes prepared to make a more favourable proposition. There is nothing in the transaction which justifies any one at all in criticising it in a hostile sense, but, as far as I am familiar with its contents, the contrary; especially when it is realized that these people, as is said in the report of the New York commissioners, get no monopoly, no exclusive rights. They get nothing more than can be got by others who are willing to put their money into the same kind of enterprise. It does not follow that because there are one or two localities indicated as the sites on which these elevators should be constructed, all the elevator space convenient or suitable in the port of Montreal has been exhausted. On the contrary, you could put fifty elevators along the harbour front, and probably a hundred. I do not know as to that, but there is practically no limit to the number of elevators you can put there if the people had the means and were disposed to erect them. So I say that when these people came along and put up their cash deposit of $50,000, as an evidence of their bona fides in this matter, and were prepared to enter into the agreement, the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal did wisely in making a contract with them, and I only hope that these gentlemen will succeed in financing the undertaking so as to carry it forward to a successful conclusion.

My hon. friend, as far as I can gather, from a careful perusal of his speech, came to certain conclusions. These were that we should call a halt, that we should throw over our canal policy, that we should cease doing anything at Port Colborne, and that we should look to railways instead of water routes. My hon. friend seriously propounded, as a substitute for the government policy, that we should give railways bonuses for hauling grain in preference to water routes. Those are the conclusions to which the hon. gentleman came, as fairly as they can be abstracted from the speech he made. When the hon. gentleman invited an expression of opinion by this House on the question of transportation, he was in duty bound to give us the best information he could on this important question, and to give us a guide, at all events, in some practical direction, in substitution of the course the government has taken; and I think I am not doing the hon. gentleman any injustice when I say that instead he led us into a fog and planted us where we can see no light. He simply said to us: Put down your hands; abstain from doing anything at all; do not strike a further blow; let this transportation go to the dogs unless you are prepared to take up railways and give them a bonus for doing the carrying trade.

My hon. friend, the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart) made some references to this question of barge transport, and he referred to the Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal, and two or three other subjects, which, I fear, without trespassing too much on the patience of the members, I could not dwell upon at any length tonight. I should like to point out, however, that the hon. gentleman's views with regard to the barge business do not agree with the opinions of men in the business. They are entirely opposed to the opinion of men, who have been carrying on the lake shipping business for years, as can be easily proved, and I would prefer disregarding the opinion of the ex-Minister of Railways to disregarding the opinion of these other people I have mentioned.

I would like to make a remark on the subject of the Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal, concerning which a very startling statement was made by the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart). He told this House that this was not a new project at all, which, of course, we all knew, and that the government of the late Sir John Macdonald had determined to take up the construction of the Ottawa and Georgian Bay canal and build it as a government work by expending a million dollars a year for twenty years. Every one who heard that statement assumed that the hon. gentleman was speaking of something of which he had personal knowledge, and he undoubtedly led the House to believe that while he was a member of the government of the late Sir John Macdonald that policy was determined upon. Well, I am bound to say that if it was, there is not any evidence in the records and archives of the government which bears out the statement. In my department—the House will scarcely credit it, after what they have heard from my predecessor—there is not an officer who ever heard that any such project was in contemplation. More than that, there is not a paper which indicates that such a policy was ever under consideration, much less actually decided upon. There is not a survey of the canal except one, and that was made either half or three-quarters of a century ago for a nine foot canal. There are no calculations, no plans, no nothing; and when I mentioned this statement of my predecessor to the deputy minister, he was entirely taken by surprise, for so far as his knowledge went, no such decision had ever been arrived at, and no such question had ever seriously been considered. One can very well believe that the hon. gentleman must have dreamt that such a policy was determined upon. Whether it was a day dream or a night dream or what kind of dream, I do not know, but he evidently must have dreamed that the government, of which he was a member, had come to this very important determination on a question of great magnitude, or he would not have made the statement; moreover, the estimate of cost which he places at $20,000,000 is sufficient for a twelve-foot canal. He said they were going to make a twelve-foot channel. Well, that could not be built for less, I believe, to-day than in the neighbourhood of $30,000,000. We could not build it in twenty years at the rate of $1,000,000 a year. Do you imagine that anybody ever suspected that it was in contemplation to start a work of that magnitude as a government work at any time within the last ten, fifteen or twenty years? I will be very sorry to have it supposed that I was expressing any opinion adverse to the proper consideration of this project later. Not at all, it may be the duty of the government to take up the subject seriously and look into it, but I think it is our first duty to get through with the large undertakings we have in hand before we enter on any fresh undertaking of a serious character.

The hon. gentleman also discussed the action of the late government, and praised that government for pushing the works so rapidly towards completion. He said the works were being pushed with great vigour and there was no disposition at all to postpone or delay their completion. Well, I am unable to assent to that proposition. I think that the hon. gentleman forgot what did take place. He does not recall the facts. The evidence is too abundant, it appears to me, to admit of any other conclusion than that which has been stated from this side of the House.

I was asked a question yesterday by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), whether the late government carried on this work with proper speed or not. Here is the question :

Whether it was the policy of the late government of Canada or of the late Finance Minister of Canada to complete the St. Lawrence canals with all possible despatch, or to pursue a dilatory policy in connection with the work?

And the answer I gave was as follows :

I am of opinion that the policy of the late government was not to complete the St. Lawrence canals with all possible despatch, but was to pursue a dilatory policy in connection with the work.

This answer excited the mirth and jeers of my hon. friends opposite. I think my hon. friend from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), who had such a poor opinion of the bonafides of his friends of the late government indulged as heartily as any in ridiculing the answer I gave. Now, I did not make that statement as a mere supposition of my own. I stated it knowing what progress had been made upon the canals during the last three or four years that had preceded my advent into this office. I stated it on the strength of evidence which was in my possession. I take one of the canals, the Soulanges Canal, which is, of course, the most important of the canals constituting the St. Lawrence system. It holds the key of the situation. If it is not complete, we cannot hope to provide the fourteen-foot channel this year ; if it is complete, the others will be ready. This canal is divided into twelve sections. In going over these sections, I found that on some of them, and very important ones they were too, the contractors were simply trifling with the work. On section 12, at the rate of progress being made between the years 1893 and 1896, it would take just 30 years to complete the work. Taking sections 1 and 2, I found that if the work were pushed on with the rapidity and vigour which characterized the late government, these sections would be finished in between 6 and 7 years. I found that if they persisted in rushing the work as they were rushing it on sections 4, 5, 6 and 7, those sections would be completed in 27 years. You will see I was not quite unwarranted in making the statement which I did. But

Mr. BLAIR.

I have other evidence which, in conjunction with what I have given, will enable the House to form an opinion as to whether this work was deliberately delayed or whether it was pushed forward with proper vigour. The testimony I am about to furnish is given by the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart) himself. That hon. gentleman was summoned, in a case in court not very many months ago, a case in which the Crown was being sued by one of the canal contractors. The ex-Minister of Railways and Canals gave his evidence under oath, and I have a copy of that evidence as it was taken. I find that the hon. gentleman stated positively and explicitly, under oath, that he himself went to the contractors as far back as 1894 and told them that it was the policy of the government not to have these works pushed on, that the Minister of Finance had concluded that we must not spend money so fast and had better dilly-dally and go slowly until they should otherwise decide.

Mr. TALBOT. So that there might be money for the Tay Canal.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, I think the intention was to start out vigorously before the general election, so that the undertaking might have the best results for the government in the election contests.

Now, my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) had one criticism to pass upon the canals the other day, and I wish to remove any doubt that may have remained in his mind or in the mind of any hon. gentleman on the point to which he called attention. He intimated that the St. Lawrence route was a very crooked route, and that the government should straighten it. I want to say that the St. Lawrence is not a very crooked route ; it is as straight as any river route you will find anywhere. And the work which is being done and which will be done will make it absolutely free from any objections on account of crookedness. I do not pretend to say that the St. Lawrence route is an ideal route in every particular. I do not say that there may not be points where you could widen the channel to some advantage. I do not say that that will not be done. I think wherever the occasion may appear to render necessary additional expenditure, the route will be from time to time improved. You never can name any period of time, you cannot say that the day will ever arrive when it will not be possible to say that more money can be spent to advantage in this direction or in that. You can do that upon any natural waterway ; you can say that as to any canal structure that you can make. But I do say, that the engineers who are engaged on the St. Lawrence canals, the chief engineer and other superintending engineers who know whereof they speak, authorize me to say to parliament and to the country that the St.

Lawrence route is in first-class, efficient condition. There are no difficulties in its way, no crookedness in that space, the lights and buoys are not going to be neglected. But we have not lights up now, we have not buoys up now, but we will have both up in due time, and we will have all the equipment that is necessary.

Mr. SPROULE. I did not give it as something of my own knowledge. I drew attention to the fact that it appeared in the Montreal Witness, and I thought in all probability that he must have seen it himself.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman very properly refers to the Montreal Witness, and I propose to make a reference to that before I sit down. But I want to assure him that it is a slander upon the St. Lawrence route to say that it is a crooked route. It is not a crooked route, and we have as wide a channel as any shippers can reasonably ask for. But no responsible person has expressed the opinion that the canal is defective in any of these particulars; on the contrary, the opinion is entirely the other way. I am sorry to see evidence of a determined purpose in some quarters to create a doubt as to the canal being in a proper condition, and as to its being likely to be opened and available for the coming season. I cannot understand the reason of this hostility, it cannot proceed from any political bias, because I apprehend no political advantage can be reaped by any party in giving circulation to those reports. But, Sir, they are not correct. The canal will be opened, and will afford a thoroughly effective and useful service as soon as the navigation of the St. Lawrence is opened, there is no doubt about that. I have in my hand a statement furnished to me on that point bearing the assurances of all the engineers. It is not necessary to read it, it is somewhat lengthy; but it has been furnished to me for use if any further question is raised. It is signed by the chief engineer and deputy minister, the superintendent of the Lachine Canal, Mr. Marceau, the superintendent of the Soulanges Canal, Mr. Monroe, and the superintendent of the St. Lawrence Canals, Mr. Rubidge. They all say in the most unqualified terms that the canal will be ready for use as soon as the river opens, and as soon as the canals are ordinarily required to be opened.

The question of lighting the canal has also been provided for. In this connection I may as well say that we did not last year have it lighted for a 14-foot service, because we did not expect, as the season advanced, that we would be able to secure a through channel, in time for the fall business. But we sent orders home early in the season last year for the gas buoys that we intend to utilize. They did not reach us last fall, but that was not our fault. It happened that the United States government got in a short time ahead of us. There is only one firm which manufactures these gas buoys, an English firm, and they have a monopoly. Those we are to use had recently been invented, and last year was the first year they were manufactured. The United States became aware of the existence of these kind of buoys having been introduced, though I do not think they knew it any sooner than we did. But they got in their order a little ahead of us, so that when our order went forward the manufacturers had already the order for ninety from the United States, which was all they could make last year. But they have gone on with our order, and ours will be in hand in a short time. So we have made every arrangement that is deemed necessary to put our canals in first-class shape. I want to repeat and emphasize the assurance so that it may go abroad, so that when Mr. Callaway or anybody else undertakes to cast a doubt upon the efficiency of the canal, for some purpose which may not be supposed to be in our interest, there may be an authoritative statement in contradiction; and that it may be known that the department can guarantee that the 14-foot through channel will be available at the opening of the season in a perfect and efficient manner.

Now, I will make a reference to what appeared in the Montreal Witness on this question. I was very much surprised to see this statement in the Montreal Witness, and regret that they have been misled to the extent of giving it a place in their columns. Some person who professed to know, some person who I think must be or must have been in the employment of the department, has made up the statement for publication. The statement appears in the issue of the 13th of February. I say at once that I entirely acquit the publishers of the Montreal Witness of any disposition to create an unfavourable impression without thinking that they were justified in doing so. I am sure that they were convinced of the absolute truthfulness of what they were circulating when they published it. I wish to say that as a matter of justice to the publishers of the Witness. I have seen nothing which would lead me to suppose they would deal otherwise than fairly with the government, or with any of its departments, but they have been absolutely misled. I have gone through their statement in all its details. I have myself interrogated the engineers on the question, and I have ascertained that there is no obstruction, no obstacle, to a safe and satisfactory use of the channel from the beginning of it to the end. There are boulders referred to in this statement as located in particular places. It is true there are boulders located just where these people say, two or three of them; but it happens that they are not in the channel, they are in parts of the rapids which our canals are constructed to overcome, and when the vessels pass through the canals they pass by the boulders. There is one large rock which lies in the channel, but there is seven hundred or eight hundred feet on each side of it, and we propose to put up a buoy upon it, so there will be no trouble on that score. Now, this article deals with the question of lighting and buoying, and says that the United States had buoys out last year. I have explained how they got ahead of us. I have explained in regard to the lighting. You do not light in winter when the canals are not in use; you do not leave lights and buoys lying around on the canal, but you bring them in when the season closes, and put them out when it opens. There is one thing which I very much regret to see in this statement, and it is :

No plain and practical test has so far been made of the condition of the route as a whole.

This is an explicit statement and as untrue as it is explicit. That route has been swept from one end of it to the other, and carefully swept under the most approved methods and with the proper appliances. It was swept last fall, and will be swept again this spring. Our canals and water stretches are swept more or less every season. You cannot tell what will happen during the winter; when the ice moves, it may bring down obstructions so that you must ascertain by sweeping, whether or not, any obstacles have been brought into the channel. I entirely deny the correctness of the statement that no plain, practical test has been made. The only possible test that could be made, has been made, and will continue to be made. Then the newspaper article goes on to add :

This should be done early next spring.

We have seen people undertaking to tell engineers who have given almost all their lives to this work, that they should do the very thing that they never fail to do under any possible circumstances. It has the effect of creating an impression in the public mind that the men who are in charge of this work, and who have been in charge of it for years, and who are as much interested in seeing that it is properly looked after as any person could be, are not attending to their duty. These officials do not require to be told by the newspapers that they must do something next spring before the canals open, which they have never failed to do in any spring. The article further goes on to say :

This ought to be done by competent engineers and business men, wholly independent of the government, so that the people may be assured of the facts, and not be deluded by a series of promises with no corresponding performance.

I want to ask this House whether it is not very unfair that any such reflection should be passed upon the officers who have charge of these works? What have they done, or failed to do, which would give any colour of justification for any such assault? It is not fair to the men who have been careful and faithful public servants. They are the men that I found here when I came into the department. I have no reason to doubt their entire fitness for their positions, or to have any doubts as to the way in which they have done their duty. I believe that no greater injustice could be done to public men, than by making reflections of this kind upon them, and I am sure that this must have found its way into the columns of the Montreal Daily Witness, without the supervision of the responsible heads. What independent source are you going to appeal to? What class of men are you going to get, that will be more interested in seeing that everything that it was necessary to do and proper to do, is done? These men could have no interest in neglecting their duty, in not having the canals in proper and safe condition, because, otherwise, the first thing that will occur, will be that some vessel will have a hole stove in her bottom, because an obstacle has been left in the river, which it is the duty of these people to have removed. It is absurd, in my mind, to call upon outsiders in such a case, and, if there are any persons who may hear me to-day, or read any report that may be published of what I say as to the condition of these canals, as to their entire fitness for efficient work, when the season opens, I hope they will disabuse their minds of the idea that anything is left undone that should have been done. I must apologize to the House, in conclusion, for the time I have occupied in these remarks, but I thought it fair to go into this subject at length and show that the government has no doubt or question as to the course to be pursued in regard to the St. Lawrence canals. The country started out upon the deepening and enlarging of these canals, and our duty is to finish them in such a shape, that we will be able to turn the vast expenditure made upon them to the best account, and to produce the best results. We decline to halt, we decline to stay our hand, we propose to push forward, and we propose to equip the canals, if parliament will give us the wherewithal to do it, not in a way in which it shall be barely sufficient, but in a way in which it will be said to be beyond doubt, amply sufficient for all proper purposes. We propose to complete the harbour and entrance at Port Colborne. We regard that as essential, in order to work out the whole policy in a successful way, and if nothing should occur, whereby the present plans, which have been embarked upon by the harbour commissioners of Montreal, should not materialize—I see no good reason why they should not—but, in case they should not, I am sure my colleagues will join with me in recognizing that it is our duty to put ourselves in such a position as that we, either in connection with the harbour board, or through an independent terminal organization of some kind, shall have the harbour of Montreal on a footing with the best port on the continent, and put in such a shape that we can do business there speedily, inexpensively, and to greater advantage than it can be done at any other port upon the Atlantic sea-coast.

Mr. McCLEARY. Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the leader of the House, I beg to move that the debate be now adjourned.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT—BUBONIC PLAGUE.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. PRIOR. Mr. Speaker, as I see the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), present, I would like to ask him if he has had any representations from the Pacific coast, in regard to the Bubonic plague, which is said to exist on the American frontier?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). There has been no appearance of any indication of the plague in British Columbia ports, but there has been a case at Port Townsend, and just lately I received, at the department, a report that a case has appeared in the Chinese quarter of San Francisco. As a result, we have given orders that coastwise vessels from United States ports shall be treated the same as if they came from the Orient, at British Columbia ports.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies), what he will take up to-morrow?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I understand that government notices of motion will be taken up, and some of the small Bills on the Order paper before going into supply.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12 o'clock (midnight).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, March 22, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 106) to amend the Patent Act.—(Mr. Gibson.)

Bill (No. 107) to make further provision respecting grants of land to members of the militia force on active service in the North-west.—(Mr. Sutherland.)

WHISKY TAKEN OUT OF BOND.

Mr. DAVIS asked :

How many gallons of whisky did Henry Corby take out of bond in each of the years 1888, 1889, 1890, 1891, 1892, 1893, 1894, 1895, 1896, 1897, 1898 and 1899? What quantity of grain did the said Henry Corby import for the manufacture of whisky in each of the said years?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). I would suggest that the question be withdrawn and another can be made, applying to the whole production in general.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question is dropped.

SUPERINTENDENT OF CREAMERIES, BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

How many dairy experts were permanently employed by the government last year in Manitoba and the North-west Territories in travelling around and instructing the people in the art of butter-making?

2. What was the total cost of their salaries and travelling expenses for the year 1898-9?

3. Will the government appoint two dairy experts this year to attend exclusively to British Columbia, the one for the island and the other for the mainland?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). 1. Mr. Marker and Mr. Mitchell have been the superintendents of creameries in Manitoba and the North-west Territories. 2. The salary of Mr. C. Marker, superintendent of western division of creameries, in the North-west Territories, is $75 per annum, and the salary of Mr. J. W. Mitchell, superintendent of the eastern division, is the same. 3. Mr. Marker's expenses for the fiscal year 1898-9, were $860; Mr. Mitchell's expenses for the fiscal year 1898-9, were $1,350.

THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

Mr. TAYLOR asked :

Is the Postmaster General aware that a number of letters containing a circular, of which the following is a copy:

Ste. Scholastique, March 7, 1900.

Dear Sir,—A new weekly newspaper, 'Le Courrier des Deux Montagnes,' will appear at Ste. Scholastique on or about March 15, the subscription being one dollar a year. While soliciting your subscription, I have the honour to inform you that we will publish the accompanying advertisement in the columns of this newspaper at the rate of $2.50 per annum, this amount being payable immediately after the publication of the first number. The publicity given to your goods throughout our rich district cannot but have good results. Hoping that you will give this proposition your immediate attention, I have the honour to remain, gentlemen,

Your very humble servant,
(Signed) J. A. C. ETHIER, M.P.,
For the Editorial Committee.

were franked through the mails by J. A. C. Ethier, M.P. for Two Mountains? If so, how many of such circulars were so sent? If so sent, does the Postmaster General intend to collect the postage due in respect of such letters?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). The department is not aware, nor am I, of the contents of any letters that pass through the mails. These letters may, or may not pass through the mails, but we have no knowledge of them.

THE PER CENT OF DUTY COLLECTED.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

What was the per cent of duty collected on merchandise imported for home consumption into Canada, taking dutiable and free combined, from July 1, 1890 to 1899, inclusive?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). The percentage of duty collected on merchandise imported for home consumption into Canada, taking dutiable and free combined, for each fiscal year, from July 1, 1890 to 1899, was, as appears on page 7 of the Trade and Navigation Returns, as follows :

1890-1.....	20·06
1891-2.....	17·56
1892-3.....	17·38
1893-4.....	17·13
1894-5.....	16·99
1895-6.....	18·28
1896-7.....	17·87
1897-8.....	16·95
1898-9.....	16 70

STANDARD BARREL FOR FRUIT, &c.

Mr. MILLS asked :

1. Is the government aware that a public meeting of farmers and fruit-growers of King's County, N.S., was held at Kentville, in the said county, on March 10, A.D. 1900, for the purpose of considering and discussing the question of a standard barrel, and that the following resolution was thereat passed unanimously:

Whereas, the farmers and fruit-growers of this county are large producers of apples, potatoes and other like products, which they export in competition with the state of New York and the New England States to the markets of Great Britain and the West Indies; and

Whereas, the National Fruit Growers' Association and the National League of Commission Merchants of the United States have adopted and agreed to use only a standard barrel of a capacity of 100 quarts, United States dry measure, which barrel has been legalized in the state of New York and adopted in the New England States; and

Whereas, the apple barrel legalized during the last session of parliament is of a larger capacity by seven quarts than the barrel now in use by our competitors, a circumstance which we look upon with much apprehension and alarm, because it will entail an annual loss of from $30,000 to $40,000 on apple products alone to the farmers of this county; and

Mr. TAYLOR.

Whereas, no provision has been made for legalizing a barrel for potatoes, a staple in which we are also largely interested, and it would be manifestly undesirable to have barrels of two or more sizes in use:

Therefore resolved, that we do respectfully request the government to repeal the Act of last session, and have an Act passed providing for a standard Canadian barrel for apples, potatoes and like products, of the following dimensions: 26½ inches between the heads, and having a head diameter of 17 inches and a middle diameter of 18½ inches, equal to a capacity of 96 quarts, or three bushels, with a proviso that 'when potatoes are sold by weight, the quantity constituting a barrel shall be 174 pounds;' and Further resolved, that copies of this resolution be forthwith transmitted to the hon. Ministers of Militia, Agriculture and Inland Revenue, with a respectful request that their influence and efforts be exerted to procure the passing of legislation to give effect to this resolution.

(Sgd.) W. E. ROSCOE,
Chairman of Meeting.

(Sgd.) GEO. E. CALKIN,
Secretary.

2. Is the government also aware that the municipality of the county of King's, N.S., by its councillors in council assembled, has also lately discussed and considered the subject-matter of the above-mentioned resolution, and did, in conjunction with the boards of trade of King's County and of Kentville, resolve as follows:

In re Standard Barrel.

Whereas, in February, 1899, the municipal council of King's County, the boards of trade of the county and of Kentville, joined in an address to the hon. the Minister of Agriculture (the hon. the Minister of Militia being also present), in which, among other things, legislation was asked for a standard Canadian barrel of specific capacity for apples, potatoes and similar fruit and roots; and it was requested that the New York State barrel, of which the dimensions were given, should be adopted as the Canadian standard, also for the cogent reason that Canada is a competitor of the United States with similar commodities in the same markets; and

Whereas, the consequent legislation of last session of parliament is inadequate, unfair to the Canadian producer, and wholly fails of the object in view, inasmuch as the barrel thereby authorized (1) is not a standard Canadian barrel, (2) is not of the dimension or the capacity asked for, (3) is limited in its application to apples, and (4) discriminates against Canadian shippers as compared with United States shippers to the extent of seven quarts a barrel; and

Whereas, the question of a uniform standard barrel is of considerable importance to our county, whose annual production of apples ranges from 150,000 to 300,000 barrels, and of potatoes from 75,000 to 100,000 barrels (not to mention other products), the bulk of which is exported, and under existing legislation would only sell at the same price as the less quantity in the smaller barrel of our competitor.

Therefore resolved, that in our opinion the Act of last session relating to apple barrels should be repealed, and that during the pending session of Parliament an Act should be passed providing for a standard Canadian barrel of a capacity of 96 quarts or three bushels and of the following dimensions: Head diameter, 17 inches; middle diameter, 18½ inches, and 26½ inches between heads, inside measurement. And it should be enacted that every person buying or selling or exporting apples, pears, quinces or potatoes by the barrel shall be understood as referring to the quantity or size of the aforesaid barrel, but when potatoes are sold by weight the quantity constituting a barrel shall be held to be 174 pounds, with suitable penalty for the manufacture or use of barrels of other capacity for such commodities; and

Further resolved, that copies of this resolution be sent to the hon. the Ministers of Militia, Agriculture and Inland Revenue, with a respectful request that their influence and good offices may be exerted to further and secure the passing of such legislation.

For the Municipality of King's,
(Sgd.) W. E. ROSCOE, Warden.

For King's County Board of Trade, (Sgd.) P. INNES, President.

For Kentville Board of Trade,
(Sgd.) R. W. EATON, President.

3. Is the following a correct copy of the New York State law or Act referred to in the above resolutions?

An Act to Amend the Domestic Commerce Law in relation to the size of Apple, Pear, Quince and Potato Barrels.

Became a law April 17, 1899.

Sec. 9. Barrels of apples, quinces, pears and potatoes.—A barrel of pears, quinces or potatoes shall represent a quantity equal to one hundred quarts of grain or dry measure. A barrel of apples shall be of the following dimensions: Head diameter, 17½ inches; length of stave, 28½ inches; bulge not less than 64 inches, outside measurement. Every person buying or selling apples, pears, quinces or potatoes in this state by the barrel, shall be understood as referring to the quantity or size of the barrel specified in this section, but when potatoes are sold by weight, the quantity constituting a barrel shall be 174 pounds. No person shall make, or cause to be made, barrels holding less than the quantity herein specified, knowing, or having reason to believe, that the same are to be used for the sale of apples, quinces, pears or potatoes, unless such barrel is plainly marked on the outside thereof with the words 'short barrel,' in letters of not less than one inch in height. No person in this state shall use barrels hereafter made for the sale of such articles of a size less than the size specified in this section. Every person violating any provision of this section shall forfeit to the people of the state a sum of five dollars for every barrel put up, made or used in violation of such provision.

Sec. 2. This Act shall take effect immediately.

4. Does the government intend to take any action along the lines of the above resolutions?

5. Does the government intend to repeal that part of the Act of last session that has reference to apple barrels?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). The answer to the first question is, 'yes'; the answer to the second question is, 'yes'; the answer to the third question is, 'yes'; the answer to the fourth question is: The matter is under consideration, and the answer to the fifth question is: The matter is under consideration.

GOVERNMENT TELEGRAPH LINE TO BELLE ISLE.

Mr. McALISTER asked:

1. Who has the contract for constructing the government telegraph line along the north shore of the St. Lawrence from its present terminus to Belle Isle?

2. Were public tenders asked for the contract? What is the contract price?

3. Were tenders asked for supplying the poles, and at what price were they to be supplied?

4. Did the contractor for the poles fail to carry out this portion of his contract? If so, for what reason, and was any penalty imposed by the government for such failure?

5. Who has the contract for supplying the poles, and at what price?

6. Who is furnishing the wire, and at what price? Were tenders asked therefor?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). I answered this question before, except the sixth clause of it, but as the answer may not have been taken down, I will repeat it again. 1. F. X. Gendreau. 2. Yes, $125 a mile. 3. Yes, 4,700 at 85 cents per pole, and 6,000 at 80 cents. 4. No. 5. L. P. DeCourval, 85 cents and 80 cents per pole. 6. Wire was supplied in July and August last (1899), at $2.75 per 100 pounds, after tenders had been obtained for such supply. The contractors were Lewis Bros. & Co., of Montreal, their tender being the lowest.

THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE—THE MONTREAL STAR.

Mr. ETHIER (by Mr. Talbot) asked:

1. Is the government aware that Mr. George Taylor, M.P., is using his privilege as a member of this House to frank through the mails daily to all parts of Canada thousands of copies of the Montreal 'Star' newspaper?

2. Is the government aware that car-loads of the Montreal 'Star' are being shipped to Ottawa to the said George Taylor, M.P., to be franked by him through the mails to the electors of Canada?

3. Is the government aware that the proprietor of the Montreal 'Star' has organized a staff of his employees to co-operate with the said George Taylor, M.P., to assist in the work of addressing and franking immense quantities of the Montreal 'Star' through the mails?

4. Is the government aware whether the said George Taylor, M.P., in order to more effectually accomplish the work of franking the Montreal 'Star,' has caused facsimiles of his signature to be prepared on stamping machines, and has intrusted the use of such stamping machines to others to be used in franking the Montreal 'Star'?

5. Is the government aware that the reputed proprietor of the Montreal 'Star' is also interested in another paper recently established in Montreal, called 'Le Journal,' issued in the French language, and printed in the office of the Montreal 'Star'; that the Montreal 'Star,' published in English, is being so franked to English-speaking electors by the said George Taylor, M.P., and that 'Le Journal,' published in French, is being distributed amongst French-speaking electors?

6. Is the Postmaster General aware whether the said Montreal 'Star' is sending free from Montreal to the said George Taylor at Ottawa large quantities of the Montreal Daily 'Star,' to be distributed free from Ottawa through the mails? If so, does the government consider it a proper use to make of the mail? If not, what action does the government propose to take in the matter?

7. Does the government intend to adopt any, and if so, what steps to prevent the said George Taylor, M.P., franking broadcast throughout Canada, at the expense of the whole people, the Montreal 'Star'? If not, why not?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). Is this the reconstructed question?

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I was not aware that this question was reconstructed, and so I did not prepare a formal answer, but I think I can fairly answer it now. The first question is:

Is the government aware that Mr. George Taylor, M.P., is using his privilege as a member of this House to frank through the mails daily to all parts of Canada thousands of copies of the Montreal 'Star' newspaper?

I have knowledge that very large quantities of the Montreal Star newspaper are being transmitted through the mails under the frank of Mr. George Taylor, M.P., and other members on the other side of the House.

Mr. BERGERON. You had better name them.

Mr. TALBOT. You will get the names soon enough.

Mr. TAYLOR. Have they not a right to do it?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The second part of the question is:

Is the government aware that car-loads of the Montreal 'Star' are being shipped to Ottawa to the said George Taylor, M.P., to be franked by him through the mails to the electors of Canada?

The answer to that is: That we have no knowledge of the quantity, or whether there are car-loads or not. The third part of the question is:

Is the government aware that the proprietor of the Montreal 'Star' has organized a staff of his employees to co-operate with the said George Taylor, M.P., to assist in the work of addressing and franking immense quantities of the Montreal 'Star' through the mails?

Well, in the interest of my hon. friend from South Leeds (Mr. Taylor), I trust that he has some assistance. As to the fourth part of the question, I understand that the papers are being transmitted under a frank in the usual form of a stamp; the name being affixed by means of a stamp, which is the usual method. The fifth part of the question is:

Is the government aware that the reputed proprietor of the Montreal 'Star' is also interested in another paper recently established in Montreal, called 'Le Journal,' issued in the French language, and printed in the office of the Montreal 'Star'; that the Montreal 'Star,' published in English, is being so franked to English-speaking electors by the said George Taylor, M.P., and that 'Le Journal,' published in French, is being distributed amongst French-speaking electors?

I may say, in reply to that, that I do not myself, read either the Montreal Star or Le Journal.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I am sorry for you.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). It is a great loss.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have, therefore, no knowledge of its tenor. As to the sixth question, there is no information upon that subject. To the seventh question, the statute deals with the subject of franking. Any change in the law would mean an amendment to the Post Office Act, and it is not in contemplation at present to submit an amendment to that Act.

NICTAUX FALLS POST OFFICE.

Mr. MILLS (by Mr. Taylor) asked:

Is the post office at Nictaux Falls, in the county of Annapolis, N.S., to be transferred from the charge of Mr. W. J. H. Balcolm to that of Mr. B. A. Balcolm?

If so, when?

Is B. A. Balcolm the son of the present postmaster?

Has the present postmaster sent to the department his resignation?

If so, was it accompanied with a condition or recommendation that his son be appointed in his place?

Does the present postmaster think the Dominion general elections are close at hand?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1 and 2. The Nictaux Falls Post Office was transferred from the charge of Mr. W. J. H. Balcolm to that of Mr. B. A. Balcolm on the 1st March inst. 3. The department has no information on this point. 4. The late postmaster tendered his resignation to the department. 5. It was not accompanied by any condition or recommendation.

NEW POST OFFICES.

Mr. BELL (Addington) by (Mr Taylor) asked:

The name and locality of all new post offices established throughout the Dominion since January 1, 1900?

(b) The names of all land service contracts whose services have been increased in contract price since January 1, 1900?

(c) The name of all weekly, semi-weekly and tri-weekly services whose services have been increased since January 1, 1900?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). I have the answer to this question, but it is very long, covering many pages, and I think it would perhaps be better to move for a return. I have no objection to reading it if the House desires to be inflicted with it.

Question dropped.

UNITED STATES ALIEN LABOUR LAWS.

Mr. CLARKE asked :

Has the government appointed an officer to inquire into the enforcement of the United States alien labour laws by American officials?

If so, what is the name of the officer, when was he appointed, and where has he been instructed to prosecute his inquiries?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The government has not formally appointed any officer to look after the enforcement of the United States alien labour laws by American officials.

THE HON. CLIFFORD SIFTON AND MR. J. G. TURRIFF.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

1. On what date and day did the Hon. Clifford Sifton leave Ottawa in the autumn of last year for his western trip? 2. Did Mr. J. G. Turriff go west towards the close of last year? 3. If so, on what date? 4. Did he precede or leave on a later day than Hon. Clifford Sifton?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. 1. October 19. 2. No. The other clauses of the question are covered by the answer to No. 2.

SMUGGLING AT KENTVILLE, N.B.

Mr. MILLS by (Mr. Taylor) asked :

What case of smuggling was it that was made at Kentville by B. H. Dodge, in April, 1883, while he was sub-collector at that place, the net proceeds of which were $1,800.13?

What were the circumstances of the seizure?

What was the name of the individual or firm from whom said seizure was made?

What disposition was made of the said sum of $1,800.13 in 1883?

Who got, or what was done with the remaining $1,200?

Why was not the award made to B. H. Dodge at the time of the seizure in 1883?

Has there been no effort made by said Dodge or by any one on his behalf, prior to 1896, to have the usual or some award on account of this seizure made to him?

If so, what, by whom and when was such effort made, and why not successful?

How and when did said B. H. Dodge cease to be sub-collector at Kentville?

Did he resign?

Was he dismissed? If so, why?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). The goods were reported as seized 'for an infraction of the revenue laws of the Dominion of Canada.' The sum of $1,800.13 paid on release of the goods was deposited as usual to the credit of the Receiver General, and so remains deposited with the exception of $600.04 awarded to the seizing officer. The Commissioner of Customs is unable to state, definitely, why the award to B. H. Dodge was not distributed prior to 1896, or what efforts were made on that behalf. Mr. B. H. Dodge ceased to be sub-collector of customs at Kentville on the 4th August 1883, as appears by an order in council dispensing with him 'in the interests of the public service.'

WORKMEN'S WAGES ON GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock) moved :

That it be resolved, that all government contracts should contain such conditions as will prevent abuses, which may arise from the sub-letting of such contracts, and that every effort should be made to secure the payment of such wages as are generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen in the district where the work is carried out, and that this House cordially concurs in such policy, and deems it the duty of the government to take immediate steps to give effect thereto. It is hereby declared that the work to which the foregoing policy shall apply includes not only work undertaken by the government itself, but also all works aided by grant of Dominion public funds.

He said : Mr. Speaker, the principles enunciated in this resolution are in themselves so eminently fair and just that I feel that any sustained argument is not necessary in order to commend them to the approval of parliament, and I may say that they have already received sanction and adoption by the English House of Commons. The proposition that runs through the whole resolution, that labour shall be fairly remunerated, and that there shall be such conditions as are fair in themselves, is first found in the proceedings of the English House of Commons on the 13th of February, 1891, on which date that House passed this resolution :

That in the opinion of this House, it is the duty of the government, in all government contracts, to make provision against the evils recently disclosed before the Sweating Committee, to insert such conditions as may prevent the abuse arising from sub-letting, and to make every effort to secure the payment of such wages as are generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen.

That resolution is the foundation of the one now in your hands, Mr. Speaker. Its phraseology has not been departed from except for the better carrying out of the intention. For example, you will find in the fourth line of the resolution in your hands, these words : 'In the district where the work is carried out.' Those do not appear in the resolution to which I have alluded, and are added in order to make clear the object of the resolution itself.

The resolution in our hands, Sir, also extends the principle not merely to contracts, to which the government is directly a party, but also to contracts for works aided by a grant of Dominion public funds.

Let me here inform the House that the resolution of 1891 has been in operation in Great Britain continuously since that year. When it was being considered, many difficulties were suggested as likely to make the principle inoperative, but as in the case of every departure from old methods, it is easy to imagine difficulties and to point out objections. However, as this policy has stood the test of experience in the motherland, we need not to-day be deterred by any such imaginary difficulties.

In 1896, after this system had been in force in England during five years, the House of Commons passed a resolution referring it to a select committee to inquire into its working. That committee did not report in 1896, and it was reappointed in the following year. In that year it reported, and I shall submit to the House a few extracts from its report. Speaking of the working of the resolution in question, the select committee of the English House of Commons reported in 1897, as follows :

This resolution has been in force for six years. So far as regards the relations between employers and employed, its working does not appear to have had any adverse effect. Indeed, it seems probable that it has done something to promote agreement between masters and men with reference to the rate of wages and conditions of employment. It does not appear either that the contractors, as a whole, object to the resolution or to the way in which it has been administered. It appears also that complaints from the workmen of breaches of the resolution are not now as frequent as formerly.

This report further proceeds to testify to the working of the system and declares that it has not been attended by any difficulties that might not have reasonably been expected in connection with the adoption of so far-reaching a measure ; and, speaking generally, the testimony of the committee was that the system had been tested for six years and the committee were unqualifiably in favour of the principle. Therefore, it is no rash proposition that I am now advancing and asking the House to discuss for the first time.

Hon. gentlemen might perhaps ask what conditions are to be adopted in order to effectively apply this resolution. To that I would reply that it will not be necessary to set forth the various conditions, if parliament affirms the principle and thus practically issues its mandate to the government to carry out that principle. It will then be the duty of the government to adopt, from time to time, whatever conditions may be approved of or deemed necessary in order to effectually accomplish the object of this resolution. Just as every law is found in working to require amendment, so when we attempt to apply the principle of this resolution, experience will point out any weakness and objections, and the government will be in duty bound to strengthen all weak points by adopting a set of conditions that will effectively enforce the true spirit of the measure.

With reference to the first part of the proposition, namely, that it is the duty of the government to adopt such conditions as will effectually prevent those abuses which arise under the sub-letting of contracts, and with reference to the second part which prescribes that all expenditure of public moneys under contract shall be subject to the condition of workmen being paid fair wages—those two sub-propositions after all simply lay down the principle that in the expenditure of public money, a fair return must be given to those who supply either labour or material in connection with public works. It has been unfortunately the experience of many people in Canada that sub-contractors have frequently failed to meet their liabilities to their employees and to those who supplied them with goods or materials to carry on their contracts, and thus the labouring men and those who supplied material have been wronged. The enforcement of this clause will prevent such injustice. It may never be possible to entirely prevent sub-letting. In fact, sub-letting is necessary to carry out works on which many different trades have to be engaged in their completion. Whilst, therefore, governments may have required security from their chief contractors and have been satisfied of their solvency and ability, they have not in the past also required sub-contractors to be competent and responsible men, and the consequence is there has been a great wrong and loss and suffering on many occasions to those who have assisted in completing government works. The application of this principle, therefore, will mean that the principal contractor will practically include the sub-contractor, that he will be the principal and they his agents, and he will be responsible for his agents. If this proposition is incorporated in the government contracts, it will not be possible hereafter for sub-contractors to misapply money to defraud those under him, but those under them entitled to payment will have the right to reach out past the contractors to the government and in that way secure whatever moneys would otherwise be payable on account of the contract to the contractor himself. In regard to materials, also the same satisfactory result will be secured.

Then, when we come to the second part of the resolution, namely, that the wages to be paid shall be the fair-going wages in the district where the work is being carried out, I am sure that hon. gentlemen will entirely sympathize with the proposition. We know that at present, when a large public work or any work is being arranged for, the contractor, anxious as he is to make the most out of his contract, has a direct interest in reducing the price of labour to the lowest possible point ; and, in order to succeed in that, where he can, he moves around bodies of workmen from one district to another, breaking down the local labour market, and, at all events, always exposing the local labour market to the danger of being competed with by persons brought in from without the districts, and, perhaps, from without the country. It is true we have alien labour laws—

Mr. CLARKE. Hear, hear.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Yes, we have alien labour laws; but these laws, however well enforced, would not accomplish what is sought to be accomplished here. The good to be the outcome of this measure would be accomplished without having recourse to any such laws. This will put it beyond the interest of any contractor to seek to import into the locality where the work is to be performed, labour either from without the district in the country, or from without the country itself.

If the contractor finds that he cannot break down the labour market in the district concerned, he will naturally employ local labour in the first instance, exhaust the local supply, paying fair wages, before he will bring in new workmen from without. I am sure that that rule will, in itself, commend itself to every hon. gentleman in this room. The country has no interest in keeping down the price of labour; on the contrary, the country is interested in the advancement of the labour market. The country is interested in every man receiving a fair day's wage for a fair day's work. It is the best policy, leaving aside the humanitarian view of it altogether. It is better for the workmen, for high wages enable him to supply himself with more of the necessaries, more of the comforts, more of the luxuries of life. This is better for the country also, as it stimulates the consumption of manufactured goods of all kinds. Higher wages benefit not only him who receives but him who gives, and they benefit not only the parties directly concerned, but the whole community.

Mr. COCHRANE. Good national policy doctrine.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Whatever doctrine there may be in it, I am sure it will receive the endorsement of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cochrane), who has just spoken. I think it is unnecessary to introduce a controversial proposition into the consideration of a subject about which, I trust, we may all be unanimous. It might be argued that the mere adoption of this resolution and its application to government works will, after all, accomplish little—

Mr. BERGERON. Hear, hear.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. My hon. friend from Beauharnois appears to have little confidence in the efficacy of this measure—

Mr. BERGERON. No.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman says 'no'—

Mr. BERGERON. Neither have you.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. My hon. friend (Mr. Bergeron) misjudges me, and he must not—

Mr. BERGERON. It is an election dodge.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman may judge himself, but—

Mr. CLARKE. He has the experience of the way other laws for the protection of labour have been enforced.

Mr. FOSTER. The salary of the Governor General.

Mr. BERGERON. And the appointment of members of parliament to office.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It is a pity my hon. friends on the other side cannot give their attention even to so important a theme as this without indulging in interruptions in no way relevant to the subject. I am not aware that the salary of His Excellency the Governor General, even if anybody thought it was too high, is a subject cognate to the wages of the workingmen of Canada.

Mr. BERGERON. No, we were only thinking of the sincerity of the man who spoke about it.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. If my hon. friend (Mr. Bergeron) has his views, let him retain them. He presented his views a year ago in connection with the conditions I incorporated in the contracts for the manufacture of clothing and other articles—

Mr. BERGERON. That was not followed out.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. In every case, so far as my department is concerned, the principle of the anti-sweating regulations was carried out literally and to the full.

Mr. BERGERON. But not in militia affairs.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am only speaking of what I know in my own department. But, if this resolution is adopted as the policy of parliament, it will be the duty of every minister to enforce it.

Mr. BERGERON. You cannot make Tarte do that.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Mr. Speaker, I do not think my hon. friend (Mr. Bergeron) will find any instance since I have been in public life in which I have interrupted him in the course of an address.

Mr. BERGERON. I will not do it any more.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not wish to hamper anybody, but I simply say it has not been my practice—hon. gentlemen opposite, of course, will adopt a practice of their own. I say that if parliament endorses this proposition, it will be the duty of every member of the government to see to the application of it in connection with all contracts in his department. And so, whether the former resolution has been wholly carried out or only partly, has nothing to do with the proposition before us. In fact, if it has not been well lived up to, the more reason why attention should be drawn to that fact, and why we should endeavour to live up to the sweeping measure which is now before the House.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). With the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Mulock's) permission, I would like to ask him a question. I see that this is made to apply not only to public works undertaken by the government itself, but also to all works aided by grant of Dominion public funds. In the case of a railway company which has a Dominion subsidy, and has given a contract to a contractor; now does the hon. minister hope to compel that contractor to pay the current rate of wages in the locality?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I think there would be no practical difficulty in enforcing the conditions in the case my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) refers to. It is not necessary, as I mentioned before, to proceed in detail to show how I would enforce the law, but I think it could be very readily done. Before the railroad drew its subsidy it could be required to prove to the satisfaction of the government of the day that it had paid the wages that this resolution calls for, and failing that, it would not be entitled to the subsidy. In the Post Office Department we have a condition under which the rate of wages is set forth in the contract itself; and at the end of each month when the contractor sends in his account for the month's work or the month's goods supplied, he is also obliged to furnish proof of the wages paid during that month; he is obliged to furnish statutory declarations of those in his service who actually know the money was paid, and unless that proof is forthcoming, he does not become entitled to his pay.

Mr. SPROULE. Does that apply to parties getting contracts to carry the mails, or who are obliged to employ others?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. No, it does not. Contracts for carrying the mails are let under the Post Office Act, under provisions which have been in force for many years, and were left to me as a legacy by my predecessors. I have tried to live up to the law that they left, and if there is anything wrong with that law, it is open to any hon. gentleman to suggest an amendment, and I am sure parliament will redress any wrong.

Mr. FOSTER. Except in the matter of franking.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Well, if the matter of franking had to be dealt with, I think the hon. gentleman would come in for a very severe criticism. When the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) put a question to me, I was about to indicate the far-reaching effect of this measure, even though in law it does not extend beyond government contracts, and we have no power to extend it beyond our government contracts. But what will be the effect of the example of the Dominion parliament passing this legislation? I think you will find other legislative bodies in Canada doing likewise. I think we may fairly expect that in due time every legislative body, be it high or low, legislatures of the provinces, legislatures of cities, municipal governments of cities, towns, townships and villages—you will find them one by one following suit, and ultimately, as the education proceeds in the direction of this resolution, you will find employers of labour as well adopting the principle, and at present many of them do all that is required of them. So the ultimate effect of the adoption of this resolution in parliament will be far-reaching, will extend beyond the mere contracts that this government may directly or indirectly make, and I think will bear fruit throughout all walks of life. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to extend my remarks. I feel that the measure itself speaks more eloquently in its own favour than I could do; and with these observations I beg to move the resolution which is now in your hands.

Mr. N. CLARKE WALLACE (West York). I am sure that the House has noticed with what stumbling and hesitation the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) has moved his resolution. He is unused to his work, I am afraid it is not a congenial occupation to him, nor one that has occupied his attention very much in the past. For four years this government have been in power, and with the general election certainly not very far off, he suddenly takes the interest of the workingman and the labourer so dearly to his heart that he has to bring in a resolution which, he says, is going to be a boon to the workingman and a boon to the mechanic. Well, if this is such an excellent thing, if it is a good thing that the government should regulate the pay which men are to receive in government contracts, the pay which is to be given to men employed by the government, I would like to ask the Postmaster General why he does not apply that to the Post Office Department over which he presides. I have the information, Mr. Speaker, that some few days ago a contract was let to carry the mails from Woodbridge station to Woodbridge post office, a certain number of times per day. I am told that the distance travelled is seven and a half miles, and as I have travelled that road frequently myself, I should think it is a very moderate estimate of the number of miles travelled per day by the mail carrier. Yet, Sir, what does he get? Under the rule laid down by the Postmaster General in this resolution which he asks us to adopt, every man working for the government is to get a fair remuneration for his labour. This man travels to carry the mails seven and a half miles per day, it will take him to carry those mails, not counting the delays of the trains and other delays, about three hours per day, and for these three hours he gets the magnificent sum of 21½ cents per day; 7 cents per hour is sufficient for the mail carrier at Woodbridge under the regulations of the Postmaster General. But the Postmaster General may answer, as he has already answered, that this was done under a law of his predecessors, and that it is open to any member of the House to have that law changed. It is open for the Postmaster General to have a law changed over which he has control, and which he cannot defend. Where is the Postmaster General to-day in relation to this man working at the rate of 7 cents per hour, taking up a portion of his day, making everything else subservient to this 21½ cents for three hours or more per day? If he takes four hours, which I have no doubt he frequently will, he will have less than 5½ cents per hour, and the Postmaster General thinks that is an admirable thing. Then take the carrying of the mails from Pine Grove to Woodbridge post office. The mail carrier there travels two long miles, and he receives for that the magnificent sum of 9 cents and a fraction per day. Now, I would like to ask the Postmaster General if that is carrying out the principle which he says he is going to adopt of a fair day's pay for a fair day's work. I would like to ask the Postmaster General if that is giving fair play to those who carry the mails. But he may answer: Oh, that is by public tender, and therefore if the person chooses to work for less than his labour is really worth, it is his own lookout. Well, the same argument would apply to the working-man and the mechanic.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. WALLACE. Wait till I get through. If you are to apply the rule that a mechanic is not to have open and free competition, that there is to be no interference between employer and employee, then it would be fair to say that the same thing should take place between the Post Office Department and a mail carrier. But, if the government is going to step in and say that every one employed by the government is to receive fair remuneration, is to receive fair pay for the work that he does, then, I contend that the same rule must apply to those who are carrying the mails throughout the country. Well, we find all over the country, I do not care where you go, the same utter disregard of the rules of fair-play manifested by the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock). Take up the Postmaster General's Report, look anywhere in it, I do not care at what page, at the details of payments made for the transport of the mails, and what do you find? Take for instance, Maple and Vellore, a distance of 11½ miles, travelled six days in the week for $150 a year, or less than 48 cents per day. Forty-eight cents per day will hardly keep the horse and rig that will have to be used to travel this 11½ miles. It will take some hours to do that, it will call for the use of a conveyance, and the man who performs that service gets for it less than 48 cents a day. You can go through the whole of these pages, and you will find the same utter disregard of fair-play and fair treatment, by the hon. Postmaster General, of those whom he has employed to carry the mails in this country. Yet, when it comes to dealing with great railway corporations, we do not find that their pay is cut down, we do not find that investigations are held as to whether they are receiving too much for the services which they perform for the government. The hon. minister himself, undertook an investigation when he came into power, as to whether the railway companies were receiving too much; he undertook to make a thorough investigation as to the expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars that were paid to railway corporations for the carriage of mails. What was done with that investigation? The hon. minister started it, he spent money upon it, but, he never pursued it. Why? Because railways are powerful corporations and he was afraid to investigate the affairs of the railways, but he could pursue a poor man who is carrying the mail for $70 or $100, he could get half a dozen others to compete with him and get the work done for 5 cents, 6 cents, or 7 cents per hour, although he declares that men should receive 15 or 20 cents an hour for work done for the government. That only needs to be exposed to show the utter hypocrisy of the hon. gentleman—

An hon. MEMBER. Order.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Oh, let him go on.

Mr. WALLACE. Let him go on! I am saying nothing but what I have a right to go on with, and I am not asking anybody's permission. There is nothing that shows the utter hypocrisy and the utter insincerity of that resolution, proposed as it is to-day, than the fact that the hon. gentleman has been utterly ignoring it in his own department. Yet, the hon. gentleman is sent here to-day to propose this resolution. What does this resolution say? It says, that, not only those employed by the government are to receive these rates of wages, but that government contractors are to give fair pay. The hon. gentleman is asked: How are you going to apply this resolution, and he says: We will apply it by saying that the contractor must give the rate of wages of the locality in which the work is being done. How are you going to ascertain what the rate of wages is? Take, for instance, the building of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. What were the wages of that locality? There were no railways there; there was nothing to go on; there was no knowledge of what railway building cost in that country, because there never had been a railway built there up to that time, and the contractor had no basis upon which to go, and fixed the rate himself. Suppose that a public building is to be erected in the city of Toronto, that a number of stonecutters are employed to cut stone for the building, that the rate of wages in the city of Toronto is from 30 cents to 40 cents per hour, and that the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) has the contract. If he gives the Toronto rate of wages for stonecutters he will have to pay 40 cents an hour, but, he says: I have a stone quarry in Lincoln, an excellent one, I will bring my stonecutters to Lincoln where the rate of wages is 25 cents an hour for stonecutters, and I will cut the stone down there. Therefore, he gets his work done for 25 cents an hour in Lincoln, while he would otherwise have to pay 40 cents an hour, being the regulation wages in Toronto which just shows that if there was any intention to have fair-play carried out under this resolution there is a way that it can be evaded. There is another point; we have the hon. Postmaster General posing as the champion of the workingman. As I said, this is a new role for the hon. gentleman. It does not fit him very well when we recall how he has treated the letter carriers of this country, the men immediately under his own control. These men were engaged under certain conditions; there was to be a statutory increase which, the government may say that they had not the power to give or withhold, but, at any rate, the power had always been exercised of giving these men the statutory increase that the law permitted. The hon. gentleman came into power and stopped this statutory increase for three years. I am told that now, in the face of an election, he is giving the statutory increase to these letter carriers, but, what about the three years they have lost? Does he propose to make that up? Not one bit of it. These poor letter carriers, living on low wages, under high expenses in the cities, barely able to live, have been abandoned. Take the case of the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Pater-son), and that of the Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière); they were under salaries of $5,000 per annum as Minister of Customs and as Minister of Inland Revenue respectively. Under the statutes of the land which gave them that amount, but, last year, we found that their salaries were to be increased, from $5,000 to $7,000 a year. What more did we find? We found, that, contrary to the course that had been taken with the letter carriers, in the case of the hon. Minister of Customs and the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue, their salaries were to be made retroactive and they were not only to receive pay for the year that was to come, and for which the estimates provided, but they were to receive pay for the past two years, I think.

Mr. COCHRANE. Is that so?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, that is true. And the two ministers, the Minister of Customs and the Minister of Inland Revenue, who, under the statute, were receiving $5,000 a year and no more, were given an increase, and the increase was made retroactive for the past two years, so as to give them $7,000 a year, although they had made a solemn contract with the government and with the people of Canada, through an Act of parliament, that they should receive $5,000 per annum and no more. That was utterly unjustifiable, but it shows how the ministers of the Crown look after themselves and how they neglect to look after the workingmen, the letter carriers, and those others who deserve, at any rate, fair-play and fair treatment from the government. For myself, being a workingman, and always having been, I have the greatest sympathy with any proposal that may be made to improve the condition of the great working classes of this country. I shall do all in my power to assist in improving the condition of the workingmen of this country, but I do not apprehend that there will be much help afforded them by the resolution proposed by the Postmaster General, unless he commences right at home by giving fair-play to the letter carriers throughout the Dominion, and by giving fair-play to those who carry the mails. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) boasts that he has saved several hundred of thousands dollars on the carriage of mails. Why, he ought to be ashamed to grind down those poor men the way he did by asking them to carry the mails for almost nothing. It may be said that a man need not take a contract to carry the mails if he does not want to; but the same argument could be used against the artisans and workingmen throughout this Dominion. If the Postmaster General says that the workingmen throughout the country should receive fair consideration, then he is bound to give liberal and proper treatment to those who carry the mails and to the letter carriers in the service of the country. The Postmaster General does not propose to do that, and therefore in bringing forward this humbug resolution—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. WALLACE. How am I out of order?

Mr. SPEAKER. You cannot use the word 'humbug resolution.'

Mr. WALLACE. It is not a humbug resolution then. Well, Mr. Speaker, if you decide that that is not a proper word to apply to it, I will have to hunt around for another word to express my idea of what it is. We will assume for the moment that the minister is sincere in this resolution, but if he is sincere he is bound to carry his principle into effect in every branch of the Post Office Department, which he controls, and he is bound to do so without a moment's delay. Why did not the Postmaster General do this during the four years he has been in power? Well, I will tell you. The moment the government see they are going out of power, they see that they have lost their grip on the country, then like drowning men catching at straws, they think of the workingmen of Canada, and they make this vain attempt to impress the people that they are conferring a benefit on the workingmen.

Mr. PETER MACDONALD (East Huron). I wish, Sir, to express my endorsement of the resolution introduced by the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock). The government deserves credit for proposing this resolution, and irrespective of politics it is in the interests of the great working class of this great Dominion, that we should all support it. We are interested in the well-being of the workingmen who toil long and continuously for a bare living, and whatever mistakes there may have been in the past, this resolution at all events lays down a principle upon which the government will act in the future. It would appear to me that the quarrel of the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) is with the Postmaster General and not with the principle of this resolution. Let me ask him does he deny that this principle will work well in the interests of the class of people which he pretends to support? Will it not go a long way in the future, in helping the government to secure justice for the workingmen? Will it not impress contractors when they are tendering for public works, that they must tender at such a price as will enable them to pay proper wages to the workingmen under them—and we know that a great deal of injustice has been done in the past in this respect, in the letting of sub-contracts. The Postmaster General is charged with being dilatory in introducing such a measure as this; but if you look over the history of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) you will find that he brought this question before the House some years ago, and that, in fact, he appointed a commissioner to go to the cities of Montreal, Hamilton and Toronto, to ascertain to what extent this sweating system was in operation. If we believe the facts set forth in that report, and we have no reason not to believe them, we must conclude that there is a sad condition of things prevailing under the contract system.

Mr. INGRAM. In what year was that commission appointed?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). About two years ago, I think. It was shown by the report of that commissioner that women worked from sixteen to eighteen hours a day, and at the end of the six working days that they only earned from $2 to $4. Is it not time that such a crying evil should be put an end to? When we know that the original contractors make large profits, is it not time to put an end to their giving such pittance to those who do the work? My hon. friend (Mr. Wallace) charged the Postmaster General with establishing a low scale of prices for carrying the mails, but the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) must remember that a large proportion of the people who carry the mails from the stations to the post offices, have other employment, and that in many cases they go to the railway trains for other purposes and simply carry the mails on their way back.

Mr. WALLACE. I quoted cases where these people were carrying mails and doing nothing else.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Very Well. Do you suppose, Mr. Speaker, that any person would spend the whole day for 21 cents—the amount mentioned by the hon. member for West York—in such prosperous times as we have now? How can it be explained that a man who is capable of carrying the mails from one point to another, would give his time for 21 cents a day when in any other occupation in the town or village he could earn $1 per day? That is something the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) has not explained, and it is something I cannot understand. Whether the sample case he cited be true or not, we all know that in the majority of cases the mail carriers take parcels and merchandise, and in many cases they simply run their busses to the trains, and they take the mail back in the bus and throw it off at the post office. The cases he cited do not at all prove the rule. Is it not also true that these mail carriers tender by contract, and that there are others standing by to say: If you do not do it at that price, I will? If one man tenders to do the work for $10, and another man tenders to do the same work for $10.50 would the government be justified in saying to the man who tenders for $10: We think you have not tendered sufficiently high and therefore we will give you $20? Would not hon. gentlemen opposite speak very loudly in condemnation of the action of the government, if they would do anything of that kind? I think that would be the very line of argument the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), would take, because he condemns the minister for not taking it. Now, we must remember that there is a duty devolving upon us; and however much we may criticise each other on political questions, that should not interfere with our trying to establish a line of action by which the labouring classes of this country will receive a fair compensation for their labour. The history of contracts and sub-contracts in the past does not show that the labouring man has received justice. Therefore, I think the acceptance of this resolution should be unanimous, and that both parties should seek to give as much advantage, as much justice, as much freedom and as much money as possible to the labouring classes of Canada.

Mr. T. CHASE CASGRAIN (Montmorancy). I have a very few words to add to what has already been said on the resolution now submitted to the House. It seems to me that it is not a practical resolution at all. It is one of those academic resolutions which we have been accustomed for some time past, to receive from the government, in evident preparation for the elections which are imminent. What is the practical effect of the resolution before the House? It says:

That all government contracts should contain such conditions as will prevent abuses, which may arise from the sub-letting of such contracts, and that every effort should be made to secure the payment of such wages as are generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen.

Now, what are these efforts which are to be made, and how are they to be binding on the government, or on anybody else? I could have understood it if the hon. Postmaster General had announced that a Bill would be introduced, founded on this resolution; but I did not understand him to say that a Bill would be based on this resolution. This does not seem to be the programme of the government. The resolution is simply the expression of an opinion that in future, the government, and the different departments should mete out justice to workmen; but, upon whom will this resolution be binding? Will it be binding on the government? It seems to me that if the resolution emanated from the government itself, if it were a declaration of policy by which the government were to stand, it should be introduced, not by the Postmaster General, who is certainly not the labour minister in the government, but by the Premier. Now, is a Bill to be based on this resolution? If not, it is not binding upon anyone. It is not binding on the successors of the government. They will simply see this resolution in the Votes and Proceedings of the House; but there is no penalty attached to the giving of a contract which does not provide for justice being done to the workmen. Therefore, it seems to me, that this is simply an academic resolution, which is forced on the attention of the House at this stage, probably, because the government have nothing ready for the House to work upon. On the other hand, it seems to me there are laws already in this country, which should be enforced before we should be called on to pronounce on this resolution. Every one knows that two or three years ago, an alien labour law was proposed in this House, and, after a great deal of opposition on the government side, a so-called alien labour law was passed. I remember, having been a member of the committee to which that Bill was referred, that the strongest opposition was offered to it at every step. It was rendered almost useless; and to-day, if the reports we hear are true, the law is not working, and it is almost impossible to put it in force.

Mr. M. K. COWAN (South Essex). Would the hon. gentleman permit me to ask him one question? He says that by the action of the committee, the Bill was rendered almost useless. Comparing it with the American law, will the hon. gentleman explain how he arrives at the conclusion, that it was rendered almost useless?

Mr. CASGRAIN. When the Bill came before the committee, we tried to make it exactly the same as the American law, but the gentlemen on that committee representing the other side of the House, opposed this strongly, so that we could not pass such a law. Our argument was, that with the friendly relations existing between the two countries, we should have reciprocity in these laws, as we were trying to obtain reciprocity between the two countries on other subjects.

Mr. COWAN. I do not think the hon. gentleman understood the point I was trying to get at. What was the difference that was made between the American law and the Canadian law?

Mr. CASGRAIN. The difference, amongst others, if I remember rightly, was that before our law could be put into execution, considerable red tape had to be used, and permission had to be obtained from the Department of Justice here. That is the great difference between the alien labour law of the United States, and the law on our statute-book. If my hon. friend is sincere, not only should he introduce a Bill based on this resolution, so that it would be binding upon himself and the government for all time to come, unless it were repealed by the House, but he should have gone a step further. There are other and greater abuses from which the labouring man suffers. For instance, here is a contractor who has a large contract from the government, and he sub-lets the contract or himself hires workmen to do the work. The contractor gets money from the government, but he does not pay his men, and there is no recourse for these men, if the contractor becomes insolvent, because they cannot seize the moneys due to the contractor in the hands of the government. This is a hardship on the labouring man. This is an abuse that should be rectified by the government; and if the hon. gentleman is sincere, he should have put into his resolution a declaration by which the government also bound itself to protect the honest workingman against the dishonest contractor. When a contractor becomes insolvent, the labouring man and the man who furnished the material he used in his contract, have to go without their pay. Why did not the hon. gentleman, while he was at it, introduce into his resolution something which would correct this abuse? There is another and most interesting problem which faces us every day. It is the workingman's hours of labour. Every one knows that the labour associations throughout this country, are in favour of eight hours a day. I am not ready, not having studied the question profoundly enough, to pronounce on this problem, which not only excites the curiosity and the study of men in this country, but which has set men thinking, in all other countries of the world. It seems to me, however, that when a man has toiled eight hours in the day, that is enough, and that should be regarded as the standard hours of labour for workingmen. If the government were going to introduce such a resolution, why did they not take up all these subjects? Why did they not propose something practical? Why did they not come to the rescue of the workingman in a practical manner?

There is another subject, which is most important, upon which there are discussions before our courts of law every day. That is, a subject of compensation for accidents. Every day accidents occur owing to defective machinery. Defective machinery is put up because it costs less, and contractors very often—I know there are notable exceptions and I see some around me—want to make out of the labouring men all they can, and will put them to work on machinery which is not provided with the necessary safeguards, or is defective in some other respect. A workingman loses an arm or is injured in some other manner. What happens? He has to sue the contractor for compensation. A mass of evidence is generally adduced in such cases, and the contractor will take the case from one court to another until he secures a judgment in his favour. Supposing a judgment in favour of the workingman is reversed or modified in appeal, the workingman will have to carry that judgment to the Supreme Court. This entails heavy expense. He has to get all the evidence and documents printed, which sometimes will cost from $300 to $500. Under the circumstances, it is almost impossible for a workingman to appeal to the Supreme Court, and he is obliged either to give up his suit or accept in compensation a sum which is not at all an indemnity for the injury he has suffered. We all know that in England there is a compensation law for workingmen, which does not work very well, but still is an improvement on what existed before. In France, a contractor—whether a government or a private contractor—is obliged to insure the lives and limbs of those who work under him. This is an obligation imposed upon him by law, and it seems to me the time has come in Canada when we should have such a law for the protection of our working people. Of course, I quite understand that doubt would arise whether this parliament has jurisdiction, because, to a certain extent, we would be interfering with private rights, and such a law would probably be within the scope of the legislatures of the different provinces. But, it seems to me it would be quite competent for the government to have made this resolution more practical by providing that it would also be obligatory upon government contractors to insure the lives and limbs of workingmen employed on government works. This would be a practical step in the right direction.

If this resolution is to be binding on anybody, it should contain some declaration regarding the seizure of moneys in the hands of the government or the keeping back of subsidies until the wage-earners and those who furnished material are fully paid what was due them.

It should also contain some condition as to the hours of labour during which workingmen would be required to work on government contracts, and also a declaration of principle as to the compensation to be given to workingmen for injuries suffered by them when labouring on government contracts.

If the resolution had contained these matters, it would be more acceptable, but, as it stands to-day, it is simply a resolution—if I may be permitted to say so—of clap-trap, to enable hon. gentlemen opposite to say to the workingmen: Just see what friends of the labouring classes we are. But they were careful not to put into your hands, Mr. Speaker, a practical resolution which would be of any advantage to the workingmen of this country.

Mr. D. C. FRASER (Guysborough). There is nothing to prevent the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) moving in all the directions he has indicated, and he can very easily prevent the government making any political capital out of this resolution by getting his friends to vote unanimously for it, and it will then be the opinion of the whole House. The hon. gentleman wants two other things brought about. One of those things he admits himself does not come under the jurisdiction of this House, and the second he has not made up his mind about. But the eight-hour labour day, though he is not committed to that principle, he wants included in this resolution. In what position would he be to vote on the eight-hour principle if he has not made up his mind about it? He should be thankful that the government have not brought down a matter on which he has not come to a conclusion. As to the other matter, I think he will admit, as a lawyer, that this parliament cannot move in the direction of compensation to workingmen. It is very doubtful whether we can go beyond imposing such fines as could be collected. In the province of Nova Scotia we have, with very few changes, Lord Campbell's Act, and it may be a question whether the $5,000 mentioned in that Act is sufficient, but that is for the local legislature to decide.

But what gives me great pleasure in supporting this resolution is, that although everything possible in the imagination of man is included in it, it furnishes groundwork of the very best character. I am not like the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), a workingman myself, although I think, I am just as much a workingman as he is. Every man who labours is a workingman, in the proper sense of the term, but this term is by custom specifically applied to those who do manual labour for a daily wage and who depend on that wage for a living. There is a question which, whether we like it or not, is forcing itself on the attention of this House and parliament as of all others, and that is, the relation between labour and capital. I have no hesitation in saying that every man who labours should not only receive a wage, but should receive a wage equivalent to the labour he performs. Labour is the foundation of all wealth, there is no wealth without it, and that government is wise which will recognize that the only source of wealth is the one upon which we ought to legislate. While I admit that the difficulties are many in respect of legislation in that direction, whilst I admit that men of much greater wisdom than myself differ from me in that respect, and that we must, before we come to conclusions, have a good deal of enlightenment, I think there can be no question whatever on this point, that if we legislate wisely we will legislate, not in the direction of simply pampering the man that labours, but of making his labour as effective as possible and giving him a return as large as possible for the betterment of his condition in life.

Now, this resolution lays down a principle. I am not over-anxious, at this stage, whether, in every respect, the words of this resolution are as complete as those of an Act of parliament. I have no regard for the question as to whether other things should have been included. For my part, if we are moving in the right direction in this matter, I am satisfied, for one day, to get a good resolution that will recognize the right of the men who labour for the government in this country to receive a satisfactory wage, and that will declare that no contractor under the government or on a work subsidized by the government shall receive a dollar upon that contract until he has shown that he has paid every cent of wages due for the labour that has made that work profitable for the government. I want the contractor to make as much as possible, but, if I can help it, he shall not receive public money until he has honestly paid for the labour that has honestly been done for him. He may make as much as he likes in competition with the world. He may make 20, or 30, or 40 per cent out of the work for the government if he gets the contract in open competition; but the government must be in a position to pay the workmen his wages, if the contractor does not, taking it out of the money due to the contractor. Matters of detail are small matters after all. I have confidence that the government will carry out the principle. Hon. gentlemen opposite do not seem to have that confidence. But, for my part, I believe that any government in this country will carry it out, because, back of the men who form governments, back of the men who come to parliament, there is a force that will compel the carrying out of this rule. Even for the future—a future that is not so near as the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) speaks of when he tries to be funny over the misfortunes of his party, but when after these gentlemen are gathered to their fathers, the Conservative party comes into power again, I am willing to trust to a Conservative government to carry out this principle. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) does not show by his speech whether he is in favour of the workingmen in this matter or not. He talks about the form of the resolution and seems to be very anxious about that. I submit that this resolution speaks for itself. I care not, for my part, whether or not this will bring any credit to the government. I am much more anxious that this resolution shall have an effect in benefiting those who are more important to the country than all governments, the wage-earners. I would like to see the members of this parliament unite in declaring that protection should be afforded, so that no man can leave this country without leaving enough to pay his workmen, and that no men can live in this country who had obtained the labour of honest men and will not pay for that labour.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fraser), allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Yes.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Does the hon. gentleman think that the resolution covers the point he has just touched?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Most certainly.

Mr. CASGRAIN. The government will retain in its hands any money to pay the wage-earner if the contractor is not disposed—but does the hon. gentleman think that the government would have the right to do that under the law?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Most certainly.

Mr. CASGRAIN. No.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Surely, if a contract is made, the parties to that contract are bound by it. And if the government make it a part of the contract, as they would, that they might pay the labouring man if the contractor did not, surely, that would be good law.

Mr. CASGRAIN. But there is nothing in the resolution that says so.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). But is the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casgrain) going to ask that every word of every clause of the contract shall be before us? Is he not going to leave a little margin for those in authority, whether Liberal or Tories, to prepare their contracts in the direction indicated by the resolution?

After all, I am afraid that these points that are being raised are being raised simply out of a desire to indicate that this government will not carry out what is professed in this resolution. But, surely there are some things upon which we can agree. I think that hon. gentlemen opposite ought to have agreed that the preferential tariff is a good thing. In their wisdom they decided not to accept that, and they may be much wiser than I am. But surely upon this one thing we can agree, this thing which deals with the rights and interests of the very heart and soul of this Dominion, the rights of the wage-earners. We may say that this resolution does not go far enough; but, for my part, I am glad to accept the resolution, because it lays the foundation for every future contract made by the government, and affords security for the men who labour. I have had some little experience in these matters. I remember a contract in Nova Scotia on a work in which the provincial government were interested. The contractor under the government dealt with sub-contractors, and the result was that many of the workmen were left unpaid. And, so strong was the feeling in the province at the shameful wrong committed upon these people, that the government was compelled to pay to the tune of $35,000 or $40,000 to make good the deficiency. Of course, they got the money back when the Dominion government took over the road. I remember, when two or three years ago, an Act relating to a railway in Hamilton was before this House in committee—

An hon. MEMBER. The Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Yes; and I remember that I had the honour, helped by other members, of moving and insisting that it should be part of the very Bill they were then getting that they should pay the labourers who had been left unpaid under a previous contract. And they had to pay them. I would like very well that a well-worded resolution should be passed relating to the questions to which the hon. gentleman has referred. But we can only move forward step by step—

Mr. INGRAM. Snail's step.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I am much better pleased to move at a snail's pace and get there, like the snail, than to turn, like the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ingram), and not get there. The snail gets there. I am willing to move as fast as anybody; still I thank God for any step that recognizes that labour should be protected. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Ingram) came here as a special representative of labour. But has he moved in this direction? Not a step.

Mr. INGRAM. Yes, he has much more so than the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fraser, Guysborough.)

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I am taking no credit to myself. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Ingram) has not answered me. He never moved in the direction proposed by this resolution. He had the opportunity of doing so. He was sent here specially as the exponent and spokesman of these men. I am not saying that he has done less than I have, but I only say that it does not lie with him to say a word against any step taken by the government or any member of it, or any member of the House in this direction. I do not claim that I have done anything special in this direction. I do not say I have been sent here specially as an exponent of the views of the workingmen, nor am I here to take credit in that direction. The county that I represent are all workingmen, but not of the class who receive the greatest benefit from this resolution. The hon. member for West York amused me with the position he took. He seemed to think he answered the resolution, when he attempted to show that the Postmaster General had done something that was not right. That style of debate is obsolete in the country I come from. The Postmaster General may have attempted to screw his own employees down to the last cent; but what has that to do with this resolution? I would advise the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) to read the New Testament, where a similar point was raised once upon a time. What is the difference where this resolution comes from. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) discusses whether the proposer of the resolution is honest. I care not whether a man is honest or dishonest;

if the resolution he proposes is a good resolution, I will vote for it.

Mr. WALLACE. Give us the quotation.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I tell the hon. gentleman to do that. But, if the hon. gentleman does not know what the words of St. Paul were, I will tell him. They were in this sense: Although one preached with envy and another with strife, he rejoiced as long as the gospel was preached. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), will find those words in the volume which he, no doubt, possesses. My reference was a proper one to St. Paul, a man who lived about 2,000 years ago, and was noted in his day, and has ever since held a high place among those who profess their faith in that which is good, or who have respect for one of the greatest, if not the greatest, intellects that ever existed. If the resolution is a good one, he need care little about where it comes from, nor about the acts performed by the man who produces the resolution. All that we need to look after is to see that it is a step in the right direction. I admit that it does not contain all that I would like to see contained in it. But, I would be a fool to oppose it, because it does not go as far as I would like. Hon. gentlemen may say that certain words would make it stronger. Well, every hon. gentleman has an opportunity to move an amendment to make it stronger; but let not any of them make that suggestion without following it up by action.

Now, I want to emphasize what was said by my hon. friend to my right, that the effect of the resolution is going to be of the greatest possible advantage to the people of this Dominion. Every one who has paid attention to the labour question and to the important problems that are beyond it, recognizes the fact to-day, that capital is of necessity better able to look after itself than labour is; that the man who is a contractor or the man who hires labour, can of necessity, do much more to help himself, and to prevent another man from helping himself, than the labourer can. Now, I do not think that labour wants any special laws passed in its favour, to help it against anybody else; but, it does claim that because the revenues to which the member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain), referred are small, therefore, this parliament ought to see to it that the labourer should not be obliged to take a portion of those revenues to fight a battle in his own defence. Labour asks nothing but a fair field and no favour; but labour demands in this country, and must eventually receive, the recognition that no man shall use his power or his money to prevent a labourer getting full return for honest work. This resolution goes quite a distance in that respect, and, I think, its unanimous passage, will do much in this country, not to raise wild ideas among labour agitators, but to give satisfaction to the men who do the labour. So far, at least, as all contracts in which the government is concerned, it will secure the rights of the labourer, and will teach the people of this country who enter into contracts, that it is wise for themselves to include in those contracts just such a stipulation as this.

I believe that capital would increase much faster, if honest labour was honestly dealt with. I believe no man who ever made a contract, and did not pay his labourers, ever had a plethora of shekles at the end of his life. I believe that when labour is honestly paid, and when every contractor will insist that that should be done, the people of this country will enjoy the full benefits which will flow from every labourer receiving a proper reward for his labour, and we will no longer see so many men going around seeking employment. Aye, more. I believe the day will come—and every step, thank God, is in that direction—when, not only will labour receive the remuneration to which it is entitled, but in the development of the relations between capital and labour, more will be given to labour than the mere wage, and capital will understand that labour well paid contributes more to the accretion of capital. I believe that. I feel satisfied that fruit will come of the suggestions long ago made, and in which some of the large capitalists, particularly in France, have already embarked, namely, that there should be a return of profit to the labourer after capital is properly recognized, and paid; that labour should enjoy a certain proportion of the results as well as capital. Now, believing that, I am thankful to the Postmaster General for bringing in this resolution. If he appears in a new role—and I will not quarrel about that, I do not think he does—all the better. We should all be thankful for one move in a right direction, when a man leaves the things that are behind, and looks forward to the things that are before. We should all feel thankful that men are moving in a direction different from the one in which they have hitherto moved; and it ought to make hon. gentlemen opposite glad to know that, if what they said about the Postmaster General is true, he has now changed for the better.

I do trust that this resolution will pass unanimously, for it lays down the principle for all governments to follow in all their contracts of every kind. I read the report of that commission, too; and, all I have to say, is this, that if this world is to move to that betterment that every true citizen has in view, it can never do so while women are forced to work those long hours for the small returns that they get. It may not be possible, as I said, for us or for the local legislatures to pass legislation such as I would like to see in that direction. But, surely we can do this much, we can hold up for the men who work, the hope that is only an instalment of what they are entitled to, and that with the growth that must come in an enlightened country like Canada, more will be forthcoming. I want to say in all frankness, that labour has often been injudicious as well as capital. I am bound to say that often the issues raised were not raised, either at the proper time, or with as much wisdom as they might be. But, I am not careful to hold labour responsible for all these things. Our people have to labour, and let us see, at least, that their homes are made more comfortable, and that not one cent of their day's wage or their week's wage, not one cent of their month's wage, or of their year's wage, should be kept from them, by which they may make their homes more comfortable. The member for Montmorency suggested a number of things that we might include in this resolution, if we had the power; but it would be incongruous. We have not yet advanced so far as we might, in the character of the buildings for our workmen. Some of the things to which the hon. gentleman referred, might be good, but, as I said before, they do not fit in with this resolution. This is a definite resolution about one thing, it calls upon the government to see that in every contract that they make, hereafter, the men shall receive all their wages; in the second place, it provides that the wage should be graduated, not upon the scale, such as men may have in their own minds, when they say: I come from a place where the wage is so much; but upon the scale of labour that prevails where they are operating. But it goes further, and it says, that not only in government contracts should the men be paid fairly, but that in all works to which parliament should grant a subvention, with any corporation to which this government may grant money, that rule should also prevail, and that the subvention should be held as a guarantee against the man or the company who receives it, until such time as he has paid his honest debts to those who worked. Viewing the resolution in that way, I am in favour of it. I know it will pass, I know that the better judgment of the members of the House is in favour of it. Let me repeat again that I do not wish, in anything I have said, to make it appear that I am asking for any particular glory for the man who introduces that resolution or for the man who supports it. It is a matter open to any hon. gentleman of this House, and I think every man should assist in its passage. Let us, at least, when it comes to a question so big as the labour problem of this country, forget that we are Grits or Tories, and lay down a rule that shall be universal in its application, and that shall give to those who need it, at least, the hope that when they work for the government they shall be paid. It is a mean thing for a man not to pay the men who work for him, but it is a meaner thing than anything I know of for a government not to pay every honest dollar they contract to pay, and I submit, that we ought to make it an exceedingly difficult thing for any man who has a contract with the government, or a subvention to assist him in the operations in which he is engaged, not to pay his men, and we should insist that he should be compelled to pay his men what they are entitled to. For these reasons, and many others which I might give, I am strongly in favour of the resolution. Pass, I know it will, and let us be ready to take the next step in the direction indicated, or in any other direction that will make it less possible for those who will utilize labour for their own purposes, to make money out of it, and more difficult to obtain that labour without honest payment.

Mr. E. F. CLARKE (West Toronto). Mr. Speaker, I will only say half-a-dozen words on the resolution which has been presented to the House by the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock). I am heartily in accord with any resolution, or any legislation having for its object the improvement of the condition of the working classes of this country, and I approve any action that may be taken by parliament that will tend to the accomplishment of that object. If this resolution, which has been moved by the hon. Postmaster General, will accomplish that end, I am entirely in sympathy with it, but, I must confess, that I was somewhat surprised at the answer given to the question put by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain), whether it was the intention of the government to supplement this resolution by an Act which would provide penalties for the non-enforcement of the principle laid down, in answer to which the hon. Postmaster General said that the government had no such intention. It seems to me, in view of that statement, that this resolution of the government will be little more than a dead letter, and that if the government are honest, as I hope and trust the members of the government are honest, they will not hesitate, now that the suggestion has been made to them, to supplement this resolution by an Act of parliament which will define the conditions under which these labourers working on contracts for the government, or working for sub-contractors, shall be employed, and providing penalties for the non-enforcement of those conditions. It is significant, and it is an evidence of the influence which is exercised upon the legislative bodies of the Dominion of Canada to-day by organized labour, that this resolution of the hon. Postmaster General should find a place upon the Notice paper, on the very day, or on the day after, a deputation, representing the Dominion Trades and Labour Council, had waited upon him. If I am correctly informed, the attention of the government was drawn, by that deputation, to the necessity of some such legislation as is proposed, or which may be embodied in the resolution. The attention of the government was also drawn to the government's scandalous neglect in connection with the non-enforcement of the Alien Labour Law, which was placed upon the statute-books of the country some two or three years ago with a great flourish of trumpets by hon. gentlemen opposite, but which, from that day to the present, has remained practically a dead letter. I feel constrained, from the experience I have had, and from the knowledge I have obtained as to the non-enforcement of that law, to say that this resolution will remain, practically, a dead letter, as the alien labour law has remained a dead letter, unless it is amplified and implemented by an Act of parliament providing for its enforcement, and which will not take an order in council to enforce, as the alien labour law does. When the government introduced the alien labour law, through the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Cowan), the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), declared that the government were a unit in their desire to give the protection which it was proposed by the alien labour law to give to Canadian workmen. The Premier declared, in his place in this House, that the government were a unit as to this proposed legislation. He said :

There cannot be any doubt as to the position of the government upon this Bill. In fact, I do not know that it is at all advisable to prolong the debate any longer, because, so far as I can interpret the sentiment of the House, there is a unanimous feeling at this moment, whatever may have been the opinions held by members in the past, that the persistence of the American Congress in keeping upon the statute-book these very obnoxious clauses, leaves no alternative to the Canadian people but to apply the same themselves. . . .

The course adopted by our neighbours seems to me to leave no option to us but to apply to them the same measure of justice, or of injustice, as they applied to us.

These were strong words, they were noble words, and if effect had been given to them, if the alien labour law had been carried out, as the intention was that it should be carried out, and rigidly enforced, the working classes of Canada would not have had reason to complain, as they do at the present time ; and it will not be surprising if they look sideways at the resolution which the hon. Postmaster General has introduced to-day, having had the experience they have had since this government came into power, of their neglect to enforce the law upon which they declared all the members of the government were unanimous, and on which the members of this House were practically unanimous. The right hon. leader of the government declared the government were a unit in giving their support and encouragement to the Bill, but, it was necessary before the Bill was crystallized into law, that it should receive the sanction of the Upper Chamber. What did we see there ? The spectacle was presented to us of a colleague of hon. gentlemen opposite, the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Scott) denouncing, in the Senate, the very measure which the Premier, in this House, had declared, had received the unanimous approval of the government. I say that, when we take this fact into consideration, we have a right to inquire as to what the motives of the hon. Postmaster General are in introducing this resolution at this particular time. Speaking in the Senate, on the second reading of the Alien Labour Bill, the hon. Secretary of State said, as will be found in the Senate proceedings of June 19, 1897 :

I do not think it would be really wise to pass this Act. I do not think it is likely to be enforced, and when it is not enforced, it is a pity to place it on the statute-book, because it is not on a line with the views of the people of Canada.

Further on, he declared :

I should be sorry to see it on the statute-book, because I know it would be an idle Act.

His words were prophetic ; it has been an idle Act.

It would be an announcement that we were going to do it, and we would not do it.

Further on, he said :

I advise that it be dropped, because it is not a Bill which should be enforced.

Again :

Under this Act, persons can come in by the thousands, and it is only when a report is sent to the Attorney General and he makes inquiry, that any action would be taken ; and, of course, the party would by that time be absorbed in the community, and that would be the end of it. It is something which we do not propose to carry out.

These are opinions expressed by a member of the same government respecting this alien labour law ; and I say that the workmen of Canada, having had the experience that they have had for the past two years of the non-enforcement of the alien labour law, are entitled to demand from the hon. Postmaster General, if he is sincere in presenting this resolution to the House, that he shall implement, or supplement it with legislation which will enable the resolution to be carried into effect in actual practice. I propose, Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the House, to offer a slight amendment which I trust will be an improvement upon the resolution of the Postmaster General. It is in the line—going a little further—which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) has proposed, and I am satisfied that if the government will accept this amendment, it will give great satisfaction to the working classes, in whose interest I have no doubt this resolution has been presented. At all events, it will enable the object of the resolution to be more efficiently carried out. Reference has been made by the Postmaster General to the propriety—we all agree in the remark—of paying a fair day's wage for a fair day's work, and the hon. member from Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) also cordially supported that proposition. Sir, if the resolution embodying these principles is to have any influence and effect, the people of the Dominion have the right to expect from this government that they will, in so far as their own employees are concerned, give immediate effect to these principles. I am sorry to say that the Postmaster General has not done that to the extent we would have liked to see him do it, in the administration of his own department. What was practically a contract, was made with the civil servants in his department when they entered the public service, and I ask, has the Postmaster General carried out the terms and conditions of that contract under which these men accepted service under the Crown? Not at all. He has allowed under-paid and over-worked employees in his department—the letter carriers and the third-class clerks especially—to remain without receiving their statutory increase which the government practically promised and agreed to give them. These men have also been compelled to work without the usual advantage of holidays during the past two or three years, and at less remuneration than they thought they would receive, and that they were entitled to under the rule in existence when they entered the public service. If the Postmaster General is desirous that this resolution of his should be effective, then the amendment which I shall propose will, I have no doubt, be passed unanimously. If the hon. gentleman wishes that resolution to have the beneficial effect it should have, he must first set the example of giving a fair day's wage to his employees in the Post Office Department, and he should induce his colleagues in the other departments, if their employees are under-paid, to pursue a like course. The wages of labourers in the civic employment of the city of Toronto to-day—men who are not skilled, men who have not passed any examination—are fixed at a minimum of 15 cents per hour. The corporation of the city of Toronto years ago embodied in all its contracts a provision that men who were employed by contractors for municipal works should be paid a minimum wage of 15 cents per hour. Would it be believed, Mr. Speaker, that one-half, yes, two-thirds, yes, three-fourths of those who enter the mail service in the Post Office Department go in at a salary of $25 per month, or less than $1 per day. If the Postmaster General desires that we should give him the credit he thinks he is entitled to for introducing a resolution of this kind, he should set a good example by raising the wages of the men employed as letter carriers and third-class clerks. I do not propose to take up the time of the House at any greater length, than to offer this amendment to the resolution :

And that the aforesaid policy shall be forthwith applied to every department of the public service, and to all parties now performing service for the government.

If the Postmaster General is in earnest in bringing about a new condition of things in so far as the rights of labourers on government contracts are concerned, and if hon. gentlemen opposite are so desirous, I am sure that they can have no objection to support the amendment which I have now proposed. I am satisfied that if they do so, the ideas of the Postmaster General can be better carried out, and that a greater measure of protection will be extended to those who are employed by contractors on government works than if the resolution remains unamended.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read the amendment again.

Mr. CLARKE. I shall read the whole resolution as amended :

That it be resolved that all government contracts should contain such conditions as will prevent abuses which may arise from the subletting of such contracts, and that every effort should be made to secure the payment of such wages as are generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen in the district where the work is carried out, and that this House cordially concurs in such policy, and deems it the duty of the government to take immediate steps to give effect thereto. It is hereby declared that the work to which the foregoing policy shall apply includes not only work undertaken by the government itself, but also all works aided by grant of Dominion public funds.

Then my amendment will be added to that, and reads :

And that the aforesaid policy shall be forthwith applied to every department of the public service and to all parties now performing service for the government.

Mr. N. A. BELCOURT (Ottawa). I was not in the House, Mr. Speaker, and had not the advantage of hearing the remarks made by the Postmaster General. My intention was to support the resolution as introduced by the minister (Mr. Mulock), but I must say now, that I am prepared to support the resolution as amended by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke). I do not think anything can be added to what has already been said in support either of the resolution itself or of the resolution as amended. The hon. member from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) spoke of a number of matters in reference to which this parliament certainly has no jurisdiction. The only possible addition to the resolution as introduced, and which it is competent for this parliament to make, is the addition which has been proposed by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clarke). The question of eight or nine hours for a day's work ; the question of compensation for loss of life or limb, and those other matters to which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casgrain) refers, are not within the competence of this parliament, and could not constitutionally be embodied in any resolution passed by us. These are matters with which the provincial legislatures have to deal, and I confess I was surprised that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casgrain), who for several years was Attorney General of the province of Quebec, should even suggest that such matters as these could form part of this resolution. All that this parliament can do is to take action with reference to its own contracts. The other matters are absolutely within the purview of the provincial legislatures. This parliament can take means to secure to labourers payment for their work at current rates on government contracts, and I take it that the resolution of the Postmaster General, so far as labouring men in the proper sense of the word are concerned, would secure to them not only employment at current wages, but the payment of these wages as well. It is quite within the power of the different departments of the government which let out contracts for public works to insert in their contracts a clause that before the final estimate shall be paid on any contract, the contractor must satisfy the government that the labourers employed by him on that work have been paid their wages. The government can withhold any money due on the final estimate until the contractor has so satisfied the department. Though it is not expressed in the resolution, that is the object in view, and that object will be carried out by the heads of the different departments of the government. I said in opening my remarks that I was prepared to vote for the amendment, and I am prepared to vote for it on this ground. I congratulate the hon. Postmaster General on the solicitude and consideration which he has shown for the labouring men properly so-called; but I think the civil service of Canada are also entitled to a little more consideration than has been shown to them by this government. I have from my seat in this House, pleaded at different times on behalf of the civil service, as I am properly more responsible than any other member, for looking after their interests. As everybody knows, there are a very large number of that class in Ottawa, and I have felt for several years that the manner of granting statutory increases has not been such as I can approve of. I confess that I do not know yet, by what rule the government determine the right of any civil servant to the statutory increase. If it is a rule of proportion, I disapprove of it. A matter of that kind, which is a matter of justice and equity, cannot be determined by the rule of three. I do not propose to advance the legal argument; I do not think it is a very strong argument; the hon. member for West Toronto does, but I do not. I do not think the civil service have a legal claim to the increase; but, speaking from my experience, which is a large one, I say that the great majority of the civil service are entitled to the statutory increase, as they would be entitled to an increase if working for ordinary business concerns. I have had a great deal to do with civil servants in the city of Ottawa, and I say, that as a rule, they are as painstaking, deserving and efficient a class as can be found in any other business or profession that I know of. I do not think that more than one-half of the civil servants have received their statutory increase during the last three years. I say I cannot approve of that, and, for that reason, I am prepared to support, with my vote, the amendment of the hon. member for Toronto West. Nor is that the only reason. If I had time, I could advance many other reasons why the system pursued by the government is not a proper one. One reason is that the fact of the statutory increase not having been granted to a large number of civil servants, has led to an enormous amount of political pressure, not only upon ministers, but upon members of this House, and, that is something from which, I think, the civil servants ought to be absolutely free. It does not tend to improve the civil service to force them, or to allow them to resort to outside political influences, in order to secure their statutory increase. That is a matter that should be left entirely in the hands of the heads of departments. It is a matter of which they alone should be the judges, and I, for one, though I have been pressed day in and day out, during the last three years, to approach this or that minister, and urge the granting of the statutory increase, I have, in every case, declined to do so, because I felt that I had no right to go to any particular minister to suggest to him the persons to whom he should give the increase. I was not in a position to know who deserved it, and, as the minister alone, had the responsibility, I declined to press the ministers in person. I have endeavoured to give my views on the subject in this House and outside, but without avail. But, I am compelled reluctantly to vote for the amendment. Not that I do not approve of the resolution. I think that resolution, as far as it goes, is all right. It will not only secure to the labouring man the current wage, but, I think, it will have the effect of forcing contractors to pay the wages of their men before they, themselves, are paid by the government. But, I support the amendment of the hon. member for Toronto West also, because it entirely meets my views with reference to the civil service. The greatest argument advanced in support of the manner of giving the statutory increases adopted by the government, is that the automatic process of giving them is a wrong one. I believe that is so. I admit that every man in the civil service should not get the statutory increase. I know from experience that there are some men in the service, who are not entitled to it, but that is a matter that is very easily ascertained from the head of the department. If a man is inefficient, indolent, or does not attend to his duties, the head of the department knows it, or ought to know it, and can enlighten his minister, if he chooses to do so. The government business is not different from any other business; it is only a matter of administration. I have a certain number of clerks in my office, and I know which of them is deserving, and which is not; and the head of a department can as easily acquaint himself with the value of his clerks, and report daily or weekly as to the condition of his staff. I admit that the automatic method is the wrong method of giving the increase, and the method adopted by this government is also one that I cannot approve of. For these and other reasons, I shall vote for the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Toronto West.

Mr. JAMES McMULLEN (North Wellington). Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), found fault with the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), for the way in which he paid for the service of carrying the mails from the village of Woodbridge to the station. I find that the statement made by the hon. member, is incorrect. The allowance given for that service is $95 a year, which is equal to over 30 cents a trip. That contract was renewed in 1895 without tender. No doubt, it was held by a friend and supporter of the hon. member for West York. Recently the Postmaster General submitted that contract for public tender, and there was a tender sent in to do the work for $67 a year, which is equal to about 21 cents a day. I would like to know if the Postmaster General was not justified in accepting that tender. The hon. member for West York finds fault because the price for that service had been reduced. Whose fault is it? The Postmaster General's? Certainly not. It was let by public tender, and the man who undertook to do the work at the reduced price, has not carried the mail once. With regard to the civil service, they are a class that I have paid a very considerable attention to during the many years I have sat in this House. There is not a better paid class in Canada. I defy hon. gentlemen opposite to name any class in this Dominion as well paid. Take bank clerks, school teachers, clerks in commercial offices—take any class in the community, and you will not find one in which the average of the salaries is as high. The average salary of the civil servant living in Ottawa is $1,197 per year. Neither in Montreal or Toronto nor any other city in Canada will you find any class whose pay averages that amount.

That being the condition of things, I think that the government was perfectly justified in refusing the statutory increase.

In my opinion the civil service should be recast from cellar to garret. There are a great many things about it I never could justify. I was very anxious that we should have had a board of supervisors to recast it, but that suggestion was not adopted. It would be absurd to augment the salaries of civil servants, in view of the condition that now exist. The country would not tolerate it. I am willing that every man should get a fair wage, but I am not willing that we should increase the wages of those who are already better paid than any other class in the community.

The hon. member for West Toronto said he would like the principle of this resolution applied to the letter carriers in the cities. I contend that the letter carriers do very light work, and the best evidence that they are well paid for the work they do is the fact that when one of them leaves you will find twenty or thirty applying to get the appointment. The letter carriers have the same salaries to-day as when this government came into power. Hon. gentlemen opposite fixed the salaries, and they have not since been changed. If they are paid too little now, they were paid too little before, and yet hon. gentlemen opposite were in office eighteen years and never offered to raise their pay. Under the circumstances, I do not think they are justified in asking that an increase should be given to-day.

I am in full accord with this resolution. It is a step in the right direction. We can well remember the case of the Hamilton, Toronto and Buffalo Railway. Those who laboured in the construction of that road would have been cut out of their wages were it not for the fact that the company had to come to parliament and apply for an amendment to its charter to enable it to draw the money it had earned from the city of Hamilton. The committee were informed that the company was in default to pay its labouring men their wages, and decided not to grant the relief asked for unless the railway company would give a positive guarantee that the labourers would be paid what was due them.

I entirely concur in the resolution introduced by the hon. Postmaster General, and I think the government deserve to be congratulated. I believe that the labouring classes will appreciate the move made by the hon. Postmaster General, and realize that the government is determined to come to the relief of the workingmen, and see that they are treated as they should be by government contractors.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia). I rise simply to supplement the admirable speech and suggestion of my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Clarke). And, as I am on my feet, I may be allowed to say that I have very little respect for imitative legislation. When statesmen proceed to legislate by imitation they make a great mistake, if they do not see to it that the conditions are on all fours; they are trying to put on the wise man's boots without catching his inspiration, and their work is incongruous and inconsequential. Now, my hon. friend, the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), has borrowed his resolution from Mr. Buxton, almost in the word. In 1891, Mr. Buxton proposed a resolution of this kind in the House of Commons of Great Britain. A resolution like this coming from a private member is most proper, because what it seeks to effect, could not, under the rules of the House be proposed as a Bill by a private member. But, Sir, you will see how ridiculous it is for a member of a government to come forward with a resolution of this kind, when that government has it in its power to do what is called for without any such resolution. It is a most extraordinary thing that it never entered the head of the members of this government in 1896, 1897, 1898 or 1899 to bring forward a resolution of this kind; but that they leave it to the very last session before they have to go to the country, to put this resolution on the paper, a resolution that, when passed, they themselves have no guarantee they will have anything to do with in carrying it out. Now, the resolution that was passed in England in 1891 did not, after all, effect the purpose that Mr. Buxton had in view. The consequence was that in 1896 Mr. Buxton moved that a committee be appointed to examine into the working of the resolution, and in the course of his speech, he used this language:

Under the old system, the course taken was a very simple one, because the lowest tender was usually accepted without any condition being made as to the terms in which the workers employed in carrying out the contract were to be treated. That system had given rise to a considerable amount of dissatisfaction on the part of certain persons employed in particular classes of labour, who complained of the way in which the resolution was administered. The question, no doubt, was beset with difficulties, but they were difficulties which might and ought to be overcome. In his view, the chief advantage of the appointment of a committee would be to smooth down those difficulties, and to place the principle laid down in the resolution upon a firmer basis.

And when the committee met, what was their conclusion? I have before me the report of that committee, presented according to an order of the House on July 22, 1897, six years after a resolution came into operation. After something good has been said about the resolution, the report proceeds:

Mr. McMULLEN.

At the same time, it must be noted that, as regards the Irish departments—

That is, the Irish departments of the government:

—the evidence points to the fact that it is only of late that any effective action has been taken to insert it in contracts or to carry out the resolution.

So that, for six years in one of the large portions of the three kingdoms that resolution had remained inoperative and almost a dead letter. And, in regard to the departments in England, here is what the report says:

On the other hand, it cannot be denied that, in certain quarters, there exists a great lack of confidence in the ability or in the desire of some of the departments to enforce the spirit and letter of the resolution. It was alleged that there is no uniformity of interpretation or of administration; that many complaints are altogether ignored, and no inquiry made into them; that where inquiry takes place, it is often very perfunctorily made; that information is frequently only sought from one side, that of the employer, while the complainants are not consulted or kept informed of what is taking place; that the decision is thus too often not in accordance with the true facts of the case; that on occasion, the departmental promises of remedial action have not been fulfilled. Further, it is alleged that, in every case there is great delay and much circumlocution in dealing with complaints; that thus it frequently happens that in cases in which the department concerned ultimately admits the justice of the complaint and instructs the contractor to remedy the grievance, the inquiry has covered such a long period of time that, by then, the contract is almost altogether completed. The men are not benefited, and the contractor escapes all penalty or charge. Finally it is stated that so great is the want of confidence in the ability or desire of the department to remedy these grievances, that trades unions and other representatives of the men, despairing of obtaining proper consideration and redress, have allowed grievances to continue, being convinced of the futility of taking action in respect to them.

Now, what would a statesman have done in the position of my hon. friend the Postmaster General? In the first place, he would have remembered that he was in a different position from Mr. Buxton—he could have proposed a Bill, the very thing that Mr. Buxton could not do. And, with a report like this before him, he would have seen that the resolution passed in the English House of Commons had proved to be, in a great measure inoperative; and therefore, instead of doing the imitator, instead of coming here with the resolution of Mr. Buxton, he, being in the government and having the power to do it, would have come forward with a Bill that would make it obligatory on every department to carry out what he professed to wish to carry out. Now, I hate to see in this House any man or men coming forward with resolutions that might be described—I am speaking generally now—in the language that an hon. friend of mine speaking here to-day ventured to apply to this resolution. I have seen in this House, and I have seen it with regret and humiliation, gentlemen proposing resolutions for no other purpose than to sound in the ears of certain voters all over this country, that they were aiming at a mark, and—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIN. What is that. I wish the hon. gentleman who is interrupting me would speak loud enough, would become an articulate-speaking man so that I can hear him. But, if he will not give me the help of his wisdom, or unwisdom, I will ask him to be quiet. I say that to see a member of this House talking as if he were aiming at a certain thing while not taking the most effective way of reaching it, always humiliates me as a member of a House like this that should be in all its dealings sincere as regards the people and manly in its actions.

Now, I was very glad that the member for West Toronto proposed the amendment that he did, because he makes it complete. But, even with that amendment, what will happen? We shall have precisely the same thing over that has happened in England. That resolution will be in part obligatory on the department; it is only suggestive and permissive, it is not mandatory. If we wanted to make it mandatory we must legislate, we must put it in an Act of parliament. Therefore, because this is in the shape of holding out a promise, of giving something substantial and valuable to the people, and then putting them off with a stone or a serpent, I will venture to add an amendment to my hon. friend's which will, I think, make the resolution complete. Anyway, it will get rid of the defect that was proved to inhere in the resolution in England, in its operation, and it will show that we in parliament are sincere. I, therefore, move in amendment to the amendment:

That all the words after 'That' be left out of the question, and the following substituted therefor:

Be it resolved, that all government contracts should contain such conditions as will prevent abuses which may arise from the sub-letting of such contracts, and that every effort should be made to secure the payment of such wages as are generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen in the district where the work is carried out; and that this House cordially concurs in such a policy, and deems it the duty of the government to take immediate steps to give effect thereto.

It is hereby declared that the work to which the foregoing policy shall apply includes not only work undertaken by the government itself, but also works aided by grant of Dominion public funds, and that the aforesaid policy shall be forthwith applied to every department of the public service, and to all parties who may hereafter perform services for the government; and that these resolves be embodied in an Act of parliament.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). I am beginning to conclude that this House was called together two months too soon. We have been in session two months, and it has puzzled the ingenuity of the government to find any means of providing something for this House to do. That their supporters recognize that there is no intention of seriously legislating on the important question that has been submitted here to-day, is to be found in the fact that you have only twenty members sitting behind three or four ministers of the Crown in this House just now. No better indication could be given of the fact that the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) is relied upon to find work for the House. On one occasion he amuses us with the introduction of a Bill which he had no reason to expect for a single moment would become law; and on another, he brings in a resolution upon a subject of great importance, but which has not a line in it that indicates any sincere resolve or desire on the part of this government to deal with that important question in the manner it deserves. Now, if there is one subject that ought to engage the serious attention of the parliament of Canada it is the question of labour. Every member of this House must know and recognize the fact, that in the dignity of labour is to be found the only true and sure foundation of the greatness of any people. It is upon having a body of intelligent, sober, industrious operatives that the country must rely for any great progress or any great prosperity. You may have capital, you may have manufacturers, you may have everything else, but unless you can command intelligent labour in a country, you will utterly fail in the essentials of true progress and prosperity.

Now, why is this subject brought before the House in this perfunctory manner? Simply because the House has nothing to do, simply because the hon. gentleman finds that the government of which he is a member have called the House two months too soon, and they are unable to furnish the House any public business to attend to. Sir, if it was intended to deal seriously with this question, why have we not a Bill introduced? As was well said by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), who has just taken his seat, this resolution is worth nothing unless it is followed by a Bill. Every one knows that everything contained in this resolution is just as much in the power of the government to-day, and has been for the last three years, as it will be after this resolution is passed. There is nothing in this resolution that was not perfectly competent for hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches to give effect to and to carry out, without such a resolution being passed at all. Sir, there is nothing more objectionable than putting on the records of parliament resolutions only to be ignored and disregarded; there is nothing more objectionable in the way of legislative action that I know of than to place on paper public measures that hon. gentlemen opposite have not the slightest intention of paying any regard to after they have been placed on the journals of the House.

What is the history of these hon. gentlemen? Are they friends of labour? Have they shown from the first hour they occupied these benches down to this moment that they have the slightest regard to the great labour interests of this country? The very reverse. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) undertook, in the sermon which he preached here this afternoon, and with some very feeble and ineffective attempts to lighten his discourse by quoting passages of scripture which he could not remember, that hon. gentleman put in a plea in excuse for the Postmaster General bringing this motion before the House. He said, no matter how great a sinner the Postmaster General might be—I will not undertake to quote his eloquent language verbatim, but that is the meaning of what he said—he said, it is of no consequence where this comes from: if it is good in itself, let both sides adopt it. Why, Sir, he reminded me very much of a clergyman who had preached a very heart-stirring sermon on temperance. When he was going home one of his churchwardens found him taking up a little too much of the sidewalk, and said to him: 'How is it possible that, after such a sermon as you have preached on temperance to-day, you have taken too much drink?' 'Oh, hang it, man,' said the clergyman, 'follow the light and never mind the lantern.' And so, the member for Guysborough says, No matter how great a sinner the hon. Postmaster General is in this matter, follow the light and never mind the lantern. And I think that, after listening to the speech made by the member for West York (Mr. Wallace), we must all come to the conclusion, that if there has been a great sinner on this question in disregarding everything that lies at the foundation of the interests of labour, it is the hon. Postmaster General, as shown in his conduct. I do not intend to go back to ancient history, but I say that his whole course, from the time he was first placed in office, has been one of the most cruel, ill-feeling modes of dealing with the labour of this country that any man has ever exhibited in this House or in this country. This government stands to-day, before the people of Canada, as not only having a perfect contempt for anything like honest labour, like honest industry, on the part of the horny-handed soas of toil, which contempt they have over and over again shown, but they have shown the most perfect disregard for anything like fair and honest dealing between the government and their employees that it was possible to indicate. My hon. friend (Mr. Davin), who has just taken his seat, says that to do any good you must have an Act of parliament, and he is quite right. But, we must have something more than an Act of parliament. The hon. gentleman had an Act of parliament on the statute-book, sanctioned by time, honoured by precedent, for five-and-twenty years by both parties in power, sanctified and hallowed by them, but the hon. Postmaster General has trampled that Act of parliament under his feet, and has cruelly deprived the employees under his control of that which the Act of parliament gave them. I asked the right hon. leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to allow that question of law, upon which eminent legal gentlemen on both sides of this House differed, to be referred to the Supreme Court of Canada, under the authority that we have in such cases where there is doubt, but the right hon. gentleman refused, and he refused, because, I believe, he knew that the report of the Supreme Court would have been that this government had violated and trampled under foot the law that was placed there to protect honest industry and labour. The policy of the country had been, from the first, to bring young men who had obtained, by their industry and efforts, the necessary education to perform clerical duties, in at a nominal amount of $400 a year, a sum that would barely clothe and feed them, without leaving them a dollar for their labour. The policy of the government—not of the government, but of all governments—the policy of parliament, as embodied in an Act on the statute-book, was that these gentlemen should be induced to come into the public service and to give the country the benefit of their services, not for a sum that would wear out their lives, that would barely feed and clothe them, but with the prospect, and pledge on the part of parliament and of the country, that if they did their duty faithfully they would be recognized by the government of the day, and they would be advanced from year to year by an increment of $50 added to the salary that they received. No measure could be better calculated than that to improve the public service, because, in order to obtain that $50 a year, it required the evidence of a certificate by the head of the department, unconnected entirely with politics, that they were deserving of it. We know perfectly well, that, in Canada, the moment a gentleman becomes the head of a department, he ceases to be a politician, he occupies a most important and responsible position, and he maintains that dignity and responsibility by acting with perfect impartiality. The law places it in the power of that man, removed from politics altogether and political considerations, to report to the minister at the head of the department, who are worthy of having that increment of $50 a year. If these public servants discharge their duty honestly and well, if they showed an aptitude for the public service, and an attention to the duties with which they were charged, they knew they had an absolute guarantee by law, sanctioned by precedent, that they would receive that increase of their salaries, until they had reached a point where their ability and intelligence and the mode in which they had discharged their duty would enable them to be promoted. The law could not have been better adapted, by any possible means, to provide a thoroughly efficient civil service, because members of the civil service knew, that, upon their industry, their intelligence and the able discharge of their duties the road to future fortune lay, and that the road was clear to all to go to the highest place in the civil service, provided they had the ability, industry and integrity which were necessary to reach that position. These hon. gentlemen by one of the most cruel acts that ever disgraced any government in this country, have, at once, trampled that law under their feet, and they have made the expenditure of public money the means of rewarding their own partisans and trampling upon the rights of every man who would not bow the knee to Baal. I say that if ever there was a government in this country that took the position that they were utterly contemptuous of labour, that they really cared nothing for anything except their own partisan advancement, and benefit, it is this government. What more have they done? They have spent thousands and tens of thousands of public money in appointing bogus commissions to go through Canada and endeavour to fish up and rake up something that would enable them to take the bread out of a poor man's mouth and turn him into the street. First, it required offensive partisanship; but, they found that that would not provide their supporters with sufficient return, and they consequently expanded the grounds of offence into any political act. The mere fact of expressing any opinion of any kind in an honest, straightforward and intelligent way was quite sufficient to destroy a man and not only to bar any advancement in the public service, but to result in his being ruthlessly driven out into the street and the bread of his wife and family being taken away from him. These are the hon. gentlemen, when the time has come that they have to go back to the people, to the great labour element in this country whose interests and rights they have outraged from the first hour they obtained power, who come in with this resolution in the endeavour to delude the people and the labour element as to their true position. It is too late. There is such a thing as a death-bed repentance being too late, and this is a case of that kind. I am afraid that the very important amendment, moved by the hon. member for Western Assiniboia, that this resolution should be crystallized into an Act of parliament will not be respected by them, because, if they can trample one Act of parliament under their feet, they can trample another. Was there ever a more scandalous outrage done to the labour element of this country than that which was involved in the conduct of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair). What a spectacle did we witness in this House! We heard an hon. gentleman, whose word no man will dispute, and whose action showed that he had a heart within his breast, if the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals had none—we heard the hon. member for Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Frost) tell the House that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals gave him carte blanche to take the heads off the whole of the canal employees in his district. He said that he did not do it. It is not to the credit of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals who handed over that despotic power, but it is to the credit of the hon. gentleman, who had this power placed in his hands to serve his own interest, that he refused to exercise it. With the enormous number of people under the control of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, he has shown, by that one act, his utter contempt of everything like honest labour in this country. What defence has been pretended to be put up? Why, they say, these parties are only employed for the summer, and when the summer is over they are released from their duties, that the re-employment next spring is a pure matter of choice on the part of the government, and they have no more claim than any other man who has never been in the service. Was ever a more cruel doctrine propounded on the floor of parliament than that? Tempted by a quarter of a century of honest administration of public affairs in this country—it was the rule observed by Mr. Mackenzie's government as well as by the Conservative government—these public employees were led to believe that they would receive fair consideration, and were induced out of their small earnings to build cottages on the public lands for the shelter of themselves and their families. And, having faithfully and honestly discharged their duties irrespective of party, they were nevertheless driven out of the houses they had built out of their savings, their families ruthlessly thrown on the streets, and their houses handed over to some heeler or partisan of this government. It is too late for this government to pose as the friends of labour. Has ever a man treated the employees in his department with such cruelty as the Postmaster General has? He turned a deaf ear to the entreaties of suffering men, and their wives and families, but last spring when he thought there was going to be a general election he endeavoured to buy these people by giving them what belonged to them before, but which he had cruelly denied them. How is he going to carry out this resolution unless he radically changes his whole policy? He has endeavoured to get work done at starvation rates, that the country was willing to pay an honest price for. He was obliged to admit to my hon.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

friend (Mr. Wallace) that he rewards the mail carrier with 7 cents an hour, or 21 cents a day for services performed under contract with him. Take his conduct in the Yukon territory, and was there ever a greater scandal? Why, the whole world rang with the utterly corrupt and disgraceful condition of the post office service in the Yukon. The government boasted that by this 10 per cent exaction it had wrung out of the poor miners who went to the Yukon with their lives in their hands to struggle for a livelihood, three-quarters of a million of dollars surplus over the expenditure in that country. Yes, Sir, these poor men, far removed from civilization and enduring the greatest hardships, were six long months without being able to get a letter to know how their friends in the outside world were, or to enable them to carry on their commercial transactions. The hon. gentleman used the mounted police in the post office service to try and show a saving in his department. If there is a body of men in this country who are entitled to the respect and confidence of all the people, it is the mounted police, but they were not qualified to discharge post office duties which required trained officials. More than that, at a cost of between half a million and a million dollars the permanent force of this country were sent out to discharge the duties which properly belonged to the mounted police. The late able Major-General Commanding, Col. Hutton, told this government in his report a year ago—and it was not very palatable information to come from a subordinate officer, as they considered him—Col. Hutton felt it his duty to report, that by sending 200 men of the permanent force to the Yukon, to perform the duties of mounted policemen, the government had utterly destroyed the permanent force which, at a large expenditure, the country is called upon to maintain. No doubt the government saved half a million dollars in one direction, but there was a vast loss to the people of Canada in the other. The Postmaster General can boast that he saved money in his department, but in saving that money he denied a postal service to the hardy miners of the Yukon, just as the government deprived them of the sanitary measures which are absolutely necessary for a population of that kind. These men were making the treasury rich by prospecting for and discovering gold, but the Postmaster General and his colleagues denied them all the rights which citizens in this country should have. Go through any part of the administration of the Postmaster General, and you will find that a more cruel and oppressive minister never tampered and trifled with the rights and interests of the sons of toil in this country. No wonder that the hon. member for Guysborough wishes us to forget the man in the cause, and has asked us to vote for this resolution without considering who it was that introduced it. While this government has trampled under foot the interests and privileges of the sons of toil in Canada, they have called upon them with the rest of the population to pay some six million dollars of additional taxation over and above that which was ever demanded from the people of Canada before. Under these circumstances, it is a little too late for these gentlemen opposite to pose in the light of suddenly waking up, in a death-bed repentance, to offer a proposition in parliament which may bring the labour vote to rally around this government, which has been the greatest enemy of the working people that has ever ruled in any country. It would be difficult, I think, to carry out this resolution. There would be no hope of doing so without an Act of parliament. The resolution reads very well; but does not the hon. gentleman see that it strikes a deadly blow at once at lowest-tender contracts? The moment you attempt to carry out this principle, you are in a position—and hon. gentlemen opposite have not taken a course which would lead us to believe that they would be superior to such a position—to pass by the lowest tenderer, a Conservative, and give the contract to a Liberal, at a much higher cost to the country, on the ground that the lowest tender was too low to enable the government to guard the interest of the parties referred to in this resolution. I do not hesitate to say that deeds in these matters speak louder than words. I was not very long Secretary of State of this Dominion, but I was long enough to change the rules of the large labour department under my control at that time, the Printing Bureau, so as to establish an eight-hour day; and hon. gentlemen opposite, as in many other instances, have accepted that precedent, as one worthy of their adoption, and have followed it. I would like the hon. gentleman to point to any Act from the hour he came into office, down to the present hour, that would show that he has ever wasted a thought upon, or given the slightest attention to the claims of that great labour element of this country in whose welfare we are all most deeply interested. As I said before, it is our duty to secure, as far as legislation can secure it, a fair day's wage for a fair day's work, and to do everything that will enable the labour element to be steadily raised and elevated in the position they occupy in this country. This country to-day abounds with hundreds and thousands of cases of men engaged in daily toil, who have, by strict economy, strict sobriety, and great industry, raised themselves step by step until they have been able to educate themselves and their families, and take a much higher position in the social scale, which is so important to the best interests of every country, and, which, I think, will be found to exist very largely in this country. I have no doubt the House will accept both of these amendments, and, I have no doubt that this measure, unless hon. gentlemen are treating it as a comedy, will require to be embodied in an Act of parliament, as well as every measure that can be wisely and judiciously adopted to secure the carrying out of such a policy in reference to the labour of this country, as will give all the aid, and all the support to that most important branch of political economy of every country as the labour element certainly represents.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to follow my hon. friend through the many digressions over which he has travelled; and still less do I propose to imitate the scolding tone with which he has discussed this very important question. I will rather address myself to the calm judgment of the House, upon what is nothing else than a mere business proposition. We have before the House a very important motion, as has been admitted by every hon. member who has addressed the House up to the present time. It involves the application of a principle against which no one has anything to say, so far as I have heard the discussion, except my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper), who has just taken his seat; and as to my hon. friend himself, I do not know what position he takes upon this proposition, and I doubt very much if he understands it himself. At one stage of his speech, he argued that this proposition was very objectionable indeed, because, it would place in the hands of ministers the power of passing over the lowest tenderer and giving the contract to the highest tenderer. This, indeed, would be a very serious objection, from every point of view; but, if the proposition moved by my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), were to be followed by this result; if it were to place in the hands of the Postmaster General, or the Minister of Railways and Canals, or the Minister of Public Works, or any other member of the government, the power of unduly favouring a friend, or being guilty of political favouritism at the expense of the treasury; if it were to permit the passing over of the lowest tenderer and giving the contract to a higher tenderer, yet my hon. friend, not only does propose to vote in favour of such a resolution, but he does not find it strong enough, and he wants to have it strengthened by an Act of parliament. Could anything be more inconsistent than such a position as that? Is the hon. gentleman serious or not serious, and is all this scolding oration which we have heard, after all simply words, without any meaning whatever? I should judge so from the language of the hon. gentleman. After all, he is going to vote in favour of the resolution, with the blemishes he sees in it, and, even though it will, in his mind, place in the hands of ministers such a dangerous power as he says is embodied in it. I would rather take the opinion of hon. gentlemen who have spoken on both sides of this House—the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke), the hon. member for Western Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), and others, who are in favour of this proposition. I would rather take the sober opinion of my hon. friend himself, who at the bottom, is in favour of this proposition, and wants to vote for it. Let me look at this proposition. I do it, not for the purpose of defending it. It needs no defence, not even against the attack of my hon. friend, who has answered himself. But, it needs to be explained because of the amendment proposed. Let me call the attention of the House to the character of the proposition, and the amendments proposed to it. The proposition is in these words:

That it be resolved, that all government contracts should contain such conditions as will prevent abuses which may arise from the sub-letting of such contracts, and that every effort should be made to secure the payment of such wages as are generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen in the district where the work is carried out, and that this House cordially concurs in such policy, and deems it the duty of the government to take immediate steps to give effect thereto. It is hereby declared that the work to which the foregoing policy shall apply includes not only work undertaken by the government itself, but also all works aided by grant of Dominion public funds.

Now, the object of this motion is plain enough. It is to protect workingmen; it is to protect manual labour; it is to protect that large class of men who are employed on public works—on railways, on canals, in shops, and so on. This is a very intelligible proposition. The amendment of the hon. member for West Toronto does not at all dispute the justice, the fairness, or the advisability of the proposition embodied in the motion. The amendment of the hon. member for West Toronto does not propose to take away anything from the original motion. He accepts the original motion in its entirety, but wants to have it supplemented by another proposition, namely:

And that the aforesaid policy shall be applied to every department of the public service and to all parties hereafter who perform services for the government.

There is no relevancy whatever to the main motion in this amendment. The main motion is intended to protect a class of labour which we know by experience is little able to take care of itself. It is intended to protect the men who work with their hands on public works generally. But, the amendment proposed is to protect another class altogether, and a class of men who, as a rule, do not require any protection. The amendment deals with clerical work, and the main motion with manual work, so that there is no relation whatever between the two. There is every reason why we should protect the men who do manual labour on our railways or canals or other public works, but why should we give more protection to the clerks in the civil service than they have already? What relation is there between the members of the civil service and the horny-handed sons of toil who build our railways and canals? I scarcely think that the hon. member for West Toronto can be serious in proposing such an amendment. He is not satisfied with protecting the labourers on public works, but he wants also to give protection to the clerks in the governmental departments. The thing is absurd. The same principle is not applicable to a clerk in the Privy Council that is applicable to a labourer on a canal. I appeal to the common sense and intelligence and fairness of the House not to stultify itself by accepting any such amendment. If the hon. member for West York is of the opinion that the members of the civil service require more protection than they have already, let him make a substantive motion to that effect, but not an amendment to this resolution. I submit to the sense of the House that the members of the civil service generally are well paid, and do not require any more protection than they have now.

I now come to the sub-amendment moved by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). What that hon. gentleman wants is that the resolution should be embodied in an Act of parliament. Well, I believe, with my hon. colleague the Postmaster General, that the resolution is quite sufficient in itself. Indeed, it has more elasticity for the purpose contemplated than an Act of parliament. An Act of parliament would tie the hands of a minister. The minister could not go beyond it, although on many occasions it might be advisable to go beyond it, whereas, if you affirm by the unanimous vote of the House—and the House is evidently unanimous in support of this resolution—the rule laid down in the resolution, a minister would be in a better position to apply that rule than if it were embodied in an Act of parliament. The resolution seems to me quite sufficient as it is.

I would further ask the attention of the hon. member for West Assiniboia, and your attention also, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that the amendment of my hon. friend from West Assiniboia is not in order. It is not drawn with the skill required for an amendment of this kind, although that is not difficult to draw. The hon. gentleman has reaffirmed in his sub-amendment both the motion and the amendment of the hon. member for West Toronto. Sir John Bourinot lays down the rule as follows:

Every member has the right of moving an amendment without giving notice thereof. This amendment may propose: (1) to leave out certain words; (2) to leave out certain words in order to insert or add others; (3) to insert or add certain words.

The amendment of the hon. member for West Toronto is quite in order, namely,

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

‘that the following words be added: “and the aforesaid policy shall forthwith apply to the Department of Public Works and all parties hereafter performing service for the government.”’

When an amendment has been proposed, it is open for any hon. member to move an amendment to the same, but in this case the original motion is laid aside practically for the time being, and the first amendment to it becomes as it were a substantive motion. The question, therefore, now before the House is the amendment of the hon. member for West Toronto, that certain words be added, namely, ‘that the aforesaid policy shall be forthwith applied to every department of the public service and to all parties hereafter performing service for the government.’ But the motion of the hon. member for West Assiniboia is not really an amendment to the amendment, but an amendment to the main motion, and it reads as follows:

That all the words after ‘That’ be omitted, and the following substituted therefor: That it be resolved that all government contracts should contain such conditions as will prevent abuses, which may arise from the sub-letting of such contracts, and that every effort be made to secure the payment of such wages as are generally current in each trade for competent workmen in the district where the work is carried out, and that this House cordially concurs in such policy, and deems it the duty of the government to take immediate steps to give effect thereto. It is hereby declared that the work to which the foregoing policy should apply includes not only work undertaken by the government itself, but also all works aided by grant of Dominion public funds, and that the aforesaid policy shall be forthwith applied to every department of public works and all parties who may hereafter perform services for the government, and that these resolves be embodied in an Act of parliament.

This is, therefore, evidently not an amendment to the amendment, but an amendment to the main resolution. What the hon. gentleman should have done was to have simply moved to add these words to the amendment: ‘And that this resolution be embodied in an Act of parliament.’ That would be in order, but I submit that the amendment to the amendment, as it is before the House, is not in order. I may be wrong in this, but the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) himself will perceive that the amendment to the amendment is not skilfully done, but that it is simply putting a question before the House that is already before the House in another way. The main motion is not before the House at this moment; it has been relegated to the background by the amendment. The question is whether the words moved by the hon. member for West Toronto should be added to the main motion. And the amendment is not an amendment to that, but to the main motion, and so, I submit, is out of order.

Mr. DAVIN. Speaking to the question of order, the right hon. gentleman’s (Sir Wilfrid Laurier's) argument, as I understand it, is that in case of an amendment to the amendment, there must be three questions before the House, the original question, the amendment to that motion, and the amendment to the amendment; and, the second amendment, to be in order, must read that words be added. Now, I say there are three questions before the House, and I would point out that the course I have taken is the course taken in the English parliament to-day—that all the words after 'that' be left out. They have a much better way of putting the motion than we have, because they put it that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question, and therefore, in the case of an amendment, and an amendment to that amendment in the English House, you get an absolute photograph of the opinion of the House at the time; whereas, with us, you can shut off the opinion on the first and second motion provided you have the majority on the third. The English system is the more scientific way of putting the question. And I say we have a right to adopt the English way of moving an amendment to a first amendment, namely, that all the words after 'that' be left out and that certain words and part of the question. I would ask the ruling of Mr. Speaker on that point.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I ask to be allowed to say a word on the question of order. I take it that any one has a right to move an amendment, so long as that amendment is relevant to the question. The rule is laid down in the authority quoted by the Prime Minister, Sir John Bourinot's book, page 386. He says that there are three ways of moving an amendment.

1. To leave out certain words.
2. To leave out certain words in order to insert or add others.
3. To insert or add certain words.

Now, the motion in amendment, moved by my hon. friend from West Toronto, is to add certain words to the resolution. There is no doubt that that is in order. If you refer to page 389 of Bourinot, it will be seen that when an amendment is proposed, it is competent for a member to move an amendment to the same. I take it that the same rule that applies to the amendment to the resolution applies to the amendment to the amendment, that is that it must be relevant to the question. The hon. member for West Toronto proposes to add certain words to the motion, and that amendment is not repugnant to the question. Supposing that my hon. friend from West Assinibola had simply moved that these words be added to the amendment 'and that these resolves be embodied in an Act of parliament.' In that case, surely nobody would have raised any question; as a sub-amendment that would have been in order. It is an everyday thing in parliamentary practice that a sub-amendment is proposed to add certain words to an amendment. That is common, not only in this House but in the legislatures of the provinces, which follow the same rules as this House. What is the difference between the course I have indicated and the course followed by my hon. friend (Mr. Davin)? All he asks to do, practically is to add these words to the amendment of my hon. friend from West Toronto 'and that these resolves be embodied in an Act of parliament.' Is there any rule or any principle of relevancy which can be quoted against such a sub-amendment? I take it that there is not. Therefore, the amendment to the amendment is in order. There is no practical result to be gained by the objection taken by the Prime Minister. If it is true that my hon. friend from West Assinibola could have added these words to the amendment, it seems to follow that the words could be added by repeating the amendment of the hon. member for West Toronto, and adding thereto the words which my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) proposed to add.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is an object in the rules of the House. That object is to devise a method according to which the public business should be done. It is competent for a member to move a resolution, for another member to move an amendment to that resolution, and for a third member who is not wholly satisfied with either to move an amendment to the amendment. The hon. member for West Assinibola says: I am perfectly satisfied with the resolution and with the amendment to the resolution, but I think something should be added, declaring the opinion of the House that the principles laid down should be embodied in an Act of parliament. If the point taken by my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was right it would deprive hon. members, virtually, of the right they have to moving an amendment to the amendment, and of getting the opinion of the House in what seems to me a perfectly legitimate manner.

The PRIME MINISTER. If the House will permit me, I think I can show by the arguments that the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper), has used that his position is not well taken. There is a proposition before the House, that presented by the Postmaster General. To this proposition anybody can vote for or against. There may be some persons in this House who may wish to vote for it, and others against it. But, before it comes before the House the member for West Toronto proposes to amend it by adding something to it, and the proposition now before the House is, Shall these words be added? Now, upon this motion any one can vote for or against. Then the member for West Assinibola proposes to add some more words to it. Now, my hon. friend will realize that this cannot be moved as a sub-amendment, that the first proposition before the House to consider is, Shall the words moved by the member for Toronto be added to the motion? That is the only question now before the House. The hon. member for West Assiniboia proposes as an amendment to assert not to affirm the main motion. Well, there may be parties in the House willing to affirm the main motion and not willing to affirm the amendment, and there may be other parties willing to affirm the amendment and not the main motion. But by submitting the two motions together, parties who are willing to vote for the main motion but who are not willing to vote for the amendment, will have to vote at the same time. Suppose my hon. friend himself is in favour of the main motion but is against the amendment. The member for West Assiniboia proposes to him that he should vote at the same time upon the main motion and upon the amendment. How will he do it by the same vote? There is confusion that he cannot avoid. I think the rule is well laid down by Dr. Bourinot in his book:

When an amendment has been proposed it is competent for any member to move an amendment to the same.

Everybody understands that. In this case the original question is laid aside practically for the time being, and the first amendment becomes as it were a substantive question. The question before the House at this moment is not the motion of the Postmaster General, it is the amendment of the member for West Toronto. That is the one upon which we have to vote. Before we can take up the motion of the Postmaster General, we have to dispose of these amendments one way or the other. But my hon. friend by his amendment proposes at the same time to vote upon the amendment and upon the main motion, and that is leading to a confusion which, according to the rules laid down in the books, is not to be tolerated.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not see where any confusion arises. We have the main motion, and we have an amendment to the motion, and we have an additional amendment to both. Therefore, the House votes first on the amendment to the amendment, that is put first. That being disposed of, you vote upon the amendment to the main motion; and that being disposed of, you vote upon the main motion. So that the House has an opportunity of reaching every point in the case perfectly.

Mr. DAVIN. I suppose with the consent of the House I will be allowed to change the motion.

The PRIME MINISTER. You had better withdraw it.

Mr. DAVIN. Then, for the time being, I will withdraw the motion, with the consent of the House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I beg leave to propose that the amendment be amended by adding the following words:

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think it would hardly be in good faith to propose that amendment now.

Mr. INGRAM. You having decided that the amendment to the amendment is out of order, I presume it follows that in discussing this question I can discuss another amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER. You had better put your amendment first.

Mr. INGRAM. Now, in rising to discuss the resolution—

Mr. SPEAKER. I think it is not fair to the member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) after stopping him from moving his amendment on the supposition that he was going to substitute a change, that my friend should now substitute an amendment and proceed to discuss it. That would be unfair to the member for Montmorency.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will take advantage of the occasion to move that these words be added in further amendment.

And that these resolves be contained in an Act of parliament.

Mr. A. W. PUTTEE (Winnipeg). Although the current wage clause had been adopted by several public bodies some years previously, as stated by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), it was in 1891 that it was first introduced into the House of Commons by Mr. Buxton. But Mr. Buxton's resolution was not the resolution that was finally adopted. That was withdrawn, and the government substituted a resolution which was passed, and which I believe is the basis on which the motion that is now before the House was drawn up. After five or six years of practice under this motion, a select committee was appointed by the House of Commons to investigate and report. They took two years to investigate, and then they reported. A section of this report reads as follows:

Finally, it is stated that so great is the want of confidence in the ability or desire of the department to remedy these grievances, that trades unions and other representatives of the men, despairing of obtaining proper consideration and redress, have been compelled to allow grievances to continue, being convinced of the futility of taking action in respect to them.

But the next clause says:

While, on the whole, as already stated, we do not consider that this lack of confidence is well founded, we think it is very important that the feeling should be removed.

That is from the draft report of Mr. Buxton himself, who was a member of this committee. The original report that was finally adopted and became the majority report, said :

While, as already stated, the committee do not consider that this lack of confidence is well founded, they think it is very important that that feeling should be removed.

Now, after this had been in operation for six years, the committee reported as follows :

The resolution has been in force for six years. So far as regards the relations between employers and employed, its working does not appear to have had any adverse effect. Indeed, it seems probable that it has done something to promote agreements between masters and men in reference to the rate of wages and conditions of employment. It does not appear either that the contractors, as a whole, object to the resolution, nor to the way in which it has been administered. It appears also that complaints from the workmen of breaches of the resolution are not now as frequent as formerly.

This report, after six years of its working, finds very little fault with the plan at all. I defy any man, who reads the report of the committee and the report of Mr. Buxton, a member of that committee, and the original introducer of the resolution in the English House of Commons, to say that there is anything in either of those reports that, in any way, condemns that resolution, or condemned the objects sought, or that it showed these objects were not attained. I am disposed to take this motion and look at it as an important motion. It is founded on a motion that went through the British Commons, and which was amended according to the report of their select committee. That fact does not, to my mind, make it appear anything less worthy of attention, but probably more so. They have, in England, proven this matter, they have had it in force for some years, and we have now their report upon it. I do not know that this motion has been received in just the way it might have been received. We might have discussed the merits of it, and I propose, for a few minutes, to deal with the principle of the motion and the subject-matter of the motion, as it is on the Order paper. The principle underlying a resolution, such as that now before the House, is that of justice and fairness between employer and employed. The effect of a contract to do certain work is apparently to place all the responsibility for fair dealing upon the contractor, but, as a matter of fact, he for whom the work is actually done, is still the employer of the labour engaged thereon. Now, in a contract, responsibility is but delegated, and under the system of competition, as we have it now, it is often delegated into very unworthy hands. I believe that on all public works, properly so-called, the government should be the direct employer of labour, that it should do its own work, that it should fix its own terms, that it should employ the men itself and pay a fair living rate of wages.

It has been demonstrated that this can be done satisfactorily, that it can be done well, and done economically. Many large cities and some governments, have tested this method, and the results have been most satisfactory, having shown it to be far superior to the contract system. It needs, of course, good enough men, yes, and large enough men, to be beyond the considerations of politics and pull, and that the works shall be given to competent tradesmen, and that proper business methods shall be applied. That the quality of the work will be improved is almost beyond question, that it is cheaper it is not hard to believe, but, the main consideration should be that, in all cases, actual value is received for all money spent. In the matter of buildings, material and time, work and all the things that go into a building can be estimated to a nicety, there is hardly any speculation; but many kinds of work involved a large amount of conjecture in estimating. Should the work prove easier, the contractor derives larger profits, but should it prove harder, he often evades financial obligations both for labour and material, throws up the contract altogether, and there is loss all around. The motion before the House recognizes the responsibility of the government for fair dealing with labour employed in the carrying out of its work, and I think if the government had considered the matter of doing as much work as possible by the day-labour system, that principle that is laid down in this motion will be applied and can be applied. It has been adopted by the British government, and by some other important bodies. The London county council and the London school board were before the British government in adopting this method in fixing and of having respect to the current rate of wages. Several cities, both in England and in this country, have adopted a similar method. Some cities have gone further. The city of Winnipeg, for instance, has adopted a minimum rate, a rate actually higher than the current rate, and this being taken to a court of law to settle whether a city had power to adopt that principle, it was proved that this policy is good public policy, and it was so held by the court. The state should, at least, throw its weight rather on the side of better than on the side of worse conditions of employment. That is what I consider is the principle involved in this matter, and, this is in line with the preachings of political economists. Adam Smith, in his 'Wealth of Nations, says :

The wages of labour are the encouragement of industry, which, like every other human quality, improves in proportion to the encouragement it receives. A plentiful subsistence increases the bodily strength of the labourer and the comfortable hope of bettering his condition and of ending his day, perhaps, in ease and plenty animates him to exert that strength to the utmost.

McCullough, in his 'Principles of Political Economy,' says :

This is not a point about which there can be any doubt. The experience of all ages and nations proves that high wages are at once the most powerful stimulus to exertion, and the best means of attaching the people to the institutions under which they live.

Although the effect of this motion is not to raise wages, but acts as a barrier to their being depressed, it may be feared by some that it interferes with the settled principles of orthodox economists. But, that is a mistake. Massingham, in an article on the Government and Labour, says :

I think there can be no doubt that it would pay a state organized on democratic lines to give its workers 10 per cent above the level of the best kind of private employment.

I remember, something less than two years ago, before the Cuban war, the party of strong business interests in New York, issued an appeal to the citizens of that country to press forward for war, for the sake of extending the markets of the United States. They made the most astounding statement that the United States had reached the limit of its consuming power. The fact was that the citizens of the United States, in large numbers, failed to exercise their consuming power, because they were not in a position to do so, and I believe that it is upon the lines of public policy that the consuming power of the mass of the citizens should be increased. It is a fact that you have to discard the conclusions of the most orthodox political economists if you wish to assume that there is some obligatory law that the pressure of competition ought, without interference from man, to be allowed so to act as to degrade the standard of life of the whole community. This motion does not seek to raise wages, but every argument which is applicable to the high standard of wages must certainly be, in a measured degree, applicable to the principles and aims that are sought to be obtained by this motion. Henry George, in his 'Protection or Free Trade,' says :

Looking further, we see in every direction that it is not the fact that low-priced labour gives advantage in production. If this is the fact, how was it that the development of industry in the slave states of the American union was not more rapid than in the free states? How is it that Mexico, where peon labour can be had for from $4 to $6 a month, does not under-sell the products of our more highly paid labour? How is it that China and India and Japan are not 'flooding the world' with the products of their cheap labour? How is it that England, where labour is better paid than on the continent, leads the whole of Europe in commerce and manufactures? The truth is, that a low rate of wages does not mean a low cost of production, but the reverse.

I hold with those who deem the increase of wages a legitimate purpose of public policy. To raise and maintain wages is the great object that all who live by wages ought to seek, and workmen are right in supporting any measure that will attain that object. Nor in this are they acting selfishly, for while the question of wages is the most important of questions to labourers it is also the most important of questions to society at large. Whatever improves the condition of the lowest and broadest social stratum must promote the true interests of all. Where the wages of common labour are high and remunerative employment is easy to obtain, prosperity will be general. Where wages are highest, there will be the largest production and the most equitable distribution of wealth. There will invention be most active and the brain best guide the hand. There will be the greatest comfort, the widest diffusion of knowledge, the purest morals and the truest patriotism. If we would have a healthy, a happy, an enlightened and a virtuous people, if we would have a pure government firmly based on the popular will and quickly responsive to it, we must strive to raise wages and keep them high.

Now, dealing with the motion itself, how will the operation of the new policy laid down in this motion affect the contractors? It cannot affect the well intentioned contractor adversely. At present one contractor tenders with the full intention of paying the full scale of wages, another has no such intention. Therefore, not to have some understanding of the cost of labour is unfair to the good contractor, it is hard on the good workman, and it is injurious to the community as a whole. The rate of wages generally accepted as current in a district where some work is contemplated, I presume, would be ascertained, and that rate would be the basis for estimating and tendering. The method of arriving at the rate would need to be sound, and fair. It is not specified in this motion, you will notice, that it is to be the union rate of wages. The question often asked in connection with the minimum rate is : Is it the union rate? This motion says nothing about the union rate of wages, but it is only right to point out that you will find in most cases, that the current rate is the union rate, and is the reason why : The organizations of labour do not fix a maximum rate of wages that its members must get ; it does not fix the rate it would like its members to get, but it fixes the minimum rate which it will allow its members to work at, and of course, according to the laws of competition, the minimum that a labourer will take becomes the maximum that capital will pay. You will, therefore, often find that the current rate is the union rate of wages. The resolution in no way fixes or raises the wages ; it only provides that the current rates shall be paid, which insures that the wages shall not be lowered. It not unfrequently happens in the carrying out of a large work in a district, that it in fact reduces the wage-scale in that district. Men hearing that a large work is to be commenced flock there in large numbers, and the employer finding a large party, and taking advantage of the necessities of the men, uses that to reduce the rate, and so a permanent injury is thus inflicted on that district. To some extent—perhaps not to any great extent—the operation of the present resolution can be expected to make it less likely that foreign labour will be imported. You will notice that when foreign labour is imported, whatever is the first thing sought, at the back of it always is that it is to bring down the scale of wages in some district. Under this motion, wages would not be affected at all events, and it will be of less concern to any contractors or others to import foreign labour.

The resolution practically includes all government contracts, whatever the class of labour, not only does it apply to what are generally meant by government works, but it also applies to all government supplies of all kinds, which the government lets by contract, or purchases by contract. In this matter the government of Canada is not without experience. The report by Mr. McKenzie King, which has been referred to several times to-night, was made in 1898, and the methods adopted in Canada in carrying out the government clothing contracts, showed conclusively that the government in its militia clothing contract was fostering and developing the sweating system in this country. A good deal of the evils of that system have been wiped out by the regulations that were put in force when that report was adopted. To some extent, the principle of this very motion has been put in operation in the letting of militia clothing contracts, and the mail bag contracts of the Post Office Department. The insertion of a clause in the contracts against that system, has to a great extent done away with a great many of the things that were strongly denounced in connection with the clothing contracts let by the government.

This resolution proposes to prevent the abuses which may arise from sub-letting or sub-contracting. It is necessary that in some contracts there shall be sub-letting, but it is a thing that should be discountenanced as much as possible, and there are cases in which the sub-contractors' profits come ultimately, and can only come, either in sweating labour, or on the prices of the material. This kind of sub-letting should be discouraged as much as possible by the government, and I believe it will be discouraged when this resolution goes into operation. I should like to have seen an eight-hour day included in this motion, or that it should have been put in force by a concurrent motion. The eight-hour day is not a new thing. The British government put it in force some years ago, in the Woolwich arsenal, probably one of the largest manufacturing concerns in the world. They reduced the day's work straight from ten hours to eight hours, and the most satisfactory results have followed. The Canadian civil service in some places is on that basis, especially in the case of our own Printing Bureau here, and the British Columbia Printing Bureau. It is no new thing, therefore, and I would like to have seen it put in force by this resolution. I know, however, that any policy which has in any way the attribute of juvenility in it, cannot or will not get much appreciation in this parliament. It seems that we have to be very sure of a thing before we adopt it, and I have no doubt that if members found themselves confronted with an eight-hour law proposal, they would perhaps be somewhat surprised, and it might be too much to expect that the government would seriously propose to put it into effect, although, probably to incorporate it in this resolution would be the simplest manner in which it could be done. I am afraid the proposition would startle some of us in this House, and, as to sending a Bill of that kind to the Senate, well, I think that the front benches on both sides of the House would hasten to block the way. But, Sir, this eight-hour day question is a matter of very great concern to the workmen of this country, and it is a matter which in my opinion could be very well faced at the present day. We are so prone to grant charters that it seems to be one of our legitimate offices, and it has almost become second nature. We can give away large grants of land; we have given away a heritage that old Rome would have fought a generation to possess; we can send contingents to the war, and equip them, and pay their way, and, I believe, commit ourselves to a pension list; we can do these things almost spontaneously; but a great wave of caution comes over us when reform propositions are put before us, and we find that we have to consider them very carefully; there are two sides to all these questions; there are so many interests to be observed, and to be adjusted, and above all, we must not frighten capital away, because capital is very timid, and capital is so easily scared. I think sometimes, Mr. Speaker, that if these measures frighten capital, we would soon have here the only country where capital could gain its composure. The eight-hour law is now of such general application, that we in Canada shall soon be lonely in that respect. New South Wales has an eight-hour law in operation, not only with regard to government employees, but with regard to the public generally. No man in that colony can employ a man in a factory, a store or an office for more than eight hours in one day, and I think it is time we attempted something of that kind in Canada. The government cannot aspire to be a model employer until that principle is included. Most of the reasoning that can be so forcibly applied to the current wage laws can be urged for the eight-hour day; but at least the resolution might go so far as to include the recognized working hours along with the current rate of wages. The contractors for the London county council have to sign a statement to this effect:

We hereby declare that we pay such rates of wages and observe such hours of labour as are generally accepted as fair in our trade.

If it is the intention to have the principle of this clause put into operation and not simply put on record, then these other matters are included in it, and are but subjects for regulations. The same may be said as to the absence from the resolution of penalty provisions as against the contractor. There is nothing of that kind in it at all. But I think the provision with regard to the penalty should provide that if the current wage has not been paid, the penalty should in no case be less than the aggregate of all the moneys that should have been paid at the current rate of wages.

Some matters have been touched upon in this debate that may be said not to be quite in line with the subject. For instance, the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), said that the Toronto stonecutters get 40 cents an hour, whereas under a contract let under the system now proposed the stone might be cut in Lanark for 25 cents an hour; and he asked, where, under such circumstances, would the men be? Well, could not that be done now? It could, so that the hon. gentleman's argument has no point here at all. I can tell the hon. member why that could be done, and why it is not done; because it is one of the rules and customs of the stonecutters that the stone shall be dressed on the spot where it is used; and that would be one of the conditions, I imagine, that would be contained in a contract intended to protect the current wage in a district. It was also objected by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) that there was nothing in this resolution to compel the government to put it into effect. I do not think it is customary for a government to make penalties against itself. I submit that if a government does not put a resolution like this into effect, the people will enforce the penalty against the government; it is their business to do so. If the suggestion that the main provisions of this resolution should be embodied in an Act of parliament is feasible, let us have a Bill; but let us have the motion anyway. As to enforcing it against the contractor—and there seems to be some suspicion that that could not be done—I submit that when you are making a contract or making a grant, you have the dictating of the terms; and if the contractor does not carry out the terms of the contract, you want no more law than the fact that you are in a position to hold the cash until the conditions specified are carried out. If this provision can be embodied in an Act of parliament, so much the better; but the British government have had just such a resolution in effect for nine years, and it has worked most satisfactorily. It is not so strong a resolution as the one before us to-night.

Mr. DAVIN. Will my hon. friend let me say why that is—because the government were not ready to bring forward an Act of parliament, and no member of the government proposed the resolution, but it was proposed by a private member.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The government accepted it.

Mr. DAVIN. That is a very different thing from the government proposing the resolution.

Mr. PUTTEE. My point is this, that this policy is effective in Britain because of a resolution passed by the House of Commons, and a motion passed by this House should be effective.

Mr. DAVIN. Proposed by a private member.

Mr. PUTTEE. The resolution introduced here is not proposed by a private member, but by a member of the government; and if it is not going to be put into operation here, point out why not. I admit the principle of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke); but I cannot quite see how it can be included in this resolution. I would like him to prove how the terms of the resolution can be made to apply to the civil service. I would like to see the principle, or the good feeling if you will, of that resolution applied to the civil service; but I would most strongly object to saying that the salaries of the civil service are to be fixed according to the current rate of wages, because you have not got the current rate. Suppose you said the current rate was $350 a year, which some of the civil servants are receiving; I would strongly object to any regulations applying to them the current rate of wages as civil servants until they are put on a better basis than prevails at present. An hon. gentleman speaking this afternoon said that the average salary of the civil service of Ottawa was $1,187. Suppose you were to tell a Canadian Pacific Railway trackman that the average salary of him and the president of that road was $30,200 a year, what satisfaction would it be to him? That would be something like telling the civil servant that his average salary in Ottawa was $1,187. A clause of this kind is not necessarily aimed at high salaries, but is intended to protect and keep up the minimum. I believe the great majority of the civil servants of this country are underpaid. An hon. member has said that when one of the least important offices is open, there are twenty applicants for the position. If so, I would like to see how many applicants there would be for some of the higher offices if they became vacant. I am sure that there would be more than twenty. I am quite in accord with the statement that the civil service needs reforming. I think it needs reforming from cellar to garret; and the first thing that needs to be done is to do away with the patronage that belongs to members of this House. The people of this country should take a pride in having a proper civil service, run on business principles, which would be a credit to the country; and with a proper civil service we should have in every office good men and pay them well. We have no right to expect some of our public officers to be efficient when we pay them such poor salaries. Fancy the government of Canada starting a citizen on $300 or $350 a year. Why is it? Because somebody has a privilege of nominating anybody—it may be a bricklayer nominated to do the work of a clerk, which he is not fitted to do, and in which he is not worth $300 a year, perhaps not $30 a year.

But our civil service should be put on a proper basis. There is something in that service to learn. Let people go in and learn it when young, as they do in other walks of life, and let their salaries grow with their experience, so that when they are proficient at the work their salaries will be on a proper basis. I am quite in accord with the proposition that we should thoroughly reorganize the civil service, and I think it would be an act of wisdom on the part of the government to undertake the work, although perhaps it might not be profitable from the view of party politics, for the time being.

A couple of years ago I remember reading a report made by the Queen's Printer on the operations of the Printing Bureau, in which he said that although there was no civil service examination imposed on applicants for employment in that department, fortunately the Typographical Union of Ottawa took the matter in hand and examined the men, and that had great effect in improving the efficiency of the bureau. Some years ago there would be, time and again, an appointment to that department of a bricklayer or a carpenter, and thus the efficiency of the staff was impaired, but nowadays if any hon. gentleman in this House should nominate some protégé of his from some remote corner in the country for a position in the bureau, he finds that the applicant has to submit to an examination by the committee of the Typographical Union, and he, if he cannot pass the test, is not admitted into the bureau. The trade itself, for its own protection against the vicious system that was in operation in this country, took the matter into its own hands, and the result has been a beneficial one in every respect. If we were to take a leaf out of the Typographical Union book and see that only proper men were admitted into the government service, the service would benefit, and so in the long run would hon. gentlemen who are returned to this parliament.

The hon. gentleman who introduced this motion said it would probably have some little effect as regards the alien labour law and the troubles experienced in that direction. It may have some effect, but you must remember, Mr. Speaker, that this resolution only applies to government works or works bonused by the government, and the alien labour law applies to a larger matter altogether. That law, I maintain, is of no earthly use, and I do not think it was ever intended that it should be of any use. What is wanted is not a retaliatory measure, but a law prohibiting the bringing of labour into Canada under contract, irrespective of where it comes from. In every case in which contract labour is brought into Canada, the intention is to reduce the wages of labour settled in the country. Looking at it in that way, the principle underlying a law to prohibit the importation of contract labour would be the same as that expressed in this motion for the protection of labour engaged on public works.

I was somewhat pleased, in the early part of the debate to hear the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) express himself in the way he did. It is refreshing to find men in this parliament regretting so much the time wasted in putting measures through. He seemed to be bothered about something, and I have no doubt it was some measure in the interests of labour which he is trying to rush through parliament. I am sure that the labouring classes can count on the hon. gentleman's helping hand in the future, and his help will no doubt be appreciated.

There was an objection raised to the principle embodied in the resolution, and that is that this resolution would have the effect of opening the door for the acceptance of any other than the lowest tenderer. I do not believe it would. If it should have that effect, it would only be because somebody intended that that should be the result. In my opinion the effect of this clause would be to compel those desiring to tender to ascertain the ruling rate of wages which they have to pay. They would have this as a common groundwork upon which to base their tenders, and that would be to the advantage not only of the department but of the tenderers themselves. Nothing is so useful in tendering as to know the price of everything you will have to use.

I feel that I should apologize for going into so many matters not altogether relevant, but in this I have only followed the example of hon. gentleman who have preceded me. On looking over the debates in the British House of Commons in 1891 on this question, I notice that the subject was not deviated from at all. The principle was fully discussed and the matter then and there settled, and the legislation then adopted has proved very useful ever since, and I hope if this motion should pass that it is the intention to make it effective and operative or otherwise it would be better not to pass it.

Mr. A. B. INGRAM (East Elgin). In rising to discuss this question, Mr. Speaker, I do not do so because it is a new one. Certain hon. gentlemen who preceded me endeavoured to lead this House to believe that this is entirely a new question in our parliament. But, Sir, in 1895, it was pretty thoroughly discussed in connection with the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) with respect to government contracts. My hon. friend, who has just taken his seat (Mr. Puttee), as well as the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), laid a great deal of stress upon the blue-book, showing how the Imperial governments have conducted their contracts in Great Britain. But I would draw the attention of hon. gentlemen to this fact, that the conditions in Great Britain and Canada are entirely different. The Imperial government have been in existence a great many years. They have spent large sums in that country in building public works. For long years they have been doing that kind of thing in a country which has not a very great mileage, and there can be no comparison at all between it and the Dominion or even the United States. The conditions in Great Britain with regard to the conducting of public works and in Canada and the United States are entirely different. I am of the opinion of the hon. member for Winnipeg, who is not opposed to taking advice from other people, but while not opposed to taking that advice, I propose to take it from those who are similarly situated to ourselves.

Let me refer for a moment or two to the objections raised by the right hon. leader of the government. He objects to this resolution being boiled down into an Act and gives that as one of the strong reasons why both the amendments should not pass. But, taking the example of the United States, what do we find? We find that whether resolutions are passed by Congress or not, as a matter of fact every contract given by the United States government contains these conditions. I have here a specification of a contract with the United States government, and I find that clause 1 is as follows:

The attention of bidders is especially invited to the Acts of Congress, approved February 26, 1885, and February 23, 1887, as printed in vol. 23, page 332, and vol. 24, page 414, United States statutes at large, which prohibits the importation of foreigners and aliens under contract or agreement to perform labour in the United States or the territories or the District of Columbia.

Clause 2 is as follows:

Preference will be given to articles or materials of domestic production, conditions and quality and price being equal, including in the price of foreign articles the duty thereon.

Clause 7. Sureties must be citizens of the United States.

Now, while that does not bear directly on the question of what the current wages shall be, I cannot see why the United States could not add to their specification, that the current rate of wages wherever the work is performed shall be paid. Here is an instance of a government situated similarly to ours drawing the attention of contractors to the fact that they must comply with the

Mr. INGRAM.

Acts of Congress before their tenders will be accepted. But that it would weary the House, I could read from different states of the union precisely the same conditions placed in their specifications. Here, for instance, is a law of the state of Illinois, passed in 1889:

It shall be unlawful for any board or commission, or any officer or other person acting for the state, or any county, township, city, village, district, or other municipality in the state, or any contractor or sub-contractor under any or either of said municipalities, to employ any person or persons other than native-born or naturalized citizens, or those who have in good faith declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, when such employees are to be paid, in whole or in part, directly or indirectly, out of any funds raised by taxation.

All this goes to show that in the United States—a country situated similarly to ours—they have framed legislation which calls upon every contractor to comply with those laws before they can be given contracts with the government. So, I say, we are justified on this side in calling on the government to place an Act on the statute-books to carry out what is called for in these amendments. My hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Puttee) stated that the penalties did not affect the government. I do not think that any hon. gentleman in this House contended that they did affect the government. Therefore, there is very little in that argument.

Now, the alien labour law has been referred to in the House to-day; my hon. friend (Mr. Puttee) who represents the labour element of the city of Winnipeg and speaks largely for the labour element of the west, has said, in effect, that the alien labour law now standing on our statute-books is simply a farce. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman when he makes that statement. I was amused at my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) and his statements about how sincere he was on the question of labour legislation. Finding that he was stuck for a word, and being reminded of how the government was going to bring about free trade by moving after the manner of a snail. I thought that by interjecting a remark, I might remind the hon. gentleman of that speech. He rather found fault with me; and said that I was elected to support the interests of labour. yet, what had I done? I was reminded of an incident of some years ago, when my hon. friend did not seem to be a very sincere advocate of labour in this House. I think that his progress has been a good deal faster than that of a snail since 1892 to be now advocating labour legislation. When my hon. friend from South Leeds (Mr. Taylor), in 1892, introduced his alien labour law, the hon. member for Guysborough said:

Mr. Speaker, I wish to enter my protest against this Bill. I am opposed to it on general prin-principles. Perhaps I may not carry with me the opinions of this House, but I believe in opening our doors to the whole world. We have a large country to be filled up, and I would put no restrictions on any man from any country coming here.

That was the view of the hon. gentleman on that occasion, but he is a strong supporter of the alien labour law now, when he thinks that—

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ingram) allow me? I am not in favour of it now, never have been and never will be. I did not say a word to-day in favour of the alien labour law.

Mr. INGRAM. Then, I am to understand the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fraser, Guysborough) is opposed to the alien labour law?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I am.

Mr. INGRAM. He is opposed to it being introduced in this form or any other form?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is why it is not enforced.

Mr. INGRAM. I suppose it is. While I agree with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fraser, Guysborough) in not approving of legislation of that kind being placed on the statute-books of any country, still, the same rule applies to it as to this resolution. If the United States places such a law on their statute-books as the alien labour law, the government of this country, whether Liberal or Conservative, should give the United States to understand that they do not approve of that kind of legislation. By placing similar legislation on the statute-books of our country, we virtually serve notice on the people of the United States to remove the harsh legislation against Canada, a country living side by side with them and willing to reciprocate friendly treatment. But, I am too much of a Britisher to believe in allowing the United States or any country to place a statute of that description on their books and for us to do nothing, while our citizens who go into their country to get employment are insulted and debarred from employment simply because they are not citizens of that country. My hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) was quite right in stating that when that legislation was proposed in this House every possible opposition was offered to it by the members of the government, and every effort made to prevent a workable Act being passed by this parliament. And I want to tell hon. gentlemen opposite that there are thousands of workingmen in this country who feel that they have a just grievance against this government for not enforcing the alien labour law of this country as it ought to be enforced. The hon. member for Guysborough says he is glad to have people come into Canada from every section of the world. Now, the hon. Postmaster General said that increased wages for the workingmen—I do not take it that he meant an unreasonable increase—has a tendency to promote the purchase of a better class of goods and so increase the prosperity of the country. I would like to know if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fraser, Guysborough) is in favour of having thousands of Chinamen come in and work for almost nothing, and take back to China what they are able to save. They live while here in such a state as I hope no Canadian would live in. If they came here to compete on even terms with Canadian citizens, I would say they have a perfect right to come. But, when we find they do not do that, it is our duty to frame such legislation as will prevent such unequal competition. I understand that a deputation interviewed the government with a view to securing an increase in the tax on Chinamen. I do not know what was the answer of the government to that deputation, but I take it for granted, in view of the near approach of the general elections, that my right hon. friend, if he was present, told a very nice story and sent them away happy, believing perhaps the right hon. gentleman would introduce something in the shape of legislation which would relieve the evils they complained of. Now, with respect to this motion, there is another point which must be considered. Whether this motion is put on the statute-book as a result of this discussion, I do not know; but we have here the report of a commissioner appointed to investigate the sweating system of this country. It was not appointed within the last year or two, as the member for Huron said, but this commission was appointed in 1895.

An hon. MEMBER. Who were the commissioners?

Mr. INGRAM. Mr. A. W. Wright, and that is what I find in question No. 39 with respect to the question of labour:

Does it sometimes or frequently happen that there is a scarcity of workers in some towns or cities and a surplus in others at the same time.

This is answered in several ways. He says further on:

Both employers and employees suffer loss by reason of there being at times, and frequently, a scarcity of labour in one locality contemporaneously with a surplus in another, but the trades under investigation do not suffer more in this way than do others.

Then again:

Under No. 39, attention is called to the loss which both employers and workers suffer because of it frequently happening that workmen are idle in one town or city when their services are needed in another. I would recommend that either as a part of the work of the bureau of labour statistics or in some other way, a system of labour registration should be adopted, so that workmen might be kept informed promptly as to where a demand might exist for their services, and employers, at the same time, advised as to where workmen could be obtained.

Now, I wish to say with respect to this, supposing the government gave out a contract to perform certain work in a certain district, and you find in that district that there is a scarcity of labour, and the contractors who have the work to perform find it impossible to procure the necessary labour. They are supposed under this motion to adopt the current rate of wages at the point where this work is to be done. Now, if it works out on the principle of supply and demand, then the supply being scarce and the demand being great, wages would naturally be higher at this point, and still it would be the current rate of wages which the contractors would have to pay. This therefore would be an important question to consider under this resolution. Under this resolution the contractors would be compelled to employ labour that is scarce there, and they could only secure the labour to do the work at a very high rate of wages. Would the contractors or would they not be compelled to consider that the current rate of wages? I have not heard the Postmaster General go into these particulars fully; I have only heard him speak of what the Imperial authorities have done in reference to the subject-matter of this resolution. If this resolution was boiled down and put into an Act, hon. gentlemen on both sides would be in a better position to offer amendments, or to suggest something more workable than can now be done on a bare resolution of this kind, proposed by the Postmaster General or any other hon. gentleman in this or any other government.

Now, I wish to say a few words with respect to our labour laws. The hon. member for Guysborough said that if the hon. member for Montmorency would move for an eight-hour labour law, he would be going in the right direction and doing something practical. It only goes to show that there are hon. members in this House who do not look at their files to see what Bills have been introduced already, and then when they get up to speak they speak as intelligently as the member for Guysborough, who did not know that there was legislation already proposed, both last session and this session, by the hon. member for London (Mr. Beattie), bearing on this very question. Therefore, it would not be necessary for the member for Montmorency to make any such motion in order to give the member for Guysborough an opportunity of supporting an eight-hour labour law. Then the hon. member for Guysborough accused me of not taking a very active part in questions of this kind in the House. I wish to say, as the hon. member for Ottawa said, that I am of the opinion, whether rightly or wrongly, that there are many measures affecting labour that it is not in the jurisdiction of this House to pass. For instance, we have in the province of Ontario an Act providing for compensation for injuries. I do not think myself that it is within the jurisdiction of this House to pass legislation bearing on that point. Then we have in Ontario the Mutual Arbitration Act. I have heard some say that it is within the power of this House to pass a general arbitration Act. I am not a lawyer, but I do not think that we have such power. Having myself occupied a seat in the local legislature of Ontario, I wish to tell the member for Guysborough that I found, under the Mutual Arbitration Act, that every question other than the most vital one between employer and employed, could be considered. While I was in that House I brought that point to the attention of the Ontario government, and secured an amendment to the Arbitration Act which gave boards of mutual arbitration power to deal with the question of wages the same as any other question; and I am happy to say that that Act was passed through the House. Then with respect to the income tax. I introduced a Bill which had the effect of amending that Act. This House has nothing to do with that, although we have a large number of Dominion officials employed by this government who do not pay any income tax at all, and there are some complaints in this country because Dominion officials are exempted from paying taxes on the incomes which they receive. With respect to compensation for injuries, a large section of employees in this country were at one time precluded from enjoying the advantages of that Act. There were thousands of men shut out by a resolution of the Ontario government because they belonged to a provident insurance society connected with a certain railway company in this country. I found that a large number of employees were paying their hard-earned money to the insurance in connection with the company, expecting to derive certain benefits therefrom. I believe that an injustice was done to these men because they were unable to get compensation in case of injury by accident, if the accident occurred through their own negligence. There was an Act on the statute-book excluding employees of certain railway companies from enjoying the benefits under the Compensation for Injuries Act, and by my persistent efforts in their interest I was able to secure a repeal of that objectionable feature of the Act, and thereby give not only the employees of railways, but men in other branches of labour, the privilege of enjoying all the benefits from the insurance that they were paying for, as well as the benefits provided for them in case of accident. So I say it does not become my hon. friend from Guysborough to make a statement of that kind. As a member of this House, some years ago, I moved a resolution that was much more definite than the hon. Postmaster General's resolution. I moved what I believed to be a definite resolution, which, if it had been carried into effect, would have saved hundreds of lives in this country, and would have prevented thousands of accidents that have occurred. When I moved that resolution, leading sections of the press supporting hon. gentlemen opposite, as well as some hon. gentlemen themselves, in this House, said that it was a buncombe resolution, that there was about to be a by-election, that I was about to appeal to the electors of my riding and that that was the motive which induced me to move this resolution. The facts were these: In moving that resolution, I recognized the fact that no private member had the right to bring in a resolution, or to introduce a Bill, which calls for the expenditure of public money, but, in order to get before the House and the country, what I believed to be a very important question in connection with the railway service of Canada, I moved this resolution so as to secure the public opinion of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, as well as of the country. Yet that is the way in which I was treated. It was not a buncombe resolution; but, I want to say, that if it was a buncombe resolution, the resolution of the hon. Postmaster General, is five times more buncombe than the resolution I moved on that occasion. If this resolution will be the means, later on, of having something placed on the statute-book, then I will not be sorry if I support it, and I intend to support it with all my heart. I am always ready and willing to support anything that will promote the interests of the workingmen of the country, and in doing this, I think I am doing nothing more than what the workingpeople deserve. It has been said that the hon. gentleman who moved this resolution, is not sincere. I have no desire to find fault with, or to question, the motives of the hon. Postmaster General, in moving this resolution. Whether his motives are good or not, I simply wish to tell hon. gentleman, that his record is well known on both sides of the House, and that it is well known by the people of the country as well, and, when the proper time comes, they will be able to judge of his career. As far as the workingmen of Canada are concerned, I want to tell the hon. Postmaster General or any other hon. gentleman in this House, that, if he thinks the workingmen of this country are so easily hoodwinked as to believe that they are going to swallow buncombe motions, he will find that he is very much mistaken. They are intelligent, and they do their utmost to keep themselves informed as to what goes on in this country, as well as many others who do not profess to be workingmen. In my experience in this House, I have never known of the introduction of what may be termed 'radical legislation.' Hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House remember that during the 11 or 12 years that I have sat here, if legislation has been introduced on behalf of the workingman, it has always been of an extremely moderate character. We have had no radical measures introduced at all. We have had motions introduced, perhaps, that in Canada with the staid and quiet ways of the Canadian people, might perhaps, be considered by some people to be somewhat advanced, but, when we come to compare them with any of the resolutions introduced into legislative bodies in the United States, Great Britain or France, we find that we are more conservative than they are in any of these countries. That being the case, it strikes me that the people, in demanding legislation of this kind, are extremely moderate in their views. They never ask any representative in this House to place himself in an awkward position by introducing radical or extravagant legislation. I will give the House a sample of some of the legislation that is introduced by our neighbours on the other side of the line. I am sure that if legislation of that kind were introduced into this House, we would hold up our hands in holy horror, and say that the element that demanded legislation of this kind was going entirely too far. Here is a sample of the legislation to which I have referred, as stated in the report of the commissioner:

In the hope that a federal law, embracing in its scope, all the states, will be effectual to prevent the 'sweating system,' a Bill has been introduced in the present Congress under the title of 'A Bill to raise additional revenue for the support of the government.' The title of the Bill is, of course, pretextual, inasmuch as the raising of revenue is not its object, but a means by which it is hoped that another object will be accomplished. The proposed measure may be summarized as follows: it provides that when manufacturers give out materials from which clothing and other manufactured articles enumerated in the Bill are to be made by contractors and others not directly in the employment of the manufacturer in his own factory, the said manufacturer shall pay in advance to the United States revenue collector a tax of $300 per year for each contractor or person to whom material is so given out. The Bill also provides that any contractor or other person taking materials from a manufacturer for the purpose of making them up, who shall sub-let the work of making up or finishing the goods, shall also pay a yearly tax of $300 in the same way for each person to whom he sub-lets any part of the work. Should the work be again sub-contracted or divided, the person so sub-letting or dividing it will be subject to a light yearly tax of $300 for each person so employed by him.

This is a sample of the class of legislation which is asked for in the United States, so I say, that there is a large element in the United States that are very unreasonable in their demands, and that ask Congress to pass certain legislation to meet their views which are very extravagant indeed. It shows, to my mind, that, instead of importing, under contract, a class of men, who would come into this country, who are extreme in their ideas, who are nihilists, anarchists and socialists, although, when I mention the latter class of people, I do not refer to a certain class of socialists, such as we have in this country, who are good citizens. we should be careful to see that we get a desirable class of people in this country. I have never heard any of them use very extravagant language, but, I think, in so far as I have described them in the United States, if that class of people were allowed full liberty, as the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), said, to come into this country, I fear that hon. members of this House would not have an opportunity of looking over the file of Bills and seeing such moderate legislation as is introduced now, and such as has been introduced for a number of years past, because, if this legislation were designed to meet the views and wants of these people, I fear that hon. members would have reason to complain of the efforts of the workingmen.

Mr. D. D. ROGERS (Frontenac). Mr. Speaker, as usual, we have had the big guns first, and the little guns come last. I do not want to detain the House too long, as I have not been in the habit of doing that, and, I do not purpose getting into that bad habit. I would be the last man to say a word that would injure the labouring men in any respect whatever. I have been a labouring man all my life, in the true sense of the word, and, I feel for them, but I feel, as regards labour organizations that, generally speaking, there is so much care being taken of labour, or is being attempted to be taken, of labour, that I feel that their organizations—and time has shown it—are pretty well able to take care of themselves. I am very glad to see that it is so, and I trust they will always be ready to do so. If I were one of them, I would be in their organization. I think it is necessary for workingmen to have such organizations to protect them against monopolies, combines, trusts and corporations. But, I do feel now, and I have always felt, that there is a certain limit to it. When they come to this House, in order to secure legislation, I think it is possible for them to go farther than is in the interest of the country. I agree with the wording of the resolution in the form in which it was first put. I entirely approve of the clause in the resolution which says that :

Every effort shall be made to secure the payment of such wages as are generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen in the district where the work is carried out.

That is perfectly legitimate and well worded. I have no objection to it. I do most emphatically object to the amendment.

An hon. MEMBER. Which one ?

Mr. INGRAM.

Mr. ROGERS. They are both on the same line, but I particularly object to the first one. That amendment evinces a motherly care over the civil servants. I cannot for the life of me see why there need be so many tears shed over the civil servants ;—in many instances I believe they are crocodile tears. Why is there not as much care and as much thought taken for the great labourer that has made this country what it is to-day, why is there not that care for the agriculturist of Canada. Hon. gentlemen have been speaking here for six hours to-day and the word of the agriculturist has not been mentioned. The agriculturist of this country are the true labourers, the labourers who have made Canada what she is, and upon whom the future of Canada depends. Legislation that will benefit the agriculturist will benefit Canada, and legislation that will injure the agriculturist will injure Canada. Canada is an agricultural country, she is not yet a manufacturing country, and the agricultural industry is the one above all others which should have the first consideration of this parliament. I am sorry to say, Sir, that although the well-being of the agriculturists should be our first consideration, it is unfortunately our last. When I was running along the old Conservative lines I felt that keenly for years and years, and I did not forget to say so at many conventions I attended, and when I got a chance to move out and take a stand on our platform I gladly accepted, and the longer I am on that platform the firmer I am, and I am far from receding from it. It looks to me as if some hon. gentlemen opposite were simply speaking to catch votes, and that to some extent may be natural. The hon gentleman from West York (Mr. Wallace) spoke about the statutory increase to the civil servants, and of course the amendment means that the civil servants, the letter carriers and others, must have that statutory increase. I think the stand the government took on the statutory increase question was a very commendable one, and I believe the country will endorse them in their efforts to conduct the government service as any well regulated private business should be run. Reward for merit is the correct principle, and it is wrong that a civil servant should get a certain increase every year whether he was worthy of it or not. I agree with the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Belcourt) that no member should interfere with the ministers on the question of salaries, but there are some instances where the heads of departments through favouritism or lack of judgment have not done justice to their subordinates. In such a case I believe that a man would be justified in asking the minister to hear that civil servant state his case, and I think that is about all the interference there should be with ministers. The poor letter carriers have been spoken of, and I would be glad if the country could afford to pay them $600 or $800 a year, but when we compare their salaries with the wages paid to men who work 12 or 16 hours a day in all kinds of weather I must come to the conclusion that they are not so badly off. The agricultural labourer in Canada is under the eight-hour system; but unfortunately, it is eight hours in the morning and eight hours in the afternoon. Let any gentleman who has experience in agriculture tell me if he can afford to pay his men the wages paid to our civil servants. We are told that it takes a long time to train letter carriers and that they must have education and all that, but I want to know if there is any man who requires more common sense than the agriculturist. Gentlemen opposite who are agriculturists know well that their servants require to be men of common sense, studious, honest and sober. I repeat, as I have said before, that I can take the average young man and fit him for any profession as quickly as I can make him a good agriculturist. Why, one has almost to be born a farmer before he makes a good one. Prof. Robertson has well said that the farmers are the great manufacturers of Canada; that they manufacture $600,000,000 worth in Canada yearly, and that they manufactured for export nearly $100,000,000 worth last year. Compare that with any other manufactures and where are they? The lowest wages paid to the letter carriers is $350 a year, and the maximum is $600. Let me ask: What wages do farm labourers get in this country? The man that can afford to pay them $1 a day year in and year out, with eight or ten thousand dollars invested, cannot balance his books at the end of the year and pay 2 per cent on his capital. When I pay my men I often say to them: I should pay you more, and you are worth more than you are getting, but I am not able to do it, and I would like to see the farmer who is. I cannot understand how a man representing an agricultural constituency can clamour in this House for the annual statutory increase for the civil servants whether they are worthy of it or not. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), is quite a stumper, and he speaks in many parts of the country, but if he uses that argument before an agricultural constituency he will get a very poor hearing. The principal arguments which I have heard in this debate have been from men representing urban constituencies. Why do not some of the practical agriculturists in this House get up and talk on this question? Have they nothing to say? Have they no grievances? Have they not to appear before their constituents and give an account of their stewardship on this question? I suppose they feel that the farmer, as I said when talking about the Redistribution Bill, has been a Conservative or a Grit for many years past, and that he will continue to be the same, and there is no use of talking to him. I thank God that time is passing away, that the farmers of this country will listen to such parrot talk any longer. The seed of independence has been sown among the farmers and in the press, and it will bring forth good fruit in the future. With regard to the civil service, I would like to compare their wages with the wages of the school teachers of the country, men and women who have spent years in qualifying themselves for that honourable and noble vocation. Are their salaries as good as the average of the civil service, or as good even as the lowest salary of the civil service, not to speak of agricultural labourers who have to toil and slave? The lowest salary of the civil service is $350 a year, and if any one who proves himself to be good and worthy can go as high as $600, whereas the average school teacher does not get $300 a year. Compare the position of the civil servants, too, with those of clerks in stores or in banking institutions, and I cannot see why so many tears are shed over them. Another thing: neither the agricultural labourers nor the school teachers have any superannuation fund to fall back upon as have the civil servants. The question of an eight-hour labour day has been brought up, and I was surprised to see the hon. member for London (Mr. Beattie), move for legislation in that direction in an agricultural country like ours. I do not care whether it is for government works or not, I assure you such a proposal would take very poorly among the agriculturists when you went before them on election day—men who have to labour twelve hours a day for twelve months in the year, and who have to pay for all these things. I think the labour men can take pretty good care of themselves, and they do not need any legislation for their protection. You cannot fairly compare an agricultural country like Canada with a manufacturing country like England. Agriculture cuts a small figure in England, but agriculture will be the great industry of Canada for many years to come; and anything done to injure that industry will not be acceptable to the farmers. There is some radical reason why the agriculturists of this country cannot pay as high wages for labour as any other class; I believe unjust legislation has a great deal to do with it. There is some radical reason why the smartest and brightest of our young men leave their homes on the farm, and we have to put up with very inferior farm labourers. It is because they are driven into other callings which have been bolstered up by the government, and in which men can get 10 or 20 or 50 per cent for their money when the farmers cannot get 2 per cent in their business. There is not a farmer in this country to-day who can hire help all the year round and at the end have two per cent on his money. It is said that anybody can be a farmer, that it does not require any brains; but I tell you that it requires more brains to-day to make 3 per cent on the money invested in agriculture than it does in any other industry. Why, then, should we have legislation against the interests of the farmer? Against such legislation I will raise my voice, and it surprises me that any man who is a practical agriculturist and who represents an agricultural constituency can support this amendment to provide that all civil servants shall be paid the statutory increase until they get $600 or $800 a year. I wish I had the power of oratory, and the time to spare, I would let my voice be heard from every platform in the country against legislation of this kind. If I had the power of oratory that some hon. gentlemen have, I would make this House ring on this subject. There are seven or eight hundred thousand agriculturists in this country to-day who are employers of labour, and they are the great labourers, and the toilers. The first resolution is right enough; there is nothing wrong with it; but the men who are not toiling, the civil servants, are well enough taken care of. That is the reason I have got up to speak, and I hope some of the farmers who represent agricultural constituencies, and who I know are good speakers will get up and express themselves against this amendment.

Mr. WM. McCLEARY (Welland). Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to follow the hon. gentleman (Mr. Rogers), over all the fields he has travelled. I wish, however, to call his attention to this fact, that while he has stood up and advocated the cause of a class of people in this country who, I presume, ought to be considered the backbone and the sinew of the country, in the able manner he has done it, he has been too late in stating his views to this House in that regard. He should have gone to the hon. Postmaster General who introduced the resolution before us, and had his ideas embodied in the resolution. The hon. gentleman belongs to that class of people who got into public life through being associated with what was known as the Patron movement in this country. The Postmaster General and the Minister of Trade and Commerce were the sponsor fathers for these gentlemen, at one time in their history. They took them under their paternal care, and so well did they look after them that to-day we find that party obliterated. Where, I would ask my hon. friend, is Mr. Joseph Haycock, who once occupied a seat in the local legislature for the county my hon. friend represents in this House? Where is that other horny-handed son of toil, Mr. Curry, who travelled this country from one end to the other, declaring for the rights of the down-trodden farmer? Where is he?

Mr. TAYLOR. In the civil service.

Mr. McCLEARY. Yes, in the civil service at $2,500 a year and expenses. Where is our friend Mr. Mallory, who, at one time, was a great leader of this movement?

Mr. ROGERS.

Mr. TAYLOR. In the civil service.

Mr. McCLEARY. Yes, he too occupies a nice berth in that service.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. McCLEARY. What question do hon. gentlemen wish to ask?

Mr. ROGERS. Might I ask the question: Am I my brother's keeper?

Mr. McCLEARY. The hon. gentleman endeavoured to lead this House to believe that all the agricultural workers of this country are under his paternal care and wing. I was asking him where was that other mighty Patron, Mr. Mallory. He, too, has found himself nicely esconced in a government job, and I do not know where our hon. friend (Mr. Rogers) will find himself when this session closes. Apparently, I should judge from his present attitude and his past record—from his having come here as an independent man, from his having been a Tory of Tories, until he reached this House, and from his conduct since he has been in this House—that he will likely find himself occupying some nice position in the government service that will give him a good remuneration for standing by the government in their needs.

Coming to the question before the House, I have not much fault to find with the resolution of the hon. Postmaster General. But I am in favour of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke), because it covers a larger field, and will be productive of additional good. I have nothing to say regarding the civil service, so far as the inside service in the city of Ottawa is concerned, but the amendment of the hon. member for West Toronto would reach hundreds, yes, thousands of men outside who have to live on a dollar a day paid by this government. I refer to employees on the canals and railways. The canals of this country are open for eight months in the year, and the men employed on them are not allowed to engage in any other employment, and have to support their wives and families on a dollar per day. While that may be a fair remuneration in some cases, it is not a remuneration sufficient for a man who must give his time the year round and sustain himself and family.

I am as well in favour of the amendment to the amendment, because that will crystallize the opinion of this House in a statute, and then we should see that the statute is enforced and not merely placed on the statute-books to be looked at, like the alien labour law, which we have had on our statutes two or three years and have never yet enforced. No doubt the reason for its non-enforcement is because the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), and a few other leading supporters of the government, like the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), are totally opposed to it.

I have nothing further to say, except that I will be delighted to give my support to anything that comes up in this House for the amelioration of the labouring classes, and which will help them in their endeavours to better themselves in their various callings in life.

Mr. THOS. BEATTIE (London). I think that too much time has been taken, Mr. Speaker, in discussing this resolution. It is not worthy of the consideration it has received. As the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Ingram) has very justly said, it is all buncombe.

Mr. INGRAM. I beg to correct my hon. friend. I said that if the resolution I moved some years ago was buncombe, this was much more so.

Mr. BEATTIE. I would have much pleasure in supporting any resolution for the benefit of the workingman, but this one does not go far enough. In fact, so far as I can see, there is nothing in it for the benefit of the labouring classes. It only has reference to contracts on government works, but there is not one per cent of the workingmen in this country engaged on government contracts. I am well aware, and the workingmen are well aware, that the government has no power to raise the wages or to lower them. The workingmen are not fools, and the government must not think that it can deceive them by pretending that it can raise their wages. But, what the government has power to do, and what the workingmen want the government to do is to shorten the hours of labour. I have such a Bill on the Order paper, and when we reach it. I trust that the hon. Postmaster General and the government will give it the support it deserves. We have legislated for a great many classes in this House, but no legislation has been granted, proportionately, for the benefit of the workingmen. Why should the workingmen of this country be compelled to labour ten long hours when every other class only work six to eight hours? Is it because they have no influence? That must be the case. Take, for instance, our banking men, they only work six hours per day. Take our civil servants, not only in Ottawa, but throughout the country, they only work eight hours per day, and have nice, clean easy work, get good pay, and when they retire at an advanced age, they receive a superannuation allowance. Nothing of that kind is received by the working classes. They must either provide for their old age or go to the poor-house and live on charity. And who pays for the superannuation of civil servants? It is the working classes who are taxed to raise the money. I consider the working classes of this country are slaves in comparison with any other class of business people. That condition of things should be, and, no doubt, will be changed. What time has any workingman for recreation or rest? None whatever. He has to rise at half-past five in the morning to enable him to get his breakfast and leave his home at half-past six, so that he may reach his workshop at seven, for, as a rule, he lives a mile away from his work. When his work is finished for the day, he returns home, arriving there about 6.30. By the time he has a bit to eat, does some little chores about the house, such as always have to be done, and reads the evening paper, it is time for him to go to bed that he may be able to rise early next morning. And this goes on day after day, week after week, year after year. You take the workmen of this country, and for seven long months of the year they do not have the opportunity of seeing their children by daylight. That accounts in great measure for such of the sons of our workmen as go astray—they have no one to look after them. In that connection I may tell an amusing story which I heard to-day and which I know to be true. A mechanic's wife, going down street one day, and having her child with her, happened to pass the building on which her husband was working. Pointing him out on the scaffolding she said to the child: 'Do you know who that is?' 'No, mother,' said the child; 'but I think it is the man that takes dinner with us on Sundays.' That is about all that many of the workingmen of this country have an opportunity of knowing about their children. Now, if the government would take some action to change that state of affairs they would get some credit; but they must not think they are going to hoodwink the workingman by such buncombe resolutions as they have brought in to-night. I shall have very much pleasure in voting for the amendment of my hon. friend from West Toronto or any amendment that will benefit the workingmen, more particularly in shortening their hours.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). I do not propose to make a speech on the subject of the resolution which has been introduced by the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), but I would like to say a word on behalf of the country postmasters throughout this country. I believe there is no class in the Dominion who are so poorly paid. I have in my own riding a large number of men who devote a great deal of time to keeping post office, and I believe I am in the bounds of accuracy when I say that they receive only from $10 or $12 a year, in some cases, to about $70 in others. And, since the reduction in the rate of postage has come into force, I am informed, their remuneration will be reduced. I think that the Postmaster General made the statement recently, that that would not be so, although some of the postmasters have since told me that it would be. However, I am not prepared to dispute the statement that the hon. Postmaster General makes. It is safe to say that their remuneration will not increase as would have been the case had the reduction in postal rates not been made. I would be glad if the Postmaster General would take this point into consideration and see if some measure cannot be adopted to give the country postmasters some better remuneration than they receive for the duties which they perform. I would like to read a brief extract from a letter which is published in one of the Manitoba papers. I do not know the name of the writer. He lives in south-western Manitoba :

Take, for instance, towns ranging from 500 to 1,000 population, which would include the principal points between Manitou and Treherne west to Melita. From the same report—

The Postmaster General's report.

—we find the salaries, rental and other allowances, &c., of these offices range from about $700 to $1,050. The postmasters have to provide their own offices at perhaps an average cost of $180 per year. The net income would represent the figures named, minus $180 or from $520 to $870, or an average of under $700, being from $100 to $300 less than salaries paid to third-class clerks and less than half the earnings of first-class post office clerks. The former without any monetary responsibility, the latter with all the varied responsibilities which are involved in the office.

It is needless to contend that the country postmasters may combine merchandise with the post office, as such offices as those referred to are required to keep the post office separate, and the duties are such as to require constant attention. Moreover, late arrival and early departures of trains in some towns, makes it impossible for one person to do the work without assistance, which he must provide at his own expense. The country postmasters throughout Canada have just cause for complaint owing to the scant consideration for the work and responsibilities laid upon them; but those of the west much more so, owing to the considerable increase in cost of living and providing suitable premises.

Before I take my seat, I desire to say that I am in hearty accord with the resolution which has been presented to the House. I think if there is one question which more than another should touch the hearts of all men who take part in the legislation of this country, it is the question of fair treatment for the workingmen. I do not think the government could engage in any nobler work than in that of improving the condition of the men who bear the burden and heat of the day.

House divided on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Casgrain).

Mr. RICHARDSON.

Amendment to the amendment (Mr. Casgrain) negatived.

Mr. A. CAMPBELL (Kent, Ont.) I desire to move an amendment to the amendment that is now before the House :

That all the words after the word ' That ' in the amendment be left out, and the following words be added to the main motion :

And that it is not expedient to mix with this proposal the salaries of those employed in the public departments of the government.

I think this amendment is sufficiently clear to commend itself to the House. I think the civil servants of this country, while there may be some who are insufficiently paid, should not, as a class, be mixed up with the class that it is proposed to benefit by this motion. Therefore, without, at this late hour, trespassing on the time of the House with any further remarks, I beg to move this amendment.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). It seems to me it is to be regretted that when a motion of this importance to a large class of people in this country, has been introduced in the hope that it would result in benefiting them, and that seems to be acknowledged by both sides of the House, that its force, and its power, and its effect are sought to be weakened, whether inadvertently, I do not know, through the amendment that is now in your hands, and, which the amendment to the amendment proposes to remove. This resolution introduced by the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), was introduced in the belief that it would result in benefit to that large and influential class who are known as the wage-earners and labourers of the Dominion, who work with their hands, who are engaged in manual labour; and this government, restricted in its legislation constitutionally on many points, has, through the Postmaster General, shown their desire, if possible, to secure through their action a recognition of fair wages to those who are thus employed. They have recognized the fact that in the past there have been abuses, there have been hardships to these men who labour for their daily bread, and this resolution was introduced in the hope of protecting these men. It might have been expected that in this House a subject so worthy of the sympathy of everybody would have been adopted unanimously without any attempt being made to weaken it. But, what do we find? Why, in the amendment that has been placed in your hands, by the member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke), and which the amendment to the amendment proposes to remove out of the way, it is sought, or at any rate, the effect would be, to nullify to a great extent, any good we might hope to derive from the resolution of the Postmaster General. The amendment which the amendment to the amendment asks to wipe out, proposes to add the following words to the resolution :

That the aforesaid policy shall be forthwith applied to every department of the public service and to all parties hereafter performing services for the government.

Sir, it is recognized that in public contracts in time gone by, there have been occasions when, through sub-letting of contracts or other causes, those engaged in public works have suffered hardship and loss. When that evil is sought to be removed, it is proposed to add to a resolution of that kind, an amendment, to bring in the whole civil service. Why, Sir, it is proposed to place men who have been engaged in public contracts, and who have had to submit in times past to sub-letting, who have worked for a wage that many consider insufficient, it is proposed to put them in the same category with all persons engaged in the service of the government; it is proposed that men who are receiving from the government salaries of $1,500, $2,000, $2,400, shall be put in the same class with these men who have to work by the day on public works and contracts. Why, Sir, that resolution is broad enough to cover even a member of the government. The amendment in your hands seeks to link these two classes together, and to assert that men who have to work on public contracts, have grievances which are no greater than the grievances of those men who are getting $2,000 or over a year. You can see what effect that would have. No, Sir, we do not wish to mix these two subjects at all. If there be any one in the civil service who is not receiving sufficient compensation, his case can be dealt with by this House, when it votes the supplies. The resolution in your hands says

That it be resolved, that all government contracts shall contain such conditions as will prevent abuses which may arise from the sub-letting of such contracts.

How can these abuses arise in any way in connection with the civil service?

And that every effort should be made to secure the payment of such wages as are generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen in the district where the work is carried out.

This House can determine that. The civil servants are safe here, because the House has the voting of the supplies, and each case can be decided on its merits.

And that this House cordially concurs in such policy, and deems it the duty of the government to take immediate steps to give effect thereto.

It is hereby declared that the work to which the foregoing policy shall apply includes not only work undertaken by the government itself, but also all works aided by grant of Dominion public funds.

Sir, it is meant to apply to that class of labour, and the gentleman who introduces an amendment to attach the civil servants to the same class, men who are in receipt of salaries of $2,000, as if they were on a par, as if they were suffering an equal hardship, I say, is introducing an amendment that should not pass this House, and if I may venture to say so, should never have been introduced, by any one who pretends to be a friend of labour in this country. I did not wonder at the member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), introducing it, but I did wonder at the member for East Elgin (Mr. Ingram), seconding such an amendment.

Mr. INGRAM. I rise to a point of order. I did not second the resolution of the member for West Assiniboia.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I sincerely regret if I made a mistake, but I did understand that the member for East Elgin had seconded the amendment to the amendment proposed by the member for West Assiniboia. And I am told now that the hon. gentleman did second it.

Mr. COWAN. He tried to move it.

Mr. INGRAM. No, I did not second that. I seconded the motion of the hon. member for West Assiniboia that the resolution be placed on the statute-book, but not the resolution moved by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke).

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I understand the hon. member for East Elgin to have seconded the amendment that the hon. member for West Assiniboia withdrew.

Mr. INGRAM. Yes.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Well, that is what I am saying; there is no quarrel between us.

Mr. INGRAM. The statement which the hon. gentleman made, and to which I objected was this: The hon. gentleman's statement brought me in connection with the resolution which dealt with the civil service, and I disputed that fact. What I did do was to second the resolution of the hon. member for Western Assiniboia, which deals with the placing of this resolution on the statute-book. That is the fact, and it is not as the hon. gentleman stated it at all.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I am very glad that the hon. gentleman has stated this. I do not know whether he has improved his position, and I do not wonder that he feels irritated at what I have alluded to. I was alluding to the resolution proposed by the hon. member for West Assiniboia, which the hon. member for East Elgin seconded, and which the hon. member for West Assiniboia withdrew. He now admits that what I said was correct that he did that. What was the amendment introduced by the hon. member for West Assiniboia? It was to strike out every word of this resolution of the hon. Postmaster General to benefit the workmen and to substitute the amendment with the addition proposed by the hon. member for West Toronto embracing the civil service, and laying down the principle that if you are going to help those who work with their hands, you must help the civil servant who gets $1,000 and $2,000 a year. I do not wonder that the hon. member for West Assiniboia would venture to do it, but I did not expect that the hon. member for East Elgin would have done it, nor, would I have expected that he would have been prepared to enact a law not for the benefit of the men who work with their own hands, who exchange their labour for wages, but that he would have been content to deal with these men to give relief where it is needed, and where it ought to be given, and not to attempt to minimize that by including in its benefits a class of men who are not standing in the same category, who are not in the same position, who, if they feel that they are suffering any hardship, can have their cases dealt with individually in this House where every member can know the salary paid to each civil servant, and where the remuneration can be fully considered. To propose an amendment by which the hon. gentleman shall weaken this resolution, designed to aid the men who are exchanging their labour with public contractors, who have obtained contracts from the government and to prevent wrong-doing in the sub-letting of these contracts, to secure fair wages for their day's work—to propose an amendment to wipe out that resolution and to bring in another class of persons whose cases does not fit in at all, whose case has no comparison with that of these men, and which can only have the effect, as every one can see, of weakening the resolution of the hon. Postmaster General, which is an honest resolution designed to benefit the men in a position in which these men are who are engaged in these works, is something that I would not have expected from the hon. gentleman. Why is this resolution of the hon. Postmaster General proposed? Simply because contractors, in tendering for public works, in future, will have to be governed by its provisions. They will have to recognize the fact that in future it will not do for them to go into a foreign country, and bring in an inferior class of foreign labour to compete on the public works if they have to pay the current rate of wages, because they would rather pay the current rate of wages to men in our own land and get better value than they would otherwise. If this is done, and if the government put it in operation, and if it resulted in the expenditure of more money in carrying out of public works, if perchance public works should cost more than they otherwise would, the government want to have their hands strengthened and their action endorsed by this parliament in giving contracts under these conditions which may result in some extra cost to the country. That is why this resolution is brought before parliament, and that is why parliament is asked to sanction it. This is a resolution that ought to have been received in the spirit in which it is brought in, as it is for the benefit of the men who are employed on these works, and there should not have been an attempt to minimize its usefulness as is proposed by the amendment of the hon. member for West Toronto, which, I trust, will be wiped out by the prevalence of the amendment to the amendment, now moved by the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell).

Mr. T. D. CRAIG (East Durham). Mr. Speaker, I would just say, after such a fiery speech from the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), that I was rather surprised at seeing the hon. gentleman standing up and supporting the amendment so vigorously denounced by himself, and which he charged the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Ingram) with supporting. It seems to me that the members of the government feel very keenly the force of the amendment of the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke). If it had not been for that they would be quite satisfied to have voted it down and not have put up a member on their own side of the House to offer an amendment to their own resolution. I suppose they intend to carry the amendment moved by the hon. member for Kent, Ont. (Mr. Campbell). It is a very funny amendment to have attached to a resolution of that kind. This resolution of the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), will look very strange when printed in full with an amendment moved by one of the supporters of the government. It shows that they feel the seriousness of their position. The hon. Minister of Customs has made an impassioned speech about the civil service. I am not concerned, myself, very much about the civil service. I believe they ought to have justice done them, but the hon. member for West Toronto was not thinking so much about the civil service when he moved that amendment. He too thought they ought to have justice done them, but he was thinking more about the letter carriers of Toronto, who, he claims, as they claim themselves, are not having justice done them by the hon. Postmaster General. We have had another example to-night here on this very same line. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) says he is in hearty sympathy with this resolution, and yet he takes the opportunity of standing up and saying that he wants to ask the hon. Postmaster General to increase the salaries of the postmasters throughout the country who are receiving $10 and $12 a year. In that case he should vote for the hon. member for West Toronto because it is right in this line. I think there is no doubt at all that we are all agreed on both sides of this House about the spirit of this resolution, but hon. members on this side of the House have not so much confidence in the sincerity of the hon. Postmaster General and of the government in moving this resolution, as hon. members on the other side of the House. I do not say that the hon. Postmaster General is not sincere. All the objections made on this side of the House have been objections which have been made over and over again by hon. members on the other side of the House when they were in opposition against the government of the day, against measures of this kind, and it was charged that they were done with political motives. I do not say that this is done with a political object just before the elections, but this has been charged, and the proof of the sincerity of what the hon. Postmaster General talked about would be given by supporting the amendment of the hon. member for West Toronto. Prove it by doing justice to the men whom you yourselves have power to do justice to. In view of the fact that the government can at the present moment do everything that is provided for by this resolution, why do they move it at all. Well, I suppose we cannot blame them for trying to make some political capital out of it.

An hon. MEMBER. They need it.

Mr. CRAIG. Yes, I suppose they feel that they need it, and hence they make this extraordinary attempt to demonstrate that they are the friends of the workingmen. As has been said by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ingram), the workingmen of Canada know who their friends are, and the workingmen know their friends are not to be found within the present government. This resolution is not definite enough, and that is one reason why I will support the amendment of the hon. member (Mr. Clarke). The amendment to the amendment, moved by the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) is about as ridiculous an amendment as I ever heard of. He wants to attach to the resolution the proposition that we do not choose to meddle with those already in the service of the government. What a nice resolution will it be with that read into it. In the resolution of the Postmaster General it is said:

That every effort should be made to secure the payment of such wages.

If the government were in earnest they should be more definite in that statement. It is easy to say that an effort should be made in that direction, but why do they not say :

That all contracts should stipulate the payment of such wages as are current.

There would be some sense in that. Again, why did they not insert a provision insisting that the men employed on public works in Canada should be Canadian workingmen. A few years ago the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart), in letting some large contracts, stipulated that the men employed should be Canadians, and that was a sensible thing to do. The public money expended on these works is contributed by Canadians all over the country, and even if Americans are allowed to obtain the contracts it would be a wise thing to provide that Canadians should be employed. We have been told to-night by gentlemen opposite that we should only look at the resolution itself, and not consider the fact that the Postmaster General has been very penurious in paying the mail carriers and other employees. That is all very well, but after all it is not so much the wording of a resolution like this that is important, as it is the men who are behind the resolution to enforce it. If the Postmaster General and his colleagues have underpaid the letter carriers and other public employees; if the contracts for carrying mails are at an extremely low price, as I know they are in some instances, then I hold that this resolution should be framed in such a way that we can understand exactly what it means, so that we may know whether the government is carrying it out or not. I suppose the government will vote down the amendment of the hon. gentleman for West Toronto, which I intend to support, and as the resolution is in itself unobjectionable I shall vote for it, but I shall not vote for it with such a tail added to it as that proposed by the hon. member for Kent, which is absolute nonsense, inserted as it is in this way.

Mr. N. F. DAVIN (West Assiniboia). Not only that, but this addition is an injunction that you must not deal with the salaries of civil servants and the tone and temper of the speech of the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) showed a positive hatred of the civil servants. I have no special love for the civil servants any more than for other citizens of Canada; but whether they are civil servants or uncivil servants, they deserve justice at the hands of the government, and if in this resolution you deny that justice to the man who works with his pen that you accord to the man who works with his hand, it is not a proper resolution to pass in this House. The speech of the Minister of Customs gave away the fact that this resolution is intended for electioneering purposes, so that gentlemen opposite can go on the stump and make it sound as if this government was doing great things for the workingman. Well, if the government wants to do anything for the workingman, let them pass an Act of parliament which will insure their doing it. The hon. minister (Mr. Paterson) used the word 'shall' as if this resolution when passed shall compel every department to act upon it. The hon. gentleman was not in the House when I read a clause from the report of the Buxton committee in 1897, which declared that the Buxton resolution, passed in 1891, had not been in operation in Ireland for six whole years, and that certain departments of government in England, it was suspected, did not work under it. Suppose this resolution is passed; is there anything to compel the Department of Customs, the Department of Public Works, the Department of Railways and Canals, or the Post Office Department, to act on it. There is nothing whatever. If you want these principles carried out, pass legislation—but the fact is, it is quite clear that that is not what is desired. I agree with the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) about the ridiculous tail that it is proposed to hang on to this resolution. It has no proper relevancy at all. It is certainly a most lame and impotent conclusion to a motion that, as it stands, is not objectionable. If the resolution stood alone, I would be ready to vote for it, and therefore, the proper thing for the government to do is to have the amendment of the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) withdrawn. There is no difference in regard to their position to the civil servants in voting this amendment down and in passing this resolution, except this: that voting it down will leave them in a position that their conduct can be construed by civil servants and by others in the light that they thought it was not desirable to pass the amendment; but let them insert the amendment of the hon. member for Kent, and certainly there is animus on the face of it against the civil servants. I do not think the civil servants, even here in Ottawa, are a very luxurious class; I do not think they are very highly paid; I do not see any evidence of superabundant wealth on their part. But go outside of Ottawa, and consider the postmasters of whom the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) spoke. There are postmasters all over the west whom the paring and grinding of the hon. gentleman now at the head of the Post Office Department has reduced to the very closest straits in order to be able to live.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend, who knows the condition of things in that country, assents to that. As my hon. friend here has referred to the letter carriers, we know that this government, which passes this so-called benevolent resolution to workingmen, is adopting a sweating system affecting an important section of the working classes of this country, namely, the letter carriers. Take the mail clerks in the west; they are a heavily worked body of men, and ought they not to have as much consideration as bricklayers or stonemasons? I say that the attitude, that only the masons, the bricklayers or the carpenters are workmen, is derogatory to the workmen themselves, is unjust in principle, and has a socialistic flavour about it. I say that system is not statesmanlike, and if the hon. gentlemen who compose this government want to put up a lasting monument of the inaptitude of which they are capable, they will support this extraordinary amendment proposed by the hon. member for Kent. What I would suggest to the right hon. gentleman is this. If he wants to vote down the motion of my hon. friend from West Toronto, let him get his somewhat bungling artist at resolution drawing, the hon. member for Kent, to withdraw his motion, and let us then vote on the motion of my hon. friend from West Toronto; and when that is voted down—as no doubt it will be, though I will vote for it—and this resolution is put before us in its present form, we shall be ready to vote on it. If the right hon. gentleman is not willing to do that, certainly the time of the House will be taken up, because we shall have to move some amendments to try to fix ourselves in a proper light before the country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. What do hon. gentlemen cheer about? I have been talking about the dignity of this parliament as a great legislative body, and if I talked of fixing ourselves before the country, I was talking of this whole parliament, and I was talking of the government, too; because the bare fact that we are in opposition does not prevent this government being for the time being our government. If this government behaves in a manner unworthy or undignified, we are lowered as well as the government.

The PRIME MINISTER. It is too bad.

Mr. DAVIN. I am glad to see that the right hon. gentleman's conscience pricks him. It is too bad, and when we find the Minister of Customs making a stump speech, as he did here to-night, and using fallacious arguments, which he surely must have known were fallacious, because the whole of his argument was based on the assumption that this resolution would be as binding on the departments as a law. We have just voted down what would make it imperative on every department in the public service, and make it of some use. What will happen? I prophesy what will happen when this resolution is passed. It will remain a dead letter on our books, just as the alien labour law has done after it served its purpose, just as the editorship and proprietorship of the Farmers' Sun did after it served its purpose for the present Minister of Trade and Commerce. It will be thrown into the limbo of forgotten things, and we shall never hear of it in the departments so long as these gentlemen are there; but I think we may congratulate the country that they will not have an opportunity of playing the same part of treason with this resolution that they have played before.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Will the hon. gentleman answer a question? Is it not in the power of the House to deal with the question of the civil service? Can their cases not be brought up individually here and discussed? Is it not wholly within the power of this parliament to determine that, and can the hon. gentleman not see the distinction between that and the question of contracts?

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, what, pray, is the difference? Can we not in this House deal with any question just as we can with the question of the civil service, at any moment? What have we seen in the last four years with regard to these civil servants? We have seen favouritism rampant, injustice done, men docked of what your own follower, the member for Ottawa (Mr. Belcourt), said they were entitled to. That hon. gentleman stood up to-night and made an indictment against the honesty of your administration with regard to the civil service. He said you had not done right.

Mr. McMULLEN. Order, order.

Mr. DAVIN. What is the question of order?

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman spoke before, and took his seat.

Mr. DAVIN. I took my seat to let the Minister of Customs ask me a question.

Mr. McMULLEN. I rise to a question of order. The hon. gentleman addressed the House on this question, and took his seat. I want to know if we are going to have a second speech?

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not know what was in the hon. member's mind. My own supposition was that he had closed his address. As to that, he is his own judge; but, certainly, the hon. Minister of Customs called him to his feet by a question.

Mr. DAVIN. I admit, Mr. Speaker, that I was coming to the conclusion of my speech.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. member says he had not concluded, that settles the question.

Mr. DAVIN. I was coming to the conclusion of my speech. The question was asked, and I think I have answered it to the satisfaction of the House, and I was about to say, when I was interrupted, that we had the hon. member for Ottawa here declaring that for four years these gentlemen have been keeping back money that was justly due to people in the public service.

Mr. BELCOURT. I do not think that is what I said. What I did say was that I could not approve of the manner adopted by the government in dealing with statutory increases. I did not question the honesty of the government, nor did I say that increases were dishonestly kept from the civil servants in this city, but I said that the manner of dealing with the statutory increases adopted by the government was not what I approved.

Mr. DAVIN. That is pickwickian to what the hon. gentleman said.

Mr. DAVID HENDERSON (Halton). The windy and thundering tones of the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), seem to convey to the House his opinion that the amendment now before us, had some very direct application to the civil service. To my mind I fail to see that either the resolution or the amendment can affect in any way the position of the civil servants in the different departments at Ottawa. I do not believe that such was the intention of the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke). His intention was more particularly to deal with officers, such as mail carriers in the cities. In my opinion, civil servants, having salaries fixed by law, will not be affected in any way whatever, by the passage or rejection of this resolution. The intention of the hon. member for West Toronto was to extend the scope of the resolution to the workingmen employed by the government, who do not come under the category of civil servants. We have numbers of men working on our canals and government railways, who are not classed as civil servants. These men would be affected by the amendment of the hon. member for West Toronto, but not by the resolution proposed by the government. There is another class which I think ought to receive our very serious consideration, and which is in no way effected by the government resolution. I refer to the large number of mail couriers throughout the country. These people are forced in good and bad weather to go out day after day, through all kinds of roads to perform their duties under their contracts, and for which in many cases they are very much underpaid. We are told that these men tender for this work, but I fail to see why a man should be forced down to the lowest possible figure, simply because he wants a mail contract. Some system ought to be adopted by which post office inspectors would be called in to give a fair valuation for services performed, as a guide to the amount that should be paid. These men are subjected to a great many hardships. For instance, let me read a statement in the newspaper published in my own village, a newspaper supporting the government. I quote from the Acton Free Press, published about two weeks' ago :

Crewson's Corners.

The roads are in a very bad state at present. It took Mr. George Cann, our genial postmaster, and a team of horses and five men seven hours to take the mail to and from Acton, a distance of about six miles for round trip last Friday, the road being almost impassable.

And, for all that service, the genial postmaster was paid the magnificent sum of fifty cents. There ought surely be some consideration shown for men who will, in all kinds of weather and roads, perform the duties they have agreed to do under their contracts, and for which they are so clearly underpaid. When this same postmaster asked the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mullock), only about a year ago, to give him an extra $25 for his services, his tender being the lowest, he was told that unless he performed it for 50 cents a trip, the mail service would be reduced to a weekly, instead of a semi-weekly one. So that it is not the fault of the mail courier, that he is paid only this small indemnity. The fact is that the hon. Postmaster General has adopted a policy of cutting down the pay of hard working mail couriers throughout the country to the lowest possible point, forcing men who have been performing the service for years, to continue rather than give up their living even if the pittance allowed them is altogether too small. To my mind, the resolution is entirely too limited. It should go a great deal further. As I understand it, it simply relates to work undertaken by the government, and to works aided by the government. Why not extend it, so as to include those men who do work such as making clothing for the militia, making blankets, boots, harness, saddlery, paper and leather, required by the government. Why not say to the man who takes a contract for making blankets or clothing, or the manufactures of leather, that the department insists in all these contracts, the men employed should be paid fair wages, equal to the necessities of the case? No doubt throughout the country, workingmen are in many cases paid small wages, and to my mind, if the government is going to assist men on government contracts, such as canals and railways, it ought to extend that paternal care a good deal further, and insist that every contractor who gets a government contract, should pay the men who actually do the work wages fair and sufficient under the circumstances. I trust that before the resolution is allowed to pass, the government will see its way clear to extend its operations so as to include a requirement of this character.

Mr. E. F. CLARKE (West Toronto). I do not intend to occupy the time of the House for more than a few minutes. I think that the object of the government in presenting an amendment to my amendment, and the speech of the Minister of Customs may be left to the country to make decision as to the reasons which prompted them. The whole burden of the speech of the Minister of Customs, if I understand that hon. gentleman aright, was an attack on the civil service. He endeavoured to justify the amendment to the amendment by making an assault upon highly paid members of the civil service, gentlemen who receive salaries of from $1,500 to $2,000 a year. I must confess that I had not in my mind, when I offered my amendment, the class of employees drawing salaries as large as those mentioned by the hon. minister. But, if these gentlemen are rendering services to the state that, if rendered to private individuals, would entitle them to salaries of more than $2,000, is there any good reason why they should not be paid those salaries? If the intention of the Postmaster General was, as he stated in the House this afternoon, to set an example to employers generally throughout the Dominion by the affirmation of the principle contained in this resolution, why should its operation be confined to labourers pure and simple? Why should not members of the civil service who are eking out a miserable existence, many of them on salaries of $300, $350 and $400, be included in the resolution? The government broke faith with the members of the civil service when they assumed office. They broke the contract made by the government of the country with these men, because when these men entered the service of the Crown, they relied upon it that good faith would be kept with them. But the hon. gentleman who made such a flowery speech this afternoon about the interests of the workingmen signalized his entrance into office by cutting down wages and depriving his officials of their increases wherever it was possible to do so. Yet, in the resolution he asks the people to believe that he is a friend of the labouring classes, and desires to do justice to them on a question in regard to which justice has, it is alleged, never been done by any previous administration. I say that the resolution proposed by the hon. gentleman is just as vague as it is possible for a resolution to be. It practically means nothing; and if it is carried—as I presume it will be by the majority in this House—in the shape in which it is presented by the Postmaster General, it will be as dead a letter as the celebrated alien labour law which these hon. gentlemen passed three years ago. The hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), says that if this resolution is passed it will prevent the importation of foreign workmen, and that Canadian workmen, under the operation of the principle embodied in this resolution, will get a fair day's pay for a fair day's work. But how will the passage of this resolution prevent the importation of alien labour? We have an alien labour law on the statute-book and it has not prevented the importation of alien labour; foreign labourers having been brought in again and again, not only in the far west but in the older provinces. And, when Canadian labourers were endeavouring to improve their position and resorted to strikes for that purpose, they were completely handicapped by the inactivity and gross carelessness of hon. gentlemen opposite in not putting into effect the clauses of the alien labour law which were supposed to give these Canadian workingmen protection. This resolution which is before the House to-day is nominally intended to 'secure the payment of such wages as are generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen in the district where the work is carried out.' This resolution is intended to apply to works of construction which are aided by bonus of the parliament of Canada. May I ask what the rate of wages is to be in those outlying districts where these works will be carried on in many cases, where there is no labour market except that created by the contractors in the performance of the work? Have the government given the House the slightest information as to how they intend to enforce the payment of fair wages? Have they shown who is to be the judge of what fair wages are in these districts? Have the government made the slightest suggestion of fixing a minimum wage per hour for workmen? Not a single attempt has been made to put the resolution in practical shape. And I must say I was amazed when the announcement was made this afternoon that it was not the intention of the government to implement this resolution by an Act of parliament providing penalties and setting up machinery to carry out the principle thus declared. It seems to me that if the government desire that we shall give them full credit for their interest in the passage of this resolution, they should set to work without a moment's delay and endeavour to enforce the alien labour law which they have placed on the statute-books, and which is admitted by their supporters, and even by themselves, and which is known by the working people of the Dominion generally, to be as dead a letter as it is possible for a piece of legislation to be. In conclusion, I may say that, in my humble judgment, there is no good reason why men in the service of the Crown, men who are compelled to work eight or ten hours a day, should not be included in the scope of the resolution that the Postmaster General presented this afternoon; and if they are underpaid, as many of them are, it is unfair to deprive them of the benefit of the principle embodied in this resolution. It is an unfair and unjust action on the part of the government, and it weakens very much the force of the plea made by hon. gentlemen on the other side as to the object the government have in view in presenting this resolution.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR (South Leeds). I beg to move the adjournment of the debate, and would ask the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) to consent to this motion. I understand that the hon. gentleman is to make his budget speech to-day. I supposed that he was preparing that speech this afternoon. I telephoned to the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) who, I presume, is preparing his reply, about 9 or 10 o'clock, that we were going to have a vote, and he telephoned back to pair him with the Minister of Finance. I wrote a note to the chief whip (Mr. Gibson) on the other side, making the request, and thought that it was all arranged. But the Finance Minister came in as the vote was going on. I wish to save him staying here another hour or two, for I know there are several on this side of the House who, since the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) has provoked discussion, wish to speak. And I am satisfied, as we have to have a couple more votes that, before the question is disposed it will be broad daylight. I do not think the Minister of Finance wants to force us to that course to-night, particularly as he is to deliver his budget speech to-day. I hope, therefore, he will consent to the adjournment. If not, I shall go on with my remarks.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). On the motion to adjourn, I may say that I have sent for the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who has been leading the House, as I prefer that he should decide the question submitted by the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor). As to the question of the pair, I may say that I had no communication whatever with my hon. friend the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) on that subject.

Mr. TAYLOR. I did not say you had.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We had no conversation on the subject, and there could be no understanding. I came in not knowing what was going on. I do not think that it is wise at present, that I should consent to an adjournment. As I am on my feet, I may be permitted to say that a strong temptation is presented to me to support the amendment of my hon. friend from Toronto, because under it I shall get a fair wage as a minister of the Crown. This amendment is intended to secure the current rate of wages for persons performing services for the government. I do not think it would affect the salary of the His Excellency the Governor General, because he is already at the maximum of his class. But, I think that the Minister of Finance should be paid at least as high a salary as the manager of the Bank of Montreal, who, I understand, receives three or four times the salary of the Minister of Finance. Therefore, there is a strong inducement on my part to vote for this resolution of the member for Toronto. Nevertheless, being an unselfish person, and being more concerned for the interest of the wage earners, not the civil servant particularly, whose claims can be dealt with in other ways, not the minister of the Crown, I reluctantly say that I am obliged to pursue an unselfish course and vote against the motion of my hon. friend. Now, that the Prime Minister is in, I will leave him to discuss the question of the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. TAYLOR. In the absence of the Prime Minister, I suggested that the debate be adjourned, because the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) has provoked a discussion, and several members on this side of the House have intimated to me their wish to speak on this question. I do not think that at this hour in the morning we should be asked to remain any longer.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) told us a moment ago that they had to devise something to meet this amendment to the amendment, therefore, I will agree to the adjournment of the debate out of consideration for the hon. gentleman.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The PRIME MINISTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.50 a.m. (Friday).

GEORGIAN BAY CANAL—PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. JOHN G. HAGGART (South Lanark). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to draw attention to a report in the Ottawa Citizen of an alleged speech made by the Hon. Mr. Blair in this House, the night before last. He is reported as saying :

Later on, in his speech, Mr. Blair dealt with the Georgian Bay Canal question; and in no very hopeful strain, advocates of that scheme will conclude. He said that in his address to the House on the present subject, Hon. Mr. Haggart had stated that the Georgian Bay Canal project was not a new one; that the government of the late Sir John Macdonald had decided to take up the matter, and take hold of the project as a government work and expend a million dollars a year upon it for twenty years. If that, said Mr. Blair, was the policy of the government of Sir John Macdonald, there is not a record or a letter in the archives of the government that will go to bear out that statement. In the Department of Railways and Canals there is not an officer who ever heard that any such scheme was in contemplation, or even under consideration. There was, in fact, only one survey in existence, one made a half or three-quarters of a century ago, he forgot which, and that was for a nine-foot canal. There were no calculations, no plans, and when he mentioned to the deputy minister what Mr. Haggart had stated, he was taken quite by surprise.

One can very well imagine, said the minister, that the hon. gentleman dreamt it; either it was a day dream or a night dream.

I call the attention of the right hon. the leader of the House, who is present, to this, because he was listening attentively to what I said in the House, and he interjected a question when I was speaking. I stated that at one time it was the policy of the Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald to build this canal, and that in carrying out that policy he had let some of the contracts. I stated further that some of the work was done, and that Sir John Macdonald intended to complete it with a reasonable expenditure. The Minister of Railways asked me what I thought was a reasonable expenditure, and my answer was that I thought it would be about $1,000,000 a year. I thought the fact was known to every person in Canada who had followed public affairs, and I do not believe it possible that the Railway Department furnished the minister (Mr. Blair) with the information that Sir John Macdonald never contemplated that work. Anyway, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) has been at the head of the department for four years, and he ought to have known the facts. If they do not know the facts in the Railway Department, let me draw the attention of the minister to the records of the House upon the subject.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I understood from my hon. friend that he wanted simply to make a personal explanation.

Mr. HAGGART. Yes, it is a question of the veracity of my statement, and the rest of my remarks will only consist of quotations from the public documents to show that when Sir John Macdonald was a member of the government and Sir Hector Langevin was the Minister of Public Works, these matters occurred.

The PRIME MINISTER. If my hon. friend will permit me, the Minister of Finance proposes to make his budget speech this afternoon, and if my hon. friend enters into a lengthy controversy—

Mr. HAGGART. I will not enter into any controversy. I will only make quotations from the public documents to sustain my statement.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to say that this is opening up a subject which I gather will be controversial, and I ought to have an opportunity of making some reply. I do not think it is proper for the hon. gentleman to take an occasion to make his statement when for reasons stated by the Prime Minister, I would be expected not to make a statement. I do not want to have the matter left in that position.

Mr. HAGGART. I will not enter into any controversy. I only wish to show whether there was any foundation for the statement I made or not. In the sessional papers of 1867, under the head of 'Montreal and Lake Huron Navigation, via Ottawa and French River,' you will find an account of the expenditure, and these words :

It was deemed expedient to commence, in the first instance, only the Chats, the shorter of these two canals. Two lines had been proposed for this canal, one on the north and one on the south shore. The northern line was selected, tenders were received for its construction, and on June 19, 1854, a contract was entered into with Messrs. A. P. McDonald and P. Schram.

In the same work, under the head of 'Montreal and Lake Huron Navigation, via Ottawa,' there is an account of expenditure as follows :

Chats Canal (not completed), Lower Canada, $482,950.

Then, in the same work, under the head of 'Montreal and Lake Huron Navigation, via Ottawa,' there is the following :

This canal extends from the foot of Rapide des Chats to Chats Lake; it was commenced in August, 1854, and is yet in an unfinished state, the work having been suspended on November 15, 1856; it was designed with locks of 190 x 45 feet, similar to the lock at Ste. Anne; the depth of water on the sills was to be 7 feet, and the total lockage 49.80 feet.

Out of this amount $273,191.98 were expended by the Department of Public Works and the balance by the Finance Department.

These are quotations in reference to that subject from the sessional papers and the reports of the minister's own department, which ought to be in his possession. I have nothing more to say.

SUCCESSOR TO GENERAL HUTTON.

Mr. E. G. PRIOR (Victoria, B.C.) Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the right hon. leader of the government to an item that appears in the Canadian Military Gazette, as follows :

It is stated in the department at Ottawa that Col. Percy Lake has actually been appointed General Officer Commanding the Canadian Forces.

I would ask the right hon. gentleman whether he is in a position to state to this House, whether that is a fact, or whether any other gentleman has been appointed to take the place of General Hutton ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). There has been no appointment.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that the House resolve itself into committee to consider of the ways and means for raising the supply to be granted to Her Majesty. He said : Mr. Speaker, when I had the honour to deliver the budget speech a year ago, I spoke to the House of the affairs of the preceding year, which I was able to describe as the most prosperous period in the history of Canada. It is, I am sure, a cause of gratification to us all that the favourable conditions which then existed have continued, and that the year which followed was also one of wonderful progress in Canada. The year 1898 was regarded as a phenomenal year ; but great as was its activity, that of the year 1899 was still greater, and I may say of that year that it was beyond all question the most prosperous year in Canadian history. The evidence of that prosperity will be found in the public documents, in the returns of the banks, in the reports of the boards of trade, in the reports of our great railway and industrial corporations. I may, as I proceed, have occasion to refer to a few of the more striking features of that prosperity, and at the close, I shall place on the Table of the House, as I did on a previous occasion, a series of diagrams, which will in a very vivid way illustrate the progress which Canada has made during the comparatively short period of her national existence.

Let me first, Sir, following the usual method of the budget speech, invite attention to the financial affairs of the year ending the 30th of June last, which we describe in our blue-books as the fiscal year 1898-9.

Mr. HAGGART.

During that year, the revenue collected from all sources amounted to $46,741,249. This amount, which I may say, by the way, exceeds the anticipation expressed in my statement of last year by $108,850, represents the very pronounced increase of $6,186,011 over what was received by way of total revenue in the preceding year. The following are the particulars of how the revenue has been derived :

	1897-8.	1898-9.	In-crease.	De-crease.
	$	$	$	$
Customs....	21,704,893	25,316,841	3,611,948
Excise.....	7,871,563	9,641,227	1,769,664
Post Office..	3,527,809	3,193,777		334,032
Miscellaneous.....	7,450,973	8,589,404	1,138,431
	49,555,238	46,741,249	6,520,043	334,032
Net increase.....			6,186,011

The increase of customs was general along the line, there being but few articles on which there was not an increase of revenue. In the case of excise, there was an increase on all articles. The following is a statement of the excise revenue collected on each article :

Article.	Duty accrued 1898.	Duty accrued 1899.	Increase.
Spirits.....	3,563,575	4,566,147	1,002,572
Malt	584,321	843,193	258,872
Cigars.....	676,577	768,496	91,919
Cigarettes....	240,343	302,841	62,498
Tobacco and Snuff.....	2,651,633	3,014,951	363,318
	7,716,449	9,495,628	1,779,179

As I have already stated, in miscellaneous revenues there is a large increase. We have a large receipt from the Yukon, which is a comparatively new source of revenue in the last year or two ; and we have an increase of over $600,000 in the earnings of government railways. In this general classification of our sources of revenue, the only item which shows a diminution is the Post Office Department, and that we do not regard as a matter of regret, because the reduction in the revenue of the Post Office Department is a reminder of the great reform accomplished in that department by my hon. friend the Postmaster General when he established the great boon of the penny post. I remember that my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, when speaking on that subject at a public gathering in the city of Brockville, not many months ago, said that if the government had reduced the postage to two cents, they would make up for that reduction by new taxes somewhere else. Well, it will be, no doubt, gratifying to the hon. gentleman to know that no new taxes have been imposed, and that consequently the concession of penny postage has been a great reduction of taxation to the people at large, because there is no tax that is more universal throughout Canada than that which may be called taxation to meet the cost of the postal service of the country. The public will be glad to know that the anticipation of my hon. friend has not been realized, and that this great boon has been given without entailing the necessity of any increase of taxation in other respects. But while there is temporarily a loss of revenue in consequence of the granting of that boon, I rejoice to know that that loss will not last much longer. It is a principle which we on this side, at any rate, recognize, that when you cheapen an article to the public they will use more of it, and that principle applies in the matter of postage as in other matters. We are glad to know that owing to the reduction in postage, the people are writing more letters than ever before, and it will be but a few months, in all probability not more than twelve months, when the revenue from the Post Office Department will be as much as it was before the penny postage was established.

The total revenue for 1898-9 was $46,741,249, or an increase of $6,186,000 over the revenue of the previous year. The expenditure chargeable to consolidated fund for the year was $41,903,500, or an increase of $3,070,974 over the previous year. I will mention some of the principal increases. One is in the interest on the public debt, in which connection we had to pay a full year's interest on our 2½ per cent loan against a half year's interest in the previous year.

In legislation we had to provide for the plebiscite; in militia we had to provide for the Yukon contingent expenses and increased expenditure on annual drill; in public works we had to provide for additional dredging plant and numerous repairs and extensive additions to these works; in our ocean and river services we had to provide for the cost of a new steamer. We had also to provide for other expenditure in the Yukon Territory which was absolutely necessary, and as hon. gentlemen know our government railways are being developed to a considerable extent, but our expenditure in that connection is a profitable expenditure, as it is the cause of increased earnings on the Intercolonial.

We had, therefore, a revenue for the year 1898-9 of $46,741,249, and an expenditure for the same year of $41,903,500, so that we closed the year with a surplus of $4,837,749.

I should now refer to the question of what we call capital expenditure. There is a disposition occasionally on the part of some hon. gentlemen, who perhaps have not given the matter sufficient attention, to confuse capital account with income account; and even during the present session we have heard hon. gentlemen treat these two accounts as if they were one and the same, and put the total expenditure of both capital and income, during our time, against the expenditure of former governments which included income charges only. There ought to be no misunderstanding in a matter of that sort. I am sure that there will not be any on the part of my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, who at one time controlled the Finance Department himself, nor on the part of my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), because both these hon. gentlemen are well aware that there is a broad distinction between these two accounts.

There are certain charges of an unusual character, such as the construction of great public works, railways and canals, the subsidizing of railways and other exceptional charges of one kind or another, which do not form part of the ordinary every day expenditure of governments, and these from time immemorial are collected together under the heading of capital account, distinguished from the ordinary account of expenditure chargeable against income.

Let it be clearly understood that the accounts of the government, as respects these two classes of expenditure, are kept to-day exactly as they were in former times; and therefore the comparisons we make are those we have the right to make with the expenditures of former administrations. I trust, therefore, that those hon. gentlemen who have confused these two accounts, will draw the line between them, and see that any comparisons they submit are properly made.

We expended during the last year on capital account, that is to say outside ordinary charges against income, $9,137,562. This is made up of the following items:

Railways—Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railways	$1,103,929
Canals	3,899,377
Public works	385,094
Dominion lands	151,212
Militia	387,810
Canadian Pacific Railway	8,418
Railway subsidies (including $2,322,500 to Crow's Nest Pass Railway) ..	3,201,220
Total	$9,137,562

Let us turn now to the effect of this expenditure in increasing our public debt. I have here a statement showing the additions to the net debt on the 30th June, 1899:

Capital expenditure (railways, canals, public works, Dominion lands, militia, and C.P.R.).....	$5,936,342 94
Railway subsidies	3,201,220 05
Expenses of loan of 1897	3,786 87
Allowance to Manitoba (under 61 Vic., cap 4).....	267,026 43
Amount paid to Manitoba (under 61 Vic., cap 4).....	231,292 82

Increase of net debt$2,317,047 69

This increase of the public debt, Mr. Speaker, is somewhat larger than I at one time expected, but it is notwithstanding a very moderate increase of the debt, having regard to the very large undertakings in which we have been engaged. When I stated that it was somewhat larger than some of us anticipated, one of my hon. friends opposite said, 'Hear, hear.' There is a popular idea, I know, in some quarters that the increase of the public debt, under this administration, has been very large. No statement is more unfounded. There is absolutely no ground for any statement of that character, if a fair comparison be made between the expenditure of the present government and that of our predecessors. I have here a comparative statement of the public debt for two periods. I take first the period from 1878 to 1896, eighteen years :

Net debt July 1, 1878.....	$140,362,069 91
" " 1896.....	258,497,432 77
Increase for eighteen years.....	$118,135,362 86
Average increase per annum for eighteen years....	$ 6,563,075 71

I now present a similar statement for the three years from 1896 to 1899 :

Net debt July 1, 1896.....	$258,497,432 77
" " 1899	266,273,446 60
Increase for three years.....	$ 7,776,013 83
Average increase per annum.....	$ 2,592,004 61

But, this statement, favourable as it is, hardly tells the whole story. Of the expenditures of the last three years, about two and a half millions, in round numbers, have been expended in paying obligations entered into by the late government, or obligations which existed prior to this government coming into power, and which should have been met by the previous government. And, if you take this two and a half millions from our expenditure and hold this government responsible only for that portion of the increase of debt which is represented by their own outlay for charges occurring subsequent to their coming into office, you will find that the average annual increase of the public debt under this administration has been only about $1,700,000, against about $6,500,000 for every year of the government of their predecessors. The other day, when some reference was made in the course of discussion to large expenditures on the part of this government, the question was asked what we had got for them, and an hon. gentleman opposite said 'nothing.' But let me call attention to two or three items of our expenditure for the last three years, that the House and the country may judge whether these expenditures have produced nothing for the good of the country. I have here a statement of the expenditures on canals, public works, Intercolonial Railway and railway subsidies for two periods of three years—the three years 1894-5-6, and the three years 1897-8-9. All these expenditures are chargeable to capital.

So it will be seen that if we have a larger expenditure in the aggregate, we are able to point to such items as these to show that this expenditure has been applied to services absolutely necessary for the 'growing time' in Canada. I turn now to the affairs of the year of which some eight months have passed. I estimate that the total revenue for this year will pass the fifty million mark. Our expenditure up to the first of the present month was $25,018,290. It will be necessary to make a somewhat liberal allowance for the expenditure of the remaining portion of the year. Last year, it will be remembered, parliament adjourned at a very late date. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) was, unfortunately, absent, through illness, and very many of the grants which were appropriated in that department were not expended. But arrangements have since been made, and I have no doubt that during the working season between now and the 1st of July, very liberal expenditures will have to be made. We make allowances for liberal expenditures on that account, and making such allowances—I estimate that the expenditure of the year will be $43,175,000. And I anticipate, making our calculations and keeping our accounts in exactly the same way as our predecessors, that at the close of the fiscal year we shall have a surplus of $7,525,000, the largest surplus in the history of Canada. I may find myself tempted to infringe on the copyright of the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), and inscribe on the public accounts 'We hold a vaster surplus than has been.'

Coming now to the capital account for the current year, our expenditure to the 1st of March has been $5,341,452. We have large expenditures on railways, on canals, and on public works yet to make. We have provided liberally for these. Then, we have this year a service of an exceptional character, which we are proud to mention, a service which is not for ourselves, but for the empire and for the maintenance of our troops in Africa. We have a large expenditure to make on that service. I desire to speak of the public debt of the year with some caution, because I know that one may easily err, and I know that the increase last year was somewhat more than I anticipated, but, looking at the matter carefully, making the best estimates one can for the year of which four months are yet to elapse, I am of the opinion, and I think that opinion will prove to be correct, that, during this current year we will pay all the liberal outlay on ordinary account that hon. gentlemen opposite talk of so often; we will pay all the capital charges we occasionally hear about; we will pay all the railway subsidies; we will pay every dollar of the expenditure required to the 1st of July for our services in South Africa—and, at the end of the year, we shall not have added one dollar to the public debt.

Mr. GEORGE E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) May I interrupt the applause for a moment? The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) did not tell us what he supposed the total capital expenditure would be, he was so anxious to get to that debt business.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) is quite right. The total capital expenditure, I estimate, will reach $9,875,000. Our position financially, therefore, is a very strong one. We have not a dollar of floating debt at this moment; and though, as any hon. member connected with finance, is aware, we have been passing through a period of great stringency in the money world, it is gratifying to us to know that we have been able to bear these difficulties and not go upon the money market at all.

I have spoken of the year 1898-9, ending in June last, and I have spoken of the current year which will end on the 30th of June next. We have placed on the Table the main estimates for the year beginning the 1st of July next, and supplementary estimates will follow in due course. I do not think it is necessary at present to go into any speculation as to the finances of next year further than to say this, that great as have been the progress and prosperity of Canada during the past two or three years, we have no reason to believe that there is going to be any early check to that prosperity. I do not think it is reasonable for us to look forward to a continued period of such prosperity as we have had. As I ventured to remark on a previous occasion, the pendulum that swings one way may some day swing back, and it is always well that we should keep that in mind. But so far as we can see now, there is no turn of the tide; there is every reason to believe that the next fiscal year will be one of prosperity in Canada, and that we will come out of it at the close with a good financial statement.

I want to ask the attention of the House for one moment to an item that has only recently appeared in our public accounts, which has taken a great deal of our money, and which swells the expenditure which hon. gentlemen opposite like to speak of so well. I desire to call the attention of the House to it as an evidence of the fact that a mere increase of expenditure is not in itself an evidence of any increasing burden to the people; but there may be cases in which increasing expenditures, far from being a burden, actually tend to reduce the burden of the taxpayer. I have here the figures of the Yukon district, receipts and expenditures for three years, which I will read to the House:

Though this Yukon statement swells up the total expenditure, though it gives hon. gentlemen opposite an opportunity to talk of this great expenditure, still the same account shows that the Yukon has also been actually the source of a small revenue.

I will now say a word as to surpluses and deficits. I do not know that it is absolutely necessary for the prosperity of a country that we should always have a surplus. We cannot properly say there may not be circumstances in which a government would be well justified in having a deficit. Still, I suppose we shall all agree that it is well to have a balance on the right side, and it is better to have a series of surpluses than a series of deficits. Seeing then that some of our critical friends have been disposed to expect that great disaster will come from the financial management of this government, it may not be without interest to present a comparative statement of the surpluses and deficits for two periods of three years :

	Deficit.
1893-4	$1,210,332 45
1894-5	4,153,875 58
1895-6	330,551 31
Total deficit for three years.....	$5,694,759 34
Average annual deficit	1,898,253 11

We now turn to the period when deficits cease and surpluses begin. In the year 1896-7 we had only a partial command of the finances of the country ; because it will be remembered that the estimates were prepared by our predecessors, and owing to the circumstances under which parliament met in the summer of 1896, it was found necessary to accept those estimates for carrying on the business of the country, with very little change. But, of course, by keeping some check upon the expenditure we had a partial control, and while it was expected that that year would result in a very heavy deficit, we had the satisfaction at the close of the year of finding that the deficit was only $519,981.44. In the two following years we had handsome surpluses, as will be seen by the following statement :

Mr. FIELDING.

	Deficit.	Surplus.
1896-7	$519,981 44
1897-8		$1,722,712 33
1898-9		4,837,749 00
		$6,560,461 33
		519,981 44
Total surplus for three years..		$6,040,479 89
Average annual surplus		2,013,493 29
Deficit, three years, 1893 to 1896....	$5,694,759 34
Surplus, three years, 1896 to 1899....		6,040,479 89
Betterment, last three years...		$11,735,239 23

That statement, be it remembered, takes no account of the surplus for the present year of $7,500,000. Sometimes hon. gentlemen opposite are a little anxious as to the future of our Dominion in regard to its finances. It will be interesting for those who have not given attention to the subject—for, of course, I know that several hon. gentlemen opposite are quite as familiar, perhaps more familiar, than I am with these things—but to those who have not given attention to the subject, it may be well that I should remind them that the obligations of Canada which will begin to mature very shortly in the mother country, bear a high rate of interest. The time will come, within a few years, when we shall have to redeem obligations to the amount of $167,000,000. But, against that we will have $67,000,000 of sinking fund, so that we shall have to borrow within the interval between now and the year 1903, for the renewals of old debts, $100,000,000. We may, in the meantime, have to make some additions to our public debt for the carrying on the public works of the country, although we are developing a marvellous capacity for carrying on these works without adding anything to the public debt. We cannot always expect to have as prosperous times as we have now, and it may be necessary, to meet these great expenditures of a practical character, to add something to the public debt in the meantime. If we assume that we will have to add $2,000,000 a year on the average, and also to retire the old debt to the amount of $100,000,000, I believe we shall be able, at the time mentioned, owing to the great improvement to the credit of Canada—an improvement which I do not pretend for one moment is due entirely to this government, because the credit of Canada occupied a good position when we came in, and I hope we have improved it—but, owing to the steady improvement for many years in the credit of Canada, we shall be able to float our new loans at a much lower rate of interest than the old loans bear. The difference between the rate that these old loans bear and the rate at which we shall be able to borrow, looking as far to the future as we can, all the money that we require, is so great that I believe that ten or twelve years hence we shall find ourselves in the happy position that, even though we should have to add $2,000,000 a year to the public debt, we shall actually be paying less money for interest on our debt than we do to-day.

I want to ask the attention of the House now to a question which is so much talked about, of the large expenditures of the government, and generally to the question of extravagant expenditures. I think that no fair discussion of that question can take place unless hon. gentlemen opposite are prepared to take up the expenditure, item by item, and show wherein there is an expenditure which has been wasteful or unnecessary. I think that every fair-minded man in Canada, who is interested in such matters, will feel that he is bound to analyse their character before he forms any judgment against the expenditures of this government. I know that many men take a general view of these matters, and, even in the general view, it will be found that this government has not been anything like the extravagant government which hon. gentlemen opposite would picture it to be. I have here a statement of the expenditure, chargeable to consolidated fund, per head of the population, for the last twenty years, and I find that, according to this statement, taking statistics of population as given by the statistician of the Department of Agriculture, our expenditure for last year was $7.88 per head, not the largest expenditure in the history of Canada.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that the total expenditure ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It is the expenditure chargeable to consolidated fund only. There are several years in which the expenditure was about $7.88 per head, and in one year, 1886, which was somewhat exceptional, it was $8.50 per head. In 1888, the expenditure was $7.84 per head, while ours is $7.88 per head. I have already pointed out that, while there is an apparent increase of the expenditure, it is only a nominal increase, inasmuch as it does not carry with it any burdens upon the people. I have given the House the illustration of the case of the Yukon; for every dollar of increased expenditure we have received a dollar back, and I might also say that, for every dollar we have expended on the working expenses of the Intercolonial Railway, I think we shall receive a full dollar back, so that these increased expenditures are more nominal than real. Even treating them as real and taking that general view that so many people are likely to take, I would point out that this expenditure was $7.88 last year, per head of the population, based upon the statistics of the Department of Agriculture. I understand that the gentleman who has charge of that branch of the public business makes his estimates from year to year upon a well established scale of percentages based upon the past increase of population. Of course, it is only an approximate statement. In dull times, when business is not prosperous, when the country is not growing, this approximate statement will, probably, be above the true statement, while, in times of great activity, this statement will be below the true statement, and I have no hesitation in saying, from such means as I have of inquiry and observation, that the figures in this statement, based upon the method of calculation pursued in the past, do not represent correctly the population of Canada. The population, in 1899, is put down at 5,312,500, but, I think, my hon. friends opposite will agree with me in what I said a moment ago, that this approximate statement is likely to be an excessive statement in hard times, and an under-estimate in good times, and that being the case, we may reasonably believe that in these great and growing times in Canada, the population is greater than is given in this statement. If that be so, then, our expenditure per capita is actually below what it was in some of the years of the late government.

Mr. FOSTER. Is the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) going to take up the expenditure per head on both lines ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not take up the capital expenditure, but I shall be glad, at a later stage, to look into that. I have not the figures with me. I have already shown that the capital expenditure is larger than when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, but, in dealing with that branch of the subject we shall have to bear in mind the question whether we were prepared to finish the canals in a hurry or carry them on quietly.

I want to submit a statement of the total trade of Canada for different periods. There are various ways of measuring the prosperity of the country; the population is one, the value of land is another, and the total trade is another. I think we can appeal to every one of these to prove that Canada is prospering to an unprecedented degree to-day. I speak particularly of the statement of the total trade. I shall divide the statement into three periods, beginning with the period from 1868 to 1878, which I may describe as a low tariff period. There was a Conservative government in power for part of the time and a Liberal government for part of the time, when we had a much lower tariff. Then, we had the period from 1878 to 1896, which, I suppose, my hon. friends opposite do not object to my calling a high tariff period. Then, we have the period from 1896 to the present time, which, if not a very low tariff, is certainly a period of a moderate revenue tariff.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FIELDING.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Now, I find that the total trade in 1868 was $131,027,532; in 1878, $172,405,454, an increase in ten years, in the low tariff period, of $41,377,922, the percentage of increase in the ten years being 31.58 per cent, and the average annual increase $4,137,792. Now we come to the period from 1878 to 1896. The total trade in 1878 was $172,495,454, and in 1896, it was $239,025,360. The increase in eighteen years was $66,619,906, the percentage of increase in eighteen years was 38.64, and the average annual increase was $3,701,105. Now we come to the period of a moderate tariff. The total trade for 1896 was $239,025,360, and the total trade for 1899 was $321,661,213, an increase in three years of $82,635,853, against an increase of $66,000,000 in the whole eighteen years of the national policy. The average annual increase in this present period has been $27,545,284, against an average annual increase of $3,701,105 in the period of the national policy. The percentage of increase in our three years is 34.57, as against 38.64 in the eighteen years of the national policy. We have a statement of our trade for the eight months of the current year, and I shall present an approximate estimate for the remaining four months. If our trade for the coming four months should keep pace with the progress of the last eight months, we would then have the increase for the four years over 1896 at $135,227,247. The average annual increase for the four years would be $33,806,811, against an average annual increase of $3,701,105 in the days of the national policy. The percentage of increase in the four years would be 56.57, as against a percentage of 38.64 in the eighteen years of the national policy. Now, converting this into a statement of the annual increase, we find that in the low tariff period from 1868 to 1878, the total trade increased 3.15 per cent, and from 1878 to 1896, it increased 2.14 per cent. There was a lower rate of increase of trade under the national policy than there was under the old Macdonald-Mackenzie tariff. From 1896 to 1899, the annual increase is 11.52 per cent, as against 2.14 per cent in the days of the national policy. If we take the eight months actual figures of the present year, and the four months estimate, we will find that the annual increase in the four years is 14.14 per cent, as against 2 per cent in the days of the national policy.

Mr. WALLACE. At what do you estimate the total trade for the current year (1900) ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I have given the increase, but I have not at hand the figures on which it is based. The increase for the four years over 1896 is estimated at $135,227,247.

I have here some comparative statements which are usually presented in a budget speech, respecting the circulation of notes of the chartered banks and of the Dominion government. That statement is as follows :

Circulation of Notes of Chartered Banks and Dominion Government.

Date.	Banks.	Government.	Total.

There is no better criterion of the general business activity of the country than the circulation of the small notes—the $1 and $2 notes, such as a wayfaring man, even though he may be a member of parliament, may expect to get hold of. The larger notes get into the hands of the more favoured people, but the average of mankind is fortunate to possess these $1 and $2 bills. It is one of the best tests of the activity of the trade of the country. Taking the figures at the highest point in each year, which is the time the harvest is being moved, at the end of October, I find the circulation of Dominion notes ($1 and $2) was as follows :

Dominion Notes of Denomination of $1 and $2 in Circulation.

The bank clearings, which business men recognize as one indication of some value as to business activity, were as follows, for the past three years, in the six cities of Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, Halifax and St. John. I may state that the clearing house at St. John, was only established in 1896 :

This shows an enormous increase in the bank clearings. The discounts of the chartered banks of Canada from the year 1894 to the 31st January, 1900, were as follows :

A very interesting statement, which I will only present in brief, though hon. gentlemen in the west would perhaps find it of special interest, is one showing the sales of lands made by the Dominion government and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in the North-west. In 1895, 1896 and 1897, the Canadian Pacific Railway returns show that they had actually sold no land in those years ; or, to put it in other words, the sales of land had not been as great as the cancellations of previous sales. In 1898, the company sold 192,918 acres, and in 1899, they sold 266,874 acres. The sales of Dominion lands, the receipts being in cash and scrip, were as follows :

1895-6.....	$ 93,303 63
1896-7.....	66,264 91
1897-8.....	109,096 78
1898-9.....	137,905 93

These figures are very suggestive of the growth and progress of our great western country.

Mr. FOSTER. Has the hon. gentleman the distinction between the cash and scrip received ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I had it, but it is not on my notes. I will furnish that to the hon. gentleman if he wishes it.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to see it.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I will try to bear it in mind. I have a statement of the immigrants arriving in Canada for a series of years, as follows :

	By Ocean Ports.	From U.S.	Total.
1892	29,810	29,810
1893	29,455	29,455
1894	20,680	20,680
1895	18,617	18,617
1896	16,835	16,835
1897	19,304	712	20,016
1898	22,781	9,119	31,900
1899	32,598	11,945	44,543

There do not appear to be statistics as to the immigration from the United States in the years prior to 1897, if there was such an immigration in those years.

Mr. CLARKE. Have you the information as to the nationality of the immigrants arriving at ocean ports during the last two or three years ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No. Is there any particular nationality the hon. gentleman would want to shut out ?

Mr. CLARKE. I would like to get all the nationalities.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am not aware whether the Department of the Interior has them. My hon. friend, the acting minister can perhaps look into that. A further illustration may be given by the importations of settlers' effects, which were as follows :

1896.....	$2,188,975
1897.....	2,233,730
1898.....	2,828,675
1899.....	2,805,956

It will be seen that there has been a considerable increase in the last two years. I am glad, however, to be able to quote another authority as to the increase of immigration from the United States. My hon. friend, the leader of the opposition visited the city of Boston a few days ago, and there made a very patriotic speech, which does him infinite credit. In the course of that speech, he said :

Since September 27 last he had the opportunity of addressing fifty-seven public meetings in Canada, in every province, and at these meetings he had met hundreds of former citizens of the United States who had taken up their residence in Canada.

Mr. PRIOR. Could the hon. gentleman say whether—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order. Sit down.

Mr. PRIOR. Would the hon. gentleman say whether the leader of the opposition stated when these immigrants came to Canada ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. In the report of the hon. gentleman's very excellent and patriotic speech, I see no reference of that kind, and I do not imagine that my hon. friend drew any such distinction.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask the Finance Minister, what is the system of registration on which his statistics of immigrants coming from the United States, are based ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I would have to ask my hon. friend, the acting Minister of the Interior to deal with that point at a later stage. Knowing that there was this immigration, I sent for the figures to that department, which keeps the records.

Mr. FOSTER. You do not know whether they are actual settlers on lands, or whether they are simply counted by our immigration officers, when they come in ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. At a later stage, perhaps the acting Minister of the Interior can look into that and give the information ; I cannot give it.

A gratifying evidence of the increasing activity of recent years, and especially last year, has been the growth of enterprises of considerable importance, for the manufacture of iron and steel. In the province of Ontario, several new establishments have been started within the last year or two, and there is, I believe, every probability that the iron deposits of that province will be worked on a much larger scale than before. But the new enterprise which has probably attracted the most notice is that which is now being established in the old town of Sydney, in the Island of Cape Breton. There a company of capitalists, largely Canadian, but led by a very able gentleman from the United States, is engaged in establishing what I believe will be one of the largest iron and steel plants in the world. The elements which go to the successful production of iron and steel are believed to exist in the vicinity of Sydney in an ideal condition. You need coal, iron and limestone, and all these may be found in abundance in Cape Bre-ton. In addition to that, they have the great advantage of having their coal at tide-water, and they can have what is practically a ferry communication with the magnificent iron deposits of Newfoundland. The company has acquired one of the most valuable iron deposits in the world in Newfoundland, and contemplates using the ores of that colony as well as the ores of the Island of Cape Breton. There are at this moment, I am advised, 2,000 men at work, even at this inclement season, getting the works in shape ; and within the next two months, as soon as spring opens, and the opportunity comes of working on a larger scale, I am informed, that the number of men employed will be nearly doubled. The company has ample capital and is likely to engage in operations on a very large scale. The old town of Sydney, while always a beautiful place and full of historic interest, was not very progressive ; but it is to-day experiencing a boom such as is often heard of in the western country, but seldom happens in our quiet towns down by the sea. Sydney is likely to become the Pittsburg of Canada. There is to-day, I believe, as great a demand for town lots in Sydney as there is in some of the older cities with ten times its population. Every indication points to a great and successful enterprise, one which is likely to be productive of great advantage to Canada, and no doubt also to the enterprising capitalists who have put their money into it. There is a feature that I may be pardoned for making a passing allusion to, though possibly it may be a little bit of vanity on my part. I feel a certain interest in the matter, not because I happened to be the medium through which the government put before parliament its legislation on that subject, not because last year I introduced, on behalf of the government, our legislation with reference to bounties, by which we continued the system that had been in existence during the four years previous, another period of years, but for another reason. I should not have great hope of the mining industry in Sydney if I thought it would have to rely for its success upon the continuance of the bounty system, and I am glad to know that those gentlemen who have put their capital into it, look to the day when that industry will flourish without the aid of government bounties, because they have put their money into this enterprise on the faith of the Act passed by this parliament by which the bounty is to be diminished from year to year until before many years it will cease altogether. But it is not particularly the legislation of last year that I had in mind. What I desire to note is that this great enterprise in Cape Breton is the direct outcome of another great undertaking, led by the same enterprising American citizen, which I had the honour of submitting to the legislature of the province of Nova Scotia for its encouragement, when I occupied the position of Prime Minister. When I remember the struggle I had to make for my political existence to get that measure through, when I recall the fact that its opponents carried their hostility to Ottawa and into the Governor General's office, I can look back with pride and satisfaction to the movement of that day, and feel that time has vindicated that policy of the Nova Scotia government, and that the enterprise then started has been fruitful of advantage to the province and the direct cause of the creation of this new enterprise which bids fair to make the town of Sydney the Pittsburg of Canada.

Perhaps the House will pardon me if I place in the budget speech the mineral statistics of Canada, which may be stated briefly in a few lines, as taken from the report of the Geological Survey :

Total Value of Mineral Products of Canada.

1890.....	$16,763,353
1891.....	18,976,616
1892.....	16,628,417
1893.....	20,035,082
1894.....	19,933,857
1895.....	20,758,450
1896.....	22,584,513
1897.....	28,661,430
1898.....	38,661,010
1899.....	46,245,878

I presented last year, simply as an interesting item of comparison, because it is not properly a matter pertaining to the budget, some figures showing the relative trades of the United States and Canada, and I think they were found quite interesting and by many surprising. It is well that we should recognize that the United States is a more self-contained country than Canada. They have a greater variety of soil and climate than we, and are able to obtain, in the way of domestic trade, many products which we have to obtain from foreign countries. In that respect, perhaps, our American neighbours have the advantage of us, but we enjoy this compensation, that in this more northern clime we have a bracing climate, which probably more than anywhere else in the world, is conducive to the bringing up of a race of strong men and women.

The domestic exports of the United States in 1898 were $16.05 per head, and those of Canada in the same year amounted to $27.54 per head.

The total foreign trade of the United States in 1898 was $24.60 per head, and that of Canada $56.29 per head.

I have also the figures for 1899. The domestic exports of the United States in that year were $15.84 per head and of Canada $25.85 per head. The total foreign trade of the United States in 1899 amounted to $25.31 per head, and that of Canada to $58.90 per head.

Let me say something on the question of the extent to which this government has carried out the policy of tariff reform. My hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, has once or twice spoken of the extent of our tariff reform as 71-100ths of 1 per cent, while his hon. friend, who sits near him (Mr. Foster), and who is perhaps more accustomed to deal with figures, has placed it, in a resolution on the journals of the House, at 1.71 per cent, which is a great deal more than the statement of the hon. leader of the opposition. However, neither statement is exactly correct. I have here a statement prepared in the Customs Department, showing the imports for consumption during the fiscal year of 1898-9 to be $154,051,593, on which the duty collected amounted to $25,734,228.75. This, however includes the sum of $38,384.69, which was collected in the year 1897-8, but not credited to the Receiver General until 1898-9. The value of the importations upon which this sum was paid by way of duty is not included in the total value of imports for consumption for 1898-9, nor was it included in the previous year. It should, therefore, be deducted in striking the average ad valorem rate of duty on last year's imports.

Mr. FIELDING.

The sum of $54,109.84 was refunded under the preferential tariff on importations of last year and it should, therefore, also be deducted in striking the average ad valorem rate. The goods covered by such amount refunded were originally entered under the general tariff owing to absence of necessary certificates of origin. On production of such certificates refund was allowed. Deducting these, we have the following statement :

Net revenue on importations of fiscal year 1898-9.....	$25,641,734 22
Importations for consumption for the fiscal year 1898-9.....	$154,051,593
Less coin and bullion	4,705,134
	$149,346,459
Net duty paid thereon.....	$25,641,734 22
Average ad valorem rate on importations, less coin and bullion.....	17.17
Compare this with 1895-6 :
Importations for consumption for fiscal year 1895-6.....	$110,587,480
Less coin and bullion	5,226,319
	$105,361,161
Duty paid thereon.....	$ 20,219,037
Average ad valorem rate on importations, less coin and bullion.....	19.19
Rate, 1896	19.19
	2.02

Now, 2.02 may strike some persons as a very small reduction, but it is a very substantial reduction if you look at it in the right way. It is equivalent to a reduction of 10½ per cent off the total duties. And if you convert it into dollars, you will find that if the old tariff had been in operation and imposed upon the importations to which I have referred, the duty which the people would have been obliged to pay would have been $3,017,000 more than they actually paid.

I wish to point out, however, that the average ad valorem duty is not a fair measure of the tariff reform. You could have a large measure of tariff reform without reducing the ad valorem duty a single point. If you should increase your duties on luxuries and diminish them on things which may be regarded as the necessaries of life, you could by such a process have a very great tariff reform, and yet your average duty might be just the same as before or higher. Consequently the system of averages is somewhat misleading. When hon. gentlemen desire to know what the tariff reform has been, they must take up the individual items of the tariff. Last year, under our tariff, we added materially to the free list. There were besides 148 items on which the duties had been reduced in the general tariff, and on every one of these items, in the case of importations from Great Britain, the duty was further reduced to the extent of the preferential rate. I think that will be an indication that there has been a very considerable measure of tariff reform. Then, there is another point to be remembered. Even taking your average, you have saved, not only 2·2 per cent on your imports, but you have saved also 2·2 per cent on your purchases of goods from the home manufacturers. We all know that as a rule—there are exceptional cases, of course—the price of the home product is influenced by the duty on the foreign article. So, when our tariff was readjusted and this reduction was made, the reduction not only affected all the articles imported, but it obliged the home manufacturer to reduce his price to correspond with the price of the imported article under the reduced duty. And he was able to do that by the increased volume of business he was doing. Therefore, the people received the advantage of that reduction and the manufacturer did more business than ever before.

So it will be seen, I think, that there is a very large reduction in the tariff. Hon. gentlemen opposite delight to say now that there has been no reduction at all. They say that our tariff is only the old national policy. I am obliged to refer to this again, because the view is too often expressed by hon. gentlemen opposite. My hon. friend from East Huron (Mr. Macdonald), read a quotation the other evening, to show what was thought of our policy when we brought it down. It was not spoken of by these hon. gentlemen as the national policy then. May I be permitted to read again the words of the leader of the opposition on the tariff of 1897 :

The result is that this tariff goes into operation and the hon. gentleman knows that the industries of this country are already paralysed in consequence, while hon. members gloat over the destruction of Canadian industries. I was reading the wail, the sorrowful wail, of those industries in the Montreal 'Gazette,' where one manufacturer after another declared that those industries were ruined, that their mills must close, and that they saw staring them in the face a return to the deplorable state of things that existed when the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House was in charge of the fiscal policy of this country. I say that a deeper wrong was never inflicted upon Canada.

I feel that so far from rejoicing at it from a party standpoint, I deplore from the bottom of my heart the ruin that is going to be inflicted upon the best interests of Canada and upon its great industries. Still, I unhesitatingly say that, from a party point of view, the hon. gentlemen are doing our work; they are showing the people of this country that no reliance can be placed upon the most solemn declarations that they make either in the House or out of it; they are showing the people of this country that, having obtained power, which was all they wished for, they are now prepared to abuse that power at a cost of a sacrifice of the industries of Canada.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. May I ask my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding), if he thinks it is fair, I do not say to the House, because he does not expect. I am sure, to impress the House with a statement of that kind, for everybody here understands the question, but does he think it is fair to the country, to read a speech made by me upon an entirely different condition of things from that which exists to-day, and to present that as a criticism of the tariff? The hon. gentleman knows—

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper), may ask a question, but this is not the time for him to make a speech—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding), knows that he substantially changed the tariff.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend will have an ample opportunity of presenting his views, and I am sure he will not expect to make a speech now. I was just coming to the point to which he refers. He has had many a bad quarter of an hour trying to explain that speech. He says that it applied to an entirely different state of affairs. When his attention was drawn to this matter last year, he said that that speech applied to the tariff as the Finance Minister first brought it down, but that the Finance Minister had made changes a little later. That is the view he is suggesting now. If his criticism did not apply to the tariff so amended, that tariff must be all right. But we do not find that, at the time, the hon. gentleman said the changes made the tariff all right. He said we were blundering and muddling along and bringing affairs into hopeless confusion. Now, when we brought down that tariff, we did not imagine that wisdom would die with us. We knew that there were thousands of men in Canada able to give good opinions upon the tariff, opinions from which we might learn something. And, when we did learn something, we had the courage to come down and say so, and to make the change. And, so with the change in one item, and a change in another, here a little and there a little, we made it a good tariff. But, has the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper), said that it was a good tariff? No, he and his newspaper organs throughout the country, and particularly the Toronto Mail and Empire, declared that we had ruined the national policy, that we had cut the duties unsparingly up and down the line. Now, he would have us understand that these changes made the tariff all right, so that his criticism, which I have read, would not apply. But, that was not his position three days ago in this House. What did he say then? When this quotation was read by my hon. friend from East Huron, the hon. leader of the opposition rose, but he had a different story to tell us then. He said that that criticism applied to the tariff of 1897, but that that whole tariff was changed in 1898. So, it was the tariff of 1898, to which he said his criticism must not be held to apply. I tell the hon. gentleman that we made those changes which were necessary and proper from the first draft of the tariff, and he and his organs throughout the country condemned that tariff as being as mischievous as before. And, the other night, he said that because we made the changes in 1898, we should not hold him responsible for this criticism, which applied to the tariff of 1897. But, what followed? He had the opportunity, three days ago, to vote for the essential principle of the tariff of 1898, and he hastened to put himself and his party in opposition to that principle; and, though he was not here at the time the vote was taken, he was paired, and thus his vote is recorded against it. And, so, Mr. Speaker, we have the tariff as brought down in the first draft, then the final draft of 1897, and then the tariff of 1898; and, from beginning to end, the whole was condemned by the hon. gentleman, who declared that it was going to prove disastrous to the interests of the country.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No? Then, if the tariff of 1898 was a good tariff, why did the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper), vote against the preference feature of it? It is too late for him to come and pretend—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding), has asked a question, will he not allow me to answer it?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes.

Mr. FIELDING.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not vote against the tariff of 1898; I voted against the statements made in the motion of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), that I considered were untrue. But, I will ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding), this question: Was not the tariff of 1897 the Cobden medal tariff, and is the tariff of 1898 a Cobden medal tariff?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper), would have been glad, not many years ago, to have had the Cobden medal. He poses as a great apostle of the national policy, but my memory carries me back to a time when men who were more loyal to the national policy than he was, brought into this House a resolution to sustain certain features of the original national policy; and when the hon. gentleman found he was in a difficulty over it, he voted against the national policy rather than resign his office. I do not know that the tariff of 1897, or the tariff of 1898 has any relation to the Cobden medal; but, I know that they were good tariffs for the Dominion of Canada, and that under them Canada has prospered as never before in her history.

Now, I think my hon. friend had better cease trying to explain away his criticism of the tariff. He had better be frank enough to say, for I know he feels it, that he has made a mistake—we all do make mistakes, you know. He ought to say: I was wrong in 1897 and 1898; I did not understand the matter, and I am frank enough to say that you have brought down a good tariff under which Canada has prospered, and I congratulate you upon it. That is the course he should take, though he may not want to take it. If, in the face of all I have shown him; if, in the face of the goods transferred to the free list; if, in the face of duties reduced from over 50 per cent to 25 and 26 per cent; if, in the face of 140 items in the general tariff reduced; if in the face of the 25 per cent reduction under the preferential tariff; if, in the face of all light and all reason, he insists upon saying that this is the old national policy; then, I shall borrow the remark of the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), and say that if this is the national policy, then the people of Canada will say: Better leave it in the hands of men, like the present government, who can get some good out of it, than to put it into the hands of men who, though they claim to have invented the machine, evidently never knew how to manage it.

I desire to make some reference now to a question which has frequently engaged the attention of the House. I refer to the West Indian trade. Many years ago the eastern provinces of Canada had a very large and prosperous trade with the West Indies. Unfortunately, in later years that trade did not flourish. From time to time various efforts have been made by several governments to improve those trade relations. Delegate after delegate has gone to the West Indies, but somehow or other, although every effort was made, I have no doubt, that was possible, very little good was accomplished. Two years ago, in 1898, in the hope that we might be able to improve matters somewhat, with the two-fold purpose of trying to extend our trade and at the same time, perhaps, lending, in a small degree, a friendly hand to the efforts which were being made by Her Majesty's government to improve the condition of the British West Indies, I submitted to the House a proposal to extend to those colonies the benefits of the preferential tariff. I am frank to say now that the increase of trade under that preferential tariff with the West Indies has not been so great as we had hoped for. I realize, however, that the difficulties are great. While we gave a preference on national grounds to the products of the West Indies, our neighbours to the south gave a preference to the cane sugar of the West Indies in another form. Though they have no special legislation which says that cane sugar from the West Indies should be admitted on favourable terms, they have a system of countervailing duties whereby the beet sugar of the continent is subjected to extra duties, and the effect of that is that cane sugar is much sought for in the United States market. The difference in value between cane and beet sugar, owing to the difference in duty, is very considerable; and, naturally, the West Indian planter finds that market so attractive that he sends his cane sugar to Boston or to New York; and when he is there selling his sugar, it naturally follows that he has a strong disposition to buy needed articles, which he carries back with him. We recognize the difficulties of the case. I have here the figures of the trade, imports and exports, with the West Indies for a few years past:

Aggregate Trade with the British West Indies, including British Guiana, for past six years.

	Imports.	Exports.	Total.
	$	$	$
1894.....	1,769,206	2,401,783	4,170,989
1895.....	1,413,041	2,203,447	3,616,488
1896.....	1,395,423	1,935,336	3,330,759
1897.....	1,171,743	1,716,906	2,888,649
1898.....	753,397	1,785,071	2,538,468
1899.....	954,471	1,990,865	2,945,336

While I do not for a moment pretend that these are satisfactory figures, while I recognize that we ought to have, if possible, better trade relations with the West Indies, and this government is certainly desirous of doing everything that is reasonably possible to that end, I would call attention to the considerable improvement last year. Several of the West India islands have entered into agreements with the United States whereby, in addition to the advantage which is already given to cane sugar under the system of countervailing duties, a further advantage may be granted to the products of the West Indies in exchange for advantages to be granted by the West Indies to the products of the United States. At this moment there are, as respects three of the islands, conventions pending before the United States Senate, and before the colonial legislatures, with a view to establish trade relations on that basis. If the several colonies in the West Indies should establish these arrangements with the United States, we would certainly be precluded from getting any special arrangements with them. What may be the result of these conventions, one cannot at this moment say.

There is one island in particular, however, with which we have recently had some negotiations. The island of Trinidad is one of the most prosperous islands of the West Indies. It has a population of about 300,000, one-third of whom are coolies, people from the East Indies; less than one-third are whites, and the remainder are negroes. Among all the islands of the West Indies there is not one with which we ought to be more desirous of cultivating trade relations. In addition to the market of Trinidad, the island stands in a particularly favourable situation for doing business with the neighbouring republic of Venezuela, which is connected, we may say, with Trinidad by little more than a ferry. It is only a few miles from Port au Spain to the ports of the Venezuelan republic. For all these reasons, we have been very anxious to deal with the colony of Trinidad if we could be met on fair terms. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), feeling the importance of this trade, sent out his Deputy Minister, Mr. Parmalee, one of the oldest and most experienced of our public officials, to make inquiry into the conditions of the West Indian trade. After going over these islands, and understanding the conditions of their negotiations with the United States, he came to the conclusion that the island with which we ought to attempt to negotiate was the island of Trinidad. About the same time the colonial government of Trinidad was moved to approach Canada. Although the preferential tariff with the West Indies had not accomplished very much, it had this good effect, that it made the people of the West Indies aware of the desire of the people of Canada to deal in a friendly and brotherly way with them, and there have been frequent manifestations of good-will on the part of the Island of Trinidad towards Canada since the adoption of that preferential tariff. The colonial government sent to Ottawa a short time ago two gentlemen representing the island, the Hon. R. H. McCarthy, of the Customs Department of Trinidad, and the Hon. G. T. Fenwick, member of the executive council. These gentlemen were not commissioned to make any arrangement with Canada, to make any formal offer; but they did assure us that there was a strong desire on the part of the government and people of Trinidad to establish closer trade relations with the Dominion of Canada. They did not submit any formal offer, as I say; but they led us to believe that a proposal approximating to free trade between Canada and Trinidad would be the means of leading the people of that island to turn their eyes towards Canada rather than to follow the example of their sister colonies in making special treaties with the United States. Having fully considered the matter, having regard to the position of the other islands in their relations with the United States, and to the great importance of our obtaining relations with Trinidad if it could be done, we came to the conclusion to make a proposal to the colonial government. That proposal I now wish to submit to the House. It will be this day made public in the island of Trinidad, and come before the colonial legislative council, at a session which, I believe, is to be held on Monday next. On the 27th of February, a proposal was made to the colonial government in the following terms:

In view of your recent representations, if details can be satisfactorily arranged, Dominion government agree, subject to approval of Dominion parliament, free interchange of products of Trinidad and Dominion of Canada, except spirituous liquors and tobacco. Goods to be carried direct per ships between British West Indies and Dominion of Canada. Detailed list of special articles comprising principal products of Trinidad and Dominion of Canada to be made, on which the duties against other countries remain the same as present rates in Trinidad and Dominion of Canada, or not to be made under minimum rates, to be fixed in accordance with agreement. Both governments to be free to make such commercial arrangements as may be desirable with any part of British dominions. Agreement to be for five years, and afterwards to continue until terminated after one year's notice has been given by either of parties.

We have not yet been placed in a position to know the views of the colonial government in regard to the proposal, but, this being the earliest moment at which we had an opportunity of submitting it to the House, we desire now to make its contents known. The substance of the proposal is that there should be, with a few exceptions, free trade between Trinidad and Canada, but it will be upon conditions that there shall be a preference, as in Canada over foreign countries, in favour of Trinidad, and that in Trinidad there shall be a preference in favour of Canada on the products which Canada may send to the Island of Trinidad.

Mr. FIELDING.

The scheme is one, which, I think, will commend itself to the House. I do not, at this moment, know what will be its fate. We know that our brethren to the south of us are very active in cultivating trade relations with the West India islands. We know that they have already secured treaties with some of the islands, and we know that they have already made proposals to Trinidad. I take it that our Trinidad friends, while well disposed towards us, will look upon this to some extent as a business proposal. They will compare the advantages of our scheme with the advantages which may be offered by the United States. In due time, we shall receive further information on the subject, and at the present I do not think it is desirable to say more in regard to the proposition.

Mr. FOSTER. Would the hon. gentleman know the main products that Trinidad would probably export to this country?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The chief products of Trinidad are sugar, cocoa and asphalt.

Mr. FOSTER. And coffee?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not think they do much in coffee.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, they raise coffee.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. They raise coffee, but I do not think there would be a very great export of coffee. Their great product is sugar.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the hon. gentleman submit a statement of the trade of Trinidad?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I have a full statement, and I would be very glad to give all the facts later on. The fact is that there is so much material, and the tendency of the budget speech is to grow to such an extent, that I purposely left the figures out, but I shall be glad to submit the figures of the trade and commerce of Trinidad.

Mr. SPROULE. One step towards the Cobden medal.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) has no use for the Cobden medal. The best wish that I offer him is that when the time comes that he shall pass away, the world may remember him as favourably as it remembers the name of Richard Cobden.

The only change in the general tariff which I propose to ask the attention of the House to, is in the direction of free trade, to add another item to the free list. We propose to submit to the House a resolution providing that machinery, not of a class made in Canada, imported for the manufacture of beet root sugar shall be admitted free of duty.

Mr. SPROULE. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. This is the sort of free trade that the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) does not object to. We have had before us large deputations from farmers and their representatives in the province of Ontario interested in the beet root industry. It may be remembered by many hon. members, who are familiar with the facts, more familiar than I am, that a few years ago the beet root sugar industry was established in the Eastern Townships of Quebec, and that the late government thought fit to give that industry a considerable measure of encouragement. For a few years the business was carried on, but it finally proved a failure and was abandoned. Perhaps it is because of that fact that there is an opinion among many of the most intelligent farmers in Canada, that the beet root sugar industry is not one adapted to our soil and climate. On the other hand, it is but fair to say that many other farmers, equally intelligent, think that in some parts of Ontario, owing to more favourable conditions, and also owing to the improvements that have been made in machinery, the beet root sugar industry may be worked upon a permanently profitable basis, and that is the opinion of a number of gentlemen who did me the honour of waiting upon me the other day. We had two deputations, one of which favoured a bounty and the other deputation, while having an eye to the windward for a bounty, seemed to take the view that if a bounty was necessary it would be provided by the government of Ontario, that province being particularly interested. That deputation only asked the government to aid the enterprise by granting an exemption of the duty on the machinery. I understand, that, for the establishment of a plant of sufficient capacity to engage in this business on a large scale, it would require the investment of $500,000, $300,000 of which would have to be paid for machinery to be imported from foreign countries. There is a certain class of machinery, boilers and engines, which may be made in Canada, but the greater portion would have to be imported from the United States, France, or Germany, and it is upon the machinery which will be so imported from foreign countries that we propose to grant that exemption. If the proportion is as large as it has been represented to me, the exemption of such machinery from duty will be a very important concession to them. However, that may be, we have felt it inexpedient, at this time, to deal with the question of bounty, but we willingly grant the concession which is asked in relation to the duty on machinery.

I have said that this is the only item we propose to deal with in detail. I do not propose to contend, for a moment, that the other items of the tariff are perfect. There are, no doubt, some blemishes in it. We think we have a pretty good tariff. No doubt there will be differences of opinion on this question, and there always will be in this country, or in the United States or in any other country, except England, which has a tariff that is beyond attack. There will always be room for debate on the tariff question, and while I do not claim that the tariff is perfect in all its items, I say there are strong reasons against disturbing it in its details. There are some duties that are high, higher than I would like to see them. There are some duties which, probably, are lower than they should be and an increase of a few of these duties might make the tariff more symmetrical and equitable. But, there is a view that I would like to present to those who advocate tariff changes of that kind; I would like to remind them that there are very few items in the tariff which stand alone. As I said in 1897, in introducing the tariff changes, the tariff had been and must continue to be, to a certain extent, a matter of compromise. There are different sections in our vast territories which have different interests which often come in conflict. It must be the part of wisdom and of statesmanship to try to reconcile these different views by a policy of moderation and reasonable compromise. It was upon that principle that the tariff was formed, it is on that principle that I defend it to-day. It is on that principle that any hon. gentleman who may have to deal with the tariff question in our lifetime will have to defend his tariff, whatever it may be. I have said that there are few items standing alone; almost every item bears a relation to another item, and if you propose to alter one item you may, of necessity, be obliged to change some other item. I desire to emphasize the fact that those hon. gentlemen who may be advocating changes in particular items that, in opening up any one item, you may have to disturb another item. There are items which concern one section of the Dominion, and there are items which concern another section, and if you attempt to deal with the details of the tariff you may find that your changes are wider and more far-reaching than you had expected. It may be that there are some duties which are high, higher than some would like to see them, on goods imported from the United States, but, we have a good answer to make to those who ask for changes. If in the United States there had been manifested any great desire to have better trade relations with us, I am sure there would be a very strong demand from many people in Canada for reductions in the tariff on American products. But, our American neighbours feel it to be their duty, and they feel it to be consistent with their best interests, not to encourage closer trade relations with Canada; and while they take that position, we do not think the moment is favourable for making reductions upon articles which are produced in the United States. The Joint High Commission, though it has not accomplished much, has not yet come to the end of its term. It is theoretically, at all events, still an open question, and though there may be no immediate prospects of its reassembling, it has not yet been dismissed by the only authorities who can terminate its existence. If we shall have an opportunity of opening up trade relations with the United States, I am sure this government will not fail to take advantage of it. If that opportunity does not come, then I do not think there will be as much desire as there would otherwise be for a reduction of duties on American products. In any case, Sir, whether we have closer relations with the United States or not; whether we have negotiation with them or not; I am sure that what has already happened between this government and the government of the United States in relation to that question, affords abundant guarantees to the people of Canada, that Canadian interests will be safeguarded at every point.

May I now say something in reference to the question of preferential trade, which was discussed a few days ago, but which is a matter too important to be overlooked in a budget speech. I am glad that the issue between the two parties on that question has now been defined, but I regret, and I say it with all sincerity, that hon. gentlemen opposite have not been able to take our view of the method of dealing with the mother country. It would have been a very gratifying fact if upon that question, as upon the other question of sending our brave sons to Africa, the two parties in Canada could have stood side by side and worked hand in hand. However, hon. gentlemen opposite have their own view of preferential trade, and though we may not agree with it we must at least have a clear understanding of what it is, and why it is that we are unable to agree with them. These gentlemen opposite have made one thing very clear, and that is, that they have fallen back to the old ground which they occupied years ago; that ground which declared that no concession of any kind should be made to our mother country unless the mother country would give us dollar for dollar and cent for cent. Whatever difference there may be between us, there is no difference as to that being the policy of the Conservative party, as led by my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper). Well, Canada has had experience of that policy. For years that policy was promulgated on the floor of this House and throughout the country. The desire for preferential trade was not born yesterday nor even in 1897. There was something in the thought which appealed to the heart of every Britisher, and hon. gentlemen opposite, realizing that fact, repeatedly brought the question up for discussion. Why did they never make any progress; why did their every step meet with failure? It was simply and solely because they asked that which was impossible. They found the Belgian and German treaties an insuperable difficulty. The Belgian and German treaties were peculiar in their character. They were different from what were called the favoured nation treaties. The favoured nation treaties dealt only with the relations of Great Britain to foreign countries, but the Belgian and German treaties related to the family affairs of the British Empire. They provided that no higher or other duty should be levied on the products of Belgium or of Germany in the colonies than were levied on the products of Great Britain. At every step the Conservative government took in the direction of preferential trade these treaties rose up as an insurmountable obstacle. Day after day and year after year, speeches were made and conferences were held, and resolutions were passed asking that these obstacles be removed, but they were never removed, and why? It was because hon. gentlemen opposite and all who agreed with them on that subject insisted upon asking things that were at the time, and even now are impossible. England was asked to give up her most cherished principles of her modern fiscal system. England, which after a great struggle under Bright and Cobden had made the people's food free, was asked to turn back the hands of the clock and tax the bread of the people. England was asked again and again to accept this condition, and just so long as that demand was made the great journals and the great leaders of thought in England scoffed at preferential trade of that kind. When the change of government in Canada came in 1896, the Belgian and German treaties were no nearer denunciation than they had been at any previous time. In 1896 a new government came to power in Canada and there was a change. There came into power in Canada a government which adopted another method of dealing with the mother country. There was a desire on this side of the House as well as on the other to have preferential trade; the only question was: How you could best go about it. We thought, Sir, that the true policy was to cease demanding impossible conditions from England. We thought that inasmuch as England had for generations aided Canada whenever it was necessary, that she had given us the protection of her flag, that she had done everything for us that we required, and had admitted our products free to her market; we thought it right that we should meet her in the same generous spirit and say: Inasmuch as you have done all these things for us, we will give you this preference free without any conditions, and we will take our chances of getting a further return.

The Belgian and German treaties stood in the way. Of course we knew that. The leader of the opposition has occasionally referred to them, as if these treaties were only discovered in recent years. Every hon. member who discussed the question in this House and who gave it any attention, had been told that these treaties must be swept out of the way. The question was: How could the thing be done? Just so long as hon. gentlemen opposite pursued their policy no progress was made, and we felt, Sir, that we must raise the question before the British government and before British public opinion in a new way. We felt that we had a fair ground to contend that these treaties did not or ought not to apply to Canada, inasmuch as Canada had never been consulted concerning them, and Canadian interests were not advanced by them. 'Oh,' said my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper), 'that is a preposterous theory.' Well, it was not so very preposterous after all. Authorities equally as sound as the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) have said that it was a fair contention. The London Times, the great organ of public opinion, after the report of the discussion in this House had been cabled it, made the statement that it was by no means clear that these treaties had any effect upon the rights of Canada at all. Whether that was right or wrong; whether our position was reasonable or unreasonable, we were bound to take a stand as advocates of Canada, and to advance every point which would help us to put the question before the British government and the British people. And so we framed our preferential clause in such a way that we thought we had escaped the consequences of the treaties. At all events, we thought we had a fair case to present. Well, Sir, we did not succeed in all respects. We were not very much surprised at that. I admitted in presenting the tariff to the House that there were doubts and difficulties in the way, and that these doubts and difficulties could only be settled by the Imperial government of Her Majesty, to whose decision we were prepared to submit. Although Her Majesty's government had to say to us, that inasmuch as they were bound to interpret their treaties with foreign countries in a liberal and generous spirit, they could not acknowledge our right to give them that preference;—while to that extent they differed from us, yet at the same moment they said that they took the step that denounced the Belgian and German treaties. Thus, Sir, as the result of the action of the parliament of Canada there was brought about the termination of these treaties in a few months, which hon. gentlemen opposite had vainly tried to secure for many years. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) has more than once referred to a speech made by me at a gathering in the city of Sheffield, England, in the year 1897. 'Why,' he said, 'the Minister of Finance admitted there that Canada had nothing to do with this matter; He admitted that it was the action of the colonial Premiers in England that brought about the denunciation of the German and Belgian treaties.' Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman has unconsciously paid a compliment to my modesty. The occasion was the great gathering of the Cutlers' Feast at Sheffield, and speaking at the moment not for Canada, but for all the colonies, I did not feel that it was the time to vaunt Canada or to vaunt any little part which I had taken in the movement. I must plead guilty to the charge of a little modesty in that respect, and say that I referred to the fact that the colonial Premiers had joined in the demand on the Imperial government for the denunciation of those treaties. But, there is not a man of those colonial Premiers who will not acknowledge that all they were called on to do was to register and ratify the work already done by the government and parliament of Canada. We had thus the obstacle removed which hon. gentlemen opposite had never been able to remove, and we entered upon a policy of preferential trade.

But, hon. gentlemen opposite say, what does it amount to? How much is your increase in trade? Well, it is not so bad. The figures were read before, but let me read them again. Canada has won honour and fame from that preferential treaty, and she has won dollars and cents as well. In our trade relations with the mother country, let us go back to 1893. The hon. leader of the opposition said the other day that the increase that has come recently is a part of the general expansion of trade. Well, we had an expansion of trade in the last years of the late government; but, while the general trade increased, the imports from Great Britain fell off under the national policy from $43,000,000 in 1893 to $29,000,000 in 1897. In 1898, however, they increased to $32,000,000, and in 1899 to $37,000,000. I have in my hand a statement showing the imports for consumption at the principal ports of the Dominion, of goods from Great Britain during the eight months ended 28th February, 1899 and 1900, respectively:

thing, so long as you take sentiment out of the question and bring it down to a mere matter of dollars and cents, you are not likely to make any progress. If we shall ever obtain that preference, we shall obtain it, not by any bargaining or trafficking, but as a result of that splendid Imperial movement which is to-day commanding the attention of the civilized world—a movement which, one of these days, may override the old-fashioned ideas of political economy which Englishmen entertain. We may accomplish it in that way; we are not going to accomplish it in any other way.

We have drawn the lines between hon. gentlemen opposite and ourselves on that question. They have demanded the pound of flesh. I do not state the case too strongly. They have in effect said that if they had been in power in April, 1897, they would not have granted the preference to England. They have in effect said that if they come back to power they will not grant any preference to England unless England shall give them an equal preference. There, Sir, we accept the issue. In testimony of our faith in the system we have adopted, in the belief that it is best for Canada and best for England, in the belief that, to use the words of Her Majesty's Colonial Secretary, it is the policy that is 'welding more closely the ties that unite the colonies to the motherland,' we stand by that policy, and we are prepared to go further; and when I conclude my remarks, I shall place on the Table of the House a resolution which declares that after the 1st of July next there shall be an increase in the preference to England.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman say how much?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If the House will only permit me, I will say how much. Let me finish my sentence. I was submitting to the House a resolution to declare, that from and after the 1st July next, the preference of 25 per cent which is now the preferential tariff, shall be increased to 33½ per cent. In other words, that from and after that date, for every $3 of duty imposed, upon the products of foreign countries, there shall be only $2 of duty levied on the goods coming from our motherland.

The policy of this government in tariff matters has been from the beginning a policy of moderation, a policy of prudence and of caution. There are those who said that we were under obligation to make sweeping changes, but these were not our friends. The policy of the Liberal party, as laid down in the great convention in the city of Ottawa, in 1893, was that we should initiate a policy of tariff reform which would have due regard to all existing conditions, without doing injustice to any interest. We have adopted that policy, and carried it out in the letter and the spirit. Step by step, desirable changes have been made, and in the step we now take, we are satisfied that we shall create no disturbing influence and injure no industry in Canada, but shall meet the reasonable expectations of the people of Canada for a further measure of tariff reform. I desire to point out that with an overflowing treasury, the people have the right to expect a reduction of taxation. We propose to give them a reduction, and to give it to them on lines which will create the least disturbance and encourage to a larger extent our trade with the motherland. If we take the largest classes of goods imported from England, and the highest rate of duty, say 35 per cent, and apply to that the reduction I now propose of 33½ per cent, or one-third of the total duties, the 35 per cent is brought down to 23½ per cent.

I submit that as things are to-day in Canada, that is a fair revenue tariff, and I do not think that the advocates of tariff reduction would ask us to go, on that class of articles, below the rates we have now named; and inasmuch as tariff stability is very desirable, and inasmuch as confidence in business is the secret, to a large extent, of prosperity, I want to say to all concerned, that I regard that rate of 23½ per cent as a fair and reasonable tariff, with which, I think, the country will be satisfied, and I do not anticipate a reduction on that class of articles for a reasonable time in the future.

There is a subject to which I wish to make a brief allusion, and it is one not wholly unconnected with that which I have been discussing. There are vast sums of money in England in the hands of trustees, who have to invest it in the best classes of security. Unfortunately for Canada, we have never been able to obtain the admission of our securities into that trustee list, and the consequence has been that whenever we placed a loan on the market, although trustees might have been willing to invest the vast sums in their hands in Canadian securities, they could not do so, because the English law did not allow it. The desirability of admission to the trustee list has long been recognized. For the last fifteen years, the matter has been agitated by the government of Canada. The hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), when he filled the important position of High Commissioner, gave a great deal of attention to the subject, and I know from my inquiry at the time, and from information I have since obtained, that my hon. friend laboured hard to accomplish that great boon for Canada, the admission of our securities to the trustee list. But, my hon. friend failed, as all others had. Many things, however, which were impossible for Canada a few years ago, have become possible under the better conditions that have arisen. A year ago, realizing as fully as my hon. friend did the desirability of obtaining admission to the trustee list, I went into the subject very carefully and prepared a full report upon it, urging, as no doubt, my hon. friend did, in his day, that Canada ought to have her securities recognized as among the best on the English market. Negotiations were carried on for some time through the intervention of our present High Commissioner, who has laboured hard, and has done great service to Canada in that, as in every other respect, and I have now the satisfaction of announcing that the difficulties have been overcome, and that by arrangement between Her Majesty's government and the Canadian government, legislation will be introduced in the Imperial parliament this session, when I shall have the honour of submitting a Bill to this House also, dealing with the subject, and when these two Bills, purely formal in their character, are adopted, the securities of Canada will be admitted to the trustee list from which they have hitherto been excluded. My hon. friends, the leader of the opposition, and the ex-Minister of Finance, both of whom are thoroughly familiar with this question, will realize, I am sure, the great importance of this concession, which we have obtained from Great Britain; but to those who may not be so familiar with the subject, let me say that the difference between the selling price of a security admitted to the trustee list, and one shut out from that list, is from two to three points. I do not think that the hon. leader of the opposition, or the ex-Minister of Finance will differ from me in that estimate. I think that at a later stage, we shall derive even more than that difference, because under the influence of this important step, the securities of Canada will approach very nearly the value of British consols. But, if we calculate at the moderate estimate of 2 per cent, on the loans which Canada will have to place in England in the next ten years, the saving will be not less than two and a half million dollars to the Canadian treasury.

Let me put it in another way. The gain that we shall make by this action of the British government in coming to the assistance of Canada, will be in actual cash, equal to every penny we spend for the sending of the Canadian soldiers to South Africa.

I regard this as a matter of very great consequence to the finances of Canada, and those who are acquainted with our financial affairs will fully agree with me in that opinion. Now that this important question is about to be settled, I desire again to say how much we are indebted to Lord Strathcona for the assistance he has afforded in this matter. And I should do less than justice if I did not say also that to our excellent Deputy Minister of Finance, Mr. Courtney, a large share of that credit is due.

And, now, Mr. Speaker, my task is done. It is, I trust, an agreeable statement which I have been able to present to the parliament and the people of Canada this day. It is the story of very prosperous times; of a strong financial position; of a country that has been able to pass through the recent financial stringency without the need of borrowing a dollar; of a country that has not a dollar of floating debt to-day; of a country with an overflowing treasury under a reduced customs tariff; of liberal grants for every useful public service; of great public enterprises for the present and future needs of Canada carried on with comparatively insignificant additions to the public debt; of a people occupying a vast country stretching from ocean to ocean, nearly all of whom are to-day busy, prosperous, contented and happy; of a people who bear cheerfully every obligation that comes upon them for the maintenance of their own public service, and who have found their devotion to the Throne and person of their sovereign so quickened by the inspiring events of recent years, that they give freely of their blood and of their treasure in defence of the honour of the empire in lands that are far away. May we all realize what a goodly land it is in which we dwell, and may we all remember with grateful hearts the blessings which Providence has showered upon this Dominion of Canada.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, before the House rises at six o'clock, I beg to move the adjournment of the debate. I had already spoken to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), intimating that I would much rather, if the hon. gentleman will allow it, take up the discussion on Tuesday.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. As I entered the House to-day, my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) intimated that he was not in good health, and preferred not to proceed to-day. And, of course, on that suggestion, I assent at once.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). My hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), informed me a moment ago that the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), not being in good health desired not to proceed with the discussion to-night. We are all taken by surprise, and there is nothing left for me to do but to move the adjournment of the House, which I now do.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 6 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, March 26, 1900.

PRAYERS.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

ADJOURNMENT—EDGAR CHAPPELL AND J. G. TURRIFF.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the House to a very serious matter, and I shall have to be explanatory to some extent, I will conclude with a motion. Early in the session, namely, on February 22, I asked the following question of the Minister of the Interior:

Whether Mr. Edgar Chappell is employed in the immigration service of the Department of the Interior? Where is he working? Where was he working during the Manitoba provincial elections in November and December, 1899? Was he engaged in electioneering work? Was he arrested for bribery? Did he arrive in Winnipeg with letters from Mr. J. G. Turriff, Dominion Lands Commissioner, instructing him to report to Mr. J. Obed Smith and Mr. McCreary, the Immigration Commissioner? Was he supplied with transportation by McCreary? Is he still in the employ of the Department of the Interior?

The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) replied:

Mr. Edgar Chappell is not, and never has been, in the employ of the immigration branch of the Department of the Interior. The government has no knowledge of the matters referred to in the other portions of the question.

On March 19, I asked the following question:

1. What is the position held by J. G. Turriff? 2. Was he Land Commissioner during the autumn and winter of last year? 3. Was he engaged in political work in connection with the Manitoba election? 4. Has he since his appointment been engaged in any political work? 5. Did he introduce Edgar A. Chappell to the Hon. Mr. Sifton at any time last year? 6. What was the date of the interview? 7. Was Chappell employed in any capacity? 8. If so, how much was he paid? 9. Did Chappell have an interview with Mr. James A. Smart, Deputy Minister of the Interior? 10. Did the Hon. Mr. Sifton write from Regina, giving to any of his officers any directions respecting Edgar A. Chappell.

Mr. Sutherland, the acting Minister of the Interior, replied as follows:

1. Commissioner of Dominion Lands? 2. Yes. 3. No. 4. No. 5. Yes. 6. The exact date cannot be stated, but it was in the summer of 1899. 7. No. 8. The answer to the seventh covers the eighth question. 9. No. 10. The records of the department do not show that the Hon. Mr. Sifton wrote to any of his officers respecting Edgar A. Chappell.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the answer of the Minister of the Interior and the answer of the acting Minister of the Interior are hardly consistent with the facts; but it will be observed that the acting Minister of the Interior tells us that in the summer of 1899, Mr. Turriff introduced Chappell to the Minister of the Interior; and it will be well to bear that in mind, for in September of last year this man Chappell was stationed at Wetaskiwin, in the North-west Territories, and Mr. Turriff gets into correspondence with him, the result of which is that Mr. Turriff communicates with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company telling them that this man Chappell was to be employed as immigration agent in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, and asking for a pass for him in such character. On the 6th of September, Turriff telegraphed to Chappell, asking him if he could come to Ottawa, and be here if possible before the 20th. On the 7th, he wrote him to the same effect. On the 11th, he wrote him, inclosing a pass, and this man duly arrived in Ottawa before the 20th of September, and saw Turriff. Now, the acting Minister of the Interior says that it was in the summer that Chappell saw Mr. Sifton, the Minister of the Interior; but if he saw him in the summer, and if he came down at the request of Mr. Turriff, and Mr. Sifton was there, I think, it is very unlikely that this interesting character did not have an interview with the minister. Anyway, he takes elaborate notes of the instructions given him for electioneering purposes by his leaders; and if he was so bent on taking notes of what his leaders instructed him, I think he would hardly remain a month in Ottawa without having the great advantage of seeing the Minister of the Interior. He took a room at Mrs. Macdonell's, 136 Slater Street. There he represented himself as employed in the Department of the Interior. He went daily for about a month ostensibly to the department, and was accustomed to receive letters from the department with the well-known red seal. He told the lady of the house that he was awaiting instructions to go west as an officer of the department. He had more than one—I cannot say positively how many meetings he had with Mr. Turriff—but we may, I think, conclude that when the acting minister says he had an interview with him, he had several interviews.

Towards the end of October he left for the west, armed with letters to Smith and McCreary, at Winnipeg. He saw both these worthies, and wrote to Mr. Turriff that his meeting with them had been satisfactory. He went from Winnipeg to Fleming, a place which gives on Eastern Assiniboia and on Manitoba, so that he could dart into the North-west Territories, and dart into Manitoba, and perform his Ariel work with greater facility. To him at Fleming, Mr. Turriff writes a letter. He seems to have remained at Fleming, as a good point, for some time, and when Mr. Sifton went to Manitoba and held a series of meetings, and prepared to go west, Chappell received a letter at Fleming from Smith, telling him to meet the minister at Regina. He seems to have seen the minister at Regina, and then the next important point where we come upon him is in Winnipeg, at the Hotel Vendome, when he proceeds to try and acquire a personator.

This rapid sketch of what I have to bring before the House, will show this House, that one of the main wings of the Liberal army is this cursed machine that we heard so much about at West Elgin and West Huron and Brockville. The revelations that Pritchett has made will keep this company.

Here are the original letters of Mr. Turriff :

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Who is Mr. Turriff ?

Mr. DAVIN. The land commissioner.

Department of the Interior,
Ottawa, Sept. 7, 1899.

Dear Sir,—I wired you this morning asking you if you could come down here about the 20th, and saying that I was writing inclosing transportation. It will be a day or two before I have the pass, but will forward it as soon as it comes to hand.

Your work will, I expect, be in connection with the Immigration Department out in the North-west, and I trust you will be able to come at the date mentioned, and look me up immediately on your arrival here.

Yours truly,

J. G. TURRIFF.

Edgar A. Chappell, Esq.,
Wetaskiwin, N.W.T.

The next letter is as follows :

Department of the Interior,
Ottawa, Sept. 7, 1899.

Dear Sir,—Inclosed herewith you will find Canadian Pacific Railway pass from Wetaskiwin, here and return, and I will be glad to see you as near the 20th as possible. I did not receive any reply to my telegram to you of the 6th inst.

Yours truly,

J. G. TURRIFF.

Edgar A. Chappell, Esq.,
Wetaskiwin, Alta.

Here is the third letter :

(Private.)

Department of the Interior,
Ottawa, Oct. 30, 1899.

E. A. Chappell, Esq.,
Fleming, N.W.T.

Dear Sir,—Your favour of 25th inst. to hand this morning, and I am glad to see that you had satisfactory interviews with Smith and McCreary in Winnipeg. I have not had any communication whatever with the minister since you left; therefore, am not in a position to say anything further. Your best plan would be just to take it easy until you see minister in Regina.

Yours sincerely,

J. G. TURRIFF.

I will now read the notes of his instructions. You cannot fail to note in these epistles the positive ring and style of a gentleman, with whose mode of positive assertion we are quite familiar in this House.

I would here note any instructions given me from the leaders, and gather such means as I could towards learning of my work and the best means of doing it. I would take with me any letters of introduction I could obtain from reliable persons to those whose influence was important in the parts to which I was to go. On my way west I would stop at Winnipeg and meet the Manitoba organizer, and learn what I could of his plan of organization, and his methods of keeping track of the progress of the campaign and recording the results.

On arriving in the constituency to which I was sent, I would meet, as soon as I could, local men approved by the party leaders and by the local Liberals, and go over the present political situation with them, discussing the general feeling so far as known, towards the government, the arguments heard for and against it, the local matters having influence on the situation, the lessons learned in the last election, the vote at last election and probable changes at the next, with reasons for such change, the foreign settlements and their attitude and conditions and leaders; and I would particularly learn of the probable candidates for convention nomination with regard to principles, chances of securing party nomination, and chance of election, if so nominated; but I would carefully avoid committing the government to any of them until expressly instructed.

This is the language that would be suggested by instructions from a man in high position.

Through the men active in the last campaign I would learn the particulars of their organization then, with regard to places where committees were formed and districts supervised by each; the workers and the part taken by each and their efficiency in their several parts; the choosing of the candidate and the plan followed; arrangements for preparing and revising the lists and keeping a report of these; the getting of the voters to the polls; agents and scrutineers, the working of the foreign element and naturalization where expedient.

In my work as organizer, I would follow as much as practicable the lines formerly followed, only departing from them where experience showed weakness. I would have the committees revived and reorganized, where necessary, and new ones organized in parts where increased population or former difficulties in doing thorough work showed the need of them.

I would divide the constituency into districts, preferring such as would correspond with the polling divisions and have a committee in each to look after the work in its division. These division committees I would group, as the circumstances in the constituency decided, about a few important points where large committees could be gotten. The sub-committees of these large committees would supervise, direct, encourage and generally watch over the various outer committees of their group, collect from them their reports and transmit them to the central committee situated at some convenient point. I would take special pains to secure capable men as secretaries of the various committees.

I would have each committee thoroughly acquainted with the plan of campaign, as the choosing of candidate, preparation of lists, thorough canvassing, reports of progress, polling of votes, overseeing of voting, meetings, campaign funds, naturalization, Election Acts, &c.

And then we have for the third time the reference what is spoken of as the foreign vote and which is very suggestive.

Especial attention would be given to those committees in districts having a large foreign voting element so that we obtain and keep that vote.

What light that throws on certain policies.

The lists I would have begun as soon as organization, each committee preparing that of its district by means of local men in each township. These lists should show each voter's name, residence, and should be so marked as to show whether the voter is a supporter, an opponent, unknown or a doubtful. Especial efforts should be made for the doubtfuls, and, as the canvassing progresses, the list marks should be altered to show any change. Reports of the results of the canvassing would be transmitted to the central committee and there recorded for reference and study.

As the canvassing goes on, the canvassers should ascertain the reasons given for such opposition as they meet, and these reasons and the strength of the opposite vote in the various parts of the constituency will indicate the places where meetings should be held, and the course to be followed by the speakers in the various localities, and the arguments to be used by the workers.

In connection with the convention, if one were needed, I would use every means consistent with not disuniting the party, to obtain the nomination of the candidate preferred by the government.

I should hold myself as under the direction of the party, and use all my time and ability to forward their wishes in connection with the work to be done.

As the campaign progressed, I would keep thoroughly posted as to its course, and be prepared to give aid where any portion of our organization appeared weak, either by personal presence and advice and work, or by writing as to the course to pursue, or by arranging for workers to aid the weaker parts.

Campaign literature would be procured and distributed to reliable parties for instruction and use; and, in such of the press as could be relied upon, the work could be greatly aided by writings inserted and published as need or expediency caused their use to be in our interests.

You see that connects him, not only with the immigration department, which we see from Mr. Turriff's letters, he is connected with, but it connects him with the literature department of the Department of the Interior—those letters and leaders sent out to the country newspapers throughout the west, which used to tell us week after week what a heaven-sent minister, administrator and genius, the present Minister of the Interior was. But, since the Manitoba election, they have rather harked back a little. They have been afraid:

Copies of the Election Acts for the parts worked should be printed in pamphlet form, and distributed, with general instructions regarding the preparations for knowing and having placed on the voters' lists all our supporters.

Well, he saw Smith, and he saw McCreary, and here is a letter from J. Obed Smith, barrister, solicitor, &c.:

Office, 367 Main St.,
Winnipeg, Man., 30th inst.

Looking at the post mark on the envelope, it is evident that 30th instant, means 30th October:

(Confidential.)

My dear Sir,—We finish our series of meetings in Manitoba on the 7th proximo. Mr. Sifton and party leave for the Territories on the 8th by regular train. Mr. Bulyea has the list of meetings. Communicate with him, and reach Sifton first point possible. You can see by 'Free Press' the various places we hold meetings. I came back last night, and am out again to-day. Will be back here on the 4th, and you can catch Sifton that day at Morden, Man.

I think there will be four meetings in your east and four in your west.

Yours truly,
(Sgd.) J. OBED SMITH.

Now, there is a sentence in this, which is rather interesting to us in the North-west Territories: 'Mr. Bulyea has the list of meetings.' When Mr. Bulyea became a minister in that government, which in theory is non-party, I was appealed to to use my influence to put up a Conservative candidate to run against him at Qu'Appelle—

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Base ingratitude on his part.

Mr. DAVIN. And a candidate could have been put up who would have beaten Mr. Bulyea, minister though he was, but on the ground that the government was a non-political government, I refused to interfere. Well, Sir, that candidate did not run. And, yet here is this gentleman evidently in active work, arranging meetings for Dominion ministers. And, I may say here, that I know of my own knowledge that he does all the work, while a minister of that non-political government, that an active Dominion partisan politician would do. And, that is a charge that cannot be brought against the member of the government who belongs to the Conservative party. He professes his Conservatism, of course, and speaks at public meetings, but he does not engage in any details of political work. Well, this worthy having been operating in the Manitoba elections, was arrested. I have read to you some of the papers which were found on him.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Who found them?

Mr. DAVIN. I have read to you some of the papers that were found on him. Now, I am going to read what followed on his arrest:

Canada, Province of Manitoba, Judicial District.
The information of D. M. Kelley, of the city of Winnipeg, in the province of Manitoba, Esq., taken upon oath before me, the undersigned, one of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said province of Manitoba, at the city of Winnipeg, aforesaid, this 7th day of December, in the year of Our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-nine: Who saith that one W. Chappell—

Looking at page 7 of the evidence, it will be seen that this is an error on the part of the transcriber, and should be Edgar A. Chappelle.

—on the 6th day of December, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-nine, at the city of Winnipeg, at a certain election holden for the electoral division of Centre Winnipeg, under the provisions of the Manitoba Election Act, on the 7th day of December, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-nine, did unlawfully, knowingly and corruptly give to this deponent the sum of four dollars of money to induce this deponent to vote for one D. M. McMillan, candidate for election for said electoral division at said election, contrary to the form of the statute made and provided.

(Sd.) D. M. KELLEY.

Taken and sworn before me the day and year first and at the place above mentioned.

(Sd.) BEN. ZIMMERMAN, J.P.

Dennis M. Kelley, sworn, saith:

I reside at present in St. Paul. I am a professional detective. I arrived here at noon on the 27th day of November last past. I came here with the understanding that there were frauds in elections. I was sent here by our manager to work in the interest of the Conservatives, and endeavour to protect the Conservative party from frauds.

I know the accused. I have known him for pretty near three weeks. I met accused at about nine o'clock p. m. on the 28th of November at the Hotel Vendome. I don't know what the accused was doing at the Hotel Vendome. The accused was stopping when at that hotel. He occupied room No. 5 there. I could not tell what the accused's proper name is. I was introduced to him as Mr. Chappelle; I met him again on second night at Hotel Vendome. We had a conversation, five or six of us, about the election. Nothing special said. We met again on the evening of 30th at Vendome. I believe that was the first night that I said anything to him about it. I said, 'At this coming election I'd like to make a piece of money.' The accused did not tell me what his business was. The accused made no answer to it. The accused told me he was going out into the country next day he thought.

The next time I saw him was on the evening of the 4th, when he came back from his trip. I had every reason to believe that he had been away. I did not see him. On the evening of the 4th inst., the accused and I went out walking, and he suddenly asked me if I had as much nerve as I said I had last week. I said what I said before, that I'd like to get a chance to vote. I said in reply to accused, 'You bet I have.' Then accused answered, 'Then you will have a chance, but you want to be sure you'll vote the right way. I said it was immaterial to me which way I voted provided I was paid for it. I said I would place myself in his hands if he would see me through; he said he would, and that everything was all right and he would have no fear. About this time we reached the Winnipeg Theatre. That was the gist of what was said before we got to the theatre.

Q. Was anything said about returning officer or election constables?

Objected to. Allowed.

A. Not during this conversation. After the theatre we returned to the Vendome, and after leaving the Vendome we walked together to the Leland. We had a conversation about returning officers and constables. I asked how the chances of being caught were, and the accused said it would be all right. The constables and the returning officers were all fixed. We retired as soon as we got to the Leland. We were both stopping then at the Leland. I saw accused the next day, and were around a good deal together. About five o'clock in the afternoon the accused said, 'I may want to use you election day to help to get some fellows drunk.' I said, 'All right, I am with you; show me what to do and I will do it.' He said, 'We want to get some people out of the way entirely election day.' I said, 'Drinking will never put any of the Winnipeg boys out of the way.' The accused said, 'We will fix a way to knock them out.' I replied, 'What will you do that with?' The accused said, 'I don't know whether it will be better to use straight laudanum or the capsules.' The accused then left me. I did not see him again until after dinner. I borrowed $7 from the accused that night.

Mr. DAVIN.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Did he pay it back?

Mr. DAVIN. I see this is very amusing to an hon. member from a constituency within which he had some very curious experience, not wholly removed from conduct of the kind I am now exposing.

I saw accused on the morning of the 6th inst.; he came to my room. When we first met after four or five days, I lent Mr. Chappelle $5 at the Hotel Vendome. He came to my room about eleven o'clock on the 6th inst. The accused and I started in talking about the elections. I understood I was to get $5 the first vote and $3 for each additional vote. I know I was to vote for the government side. I was to do my voting right here in the centre of the city, I believe. There was nothing said about what electoral division I was to vote in. I said I'd be guided by him. The accused said I would probably have to change my clothes several times on election day and disguise myself in various ways. I replied that I had but one suit of clothes here. He replied, 'That will be all right;' he'd fix that, that he stood in with the secret service people, and he could get anything he wanted from them.

Mr. Speaker, at the present minute there are sums, some as high as $1,000, paid out by gentlemen who were ministers at that time, and it is impossible to get any account of what they paid it out for, and one man that thus paid out money is now a senator of the Dominion of Canada, with honourable before his name.

He said he would have to change his coat, as his was a very conspicuous one, and he had a tip that the police might be looking for him. The accused was to wear my coat election day. He was to shave off his beard on election day. Up to the day before election the accused had a short full beard. The beard disappeared on election day. During our conversation, I don't know just when it came in, the accused said, 'Say, old man, can you lend me a couple of dollars?' I said, 'Sure, Bill,' and I pulled out $3 and handed it to him, and said, 'I owe you $4 now, and I will fix that with you on our first vote to-morrow. I meant that I would fix the $4 with him on the first vote. We had no further talk then with regard to election matters.

Q. Did you have a man described to you and named as one Malloy who figured in one West Elgin election?

Objected to. Allowed.

Mr. Elliott undertakes to connect this with the information herein.

A. Up to this time, no. Besides the conversation I had, which commenced at eleven a.m., I had a conversation with accused at about seven o'clock p.m. that evening. I met accused in lobby at Leland, and he said, 'Come outside a minute.' I went with him to the corner at rear of Leland Hotel, and the accused said, 'I wish you would go aside and see if you can see a fellow with a black stiff hat, smooth face, dark clothes, and wearing a blue and white striped shirt or cuffs.' I went inside, looked about, but could see no one answering that description. Mr. Chappelle and I returned, and I sat in the office, and a few minutes after I saw a fellow walking leisurely through the lobby answering this description. I nudged the accused and said, 'Is that him,' and he replied, 'Well, if it is he must not stay here,' referring to the man described above. He then got up and walked over and spoke to this man, I should judge for about ten seconds, and then returned to where I sat. I said to him, 'Is that the fellow?' And he gave me no answer. In the meantime, I had received a description of Malloy, of Ontario, and this man to whom Chappelle talked answered the description given me of Malloy, who was stopping at Clarendon, as I supposed.

Mr. Speaker, you will have heard of Malloy. Malloy was a friend of Preston.

I said to Chappelle, 'What is the matter with me following that guy and see where he goes?' He said, 'All right; I'll meet you at the corner of Portage and Main in a few minutes.' Failing to find this fellow when I went out, I went at once to Portage and Main, where I met the accused. The accused appeared worried and anxious, and I said, 'What are you scared of, Bill?' And he replied, 'I have all the reason in the world to be scared.' He left me then, that he was to see me later in the night. I don't know where he went to. I did not see him again until after his arrest. I have given all the conversation I recollect from the time we met until the evening of the 6th inst. The accused did not tell me what his business was. I was introduced to him as an immigration agent, or rather he was introduced to me as an immigration agent.

And we see how zealously he was carrying out his duties in that way.

I believed the accused's name to be Edgar A. Chappelle.

Q. Was anything said about expenses?

Objected to. Allowed.

A. On a couple of occasions the defendant said expenses cut no figure with him.

Q. What do you mean by that?

Objected to. Allowed.

A. I thought by that he could spend all the money he wanted to. I don't know what money the accused had on him the day before election. When he returned after being, as I believe, away he had a roll of bills—a handfull, I do not know the denomination of the bills.

Cross-examined:

I can't say that accused did strongly urge me to vote in this last election.

Q. Was there any effort made on you by Mr. Chappelle to induce you to vote at this election, recently held for legislative assembly?

A. None with the exception of the conversation stated before.

Q. Did Mr. Chappelle arrange for you to vote on Thursday, 7th inst., at the provincial election?

A. He said he would, whether he did or not, I don't know; I did not see him on 7th inst.

William H. Reid, sworn, saith: I am a police officer of the city of Winnipeg. I arrested accused Chappelle on morning of 8th instant, in Vendome Hotel. The handwriting on envelope shown me is partly mine and partly Constable Blair's. I took papers from accused after arresting him. A paper is produced marked Ex. No. 1. Recognize it, or one similar to it, I took from accused. The paper I got I put in an envelope. I took a paper similar to Ex. No. 2 from him. (The prosecution admit all the papers produced in envelope, Ex. No. 3 having been taken from accused on morning of 8th instant after his arrest.)

Cross-examined:

Mr. Elliott and two other men were present when I arrested accused. There were other papers found on accused. I put papers in Ex. No. 3 under direction of Sergt. McCharles. Constable Ed. Blair and Mr. G. A. Elliott were present at the time I initialled Ex. No. 3 and sealed it. It was a new envelope. The envelope was opened twice. I could not tell who opened envelope after I sealed it. I found it unsealed, and sealed it up again. I will not swear that all the papers I put in Ex. No. 3 are here now. I did not count them. There was no request made to me to look at papers in Ex. No. 3 after they were sealed. Ex. No. 3, with papers, was left in drawer in the police office. No one could get at the papers but officers.

These memoranda, I am reading now, were probably made on the train, being an account of what he spent.

That would be street car fare in Winnipeg.

Never such a chance to gain for Liberals.

Country prosperous.

Government generous.

And then comes :

Pledges kept.

Write to A. Monkman, re organization. See Turriff.

This Monkman was the registrar at Morden, who was given that position for his scandalous services in connection with the revision of the Dauphin voters' lists in 1896, and he was the revising officer for the Greenway constituency of Manitoba in the last revision when he displayed the grossest and most arbitrary partiality.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Is that all there, too ?

Mr. DAVIN. Was this man employed as an immigration agent ? If he was, the answers given by the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) and the hon. acting minister (Mr. Sutherland) cannot be squared with facts. If he was not an immigration agent, and if he was never employed as an immigration agent, what was his relation to the Department of the Interior ? We have the land commissioner introducing him to the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) in the summer, we have him writing and telegraphing to him at Wetaskiwin, we have him getting for him, from the Canadian Pacific Railway, transportation. I have not the pass here, but, it can be proved by affidavit, if necessary, that 'on account of immigration,' was written on it. We have him writing to him, and he writes to him after he leaves here. He has been here for a whole month, and at the place where he was boarding, or where he had a room, he represented himself as an immigration agent, as being employed in connection with the Department of the Interior, as waiting for instructions to go west. When he does go west, he gets letters of introduction from Mr. Turriff to Mr. McCreary, who is the head immigration agent, but who is more active as a political wire-puller at Winnipeg than as an immigration agent, and to Obed Smith, the organizer. He represents himself to Turriff as having interviewed these gentlemen and found that it was satisfactory. He then goes to Fleming, receives a letter from Obed Smith, and both Turriff and Obed Smith tell him that he is to see the hon. Minister of the Interior. One tells him to see him at Morden and another to see him at Regina. Can there be a doubt that he saw him either at Morden or at Regina ? Can there be a doubt that these papers establish a relationship between him and the Department of the Interior, or that he got instructions from the hon.

Mr. DAVIN.

Minister of the Interior ? Can there be a doubt that he was instructed to go back to Winnipeg and to work in Winnipeg on behalf of the Hon. Mr. McMillan, as we find him working ? Look at the character of this man, surreptitiously employed by the Department of the Interior, a man who is prepared to keep people from voting by using knock-out drops, a man who is prepared to introduce election fraud by the practice of personation—this is the kind of man that had established relations with the Department of the Interior and the Minister of the Interior, so that, Sir, we have the Department of the Interior, to-day, in the box, and, we are in this position, that this House of Commons has heard answers from two hon. Ministers of the Crown that it is impossible to square with facts. I will not use any stronger language than that. I beg to move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. JAMES SUTHERLAND (North Oxford). Mr. Speaker, I have listened attentively to the statement of the hon. member for Western Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) and to the papers that he has read. I have only one thing to say, and it is, that, although the hon. gentleman had, as has been reported, some stolen papers, there is no evidence here, in this House, of the genuineness of any of the letters and there is certainly none, as to whether the memoranda which he has read were written by the gentleman whose name he mentioned—I think Mr. Chappelle. There was no evidence as to who might have made this memoranda. They may have been furnished to the hon. gentleman, and it may have been reported to him that they were made by Mr. Chappelle, or somebody connected with him. The only evidence he has presented at all in regard to the matter is that given by a Yankee detective whose declarations, in his own affidavit, are that he was engaged by the Conservative party to go to Winnipeg and to work in the interest of that party. Well, Sir, I would not like to believe accusations of that kind made by such a character—and I believe men of his stamp are very common in the Western States—even if he made such accusations against the Conservative party. But, if some person representing that party did engage this man for the purpose he says he was engaged for, I suppose he had to make some report so that he might draw his pay, if he was paid. I am more than surprised that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) should waste an hour or an hour and a half of the time of the House reading such trash as we have heard to-day. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) indulged in sneers and innuendoes against prominent and respectable citizens of this country, trusted officials of the department, without daring to say one word against them directly. All I can say, Mr. Speaker, is, that if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) has any charge to make against the minister ; if he has any charge to make against any officials of the department let him do so in a proper way and he will have every opportunity to prove his charge. I can assure him that if the officials have been mixed up in anything unworthy the conduct of gentlemen occupying their position, the government will not be slow to deal with a matter of this kind as it should be dealt with.

Mr. DAVIN. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, the letters of Mr. Turiff are there signed by his own hand, written on the Department of the Interior letter paper, and therefore the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sutherland) cannot, I suppose, impugn these letters. What more could I do to give him a reason for inquiry than to give the evidence that is given here? He (Mr. Sutherland) found fault with me because I was so reticent. He says that I read out these documents and mentioned the names of respected officers of the department, and that I did not dare to bring accusations against them. Why, the accusation is in the document itself. It is rather ungrateful, that with such an opportunity for strong language and condemnation, the hon. gentleman censures me because I contented myself with reading the documents. Why, Sir, there is a corpus delicti of the gravest kind, and on the face of it the government should at once have an inquiry.

Motion (Mr. Davin) to adjourn, negatived.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. AULAY MORRISON (New Westminster). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask the First Minister when legislation restricting Chinese immigration will be brought down as promised?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Probably during this week.

BRANDON AND SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

The House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 25) respecting the Brandon and South-western Railway Company.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (East York). I have given notice of the following amendment to this Bill, which I now propose:

That on the third reading of this Bill, I will move to add the following clause:

'That the maximum rate for passenger traffic on the railways to be constructed under the authority of this Act shall not exceed 2 cents per mile.'

Here we have a railway in the North-west, built through a comparatively populous extent of territory; a railway that will be very cheaply built; and a railway that can well afford to give a passenger rate of 2 cents per mile. The experiment has been tried in the state of New York where there is, it is true, a great population, and by making the 2-cent rate apply to one railway there it was extended to every railway in that state. If we wish to do something for Manitoba; if we wish to induce people to go into that country, the time has come to afford them cheap railway transportation. I will, of course, be told that I should make this proposition to cover all railways, but when I sought to do that I was answered that I was interfering with vested rights. I now come forward to press this principle in connection with a railway that is not yet built; a railway which runs through a country presenting few engineering difficulties; a railway that can be constructed for $10,000 a mile or less; and I say that a railway of this character can easily afford to give the people cheaper transportation. I hold that cheaper railway transportation is like cheaper postage—the cheaper you make it the more the public will use it. I would like to see the experiment tried on this railroad, for I believe that the public will use the railway more, and the company will not suffer in the end. I ask this parliament to try the experiment for a year or two, and if it succeeds, then the policy will go ahead. Railway freights have been cut down time after time. There is not a railway in Canada that has not reduced its freight rates time and again, but passenger travel to-day is as dear as it was forty years ago. I have heard it said by some people: We do not want cheaper passenger travel; we want cheaper freight rates. Well, Mr. Speaker, I say that the people want cheaper passenger rates in this country, and the only way they can get it is for their representative to insist upon it, and to bring up the proposition every time a new railway Bill comes before this House. If the government want to do a popular thing in this country they will make the maximum rate 2 cents a mile. I am sorry the Minister of Railways is not here to listen to me to-day, but I can tell him that if he sets the example of giving cheaper railway rates over the Intercolonial Railway, then every other railway in the country will have to follow suit. Whether that is done or not, I intend to divide the House on this question in favour of cheaper transportation for passengers throughout the North-west. I therefore beg to move my amendment.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. J. GUNION RUTHERFORD (Macdonald). I beg to move, Mr. Chairman, on the third reading of this Bill:

That it be referred back to the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines, to strike out section 10, chapter 86, 53 Vic.

This is a clause in the original charter which gives this company power to sell or lease the lines to the Canadian Pacific Railway. I do not know that it is necessary for me to say very much in favour of this amendment. We have now a great many Canadian Pacific Railway lines in Manitoba, and while, as I have before stated in this House, I have no desire to make any political capital out of abusing the Canadian Pacific Railway, yet in Manitoba, we do not wish to become a country of one railway. We desire to have competing lines there, and the only way we can have railway competition is to prevent the Canadian Pacific Railway from obtaining the control of all the roads in that country, as they are rapidly doing. We have the Manitoba and North-western, which started as an independent organization, but which is now simply a branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway. We have the Great North-west Central in the same position, and we know in that country that if we are to have the benefits of railway competition, we must stand up against this monopolizing of railways. The charter which is being granted the Brandon and South-western is a very remarkable charter. The line runs across the country in a zig-zag way, and as an individual railway it is certainly of no use whatever. It is not a businesslike railway at all. I am satisfied that the ulterior object of building this railway is to operate it in conjunction with some other system.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Speaking for myself, I am inclined to think that if this matter had been brought to the attention of the committee when the charter was granted to this company, the amendment proposed would probably have been acceptable to a majority of that committee. The committee during the past two years have laid down the rule, which now amounts almost to a precedent, that if a railway company wishes to amalgamate with another company, it must give satisfactory reasons to the committee and the House why that amalgamation should take place; and I would advise my hon. friend who has charge of this Bill to accept the amendment. I should think there could be no injury to the railway company from doing so. All who were present in the committee will remember that it was set forth that it was not the intention to amalgamate with the Canadian Pacific Railway, or with any other railway at the present time, but that the settlers in the various districts through which the railway was to run desired to have railway accommodation, as they were too far from a railway to market their grain to advantage. For that reason, a majority of the committee gave this company the right to build roads in those sections of the country where it was represented the people desired better railway accommodation. It was represented that the company had no intention or desire to amalgamate with existing railway companies; and I think it would be quite proper, in the interest of the people of that part of the country, and in accordance with the usual trend of legislation, to accept the amendment. I would ask my hon. friend to consider it from that standpoint.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). It seems to me that there are the very strongest reasons why this amendment should not be agreed to. In the first place, we have always required a railway company desiring to amalgamate with another, to give the name of that company.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will my hon. friend allow me to make my point clear? The original Bill, if my memory serves me rightly, was for a small line or branch of seventeen miles; and when we gave the company a charter for that line, it was with the full expectation that it would become a part of the Canadian Pacific Railway. But, now they are asking for a charter for a line three or four hundred miles in length, paralleling the Canadian Pacific Railway in many instances, and representing that the interests of their line are different from those of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. SPROULE. I was going to refer to that. While the original charter was for a short railway, there was some necessity for amalgamation; and when the proposal was made to extend the railway, what grounds were submitted to the committee to show the desirability of extending it? It was said to be for the purpose of reaching the coal fields of southern Manitoba in order to secure cheaper fuel for the farmers of the country. Any one who looks at the map will see that the railway traverses three sides of a square and part of the fourth, and that in almost every direction it crosses the Canadian Pacific Railway system at right angles; and if it should succeed in distributing coal to different parts of Manitoba, it could only do so by using the lines of the Canadian Pacific Railway; so that, unless the company made amicable running arrangements with the Canadian Pacific Railway, it would be utterly impossible for it to carry out the object it had in view in securing this incorporation. In my view, the railway would be of comparatively little value unless it could amalgamate with the Canadian Pacific Railway, or secured the right to use the lines of the Canadian Pacific Railway with the greatest freedom. For these reasons, the company should be allowed the latitude to amalgamate, which the original charter gives it. If that was desirable in the original charter, the desirability for it increases tenfold by virtue of the proposal which this charter contains for the building of a railway which will cross the Canadian Pacific Railway in a dozen places almost at right angles. It must avail itself of the Canadian Pacific Railway for the distribution of fuel if it is going to be of any advantage to the section of country which this railway is supposed to supply.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). I do not think the reasons advanced by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken are cogent with regard to giving the company power to amalgamate with the Canadian Pacific Railway. I presume that the company will be able to treat with the Canadian Pacific Railway for running powers or for the exchange of traffic if it desires. I fancy that the object of the mover of the resolution is to prevent such a large railway, embracing so much mileage, from falling into the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway. We want, if possible, to keep these railways independent, in order to provide competition in that country. This road, as the committee probably knows, is to cover an extent of about four hundred miles. Then, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has a Bill on the Order paper immediately succeeding this one, for building about nine hundred miles of railway in that province; and it has another Bill, taking power, I am informed, to build nearly two hundred and fifty miles of railway in the north-western part of the province. So that, if the present company is given power to amalgamate with the Canadian Pacific Railway, the latter company will have obtained from this parliament this session power to construct some 2,000 miles of railway. The point made in the committee was that it was not desirable that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company should be given power to blanket the entire province with railways. If the Canadian Pacific Railway Company desires to build one or two branches during the coming summer, I am sure that parliament will be quite willing to grant it that power; and if later on it wishes to build other branches, this parliament will doubtless be willing to give it power to do so. But, there exists in the province of Manitoba a very strong feeling on the railway question, and the people do not want again to be subjected to a railway monopoly such as at one time almost menaced the existence of that province. They do not want to give the Canadian Pacific Railway Company power at any time to club the people. We witnessed last summer the spectacle of the Canadian Pacific Railway trying to build a branch line side by side with the Northern Pacific, its object being to block that line; but great public indignation arose, and the Canadian Pacific Railway finally desisted and left the Northern Pacific to go on with the construction of its railway. With regard to the motion moved by the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Rutherford), I am in hearty sympathy with it, but it seems rather peculiar that when I moved a motion along the same line last Wednesday night, it was defeated. This is the motion that I made:

That the company shall not amalgamate with or dispose of its interests to the Canadian Pacific Railway, nor to any other company, without first obtaining permission from the legislature of Manitoba to do so.

I offered to amend that by adding the words: 'without first obtaining permission from the Governor in council.' The committee will remember that this motion of mine was defeated. However, though sorry that my motion was defeated, if the same motion comes with any better recommendation to this House, because introduced by another hon. member, I shall give it my most hearty support, and would be very glad to second the motion, if the hon. member for Macdonald has no seconder.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE (Marquette). I am also heartily in accord with the object of the mover of this resolution. The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), said that had this question been raised in the Railway Committee, no doubt this clause in the original charter would have been expunged. If I may be permitted to refer to what took place in that committee, the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), did suggest exactly such a resolution, and his suggestion was pooh-poohed. He was rather sat upon, and seeing such unmistakable evidences of dissent on the part of the majority of the committee, he did not press his point any further. However, it appears that what was refused the hon. member for Lisgar, the chairman of the Railway Committee is quite willing to accord to the hon. member for Macdonald, and I can only congratulate the chairman of the Railway Committee on his change of view, and the hon. member for Macdonald, on the preference shown him.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does my hon. friend say that this motion was moved in the Railway Committee?

Mr. ROCHE. I did not say that a motion was made, but that a suggestion was made.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. As chairman of the committee, I have no power to put suggestions.

Mr. ROCHE. But, I noticed that the hon. gentleman did not at all acquiesce in the suggestion. I am not finding fault at all with the hon. member for Macdonald, and am pleased that his motion has been accepted by the hon. member for North Oxford, but, I cannot help pointing to the fact that a little unnecessary discrimination has been resorted to. I am quite in accord with the remarks that have fallen from the hon. member for Lisgar, regarding the necessity of safeguarding the interests of the public at the time when these companies are securing their charters. Many members from the east say they cannot understand how western members will object at all to the construction of lines of railway in Manitoba, because the more railway lines, the greater the competition. Well, speaking for myself, and I think I am expressing the sentiments of other western members, we do not at all object to the construction of lines of railway in Manitoba. The more we have the better, consistent with the requirements of the country, but we are not convinced that the mere construction of lines of railway will always insure competition, and we, therefore, think that the time to safeguard public interests, is when we are granting the charters. This line of railway was originally chartered to the extent of seventeen miles, and was given 6,400 acres per mile, or in all 108,800 acres, which at $3 per acre, are worth $326,400. They are now asking authority to extend their line, and therefore before giving them this privilege, we should see that the public are properly protected. My experience is that if you do not safeguard the interests of the people when these companies ask for charters, you cannot do it nearly so well afterwards. The Manitoba and North-western was supposed to be an independent line, and so was the Great North-western Central, but they are now in the hands of the one corporation. I am not saying a word against the corporation which has acquired control of these roads, and which is no worse and no better than any other great corporation, but it is not right that the whole country should be placed under the control of any corporation, whether the Canadian Pacific Railway, or any other.

Mr. AULAY MORRISON (New Westminster). I may state that I am quite agreeable to the suggestion of the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Rutherford), being carried out. I think that the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), was hardly fair in the reference he made to his own amendment the other day, because there is a difference between the amendment he proposed, and the one before the House. His amendment was objectionable in this respect, that it would be an expression on the part of this House in favour of introducing a clause of that kind into isolated charters. But, the present amendment, which asks that the section be eliminated from the charter, will prevent any misconstruction of that kind being put on the action of the committee. Knowing that the promoters of this Bill have no intention of amalgamating with the Canadian Pacific Railway, or any other railway—they advised me from the very first that they had no such intention—I see no objection to the motion carrying.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). I do not quite concur in the suggestion made by the hon. the acting Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sutherland). I would draw his attention to the fact that it does not appear to quite carry out the views of the Railway Committee. In that committee the suggestion was made by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), that a motion of this kind should be adopted, but that suggestion received no support whatever. The Railway Committee appeared to be unanimous against this very proposal. If that committee is of any utility at all, it is useful for the consideration of just such questions as this, and instead of having this motion sprung suddenly on the House, we should have it brought up in the committee where parties can be heard on both sides. If the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Rutherford), would allow the Bill to pass through the committee here as it has gone through the Railway Committee, and then move, on the third reading, to refer it back to the Railway Committee to consider the point now raised, it seems to me that would be a much more satisfactory way of proceeding, than to adopt this motion now. If he would allow the Bill to pass through committee here as it came from the Railway Committee, and then, on the third reading, move to refer it back to the Railway Committee to consider that question, I think it would be much better than to spring this on the House without it having received the consideration of the Railway Committee, especially so because, when the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), raised this question in the Railway Committee, he received no support.

An hon. MEMBER. That is what is proposed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If I understand that it is intended to move on the third reading to refer this back to the Railway Committee, I have not a word to say.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) is, no doubt, somewhat mistaken, as to what occurred. No doubt the matter was dropped when it came up in committee from the remark I made, in which the hon. gentleman concurred, that the company had no power to amalgamate with the Canadian Pacific Railway. This, no doubt, influenced many members of the committee. But on Friday evening, the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Rutherford) brought the original charter and called my attention to the fact that they had this power to amalgamate.

Mr. DAVID TISDALE (South Norfolk). I remember asking in the committee if all the railways they wanted mentioned were mentioned, and I think that is in the new Bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tisdale) is mistaken. We were asked to put a clause in this Bill forbidding them to amalgamate with the Canadian Pacific Railway or any other company without the consent of the legislature of Manitoba.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sutherland) will allow me—I offered to amend that so as to make it read—without the consent of the Governor in Council.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I would call the attention of the leader of the opposition to the fact that the discussion in the Railway Committee was on a proposal to forbid the company amalgamating with the Canadian Pacific Railway without the consent of the legislature of the province of Manitoba. That did meet with disfavour, but, I think, under the circumstances, it was quite proper for the hon. member to ask that in the granting of the charter at the present time they should not ask power to amalgamate. If the conditions that the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) referred to prevail, the company can come here, give the reasons, and, if this House thinks it in the public interest, can be granted the power to amalgamate. At the present time, we are told by the promoters of the Bill, both parties are willing that this clause should be struck out. The parties with whom it has been suggested they may amalgamate, I suppose, are not asking that it should be put in. So, as many members of the House and the people, in that district think, they should have something to say with regard to the matter, and, while the people are asking railway accommodation and are willing to support this company, to get what they think is a competing railway with the Canadian Pacific Railway, we might easily allow this motion to pass unanimously and reserve for ourselves the right of future action.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sutherland) strengthens very much the case against our acting without referring the Bill to the Railway Committee, when he gives us to understand that the present charter gives them power which it is proposed to take away from them. I understand that the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Rutherford) has given notice that, on the third reading, he will move to refer the Bill back to the Railway Committee. That, I think, is the sound course.

Mr. TISDALE. Another important reason is, that it is a very unusual thing not to give this power. For the last ten years anyway, this has stood as part of what we call the model Bill. There is no reason why we should not change it if it is wise to do so. But this has usually been one of the formal clauses, the only question asked by the Railway Committee is with a view to restrain a company where they asked to name a road that does not touch their own. If it is to go back to the Railway Committee, I would consent, as there seems to be a bona fide objection.

Mr. SPROULE. As to my own opinion in this matter, I wish to say, if I could be convinced that this railway would remain for any length of time independent of the Canadian Pacific Railway and be a competitor with it, I would strongly support it. But my experience of a good many years in this parliament is that you cannot accomplish that. If this were a line parallel with the Canadian Pacific, it might be different, but it runs practically on three sides of a square crossing the Canadian Pacific Railway almost at right angles at several places. It was said in the committee that the main object of this road was to distribute coal to various farming districts. If that be the case, it is important that they should have the freest and most extensive running powers over the Canadian Pacific Railway or else they should be amalgamated with the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Bill reported.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. I beg to move that this Bill be referred back to the Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines, to strike out section 10, chap. 86, 53 Vic.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I hope that referring this Bill back to the committee will not necessarily be limited to passing the motion exactly as the hon. member has made it.

Mr. TISDALE. They would be limited to this particular subject, of course. It defines what the committee will do, this is the only thing that can be done.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I did not know whether it was definite enough.

Mr. SPEAKER. As a matter of fact the resolution will cover his amendment which he proposes to submit and no other.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY AMENDMENT.

Mr. MACDONELL moved that the House resolve itself into committee on Bill (No 34), respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (East York). In connection with this motion, I desire to bring up the general question of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. SPEAKER. Do you propose bringing it up before we go into committee?

Mr. MACLEAN. Yes, the Premier is in the House, and I wish especially to call his attention and the attention of the government to this matter. Now, the legislation proposed in this Bill is of a very important character, it is practically giving the Canadian Pacific Railway power to build 1,200 miles of railway. The government have laid down the policy that for the future they intend to demand concessions from every railway obtaining powers from this parliament, and especially have they laid it down in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway. Some years ago the Canadian Pacific Railway was given very large powers and very large subsidies in connection with the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. The government laid it down then that they intended hereafter, before any new concessions, any new powers, any new franchises were given to the Canadian Pacific Railway, that some concessions should be received by the people in return. I say that the time has now come in connection with this Bill when the government ought to live up to that policy, and they ought to obtain some concession from the Canadian Pacific Railway in regard to its rates and in regard to its attitude towards the public. That time has arrived now, and no better opportunity will ever be presented to the people of Canada for obtaining a repeal of what is called the monopoly clause of the Canadian Pacific Railway as it exists to-day. In the original charter the Canadian Pacific Railway is protected in this way, that the rates of that road should not be subject to the revision of the government, or should not be subject to the revision of parliament, until such time as the profits of the company exceed 10 per cent. Now, so far as we can gather, to-day the Canadian Pacific Railway is making very large profits, and so far as we can gather, they can very well afford to give this concession to the people and to give up that monopoly clause in their contract. Only a few years ago they had another monopoly clause which was conceded to the people after a great deal of trouble and agitation had been spent over it, they had a monopoly clause which prevented competing lines running in the direction of the American boundary, and it was only after years of agitation that that clause was removed. Now that the Canadian Pacific Railway is a great success, now that it is paying its shareholders 5 per cent on a capital, a large amount of which is watered, or which was sold at 25 per cent advance on the dollar, I say the time has come when they ought to surrender any other monopoly clause they have, and come under the complete control of this government or of this parliament in regard to rates. That is the proposition I intend to submit here to-day when the House gets into committee, and that is the proposition on which I will hold the government to declare themselves to-day. They have laid it down in this House, the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) has laid it down in this House, the Premier (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has laid it down in this House, their chief organ, the Globe, has laid it down in its columns, that hereafter there are to be no more railway franchises, no more concessions to the Canadian Pacific Railway except on terms. If that is the doctrine of that party, if that is the doctrine of the government, here is an opportunity the like of which will never present itself again, to compel the Canadian Pacific Railway to relinquish that monopoly clause in consideration of getting these further extensive franchises that are included in this Bill. They are getting, as we were told to-day, power to build some 1,200 miles of railway, they are practically blocking the province of Manitoba, and they are doing it in face of the expressed wish of the people of Manitoba that in some way the Canadian Pacific Railway monopoly be now checked. There was an election the other day in the province of Manitoba, and it turned, we are told, largely on railway issues. There is a new government in that province, and if we are to believe what we read in the public prints, there will be a declaration by that government in a few days in the direction of regulating the rates of railway corporations in so far as that province is able to do it.

Mr. TISDALE. That clause does not apply to this Bill.

Mr. MACLEAN. I want to point out to the hon. gentleman who seems to be the champion of the railways of this country that there is now an opportunity to carry out the government policy, which has been that no more concessions are to be given to railways unless concessions are given to the people in return. Now, if it is a fact that the Canadian Pacific Railway is paying 5 per cent to its shareholders, if it is a fact that the people of the North-west have grievances in regard to railway charges imposed on them to-day, here is an opportunity to carry out the policy of this government, and here is an opportunity to make the Canadian Pacific Railway surrender the last of their monopoly clauses. I think that is a fair proposition. I think now is a good time to propose it, when they are asking us to give them a franchise covering 1,200 miles or 1,400 miles of railway. If that is the case, now is the time for the government to declare where they are, now is the time to tell the people whether they intend to live up to that policy which they laid down in connection with the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. It was then laid down that there were to be no more concessions to the Canadian Pacific Railway unless concessions to the public were given in return. That policy has been heralded all over this country, all their stump speakers all over this country have declared that to be the policy of this government. There is now an opportunity of carrying it out. It was the Liberal party that educated the people of this country up to the idea that the Canadian Pacific Railway was a great monopoly that had been inflicted on this country. An opportunity now presents itself to wipe away the last vestige of that monopoly, and to carry out this policy that they have laid down. I hope they will do it here to-day, and that they will take this matter into their consideration, and withhold this legislation until such times as the Canadian Pacific Railway makes terms satisfactory to the people and to the country.

Now, I want to read to the House a little paragraph that I saw in a newspaper in this city the other day, which bears out what I am contending for now. The people of Canada gave more to the Canadian Pacific Railway than they have given to any other corporation, party or individual :

The Canadian Pacific Railway is lauded to the skies as 'the great national highway,' and yet the nation does not own a dollar's worth of it, notwithstanding that it put millions into its construction. The Canadian Pacific Railway made a big profit last year, but the Canadian people did not get any of it. There was no dividend paid on Canada's investment, and there never will be. The millions are gone for ever, and we have the privilege of paying the highest rates that can be wrung from us every time we make use of the road. The stockholders of the road are not to blame. They were in the scheme for all that could be made out of it, but the men who made the bargain in Canada's behalf are responsible. In the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway's main line there was perhaps some excuse, owing to the nature of the country through which it had to pass, and the doubtful success of the road as a purely commercial enterprise; but there is now no excuse for continuing that policy.

Mr. WALLACE. Who writes that ?

Mr. MACLEAN. That is published in Ottawa. I believe that is the reflection of public opinion to-day. In the old days, when the Conservative party built the Canadian Pacific Railway, they had to give great concessions to the men who undertook the construction of the road; they had to give them large subsidies and they gave them a monopoly clause, but, the Conservative party withdrew one of these monopoly clauses in the interests of the people. The Liberal party have laid it down that the other monopoly clauses ought to be taken away, and they got some of them taken away. I believe the opportunity is here to-day to take away the last of them, and put the Canadian Pacific Railway exactly on the same footing as that of the Grand Trunk Railway to-day. My amendment, in short, is to repeal that clause, which is called the 10 per cent clause. I am told that the Canadian Pacific Railway have that by charter, that they have it by law. I do not care if they have nor does the country. Whatever monopoly the Canadian Pacific Railway has can be and ought to be surrendered, and the time to get a surrender is when they are seeking further legislation, such as that which is before this House in connection with this Bill. I hope that the right hon. leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who is in the House, in the absence of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), will take the opportunity of telling the House and the country whether he intends to live up to the policy which he laid down before this House as to what the guiding lines of his party would be, namely, that if any Canadian Pacific Railway, or any other big railway, proposition comes before the House it will only be conceded in return for such concessions as are made by them.

Mr. DAVID TISDALE (South Norfolk). Mr. Speaker, I do not think that any hon. gentleman in this House advances his cause at all by allusions, or by making statements which, if they were to be made outside of this House, would be characterized as untrue. I want to tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean), as he has seen fit to make such statements, that in the thirteen or fourteen years that I have been in this House I have not found it necessary to make a personal allusion. I want to tell him further in connection with his remark, as regards any business relations I have had with railways, that, if all reports are true, he has had a great deal more money out of their pockets than I have, because, I have never had a dollar. I have always endeavoured to promote the public interest in the course which I have taken in regard to public or private legislation, and I do not think that an hon. gentleman, by such references as these, presents an argument which carries any weight. I would rather have an hon. gentleman who adopts such a course as this speak against me than in my favour. I say that this is a poor argument. I am not here to advocate the cause of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but I am here to say that, in connection with this Bill, my sole object was that which has always prompted me in connection with private legislation, which is after the proper tribunals have pronounced upon it, to try and get it through the House. When the hon. gentleman talked of a monopoly clause, I merely called his attention to the fact that when this Bill was in the committee they took away what was considered a monopoly clause. The Canadian Pacific Railway immediately consented to it, they said, that under these changed circumstances, they were quite willing to accept this franchise in that way.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not think there is anything in it that binds them to do that. They only made the statement that they were willing to do it.

Mr. TISDALE. No, there is a clause put in. I have just read the clause which was put in there. There is no question about that. I want to say, that not only in regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway, but in regard to any other institution in the country, that if, representing a constituency, I cannot stand up in this House and say what I believe in connection with any legislation that comes before it, without sacrificing a little cheap popularity, I am willing to cease asking for a seat in this House. No one has ever accused me of being particularly friendly to the Canadian Pacific Railway. I have always endeavoured to do justice in regard to them. But, I am prepared to say that it is important that this country shall keep faith with the institutions with which we have made bargains, and to which we have pledged our faith. It is necessary that we shall keep faith with those who have invested many millions of dollars in the Canadian Pacific Railway, perhaps more than in the Grand Trunk, which is our other great railway system. I have the pride of a Canadian, and while I think it is an honourable thing to come to this House and to represent a constituency, if I am not permitted to express the opinions which I believe to be true for the fear of losing a little popularity, I will be content to stay at home. I represent a rural constituency. But, what is good for the cities and towns, for the development of trade and commerce, is good for the country, and this is a fact which our agriculturists know. They read enough to keep themselves informed by reading, and they understand this matter quite well. When we have induced capital to be invested, there is no more vicious thing, even looking at it as a matter of policy, than to run the risk of allowing it to be known in the money centres of the world that the Canadian legislature will not keep faith. There is nothing more vicious, and we should be very careful how we stop supplies by allowing any question to be raised as to our good faith. The good faith of Canada, good faith between the legislature and the people, is much more valuable than any cheap popularity that may be gained by attempts to mislead public opinion on important questions in regard to which it may sometimes be dangerous to do justice to those whose rights are in the keeping of the legislature.

Mr. MACLEAN. Mr. Speaker, just a moment in personal explanation; the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tisdale) has admitted everything I said here.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Vote, vote.

Mr. MACLEAN. I have the right to make a personal explanation.

Mr. TISDALE. As far as I am concerned, I hope the House will give him the indulgence.

Mr. MACLEAN. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Tisdale) started out by correcting me and accusing me of not knowing what was before the House. I knew that this clause was in the Bill, but I say that it does not meet the case.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has already spoken on this subject.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Mr. Speaker. I would like to say, in regard to this matter, just a few words. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean), perhaps, was not in the Railway Committee when this question was discussed?

Mr. TISDALE.

Mr. MACLEAN. Yes, I was.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. If he had been he would know more than he does in connection with the Bill. I agree with some of the things he has said. I am not in the position of being able to see into the mind of the hon. gentleman, and I cannot judge as to his motives. Perhaps, the less said about them the better, but, still, I am compelled to agree with a great deal he has said. But, there is one great difference between the facts of the case and his presentation of them. There is a great difference between the action of the government in giving aid and assistance to railways and this House simply granting charters to railways. In giving aid and assistance to railways the government is in a position to demand concessions in return, as in the case of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, and in other legislation, which has since been passed upon in regard to these railways. This is, however, a question of degree. I object to the granting of these charters all over the province of Manitoba, and to the blanketing of the province of Manitoba by the Canadian Pacific Railway for reasons which I have, time and again stated before the House and elsewhere. I may say that if the hon. gentleman had been present in the committee he would remember that Judge Clark, the representative of the Canadian Pacific Railway, expressly refused to entertain, even for a moment, the proposition that they should accept the relaxation of the 10 per cent clause on the branches, of which these lines are extensions, even as far as Winnipeg. Some hon. members on both sides of the House may be of opinion that the sop given by the Canadian Pacific Railway in relaxing the 10 per cent clause on these branches, may be of considerable value. Well, I do not look upon it as being of any very great value, and I agree with hon. gentlemen that before granting these charters to the Canadian Pacific Railway, something ought to be done to make them extend the relaxation of the 10 per cent clause at least as far as the city of Winnipeg, because all these lines communicate through the original branches and main line with Winnipeg. I do not know whether it is possible to do that or not, but if it is possible it ought to be done. So far as that portion of the remarks of the hon. gentleman are concerned, I am heartily in sympathy with him.

Mr. A. W. PUTTEE (Winnipeg). This is simply a matter of making a bargain, and I fail to see that it is at all a breach of faith on our part. When the solicitor of the railway company agreed before the Railway Committee to forego the 10 per cent clause on these branch lines the question was put to him as to what was the value of that concession, and he told us, that the company certainly was not giving something for nothing. Well, we are now giving something here, and are we going to give it for nothing, or, without some valuable consideration in return for it? Now is the time—in this charter and in the other charters that the companies will be asking for—to insist that some arrangement will be made whereby that 10 per cent clause will be abolished. Before we give these charters is the proper time to consider the matter, and we should take care that something of that kind be done now.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). I feel that I would be derelict in my duty if I did not support the views of my fellow-members from the North-west on this matter. If we can induce, or if the government can induce, the Canadian Pacific Railway to surrender the 10 per cent clause, it will be a matter of extreme importance to us. It must be evident to every intelligent man who has given any study at all to the railway question, that until that clause is surrendered, it will always be impossible to exercise any effective control over the Canadian Pacific Railway. And, Sir, unless we do exercise control over the Canadian Pacific Railway, it would appear to me that there is not very much object in our exercising control over the other railways of Canada, because the Canadian Pacific Railway is by long odds the largest railway system within the bounds of Canada. Last year I introduced a resolution calling upon the government to appoint a commission to ascertain the exact cost of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The 10 per cent clause reads: That until they have earned 10 per cent on the money actually expended on the railway, the Governor in council will be unable to exercise any control over the Canadian Pacific rates. I pointed out then, and I shall briefly recall the facts here, that the people of Canada gave them $25,000,000 in cash, as well as $35,000,000 worth of completed road. We built for them the Yale section, the Thunder Bay section and the Callender section, the most expensive sections on the entire system. In addition to that, we gave them 25,000,000 acres of land, and if hon. gentlemen will refer to the report of the Canadian Pacific Railway, they will discover that these lands have been selling on an average at from $3 to $4 an acre. If you place the amount at $3 an acre, you will find that we have given them lands to the value of $75,000,000. Now, $75,000,000, plus $35,000,000, plus $25,000,000, will give you $135,000,000 that the people of Canada have invested in that road. The proposition I made last year, and which I wish to emphasize now, was, that it was not fair that we should allow the Canadian Pacific Railway to earn 10 per cent on the money, or money's worth, that the people of Canada gave them. In all conscience it ought to be a fair proposition, that if they earn 10 per cent on the money they invested themselves, that ought to be sufficient, and when they have done that, we ought to be able to control the rates. I appealed to the House last year, and I appeal to the House now, that what the government ought to do is to appoint a commission to make a thorough inquiry, in order to ascertain the amount of money which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company themselves put into this road. I am perfectly satisfied that if that investigation were made, we would discover that they are already earning 10 per cent, and probably 15 or 20 per cent on the amount of money which they have put into this road. Notwithstanding the fact that we gave this enormous amount of money to this company, it will be found by reference to the debates at the time, that their own estimate of the cost of constructing that railway was $81,500,000 and adding $10,000,000 for equipment, it gives $91,500,000 as the cost of the road. You will see that if ordinary prudence had been exercised, the company would have had the entire road and $40,000,000 in addition presented by the people of Canada. I have stated on practically every platform on which I spoke in Manitoba, and I am free to say it here now, that a greater outrage was never perpetrated on a long-suffering community than that Canadian Pacific Railway contract. I believe that the time has come—and if it has not come now, it will very shortly—when the people of Canada will see the real iniquity of this transaction; when they will insist upon the government investigating the actual cost of that railway, and insist, too, on having that 10 per cent clause modified or wiped off the statute-book altogether. I believe, Sir, that there is no honest man who studies the question but who will conclude that the company is already earning 15, yes and 20 per cent on the money they actually invested themselves. In that view of the case, I support the proposition the hon. gentleman has made. Some hon. members take the view—and I can see the reasonableness of it—that inasmuch as we are not giving this company any land grant or any bonus, we ought not to insist upon any quid pro quo. But, Sir, I believe that the time has been reached in Canada when a franchise is in itself a very valuable consideration. Those who remember the history of the street railway franchise in Toronto know how very valuable in itself a public franchise may be. In a short time these railway franchises will also be indeed very valuable. It is very important to a railway company to receive from this parliament the privilege of building thousands of miles of railway in every direction they desire in that province, and in giving such a franchise it is my opinion that we ought to insist upon some value in return. It is not at all too much of a quid pro quo to ask that that 10 per cent clause be abrogated. I believe that public opinion is crystallizing so rapidly in this direction that the people will themselves soon insist upon an investigation into this matter, and insist, too, on having that 10 per cent clause wiped off the statute-book.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). When the original charter was passed in the Railway Committee I objected to this clause, and I objected for reasons which are, I hold, even stronger to-day than they were then. I objected in the first place because it was not clear upon what capital that 10 per cent was to apply. I failed in the attempt to have the capital defined, and indeed I believe it was not intended to make it clear. My contention in the first place, was that so far as our experience goes, railways never earn 10 per cent upon the actual cost of the road, and in the second place, that it was not specified on what capital, in making the calculation, that 10 per cent would apply. I contended that we had no right to allow them to earn 10 per cent upon the money contributed by the people of the country. I therefore wished to have it made clear how the calculation of capital would be made, and I opposed the 10 per cent clause at that time, because this was not made clear. It was stated by the Hon. J. J. C. Abbott, who had charge of the Bill, (and I think he was supported by the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald) that this clause was put in for the purpose of inducing foreign capitalists to invest, for at that time it was very difficult to get moneyed men to take stock in the undertaking. Anyway whatever the object was, the clause was inserted and it became law. Whether or not the foreign capitalists who put their money into this railway had in view larger earnings by virtue of this clause, at least it was there, and I have no doubt they considered it; and I think it would be arbitrary to take power to repeal that clause without the Canadian Pacific Railway Company being a consenting party to it. I think it would be equivalent to a confiscation of property, and for that reason I could not support the proposition. We should never allow the company to earn 10 per cent on the capital which the country put into the railway, because the country put that money in for the purpose of providing for the people of the country through which the railway runs conveniences which they never could have obtained without a government subsidy to a considerable amount. I hold now, as I have always held, that it is a great injustice to the people that the railway should be paid by earning 10 per cent on the money put in by the people; but seeing that the matter was not defined at that time, I think the government should take steps to have it defined, even at this late date, by a conference with the company or by submitting a case to the Supreme Court. If the provision applied only to the money which the company itself put into the railway, I have no doubt it is to-day earning more than 10 per cent; but as this amendment proposes to deal with the matter without the consent of the company, I think it would be confiscation and a breach of faith with the people who put their money into the railway, and for that reason I would not support it.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, the question raised by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) is one that is of course of great importance, especially to the North-west, and here we are without the Minister of Railways and without the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister was here when the hon. member for East York first spoke, for the hon. gentleman appealed to him, but the appeal was in vain, for I noticed that the right hon. gentleman paid no attention to it whatever, but apparently carried on a pleasant conversation with two of his supporters, and now he has disappeared from the House. I say that in a matter of such great interest to the people of the North-west Territories, that is a scandalous thing. On July 8, 1895, I myself brought forward a proposition in this House—I believe it was the first time any proposition of the kind was brought forward—to the effect that whenever any privileges were given to any railway company, especially to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, arrangements should be made providing for the lowering of freight rates on produce going out of the country and on goods going in. That is the gist of a somewhat long resolution. Well, when we have a Bill like the present, giving bonding privileges of great value to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, we have a government whose head promised us in 1894, when he was in the North-west Territories and speaking at Moosejaw, that if he got into power he would lower freight rates; and we have had legislation year after year, and no attempt to lower freight rates or to carry out that promise. I would rather see the movement take the form of getting freight rates lowered than doing anything with regard to the 10 per cent, but I am prepared to support any just procedure in that direction. When we had this matter before the Railway Committee the other day, the Minister of Railways told us of a great railway in the United States that had a clause in its charter somewhat like that which the hon. gentleman would desire, affecting freight rates after the earnings came up to a certain point, and the minister said that the railway company never allowed the earnings to come up to that point. If you look at the history of the Canadian Pacific Railway, you will find that in 1886 the Canadian Pacific Railway charged an average of 30 per cent to haul our stuff out of the North-west Territories, but in 1887 I was elected. Then we had a conference here in 1887, which was attended by Mr., now Sir William Van Horne, together with all the members from the North-west, British Columbia and Manitoba, and the rate was lowered to 24 cents; and then the idea was impressed on our minds—I do not say that it was laid down by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company—that at recurring intervals of three years there should be a reduction. You will find that three years after that there was a reduction of 2 cents in the hundred; that three years passed by again, and there was another reduction of 3 cents in the hundred; and at the time the late government went out of power, if they had not gone out of power, we would have had another reduction of 3 cents in the hundred. But, what happened? The late government went out of power, and this government came in; and this government made a bargain with the Canadian Pacific Railway called the Crow's Nest Pass deal, by which they actually postponed the triennial reduction for several years, and made it gradual and graduated, so that for two years after it should have been reduced by 3 cents, the company charged 19 cents, and it was only last year that the reduction of the second $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents per hundred came into operation, completing the 3 cents, begun by $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents in 1898, and for doing this they got \$6,000 a mile more than the Conservative government were prepared to pay. Now, Sir, I think we in the North-west have reason to complain, when an opportunity like this occurs, that the Minister of Railways and the Prime Minister, who held out to us the promise I have mentioned, are not only silent, but are absent from this House, and we cannot get the relief we are entitled to.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 3,

Mr. MACLEAN. I wish to draw attention to the fact, now that we are dealing with branch lines in Manitoba, that the people of that province are in rebellion against the Canadian Pacific Railway, and desire to deal themselves, in their own provincial legislature, with these branch lines. If we would allow this matter to be dealt with by the people of Manitoba, they would not allow the Canadian Pacific Railway to blanket the whole country with branch lines, without giving the people concessions in return. It has been said that a commission could be appointed to ascertain the cost of building the Canadian Pacific Railway, but so far, we have not been able to have one appointed. An hon. gentleman behind me said that he raised this question in 1895. Well, I raised it before that. Year by year the attempt has been made to devise some means of ascertaining the cost of building the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the amount on which the 10 per cent could be earned, but without success. It would be well for this House to allow this Bill to stand until we hear from Manitoba. The people of that province are prepared to give a franchise to these branch lines, but only on terms. The hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale), undertook to rebuke me to-day. Well, I am quite well prepared to take care of myself when that hon. gentleman, or the acting Minister of Railways suggests that I am simply seeking cheap popularity. If the attempt to do something in the interests of the people is to seek popularity, then I must plead guilty to the soft impeachment, but I am simply doing my duty, for I was sent here to look after the interests of the people, and particularly to try and get some kind of railway reform. It is not petty constitutional questions which lawyers are fond of discussing, that the people are interested in, but something that affects their pockets, and there is nothing that touches their pockets more than this railway question.

I again call the attention of the right hon. First Minister to the fact that he has twice pledged himself and the government, that no more important railway concessions will be given the Canadian Pacific Railway, or any other railway, except on terms. He has boasted of the large concessions he obtained from the Canadian Pacific Railway in the construction of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, but here is an opportunity by which he can gain the most important concession ever obtained in the interests of the people. I am not here to weep over vested interests. I have seen weeping tommies in the committee and in this House, and the public can judge pretty correctly what all their weeping amounts to. There is no occasion to weep for the men who have put their money into the Canadian Pacific Railway, for they are getting a very good return, and their interests are not in the slightest jeopardy. The Canadian Pacific Railway is the greatest railway proposition in the world to-day, and there is no fear of its going to grief. It has a most valuable franchise, and now is the time, when it is in the height of its prosperity, to bring it to terms and put it where the Grand Trunk Railway is to-day. No other railway has the monopoly clause enjoyed by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and yet that railway has been built by the people. It has had cash bonuses and land bonuses by the million, it has been given everything it asked for, and now, when it is asking for something more, is the time to demand a surrender of that monopoly clause, and have the company put in exactly the same position as every other railway in this country. I warn the hon. members of this House to beware how we interfere with the province of Manitoba in dealing with this question. That province, I believe, will announce to the people in a few days, that it is prepared to deal with this question, and give these franchises, and I think we would be doing well to leave this matter to be dealt with by the people of Manitoba.

Mr. JOHN ALEX. MACDONELL (Selkirk). I desire to repudiate the statement of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), that the people of Manitoba are in rebellion against the Canadian Pacific Railway. That statement is absolutely unfounded. There is a small section of that province in rebellion against the Canadian Pacific Railway, the section that is served by the Northern Pacific. In my section the people are anxious to have the Canadian Pacific Railway build this branch, of which the terminus will be in our district. What evidence have we before this House that the people of Manitoba are in rebellion against the Canadian Pacific Railway? None except the bare statement of two hon. members—one representing a constituency in the North-west, and another a constituency in the province of Ontario.

Mr. MACLEAN. What did the election turn on—Sifton, and not the railway?

Mr. MACDONELL. It did not turn on the railway question. We have in Canada a national policy of trade; and if that policy is to be successful in the future, we must also have a national policy in railways. The Canadian Pacific Railway was built in order to bind the provinces together, and also for the benefit of the common interests of trade in Canada. We find about the middle of this Dominion, the province of Manitoba. West and east of it are immense areas. Is the parliament of Canada to forego its control of railways in the interest of Manitoba in order that that province may erect a barrier against the trade of Canada and facilitate the transfer of that trade to American channels? Practically that is what would be accomplished, if the plea of the hon. gentleman for the transfer to Manitoba, of the rights of Canada, in the matter of regulating and controlling railways, were granted.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I wish to say just a word in reply to the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. I do not think he intended to convey that I made the statement that the people of Manitoba and the North-west are in open rebellion to the Canadian Pacific Railway. I am sure he would not intentionally misrepresent me. I did not say that, and I do not think that.

Mr. COWAN. You are not from the North-west.

Mr. MACDONELL. I referred to the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson). The hon. gentleman has given the impression to parliament and the country that the people in the North-west are strongly prejudiced against the Canadian Pacific Railway. I cannot gather anything else from his remarks. He is a persistent opponent of that company in the country and has never lost an opportunity to do what he could to injure them, and has given the House to believe that in this attitude he represented the people of the North-west. He may represent the views of a section of the people, but I am satisfied that I am right in saying that it is a small section.

Mr. MACDONELL.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am glad that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonell) has had an opportunity to state frankly exactly what he thinks, and glad that it gives me an opportunity of making an explanation which I think is due to the House and to myself. If I have appeared to this House as a bitter opponent of the Canadian Pacific Railway, if I have appeared to wish to injure the Canadian Pacific Railway, I desire publicly to make a most humble apology to that company and to state absolutely that I occupy no such position and desire to occupy no such position. I am here to proclaim, in the face of the parliament of Canada, and in the face of the people of Canada, that I have the very greatest admiration for the Canadian Pacific Railway and for the efficient manner in which it is managed. I am here to say that I believe there are no set of men in the Dominion of Canada who, had they been placed in the same advantageous position as were the members of the original syndicate, would not have acted in practically the same manner as they did. I have no desire to assail the Canadian Pacific Railway in any particular. But I take the position, which my hon. friend (Mr. Macdonell), apparently, does not understand that the parliament of Canada constituted as it is should lose no opportunity to protect the interests of the people of Canada; and inasmuch as the Canadian Pacific Railway is one of the greatest institutions on this continent, inasmuch as they largely control the railway situation in this country, it becomes the duty, I think, of every man who assumes to represent the interest of the people of Canada not to be afraid of that company, but to be willing to stand up and fight even the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, if necessary. Now, it is quite true, as the hon. member (Mr. Macdonell) has said, that I have taken a prominent part in legislation in which this company is affected. And why have I done so? Because the Canadian Pacific Railway, as the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Rutherford), has pointed out, practically controls the situation in the province of Manitoba. It has, as hon. members know, its own vast system of roads there already; it controls the Manitoba North-western, the Great North-western Central, and it is asking, as I stated a little while ago, for permission, if it acquires the Brandon South-western charter, to construct over 2,000 miles of road in Manitoba. I wish to say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the members of this House, that this is a very important matter to the people of Manitoba. If this parliament is going to give the Canadian Pacific Railway Company unlimited power to build roads in all directions, I think the people of Manitoba ought to have something to say about it. If we are going to give this company a blanket charter which will enable them to run anywhere in townships 1, 2 and 3, that is any point within a distance of 18 miles, the people of Manitoba might as well say good-bye to competition. The company will be in a position practically to dictate terms to the people of Manitoba. I really think my hon. friend (Mr. Macdonell) would reasonably agree with me that the people of Manitoba are very much in earnest about the railway situation. They do not want the independent railway companies driven out of the business altogether; and I feel that if any company is given unlimited power to build what is asked here, the little independent roads will be crushed out altogether and Manitoba will be in the grip of a greater monopoly than ever in the past. If, as I have said, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company merely desire to construct one or two branch lines, I would be delighted to support them. But they ask, in the Bill now before the committee, power to build some 900 miles of railway. As I have pointed out several times in this House, the people of Manitoba have been thoroughly aroused in the railway question. I believe that the late provincial government was defeated largely because of its position on the railway question and that the new government has come in under a policy by which, if the railways cannot be run under proper conditions otherwise, the government shall build them and own the roadway. If that represents what the people of Manitoba think, surely, this parliament does not wish to put upon that province conditions abhorrent to the people. There would certainly be an outcry if that were done. The members from the west are practically unanimous—though there may be one or two who dissent—that the will of the people should prevail and that these blanket charters should not be given. We rise in the Railway Committee, member after member from the North-west and appeal to this parliament to listen to our cry. Surely, if we are going to have representative government, the people who represent a given portion of the country should be listened to. But we are outvoted by members from the other provinces, who know nothing of the conditions and, I am sorry to say, many of whom do not seem to care a great deal about what happens to us in the North-west. If government is going to be conducted on popular principles, if we are to have representative government, surely parliament should listen to what members from the west say when they ask that Manitoba should have an opportunity to say what lines shall be constructed in their province. If the Canadian Pacific Railway desires these lines, let them come to the legislature of Manitoba and ask a charter to build them. Then, if the people of Manitoba, as represented by members of the legislature, grant that charter, we have nothing whatever to say. This charter, I wish to point out to the House, pertains only to the territory in the province of Manitoba. Why should not Manitoba be listened to in this matter? I do not desire to assume the role of a prophet, but it is my belief, though I may be wrong, that there will be an outcry of the people of Manitoba against this sort of thing. I think it interferes with provincial autonomy—

Mr. MACDONELL. Rot.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonell) says 'rot.' If we force upon the people of Manitoba these charters and they do not desire them, surely it is interfering with the people of Manitoba. I wish to say, while I am on my feet, that I have been glancing over the Bill, and I ask leave to read two or three little clauses that show how indefinite it is. For instance, it says:

From a point on the Deloraine extension of the Souris branch of the company's railway at or near Deloraine; thence south-westerly to a point in township 1 or 2, and thence westerly for a distance of 100 miles.

That may be a point anywhere within 12 miles. I do not think that this parliament should grant a charter like that. Why can they not lay down where they wish to build a road in order that we may understand what we are doing?

Mr. MONTAGUE. That was all threshed out in the committee. It was shown that the lines were laid out as definitely as possible.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Even if it was threshed out, there would be no harm in spending a little time in threshing it out again.

From a point at or near Napinka on the company's Souris branch; thence westerly to a junction with the north-west extension of the Souris branch.

It may run in a westerly direction, or it may deviate and make long detours. We do not know exactly what they want to do.

From a point on the Manitoba South-western Colonization Railway between Manitou and Pilot Mound, thence in a general southerly direction to a point at or near the international boundary;

From a point at or near Osborne, on the company's Pembina Mountain branch, thence westerly and south-westerly to some point on the line of the Manitoba South-western Colonization Railway, between Cartwright and Boissevain;

From a point at or near Otterburne on the company's Emerson branch, thence south-easterly to a point in township 1, 2 or 3; thence in a general easterly direction to the Lake of the Woods.

Now, before I sit down I wish to say that we had a discussion the other day when the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Roche) asked that these Bills be held over in order to give the people of Manitoba, through their legislature, an opportunity of pronouncing whether they desired these Bills or not. The legislature meets within three days, and the hon. gentleman assured us that a resolution would be immediately submitted to the local house, and I believe, as I said then, that we will have a unanimous pronouncement from both sides of the House regarding this question; therefore, I would urge that this Bill be delayed in order that we may hear what the people of Manitoba have to say.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). I wish to say a few words in regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson). I agree with him in the main in his views of the unwisdom of granting power to build a number of branch lines as contained in this Bill. That was discussed in the committee, and I thought it unwise to grant this power for two reasons. In the first place, it appeared that this was done for the purpose of preventing other companies from occupying the same ground, so that if other companies proposed to build a railway in the same locality the Canadian Pacific Railway Company could set up a claim that they had previous rights by virtue of holding a charter to build over the same ground. In the next place, it occurred to me in looking at the map that it was intended practically to cripple the only independent line there appears to be in that country to-day, that is the Northern Pacific. I found that one branch of this railway was paralleling the Northern Pacific, and that it was not in any place more than four or five miles away from that road for a distance of sixty miles. Now, I never could see the wisdom of parliament granting a right to any corporation to parallel the road of another, particularly so near as these two lines. It could not be in the interest of the locality unless you hoped to keep these roads independent so as to have competition. But on the other hand, as has frequently been said in this House, where two roads are allowed to occupy the same locality so close to each other it is impossible for either of them to earn sufficient money to pay a fair interest on the capital invested. For that reason I did believe that this charter was intended to choke off the Northern Pacific Railway in at least one section of that country. I still believe it was unwise to give that charter, but the committee decided to do so. In doing so, I think we should have made a discrimination between the extensions which that road proposed to build inside the next two or three years, and the extensions which they did not propose to build until later on, and it was well enough to give them the right to build these extensions which they intended building in the near future, and to allow them to come back to parliament when they were ready to go on with the others. I think perhaps it was largely intended by that company to occupy the whole country to the exclusion of every other company that contemplated building roads through that country. If that be the case, the country will practically be left in the hands of one corporation. I say that provided they go on and build these extensions as contemplated by this Bill, it will practically choke off any extension of the Northern Pacific in that country. The result will be that the Northern Pacific will be practically squeezed out of the country, if they are not frozen out or bought out at a great sacrifice. For that reason I think the committee was not wise in passing the Bill. But we now have it before the House, and it is for us to say what disposition we shall make of it. I agree with the member for Lisgar that it would be well to hold it back for a short time to ascertain what policy will be laid down by the present government of Manitoba, who have called the legislature together and who have promised to lay their policy before the people at the earliest day. It is desirable that we should not be found in conflict with the aims of the provincial government in so far as we can favour them without abnegating the rights of this parliament. There may be cases where, if we knew their policy, we could work in consonance with them without doing any injustice either to the Canadian Pacific Railway or to any other interest in that country, and in that case it would be wise that we should have the policy of the local government before us as early as possible. I do not wish to be understood to say that we should in any way abandon our rights or our principles here, or put ourselves in subordination to the wishes of that government; not by any means. We have our own duties to perform, our own rights and functions to maintain, and I think we should carry them out to the fullest extent. But we might be able to do that, and at the same time to further the aim of the government of Manitoba, and thereby help to better the condition of the people of that province.

Mr. MACLEAN. I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

It being six o'clock, the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Before this clause is carried, I would like to say a few words in regard to this matter. I think that, before these valuable franchises are granted to the Canadian Pacific Railway, which has already received every possible consideration at the hands of the people of the Dominion of Canada, it would be well to carefully look the situation over and see whether something cannot be obtained in return therefor. I do not adopt the same view as the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), or the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Roche) or the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), in claiming, for one moment, that this parliament should delegate any of its rights, or privileges, in regard to the chartering of railways, to the provincial legislatures, and I do not think that this House is in any way bound to await the pleasure, or decision, of the provincial governments in regard to these matters. I think, however, that this House, being paramount in the affairs of the Dominion, should insist upon some concessions being granted to the people in return for these privileges. Once they are given they cannot be taken away, and now is the time to deal with this matter. We have the case of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, which has been cited here this afternoon more than once, and which is in degree a similar case. The hon. member for East York, in suggesting that the Canadian Pacific Railway should, in return for these charters, agree to abandon altogether the 10 per cent clause, has not got his usual sense of the true proportion of things. When we obtained, from the Canadian Pacific Railway, the abrogation of that clause in so far as it affected the rates from any point on the railway west of Dunmore and south of the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway to any point on the Canadian Pacific Railway system, and from any point on the Canadian Pacific Railway system to any point west of Dunmore and south of the main line, we gave in return therefor a very valuable bonus. We gave $11,000 a mile, and it was only right, when giving that much money, that we should expect to have that valuable concession in return. When the hon. gentleman suggested that the Canadian Pacific Railway should give us in return for these charters, the abrogation of the 10 per cent clause over the whole system, he was, perhaps, asking too much. I do not propose to go as far as he does, but, in regard to these branches, charters for which are being asked for now, there is, I understand, an arrangement now arrived at whereby the Canadian Pacific Railway consents to abrogate the 10 per cent clause on the new portions of the road. It is all very well as far as it goes, and it certainly is a step in the right direction, but it does not go far enough. In the committee, the other day, I asked Judge Clark to tell us what that concession amounted to, and he declined. When I asked him what I am going to suggest to the House, now, namely, that the concession should apply, not only to the new portions of these branches, not only to the new extensions for which they are asking charters, but, that they should extend to the branches and to portions of the main line between the new extensions and the city of Winnipeg, so as to give the Governor in Council, not the lieutenant-governor, or the provincial government, control of rates, the same as in the case of other railways, from Winnipeg to and along the various branches for which charters are now being asked, Judge Clark said: No, we certainly will not do that; we will not give you something for nothing.

Mr. MACLEAN. Hear, hear.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. If these charters, for which they are asking, are worth nothing to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and if the people of Manitoba are not dying to get them, I do not know that it is the duty of this House to be so very ready to surrender these valuable franchises which have such a low value placed upon them by the Canadian Pacific Railway, as expressed through their counsel. They say that they are not prepared to give anything for them. I do not know that there is very much hope in this House, at the present time, of having this carried, but I call the attention of the government to the fact that it is only a matter of degree, and if we were able to obtain from the Canadian Pacific Railway, in connection with the construction of the Crow's Nest Pass road, valuable privileges, I think it would be only fair to take a proportionate view of matters and to ask a return such as I have suggested. I, therefore, beg to give notice, that I will, on the third reading of this Bill, move that it be referred back to the Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraphs Lines, to take this matter into consideration.

Mr. MACLEAN. Mr. Chairman, again I wish to point out to the House, what has been said on the other side, that I do not appear here as antagonistic to the Canadian Pacific Railway. I appear here rather in the interest of the people of this country in the endeavour to secure some practical concession for them when this question is up. I agree with what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Rutherford) has said, that when you are giving something, then is the time to get something back. This is what we have been told is the policy of the Liberal party. It has been said, this afternoon, that Manitoba has no grievance, that it recognizes, in the Canadian Pacific Railway, its very best friend. I say that the events that have taken place in the province of Manitoba show that the people have substantial railway grievances, and that they wish to have them remedied. I wish to point out that when the Liberal party were in opposition in this House, when parliament granted the Canadian Pacific Railway charter, the whole country rang with the charges of the monopoly that was inflicted upon the people of the North-west Territories. They declared that the people of the North-west Territories were bled white by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and they made out their case so well that the government of Sir John Macdonald was compelled to negotiate with the Canadian Pacific Railway for the abrogation of the monopoly clause, so far as competing roads running into the United States was concerned. But, they also spoke of other grievances. Time after time they declared that other railway grievances existed, and they charged this all over Canada. These grievances continue to this day, and now is the time to remedy them. The people of Manitoba declared, in the recent elections, that there were these grievances, and that they wanted them removed. Since I spoke this afternoon I have been looking at the speeches of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) when he introduced the Crow's Nest Pass Railway proposition, and his whole defence of the proposition was, that while we are giving the Canadian Pacific Railway something now we are getting many substantial advantages in return. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) also spoke on the same lines, and the right hon. First Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), when he toured the province of Ontario, only last fall, made a series of speeches, in every one of which he claimed that great credit was due to his government and to the Liberal party because of the advantages and benefits they had conferred on the people of the North-west Territories in that arrangement with the Canadian Pacific Railway. He gave the whole country to understand that the old system of dealing with the Canadian Pacific Railway, practiced by the Conservative party, was a thing of the past, and that a new and improved system of dealing with the railways of this country had been adopted. Addresses were presented all over the country, lauding him for all that he had done. He accepted the adulations in these addresses in regard to the new policy which he said had been adopted by the government of this country. In this case here, the opportunity presents itself, which we can accept without doing any harm to anybody and at the same time do the country a great deal of good. The Canadian Pacific Railway is a most successful enterprise, its stock was quoted at 95 on Saturday, it went up a point and a half to-day, and it will probably go up a point and a half to-morrow, notwithstanding this discussion here. There is no danger to the Canadian Pacific Railway in giving up that monopoly clause. On the contrary, it would pay it well to give up that monopoly clause and gain the respect and esteem of the people. No injury would come of it. It has a most valuable franchise, it has made big money, it has a large income, its future is assured, it can go forward in the world now, and why should it not be on the same status as any other railway in this country? Why should it not be placed in the same position? The Canadian Pacific Railway to-day is our strongest corporation, because it is entrenched by these monopolistic clauses in its agreement. There will be no railway reform in this country, no successful regulation of railways, unless the law is unified and applies in the same way to every railway. How can we propose to deal with any of the smaller railways, while the greatest one of them all is entrenched behind monopolies? It may be contended that if this clause is repealed, the Canadian Pacific Railway will come under the 15 per cent clause, but whether that be so or not, it is not germane to the question. What I propose to do is to bring the Canadian Pacific Railway under the same rule which governs all the other railways. I am not here to wipe out some of their monopolies, and by a brush of the hand, to say that an agreement shall not be sacred. An effort has been made to attribute that position to me, but such is not the case. What I say is, that now when the Canadian Pacific Railway is asking for this charter, now is the time to get them to consent to the abrogation of this clause. It is no interference with vested interests; it is simply a matter of negotiation on the lines laid down by the government in 1897, and by the ministers in their speeches throughout the country last fall. It is worth while, just for a moment, to read what the Prime Minister said at Bowmanville on October 16th last. This is the language used by the right hon. gentleman:

You are aware, because I know many of you have sons and relatives on the prairies of Manitoba and the North-west, you are well aware that the one thing of which they have been complaining most is the monopoly given to the Canadian Pacific Railway when the Canadian Pacific Railway was organized. I am not here to quarrel with the Canadian Pacific Railway. It has been a good institution, which has served a good purpose, and done much for the development of Canada, but I do not hesitate to say at the same time that the monopoly given it by the late government has been an incubus on the development of the North-west and Manitoba. We had, in 1897, to aid in the construction of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. As you know, valuable deposits of gold and silver and lead, galena and coal, have been found in that section of the Rocky Mountains which is nearest to the boundary line. In 1897, these were being developed with great rapidity. Miners from all over the world were flocking there, as they always will wherever there is a discovery of gold. And the trade of that country was going to the United States. We determined to build a railway, called the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, to connect with the Canadian Pacific Railway, but in so doing we had to give aid for the construction of that railway. At the same time we obtained from the Canadian Pacific Railway value for the aid given. We determined to give to the Canadian Pacific Railway a subsidy of $11,000 a mile. We received this concession and we received that. . . . This is a most valuable concession to the farmers of the North-west Territories. But this is not all; the Canadian Pacific Railway had obtained a land grant of coal lands from the provincial government of British Columbia. We compelled them to surrender to us 50,000 acres of these coal lands, so that we might keep the price down, and have competition among the producers of coal. We obtained from them that the owners of coal could not, and should not, sell their coal at a higher price than $2 per ton, f.o.b., at the mines. This is what we have done for the people of Canada. I call this substantial, practical politics.

So do I, and here is an opportunity for practical substantial politics. I challenge the Premier and his colleagues to live up to the policy there laid down. They intend to appeal to the people of Canada on their record, and most of all, on the record of what they have done in connection with this great transportation question. I challenge the Premier to-night, and I challenge his government and the party behind him, to declare what they have to say with regard to this policy. It is practical politics, and it is practical business to make the best possible deal with the Canadian Pacific Railway under the circumstances. No better opportunity will be afforded this parliament to do so. To-night we are giving them the right to build 1,100 miles of railway, and we are giving them that right for nothing. We are giving this valuable franchise away, and let us get something in return. We are giving this charter away in the presence of that recent declaration of the people of Manitoba, in the late elections, that they were in favour of substantial railway reform, and that they were in favour of the government controlling railway rates. There can be no government control of railway rates as regards the Canadian Pacific Railway, so long as this monopoly clause exists, and here and now, that monopoly clause ought to be wiped out; not by ignoring vested rights, but by negotiations and by arranging terms.

Mr. DAVIS. What monopoly clause is the hon. gentleman talking about? Is it the 10 per cent clause in the original agreement?

Mr. MACLEAN. Yes.

Mr. McISAAC. Who put in that clause?

Mr. MACLEAN. The Conservative party put it in because they thought it was essential to the construction of the road.

Mr. DAVIS. How will you get it out?

Mr. MACLEAN. I will tell you. According to the Prime Minister and according to the Minister of Railways and Canals, the Canadian Pacific Railway surrendered any number of concessions in consideration of getting something, as in the case of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway.

Mr. DAVIS. They got a subsidy for the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, and in this case they are getting nothing.

Mr. MACLEAN. They are getting a franchise here, and sometimes a franchise is much more valuable than a subsidy. A street railway franchise is valued in millions and millions of dollars, and this franchise which we are giving the Canadian Pacific Railway now, is not merely something on paper. It is a substantial franchise, and they think a great deal of it apparently, for they have put up a lobby in this House, and in the city, to try and secure the carrying of this Bill. It is one of the most extensive lobbies they have had here; all the officials of the Canadian Pacific Railway are here, and they have been in the Railway Committee, and they have canvassed everybody in this House, and they are most anxious to get this Bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS. They did not canvass everybody.

Mr. MACLEAN. This Bill strengthens the monopoly they have. If the Liberal party were true to its pledges, it would reduce the monopoly, but we are here to-day asked to pass legislation that substantially increases the Canadian Pacific monopoly. What has always been the attitude of the great railway monopolies towards the settlers. It has been charged in this House time and again, that the attitude of a monopolistic railway towards the settler is to keep the railway rates at so high a figure that the settlers must remain upon the land at starvation point. That is the history of the relation of the great railways of the United States and of the great railways of Canada, in the North-west especially, towards the farming community. Their object is to keep the railway rates so high and have their monopoly so strong, that the farmer will just stick on the land, raise the crop, and give the best part of the crop to the railway companies. That is what the railways have been doing all over the American continent. That is what they wish to do in Canada to-day, and so long as they can entrench themselves behind the monopolistic clause, so long will they keep the Canadian farmer in the North-west almost at the point of starvation. There is a recent saying: When you are tired of killing Kruger with your mouth, you are to do something else, and if we on this side of the House are tired of killing Greenway with our mouths, it is time for us to come forward and show what we think of Hugh John Macdonald and the victory he has gained in Manitoba. I say that the Conservatives above all should stand up here against railway monopolies.

Some hon. MEMBERS. We do not see them doing it.

Mr. MACLEAN. I say that the people in the North-west are looking to the Conservative party to do something for them in the way of railway reform.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Why are they not doing it?

Mr. MACLEAN. Unless we do that we are open to the taunts that hon. gentlemen opposite are flinging across the floor just now. I trust that all the members in this House, and especially those on the Conservative side, will recognize the voice of the people of Manitoba, and will do something on the present occasion to improve the position of the people of that province in their relation to railways. I trust that this House will act on the lines laid down by the government, and especially on the lines laid down by the Prime Minister in his speech at Bowmanville last fall. And, Sir, not only is the province of Manitoba interested in this question, but the province of British Columbia, is equally interested. I am waiting to see what the members from British Columbia have to say in regard to this monopolistic clause in the charter. I am waiting to see what they have to say about continuing this monopoly and giving further and greater privileges to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company without terms. I am waiting to see what the members for the North-west Territories have to say about strengthening this monopoly.

Mr. COWAN. Did you ever condemn that Canadian Pacific Railway bargain before ?

Mr. MACLEAN. Yes, and I defended it too, if you want to know it. But I have seen light. There was a time when the Canadian Pacific Railway contract could be justified in every particular. It was an experiment. We were opening up what was called an inhospitable country—a country of which there was not any certainty ; and it was a hard thing to get money for the purpose, and a hard thing to induce men to take the venture. It was a Conservative government which made the contract ; but it was Sir John Macdonald who rescinded the strongest feature of that monopoly on terms. He took away the monopolistic clause with regard to building lines to the south ; and if he had remained in power up to this time, he might have had this clause abrogated. But the point I am making is that now is the time to get terms from the Canadian Pacific Railway ; now is the time to abrogate this clause. By its abrogation the Canadian Pacific Railway will not lose a single dollar, but will be put in a better position. It will have the same status as every other railway in this country. Then the time will come when Canada must establish her railway commission, and take control of all these railways ; when the people, who are greater than any corporation, must regulate the rates of the railways. At the present time the Canadian Pacific Railway, entrenched as it is behind this and other monopolies, is the greatest power in this country ; it is growing stronger every day ; and its ambitions have not ended. From what we see in the papers, it is quite evident that in the future the Canadian Pacific Railway Company will come to this parliament and will say, You do not want the Intercolonial Railway ; we do not want to see the people having a people's railway ; we are willing to take that railway from you ; and we are willing to establish a fast Atlantic service, too. We can see public opinion being educated along that line in certain sections of the press. That great monopoly is not satisfied with all the franchises it has now, but it wants to control the people's national railway ; it wants to get possession of the Intercolonial Railway, and it will never be satisfied until it has it, unless we take the stand that we intend to maintain the independence of the government railway and wipe out this monopoly clause, on terms if you will. But we intend that the parliament and the people of Canada shall be greater and stronger than any railway, and we intend that the people shall regulate the railway rates in this country. That day has got to come ; it is near at hand. The people are waiting for that day to arrive, and the way to help forward the coming of that day is to adopt something on the lines I propose to-night ; and I hope to hear from the members from the North-west, the members from British Columbia, and even the members from Ontario, a declaration that they are in favour, not of abrogating this clause, but of asking the company to surrender it in consideration of the great franchises which they are getting from us to-night.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART (South Lanark). There seems to be a great misunderstanding of what hon. gentlemen call the monopolistic clause of the Canadian Pacific Railway contract. If these hon. gentleman will only look at the legislation of this parliament, they will find that instead of the Canadian Pacific Railway being granted a monopoly by that contract, there was a reduction of the terms which were given to every other railway chartered in this country from the year 1856 until the year 1886. Let me read the clause of the Railway Act which applied to every railway that got a charter between those years, and compare that with the clause embodied in the Canadian Pacific Railway Act. The clause to which I refer, is in the Railway Act of 1886, and is as follows :

The parliament of Canada may from time to time reduce the tolls upon the railway, but no such reduction shall, without the consent of the company, be made so as to make the said tolls produce less than 15 per cent per annum profit on the capital actually expended in its construction—

There was a notice given by the people of Canada to every investor who put a dollar into a railway from 1856 to 1886, that there would be no tampering with the profits to which he would be entitled from his investment until the tolls on the railway produced not less than 15 per cent on the capital actually expended on construction——and unless, on an examination made by the minister of the amount received and expended by the company, the net income from all sources for the year then last past is found to have exceeded 15 per cent upon the capital actually expended.

At the time the contract was entered into by the government of Canada with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the government thought that was an excessive rate, and they entered into a special arrangement with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to this effect :

The limit to the reduction of tolls by the parliament of Canada provided for by the 11th subsection of the 17th section of the Consolidated Railway Act, 1879—

Which is in the very words of the Act of 1886, which I have quoted——respecting tolls, is hereby extended, so that such reduction may be to such an extent that such tolls when reduced shall not produce less than 10 per cent per annum profit.

That is a drop of 5 per cent upon the profits allowed to every other railway chartered between 1856 and 1886. It is true, as the hon. gentleman says, that when the railway companies are coming to parliament for terms, we may exact conditions from them. Now, what are the facts with reference to the Bill now before the House? The company ask for a charter to construct 900 miles of railway, and they say that neither of these clauses, neither the 15 per cent nor the 10 per cent provision, shall apply to the lines to be constructed, but that the Governor in Council may exercise his discretion to fix the rates at any figure he likes. Is that the reason why these hon. gentlemen ask that what they call the monopolistic clause shall be struck out of the company's charter? Is that the reason why they ask us to do this act of confiscation?

Mr. MACLEAN. Does the hon. gentleman say it is an act of confiscation to put the company on the 15 per cent basis instead of 10 per cent?

Mr. HAGGART. We are not putting them on the 15 per cent basis by taking that clause out of their charter. If you annul that clause, it will leave the Governor in Council free to fix the rates at anything he likes. The 15 per cent clause will not apply then. Besides, the 15 per cent rate was abolished in 1897, and does not apply to any railway chartered since that year. The company now simply apply for a charter to construct 900 miles of railway, and they are not asking for any bonus or any exceptional treatment. They agreed to abandon all the privileges which they have under the 10 per cent clause, but they ask that they be put in the same position as any other road which is chartered at present, and let the same rule be applied to this particular section of road which is applied to other lines.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Before you report, Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to move of which I have given notice, but if the promoter of this Bill intends pushing it to a third reading to-night, I will allow it to go through committee and move my amendment on the third reading. There is another point. When in committee on Thursday evening, the hon. member for Marquette, (Mr. Roche) requested that the Bill be not finally disposed of until we heard from Manitoba, and the hon. Minister of Railways, if I understood him correctly, stated he was willing to acquiesce in that request and let the third reading be delayed until we heard from Manitoba. As the Manitoba legislature will meet in three days, and as, according to the hon. member for Marquette, they intend making a declaration of policy at once, we would know in three or four days what that legislature intends doing.

Mr. MACDONELL. If it be possible to get that Bill read a third time to-night, it is my intention to have that done.

Mr. RICHARDSON. What about the hon. member's notice to refer the Bill back to the Railway Committee with instructions to add a certain amendment regarding the operation of the 10 per cent clause?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Let the Bill go through committee, and then on the third reading you can make any amendments of which you have given notice.

The committee reported.

Mr. MACDONELL moved the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. MACLEAN moved in amendment that the following be substituted for clause 4 :

4. Clause 20 of the company's charter is hereby repealed.

Also to add the following clause to the said Bill:

That the maximum rate of passenger traffic on any of the railways to be constructed under the authority of this Act shall not exceed 2 cents per mile.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is my intention to move two or three amendments in the House. I might have moved them in committee, but did not do so, because I thought it would be a waste of time.

An hon. MEMBER. It is a waste of time here.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think it will be discovered to be time very well spent, because I think it is important to know how every member stands on these questions. I move, seconded by Mr. Rogers :

That the Bill be not read now a third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole with instructions to add the following :

That during the construction of this road, all books, accounts and records stating the actual cost of construction and equipment shall be open to inspection by the government, in order that if it be subsequently determined by either the government of the Dominion or the government of Manitoba to acquire the railway or any portion of it, it may be so acquired with a knowledge of the actual cost and at a figure from which may be deducted any bonuses given.

Now, this does not provide that the road shall be taken over by any government at cost. It simply lays down the proposition that the accounts shall be laid open to inspection, so that the government may know exactly what the road did cost. If it be determined at any future time that the road should be acquired either by this government or the government in Manitoba, it may be acquired with a knowledge of what it cost. Now, I think that many members who voted against the amendment of the hon. member for East York might do so because they thought it was interfering with a contract that exists between the government and the Canadian Pacific Railway. But this amendment of mine interferes with no contract; it merely provides a plan by which the government may be seized of important information. Whether the government in the future acquires this road or not, we want to know exactly what it costs to build the road. As I pointed out in discussing the other Bill—we have no means of knowing what the Canadian Pacific Railway costs. I told the House that the company's estimate including equipment was ninety-one and a half millions; but they formed a construction company, and enormously enhanced the nominal cost of the road. It was because I thought the country should know exactly what that road did cost that I moved last session for a commission to inquire into the actual cost. Now, if the House adopts this amendment, and this is a reasonable amendment—it does not say that either this government or the government of Manitoba shall take over the road. We simply find out what it cost; leaving out this question of ownership that may come up in five, or ten, or twenty years from now. Even if it does not come up, it can do no harm to adopt this amendment; and if it is adopted and the government decides in future to take hold of the road, it can take it over with a knowledge of what it costs.

Mr. SPROULE. I support this amendment. I think it does no injustice to any company to have such an amendment put in. It seems to me that we ought to be in possession of such information for various reasons, that I will not mention here to-night. Under this we will know exactly what the cost of the road is. The data from which purchase is to be made will be available in the event of negotiations with regard to the road or in the event of it being necessary to determine the exact cost of this road or other roads of a similar character. I admit at the outset that it would be better if such an amendment were made in the Railway Act, so that all roads should furnish this information. But, in the absence of that being done—and we have no reason to believe that it will be done either now or in the future, because we are usually put off when we propose these things, first with a statement that it should be in the General Railway Act, and then that it would be better to put it in the Act some time in the future—it is no injustice to any corporation that comes to this House for a charter that we should impose upon them such a provision—and that we should keep count of the cost of the road so that it may be available in case it may be desired.

Mr. J. V. ELLIS (St. John City). I would point out to the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), that his amendment, it seems to me, does not effect what he proposes. It merely provides that the books shall be open during construction, but there is nothing to require the government to inspect them while under construction. If it does not inspect them, it is without power to do so afterwards. I go, perhaps, a little farther than the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) who has just spoken. My idea is that there ought to be a uniform system of bookkeeping for all railways in the country, and the government ought to compel them to keep their books according to that system. It seems to me the resolution is defective in the way I have pointed out.

Mr. CLARKE. How would it do to amend the amendment so as to compel the company to make a sworn return of the actual cost?

Mr. RICHARDSON. That would be a very difficult matter. The company could scarcely be relied upon to furnish an accurate return. If the House will permit me, I may say that I moved this amendment to the Rainy River Bill, and the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), while he did not accept mine, placed an amendment in the Bill that the company must furnish details when called upon. However, I do not think that that is satisfactory. I agree better with the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis), and I would be quite willing, if the Bill goes back to committee to amend my amendment to meet the views of the hon. member for St. John, that the government shall apply a check upon the companies.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The difficulty which arises over the wording of the amendment only shows that it is a thing better dealt with in an amendment to the general Act, and only after very careful consideration. If this amendment were passed as suggested by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), it would be of no use at all, as pointed out by the hon. member for St. John's (Mr. Ellis). The government would have the privilege of inspecting the books during construction, but if they did not do it during construction they would have no right to do it after. The books might be destroyed and information could not be got. Instead of jobbing at these things by patching up a single Act here and there, if the principle is thought to be a good one and a fair one, it ought to be adopted in a general way, instead of dealing with a single Act, and dealing with it in a defective manner.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART (South Lanark). The Act provides for all this. One of the schedules of the Act covers it all, providing:

1. Cost of land and land damages.
2. Cost in connection to the administration of land grant in aid, if any.
3. Cost of grading, masonry and bridging, station buildings, &c.
4. Cost of rolling stock of all kinds, including workshops.

Mr. CLARKE. Are these returns made under oath?

Mr. HAGGART. Returns made under oath to the minister, and he may enlarge them and inquire into the details.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Speaking for myself, I would not be particularly opposed to this amendment, except on the grounds stated by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague). It does not amount to anything, and might give rise to difficulties. My hon. friend (Mr. Richardson), I suppose, has in view the purchase of the Canadian Pacific Railway by the government of Manitoba—

Mr. RICHARDSON. I object to being misrepresented, and specially by a minister. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sutherland) has no business to insinuate that I desire to have the government of Manitoba purchase the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the hon. gentleman would allow me to finish my sentence, I do not think he could have taken exception to the position. I must apologize for having put the word 'Manitoba' before the word 'Dominion,' but I had read it hurriedly. I see it says:

It may be subsequently determined by either the government of the Dominion or the government of Manitoba.

Mr. RICHARDSON. To acquire these branches, not the Canadian Pacific Railway, any portion of these branches.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The hon. gentleman's word is not, perhaps, as reliable as he tries to make out. It is his own amendment, and I am taking him according to the notice he has put on the paper. Perhaps I do not understand the English language, but it says: 'To acquire the railway—'

Mr. RICHARDSON. Or any portion of it.

Mr. MACLEAN. Railway means railway under the Bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If that is not the Canadian Pacific Railway—

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is not the Canadian Pacific Railway. In the general Bill that is amended.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I may be mistaken. I have to be guided by the information I have, but I am in the judgment of the House, if my hon. friend is not altogether mistaken in the meaning of the word railway here. It applies to the Canadian Pacific Railway. But that is immaterial. However, I was under the impression, in listening to the speeches of these gentlemen, that they were advocating a policy of controlling the whole railway system of the Dominion, that is the impression that they gave me, speaking to-day on this Bill and on other Bills, in order and out of order. If I misunderstood my hon. friend, I am willing to apologize and to be set right. But according to my understanding of the English language, the expressions of these gentlemen led us to believe they were advocating the policy of the purchase and control in some way of all railways. I understand the object of this amendment is set forth in the resolution, 'It may be subsequently determined by either the government of the Dominion or the government of Manitoba.' Now, Sir, I do not think that these gentlemen have a right, every time they speak, to assume that no other members of the House have the interest of the public at heart but themselves. We hear that so often that it becomes almost tiresome to those of us who seldom speak on any question. We have a right to assume that we are all acting to the best of our knowledge in the interest of the public. So far as I am concerned, I think, with the member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), that this amendment is likely to be of more injury than benefit to the object the hon. gentleman has in view. With the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart), I claim that we have certain powers under the Railway Act now; but I claim more than that, I think if at any time it should be the policy of this parliament to purchase every road, or any road, or any portion of a road, we will be in a better position to do so, and to determine the cost, the value and the amount we should pay, without this amendment than with it. Parliament has that full power and whenever the time comes to take practical action I am sure we would be in a better position to do so without this amendment than with it. For that reason I shall vote against it.

Mr. TISDALE. If the hon. gentleman will take the trouble to examine the Railway Act, and particularly the report issued every year by the statistical department, they will find covered every possible thing that they are moving for. You have to make a return of the cost of the construction, the cost of the rolling stock, and all that sort of thing. I know all about it, because for six or seven years before I was a member of this House, I had to go over those returns carefully. In addition to that, under the Railway Act the minister and the Railway Department have power to ask for any return of information they want. The Act specifies the kind of statistics the companies shall furnish, including accidents, working expenses and all such information. Then it puts in a general clause which I will read:

The company shall also, in addition to the information required to be furnished by the minister—

That is the annual return.

—as indicated in such schedule 1, furnish such other information and returns as are from time to time required by the Governor in Council.

Now, we have already on the statute-book stronger legislation than any of these motions require. Under these circumstances I think we have a right to complain of the time that is taken up, not only in the Railway Committee, but in this House, by renewed motions of precisely the same nature and reiteration of arguments of the same nature, calling for information and powers which the government and parliament already possesses. If the hon. gentlemen would inform themselves by looking into the returns, that at great expense and trouble, the Minister of Railways and Canals and his officials have to prepare every year, they would find many of these things that they ask for are already covered. At the first meeting of the Railway Committee, attended by nearly all the members, we had a question of this sort come up, and by a very large majority, after full discussion, it was decided that these questions ought to be dealt with in the general Railway Act. The committee spent a good deal of useful time in discussion, and we affirmed that by a large majority. Having affirmed it there, and discussed it time and again, surely the time has come when we have a right to appeal to these gentlemen. I am not finding any fault with this discussion, but when an intelligent House like this has fully discussed a matter and passed upon it by a vote, in addition to the discussion given to it by that great committee, surely the responsibility of members who vote for or against it has been established. I repeat that these things have already been provided for in a more thorough manner than is called for by all these amendments. It is all provided for by the Act of 1886, which was amended in 1888, and again last year. This was certainly the law in 1888, and I think in 1886. I wish to say here, on account of some strictures passed upon me this afternoon, that I am quite prepared, either in committee or in the House, fully and carefully to discuss these questions. Sometimes I am accused of being rather inclined to discuss things at too great length. But when once they are discussed and settled, then I do not think, as the chairman of the Railway Committee, the member for Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), has said, that other gentlemen should again and again bring them up to be all gone over again. I do not know what impression may be made in the country, but it makes us feel as if we were being held up all the time on these questions as having some other interest in view instead of the interest of the people. Surely there must be some time during a session when this principle ought to be sufficiently affirmed. When a government or private question has come before the House and the House has passed upon it, I think that is sufficient for one session. I protest, as a busy member of the House, having reference not only to my own affairs, but to the affairs of the House, and also in the name of many other hon. members, against rediscussing and rehearing the same things over and over again. I appeal to these hon. gentlemen. We understand our responsibility and they do theirs. I do not wish to be considered as lecturing them. The people understand the position that hon. gentlemen take, the newspapers distribute the information throughout the country, and it is unnecessary, day after day, to take up our time as has been done to-night. On the last private members' day we practically passed upon most of these resolutions, and all these resolutions are more than covered by the authority of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, the great tribunal which both sides of the House have more than once affirmed as being seized of the responsibility, so that it becomes time to make an appeal to hon. gentlemen and to protest against a further waste of time.

Mr. MACLEAN. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of attention to the lecture which has been read to us by the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale). He has treated the House as if it were a Sunday school and he were the Sunday school superintendent. I am not going to be lectured.

An hon. MEMBER. He never made that mistake with you.

Mr. MACLEAN. I have the right, and I intend to live up to the right and duty of a member of this House, who, if he thinks there is a public grievance, should air it in this House, not once, but on every occasion that presents itself. I am not, for one, going to be put aside by the statements of the hon. member for South Norfolk, that these principles have been accepted and settled. They have not been settled, and the trouble is that we have not a government, or a parliament, that will tackle this railway question, deal with it and settle it. This is a question that ought to be settled on broad lines. But, when it is brought up on broad lines the objection is raised that we are interfering with vested rights, and when it is brought up in reference to a particular case, we are told that we should bring in a particular Bill. That has been the policy of this House ever since I have been in it. The whole trouble is that we have not a government, or a House, that will deal with this question. It is the duty of the government to call the Canadian Pacific Railway into court and ascertain what the cost of the railway was. As has been pointed out here, to-night, they have gone before the people as the champions of the people prepared to remove that monopolistic clause from the Canadian Pacific Railway. They have made this whole country howl with it, and now when the opportunity is presented to them, when they have a majority behind them of something like fifty votes, they take no action in the matter, and they refuse to call the Canadian Pacific Railway into court. If the government would stand up and say to the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) that they intend to call upon the Canadian Pacific Railway and to ascertain what its road had actually cost, there would be some reason for asking us to raise this question, but, it is because of the inaction of the government and the inaction of the Liberal party that we are obliged to raise this question on every occasion. I shall not bind myself to abide by the lecture that has been read here to-night by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tisdale), but, whenever I see an opportunity, I intend to challenge the House and to appeal to the country on this question of railway monopoly.

Mr. N. CLARKE WALLACE (West York). Mr. Speaker, I do not think the remarks that have been made to the House by the hon. gentleman will convince this House and this country that we have that full information from the railway companies which is desirable and which is absolutely necessary to have, if we are, in the future, at any time to acquire possession of these railways. The amendment moved by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) is, I think, a step in the right direction. The hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) has given us the information that all these things are already provided for in the Railway Act. Well, I can tell the hon. member for South Norfolk that there is no information that we can lay our hands upon to-day that gives this knowledge of the various railway companies. Where is the information which states the actual cost of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway? That information has not been given nor have we the cost of the grading, the cost of the rails, the cost of the station houses, the cost of the rolling stock or all these other items. It is proposed by the hon. member for Lisgar that machinery be provided by which we will get this information. I think it is a step in the right direction, and that the House should require from every railway company all the information that they desire to have, as it is necessary, for many purposes, that we should have it. Take the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway; I am told that its profits last year were about 8½ per cent. We are coming right up to the time when the 10 per cent limit will be reached. We want to know the full and official particulars of these facts. The House and the country want all the particulars, and I think they are entitled to have them. They tell us that we can get this information now. All I can say is that I would like to have it. I would like some of the hon. ministers, or ex-ministers, to be able to give us this information. It is strange—it is not so strange, after all, because it is happening every day—that, whenever a matter comes up in which the department of a minister of the Crown is specially and particularly concerned, the minister of that department is absent from his seat. We look across and see no Minister of Railways here to-day, though this is railway day. This is a day when the hon. Minister of Railways should be here to give us information and to supply us with data from his department, but he is not in his seat. Then, again we have matters coming up in regard to the Department of the Interior, but the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) is away. We are told that he is away because he requires medical treatment. Well, I presume, without inquiring too closely, that medical treatment could have been given at other periods of the year beside that at which the House is in session, with the same satisfactory results. I hope he will come back thoroughly cured. But, it has been the practice that whenever matters relating to a department come up, the minister of that particular department is absent. The right hon. First Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), I am bound to say, is always in his place, always attending to business, looking after matters, and I wish he could infuse that same spirit of diligence and industry into his ministers that he displays himself. It is too bad that the business of the House should be delayed by ministers being away from their places when important matters are under consideration. To come back to the particular clause of this Bill. Reference has been made to the Rainy River Bill, passed last year. What was the necessity of this clause being inserted last year if it were already provided for in the General Railway Act. Clause 9 says :

As respects all railways for which subsidies are granted by this Act, the company at any time owning or operating any of the said railways shall, when required, produce and exhibit to the Minister of Railways and Canals or any persons appointed by him, all books, accounts and vouchers showing the cost of constructing the railway, the cost of operating it, and the earnings thereof.

This applies to the railways that received subsidies last year, but it does not apply to the other railways.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. What Act is that ?

Mr. WALLACE. This is the Railway Subsidy Act of 1899, and all the railway companies that received this assistance last year are to furnish that information. This is not the case of some private member getting a clause inserted in a private Bill, but it is the government's own act. If the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) be correct in what he states, that far more information is already required to be given by the General Railway Act, what was the necessity for putting in this provision in the Act of last year ? Why, the thing is absurd, and it is another and additional argument why the proposal of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) should become law.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I would remark to my hon. friend (Mr. Wallace), who has made some allusion to the absence of the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair), that the Minister of Railways is absent to-day on account of some domestic matters which have called him away for two or three days. He will, however, be in his seat before the end of the week. The questions raised to-day, however, do not urgently require the presence of the Minister of Railways, because it is within the knowledge of every one that all these questions have been threshed out over and over again in the Railway Committee. No new information has been imparted to the House. The Railway Committee is the largest committee in the House; it is almost a committee of the whole House, and whatever is settled there is settled for the House, except on very rare occasions.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I have one more amendment to propose. It refers to the 10 per cent clause, and is as follows :

That the rates, both passenger and freight, shall at all times be subject to revision and control by the Governor General in Council, provided that whenever such rates produce a net profit of more than 6 per cent on the actual cost of the road and equipment, less the amount of any subsidies received from any source, the rates shall be reduced to such point as shall only produce 6 per cent on such net cost.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. When this Bill was before the Railway Committee, a clause was added to it providing that clause 20 of the Canadian Pacific Railway charter—that is, the clause providing for the 10 per cent—shall not apply to the tolls to be collected by the company for passengers or goods transported upon any railway to be constructed under the authority of this Act, but all such tolls shall be fixed and regulated as provided by the Railway Act.' If I understand the matter, this amendment would have this effect, that the Committee of the Privy Council could not interfere with the rates until the company had earned upon these branches 6 per cent upon the amount of the cost. If the Act is left as it is, the Railway Committee could interfere whether the company paid any dividend or not. So that, in my judgment, the effect of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Lisgar would be to place the Governor in Council in such a position that they could not interfere with the rates until the company had earned 6 per cent upon the cost of the construction of these branches. I should prefer very much to have this question left as it is at present under the Railway Act, as the Governor in Council would then be entitled to interfere with the rates on the application of any person interested.

Mr. CRAIG. The hon. member who moved this amendment said he would let it go on the same division. I cannot agree to that, because I voted for the last amendment, but I intend to vote against this one.

Mr. DAVIN. It seems to me that the objection taken by the acting Minister of the Interior is fatal to the amendment of the hon. member for Lisgar. It is quite clear to me that if the amendment of the hon. member for Lisgar were adopted, we would be in a much worse position than we are now. The clause that has been added seems to me to get rid entirely of the 10 per cent restriction, and much more effectually than the hon. gentleman's amendment would.

Mr. RICHARDSON. While the original charter of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company allows them to earn 10 per cent on the actual cost, I do not think this House would take the position that we are not willing to allow the company to earn at least 5 or 6 per cent on their bonds. I do not think the people of Canada desire to prevent the railways earning something on their bonds; and 6 per cent seemed to me to be a reasonable rate, and I put it in. I merely wish to explain.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has a right to explain.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think the hon. member should be allowed to explain, because this is the most extraordinary spectacle I ever saw in the House. Here we have been asked by the hon. member for Lisgar to fight against giving too much to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company; we have been asked to say that they shall not have this monopolistic clause and that monopolistic clause; and they came to the Railway Committee the other day and said: If you give us this charter, we do not want any special privileges; we are willing to abandon that 10 per cent clause, and do away with it entirely. The committee adopted a clause accordingly, and put it in the Bill, and now up steps the hon. member for Lisgar and proposes that they shall be permitted to earn at least 6 per cent—in other words, that this House shall put a monopoly clause into a Bill which had all its monopoly clauses expunged by the committee. If this is not the 'reductio ad absurdum' of legislation in this House, I do not know what is. It only shows, as the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) says, that the House is being trifled with by amendments which are ill-considered, ill-timed and absolutely useless for the purpose for which they are proposed.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. While I have the very greatest sympathy with the hon. member for Lisgar in his attempts to reform the railway system of the Dominion of Canada, I beg to point out, in addition to what the hon. member for Haldimand has said, that this is only a matter of degree; that nineteen years ago, when the Canadian Pacific Railway charter was granted, 10 per cent was about the same rate of interest on money that 6 per cent is to-day; and this hon. gentleman is prepared to saddle the people of that country, for whose rights he is so earnestly contending, with a clause as iniquitous in degree as was the 10 per cent clause, against which he has been agitating so long. I was rather amused at his suggestion that we should deal with this amendment on the same division as the other, because they are entirely dissimilar in every way.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. I beg to move:

Clause 20 of the original charter shall not apply to the tolls to be collected by the company for passengers or goods transported upon any of the railways to be constructed under this Act, nor to passengers and goods transported from or to any point on any of the said railways to or from any other points upon the lines of the company within the province of Manitoba.

Mr. HAGGART. Let me draw the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that there are only six clauses in the Act; there is no such clause as clause 20 in it at all. What he refers to is clause 20 of schedule A; there are two schedules in the Act. If the hon. gentleman's amendment were carried, it would not affect the Act in the slightest.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. That is only a very minor matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. The hon. gentleman understands what I mean. A little technical error of that kind does not count in a principle of this kind. If there is any little technical mistake, I am sure the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart) will be one of the first to assist me in putting the thing in proper shape before this House. The idea is to endeavour to get something for something, but we are now getting nothing in return for the franchise we are giving, and we ought to get something for these concessions. The amendment, which was passed by the Railway Committee the other day is of no avail as regards control of local rates, because the principal local traffic in the province of Manitoba, as every one knows, is from and to the city of Winnipeg, and unless we give control to the Governor General in Council over the rates of those lines all the way to Winnipeg and throughout the province, the little concession which the Canadian Pacific Railway has given us is of no account. I trust that this amendment will receive the serious consideration of the House.

Amendment negatived.

Bill read the third time and passed.

THE HOLINESS MOVEMENT (OR CHURCH.)

The House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 51) to incorporate the Holiness Movement (or Church) in Canada.—(Mr. Belcourt.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. D. HENDERSON (Halton). It seems to me that this legislation is something entirely uncalled for. The general tendency for the last twenty-five or thirty years has been towards union instead of disunion among the various Methodist churches and Presbyterian bodies. In fact, at present the tendency is towards greater union between the Methodist and Presbyterian bodies, and we should be very careful before passing legislation in a direction the very opposite to that approved of by the great churches of this country. I therefore beg to move that the committee rise.

Mr. U. WILSON (Lennox). I understand that the general superintendent of the Methodist Church came here and appeared before the committee.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. HAGGART.

Mr. WILSON. I was under that impression. At any rate, I have had conversations with some of the representative ministers in the Methodist churches, and while it is quite true that they are not much in favour of this movement, they do not see why a body of men who have formed this religious organization and want the right to hold property and enjoy the other privileges of such organizations, should be denied these rights. We are in a country where everybody should have equal rights. I know nothing of the religious tenets of this body, but I know that they are very earnest workers, and I certainly think it would be a great mistake to refuse them incorporation. Every man should have a right to worship his God as he sees fit without interfering with any other man or set of men. For these reasons, I am very much opposed to the kind of treatment which the hon. member asks us to deal out to this body.

Mr. D. C. FRASER (Guysborough). I agree with the last speaker. If union is what the hon. member for Halton has in view, he is taking the very worst way to bring it about. Just so soon as you try to prevent people from worshipping God as they like, so soon will you bring about greater disunion than already exists. These people come together to worship and they want that recognition which will enable them as a corporation to hold property. It makes no difference what our views may be concerning that movement, so long as these people are law-abiding citizens and desire to come together and worship in their own way, they have the right to do it. It would be a sad thing if we were to throw out this Bill. If the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) had lived long ago in England, I suppose he would have insisted that nobody should live there but Episcopalians, and have thus deprived the country of the Presbyterians, the best class of people in it, and I suppose that if he had lived in Scotland he would have allowed no Episcopalians to remain there. These people are not asking for any exclusive privileges. They do not ask that they should be put in the category of distinguished prelates of this country and be entitled to take their places at Government House or anything of that kind, but only ask the right to go on doing their religious work according to their own views and to hold property as a corporation, because there is a considerable amount of difficulty in holding property in the names of trustees. If they are all right, they will succeed; but if not, they will not. But in any case we will do them and all other denominations in this country a great injury by simply throwing out the Bill.

Mr. E. G. PENNY (St. Lawrence, Montreal). On general principles I quite agree with the hon. member for Guysborough. But if I understand rightly, this is a body that at one time were called Hornerites. If I am right in that, I may say that they were a disturbing element in Montreal.

MR. FRASER (Guysborough). So were the Orangemen.

MR. PENNY. Well, I think that in view of what occurred, we ought to consider this Bill well, before passing it.

MR. HENDERSON. I do not hold the narrow views attributed to me by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fraser), I do not oppose this Bill, because of the nature of the practices of the body asking incorporation. I may say that I know nothing about them. But the tendency of the age is towards union and not disunion. The opinion of the great Methodist body of this country, is, and has been, favourable to union. And I am not sure, if that body were consulted throughout the country, that they would be favourable to the creation of any new church, a split off from their own body. The tendency of the Presbyterian Church, as I said before, is, and has been, towards union. I think this parliament is simply doing something that will operate against the church of this country, which believe that union and not disunion, should be sought, that the churches should be strengthened and not weakened.

MR. T. S. SPROULÉ (East Grey). I confess that I cannot agree with the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson). I do not think that we should lay down any cast-iron rules that there should be only so many churches in the land. I think if the practices of the churches are right you may make as many of them as you please. So long as there are sinners, you can hardly say that you should not have more churches, because the churches in existence do not succeed in covering the field. I would have no objection to giving them incorporation, so long as the practices of their religion are in conformity with the principles of the Christian religion.

MR. GEO. TAYLOR (South Leeds). It has been the rule of this House ever since I have held a seat herein, that all religious denominations applying for incorporation, have received it. The Bill on the paper following this one, is for the incorporation of a religious society not agreeable to my views, but because it is a religious body, I intend to support that Bill. I think it is the duty of this House to grant this religious body this Act, the same as is granted to any other religious body.

MR. WILSON. The argument used by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson), might be used by any denomination against another. I am sure there is a good deal of difference of opinion between those who do not belong to a church, and those who do belong to it, as to what church ought to have. But I thought we had outlived the day when we expected people to worship as we did, and it had got to the time in this House and country, when we were ready to give to others the same privilege that we ask for ourselves. I do not want the privilege of worshipping God as I see fit, without giving the same to my neighbours. I think it would be a great shame if this parliament refused to incorporate this body of men who, I believe, are trying to do what they think is in the interest of humanity. Even if I did not believe in their way of doing things, that would not be a good reason why they should not be incorporated.

AN HON. MEMBER. Do you want them to come out of your church?

MR. WILSON. No, I do not want people to come out of my church to join this one. But, I do not want to force a man to stay in my church, if he wishes to attend some other. I want men to worship God in the way they think best. I do not think we have any right to dictate to them in such matters. Therefore, I am in favour of incorporating this society.

Motion (Mr. Henderson) negatived.

On motion for third reading.

MR. LARIVIERE. I understood that the title of the Bill was to be amended on the third reading. In the body of the Bill, the word 'or,' is struck out, leaving it the Holiness Church of Canada. Perhaps the Bill had better stand.

MR. HENDERSON. That would be a very odd name for this church seeking incorporation, and in a sense recognizing their right to assume that all the holiness in Canada is possessed by this particular body. To change it to the name suggested by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière), it seems to me, would be a usurpation of the rights of other religious bodies.

MR. SPEAKER. The Bill will stand.

IN THE COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 24) respecting the Nova Scotia Steel Company (Limited).—(Mr. Fraser, Guysborough.)

Bill (No. 77) to incorporate the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer.—(Mr. Quinn.)

Bill (No. 45) respecting the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Poupore.)

Bill (No. 43) respecting the Grand Valley Railway Company, and to change its name to the Port Dover, Brantford, Berlin and Goderich Railway Company.—(Mr. Charlton.)

THE SERVIS RAILROAD THE PLATE COMPANY.

MR. FRASER (Guysborough) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 93), to confer on the Commissioner of Patents certain powers for the relief of the Servis Railroad The Plate Company of Canada, Limited.

Mr. J. V. ELLIS (St. John). I do not intend to oppose the Bill or to arrest its progress; but I would call the attention of the House to the fact that there are four Bills of this nature now before it. Since I have been a member of the House for several years there have been constant applications to override the law. The whole process is very troublesome, and I would suggest to the government that they take the matter into consideration and either give a general power to the Commissioner of Patents to deal with these cases, or in some other way to amend these Acts, if it is necessary to amend them at all. The present system is cumbersome and troublesome, and good results are not reached by the present mode. It would be far better to establish a court composed of the Commissioner of Patents and two or three other gentlemen. I think in the United States the commissioner has power; but the present system is a very inconvenient one.

Mr. W. H. MONTAGUE (Haldimand). I do not object to these powers being given to the Commissioner of Patents if there is any show of reason for it; but in this case there is no show of reason whatever. The only reason is assigned in the preamble:

But that, without fault or neglect, it has failed to obtain from the use and sale of said invention a reasonable remuneration for the money, time and labour bestowed upon it, and upon its introduction into public use.

Now, parliament in its wisdom established a certain length of time during which the patent is the property of the inventor.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What are they asking for?

Mr. MONTAGUE. They are asking to confer upon the Commissioner of Patents power to extend the time. I submit that is no reason to come to parliament for such an extension. You do away absolutely with the usefulness of the Act if you suspend it for such a reason as that.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I would observe to the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis), that at first blush I would not favour the suggestion that he offers to the House. If we were to put into the hands of an officer the power he suggests, the power of entertaining such a motion as is embodied in all these Bills now before the House, it would be to a large extent to favour the granting of these requests. Now, it seems to me that in the public interest such requests should not be granted. The granting of a patent is an abridgement of the right of the community generally. If the grantee of the patent does not choose to avail himself of the privilege given to him by law, if for some reason he allows the time to elapse before taking advantage of it, then I do not think his application to have this power continued to him ought to be favourably entertained. I think as a general rule all such applications ought to be refused unless a very strong case is made out, so strong indeed that the power of parliament might be invoked to determine whether the power granted to the patentee should be revived. For my part I do not think it would be wise to facilitate such extensions in any manner. By forcing the party who wants to have a new charter or a new patent given to him to come before parliament, we would discourage all such applications. I would agree with the opinion of the member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), to a large extent. But, I think, it is better to do as we have done in previous cases, that is, to send these applications to the Committee on Private Bills there to have them fully threshed out.

Mr. A. B. INGRAM (East Elgin). There is another Bill following this on the Order paper where the patentee allowed his patent to expire in September last. The original patent was not worth anything, but the person who succeeded in remodelling the patent, the patent in his possession, made it worth something. Now the late patentee wants the patent resurrected again.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). This is not a case of allowing a patent to lapse or not working under it. In the first years, after the patent was obtained, it was impossible to begin operations. Operations have now been begun, and they are selling both to the Intercolonial Railway and to the Canadian Pacific Railway, as will be shown before the committee. All they want is a lengthened period.

Mr. MONTAGUE. This is taking away the rights of the public.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I am aware that we have passed a number of Bills to that effect almost every year since I have been in parliament.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Never upon an excuse of that kind.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I think it will be shown before the committee that what I say is a fact. This is not the time to discuss it.

Mr. ELLIS. My idea is that a better system might be adopted than the present one. While it is true that these Bills come before parliament, as the right hon. leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) says, as a matter of fact they always go through the committee. Therefore, there is no great attention paid to them. Although the committee sifts them, they always go through. But it ought not to be allowed.

Mr. SPROULE. There is no doubt that we have dealt with a number of Bills of this kind in this House, and that a good many of them should not have been allowed at all. I think that wisdom prevailed in sending them to the committee, where all the evidence that was necessary could be taken, and where the Bills could be sifted to the bottom to see whether they were wise or not.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). That was in cases where they had lapsed and nothing done.

Mr. SPROULE. Yes. I think we should follow the same course here. I do not see any reason for allowing this patent to be extended, but, I think, it would be the part of wisdom to send this Bill to the committee and let them inquire fully into it, calling before them any evidence that may be required.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 94) respecting the Schomberg and Aurora Railway Company.—(Mr. Landerkin.)

Bill (No. 104) respecting the Montfort and Gatineau Colonization Railway Company.—(Mr. Bourassa.)

Bill (No. 109) to incorporate the Manitoulin and North Shore Railway Company.—(Mr. Dymont.)

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he has any knowledge as to when the electoral lists will be printed?

The PRIME MINISTER. I cannot give any definite information to my hon. friend. I shall make inquiry, and if he asks at another time, I may be able to give an answer.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, March 27, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—MR. MONTAGUE.

Mr. W. H. MONTAGUE (Haldimand). Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I want to refer to an article in the Toronto Globe of yesterday, in which I am charged with having made a certain statement in the House of Commons, when I had the pleasure of discussing the motion of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell). This article says that Dr. Montague said:

England owes more to Canada than Canada owes to England.

This, it said, as a 'curt' statement. I did quote these words, Sir, as they appear at page 2166 of Hansard, but the Hansard reporter, I notice, put them in inverted commas, which was quite proper. I do not claim to be the author of these words. They were the exceedingly curt words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), and, as I do not care to be proclaimed throughout the Dominion as the author of them, I take this occasion to make the correction.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding):

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising a Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Mr. GEORGE E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) Mr. Speaker, I rise to-day with a good deal of pleasure to venture some remarks, of plain, and, I hope, truthful criticism on the address which was delivered on Friday last by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), as an exposition of the budget of the country. In the latter part of his address, he spoke of the history of Canada as a story, combining certain peculiarities; and, I think, it would be not travelling out of the record, if I were to say that the hon. gentleman's speech bears all the marks of a story easily and plainly recounted, gathered from the statistics of the government, of the banks, and of some of the business interests of the country, very much disjointed, and, I may venture to say, somewhat tortured for the purpose of upholding the interests of a government whose inconsistencies are quite as glaring as was the weaknesses of my hon. friend's speech, regarded as a budget speech and an exposition of the financial and fiscal affairs of the country. Necessity, of course, impelled my hon. friend, and he listened to its voice. Any clerk in a very short time, could have compiled the figures that he used; but any clerk should be drummed summarily out of the service, who would make as disingenuous a use of those statistics as, I am bound to say, my hon. friend made. I hope my words at the commencement will not be too strong for the proof which I shall try to adduce as I proceed. If any one had been in the gallery, unacquainted with the affairs and history of Canada, especially in a fiscal and financial sense, I venture to say that, if he took his information simply from the figures which were quoted and the peculiar logic used on Friday afternoon, would go away with a very insufficient, and very erroneous idea of the history of Canada in these respects. He would have looked entirely in vain for an analysis of the expenditures of last year, as to how they were applied and as to the quickening and vitalizing effects of the application of such an immense sum of money as was expended by hon. gentlemen opposite during that year; he would look in vain for any inquiry into, and any comparison of the courses and currents of the trade of this country, or for any discussion of the tariff as affecting the great problems of labour and industry in Canada, some of which are very close now to a public decision, and public action in this country; and he would have risen from his seat without having had one single proposition placed before him by my hon. friend for the solution of the great and vexed questions which are pressing forward in this country for discussion and action by her public men. As I said before, it would rather seem to be a simple collation of statistics, the disjecta membra of which, if I may be allowed the use of a Latin term, seemed to have been promiscuously sown wherever it was thought an appeal might be made, ad captandum, to people who have not had the opportunities of looking into, and so have not the power of discerning what are really the facts of the case as bearing on the questions under discussion. All through the hon. gentleman's speech there seemed to be a leading up to the reiteration of the almost endless refrain: Behold what a people we are—'Is not this great Babylon that I have built?' And, no matter from what quarter the facts are taken, whether from the first years of confederation, fragments were extracted, or whether joined to them were fragments from later years—no matter, everything was done, anything was done, which could be used to prop up the idea often made in so many words, but more frequently by inference and appeal, that all the wonderful progress of to-day had its origin and is now maintained by the gentlemen who, for the present, are governing affairs in this country. There was a great glorification of what was called generous expenditure, and of increased revenue; but there was a very discreet avoidance of the destructive contrast between the professions and policy of these gentlemen, when they were out, and the performance of these gentlemen now that they are in. My hon. friend was so hurried, along this particular line, that he had not the time to give the House some very necessary information which I think he should have given. For instance, he quoted immigration returns, beginning his statistics, so far as immigration from the United States is concerned, with the year 1897, and prefacing his figures with the remark, that there did not seem to be any statistics with reference to them up to that period; and then after quoting them all, as a strong argument in favour of the propositions which he was sustaining, it was found that he had not gone to the trouble of ascertaining on what these statistics were based—whether they were simply the numbers returned by the immigration agents, whether they were the numbers taken down by the customs officers as the people came across the border, or whether they were actual persons who settled on land and took up their abode in Manitoba and the North-west. Yet we all know that this same immigration from the United States had been going on long before 1897. He spoke of the fact, which we are all glad to know, is now about to become a reality, that the Canadian securities will be equal to the best British securities, so far as the investment of trust funds is concerned. But he did not have the time to lay before this House, or to give information to this House, as I think he should have done, of the terms, and the conditions, upon which these securities are to be taken in respect to the trust funds which are invested in them. He came down with a very important proposition, no other than the proposition to admit the products of a large and fertile island in the West Indies into the community of free trade with the Dominion of Canada; and he had not either the time or did not take the trouble to give to this House one single line of information as to how this introduction of the products under free trade into Canada was to be carried out, to what extent, or in what regards they would differentiate or affect the trade of this country. He took an important step in giving a bonus by way of remitting the customs duty upon expensive machinery for the beet root industry in this country. But he gave the House no information as to whether later experiments and the experience of the last ten or fifteen years in countries situated something like Canada, gave a reasonable basis for believing that the beet root sugar industry of this country is one which can be successfully planted and ought to be, by bounty or otherwise, aided by this parliament. And so all the way through. He gave no details at all, even with reference to the current year, as to what would be the sources of the revenue, which the hon. gentleman says is this year going up to the 50 million mark. Why? Probably because he did not wish to tell the House, and more particularly the country, that in bringing it up to the 50 million mark he would have to draw about four million dollars more in taxation out of this country, which he must drag from the pockets of the people.

Now, Sir, I will take up seriatim some of the principal points touched upon by my hon. friend; and first, with reference to the expenditures of the country. The hon. gentleman was totally oblivious of his near neighbour, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), who sat very close behind him, though immediate proximity seemed during those particular hours to have been shunned. He took no notice at all of the way in which he must have been harrowing the feelings of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, whilst he was rolling forth from his tongue the immense expenditure of the last year and of the present and current year by the gentlemen who, in 1893 and 1896, made it the particular plank in their platform that the expenditures of the country were outrageously high, and that the Liberal-Conservative government should be put out of power because they would not reduce them. But, Sir, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) went into this business of expanding the expenditures of the country, of rolling up the millions that were devoted to these different objects, and generally to the carrying on the services of the country; and now in contrast I wish to bring the attention of this House and of hon. gentlemen opposite to the position they took before 1896, and to the strange commentary upon what they call their principles and their policy in the years preceding 1896, made by their acts since 1896. In 1893, these gentlemen commenced, in their convention, with declaring:

We cannot but view with alarm the large increase of the public debt and of the controllable annual expenditure of the Dominion, and the consequent undue taxation of the people under the governments that have been continuously in power since 1878; and we demand strict economy in the administration of the government of the country.

That was the pronouncement of the Liberal convention of 1893. Mr. Davies, now Sir Louis Davies, the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries, declared:

The Liberal party says that several millions may be lopped off the present expenditure, without injury to the public service.

The Hon. David Mills, now Minister of Justice in this government, estimated that 'The probable saving would be four millions of dollars.' Mr. John Charlton, at that time and still a member of this House, declared in this House:

The Liberal party, if in power, could at once reduce the public expenditure and effect other savings to the extent of five million dollars per annum, without impairing the efficiency of the service.

And Mr. Wilfrid Laurier, now the leader of this government, declared in Toronto:

If we get into power we will follow the example of Mr. Mackenzie; and I say that, although we may not be able to bring the expenditures to what they were under him, we can reduce the amount two, yes, three millions of dollars per year.

The present Minister of Trade and Commerce, who, for nearly twenty years went bellowing through this country against the great expenditures of the government, declared from his place in this House:

For my own part, I do not hesitate to tell him that I consider a yearly expenditure of forty million dollars, or thirty-eight million dollars, altogether too large for the present resources of Canada. I say that it is a disgrace and a shame to the government that have been entrusted with our affairs that they come down to us and ask for an expenditure of $38,300,000 a year for federal purposes. Sir, the thing is utterly unjustifiable.

The present economical minister, the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), who, when he was trying to get into office, objected to such things as the Governor General's salary, shouted himself hoarse over seventeen or even fourteen cabinet ministers in a country like Canada, swallowing up the money of the country in an attempt to govern the people, in 1895 declared, with his hand on his heart:

Who can justify the expenditure of our country to-day? It cannot be justified by the wealth of the country. There is nothing to warrant this enormous expenditure of nearly $38,000,000 except the fact that we are burdened down with debt and with office-holders, great and small.

And Mr. Paterson, now a member of this government, in 1890, declared:

In 1889 we were taking $6,115,000 more in taxes out of the people than we should, and we spent $7,571,000 more than we should. He declared that an era of economy in expenditure should be at once entered upon.

Mr. David Mills, at that time, but now the Minister of Justice, declared in 1893:

We say that the government of this country may be carried on for a very much smaller sum than that which is now being taken out of the pockets of the people for that purpose.

We are asking for a reduction of taxation; we are asking for economy in the management of public affairs.

Mr. Charlton, at that time, and still, a member of this House, declared that the people were becoming disgusted.

They see the taxation from customs is increasing, they see the public debt piling up, they see the inordinate increase in the expenditure, . . . and our people are leaving the country in disgust.

Mr. Mills again declared, in 1889:

I have no doubt at all that the efficiency of the public service might be increased and the expenditure diminished by almost one-half.

On a special point, the present hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), declared :

Now, I believe that the services of this government will be infinitely better conducted if we had seven cabinet ministers and a moderate number of junior officials to assist them. It does appear to be a monstrous piece of folly and extravagance that we should find it necessary to augment our number of seventeen. This is far too many, and is a dissatisfaction to the country.

And, if I may be permitted to join the smaller to the greater, I would say, that, in 1894, the present hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), said :

I must take exception, in the first place, to the office ever having been created.

What office? The Ministership of Trade and Commerce.

I do not see why it was created, unless it was to give a resting place, for the balance of his life, to the hon. gentleman who now occupies the position, drawing $7,000 a year for virtually doing nothing.

I suppose the hon. gentleman now is willing that this office shall be retained in order to give a resting place for the 'onlooker' of the present cabinet, who has passed his period of active service. What are these that I have been reading? These statements that I have been reading represent the solemn pledges of grown men, who have lived in this country and engaged in its politics for thirty, twenty-five and eighteen years. These are the utterances of men, who stood before the people, with their hands on their hearts, and declared that they were honest and truth-telling; these are the utterances of men, all anxious to climb into power, taking hold of these pledges as of the rungs of a ladder, by which they have gained power, and which, after they have gained power, they have kicked over, and broken entirely the pledges which they made. Hon. gentlemen smile as I recount these things. Why? Because they believe there is no longer necessity for truth and honour in the public men of this country, because they believe that the electorate is as debauched, as utterly to be contemned, as utterly to be despised as are their promises so solemnly made and so often repeated before the people. Is there any reason why these gentlemen should not cover their faces with their hands whenever they meet an honest man in this country? Do they believe, that, by means of the machine which they control, of the creatures that they take into their confidence, and send off to do their electioneering work, they are going to pass scot-free for this violation of what, in England, would consign any public man to political oblivion as surely as he has engaged in public life in that country? Now, these hon. gentlemen came in, and what have they done since they came in? What have they done with the expenditure of this country? The hon. Minister of Finance

Mr. FOSTER.

(Mr. Fielding), said, in a light and airy way : We had last year more money, we had a revenue $6,186,000 greater than we had the year before. Great applause from the back benches! Let me translate that into plain English, such as the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce would have used in 1896. What does it mean? That you are taking out of the pockets of the people, the wage-earners, the labouring classes, the farmers of this country, $1.16 per head more than the previous year for every man, woman and child in Canada. He made the statement that they had taken five millions and odd more in customs and excise than they took last year. Again applause from the back benches. Translate it, and what does it mean? That from these people, who were 'bled white,' in the language of my hon. friend opposite, the farmers, the people whose backs were bowed beneath the burdens of extravagant government, you are taking $1 per head over and above what you took the year before in taxes alone. Then, Sir, he boasted that he had a surplus of $4,837,000. It was again greeted with applause. The translation of this into language of old times would have been : A surplus, Sir! You have no business with a surplus; when you take sufficient out of the pockets of the people of this country to care for the ordinary consolidated fund expenditure and services, you have no business to take more. You should have let that remain in the pockets of the people, who could use it a great deal better than you could use it here. My hon. friend was very solicitous lest we should confuse the expenditures upon consolidated fund and capital. He said that some gentlemen were apt to confuse them. Who are the gentlemen? They are apt to be confused, when we find the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) spreading upon the estimates and voting through this House, on the lines of capital expenditure, hundreds of thousands of dollars, which, in preceding governments, were always met out of consolidated fund and charged to consolidated fund alone. It is things, such as this, Sir, which make it impossible for people to rightly appreciate the expenditures of the country, unless you take the total expenditures, because, the line and distinction between capital and revenue expenditures has been obliterated, blotted out, a course approved by hon. gentlemen opposite, and which has been most determinedly opposed by this side of the House in the interest of a parity of action, and consequently of fair comparison, and also, in the interests of the administration itself. Let us take both. It has been stated over and over again, by hon. gentlemen opposite, that when the late government were in power, they were a very extravagant government. I wish to put a table before the House, and I will read the figures contained in it. It gives the expenditures on consolidated revenue account, and also the total expenditures in parallel columns, consequently, I offend in neither respect, and I do not confuse the two.

Now, Sir, one word as to total expenditure, for after all that is really what we spend. That is what we get either from the country or by borrowing, and that it is which measures the extravagance or the economy of a government. It is all very well to manipulate surpluses and capital expenditure so as to enable you to make a large capital expenditure and yet not increase the debt largely; but the plain truth is told by the total expenditure, and it is this plain truth that this House requires and that the country needs. If we take the average from 1892 to 1896, it is $42,141,763. The House will notice that the average total expenditure of the late Liberal-Conservative government from 1892 to 1896 was less by about $400,000 per year than from 1887 to 1891.

Now, Sir, when you leave the year 1896 what do you find? You find that in 1897, the average total expenditure rises to $42,972,755.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I do not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but would he state again what he makes the total expenditure for 1896?

Mr. FOSTER. The total expenditure for 1896 is $41,702,383, and to assist my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright), I will tell him what the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding), has had to tell me in this House for three several times, but only upon my jogging his memory, namely: that simply in a book-keeping way he charged up to the government expenditure in 1896 $2,394,000 for the North Shore Quebec Railway subsidy, which was a liability incurred in 1882, and not in 1896. And though it was included in railway subsidies actually paid in 1896, I challenge the Finance Minister to rise in his place now, and tell this House that he has paid off that liability. He put the total sum in the railway subsidies of 1896, and charged it to the late government, and to this day he is simply paying the interest, as was the condition of the grant made in 1882. That is why I wish to assist my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright), lest he fall into a trap.

Now, Sir, when you come to the summation of that matter let it for ever put to rest gentlemen who state that the Liberal-Conservative government for the last ten or fifteen years of its existence was an extravagant government as measured by great increases in public expenditure. What is that summation? It is that the Liberal-Conservative government spent in totality $388,237 per year less from 1892 to 1896, than from 1887 to 1891, and, that the present government has exceeded the Liberal-Conservative average expenditure from 1892 to 1896 as follows:

In 1897 by.....	$ 830,992
In 1898 by.....	3,192,518
In 1899 by.....	9,400,872

And as estimated by the Finance Minister for this current year of 1900, they will over-expend the average expenditure of the late government from 1892 to 1896, by the sum of $10,908,255.

Now, Sir, I invite any gentleman on the other side of the House to take the public accounts which he can have put in his hand and to deny one single statement that I have made with reference to a comparison of this expenditure as between the two governments.

Let us now take the total expenditure per head of the population. I am not going into any fanciful enumeration of the population of this country, because I am not able to do so any more than is the Minister of Trade and Commerce, although in his speech in Massey Hall he undertook himself to make up the population of this country and draw his deductions from the figures he made, and he got himself into an absurd tangle in his attempt to do it. I am taking what the public records give us as to the population of this country, as we have to do between the years when the census is taken. Well, Sir, how does it stand? The following table will show it at a glance. The total expenditure of this country from 1892 to 1895 with a population on the average of 5,011,000 was $42,141,764, or a per head expenditure of $8.41. In 1896, with a population of 5,125,436, and a total expenditure of $41,702,383, the expenditure per head was $8.14. Here is the per capita expenditure of this country for the years mentioned, and any one can institute a comparison:

TOTAL PER CAPITA EXPENDITURE.

1895.....	$8 41
1896.....	8 14
1897.....	8 28
1898.....	8 63
1899.....	9 72

Here we have a per capita expenditure in 1899 of $9.72, according to the figures given by the Minister of Customs and by the Dominion Statistician. Now, Sir, let me make a slight comparison. In 1893 it was that my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) denounced the Liberal-Conservative government for its extravagance, and declared that he would bring the expenditure of this country at two millions or three millions less than it was. Now, Mr. Speaker, what are the comparisons ?

	Consolidated Fund Expenditure.	Total Expenditure.
1893	$36,814,052	$40,853,727
1899	41,903,500	51,542,635
Increases	$ 5,089,448	$10,689,108

And yet, these hon. gentlemen claim that they have fulfilled their pledges. Having driven out a government which was so extravagant, these gentlemen have marked, and marked in a significant manner, their appreciation of economy by spending $10,689,000 more in the last year than was spent in 1893. Well, Sir, that is not the best of it or the worst of it: for the estimates given by the Finance Minister for the current year are as follows: That the expenditure on consolidated fund will be $43,175,000, and on capital, $9,875,000, a total expenditure of $53,050,000, as compared with a total expenditure in 1896 of $41,702,383. In the current year, the revenue is to go up to $51,000,000, an excess of $4,400,000 over last year, and the expenditure is to increase over that of the present year by $1,500,000.

Now, Sir, having made this comparison, I wish to come back to the statement which was made by the Minister of Finance. He desired to show, as regards the increase of the debt, that the present government was in a much better position than the late government; and how did he attempt to show that? Why, Sir, he took the years from 1878 to 1896, and said that in those eighteen years the debt was increased by $118,000,000, an average of $6,563,000 per year, whereas from 1896 to 1899, three years, there was an increase in the debt of $7,700,000, or an average increase of $2,503,000 per year; and then he imagined that he had satisfied this House and this country that he had proved the matter up to the hilt. Was there ever a more unfair statement made? Was there ever a more flagrant outrage committed upon all reasonable rules of comparison? The hon. gentleman takes the period from 1878 to 1896, and he compares the increase of capital expenditure in those years with the increase in the three years just past when Canada had almost completed her house and installed her main furnishings and now had but to provide the lesser requirements in the various departments of the public service. Let me read to my hon. friend some figures, and then see if he does not himself feel ashamed of having attempted to palm off so unfair a statement upon the country. From 1878 to 1896 we were building the Canadian Pacific Railway, and we spent $65,000,000 of capital on that road; in the three years past these gentlemen have spent just $23,000 on the Canadian Pacific Railway. From 1878 to 1896 we spent on canals, $36,000,000; in the last three years these gentlemen have spent $9,300,000. From 1878 to 1896 we set aside as debts to the provinces, $10,300,000; while these hon. gentlemen have made an appropriation of only $260,000; and yet the Finance Minister of this country thinks it is not beneath his dignity, and that it is fair and reasonable, to make a comparison between these utterly dissimilar periods as regards great expenditures. We spent on the Intercolonial Railway branches, $20,500,000; they have spent $1,400,000. We assumed the St. Lawrence debt, $2,700,000, and went on thereafter with the improvement ourselves; they have assumed nothing with regard to the debt incurred by the Montreal Harbour Commission in improving the St. Lawrence. On the Quebec North Shore Railway we assumed $2,394,000; they have spent nothing. On territorial expenses we expended $900,000; they nothing. On the North-west rebellion we paid $4,800,000 out of the revenues of the country; they incurred no like expense.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FOSTER. Why this outburst of ill-timed enthusiasm? Are the hon. gentlemen opposite dissatisfied that the rebellion was quelled? Are they dissatisfied that we did not add that expense to the national debt, but paid it out of the abundant revenues of the country? Or if they are dissatisfied with neither of these things, why this lucid ejaculation? If you add all these expenditures from 1878 to 1896 together, you will find that we spent on these great services of the country $142,600,000, while they spent no more than $11,000,000 on similar services; and, Sir, will you remark it, while we spent $142,600,000, our debt increased only $118,000,000, the rest of the expenditure being provided for out of the revenues of the country. And yet, my hon. friend thinks that it is a fair thing to send out to the country a comparison on such dissimilar grounds as he placed before this House on Friday last. Let us look at another point. Suppose we did increase the debt from 1878 to 1896 by $6,563,000 a year, while they increased it during the last three years by only $2,503,000 a year; let us go to the other side of the ledger. How much taxation did we take out of the people of this country from 1878 to 1896? We took $26,500,000 a year. How much have these gentlemen taken out in the three years since they came into office? They have taken out $31,000,000 a year, and they are increasing this in the present year by $4,000,000. If we had taken the same taxation out of the country that these gentlemen are taking out of it to-day, we would have met all that expenditure of $142,600,000, and we would have comparatively little of that $118,000,000 added to the debt of the country. The hon. gentleman says: Now, look at my surplus. Yes, look at his surplus. Why, Sir, there was an hon. gentleman close behind him who made a remark with reference to surpluses, not once, but many times in this House. Let me read it. In 1882 he declared, when Mr. Tilley announced a surplus of $4,000,000:

I ask how it was got. $1,100,000 was derived from two of the most odious and oppressive taxes which were never imposed in any civilized country before, under similar circumstances at least—the taxes on breadstuffs and fuel. If he really wants to relieve the people, let him remove the taxes on breadstuffs and coal.

If my hon. friend boasts of a surplus to-day, there is an hon. gentleman sitting close beside him who will tell him that he need not look around very long for a method of remitting that to the people, and thus ridding the people of what this prominent member of the government declared over and over again, an odious tax which should not be allowed in any civilized country—the tax on breadstuffs and coal.

Mr. COCHRANE. Who said that?

Mr. FOSTER. That was stated by Sir Richard Cartwright. But we have another authority on this question, also a member of this government, by name D. Mills, and the Hon. David Mills said:

He boasts of a surplus. I say that a government is not entitled to have a surplus. There is no stimulus to economy when a large surplus remains in the hands of the government. A large surplus invites to extravagance, and has invited to extravagance in this country. The government and parliament of this country should inaugurate a system of economy.

That is a statement made in 1893 by a gentleman who is to-day a colleague of the Minister of Finance, and when the Minister of Finance comes down and boasts of one surplus of $4,700,000 and a coming one of $7,500,000, I refer him to his colleagues.

The hon. gentleman wanted to show that the era of deficits had passed, and that an era of surpluses had succeeded. Well, what years do you suppose he chose in order to make a fair comparison between the two administrations in the matter of surpluses and deficits, and how do you suppose he treated the question, even after selecting his ground? He took the years of Conservative administration of 1893, 1894 and 1895, and he said that in those three years there was a deficit of $5,694,759. He then took the three succeeding years of the present government, and he added up the surpluses and deducted the small deficit, and made a net surplus, and then adding this surplus to the former deficit, he exclaimed: Behold a betterment of $11,000,000! Does my hon. friend think it fair to select a period of depression, such as existed in this country from 1893 to 1895, and to compare that with a period of the greatest expansion, as he himself says, ever known in Canada? Why did my hon. friend not go back to 1891? He would have found that in 1891 we had a surplus and also in 1892, and he would have found out some other things. He would have found that in 1891, when we had a buoyant revenue and a surplus of $155,971, with another surplus in sight for the next year, I, as Finance Minister of the government of that day, came down to this House and wiped out entirely the duties on raw sugar, which were very high. If he had looked at the calculations he would have found the following result, and I give him this table for comparison:

In 1891 we remitted taxation on sugar—it came into effect the latter part of that year—to the extent of $227,477, and we had a surplus of $155,977. In 1892, the remission of sugar taxation, calculated on an equal consumption, was $5,200,000, and still we had a surplus of $1,354,555. In 1893, calculated on the consumption, the remission of taxation on raw sugar and other sugar amounted to $4,000,000, and we had a deficit on $1,210,232. In 1894, the remission of sugar taxation was $4,821,000, and we had a deficit of $4,153,875. And in 1895, after which I placed again the duty on raw sugar, the remission of total taxation was $5,603,521, and the deficit had come down to $330,551. What is the summing of the matter? It is that in that period there was taxation remitted to the tune of $19,800,000, but there was a net deficit of $4,184,227. So that consequently there was given back to the country, in the remission of taxation, over and above the deficit which had to be provided out of capital, the sum of $15,000,000.

Those are facts which were known to my hon. friend and which he might have taken into account in making his comparison, but which, unfortunately for him, would have entirely destroyed it. That no doubt was the reason why he ignored them.

There is something more. If you will take the collections you will find this comparison. We collected in taxes from 1894 to 1896, $80,700,000; and they collected taxes from 1897 to 1899, $93,100,000. That is, they collected more than we did by $12,400,000. From 1894 to 1896, in the other revenues, we collected $26,200,000, and from 1897 to 1899, they collected $32,000,000, or $5,800,000 more than we did. Making the comparison in this way, comparing the actually collected revenue in both cases, they collected $18,200,000 more from the people in the three years of their administration than we did in the three years of our administration which the hon. gentleman selected, and this would have entirely wiped out his so-called betterment of $11,000,000, and left $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 to the good besides.

Surpluses, says my hon. friend. Does he know that since confederation there have been twenty surpluses in our financial history? Does he know that the Liberals can only boast of three of these, and that out of twelve deficits the Liberals are responsible for five, and the Liberal-Conservatives on seven. But of the seven, two were due to the paying of the North-west rebellion expenses out of the revenues of the country, and the other three were due to this remission of sugar taxation of which I have spoken.

I am willing to take a deficit when it is caused in that way, by relieving the burdens of the people. But, what burden of the people, has this gentleman relieved? I fail to see. Sir, he has added taxation. He has added taxation on liquors and tobacco. And, he has added taxation on sugar, under the pretense of giving a preference to the West Indies, which he knew at the time would not be operative, and he came up at the next session of parliament and declared that it had not been operative. And why? Because at the very time he put on this duty, there was such legislation in the United States of America in respect of the counter-vailing duties, that it more than made up to the West India cane sugar producers for the preference he gave them. Yet he added from $300,000 to $500,000 on sugar under that pretense. Yet, even when he acknowledged that it was but a pretense, he had not the sense of fair play, which should impel him to remit the taxation which he put on the people upon a pretense which was unfounded.

From 1891 to 1895, there were three several reductions of the tariff under the Conservative party, on sugar, on molasses, on glass; and in 1894, a general revision of the tariff, which, calculated in any way that my hon. friend pleases, made a greater remission of taxation, by far, than all the cuts and all the revisions of the tariff that he has made since 1897 to the present hour. Now, Mr. Chairman, so far, I have dealt with the large figures of the expenditure. Let me give the House a table in detail. I will compare 1895-6 with 1898-9, expenditure on consolidated account in the different departments of government. What was the great charge hurled against us by hon. gentlemen opposite? That we were extravagant in every department of government; that every department might well have its expenditure reduced. Take 1895-6, which was the last fiscal year of the late government, and compare it with 1898-9, under hon. gentlemen opposite:

EXPENDITURES ON Consolidated Fund Account.

Now, lest I overwhelm the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), with these astonishing figures respecting his own department, I will say, that, at long last, he has plucked up courage to pay the silver-lead smelting bounties in British Columbia, for which legislation was prepared and passed by the Conservative government before they went out of office, and that a large part of the expenditure in his department is due to the paying of these long-deferred bounties. In the whole of the pages of comparison in the public accounts of this year, there are only four or five departments or sub-departments of government in which there has not been an increase.

Now, let me say something with reference to the taxation of this country. The opinion has prevailed, made to prevail, by these hon. gentlemen very largely, that the taxation taken from the country by the Liberal-Conservatives was exceedingly high. This was urged as a strong reason for the defeat of the late government. The pledges of those who are now in power led the whole country to believe that the load of taxation would be relieved if they were returned to power. It will be interesting to read these figures, taken from the hon. gentleman's own returns. In 1889-90, we had the period of highest taxation in this country, and I begin with that year.

VOLUME OF TAXATION AND REVENUE.

	Taxes.	Total Revenue.
1889-90.....	$31,587,071	$39,879,925
1890-1.....	30,314,151	38,579,310
1891-2.....	28,446,157	36,921,871
1892-3.....	29,321,367	38,168,608
1893-4.....	27,579,203	35,374,693
1894-5.....	25,446,198	33,978,129
1895-6.....	27,759,235	36,618,590
1896-7.....	28,648,626	37,829,778
1897-8.....	29,576,455	40,555,238
1898-9.....	34,958,059	46,741,249

We see, therefore, by these figures, that 1894-5, when the taxation was $25,446,198, and the total revenue $33,978,129, was the period of lowest taxation, and we know that from 1890 to 1894, including these years, three successive reductions had been made in the tariff of the country. Now, Sir, what follows? That whereas in 1889-90, $31,500,000 were taken from the country in taxation, in 1894-5 that had been reduced to $25,500,000, or in round numbers, $6,000,000, largely by the tariff revises which had taken place under the Conservative government. These figures, I think, are a striking commentary upon two things: First, the alleged extravagance and the high taxation under the Liberal-Conservative government, and the beautiful way the unique way, in which these economists have carried out their pledges and reduced the taxation by increasing it $7,190,000 from 1896 to 1899.

Well, Sir, there is another way of making comparisons, which is the taxation per head. The highest, as I have said, was in 1890, $5.01. From 1892 to 1896, the average was $3.95 per head. In 1895 it was $3.52; 1896, $3.94; 1897, $3.83. Why lower in 1897? Was it because my hon. friend, as he said yesterday, when talking about expenditure, that for 1897 they had not control of the expenditure, consequently, as the House will see, it was fairly light. But in 1898-99, when they had got control, the House sees, and the country will see how it went up. So, in 1897, was it only $3.83 per head because they had not control of the machinery? But in 1898 it went up to $4.22; and in 1899 it is $4.84 per head. That is to say, the reduction per head from 1890 to 1895, under a Conservative administration, was $1.49. In customs and excise both, there was an increase in 1896 to $1.58. From 1896 to 1899, the increase in customs alone is 90 cents per head, and in customs and excise together, $1.16. And this past year is but a promise of what the present current year and the succeeding year are to be in the way of still greater increases.

Now, Sir, I want to say a word on the tariff rates so as to make a comparison which will bring out as clearly as we possibly can what is the difference between these hon. gentlemen under what they call their low revenue tariff, or moderate tariff, and the Liberal-Conservative government under what hon. gentlemen opposite denominate as the extravagantly high national policy duties. Now, I am not going to make these calculations myself. There is only one thing that a member of an opposition can sometimes get out of the government, he can occasionally get some information from them, and when these hon. gentlemen do get their blue-books down—which the Minister of Trade and Commerce has not done yet, and the lack of which I felt in my preparation for my reply to the hon. gentleman who spoke on Friday—I say that when we do get the figures made up by themselves, I propose to take them as long as I think they fairly conserve the facts, and are based upon impartial lines. So, I take the trade and navigation figures, and these are the duties on dutiable and free imports into this country for home consumption. The highest year of tariff rate was in 1899, when it was 21.65 per cent. In 1890, it was 21.21; in 1891, 20.06; in 1892, 17.56; in 1894, 17.13; in 1895, 16.99. The House will see that from 1889 to 1895 the percentage rate of taxation fell from 21.65 to 16.99 under the successive reductions of the tariff which were made by the Liberal-Conservatives. Now, in 1896, the rate goes up, because, as I said, a part of the sugar duties were put back, and the rate in that year was 18.28. In 1897, when the hon. gentlemen had not got control of things, the rate was 17.87; in 1898, it was 16.95, when they had got control of things; and in 1899, it is brought down in these figures as 16.70. Now, Sir, I will take the hon. gentlemen on their own ground. I am not making these figures, they are made by the administration opposite, they are compiled from the returns, they are presumably correct. Now, what is the state of things which they disclose? If we compare 1889 with 1895, there has been a reduction of 4·66 per cent in the rate of taxation under the Liberal-Conservatives. If you take the imports of 1895, which were $105,252,000, you will find that 4·66 per cent of it is $4,900,000, that is to say, the reduction in the rate of taxation from 1889 to 1895 is 4·66 per cent; and the actual volume of taxation taken off on that basis is $4,900,000. Now, we will take 1896, their own figures still. The tariff rate was 18·28; in 1899 it was 16·70, a difference between the two periods of 1·58. The total imports for 1899 were $149,346,459. So, if you had taken the tariff rate of 1896 and applied it to these imports, you would have taken from the people $2,435,000 more than actually was taken. That is to say, by their own showing they have saved, in the volume of taxation, $2,400,000 by their reductions, whilst the Liberal-Conservatives saved $4,900,000 by their reductions. Does the hon. Minister of Customs dispute those figures?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). No, but I would treat them somewhat differently.

Mr. FOSTER. How would the hon. gentleman treat them differently if he treated them honestly? I take my hon. friend's statement now. He would treat them differently. How?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Because you are speaking of reductions made on your own figures. Our reductions are made upon your revenues and your figures.

Mr. FOSTER. I am speaking of reductions made on the figures of the Trade and Navigation Returns, on the figures which your own report gives me. I have made the calculations, I will put them before the House, and I will challenge you to dispute their correctness. I am following up, exactly, the method that the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) pursued on Friday, when he said he had figured out a rate of 2·02 per cent of a reduction, equal to a reduction of taxation of $3,070,000.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. A reduction as compared with your tariff, not as compared with any tariff of our own.

Mr. FOSTER. I will carry on the comparison a little farther. From 1892 to 1896, a period of five years, the average rate of custom tariff was 17·47 per cent; from 1897 to 1899, three years, the average rate was 17·17 per cent. So that if you take three years of the hon. gentleman's administration, they have reduced the tariff rates by 30-100 of one per cent. Now, their answer to that will be: Well, but, in 1897,

Mr. FOSTER.

we had done nothing with the tariff until the very last month, or two months of the year. Very well, then, we will take 1898 and 1899, two years. During these two years their average was 16·82 per cent, and if you deduct that from the average rate from 1892 to 1896 it gives a reduction of 65-100 of one per cent of the average tariff rate. But they will say: Our full preference was not in force in these two years. Then, we will take the year 1899, when, by their own calculation, their rate was 16·70; this is a reduction of 77-100 of one per cent compared with the average tariff rate from 1892 to 1896. Now, these are statements which are made from their own figures, which are open to this House and which can be canvassed by the country and pondered upon. But, there is a peculiar circumstance that I would like to call to the attention of the hon. Minister of Customs, who deals honestly with figures and wishes to do what is right. I will ask him if, in 1896, 23,000,000 bushels of Indian corn had been imported into the country, how would it have been entered in the Trade and Navigation Returns of that year? He knows that that 23,000,000 bushels would not have been taken for consumption in this country, and, that a very small proportion, comparatively, is taken, even now, for home consumption, of the corn that comes in from the United States. It passes through the country in transit and is exported from this country as foreign produce. I ask the hon. Minister of Customs, if, under these conditions, in 1896, there had been 23,000,000 bushels of American corn brought into this country, in what column it would have been entered—for home consumption, or under general imports? The hon. gentleman knows that not a bushel of it would have been entered for home consumption except that small quantity which was actually intended for home consumption, and that the rest of it would not have gone into the home consumption totals for the calculation of the revenue rates, and it would have gone out as foreign product exported. Now, the thing is changed. Corn is free, and I ask the hon. Minister of Customs to take his Trade and Navigation Returns, to turn up the book and find how much corn, from the United States, was entered in the column of total imports, and not included in the home consumption column upon which the scale and rate of duty is to be calculated. How much will he find? I venture to tell him that he will not find a bushel, but, he will find that 23,342,847 bushels of American corn were brought into this country, placed in the columns of his returns: 'entered for home consumption,' that the value of that was $8,966,925, and if he will go to the column of exports he will find that of that 23,000,000 bushels, 16,009,847 bushels, valued at $6,362,683 have been exported from this country, as foreign product, to the old country. If the hon. gentleman wishes to deal honestly with figures he will instruct the clerks of his departments to take that $6,362,683 worth of corn, entered here for home consumption, but which did not go into home consumption, and which was never meant to go into home consumption, but into the exports of foreign products, from the $154,000,000 which he has taken as the home consumption totals upon which to calculate his averages. Will the hon. gentleman do that? Does he consider that this is dealing honestly with the country? I give my hon. friend greater credit for sagacity and knowledge than not to know the currents of trade upon such important articles as Indian corn, in the department of which he is the head, and where he is constantly in touch with the details of the business. Why is it they have gained the advantage of a lower rate per cent this year which the addition of this $6,000,000 odd, where it should never have been added, has given them? Because, either the hon. gentleman's clerks did not choose to do the right thing, or, because when the hon. gentleman was calculating the rates he did not give what was fair and honest information in reference to them. If he will deduct that $6,362,683 from the $154,000,000 and divide the remainder into the duty collected, he will find that, instead of 16·70 per cent, as I have hurriedly made the calculation, his rate for 1899 will be 17·36 per cent, as compared with 16·99 per cent in 1895, and with 18·28 per cent in 1896, instead of 16·70 per cent, and he will find that his gain of reduction of duty in 1899 over 1896 is only 92-100 of one per cent. I may be mistaken in this point; I am anxious that I may be set right if I am mistaken, but, if I am right in my calculations and assumptions, I think it is the duty of the hon. Minister of Customs, of the hon. Minister of Finance, and of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, to set this matter right at once, for Sir, if you cannot take our blue-books, solemnly given to the people as a record of facts, as in every respect true to fact, and make your calculations upon the basis of the circumstances which actually exist, then, Sir, you most surely implant the canker and virus of that suspicion and want of confidence which will effectually destroy all value in our public records. Now, if we apply this as the true rate, until it is contradicted, what do we find? From 1892 until 1896 the rate average was 17·47. In 1896, it was 18·28, and in 1899, it was 17·36. That is, in 1899 the tariff rate is just eleven-one hundredths of one per cent less than the tariff rate from 1892 to 1896, upon the average. And, the reduction of taxation which the Minister of Finance calculated yesterday at $3,017,000 will be reduced to $1,417,000 over 1896, at the rate of reduction of ninety-two-one hundredths of one per cent. I have one word more to say with reference to these rates? Again, they are not my own figures, but the figures of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I give them for what they are worth, and I take them to be true. What are they? I have here a list of the rate of dutiable goods imported from Great Britain, and I find that in 1896, the rate of tariff imposed on dutiable goods from Great Britain was 30·20. In 1899 it is 26·62, or just three and fifty-eight-one hundredths of one per cent less than it was in 1896. Again I say these are not my figures. They are the figures taken from the table published by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in his report.

Mr. HAGGART. With the percentages calculated by him?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, with the percentages themselves calculated by his department, and set down by the department, and this is simply a copy of those figures which I have put upon this paper from which I am reading.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And under the operation of the preference.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, under the operation of the preference. Now, what are the facts disclosed as to this preference? Here you have an important policy founded upon a preference. A preference of what? A preference of 25 per cent of the duty, and it goes into force 12½ per cent first and then another 12½, making it 25, and for eleven months of this year 1899, the 25 per cent reduction has been in force. If you take 30·20, which was the tariff on dutiable goods in 1896, their full reduction of 25 per cent would be 7·55. They should have had these figures of duty reduced to somewhere near 7·55 per cent, but instead of that they are reduced only 3·58 per cent. But I will deal more with that question later. My hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) undertook to go over a large number of what he called indications of prosperity in this country. I agree with him that in the main these are evidences of prosperity. First, the growth of trade; second, the deposits in the public banks and the savings; third, the clearing house returns, which register the transactions of trade to a large extent. Then there is the immigration into the country and the various other points which he mentioned. But, Sir, when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) was speaking I thought I had heard an argument advanced per contra on that very line, and in looking it up I found that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), on one occasion in replying to myself, when I gave in as careful a manner as I could these same evidences and drew conclusions of prosperity from them; the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) rose and made a very serious and very vigorous comment on my position. And what did he say?

Bank deposits! Sir, evidences of debt are not evidences of prosperity. Savings bank deposits! Where is the money? You have not got it. If a run were made on your bank to-day, you would have to go to England and borrow it. You owe it; it is interred in public works and railway subsidies, to keep some one behind the minister in good humour.

The further extract is blurred here.

Mr. MONTAGUE. He got mixed.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, I will stop at 'good humour.' It is a very appropriate place to stop and the argument of the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) is brought out. I did not entirely agree with my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) when he criticised these indications, but, anyway, there is what he said. The Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce are now sitting together, and I dare say that on Friday night the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) quietly took the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) by the lapel of the coat and said:

See here, Fielding, you make a great mistake in that. Do you know that evidences of debt are not evidences of prosperity? Why, you have not got that money; it is interred in railway subsidies and public works to keep some troublesome follower behind you in proper subordination: do you not know that if you were called on for the money in the savings banks you have not got it in your treasury and that you would have to borrow it.

And so I think that a modifying influence may have been used in that way by the colleague of the Finance Minister. However, maybe the sweets of office have modified the asperities of his former criticism: maybe that the delights of sitting back as an on-looker and alternately laughing, and underneath his beard sometimes, I fear, swearing at the vagaries of his colleagues; perhaps these have so softened his former opinions or obliterated them, that he has not used the keen edge of criticism on his honourable colleague the Finance Minister.

Well, Sir, I have nothing to quarrel with in these indications of prosperity, but I have some remarks to make as to the manner in which they were collated and placed before the House. Does the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) tell me that he is giving any fair comparative or other statement of the trade of Canada by dividing it arbitrarily into three unequal periods—the first period from 1868 to 1878 (ten years); the second period from 1878 to 1896 (eighteen years); and the third period from 1896 to 1899 (three years). On what basis has he made the collocation of these figures; on what basis has he made this aggregation? Does not my hon. friend know that when he states that in 1898 the trade was $131,000,000; and in 1879, it was only $153,000,000; does he not know that he has simply caricatured the state of trade from 1868 to 1879, because if you look over the course of trade, you will find that in 1873 it had gone up to $217,000,000 from $131,000,000 in 1868, and then in 1873, for some reason it commenced to decline until it went down to $153,000,000 at the end of the administration of the Mackenzie government in which my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) was Finance Minister, as compared with $217,000,000 in 1873. Well, take the other period, from 1879 to 1896. In 1879 the trade was $153,000,000, and in 1896 it was $239,000,000. Any one looking over the trade reports knows that in that long period of eighteen years there were periods of greater and less trade, because cycles of greater or less prosperity succeeded each other—twice, three times, sometimes four times, in that length of time. My hon. friend knows also that the circumstances of this country radically change from period to period, and so his comparison was entirely worthless, except that he wished to exaggerate the immense and splendid increase the last three years had registered in the trade of this country, taking those unfavourable points of comparison, as he did, in 1878 and 1896. Well, Sir, let us look at this question of trade. Nobody doubts at all that the trade of Canada has advanced and advanced splendidly in the last three years. Nobody who will be fair, doubts that the turn of the tide commenced in 1894. Nobody who has read the financial and trade history of this country doubts for a single moment that the conserving power of the national policy from 1891 to 1895 did great things for Canada, preserving her in a position enjoyed by very few other countries in the world. Let me give an outside authority for that—an authority who has been quoted in this House before, a famous statistician and publicist, the Hon. Mr. Wells, who in the Forum of 1894 wrote as follows:

In the Dominion of Canada, separated from us on the north by an imaginary line, there has been no panic, no unusual demand for money, no stoppage of industries, no restriction of trade, no increased rate of interest; in short, nothing beyond the ordinary course of events, except so far as these events may have been influenced by contiguity to what may be termed a financial cyclone whose pathway of destruction was contiguous to, but not within Canadian territory.

That is a statement of great force and great worth, coming from the eminent man who penned it. Well, Sir, that period of 1891-5 was one of well-sustained activity in the Dominion of Canada. There was a disturbance of trade; there was a falling off in imports; there was in one or two years a slight falling off in exports. But, Sir, by 1894 the tide had turned, and we were on the uphill course, as was shown by such signs of prosperity which the hon. gentleman mentioned in his budget speech. From 1894 into 1895 and in 1896, the progress of this country was upwards towards a cycle of greater prosperity; and these hon. gentlemen got into power just when he was taking on its greatest vigour and strength. They are to be congratulated on having obtained power on so auspicious an occasion and under circumstances so favourable to trade and commerce. But is it not arrant foolishness, is it not the very opposite of reason and common sense to declare that because these hon. gentlemen came into power at that particular time, therefore all the splendid progress in trade which has taken place since is due either to the administration or the legislation of these hon. gentlemen? No thoughtful man will be misled who is used to accounts and to financial and trade history; but, put as the case was by my hon. friend the Finance Minister, it goes forth to people who from their position are not able to look into these matters and judge them fairly, but must take the statement according to the credence they give to the man who utters it. As I said, I do not for a single moment deny the increase of trade, but I deny that it is so great as hon. gentlemen have stated, and I think that one or two sober words may as well now be heard by this House and this country with regard to that. My jubilant and hon. friend, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, when he was in Massey Hall, declared with a great flourish of trumpets that the trade of Canada in 1899 was $90,000,000 and over greater than it was in 1896. Trade and commerce reports, when they come down, reduce that to $82,600,000. That is the first moderate reduction. But there are other things to be taken into account. What is it that really benefits Canada and is the index of the prosperity and growth of Canada, so far as her productions and her commerce are concerned? It is the amount of the imports for consumption in the country on the one hand, and the amount of the exports which are the products of the country on the other hand. The trade which rushes through a country is of some service to some parties; but it is not to be taken into serious account when you are trying to get down to the basis of a country's greatness and prosperity. If you take the dutiable merchandise and the free goods imported into this country for home consumption, you will find that the imports were just about $44,000,000 greater in 1899 than they were in 1896. If you take the exports of home produce, you will find that they were $27,600,000 greater in 1899 than in 1896. Taking these together, the total real trade of Canada, in and out, is $71,700,000 greater in 1899 than in 1896. So that we reduce the amount first from $90,000,000 to $82,600,000, and then to $71,700,000. But, further, if you take the actual merchandise imported for home consumption, and take the domestic exports, deducting the corn, which is brought into this country and entered for home consumption, but which goes out as a foreign product, that figure is again reduced to about $64,000,000, which represents about the real amount of the trade, export and import, on the basis which I have laid down, as the gain of 1899 over 1896. Well, Sir, that is a great gain. It is a gain which any government and any country may well be proud of; but we derive no benefit for ourselves, and we do not conserve the real interests of this country and our real government and conduct of this country by representing our trade any larger than it is, so far as its real value to the country is concerned.

Now, I want to call the attention of my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance to another point. When he is talking of the trade of 1899 being so much greater than the trade of 1895, has he never realized the fact that he is speaking about values of trade and not volume of trade? To take a rough illustration, suppose that in 1895 there was exported from this country 20,000,000 bushels of wheat at $1 a bushel, that would swell our imports by $20,000,000. Suppose that in 1899 we exported an equal amount, 20,000,000 bushels, but only at a valuation of 50 cents per bushel, our export trade would then show $10,000,000 less on exactly the same amount of sweat and labour and toil and production of the country. The difference in value must be taken into question as well as the difference in volume. I am not stating that that was the difference in value between 1895 and 1899, but simply use it for the purpose of illustration.

I am going on to make two more statements. As every financier knows, there is kept up in the old country and in the United States, and to a certain extent in this country, what is known as a barometer of prices from year to year. There is none better on this continent than that kept by Bradstreet. Bradstreet's index of prices is known and relied upon all over this continent. For the last fifty years they have taken the prices of some 96 or 100 staple articles, arranged their system in a series of index numbers, which show the difference in prices from year to year. If you will go to October, 1890, you will find that the index number is 105,996. I am not going to take up time explaining the technical construction of this system, but will merely give the figures, and any hon. gentleman who wishes to look into it will very soon find out the basis on which the thing is worked. In October, 1890, the index price number was 105,996. In 1895 it had gone down to 71,672, or a drop of 47 per cent. What does that mean? It means that the average value of articles in 1895, taking all classes and kinds, was 47 per cent lower than in October, 1900. If any one attempts to show, by simply taking the volume in the Trade and Navigation Returns, that the purchasing, producing, the exporting and buying capabilities of this country are so much less in 1895 than in 1890, he will get no idea of the difference at all. He has to take the comparative value; and if he wants to find out what the trade of 1895 was as compared with the trade of 1890, he has to compare the levels of value to each and the difference between the two levels, as shown by Bradstreet's index, is 47 per cent. Suppose we work that out. Taking the actual exports and imports in 1895, their valuation in Canada was $203,504,332. We now want to find what the value of that 1895 trade would have been according to the prices of October, 1890. We add 47 per cent, which is $95,645,000, and you have $299,150,000, as the trade of 1895, and that would have been its value had it kept the level of prices attained in October, 1890. Hon. gentlemen see the point. Some one says: Your trade is diminishing because the books in 1895 show less value than in 1890. I answer him, in the light of this index, by saying: No, the activity, the producing power, the exporting and the buying power of this country, is actually higher than in 1895, measured by its trade, than in 1890, and you get at something like a fair comparison by taking the prices of the different years into account and bringing them to the same level in each case.

Suppose we apply that rule to 1895, and then compare with 1899. In 1899 the prices were 17 per cent higher according to the index than in 1895, so that if you would make a fair comparison, you would have to add 17 per cent to the trade figures of 1895, which would give an addition of $34,700,000. And in comparing 1895 with 1899, the imports and exports of 1895, instead of reading $203,000,000, would read $238,000,000, I mention these facts simply to call your attention to this point, that we have not exhausted the subject when we simply take the figures in our books unless we keep in view the varied rates of prices in these goods year after year as our trade history goes along. If we were to apply that $34,000,000 it would reduce the $34,600,000 to about $30,000,000 of excess in volume of trade, and still we would have a magnificent addition to our trade.

Let it be well understood that neither I nor any intelligent man, nor any member of the Liberal-Conservative party, has any other feeling but pride and gratitude that this country's trade is progressing. Why should we not have pride in it as a party and for merely party reasons? Must there not be a period of brooding and preparation and of long sustained course of gestation before the splendid possibilities break out into fulfilment and completion? And it is the glory and the pride of the Liberal-Conservative party that they directed the destinies of this country in that long brooding time of patient preparation, during which our transport facilities were being developed and all the difficulties of the pioneer met with and faced, until at last, even though it be under the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, from this preparation period, the present period has sprung forth instinct with the results of perfected development.

Is it hard to make a reasonable calculation as to this increase of trade and how it has taken place? Let me read you some figures.

In 1896 and 1899 the exports of home products were as follows:

EXPORTS, HOME PRODUCTS.
	1896.	1899.	Increase or decrease.
Mines	$ 8,050,000	$13,360,000	$ 5,410,000
Animals and their products	36,500,000	46,700,000	10,200,000
Agricultural products	14,000,000	22,900,000	8,900,000
Fisheries	11,070,000	9,900,000	-1,170,000
Forests	27,170,000	28,000,000	830,000
Manufactures	9,360,000	11,700,000	2,340,000
Total	$106,150,000	$132,560,000	$27,680,000

Now, Sir, I put it to any reasonable man, and there are lots of them in this House, I ask this one question, and I plead for a fair, manly answer: Does any man in this House, or this country believe that if, in 1896, the fortunes of the political field had returned a Liberal-Conservative government to power, we should have had one dollar less raised from the mines in 1899, one dollar less brought from agricultural products, one dollar less from animals and their products, one dollar more from fisheries—in which hon. gentlemen opposite had a decrease—one dollar less from the forests, one dollar less from the manufactures of this country? There is a plain, common-sense way of putting it. If the Liberal-Conservatives had come into power in 1896, what barrier would they have raised in the way of the workers in the mine, of the workers in the forest, of the workers in the sea, of the workers in the dairy, farms and ranches and cattle ranges of the country? Would they have opened up any fewer markets than hon. gentlemen opposite have opened up? Would they have built any fewer railways, would they have subsidized and kept running any fewer steamship lines? In what way, let hon. gentlemen say, would their coming into power have exercised any effect to destroy production in any of these forms? Answer that, as honest men answer it. You will say: We are party men, but we know quite well, that if you had come into power, these things would have gone on just the same. If that be your answer, then, for pity's sake, do not spend two or three hours in making what is supposed to be a budget speech into a hustings appeal to the country for credit for having done that which it is perfectly clear you did not do. Did it all happen because these hon. gentlemen came in? Then, let us see what has happened since. What has happened within six months, up to December 31st, 1899. Why, the mining products have gone off by a million dollars, the fisheries have kept about stationary this current year, they are going behind. Agricultural products have dropped by $5,200,000. Here is a short statement which will show the decrease within the last six months of 1899 compared with the last six months of 1897 in the products named.

EXPORTS TO GREAT BRITAIN.

Cattle	$ 7,177,533	$ 5,391,544
Horses	941,193	479,223
Wheat	7,414,273	5,983,282
Cheese	13,458,844	12,112,649
Wood and timber	21,166,303	18,099,249

If the coming of these hon. gentlemen into power, and their remaining in power caused all this great burst of trade, why is it, since they have been firmly seated in power for the three years, that these exports have commenced to go down? Is it not far more common sense like to say that governments may come, and governments may go, but, unless legislation and administration are totally and foolish, in a country like Canada, with its enterprise, its pluck, its general diffusion of knowledge, and its general business activity, these great lines of production will go forward year after year subject to those changes which take place in trade in every country, by reason of forces within the country, or even of forces entirely outside the country, but in either case, largely beyond the power of the government to affect or mitigate.

Now, while I am on this point, let me drive it home, so far as I can, by a little additional argument. The assumption that ran all the way through my hon. friend's speech was this: After this, therefore, on account of this, or, as the Latin has it, post hoc, ergo propter hoc—because we came in, because we introduced our policy, therefore, these things have happened. I have taken the leading lines of production, and read the results in figures. Will any one say, with regard to the mines, any act of administration or any initiation of this government has given an impetus to the opening of mines, or the production of minerals in this country, different from what would have been given if this government had not been in power? Are the miner's tools any cheaper than they were before? No, Sir, he is paying on his iron and his steel, from 25 per cent to 200 per cent of an increase over what he was paying before these gentlemen came into power, because the prices of these articles have been by that much enhanced. Does he get cheaper food? I think not; I think the prices of his food are about level with those he paid before. Are his clothes any cheaper? The staple articles in this respect, have increased in value. Has he any enlarged market for his products? Not one. He meets the same difficulty in his export of the finished article—what he may happen to finish on this side of the line, so far as his lead is concerned. Has he diminished competition? No, the competition he has to meet is as keen as before. As I have stated, hon. gentlemen have at last paid the silver-lead bounty, but that was planned and provided for by the Liberal-Conservative government before it went out of power. Therefore, my hon. friend has simply carried out the legislation he found at hand. So, go through the whole of the miner's outfit, and his work and conditions, and we see that no legislation made by this government, and no conditions which exist to-day on account of such legislation, makes the miner's occupation a more favourable one than it was before. Ask the same questions with reference to the fisherman, ask the same with reference to the lumberman, ask the same with reference to the farmer—and, by the way, there is an additional point with reference to the farmer, which I shall speak of a little later. It is a significant fact that when you go through the returns of trade and business, you will find, that in the large, what the farmer has to buy has appreciated in price, while the main stock articles that he had to sell have depreciated in price. Now, Sir, there is not a gentleman conversant with business that will attempt to deny that general fact. You will find some exceptions to that rule on both sides of the list, but the rule is clear that there is a perceptible, and in some instances, emphasized diminution in the prices that the farmer gets for his products. Take 1899 into account, and there is a sensible increase in what the farmer has to pay for what he uses. Everything in the shape of iron, nails, wire, coal oil and all that, a great part of which the farmer has to use in his business, has gone up from 50 per cent to 150 per cent or 200 per cent; whilst on his staple articles there has been a decrease in the prices which he obtains. I have here an illustration of that taken from my hon. friend's report. In 1894 we exported to Great Britain $6,316,373 worth of cattle, valued at $78.43 per head; in 1895 we exported $6,797,615 worth, of which the value per head was $79.16. In 1896 the value per head was $72.40; in 1897, $53.79; in 1898, $60.63; in 1899, $61.75.

There, on very large exports of a staple product of this country, the price per head has fallen, although the exports of the number of cattle have gone up from 80,000 in 1894 to 115,000 in 1899, though by the way, 1899 shows a diminution of about 7,000 head of cattle as compared with the year 1898.

Now, there is a point that could have been made by the present government if, in the complicated mechanism, the widely distributed mechanism, of transport there had been some appreciable difference made. Let us ask ourselves whether there has been or not. Hon. gentlemen opposite have spent millions of dollars for railway subsidies, for canal work, for different improvements in one way or another, which in the years to come will make themselves felt, I hope, upon the general trade of this country to its advantage. But if you will think it over, not a single large work which they have commenced, not a single great expenditure that they have made, has yet come to the point of completion, so that it is actually in greater use than it was in 1896 for the farmers and the merchants of this country. The hon. gentlemen have spent $9,000,000 on the canals, but not a pound, not a ton, not a box of all this import and export has felt the least advantage of that expenditure yet. Vessels went until the end of the last season on the same depth of water and with the same capacity that they went in 1896. Large sums of money have been voted to railway subsidies, and these railways are only completed in part or not completed at all; and we will have to wait for some years before we get any advantage from their completion so far as the distribution and carriage of goods are concerned. So with reference to the mechanism of transport, nothing that these hon. gentlemen have done yet has added to the facilities for trade and commerce.

But they did one thing, Sir. They found at their hand when they came here a contract ready to be signed which would have put into operation an ocean fast service in May of last year. Everybody knows what with the developments that have taken place since in this country and outside, what an immense sweep of advantage a fast line service, which would have gone into operation last May, would have had for impressing itself on the world and on making for itself a line of commerce and of communication, with success almost from the outset. That hon. gentlemen have torn up. They tinkered with a brokers' firm for months and months, and then came down and told this House that the fast line project with which they were in great sympathy was put out of sight for the moment, because of the rise in the price of material. Certainly; and now the hon. gentleman comes down with bottle-necked and bottled-nosed ships that have been canvassed over and over again, and I am afraid that the travelling minister has lost his portfolio so far as that is concerned, after all these attempts have been made, the hon. gentleman comes down this year and says: Oh! It is all out of sight now on account of the war which has taken place between Great Britain and the South African Republics. But if the hon. gentlemen that are on this side of the House had remained in power, a fast line service would have been in sight, in action, in operation; and if the hon. gentlemen had followed the lead of what was laid down for them in that case as they did in so many other cases, we would have had a fast line service to-day; and, Sir, our own volunteers would probably have gone to the seat of war in our own swift ships with the Canadian and English flags waving at the masthead.

Mr. FOSTER.

Now, Sir, the basis of all this increased trade is to be found, as I have said, in the previous steady and long continued preparation. When the opportunity came what did we find? Fast lines of railway making their way across this continent, opening up almost every field of development as regards wheat growing, cattle growing and produce of all kinds. These, Sir, had been built on lines of policy laid down by the Liberal-Conservative party, interfered with, opposed, ridiculed and fought by hon. gentlemen opposite, individually and as a party. They found in this country a widely extended industrial establishment built up on the lines of an adequate protection which these gentlemen fought against, which they ridiculed from 1878 to 1896, which they declared when they got into power they would destroy, but which, after they have come into power, they have kept up at about the same general level. In that respect as well there had been a long period of preparation, so that when the time came they found all these establishments manned and ready to work, ready to add to their power and to their output. So to-day we have this large industrial activity and prosperity in the country because of the foundation and preparation period under the Liberal-Conservative party and their policy.

Sir, there is another reason, and I think it is worth some attention. One cause of the unexampled prosperity of the last three years is due to—what? Is due to what always takes place in a period of enforced economy. For the country as often for the man, a period of enforced economy is a period of strengthening for better future operations. Every man who understands plant life knows that if he wants to produce a stocky plant he has to cut off the shoots, to cut off the buds and branches, even though it break his heart to do it, to allow it to make root room and gather strength for the days to come when it will astonish him by the vigour of its growth and the freshness of its bloom. It is true with the country and with the business man. The enforced economy from 1892 to 1895 has been a strengthening time for the business backbone and power of the country. But, it did more. There never was a period in the history of Canada when stocks in this country were at a lower ebb than in 1895. Every bit of old iron that could be worked up out of a railway store-room was worked up instead of putting in new stock; every bit of stock that could be sold out of the shelves was sold out rather than put in new stock. Manufacturers cleaned out their lofts, their garrets and their cellars, sold everything that they possibly could, so that in this country there was what you might call a hungry man's period. What happened then? The turn of the tide came. There was an increased production stimulated by an increased price for cereals and cattle. That caused an inflow of money into the country, that called for greater producing power, greater transportation facilities, greater demand for new stock to replace the old stocks in the stores, and taking all that into consideration, every man knows that a large part of this extraordinary activity of the last few years has been expended in filling the void which was created in the period up to 1895. Why do I mark that? Because I think it is the part of wisdom to recognize that these booming times are not going to go on always. These large manufacturing plants, which are now bending every muscle, with orders six months and a year ahead, will, with the powers of development and of production, their millions of capital, soon reach the point of satisfying the demand of the store-rooms and the larders, but, they will exist, and with their immense developing power, they will become competitors in the markets, and then will come a different state of things from what we have to-day. Now, you go and place your order. The man says: I am full; I want no more, I have no power to do more. But, maybe six months, or a year, or maybe a little longer than that from this time, these voids will have been filled, this demand will have been overtaken by the supply and then these greatly increased productive energies will be in the market still to produce to the extent of their plants if they can, the competition in their field of trade will bring down prices, and it will consequently act as in every cycle it has acted and reacted. The hon. Minister of Finance and every other man in this country may just as well come to the conclusion that there are fictitious as well as real reasons for this great expansion of trade and activity, that the demand is rapidly being filled up and that the time will come, we hope not for many months, but it may be within a few months, when matters will take on a different complexion. So, it is well for the country not to be too lavish in its expenditures, and it is well for the business people of the country not to think that trade will go on uniformly in an increasing ratio, but to look facts in the face, and whilst they are glad for this prosperity, they will, as prudent men, come to the conclusion that what has happened before will happen again and they will reflect that the great period of prosperity will sink into a depression of volume and values prevailing at the present day, again, without doubt, to blossom and bloom forth into an extension of the prosperity even of the present period.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. FOSTER. I said before six o'clock that it would be found that the prices of the great staples that the farmers of this country have to sell have on the average not only not increased but diminished in price, whilst the chief staples which the farmer and consumer in rural parts and in the cities have to buy, have on the average increased in price. I wish to present a table to the House, of prices, including a large number of those I have mentioned as farmer's products—what he has to sell—that may be exported from this country. The list of prices runs through the three years of 1895, 1898 and 1899, and is as follows:

These, I may say, are all prices taken out of the tables of the Trade and Navigation Returns, and consequently are the figures upon which are based the values in our reports.

With reference to the prices of articles that the farmer has to buy, I have a very long list, but I have culled from it some few items which I will read. These are the New York prices as given for the first week in January for each year, 1895, 1899, and 1900:

	1895.	1899.	1900.

Instead of giving the various articles made from iron I have mentioned only the raw basis of manufactures. Generally the prices on staple articles which are bought have increased in accord with the increase in the articles which I have read. On this point it is certain that if the farmer today is having prosperity it is not because in the first place, less taxation is taken out of him by the present financial legislation—not because the general revenues to which he contributes are less; for they are more—not because he is getting a higher price for his staples; but he is prosperous because he is getting a ready market for what he has to sell, and he is raising larger quantities, and in many respects of a better grade of stuff for the market than he raised before; he is producing more.

Now, Sir, finishing that part of the subject, I shall come to the question of our trade with Great Britain, upon which we have a pretty strong divergence of expressed opinion between the Finance Minister and gentlemen of business experience and capacity on this side of the House and in the country. The Finance Minister and the right hon. leader of the government, and I suppose the party as a whole, take the ground that the added trade with Great Britain is due to the preference which is given under the tariff of 1897, as worked out in 1898 and 1899. The view I would take of that is this: So far as imports are concerned, there is no doubt a quickening influence felt on account of the slight practical reduction which is made to the British exporter to the Canadian market; but the main increase with Great Britain is an increase which Great Britain participates in, as the result of the general increase of Canadian trade, both as to imports into this country and exports from this country. That proposition I think I shall abundantly prove. While there is a small practical differential in favour of the exporter from Great Britain, that is to a large extent offset by the greater distance and larger cost which is attendant upon imports from that country. The longer time that it takes to fill orders, and the competition with her great competitor, the United States of America, for all kinds of textile goods, have worked in the past and will work for the present and the future to a certain extent against imports to this country from Great Britain. Now, what is held with reference to this matter? First, let me notice a most wonderful argument addressed by the right hon. gentleman who leads the House to the people of Bowmanville in October, 1899. Speaking before an immense, and I venture to think, a very intelligent audience there, the Premier was endeavouring, as usual, to draw the credit to his government for the great increase of trade between Great Britain and this country, on account of the preference policy which had been adopted, and he said this:

The merchants of England, the men who have to buy articles in the markets of the world, no longer go to the United States to make their purchases. They come to Canada, and this is the direct result of our preferential tariff.

Now, you have to stop and think over a statement like that before you really take it in. To think that any man leading a party of average business intelligence, who had kept himself at all in current with the business of the world, would, before an audience of three thousand intelligent people, with newspaper reporters on each side of him, make a statement of that kind, almost passes belief. Let us analyse it. Under this new policy, 'when the people of England want to buy anything in the markets of the world, they no longer go to the United States of America—they come to Canada; and this is the direct result of our preferential tariff.' Well, Sir, we will take the facts as given by the statistics of 1898, and we will see whether that is true or not. The merchants of England wanted to buy cattle in 1898, and they went to the United States to buy them to the value of $30,331,563; they wanted to buy salted beef, and they went to the United States to buy $1,297,745 worth; they wanted to buy fresh beef, and they bought from the United States $22,763,498 worth; they bought bacon, $31,332,763 worth; hams, $17,770,215 worth; pork, salted, not hams, $1,092,732; butter, $1,338,504; cheese, $4,898,719; lard, $13,608,699; wheat, $74,434,528; barley, $1,146,689; oats, $11,146,458; rye, $722,072; maize, or Indian corn, $35,599,350; flour, $46,089,431; hay, $731,418; apples, $1,956,979; seeds, $1,472,488; tallow, $2,619,449; wood and timber, $13,580,309; house frames and fittings, $2,830,390; leather, $14,781,147. Total $301,592,845. So that we find, in direct contradiction to the hon. gentleman's assertion, that the merchant of England last year went, not to Canada, but to the United States to buy over $300,000,000 worth of the articles above mentioned. This is an answer—a conclusive answer, I think—to the hon. gentleman's inclusive statement; and out of that I think there arises a great necessity for some older and more experienced and more discreet member of the party to accompany the right hon. gentleman on his journeyings, and keep him well within the line.

Let us ask again, what are the statistics of trade with reference to imports into Canada? Is it true that Great Britain exports to Canada and that we import from her a larger amount, compared with the increase of our trade with all the other different countries of the world, than we do from all those other countries concerned in the general increase? Take the tables of the hon. gentleman's own department, and what do they show? A glance at the following table will give the information:—

* Decrease.

Summed up, that means that our increase in imports from Great Britain was 12½ per cent; from all countries with which we trade, 39 per cent; and from the United States, 59 per cent.

So that, so far from there being an abnormal increase in our imports from Great Britain, the percentage of that increase has been almost the lowest on the list, and very much lower than that of the other great countries with which we trade.

I remember the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce saying, not long ago, that there was an export from Great Britain in a certain year, of $66,000,000, and to the United States an export of $41,000,000, while we only had an import of $32,000,000 from Great Britain, compared with the import of $58,000,000 from the United States. He declared that that was a gross discrimination against the trade of Great Britain. He said:

There, if you will, is a genuine practical discrimination to an enormous extent against England and in favour of the United States. I have always said that the national policy was a Yankee device copied from the Yankees, and in fact a benefit to them chiefly, and here is a proof of it.

The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), speaking at a great meeting in London, informed the people that, under the policy which his government had adopted, this disparity and discrimination would be done away with. Well, we will see how it was done away with. Of dutiable imports merchandise entered for consumption, we find that in 1896, the percentage which Great Britain contributed to the trade of this country was 36·24, and in 1899 that fell to 30·77, a loss of 5·47 per cent in three years. Whereas the United States contributed of dutiable imports to Canada 43·28 in 1896, and 49·73 in 1899, a gain of 6·45 per cent. What has become of this Yankee device, and where is the statement of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries that the policy of this government was to change all that?

Then let us take the free goods. Of the total imports of free goods into Canada, Great Britain contributed 22·19 in 1896, and in 1899, 15·70, showing a falling off of 6·49. Whereas the United States contributed in 1896, 64·07 of our total importation of free goods, and in 1899, 73·43, a gain of 9·36. Where, again, has this Yankee device been laid away, and where is the betterment that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries promised to his admiring London audience?

Take your total trade. Great Britain, in 1896, contributed 31·15 per cent, and in 1899 only 24·72, being a decline of 6·43, whereas the United States contributed, in 1896, 50·80 per cent, and in 1899, 59·24 per cent, being a gain of 8·44 per cent. Now, I think, that these hon. gentlemen were very wrong in denouncing the national policy as the Yankee device, on account of its discrimination. They were either wrong in doing that, or they have shamefully neglected their duty, for if they have any different machinery from the Yankee device, it has the effect, not of mitigating, but of enhancing the discriminations which they say existed before.

So much with reference to the imports. But, if their argument fails on the question of imports, what can we say of it with regard to the exports, when they attribute the increase, so far as Great Britain is concerned, to the preference which they have given British imports into this country? One can see that there is some reason in supposing that the preference, however small, on the imports from another country, will lead to an increase of these imports, but it is very difficult, on business principles, to conceive how it is possible that any large extension shall be made in the export trade on account of the preference given the imports. Well, what are the facts? Suppose we take the figures from the Trade and Navigation Returns, and see whether or not there is an abnormal increase of exports from Canada to Great Britain, as compared with the increase of exports from Canada to other countries.

These figures, taken from the blue-books of Canada, show that whilst there was a large increase in our exports to Great Britain, that increase was not nearly so large as the increase of our exports to nearly every one of the other principal countries with which we trade. In none of these other countries was there any generous feeling aroused by a preference given to them which would make them buy more of our exports. And yet, simply in the course of trade and with the expansion of trade, there has been a percentage of increase in our exports to these countries represented by the figures I have already given, some of the increases being of astonishing proportions. It does not destroy that argument in the least to say that our trade with other countries is comparatively small. The increase is there, and it is on exactly the same principle upon which an increase occurs in every case—that is, the principle of the general expansion of trade. Why, take the case of the United States of America; does my hon. friend know that they had the largest exports last year of any year in their history, and that a larger proportion of these exports went to Great Britain than in any preceding year? And yet, Sir, no preference has been granted by the United States upon British imports; and I suppose there has been no answering throb in the great, generous British heart which would cause the British consumer to buy United States goods because of the inestimable benefits conferred upon his country by the Dingley Bill.

To hear these gentlemen talk, one would think that there had been no exports from this country to Great Britain on the lines of natural products until they came into power. Let me take three articles out of many. Of cheese, in 1891, we exported 117,000,000 pounds to Great Britain. But, Sir, in 1897, this had increased to 171,000,000 pounds, an increase of 46 per cent. From 1897 to 1899, the increase has been from 171,000,000 pounds to 197,000,000 pounds, an increase of 15 per cent. But, strangely enough, as compared with 1898, there has been a decrease of 5 per cent in the exports of cheese from this country to Great Britain, and this in the year when the second half of the preference calculated to stir the generous heart of the British buyer and consumer, went into effect. I remember when, in 1890 or 1891, as Minister of Finance in the late government, I introduced the tariff changes with reference to meat products. This was the beginning of a policy urged on the government by the farmers and producers of the country, and by none of them more strongly than my hon. friend from East Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane), who brought a very large deputation with him, accompanied by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) and others representing the farmers in the different constituencies. We listened to what they had to say, and we put up the duties on meat products. And why? Because the competition from the United States was destroying the standing ground of the producers of meats in this country. Unless the producers of meats could fairly secure standing ground in the home market, it was impossible for them to reach out for the great foreign market which they were after. What was the position taken by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright)? He opposed the imposition of these duties, and moved a resolution against them. I thought I had by me both the resolution and a short extract from his speech. I should be sorry to deprive the House of the hon. gentleman's remarks altogether, and I must ask the hon. gentleman and the House to take my recollection of them. The hon. gentleman warned the government and the House that no more insane and utterly foolish proposition could be enacted into law than to attempt to put a duty on pork and pork products in this country. And one reason why he made that statement was that it would irritate the United States producer of pork, and would operate to bar us, and continue to bar us out of the market of the United States for these products. Well, Sir, the policy was introduced. In 1891, there was an export of bacon to the extent of 8,000,000 pounds. In 1896, that had increased to 47,000,000 pounds, an increase of 500 per cent. The latest year, 1899, shows an export of 111,800,000 pounds of bacon. What happened was this: In the first place, competition from the United States producer of pork and meats was dull. The producer here got his home market to a large extent, and he built upon that basis, and it was that which enabled him to reach out to the British market, until to-day, the meat producer here has practically his own market, and has also an opening into the markets of Great Britain. Now, if we take the exports of grain, you will find that in 1891, 2,000,000 bushels were exported; in 1896, 11,600,000 bushels were exported; in 1898, 30,000,000 bushels were exported; and in 1899, 22,200,000 bushels. Summing it up, the increase between 1891 and 1897, in the exports of cheese, was 46 per cent. of bacon, 640 per cent, and of grains, 410 per cent.

The increase from 1897 to 1899, in cheese, is 15 per cent, in bacon, 89 per cent, and in grain, 27 per cent. The decrease between 1899 and 1898 is, in cheese, 5 per cent; in grain, 26 per cent.

Sir, the point I wished to make was, that in these great staple products of agriculture, which are typical of the others, there was before these gentlemen came into power, a large and increasing export, and that what has taken place since, has been but the continuation and extension under better conditions of consumption and purchase the world over, in these same commodities. If you take the United States market, which has no legislation such as these gentlemen have here, which has none of the inspiring effects of their guiding policy, and which has a very high protective tariff, you find that in 1890, the exports from the United States amounted to $857,000,000; in 1895, they had gone down to $824,000,000; but in 1899, they had increased to $1,300,000,000, under a large protective policy and a large expansion of the export trade, which is due to none of the causes that hon. gentlemen seek to bring as the reasons for the increase of our export trade with Great Britain during the past three years. Germany. Belgium. Italy. Austria. all the great European countries have had this large expansion, both of export and import trade, during the last three or four years. It is characteristic of business and trade the world over. I think, therefore, I have said enough in this respect to show that the preference which these hon. gentlemen have given in the first place, has had but small effect upon the imports from Great Britain into this country, and has had practically no effect upon the exports from this country.

Now, a word or two with reference to the views of hon. gentlemen opposite with reference to the trade and fiscal policy of this country. There were three or four kinds of preference that these hon. gentlemen agitated before they came into power, and since they came into power. I hold in my hand the report of a speech made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in 1888. I do not know why it is, but I found tacked upon the front page of this speech, an extract from the hon. gentleman's speech at Massey Hall, in 1899 which reads thus:

We have shown, Sir, that we believe in the unity of the empire, and we have done more to develop it than all the jingo blusterers of the last twenty years. When we gave a specific preference to English manufacturers, we showed that the Liberals were prepared to do what the Conservatives had only been prepared to talk about.

How wonderfully loyal to Britain and to trade with Britain. Sentiment, allegiance, is the basis of that outburst; but there was a time in my hon. friend's career, when sentiment and allegiance played no part in his political creed. This address of 1888, was delivered in this House, in support of a resolution, the last article of which is:

That it is further expedient that the government of the Dominion should take steps at an early day to ascertain on what terms and conditions arrangements can be effected with the United States for the purpose of securing full and unrestricted reciprocity of trade therewith. I wish I could take the time to read to this House the whole of that speech. I cannot do it, but I will give a running comment on some points of it, and I will make a few extracts as I go along. Well, Sir, he starts out with one headline, and after going a little way in his speech, he says:

This is a case in which nature is too strong for us.

Nature is too strong for Canada, and she must go for her trade to the United States. There are insuperable difficulties, natural difficulties, to any interprovincial trade, to any trade with Great Britain. All the lines of water and railway flow to the south, and not across the ocean. 'Nature is too strong for us.' A little further on the hon. gentleman declares:

That we are not getting a farthing of interest on the outlay of 200 millions that we have invested in public works, and that he sees no prospect of getting an income from the outlay. . . . That our federal constitution is threatened with collapse, and that this is becoming manifest as the days roll on. . . . That unless a speedy check is brought about, our political system cannot last very long. In twenty years we have trebled our debt, trebled our taxes, and added 30 per cent to our population. Suppose we go on thus for another twenty years, or even for another ten years—and I can tell the House that there are very serious signs that unless such a check as I spoke of is put on, we will go on in the same headlong, reckless course—why, Sir, in twenty years at the same rate of increase of population and the same rate of increase of debt and taxation, we will find ourselves with a population of six millions and an annual taxation of ninety million dollars. . . . The government cannot and will not put a stop to this practice of immense and insane expense. . . . To say the least of it, enormous stores of raw material of great value to the United States are stored up in Canada, and it should be our pride and our work to get our raw products out as quickly as possible, and send them down to be put into manufactured products by the skill and labour of the United States. . . .

He declares that if we only had free intercourse with the United States the $80,000,000 of trade would become doubled and trebled.

I will venture to say that it is well within the bounds of possibility that with unrestricted intercourse with the United States, that $80,000,000 might, within a few years, swell to $300,000,000. . . . Who does not know that for an immense number of the products of the people of this country, the United States is not merely the best market, but substantially the only market.

Then, he speaks of the attempt—to force trade among the various provinces of the Dominion. . . . I have always myself regarded it as very up-hill work, about as profitable, indeed, as an attempt to make water run up a hill. . . . Must we not admit that, no matter how the government may strive, no matter how the people may strive, you cannot establish any great interprovincial trade from which any great profit can redound to the people of this country. . . . Who does not know, who dares deny, that the trade of Halifax naturally seeks Boston, that the trade of Toronto naturally seeks New York, that the trade of Winnipeg seeks St. Paul and the country south of it, and that the trade of Victoria naturally seeks San Francisco and the rest of the Pacific coast. There is an old saying, and I think a true saying in part, that trade follows the flag, but I tell this House that it is more true the trade follows the people, and we have unhappily already sent out about two millions of missionaries to cultivate friendly trade relations with the United States. . . . It is quite clear that in older Canada, at any rate, grain production is on the wane, and that the only cereal which we can depend upon as likely to continue to be raised in large quantities is the article of barley, for which we have practically no market except in the United States. . . . Now, I contend that for almost everything which our farmers have to sell, the United States, if only we had free and unrestricted trade with them would afford us absolutely the best market; and I contend further, besides being the best market, it is literally the only market for a great many important articles which we produce. . . . Given free trade, given unrestricted intercourse, and that trade might assume nearly unlimited proportions. . . . Why, look for one moment at the host of great and growing cities which stud our southern frontier alone. Chicago, Detroit, Cleveland, Buffalo, Boston and New York. Those cities alone which I have named, with their environs, contain a population of some five millions of people who are the very best customers on the face of the earth. We all know the natural impediments which exist to interprovincial trade. . . . It is perfectly well known to all who are familiar with that people—

That is, the American people.

--that there is no market, I repeat, on the face of the earth where the man who has a first-rate article, particularly of food, to sell, is half so sure of obtaining a first-rate price for it, as in the United States. . . . One United States customer is worth to us in Canada half a dozen English customers, and half a dozen customers of any other nationality.

Talking about the manufacturers, he says :

I believe that there is good ground for saying that all manufacturers who deserve to flourish in Canada, all who possess the requisite pluck, and capital, and energy, will prosper likewise enormously if that great market be opened to them. . . . It would have been an easy task for an honest and intelligent administration to have kept the total expenditure of Canada to $26,000,000 or $27,000,000 at the utmost, and the total taxation of Canada to $20,000,000 at the uttermost, and withal to have placed half a million of the best settlers in the world in Manitoba, to their great profit and ours.

Well, I cannot read all of these things, but let me read just one or two others :

It is perfectly apparent that we cannot hope to obtain free intercourse and unrestricted reciprocity with them without discriminating against the goods of other countries, unless and until the United States are prepared to go in for free trade with all the world, in which case our proposition would not be necessary. The thing, I grant—

Mr. FOSTER.

That is, discrimination.

—is of the essence of the bargain.

The hon. gentleman says it does not frighten him, but that we have the right to discriminate against England even in our own material interest.

I do not think, for my part, that we are under any deep debt of gratitude to English statesmen, that we owe them much, unless, perchance, it may be the duty, as Christian men, to forgive them for the atrocious blunders which have marked every treaty, or transaction, or negotiation that they have ever had with the United States where the interests of Canada were concerned, from the days of Benjamin Franklin to this hour, not excepting the first or second treaty of Washington. I say there is no man here who does not know that from the very first hour when the United Empire Loyalists took possession of Ontario and held it for the British Crown, down to this year 1888, there never has been a time except, perhaps, the short paroxysm of the American civil war, when our people could not have greatly benefited their material interests by throwing in their lot with the people on the other side.

He closes with this statement :

It is quite clear to any one who will carefully study those trade returns and will study the figures which I submitted before recess, that the United States market, if it were only made free, is worth more than twice over to Canada that of all the rest of the world put together. It is perfectly clear that it is the only market open to us for a great amount of our productions.

Now, the first article I read, the loyal article, and the speech made on the 14th of March, 1888, by Sir Richard Cartwright, in the House of Commons, seem to me to proceed from two different states of mind, but, I believe, from the same individual and guided by exactly the same lack of principle. He thought unrestricted reciprocity was good enough to get in on in 1888; he thinks the preference business with Great Britain is good enough to stay in on in 1899. With these gentlemen it matters nothing as to principle or consistency; what they wanted to do when they were out, was to get in, and what they want to do when they are in, is to stay in. Any road that led to the goal was good enough for them if they could get there by that road; any method by which they can stay here is good enough provided they can stay. Now, Sir, in 1893, which was later, the hon. gentleman declared :

The remedy which we had suggested, the remedy of continental free trade, the remedy of throwing down the barriers between ourselves and the United States, which, in my judgment, is the only means which can give great and durable prosperity to Canada. Under no circumstances or conditions can the resources of Canada be developed as they should be developed, can we make anything like a full use of the resources we possess until, in one form or another, the markets of this continent are thrown open to us, and we are able to trade on even terms with our friends and neighbours of the United States.

In 1892, in this House, he declared :

It was scarcely possible for any man to exaggerate the mischief and injury which would be done to the agriculturists of Canada if the American market should unhappily continue to be barred to their products. Practically speaking, the only thing we are likely to deal on even terms in the English market are wheat, fat cattle, pork products and cheese. In all other respects, I say here that the loss of the American market, if we do lose it, would be little short of an irreparable calamity to the already overburdened farmers of the Dominion.

Mr. Davies, in 1892, said :

This result can be obtained by those whose hearts are in the business. It is quite possible for the honest man who goes to the United States; it is quite possible for the honest man, with a sincere desire to negotiate a fair treaty, to negotiate one in a very short time. Is the fact that you are going to discriminate against Britain to stop you from negotiating altogether. Are we to legislate in the interests of Canada or of the British exporter.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Paterson (now Minister of Customs), in 1892, declared :

There is a market right at your very door for forty millions of bushels of wheat. If we have free intercourse, Canada will be the market from which these states would draw the supply of wheat for the ten million barrels of flour they need per annum. They need every product the farmer has to sell. There is your home market.

Sure of getting it, why, of course, they were sure of getting it. Mr. Davies, late in the campaign, declared :

If the people of Canada approach the United States in a fair and reasonable spirit, they would obtain a reciprocity treaty in a short time.

Mr. Fisher, now the Minister of Agriculture, declared :

If my leader comes into power it would not be a rash prediction to say that within six months from that day, by a scratch of the pen, a treaty of reciprocity would be put in force between Canada and the United States.

And the Hon. David Mills, now Minister of Justice, declared, while sitting in this House :

If hon. gentlemen on this side of the House cross to the Treasury benches, I can promise there would be no difficulty in establishing trade with the neighbouring republic.

There was no trouble in these respects at that time. Neither at that time nor since was there any trouble about allegiance and sentiment. What said the right hon. gentleman who leads the government? Speaking in this House, in 1892, he said :

While they commit the mistake of basing their trade policy upon uniformity of allegiance and the mere sentiment, we of the Liberal party maintain that the policy of this country must be based, not upon sentiment, but upon business principles. And fresh as we come from the people, I say that the only policy which will benefit this country is unrestricted reciprocity and continental freedom of trade. It is absurd to suppose that, situated as we are, the interests of Canada will always be identical with the interests of Great Britain.

Here is the germ seed which sunk into the fertile brain of the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Monet), and which found a lodgment in the mental soil of the member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). The Prime Minister continued to say in 1892 :

It is absurd to suppose that, situated as we are, the interests of Canada will always be identical with the interests of Great Britain. Some day must come when these interests will clash, and whatever the hon. gentleman may be, for my part whenever it comes to that, and however I may regret the necessity, I will stand by my native land. I, for one, when I made up my mind in favour of this policy of unrestricted reciprocity looked first and last to the interests of Canada and not to the interests of England. Let the British subject who sits in the British parliament look after the interests of England. I do not believe in the principles of the United Empire Trade League, for the reason that that scheme limits trade to allegiance. It proposes to make allegiance the basis of trade, whilst we desire to make trade interests alone the basis of trade.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Who said all that?

Mr. FOSTER. That was pronounced by Mr. Wilfrid Laurier in 1892 in this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. FOSTER. And Mr. Laurier continued to say :

Our duty is to Canada and not to England. Just as the British government teaches this government that the first duty of the British government is to England and not to Canada, so I insist that in all these matters, it is for any self governing colony to look to its own interests, first, last and always.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, Sir, that shows a tremendous change of opinion within a very short period of time. This was the first preferential idea that these gentlemen undertook—a campaign for unrestricted reciprocity and continental free trade. They staked their political existence on it. There is not a man who supports them in this House who did not cry out and shout for that policy, just as loudly as the leaders did themselves. That policy, it suffices to say, has not been accomplished, and it was not accomplished, because the Liberal-Conservative party pitted their strength with all their vigour and force against that policy and in antagonism to it, and the bulk of the people of Canada followed the Liberal-Conservative party and repudiated unrestricted reciprocity and continental freedom of trade. But, Sir, I want to ask these hon. gentlemen opposite, who the other evening sang so lustily 'God Save the Queen,' when 33½ per cent of preference was given to the mother country on the ground of allegiance and sentiment alone—I want to ask these hon. gentlemen where they would have been, and where that song would have been, if in 1891 the Liberal party had come into power and carried out their policy of unrestricted reciprocity and continental free trade? The answer to that question cannot be avoided. It is, that every one of these gentlemen who sits facing me and who supports the government knows that if their policy had been successful—and it was no fault of theirs that it was not successful—that we should have had no loyal effusion such as we have had within the last few months; that we should have had no preference for Great Britain; that we should have had a wall of prohibitory discrimination barring out every British product in this country and allowing the advantage to the people of the United States instead of to the people of the mother country. No one who answers that question but what knows in his own heart, that if the Liberals had then got into power and carried out that policy, you would have bidden an everlasting good-by to the strengthening and uniting bonds between the mother country and ourselves. Could you have given the mother country a tangible proof of your gratitude for her good will and protection—such as you say you have now given—if you had bound yourselves hand and foot to the United States of America and come under bonds to discriminate against the goods of Great Britain? If you could not have made any trade arrangements with advantage to Great Britain, if you had barred yourself entirely from it, you would have built up an ever-increasing wall between this country and the mother country, which would have ended in complete and total separation in the matter of trade. For, then would have come the day, and come right speedily, when the interests of Canada would have clashed with the interests of Great Britain; and when that day came, invited as it was by my right hon. friend on many occasions, he would stand by Canada against the mother country. Only once, and that is for ever and ever, will the people of this country be profoundly thankful that their good sense stopped the wild and absurd procession that was formed, headed by my right hon. friend, with its face towards a foreign country, and its back towards the motherland that gave us birth and protected our struggling infancy.

Then, Sir, the next preference to the United States was a preference jug-handled and partial. They were not able to carry out the first. They got into power upon a different tack. They came into power, and what have they done? They have given to the United States of America a preference in many things. What have they given them? Free corn for nothing; free binder twine for nothing; free wire for nothing; a cut on their iron—and everybody knows that the United States of America to-day towers above every other country in the world in her production of iron—that she practically has a complete monopoly in her own country and a very large hold upon every neutral market in the world. To-day there is no competition which faces Great Britain so keen, so threatening, as the competition of the United States in the markets of the world, in iron goods of every description. That is what this government have done. Did they stir a sympathetic response in the hearts of the people of the United States? Let the Dingley Bill be their answer. Let the abortive commission which sat for six months, at Quebec and Washington, with its expenditure of $36,000, and its results a blank, utter and absolute, be their answer again, if another answer is necessary. And yet, Sir, after these rebuffs, these gentlemen, these administrators of just laws, find it within their hearts, by order in council, to break the statute law of the country in order to allow the United States coasting vessels to participate in our lake coasting trade while our vessels are debarred from theirs. These gentlemen allow the alien labour law of Canada to remain a blank on the statute-book, whilst the alien labour law of the United States is rigidly enforced against every labouring man and woman who enters the United States. We are opposed as a party to that kind of preference. Another preference is that to Great Britain, such as was argued for by my hon. friend who leads the opposition, in 1895 and 1896, and long before it was absolutely accepted by the right hon. gentleman who leads the present government. He sits before me now, he hears what I say, and I invite him to rise and deny that before the election of 1896 he pledged his honour as the leader of a party, and pledged his party with him, that he was favourable to the idea of mutual trade preference with Great Britain, that it would be an immense boon to this country, and that if he and his party got into power, one of their first acts would be to send a commission to Great Britain to try and bring about that boon which he described to the people of London. Has he done it? Did he make the promise? When he went to England, did he take a commission with him? Did he himself take the least trouble to follow in the line of the invitation of Mr. Joseph Chamberlain for a conference, if nothing more? No, Sir; nothing of the kind. He took the first occasion to tell the people of Great Britain: 'We have given something, but for heaven's sake do not give us anything in return.'

Mr. McMULLEN. Give us something new.

Mr. FOSTER. Something new? I think there are more than the hon. gentleman who would like to have something new. But, to my mind, truth is old, principle is old, honour in public men is old. These things are prized by the people of this country, and I miss my guess if hon. gentlemen opposite, who seem to laugh these old-fashioned principles to scorn, will not soon be met by the strong voice of the people in favour of old-fashioned truth and honesty. Now, Sir, if the right hon. gentleman pledged himself to do that, why did he not do it? Has he ever given a reason? He neither denies nor exculpates himself. But he made a speech and took a medal, and the very basis on which he made the speech and took the medal was that there should be no preference. Free trade out and out was the Cobden cry, and it was a violation of the principle of free trade to give a preference even to your best friend. The difference between the Liberal-Conservative party and the Liberal party on this one point is this, that we are in favour of a mutual preference. We were in favour of a mutual preference between the United States and this country in the form of a reciprocity treaty on just lines; but we were against discrimination, that is, unfair treatment with regard to Great Britain. These gentlemen were in favour of unrestricted reciprocity or restricted reciprocity with the United States, coupled with unfair treatment and discrimination against Great Britain. In the matter of preference with England, we have favoured and we favour to-day a preference which shall be mutual, giving benefits to both sides, not alone because of the selfish principle that we want to get something for something, but because, if it could be carried out, it would be the most uniting and welding influence between the Imperial colonies and the empire all the world around, that could be brought into force.

Before 1896, both parties were agreed upon this preference and on the same lines and conditions. We have not changed, but hon. gentlemen opposite have. If our policy, Sir, was right in its principles then, we believe that those principles hold good still. We believe that it will be the essence of fairness, that it would contribute to the good of this country and Great Britain herself, that it would be an immense binding power the empire through, if we could have a mutual preference, giving benefits to both parties, and creating a current in trade matters between Great Britain and all her colonies. No one will dispute that. The Finance Minister says: I, too, am in favour of it, and I do not say that we may not some day get it. But while that statement was still warm on his lips, he puts an additional preference, without mutual preference, in favour of Great Britain, which is one of the most effectual ways of preventing that being ultimately brought about which the hon. gentleman wishes. No greater opportunity had ever offered, possibly no better opportunity ever will offer than was offered within the last three years to the right hon. gentleman who leads the government to get from Great Britain and all the colonies a modus vivendi with reference to trade matters which, on some fair and reasonable principle, would be mutually beneficial to all. Events move rapidly. Who would have thought, three years ago, that the relative position of Canada and the empire would be what they are to-day. The Queen's jubilee, the breaking out of the war between the South African Republics and Great Britain, and the consequent great outburst of loyal and patriotic feeling has brought sentiment into a state of ripeness which is favourable to the operation of changes that three years ago would not have been looked at by public men in Great Britain and perhaps not by many public men in this country. And it was a pity of all the pities that the right hon. gentleman did not carry out his pledge to the people of Canada. It was a pity that he did not put himself and the premiers of the other colonies, at Mr. Chamberlain's direct request, into a commission for taking over and arranging this matter if possible on some reasonable basis. Never before had there been such an opportunity, and it may be many years before such a favourable opportunity will be found again. I do not propose to say much more with reference to this question of preference. It is evident that the preference of 12½ per cent did not have much effect. It is equally evident, from the statistics, that the preference of 25 per cent did not have very much more stimulating effect. Hon. gentlemen have gone to the extent of adding another third and have made it 33½ per cent. We will see what effect that will have in stimulating imports from Great Britain to this country. But this is a matter which, I think, should have been approached with very great care and been thought out on more lines than one. What is one of the first effects of this cut of 33½ cents, made horizontally, without discrimination as to articles. It is that it places articles of luxury about the lowest on the list of dutiable goods coming into this country. If the 33½ per cent cut is effective, it lets jewellery in at 20 per cent. It lets manufactures of gold and silver used by rich people in at 20 per cent; it lets in silks, which are used by the wealthy, at 23½ per cent; it lets in laces at 23½ per cent; it lets in pianos at 20 per cent; it lets in porcelain goods at 20 per cent; it lets ribbons in at 23½ per cent; it lets shawls and rugs in at 20 per cent; it lets in watches at 16½ per cent; it admits high class worsted goods at 23½ per cent; velvets at 20 per cent; Brussels carpets at 23½ per cent; cottons, gray and white at 16½ per cent, and coloured cottons at 23½ per cent.

It is an acknowledged principle in the levying of tariff rates in every country that what we call the luxuries of life, which can be afforded by the rich and not much wanted by the poorer classes of people, shall pay a higher percentage of duty. Under this cut, if it be effective, these articles will be amongst those which pay the least duty, and our farmers and artisans will not derive any benefit compared with that derived by the richer classes.

Another point to be observed is how this is going to affect the industries of this country. So far as I can judge, some of the most important industries of this country will find that the cut operates to such an extent that the tariff affords them little or no protection. What is the principle upon which hon. gentlemen are acting? Are they acting in favour of free trade or in favour of adequate protection to the industries of this country? The late Mr. Bertram knew, and he declared that they were acting in favour of an adequate protection to the great industries of this country. The Hon. Clifford Sifton declared that that was their basis of action. The Hon. Mr. Tarte declared that adequate protection was embodied as a principle in their legislation and would not be interfered with. Now, this additional cut of $8\frac{1}{2}$ per cent will act in two ways. It will act in the way I have already mentioned, and besides it will affect some of the principal industries of this country. Whilst it will give no relief to the farmer for his implements, while it will give little or no relief to all the users of iron goods, while it will give no opening market for the farmers of this country, it is possible, it is even very probable, that this will have a damaging effect on certain of our large industries. And, after all, the Liberal-Conservative party, formed with that principle, growing by that principle, having stood by that principle since 1876, to the present hour, does not propose to go back upon that principle now. Over and above everything else, the great asset of this country is its natural resources, and over and above everything else, it ought to be the guiding star of the legislation of this country to work for the development of these great resources so as to make this country so far as we possibly can a hive of industry, where labour finds its employment and its wage, and where abundant natural resources are worked up to the point of highest value and, when put upon the markets of the world, bring the richest returns to the men who bring them forth and fashion them to the use of mankind. There is no other thing which will compensate this country for the loss of that inestimable privilege, for the obliteration of that line of policy which ought to be clearly defined and constantly followed; and, Sir, I say as a member of the Liberal-Conservative party and as a lover of my country in its industrial and trade development, that I believe it is essentially necessary that the principle of adequate protection for the industries of this country should be kept up here. But we are told: This preference to Great Britain is now an accomplished fact. When you get into power, what will you do with it? Will you repeal the preference to Great Britain? That is a question that will be asked; that is a question that must be answered. My answer to it is this—that certain facts when once they are accomplished, become accomplished facts, and, though they were accomplished against the will and against the wish of one party, and against what was considered by that party to be a fair and judicious policy, yet, when once they have been accomplished, it becomes a question whether, profitably to the interest of the country, and to what extent, these accomplished facts can be repudiated or antagonized. One thing, however, is sure—that when the Liberal-Conservative party comes into power, whatever preference is given to the British manufacturer, that party will take care to see that home industries are fairly and adequately protected no matter what advantage is given to others.

The hon. gentleman has given us an idea that a free trade policy is to be adopted with reference to Trinidad. Unfortunately, he has given us no data upon which to express an opinion with reference to that point. We have none of the statistics of trade, we know nothing of what will be the conditions of the bargain, so, we will have to leave it to be discussed when the proper time comes. But, what a change! Just a few years ago the present Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) from this side of the House, laughed me to scorn because we were treating for a market for Canada amongst the 'black people of the West Indies.' A few years ago, the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) declared:

He lucidly set forth the foolishness of thinking of substituting for our natural market of sixty-five millions, the establishment of trade relations with Peru, with Chili, with Patagonia and the West Indies. He would as soon lief send an ambassador to negotiate trade relations with the Esquimaux.

The present Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies, then Mr. Davies) said:

You hear certain politicians who never engaged in trade in their lives, talking flippantly about opening up new markets in other countries. When a great political party declares that its policy consists in obstructing trade with our natural markets, and then tells us they want to open up markets with China, Japan, Timbuctoo, I almost lose my patience. New markets indeed! You have a market to the south of you where everything you can draw out of the sea or delve from the mines or grow from the soil, will find a ready and profitable sale.

The present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), declared:

Mr. Foster has gone to Jamaica to try and get a market for the manufacturers. . . . They have cut themselves off from our best markets in the United States, and are obliged to seek for others. I said that Mr. Foster had gone to Jamaica to find a new market. The flippant way they speak of these new markets is simply trifling with the matter. These new markets, Jamaica, South America, China and Japan, come in at the tail of the list with a fraction of 1 per cent of our commerce; the United States, at the head of the list, takes one-half our whole commerce.

The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), said :

It is absurd to talk about developing trade with the West Indies, Mexico, Central and South America, when these markets are so insignificant compared with the United States markets.

And here we find these same gentlemen sending delegates to South Africa and to Mexico and to Trinidad, and for all I know, to Timbuctoo, in order to open up markets for trade. They have been in power for three years ; let us ask ourselves upon what we can congratulate these hon. gentlemen. They came in with the most definite pledges. They were pledged to a reduction of taxation, pledged to a reduction of debt, pledged to a reduction of expenditure. They were pledged to independence of parliament ; they were pledged to the purity of the elector : they were pledged to give prohibition if the will of the people so declared, they were pledged to the reform of the Senate—and what not ! How have they carried out these pledges ? Look at their expenditure, as I detailed it before this House. Look at the debt continually increasing. Behold the taxation leaping up by four millions a year. See the independence of parliament with the right hon. gentleman at the head of this House reading out some twelve or fifteen names of men who are members of parliament, and who have been given their reward, and who sat here in this House, some of them, with the promise of reward in their pockets. Talk of the purity of the electorate. Last year, the right hon. gentleman gave way to a demand for investigation into electoral frauds in Brockville and West Huron. This session, when much had been proved, and much more remains to be proved, the hon. gentleman throws his own weight and the whole weight of his party to prevent an inquiry before an independent committee of this House as to the enormities which accompanied these elections. Talk of the purity of the electorate, when the infamous machine has been running, when the gentleman who was its father, so to speak, and its manager, worked it until he grew afraid to work it longer, and then was taken up by this government and given the highest position in the Department of Immigration. Talk about giving the people their will in regard to prohibition. They said to the people : Form yourselves into armies ; fight this question out at the polls : and if the result is to secure an expression from the electorate in favour of prohibition, the will of the people shall be carried out. All this when the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who leads the House, and the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) had sat themselves down together in 1893 and, in secret conclave, had come to an arrangement that they would not consider the will of the people as expressed unless there was a majority of all the voters upon the lists—and refused to inform the people of the agreement they had made until the battle was fought and the votes were counted. What about this reform of the Senate ? How it lags. One session, two sessions, three sessions, and yet nothing done. Where are the large lines of their policy, the new markets they were going to open ? Have they opened one ? No, not one. In all the wide round of the world's traffic there is not a port, there is not a settlement with a thousand people that is to-day open to the trade of this country on any advantageous terms as compared with what it was in 1896. They have succeeded in placing barriers against the trade of Canada in more countries than one. But as to new markets, where are they ? The reciprocity we were promised has not been gained. Once they have got what they wanted out of it as an agitation, and got the jaunt out of it with an expenditure of $36,000, they come coolly back to this country and make the admission that after all they don't think there is any sentiment in this country worth while that wants reciprocity with the United States. Sir, as before they got into power any road to get there was good enough for them, so since they have got into power, any policy which keeps them there is a good enough policy for them. On October 4, 1899, the right hon. gentleman thought that the policy of delay, and of hindrance, and of prohibition of the help of this country being given to the British flag and power in South Africa was the right card to play before the people, and they played it. Then when they found, as in 1891, that the people's voice was against this, as it was against their programme then, they quickly shifted round, and now nothing is too loyal or too patriotic for the hon. gentlemen to say or do. We are thankful for the change. We wish it had taken place on the grounds of a more solid principle, or rather wish that there never had been an occasion for a change with hon. gentlemen opposite in this respect.

Sir, if I cannot congratulate the Liberal party on their lines of policy, their fulfilment, their execution and their legislation, I can congratulate the Liberal-Conservative party on many things. I can congratulate the Liberal-Conservative party on having had strong convictions on great lines of policy for the building up and development of this country, steadily held while in opposition and whilst in power, and until they saw their fulfilment, and they are sitting here now on this side of the House after they have been fulfilled, and are beholding the edifying spectacle of hon. gentlemen opposite who opposed every one of them, now conceding that these are good and great helps to Canada, and worthy of the power and enterprise and genius of this century. The Conservative party built on good strong lines of foundation and their work remains. No party, no people in this country are prouder and gladder to see the splendid fulfilment of the results of their twenty long years of work than is the Liberal-Conservative party, though their opponents sit in the seats of office. But, Sir, without any envy of these hon. gentlemen, but rather with commiseration, the Liberal-Conservative party of this country does not propose to change its principles because it is in opposition. Take its trade principle. It believed in it in 1876, it believed in it in 1879, and put it on the statute-book. It stood by it from 1879 to 1896, it went right on, and to-day it stands in opposition on that principle, well knowing that the voice of the people will fully recognize consistency and conviction in great lines of political action.

Sir, more than all I can congratulate our country, Canada, on the position which she holds to-day, young and strong and hopeful, with her face towards the rising sun, and her bosom filled with high thoughts and lofty ambitions. Sir, this Canada of ours was not born in a day, she was not brought forth in a single hour. This Canada of ours, like all other countries that have become great, has had her long period of brooding and preparation, as I said this afternoon, even under clouds and through difficulties. But as sure as she has had her period of preparation, she is coming out to-day into the period of splendid growth and splendid development which shall continue on this half of the American continent for many and many a long century to come.

What are the great causes that have played their part in building up this new nation of the north? First, there was political and geographical unity. There were no natural difficulties which daunted the people of this country, and which prevented them from achieving the political and geographical unity of this country. To-day that is accomplished, natural barriers have been overcome, difficulties between the provinces in interprovincial communication have been vanquished, and to-day that unity is not simply written upon paper, but is an entity strong and vigorous, which has come to remain, and upon which a splendid development in the future shall be built. But, Sir, there is a unity, if not a blending, of race and of creed in this country. There may never come a time when the races and creeds of this country will blend one with the other; but there is coming a time, there is now a time, and there will always be a time, I believe, in which unity can exist between people of different races and different creeds, with perfect respect the one for the other, and perfect unanimity of feeling on the great lines of citizenship and public endeavour. There is a unity, too, through lines of communication, like the veins and arteries of the body, through which the distant parts of our country shall have their life blood of thought and of commercial activity constantly flowing and returning.

Mr. FOSTER

The veins and arteries are the great lines of railway communication, the majestic and spacious rivers of our country, improved for the purposes of navigation, by the expenditure of our money, the telegraph and telephone lines, and all these myriad means of communication which make trade and thought a common factor and a common inheritance from one end of this country to the other. That is a unity in the production of which the Liberal-Conservative party has played no mean part, and in the promotion of which I hope in the future the Liberal party as well, during its term in power, whether it be long or short, will work with equal fervour and with equal success.

Then, there is what you might call the unity of a broad and co-existent action of the people on the lines of labour and of industry. No more inviting influence was ever brought into action in this country of Canada than our great lines of national industry, protected though they had to be at first. Because, in these diversified industries of the country, the common heritage of our people, the common source from which they shall draw that which keeps themselves and their families, making their homes comfortable, their lots pleasant in this country, this community of labour in industrial work is something that binds this country together and upon the possession of which this country may well congratulate itself. There is also a unity of allegiance and loyalty within Canada and within the bounds of the empire. On this auspicious occasion we, in this House can assume that there is not a man, sitting here to-night, representing well the people and the feelings of the people of this country, who does not feel a throb of loyal ambition when the name of his own country, Canada, is spoken, and who does not feel that sense quickened when he knows that over and above and around this country there is the great Imperial power presided over by the matchless Queen, to whom we all give our homage and unswerving loyalty.

How, like a romance, reads this history of Canada! Four centuries ago, so far as governmental lines were concerned, what now forms the Dominion of Canada was without form and void, though beautiful and strong in its vast and undeveloped possibilities, caught in distant and infrequent glimpses by the daring voyageur travelling unknown seas in search of unknown lands. Three centuries ago the spirit of European adventure brooded here and there—sowing, in scattered places, the seeds of a new civilization which gradually spread from section to section, to our great lakes, westward, to our prairies and across the mountains, until it came to be dominant and strong in that part of this North American continent which now forms the Dominion of Canada. One and a half centuries ago the people of this country were settling the sovereignty of this country along the borders to the south of us down by the ports and coasts of the Atlantic, up along the line of the St. Lawrence, and ultimately on the Plains of Abraham, where Montcalm and Wolfe of glorious memory sanctified the valour, sealed the long compact of peace between two great races. Half a century ago we, placing in this country, the capstone of responsible government upon the remains of the old colonial rule, municipal lines were being laid in the different provinces, schools and colleges were being formed and the nucleus of these great productive industries which, to-day, dot this country from one end of it to the other, from Cape Breton to the Pacific coast, was being established. Thirty years ago the people of this country joined hands from sea to sea, rearing the dome of that great superstructure of the Dominion of Canada, beneath whose broad roof all the peoples of all the provinces entered into a common home under a new system. To-day we are here, five millions of sturdy, enterprising, energetic people, with our lines of railway, 20,000 miles in extent, running through every portion of the country, taking us across the prairies, overtopping the mountains and giving us a great highway from ocean to ocean; with our prairies yielding themselves to the art of the farmer and the cultivator; with our broad forests, which give up their annual resources and income to the strong and able men who work in them; with our mines, which are developing untold and unthought of wealth—untold as yet, unthought of by any up to the present time. Self-contained and self-governed, we look complacently on the past history of the country, enjoy the present and look to the future with hope, ambition and pride. Gradually, in these later years, she has awakened and heard, as it were, a voice calling in the night, the first ring of the anthem which British voices are now singing around the wide world, the anthem of inter-Imperial unity, of interest and mutual solicitude. Gradually she is growing and has grown responsive to the spirit of that prophecy which tells of peace, security, resting on the broad basis of a world-wide and invincible power. Gradually we have been rising to the regal dignity of a citizenship born here, centred here, but, bounded in its sphere of action only by the farthest limits of Britain's Imperial sway, ready to defend our own at home, ready to strike for the flag and the empire wherever danger threatens, or wherever duty calls.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether it would be unfair to suggest that when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) who has just sat down was, unhappily, overtaken by illness and unable to reply to the speech of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), on Friday night, the illness in question was an illness, not of the flesh, but of the spirit.

I have no doubt whatever that the hon. gentleman and his friends beside him found the budget so ably and lucidly presented by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) an extremely hard pill to swallow. Seven millions and a half of surplus, a volume of trade rising, within four years, from a little over $200,000,000 to an estimate of well-nigh $400,000,000 in the approaching year, all the evidences that could well be imagined, all evidences that the hon. gentleman had ever piled together in former years, as evidence of wealth and prosperity, doubled, trebled, quadrupled, negotiations opened for the purpose of extending our trade relations with an important sister colony the securities of Canada admitted within the charmed circle open for investment for all trusts and last of all, and worst of all for these hon. gentlemen, the proof that we still adhere to the letter to the preference we have accorded to the mother country. The hon. gentleman has intimated, on more than one occasion, that times have changed. You and I, Mr. Speaker, can both remember the time when we had to battle with the beasts at Ephesus, and when we had to confront the Conservative cohorts advancing in line to the cheerful slogan of 'the old flag' and an appropriation. Sir, unhappily, the appropriations are not for them; still more unhappily the old flag at long last cleansed and purified, has been rescued in fair fight from the hands of the miscreants who traded on it, and degraded it, and the old flag now waves brighter and purer and loftier than ever, over the ranks of the men who, first among colonists, have granted voluntarily of their own free will, a substantial preference and advantage to the goods and merchants of the motherland. I fear that the dose administered by my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding), affected—to judge from the speech we have just heard—not merely the digestion, but the temper of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster). It is my private suspicion, that, however ill he may have been, this is a case in which he suffers more from a diseased mind than from a diseased body. And, Sir, it may interest the House to know that my diagnosis of his case is fortified by the opinion of a very eminent specialist, no less than Sir Mackenzie Bowell, who, as the House probably knows, had most uncommonly good opportunities for studying in times past, the mental evolution and the nature and habits of the hon. member for the county of York (Mr. Foster). I am afraid that the malady of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), is serious. The symptoms are bad. More particularly ever since he got on the other side of the House, I have observed one characteristic and dangerous symptom. It seems to be impossible for that hon. gentleman to utter an exalted sentiment (and he is very fond of uttering exalted sentiments), without making use of it as a sort of shoeing horn for some particularly nasty insinuation. It is a sad symptom of the mental aberration which I deplore, that we find in the hon. gentleman's case, that words like 'candour,' 'purity,' 'loyalty,' 'honesty,' are perpetually present in his mouth and perpetually absent from his heart. It is another bad symptom. I am afraid, that we find almost invariably the loftiest professions are but the precursors of very low practices on his part. And, it is a bad symptom that he appears to be, in stating a case, unable to see straight or to speak straight. He really is physically incapable of making any statement, without suppressing a great many material and important facts, and which, you will observe, Mr. Speaker, is very frequently the case in these instances of mental aberration, the patient always suspects other people and accuses other people of doing the very things which he is constantly doing himself.

I do not know whether you remember, Sir, that very remarkable chapter on the Association of Ideas, which figures so conspicuously in the works of the philosopher Locke. To the best of my recollection, that philosopher devoted a very considerable section of his famous work to explaining how extraordinary was the association of ideas in men's minds, and if I remember aright, he was specially emphatic on the point, that certain scents or perfumes in some extraordinary fashion always seem to be associated in men's minds, with incidents and events with which they had no apparent connection. It is a very curious and singular fact, that for long I have been unable to listen to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), without being irresistibly reminded of the poet Tennyson. I grant that it appears a most irrelevant thing. I grant that it is scarcely possible to conceive an hon. gentleman, who in looks and manner is less like the worthy Knights of the Round Table celebrated by the poet laureate, but so it is. I never could listen to a speech made by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), without being irresistibly reminded of the poet Tennyson and of the poet's famous lines :

A lie that is all a lie, can be met with and fought outright,
But a lie that is half the truth is a harder battle to fight.

Now, Sir, we will admit frankly, (nihil humanum a me alienum puto), that the hon. gentleman's luck is hard. I sympathize with him from the very bottom of my heart. I myself have known what it is to have had hard luck, but, Sir, that is, after all, the fortune of war, and the hon. gentleman must learn to bear it. Still I sympathize, not so much, perhaps, with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), as with his colleague, the hon. Baronet, who leads the opposition. Just fancy, Mr. Speaker, if that hon. gentleman in his time, had had a surplus of $7,500,000, how the welkin would have rung. Just fancy had the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper), had the luck to preside over the colonial Premiers at the diamond jubilee of Her Gracious Majesty, how he would have glorified his office, and how he must feel that it was the cruellest turn of fortune that took away from him both the surplus and the chance of figuring conspicuously before the eyes of assembled Anglo-Saxondum in London. I have said it was the fortune of war, and here let me recall to my elder colleagues what occurred in 1878. It is no news to them, that if ever there was a government, and if ever there was a man, who were made scapegoats for the sins and follies of their predecessors, it was Mr. Mackenzie, and Mr Mackenzie's administration. I remember very well, how, when the Mackenzie administration was formed, we inherited from these hon. gentlemen—some of them now before me—or from their predecessors, legacies which might well have appalled any government. We came into office in 1873, to find that $5,000,000 a year had been added to the annual expenditure of Canada, for which not one farthing's provision had been made. We came into office to find liabilities incurred to the tune of $100,000,000, for which no provision whatever had been made, and here let me point out that $5,000,000 a year in those days, and $100,000,000, were far more than would have been an addition of $10,000,000 a year, or of $200,000,000 to our general public debt to-day. And, Sir, immediately almost, after we were well settled in office, we were called upon to face one of the most tremendous and world-wide depressions of trade that ever rolled over the English-speaking world. Great Britain not excepted. A little while ago, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), talked of the financial cyclone that had struck the United States between 1892 and 1895. I was through both of these periods, and I can tell him that the depression that prevailed in the United States between 1873 and 1878, compared with the depression from 1892 to 1895, is as the Rocky Mountains to the hills on the other side of the Gatineau. Then we had to wrestle with a great fall in values and inevitably with a great loss of revenue, and lastly, we had to face three bad harvests in succession. Now, what did the hon. gentleman's friends, and what did the hon. gentleman's colleagues do under those circumstances? He has been appealing to us, not now for the first time, but scores of times within the last few years for indulgence and consideration because his deficits were due to circumstances which neither he nor any other government could control. He has been appealing to us over and over again for indulgence on the very grounds, only by no manner of means so well established as those on which we might well have pleaded for indulgence in the time to which I have alluded. I am in the judgment of those hon. gentlemen who sat in parliament with me in those days, when I ask, did these hon. gentlemen under those circumstances ever dream of making any fair allowance, or any allowance at all, for the misfortunes to which the Mackenzie government were exposed? Did they admit that the causes mentioned were beyond the control of any government? It is not too much to say that the way in which they aided us was by doing everything that malice and misrepresentation could imagine to inflame the passions of the ignorant masses against us for misfortunes that could be averted by no possible exertion on our part. I well recollect that there was nothing that these hon. gentlemen did not stoop to in those days. I well recollect that they induced manufacturers who were carrying on their business at a reasonable profit to suspend operations for the purpose of inflaming their operatives against the Liberal party. I remember well that Parliament square was filled with a howling mob, not one of whom appeared to be hungry, but a great many of whom appeared to be drunk, brought there, I believe, hired to come there, for the purpose of creating a popular uproar against the Mackenzie government. I remember when an Orange demonstration was engineered in the city of Montreal for the express purpose of setting religion against religion and race against race if it were to the detriment of the Liberal party. What did these men care then, or what do they care now if the streets of Montreal were to run red provided always that they scored a point against a Liberal administration. Mark, Mr. Speaker, the moment the Conservative party came into office all these demonstrations ceased, and I believe I am correct in saying that from that day to this no Orange procession has flaunted itself in the streets of Montreal.

Mr. WALLACE. That is where you are mistaken. There have been many since then.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. When?

Mr. WALLACE. I took part in them myself.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I stand corrected if I am mistaken. My recollections, of course, chiefly refer to the dozen or fourteen succeeding years during which I am sure the utmost peace and order was observed on the part of that magnanimous order as regards the inhabitants of Montreal. Now, these hon. gentlemen who, as everybody knows, held us liable for the short crops that occurred, who held us liable for the collapse of trade in the United States and in England, who would admit no plea, listen to no argument, turned their backs on their own policy; for I am speaking what is perfectly well known to every man here who has paid any attention to the history of Canada, when I say that until after they were elected in 1878, they never avowed that they intended to introduce a policy of protection. I know what Sir John Macdonald stated; I saw his telegram to Mr. Boyd, in which he declared that he did not intend to increase, but only to readjust the taxation. I have no objection, for my part, to the severest criticism which these hon. gentlemen can bring to bear if only that criticism is fair and intelligent; and I think the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster), might do good service to the state if he would betake himself to something like reasonable and fair criticism of such a speech as that delivered by my hon. friend the Finance Minister, which speech I may remark he did not pretend to answer in all the four and a half hours he devoted to it this afternoon. The hon. gentleman is able, he is industrious, he is a good debater, if only he would only learn to condense his everlasting speeches a little. I trust that he will not take it amiss if I say that I believe that even on his own side there was a feeling of infinite satisfaction when that speech became an accomplished fact, as he tells us the preferential tariff is likely to be.

Now, Sir, I am bound to say that the speech of the hon. gentleman deserves some considerable attention at our hands. I may define it briefly as a magazine of misstatements. Nevertheless, I purpose to pay the hon. gentleman the compliment—and I hope he will appreciate it—of analysing it in considerable detail. So far as I was able to listen to it, and I endeavoured to bring my attention to bear upon it, I think every sophistry, every perversion of fact, every piece of trickery and juggling of figures that has been strung together by himself or his worthy colleagues since the commencement of this session has been in one shape or another embodied in that speech. I purpose to take the hon. gentleman's assertions, his suppressions of facts, his unfair inferences, and I purpose to deal with them all seriatim and in due order. It may take time, but it is necessary that that time should be given.

In the first place, I want to deal, not at much length, with the charge of inconsistency which the hon. gentleman has brought against myself and against other hon. gentlemen on this side, in that we admit a different policy in the matter of expenditure to be justifiable now, in 1900, from that which we admitted in 1895. Sir, I say here, as I said before, that the Liberal party were perfectly right then and they are perfectly right now. The circumstances of the case called imperatively in the loudest possible tones for strict and rigid economy in 1895; the circumstances of the case warrant free and judicious outlay for proper purposes in 1900. The hon. gentleman is perhaps not aware of a few facts which I think he ought to be made aware of, with respect to the position in 1895, and the position in 1900. As the House knows, I have always called attention from both sides of the House to the extreme danger in a country like this of allowing our fixed charges to increase in too great a ratio to the ordinary expenditure of Canada. I want to present to this House a very brief statement which will show them, without going into minute detail, what sort of position we had got into in 1895, and how thoroughly just were the criticisms I and others levelled against the policy of the government at that time. In 1895 the gross receipts of Canada for consolidated revenue purposes were $33,978,000. The charges for collection of revenue amounted to $9,115,000, and the fixed charges, including the treaty obligations to Indians, interest, sinking fund and subsidies, amounted to $18,000,000. In all $27,115,000 had to be paid out of $33,978,000 before you had a farthing available for ordinary purposes. The balance in our hands at the expiration of that year amounted therefore to $6,863,000 for all purposes.

Under the estimates submitted by my hon. friend for the year 1901, our charges for collection for revenue will amount to $10,725,000, and our fixed charges to $18,800,000, making a total of $29,525,000; and if my hon. friend's expectations are realized, as there is every reason to believe they will be, we will have available for our ordinary expenditure, not $6,800,000, but $21,475,000. I take it that hon. gentlemen on the other side are not children or fools. Do they presume to tell us that the same line of policy with regard to details of expenditure ought to be pursued when your whole available revenue is less than $7,000,000, which is justified when your available revenue exceeds $21,000,000? Do they think that there is no ground for a new departure when we exchange a deficit of $4,900,000, such as we had in 1875, for an estimated surplus of $7,500,000, such as exists in this year? Do they think that the expansion of trade from $224,000,000 to the sum it is estimated we will approach next year, about $4,000,000, is no ground for adopting a more liberal policy of expansion now than we deemed it wise to adopt then? There is not a man in all Canada who will pretend to say that a person whose income is suddenly raised from $1,000 to $3,000 a year will not be fully justified in indulging in many items of expenditure which, on an income of $1,000, would be gross extravagance. There is the best and the only answer I deem it necessary to give this absurd charge of inconsistency on our part. It is perfectly true that very gross extravagance did prevail before our advent to power, especially in the way of increasing the fixed charges of Canada to the extent they were increased in the years preceding our entrance into office. That is perfectly true.

but, all the same, the conditions have so wholly changed between 1895 and 1901 that there is no justification for saying that because we advocated a line of economical conduct then, we are inconsistent in advocating a reasonable increase of expenditure now. Moreover, then, as the hon. gentleman admitted, there was a period of almost complete stagnation, while, as he also knows, we are now in a period of very general expansion and prosperity, I am happy to say.

And here I desire to note one very remarkable difference between the prosperity that now exists and the prosperity that was claimed to exist from 1878 to 1896. I deny the claim made by those hon. gentlemen that Canada prospered under their national policy. I say that Canada did not prosper as a whole, although it may be true that certain individual localities, and a certain favoured few, did succeed in reaping considerable prosperity from the impositions laid on the country. But, so far as the so-called prosperity did exist, that prosperity, I repeat, was partial and artificial. It was confined to a small class, the great masses had no share in it, and to all intents and purposes it was that kind of prosperity which consists of robbing Peter to enrich Paul. If ever one man's gain was another's loss, it was under the policy of high taxation initiated by those hon. gentlemen and to a great extent happily redressed by us. What was the condition of things in Canada during that period? Is there a man here representing an agricultural constituency who can gainsay my statement, that during that long period agriculture was depressed to a degree never before known in Canada. From Canada our people were fleeing, not at the rate of tens or hundreds of thousands, but of millions all told. Is there any man who knows anything of the real condition of Canada who will deny that all over Canada at that time debt was increasing, mortgages were increasing, lands were sinking in value, and often absolutely unsaleable besides.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is one of your blue-ruin speeches dressed up again.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Not at all, it is the speech of one who is speaking with the knowledge derived from handling transactions amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars affecting the agriculturists of Canada. Compare the situation now. Where is the farmer, the miner, the lumberman, the manufacturer, the merchant, in Canada who is not prosperous and satisfied with the condition of things to-day? Sir, I am happy to be able to say that almost all those conditions to which I have referred have been completely reversed in the last three or four years. Throughout all Canada agriculture is thriving, land is rising in value and finds plenty of purchasers now, where before you might have put up a dozen of farms without receiving a single bid. I am happy in being able to say that the records of the loan companies show that our farmers are paying off their mortgages, that the exodus is at an end, that trade is expanding in all directions, that new sources of wealth are opening up on every side, and that at last we have entered on an era of prosperity such as Canada was hoping for and was promised many a long year, but has never enjoyed until the Liberal party were returned to power.

I want to say a few words on one of what I must call the very disingenuous statements made by the hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster). The House may have noticed that in comparing expenditures between this government and the last, he was exceeding careful to select the year 1896, knowing, as he well knew, that the accounts for that year had been deliberately cooked so as to make them wholly unreliable as a means of comparison. That has been exposed again and again on the floor of this House. Not once, but fifty times, has it been pointed out that the hon. gentleman's actual expenditure for 1885 amounted to considerably over $38,000,000, that his original main estimates for 1897 amounted to $38,358,000, and that over and above all these he was prepared, had his main estimates passed, to bring down other supplementary estimates to the extent of over $3,000,000. Yet, he is not ashamed—he, an ex-Finance Minister—to stand up and give the House to understand that he had reduced the expenditure to a matter of $37,000,000. How did he do that? By starving two of the most important services Canada has to deal with, by so reducing the expenditure on militia as to make the whole outlay for that year practically useless, by so reducing the expenditure on public works as to have since involved us in very large and heavy expenditure for the repairing of injuries to public works caused by his senseless parsimony for the purpose of making a false balance in 1896.

Let me give the House a little sample of the sort of expenditure which that hon. gentleman was prepared to inflict upon us had his party succeeded in returning to power. I have here a list of harbours and rivers for Nova Scotia appearing in the supplemental estimates prepared by the hon. gentleman, as supplemental only for 1897, which foot up to $648,890, while his total supplemental estimates for that year amounted to $3,180,000, making, as I have said, something like $41,500,000 which he was prepared to ask for the service of the year 1897, if he and his party had been, unhappily, continued in power. I remember perfectly well the excuse that the hon. gentleman gave for refusing to be bound by these estimates. He told us that these had been submitted to council but had not been passed. My answer to that is that he and his friends are entirely estopped from disputing these estimates for the excellent and sufficient reason that they made use of these estimates on the hustings and for electioneering purposes during the general election. This is the gentleman who arises here and pretends to make an honest comparison of the rate of expenditure between 1896 and 1897 and the expenditure incurred by my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding). And more than that, I call the attention of the House to note that all through these calculations of his he took most excellent good care to suppress the most material fact, that of our additional expenditure, a very large proportion (by much the larger proportion) consisted of some services which he had not to provide for, and which were in the strictest sense of the term, cross-entries, because we returned to the public treasury without taxing the people a full equivalent for the sums we took out, whether they were for sinking fund, for a expenditure in the Yukon, for additional services on the railways or for any of several other purposes that I have not time now to enumerate. These facts alone, I think, will be amply sufficient to show the House that I am perfectly justified in saying that the statements and comparisons the hon. gentleman has made, even in those comparatively rare cases where they are correct in themselves, are utterly vitiated by his inveterate practice of suppressing all material facts which it is necessary to bring to the attention of the House for the purpose of obtaining anything like a fair or accurate comparison as to the expenditure of the two governments. Now, I do not think it would be fair to the House or possible for me to enter upon a minute analysis of the hon. gentleman's statements at this moment; but there are one or two things which, before I move the adjournment of the debate, I would like to call attention to. The hon. gentleman was good enough to dwell at great length on a speech made by me in 1888. Well, Sir, I stand by the speech I made in 1888, though I am not prepared to say that twelve years afterwards under a different condition of circumstances, I would be disposed to advocate the policy which then would have been advantageous to the country. All that I wish to call the attention of the House to is this—that the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) who sits beside him was Finance Minister at that time. It fell by right to his lot to answer the speech made by me at that time. But the hon. gentleman had one advantage over his colleague of being a medical man, and so of having the power to put himself on the sick list. This he did and until the debate was concluded, and never rose in his place to answer, to oppose the arguments I brought forward in favour of unrestricted reciprocity. If the hon. gentleman condemns my friend, the Minister of Marine (Sir Louis Davies) for declaring that it would be the easiest thing and the most desirable thing to obtain reciprocity within a few months. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) beside me, can bear me witness that during the election of 1878, the main argument by which the hon. baronet sought to convince the electors of the lower provinces that his policy was likely to be right and wise was his declaration that if they would carry out the policy he proposed he would obtain reciprocity for them in less than two years.

Now, the hon. gentleman told us that the purchases made by England from the United States were enormously in excess of those made from Canada. Quite true. It is extremely probable that England, in dealing with over seventy millions of people, would buy more than she buys from the five or six millions of Canada. But the hon. gentleman undertook to analyse the matter, and I took down his figures, which, I believe, are tolerably correct. He showed that England bought about $300,000,000 of food stuffs and bread stuffs from the seventy or seventy-five millions of people in the United States, averaging about $4 per head, while she bought from us, with our five and a half millions, about $62,000,000 worth, or over $11 per head from us as against $4 per head from the United States. So, in proportion to our population, we supply England with three times as much as the United States, and our exportation to England, as everybody knows, is very rapidly on the increase. And, as an hon. friend reminds me, there is an extreme probability that a very considerable proportion of the exports credited to the United States are really Canadian products which go through that country.

Now, Sir, I would like to know what the hon. gentleman proposes to do about this preference. He was good enough to tell us that it was a fair question to ask him what they were going to do about it and that it was a question that must be answered—and he immediately proceeded to dodge it and evade it, and has given us no answer, unless it be that we are to interpret his statement that an accomplished fact is an accomplished fact to mean that he and his friends are afraid to lift their little finger against it. The hon. gentleman, the other evening, I am told—I had not the pleasure of being present—read an amendment which he proposed, as I understand, with the full concurrence of his party to move in opposition to our policy and explaining and defining theirs. Where is that amendment? Are we not to have it? Surely, the hon. gentleman who read it from his place in this House is not going to delegate the moving of so important an amendment to another and secondary hand. Or, does my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) think that so grave and solemn a task is one that he should not commit even to so trusty a subordinate? The hon. gentleman told us that the Liberal-Conservative party never changed its principles. Well, that may be—that may be. Some people would say there would be a difficulty in changing what did not exist. But when he goes on to tell us that the Liberal-Conservative party went out on principle, I must beg to differ from him. I understood that that section of the Liberal-Conservative party to which he belongs went out on strike. Mr. Speaker, having some consideration for the length of time this House has been listening to these financial statements, I think I will not inflict on you any more of them at present, and I will move the adjournment of this debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT—ELECTORAL LISTS.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. W. H. MONTAGUE (Haldimand). The Prime Minister promised us last night to give us some information at a later date with regard to the preparation of the lists. Is he now prepared to say what progress is being made?

The PRIME MINISTER. What lists are printed—is that it?

Mr. MONTAGUE. If the right hon. gentleman will tell us what lists are printed, we will be delighted to know, and when we may expect the rest of them.

The PRIME MINISTER. There is a question on the paper to-morrow afternoon, and probably by that time I will be able to give some information.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If the right hon. gentleman will also tell us what time they will be wanted?

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend is too inquisitive.

SELECTIONS FOR THE STAFF COURSE.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) I want to prefer a request for the papers asked from the Department of Militia and Defence in reference to the appointments to the staff course, or the selection for the staff course. I do not think we ought to be asked to wait any longer for these papers. Unless they are down, I shall certainly renew my request in another way. It would not take five minutes to bring them down. I have been told that people who have been to the department to inquire, have been virtually answered: It is none of your business, the minister has other things to attend to, you fellows are always wanting papers, and you will get them when we are ready to give them to you. Now, the officers in that department are the officers of this country.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). I do not think the hon. gentleman has any right to make that statement. Nobody in the department could have used such language. Will the hon. gentleman give me the officer's name?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not choose to do it.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Then you had better not make a statement of that kind here in the House.

Mr. FOSTER. I will make any statement I please right here in the House, and I will make a great many more statements before this session is over.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Minister of Militia and Defence says that nobody returned such an answer. Will he tell us on what authority he makes that statement?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I said I would like to know the name of the officer who made any such statement as that repeated by the member for York (Mr. Foster).

THE PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask if the Public Accounts Committee is going to meet at all during this session?

The PRIME MINISTER. I have called the attention of the chairman to it, and I will call his attention to it again to-morrow.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—THE BUDGET DEBATE.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the House adjourns, I would like to ask my right hon. friend what course is proposed, with reference to the budget debate. The usual practice has been to go on continuously with the debate until it is closed.

The PRIME MINISTER. By the rule of the House, this debate will be resumed again on Thursday. But I intend to put a notice on the paper to-morrow, that on Friday I will move to take Wednesday the rest of the session for government business. Therefore, next week, we expect to have the debate continue, if need be, for the four days, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday. But, to-morrow is private members' day.

Mr. INGRAM. I think it is unfair to private members to take Wednesday away from us.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.00 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, March 28, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

RETURN.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). I would like to say to the hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster) that the return which he has asked for will be laid on the Table to-morrow.

HOCKLEY AND MONO CENTRE MAIL CONTRACT.

On the question (Mr. Davis),

Has the postmaster taken any action in connection with the transaction referred to in the following extract from the Supplementary Report of the Post Office Department for 1896?

HOCKLEY AND MONO CENTRE.

In renewing this contract without tender, the department had before it the statement of the inspector that the service could be obtained at a rate from $90 to $100 lower than the contract rate. As a matter of fact there was a tender in the department at the time the renewal was authorized which was $121 per annum lower than the contract rate, the loss on the contract being $484.

When the facts were brought to the attention of the present government it had the contract cancelled and tenders invited. The result has been that a contract is in operation for the same service at the rate of $234 per annum, and a saving effected of $136 per annum, or $544 for the contract term.

The following tenders were received but not considered:

Louis Gunn	$249 00
Robinson Holland	250 00
Robert Mills	279 00
S. R. Fleming	295 00
John Lee	300 00
James Fleming	325 00
R. J. Hackett	345 00
Thomas Hackett	349 00
Robert Colwell	370 00

(Correspondence.)

Lorraine, 3rd January, 1894.

Dear Sir,—Having tendered for carrying the mail between Hockley and Mono Centre for the sum of two hundred and seventy-nine dollars—$279—per annum, I ask one favour from you to do what you can in regard of getting it for me, and I am sure I will try and give good satisfaction, and also carry according to the rule, which has not been done in the past, and also state that the old contractor is getting far too much salary for carrying it, and if the laws and rules were posted up in every post office so the public could see them, the mail carrier would not be imposed on so much.

ROBERT J. MILLS,

Some times assistant in Lorraine post office, Ontario.

Postmaster General.

4th January, 1894.

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 3rd inst., calling attention to your tender for the Hockley and Mono Centre mail service. In reply, I am to say that when the tenders for this service are opened yours will have every consideration.

I am, &c.,

ARTHUR LINDSAY,

Mr. R. J. Mills, Superintendent.
Lorraine, Ont.

Ottawa, 25th January, 1894.

Dear Sir Adolphe,—I inclose you a communication that has been addressed to me by our warm friend who resides in Orangeville, Ont., Mr. J. S. Leighton. You will observe what he says about the contract for carrying the mail between Hockley and Mono Centre, that is again being tendered for by Mr. Caldwell. If you can renew this contract to Mr. Caldwell at the old figure I shall be very much obliged. Kindly drop me a line saying what you can do, and return the inclosed letter.

I am, faithfully yours,

N. CLARKE WALLACE.

Hon. Sir A. P. Caron, Postmaster General, Ottawa.

(Inclosure.)

Box 104, Orangeville, 22nd January, 1894.

Dear Sir,—Mr. R. Caldwell has sent with this mail a tender for renewal of contract for carrying the mails from Hockley to Mono Centre. This tender is the same as the contract he already had.

I understand the parties who are tendering against him are McCarthyites and they deserve nothing at the hands of the Dominion government. Mr. R. Caldwell is and always was a thorough Conservative.

Yours very respectfully,

J. S. LEIGHTON.

N. C. Wallace, M.P., Controller of Customs.

Ottawa, 27th January, 1894.

My dear Mr. Wallace,—I am in receipt of your letter of the 25th inst., inclosing a letter from Mr. J. S. Leighton, recommending the renewal of the contract of Mr. R. Caldwell for the mail service between Hockley and Mono Centre.

In reply, I beg to say that in accordance with your recommendation, I have authorized that this contract may be renewed for a further term.

Yours faithfully,

ADOLPHE P. CARON.

N. C. Wallace, Esq., M.P., Controller of Customs, Ottawa.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Stand.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). No; I have the answer to the question here: The contract in this case was terminated and put up to tender, and a new contract let to the lowest tenderer at $234 a year, thus effecting a saving of $544 for the contract term.

Mr. GEORGE E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) I beg leave to call attention to the fact that in this case the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) has given a great deal of information that he was not asked for, and also that he has misstated the expenditure for the year 1896.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) will, at the proper time, call my attention to any error, I shall be glad to correct it. I have no desire to state anything not in accordance with the facts. As to giving additional information, we discussed that the other day. I think I am entirely within the rules.

What is the number and value of cattle and sheep, respectively, exported from Canada to Great Britain during each calendar year since January 1, 1890?

What is the number and value of horses exported from Canada to Great Britain during each calendar year from January 1, 1890?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Had he not better move for the returns ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). I have them in condensed form here.

Mr. MONTAGUE. We asked some questions the other day similar to these, and we were asked to move for a return.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I do not remember that.

Mr. MONTAGUE. We remember it very well on this side of the House.

RAW MATERIAL OF BINDING TWINE.

Mr. McMILLAN asked :

What was the price paid by the penitentiary authorities at Kingston for each quality of raw material purchased since July 1, 1898, giving the price of New Zealand, Manila and sisal separately?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I cannot give to my hon. friend the information he asks for. It is the policy of the department, not to state the prices at which the raw material was purchased until after the product has been disposed of.

THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

Mr. TAYLOR asked :

1. Is the government aware that Mr. Charles A. Gauvreau, M.P. for Temiscouata, is using his privilege as a member of this House to frank through the mails daily to all parts of Canada and the United States thousands of copies of a circular announcing the publication of a work by Mr. Wilfrid Larose, président de l'école littéraire de Montréal?

2. Is the government aware that cart-loads of these circulars are being shipped to Ottawa to the said C. A. Gauvreau, M.P., to be franked by him through the mails to persons in Canada and the United States?

3. Is the government aware that the said C. A. Gauvreau, M.P., has organized a staff of persons to assist in the work of addressing and franking immense quantities of these business circulars through the mails?

4. Is the government aware whether the said C. A. Gauvreau, M.P., in order to more effectually accomplish the task of franking said business circulars of Mr. Larose's work, has caused facsimiles of his signature to be prepared on stamping machines and has entrusted the use of such stamping devices to others to be used in franking the business circulars of the said Wilfrid Larose?

5. On such communications addressed to persons in the United States and franked with the frank of the said C. A. Gauvreau, has the government, or the officials of the Ottawa post office, to affix postage stamps?

6. Does the government intend to adopt any, and if so, what steps to prevent the said C. A. Gauvreau, M.P., from franking broadcast throughout the Dominion and the United States, at the expense of the whole people, business notices relating to the publication of Mr. Larose's book? If not, why not?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). The government is not aware of the matters inquired about in the various portions of this question, with the exception of item 5. Speaking generally, it may be said, that under the Postal Union laws, all letters transmitted from one country to another should be stamped with the postage stamps of the country of origin.

CARRIAGE OF MAILS TO BELGRAVE POST OFFICE.

Mr. TAYLOR asked :

Were tenders called for for conveying the mail from and to the Belgrave post office to the station?

Mr. PATERSON.

If so, who were the parties tendering, and what was the amount of each tender?

Was the contract let to the lowest tenderer?

When were tenders called for, and on what date did the time expire for receiving tenders?

What is the date of each tender received?

Did any party tender more than once; if so, who, and what was the date of their tender?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). Tenders were called for a contract to commence on the 1st October, 1899, for the mail service between Belgrave post office and the railway station, the tenders being due to be opened on the 14th July, 1899. The following were the tenders received, with the dates on which they reached the department :

William Hobbs, $100, received 4th July, 1899; Sarah Tufts, $134, received 12th July, 1899; Wm. Bone, $138, received 10th July, 1899; J. Scandrett, $142, received 12th July, 1899. Mrs. Sarah Tufts, the former contractor, having applied for the contract at the rate of the lowest tender, $100, and the inspector having reported that the mail service had been performed by Mrs. Tufts in a very satisfactory manner, during the last twelve years, the contract having been renewed, during that period, at the rate of $132 per annum, the Postmaster General decided, in view of her satisfactory services in the past, that it was in the public interest to retain her services as contractor, and, therefore, under authority of section 54 of the Post Office Act, awarded to her the contract, allowing her the price of the lowest tender, which is $32 less than it had been renewed for during the period of twelve years.

POWERS OF CHARTERED BANKS.

Mr. GUILLET asked :

Were the corporate powers of the chartered banks, which had been extended to July 1, 1881, renewed in the session of 1880, and extended to July 1, 1891?

Was an Act passed in the session of 1890 further extending the charters of these banks to July 1, 1901?

In view of the expiration of these charters on July 1, 1901, is it not the intention of the government to introduce a Bill this session extending them for a similar period?

If important amendments to the Banking Act are to be proposed, is it not desirable that the Bill should be promptly introduced, that due notice may be given to all concerned?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The bank charters were dealt with in times past in the manner described in the hon. member's question. It is the intention of the government to introduce a Bill during the present session, to extend the charters of the banks. The Bill will be introduced in ample time to afford all parties interested, full opportunity for discussion.

ST. VINCENT DE PAUL PENITENTIARY.

Mr. FORTIN asked :

1. Is the government aware that according to a new regulation, seven officers of the St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary are bound to perform night duty permanently? 2. Is it the intention of the government to maintain such exceptional regulation? 3. Has the government received from the physician of the institution a report upon the subject?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). 1. The Minister of Justice is aware, that according to the new regulations, seven officers in the St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary have had night duty to perform permanently. 2. The regulation is not exceptional, but it is the practice in a great many penitentiaries on this continent. The minister has under consideration the question of whether permanent or alternate officers is the better plan to adopt. 3. The minister has received from the physician a report on this subject, which is now under consideration.

REPORT OF SPEECH IN LA PATRIE.

Mr. DUGAS asked :

Do the following words, taken from the number of the newspaper 'La Patrie' for 28th September, 1899, report in a sufficiently exact manner a part of the speech made by the hon. the First Minister at Drummondville on 26th September last:—

'You know that in 1896 an irritating question was causing trouble in the country. It was a question where religion and politics were confounded. The solution of this question demanded the strongest qualities of a statesman. The old administration pretended to have settled this question by the presentation of a Bill called remedial, but which did not remedy anything at all. This Bill, from another side, was of a nature to irritate the population of a sister province. The measure was wrecked, and we came into power. We have promised to settle the question in six months. You are witnesses that this promise has been fulfilled to the letter.

'The school question does not exist any longer, although our friends the Blues seek to bring it up again.'

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am sorry to say, although I always thought I had a good memory, that it is not good enough to remember a speech six months and two days afterwards, when the question is put.

CHURCH PARADE OF STRATHCONA'S HORSE.

Mr. RUSSELL (by Mr. Flint) asked :

By whom were arrangements made for the church parade of the Strathcona Horse in Ottawa on March 11th?

By whom were such arrangements, if any, made for a church parade of the force in Halifax?

Was there any difference between the procedure adopted with reference to the arrangements for such parade at Halifax and those adopted with reference to the parade at Ottawa?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. By Lieut.-Col. Cotton, commanding the Ottawa Brigade, under whom Strathcona's Horse were mobilized in Ottawa. 2. By the district officer commanding, Lieut.-Col. Irving. 3. District officers commanding arrange these matters with the officers commanding corps concerned. Nothing is known of there being any different procedure at Halifax than that at Ottawa.

STRATHCONA'S HORSE—LT.-COL. SAMUEL HUGHES.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON asked :

Whether in an official document emanating from the Militia Department, dated February 17, 1900, containing for Lord Strathcona's information a list of those gentlemen recommended for commissions in Strathcona's Horse, the name of Lieut.-Col. Samuel Hughes was included?

If this be true, why does not Lieut.-Col. Hughes' name appear in the official list, dated March 9, 1900?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). The answer to the first question is, No; and the same, of course, to the second question.

REBATE ON AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS EXPORTED.

Mr. CLARKE asked :

What is the amount of the rebate paid on agricultural implements exported from Canada for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, 1897, 1898 and 1899, specifying the amount paid to each firm in each of the above years?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). I would be obliged if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clarke) would move for a return. I will make every effort to have the information brought down.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CLARKE asked :

1. What is the amount of royalty collected in the Yukon district for the year ending June 30, 1899?

2. What is the amount of royalty collected in the Yukon district for the six months ending December 31, 1899?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. 1. $589,943.52. 2. $292,006.61.

YUKON DISTRICT—CANADIAN BANK OF COMMERCE.

Mr. CLARKE asked :

1. Is the Canadian Bank of Commerce the exclusive financial agent of the government in the Yukon district?

2. If so, for what period has such arrangement been made?

3. What is the rate of commission or compensation allowed to the Canadian Bank of Commerce for collecting the royalty for the government in the Yukon district?

4. Are there any other payments made to the Canadian Bank of Commerce in addition to the commission for collecting the Yukon royalty?

5. What amounts have been received up to December 31st last for all services by the Canadian Bank of Commerce since the arrangement took effect by which the bank transacts all the financial business of the government in the Yukon district?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The Canadian Bank of Commerce is the exclusive agent of the government in the Yukon district as regards the collection of the government royalties and the transaction of the government's ordinary business in the district. The details of the arrangement will be found in Return No. 47 of the session of 1898. The arrangement was for one year from the date of the opening of the bank at Dawson City, and thereafter until terminated at the will of either party on six months' notice to the other. The compensation to be paid to the bank is at the discretion of the Minister of Finance. No amount has been paid to the bank for its services, but parliament will be asked, in the supplementary estimates, to vote a sum of money to compensate the bank for such services.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—RANK OF MILITIA OFFICERS.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON asked :

1. What are the relative positions of Lt.-Col. Steele and Lt.-Col. Otter as regards rank? (a.) Does Lt.-Col. Steele hold an Imperial commission and Lt.-Col. Otter a Canadian one? (b.) Is not Lt.-Col. Steele an officer considerably junior to Lt.-Col. Otter, as far as Canada goes, the senior? (c.) Vide Militia Act, 1886, par. 50. In case their meeting on the field in South Africa, who would rank as the senior officer?

2. Are cadets who have graduated from the Royal Military College, Kingston, joining the Imperial army and who have returned to Canada as officers of instruction at the Royal Military College or elsewhere, entitled to precedence over cadets who graduated long before them but who have elected to serve in the Canadian permanent corps? Are they not given a local step in rank, in coming to Canada and then considered senior of that rank; do they not in consequence often become senior to officers of the permanent corps, who actually instructed them?

3. Are not officers of the imperial army of comparatively junior rank (as in the case of Major Stone and others who have come to Canada) placed over the heads of the permanent corps officers, who have had often greater permanent service and also in many cases more service in the field? By what authority has this been done?

4. Is there any intention of revising and amending the Militia Act, so that the officers of the Permanent Corps especially, and the militia generally may be placed in a more just and fair position as regards rank with Imperial officers and those lent to the Dominion of Canada?

Mr. CLARKE.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. Lieut.-Colonel Steele has been given acting commission of lieutenant-colonel in the Imperial army. Lieut.-Colonel Otter has the rank of lieutenant-colonel in the Canadian militia. (a) Yes. (b) Yes. (c) Lieut.-Colonel Steele. 2. If of the same rank, No. (a) Not always or necessarily so, but has frequently occurred. (b) It has occurred. 3. Yes; the authority is the Queen's Regulations. A recommendation dealing with this subject so far as it affects Imperial officers serving in Canadian militia, will shortly be submitted for the approval of His Excellency in Council. (a) Answered above. 4. Not at present. In view of probable changes in respect of these matters, in the Army Act and Queen's Regulations, it is better to wait for the present.

GREAT NORTH-WEST CENTRAL RAILWAY LAND GRANT.

Mr. DOUGLAS asked :

1. Has the original land grant voted by parliament to that road now known as the Great North-west Central, lapsed, or is it still available under the present charter?

2. What was the grant per mile, and how many miles did the grant cover?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. 1. The grant has lapsed with the exception of the portion earned by construction of fifty miles, which entitles the company to 320,000 acres. 2. The grant was 6,400 acres per mile, and the length of line originally subsidized was 450 miles.

ISSUE OF RIFLES AND AMMUNITION TO RURAL CORPS.

Mr. OSLER (by Mr. Clarke) asked :

1. How many Snider rifles are now issued to the rural corps?

2. How many rounds of ammunition for said rifles are on hand?

3. Is the government manufacturing any more at present, or do they intend doing so?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. 16,968. 2. 860,571. 3. No.

PAN-AMERICAN EXHIBITION AT BUFFALO.

Mr. OSLER (by Mr. Clarke) asked :

Is it the intention of the government to provide a sum of money in the estimates for the erection of a suitable Canadian government building in connection with the 1901 Pan-American Exhibition in Buffalo?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). No provision of a specific character has been made. The government have accepted an invitation to take part in the Pan-American exhibition in Buffalo, but no plans or arrangements have yet been made as to the manner in which that can be done.

YUKON DISTRICT—TRANSFER OF MINING CLAIMS.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

Can companies incorporated in any or all of the provinces of Canada hold or have transferred to them mining claims in the Yukon, or can this be done only by companies having a charter from the Dominion of Canada ?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Companies incorporated in any or all of the provinces of Canada can hold, or have transferred to them, mining claims in the Yukon district, provided they hold a free miner's certificate unexpired.

INTEREST ON MONTREAL TURNPIKE BONDS.

Mr. MONK asked :

1. What is the reason that the interest upon the Montreal Turnpike bonds held by the government has not been paid since three years ?

2. Has the government taken any steps to ascertain the causes of the delay in the payment of interest on said bonds ?

3. What steps does the government intend taking in the matter ?

4. Has the government had a report showing the financial standing of the Montreal Turnpike Trust ?

5. What was the total revenue of the said trust according to the last statement ?

6. What were the expenses of management ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The government have made inquiries as to the reasons why the interest upon the Montreal Turnpike bonds held by them was not paid. The trustees represented that the roads had, under the former management, been allowed to run down, and that it was necessary to use all the earnings of the trust to put them in proper repair. The government are not able to state at present what course may be necessary as regards the collection of interest. The government have had reports from time to time showing the financial position of the trust. By the trustees' report, it appears that the total revenue of the trust for the year 1899 was $42,755.37. The total outlay for the year 1899, as reported by the trustees, was $40,627.12, of which $32,309.92 was for maintenance of roads, and $8,317.20 for general expenses.

THE POSTMASTER AT MURRAY HARBOUR ROAD, P.E.I.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

1. Has the Postmaster General received the resignation of Mr. John McPhee as postmaster at Murray Harbour road, in the province of Prince Edward Island ?

2. If so, has his resignation been accepted ?

3. If yes, has a successor been accepted and what is his name ?

4. Has the Postmaster General received a petition asking for the appointment of Mr. Murdoch McLeod as postmaster in the event of a vacancy ?

5. If yes, how many names are attached ?

6. Has the Postmaster General received, within the last three years a petition asking for the appointment of Mr. Archibald McKinnon as postmaster, or any letters or petitions against his appointment ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). In answer to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin), I beg to say : The resignation of John McPhee as postmaster at Murray Harbour Road, P.E.I., was received and accepted, and Mr. Archibald McKinnon was appointed to succeed him. Subsequent to Mr. McKinnon's appointment a petition was received objecting to it on the ground that it would involve the removal of the office too far north, and recommending Mr. McLeod for the position. Upon investigation it appeared that the majority of the petitioners received their mails at another office, and the objection to Mr. McKinnon's appointment did not appear well founded, and accordingly that gentleman's appointment was allowed to stand.

PINETTE HARBOUR IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

1. Has the government received a petition from the residents of townships numbers 57, 58 and 60, in the province of Prince Edward Island, asking for the dredging and improvement of Pinette Harbour ?

2. If so, does the government intend to grant the prayer of the petitioners ; what improvements are proposed ; what is the estimated cost ; and when will work be begun ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. Yes. 2. The matter is receiving consideration.

THE ELECTORAL LISTS.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked :

1. Have all the electoral lists for the electoral districts of the province of Quebec been received by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, in pursuance of the Act 61st Vic., c. 14, sec. 10 ?

2. If not, what are the lists for such electoral districts which have not been received ?

3. In the case of some of the said electoral districts, is it true that the lists for all the municipalities included therein have not been received ?

4. If so, which are the municipalities ?

5. What are the names of the districts or parts of districts for which the lists have not been printed and distributed ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). 1 and 2. They have all been received. 3 and 4. All the lists have been received that are complete. They are all complete with the three following exceptions : St. Marcel in Bagot ; St. Rémi in Laprairie and Napierville ; East Hull in Wright. The lists of these municipalities have not been received. 5. The lists of the following have not yet been printed : Argenteuil, Beauce, Bellechasse, Charlevoix, Chicoutimi and Saguenay, Compton, Gaspé, Hochelaga, Joliette, Kamouraska, Napierville, Laval, Maisonneuve, Megantic, Quebec East, Quebec West, Quebec Centre, Quebec County, Richmond and Wolfe, Shefford, Stanstead, St. John and Iberville, Three Rivers and St. Maurice, Two Mountains, Terrebonne.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Prime Minister last night, when I asked the general question with respect to the lists, said he would be prepared to answer to-day.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am sorry to say I have not the information at this moment.

Mr. MONTAGUE. You will have it before the general election?

The PRIME MINISTER. If you are patient enough.

GOVERNMENT LIFE INSURANCE ANNUITIES.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON asked :

Has the Postmaster General considered the advisability of introducing government life insurance annuities as adopted by the Post Office Department of Great Britain?

If so, does he propose introducing legislation?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The question has been referred to me by the hon. Postmaster General. The question of government life insurance annuities has engaged the attention of the government and will be further considered. It is hardly probable that any legislation on the subject will be submitted this session.

THE MEDALS OF 1866-1870.

Mr. MONK asked :

When will the medals of 1866-1870 be distributed in the 5th and in the 6th Military Districts?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). The medals for No. 5 Military District have been already sent out; those for No. 6 District will be ready in about two weeks.

EXPENSE OF PROVINCIAL ELECTORAL LISTS.

Mr. MONK asked :

1. What is the total amount expended to date by the government in procuring the provincial electoral lists from the different provinces of Canada?

2. What is the total expenditure incurred to date by the government in printing the said lists?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). 1. $9,829.46. 2. $17,274.43.

WORKS AT BELCÉIL.

Mr. MONK asked :

1. What was the original estimate of the cost of works to be executed on the Richelieu River, near the Grand Trunk Railway bridge at Belcélil?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

2. What is the total amount expended to date on the said works?

3. What is the amount required to finish the said works?

4. Is it a fact that the wharf at Belcélil above the bridge has caved in, and to what extent?

5. Who is the overseer of said works, and how much is he paid per day?

6. Has the said overseer been paid during the whole of the winter of 1899-1900?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. $11,000, not including superintendence. 2. $16,454.07. 3. $500 to complete filling. 4. It is not a fact that the wharf has, in the ordinary sense of the word, 'caved in.' In works of this kind a certain amount of settlement frequently occurs. In this particular case, the outer face of the wharf at Belcélil, at about 100 feet from its upper end, has slightly settled about 5 inches on a length of from 30 to 40 feet. 5. Avila Bernard, $2 per day. 6. No.

MURRAY BAY AND RIVIERE OUELLE STEAM COMMUNICATION.

Mr. MORIN asked :

1. Whether the sum of $7,000 voted last year for steam communication between Murray Bay and Rivière Ouelle has been expended?

2. If so, to whom was the said sum paid?

3. If not, why was the said sum not expended?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). 1. No. 2. No. 3. Because no one was ready with a suitable steamer to take up the service. It is expected to be taken up during the coming winter, arrangements having been made to that effect.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS.

Mr. INGRAM asked :

Under what section of the Franchise Act, 1898, have the government the power to authorize a board of registration to act for the purpose of registering voters in cities and county towns in the province of Ontario in which the lists have been prepared more than one year previous to the date of the writ for an election or after the dissolution?

If under section (9) nine, does it mean the same as under the Ontario Act respecting the registration of manhood suffrage voters, sections 20 and 22?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). 1. Under section 9 of the Franchise Act. 2. In the preparation of lists, under section 9, sections 20 and 22, so far as reasonably applicable, may be followed.

IMPORTS OF AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS.

Mr. SPROULE asked :

What is the value of agricultural implements and agricultural machinery imported into Canada from July 1, 1899, to March 1, 1900, and the duty collected thereon?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). The officers of the department inform me that they are not able to give this information, as the monthly reports do not contain the classification. If it would answer the hon. gentleman's purpose, I can give him the figures from July 1 to December 31, 1899, and by and by, as soon as we get the quarterly returns to the end of March, I could supplement that; but that would take a month. If the hon. gentleman desires the information up to December 31, I will get that.

Mr. SPROULE. Yes, I would like to have that.

Question allowed to stand.

POST OFFICE BUSINESS.

Mr. SPROULE asked :

Is the Postmaster General aware of any of the city or town post offices being conducted without the practical assistance of the postmaster? If so, what office or offices, and for how long has such been the case?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). The Postmaster General is not aware of any instance wherein the postmaster fails to render some assistance in the conduct of the business of the office. The degree of assistance may vary, but to whatever extent such assistance is rendered, it may be regarded as practical assistance.

RESIDENT ENGINEER IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

1. When was Mr. Roy, C.E., relieved from the office of resident engineer in British Columbia?

2. Has a successor been appointed in his stead?

3. If not, why not?

4. Has the province been without a resident engineer since Mr. Roy's departure from British Columbia?

5. Have any applications for the position been received; if so, from whom?

6. Is it the intention of the government to make the appointment without further delay?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). Mr. Roy has not been relieved from the office in question, but is temporarily at Ottawa in connection with the Public Works Department. During his absence his chief assistant is attending to the duties of the position in British Columbia.

Mr. PRIOR. That does not answer questions 5 and 6.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have read all the answers given to me; but I would not think it quite fair to answer No. 5 under the circumstances if there were any applications.

VOLUNTEERS FOR SOUTH AFRICA.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

1. Has the government any means of knowing how many militiamen, or how many militiamen and civilians, have offered their services as volunteers to serve in South Africa up to the present time? If so, how many?

2. Do not the district officers commanding keep a record of same in their several districts?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. No. 2. No. No record has been kept of men who personally volunteered and were rejected owing to there being no vacancy or for other reasons.

PRINTING PLANT AT ELKHORN.

Mr. ROCHE asked :

1. Did the government lease or sell the printing plant formerly in Indian schools, Elkhorn, since the Thompson lease was cancelled?

2. If so, to whom?

3. Is the government aware that this plant is now used for the printing of a paper supporting the government in Griswold, Brandon constituency?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. 1. No. 2. Answered by No. 1. 3. No.

MR. MARTIN JEROME, M.P.P.

Mr. ROCHE asked :

1. Is Mr. Martin Jerome, M.P.P., Carillon, Manitoba, still in the employ of the Interior Department?

2. Is he the gentleman that the Minister of the Interior promised last session would be dismissed from his position if he accepted the nomination as political candidate?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In answer to the hon. gentleman's question, I would say that Mr. Martin Jerome is the gentleman who was referred to in an answer made by the Minister of the Interior to a question asked by the hon. gentleman on July 12 last; that Mr. Jerome resigned in November last his position in the service of the Department of the Interior; but that it was subsequently decided to re-employ him, and that he is now in the employ of the department.

LETTER BOXES IN BARRIE.

Mr. TYRWHITT (by Mr. Henderson) asked :

Is the government aware that J. C. Morrison collects the mails from letter-boxes in Barrie? That he carries the mail from Allandale to Painswick? What does he receive for this latter service? Was the Postmaster General consulted as to transfer of contract from Joseph Huggard to said Morrison? Why was not the contract put up to tender?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). The department is not aware that J. C. Morrison collects the mails from the letter boxes in Barrie, or that he carries the mail between Allandale and Painswick. Mr. Joseph Huggard is the contractor for both services, and in each case received the contract as the result of public tendering. If Mr. Morrison is doing the work in these cases, it is as the employee of Mr. Huggard, whom, along with his sureties, the department holds responsible for the proper performance of the contract.

BINDER TWINE—KINGSTON PENITENTIARY.

Mr. McMILLAN asked :

Is it the intention of the Department of Justice to further extend the time during which farmers can purchase binder twine at Kingston Penitentiary in such quantities as may suit their wants?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Yes ; the time has been extended to the first of May.

LOBSTER SEASON—P.E.I.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's) asked :

At what date are lobster fishermen to be allowed to put out their lines preparatory to placing their traps for fishing in the province of Prince Edward Island?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Immediately on the expiration of the close seasons; and on the first day the taking of lobsters is lawful but not before.

REGINA TOWN SITE.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

Whether there is not in the Department of the Interior a conveyance or agreement or document having the effect of a conveyance from the government, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the North-west Land Company to the town site trustees of Regina, conveying their property in the said town site to the said trustees? Whether he will lay such documents on the Table?

If there be no document as described, is there any document or agreement conveying the property in the town site to the town site trustees, and will he lay it on the Table?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. 1. There is on record in the department the agreement entered into between the government of Canada, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and trustees, conveying certain properties as joint town sites to trustees, and a copy of an agreement entered into between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Canada North-west Land Company affecting such properties. 2. Copies of the documents will be made and laid on the Table.

REGINA TOWN SITE.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

Whether it is the intention of the minister to lay on the Table a copy of the agreement between the government, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the town site trustees of the various town sites along the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Copies will be made and laid on the Table.

RECALL OF MAJOR GENERAL HUTTON.

Mr. PRIOR moved for :

Copies of all papers, correspondence, telegrams and cablegrams, relating to the removal of Major-General Hutton from the command of the Canadian militia, including all orders in council, minutes of council and communications with the Imperial government appertaining thereto. Also a copy of his resignation, with the date of its receipt by the government and the date of its acceptance.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I draw the attention of my hon. friend to the fact that there are confidential papers in this, which cannot be brought down, unless with the consent of the authorities. As soon as we have it, we will bring them down.

DISMISSAL OF E. H. JONES.

Mr. PRIOR moved for :

Copies of all correspondence, telegrams and reports in regard to the dismissal of Mr. E. H. Jones, late postmaster of Kamloops, B.C.

He said: I would like to amend that motion, by substituting the words, 'in connection with,' instead of the words, 'in regard to.'

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). I have no objection to the motion passing, upon the understanding that if the report is an ordinary confidential report, it shall not be covered by the order. I do not remember the contents of it; the hon. gentleman, perhaps, will permit me to judge of that. I do not say that, in order to withhold anything that ought to be brought down, but it is not customary unqualifiedly to order the production of reports.

Mr. PRIOR. If it only refers to the reason for the dismissal, I think the Postmaster General ought to bring it down.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. If the hon. gentleman, then, will let the motion stand, I will look up the report, if he prefers to have the motion unqualified.

Motion allowed to stand.

FISHERY PROTECTION SERVICE, B.C.

Mr. PRIOR moved for :

Copies of all correspondence, telegrams and reports between the government and their agents in British Columbia, or any other person, in regard to the necessity that exists for the employment of another vessel to work in conjunction with the ss. 'Quadra' in the Lighthouse, Customs and Fishery Protection Services on the coast of British Columbia.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Does the hon. gentleman desire that to go without any limit right back to confederation, or does he want to start in at a particular time?

Mr. PRIOR. Say the last five years.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. So long as we understand it. Perhaps he had better put it in the motion.

Mr. PRIOR. I move to amend, by adding 'since the 1st of July, 1894.'

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

MR. FOSTER'S SPEECH ON THE BUDGET—CORRECTION.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Notices of Motion are taken up, I want to make a correction in one of the figures I read yesterday, in that multitudinous list, in regard to the rate of duty upon British dutiable goods imported into this country. In my main notes, I had it correctly, but in the slip that was transferred by the page, the figure 9 was substituted for 6. It should be 26.62, instead of 29.62, which would make a difference of 3.58, instead of .58. It is an important change, and I would like to mention it, so that the error may be corrected.

LENGTH OF SPEECHES IN THE HOUSE

Mr. JOHN CHARLTON (North Norfolk), moved :

1. That the practice of delivering speeches of great length in the Canadian House of Commons has introduced a discursive style of speaking that is destructive of pertinent debate upon public questions, is a waste of valuable time, unreasonably increases the length of the sessions of parliament, is in marked contrast to the practice with regard to debate that prevails in the British House of Commons, and tends to repel the people of Canada from a careful and intelligent consideration of the proceedings of parliament.

2. That it is desirable that rules be adopted, limiting, under certain conditions, the length of speeches and regulating the general conduct of debate in that regard.

3. That a special committee should be formed to consider the questions of parliamentary debate, length of speeches, general conduct of debate, and proper methods for securing greater promptitude in the despatch of business, so far as may be consistent with the parliamentary rights of the minority and the general interests of the public, and report its recommendations to this House.

He said : Mr Speaker,—

An hon. MEMBER. Make it short.

Mr. CHARLTON. We have taken some little time to reach the subject of discussion this afternoon, and I am greeted, at the outset, with the exhortation to make it short. I think the delay in reaching it will necessitate me following that advice. I desire to discuss, briefly, a question relating to the rules of procedure in this Canadian House of Commons. I do not propose to make any suggestions, or to propose any rules or regulations, or changes, but merely to assign reasons why, in my opinion, the question warrants the House in referring it, as I have asked the House to do, to a special committee to consider it, to decide, after investigation, as to whether the rules of procedure of the House are, in any respect, faulty or not, or can in any way be modified or changed to the advantage of the transaction of the business of this parliament. I shall present a few reasons, which, I think, warrant me in making these suggestions, that such a committee should be struck for the purpose I have named.

Parliamentary institutions can, almost properly, be termed British institutions. The birth of parliament was some six or seven hundred years ago in the zenith of the Catholic middle ages, and the gradual growth of parliamentary institutions in Great Britain has marked directly the growth of liberty and popular advancement in that country. The great dividing line between English institutions and the institutions of the continental nations, consisted in the fact that parliament, at an early day, took to itself the control of the purse strings and laid upon the governments of the day the necessity of securing from itself the votes of money necessary to carry on the operations of government. In this way, British institutions, and British liberty have been gradually evolved, and have reached that position of growth that characterizes British institutions in all parts of the world to-day. The growth was slow, the struggle was, in many respects, an intense one, and the stake, the cord, the axe, the sword, were the grim nurses that stood by the cradle of British parliamentary liberty, at its birth of pain. We have not participated in these historic struggles or paid any portion of the cost in blood and suffering of what has fallen so easily to our lot, for we have inherited these institutions in this country, and we have inherited them with very little realization of what their value is. We have inherited the parliamentary institutions of England, we have adopted, to a certain extent, the parliamentary usages of England, but, the great boon has come so easily, that we are scarcely aware of its sanctity, or value, and I fear that sometimes we are in danger of losing a proper sense of the dignity that pertains to parliamentary institutions and parliamentary transactions. We must all lament the fact we have, too often, witnessed scenes that are not up to the high level of parliamentary usages, or to the ideal of what a parliamentary body should be. The high sense of dignity and of power which appertains to these institutions, and to our House of Commons, is something of which we should never lose sight. We should never lose sight of the power we possess, of the responsibility which rests upon us in consequence of the possession of this power. We should never lose sight of the dignity with which this House should be clothed, in the transaction of the business of a great country like Canada. A discussion of our mode of procedure can, certainly, have no ill result, and may lead to a desire to rectify some of the abuses, admitting that any abuses do exist.

We have adopted, as our rules of procedure, the rules of procedure of the British House of Commons, but very great differences in practice exist between the mode of transacting business in this House and the mode of transacting business in the British House of Commons. I noticed the other day, in looking over our Hansard, that the Hansard reports of the House of Commons of Canada, for the last year, were quite as voluminous as the Hansard reports of the British House of Commons and the British House of Lords. This House of Commons, transacting the business of less than 6,000,000 people, consumed as much time, and had its transactions spread upon Hansard with as great volume as a parliament controlling the destinies of 400,000,000 people, with all the great ramifications and interests that characterize their affairs, and with the added excitement, in that particular session, of the South African question. With the South African question, and with the multitudinous other questions, the proceedings of both Houses being recorded in the Hansard, the record of the House of Commons of Canada was as voluminous as the reports of the proceedings of these two Houses. This is a statement which, must necessarily, convey to the mind the impression that our proceedings are either prolonged and spun out, and that there is too much verbiage, or, that the character of our report can be changed in such a way as to give us an epitome of the transactions and discussions of the House. As to long speeches, I do not know what their purpose is, or what is the desire of the person making them, but, if the desire of the individual making the speech is to reach the community, or to produce an impression, either in this House, or outside of the House, a long speech, if it is longer than it is necessary, if it is not concise, if it does not present the case logically and with as little waste of words as possible, defeats the purpose of the man making the speech, because, the longer the speech, the weaker the effort made by the individual who makes it. We want dignity of debate in this House, that kind of dignity in debate that is prevalent in the British House of Commons, where a man gets up and talks to the question plainly and directly, without elaboration, without the preparation of a voluminous essay, without any writing of his statement and committing it to memory, or reading to the House a long disquisition or essay. We have too much essay reading, and too little debating here, too little pertinent parliamentary debating upon questions that are presented for discussion to the House. We should adopt the plan of condensation, economy or verbiage, a greater directness, an attempt to secure greater power and brevity by epigrammatic statement. If we did so, there would be a great improvement in the character and style of speaking now in vogue in this House. The country realizes that we are wasting time here, and that realization on the part of the people of the country is becoming clearer session after session. We waste time to such an extent that the people lose interest in our proceedings; we waste time to such an extent that people grow, in a way, disgusted with the manner in which we transact public business. And this waste of time has not a single thing to commend it to our favour or to the public favour. It lowers the House in the public estimation; it lowers the House in its own estimation—and must necessarily do so.

The character of the speaking in this House, when I first came into parliament, and when you first came into parliament, Mr. Speaker, was quite different from what it is to-day. The term from 1857 to 1872, and the term following that were terms when we had no Hansard. The reports of the proceedings of the House were brief; and you have to go back to the Votes and Proceedings and the Journals of the House to know what the proceedings were. Men got up then to debate the question. The object of their speeches was, if possible, to produce an effect upon the House, was, if possible, to produce an effect upon the country; and we had parliamentary practice and parliamentary proceedings that were of a higher order than those of to-day. Not that the gentlemen who sat in this Chamber then were men of greater ability or better education than the representatives of the people here to-day; but the character of the proceedings was of a higher order than of to-day, simply because the House adhered more closely to what I consider the beau ideal of parliamentary usage, the system followed in England. We established Hansard in 1875. Hansard of that year is a modest volume. It gives the proceedings of the House in substance. It is not a verbatim report, but it is as good as a verbatim report; it is a Hansard that will be read more thoroughly than the volumes that have succeeded. We ought to adopt in our Hansard reports some system of condensation as has uniformly been done in the English House of Commons and in the English House of Lords. There is no sense in having such a Hansard as we have. Nobody is going to read it. A man's speech gets into Hansard, and is there entombed for ever. I do not know who is going to read Hansard in the future, unless it be some student of political history; and he will curse the day when men took forty times as long to say a thing as they should have done, and fixed upon him the dire necessity of wading through forty pages to learn what could as well have been said in one. Hansard has gradually become a medium for the record of speeches for circulation among members' constituents. It serves an admirable purpose in that respect, so far as the desires of the individual member are concerned. An hon. gentleman wishes to make a speech to circulate amongst his constituents. He makes that speech in the House. It is taken down by a most efficient staff of reporters—it is a perfect report. He revises it; it is printed and he gets a certain number of copies at so much a thousand—at a very low rate—and he sends these copies to his constituents. I do not suppose that any member sins in this respect more than once or twice in a session. But, where there are 213 or 214 members, if only half the House use Hansard as a medium to get speeches before their constituents, we can understand that a hundred speeches or more of that kind are going to consume time; and, though they may serve the individual purposes of the gentlemen who make them, in the means they afford of sending out at a cheap rate speeches to their constituents, there is no advantage to the country generally. This evil existed in the Congress of the United States. Members could not forego the privilege of having their speeches printed, largely at the public expense, for circulation to their constituents. So, Congress adopted the plan of handing in the manuscript of speeches. A member was recognized by the Speaker; he made a few remarks; spoke a few opening sentences and asked leave to hand in a few observations he desired to make without taking up the time of the House. He would then pile upon the record a long speech that would, perhaps, occupy two or three hours in delivery. This method was a saving of time. The bulk of the record was not reduced, but the time of the House was economized by the course pursued there. If we continue our present course of making Hansard a medium for reaching our constituents in that way, perhaps it would be better to adopt the American method of handing in the manuscript and allowing the House to go on with its legitimate business in the meantime. These abuses—for I consider them abuses—threaten one danger and are apt to lead to one consummation which I should regret. The mass of the members of this House, I can realize, session after session, are becoming a little more averse to the continuing of Hansard. Hansard is losing its popularity as a record of our proceedings; and if a motion were made to abolish it, and no intervention on the part of the government or no statement made of the wishes of the government to retain it were made, I should be almost afraid it would be abolished. If Hansard were abolished, it would be due largely to the faults and abuses to which I refer.

Waste of time in various ways is a feature of our proceedings here, and has grown to be a more marked feature of our proceedings within the last few sessions than in previous years. We do not know when we are going to reach any regular business now; it is a matter of chance—pure chance. Take the motion to which I am now speaking as an instance. I have waited since the 6th of February to reach it. I thought to reach it last Monday, a day devoted to notices of motion; but it was not reached. I thought to reach it the previous Wednesday; but it was not reached. We have a chart here to guide us in the order of business, the Order paper; and we suppose that we are going to reach something on that Order paper. But some gentleman gets up and says: Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a few remarks, and, to place myself in order, I will conclude my remarks with a motion. Heaven knows when we are going to get to the end of that. He strikes out with a discussion and closes with a motion to adjourn, then somebody else speaks, and the day is as good as gone. And so it goes on day after day. My hon. friend opposite (Mr. Foster) who is listening to me now, moved a motion of that kind some weeks ago with reference to a riot in Montreal. The discussion on it lasted all day. And so we have wasted day after day in this House, not attending to the business laid down in the Order paper, but we have wasted day after day in discussing matters, which, in some cases, may have a momentary interest, but, which, in the majority of cases, are resorted to for the purpose of making political capital, and which, in some cases, pander to popular passions—as in the case I refer to—and all of which are an abuse of the system of parliamentary procedure and practice.

Mr. FOSTER. Now that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) has finished his period—and a very nice one it was—I beg to state that I was not the mover of that motion. It was moved by my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill). I participated in it.

Mr. CHARLTON. I ask the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Foster's) pardon. He is right. But he was so prominent an actor in the farce that I thought he was the originator.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think this matter that I have referred to of having discussions of interminable length upon motions to adjourn, is something that deserves consideration, and that probably could be remedied in a measure. I understand that in the Ontario legislature, members are allowed not more than ten minutes for a speech upon a motion to adjourn. While we could not adopt the plan of prohibiting the making of motions to adjourn, yet, we might adopt some regulation in connection with it that would insure us against the loss of so much time as we have lost in the past. Take this House as a mass, we do not want to adopt any plan that, we must feel and realize, is of a character to lower the dignity of the House, and waste its time. We have a system of putting questions on the Order paper here, which should be changed. Numbers of questions are asked that the member could just as well answer himself by going to the blue-books which are open for the investigation of all men. The consequence of this is merely to put work on the minister or on some clerks, to collate that information. Sometimes questions are asked by the opposition for the purpose of making political capital, and that may be right or it may be wrong, but we have gone too far in the direction of loading up the Order paper with long and intricate questions, many of which could better be answered by a return, and many of which have no business on the Order paper at all. We recognize that the evil exists to a greater or lesser extent, and it is our duty to seek a remedy for it, without, of course, abridging in any way the privileges of parliament or the rights of any individual member. One thing above all is necessary in parliamentary practice, and that is, that Her Majesty's loyal opposition shall have full opportunity of presenting their views, and that every member of the House, whether on the government side or not, should have perfect freedom of speech. Anything that would abridge such a right should not for a moment be taken into consideration. It has occurred to me often that the system of transferring an uncompleted debate to Public Bills and Orders is one that works injury. On the Order paper to-day there are three adjourned debates taking precedence of Public Bills and Orders, and to-night probably there may be a fourth one. The consequence is that the Public Bills, which legitimately come under this heading, will be crowded out of their place and will probably not be reached this session. It seems to me that motions should be kept in their proper places on the Order paper, until they are disposed of, and in this way each item of public business will stand on its own merits. The Public Bills and Orders should stand in their legitimate place under that heading. We have, in my opinion, now reached a period when there is an absolute necessity for economizing time. We will of necessity in a few years have a very large increase in the number of members in the Canadian House of Commons, by reason of the mode of apportioning our representation. By the provisions of the constitution we have a fixed number of members, namely sixty-five for the province of Quebec, and every decennial census the population of Quebec divided by sixty-five is the basis of representation in the other provinces. The maritime province representation probably will not increase, or perhaps it may diminish a little. Ontario may increase its representation if it increases in population more rapidly than Quebec. But, in the great North-west and British Columbia, where a vast increase of population must take place, there must be a rapid increase in the number of members, and by the time we reach ten millions population we will have probably four hundred members here. When we reach a population of 15,000,000 we will have five or six hundred members in the Canadian House of Commons, and of course the greater the number of members the greater the difficulty in securing a prompt and rapid despatch of the public business. The prospective growth of the country, and the consequent increase of the number of members of parliament, furnishes one strong reason for establishing rules and regulations which will prevent loss of time—as far as that can be done without sacrificing the interests of any class in the House. With the growth of the country is sure to come a multiplication of interests. Canada will grow in wealth; she will increase her population and develop her resources, and bring vast tracts of land under cultivation. She will develop her minerals, develop her fisheries, develop her lumber industry, and so the business that this House will have to take cognizance of will in a few years to come be immensely greater than it is now. Under our present methods we will very soon find it impossible to transact our business and give due consideration to all these interests that will press upon us for our consideration. The inevitable increase of legislative business is something most desirable to see, because it indicates the growth of country, the growth of power, and advance in nationality and greatness. We shall have to look ahead to see what is necessary in order that we may keep ourselves a working body, capable of doing that which the country sent us here to do as their representatives; giving them proper laws, conducting ourselves with dignity, and with fairness. In my opinion the sooner we grapple with this question by referring it to a committee to examine into it, and report to the House, the better it will be for all concerned. It is high time to apply a check to the waste of time which characterizes the proceedings of this House at the present moment. I do not know that any party or any particular member is responsible for it, but we have drifted into it, and we will have to put on the break in some way and exercise suasion either moral or otherwise, to rectify faults that have grown up, and for which I have no doubt one is just as much to blame as the other. Various countries have had their own experience in the matter of waste of time in legislative bodies, and most of them in a more aggravated form than we have experienced, and those countries have found it necessary to adopt parliamentary rules for the purpose of economizing time, and for facilitating public business. In Great Britain not many years ago, conditions existed that threatened to block legislation, and it was necessary to adopt the closure. It seemed to be at variance with all the traditions of the British House of Commons, and the liberty of the member of parliament, but it was absolutely necessary to adopt it, and so it is in vogue now. Various schemes have been tried for saving time in the United States: that of putting in manuscripts without reading them, being one, and the regulation of the length of speeches another. They have in the United States House of Representatives what might practically be termed legislation by committees. There are forty committees in the House of Representatives, and to these committees are referred all the Bills introduced into that House—and they have some ten or twelve thousand of them in a year. The particular committee to which a Bill is referred considers that Bill and makes its recommendation, and at a certain fixed hour a report is made to the House. The chairman of the committee presents the recommendation of the committee with reference to that Bill, and usually the recommendation is accepted and goes through at once. It amounts to legislation by committee, and in the House of Representatives, nine-tenths of the public measures are dealt with in that way. Again, they have a fixed time to vote on the question under discussion. The time is fixed when a vote shall be taken, and before that time is reached, if the discussion is not exhausted, they cut the members down to five minute speeches, and under no circumstances is a member allowed more than one hour. They guard against the opening up of the whole question through moving an amendment or an amendment to an amendment, by providing that no speech on an amendment can be longer than ten minutes, and which must be replied to in a speech of ten minutes. In the United States House of Representatives an amendment may be offered in a speech of only ten minutes and replied to in a speech of only ten minutes. That is all the discussion allowed on it; and so it is with an amendment to an amendment. By these devices time is saved.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman knows that there are methods by which that is got around.

Mr. CHARLTON. One member can give another member his time.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And a member may borrow the time of forty other members.

Mr. CHARLTON. But the vote must be taken at a given hour, no matter how the members regulate the speeches. At a certain stage of the debate the speeches are cut down to five minutes. A member cannot then either borrow or lend the time of another member. At the time fixed for the vote it is taken, and the proceedings are ended. If this method of proceeding has been found necessary in order to secure the transaction of business, to get through the calendar at all, in the United States, where the business of the country is so largely in the hands of the various state legislatures, it will be found, I fear, necessary to adopt some system here—not their system, I would be very sorry to see it adopted; for ours is infinitely superior to theirs—but some system by which we can economize time without sacrificing the public interest. The press reports of our transactions here are ordinarily brief, and their length is never governed by the length of the speeches; and the evils into which we are falling in our methods of doing business are likely to lead to a still greater curtailment of press reports. The time is coming, in my view—and unless we make a radical change, it will come sooner than we think—when the press reports will have very little to say about our proceedings. The managers of the newspapers tell us that these reports are hardly worth the expense incurred in obtaining them; and if we go on, introducing extraneous matters, giving these long, foggy harangues, and making this Chamber a place for the delivery of elaborate essays, we may before long see an end of the reporting of our proceedings by press despatches at all. Now, Mr. Speaker, the waste of time involved, as I said a moment ago, is undoubtedly a matter worthy of our serious consideration, if such a thing as waste of time does exist. Let us look at the state of business in this House at the present moment. We have been in session two months, and we have just had our budget speech; we have not reached a public Bill in the hands of a private member to put it through to its conclusion; and we have an Order paper containing page after page of notices of motion. I am speaking to a notice of motion which I have been waiting several weeks to reach. The manner in which we conduct our business would hardly enable us to dispose of it at all if we sat for twelve months. But we sit for two or three months, and what happens? We get tired; we feel that we have gone along fooling with this thing long enough; we have wasted all the time we have to spare. The majority of the members of this House are business men who can ill afford to squander or lose so much time in the discussions of the House, and we reach a certain stage when we get tired. Then we conclude that we have to reach the end of the session within a certain time, and what do we do? We rush through the business without consideration; and if we have an unscrupulous government, which wants to put through any questionable transaction, it brings it forward, and it goes through without proper attention. Many of the most important matters which the House has to consider are rushed through at railroad speed. The House has got impatient, and it will not tolerate even a member who rises to call attention to an abuse or anything he considers wrong. So, we fool away the first two-thirds of the session, and during the other one-third we rush through our legislation without adequate consideration. These are evils that ought to be attended to as far as we can attend to them. I reiterate that it is not my desire to abridge any proper privilege enjoyed by any member of this House; it is not my desire to see rules adopted that would infringe on the rights of debate or on the right of a representative of a constituency to express his views. But, let us have this done in a proper, businesslike manner, and avoid many of the abuses and the methods of wasting time that have grown to be part of our ordinary proceedings. I do not, of course, suggest a remedy. As I said at the outset,

I have no remedy to suggest. This is too big a question for me to attempt to suggest a remedy. I merely suggest the consideration of this question by a committee; and I ask leave to amend my motion by adding to it:

That such committee shall consist of Mr. Ellis, of St. John; Mr. Russell, of Halifax; Mr. Bell, of Prince Edward Island; Mr. Davin, of Assiniboia; Mr. Bostock, of British Columbia; Mr. Bergeron, of Quebec; Mr. McMullen, of Ontario; Mr. Bourassa, of Quebec; Mr. Somerville, of Ontario; Mr. Craig, of Ontario; Mr. Christie, of Quebec, and the mover.

Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary for me to say what I think this committee should do. The committee, if it is granted by the House, will probably meet, consider this question, and decide whether a change of rules can be suggested that would probably remedy, in whole or in part, the evils of which we complain. When the committee has done its work, its recommendations will be submitted for the consideration of the House; and, necessarily, the House will give those recommendations just such weight and consideration as it may deem proper. It can do no harm to have such a committee to examine into this question, and to have its deliverance or recommendations presented to the House. The House will then have something tangible before it to act upon, and it will decide for or against any or all of the recommendations which the committee may choose to make. I do not suppose that committee will make any serious assault on the rights of the leaders in this House to speak at any length they choose: I do not suppose the leaders of the opposition will fear from its recommendations any abridgement of their right to speak; but there may be a proper limit of debate after gentlemen have spoken in presenting questions to the House. These and all cognate matters will, no doubt, be considered by the committee, and its recommendations, whatever they may be, will be presented to the House for such consideration as the House will think proper to give to them. Mr. Speaker, I beg to present the motion, asking permission to add the names of the committee proposed.

Mr. A. A. C. LaRIVIERE (Provencher). Although the province of Manitoba, the leading province of the future, is not represented on the committee suggested by my hon. friend, I hope I may be allowed to offer some remarks on the question raised by this motion. My hon. friend seems to have on the brain the great speech which he once made in this House, during the small hours of the morning, on a question that was then agitating the House of Commons and the whole country: and when for several hours he gave us some very interesting religious lectures, not for the sake of converting members of this House, but for the sake of killing time in order to arrive at the object he then had in view. Now, however, he is a convert, and with the traditional zeal of converts he desires to prevent the recurrence of what he himself was guilty of on that celebrated occasion.

In opening his remarks the hon. gentleman referred to the Hansard, and stated that he considered the establishment and continued publication of that valuable work as a cause of the length and number of speeches delivered in this House. Well, Mr. Speaker, on a former occasion, I made an attempt to show that the establishment of Hansard in this House has had no effect at all on the length of the sessions. Two years ago I gave to the House a long tabulated statement, extending as far back as 1841, giving the length of the sessions from 1841 to 1866, prior to confederation, and giving also the lengths of the session subsequent to confederation. From 1841 to 1866, when the number of members was only eighty-four, and the number of provinces only two, Upper and Lower Canada, under the union of 1841, the average length of the sessions was ninety-nine days and a fraction. At that time our population was only 2,200,000.

After confederation, from 1867 to 1874, when we still had no Hansard, the average length of the session was eighty-nine days. At that time the provinces were seven in number, our population was 3,500,000, and the number of members 200. So that although the business of parliament had increased to a great extent, and the number of members was larger, the average length of the sessions was ten days shorter from 1867 to 1874, than from 1841 to 1866.

In 1875 Hansard was established, and from 1875 to 1897, which is the last year of which I have a record, the average length of sessions was ninety-eight days and a fraction, or still less than the average between 1867 and 1874, when we had no Hansard. And from 1875 to 1897, there were 213 members, and the provinces, exclusive of the Northwest Territories, numbered seven, and our population 5,000,000. This statement, therefore, which appears in full on the Hansard of 1898, pages 7027 and 7028 shows that the publication of Hansard has in no way affected the length of the sessions, and much less the length of the speeches delivered in this House.

But I agree, Sir, with the hon. gentleman when he says that there is room for some improvement. And I would suggest, as one of the improvements, that we should adopt the system which prevails in many other countries, and change the hours of our sittings. Instead of sitting as we do from three o'clock in the afternoon until the business of the House is done, sometimes until the next day, we should adopt either the United States system or the system that prevails in most of the European countries except England. In the United States the sittings of both Houses begin at twelve o'clock, noon, and are continued until six o'clock, and there are no sittings in the evening. On the European continent, in Germany the sittings are from two to six o'clock. The hours are the same in Belgium, Italy and France. There are no sittings after dinner in these countries except for committees or other private business.

I propose to show that if the work of our session were better apportioned, if there was not so much time lost at the beginning of sessions and at other periods—I am not making any political charge against this government because other governments have been just as guilty—we could get through all the work we do now by simply lengthening the sitting before six o'clock and having none after that hour.

I have here a statement, very carefully prepared by Mr. Desjardins of our Hansard staff, and the preparation of which involved considerable labour, which gives the average length of each day's sitting in every session as far back as 1875, and by that statement it will be seen that the average sitting did not exceed six hours per day. The statement is as follows :

Seventy-one sittings lasted seven hours and less each. Twenty-eight sittings lasted seven hours and over.

The above includes twenty-six sessions of the House of Commons. It will be seen that 1,282 sittings lasted only seven hours each or less, and 510 seven hours and over. Adding together all the sittings, we find that the total number is 1,792, and the total duration 11,978 hours and 52 minutes. This gives an average of 6 hours and 41 minutes per sitting.

It should be observed that in making this compilation, we have assumed that the Speaker each day took the chair at three o'clock, and resumed it after recess at eight o'clock. But it would be nearer the mark to say 3 hours and 15 minutes and 8 hours and 15 minutes, which would take half an hour off the length given for each sitting, and make the average 6 hours and 11 minutes, or in round numbers, 6 hours.

Allowance should be made, besides, for two extraordinary sessions, that of 1885 and the first session of 1896. In the former the sittings were of an extraordinary length because of the particular legislation then before the House. In 1896 there was also one sitting of unusual length, 117 hours, and two others of fifty-three and thirty-five hours, or three sittings lasting 205 hours. If these extraordinary sittings, as well as many others that could be mentioned, although of a less duration, were put aside, the average length would be exactly six hours.

Mr. Speaker, after giving those statistics, I may say that I think it will be possible to make a better apportionment of the work of the House by transferring the hours of the sittings to an earlier period of the day, and by ending them at six o'clock, as is done in many other countries, especially in that favourite country of my hon. friend, the United States. This arrangement would give the members a better chance to attend to the business of the committees, which, I must say, are a good deal neglected, especially one or two of them. These committees at present have to sit in the morning, when the members who have to attend them are tired with a long night's sitting, and are unable in many instances to attend to the committee meetings. Now, Sir, it cannot be denied that the principal work of legislation is done in the committees. It is in the committees that these laws, these Bills that are brought before the House, are carefully studied and considered before being passed by this House. So much is that the case, that when a Bill has been thus carefully examined by a committee, it is very seldom that it has to be considered any further in this House. We look upon these committees as being the caretakers of legislation. Therefore, I think that a better time should be given to the work of these committees, that they should meet in the evening, and that the House should only meet in the afternoon, and in that case the House might begin earlier. There would not then be so many of those long speeches of which my hon. friend has complained, because in the afternoon the members would be aware that they have to attend to this committee work, and they would not, therefore, have an opportunity of exhibiting themselves for the sake of their electors. When the House sits in the evening, we have the whole night before us, and what we would not feel inclined to do in the afternoon, we might feel more at liberty to do at night. The members then naturally say: Oh, well; it won't prevent so and so from speaking, because he has lots of time; we have until to-morrow morning to make our speeches. More than that, Sir, I believe that we should give some consideration to the health of the members of this House, and not compel them to remain during these weary all-night sittings.

Mr. J. H. BELL (East Prince). My name has been mentioned as a member of the proposed committee. I am in entire accord with the resolution and with the sentiments expressed by the hon. gentleman who moved it (Mr. Charlton). The hon. gentleman mentions three principal causes of the waste of time of the House. The first one is in connection with the motion to adjourn. That is a privilege which ought to be very jealously guarded. But, it has been abused, especially on private members' day. An hon. member rises in his place and, under the pretense of urgency, will move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the hon. gentleman tell us how he could prevent that?

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.) I will come to that in a moment. He will then speak upon some party question, and that necessitates a reply from the other side. The necessary result is that the day is lost. Private members' day has become a farce. The other causes assigned for the waste of time are frequent speeches and long speeches. I look upon it that the man who makes a long speech commits a threefold wrong; he injures himself, he injures his fellows, and he injures the public. He injures himself, because he frustrates the very object he has in view. He speaks two, three or four hours. The public have no time to read his speech, and if they do read it, they cannot remember it. It is neither read nor remembered.

Mr. DAVIN. It is a very good thing.

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.) Yes, there are some speeches better neither read nor remembered.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What would you call a long speech?

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.) In the English Commons, orators, like Chamberlain, confine their remarks to half, or three-quarters of an hour, and that upon important questions,—questions to which they have given a lifetime of consideration. The speeches delivered in this House, that are read and remembered by the people, are those that occupy only a short time in delivery. Without making any invidious distinction, I may say, that the speech to which we listened, a few nights ago, of the right hon. leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), in reply to the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa)—a speech which occupied about half an hour in its delivery, is an instance in point. It is a speech that has been read and will be remembered by every man in Canada. It will be embalmed not in Hansard, but in the hearts of the people. So if one would consult his own interests he will make his speech as short as possible. There was an impression at one time, that a man who made a long speech manifested great ability. That impression has been relegated to the past. The man who now makes a long speech indicates that he has no power of condensation of thought, no skill in selecting and presenting ideas. Nowadays a long speech is considered, in the minds of those best capable of judging, a sign of weakness and not of power. Again, the man who wastes time in long speeches injures his fellow-members. The time of this House is valuable. The man who wastes one hour of it, wastes not one hour alone but two hundred other hours besides. He consumes the time of the other members with that of his own, and it is this consideration which gives to this resolution its greatest import. The members of the House are anxious to get through the public business, in a business way, that they may go home and transact their own. Besides, the long speech-maker does an injury to the public. He lengthens out Hansard and incurs unnecessary cost of printing, and every day that this House is in session, beyond what it ought to be, involves a loss to the country of many thousands of dollars.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bell), but he is speaking so long, that other gentlemen will not be able to discuss the question. The subject drops at six o'clock.

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.) I have only been speaking five minutes. I hope I am not wasting time.

Mr. BERGERON. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bell), is killing the measure.

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.) It will be conceded, that abuses exist, but how are they to be remedied? The first proposition is to abolish Hansard. We adopted that plan in Prince Edward Island for the purpose of saving time and expense, but in this parliament I consider it an entirely different proposition. I would regret to see Hansard entirely abolished. Its abolition would not do away with long speeches; they would publish them in newspapers, or in some other way. This parliament is the highest court in the realm, and Hansard is its record. I would just as soon see the courts of law abolish their records as see this parliament abolish its record. There is another proposition—the shortening of the report. That might be carried out. The reports of the early sessions of parliament, were shorter than at the present. Hansard would be just as valuable and more readable if the debates were considerably shortened. But the shortening process will not effect a saving of the time of the House. Then, there is a third proposition to limit the time of debate. That is the basis of the closure in the English parliament. That method was adopted to meet a special condition—to overcome organized obstruction. I do not believe that the necessity exists in this parliament for the closure, and I do not think that any member would desire to see it introduced. The fourth proposition is to put a time limit to the length of the speech. This device is adopted in the Ontario Legislature and in the United States Congress. I do not say what the proper length of time for a speech should be, because that would depend upon the occasion and upon the importance of the question under consideration. In the Congress of the United States, they limit the speeches to one hour. Some modification of that rule might well be adopted in this parliament. It would have one advantage of saving the valuable time of the House. Then, there would be another object gained, it would compel members to condense their speeches.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.) I am very glad that my suggestion has met with such hearty approval, and I trust it will bear fruit.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bell), with the best possible incentive in that direction, is in himself a good example of how his proposition would be carried out.

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.) I will undertake to measure my speeches with those of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague), and then he will feel ashamed of his criticism.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Time.

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.) This limitation of time would compel members to select and emphasize merely the main points of their argument. That would ensure their speeches being read and remembered. It may not be that very much benefit will arise from the appointment of this committee, but this discussion will have the effect of calling the attention of the House to a condition of things which every one deplors and which every one would desire to see remedied. Healthy public opinion will be created. In the parliament of Great Britain there is no limitation to the length of time a member may speak, but, nevertheless, there is an unwritten rule forced upon parliament by public sentiment, that speeches must be short and to the point. I believe that this discussion, if it does nothing else, will have the effect of creating in this House that same public sentiment which prevails in England with reference to the length of speeches and the despatch of parliamentary business, and that without any written rule members will be compelled to speak briefly to the point and not to speak too often.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). The hon. gentleman who introduced this motion (Mr. Charlton) apparently had the object in view of shortening speeches in this House. Let me, however, call attention to the fact, that while he intimated his desire to make a few remarks, he only took forty-two minutes to do so. He gave the best example of a man wasting a lot of time in saying very little that we have had in the House for years. Then, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bell) who last spoke, condensed his speech into twenty-nine minutes, and he thought he had scarcely commenced. I have been left with five minutes of the clock in which to speak, and, therefore, I will be obliged to condense. In my judgment, it would be a mistake if any such rules were introduced as those suggested by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). In a deliberative assembly such as ours, it has not been the judgment of the wisdom of the age, that speeches should be curtailed or that freedom of speech should be in any way interfered with. I have before me that excellent work by Sir John Bourinot, on parliamentary procedure.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Read it all.

Mr. SPROULE. I think hon. gentlemen will agree with me that Sir John Bourinot has condensed his references to this very question, into an admirable digest, which is as follows:

Members are not limited to time when they address the House. Attempts have been made in vain in the English Commons to pass resolutions confining speeches to a certain fixed limit of time. For instance, in the session of 1849, whilst the standing orders were under consideration, Mr. Milner Gibson proposed that members should be confined to speeches of an hour's duration, excepting only the introducers of original motions and the ministers of the Crown; but the House negatived the proposed amendment by a large majority. Similar motions have sometimes passed in the old parliament of Canada; but a short experience proved that it was not practicable nor conducive to the public interests (which are necessarily involved in free discussion) to limit time. (Leg. Ass. J., 1851), half an hour; (1854-5) three-quarters of an hour. In the House of Representatives in Washington there are rules limiting the time of speaking.

But whilst no limit has been placed to the length of a member's speech in the English Commons, a debate may now be closed when the Speaker or the chairman of Committee of the Whole is of opinion that a subject has been adequately discussed, and the House resolves that the question should be put forthwith. The closure has not yet been adopted in the Canadian parliament.

And I am quite sure that it will be a long time before it will be adopted. I would like to say something with regard to the reading of speeches and very long extracts, but as my time is up, I will reserve that for another occasion, and move the adjournment of the debate.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Six o'clock.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

GRAIN TRANSPORTATION TO THE SEABOARD.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Bennett:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is advisable to take a definite line of action with regard to the question of transportation of the grain and other commodities of the North-west Territories, Manitoba and the United States, with a view of centreing the same to the greatest possible extent in Canadian channels.

Mr. WM. McCLEARY (Welland). I can hardly hope to add any new interest or life to a debate which has already dragged along its weary course for many weeks in this House. I do not propose to take up the time of the House at any great length, particularly after being admonished by the different gentlemen who, this afternoon, discussed the propriety of short speeches. I shall endeavour to profit by what has been said and shall confine myself to as short a time as possible in making known to the House my views concerning the very important question which is now up for consideration. The question involved in the motion is one which has received the attention of hon. gentlemen who have preceded me, in a very exhaustive manner. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) gave us a week ago a very instructive, exhaustive and elaborate speech on this subject, and, to my mind, furnished a great deal of information that should set at rest for ever any quibbling with regard to the decision of the government to enlarge and improve Port Colborne harbour, which is the key to lake navigation in this country. So much has been said on this point already that I need not advance further argument, and shall content myself with saying that I am well pleased with the policy which the government have adopted and which the Minister of Railways and Canals has stated so clearly to this House.

I propose, however, for a short time to refer to some observations made by hon. gentlemen, particularly on my own side of the House, who are opposed somewhat to the attitude of the government on this transportation question. The proposition to my mind resolves itself into this—as to whether an all-water route or a combined rail and water route, or an all rail route should be the one adopted as the best means of carrying the products of the west to the tide waters in the east. My hon. friend from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), who moved this resolution, took the ground that a combined route is the preferable. In support of that position he told us that the United States of America have proved beyond question that a combined water and rail route is the one most advantageous. They have proved this, he said, by the fact that of the very large amount of grain which goes to the port of Buffalo, only a very small percentage is carried by water to the city of New York, and that the railways do the greater part of the work. This, he argues, proves conclusively that a combined water and rail route is the best one and the one that should be adopted by this parliament and country. I want just to say to my hon. friend that it proves nothing of the kind. All it proves is the superiority of the well-equipped system of railways running from the city of Buffalo to the city of New York over the miserable ditch of water called the Erie Canal, with not more than five or six feet navigable water in it, navigated by barges or scows, propelled by that new and scientific and swift power known as mule muscle. It has been an unsolved problem to those of us who know of the go-ahead-activeness of the United States people, their business activity and pluck, why this waterway, so-called the Erie Canal, has not been long ago put into proper condition for the carrying of grain to the city of New York. But to those who know anything about the working of the legislature of the state of New York and its public men, the reason is quite obvious. Time and time again the proposition has been advanced to enlarge that canal, but just so soon as it was made evident that the New York legislature was in earnest, at once the railways were in evidence, and the legislature and the public men of that state were throttled and the work laid aside. Even to-day, when there is a proposition before the people of New York State to spend $60,000,000 in the enlargement of the Erie Canal, we find again the railway people to the front, endeavouring to take again the public men of the state of New York by the throat, and they say: Instead of the state spending this $60,000,000, give us a fair interest on the money, and we agree to carry every bushel of grain that comes to the city of Buffalo to the city of New York for nothing. What does that mean? It means the shutting up practically of every railway we have in our country for the carrying of grain, should a proposition of that kind take effect, and the public men of the state of New York be thus throttled by the railway people. The Erie Canal has never had a chance to compete with the railways, simply because it never was in a condition to carry the grain. With 400 miles nearly of so-called canal, it could hardly be expected that these antediluvian scows moved by mules, until the last year or two, when a few steam tugs have been brought into service, could compete with the railways; but so far as the rates are concerned, the Erie Canal has always had the call, and has kept the freight rates on the railways down to somewhat of a proper level. To-day we find that the railways for fear of the enlargement of the Erie Canal, have agreed upon a through rate from Buffalo to New York of 3 cents a bushel, and from Chicago to New York by an all rail route of somewhere in the neighbourhood of 7 or 8 cents per bushel. So that if the experience in the United States has demonstrated anything at all, it has simply demonstrated the superiority of these railway companies and their management to take hold of and throttle and cripple the men who are interested, or who should have been interested at least, in the enlargement and reconstruction of the Erie Canal. So that I think the reference of my hon. friend from East Simcoe to the United States has not been a very happy one for himself.

Then we had a speech from the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler), whom I do not see in his place to-night. I would be very sorry to impute anything like selfishness to that hon. gentleman, because I consider him too large-minded a man for that sort of thing. His mind is wide and broad and liberal, but we must remember that he is a railway man and has no hesitation whatever in telling us that the railways of this country are going to be the channel through which the trade is bound to take its course. While I say this of the hon. gentleman personally, I cannot help feeling that he is but the index of reflection of the Board of Trade of the city of Toronto. The Board of Trade of the city of Toronto is composed of most estimable citizens. It is made up of men of standing in commerce, not inferior, I presume, to the Board of Trade of any other city of this fair Dominion. On this Board of Trade are some of the strongest men, financially, in the country, men of credit, men of responsibility. But, strangely enough, that Board of Trade has got the idea that governments and legislatures are only called into existence to pass laws and do business for the city of Toronto. They have an idea that the time of this parliament and the time of the provincial legislature should be almost entirely taken up in looking after their welfare and their interests. If there is any spare time, why, it can be devoted to legislating for the interests of the other five or six million people. They would if they could, reverse that scripture which says that 'the earth is the Lord's and fullness thereof,' and they would say 'the earth is Toronto's, and the fullness thereof.' Now, these gentlemen who compose the Board of Trade of Toronto have issued, I cannot say how many mandaments, how many edicts, how many bulls, how many propagandas, ultimatums and so forth, in reference to what should be the policy of this government and this parliament regarding the trade of this country. I have before me one of their pronouncements which, however, I will not take up the time of the House to read because it is too long. It consists of twenty-one articles, each one of which virtually asks this country to abandon our Welland Canal system and build a railway from the city of Toronto to the town of Collingwood. For some unexplained reason, a reason that is not founded on fact at all, they tell us that if this were done we should see the great majority of the vessels carrying on trade on the upper lakes, sending their cargoes down to the city of Toronto, and that there they will tranship their cargoes into barges of 60,000 or 65,000 bushels capacity, which will thence go on to Montreal; and that, they say, would be the proper highway through which the immense quantity of the commodities from the west must be brought to tide water.

Now, Sir, I am not here to find fault with any of the systems advocated by the gentlemen who are interested in their own localities. But I want to call the attention of this House to the fact that there has been a railway in existence between the city of Toronto and the town of Collingwood for a great many years, one of the oldest lines of railway in the Dominion of Canada. There was a time in the history of this country when that railway did a fair amount of business in carrying the products and trade of the west; but that was a time when freights were at least ten times higher than they are at present. When carriers were charging from 25 to 30 cents a bushel for carrying wheat and other grain from Chicago to Kingston, that line of railway did an enormous business; but as soon as water navigation was established and freights went down to 4 or 5 cents per bushel, that railway has done nothing at all. Now, I would like those gentlemen who have faith in that mode of transport to explain why the trade fell down to the meagre amount that passed over that road last year. The other day the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), I think, presented a report to the House showing that something like 600,000 bushels of wheat went down to the town of Collingwood, which would about fill two of the large lake boats now in use. So you will see the absolute folly of this House considering the propriety of building another railway, when there is one already existing. True, they say: We will make that line only 70 miles long which is now over 100 miles long. But there would have to be the same transshipment at each point, and if there was anything in it for the Grand Trunk Railway they could straighten up their crooked road, which they will have to do anyway at their own expense, instead of asking the people of this country to contribute the money to build a railway between Collingwood and Toronto.

Now, without taking up time in referring to any of the other propositions, I want to say a few words regarding the proposition of enlarging and improving the Port Colborne harbour. The Toronto Board of Trade tells us in this declaration of theirs that the Welland Canal has proved to be a failure, that not only has it failed to capture the trade or any considerable amount of the trade, but it has been the means of preventing Canadian ship-building upon the upper lakes. They would practically, as I said before, have us abandon the Welland Canal, and for that matter, the St. Lawrence route, on which the government has spent altogether in the neighbourhood of $60,000,000 or $70,000,000. Now, Sir, the reason why the Welland Canal has not been able to carry more of the grain that comes down from the great lakes is very easily stated. The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) the other evening gave the reason exactly when he said that we had no entrance to the Welland Canal. There never was an entrance at Port Colborne worthy of the name. Notwithstanding that the government of this country have spent upward of $25,000,000 on the Welland Canal, there never was a proper entrance made to that canal at Port Colborne, the very place where the government ought at first to have made a proper entrance to the canal.

It was absolutely impossible for the Welland Canal to compete with the trade going to Buffalo under the conditions under which the port of Port Colborne had been from the time the canal was built. We have heard a good deal about the slowness of the government, in the past, in the enlargement of the canals. Much has been said about the apathy of the late government in regard to the enlargement of the St. Lawrence Canals and the Welland Canal. I am not here to apologize, in any sense, for the party that I am identified with. I believe, myself, that the work might have been and should have been proceeded with far more quickly, and to the advantage of this country. I am here to say that the slowness with which the work of enlarging the Welland Canal was done was the first great mistake that was made by the government of this country. The enlargement of the Welland Canal was undertaken in 1872. The government of Sir John Macdonald appointed a commission to inquire into the advisability of the enlargement of the Welland Canal. That commission reported; Sir John Macdonald's government was turned out; the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie formed a government, and from that time down to the present, when successive governments have been asking for money to do the work, they have been apologizing for this expenditure, and from the opposition, let it be a Tory or a Grit opposition, there has always been a determined hostility to granting money for the speedy fulfilment of the work of the enlargement of this canal. Mr. Mackenzie, in 1875, informed the House that it was the intention of his government to have but twelve feet of water on the mitre sill in the enlarged canal.

Mr. CLARKE. Who said that?

Mr. McCLEARY. Mr. Mackenzie. It has been stated in this House, more than once, that Mr. Mackenzie always intended that there should be fourteen feet of water in the enlarged Welland Canal. Let me read what he said, himself, in 1875, on the vote that was asked to apply on the works then being done. In 1875, Mr. Mackenzie said

With reference to the Welland Canal, this is the principal work in many ways, because it paid a considerable revenue over the amount expended in working it. Nearly all the contracts were let providing for the construction of locks 270 feet long, 45 feet wide, and having 12 feet of water on the mitre sills.

That was Mr. Mackenzie's proposition to the House in 1875, and it was, that, instead of fourteen feet of navigation, as we have been told, there should only be twelve feet of navigation. However, Mr. Mackenzie did not have the support of his party in that regard any more than he had the support of the opposition, because, I find, in the very same session, that Mr. Holton, who was then a member of his government, when the House was going into Committee of Supply, moved the following resolution :

That, in the opinion of this House, steps should be taken to ascertain the feasibility and cost of adapting the Welland Canal to fourteen feet.

That proposition was supported by the Hon. Mr. Tupper, who was then the ex-Minister of Public Works, and supported as well, by many hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House. Mr. Mackenzie objected to the resolution being passed, because, he said, that, being made when the House was asked to go into Committee of Supply by the government, it would be taken as a vote of want of confidence. Mr. Holton, Mr. Tupper and others endeavoured to persuade him that such would not be the case, but that it was merely to adopt the principle that the Welland Canal should provide for fourteen feet of navigation. During that debate a letter was read from the late Mr. Shanly, whose authority and ability to give an expression of opinion are well known in this country. Mr. Shanly wrote :

The Welland Canal can never perform its proper functions so long as larger vessels can put in at Buffalo than can come down to Kingston, and it seems too bad, with our long canal experience in Canada, the improvements now entered upon should be deliberately planned on an imperfect and insufficient model.

He was speaking then for a fourteen-foot navigation. I am referring to this simply as a matter of history in regard to the building and enlargement of the Welland Canal, so that, we will find out where the blame lies and who is chargeable with the delay. You cannot, as I intimated before, charge it to either government, because I will show the House further, that when Mr. Mackenzie went out of power and when Sir John Macdonald was called upon to form a government, and did form a government, the then Minister of Public Works, now the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), wanted to blame the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie for adopting the fourteen-foot navigation. The government have always been afraid to take the responsibility of this work. When a vote of $2,000,000 was asked for continuing the enlargement of the canal in 1879, Mr. Mackenzie is reported, in Hansard, as saying :

It was not the intention of the late government to go beyond twelve feet; so that there was about $3,000,000 expended or to be expended, on the Welland Canal more than the late government intended to expend.

Now, this, to my mind, shows conclusively what an opposition will do sometimes in order to unfairly criticise a government in doing what they believe to be their duty and what they believe to be in the best interests of the country. The present hon. leader of the opposition—who was then the Minister of Public Works—endeavoured to show Mr. Mackenzie that he had committed himself to the fourteen-foot navigation, and that he was not responsible for it. However, there were men in the House at that time, who were big enough and who had foresight enough to see what the future of this country was going to be. The Hon. Mr. White, then member for Cardwell, said :

Whoever was responsible for the deepening of the Welland Canal to fourteen feet, he thought, were to be congratulated for having decided that it should be done at once.

So that, what is taking place to-day, on the opposition side of the House, on the part of some hon. members, in, I think, unfairly criticising the policy of the government in regard to this expenditure for enlarging the Welland Canal, is only history repeating itself.

Mr. CLARKE. Is there any proposition to enlarge the Welland Canal before the House ?

Mr. McCLEARY. Before this House ?

Mr. CLARKE. Yes.

Mr. McCLEARY. I can answer my hon. friend (Mr. Clarke) by saying that the Welland Canal has proven itself to be absolutely inadequate, in its present condition, to take any considerable amount of the trade going to Buffalo unless the entrance to the canal is properly and thoroughly enlarged to accommodate vessels going there. Therefore, when my hon. friend (Mr. Clarke) endeavours to draw a red herring across the track—as he would himself say—he is certainly not doing credit to his judgment or sustaining the opinion which gentlemen in this House has of him, that he is a man of large views and proper conceptions regarding the requirements of this great country.

As to the delay and the causes of the delay of the work on the canals, I have a remark to make. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) put a question on the Order paper the other day, asking if it was not the intention of the late government to proceed slowly with the enlargement of the St. Lawrence Canals, and the Minister of Railways and Canals gave the answer that he believed it was. The hon. gentleman backed up his statement by saying that the ex-minister (Mr. Haggart) had lately given evidence in some court to the effect that he told the contractors that the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) had given his opinion that the money would not be expended on certain sections immediately. That reminds me, Mr. Speaker, that the old saying about chickens coming home to roost sometimes proves true, and it never was truer than in the case of the member for North Wellington. The hon. member (Mr. McMullen), who was so eager to charge the late government with delay in the enlargement of the canals, has placed himself on record regarding the enlargement of these very canals, and, as I hope he always does, he honestly, fairly and sincerely discussed the expenditures of the government in this respect. In 1892, he had something to say on the enlargement of the St. Lawrence Canal route. When the House was in supply, and when the late government was asking for an expenditure of $400,000 for this purpose, this is what the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) said :

It is to be regretted that this work should have been commenced at all until its necessity was fully and clearly decided upon. It is well known that two-thirds of the grain shipped from the west is unloaded at Kingston and put into barges and run down through the canals to Montreal. When we consider that railways are now constructed in all parts and operated so cheaply, and that the canal service is growing less in every country in the world, even in the United States, where it is only kept for the sake of competition with railways, we must come to the conclusion that this is a very unwise expenditure.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. POUPORE. Who said that ?

Mr. McCLEARY. Why, that language was used in this House by the hon. gentleman from North Wellington, who the other day asked, in all sincerity, I hope, who was responsible for the delay in the enlargement of the St. Lawrence Canals. It is rather hard, of course, to reconcile his anxiety now, with his previous statement that practically the canals ought not to be enlarged. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals rather incisively chastised my hon. friend from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) for saying that the government should call a halt in any further expenditure on the canals, and particularly the expenditure at Port Colborne. I am glad the minister (Mr. Blair) relieved me of that duty, because, as a personal and political friend of mine, I would not have cared to say the things about the hon. member (Mr. Bennett) that the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) did. But, the hon. minister (Mr. Blair) might have looked at some of the utterances of the men who are now supporting him, and, indeed, he might have considered the remarks made by one of his ministers who sits in council with him. The hon. member for East Prince (Mr. Bell) told us in his speech the other day :

I do not know what the policy of the government may be, but to my mind the policy they ought adopt, and which I hope they have pursued, is a policy of waiting and watching.

Waiting and watching for what, may I ask ? I hope it is not for an election. Perhaps he wanted to wait and watch until the port of Buffalo got all that is left of the trade coming from the North-west. Then let me direct the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals to what was said by the minister without portfolio (Mr. Dobell). He told us :

The Minister of Public Works should hold his hand in this expenditure—

And that —the day of large carriers is done away with on the upper lakes.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Dobell) told the House that the trade of the west would be carried in smaller craft of 60,000 or 65,000 bushels instead of craft carrying 250,000 or 300,000 bushels. I am afraid the hon. gentleman (Mr. Dobell) has not made a very careful study of navigation, and of the ship-building trade in Canada or the United States, else he never would have made that assertion. Sir, the smaller craft will never take the place of the large vessels on the lakes. I trust the government will not take the advice of the hon. member in this matter. That hon. gentleman (Mr. Dobell) has taken a sort of particular interest in this fast Atlantic service, and the government have evidently been advised by him in that, because in stead of having—as we might have had to-day, if the government had signed the contract they found before them when they took office—instead of having a complete fast Atlantic service to-day that would be of incalculable value to the people of Canada, we have nothing to show for all the exertions that have been made to promote that scheme.

Mr. BRODER. We have a bottle-nosed model.

Mr. McCLEARY. Yes, we have a bottle-nosed model, but as that is neither very fast nor a large carrier, it is of particularly little use to us. If the observations of the hon. gentleman from Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) regarding our canals go to the shippers of the west, and they believe them, then there is no use in the government spending a single dollar on the Welland Canal or on any other canal. He told us that our canal system was practically shut up for six months in the year, but had he taken the trouble to look at the last report of the Minister of Railways and Canals, he would have found that the canals were opened on the 20th of April and closed on the 14th of December, giving 238 days of navigation, or exactly eight months, instead of six months, as he said. So that when the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals scores my hon. friend from East Simcoe for asking the government to stay their hand, he must be very careful that the hon. member for West Quebec does not use his influence over the government to make them believe that the statements he has made on the floor of parliament have some foundation in fact. Now, Sir, I want to say a few words regarding the volume of trade and the rates of freight by all-water route, by all-rail route, and by both combined. My hon. friend, the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals, in the very elaborate and instructive speech he made some nights ago, told us that there was but a moiety of the grain that went to the city of Buffalo that we could possibly compete for and obtain. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals took up that question, and I may say he understood the hon. ex-Minister of Railways and Canals just as I understood him; but when I come to read the report of the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Haggart's) speech, I find that I misunderstood him. I understood him to say that there were about 19,000,000 bushels of grain exported from New York that we could compete for. What he did say, I find by looking at the report of his speech, was that there were but 19,000,000 bushels of wheat exported from New York that we could compete for. This is what he said:

Let us look for a moment at the figures of the trade. About 273,000,000 bushels of grain go to the port of Buffalo each year. What proportion of that grain can we contend for in order to transport it to the other side? You must look at what proportion of that 273,000,000 bushels that go to the port of Buffalo is exported from the seaboard to Great Britain. You will find that only a moiety of that is exported to the other side. If you look at the export from the port of New York, you will find that only 19,000,000 bushels of wheat are sent from New York to all foreign countries.

And that is for the year 1897. Now, to correct the impression which I got from the remarks of the hon. ex-Minister of Railways and Canals, that he referred to grain, and not to wheat alone, I find by the last report of the Board of Trade of the city of New York that the grain exported from the port of New York in 1896, 1897 and 1898 was as follows: In 1896, 69,000,000 bushels; in 1897, 117,000,000 bushels; in 1898, 124,000,000 bushels. We would be able to compete at Port Colborne for at least 100,000,000 bushels of that, provided Port Colborne were placed on the same footing as the city of Buffalo in regard to its harbour and wharfage accommodation. There can be no question about that, I believe there are other exports from the United States which we could also compete for. When we look at the great volume of exports from the United States to Great Britain, it is only fair to say that if we were in a proper position to receive it, we would be able to take a considerable quantity of that. By the last report I can lay my hands on, I find that the total exports of agricultural products from the United States were $853,683,570 worth of which there went to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland $649,885,790 worth; and for this we could put ourselves in a position to compete by our canal system or our railway system.

Now, I want to give a few more figures regarding rates to show you, as must be conceded by everybody who will give the matter thought, that an all-water route must have an advantage over an all-rail route or a combined rail and water route. Grain has been carried from Chicago to Buffalo at as low a rate as 1 cent a bushel, from Chicago to Ogdensburg at 2½ cents a bushel, and from Chicago to Montreal at 3½ cents a bushel. If there is any railway and water combination that can carry grain that distance for 3½ cents a bushel and make any money, it has yet to be developed; and the scientific energies of man will be strained to a far greater degree than they have ever been in the past to develop a railway that will be able to do anything of the kind.

Now, Sir, I will give you the average freight charges from Chicago to New York, by lake and canal, by lake and rail, and by all-rail, respectively. By lake and canal, corn has been carried from Chicago to New York for 453-100 cents, say 4½ cents a bushel; by lake and rail, for 692-100, or nearly 7 cents a bushel; and by all-rail the lowest rate ever given up to this year has been 12½ cents a bushel on wheat, and 1143-100 cents, or nearly 11½ cents a bushel on corn. My hon. friend for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) says the railways are prepared to do better than that. I know they are, and why? I know that already the railways have formed a combine and are fixing a rate on grain for the coming year at about 8 cents a bushel from Chicago to New York, and that they are agreeing to carry it from Buffalo to New York at 3 cents a bushel; and I will give you the reason why. Let me give my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) the reason why the railway people are ready to give these rates. There is a paper printed in Chicago known as the Chicago Record. That paper has a correspondent in this country who has been taking cognizance at what our government is doing in the way of enlarging our canals. Referring to these canals, that paper says:

The railway lines from Chicago to New York, within the last few days, have made a rate on grain for export of 13 cents per 100 pounds, which is equivalent to 7·8 cents a bushel for wheat. The railways between Buffalo and New York have reduced their rates to 3 cents per bushel. . . . The 'Record' comes to the conclusion that the Canadian route will be able to quote considerably lower rates than the railways. It says that with the old seven-foot Canadian canals, having small and imperfect locks, grain was at one time carried from Chicago to Montreal for 3¼ cents a bushel. The expense of carrying grain in a fourteen-foot vessel, 250 feet long, to Montreal, it is estimated, will be about twice the expense of the same vessel to Buffalo. Good judges of these matters say that such vessels with profit can carry grain from Chicago to Montreal for 2 or 3 cents a bushel. If the estimate of the 'Record' is correct, it is quite clear the Canadian route has the call.

There is no unprejudiced man who knows anything at all about the transport of grain, who does not believe that even if that is not consummated the coming season, it will take place as soon as the harbour of Colborne is put into a proper condition to receive vessels. The reason, and the only reason, why trade has been kept back from our canals, is the fact that we have had no harbour at Port Colborne. It is true that Port Colborne is in my constituency, but I am satisfied that the government have no intention of expending money there for political purposes. I am satisfied that they have no idea of benefiting any of their supporters in this House, and no expectation of gaining support by this expenditure. I think that the government is viewing this matter in a most magnanimous manner. They see that it is the last thing that must be done, that it should have been done at first, and that until Port Colborne is put into proper condition, we will not be able to capture any considerable quantity of the grain now going to Buffalo.

The proposition has been advanced by two or three hon. members on this side, that instead of expending this large amount at Port Colborne, to give us twenty-two feet of navigation, the government should only strive for a fourteen-foot navigation. I think that the hon. member for West Quebec suggested that to the House. He said that the day of large freighters is over, and that there was no need of accommodation at Port Colborne for vessels of that character. Then, some hon. gentleman on this side advanced the proposition, that these large freighters could go to the city of Buffalo, unload their cargoes there, and that our Canadian vessels could take on cargoes at Buffalo and come back to Port Colborne, thence down the Welland and St. Lawrence canals to Montreal. I cannot understand why such a proposition as that should have suggested itself to any hon. gentleman, particularly on this side. Leaving patriotism out of the question, do you think, Mr. Speaker, that it is possible for us to send our Canadian vessels to Buffalo, and get any considerable quantity of trade there? Why, the port of Buffalo has been open to us for thirty or forty years. Why did not our vessels go there for cargoes during all this time? The reason is obvious. Just so soon as a bushel of wheat goes into a United States elevator, it will be returned into United States carriers, either boat or railway, and a Canadian vessel would not have the slightest chance of getting any of it.

I was very sorry to hear such a statement made in a Canadian House of Commons. I was very sorry to be told that we should depend upon the port of Buffalo for wharfage accommodation for our boats. It is out of all reason to expect that we could load a single vessel there, unless we were willing to do the carrying for little or nothing.

While our government has been asleep as regards the enlargement of our canals, the people of the United States, particularly in the city of Buffalo, have been wide awake. Just so soon as the enlargement of the Welland Canal was begun in 1871-2, they began spending millions of dollars on the port of Buffalo. That port had no better accommodation than Port Colborne. It had no natural harbour, but the American people spent millions of dollars improving it, and are spending millions of dollars there to-day, building a great breakwater to protect vessels going in. While we have been going along in a slipshod fashion, trade has been leaving us. That is my answer to every one who asks me why the Welland Canal has not come up to the expectations of the governments which expended the money on its enlargement—simply that the canal was never finished and never put in proper condition for business. Time and time again, vessels come down—even small craft carrying from sixty-five to seventy-five thousand bushels of wheat—and, if there was a storm, they would not dare to come in, but would go to Buffalo or stand off for days at Long Point or somewhere else, waiting for good weather in order to get into Port Colborne. Is that any condition in which to leave Port Colborne, which is the key to our great St. Lawrence route, the wonder and admiration of the whole world? Why, Sir, it is almost unpardonable that the several governments of this country have so far neglected and so ruthlessly neglected doing this work years and years ago.

No, I am not charging it to any government in particular. I charge the government that first undertook this work in 1872 and up to 1878 with being negligent and indifferent to the construction of the Welland Canal. They undertook to build the canal with only twelve feet of water. At that time, the old Welland Canal had ten feet of water. There were then running on the upper lakes, when we undertook to enlarge the Welland Canal, over a hundred vessels drawing fourteen feet or over. Such vessels could hardly be expected to get into a canal having only twelve feet of water. When the original Welland Canal was built about seventy years ago—I think it was completed in 1829—there was not a single vessel on the lake drawing more than eight feet of water. William Hamilton Merritt, with foresight that did him credit, discerned what was coming and what could be brought about by the building of a canal connecting Lake Erie with Lake Ontario. He undertook to gather private capital, and built what is known as the old Welland Canal, with wooden locks. In a very few years, there were on the upper lakes more than a score of vessels that could not get through that canal. Then the building of the old Welland Canal as it exists to-day was undertaken. That was completed in 1845. When it was completed, there were fifty vessels on the upper lakes that could not get through it. On the mitre sills of the old Welland Canal there was supposed to be ten feet six inches of water; but vessels were never allowed to go through drawing more than ten feet of water. Coming on up to the enlargement of the Welland Canal which began, as I said, in 1872—that is the canal as it exists to-day—our government were negligent and as indifferent as subsequent governments. Either they had not the foresight to know what could be done, or, if they had the foresight, they had not the energy and pluck and nerve to proceed at once to finish the canal, and make it fourteen feet navigation. But they dilly-dallied, and, instead of taking only five or six years to build it, it took twelve or fifteen years. And that Welland Canal was opened and vessels navigated it with only twelve feet navigation—twelve feet of water on the mitre sills. So, I think I have amply proved that the governments of our country have never had a proper grasp of this question, have never firmly taken hold of it in a large way; they have never had the faith they pretended to have in our country's development and progress. And now when, at this late day, the government sees the blunder that has been made and attempts to correct it, we find men in this House ready to stand up and ask them to hold their hands, ask them not to spend money in order that we may utilize the enormous expenditure that has already been made on our canal system. It seems to me absurd that gentlemen of intelligence, who know of the great commercial strides that this country has been making in the past, would in word or deed interfere or attempt to interfere with the undertaking that the government has in hand at this time.

I agree, that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) is not in his seat; but, even in his absence, I wish to say a word or two upon another point. I do hope he will not be influenced by any of the hon. gentlemen in his government who have not the courage that he has. There are some who would hold him back. Last year, I had the pleasure of discussing in the House here a resolution that I placed upon the Order paper regarding the enlargement of Port Colborne harbour. The Minister of Railways and Canals was good enough at that time to sanction every word I said. He made these remarks:

Sir, having that in view—

That is, securing a considerable amount of the trade of the lakes.

—and succeeding as I have done in impressing my colleagues with the soundness of it, hon. gentleman will already have observed that a very substantial sum has been put in the estimates for the current year for the purpose of deepening the entrance to the canal. I am in hopes that the work will be completed during the current year. We are going to proceed with all despatch to obtain the end. We have in course of preparation specifications for the purpose, so that there may be no delay in inviting tenders and having the work entered upon.

That was the position the minister took a year ago. He expected last year that he would have the work begun and under contract, so that it could be finished this year. Now, I do not know why, but the hon. gentleman only asked for tenders at the beginning of this year; then they were postponed for three or four weeks more for the first part of the work; and the contract, I believe, has only recently been given. So, we shall not have this entrance to Port Colborne harbour—I am not speaking of the work that is absolutely necessary to be done by the Minister of Public Works, but of the entrance to Port Colborne harbour—ready before next year. I think it was too bad that the matter was delayed any length of time whatever. With the minister speaking as he did last year, knowing that we were losing our trade, knowing the necessities of the case, he should have been moved by the spirit which moved him while he was speaking; he should have gone on, advertised for tenders and had the work going on since last year, so that this year we could receive at Port Colborne the trade that we have been waiting and hoping for. When we think that at Chicago and South Chicago, of the grain craft, there are fifty-nine boats of a total capacity of 4,718,642 bushels already loaded, four of the capacity of nearly 500,000 bushels, that they are ready and will go to the elevators in a few days, and that there yet remains in the river in the neighbourhood of thirty boats to carry grain to the amount of at least 2,000,000 bushels—when we consider this, is it not too bad that our harbour at Port Colborne is delayed, and that when navigation opens, as it will in a few weeks, it will not be in a position to receive a fair amount of the grain which undoubtedly would come our way were we able to take it. Therefore, I feel a little apprehensive regarding the speediness with which the government intend to go on and do this work.

The Minister of Railways and Canals, in his address a week ago, stated very explicitly to the House why it was necessary that Port Colborne harbour should be improved. While he had not a map on the Table that would answer the inquiries of some hon. gentlemen on this side of the House as to the details of the expenditure, he informed the House that his engineers had made it a matter of special inquiry; that Mr. Thompson, the resident engineer, Mr. Keefer, and the chief engineer, the Deputy Minister, had given the matter a great deal of thought and consideration, and that after looking carefully into the matter they had determined upon enlarging Port Colborne harbour. But some hon. gentleman, I think it was the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke), asked the minister if there was not some difference of opinion as to whether Port Colborne harbour should be improved. The minister very generously told him that Mr. Keefer was not entirely in favour of the Port Colborne route, that he rather favoured the transshipment of grain at Port Maitland, and making a canal to meet the Welland Canal; that he favoured that plan instead of enlarging Port Colborne. However, the Minister of Railways and Canals stated that after considering the matter in all its bearings they had decided that it would be more advantageous to improve Port Colborne, and, I think, rightly. I may say, however, that had Port Maitland been selected as the port of entrance to the Welland Canal when the enlargement of the canal was decided upon, or when the old canal was built, it might probably have been a better thing to do. Port Maitland is a better natural harbour than Port Colborne. But I am sure that I am within the mark when I say that it would cost a great deal more to put Port Maitland into proper condition to compete with the port of Buffalo than it will to put Port Colborne into the same condition. Besides that, we would save ten or twelve miles of canal. In order to take the Port Maitland route, the government would have to build a canal 21 miles long, and then they would have to go to pretty nearly the same expense, if not quite as much, to put Port Maitland into any sort of condition to compete with Buffalo. So, Sir, I think that the Minister of Railways and Canals showed a proper judgment in deciding, with Mr. Thompson, the resident engineer, that the Port Colborne work was the proper one to take up.

Mr. Speaker, I have some other data, but I will not trouble the House with it, because I have already spoken longer than I expected. I want to show the actual condition of the trade at present on the Welland Canal. There is no need to show why the trade has fallen off. It must be patent to everybody that the reason is that we have not been in a position to take it. When we look about us and see what the prospects are for trade development in this country, I think we cannot entertain too sanguine expectations of what our canal system is going to do in the way of carrying trade that is offered for freighting on the great upper lakes. If we look at the growth of the lake tonnage during the years that are past, we will have some slight conception of what we may expect it to be in the future. When the old Welland Canal was opened 50 odd years ago, there were less than 200,000 tons of lake tonnage then navigating the upper lakes. Thirty years afterwards, about the time of the beginning of the enlargement of the canals, that tonnage had grown to 600,000 tons. Fifteen years afterwards it had grown to 1,000,000 tons, and in 1898, it had grown to the enormous figure of 1,500,000 tons. Now let us look at the freight tonnage. In 1885, it was 19,200,000 tons, that is the freight tonnage for grain and other commodities. In 1890, it had grown to 37,000,000 tons, and in 1898, it was 62,500,000 tons, nearly the combined tonnage of London and Liverpool, the two great cities of the commercial world. So, I say, that in view of what has taken place in the past, we can look forward with great expectations to the future, and I think we may not unreasonably expect that in ten years from now that 62,500,000 tons of freighting will be doubled. I do not think that that is at all an extravagant expectation. We will have ample business for every railway in this country to do. We are not going to shut up a single railway. The policy of the government has been in the past, as it is to-day, to favour railways that are tapping the lakes and Georgian Bay. The harbours from Sarnia to Parry Sound, in the improvement of which hundreds of thousands of dollars have been expended, are tapped by the great railways of this country. They have been and are carrying no small amount of the traffic of the country. They will carry more; there is no doubt about that. I believe that the water route, the great St. Lawrence route is going to carry its share, and that it will carry more than the hon. gentlemen, who support the combined route, have any idea of. Even if it does not, it will have this beneficial influence upon the country, in the interest of the farmers and the people generally, that it will, at least, keep under control the freight rates that the railways will charge. The hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald), gave us, what I consider a very fine address, in regard to this matter. He had gone to some trouble in looking up figures, and he showed that it had been decided by experts that you could do, on the lakes, with one dollar, what it would take ten dollars to do on the railway. The water route will always be, not only a competitor, but it will be such a competitor, that it will necessarily keep down and regulate the freight rates of this country. In reference to the harbour of Montreal, I just want to say a word, and it will only be a word. The government are pursuing the right course in putting Montreal harbour in a proper condition. There is no use of making Port Colborne right unless Montreal is made right. I was astonished to find out, only a short time ago, the condition of affairs in the harbour of Montreal, as to their capacity to receive what had gone to them. They are actually, in no condition whatever, to receive the trade, even if it went to them. Suppose all the trade that goes to Buffalo, should go to Montreal, they could not handle it. The government must arouse itself; it must not stint the expenditure of money in putting these two ports, Port Colborne and Montreal, in a proper condition to receive and discharge the commodities that may come to them for export. I hope that it will not be negligent in this regard, but that it will be diligent, and that when Port Colborne has been put in proper condition, when we have our entrance deepened, so that vessels can come in, drawing 22 feet of water, or 20 feet of water, when a breakwater is built around there to protect the vessels that come in—and the government have not seen fit to be niggardly in this regard, but have risen to the position the people expect them to take—we will have in Port Colborne and Montreal, respectively, the Buffalo and New York of Canada.

Mr. LEIGHTON G. McCARTHY (North Simcoe). Mr. Speaker, exceedingly interesting and instructive speeches, have been delivered during this debate on the transportation problem of the country, and I am pleased to observe, that, at last, our legislators are waking up to the importance of this all important problem. The solution of this problem is, as I have said, the greatest importance to this government, to this House, and to this country. In fact, I think all true Canadians will agree that we have a task of the most burdensome, intricate and onerous kind before us. The future of this country is very largely wrapped up in the transportation question. Why? Because, Sir, it seems to me that we Canadians must have, and should have, if we are to prosper and progress, the enormous advantage to be gained and the large profit to be made by transporting the products of our own North-west and the western states via Canadian channels, to the European markets. We must apply ourselves to the solution of this problem. How are we to attain this end, is the question now being discussed by the House. Geography shows that we have the shortest routes, and, therefore, it only remains for us to properly improve these channels, and we must, of necessity, capture and control a very great proportion of the enormous trade which now goes via the channels of the United States. Then, what would be the effect of that? Is it not obvious that it would lower the rate of transportation, and thereby increase, to a very, very large extent, the profit of the producers of this country. How largely this country is interested in this question has only of recent years been appreciated. We have, as the hon. member (Mr. McCleary), who has just resumed his seat, said, been sleeping while our neighbours to the south of us have shown us, with their wonderful activity, how a transportation system can be built up and developed. True, they have expended large, yea, enormous sums of money upon their waterways and harbours, but, has not the expenditure proved to be wise? Has not that expenditure been amply repaid? I submit that there can be but one answer to that question, and that is an answer in the affirmative. Yes. Probably, it was from the experience of our American neighbours, that Mr. J. R. Booth conceived and carried into successful operation the idea that the proper development of the transportation system, not only would carry our own Canadian freight, but would also carry, as the system which he has developed is carrying, the freight of the western states. That system, to which I refer, is what is known as the Ottawa, Arnprior and Parry Sound Railway, which has abundantly proven the correctness of that astute man's ideas. Well, then, Sir, what lessons are Canadians taught by this experience to which I have referred? Is it not, that we must be prepared to spend large sums of money on the improvement of our transportation system, to so improve it, that it will reclaim and redivert that Canadian trade, which, I regret to say, has hitherto been diverted to American channels, and have it transported entirely via our Canadian routes? I say that if we make a proper and reasonable expenditure upon the improvement of our waterways, our harbours and other carrying facilities, it will have the effect of diverting into Canadian channels a very large proportion of the trade which now goes via American channels. The Canadian routes are shorter, as my hon. friend, the member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), demonstrated, by stating that which is a fact, namely, that a vessel can make from Chicago to a Georgian Bay port, five trips in the same length of time that she can make three trips to Buffalo, and the geography shows that it is several hundred miles shorter. I have seen it stated that the prime requisite for accomplishing improvement in our industrial, commercial and financial conditions, are that the traffic, and especially the grain, must be carried by the shortest and most economical route possible, from the west to the seaports, and thence to manufacturing Europe. What, therefore, is the shortest, the best and the most advantageous route? That is the question which has to be decided by the government; that is the question which has to be decided by this House. I congratulate the hon. member for East Simcoe, who introduced this resolution, upon the ingenious manner in which he endeavoured to conclude that the route via the port of Midland was the most advantageous in Canada. It will be observed that in order to arrive at that alleged conclusion, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) was forced to link the advantages of the port of Parry Sound with the port of Midland. In all his arguments he was careful to do that. He joined these two ports together and in doing so he arrived at what he said was the clear conclusion that the Midland route was the most advantageous. Let me point out a grave distinction between the Midland route and the Parry Sound route. It is this: The Midland route is not an all-Canadian route, for all freight landed at Midland must be transported over the Grand Trunk Railway, the seaboard terminus of which railway is, as we all know, in Portland, Maine. Now, the Parry Sound route may or may not be an all-Canadian route, because it is possible to divert the traffic at Coteau and send it through American channels, or it is also possible to continue from Coteau to Montreal.

I was pleased to note that the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McCleary) devoted the greater part of his argument this afternoon to an attack upon the Collingwood route, which I have the honour to present to this House. The hon. member representing North Simcoe, on behalf of his constituents, has oft times presented the advantages of that route to this parliament, and it is apparently of such importance as to be deemed worthy the condemnation of the hon. member for Welland, who, no doubt, fears in it a serious rival to his scheme. The proposition which I present is this: That an air line railway should be built, joining the two ports of Collingwood and Toronto. By that means two very serious objections in the transportation of freight are obviated. First, we get over the long delay occasioned by going through the canals, and in the second place, the haul from Collingwood to Toronto is so short as compared with that of Midland or Parry Sound, that the advantages of the Collingwood route is at once obvious. It is only seventy miles from Toronto to Collingwood, through an easy country in which to build a railway. If this railway were built the chain would be complete, and thus the natural channel through which this trade should go would be perfected and the lower lakes, rivers and canals would be successfully joined with the upper lakes and canals. While, Sir, I am submitting this as the most advantageous scheme and as the best possible solution of this exceedingly intricate and important problem, I do not desire that we should confine ourselves to a single route. I believe that we should develop all the channels of transportation within our reach, because I am happy to think that in the future there will doubtless be sufficient trade for all the transportation routes that are now being proposed. When we develop our western country, and when we divert from American channels that trade which we must divert as a matter of course, when our waterways are properly equipped, I believe we will have sufficient trade to keep busy all these routes that are now striving for recognition. I must not, however, forget the very regrettable fact, that we are limited in our money supplies, and remembering that, it follows as a necessary consequence that that route which presents the best claims must be the first to be developed. Notwithstanding what the hon. gentleman from Welland has said, it is a fact that the most successful freight routes in the United States are the mixed rail and water routes. It would be well for us also to remember what the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) told us recently: That the American railways—not the canals, mark you—are equipping themselves to transport freight at cheaper rates. Let me for a moment compare the most prominent of the contending routes which have been brought to our attention. I omit the Midland route because, as I have said, its ultimate terminus is at Portland, Maine, and it therefore cannot be considered as an all-Canadian route. I regret that the hon. member for Welland is not now present, because I would like to have called his attention to the fact that politicians will regard him as a very brave man, even although the speech which he made this afternoon was delivered in the absence of his leaders. Judging from the experience of what has been meted out to my family in the past, I am afraid that if the Conservative leaders were present, the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCleary) would probably soon see an article in the Conservative press, reading him out of the party; for be it known that the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCleary) made a speech this afternoon, a greater part of which was devoted to telling how the Conservative government have blundered in their transportation policy; how they had made mistakes from the beginning, how they had slept, and how their apathy was something too enormous to conceive. Not only that, but the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCleary) on the other hand, said that the present government were doing everything that was proper and everything that was wise in relation to this transportation question. I may not be able to agree with the hon. gentleman in his last proposition, but I am in hearty accord with him in his contention that the Conservative government had slept, that they had blundered, and that they had not pressed our transportation problem to a certain conclusion as it should have been pressed.

In considering these routes, let us take first Cockburn Island, which is a starting point common to all. The various distances from that point to Montreal are as follows:

	Miles.
Taking these in order, there is first the all-water route by the Welland Canal:
From Cockburn Island to Detroit River the distance is	288
Then down Detroit River	18
Through Lake Erie	216
Through Welland Canal	22

	Miles.
From Port Dalhousie, on Lake Ontario, to Kingston	148
Kingston to Montreal	160
Making	352
The Parry Sound route:
	Miles.
From Cockburn Island to Parry Sound.....	178
By rail, Parry Sound to Coteau.....	341
Coteau to Montreal, by water.....	36
In all.....	555
Of which 341 miles are by rail.
The Collingwood route:
	Miles.
Cockburn Island to Collingwood.....	193
Collingwood to Toronto, by rail.....	70
Toronto to Kingston	148
Kingston to Montreal.....	160
In all.....	574

Now, the Parry Sound Railway Company is at present carrying grain the 555 miles, of which 341 miles is by rail, but via Collingwood the distance is only 19 miles more, but of the 574 miles via Collingwood, but 70 miles, as against 341 miles, are by rail. There are the same number of transshipments in each way, namely, at Parry Sound and Coteau, Collingwood and Toronto. Can it be doubted that if the Parry Sound Railway Company can carry grain by the route indicated, that the via Toronto can compete with advantage.

Then, comparing the Toronto route with the Welland Canal route, the saving in distance is over 300 miles, and the question is whether the grain can be carried 70 miles by rail with an additional transshipment at an equal or less cost than 400 miles by water (or, to be exact, 390).

That is no doubt the reason why my hon. friend (Mr. McCleary) went all round the question so far as the distances between these contending routes is concerned. He gave us an interesting address, but much as he slanged the city of Toronto, and much as he slanged the enterprising merchants of Toronto, he did not point out, and he could not point out, where any advantage is to be gained in the way of distance between the Welland route and the Toronto and Collingwood route. On the contrary, as I have said, the figures show that the Collingwood-Toronto route is 300 miles shorter than the other.

Mr. McCLEARY. May I ask the hon. gentleman, in what manner did I slang the city of Toronto or the board of trade of that city?

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman said that Toronto practically wanted the earth and that the members of the board of trade, to whom he alluded as business men, were men who assumed that this House of Commons and the legislature of Ontario had nothing to do but legislate for the interests of that city, and that in the balance of the time they might attend to the business of the country. If that is not slanging, it is a satire of the gravest kind. It is pointing the finger of scorn at those who represent that city.

Mr. McCLEARY. Mr. Speaker, I object to the hon. gentleman using that term towards me.

Mr. McCARTHY. If the word offends my hon. friend, I shall be most happy to withdraw it, and substitute the words, most satirical towards the board of trade of the city of Toronto and the citizens of Toronto generally. I was proceeding to say that the question is whether the grain could be carried seventy miles by rail, with an additional transshipment at an equal or less cost than 400 miles by water. I want to emphasize that. Because the hon. gentleman has been talking about the enlargement of the Welland Canal. He was interrupted by the hon. member for West Toronto, who asked him if there was any proposition to enlarge that canal. He did not answer the question, though he made a somewhat curt reply. It might offend the hon. gentleman if I said that he slanged the hon. member for West Toronto. I do not say that. I say that he answered in a curt manner, the effect of his reply being that the only proposition we had before us was the improvement of the harbour at Port Colborne. This last proposition which I have submitted, namely, whether grain can be carried seventy miles by rail with an additional transshipment at an equal or less cost than 400 miles by water, or to be exact 390 miles, is a matter for practical men; but from the inquiries which I have made and the statements I have seen as to the freight now being charged, there seems to be no room for doubt that the route via Collingwood and Toronto is of all the cheapest and best. It must be remembered also that the large ships which ply on the upper lakes cannot pass through the Welland Canal. My hon. friend from Welland has spoken of ships of 20 feet draught. He knows perfectly well that they cannot enter the Welland Canal or the harbour at Port Colborne, and there would be the necessity of transshipping at that point and probably also at the other end of the canal, which would not give the advantage which I conceded in the former part of my remarks, wherein I acknowledged that there would be one more transshipment in the route by Collingwood and Toronto than in the route by the Welland Canal. It follows, therefore, that smaller vessels will have to be used for the carriage of grain through the Welland Canal, and the transshipment which I have spoken of would have to take place.

But too great importance cannot be attached to the fact that by both the Parry Sound line and the Welland Canal route, Toronto, the capital of the province of Ontario, the chief province of the Dominion, is being side-tracked. Any policy which can give to Toronto, without loss to the producer or shipper, a fair share of the business of the North-west and the western states, is one that ought to be acceptable to all parties and all sections of the Dominion. Montreal or Quebec must be the summer terminal points so long as grain is carried by water, either via the canals or via Toronto, and there is no antagonism between Toronto and Montreal—their interests are in this matter identical. But the grain that goes via Parry Sound railway may be diverted at Coteau to the American shipping ports to the loss and detriment of our own ocean terminal ports. It is clearly important, therefore, to make it feasible and practicable to tranship grain so as to benefit not only three of the chief cities of the Dominion, namely, Toronto, Montreal and Quebec, but also the ocean ports of the maritime provinces, and retain within the Dominion itself the handling of grain from its own ports.

Therefore, Sir, from these figures and for the reasons I have stated I submit that the proposition I have presented to the House is the best, most advantageous and most feasible solution of this difficult problem. I submit, Sir, with the greatest confidence that it is superior to the Welland Canal route, it is the most natural channel, and the one which should receive the immediate and prompt attention of the government. The hon. member for Welland has with considerable ingenuity diverted our attention by quoting figures with regard to the transport trade of the United States; but the enormous expenditure that will be necessary at Port Colborne, and to deepen the Welland Canal, to admit of the passage of vessels of large draft, must not be overlooked. The expenditure which would be necessary to equip the line referred to in my proposition would not be nearly as large.

Then, Sir, there is one further consideration as to the effect of the Welland Canal route on our inland marine. I submit, Sir, that the improvement of the Welland Canal suggested would be detrimental to them. It is desirable to encourage the building of more Canadian vessels and to afford them the opportunity of participating in this traffic by an ample protection against their well equipped and long established American rivals. The government, I submit are only justified in maintaining the Welland Canal at its present efficiency, and should not expend any further sums of money with a view to enlarging and improving its capacity, which would, I think, adversely affect our Canadian marine, experience in the past having unquestionably demonstrated that expenditure on the Welland Canal has been chiefly to the advantage of the Americans, and would, I fear, without doubt, be of still greater advantage to them in the future under improved conditions. This was shown by the figures which I quoted to the House last year in discussing this question, and which therefore, I will not now repeat. Sir, I fear that future developments and enlargements of the Welland Canal at the present time means the creating to Canadian shipping a menace for all time to come, as United States vessels would be able to participate in the traffic in the ratio that their vessels exceed in capacity and numbers those of Canada, which would practically mean an American commerce over a Canadian route provided by Canadian money.

Therefore, I say, the government should consider the development of an all-Canadian route which can be equipped and put in operation in a very short time, viz., by the construction of a railway across the Portage between Toronto and Collingwood, on the Georgian Bay, which is the natural receptacle of the grain of the North-west, Canada and the western states. By this project Canadian vessels only would be entitled to participate in the traffic between Toronto and Montreal, and would have a monopoly over this route in bringing freight by return cargo, and a Canadian inland marine would be thereby fostered, encouraged and developed. There is one other scheme of transportation to which I desire to refer, and that is the Trent Valley Canal. We have not heard that scheme mentioned to any great extent in this debate. I am sorry to see the opposition benches so empty, because I would ask my hon. friends opposite, who spent during their term of office such huge sums on that most important work, to impress on this government the necessity of going on and completing it. It is now within a very few miles of Lake Simcoe, and I trust it will be pushed forward and soon enter that lake, because it will then be of great advantage to the towns and villages of that locality.

The hon. member for Welland made a statement which I am at a loss to understand. He said that those who advocate the Toronto and Collingwood route would have the government abandon the St. Lawrence Canal route. Why, nothing is further from our idea. It is in order to develop trade via the St. Lawrence Canal route that we ask for the development and proper equipment of the Toronto and Collingwood route.

My hon. friend from Welland asked how it was that the trade via Collingwood has fallen off. Let me ask him how it is that the trade via Welland Canal has diminished. To that question no doubt his reply would be that they have no harbour at Port Colborne. Well, Mr. Speaker, if our trade via Collingwood has fallen off, though not to the same extent as that via the Welland canals, the reason is because our harbour requires to be further deepened. True, we have a natural harbour, which Port Colborne has not, but we have not the necessary depth of water, and we are asking this government to do for us what he is asking it to do for Port Colborne.

I desire to congratulate the government on the deepening of the St. Lawrence Canal system, and I now ask them to give their attention and consideration to the Ontario portion of that route, and particularly to the proposition which I have endeavoured to lay briefly before this House to-day.

This question, Mr. Speaker, must be considered on broad Canadian lines and a settled policy of some kind be at once adopted. A good Providence has given us, beyond doubt, the shortest natural route, and we know that that Providence helps him who helps himself.

Mr. HENRY CORBY (West Hastings). I am going, Mr. Speaker, to act on the resolution brought in by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) this afternoon, and make my remarks as brief as possible. I am glad to hear the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) urge the government to go on, and complete the Trent Valley Canal in that district of country, we are all very much interested in the completion of that work which has been kept dangling for so many years before the public. I might say that a deputation waited here a few days ago on the government to urge the necessity of diverting that canal by the way of Port Hope and Cobourg. But, that seems to me a ridiculous idea, because I understand that the height of land is 300 or 400 feet, which would have to be overcome, and I consider that the only feasible route is by the Bay of Quinte and down by Trenton. Running it that way, you will be land-locked from Trenton clean through to Montreal, with but two gaps to go through, one of one and a half miles and the other of five and a half miles.

I wish to say a few words with reference to the transportation question, which I consider one of the most important that can be brought to our attention. The great question to solve is the best plan of securing the grain trade of the west for ourselves. To-day we are told that 75 per cent to 80 per cent, and even 90 per cent, of the North-west grain goes by way of Buffalo and the Erie Canal to New York, and I was glad to hear the Minister of Public Works say a few days ago that the government proposed putting a large amount in the estimates to improve the harbour at Port Colborne. As one of the opposition, I would be pleased to support any reasonable grant, even up to $3,000,000 or $4,000,000, to put that harbour in just as good shape as the harbour of Buffalo. There is no use in our trying to compete for the carrying trade of the great North-west unless we have a harbour suitable in every respect at Port Colborne, so that vessels can go there at any time in the season of navigation. If we get those improvements at that port and if the government then do not feel disposed to go on and deepen the Welland Canal, they could utilize the water power they have at present on that canal to run an electric road and lighten the larger boats that go through to Prescott, Kingston and Ogdensburg. Let them utilize the water power of that canal in this way and carry that grain, even if they carry it free, where now two or three cents per bushel is charged only for bringing the grain across from Port Colborne to Port Dalhousie. The same thing might be done also lower down the River St. Lawrence. The men running these large propellers and boats have told me that even if the canal were deepened from Prescott and Ogdensburg to Montreal, it would not pay them to lose the time it would take to go down there, and the smaller boats could carry the freight cheaper than they could. They claim that in the time taken in going from Prescott to Montreal, they could at least take two round trips from Chicago to Prescott, which, in an ordinary season, would be the profit.

I might also say that I certainly think that the charges at the port of Montreal are no doubt a very great drawback to shipping our grain from that port, and it is necessary for the government to get to work and make Montreal harbour free and thus encourage our grain taken that route.

I am also informed that the New York Central Railway are offering to carry all the grain that goes down the Erie Canal at the interest on what it would cost the government to deepen that canal. I was also told by a gentleman from New York that the suggestion was thrown out that two tracks could be put in the Erie Canal and freight carried cheaper by rail on the bed of that canal than it would cost to deepen it. If that can be done there, I do not see why we could not utilize our water power on the St. Lawrence to carry grain from Prescott and Ogdensburg to Montreal, and that would cost us a good deal cheaper than to deepen our canal down to, say, twenty or twenty-two feet.

I certainly think it is the duty of the government to do everything in their power to divert the grain trade by the St. Lawrence route. We also know that the government should stand at no expense in properly buoying out the river St. Lawrence, and making it perfectly safe and navigable through to the ocean. To-day we know they are discriminating against us, for the reason that they say the Canadian route is a dangerous route. I say we cannot afford to stand for money; we must pay what is necessary to compete with the United States; we must make the Montreal harbour equal in every respect to New York, and we must give the shippers every facility for bringing their grain this way. I claim that we, as Canadians, have no choice before us, the government must perfect the navigation by way of the river St. Lawrence. Now, I heard the hon. member for East Simcoe stating the other day his views in regard to carrying our grain by way of Midland and by Collingwood. I have heard the suggestion of the hon. member for North Simcoe, that the only advisable way to bring the grain, is by way of Collingwood and Toronto. I wish to say, that, if you are going to carry grain by a railway and water route, I think the best route in the Dominion, from Chicago to Montreal to-day is by way of Midland and city of Belleville, and the Bay of Quinte. Midland is situated on the Georgian Bay. The route is direct to Belleville, and from Belleville you are land-locked, from Montreal to Quebec you have the barges protected, and you do not have to go outside on the lakes at all. I claim, that if you are going to carry grain by rail, the best way is from Midland, via Belleville and the Bay of Quinte, and the St. Lawrence to Montreal and Quebec.

Mr. ARCH. CAMPBELL (Kent, Ont.) One thing has been brought out very clearly in this discussion, and that is the almost unanimous opinion expressed by all the members of the House as to the necessity of increasing our transportation facilities. Now, what particular object have we in view? Of course, it is nice to see a great fleet of vessels going down Canadian waters and discharging their cargoes at a Canadian port. While we like to see that, we have something higher and better in view. It is well known, that the more cheaply you can transport grain from the west, the higher the price the producer receives; and every cent you can reduce the cost of transportation, it adds that much to the price of the products in the hands of the producers. Then, again, the more grain we bring down, the more vessels leave our ports, and the more seek our ports for cargo, and competition reduces the charge for bringing goods into Canada. And, so, not only do we get a higher price for our grain, but we get goods brought into our country at lower rates. That is the object, I presume, that we have in view, and the question of how we can best obtain these results, is what has given rise to the discussion in this House, which has been going on for some time. Various schemes have been suggested. The Georgian Bay and Ottawa Canal scheme is one that has come to the front; we have also the Trent Valley Canal, the all-rail route via Midland, and the all-rail route via Owen Sound, the Welland Canal route, and also, as has been very clearly pointed out by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), the Georgian Bay and Toronto scheme. I do not think, with the hon. member for North Simcoe that we should not spend any money at Port Colborne, for we have so much money invested in our canals, that it is the duty of the government to put Port Colborne in reasonably good shape to accommodate that share of the enormous quantity of trade coming down the great lakes year after year, that will seek an outlet by the Welland Canal. It is absolutely necessary to give an entrance to that harbour, in order to be able to use the canal. I also approve the spending of a sufficient amount of money at Montreal. That port must be put in the best possible condition in order to meet the requirements of the country. I think the late government deserves a great deal of censure and blame for the dilatory manner in which they have carried out these works. It seems almost inconceivable that for eighteen years the late government were in power, and our facilities for carrying our grain trade to the seaboard, still of the most crude and unfinished character. Everything was conducted without a definite plan; and, when we look at Montreal, which has been our chief maritime port and consider its facilities for the handling of the grain transportation trade, we find that they are simply disgraceful to Canada. The late government were to blame for the way they allowed the works to be delayed. This government have inaugurated a new era. They have brought activity and intelligence to the work. They have spent about $9,000,000 in enlarging the canals, which will give us 14 feet of water from tide-water to the head of the lakes. I believe the people will support and commend them for that. As to the work at Port Colborne, I have no doubt that that work will be pushed forward rapidly, and will be completed in a way to reflect credit on the government and the country.

While I am in favour of spending a reasonable amount of money at Port Colborne, I am strongly of opinion that the great highway from the west should be by way of the Georgian Bay and Toronto. I think the advantages of that route have been pointed out very clearly by the hon. member for North Simcoe. It is over 300 miles shorter than the route by the Welland Canal. It is the shortest possible route to the seaboard, and it can be constructed at reasonable expense, as compared with the other routes. It is true that there is one more transshipment, one more handling of the grain; but grain, in these days, can be handled at so small a figure, that this really is not a considerable element in the calculation. Then, also, it is 555 miles shorter to Montreal than it is to New York via Buffalo. For this route, there is only 70 miles of railway to be constructed. We have to-day a good harbour at Collingwood, and a good harbour at Toronto. There are 70 miles of railway to be built down hill, because the land at Collingwood is about 300 feet above Lake Ontario. The grades on that road are comparatively easy. For the first ten miles after you leave Collingwood, I am told the grades are only 10 feet to the mile until you get to the height of land, then you descend 400 feet from the height of land to the waters of Lake Ontario. The advantages would be, therefore, that large steamers could go into the port of Collingwood or some other port on the Georgian Bay—I mention Collingwood on account of its excellent harbour—and there discharge their cargo. It could be transhipped into our lines of railway running to the city of Toronto where you would get it landed in the waters of Lake Ontario, and then it could be transferred into vessels that will run down the St. Lawrence to the city of Montreal. Thus you have the shortest possible route from the great west to the great east.

Then there would be another advantage of this route to the people of Ontario principally. The people of the North-west and Manitoba and the Western States have very little reason to complain to-day. They get their grain transported from the west to the seaboard now at a very low rate; and while we naturally want to attract that trade to Canada, yet, at the same time, it is not going to lessen their rates very much, because they have to-day from Duluth, Chicago and Fort William very low rates of freight to the seaboard. But what we have to complain of in the province of Ontario is, that we are charged very much higher rates of freight from points in Ontario to Montreal than they pay from Chicago, Duluth and Fort William to Montreal. We have no means of overcoming that difficulty. A line of steamers running through the Welland Canal down the St. Lawrence River, will not affect the rates in the province of Ontario very much. But I contend that by turning the stream of commerce from the Georgian Bay to the city of Toronto, cutting Ontario into two parts as it were, dividing the territory, and thus making a great highway from the Georgian Bay to the city of Toronto upon which freights would be carried, say, for 8 to 10 cents per 100 lbs. from any point along that line to Montreal, you will at once reduce the freights from all points in Ontario to Montreal. You will then compel the railways to reduce their freights in accordance with the rates on this great national highway, and thus you would at once afford to the people of Ontario enormous benefits in the reduced transportation of their wheat, their bacon, their cattle, their apples, their cheese, their butter and the thousand and one things that they have to export. It is a lamentable fact that to-day, from points in central Ontario, farmers have to pay more on their apples, on their cheese, on their butter and on their cattle than they do a thousand miles further west, to the city of Montreal. I say that if this route were adopted and a highway made from the city of Toronto to the Georgian Bay, you would at once afford a competing line which will compel all the railways to reduce their freights, and thus you will add enormously to the value of the produce of the rest of Ontario. If, instead of paying 15½ cents per 100 lbs. from points to Montreal for export, we had a rate, as they have in the Western States to Montreal, of 8 or 10 cents per 100 lbs., why, you would immediately advance the value of the crop of the province of Ontario, the value of all our produce that seeks a market via Montreal would immediately be enhanced thereby, and you would thus confer upon the people of Ontario enormous advantages by reducing the cost of the transport of their grain from their homes to the city of Montreal for export.

At the same time I contend that this great highway will afford to the people of Manitoba, and the North-west, and the Western States, all the advantages that can be conferred by any other route that is in vogue to-day. They will be enabled to send their produce by the Georgian Bay and Toronto and down the St. Lawrence to Montreal, at fully as cheap a rate, by a route over 300 miles shorter than by the Welland Canal. Thus it will afford to them all the advantages the Welland Canal route will afford, and it will also enable the people of Ontario, the various manufacturers and dealers there, to reap some advantages from the construction of this highway, and it will in that way confer upon the people of Ontario all the facilities that are required by the people of the great west.

Mr. Speaker, when we look at the way in which affairs have been managed to the south of us, it is lamentable to reflect that we have been so blind to our own interests. Take the great city of Buffalo where 90 per cent of all the grain raised in our own North-west seeks a market for a foreign port, by a route 550 miles further to the seaboard than by our own national highway, I say it is a humiliating fact that 90 per cent of all the produce shipped for export from the great North-west seeks a market through a foreign port. The last year something like 270,000,000 bushels of grain passed through Buffalo to New York for export, while our own great national highway was almost idle. I contend that the government should carefully look into this matter before they finally decide. I believe that the route from Toronto to the Georgian Bay, which is over 300 miles shorter than via the Welland Canal, will confer upon the people of this country enormous advantages, advantages that will greatly enhance the value of all the produce raised in Ontario. It will afford to the people of the great North-west all the advantages that they desire. Every advantage that they will get via the Welland Canal, they will also receive for their shipments when made via this route. It will also confer upon the great city of Toronto one of the greatest possible benefits that can be conferred upon any city. It will establish in that city immense shipyards, because there will be a great number of vessels required to convey this grain from Toronto to Montreal, these ships will be constructed there, and will employ thousands and thousands of men in their construction. It will enable manufacturers all over this Canada of ours to locate along this line of railway, because the rate will be reduced, say to 8 or 10 cents per 100 lbs. to Montreal, whereas they now pay 12½ cents to 15½ cents per 100 lbs. Thus you see the enormous advantages that will be derived from the construction of this route.

Then I contend that it will enable vessels going to Montreal to bring back return cargoes. Why, there are in the city of Toronto alone some 800,000 tons of coal consumed every year. That coal could be all brought from Cape Breton to Montreal in vessels, and then be carried up the lakes, affording return cargoes to our vessels. Not only that, but those cargoes could be unloaded into these large steel cars of the latest construction, that will carry them to Collingwood and a thousand miles west. The iron, and coal, and all the necessary articles that they require could be brought back in these vessels which would go down loaded with grain. I say that this route can be constructed at a comparatively small expenditure. There will be a Bill before the House in a few days from a company asking a charter to build this line of railway. The company is composed of wealthy men, men of undoubted ability. If the government favour the granting of this charter, I believe that it will be the beginning of a scheme that will confer upon the people of this country the greatest possible advantages. I trust the government will give this matter their most serious consideration, because I think it is one that will commend itself not only to this House, but to the people of Canada.

Mr. E. F. CLARKE (West Toronto). Mr. Speaker, to declare that the satisfactory solution of this transportation problem is a matter affecting vitally the interests of all classes and districts, is but to state a truism, and I presume that is the reason why so much time has been taken up in the discussion of the resolution which was presented by the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) two or three weeks ago. Public attention is now more generally and more closely directed to the solution of this problem than it has been for many years past, and this, no doubt, is due to the fact that the immense works undertaken, many years ago, by the predecessors of the present administration, for the enlargement and deepening of the Welland and St. Lawrence canals, and for the accommodation of Canadian shippers in moving the products of the west from the great lakes to the seaboard, are now nearing completion, and the people who have cheerfully borne the burden and responsibility of these vast expenditures are, naturally, anxious to know what possible return they are to get out of them. For that reason, I think, the resolution of the hon. member for East Simcoe is timely. I think that the government ought not to proceed too hastily in the undertakings which have been suggested by individual members of the government from time to time during the past twelve months. We must not forget that, since these works of enlarging and deepening our waterways were commenced, the conditions have steadily changed. The marine architect and the marine engineer have been steadily at work, and the grain carriers of twenty-five or thirty years ago, as far as the upper lakes are concerned, at any rate, are practically things of the past, and improvements and changes have been made not only in lake transportation, but in transportation by land or rail. The mechanical engineer has also been steadily at work, and to-day, we have, as a result of his labours, vastly improved cars, vastly more powerful locomotives, a better road bed with heavier rails, and locomotives that can haul at least four times the weight that was possible for the locomotive of fifteen or twenty years ago to haul. So, I say it is timely that the resolution, which has been presented by the hon. member for East Simcoe should be considered and considered very carefully. A discussion upon this question of transportation commenced, so far as this parliament is concerned, with the proposition, made last year, respecting the enlargement and improvement of the harbour of Port Colborne. I think I may safely and fairly say that in anything that was said by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House in regard to the proposals of the government, no attempt was made to make party or political capital out of these proposals. The desire was expressed last year by hon. members on this side of the House, as it has been expressed this year, that the government should be placed not only in possession of the fullest information as to the scheme it has in hand respecting Port Colborne, but, also, that it should vouchsafe to the House the information and plans upon which it proposes to act. There was only one set of plans in existence twelve months ago when the vote was being taken by the government as the initiatory sum for improving the Port Colborne harbour, and the expenditures which the engineers said were necessary to carry out the works set out by these plans, amounted, if my memory serves me, to the enormous sum of $5,000,000. In the exhaustive and able speech which we had the pleasure of listening to a few nights ago from the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), the statement was made that the present intention of the government was to expend somewhere in the neighbourhood of $2,000,000 on the work at Port Colborne; and, if my memory serves me, the hon. gentleman promised to bring down plans and reports showing how it was proposed to make that expenditure. But, so far, we have not been favoured with these plans nor have we seen the repairs which the government have accepted. It is noteworthy, in this connection, to remind the House that an engineer as eminent and as accomplished as Mr. Keefer rather favours, as the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McCleary) admits, the selection of Port Maitland as the Lake Erie entrance to the Welland Canal in place of Port Colborne; and as one desirous of sustaining and assisting the government in any reasonable measure of expenditure to put the Welland Canal into as efficient a state as it can be placed, I should have felt more comfortable if the information and plans which were to be brought down had been laid before parliament before this discussion was concluded. I repeat that, so far, we are in the dark; we are not in possession of the plans or information which have enabled the government to reach a conclusion itself. Now, I think that the hon. member for Welland was hardly fair to his colleagues on this side of the House in the strictures which he made respecting their remarks. I am sure that I can congratulate that hon. gentleman, however, upon the eloquence and earnestness with which he presented the case from the standpoint of Port Colborne, and I think he deserves very great credit for his efforts to satisfy the House that the government has acted wisely and discreetly in coming to the conclusion that it has come to in determining to pursue the course which it has determined to pursue. But, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman, in the remarks which he has made, took very good care to present only one side of the shield, one side of the argument to the House respecting the Welland Canal route. I do not know of any hon. member in this House who, recognizing the vast amount of money that has been expended by parliament since the Welland Canal was first established, desires to do anything to militate against the success of our all-water route; but, I think, Mr. Speaker, that we would be derelict in our duty, as representatives of the people, if we did not point out, at last, the advantage which might obtain to the Dominion by the selection of some other route in addition to the Welland Canal, as a means of transporting the products of the great west to the seaboard. I take it, Sir, that it is not a disloyal act to the all-water route—to the Welland Canal and the St. Lawrence Canals route—to advocate, as has been advocated by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and the hon. member for Kent, Ont., (Mr. Campbell) the claims of the Collingwood-Toronto route. That route is, as has been pointed out to-night, an all-Canadian route. I think that may be done without our being charged, as my hon. friend from Welland saw fit to charge my colleague (Mr. Osler) with being narrow, and having only the interests of the city of Toronto at stake. My hon. friend from Welland was very severe upon my colleague. He said that he was merely an echo of the Board of Trade of Toronto. The hon. gentleman must have forgotten the sentiments contained in the speech which my hon. colleague delivered upon this very question two or three weeks ago. My hon. colleague's reputation as a broad, liberal-minded business man is sufficiently well established to withstand the attack which the hon. member for Welland made upon him and the charges of narrowness which he hurled against him; but, lest the House should forget what the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler), did say, in addressing it upon this question of transportation, I may be permitted to make two or three extracts from the speech to demonstrate that he was actuated by a desire to procure, in the expenditure of public money upon the completion of these transportation routes the best possible value, the greatest possible advantages for the producers, the shippers and the people of Canada generally. Mr. Osler said that:

The transportation question is an all-important one, and one which concerns the people of Canada perhaps more than any other question at present before them.

He recognizes the fact that this transportation question is a national question, a question the satisfactory solution of which affects not only the city of Toronto, but also, as I have already said, every village, every hamlet, every city, and every section of the Dominion. In giving utterance to these sentiments he was not tied up simply to reflect the opinions of the board of trade, but he was reflecting opinions that are entertained by the great body of the people of Canada, and especially by those who, like himself, occupy commanding positions in the business world and appreciate the importance of the question which is being considered. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Osler) said further:

There is no proposition that can be put before this House for the proper expenditure of public money which I believe will meet with such cordial approval from hon. gentlemen as the proposition to expend money to increase our transportation trade from our great west to the seaboard and to the market.

These are not the utterances of a gentleman who desires to aggrandize himself or the members of the Toronto Board of Trade especially. These are the utterances of a gentleman who, taking a broad view and having a firm grasp of the whole position, desires to do the best that possibly can be done in the interests of the people generally. He said further:

If we can improve our waterways, if we can cheapen our carriage in any shape or way, let us do it.

And he said further, and these are surely words of wisdom:

But let us be quite sure of what we are doing.

That is the position taken by hon. gentlemen who have opposed the proposals of the government respecting the expenditure at Port Colborne harbour. They did not desire to offer any factious opposition to these expenditures if they were satisfied in their own minds that Port Colborne was the proper place to select as the Lake Erie terminal of the Welland Canal, and if the expenditures were made in the most judicious manner possible. But we have had the experience and the statements of gentlemen who have been members of this House and who are now members of the Senate, respecting the inadvisability of making the expenditures at Port Colborne. My hon. friend from Welland referred to the attitude taken by the late Hon. Thos. White respecting the sums to be expended in deepening our canal system. That gentleman had the utmost faith in the future of this country. He realized the immense development that would take place in our great west, and he thought the government of that day were acting in a niggardly spirit in not providing a larger sum for making our canals larger and deeper than was then in contemplation. We had a gentleman representing that section of Ontario which is now so well represented by my hon. friend from Welland, in the person of the Hon. Senator McCallum, and on the same occasion—having a like faith in the future of the country that the late Hon. Thos. White had—he urged that the government should adopt a generous policy in the matter of canal enlargement and deepening, and years ago he very strongly advocated the selection of Port Maitland as the Lake Erie entrance to the canal instead of Port Colborne. It is a matter of fact, that it has been reiterated again and again in the course of this debate, that we have nothing worthy of the name of a harbour at Port Colborne at present. There is no difference of opinion respecting that. We have had that statement made during this debate by the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell), by the hon. member for South Grenville (Mr. Reid), by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), by the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart), and by other hon. gentlemen who have spoken.

A petition has been circulated amongst the members of the House during the last few days from the board of trade of the city of St. Catharines, a city that is very deeply interested in the prosperity of the Welland Canal, and the admission is made in that petition :

That the testimony of vessel-owners, master-mariners and forwarders is conclusive that this harbour at Port Colborne is deficient in those qualifications which it ought to possess as a vitally important link in the national inland all-water route to Montreal. Those qualifications are safety and convenience of access from the lake in all weather ; sufficient depth of water at all times, and at the lowest level of water in Lake Erie during the season of navigation ; spaciousness and dockage. This harbour possesses none of them.

This statement is made by the representative business men of St. Catharines through the board of trade. They repeat here the statement often made during the course of this debate, that there is practically no harbour at Port Colborne, and the hon. member from Quebec West and others have declared that it will take an immense amount of money—possibly a very much larger sum than is at present contemplated—to put the harbour of Port Colborne into a position to compete with its chief competitor, the port of Buffalo. My hon. friend from Welland declared that it would take a much larger sum to equip Port Maitland efficiently than it would to equip Port Colborne. The statements which have been made by Senator McCallum and others, and which have never been challenged in my hearing, are to the effect that a better harbour and as good an entrance to the Welland Canal can be procured from Port Maitland at a much smaller expenditure of money than from Port Colborne. And, Sir, if any exception has been taken to the government policy respecting the contemplated expenditures at Port Colborne, it has not been because there was a difference of opinion as to the wisdom of completing and improving the Welland Canal by giving it an outlet to or entrance from Lake Erie, but because there was an honest difference of opinion as to whether the government was selecting the right port on Lake Erie at which to make the terminal. In view of that fact—and I do not think it can be challenged—it was hardly in accord with the fitness of things, and with the proper conduct of this discussion, that my hon. friend from Welland should attack my absent colleague (Mr. Osler) and others, because they conscientiously differed from him as to whether it was wise or prudent that this expenditure should be made at Port Colborne or at some other port contiguous to it. I believe that the government are justified in making whatever expenditure may be found to be necessary to give the shippers who desire to do business through the Welland Canal the very best possible facilities for entering that canal at all seasons when navigation is open. After that canal has been deepened, and now that the St. Lawrence canals are practically deepened to fourteen feet also, it would be a very foolish policy not to provide a proper entrance to the Welland Canal from Lake Erie. The objection has been taken to the policy of the government—and I repeat it for the last time—because this House has not been placed in possession of the facts and of the information to enable it to determine intelligently whether Port Colborne is the best possible place at which to make an entrance to the Welland Canal. But, in making the very best case possible for the Welland Canal—and my hon. friend (Mr. McCleary) did so—he neglected to state one drawback that will always remain in connection with transportation from the head of the great lakes to the seaboard by that route, and that is the additional mileage which will have to be covered by vessels traversing the great lakes by way of the Welland Canal to Montreal or Quebec. The hon. gentlemen from Kent and North Simcoe have both pointed out what this difficulty is, and it might not be amiss to draw attention to it again, because if we can make out a case for the Toronto-Collingwood route—it being more than 300 miles shorter than the Welland Canal route—it will be as to whether transshipment can be made at Collingwood and at Toronto and a haul of seventy miles by rail made, as against a route over 300 miles longer by water and the tedious delay of getting through the Welland Canal from Port Colborne to Port Dalhousie after transshipment at Port Colborne. That is one of the strongest reasons that can be advanced in favour of the Toronto-Collingwood route, it being a safer route and a much shorter route than that by the Welland Canal. If we take the rail and water routes as at present used or in contemplation, we find that the distances from Fort William to Montreal are as follows :

	Miles.
Via Welland Canal, all water.....	1,296
“ Owen Sound (563 by water, 460 by rail).....	1,023
“ Midland (589 by water, 416 by rail).....	1,005
“ Collingwood-Toronto (920 by water, 74 by rail).....	994
“ North Bay (621 by water, 364 by rail)....	985
“ Parry Harbour (566 by water, 373 by rail)	939

So that there is a difference in favour of the Collingwood-Toronto route as against the Welland Canal route of 302 miles. This seems to me to be a sufficiently substantial difference in distance to justify the claims of the former route being presented to this House as one of the routes that ought to be adopted in connection with our national lines of transportation from the west to the east. In this connection, I might refer for a moment to a proposition which has been presented to this House, vaguely it is true, in favour of another line of communication, namely, that by means of the Ottawa River and Lake Nipissing, with the Georgian Bay. The demands or proposals which have been presented by the promoters of that route, are, to say the least, very modest. They ask, as I understand it, that the government of Canada shall guarantee the interest at 2½ per cent on $30,000,000 for twenty years. If I have figured out correctly what the present value of that guarantee is, it means that the government of Canada is asked to commit itself to an expenditure of no less than $11,747,598, which is the present value of an annuity of 2½ per cent for twenty years on $30,000,000. Suppose this route was completed, what would be the saving in distance, as compared with the route from Fort William, via Collingwood and Toronto, the expenditure to complete which would be a mere bagatelle in comparison with the liabilities which this country would have to assume if it undertook to finance the scheme of the Ottawa River and Lake Nipissing route? The distance from Fort William to Montreal by that route, is as follows: Fort William to North Bay, via French River and Lake Nipissing, 621 miles; North Bay to Montreal, 352 miles; total, 973 miles; whereas, as I have pointed out, the distance from Fort William, via the Collingwood-Toronto route to Montreal, is only 994 miles. There is a difference in favour of the North Bay-Ottawa route of 21 miles. A further difference is that there will be 74 miles of land carriage in the Toronto-Collingwood route. But, when it is taken into consideration that the navigation of the French River and the Ottawa River would necessitate a much slower rate of speed than the other route, it seems to me there can be no comparison, for many years to come at any rate, between the two. I hope that the prognostications and expectations of hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House will be realized, even sooner than they anticipate, and that not only the Welland Canal route, but the Toronto-Collingwood route, the Midland route, the Parry Harbour route, and the North Bay-Ottawa route will all be required to carry the enormously increasing volume of trade from the great western districts of this Dominion to the seaboard. But, in view of the vast expenditures which have been made by the people of Canada upon the Welland and St. Lawrence canals, I think it is at least premature to commit this country to an expenditure of eleven or twelve or fifteen million dollars to parallel the St. Lawrence canals by another system of canals 90 or 100 miles to the north, when we have not yet received the advantages of the vast expenditures which we incurred on the existing system. The deepened St. Lawrence canal system will not be available until some time during the coming summer, and I think that before giving any aid or encouragement to the Ottawa route, we should hold our hand until we see what increased amount of traffic will be taken down by the Welland and St. Lawrence canals to the seaboard, and also, until we give encouragement to the proposed route by Collingwood and Toronto. My hon. friend from North Simcoe, has pointed out that the distance between Collingwood and Toronto is only between 70 and 74 miles, and application will shortly be made to parliament for a Bill to incorporate a company to construct a railway between those points. I do not wish to anticipate the discussion of that matter, but I have this to say, that I think that railway should be controlled absolutely by the government, or, if it is not, the most stringent provisions should be inserted in the Act of incorporation to prevent the proposed company from amalgamating at any time with either of the existing railway systems. My hon. friend from Welland, referred sneeringly to the fact that we have one line of railway at present between Toronto and Collingwood, which ought to bring the traffic which seeks that route to the seaboard. As the hon. member for North Simcoe has pointed out, although we have that line of railway, there are no terminal facilities at Collingwood and no harbour of sufficient depth to accommodate the great freight vessels of the upper lakes. But there is this further difficulty in the way of making the present railway a grain-carrying road in the contemplated national line from Fort William to Montreal, that the Grand Trunk Railway Company have a competing point at Midland, and they are bending their energies to improving the line of communication between Midland and Belleville, and between Belleville and Montreal. It can not be anticipated, then, that the Grand Trunk Railway Company would endorse or extend its sympathy to a proposition for practically paralleling its present line between Collingwood and Toronto. Nor can it be assumed that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which has a competing line between Owen Sound and Toronto, would lend its aid or encouragement towards the completion of the proposed railway. If the government desire—in view of the advantage to our shippers of this shorter route—to assist and encourage the project, they should either undertake the construction and operation of the railway themselves; or, if they do not see their way clear to do that, they should at least insist on provision being made in the Act of incorporation of the company, that the company shall itself operate the road and maintain it independent of the influence of either the Grand Trunk Railway or the Canadian Pacific Railway.

I do not know that I should say much more on this matter, as the ground has been pretty well covered by the gentlemen who have preceded me. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals said, however, that he hoped that this matter would be discussed from a non-party standpoint, and I have already said that, so far as hon. members on this side of the House are concerned, I believe that policy has been followed. But if we on this side were to form our conclusions from the statements made during the course of this debate by some hon. gentlemen on the other side, we would conclude that no previous administration since 1867 even knew how to spell the word 'transportation,' and that we are indebted to hon. gentlemen opposite for having done more during the past two years towards the solution of the transportation problem than was done by their predecessors in many years previous. I deny that statement in toto. I admit that, so far as the present administration has accelerated the work on the St. Lawrence canals and caused it to be completed in shorter time than would have been the case under the old administration, they are entitled to credit; but in pushing those works to completion, they are only carrying out the policy enacted by their predecessors many years ago.

One hon. gentleman opposite did not confine his remarks to the subject of navigation between the lakes and the seaboard, but went on to congratulate the government on what he called its splendid achievement respecting the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. Surely our silence respecting a statement of that kind is not to be taken as an endorsement of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite? Not at all, for we certainly dissent from the hon. gentleman's statement.

The hon. member for West Elgin also spoke of the achievements of the government in the port of Montreal, and particularly of the bargain which had been made through the harbour commissioners of that city, with the Connors Syndicate. In everything that has been said regarding the necessity of making Montreal or Quebec the national port, or making both national ports, I entirely agree. I believe that they ought to be well equipped ports, though my own judgment is that Quebec is the natural port of the Dominion, and that in the very near future there will be a great revival of business in the ancient capital. In the meantime, however, I entirely approve of the policy of advancing the interests of shippers from the port of Montreal; but if we are to be guided by statements which have been made again and again in newspapers friendly to hon. gentlemen opposite, notably the Montreal Witness, we are forced to the conclusion that in the plans adopted by the government for the improvement of Montreal harbour, the public interest was not always the first consideration. Again and again I have seen articles in that paper,—and that paper cannot be classed with the yellow press, the names of which appear so frequently in the Auditor General's reports—referring to the course pursued by the present administration with respect to the improvements in Montreal harbour.

While I admit that the action of the Montreal harbour commissioners in giving their assent to the contract with the Connors Syndicate should cause us to give the proposition of that syndicate our most careful consideration, the fact that a syndicate of foreigners has been given the very choicest and best sites in the port of Montreal seems to me to be picayune policy, to say the least. I think the government can borrow the money to construct those elevators as cheaply as the Connors Syndicate, and I think it would be more consonant with the views prevailing at present as to the great future in store for Canada if the government had reserved the sites for the people of Canada and constructed elevators on those sites. I have not the slightest sympathy with any policy which would hand over any part of the harbour of Montreal to foreigners to do such an important work in connection with the transportation of merchandise.

I thought it was my duty not to allow the remarks respecting these particular phases of the government's transportation policy to pass unchallenged. I wish to add a word more to implement what has been said as to the wisdom of the government giving aid to the Toronto and Collingwood route. The hon. member for North Simcoe and the hon. member for Kent both referred to the fact that if we desire to encourage Canadian marine interests, if we desire to increase the tonnage of Canadian vessels operating on the great lakes, we should give our sympathy and support to the proposition to establish this all-Canadian route from Fort William to Montreal or Quebec. One of the drawbacks to the Welland Canal route has been the difficulty of getting return freights, and that has been discussed by my hon. friend from Kent. But in view of the steadily increasing volume of trade between the cities of Quebec and Montreal in the east, and the city of Toronto in the west, and in view of the great possibilities for trade between the maritime provinces and Montreal, we should encourage, as one of the national routes for the Dominion, that route which would enable us to put more freight carriers on the lakes, not only between Fort William, Collingwood and Meaford, but also between Toronto and Montreal or Quebec. If a line of freight carriers were established between Toronto and the cities of Montreal and Quebec, it would have a very wholesome influence on freight rates, in the summer at least; and I am satisfied that a line of vessels regularly plying between these cities would be very much more likely to get return cargoes than if plying at odd intervals between Montreal and any port on Lake Erie. If the interests of Toronto are not to be side-tracked by the adoption of any policy inimical to it, the government ought not to look any longer sideways on the proposition presented again and again to the hon. Minister of Public Works by the board of trade of Toronto, and before this session closes we should have an announcement of the determination of the government to assist in the establishment of this new through route, because it will be an additional feeder for the promotion of interprovincial trade. It will give us another line of competition against the railways; it will enhance the value of the products of the west and cheapen to the consumers in the west the output of the east. I think that the attention of the government should be called to the advantages of this route; and I am satisfied that if the government are not actuated by political animus against the city of Toronto, the claim of the city is so reasonable and the advantages of the route so apparent, that the policy of aiding it will be adopted by the government, and in the very near future that route will be established.

I was very pleased to hear the speech of my hon. friend from Kent in advocacy of this route. I was very pleased to hear him point out the advantages which would obtain, not only to Toronto, but to the whole province, from its adoption, and I must say that statement to-night gives an emphatic contradiction to the one which he was alleged to have made at the annual meeting of the Reform Association of Toronto, namely, that the policy of the rural Liberal members from the province of Ontario might be summed up in the words that the city of Toronto should be allowed to stew in its own juice.

Mr. CAMPBELL. You know better than that.

Mr. CLARKE. I do not.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Well, I deny it now.

Mr. CLARKE. And further, the hon. gentleman is alleged to have made a suggestion to the members of the Reform Association at their annual meeting that it would be a good thing for them, if they desired to see this Toronto-Collingwood route carried out, to send members from the city to support the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. We are willing, on this side, to support every feature of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite that commends itself to our judgment, but we should hesitate even to do that if we thought these hon. gentlemen were actuated by any desire to persecute the city of Toronto and deprive it of the advantages which undoubtedly would accrue from the establishment of this route, because the free and independent electors of the city did not deem it prudent on their part to give a pliant support to the government.

I must apologize for having taken up so much time; but in view of the admirable addresses which have been made on the Toronto-Collingwood route, I desired to be heard also and to urge that this matter should receive the attention of the government; because I believe that the more it is looked into by them, the more it will commend itself to their judgment.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.35 p.m.

EXEMPTION OF C.P.R. LAND GRANT FROM TAXATION.

Mr. RICHARDSON asked :

Under the terms of the contract between the government and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway does the clause relating to exemption of the land grant from taxation apply to lands granted in the province of Manitoba, or only to lands granted in the North-west Territories?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The only information I can give to my hon. friend (Mr. Richardson), is to quote from the section of the statute which applies to the subject. Section 16, of the schedule to Canadian Pacific Railway Company Act, reads as follows :

Mr. FIELDING.

The Canadian Pacific Railway, and all stations and station grounds, workshops, buildings, yards and other property rolling-stock and appurtenances required and used for the construction and working thereof, and the capital stock of the company, shall be for ever free from taxation by the Dominion or by any province hereafter to be established, or by any municipal corporation therein ; and the lands of the company in the North-west Territories, until they are either sold or occupied, shall also be free from such taxation for twenty years after the grant thereof from the Crown.

PURCHASE OF STEEL RAILS BY THE DEPARTMENT OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS.

Mr. McINERNEY asked :

How many tons of steel rails were purchased by and delivered to the Department of Railways in 1897, 1898 and 1899, respectively, from what parties, and at what prices?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Only four or five days ago, I furnished the House, in the form of a return, with all the information that the hon. gentleman (Mr. McInerney) is asking for here.

Mr. SPEAKER. Dropped.

VANCOUVER DRILL HALL

Mr. PRIOR (by Mr. Earle) asked :

1. How much of the sum already voted for the erection of a drill hall at Vancouver had been expended up to the end of February last?
2. Is the work being carried on at the present time with all due diligence and despatch?
3. If not, why not?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. $3,967.60. In reply to the second and third questions, the department understands that it is not practicable to conduct certain classes of building operations in the winter, and assumes that the work on the Vancouver drill shed is, for this reason, standing over until the spring opens, when it is expected to be proceeded with with all proper despatch. The contractors have until the 30th November, 1900, to complete the building, and there should be no difficulty in its being finished within that time.

ST. LAWRENCE CANALS—SUSPENDED OR CANCELLED CONTRACTS.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

What contracts existent July 1, 1896, on the St. Lawrence canals system were either suspended or cancelled, and replaced by new contracts entered into thereafter, and for what amounts respectively?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The contracts existent 1st July, 1896, on the St. Lawrence canals system, which were suspended or cancelled, and replaced by new contracts, are: Archibald Stewart, sections 1 and 2, Soulanges Canal; George Goodwin, sections 4, 5, 6 and 7, Soulanges Canal; George Goodwin, section 12, Soulanges Canal. The contracts were all under schedule prices.

EXTENSION OF INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY TO MONTREAL.

Mr. MONK (by Mr. Dugas) asked:

1. Has the Grand Trunk Railway Company made any claim upon the government, by reason of the improvement of the terminal facilities afforded the Intercolonial Railway at Montreal, or for any other causes arising from the contract between the government of Canada and the said Grand Trunk Railway, in connection with the extension of the Intercolonial to Montreal?

2. What is the total amount of said claim or claims?

3. Has any sum been paid by the government on said claims, and what amounts have been paid, if any?

4. Has the Grand Trunk Company made any claim upon or obtained any money from the government on account of the acquisition by the said Grand Trunk Company of blocks of property in the vicinity of the Bonaventure station at Montreal?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. No, the Grand Trunk Railway Company has not made any claim upon the government by reason of the improvement of the terminal facilities afforded the Intercolonial Railway at Montreal, or for any other causes arising from the contract between the government of Canada and the said Grand Trunk Railway, in connection with the extension to Montreal. 2. Answered by first answer. 3. No. 4. No.

USE OF PRIVATE CARS.

Mr. PETTET asked:

1. Does the government permit one of its employees, Mr. C. Schreiber, a civil servant in the Department of Railways, to use the private cars, the property of the people of Canada, for the purpose of pleasure excursions for his family friends?

2. Was this done within the last two weeks?

3. At whose expense was the car on this occasion (if any) provisioned and maintained?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. Mr. Schreiber, as deputy minister and chief engineer of Canadian government railways, is entitled—as similar officers on all other railways are entitled—to the use of an official car, on the line, when one is available; and the other railway companies, on their lines, extend the courtesy of free transportation to the deputy minister and chief engineer of Canadian government railways and his wife, including same in general terms of car and party. 2. Yes, within two weeks the wife of the deputy minister and chief engineer with some friends went to Halifax and return, using an official car. 3. No expenses whatever in connection with this visit were paid by the government.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY PASSES TO JUDGES.

Mr. ANGERS (by Mr. Legris) asked:

1. Whether the Minister of Railways and Canals has, within the past twenty-four months, granted free passes on the Intercolonial Railway to the judges of the several courts of civil and criminal jurisdiction of the Dominion?

2. If so, how many such passes were granted; to whom, and when?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. The Department of Railways and Canals, for a number of years has granted free passes to two former Deputy Ministers of Justice and solicitors of the government railways, who are now judges, and one to an officer in charge of the Provincial Police of Quebec, who is a judge. That system has been in operation for a great many years. 2. Three such passes were granted within the last 24 months, as follows: Mr. Justice Burbidge, a former Deputy Minister of Justice and solicitor of Canadian government railways, in 1899; Mr. Justice Sedgewick, a former Deputy Minister of Justice and solicitor of Canadian government railways in 1899 and 1900, and the Hon. A. Chauveau, in charge of the Provincial Police of Quebec, in 1899 and 1900.

LIQUOR LICENSE ACT, 1883.

Mr. McMULLEN asked:

1. When did the Liquor License Act of 1883 go into force?

2. Who were the commissioners in the province of Ontario?

3. How much was paid to each of them?

4. What was the total amount paid out by the government for salaries, costs, expenses and disbursements of all kinds in connection with this Act?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). The answer to the first question is that the Liquor License Act under the provisions of the last section thereof, came into operation on the 1st of January, 1884, but licenses issued under it only became operative from the 1st of May following. As to the second part of the question, I have here a list of names, and if the House requires me to read it I will do so, but I may state that there are 174 names.

Mr. FOSTER. It could not go on the minutes at all.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I would certainly not have asked the officers in my department to prepare this record in answer to the question, had I known it would have taken two or three days to do so. I was going to ask the leave of the House to put it into the shape of a return.

Mr. FOSTER. That is the better way.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question is dropped.

UTTERANCES OF HON. CLIFFORD SIFTON.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

Whether the attention of the government has been called to the following utterances of the Hon. Clifford Sifton in Brandon on March 2: 'He knew there were difficulties. Manitobans were not satisfied with what had been done on the tariff. They had not, however, looked at the question from a Dominion standpoint. A deputation had come to Ottawa representing millions of dollars and thousands of people and more power to affect constituencies than was to be found in the whole of Manitoba. They said to Sir Wilfrid Laurier: If in twelve months your government does not do us justice and protect us by putting a duty on lumber, we will support Sir Charles Tupper. He had been called in and was obliged to state to his leader that when such legislation was passed he might as well get his resignation ready. He was the only member of the cabinet who cared a straw to keep the lumber free. He was the only member who would not be benefited if lumber duties were replaced.'

Whether, insaying 'he was the only member of the cabinet who cared a straw to keep lumber free,' he correctly represented the attitude of the Prime Minister and the overwhelming majority of his colleagues?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The attention of the government has not been called to the reported utterances of Mr. Sifton.

INQUIRY—Re J. PERRAULT.

Mr. MILLS (by Mr. Taylor) asked :

Is the account set forth in 'Hansard' of March 21, 1900, and forming part of Question No. 20 on the Order paper of that day, a true account of the expense to Canada with reference to the Centennial Exhibition, held in the city of Philadelphia in 1876?

Is the J. Perrault whose name appears in said account, and J. X. Perrault, lately appointed on the staff of the Hon. J. Israel Tarte, Minister of Public Works, in connection with the Paris Exhibition, one and the same individual?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). 1. The account as set forth in Hansard of March 21, 1900, and forming part of question No. 20 on the Order paper of that day is identical with the account as set forth in the Hansard of June 17, 1895, pages 2735 to 2754 inclusive. I cannot state positively at the present time that this is a true account of the expenses to Canada with reference to the Centennial Exhibition, but have no doubt that it is. The turning up of the old ledgers and careful checking of the different items of the account would take a long time and cause a great deal of work. 2. Mr. J. X. Perrault, presumably the Mr. Joseph Perrault whose name appears in that account, is one of the four commissioners for the Paris Exhibition of 1900.

Mr. SPEAKER.

RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE—NOVA SCOTIA.

Mr. BELL (Pictou) asked :

1. Has a superintendent of the railway mail service in Nova Scotia been appointed?
2. If so, who has been appointed?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. No. 2. Answered by No. 1.

BRITISH COLUMBIA HYDROGRAPHICAL SURVEY.

Mr. PRIOR (by Mr. Earle) asked :

1. Has the attention of the government been called to the numerous wrecks that have occurred on the coast of British Columbia during the last three years, including the total wreck of the ss. 'Miami,' with 3,000 tons of coal on board, on White Rock, Trincomali Channel?
2. Is it the intention of the government to have a thorough survey of the coast made by competent hydrographical engineers?
3. If not, why not?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Yes. Attention has been called to the fact that there have been a number of such wrecks, including that of the Miami. 2. Not in the immediate present. 3. Principally because hydrographic surveys of the ocean coasts have heretofore been made by the Imperial government, and the Royal Navy surveying ship Egeria has for the past two seasons been employed on the coast of British Columbia; and it is understood that she will continue work on that coast indefinitely. This department has made and is continually making small surveys of harbours and isolated rocks, and the results of these surveys have been embodied in the Admiralty charts. Good charts already exist of the localities where wrecks have lately occurred, and the wrecks have been in no way caused by defective surveys. This is emphatically the case with regard to the wreck of the Miami. The Nanaimo pilotage authorities, without proper inquiry, attributed the wreck to a defective chart. Captain Smyth of the Egeria, located the wreck, and found the ship had run on a well-known danger which was shown on the chart. In consequence of the very rough nature of the British Columbia coast, new dangers are constantly being discovered, but it is extremely improbable that the closest hydrographic survey would locate many of these dangers. The establishment of a hydrographic survey by the Dominion in British Columbia waters would involve the purchase of a steamer at a cost of at least $120,000, and an annual outlay of not less than $30,000.

FRASER RIVER IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. PRIOR (by Mr. Earle) asked :

1. What sums have been expended on the Fraser River, B.C., (a) for surveys, (b) for improvements during the years 1890 to 1899, inclusive?

2. How much has been expended in cutting a channel through 'Sumas Bar' on the Fraser River, near Chilliwack, up to the present time?

3. What was the necessity for such expenditure?

4. What success, if any, has attended the operation?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. Expenditure during the ten years ended 30th June, 1899: Hydrographic survey, $36,573.29; improvement of channel, $261,981.20; total, $298,554.49. 2. The cost of cutting the channel through Sumas Bar was $7,420.71, and is included in the above item of improvements of channel. 3. To restore the main channel of the river to its former position, thereby preventing further encroachment of the river on valuable property through erosion at Miller's Landing. 4. Work has proved satisfactory for expenditure incurred; additional dredging is required to obtain the result looked for.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL MARKHAM,
8th HUSSARS, NEW BRUNSWICK.

Mr. DOMVILLE asked:

1. Is the government aware that Lieut.-Colonel Markham, late 8th Hussars, received a cheque from the Militia Department in September, 1898, allowance for care of arms of the regiment, due June 30, 1898, for the year 1897-8?

2. If so, what was the amount of the cheque?

3. Is the government aware that this allowance was due to Major F. V. Wedderburn, 8th Hussars, he being the regimental storekeeper, duly appointed regimentally, and confirmed by authority from the department at Ottawa, and should have been paid over to him by Lieut.-Colonel Markham, then acting as commanding officer, immediately on receipt of it?

4. Is the government aware that the said cheque has never been paid over to Major Wedderburn, and that he is claiming from the Militia Department this allowance due to him?

5. Has the government received any official communications from the late officer commanding relating to the wrongful retention of the cheque in question by Lieut.-Colonel Markham?

6. Has Lieut.-Colonel Markham been called upon by the general officer commanding or the Department of Militia and Defence, to explain his reasons for illegally retaining this money, which does not belong to him, and keeping Major Wedderburn out of possession of it?

7. If so, what reply has Lieut.-Colonel Markham given for the wrongful detention of the cheque for the care of arms?

8. Does the government propose to take steps to compel Lieut.-Colonel Markham to refund the cheque illegally held by him; if so, what steps will be taken?

9. Is the government aware that the rent of the armoury at Hampton is unpaid and legal proceedings threatened?

Mr. SPEAKER. I wish to draw the attention of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Domville) to the details of this question. We occasionally have had a question raised with reference to aspersions or suggestions being made respecting individuals, and I draw the attention of the hon. member (Mr. Domville) to the fifth question where the word 'wrongful' retention of the cheque is used. It is only fair to the other party that the word 'wrongful' should be stricken out. So, in the sixth question the word 'illegally' should be stricken out, and in the seventh question the word 'wrongful,' and in the eighth question the word 'illegally' again appears. These words should be stricken out of the question.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). In the sixth question the words 'which does not belong to him' should also go out.

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR. Out goes the whole question.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question can be put as amended.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The answer to the question is as follows: 1. Yes. 2. $240. 3. The department is aware from the correspondence which has taken place that Major F. V. Wedderburn claims the amount for storage of arms, but the arrangement made between the officer commanding the regiment and Major Wedderburn is one with which this department has nothing to do. 4. It would appear so from a letter addressed by Lt.-Col. Domville, late Commanding Officer 8th Hussars, to the Deputy Minister of Militia, dated 2nd December last. 5. Yes. 6. Lt.-Col. Markham has been called upon to account for the way the allowances paid to him have been expended. 7. Lt.-Col. Markham states that allowances having been paid to him under authority of Regulations and Orders, as officer commanding the regiment, he was charged with the due application of such allowances, and that his being called upon for a statement showing how the money has been expended 'is a reflection on me as an officer, and I cannot comply with the request.' 8. Under consideration. 9. It would appear so from the letter from Lt.-Col. Domville, already referred to, dated 2nd December last.

DEFICITS, SURPLUSES AND SUBSIDIES.

On the question (Mr. Dechene).

1. What was the amount of the deficits of the late Dominion government for the years 1892, 1893, 1894, 1895 and 1896?

2. What was the amount of railway subsidies promised in 1896, and if greater than in the preceding years, by how much?

3. What is the amount of subsidy voted by the late government for the Quebec bridge from 1892 to 1897?

4. What is the amount of the deficits of the present government for 1896, 1897, 1898 and 1899?

5. What is the amount of the surplus, year by year, for 1897, 1898 and 1899?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I would ask that this question be allowed to stand.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If I am not out of order, I would like to call the attention of the Prime Minister again to the similarity of this question to questions asked by hon. gentlemen opposed to the government, which, when asked, have been answered by the Prime Minister saying, 'You must move for a return.'

The PRIME MINISTER. Order.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I know I am out of order, but I thought—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Well, Mr. Speaker, if hon. gentlemen desire it, I can put myself in order very quickly. I do not want to do that; but I want to call the attention of the Prime Minister and the government to this, and to say that both sides of the House should have equal treatment.

The PRIME MINISTER. I think the hon. gentleman will find that answers were given to questions of that kind put by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain); and his remarks do not apply to this question. Very lengthy answers were given to some questions put by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Question allowed to stand.

REMUNERATION OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. ROSAMOND asked :

1. Has the Postmaster General, in view of the reduced rates of postage, taken into his consideration the reduced remuneration received by postmasters who are paid by a percentage on receipts?

2. If so, will he take steps to increase that remuneration?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). I understand this to be a question asking whether the government intend to increase the salaries of postmasters. It seems to imply that there has been a reduction in the salaries of postmasters in consequence of the reduction in the rate of postage and a consequent reduction in the general revenue of post offices. If that is the meaning of the question, I have to say that instructions were given about the time of the reduction of postage that in no case was that reduction to be followed by a reduction of the salaries of postmasters, and I am not aware of any case in which a reduction of the salary of a postmaster has been made in consequence of the reduction of the rate.

Mr. ROSAMOND. Would the minister kindly answer whether he proposes to increase the remuneration of postmasters as it is at present?

Mr. BORDEN (King's).

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. That question has not been before me, and I have not been considering it.

Mr. WALLACE. How about a new post office?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE—THE LATE ALFRED BROWNE.

Mr. GILLIES asked :

1. Was the late Alfred Browne in the employ of the government as a superintendent of the railway mail service? If so, what was his salary?

2. Has any person been appointed to fill the position made vacant by the death of Mr. Browne?

3. If so, who is the person appointed? When was he appointed, and what is his salary?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock 1. Yes; $1,500. 2. No. 3. The third question is answered by the answer to the second.

ASSISTED IMMIGRANTS.

Mr. MORIN asked :

What is the number of immigrants from Europe brought into Canada, at the expense of the Canadian government, for each of the years 1897, 1898 and 1899?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The government has not adopted or acted upon a policy of assisting immigration. There is no expense except the general expense of the immigration department. Every hon. member knows about what that would be.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding :

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising a Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Mr. Speaker, I must frankly and candidly admit that when two nights ago I pledged myself to the House that I would read and analyse the speech of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), I did not at the moment quite understand what a task I had set myself to. It is one thing to listen to a speech even of that duration, with a friend on the right hand and a friend on the left, with whom you can take counsel, and with a reasonable interval allowed for refreshments, and quite another thing to sit down and wade through it in cold blood. Nevertheless, Sir, plighted words must be redeemed, and I trust that it will be accounted to me for righteousness that having pledged my word to do it I have done it. Sir, it was a remark of King Solomon's, 'Oh, that mine enemy had written a book,' but, Mr. Speaker, if the book which King Solomon had in his eye was half as prosy as the speech of my hon. friend, I take leave to think that that wise king's exultation would have been greatly damped, or he would have added a rider to the proverb: 'Oh, that mine enemy had written a book, and that mine other enemies had to read it.' Sir, I have the speech here 'in extenso,' five and fifty pages of Hansard without one stop. Five and fifty pages of our Hansard have I waded through, and I give the House my word that I have been unable to discover five new ideas in those five and fifty pages.

Sir, I have looked in vain over the speech, for anything like a clear declaration of his policy. I have looked in vain for anything like a declaration of the scheme of reduction of taxation which he would recommend us to adopt. I look in vain for any fruitful suggestions, and I hope he will not take it amiss, if I say, that, so far as I could judge, the speech was made up in about equal parts, one half of scrap-book, and one half of snarling platitudes, peppered and salted, I will admit, with a great variety of tabulated mis-statements, and also certain gross blunders, which go rather far to justify the statement I have made on former occasions, that my hon. friend, quick and smart as he undoubtedly is, is one of those pretenders who have very little real knowledge of the subjects they discuss.

Now, I want to put in all sincerity, one or two questions to my hon. friend. What does he mean by it all? What does he hope to get by it? And, Sir, I think I must ask my hon. friend, where does he expect to go to, if it be true, that for every idle word a man speaks, he must render a strict account hereafter?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman is touching a burning question just now.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. And, what an awful prospect yawns before my hon. friend, unless my other hon. friend here (Mr. Charlton), carries his point and Hansard is abolished.

Mr. CHARLTON. I did not propose any such policy.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I beg my hon. friend's pardon, I thought that was his suggestion. Now, Sir, I would like to ask the hon. gentleman does he hope to impress the public by such a speech as he has lately delivered. Sir, I take the liberty of telling him that the people of Canada, in mass, and at large, do not care a decimal point, one, or for the matter of that, two, for all the tabulated statements which he put together. What the people of Canada do like, and do want to hear, are such broad facts as we heard from another quarter a few nights before. They like to hear that we have a surplus of $7,500,000; they like to hear of a probable total growth of exports and imports, a probable total growth of trade, of $150,000,000 in three years. They like to know that our growth of trade in three years, equals, if it does not exceed, the growth in the preceding 30 years. They like to know that we are able to borrow money at 2½ per cent, and that our securities, at long and last, are rated, for purposes of investment, by English trustees, on a par with English consuls. And, lastly, they like to know—although it is not a good Christian feeling, I dare say—that when English goods imported into this country have to pay $2, Yankee goods have to pay $3, and, furthermore, the Canadian consumer is benefited by the operation. These are the facts the people like to hear. And, as for my hon. friend's further points, as for his policy of pinpricks, his picayune criticisms and quibbling, all I can say is that I do not believe they will affect one vote, except adversely to himself, in the event, which I deem very unlikely, of any of his constituents perusing his speech of their own proper will and motion.

I observe that the hon. gentleman's friends in the press, took some considerable umbrage, the other day, because I ventured to quote to his disparagement, certain lines of the poet Tennyson. Perhaps a change of air would do the hon. gentleman good. He objects to Tennyson, let us try Pope. I have been looking at the hon. gentleman's speech and using my poor faculties in the endeavour to comprehend what it all meant, and I advise him, if he is not satisfied with Tennyson, to try the advice given by Pope 150 years ago, to the critics of his day:

The critic Eye, that microscope of wit,
Sees hairs and pores, examines bit by bit,
How parts relate to parts, or they to whole,
What forms the features, what inspires the soul,
Are things which York's small delegate shall see
When man's whole frame is obvious to a flea.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Encore.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I will send hon. gentlemen the lines, and others like them by-and-by.

Before I proceed to discuss a little more minutely, the hon. gentleman's speech, I desire to say to the House and the country, that I challenge, I think, without exception, all his calculations and comparisons of expenditure as being grossly unfair, and I do it for these four excellent reasons. In the first place, because I contend that the hon. gentleman, for reasons which I have stated, and which I might amplify to a very great extent, is utterly unjust and unfair in selecting the expenditure for 1896, as being a fair and reasonable one wherewith to make his comparisons. I am willing to take that hon. gentleman's actual expenditure in the year 1895, and compare it with our actual expenditure in the year which has just passed. I am willing to take his estimated expenditure—the main estimates alone, remember—for the year 1897, and compare it with our estimated expenditure for the year 1901, but I do say, in view of the facts I have stated, in view of the fact that the public service was starved and stinted, in view of the fact that the loss of millions was, by his untimely parsimony, inflicted on the public, it is utterly unfair and unreasonable to take the year 1896 as a fair standard of comparison. I object to his calculations, because the hon. gentleman has no right whatever to do as he has done, club together the capital expenditure and ordinary expenditure, and draw comparisons between the total of these in the one year and the other. Any man who knows anything of business, knows that the capital expenditure of one year may for very good reasons be $8,000,000 or $10,000,000, or $12,000,000, while, in another year, it may be $1,000,000 or $2,000,000, or per-venture, nothing at all. Under such circumstances, to make a comparison on such a basis, between one year and another is, on the face of it, manifestly and grossly absurd. Suppose, for instance, we were to carry out one of those projects which are now floating in the air. Supposing we were to spend $10,000,000, let us say, in the purchase of a telegraph system, and from the operation derive a net profit of, say, $1,000,000 a year, according to the hon. gentleman's mode of calculation, the country would be $2 per head per annum, for that single year, worse off than in a year in which we had made no such profitable transaction at all.

The fact is you can make no honest comparison, no fair comparison, between one year and another, if you add capital and ordinary expenditure together. Take this very case in point. We come in and find the late government dawdling along with the construction of our canals, taking ten years to build what ought to have been done in five. My hon. friend opposite puts his hand to the plough, and does in three years what it would have taken his predecessors, according to past experience, thirteen years to do, or at least six or seven years. Yet, because he completes the canals and spends a few millions more a year than they did, therefore, forsooth, the charges on the country are to be calculated as ever so much higher in the years when my hon. friend completed the canals, than in the other years when hon. gentlemen opposite were dawdling over the job. Then, Sir, there is a third matter; not of so much importance after all, because I find that the difference between us would only amount to perhaps 100,000 or 125,000 souls—but I take leave to state that I wholly and entirely dispute the estimates of population which the hon. gentleman made. However, as that is a point I intend to go into this at greater length at a later stage, I shall say nothing further now except that I entirely dispute the figures which he gave. And, lastly, Sir, and most of all, I dispute the accuracy of his calculations; I dispute their fairness; I dispute their honesty, because all through he has most steadily and carefully avoided taking into consideration any of the new services which did not exist in his time, and on which many millions have been expended. Let him show me, if he can, from the first page of his speech to page 55, a single acknowledgment of the fact that in these increased expenditures was included the expenditure of more than a million and a half for the Yukon, was included the expenditure of half a million at least for increased services on railways and canals, was included about half a million for sinking fund, was included a considerable sum for interest. Interest, how accruing? In carrying out obligations which these gentlemen had incurred, and left behind them and not discharged. Bear in mind, these expenditures involve not one penny of loss to the people of Canada, except in the case of interest alone, for my hon. friend (Mr. Blair) puts into the treasury a dollar for every hundred cents he takes out for expenditure on railways, in the expenditure on the Yukon there is a surplus, and the sinking fund is a mere cross entry. But the hon. gentleman wholly refuses to allow for these; he will charge everything to our debit, but will not place a cent to our credit. Sir, I go a little further; I state distinctly here, that, striking out these particular special services of which I spoke and for which there is no corresponding entry in the year 1895, the cost is not a bit greater than it was in his time; and, that, having reference to any per capita calculation he likes to make, service for service, we are governing the country for less than he and his friends governed it. Moreover, Sir, I challenge entirely his averages and his percentages as they are applied to tariff matters. Had the hon. gentleman thought on the question for a moment, or if any hon. gentleman chooses to think on the question for one moment, he will see that necessarily and obviously, from the very nature of the case, you can make no possible fair comparison between a tariff which was avowedly protective and a tariff which we intend, at any rate, to make a tariff for revenue purposes. Just in proportion as any tariff is protective, so far that tariff is prohibitive; and, as Canada's protective tariff excluded a great quantity of goods, you can make no comparison whatever between it and a revenue tariff whose object is to admit at a reasonable rate all the goods the country may happen to require. Why, Sir, if I chose, I venture to say, I could draw a tariff, with a few strokes of my pen, under which, while it would be protective to the highest possible degree, I would have a very much lower average of duties on the goods I did admit into the country than under an ordinary revenue tariff. The thing is easily done—put a very moderate duty on the goods you choose to admit, and put an absolutely prohibitive duty on the goods you wish to exclude; and the result will be that your protective tariff will levy a very low rate of duty, nominally on dutiable goods. Yet, the hon. gentleman, ignoring these facts, which every tyro in political economy should be familiar with, gets up and gives us page after page of what I have rightly called his mis-statements of averages and percentages. And yet, he has the audacity to lecture me because I do not think much of such averages or percentages.

More than that, Sir, on two or three important matters I entirely challenge the accuracy of the hon. gentleman's statement per se; and I repeat and I purpose to show that, while the hon. gentleman is a clever debater, while he can speak well enough within the four corners of his brief, he does not possess in reality any true and proper knowledge of the subject he has been discussing. A good deal has been said by my hon. friends opposite which, I think, might have been spared, about certain proceedings of my own in the way of using what I believe to be my fair, legal right to distribute useful literature to the people of this country through the post office. Now, I am going to make a sporting offer to the hon. gentleman—

Mr. FOSTER. Easy, easy!

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Do not be afraid; there is nothing illegal about it. My proposition is this, and I am going to ask my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) if he will consent, if he will promise and his friends will promise to carry out the bargain fairly—instead of his sending out a hundred tons, and I sending out a hundred tons, peradventure, that we combine them both together, his speech and my answer, and make a bargain that neither party will send to any constituent in Canada one speech without the other. And, further, for fair-play's sake, we will include the excellent budget speech of my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) beside me.

Mr. FOSTER. Is my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) sincere in his offer to put my speech along side his and frank them both to the five or six hundred thousand electors?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Perfectly sincere.

Mr. FOSTER. All right; I will have mine ready.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. But on one condition—the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) and his friends must agree to have them printed together, and that no separate copies must be sent.

Now, Sir, I have here under my hand the, what shall I call it?—the ipsissima verba, or the corpus delicti?—here, Sir, are the five and fifty pages, duly strung together, of the hon. gentleman's speech. I am sorry to say that the first sentence that strikes my eye is one that I cannot at all accept. Speaking of my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) beside me and his speech, he said:

Any clerk in a very short time, could have compiled the figures that he used; but any clerk should be drummed summarily out of the service, who would make as disingenuous a use of those statistics as, I am bound to say, my hon. friend made.

And he proceeds to say, Sir:

As I said before, it would rather seem to be a simple collation of statistics, the disjecta membra of which, if I may be allowed the use of a Latin term, seemed to have been promiscuously sown wherever it was thought an appeal might be made, ad captandum, to people who have not had the opportunities of looking into and so have not the power of discerning what are really the facts of the case as bearing on the question under discussion.

Sir, I am an older member of parliament than the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster). I do not know but that I might, if I felt so disposed, so far as Ontario and Quebec are concerned, I might not to-day claim to be the father of this House. It has been my fortune, for nearly forty years to have crossed swords on budget questions, with, I may fairly say, the ablest men that all Canada could produce. I have made a good many budget speeches; I have answered a good many budgets—and I did not take four days to do it either. Sir, I think I may put in a claim, with some degree of reason, to be a tolerably fair judge of what a budget speech should be. And I think the House will acquit me of being, in a general way, disposed to indulge in indiscriminate gush over friend or foe—rather the other way about, perhaps. Now, Sir, what I want to say, speaking as a critic, and not as a colleague, is this. I say it gravely and without heat, I say that the speech which the hon. gentleman speaks of so slightly, the speech which was delivered on Friday last by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), was an admirable budget speech. I say that it was a lucid, well arranged speech, no longer than a budget speech ought fairly to be. I say more, that it was a speech which everybody who read it could understand. The wayfaring man though a fool would not err therein, whatever the members on the other side of you, Mr. Speaker, might do. Sir, the speech was a modest speech, an effective speech, and an eloquent speech, a speech that has done good service to Canada in Canada, and, as I shall show before I sit down, a speech that has done good service to Canada outside of Canada. I will add that it was a speech which forms an admirable contrast to the speech with which the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), thought fit to answer it. Sir, I say those remarks of his were in bad taste, were bad tactics; and I will do the hon. gentleman who sits beside him, and who leads the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), the justice to say that he at least would never have committed such a mistake.

Now, passing on over a page or two of platitudes with which I will not trouble the House, I come to a sentence, which for certain reasons, I want to call to the attention of the House. The hon. gentleman says:

Hon. gentlemen smile as I recount these things. Why? Because they believe there is no longer necessity for truth and honour in the public men of this country, because they believe that the electorate is as debauched, as utterly to be contemned, as utterly to be despised, as the contempt and despising that they have put upon their promises solemnly made and repeated before the people.

Rather a nasty insinuation, and I would like very much to know what Sir Mackenzie Bowell would have to say about it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will come to the hon. gentleman's statement of expenditure. He refers to his expenditure on consolidated fund account for 1892, 1893, 1894, 1895 and 1896. Then he takes up our expenditure for 1897, 1898 and 1899, and he draws this inference: See how much more these hon. gentlemen spent than I did. Sir, I say that is distinctly a dishonest inference. He knew when he made that statement, that a large amount of extra expenditure was for services for which he was not called upon to provide a dollar. He knew that those services were performed for the most part without costing the people of Canada one cent. He calls attention to the difference, and although he does not dare say so, he obviously leaves it to be inferred, as any hon. member will see, on reading his speech, that a very heavy extra charge had been laid upon the people, for which they had to be heavily taxed over and above the taxes which he had laid upon them. However, as I have got a good deal to say on that head, I will do no more at this moment than merely to call attention to the fact.

I proceed to review a certain little dodge of the hon. gentleman with respect to the expenditure for 1896. Now, you will have observed, no doubt, that the public documents and blue-books are sacred things in the hon. gentleman's eyes, when he can make of them a point to help him; but if the public accounts do not happen to suit his purpose, the hon. gentleman treats them with superb disdain. He puts down his total expenditure, for all purposes, for 1896, at $41,702,833. The public accounts put down the expenditure at $44,000,000 odd, and he waxes wrath and he waxes eloquent. Why? Because my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, in the exercise of his clear duty on coming into office, finding that this hon. gentleman and his friends had, for many years, neglected to charge up to public debt a considerable sum of money which they ought to have charged up, rectified the error and made the account what it ought to have been. Well, Sir, it may have been inconvenient for the hon. gentleman to have rectified it in 1896, but whose fault was it. He had half a dozen years, if my memory serves me, to have straightened this matter out, he neglected to do his duty, and my hon. friend did it, and now the hon. gentleman has the superlative audacity to accuse my hon. friend of playing a trick upon him, because he did his duty, and charged up that item which ought long ago to have been charged to public accounts.

Mr. FOSTER. With the permission of the hon. gentleman, I would like to ask him one question. Was that $2,394,000 which is charged in 1896, and included in the expenditure for railway subsidies, and helps to swell the total, paid in 1896?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. It does not matter one straw, whether it was paid or not. The charge as a charge against the public, is properly capitalized at the amount of the interest, which is charged against the annual charges of Canada.

Mr. FOSTER. Will he answer another question? Have you yet paid the principal, or are you not yet paying it in simple interest at 5 per cent to the Québec government?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. It is a matter of no earthly consequence. If it be a perpetual annuity for which $111,000 per year is paid, the burden on the people of Canada is equally the same; and my hon. friend was perfectly right in capitalizing it and treating it as he did, and charging it to the hon. gentleman; so that at a later period he might not find our debt swollen by the negligence of his predecessor in not making the entry that he ought to have done.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not like to bother my hon. friend, but I would like to ask him—

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I quite understand his point, and he understands mine. I say that he ought to have charged that money four or five years ago, and he did not, and he is not entitled to make such a charge against my hon. friend beside me.

Mr. FOSTER. There is a further question I would like to ask.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I consent, let him go on.

Mr. FOSTER. Would my hon. friend think it right, if there was to be a bookkeeping entry, that the sum which has been capitalized and charged should, in the arrangement, have been charged to the year when the obligation was incurred, namely, in 1882 ?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I think it would have been right for my hon. friend's predecessor to have done that, I think it would have been right for the hon. gentleman to have done it half a dozen years before. I think he committed half a dozen serious errors in not doing it when he was Minister of Finance, if I only charge him with one error in each year. Now, Mr. Speaker, the point is this, that the hon. gentleman, on going out of office, left a considerable amount uncharged, which ought to have been charged, and it is charged up by my hon. friend beside me. It is rather an inconvenience, to some of his tabulated statements, that it should have been there charged, and he naturally squirms under the infliction.

Now, I come to another statement: I come to the statement, twice repeated by him, that his expenditure, for 1896, was $41,702,000. That means, according to him, the total expenditure, capital and interest. I come then to his comparison of the expenditures for 1897, 1898 and 1899, which he represents, correctly enough, to be $43,000,000, $45,000,000 and $51,000,000 respectively. Here, I want to call attention again to the dishonest character of this whole business. He takes two periods of three years each, and, in the face of the fact that the great bulk of the additions are represented by the new services, to which I have alluded, Yukon railways, sinking fund and such, the hon. gentleman deliberately aims to lead his hearers to believe that the Reform government had, without a corresponding advantage to the country, without a corresponding credit to the country, added many millions a year to the total expenditure. For reasons which I have given, I object in toto, to his false comparison and to his practice of doubling together the expenditures in such a manner. No good result can be arrived at from it; no comparison can be made under it, but a great deal of misleading and error will arise from it. Then, a little farther down, I come to the hon. gentleman's estimate of population. Now, Sir, for convenience sake, as I want to get through with this speech of his, I will reserve this until I come to deal with the census, merely stating that the statement which I made at Toronto, that the population of Canada was increasing and had increased at a greater ratio during 1897, 1898, 1899 and 1900 than it had in the years 1892, 1893, 1894 and 1895, is a statement which I am prepared to maintain in detail and give good reasons for—a statement, which, I think, every hon. gentleman who has any knowledge of the movement of population will know to be, on the face of it, prima facie, likely to be correct. But, here, I come to where the hon. gentleman was getting in his fine work. Here is the per capita expenditure, and here the hon. gentleman goes on to point out, that, in 1895, the per capita expenditure, putting both capital and interest together, came to $8.41 per head, while, under the present administration the hon. gentleman says the per capita expenditure has risen to $9.72 per head in 1899. I put it to this House, I put it to all fair-minded men, would any man, from that statement, not imagine that we had added $1.30 to the annual per capita charges upon the people of the country without giving any advantage in return. That is the inevitable inference, the only inference which the hon. gentleman could wish the people to draw from that statement of his. Now, I am going into details about this. I will assume my estimate of population to be correct, and I will take afterwards the hon. gentleman's estimate and see how the thing will work out. The House will know, as the hon. gentleman has worked it out in detail, that he represents that we have added $1.30 as between 1895 and 1899, to the annual charges put upon the people of Canada, when he knows that between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000 of this total will cost the people nothing at all, because the money that goes into the Yukon comes out of the Yukon, because the money that goes into the railways comes out of the railways, because the money that goes into the sinking fund goes to reduce our debt, and these will not cost anything at all. If the hon. gentleman wished to make a fair comparison he would have deducted all these items, and if he had done so the addition to the public expenditure of $1.30 per head would have shrunk into miserable proportions. But, he would not do that, nor would he make any allowance for the fact that my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Blair) had been completing the canals at speed whereas he and his friends had been dawdling along with them, and because he spent more than the hon. gentleman did, he assumes that the burdens of the people have been raised in proportion. In 1895, and I am now taking the hon. gentleman's own figures and his own estimate of the population, we had a population of 5,000,000, and an expenditure, chargeable to consolidated revenue, of $38,132,000. What did that represent? That represented, for all services that were performed by these hon. gentlemen and charged to consolidated fund in 1895 an annual charge of $7.62 per head. In 1899 we had an annual expenditure, after deducting the Yukon expenditure, after deducting the extra expenditures on railways, after deducting the sinking fund and the charges for interest, to meet liabilities incurred by him—we had an expenditure of rather under $39,000,000, as against $38,132,000. According to his own account the population in these four years, may have been increased a quarter of a million, and therefore, our per capita charge for purposes of discharging these identical services which these hon. gentlemen discharged in 1895 was about $7.40 instead of $7.62. We did the same work as they did for 20 cents per head less, and if you estimate the population in 1899 at 5,400,000, or 150,000 larger than his estimate, you would have had an expenditure of $7.18 per head instead of $7.62 per head. I will come to deal with that matter a little later on, but, I repeat, that, service for service and deducting those services to which I have alluded, which did not cost the people anything, as I have pointed out, this government, in 1899, was doing the work, at least, 20 cents a head cheaper, which means a million of dollars on the average cheaper in comparison with the population than these hon. gentlemen were doing it in 1895.

Now, I come again to one of the hon. gentleman's pleasant little insinuations. The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) most correctly stated that, in the years from 1878 to 1898, the debt had increased at the rate of $6,500,000 a year. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) was not able to impugn the correctness of this statement of increase, but he took upon himself to read the hon. Minister of Finance a long and very severe lecture. And why? Because the hon. Minister of Finance had misstated the figures? Not a bit of it. Because that expenditure had not been incurred? Not a bit of it. But because he and his friends were occupied in building the Canadian Pacific Railway at the time. What on earth had it to do with the argument of the hon. Minister of Finance, whether they were building the Canadian Pacific Railway or any other railway? The hon. Minister of Finance was simply stating the fact that, in these eighteen years, on the average, the public debt increased at the rate of $6,500,000 a year. The hon. gentleman could not deny it, and so he turned round and attacked the hon. Minister of Finance as if he had been guilty of some serious iniquity in making a simple statement of fact. I may just make a little criticism of my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) beside me, and I hope he will take it in good part. I have a criticism to make of my hon. friend, and it is this.

Mr. FOSTER. Be careful now.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Do not be afraid. My hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) stated that, in these three years he had added $7,750,000 to the public debt or $2,500,000 a year. That was nominally correct, but—let the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) prick up his ears—the hon. Minister of Finance was practically nearly $1,000,000 astray.

Mr. FOSTER. That is your Finance Minister for you.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Why? My hon. friend had very wisely and properly contracted at 2½ per cent loan in London at a discount of 9 or 10 per cent, a wise transaction, a prudent transaction, a transaction from which Canada will benefit largely, though nominally it will represent an increase of debt of about $1,000,000, and the difference must be deducted from the $7,750,000, and he did not take credit for it. He allowed it to be supposed—and there I blame him—he allowed it to be supposed that this had been the money spent instead of $1,000,000 of it being a discount. My hon. friend the minister (Mr. Fielding) has charged himself, in my calculation, with $350,000 a year more than he ought to, and I hope he will take a note of it.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) in giving an enumeration of the various causes which led to the increase of the debt: The Canadian Pacific Railway, the canals—and, by the way, the Intercolonial Railway, which includes, I suppose, the St. Charles branch, and a very beautiful piece of administrative work that was.

Mr. FOSTER. Almost as good as the St. Frances locks.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The hon. gentleman goes on to say, and mark this:

On the North-west rebellion we paid $4,800,000 out of the revenues of the country, and they paid nothing.

And they paid nothing. Sir, it is not the purpose of this government to create rebellions and to charge their cost up to the people of Canada. Here I come to a statement which I do not exactly understand, but which I give the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) the benefit of. He states that in 1892 the remission of sugar taxation was $5,200,000, and in 1893, the remission was $4,000,000. I would like to know how the hon. gentleman manages to show that the remission of sugar taxation could have amounted to $5,200,000. The utmost revenue we ever obtained from sugar, to the best of my recollection, was about $3,200,000. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) is, no doubt, a man of parts, but how he deducted a remission of $5,200,000 taxation out of a total taxation of $3,200,000 is not immediately apparent to the ordinary observer—the wayfaring man, though a fool, cannot understand that. It may be right, but there is only one way I can see to understand it. Perhaps he and his compeers were abstracting an enormous sum of money out of the pockets of the people, and putting little into the treasury, and largely into the refiners, that the alteration in the tariff may have saved the people $5,200,000, but it was not saved in taxes, so far as I can see.

Here again I come to another of what I am sorry to say I must call these very dishonest tabulations of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster). He takes the year 1895-6 and the year 1898-9. He compares his expenditure of $36,900,000 with $41,900,000, and he draws the inference, and parades it at great length, that we cost the country $5,000,000 more than he did. Now, this plan of taking 1896 involves this result. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) starved two important services. I, myself, and my hon. friend the Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden), know that the result of the injury he did to the militia service was not repaired for two or three years: perhaps, is not fully repaired yet. I know, and my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte)—whom we all regret not to see with us—knows well that the result of his miserable parsimony in dealing with the public works of Canada was that a great many of the public works were neglected, were allowed to receive great injury, and so, probably, for every $100,000 the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) saved, five or six hundred thousand dollars have subsequently had to be paid in order to make good the mischief caused by lack of repairs at the proper time. I had an instance brought to my notice the other day, showing the result of this miserable false economy, which is just the same as if my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), in a fit of economy, were to shut off about half the marine lights under his jurisdiction. The hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) might save two or three hundred thousand, but how many millions of dollars would the country lose and would the trade of Canada lose under such an arrangement as that? What did that hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) do in the case of the St. Lawrence channel? He cut down the public works estimate to the bare bone, and the result was that while we have expended a great many million dollars in constructing the ship channel between Quebec and Montreal, certain necessary things that ought to be done to it every year in the way of sweeping the channel and removing boulders, were utterly neglected. Quite a considerable number of vessels were injured. Very heavy claims are accruing on that account, the navigation of the St. Lawrence has been seriously impaired, and the rate of insurance very considerably put up on our vessels, partly, at least, owing to the injuries caused by the undue parsimony of that hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster). Now, Sir, I take, as I took before, the year 1895, when the expenditure was $38,132,000. I take the $41,900,000—I deduct from it the $3,000,000 I have alluded to for Yukon and the rest—and I find that for the services rendered, we pay $38,900,000. Again, I repeat, and the House will bear it in mind, that these special services I have alluded to cost the country nothing, because return was made by them in due course. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) alleges that we increased the cost of government about 14 per cent. Well, the difference between $38,100,000 and $38,900,000—with which he ought to have made a comparison if he was desirous of doing it honestly—is just $800,000, which is very little more than 2 per cent as against his 14 per cent. If you take my calculation of the population at 5,400,000, and the expenditure being $38,900,000, you will find that it amounts to $7.20 per head. The annual charge, taking his own statement, and taking his estimate of population for 1895, would amount to $38,100,000, or $7.62 per capita, being exactly 42 cents in our favour, if you adopt my calculation of the expenditure, and about 20 cents in our favour if you adopt the hon. gentleman's calculation. I submit to the House, in all seriousness, what possible use, what possible reason, what possible object can be served by making these calculations and omitting the material fact, that the bulk of the additions were new services, which new services in no way involve a charge upon the country.

Here is a sentence well worthy the attention of the House, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) especially addressed it to me. I am going to quote it now, I am going to quote it again when we come to deal with the census returns, as to which I have a word or two to say:

I think it is the duty of the hon. Minister of Customs, of the hon. Minister of Finance, of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, to set this matter right at once, for, Sir, the canker and the virus of suspicion and non-confidence is in no way better imported into the government of the country than where you cannot take its blue-books solemnly given to the people as facts, as in every respect true to fact, and make your calculations upon the basis of the circumstances which actually exist.

Let the House take a note of that; let the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) take a note of it, for it is not the last he is going to hear of it before I have done with him.

But here I come to what is, perhaps, the cream and crowning glory of the hon. gentleman's statements. If there is one subject more than another which ought to have engaged, and which has engaged I do not doubt, the attention of a man in his position, it must have been the operation of the preferential duty on goods imported from Great Britain. He goes on to say:

These are not my own figures, but the figures of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I give them for what they are worth, and I take them to be true. What are they? I have here a list of the rate of dutiable goods imported from Great Britain, and I find that in 1896 the rate of tariff imposed on dutiable goods from Great Britain was 30.20. In 1899 it is 29.62, or just 58-100ths of 1 per cent less than it was in 1896.

This is not a mere oversight, for he goes on to repeat it a little later, and makes a new calculation. Now, Sir, I have here the identical statement from which he was quoting; it was furnished to him, I believe, from my department; and it contains a cal-calculation of the percentage on dutiable goods imported from England in 1899. Even if there had been a mistake in the figures, this is a matter which the hon. gentleman, if he had any real knowledge of the subject, ought to have known in an instant. He knew that we had reduced the tariff rate as a whole 25 per cent on English goods; he knew that that reduction had come into force in 1899, and he must have seen, or he ought to have seen if he had any real knowledge of the subject, that the reduction could not have amounted to so small a figure as 58-100ths of one per cent. More than that, he had, at any rate, the total amount of goods imported from England, which amounted to $27,500,000, and he had likewise the total amount of duty paid on those goods, which was $7,300,000 in round numbers; and any man with a particle of knowledge of the subject would have seen that his statement was absurd. What are the facts? The fact is that he is astray about 600 per cent. The reduction, instead of being 58-100ths of one per cent, was 3·62 per cent. The rate of duty was not 29·62 per cent, but 26·627 per cent. If the hon. gentleman wants to see the figures, I will send them over to him.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend probably was not here yesterday, but if he had been, he would have heard me say, what appears in to-day's Hansard, that I had made a mistake in the figures, taking a 9 instead of a 6, and I corrected the mistake before the House.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Very good. I accept the hon. gentleman's statement. I have no doubt he made the mistake, but my point is that any man with any real knowledge of the subject could not have made that mistake. It is the mistake of a lawyer arguing from a brief, who knows nothing about the subject except what he finds in his brief; it is the mistake of a parrot attempting to speak as a scholar. Why, Sir, if the hon. gentleman knew anything at all of the subject, he ought to have known that if you have a total revenue of $7,300,000, it cannot possibly amount to 30 per cent of $27,500,000. He had merely to take his pencil or look at the figures, and he would have seen that the thing was impossible. More than that. I make all allowance for the fact that in some lines the duties were raised, although not more than half the amount of the total 25 per cent reduction; but making all allowance for that, I repeat that it was utterly impossible for any intelligent man, if he had known anything of what he was talking about, to make out that a reduction of 25 per cent on the tariff eventuated in a reduction of 58-100ths of one per cent on the goods imported. In making that mistake, I think he exemplified what I have said, that he knew very little of what he was talking about. The hon. gentleman had better learn, particularly when he is talking about any statement I may make, to look before he leaps.

I want to call attention to another statement made by the hon. gentleman:

My jubilant and juvenile friend, the Minister of Trade and Commerce—

Thank him!—

—when he was in Massey Hall, declared with a great flourish of trumpets that the trade of Canada in 1899 was $90,000,000 and over greater than it was in 1896. Trade and commerce reports, when they come down, reduce that to $82,000,000.

Sir, what I said was this:

In 1868 our total volume of trade was $31,000,000. In 1895 (not 1896) our total volume of trade was $224,000,000, being an increase in that long interval of $192,000,000. Since 1895 our total volume of trade has increased from $224,000,000 to $319,000,000, being an increase of $95,000,000 during those few years.

The hon. gentleman, I suppose, had this in his hand, and he chose, for reasons best known to himself, to represent me as speaking of the year 1896 when I spoke of the year 1895; and my figures are not only accurate, but within the mark. I turn to the Trade and Navigation Returns, and I find, as I said, that in 1895 the grand total volume of trade was $224,420,000 and that in 1899 the grand total volume of trade was $321,000,000. Will the hon. gentleman's arithmetical faculties enable him to deduct 224 and 321 and report the product? If he does, he will find that the difference is 97 and not 82; and in future, if he will take a bit of friendly advice, he will be careful, before he corrects a statement of mine, to verify his figures. Sir, the fact is this. I took the grand total, which, of course, differs a little from some of the other computations, though not materially in this case, because I was going back to 1868, and in doing so, that was the only possible point at which I could make the comparison. The fact remains that the hon. gentleman, with the facts before him and ample opportunities to learn what the real truth was, would not take the trouble to make the calculation for himself. I suppose some one of his myrmidons told him that I had made a mistake and he swallowed the bait, and so he makes a statement which is only $15,000,000 astray. After this paragraph my hon. friend, for two or three pages, resolved himself into a brooding hen. He explained to us how all the time things were going to the deuce under the Conservative administration, they were really brooding how to make things better. Sir, if my hon. friend likes to take up that role, I do not know that I should object. I remember seeing long ago, in some account, I think, of the reign of Charles II., that on one occasion the Moors took prisoner a very valiant but very puny knight. They did not know what to do with him, and they finally set him to do the work of a brooding hen.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

There may be a precedent, if the hon. gentleman desires to fulfil that role, and I am bound to say he would be a great deal more usefully employed in this enterprise than some things he has been turning his attention to of late.

Here comes a rather curious sentence. The hon. gentleman is talking of the increases in iron and steel and other matters, and he goes on to say that the miners and farmers are paying largely increased prices for the articles they use. What is his inference from that? Does he want the farmers and miners to understand that because we largely lessened the duties on iron, therefore, they are paying more for them now? But if they are now paying more for their iron with our greatly reduced duties, what would they have been paying if we had left the duties alone?

Then comes a sentence which I hail with pleasure. The hon. gentleman goes on to point out that times of depression are not always times of great injury. He said:

The enforced economy from 1892 to 1895 has been a strengthening time for the business backbone and power of the country.

There is a glimmer of sense here, and I hail it with satisfaction. It is an oasis in the desert of verbiage I have been wading through. Let me call the hon. gentleman's attention to this fact. Long ago, long before he was Finance Minister, just such a case did occur in 1876, 1877 and 1878, and I pointed it out very thoroughly and strenuously to the Conservative party, and much thanks and credit I got for my trouble.

Then follow a considerable number of pages, which, I think, were put in for very little purpose that I can see, unless, peradventure, to tire the House and prevent a reply. But, later on, I come to a statement to which I want to call attention. The hon. gentleman goes into a statement which he might have spared us to show that the increase of our trade with Great Britain, after all, is not large, and he presented a long series of exports to the Argentine Republic, Belgium, France, Germany, Japan, the Spanish West Indies, and the Lord knows where else, in order to show that our exports to these countries grew greatly in comparison with the trade of Great Britain. But he omitted entirely this most material fact, that taking our trade with the two great competitors for it—for nearly all our trade is with Great Britain and the United States—in 1896, we sold to Great Britain $67,700,000, and in 1899, $85,113,000 worth, being an increase of $23,000,000, in round numbers. Compare that with the United States. In 1896, we sold to the United States, $34,400,000 worth, and in 1899, $34,700,000 worth, being virtually no increase at all. While our export trade with the United States was stationary, our export trade of home products with Great Britain had increased $23,000,000, but that was a trifle which the hon. gentleman did not think it worth his while to enlarge upon at all. But he did enlarge upon the material fact that, while our trade with Great Britain had increased but 35 per cent, our trade with Hawaii had increased from $31,000 to $185,000, or 500 per cent. That was an important fact, but the fact that our trade with the United States had remained stationary, while that with Great Britain had increased 35 per cent, was of no importance at all. That fact he simply whistled down, because it did not suit his purpose.

Then, we go on through two or three pages of the speech, consisting principally of scrap book.

Mr. FOSTER. It is your own speech in 1888.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Very likely, and the best thing the hon. gentleman had in his speech. I have this to say with respect to that speech. I am not in the least degree disposed to recede from the statements I made in it. I continue to be of the opinion that the trade and good-will of the United States is of great importance to Canada, and of great importance to the British Empire.

Mr. FOSTER. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I continue to be of the opinion that it would be the work of a statesman of the very first class to do anything and everything that lies in his power to cement, consolidate and bring together those two great halves of the English race.

Mr. FOSTER. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I would be glad to do it. I know that the hon. baronet who is at the head of the opposition would have been glad to do it too. That we failed was not our fault, and circumstances and conditions have so altered that I do not say I would advise renewing the propositions or renewing them on the same lines.

Mr. FOSTER. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. But I might tell hon. gentlemen this. Great events are in the air and great events may come to pass, and before he and I pass off the stage, the great idea underlying reciprocity with the United States, the idea of bringing into close alliance, although not political alliance, the two great halves of the English race, may yet fructify in a manner that will astonish hon. gentlemen. And the man who helps that forward will do, as I have repeatedly said, the greatest service to England any man has yet done. One reason why I am pleased to see England and her colonies coming together is because the power, the strength, the vitality of the alliance will go pretty far to show our American cousins that we can treat with them on equal terms, and I would suggest, as we are talking about figures, that whereas 70,000,000 minus 50,000,000 may be a negligible quantity, 70,000,000 plus 50,000,000 amounts to 120,000,000, and not all the rest of the world united together could afford to disregard 120,000,000 of Anglo-Saxons acting in unison.

I come here to a curious statement in the hon. gentleman's speech. He says that there are answers to certain questions which cannot be avoided. For instance, the answer to the question: What do he and his friends propose to do about the preferential tariff if they get into power? But, nevertheless, the hon. gentleman seems to have been pretty successful in evading that question. Here, Sir, is a delightful sentence. He says:

They have given the United States a preference in many things. What have they given them? Free corn for nothing; free binder twine for nothing; free wire for nothing; a cut on their iron—everybody knows that the United States to-day towers above every other country in the world in her production of iron.

That is redolent of the narrowest and most hide-bound protection I ever heard advocated. I would like to have my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) let loose: I would like to have my hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. McMillan) let loose to answer the hon. gentleman, and to inform him that when we admitted Indian corn free we conferred a great boon on the great mass of agriculturists in Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Yes,—a great boon upon the great mass of the agriculturists when we admitted corn free. What did they want free corn for? To fatten the fat beef they export to England. And why, I should like to know, ought not our agricultural friends who want to use corn in that way, get their corn free as much as our manufacturing friends get their cotton free?

Mr. MONTAGUE. And I would suggest that you let loose the hon. member for Essex and Kent, Ontario, at the same time.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The members for Kent and Essex represent two magnificent counties, where the people can grow, and grow profitably, everything that can be grown in Canada; and it makes little difference to them and to their constituents whether they grow a little more wheat, a little more peas or a little more tobacco, in place of corn. They are not going to suffer and they are not afraid of it. But I repeat, Sir, that we have admitted these things free. The hon. gentleman says: You admitted them for nothing. We admit them for the benefit of our people, because we, at any rate, believe that the consumers of this country and the great body of the producers have some rights to be regarded in the legislation of this country. We are here, as my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) very properly said, to legislate justly in the interests of all classes, and I have yet to learn that legislation on behalf of the great body of consumers and producers can be rightly objected to by any hon. member of this House. Then the hon. gentleman goes on:

But we are told: This preference to Great Britain is now an accomplished fact. When you get into power, what will you do with it? Will you repeal the preference to Great Britain? That is a question that will be asked; that is a question that must be answered. My answer to it is this—that certain facts when once they are accomplished, become accomplished facts, and, though they were accomplished against the will and against the wish of one party, and against what was considered by that party to be a fair and judicious policy, yet, when once they have been accomplished, it becomes a question whether, profitably to the interest of the country, these accomplished facts can be repudiated or antagonized.

Sir, I have done a little yachting in my time, and I think some hon. gentlemen here have done some sailing as well. Is there not a point in the compass known as north by south? And would not the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) be admirably qualified to take command of a ship steering north by south on a question, which 'must be answered.' I am bound to say that there is a good deal of family resemblance between the action and statement of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) and that of the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) who sits beside him. I think that hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) has said something to the effect, as regards his Manitoba policy, that it is an accomplished fact, and he is not going to raise it again; and I think he was perfectly sincere when he made that utterance. But I think the pair of them, with respect to preferential trade, occupy the position of that famous American statesman, whose name I have forgotten, who, at the conclusion of an impassioned address—quite as impassioned as that of my hon. friend (Mr. Foster)—closed by declaring: 'Gentlemen, these are my principles; but if they do not suit you, I can change them.'

Mr. MONTAGUE. Was it an American statesman?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. An American statesman of note.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) could have got an instance nearer home.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. No, I do not think so. But if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) had known what was doing in this matter of preferential trade, he would have come to this same understanding that some of his friends have—that we have got mighty close to a genuine revenue tariff and he and his protectionist friends have been thoroughly left in the cold by it.

Now, Sir, there are two points with which I would like to deal at some little length. In the first place, I might say a word or two as to the real incidence, bearing and extent of the preference which has been granted by Canada to Great Britain. But, on this point, I would like to know which of these hon. gentlemen represents the opinion of the opposition. One, I find, is continually declaring that the preference granted by us to Great Britain is a mere fraud, delusion and sham; and the other says that, because we have granted preference to Great Britain, we ought to have obtained substantial advantages from Great Britain in return—for giving her a preference which is a fraud, a delusion and a sham. Neither of these two things is the case. The preference we granted to Great Britain is a very substantial advantage to Great Britain and to British merchants. There is no doubt whatever that the preference we have recently granted will be still further an advantage to them, and a great gain to Canadian consumers and producers as well. On this same question of the preference to Great Britain there are several things to be said. Sir, it became apparent to me long ago, it became apparent to me long before we came over to this side of the House, that, from the very nature of the case, goods of American manufacture and production could easily bear a very much higher rate of duty than English goods, without being excluded from our markets. For that, there are a good many reasons, which will present themselves readily enough to anybody who chooses to consider this matter a little in detail. In the first place it arises, no doubt, from propinquity, from our nearness to the American producers and consequent convenience in dealing with them. Also, as a rule, Canadians can deal with American producers without the intervention of middlemen, at any rate without the intervention of middlemen to the extent that exists in dealing with producers in England. More than that, the tastes and habits of our people are closely similar to those of a very large number of American consumers. All these things go together to make it easier for the Americans to send their goods into our markets, even if they are taxed therefor higher than the English goods are taxed. Besides, there is the method of trade, which is worth considering. Everybody who has had much to do with the American business men knows that the object of the American is to try to do a large trade, and he will sacrifice a good deal for the sake of doing a large trade. The English merchants, on the other hand, desires, and very properly and reasonably, to drive a profitable trade. I remember very well discussing this question with an eminent American statesman, and that gentleman saying to me, what was perfectly true, that the result of our preferential trade with England was not, and probably would not be, materially to diminish the import of American goods into this country, but, as he put it: It will compel our people, though they have to pay the same taxes as before, to cut down their prices to the Canadian consumer in order to meet the prices at which his English competitor will sell. That is the exact effect of our preference. It not only does no injury to the Canadian consumer, but it enables him to reap considerable benefits from it. He gets, in the first place, a direct advantage which is caused by the reduction of taxation; in the second place, he gets the advantage which is caused by the Canadian manufacturer having to come down to the level of the English prices; and he gets, in the third place, the advantage which is caused by the American manufacturer having likewise to come down to the level of the English preferential rate. So that when you estimate the real value of the remission of taxation under the preferential tariff, you must, at least, multiply it by three, to get at the full benefit extended to the people of Canada thereunder.

Sir, I caused some calculations to be made on this question which I think will be of some interest to the House. I desire to point out that if you simply take the ordinary percentage, you will run some risk of underestimating the extent of the reduction which is made under our preferential tariff. You will observe that our preferential reduction to England, applies to all articles, except spirits, wines and tobacco; so that if you want to see the real value and weight of the reduction made by the preferential tariff, you must first of all deduct from the amount of goods imported from England into Canada, the amount in value and the amount in duty paid on spirits and wine. If you apply that, you will see that our original cut went much further than people generally supposed. We imported, last year, in round numbers, $27,500,000 worth from England, on which we paid, I think, $7,300,000. There were $500,000 in value of spirits and wines on which we collected a revenue of $1,000,000. The result was that on the $27,000,000 of manufactured goods imported from England, we collected a duty of $6,300,000. Now, $6,300,000 on $27,000,000, will be, speaking roughly, about 23 per cent or 23½ per cent. It will be observed, therefore, that the present tariff, as applied to England, is very far indeed from being anything like as high as might be supposed, if you simply take the gross amount levied without making the deductions that I have alluded to. Further than that, I find—and this bears on the total importation, and the effect of our trade with Great Britain—I find that in 1895, we imported of goods paying 20 per cent, $6,500,- 000 worth ; of goods paying 25 per cent, $11,250,000 ; of goods paying 30 per cent, $14,000,000 ; of goods paying 35 per cent, $21,000,000, in all about $52,750,000. Now, under our present reduction of one-third, the 20 per cent would be reduced to 13 per cent, the 25 per cent would be reduced to 16½ per cent, the 30 per cent would be reduced to 20 per cent, and the 35 per cent to 23¼ per cent. The result would be this, in plain terms, that if we were to apply to our late importations the preference cut we have just made, the average, deducting wines and spirits, would amount to a very little over 20 per cent on English goods imported into this country, the balance of our imports consist of articles like coal, $3,750,000 ; sugar and molasses $6,500,000 ; spirits, wines and beers, about $2,000,000 ; fruits and provisions, $7,000,000, articles subject to specific duties about $2,000,000, and a number of minor articles that I have not time to enumerate.

And, here comes in a point to which a good deal of attention is directed. The hon. gentleman, in part of his speech, made a reproach to my hon. friend, because he intimated that English merchants were looking here for a market, and he went on to say: When English merchants want to import provisions, where do they go to ? And he gave a long list of all the articles they import from the United States. Sir, as I pointed out the other evening, in proportion to population, England now buys three times as much per head from us as she does from the United States. We sold England, of provisions, about $62,000,000 worth, in round numbers, last year, on the basis of 5,400,000 of a population. The Americans, with a population probably of 75,000,000, sold, according to the hon. gentleman's statement, which, I think, is substantially correct, about $300,000,000. There is, therefore, an average for us of $11 per head, sold to Great Britain, and an average for the Americans, in the same lines, of $4 per head, sold to Great Britain. More than that, I do not think that these hon. gentlemen have been paying very close attention to the United States trade statistics of late. If they had, they would have noticed this remarkable fact, that according to their latest statements, unrevised, and, therefore, perhaps to be taken with some care, the total exportation of British goods to the 75,000,000 people in the United States, has shrunk to something like £18,000,000 sterling, being an average of $1.17 per head. The total importation of British goods into Canada amounts to $37,000,000 all told, free and dutiable, being an average for Canada, of goods purchased from Great Britain, of something like $7 per head, as against $1.17 per head of goods sold to the United States. Now, if that kind of thing goes on, the time is not far off, when our 5,500,000 will take half as much British goods, as the entire 75,000,000 to the south of the border, will take, at any rate in proportion to their population, an infinitely larger percentage than our American neighbours will take. I commend that to the consideration of those gentlemen who think that this question of the preferential duty is likely to cut but a small figure and have a small influence on the English mind. As long as they continued to export a great many million pounds sterling in value of their produce and manufactures to the United States, they were not likely to pay so much attention to their colonies ; but within the last few years, there has been a remarkable alteration, and to-day, I am inclined to think, that the amount of goods sold by Great Britain to her various colonies, including India, approximates to nearly one-half of her trade with all the rest of the world, if not more. I am speaking from memory, but, I think, that Great Britain sold between £80,000,000 and £90,000,000 sterling of goods to the colonies, and I think she only sold to all the rest of the world about £145,000,000 or £150,000,000. If these figures be correct, the question of preferential trade within the empire is susceptible of a new and much more important development than any of us supposed a little while ago.

Now, I come to consider another matter ; I come to consider the benefit that accrues to Canada from this preferential tariff. These hon. gentlemen make light of it ; these hon. gentlemen tell us that business is business, and that commercial men have no sentiment in business. I tell them, and I am in the judgment of merchants and exporters, of every man who travels from Canada to England, that the direct advantages to Canada, accruing from the granting of a preferential tariff by Canada to Great Britain, are enormous and are continually increasing. I say that we have a real and substantial, if not a legal preference in the markets of Great Britain. I say that, to-day, if Canada be true to herself, if Canadian producers and exporters be true to themselves, wherever Canada can give as good an article as can be got elsewhere, the English consumer is prepared to give us the benefit of the doubt. In view of the position of things, in view of the fact that England is the great customer for the enormous amount of surplus foodstuffs of the world, a preference of that kind is of immense benefit to the people of Canada. It depends upon themselves, and I warn them of it, that if they be true to themselves, if every Canadian exporter and dealer makes it a point of honour to see that no bad or damaged articles, bearing the Canadian hand mark, go from his own market to Great Britain they will reap the benefit. These hon. gentlemen ought not to be so blind. Surely the lesson given to them on Friday ought to have made some impression upon them. My hon. friend was to blame in one other respect beside the one which I have noted. When speaking of the enormous advantage which Canada might derive from her securities being placed in the list of those open for investment to English trustees he estimated that the increment would be 2½ per cent to the purchasing price of our securities. I had occasion to study that subject more than a quarter of a century ago, and although things have altered somewhat since then, I beg leave to differ from my hon. friend. I say that he is too cautious, that he has greatly underestimated its probable effect altogether, and the great advantage it will be in view of the fact that we have recently introduced a 2½ per cent loan. It is not an easy thing to float securities at that rate against the natural dislike of the English Stock Exchange to seeing any new low-priced securities introduced among them. And when my hon. friend estimates it at 2½ he hardly estimates one-half, or one-third of the benefit which is likely to accrue to Canada from that matter, which would never have been given to us in God's world, but for this preferential tariff to Great Britain. I do not want to mix up the question of the sending of the contingents with paltry mercantile considerations. Yet, it is true, that, in all probability all the money that the contingents have cost us will be repaid two or three times over, first, by the advantage gained by admitting our securities on even terms, and next, by the fact that, in consequence of our sending these contingents the attention of the British government has been attracted to Canada, and the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) has been able to negotiate the sale of hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of hay which have been purchased together with a great many other articles opening up a profitable trade in these articles with England and with certain other countries which we would never have obtained at all but for the attention attracted to us by the action of this government. What does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague), say?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I was not speaking to the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright), but I was merely asking if the sales of hay were not probably due to cold storage.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. No doubt incidentally they were. The fact that the hon. Minister of Agriculture has been eminently successful in aiding and developing the sales of agricultural products of various kinds, through the attention he has wisely bestowed upon the subject of cold storage, has helped, as it always will help, to introduce other articles to the notice of English purchasers. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) noted one thing. He noted that there had been a great increase in our trade with the United States, that we are purchasing more than ever from the United States. I have no time to go into details, I have no time to show him that what we purchased on the free list, from the United States was purchased for our own benefit and eminently, for the benefit of our manufacturers, for the benefit of our farmers, purchased to please ourselves and for our own advantage. We did not purchase these articles to oblige the United States, but for our own benefit. But, my point is that the very fact that our purchases from the United States have increased, in spite of the fact that we levy a much heavier tariff on them than upon Great Britain proves conclusively that, we have, at long last, got a revenue tariff. The distinctive marks of a revenue tariff and of a protective tariff are that under a protective tariff, goods are excluded, while, under a revenue tariff, goods come in. They come in under our tariff, that is proof that it may be looked on as a revenue tariff, and it is good proof, to my mind, that we are, to all intents and purposes largely working under a revenue tariff at this present moment. Now, I want to say a word as to our policy towards the United States. This is a grave question, a question to which I invite the attention of the hon. baronet opposite, (Sir Charles Tupper), who, upon more than one occasion, aye, and in opposition to his own colleagues, has shown that he really did appreciate the importance of the question. We are abundantly willing to trade with the United States, but we are also able to do without them. Time was, I grant, when I would not have said that. There has been a very great and important alteration in many of the conditions regulating the commerce of the world within the last ten or fifteen years. I am aware of the fact that we do not stand still on this side of the House. I recognize the fact quite clearly, and I say that we are now very much better able to do without the United States than we were before. But, above all, do not let us make the mistake of believing, or supposing that the trade of a kindred people, numbering 75,000,000 adjacent to us, will ever be anything but a matter of the greatest possible importance and advantage to Canada if it can be obtained upon anything like fair terms. Our trade can compare, and the Americans are watching it closely, very favourably with the American trade. If the hon. gentleman's calculations be correct, at the close of the present year, or, of the ensuing year, I think, of the present year, our total trade will amount to $375,000,000, and, with a population of 5,250,000 or 5,500,000, without going into minute percentages, is something like $70 per head, for every man, woman and child in Canada. The total American trade is about two thousand million dollars with a population of 75,000,000. That is something like $28 or $29 per head, as against $70 per head for Canada. Our tariff, particularly since this cut has been made, will conpare most favourably with that of the United States. I see that about $358,000,000 of dutiable goods were imported into the United States in the last year, for which I have returns, on which they will have $202,000,000 of duty, equal to 52 per cent. Now, this year on the dutiable goods that was imported we did not levy more than 27 or 28 per cent. What we have been saying to the United States is this: That if they do not want to trade with us we are able to do without them, we are able to prosper, we are able to increase enormously the volume of our trade. More than that, we are showing them, and they know it, that the trade of Canada is worth more to the United States—if she could get it—than the trade of all the rest of the new world, with Mexico thrown in, and the West Indies to boot. Sir, the United States may refuse to trade with us—that is their business—but the United States cannot refuse to compete with us, and we are teaching them that just so much as they refuse to trade with us to their gain or ours; just so much surer and more certain they made the competition which they will have to face in these markets which are naturally open to both. Now, Sir, if the House will permit, I think I will call it six o'clock, because there are one or two subjects of a different character which I propose to enter upon as soon as the House resumes.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Mr. Speaker, when the House rose, I had occasion to make a few remarks on the extent and importance relatively of the trade now maintained between England and the United States, and the trade between England and Canada. I pointed out that although I was not disposed to claim perfect accuracy for the figures I gave—inasmuch as I was necessarily using what are called unrevised returns—I pointed out that the total trade between England and the United States, exports and imports put together, amounted to something like $672,000,000—$584,000,000 imports and $88,000,000 exports. I may mention that the previous figures I had been giving refer to the food exports, which, of course, are only a portion, though a very large portion, of the total importation from the United States. Assuming the population of the United States at the figures I gave, then you get the total trade between England and the United States at about $9 per head of the population. Our total trade, based apparently on the same lines, was last year about $136,000,000, being an average per head as between England and Canada,

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

of $26. That, you will see, is an enormous increase per capita as compared with the trade between England and the great republic. That trade, you will observe, was developed under the old preference, and looking at the enormous strides our trade with England has been making, it is not unreasonable to suppose that in view of the additional preference we are giving them, if this country goes on and increases with anything like the rapidity that now appears reasonably probable, then, within the space of a comparatively very short number of years, it is quite on the cards, not merely that the export trade of England with Canada will equal the export trade of England to the United States—I may say that at the present moment it is very nearly one-half of the total export to the United States—but it is altogether possible, I will not say probable, that by the time we attain a population of nine or ten millions, if things go on as they are—because there is a downward tendency as to the trade between England and the United States and an upward tendency in our trade—it is quite possible that the trade between England and Canada may quite equal the trade between England and the United States in spite of the enormous superiority of their numbers.

And now, I want to say a few words as to the policy of Her Majesty's loyal opposition on this question. I put a question without getting a very satisfactory answer last night, but I observed that about a week ago one hon. gentleman now before me, one of the leaders of the opposition, speaking on the proposal submitted by my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Russell) delivered himself as follows:

I will read, in order that it may go on record, side by side with the amendment on which we are called to vote, these views which I propose to present in a notice of motion.

Formal notice given—the identical words given to us; and here the words are:

That this House is of opinion that a system of mutual trade preference between Great Britain and Ireland and the colonies would greatly stimulate increased production in and commerce between these countries, and would thus promote and maintain the unity of the empire, and that nothing which falls short of the complete realization of such a policy should be considered as final or satisfactory.

I do not know, Sir, whether that rather remarkable declaration was made by the hon. member for York in one of those moments of weakness which are peculiar to him; but if it expresses his views, and if he expressed the views of his friends beside him, I think the time has come now for them to put themselves on record and to explain clearly and distinctly to Canada and to the British people what their policy on this matter is. Such an answer as he gave is not likely to be satisfactory either here or on the other side of the Atlantic. A formal declaration such as he proposed to vote on the other night would at least have the merit of letting us know where they are, of letting us understand that these men are distinctly opposed to a policy of preferential trade.

In this connection I desire to call attention to the utter absurdity of the attacks which have been made in the course of recent debates and during the past few years on the attitude assumed by my right hon. friend the First Minister on this same question of preferential trade. Times without number we have been told that the right hon. First Minister threw away what hon. gentlemen opposite were pleased to call most golden opportunities on the occasion of the Jubilee year. Times without number we have been told that he had merely to ask and have, that if he had not frustrated the patriotic intentions of Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, the Duke of Devonshire, and various other worthies when he arrived on the other side of the Atlantic, he could for the asking of it have had a complete and absolute preference for Canada, and a discrimination in favour of our products. Now, Sir, I doubt myself whether a more utterly unfounded, unreasonable and unfair statement was ever made by any factious political partisans in the world. In the first place, I have the speech delivered by the Hon. Joseph Chamberlain at the Canada Club dinner on March 25th, 1896. I observe that Mr. Chamberlain speaks very fully, very clearly and very distinctly as to the proposition contained in the resolution which the hon. gentleman said he would submit, the proposition frequently advocated by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), the proposition which these hon. gentlemen declare my hon. friend had only to ask for to obtain. What Mr. Chamberlain says is this :

I see no use in shutting my eyes to the consequences of the proposition which I desire to consider with an impartial mind. The first thing is to establish the facts, and the facts are as I have stated. In return, under this proposal, we should get a small and a very small, consideration in the shape of a preference of, it may be 2 per cent, it might even be 5 per cent, in our competition with foreign manufacture in the colonial market. Now, what, then, is the proposal we are asked to consider? It is a very startling proposal for a free trade country, and I say that in its present form it is a proposal which it is impossible for us to adopt.

Is that the language of a man from whom my hon. friend had only to ask in order to obtain what he required? Mr. Chamberlain goes on :

The percentage, therefore, would be much more in favour of the colonies than it would be in favour of the United Kingdom. But the second point, which is much more important, is that our foreign trade is so gigantic in proportion to the trade of the colonies that the burden of an arrangement of this kind would fall with much greater weight on the United Kingdom than upon our fellow-subjects in the colonies. I therefore think we may very fairly ask our fellow-subjects in the colonies to better their offer if, as I believe, they desire to proceed upon those lines, and if those lines do really offer the best direction in which we can proceed.

Then he quotes Lord Ripon's despatch, which is to the following effect :

The resolution (that is, the resolution of the Ottawa conference) does not advocate the establishment of a customs union comprising the whole empire, whereby all the existing barriers to free commercial intercourse between the various members would be removed, and the aggregate customs revenue equitably apportioned among the different communities. 'Such an arrangement,' says Lord Ripon, 'would be free in principle from objection, and, if it were practicable, would certainly prove effective in cementing the unity of the empire and promoting its progress and stability.'

Mr. Chamberlain may have been willing, I think he has always expressed himself as willing, to consider a proposition as to sweeping away all customs barriers between ourselves and Great Britain, and making some discrimination, although he has always admitted that it would be almost impossible to carry it. Then, he goes on to say :

We are not conterminous countries; we are countries, as I have said, separated by thousands of miles, in some cases, and the circumstances of our different countries vary so considerably that it is evident that in any arrangement as to general free trade within the empire exceptions must be made in the case of articles that are chiefly taxed for revenue purposes.

All that shows clearly and distinctly the absolute correctness of the statement of my right hon. friend, that no encouragement was held out to him by any person having authority to speak for the British parliament or the British government, lending any ground for believing that had he asked, at the time he proposed the preferential tariff, a discrimination in our favour, particularly in food products, in which we chiefly desire discrimination, there would have been the remotest chance of its being granted. But, Sir, this matter, I think, has been put beyond any possibility or doubt by a letter which I also will place on Hansard, addressed by the Duke of Devonshire to my hon. friend Mr. Mulock. It is dated the 2nd of May, 1899, and is as follows :

Privy Council Office, May 2, 1899.

My dear Sir,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of April 1.

The best answer I can give to your inquiries is to inclose you a copy of the report of the speeches made on the various occasions in the summer of 1897, when I had the pleasure of meeting the colonial Premiers, in my capacity as president of the British Empire League.

I do not think that, in any of those speeches, you will find anything to support the view of my opinion on the question of the policy of granting preferential trade to the colonies, which appears to have been held by Sir Charles Tupper and by some of the journals in this country, which seek to attribute what they term 'protectionist heresies' to members of the Unionist government.

It was, no doubt, my speech at Liverpool on June 12, 1897, which was referred to by Sir Charles Tupper, and my admission that free trade had not done for us all that was once expected, may have been commented on by free traders or opposition journals.

But while I congratulate Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Dominion of Canada on the offer which has been made to admit British goods at reduced rates, as compared with those on the goods of other nations, as an important step in the direction of Imperial unity, I had no authority to offer, and did not offer, to Canada a preference in British markets. You are at liberty to make what use you please of this letter.

I understand the English language, I think, as well as the hon. baronet, and I say there never was a more absolute and complete contradiction put on paper to the assertion that my hon. friend had only to ask and have, than the declaration contained in that same letter. But incidentally I may remark that I hold another communication here, in the shape of an extract from Lord Rosebery's speech on the 1st November, 1897. Lord Rosebery quotes Sir Wilfrid Laurier's speech as follows :

There are parties who hope to maintain the British Empire on lines of restricted trade. If the British Empire is to be maintained, it can only be upon the most absolute freedom, political and commercial. In building up this great enterprise, to deviate from the principle of freedom will be to so much weaken the ties and bonds which now hold it together.

Commenting on this, Lord Rosebery goes on to say :

Well, that is a view I hold, and that I believe you hold in this hall. I believe—

Mark this :

I believe that anything in the direction of an Imperial commercial league would weaken this empire internally, and excite the permanent hostility of the whole world.

And he goes on to say, referring to the proposal made by hon. gentlemen opposite :

The proposal, if I understand it rightly, would tend to interpose checks upon the free import of the food of the people. I believe that that is absolutely impracticable, and, but that if it were practicable and were done in the name of empire, it would only succeed in making the empire odious to the working classes of this country.

Now, Sir, I have read Lord Rosebery's and Mr. Chamberlain's, and the Duke of Devonshire's views—the three men perhaps in England who would, in their various capacities, be the most likely to have entertained such a proposal as my hon. friend might have made. Each and every one of them—some more emphatically and some less—put down his foot in the clearest manner to prove that unless and until the colonies were prepared to grant something like, for example, free trade in British goods—and I never heard that these hon. gentlemen were prepared to admit British goods perfectly free into Canada—unless and until that would be done, they would not be prepared to undertake or carry out any scheme of discrimination in favour of Canada. Under these circumstances hon. gentlemen opposite, if they are wise and honest, will cease from this time forth all their statements and declarations as to the so-called loss of golden opportunities on the part of my hon. friend.

Let me turn to another question, and an interesting one, which comes up incidentally in connection with the budget. After all is said and done, the true basis of national wealth—the item of national wealth which I think all here would most earnestly desire to see grow and increase—is the number of intelligent and prosperous men and women in this country. A question has arisen between myself and the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) as to the amount of population in Canada at this present moment, which I am disposed to estimate at a considerably greater number than he is willing to allow. The hon. gentleman, I understand, bases his opposition to my calculations on some statements which he finds contained in the blue-book, the Trade and Navigation Report, issued by my hon. friend. I do not think that my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster), and some of his supporters understand in the least what those figures mean. They are the mechanical, conventional figures which have appeared at any time in the last twenty years, and in no way represent the opinion of any one of authority or weight as to the population of the country. They simply show that if the growth of Canada, in any one particular series of years, is exactly identical with its growth ascertained during the last decade, the result would be so and so. That is all that is pretended to be established, yet the hon. gentleman brings these figures forth, as if they were formidable and well-sustained calculations which rendered impossible the statement I made that the evidence in our possession shows pretty clearly that, in all human probability, the increase of population in Canada in 1897, 1898 and 1899 has been very much greater than in the years 1892, 1893, 1894 and 1895, and is probably not much short of 100,000, and possibly 125,000 per year. That assertion was made by me, I think, with good cause. If there is one fact better established than another it is this, that when a country is reasonably prosperous, its population grows more rapidly than when it is not. In the second place, it is tolerably well ascertained by the great consensus of evidence that the exodus which did so much to deplete Canada, practically ceased by the year 1896, on the admission of these hon. gentlemen's own journals, and on the evidence supplied us in various shapes and forms by our various municipal authorities and others. We have not in Canada, unfortunately, any adequate system of vital statistics, and I am obliged to proceed by guesswork to a certain extent, where in England I could speak with positive authority. But I think most people will admit that I am not making a very bold assertion when I say that in Canada, being a young country with a very large amount of untilled and unoccupied land, the natural increase of births over deaths ought at least to equal the rate of increase in such a country as England and Wales. I think that is a fair proposition to advance, and in doing so I say nothing of the well-known exceptional fecundity of a certain portion of our population.

I find by the very last returns for the year 1897, that the increase in England amounted to 1½ per cent for that year, and it was greater in some other years. I contend that it is clear to demonstration that during our prosperous years, our increase was not likely to fall below that of England and Ireland, and in addition we have positive proof in fifty different ways. We have proof from the sales of land by the Canadian Pacific Railway, from the numbers of homesteads taken up, from the reports of our immigration agents, and from the well-known fact that a very large additional mining population was brought into Canada in 1897, 1898 and 1899, including, of course, the population of the Yukon—these furnish as strong a prima facie case as it is possible to make out that the population, in all human probability, has increased very much more rapidly in the years I have named, from 1897 to 1899, than from 1892 to 1895, which, according to hon. gentlemen opposite, were years of depression in Canada, when he was reduced, as he tells us himself, to the condition of a brooding hen. More than that, I do not think that he or any man in this House would get up and state their belief that the growth of the population in Canada, under the circumstances I have alluded to, and bearing in mind the condition of the country in those four or five years and its condition since, was as great from the 1st July, 1891, to the 1st July, 1895, as it was from the 1st July, 1895, to the 1st July, 1899. And yet, Sir, if these statements in the trade and navigation returns are to be accepted as unanswerable evidence, according to them the increase of population was a little greater from the 1st of July, 1891, to the 1st of July, 1895, than it has been from the 1st of July, 1895, to the 1st of July, 1899. I do not think it is necessary for me to waste more words in saying that the whole preponderance of evidence, and I might have added the evidence afforded by the enormous increase in the importation of settlers' goods, goes to show that the odds are immensely in favour of my proposition that the growth of population since we came into office is considerably greater than before. I would add for the future information of the House, that in the decade from 1881 to 1891, these same customs returns show—going on just as they had done before—a total increase of population in Canada at the rate of over one hundred thousand per annum, being exactly 100 per cent more than the actual increases reported under the census. Of course, that was all right according to the hon. gentlemen then, though I called attention long before it was recognized, to the probable error that existed. I give that fact to show the utter unreliability and absurdity of calculations made in that way, and for that purpose. I regret that they should have appeared there, because unlearned and ignorant persons like the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), and the editor of the Star, are misled by them, and I do not want them to be misled by anything appearing in a government book, no matter how fully it may be accounted for and explained afterwards.

Now, the hon. gentleman made one remark to which I wish to call a little attention. The hon. gentleman is most jealous, every body knows, of the honour of public men. He declared :

I think it is the duty of the hon. Minister of Customs, of the hon. Minister of Finance, and of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, to set this matter right at once, for, Sir, the canker and the virus of suspicion and non-confidence is in no better way imported into the government of the country than where you cannot take its blue-books, solemnly given to the people as facts, as in every respect true to fact, and make your calculations upon the basis of the circumstances which actually exist.

Sir, these are really valuable words, and deserved to be emphasized and remembered.

Now, about eight or nine years ago, we had occasion to have a census in this country. It so happened that it was very much in the interest of hon. gentlemen opposite—I may except, I believe, the hon. baronet, (Sir Charles Tupper), for, I think, he was not here at the time—to show or to appear to show the people two things. It was very much their interest to show, in the first place, that the population of the country was not decreasing. Long before that time a great deal had been said on our side concerning the extent and rapidity of the exodus going on. And, in the next place, it was their interest to make a good showing of the number of industrial establishments. These hon. gentlemen set to work to do these things. I do not see my hon. friend the Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden) in his place, but older members of the House, at any rate, will recollect that, shortly after the census had appeared, that hon. gentleman, in his place, brought forward the most absolute and overwhelming evidence that in one single small subdivision not less than two and fifty people in that small section, who had been residents of the United States for terms varying from three years to twenty-two years, had been falsely and improperly placed in the census, swelling the apparent number. When a statement of that kind was made by a prominent member of the opposition, the government, if they were honest, if they desired to establish the facts, had two things to do—to take the matter into their own hands and make a thorough and searching investigation, or to throw open their archives to the members of the opposition and allow them to do it for them. Failing either, the government became, to put it mildly, accomplices after the fact in a villainous fraud. What the government did on that occasion was absolutely to shut down on my hon. friend and refuse him and other members of the opposition the smallest opportunity to obtain the information which it was absolutely necessary to get in order to show the extent of these frauds. And in that position the matter remained from that time to this. Now, I have not the means of accurately ascertaining the extent of the fraud as to population. I have justification for saying that the whole subject of the population of Canada, as given in the census of 1891, is subject to the very gravest suspicion of having been improperly manipulated by the government of the day for a political purpose, and I have declined from that time out to accept the statements in the census qua population as being anything more than approximations or guesses. Whether the total of the frauds committed ran to 100,000 or 150,000 or higher, I say I cannot tell. All I can tell the House is this—that the government of Canada for the time being were accomplices after the fact and did their uttermost to shut off investigation. Details of that will be found in the Hansard of 1895. Full details of that I took care to have published in the speech of mine at Massey Hall, which seems to have exasperated hon. gentlemen on the other side to such an extent.

Mr. FOSTER. Not at all.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I recollect, in the old days, we used to have a saying, indicating that if you throw a stone among a pack of wolves, it is satisfactory to hear them howl. Now, I take it, that that is a sound general axiom. But when, after eight months, they keep howling still, it can hardly be wondered at that I feel a pleasing assurance that I did my duty on that occasion. But, Sir, if it is a matter of suspicion, however grave, as to the frauds that were practiced in the matter of population, it is not a matter of suspicion at all as to the frauds that were practiced as to enormously exaggerating the number of industrial establishments in Canada. I would just quote a few remarks I made at that time to show that these gentlemen had tolerably full warning at that time. I quote from Hansard of 1895, vol. 1, page 639 :

Now, Sir, with reference to the returns of population, the conduct of the department, and the conduct of those charged with making the census returns is open to the gravest suspicion. In other respects, it is open to no suspicion at all. Sir, I have here a volume called, 'Census of Canada for the years 1890-1, vol. 3,' to which I wish to attract the attention of the House. I do not object to men defending their cause by any honest arguments, but I do object, and I think the country will object, and I hope the whole House will sustain me in objecting, to seeing our census returns made the means of disgraceful fraud. As to the returns of population, I have indicated what I think. But now we come to the proofs which these census returns offer us of the huge increase in industrial establishments, and of people employed therein under the national policy. These census returns declare that 25,000—only think, 25,000—new industrial establishments blossomed into existence between 1881 and 1889, and that 112,000 people were employed in these establishments, who, presumably, would not have been employed at all but for them. I have taken the trouble to analyse these statements. I am not going to deal with the matter fully; my friends must help me to bring before the country the results to be learned from the analysis of the returns with regard to these figures, 25,000 new industries. First, I come to what appears to be a wholly new industry, because I find no reference to it in the similar volume of the census of 1881, which also I have in my hand. This is the industry of knitting factories. You will find them narrated on page 195. The House will be delighted to hear that there are now, or were in 1891, 223 industrial establishments in the shape of knitting factories in Canada. Where is the Minister of Militia? Is he here just now? Or is there no Nova Scotia minister representing that province?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, I am very sorry, because I was about to congratulate him. Nova Scotia is specially privileged. Of the 223 knitting factories, 99 were developed in Nova Scotia. And more than that, of the 99 developed in Nova Scotia, 93 were developed in the county of Shelburne. I find on further examination that the 93 industrial establishments in the shape of knitting factories in the county of Shelburne employed collectively 126 hands. I find, further, on the same page of the census, that they earned in that year $1,833, being at the rate of $14.55 per year for each hand, or 28 cents a week, and 4½ cents a day.

I find that in Quebec, in the county of L'Assomption, there were 12 industrial establishments known as knitting factories, employing collectively 12 hands, earning an average of $63 a year, being at the rate of $1.20 a week, wherewith, I suppose, to discharge the wages of superintendents, the cost of finding power, and dividends to the company. Portneuf is equally favoured, it has 12 establishments, which average $90 per year in wages, or $1.60 per week. Now, I find here that the value of machinery and tools employed in each factory are given; and it may interest the hon. member for Shelburne (Mr. White) to know that the 93 knitting factories in Shelburne actually employed for machinery and tools to the value of $623, being at the rate of $7 per factory for machinery. Now, I want to call the attention of the House to this fact. We are told there were 25,000 new establishments; I have shown you what some of those consist of. I have analysed these further, and I find that out of the 223 knitting factories there may possibly be 30 that deserve the name by a stretch of courtesy. Those 30 pay $288,000 in wages out of a total of $322,000. The remaining 193 pay an average of $200 a year for all purposes. But, Sir, great as the knitting factory is, fine as the work which the national policy has got in there—

Perhaps I should say the census commissioners.

--finer still in the work which the census commissioners get in there, it pales before the industry of carpet-making. The House will be glad to know, I was glad to know, that there are now 537 industrial establishments for making carpets in the Dominion of Canada. I find by a reference to the census returns of 1881 that there were only 11 then in existence; we have, therefore, an increase of 546, which is something like—how many thousands per cent? Is it 5 000 or 50,000 per cent? Some of those hon. gentlemen who are good at it may occupy their leisure time in making the calculation. Well, Sir, of these 537, 51 are in New Brunswick under the fostering care of the minister; and they employ 51 hands, mostly old women. Their collective wages are $1,792; so that each of them earns $36 per year, or 70 cents per week. Nova Scotia possesses 106 for carpet-making, employing 117 hands, who earn $62 a year, or $1.10 per week.

And so on, and so on, and so on. I will not inflict the rest on the House, but I may say that these were sample bricks of which my hon. friends on this side, before the debate closed, gave any imaginable quantity, any quantity of instances of the way in which these intelligent census commissioners improvised 25,000 new industrial establishments, that had been established in Canada in the space of ten years. I will give just one more sample, the town of Port Hope, and that is the last I shall inflict on the House:

During the last ten years, unhappily, Port Hope lost 539 in population, besides the natural increase; but while the people decreased, the industrial establishments multiplied. There are now 147 industrial establishments in Port Hope; 63 of these employ one man, or one woman, one boy or one girl; 20 of them employ two men, or two women, two boys or two girls; 33 of them employ three men, women, boys or girls; 116 establishments employ 219 people, or equal to one man or woman to each industrial establishment, and three-quarters of a boy or girl to spare.

Now, Mr. Speaker, my point is this, as the hon. gentleman brought up the question incidentally, that, with full knowledge, these hon. gentlemen made our last census of 1891 all but absolutely worthless as regarded the industrial establishments, and subject to the gravest suspicion as regarded the number of people in this country. I am not now going to take up time by discussing the question as to whether a de jure or a de facto is the best system of taking a census. There may be difficulties about altering a system which has been in existence 20 or 30 years, and although the de jure system applied in a country like this, where there are about a million of our people resident in the United States, affords almost unlimited facilities for fraud in the hands of an unscrupulous government, I am not prepared to say absolutely that it is possible to dispense with it, however desirable it may be. But what I want to call your attention to is the fact that we are very much at sea, owing to the conduct of these hon. gentlemen, on the very important question of what was the true population in 1891, and upon that basis, what was the true population of Canada in 1896. Had it not been for the deficit then existing, I would certainly have pressed hard to have had at least an enumeration of the population made, but in the teeth of the deficits for three or four successive years and a deficit certain for that year, it was hardly possible for us to undergo the expense that such a step would involve.

But, Sir, I may call attention to the fact, that the ex-Minister of Finance thinks no duty of a government is more sacred than to take care that these national returns—perhaps he does not count the census return as a blue-book—but that the blue-books of the government shall be perfectly accurate and above suspicion in all points. Now, I have noticed on the part of the hon. gentlemen and I have noticed on the part of their press a good deal of grumbling, which appears to me rather unreasonable. Those hon. gentlemen grumble because the party who assailed an unjust and high protective tariff have altered their tactics from time to time. I am credibly informed that a good many of the elderly Boers thought that Lord Roberts behaved exceedingly badly to them when he would not attack them in front as his predecessors had done. Sir, we were perfectly justified in executing a flank movement, whether that flank movement took the shape of reciprocity or preferential trade. Sir, the Boers and the protectionists were very well entrenched, and not very pervious to frontal attack, as we found on more than one occasion. There were barbed wire entanglements, there were gerrymanders and there were Senates in front of us to obstruct the progress of civilization. But I am happy to say that the flank movement seems to have had a very good practical effect, and that we are now in the enjoyment of a tariff which has greatly lightened the taxation of the people, which has given consideration to those manufacturers who dreaded, perhaps with some reason, the extraordinary development of the tactics used by the American manufacturers, and great general prosperity to this country. And here, Sir, I want to make a few remarks on the general position. Sir, even the hon. member for York, although he would have liked very well to have done it, could not deny that there had been a tremendous advance all along the line. These hon. gentlemen may say that it is all pure luck. The hon. member for York devoted a good deal of time to showing that luck came in cycles, prosperity and depression succeeding each other, and that governments had very little to do with it; in fact, I think he rather leaned to the heresy that governments were only flies on the wheel.

Mr. FOSTER. You have a patent on that.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. No, the hon. gentleman is mistaken; the man who first made that statement, if the hon. gentleman wants to know it, was the Hon. Sir John Alexander Macdonald, and the place at which he used it, Halifax, and it was in reference to a speech he made on the subject of confederation. I give every man his due, dead or alive. These hon. gentlemen may, if they like, say that it is pure luck. I am not going to deny the fact, that the Liberal party have had very rare good fortune since they came into office in 1896. It would be untrue, and foolish to do so, but, if we have had rare good luck, we have used it well, and helped it on. The preferential tariff was not a piece of pure luck, the sending of the contingents was not a piece of pure luck, the great development of the agricultural interests of the country through the instrumentality of the hon. Minister of Agriculture, largely, was not a piece of pure luck, the opening up of the British Columbia mining districts was not a piece of pure luck, and hon. gentlemen will remember that we were severely attacked because of the aid we granted in that direction), the floating of our loan at 2½ per cent, was not a piece of pure luck, the obtaining of leave for trustees to invest our securities, was not a piece of pure luck. Why should these men grudge us our luck? We have the right to our turn as well as they. The Conservative party profited to the utmost, as everybody knows, by our bad luck in 1878. Let them take their medicine to-day. Our right is to profit. When was the trade of Canada more buoyant than it is to-day? When was the general prosperity so universal as it is to-day, when was the reputation of Canada so high, not merely on the stock exchange, but on the field of battle, as it stands to-day? I do not want to quote any more poetry, because my efforts in that direction do not seem to be appreciated, but, I may remark, that it is just well, now and then, to see ourselves as others see us, and I want to call the attention of the House to the way in which the leading journals of England have received the statement and the speech so belittled by the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster). The Times states that:

Mr. Fielding's statement contains many points of interest to people in this country. One point transcending all others is the patriotic spirit of Imperial solidarity, in which the speech was conceived, delivered and acclaimed. It was not the mere statement that the past year was the most prosperous in the history of Canada.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

ada that caused the speech to be punctuated with patriotic cheers and followed by the singing of the national anthem. It was rather the common feeling that the past year also witnessed and sanctified the close affection binding the Dominion to the mother country in a community of sacrifice, sorrow and achievement, these real chords of man, these true bonds of empire. It was not the common felicitation over a prosperous balance sheet, nor even over the new adjustment of fiscal relations, however advantageous and desirable in itself. After referring to the increased preference in favour of Great Britain from July 1, the 'Times' adds that there is no immediate suggestion of reciprocity in this graceful, gratifying concession of Canada to the trade of the United Kingdom. The reciprocity, so far is the natural consequence of the fiscal policy adopted by Canada with Great Britain to the advantage of both parties. Without recasting our whole fiscal policy, we have no other reciprocity to offer. We hold that the best form of reciprocity is in the abstract, that in which two countries exchange their respective products as freely as possible without let or hindrance from fiscal barriers on either side. Perhaps in the concrete the next best form might be a common fiscal tariff for all parts of the empire, but the time for that is evidently not yet. The two ideals are economically irreconcilable, perhaps, but some day it may be found politic to subordinate the purely economical ideal to the larger ideal of a consolidated, united empire. It was perhaps within the bounds of possibility, said Mr. Fielding, that England might be induced to impose a duty for the benefit of the colonies. We do not question the possibility in the abstract, but inasmuch as Canada found her advantage in successive reductions of her tariff in favour of a country imposing no duties except for revenue purposes, perhaps it is equally possible that the solution of the problem of an Imperial Zollverein may in the end be found in the common acceptance of a policy of free exchange rather than in the reversion to a policy of protective duties and preferential tariffs.

Then, we have the Standard, the special organ of the English Conservatives, not, I am afraid, likely to be so much in favour with those who call themselves Conservatives in Canada. The Standard, after congratulations on the prosperous year, says:

It is scarcely less pleasant to hear of the success that attended the experiment of preferential trade with Great Britain. On this question Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his colleagues adopted what, on the face, was a more sentimental policy than was considered proper by Sir Charles Tupper and the opposition. While the latter always insisted that Great Britain must alter her fiscal system and give a preference to Canadian products if Canada lowered her duties on British goods, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, putting all such conditions aside boldly, made a reduction of 25 per cent in favour of British importers. After reciting the proposed extension of the preference, it adds that this is to be carried out without any claim of reciprocity from us. Though the Imperial government would, no doubt, be promoting Canadian interests if it could accept the arrangement for admitting colonial stocks to the privilege of trust investments in this country, the prospects of the adoption on our part of anything like a Zollverein were discussed by the Finance Minister with complete appreciation of what is practicable in the United Kingdom. The supporters of preferential trade within the empire will welcome the beginning made by Canada as the one way in which, if ever, such a thing might most easily be brought about. It is, however, not a question of immediate importance, and in the meanwhile, without complete reciprocity, it appears that both Canada and the United Kingdom reap the advantage of the one-sided preference now given. The Dominion obtains an increase of trade. The British importers pay a lower duty. Mr. Fielding mentioned that the immigration returns showed an increase; that many people were leaving the United States to settle in western Canada; that the whole future of the colony and its place in the empire depend on its obtaining a considerable increase of population, so that its immense resources may be adequately developed. Of late years there has been a marked advance in this respect observable, and the stream of British immigration to the United States has been diverted more and more to Canada.

The Financial News says :

We are not grateful merely for what Canada is doing for the mother country in the field or in the less glorious sphere of commerce. What appeals most strongly to our instincts is the splendid example Canada is giving to her younger sisters. Let the Australians note well that the financial prosperity and the political vigour which show in every sentence of Mr. Fielding's speech could be attained only by a federated Canada. Let the Australian colonies dwell on the fiscal stability of the Dominion. Let them emulate the course of Canadian statesmen. Australia is not one whit behind Canada in that generous impulse which has rallied over-sea Britons round the Imperial flag in South Africa. But the various colonies in the southern seas have not yet attained the same sense of political and financial responsibility that is so conspicuous in federal Canada. That will come in due course. Meantime, the example of what Canada has been able to achieve with her own financial credit should give a strong impetus to the Australian longing to make federation real and unimpaired by local and colonial jealousies. The privilege earned by Canada of having her debt recognized as trustee security is one the Australian colonies greatly desire, and they have now a good idea of what they must do ere it is conceived. Canada has evolved its own destiny unaided, and no attempt has been made to force the lessons she teaches to-day. We must not imagine she teaches the other colonies only, she has lessons for the mother country. We have need to envy the fiscal insight of the Canadian government and the disinterestedness of her people she plainly shames us for sacrificing the welfare of the colonies which still reverence the Imperial connection by refusing to discard the fetish of a fiscal policy that has survived its usefulness.

Stronger testimony could hardly be given of the truth of the statement I made a little while ago, that the eloquent speech of my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding), in delivering his budget had done right good service, not only in Canada, but to Canada, across the ocean in the motherland, with whom, for many reasons, we desire to dwell on terms of the utmost amity and concord.

I am glad now, Sir, to be able to tell the House, that I am approaching very rapidly the conclusion of the remarks I have to offer. There was one point I am bound to say, on which the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) offered caution, that I thought well placed. His remarks on the surplus and the use to be made of the surplus deserve attention. They are not his own, but they were good.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I do not in the least desire to belittle the fact that he sometimes knows a good thing when he sees it, and uses it. In the main, I agree with him, that a great surplus should be used for the purpose of reducing taxation under ordinary conditions. Of that there is no doubt. We are using our surplus to give a reduction, and a much larger reduction in reality than in appearance, to the consumers of Canada. But, there are occasions, and this is one of them, on which it is wise to remember that for good, sound financial reasons, it is not politic for us to rush into the money markets of the world, to borrow. We have recently attempted to establish a Canadian 2½ per cent loan, and we have a huge amount of money that within a short number of years we will desire to reinvest at that rate. Under these circumstances it would be indiscreet; it would be foolish for my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding), for the sake of some piece of economic pedantry to insist on doing away with the entire surplus he possesses. The people are not suffering from taxation at this present moment. Our taxation has been very greatly lightened in reality, as compared with the taxation we found when we came into office, and under all the circumstances, while I entirely agree with the general gist of the remarks made by the ex-Finance Minister: that as a rule a surplus should be used for the purpose of reducing taxation; still, when we have a considerable capital expenditure, it is always an open point whether it is not well to use the surplus for the purpose of preventing the increasing our debt, or for the purpose of preventing us going into the money market at an inauspicious time. For these reasons I agree entirely with the position taken by my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding), that on the whole, it is better for us to use our surplus to prevent an increase of debt, than for the purpose of extinguishing taxation. Then, Sir, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), reminded us that these periods of prosperity always go in cycles. He reminded us that the lean kine always succeeded the fat kine. I think, I noticed when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), was dwelling on his parable, that the lean kine always devoured in the long run the fat kine, that looked rather hungrily at his neighbour (Sir Charles Tupper), who like myself, in advancing in years, has become tolerably well furnished with flesh.

For my own part, I think there are three things that the country needs to exercise judicious caution about. One I have alluded to already. We have attained, by reason of the preferential tariff, to an extraordinary degree of favour with our chief customer, the English people. We can maintain that, we can extend that; we can double, treble and quadruple the enormous amount we have already sent to England, but on one condition, and on one condition only. That condition is, that the exporters of Canada and the producers of Canada make it a point of honour and a point of interest, in seeing that the goods they are exporting from Canada are sent to England of good quality and in good condition. There is a second thing that we will require to exercise a good deal of discretion about. In Canada as in other countries, labour and capital are sometimes in danger of coming to strained relations. I know that in certain quarters of Canada, very considerable loss to the public has been sustained by the strikes which will occasionally occur between employers of labour and the labourers; and I hope that a means may be found by this parliament and by this government, for setting in Canada, a good example to other countries in the matter of maintaining friendly relations between employers and employees. They eat off the same loaf; their interests in reality are the same, and I am inclined to think that if they can be brought together on fair terms (if they can be made more ready than they sometimes are to hear each other's side of the case), there would be little danger of any unfortunate collisions between these two important classes. Those who have studied the history of strikes in England and in the United States, know that I am speaking well within the mark, when I say, that a great industrial strike is often almost more expensive than a great war. And, wholly and clearly apart from the evil feeling and bad blood engendered between the contending parties, the economic loss, even in a comparatively trifling strike, is great enough to deserve the most careful attention of all statesmen.

There is a third thing which the government desires to keep in mind. In Canada, in former years, we were rash and reckless in continually increasing our fixed charges. I gave an illustration the other night of the extent to which the fixed charges, and the charges for the collection of revenue, had absorbed almost the entire available margin of income, and I would guard the House and the government, if I can, against allowing anything of that kind to occur with us.

For the rest, Sir, I invite examination. The facts which I have given lie open and can be proved. If I have made a mistake, let hon. gentlemen show wherein I have misstated the facts, or wherein I have erred, but, Sir, let them state what I do say; let them not put words in my mouth which I never used; and let them be good enough to verify their quotations before they make them. For the rest, I now and here repeat, on behalf of the government, the challenge I made at the opening of this session. If these gentlemen opposite condemn any particular expenditure of ours, whether it be for public works, or whether it be for railway subsidies, or for any other purpose; let them rise in their places in parliament and by word of mouth and by vote, record their disapproval of our acts. If they disapprove of our policy; if they want to uproot our preferential tariff; if they want to cut asunder the bonds which now unite us to the motherland, let them take the same manly course and put themselves on record and stand and fight by it. And, if they will not do these things, if they will prefer to remain silent, then I advise them to accept the situation, to hold their peace, and to be content with the general prosperity which has prevailed in Canada since this government came into power.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton).
Mr. Speaker, I dare say you have often heard it said by people who are engaged in agriculture, that the hardest work that the mower ever has to engage in, is when he has a very short crop of hay. Certainly if hon. gentlemen opposite are satisfied with the exhibition that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), has made of himself to-night, I can assure you that that sentiment is heartily reciprocated on this side of the House. The hon. gentleman has said something to us on the subject of good taste. I would like to ask that hon. gentleman whether he thinks it was in good taste—for the first time, I believe, in this House—for an hon. gentleman to refer to the plea of indisposition on the part of any hon. gentleman as a pretext that was unfounded and that was used because the hon. gentleman making it was not prepared to address the House. I think, Sir, if I know anything of good taste, that it never was outraged more than it was when the hon. gentleman referred to the adjournment of the House in consequence of my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) being somewhat indisposed that day, and not prepared to make a very long address, as he had to do. But, Sir, we had a curious illustration given by the hon. gentleman himself. He rose to answer the speech of my hon. friend, and stated that he intended to go into a very elaborate criticism of all the statements my hon. friend had given to the House; but before he proceeded very far, he found that he was a little indisposed himself, and he moved the adjournment of the debate in order to enable him to prepare fully for the encounter which he had undertaken and for which he found himself unequal. The hon. gentleman was good enough to indicate that in 1888, when I held the position of Minister of Finance, I had on the plea of illness failed to reply to a statement he had made on unrestricted reciprocity, and that during the whole of that debate I was absent from the House. I think, Sir, whatever my failings may be, and I know they are many, that gentlemen on both sides of this House will not include cowardice among them. I can tell the hon. gentleman that he was setting a bad example—that he was directing the minds of hon. gentlemen in this House in a direction that would not be very profitable or advantageous to the government at this hour. What is the fact, Sir? That two of the most important departments held under the government are vacant at this time on the plea of the illness of the parties who hold them. Has the hon. gentleman these suspicions aroused as to the sincerity of gentlemen on this side of the House who at any time may be indisposed and in a condition in which it would be desirable for them to make a laboured effort in this House, owing to the fact that two of his colleagues are absent on the plea of illness, because it is convenient for the government not to have them present in the House? Are we to understand that the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), who is absent on the plea of failing in his hearing, which is chronic, and which has existed from the time we knew him here, and which was no worse so far as we could judge, is absent because he found it convenient to go when the Committee on Public Accounts was preparing to take up the Yukon scandal and put people on oath and have that matter investigated this session? Has the hon. gentleman that suspicion from the fact that he and his colleagues had resorted to this means of sending out of this House members holding important departments in the public service, because it was more convenient for the government that they should not be in a position to have their conduct examined and overhauled when the House is ready to examine and overhaul it? I would like my hon. friend in the future to look at home before he attempts to indulge in such innuendoes, to violate good taste to an extent which I have never known or seen in this House before, and to set an example which is calculated to lead to very unpleasant comparisons. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman has used language for which I thought he would apologize when he addressed the House to-day. He ought to have apologized. He used language which we have not been accustomed to hear used across the floor of this House by anybody, in reference to my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Ex-Minister, if you please.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have only anticipated, Mr. Speaker, by a few months an event which I have no hesitation in saying is certain to happen. That hon. gentleman forgot himself so far as to say in regard to my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) :

Now, I am bound to say that the speech of the hon. gentleman deserves some considerable attention at our hands. I may define it briefly as a magazine of misstatements.

The hon. gentleman tells us that he has had great parliamentary experience, and that he listened with profound delight to the brilliant financial exposition made by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), which he had hardly ever heard equalled, certainly never excelled, in any parliament during the long period of his public career; and he ventured to say at the same time that he had listened to the most feeble, puerile criticism on the part of the ex-Minister of Finance that he had ever heard. Now, I may say to my hon. friend that I have had still greater experience than he has had.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Excuse me, you have not.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes. I tell the hon. gentleman that I have been in public life eight years longer than he has.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Not in parliament, however.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I say I have been in public life, and I have been not only where I had an opportunity of hearing what finance ministers could do on the floor of this parliament, but where I have had an opportunity of listening to the greatest financial experts that are to be found in the world—those in the Imperial parliament; and I tell the hon. gentleman that during my public life of forty-five years in May next, I have never heard a more disingenuous statement come from the lips of a Finance Minister than the budget speech delivered by my hon. friend opposite. I say more, Sir: I say I have never heard a more stringent, a more exhaustive, a more complete, a more crushing criticism of a budget speech than that delivered by my hon. friend, the ex-Finance Minister. This is a matter on which gentlemen differ in opinion; and if I did not entertain that exalted opinion of the great, the brilliant effort made by my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance, I have no doubt that when the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) sat down to-night after declaring how he intended to tear and rend that speech to pieces, he gave the House the evidence that he was unable to make a single point against that speech, except the point in which he had been forestalled by my hon. friend from York, N.B., (Mr. Foster) in the correction of one of those slight errors which will frequently occur in handling a mass of figures—a mere clerical error. The hon. gentleman made use of language which I think we will all, on reflection, condemn. I do not think there is any gentleman on that side of the House who will say that the term, 'miscreant,' is a proper term to apply to public men sitting on the one side or the other. What did he say? He said:

The old flag, at long last cleansed and purified, has been rescued in fair fight from the hands of the miscreants who traded on it and degraded it, and the old flag now waves better and purer and loftier than ever.

When did that hon. gentleman ever do anything to raise the old flag? If there is one man more than another in Canada who has done all that lay in his power to degrade and lower and destroy that flag, so far as Canada is concerned, it is the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. What did he do in 1891, when leagued with parties in the United States, who were determined to destroy British institutions, and united with avowed annexationists in the United States, he led the van in this country upon a policy denounced by the Hon. Edward Blake as one so disloyal that it would deprive Canada of British institutions—a policy so disloyal that Mr. Blake felt compelled to refuse to go into the battle with his late confere because he was not willing to fight under false colours and because he believed that the commercial subjugation proposed by the hon. gentleman to the United States would end in political subjugation and destroy our British connection. I do not attribute to him, as I properly might, the term that he has used. I might say that no man but a miscreant would have adopted such a policy, but if I use that term, I take it from his own mouth and his own lips. To whom does he apply that term, and whom does he charge with having lowered and degraded the flag of England? It is the men who fought to the death that disloyal policy which the hon. gentleman advocated. It is the men who defeated the conspiracy which the hon. gentleman had entered into when he leagued himself with parties in Washington to destroy British institutions in Canada. If that term 'miscreant' could be hallowed and rendered an honourable epithet, it would be by applying it to the conduct of men who raised and saved that flag, as the Liberal-Conservative party did in 1891, when they defeated the disloyal attempt to subvert British institutions in Canada. The hon. gentleman further said:

It is a sad symptom of the mental deterioration which I deplore, that we find in the hon. gentleman's case, that words such as 'candour,' 'purity,' 'loyalty,' 'honesty,' are perpetually in his mouth and perpetually absent from his heart.

Where does the hon. gentleman find instances of men who can have all these epithets in their mouths and not one of the qualities they represent in their hearts?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

He finds them in his own associates, and it is from their conduct that he has evolved the slander which he has attempted to fasten on my hon. friend.

The hon. gentleman quoted from Tennyson:

A lie that is all a lie can be met and fought out right,

But a lie that is half a truth is a harder battle to fight.

That is the battle we have to fight. We have to fight the lie which is half a truth, and from the hour the hon. gentleman took his feet until he resumed his seat, his whole tissue of misstatements was precisely that lie which is half a truth and hard to fight.

He said to my hon. friend: 'I sympathize with him from the bottom of my heart. I myself have known what it is to have hard luck.' Although it is rather late in life for either the hon. gentleman or myself to be greatly improved by lessons, will he allow me to point out what the cause of his hard luck has been. The Nemesis that has pursued him for many long years was that he had a higher opinion of himself than anybody else had. Does he remember when he went out on strike in 1869? Down to that hour, he prided himself on being a blue-blooded Tory, a Tory of Tories, and I frankly admit that while he was in the rank and file, he was a fairly respectable member of the great Liberal-Conservative party of that day. But, unfortunately for him, that great man to whom Canada owes a debt she can never repay, the Hon. Sir John Macdonald, did not estimate the hon. member's talents and attainments and abilities so highly as he did himself; and when a vacancy occurred in the office of Finance Minister, he called to his aid one of the ablest financiers Canada has ever known—Sir Francis Hincks. What happened? The hon. gentleman there and then sat down and wrote Sir John Macdonald that he would turn his back upon him at once and for ever because he was not given that position. Was that going out on strike?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The hon. gentleman has made a statement without a particle of foundation of truth, and he knows it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would call upon you, Mr. Speaker, to call the hon. gentleman to order. No hon. gentleman in this House can charge an hon. member with having wilfully made an untrue statement.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The hon. gentleman has made a statement impugning my conduct. Let him produce his authority.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman must withdraw that statement.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman should withdraw the last part of his statement, namely, that the hon. leader of the opposition has made a statement which he knows to be untrue.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I stated that it was absolutely without foundation in fact, which it is, but I will, in obedience to your ruling, Sir, admit that while it is utterly and absolutely without the smallest particle of foundation in fact, I have not the legal proof that he knows it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is an aggravation of the offence, and I must insist on an absolute withdrawal of the statement.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I understand that the hon. member has withdrawn the statement.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I withdraw the statement.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I am simply asking the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) if he withdraws the expression. I understand him to do so.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Certainly, I withdraw it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman having got a lesson which, I hope, will not require to be repeated during this discussion, I shall resume my observations. And I say that the statement I have made I know to be simply accurately true—

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I call the hon. gentleman to order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) must accept the statement made by the hon. minister (Sir Richard Cartwright). Consequently, I suppose, he is accepting that statement.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I wish you to remember that the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) has challenged me for my authority for the statement I made. Have I not the right to give it?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. No, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has stated that he never wrote such a letter, and—

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no; he did not say that.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I understood the hon. minister to say that the statement made by the hon. leader of the opposition is not correct. Consequently, it must be accepted by the leader of the opposition.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. But the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) has challenged me for my evidence. I state in the presence of this House that I saw the letter, that Sir John Macdonald showed me the letter. I do not believe the hon. gentleman—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order. I do not think this is a proper discussion. The statement made by the leader of the opposition was a personal statement affecting the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The hon. minister denies that statement; and that denial must be accepted by the hon. leader of the opposition.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am quite sure, Sir, that you will not rule that when an hon. gentleman in this House challenges the authority on which a statement is made, an hon. member is not permitted to give that authority.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. There has been a denial by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and that denial must be accepted.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Now, Mr. Speaker, having disposed of that little incident, I want to go on and indicate the hard luck that pursued the hon. gentleman from that time to this. From that hour when he was not made Finance Minister by Sir John Macdonald he devoted his life in this House to the most violent abuse, the most incessant tirade of abuse, that it was possible for one man to use toward another. And with what result? With the result that day after day the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald rose higher and higher, the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) sank lower and lower. I call that very hard luck. But harder luck awaited him. He was entrusted with the coveted position of Minister of Finance by the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie. And, Sir, during the five years that he held this office, as the records of parliament will show, no man that ever undertook it, failed so utterly and lamentably to discharge the duties incumbent upon that high office as did the hon. gentleman. He knows that every calculation he gave in the House proved, when twelve months came around, to be utterly fallacious and without foundation. He knows that he witnessed the country sinking day by day, year by year, lower and lower, until the independent electors of Canada at last got the longed-for opportunity and swept him and all about him out of office with one of the most overwhelming majorities ever known in the history of this country. That, certainly, was very hard luck. But still worse remains to be told. The hon. gentleman made the humiliating confession on the floor of this House two years ago that as Minister of Finance he had come to the conclusion that the policy that was advocated by the Conservative opposition of that day was well founded, and he had determined to adopt it; and that he had prepared a tariff for the purpose of giving a certain amount of protection to the interests of Canada—

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Not a particle of protection.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We will not discuss that. That was the question at the time. The industries of Canada were sinking, and the hon. gentleman came to the decision to raise the tariff by a very considerable amount. He himself stated two years ago on the floor of this House that a free trade brigade came up from the maritime provinces, and told him that they would cross the House and vote against him if he did not abandon his proposed tariff. And the hon. gentleman abandoned his convictions and his own deliberate determination to hold his office, failed to do that which the interest of his government and the interest of the country required, and let the country go to Jericho. I call that particularly hard luck. Has any hon. gentleman in this House or in any place where parliamentary government exists, ever been compelled to make a more humiliating confession as to his position than that statement of the hon. gentleman with all that it implied? But it did not end there. The hon. gentleman went out of office—by the indignant assistance a posteriori, of the electors of Canada. And it disagreed with him very much. For eighteen long years he sat on this side of the House, showing that he and all those whom he was able to control were as utterly destitute of principle as any body of politicians ever known in this country or in the world. He was one day for absolute free trade; another day he was for unrestricted reciprocity with the United States and the adoption of the highest protective tariff in the world, even if he had to turn his back upon Canada. The hon. gentleman, when he was asked at Oshawa by Mr. Scott whether he was prepared to adopt the American tariff and to discriminate against England in order to obtain unrestricted reciprocity, answered: I am. Just as he told us in this House, that Canada owed nothing to England, that England owes more to Canada than Canada owes to England. And when reminded of this the other day, he approved it and repeated it. All that we owe to England, said the hon. gentleman, is Christian forgiveness for the deep wrongs she has inflicted upon Canada by the mismanagement of our affairs. That is the position of the hon. gentleman who, according to his own statement has elevated and cleansed the flag of England. It is astounding that an hon. gentleman should so expose himself as to make statements of that kind. But still worse luck remained—hard as that was, still worse remained. At last his party got back into power. They did not come in on any great principle; they got back by an accident of an accident, by a conspiracy which I will not weary the House by referring to in detail. But, in order that they might get into power, where did the hon. gentleman find himself? Why he found that the party he had dragged down from the time he first became connected with it down to the hour that they got back into power, only got back into power by submitting him to the greatest humiliation that any man ever suffered in this country. They manacled him and chained him to the deck. They gagged him that he might not open his mouth until the elections were over. When he was let loose it was all up with them. Nothing could get them into power unless he was prevented from opening his mouth and ruining their cause, as he did when he was Minister of Finance. When he was Minister of Finance he said that a howling mob occupied Parliament Square. So they did, they were clamouring for bread. And what did General Distress say to that army? He gave the word of command: 'Starve.' Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman, as I say, has had the misfortune to be one of the great causes of the ill-luck of his party. It has pursued him and will pursue him until he sinks out of sight. His opinion of himself is so great that he could not believe that anybody knew anything but himself. When his own party, when his leader and the ablest men in the ranks of the Liberal party went to him as Minister of Finance and begged him for God's sake to do something to rescue the prostrate, dying industries of Canada, the hon. gentleman said: You know nothing about it. He says that he borrowed the expression: 'Flies on the wheel' from Sir John A. Macdonald—I suppose, as he is borrowing a good deal that belongs to us just now. But, what did he tell them? He said: Oh, it is all nonsense, you don't know anything about it, you must not undertake to teach me, the great Minister of Finance of Canada. He said: What you must do is this, you must be more industrious and you must be more frugal. That is to say: You must work harder and you must eat less. He said: We are mere flies on the wheel, we have to go around with it instead of being able to stop it or to hinder it. There, I say again, was the hard luck the hon. gentleman experienced. When he got back to power, carried back on the shoulders of the people upon whom he had been so heavy a burden for so many years, he found that he could not go back into the position in which he had been such a gigantic failure in attempting to discharge the duties of the Minister of Finance; and so he was relegated to a back seat, and a young gentleman whom he is now obliged to extol and eulogize in this House, took his place. Sir, what became of him? He knows that he is a barnacle on the state to-day. He knows that he has not given one dollar's worth of value to the people of Canada for the $7,000 a year that they have to pay him. Indeed, he himself declared in this House that his office was an entirely useless one, that there was no benefit in wasting public money upon it, and he has proved that to a demonstration. Not only has he proved it to a demonstration, but he has shown that a man in his position, destitute of any confidence in the judgment of other people, who thinks that he has in his own cranium all the knowledge of the known world, can do a great deal of harm. Sir, all that he can say of his work as Minister of Trade and Commerce is that he has brought to naught a magnificent project on which the heart of the people of Canada was set, supported by both sides of the House, brought to perfection, the contract ready for signature, the British government joining with Canada and giving £75,000 sterling a year for ten years to enable us to have a fast Atlantic service. Sir, when parliament had given power to the Conservative government to ask for tenders, to complete the contract, and to sign the contract subject to the approval of parliament, he knows that for some cause or other, when that contract was ready for signature, it was not signed, although the British government were perfectly satisfied, and we had one of the most able and effective firms that could be found in the world, the Allans, of Glasgow and Liverpool and Montreal, undertaking to perform that service, and the service would have been ready on the first day of May last to go into active operation, with four steamships, and would have given to Canada all the advantages which we were expecting. Sir, the hon. gentleman destroyed that project because he said that he could do better. He could not believe that any wisdom could exist outside of himself. And where is he now? Why, he is in the humiliating position of having to stand up in this House and confess that he has destroyed that magnificent project, and that it is out of sight. He has been peddling, wasting the public money in sending gentlemen backwards and forwards across the ocean to negotiate with people who were utterly incapable, as I told him at the time on the floor of this House, to render such a service. Time was wasted, the golden opportunity of advancing the interests of the agricultural community was lost, and he now confesses that the materials of ship-building have so increased in price that he has had to abandon the project. I call that very hard luck for a gentleman who occupies so great a space in the public eye. That is a humiliating position to occupy, and I do not wonder that he says that he sympathizes with my hon. friend in his hard luck, for he knows what hard luck is.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Well, Sir, he says there was great depression between 1873 and 1878. He is quite right. He says that that great depression was followed by a great fall in values. He is quite right again. It is perfectly true that there was then a great fall in values, and I want to know if that does not fully maintain the argument and the calculations based upon the soundest principles of finance, of my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Foster) that the great expansion of trade and the wonderful position the country occupies to-day are owing to an increase in values. Therefore, the hon. gentleman has made a case against himself. But, here is a libel uttered by him on the floor of this House which is deeply to be regretted. Sir, the hon. gentleman dared to say on the floor of this House :

I well recollect that there was nothing that those hon. gentlemen did not stoop to in those days. I well recollect that they induced manufacturers who were carrying on their business at a reasonable profit to suspend operations for the purpose of inflaming their operatives against the Liberal party.

Now, Sir, there is a gross libel uttered against a great body of gentlemen who have done an immense deal by their energy, enterprise and capital to build up Canada to its present high position. They are thus traduced on the floor of this House by a gentleman who undertakes to speak for the Liberal party. I say that a gentleman who would charge hon. gentlemen on this side of the House with stooping to such a thing, was again measuring our corn in his own half bushel. He knew that if he had been in our place at the time he would have done that himself. But, no man in the Liberal-Conservative party would have so degraded himself in his own estimation, and in the estimation of every respectable man in this country, by stooping to so contemptible a means of advancing party interests. But what more does he say? He makes a deeper, blacker and fouler charge against a great mass of intelligent people, than that—I refer to the Orangemen. I am not an Orangeman, and I, perhaps, know as little about Orangeism as any man in Canada. But I have always understood that one of the great features of Orangeism was reverence for the flag and Crown; I have always understood that one of the great features of Orangeism was the maintenance of British law and British order. Now, Sir, what did the hon. gentleman say :

I remember when an Orange demonstration was engineered in the city of Montreal for the express purpose of setting religion against religion and race against race if it were to the detriment of the Liberal party. What did these men care then, or what do they care now.

He is speaking of every Orangeman in Canada when he makes that statement—

—if the streets of Montreal were to run red, provided always that they scored a point against the Liberal administration.

If the hon. gentleman thinks that he can advance the interests of his party in this country by a foul, a false and a malicious statement of that kind, uttered against a great body of intelligent independent men throughout Canada, I think he greatly mistakes his position. Now, he says :

I am speaking of what—

I am glad to know that I am getting through with these personal references in regard to the hon. gentleman, as it is always, as everybody knows, a most painful thing for me to be compelled to make them. He says :

I am speaking of what is perfectly well known to every man here who paid any attention to the history of Canada, when I say that until after they were elected in 1878, they—

That is the Liberal-Conservative party—

—never avowed that they intended to introduce a policy of protection.

This is a statement boldly, broadly and clearly made by the hon. gentleman. Now, let me give him a proof which will controvert every word of what the hon. gentleman says. On March 10, 1876, Sir John Macdonald moved :

That the Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be resolved that this House regrets that His Excellency the Governor General has not been advised to recommend to parliament a measure for the readjustment of the tariff which would not only aid in alleviating the stagnation of business deplored in the gracious speech from the Throne, but would also afford fitting encouragement and protection to the struggling manufactures and industries, as well as to the agricultural products of the country.

I am inclined to think that the hon. gentleman's memory is getting very short, and I will not say that when the hon. gentleman made that statement he knew there was not a word of truth in it, but he ought to have known it if he did not, and if he does not know the facts that are so perfectly patent to every hon. member of this House and the country, the sooner he disappears the better. On that resolution I made a few remarks. I do not intend to weary the House with them, but, if the House will indulge me for a moment, I will read a short extract from my speech. On the 20th of February, 1877, I said :

Whether you look at it, Sir, in relation to revenue, whether you look at it as a means of getting a reciprocity treaty; whether you look at it as a means of giving a just, fair and legitimate protection to the great manufacturing industries of, and to the great agricultural interests of this country; look at it from what point you may, a policy the very reverse of that which is pursued by this country is demanded by the interests of Canada. Boards of trade, representing the commercial and manufacturing interests of this Dominion, have dealt with this question and in no uncertain way. They have asked that the tariff be so reconstructed as not only to preserve our credit intact, but to foster and promote our industries. The resolution which the right hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) moved a year ago, the policy on which the party he leads have taken their stand, propounds to the country that fitting protection should be given to the suffering industries of the country.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

What did Mr. Mackenzie say? Did he say that we had not avowed the policy of protection? He addressed the House in answer to myself, and what did he say?

I congratulate the hon. gentleman—

Dr. Tupper then—

—as a Nova Scotian representative—though he says he is a citizen of Ontario and speaks in that character—that he has been obliged to hoist the pure protection banner, and that under that he is resolved to fight for the future. So be it. We have never swerved in our devotion to what we conceive to be the true trade principle of the country, viz.: that we should have a revenue tariff, and a tariff imposed only for the purposes of revenue, although it is well known that, with our revenue necessities, such a tariff practically yields a very large measure of protection.

I give the hon. gentleman that as the evidence of a man whose word will be believed from one end of Canada to the other as completely and as unreservedly as that of the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman said :

The House may have noticed that in comparing expenditures between this government and the last, he—

The hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster)— —was exceedingly careful to select the year 1896, knowing, as he well knew, that the accounts for that year had been deliberately cooked, so as to make them wholly unreliable as a means of comparison.

I am astonished; the last man in this House, the last man in this country that should ever refer to such a disgrace to any public man as the cooking of accounts is the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright). On the floor of this House, in 1874, in speaking on the budget, I not only said, but proved, that the hon. gentleman, in order to create a deficit, against the outgoing government, which had never existed, took bodily, money voted for capital expenditure, and spent as capital expenditure and transferred a large amount to consolidated revenue account by which he cooked the accounts, and when the hon. gentleman ventured to question the accuracy of my statement, I declared that I would go before the Committee on Public Accounts and bring the ablest men of his own department to prove the absolute correctness of the statements I made. The hon. gentleman shrank from the encounter and never gave me the opportunity. I think it hardly lies in the mouth of the hon. gentleman, in the face of the evidence in the public records of the country to charge any man with cooking accounts. But, the statement was utterly foundationless; in fact, my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) did not compare the year 1896 at all, and therefore the whole argument fell to the ground. The hon. gentleman's argument was that the amount of the estimates for 1897, $38,358,000 must be increased by supplementary estimates, to the extent of $3,000,000. What occurred was this: The government of that day, of which I was a member, brought down estimates to this House and they were met by obstruction—such obstruction as never occurred in this House before, such obstruction as I hope, for the honour and character of the country and of this parliament, never will occur again—in consequence of which they were unable to pass their estimates. We said: It is folly to bring down supplementary estimates when these hon. gentlemen will not allow any estimates to pass at all, except those that they might be inclined to accept. Although we had an overwhelming majority at our back we were met by a factious obstruction to prevent supplies being voted. These estimates were not supplementary estimates; these estimates never would have found their place on the Table of the House. What occurred was this: All the ministers put into their estimates all the applications that were made for the purpose of bringing them down before council, there to select all that the government were prepared to adopt, and bring down to the House and nobody can say to-day whether there would have been $2,000,000 or $1,000,000, or $500,000 in the supplementary estimates, because when they came before council they never were taken up, for the reason that we found that we were in the position in the House that we could not carry our main estimates. Therefore, it was utterly useless to bring down supplementary estimates. The hon. gentleman's statement is utterly unfounded in fact, but, here is a statement made that I must detain the House for a single moment while I refer to it. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said:

The ex-Minister of Finance is not ashamed to stand up and give the House to understand that he had reduced the expenditure to a matter of $37,000,000. How did he do it? By starving two of the most important services Canada has to deal with, by so reducing the expenditure on militia as to make the whole outlay for the year practically useless.

Does the minister (Sir Richard Cartwright) not know that there was a Liberal brochure scattered through the province of Quebec broadcast, denouncing my government for having spent an enormous amount of money on the militia service. Does he not know that when the Venezuelan trouble arose, and when Germany did not show any too great friendship for the mother country, one of the first acts of Sir Mackenzie Bowell's government was to expend about $3,000,000 to place the best arms that could be secured in the hands of the Canadian militia? Does he not know that that government lost a large support in the province of Quebec on account of the declaration that they were wasting money in providing these arms. I may say in passing, that the rifle placed in the hands of every militiaman by Sir Mackenzie Bowell's government, was the very rifle that the British government selected for service in South Africa, and had that expenditure not been made by the Conservative government, every one knows that the cost of sending the Canadian contingents of 2,500 to the seat of war, would be enormously increased by this government having to purchase that very rifle for each volunteer. I despair of seeing a blush mantle to the cheek of the minister (Sir Richard Cartwright), but if ever a statement was made by an hon. gentleman that he should be ashamed of, it is that statement.

The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) has indulged in a sporting offer. In his somewhat advanced years he is getting very sporty. He has challenged my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) to have his speech bound together with his own and circulated all over this country. Well that is not original, for my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) has anticipated it. I have the great Massey Hall speech which the Minister of Trade and Commerce was compelled to grind out by his hard taskmasters; it is the Globe newspaper's verbatim report of that speech, and my hon. friend (Mr. Foster), has given the Minister of Trade and Commerce the full benefit of being responsible for it, and then he has subjected it to that same caustic criticism that he subjected the speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), and he has circulated both the speech and the criticism. The challenge of the Minister of Trade and Commerce has, therefore, not even the merit of originality. I undertake to say that if he attempted to carry out his challenge, there is not a man on the Treasury benches nor one of his supporters behind him, who would not go to him and say: For God's sake Sir Richard do not ruin the party by doing such a thing as that.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Minister of Trade and Commerce asked: Where is the amendment. Well, the amendment is here, and the hon. gentleman got due notice of it. We did not treat this amendment as the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) treated his amendment on going into supply, when he concealed it in the inner Chamber where he was concocting his speech upon the subject, and was so careful not to allow any person on this side of the House to have the least inkling of what he proposed to move until the very minute he was about to resume his seat after making his speech. I was under a great disadvantage in answering the hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) on the spur of the moment, but I did the best I could, and his resolution was of such a character that even though taken by surprise and without an opportunity of giving it consideration, the answer to that speech is such that I do not think the Minister of Trade and Commerce will agree that it shall be bound up along with the speech of the hon. member (Mr. Russell), and circulated throughout this country. I shall be quite ready to join in that commercial enterprise if the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), is anxious for it. Now, Sir, the amendment which the hon. minister has inquired after, is this :

That all the words after that be left out, and that it be resolved that this House is of opinion that a system of mutual trade preference between Great Britain and Ireland and the colonies would greatly stimulate increased production in, and commerce between these countries, and would thus promote and maintain the unity of the empire, and that nothing which falls short of the complete realization of such a policy should be considered as final or satisfactory.

There is the position on which we take our stand, and there is the line on which we are prepared to go to battle with hon. gentlemen in the face of the intelligent electors of Canada, and to ask these electors whether they want a preference such as has been given without any return on the other side, or whether they want a mutual preference that will carry out the objects that those who have moved in the direction of inter-Imperial preferential trade have held to from the first. I do not intend to occupy much more time with the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but he said some things this afternoon of which I propose to take a little passing notice. He told us that my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) had been guilty of a great act of unfairness when he mingled expenditure on capital account and expenditure on consolidated revenue together. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), did nothing of the kind. He put both expenditures in parallel columns so that every intelligent man in the House and in the country would be able to separate the one from the other as readily as it could possibly be done.

The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) boasted of what his government had done with reference to the canals, and I may say that I believe they have pretty much abandoned their attempt at grand larceny with reference to our canal policy. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is entirely mistaken when he says that the policy of deepening the canals to fourteen feet is the Liberal policy. Let me tell him that a canal commission was appointed immediately after confederation with Sir Hugh Allan at its head, and including in its membership eminent engineers and merchants. It was perhaps one of the ablest commissions ever appointed in this country, and it reported in favour of the Welland Canal being deepened to twelve feet and the St. Lawrence canals to the same depth. That policy was adopted, and it was proceeded with under Sir John Macdonald's government and the contracts let. Then as the question obtained greater attention, certain gentlemen in this country and in this House came to the conclusion that it would be better to secure a fourteen-foot navigation than a twelve-foot navigation, and this matter was pressed upon the Hon. Alex. Mackenzie and he utterly refused to listen to it. Turn to Hansard of 1875, and you will find that when the question of deepening the Welland Canal to fourteen feet was propounded by the Hon. Mr. Holton, on going into supply, I gave a hearty and enthusiastic support to the project, as one which I was satisfied the interest of Canada required; and you will find that, notwithstanding the entreaty of Mr. Holton, a friend of the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, that motion was voted down by Mr. Mackenzie's government. Then I may say that when we were engaged in the great work of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, costing the country such an enormous sum of money, we did not feel warranted in pushing the work with the same vigour that we otherwise would especially when the hon. gentlemen told us that it would be utterly fatal to the credit of Canada, completely ruinous to the country, to attempt it at all. But, in the eighteen years that we were in power, as the ex-Minister of Finance has said, $36,000,000 was expended by the Liberal-Conservative party on canals; and when hon. gentlemen opposite were brought down to the point, the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), declared that he could open the fourteen-foot navigation in two years; but after three years and more, the canals are not yet open to fourteen-foot navigation. But, Sir, the hon. gentlemen will find that with all this abounding trade, with these enormous revenues, with money to burn in their hands, the government has only spent about half a million dollars a year on the canals during the last three years, more than the annual expenditure of the three years before they came into power; and yet one would suppose that they had made up their minds at one time that they were going to take this question of canals entirely into their own hands.

Now, Sir, I think I am about done with my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, because some other remarks he made, I shall take up in connection with a little criticism of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. I may say that I have little reason to find fault with these hon. gentlemen. I am now following the example of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who, on two or three occasions, turned round to scold his friends, and he found a good deal of fault with the Minister of Finance. I think I must find a good deal of fault with the ex-Minister of Finance. I do not think he treated me altogether well when he subjected that budget speech to such an exhaustive and complete criticism as absolutely to leave me nothing but a few crumbs to deal with, when I came to take the question up, I believe there is in this country a society for the prevention of cruelty to animals; who, when they find that everything like vivisection is going on, come down on the parties practising it, although those parties say: 'We are only resorting to vivisection in the case of a dumb animal, whereas the life of a human being may depend on it.' But the society have pursued their hostility to vivisection to a great extent; and I am inclined to think that if any of them had been in the House the other night, when the ex-Minister of Finance was subjecting these two hon. gentlemen to vivisection, they would have been disposed to take action against him to prevent cruelty to animals. The hon. Minister of Finance commenced his budget speech with a grand burst about the wonderful prosperity of the country. He said:

The year 1898 was regarded as a phenomenal year; but great as was its activity, that of the year 1899 was still greater, and I may say of that year that it was beyond all question the most prosperous in Canadian history.

There is no person on this side of the House, no Liberal-Conservative in Canada, who does not rejoice that the hon. Minister of Finance was able to make such a statement as that. But what I complain of is, that running through the whole speech from A to Z, the story was told as if these hon. gentlemen had brought this about—as if Canada owed this marvellous prosperity and progress to something which they had done. The hon. gentleman did give Providence a passing remark at the very conclusion of his speech, and it was evidently very grudgingly done. But, I think, it would have been only fair on the part of the hon. gentleman, to have said that Canada was enjoying this exceptional prosperity, not because of the present government, and the marvellous things they had done to bring it about, but that the rest of the world was in the same condition. I hold under my hand an extract, which, I am sure the House will allow me to read, on this subject, from the London Times of January 6, 1900:

The year just closed has been an 'annus mirabilis' in regard to trade. In the remarkable story told in the series of reports published in our columns yesterday, and dealing with the chief industries of the country, there is a record of prosperity rarely equalled. . . . In almost all the metal and mineral trades prosperity rarely equalled is reported. It is evident that makers do not know how to cope with the orders which they have booked and which are coming in. From the Cleveland district we learn that 'all previous records in the steel and iron trades have been surpassed during the past year, pig iron prices especially being better than during the previous twenty-seven years. . . . More than one report makes it clear that 1899 was the best year for about a quarter of a century.'

What is the history of the United States of America? Precisely the same. The hon. gentleman knows that they declare that they have reached a position in their trade and commerce and everything that indicates the greatness and advancing prosperity of the country, such as they have never known before. Therefore, what I object to, is putting these things forward in a manner to lead—not the members of this House, who know how little hon. gentlemen opposite have to do with it—but, people not so well informed, in some of the back settlements of the country, to believe that this government has achieved something marvellous for Canada, that has never happened in its history before. The hon. gentleman referred in passing to the loss of revenue in the post office, and he said, that he remembered my speaking at Brockville, and saying that the loss of revenue consequent on a two cent rate of postage would have to fall on other taxes.

I say so now and I am prepared to establish it. The hon. gentleman admits that there has been a loss of revenue, owing to the two-cent postage, amounting to $334,032. But, he did not tell the whole story. I will not say, when speaking of my hon. friend, that a lie which is half a truth is the hardest to fight, but he did not tell the whole truth. What is the whole truth? It is that you must add to that amount of $334,032 the amount of $387,783 wasted public money during last year, in all, from half a million to a million dollars, wasted because this government used the mounted police to do our postal work. They used the mounted police for this service, and then ruined, as the major-general commanding says, the whole militia service of this country, destroyed all the schools of instruction and everything of that kind, by sending up to that country 200 of the permanent force. Everybody knows that there was no section of the country to be found in which peace and order existed to a greater degree than the Canadian Yukon. What, then, was the object of using the mounted police in this postal service and sending up the permanent force? The only object was to have the post office work charged to the Mounted Police Department instead of the Post Office Department. And everybody who knows anything of the question knows that it would have cost more than was charged against the mounted police force to properly perform the postal service in the Yukon, but instead that service was a scandal and disgrace. Charging the cost of the mounted police force engaged in the postal work to the Post Office Department would make a deficit of $732,815 for the last year instead of $334,000.

I stated at Brockville, and I repeat it here, that this reduction in postage, which has been a great boon to the merchants and bankers and commercial men, has not been an advantage to anything like the same degree to the agriculturists and the ordinary tax-paying population.

Then, the hon. gentleman said that our government railways are being developed to a considerable extent, but that our expenditure in that direction was a profitable one, because it was giving increased revenue to the Intercolonial Railway. I deny that statement. If we could get at the truth, which ought to be most easily obtained, we would have evidence clear and unmistakable that instead of the development of the Intercolonial Railway system giving increased earnings, it has been the cause of a heavy deficit. From Lévis to Montreal, the Intercolonial Railway has not paid its expenses or anything like it, and what increased revenue is we must look for in the province of Nova Scotia, and that is due in a great measure to the development of Newfoundland and the consequent increased business between that colony and our far eastern provinces. But that subject we will discuss more fully on another occasion.

But there is no difficulty in showing a surplus in the Intercolonial Railway when you spend a million dollars per year on that railway, and you have done this year, and charge it to capital account. Every one who knows anything of the subject knows that while you keep adding to the capital account and put a million into the hands of the man who is responsible for operating the railway, he can make the surplus pretty much what he pleases. That will be established beyond controversy when we reach and probe this subject a little further.

The hon. gentleman said that he would divide the period from 1868 to 1899 into three periods. To that division I take exception. He says that during the first period there was a Conservative government in power part of the time and a Liberal government the balance—that was the first ten years, from 1868 to 1878. Let me ask my hon. friend what he meant by this sentence :

There was a Conservative government in power part of the time and a Liberal government for part of the time, when we had a much lower tariff.

That reads as if, when the Liberal government was in power, we had a lower tariff. Does the hon. gentleman mean that during part of that ten years, from 1868 to 1878, when the Liberals were in power, there was a lower tariff ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). There was a lower tariff than the one which followed when we had the national policy. I divided the term into three periods—one the low tariff period ; second, the national policy ; and, third, the present tariff, which I described as a moderate tariff.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I cannot believe that my hon. friend is as stupid as he appears.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think the hon. gentleman is.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Let me put the question again. He knows that the Conservative party were in power from 1868 to 1873, and that from 1873 to 1878 the Liberals were in power. Now, taking the sentence I have quoted, I ask him again if he means that there was a lower tariff when the Liberals were in power than when the Conservatives had office ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I say that there was a lower tariff than in the period which followed, the national policy period, and the period subsequent to that, but I cannot make the hon. gentleman understand if he will not.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I put the question again. The hon. gentleman knows that the Liberal-Conservatives were in power from 1868 to 1873, and that from 1873 to 1878 the Liberals were in power. Does he say that there was a lower tariff when the Liberals were in power ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I say that there was a lower tariff than during the two later periods with which I was comparing it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman does not mean to say that the tariff was much lower when the Liberals were in power than when the Conservatives had office ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The tariff at the beginning of confederation was immensely lower than in 1878, when the national policy was established, and still lower than the subsequent period.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is not the point.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That was the point I was discussing.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman's language would imply that the tariff was lower when the Liberal party was in power, from 1873 to 1878, than when the Conservatives had office, previous to that date. He ought to correct that.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I have nothing to correct. I was comparing the first period with that which followed when the national policy was introduced, and which, I suppose, the hon. gentleman will not object to my calling a high tariff period.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Quite right, we are very proud of that.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Then, we had a period from 1896 to the present, which, if not a very low tariff, is certainly a comparatively moderate revenue tariff.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That we dispute it toto. And he then goes on to speak of the increase of trade that has occurred, in comparing one period with another. Now, I ask the hon. gentleman if he thinks that a bald statement of the figures of the trade in the various periods is any indication whatever of the ability of the men who are guiding and controlling public affairs? I am sure he does not. Yet there is no other inference in the whole story as told by the hon. gentleman—the reader is left to infer that this increase has been due to the accession to power of the Liberal party, though the hon. gentleman knows that there is no justification for such an inference. That period when the industries of Canada had the highest protection was a period during which our tariff was 15 per cent. I do not say that the tariff was one of the most highly protective tariffs, but I say that the industries of Canada never enjoyed a greater measure of protection than that they enjoyed from 1868 to 1873. The hon. gentleman knows that a civil war was ravaging the United States. A million men or more were taken away from production and engaged in war. Manufacturing industries of all kinds were thoroughly disorganized. In that condition of things, Canada had a market in the United States which gave it one of the greatest periods of protection that could possibly be. I am justifying the position hon. gentlemen opposite found themselves in. In 1873, when they came into power, fortunately for humanity, that great internecine struggle was over. But the protection that Canada enjoyed was swept away. Then came the effect of a low tariff upon Canada, leaving her a slaughter market for the United States whose industries were re-established and reorganized from one end of the country to the other. The result was that a high tariff which was imposed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, then the Finance Minister, was a much lower tariff relatively than the 15 per cent tariff that had existed before.

If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) wished to claim credit for Canada's present prosperity, it would have been worth while to show reason for that claim. Why, it was amusing to notice the rounds of enthusiastic applause that the hon. gentleman was greeted with at every sentence, while he spoke of this magnificent prosperity. If it had all been due to the Finance Minister, he could not have been more heartily cheered. But the applause was greatest when he said he had taken seven millions more from the people than had ever been taken from them before. The welkin rang with tremendous cheers, as if he had accomplished the most desirable feat in the history of the country. Where did this trade and this prosperity come from? What are the facts with regard to these figures that the hon. gentleman knows are so delusive and calculated to mislead the people who have not studied this question? I challenged these hon. gentlemen two years ago, I challenged them a year ago, and I repeat it to-night—I challenge them to show one single act, one single item of public policy they have initiated and carried out that increased the prosperity of Canada. And, Sir, they were dumb; and they are dumb now. I shall refer by and by to the miserable plea, the skeleton of a plea put in by the Minister of Trade and Commerce to show what they did do. When we examine that a little more closely, we shall find the reason why these gentlemen are dumb when asked to name one single feature of public policy, one act of administration that has added to the prosperity of Canada that had been initiated by them. It is only where they have so servilely followed the steps of their predecessors, where they have abandoned all their principles and all their policies and have accepted and adopted ours, that they can show that they have done anything to secure prosperity for this country.

They say: Then do you denounce us, do you attack us for adopting your policy? Certainly not; we never have done so. We say that is the only thing they are to be credited with. They found they were wrong for twenty years, or they were deceiving the people of this country and they may take which ever horn of the dilemma they please—and they threw their own policy to the winds and adopted that of the Liberal-Conservative party. That is the one redeeming feature of the tenure of office. It is a great sacrifice to public character for men to be in that position; and these hon. gentlemen wish to evade the facts. You know, Mr. Speaker, as everybody knows, that there is no means by which the mass of the people of this country can judge so completely the claims of the two great parties contending for public favour as to ask which of these parties has had the wisdom to inaugurate a sound, judicious policy and to carry it out honestly, and which of them has been mistaken from the first, wrong in everything it has undertaken, and compelled to abandon every line of policy it adopted. Why, Sir, there is no doubt if you want to judge of the character of two of your neighbours, there is no test that you apply to them more readily or more sensibly than that of honesty, their straightforwardness, their truthfulness. If you find that they deceive you, if they say one thing and do another, you lose confidence in them. Just so it is with political parties. I have shown the evidence to the House and have given Mr. Mackenzie's statement, as to our course when we went to the country in 1878, pledged to the adoption of the national policy of protecting the various industries of Canada. When we came in, what took place on the floor of this House? I call the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to it. When Sir Leonard Tilley, as Minister of Finance, stood up in the House in 1879 and propounded his tariff, hon. gentlemen opposite, then on this side, said: Well, we never believed that you would do it; but you have kept your word, you have done exactly what you declared you would do. What was the result? The result was, instead of the deplorable condition that Canada had sunk to, instead of a series of deficits one after another amounting to many millions on account of ordinary revenue, we had sufficient revenues for the necessities of the public service. Instead of leaving industries ruined, the national policy revived the industries of Canada. It has acted as if by magic over the whole face of the country; and the statement that hon. gentlemen made in regard to what the effect of that policy may be was falsified by the results. Does the hon. gentleman remember when he stood here and said: Do you tell me that you can get more revenue by putting on prohibitory taxes? Why, he says, the thing is an absurdity on the face of it; you will lessen your revenue instead of getting more. Well here again they found that they were mistaken. When the policy went into operation we had a buoyant revenue, and were in a position not only to carry on the public services of the country efficiently, but to grapple with the most gigantic work that five million of people in any country ever undertook to grapple with. What more did they say? They said: See what a cost this is going to be to the country. By creating these industries you are shutting out cheap goods that will come into Canada from the United States—which were then making a slaughter market for Canada. They said: You are going to stop all that, you are going to make these goods so excessively dear that you will ruin the people. There again they were proved to be wrong. We answered them: No, we will bring capital into the country, we will bring labour into the country, and we will give work to Canadian hands on Canadian soil; and the competition of the capital and labour brought in under a protective policy will bring down the prices of articles until they can be purchased just as cheaply as in any other country. There again the event proved that we were absolutely correct.

Then what did that enable us to do? It enabled us to deal with the great question of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Let me here draw the attention of the House to the fact that during the period from 1878 to 1896, no less than 10,127 miles of railway were added to the railway system of Canada. Does the hon. gentleman think that that had any effect on the progress and prosperity of Canada? Does he think that opening up this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean, that opening up the great prairies of the west with a line of railway communication, that penetrating this country in a manner that had never been dreamed of by public men, with a line from Ottawa and Pembroke away to the head of Lake Superior and so on to Manitoba—does the hon. gentleman think that that contributed anything to this great impetus given to the prosperity and trade of Canada? The hon. gentleman knows how that project of the constructing the Canadian Pacific Railway was met by the Liberal party.

Now on this question of the progress and prosperity of Canada and the development of its trade, especially for the past two or three years, let me refer to a subject which the hon. gentleman has not given prominence to. The London Economist of January 14, 1899, speaking of the world's production of gold, says that the increase in 1898 was the largest in any year since the early fifties. In 1898 the production amounted to £60,000,000; in 1896, the production was £40,000,000, showing an increase in two years of £20,000,000. Now, does the hon. gentleman think that is worth a passing note in a budget speech, as one of the means by which this great expansion of trade and business throughout the world has been brought about? On this same question let me quote from the Railway and Commercial Gazette, London, of January 7, 1899:

To this extent, the past year has been productive of excellent results.

It has not only revived confidence among our traders, who see great possibilities in the near future for the consumption of iron and steel, but it has at the same time provoked a great revival of industrial activity in Europe, in which the two Anglo-Saxon nations on both sides of the Atlantic are largely participating.

The hon. gentleman himself, in his budget speech, shows, as you will see by reference to it, that the increased mineral wealth in the Dominion of Canada from 1896 to 1899 has gone up from $22,584,513 to $46,245,878. Has that nothing to do with the expansion of trade that has taken place? Why, Sir, if the Liberal party had not been repudiated by this country the hon. gentleman would not have been in a position to make any such budget speech in 1900 as he has been able to make. I will show that not only have they done nothing, not only are they unable to put their finger upon a single thing that they have done to promote the prosperity of Canada, but I will show that while the Liberal-Conservative party has been the progressive party, the Liberal party has been the obstructive party. It was the Liberal party that set its face straight and stiff against every movement forward, and it was the Liberal-Conservative party who initiated every movement that has contributed to the progress and prosperity of Canada. When we brought forward the policy of the construction of an inter-oceanic line of railway in 1871, my hon. friend knows that in this House we met with the most determined obstruction from the Liberal party. What did Mr. Blake say on that occasion? Why he said that it was fatal to the confederation of Canada. Could he have taken stronger ground? Here was a project to open up the avenues of trade, to open up the country for development, and yet it was denounced as disastrous, and Mr. Blake declared that it was fatal to confederation. In 1879, Mr. Mills, now the Minister of Justice, said, as you will see by referring to the Hansard, page 1928:

This country was not able to construct a railway across the continent, and the sooner they honestly admitted their inability in the matter the better for all classes. . . . There was no Asiatic traffic, there were no articles of commerce from Asia that were likely to find their way over this railway.

Well, Sir, Mr. Mills was a great Liberal statesman. Now, let me give you another opinion, that of the Hon. William A. Seward, Secretary of State under President Lincoln. After he had made a short visit to the Dominion of Canada, he penned the following prophetic words:

Having its Atlantic seaport at Halifax, and its Pacific depot near Vancouver Island, British America would inevitably draw to it the commerce of Europe, Asia and the United States. Thus, from a mere colonial dependency, it would assume a controlling rank in the world. To her other nations would be tributary; and in vain would the United States attempt to be her rival, for we could never dispute with her the possession of the Asiatic commerce, nor the power which that commerce confers.

That is what a great statesman thought of the prospect of getting any Asiatic trade. Why, Sir, the three steamships running constantly between Canada, Yokohama, in Japan, and Hong Kong, are actually carrying out his words. Why are they so successful? Why have they so outdistanced the San Francisco line of American steamers to the same place? Because, as Secretary Sewell saw, a party coming from London to Yokohama, can save a thousand miles by taking the Canadian Pacific Railway, instead of going via New York and San Francisco. I am sorry to disturb the slumbers of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), because he seems to be in a very happy condition, but, that hon. gentleman, speaking in Charlottetown, in December, 1880, said, in reference to the contract under which this road was to be built, and under which it has become such a gigantic success:

A contract from which there is no escape politically or commercially excepting one, and that is annexation to the United States. It is an escape that no politician likes to talk about, but it will come one day, and when it comes we must take our chances and make the best bargain we can.

What does the hon. gentleman think of himself in the capacity of a prophet? Had nothing been done in other ways? What was done in addition to the establishment of this great inter-oceanic line? There was the opening up and developing of the great prairie country in the North-west. Let me read an extract from a publication issued by the Hon. Mr. Greenway, then the Premier of the province of Manitoba, who, in an immigration advertisement, issued three years ago, in 1896, said:

Twenty-five years ago the chief products of Manitoba were the furs of wild animals. Today (1896) these products are wheat, cattle, butter, cheese. In twenty-five years the population increased from 12,000 to 200,000, the land under cultivation from 10,000 acres to 2,000,000 acres, and the number of schools from 16 to 382. Even in a single decade the results are no less remarkable, as may be seen from the following figures:

	1885.	1895.
Wheat produced, bush.....	7,429,460	41,776,038
Oats produced, bush.....	6,364,263	22,555,732
Barley produced, bush.....	1,113,481	5,645,036

Total, bushels.....14,907,184 59,975,807
Increase in ten years, 45,068,623 bushels.

The area in wheat, oats and barley under crop was, in 1885, 566,628 acres, and in 1895, 1,722,733 acres; increase, 1,156,545 acres.

I want to ask the hon. gentleman whether he thinks that the opening up of that country by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the development which Mr. Greenway has put on record, in ten years, is no evidence of what those, who went before him, those who carried out the policy, against which the Liberal party of this country fought to the death, have accomplished in the interest of Canada. What more did Mr. Greenway say? As you know, the Hon. Thomas Greenway is a large and extensive farmer in the province of Manitoba, and he knows, as Premier of that province for many years, thoroughly whereof he speaks. On the 21st of October, 1899, he said:

Manitoba and the North-west Territories have produced this year approximately 50,000,000 bushels of wheat. That is but a bagatelle to what the production will be in the future. You can easily figure what a tremendous saving there would now be to the farmers if the rate on wheat were reduced to 10c per 100 pounds; but what, I ask, would it be on 100,000,000 bushels, or 500,000,000 bushels, and the wheat production in this country will reach the latter figures in the not very distant future. I read in a paper recently that the whole wheat area of the United States produced this year 500,000,000 bushels of wheat, and the same paper stated that Manitoba had produced as much as a tenth of that amount. And yet, remember, there are only 35,000 farmers in Manitoba, and only a tenth of the arable land is under cultivation. Vastly more people will come into this country during the next few years than we have ever had before.

I give that to the hon. gentleman, as additional evidence. Now, I am afraid that the House will be as tired as I am myself, if I keep it much longer, and, if it is agreeable to hon. gentlemen opposite, I will move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11.10 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, March 30, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

OFFICIAL DEBATES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. CHAMPAGNE presented the third report of the Select Committee appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates, as follows :

The committee recommend that Mrs. Mary H. Dansereau, widow of the late Mr. J. C. Dansereau of the staff of translators, who died on the 7th instant, be paid the sum of $100, which amount he (the same as the other members of the staff) would have been entitled to receive had he lived up to the 15th instant.

Mr. CHAMPAGNE moved :

That the third report of the Select Committee appointed to supervise the official report of the debates of the House be now concurred in.

He said : I may say that the report is only in connection with the claim made by the widow of the late Mr. Dansereau. There is no other matter mentioned in the report, and I do not think it ought to be delayed.

Mr. SPEAKER. Stand.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding :

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising a Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). Mr. Speaker, in resuming the observations that I was making when the House rose last night, I may say that I had reached that portion of the speech of my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) in which he refers to the very gratifying fact that in the province of Ontario several new establishments have been started within the last year or two and that there is, he believes, every probability that the iron deposits of that province will be worked upon a very much larger scale than ever before. I may say that no person has heard that with greater pleasure than I have myself. It will be remembered by the House that when I had the honour of holding the position of Minister of Finance I introduced a measure into this House calculated, in my judgment, to promote the iron industry of Canada, and, although that measure has not realized all the expectations that I ventured, at that time, to indicate would be achieved, I am safe in saying that not a blow would have been struck, in connection with the iron industry in any part of Canada, but for the policy adopted in 1887. The reason that the fullest and greatest realization of everything anticipated did not accrue was owing to the remarkable fact, that shortly after the adoption of that measure pig iron fell in the greatest market in the world for pig iron, the United Kingdom, something like 50 per cent. Of course, there was no meeting such a contingency as that, but, as I said before, fortunately for Canada, notwithstanding that great fall in the price of pig iron, some measure of progress had taken place in regard to the iron industries of Canada, and I say that is very gratifying to learn, as a result of the policy propounded on that occasion, and the renewed condition of things by which the price of pig iron has largely increased, the fact that in Hamilton, where a considerable iron industry has steadily been carried on, notwithstanding the depressing circumstances that I have referred to, a nickel and steel company is being organized with a capital of $6,000,000, and which, there is every expectation, will become a very important Canadian industry. I saw a statement made on the 28th of this month of a meeting in New York of the organizers of the Canadian Steel Company. It is as follows :

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

A meeting of the organizers of the Canadian Steel Company, the incorporation of which, with $18,000,000 capital, $3,000,000 preferred, is now pending in the Canadian parliament, was held in this city this week. At this meeting the details of the organization were agreed upon, although the formal organization cannot be effected until the charter has been actually issued, which it is expected will be done about the 20th of next month.

That is in Welland. I now come to the announcement made by the hon. Minister of Finance in regard to the iron industry of Nova Scotia. He said :

I can look back with pride and satisfaction to the movement of that day, and feel that time has vindicated that policy of the Nova Scotia government, and that the enterprise then started has been fruitful of advantage to the province and the direct cause of the creation of this new enterprise which bids fair to make the town of Sydney the Pittsburg of Canada.

My hon. friend was good enough, in another part of his speech, to say that I had paid a great compliment to his modesty. There is no quality of the human mind that I admire so much as modesty, and I am always ready to recognize it on the part of any gentleman, but, I am afraid that I can hardly pay the hon. gentleman the compliment of having exhibited a great deal of modesty in regard to this matter when he undertakes to claim that the present great development of the iron and coal industries of the province of Nova Scotia is due to himself. I may say to the House that, I think, my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding), ought to have given me a little share of credit for that progress in that development, and, I think, he was a little selfish in claiming it all. I think, the House will agree with me when I state the facts that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding), hardly did me justice on that occasion. The facts are these: Two years ago the scheme was proposed by the gentlemen connected with the great industrial development in Nova Scotia, which bids fair to make the county of Cape Breton which I have the honour to represent, and the town of Sydney, rival even Pittsburg itself. A gentleman interested in that, Mr. Whitney of Boston, a most energetic and enterprising man, who has shown that he is equal to very great financial enterprises, was engaged in the coal industry in Nova Scotia. Having investigated the great mineral resources of that province and the advantages possessed by the county town of Sydney, for the development of a great iron and steel industry, he became much interested in the matter. Mr. Graham Fraser, of the New Glasgow Iron and Steel Company, was also deeply interested. These gentlemen accompanied by the mayor of the town of Sydney came up to see the Minister of Finance, and they implored him to adopt the policy of extending the bounty system that had been placed on the statute-book by the Liberal-Conservative party, and which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding), had himself adopted as part of the national policy, when he was swallowing the rest of it, in bringing down his tariff. They came to my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding), and they implored him to extend that measure of assistance necessary for the inauguration of a great enterprise of that kind. My hon. friend (Mr. Fielding), gave them an absolute, palpable refusal to do anything, and they went home utterly discouraged. A year ago last summer, I visited my constituents in Sydney, and I was waited on by the mayor, who asked me if I would accept the public presentation of an address from the Board of Trade. The mayor himself was a political opponent of mine, and the majority of the members of the board were also my political opponents, but he stated frankly to me that they came to me to see if it were possible that I could help them in the great difficulty in which they found themselves placed, inasmuch as after all the pressure they could bring to bear on the government, they had met with an absolute refusal from the government, to do anything in the way of extending the bounty system as it then existed. The difficulty was this, that before the enormous capital required to build up that great enterprise could be obtained, the bounty under the law, would expire, and they would be deprived of any advantage whatever from it. I could excuse my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding), to some extent. There was the incubus upon him of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), who, no doubt, represented to him, that it was impossible for that government to stultify themselves in reference to every portion of their policy, and he, (Sir Richard Cartwright), no doubt, pointed out to him, (Mr. Fielding), that he had used his most powerful invective against the principle of bounties, as one of the most extreme phases of protection, and that, therefore, the government should not listen to any such mad proposal as the extension of that system. Whatever the cause was, I was informed by these gentlemen that they had met with an absolute refusal.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Who are these gentlemen? Who were the gentlemen that made that statement to the hon. member (Sir Charles Tupper)?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What statement?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE The statement the hon. gentleman has just made. My hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper), says he was informed they had met with an absolute refusal. I wish to know who 'they' were.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have no hesitation in saying that statement was from Mr. Whitney and Mr. Graham Fraser; it was from the representatives of the Dominion Coal Company, and the New Glasgow Steel Company.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. What time?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. When I visited my constituents the summer before last; after they had been here, and met with an absolute refusal from my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding). My hon. friend cannot be ignorant of the facts, because there was a public address presented to me in the largest hall that Sydney could afford and crowded to the doors, the platform covered by political friends of the hon. gentleman with the mayor, his political friend, in the chair. I responded to that address and I frankly told them that I thought they ought not to despair, notwithstanding the refusal they had met with, and that I hoped the government might be induced to reconsider their position and change their attitude. I told them that I would give them such assistance as I could. I do not insinuate for a moment, that my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding), was dependent upon the speech which I made upon that occasion, for one of the most brilliant passages in his budget speech, but there is a remarkable likeness between it and the manner in which he portrayed the wonderful position of the town of Sydney as a great seat of the iron and steel enterprise. I suppose, that wonderful likeness has arisen from the fact that great minds sometimes jump together. However, I stated frankly to the Board of Trade of the town of Sydney, that I would myself go to the government and would urge upon them, in the strongest possible manner, the reconsideration of that important question. I told them their case was so overwhelmingly strong that I did not despair of convincing the government that they should reconsider that question, and change the attitude they had adopted. I told them that if that failed, all I could say to them, was that, should the time come, when I was in a position to render substantial aid to carry out the views which they held so strongly, and in which I heartily concurred, they would find me prepared to do so. The speech was published verbatim by the Board of Trade, and I have no doubt a copy was sent to my hon. friend, but even if it were not, a lengthy report of the speech appeared in the Halifax Chronicle, the organ of his party in Nova Scotia. I may add that the Morning Chronicle characterized a portion of my speech as being of a political character, but it was immediately informed by the leading men of the Liberal party in the town of Sydney, that there was no foundation for any such statement, and that the Liberals of Sydney heartily endorsed every word I said.

Then, when I was invited to open the provincial exhibition in St. John, N.B., not long afterwards, I had the good fortune to meet my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, my hon. friend, the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), and my hon. friend, the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair). I solicited an interview from these gentlemen in the hotel where we happened to be staying. They were good enough to accord me that interview, and I there discussed, with these three gentlemen, in all its phases, the great importance of reconsidering the decision they had arrived at, and of extending the bounty so as to enable this large amount of capital to be invested in successfully promoting that great industry. I may say that my observations received the most respectful consideration. We discussed fully and freely together, the question, and I was assured that they would give the most careful reconsideration to the subject.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Did you say 'reconsideration'?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, yes, reconsideration, because the subject had been pressed upon them by all the parties most deeply interested, who had met with an absolute and positive refusal.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We shall see about that later.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Well, I shall be able to furnish my hon. friend with the most abundant evidence on that subject. They promised to reconsider that question. They did not intimate for a moment, not one of them, that they had not given a complete refusal to the proposals laid before them, and they were good enough to promise me that if they arrived at a favourable conclusion, they would give me that information. They did not do so. When the House met, as will be seen by reference to Hansard, I took this matter up in my speech on the address as one of the gravest importance, and I again pressed upon the government the great importance of taking up that subject; but it was without effect. When my hon. friend brought down his budget, without making any provision for this important matter, I again took up the question, as will be seen by reference to Hansard of last session, and pressed it as strongly as I could upon his attention and upon the attention of the government. I not only did that, but I told my hon. friends frankly, when discussing the matter with them in St. John, that I did not ask this as any political favour to myself, because I could only assure them that if they refused, I should make that one of the leading planks in my platform whenever I had an opportunity to discuss these questions with the great electorate of Canada. But let that be as it may, I am happy to say that the hon. gentleman did reconsider the question; the scruples and difficulties they had entertained were overcome; and they brought down the policy to which I gave that hearty assent, which I had pledged myself in the city of St. John to give; as I pledged in the town of Sydney that they would find the great Liberal-Conservative party of Canada standing solidly behind the government in maintaining a policy of that kind, and that if the hon. gentleman should meet with some difficulty on his own side of the House, he would find none on this side. There was an entire support of the Liberal-Conservative party to the policy. Under these circumstances, I think I cannot compliment my hon. friend on his modesty in taking entirely to himself the credit for his great measure, for it is one of the greatest that has passed this House.

Now, my hon. friend said a remarkable thing to put in a budget speech. Budget speeches are not generally of an aggressive character, and Finance Ministers do not generally adopt the aggressive tone which the hon. gentleman adopted towards myself. That, of course, is a matter of taste and judgment, and I am inclined to think that after this experience it will not likely be repeated. At all events, I do not expect it to be repeated by the hon. gentleman for a decade. He said:

He (Sir Charles Tupper) poses as a great disciple of the national policy, but my memory carries me back to a time when men who were more loyal to the national policy than he was, brought into this House a resolution to sustain certain features of the original national policy; and when the hon. gentleman found he was in difficulty over it, he voted against the national policy rather than resign his office.

Now, I do not intend to waste the time of this House on a matter which can be found on the journals of the country ; but I say this, that from the first hour I entered this parliament down to the present, no person has ever found me on that question adopting any but one line and one action with regard to the duty on coal. I fought for it in this House in season and out of season, as the hon. gentleman knows ; I fought for it yearly. Although it was struck off the statute-book by an unexpected attack on the government, for which no preparation had been made, just as the salary of the Governor General was reduced by a motion emanating from the same party and suddenly sprung on the House, the hon. gentleman knows that I adhered to the policy of imposing a duty on coal until I had an opportunity of seeing it completely vindicated and adopted by this House, and brought to an eminently successful issue. My hon. friend boasts of what he did in relation to the Dominion Coal Company, and he boasts of what he is now accomplishing in connection with that industry. I ask my hon. friend where that coal policy would have been to-day if he and his friends had triumphed. I ask if that coal policy was not carried by the Liberal-Conservative party in spite of all the opposition the Liberal party could give to it, himself among the number. He was not in this House, but he was doing his little best outside of it to support the party who unitedly fought that policy whenever it was proposed. What has been the effect of defeating the hon. gentleman ? Why, Sir, the effect of it has been that the coal sales of the province of Nova Scotia have increased from 693,511 tons in 1878, when the national policy was adopted and the duty was first imposed, to 2,419,137 tons in 1899. My hon. friend now boasts of what this iron policy is going to do not only for Nova Scotia but for the whole of Canada—because he is perfectly correct in saying that there is no place in the Dominion of Canada where that great enterprise can be carried out with a better prospect of success than in the town of Sydney ; but I ask him where would that policy have been if he had triumphed ? Where was that hon. gentleman after nineteen years of confederation. Why, he was leading an onslaught against confederation in the province of Nova Scotia, and he succeeded in getting a majority of the legislature of that province pledged to support him in taking Nova Scotia out of the union and destroying confederation. Where would there be to-day a possibility of any iron industry in the province of Nova Scotia if the hon. gentleman had not been defeated ? That was in the year 1886. Fortunately, I was able to go down to Nova Scotia in 1887. I resigned my position of High Commissioner of Canada, re-entered the government as Finance Minister, went down to Nova Scotia to meet the hon. gentleman's agitation, and came back here with two-thirds of the province of Nova Scotia at my back ; and I would do the same thing again tomorrow if the opportunity presented itself.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman said that the last time, but he did not do it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman carried the province of Nova Scotia on a recent occasion by a large majority ; but he did not carry it, Sir. My policy carried it. The hon. gentleman as Finance Minister enabled his successor as Premier of Nova Scotia to say to the people of Nova Scotia : 'Your having the duty maintained on coal depends on your maintaining the Liberal government at Ottawa.' So the hon. gentleman carried the province of Nova Scotia by adopting the policy against which he had fought during the whole of his public life until he became Finance Minister. I will not detain the House any longer in reference to that question ; but I think my hon. friend will learn that it is just as well not to forget the past altogether. When spreading his wings and soaring in the air, and boasting what a magnificent nation has been created on this northern half of the continent—when the hon. gentleman admits, as he had to by the statistics, that even the great republic to the south cannot compete with us, he ought not to forget that if we occupy that proud position, it is because his puny arm was too weak to oust us from it. But if the Liberal-Conservative party had not been more powerful than the hon. gentleman and his party, we would be in a different position to-day.

The hon. gentleman had something to say upon this much vexed controversy as to how much his party had cut off the tail of the national policy horse when they appropriated that useful and valuable animal to themselves. On this point the hon. gentleman said :

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition has once or twice spoken of the extent of our tariff reform as 71-100ths of 1 per cent, while his hon. friend who sits near him (Mr. Foster), and who is perhaps more accustomed to deal with figures, has placed it, in a resolution on the journals of the House, at 1·71 per cent.

I had the curiosity to look up the Hansard, and I find that I did not say it was 71-100ths of 1 per cent at all. I had not gone into the subject or made the calculation, for I was on the Atlantic when the Finance Minister's statement was made last session, but I was quoting my hon. friend the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster), who is the highest authority in this House or country on such questions.

On the 11th of August, in the Hansard, 1899, the hon. gentleman will find these words in Mr. Foster's speech :

From 1892 to 1896 the average rate was 17·47 per cent, while for 1898-9, the average rate was 16·76 per cent, or just 71-100ths of 1 per cent reduction from the average of the years 1892 to 1896.

That sustains, at all events, the statement I made, and gives a higher authority than mine for it.

I am afraid that my hon. friend (Mr. Foster), who has been so highly complimented by the Minister of Finance, has rather overstated the case. I find that the average rate of duty from 1894 to 1896 was 18.24 per cent, and I find that the average rate of duty from 1897 to 1899 was 17.71 per cent, a reduction in duty of 54-100ths of 1 per cent, instead of 71-100ths. If my hon. friend wants the figures upon which the calculations are made, I hold them in my hand. I took out coin and bullion and averaged the duties in the three years preceding the advent of the hon. gentleman into power, and the duties in the subsequent three years, and the average rate is what I have said, or, to be exact, it is .539, or not quite 54-100ths of 1 per cent.

I now come to one of the most disingenuous and unfair statements possible for a gentleman on the Treasury benches to make, a statement calculated to grossly misrepresent the attitude I had adopted with regard to the tariff of 1897-8. The hon. gentleman read from my speech as follows, which was delivered when he brought down his tariff in 1897 :

The result is that this tariff goes into operation and the hon. gentleman knows that the industries of this country are already paralyzed in consequence, while hon. members gloat over the destruction of Canadian industries. I was reading the wail, the sorrowful wail, of those industries in the Montreal 'Gazette,' where one manufacturer after another declared that those industries were ruined, that their mills must close, and that they saw staring them in the face a return of the deplorable state of things that existed when the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House was in charge of the fiscal policy of this country. I say that a deeper wrong was never inflicted upon Canada.

I may say that I was reading from the Montreal Gazette, and what did I find in that paper? I found that not only one but several of the large industries of Montreal had locked their doors and there were hundreds out of employment, in consequence of the tariff hon. gentlemen brought down. The hon. gentleman has admitted, what we all know to be a fact, that having tried his hand at tariff making, a perfect horde of delegations of people engaged in industries came down upon him in this city, and the result is stated by him in his budget speech :

And when we did learn something, we had the courage to come down and say so, and to make the change. And so with the change in one item and a change in another, here a little and there a little, we made it a good tariff. But has my hon. friend said it was a good tariff? No.

The fact is that the hon. gentleman having tried his 'prentice hand at tariff making, found that his tariff would not suit at all and was compelled to change it. This wail of disaster did go up in the great manufacturing centre of Montreal, delegates poured in on the hon. gentleman, and he changed the tariff. I will not say in how many cases, but will be safe in saying twenty or thirty at all events. The great feature of that tariff which I condemned was this :

That when the customs tariff of any country admits the products of Canada on terms which, on the whole, are as favourable to Canada as the terms of the reciprocal tariff herein referred to are to the countries to which it may apply, articles which are the growth, produce or manufacture of such country, when imported direct therefrom, may then be imported direct into Canada, or taken out of warehouse for consumption therein at the reduced rates of duty provided in the reciprocal tariff set forth in Schedule 'D.'

Which reduced rate was 12½ per cent the first year and 25 per cent the second. That was the position to which I was inviting the attention of the House ; and in that connection I was showing that radical changes had been made subsequently, which enabled these industries to reopen their doors and the people to go back to work.

I will give the hon. gentleman the credit of having one great quality which his predecessor on that side (Sir Richard Cartwright) was never gifted with. He has a receptive mind. He has shown that he is capable of being taught. He has shown that when he has made a mistake, he does not come to the conclusion that there is no other wisdom in the world except that which he possesses ; and when I convinced him of the great mistake he made on a most vital question, the iron industry, he changed right about face and did that which previously he had refused to do. Again he said :

And so, Mr. Speaker, we have the tariff as brought down in the first draft, then the final draft of 1897, and then the tariff of 1898; and, from beginning to end, the whole was condemned by the hon. gentleman, who declared that it was going to prove disastrous to the interests of the country.

A more disingenuous statement never was made on the floor of this House, than the statement that I had applied that condemnation to the tariff of 1898. I say, Sir, that the hon. gentleman will search in vain for any evidence of such a state of things. The quotation from Hansard proceeds :

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No? Then, if the tariff of 1898 was a good tariff, why did the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) vote against the preference feature of it? It is too late for him to come and pretend—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) has asked a question, will he not allow me to answer it?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not vote against the tariff of 1898; I voted against the statements made in the motion of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), that I considered were untrue. But, I will ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) this question: Was not the tariff of 1897 the Cobden medal tariff, and is the tariff of 1898 a Cobden medal tariff?

I do not refer to that subject for the purpose of disturbing in the least degree the feelings of my right hon. friend the leader of the government. But, this is one of the strongest, one of the clearest, one of the most complete evidences of a radical change between the tariff that I denounced, the tariff of 1897, and the tariff of 1898, that it is possible to conceive. One was a tariff under which my right hon. friend could properly receive the Cobden medal from Lord Farrer in the language in which that gentleman gave it; but in presenting that medal the words that Lord Farrer used were that if my right hon. friend had done that which was actually done in the tariff of 1898, they would not have assembled there to give him that medal. Is that proof or is it not that there was a radical change in the principle and essence of the tariff of 1898 as compared with that of 1897? Now, I stated the reasons why I could not support the amendment of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell). Let me read that amendment:

That this House regards the principles of British preference in the Canadian customs tariff as one which in its application has already resulted, and will, in an increasing measure, continue to result in material benefit to the mother country and to Canada,—

I deny that it has resulted in any benefit to the mother country. I say that the imports from Great Britain under that preference tariff are utterly insignificant as compared with what they might naturally have been expected to be without any preference whatever, in the enormous expansion of trade that Canada has experienced between 1896 and the present time. Moreover, I say it has not resulted in any good to Canada. The hon. gentleman may say that the people have been relieved of some taxation. I have stood before great masses of the electors of Canada, and I have put this question to them: Have you paid less during the last year since that tariff preference came in for the goods that you get from England than you paid before? And on every occasion there has been an overwhelming responsive 'No.' Therefore, there has been no benefit that has reached the Canadian farmer, none that has reached the producers of Canadian goods under that tariff. Therefore, Sir, I was unable to vote in favour of a declaration that I believe to be utterly unsound and absolutely contradictory of the facts. The resolution goes on:

—and which has already aided in welding, and must still more firmly weld together the ties which now bind them, and desires to express its emphatic approval of such British preference having been granted by the parliament of Canada.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that this preferential tariff had been of great value to Great Britain. He said last night, as I understood him, that he had no doubt that we had obtained the permission to have trust funds invested in our securities, which would be of great value to Canada largely in consequence of the preferential tariff. But what does the Prime Minister say on that question? He ought to be an authority. He is the leader of the government and has the Minister of Finance to advise him on financial questions, and the hon. Minister of Customs behind him, unsafe as it may be to trust the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) who sits in immediate proximity. What did the Premier say? Speaking in the city of Montreal and the city of Quebec, he said that Great Britain had accepted preferential trade at a great sacrifice, because, to obtain it, she had had to denounce the Belgian and German treaties and thus lose a large amount of a valuable trade, much greater than any benefit that it would be to her. So, the hon. gentleman finds that he is in controversy on that question with the Prime Minister and that I have the Prime Minister on my side as to this preference tariff not being the boon to Great Britain that would induce her to make valuable concessions to Canada.

Now, the hon. gentleman has said that one of the great features of this preferential tariff has been the enormously expanding trade of Canada, for the reason, as he puts it, that if you buy from a country they will buy from you. That is the cardinal principle that my right hon. friend the Prime Minister has again and again enunciated; and he has gone so far as to say that this great expansion of our exports to Great Britain has been in consequence of a preference which never preferred. I have shown on a former occasion that the statistics of the three years previous to hon. gentlemen opposite coming into power, as compared with the figures since, show that there has been an average decrease in the imports from England in the three years under their management of $1,285,173, or about 3.90 per cent. Was there anything in that to make the English mercantile community so wildly enthusiastic about what Canada had done for them? Did they feel greatly benefited when they found that in three years, under hon. gentlemen opposite, with one full year of the preference in force, they had actually sent less to Canada than before, notwithstanding an enormously expanding trade in this country? In contradistinction we have the fact, that the government gave no preference to the United States—he says that he gave a preference against the United States in favour of England. And with what result? With the result that in the three years 1897, 1898 and 1899, the average imports from the United States amounted to $77,787,266, as against average imports for 1894, 1895 and 1896 of $55,414,215—or an average increase of $22,373,051, or 40.37 per cent, as against a loss of 3.90 per cent of trade from the mother country. The hon. gentleman says that this is of enormous advantage to Great Britain. I do not think that the figures show it. These hon. gentlemen tell us that England will buy our cheese, butter, eggs and all these things, not because they prefer them, but because Canada gave them a preference—that in the gratitude of their hearts they want to eat our bacon, our butter and our cheese, whether they like them or not. I am going to quote what I consider a very high authority to contradict that statement. I have shown by figures, that where you gave no preference, as in the case of the United States, there has been an increase of imports, and where you gave a preference, to Great Britain, there has been a falling off. But, I wish to give a higher authority than any hon. gentleman of the Treasury benches—and that is your own, Mr. Speaker. You are an agriculturist, you know something about cheese, and bacon, and you know something about how the sale of these articles is to be promoted. Let me read what you said on the floor of this House, and I heartily endorse every word of it, although I do not always endorse what you say now. On May 8, 1898, as will be found in Hansard, page 5852. Mr. Bain said in the House of Commons :

When we do the best we can and put our natural products on the English market in the best possible condition, when we offer the best quality of cheese, the finest grade of butter, the finest wheat the world produces, and put them on her market in the best condition, then we have a guarantee that the English dollars will come to our pockets, and come in a legitimate process.

That is the whole thing in a nut shell, and I hope this eminent agricultural authority will be heeded and will have the effect of destroying some of those fallacies.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I hope my hon. friend will listen to other advice he got from that quarter equally pertinent.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I always do, with great respect. I now come to the point I raised before. I have shown that the policy of 1897 was the policy I denounced. It was a free trade policy, it was a policy of giving to all the world, and not giving anything to England. At that time England was almost the only country that could not take advantage of it. But I say it was a policy open to all the world; and the hon. gentleman the Minister of Trade and Commerce followed it up by stating that they intended to drive that wedge home and steadily to increase the preference until they had reached that happy hunting ground of free trade. Now I will read what Lord Farrer said, when delivering that medal to the right hon. gentleman :

There is a party amongst us who would willingly discriminate against German and Belgian goods, and who look upon the denunciation of the German and Belgian treaties as a step towards what they have been pleased to call the commercial federation of the empire—a system under which commercial union in the different parts of the empire will be fostered by laws excluding or discouraging foreign goods. If this were to be the consequence of what you have done, I need hardly say that we of the Cobden Club would not have been here. It is because we believe that your efforts are founded on the opposite principle, and will be followed by opposite results, that we, followers of Adam Smith and of Peel, of Bright and of Cobden, are here to congratulate and to thank you. You do not ask us to abate one jot of our free trade principles.

There is a declaration of Lord Farrer in the clearest and most comprehensive terms that if he had had that tariff of 1898 before him, my right hon. friend would not have received that great distinguishing badge which I told him on a former occasion I was afraid he would find a mill stone around his neck, and I am still of that opinion. Let me now recall what I stated to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance in reply to his statements as to my attitude on the tariff, and I give it as an evidence of the position that we took on this side of the House :

The first is that this proposed tariff, exposing the industries of Canada to competition with all the world, and the reduction of 25 per cent below the general tariff which is adopted, will be fatal to Canadian industries.

I believed that then, and I believe it now.

That may not be felt—

Fortunately we have been rescued from that, fortunately the abandonment of the free trade policy that Lord Farrer spoke of, and the adoption of the exclusive preference to England, has saved us from that danger we were exposed to under the tariff of 1897, which as Lord Farrer said, was open to all the world.

That may not be felt perhaps immediately, but at a very early day it will be felt; and, the gentlemen on the back benches have enlightened us by telling us that after personal communication with the government, they have obtained a pledge that this is only the entering of the wedge, and that it will be driven home until every vestige of protection is rooted out. My second and great objection is that this policy has destroyed the prospect of obtaining preferential trade, the most gigantic boon which, in my judgment, could be obtained for Canada, and one which, if the hon. gentleman was determined to make his attack on the industries of the country, they ought to have secured, if for no other reason than as some compensation for the injury they were doing.

And I moved this resolution :

That in the opinion of this House the reduction by 25 per cent of the duties upon all imports except wines, malt liquors, spirits, spirituous liquors, liquid medicines and articles containing alcohol; sugar, molasses and syrups of all kinds, the product of the sugar cane, or beet-root, tobacco, cigars and cigarettes in favour of any country whose tariff is or may be made on the whole as low as that of schedule D, is calculated to imperil the industrial interests of Canada, and is in principle opposed to preferential trade of any kind with the mother country.

That on several occasions the government and parliament of Canada have requested Her Majesty to be pleased to take such steps as might be necessary to terminate the effect of the provisions of all treaties which prevent the parliaments of the United Kingdom and the self-governing colonies adopting such tariffs as may be required for the promotion of trade within the empire, but no decisive action has been taken in this direction.

That the desire for preferential trade with the United Kingdom is now general throughout Canada.

That this House is of opinion that the government of Canada should cause Her Majesty's government to be advised that so soon as the difficulties in the way are removed the parliament of Canada is ready to enter into a preferential trade arrangement with Great Britain and Ireland.

That this House cannot consent that any arrangement made by the government of Canada with any country involving serious considerations of tariff and revenue should become operative without the sanction and ratification of parliament.

Now, there is a policy, there is a statement, there is the proof that this tariff I condemned in 1897 was radically in principle unlike that which was introduced in 1898, and we were all glad to get rid of the exposure of our industries to the competition of the whole world under a preferential rate, and we were anxious to have it limited, if it must be given to anybody, to the mother country. Now, let us see what the Minister of Finance said in his budget speech in regard to the United States :

If, in the United States there had been manifested any great desire to have better trade relations with us, I am sure there would be a very strong demand from many people in Canada for reductions in the tariff on American products. But our American neighbours feel it to be their duty, and they feel it to be consistent with their best interests, not to encourage closer trade relations with Canada. And while they take that position, we do not think the moment is favourable for making reductions upon articles which are produced in the United States. The Joint High Commission, though it has not accomplished much, has not yet come to the end of its term. It is theoretically, at all events, still an open question, and though there may be no immediate prospects of its re-assembling, it has not yet been dismissed by the only authorities who can terminate its existence. If we shall have an opportunity of opening up trade relations with the United States, I am sure this government will not fail to take advantage of it.

Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman in this great burst of loyalty, and which he has endeavoured to keep up to the very highest point, has always taken the attitude he took in 1897 in this House, namely, that it was Great Britain to which Canada desired to turn for her trade, and we desired to discourage, at all events, the offering of any inducements to the United States. Now, how does my hon. friend account for the fact that under that policy, under that tariff which he introduced with a grand burst of loyalty, a great flourish of trumpets as to what he was doing for England, how does it turn out that at the end of three years you have done nothing to increase that trade? Your imports have been less from the mother country during the three years that you have been in power as during the previous three years before you came in. On the other hand, we find that in 1899 there was an increase of $37,500,000 over the average for 1894-1895-1896, or 68 per cent increase in favour of the United States. I say that if the English people can be made to feel grateful for the creation of a tariff that brought about that result, I do not think they would exhibit that amount of intelligence that I should hope to find in that country. I think I mentioned last night that my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, speaking at Oshawa, on February 10, 1891, is thus reported :

C. W. Scott asked: 'Does the Liberal party favour discrimination against Great Britain by admitting American manufactures free and taxing the manufactures of Great Britain?'

Sir Richard Cartwright replied: 'Certainly we do.'

Although the hon. gentleman has not boldly proclaimed that they did give a large preference to the United States of America in the construction of their tariff, which has raised the exports from that country into Canada no less than 68 per cent, while they have been lessened from England, he has succeeded in carrying out a discrimination in favour of the United States, if there is any truth to be found in the statement that was made in the platform of the Liberal party in 1893, when they declared, in express terms, that the tariff of Canada discriminated against England. I ask if there is an hon. gentleman on that side of the House who will repeat that to-day. Was that statement true? Was there discrimination in the tariff? If so, you have increased it tenfold. The statement made by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), to a session of the Chamber of Commerce in England, has exposed that hon. gentleman to the fact that his statements have proved to be utterly delusive. He said that our tariff discriminated against England, and he said that their tariff would change and reform that. Instead of doing that the tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite has raised the imports from the United States no less than $37,500,000 during the short period that they have been in power. I do not intend to say much more upon this subject, but I may say, in excuse for the very incoherent manner in which I am dealing with this subject that I have been following the extraordinary course pursued by the hon. Minister of Finance in introducing his budget. He passed from one subject to another, back and forward, to and fro, and I am obliged to follow the very irrational course he pursued in order to be consistent. I do not intend to detain the House in speaking upon the question of making machinery free used in the manufacture of beet-root sugar, that cannot be manufactured in Canada. It is a policy that I entirely approve of. When the question came up last year I ventured to advise my hon. friend to investigate it and see what action could be taken by the government that would be calculated to promote the beet root sugar industry. I think, that if the sugar people are very thankful for what he has done, they are very easily satisfied, and I am inclined to think that, although he has done something, he has not investigated the subject with any very great degree of care.

I find that he has taken to heart the advice which I ventured, across the floor of the House, to extend to him in reference to the West Indies. I stated last year, and I repeat again, that I regard it as a most unfortunate thing that Great Britain should, owing to her hostility to countervailing duties, paralyze the industries of her possessions in the West India Islands, and reduce them to such a condition of difficulty and embarrassment that she absolutely had to advise them to endeavour to negotiate a treaty, and assisted in negotiating a treaty with a foreign power. When England has succeeded in placing the commerce of the British West India Islands under the heel of the United States of America, she has gone a long way, in my opinion, towards bringing about different sentiments in regard to the political relations of those countries. I do not hesitate to say, having pressed this matter strongly on the attention of the hon. Minister of Finance, that I am glad to find, as he said, in his very modest speech, that he was not above taking a little advice from wherever it might come, and I am glad that he has adopted the policy of endeavouring, at all events, to rescue Trinidad from that condition of things, which I regard as calculated to be fraught with very unpleasant consequences. I should be only too glad if a treaty can be arranged with Trinidad that will enable the productions of Canada to go in, in the freest possible manner, raw sugar being taken in return. I told my hon. friend when he introduced his 25 per cent tariff to the West Indies that he would find it perfectly delusive, and he now admits that he has failed to accomplish what he expected. I am glad to see this additional step taken, which I say is in the right direction.

Now I come to the question of preferential trade, and if I am obliged to detain the House at a much greater length than I would like to do, if I am obliged to re-iterate again and again, on the floor of the House, the position I have taken on that important question of preferential trade, my excuse must be that I regard it as the most vitally important question that is to-day before the people of Canada. I say that any system of inter-Imperial preferential trade that will give to the people of Canada the advantage of a preference in the markets of the mother country, is a policy so fraught with enormous results to the people that too much attention cannot be given to it. The hon. gentleman said, and I was greatly surprised to hear him make such a statement, that :

England, which after a great struggle under Bright and Cobden, had made the people's food free, was asked to turn back the hands of the clock and tax the food of the people. England was asked again and again to accept this condition, and just so long as that demand was made the great journals and the great leaders of thought in England scoffed at preferential trade of that kind.

That is a bold and unqualified statement, but it is a statement which is not borne out by the facts. I say that the greatest journals of England have looked upon that measure with great favour, and on more than one occasion they have indicated that it was a question deserving of the most careful and thorough attention from the government of that country. One hon. gentleman, going farther than the hon. Minister of Finance, defied anybody to show one line in anything that had been uttered, or said, or written by the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain in favour of that policy. I propose to draw the attention of the House for a few moments to this subject. The hon. Minister of Finance indicates that the government have reached the hearts, and through the hearts, they have reached the stomachs of the people of England with Canadian productions, and have created a yearning desire for our cheese, our bacon, our butter and our eggs. Do these hon. gentlemen remember, that when the McKinley tariff was passed and when the Liberal-Conservative government said that they proposed to send eggs to England, they were met with a shout of derision by the Liberals of this country, because the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, being then supreme on financial and commercial questions in that party, held strongly to his pet doctrine that governments were flies on the wheel, and that there was nothing that they could do to promote trade in butter or eggs or anything else. But he has had to listen to a different story from the hon. Minister of Finance. Take the question of cheese. Will hon. gentlemen tell me if there was any preferential tariff in force from 1878 to 1895? What occurred in the cheese trade? We sent, in 1878, $3,801,643 and in 1895, $14,220,505 worth of cheese to Great Britain. The cheese of the United States was driven out of the English market by Canadian cheese long before the preference was thought of, and that ascendancy attained under the Liberal-Conservative rule has, I am happy to say, continued to the present time. So it is with Canadian bacon. As I went through the streets of London, I was glad to see in the large grocery stores, that Canadian cheese and Canadian bacon were rated of far better quality and selling at a higher price than the American products. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding), says that we do not ask for any quid pro quo from England, and that we do not want any pound of flesh. Let me tell him that Canada did not originate this policy of preferential trade. Inter-Imperial preferential trade was adopted in 1891, by the United Empire Trade League, composed of a number of eminent members of the Lords and Commons and commercial men of both political parties. Their object was not to benefit Canada, but to benefit the empire. They were Englishmen and their policy was propounded, because having examined all the means to bind the empire together, they thought this was the best. They arrived at the conclusion that to the feeling of sentiment might be added mutually beneficial trade relations, and that both combined, would indissolubly unite the empire together.

I want to meet the statement made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding), that nothing will induce the English people to reverse their policy and to impose any duties upon the food of the people. In 1890 and 1891, I went into that subject very fully, in the Nineteenth Century, and I gave elaborate evidence from the best authorities to show what substantial advantage might be given to colonial products in the English markets, without at all raising the price of food. I will give the hon. gentleman a very high authority. The Right Hon. Mr. Goschen, when Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1891, used this language, and he is now in the present government as First Lord of the Admiralty. He said:

I think it possible that the advantage of the consolidation of the empire may be so great that, if the increase in the price of the loaf is extremely small, the producers with whom the power now lies far more than with the consumers, may not object. I differ with the hon. member for Leeds, who supposed that if we had any customs union or arrangement by which favour was shown to the colonies, the United States would have a right to interfere. I do not think the United States would have a right to remonstrate or interfere in the way he suggested.

I give that to the hon. gentleman from an eminent British statesman, who does not regard that phase as a contingency. I may say that the masses of the people, the consumers, will, in my judgment, be the very agency that will bring about the condition of things in England which we desire to see. The United Empire Trade League went to Lord Salisbury with the request that he would have the Belgian and German treaties abrogated, because no such arrangement of inter-preferential trade could be carried out unless that were done. Lord Salisbury said:

On this matter, public opinion must be framed or formed before any government could act.

Did Lord Salisbury say, it is quite impossible to undertake or to deal with a subject of this kind. Not at all. Lord Salisbury said further:

On this matter, public opinion must be framed or formed before any government can act. No government can impose its own opinion on the people of this country in these matters. You are invited, and it is the duty of those who feel themselves to be the pioneers of such a movement and the apostles of such a doctrine, to go forth to fight for it, and, when they have convinced the people of this country, their battle will be won.

That is not very discouraging. Lord Salisbury's advice was taken, and the United Empire Trade League agitated all over Britain in favour of this matter, and after the general elections in 1895, they went back with this statement to Lord Salisbury:

The greater number of the members returned to the present parliament in support of your lordship's policy and administration, advocated either in their election addresses or in their platform speeches, the policy of united empire trade, and to this fact must be ascribed some portion of the unparalleled majority in the House of Commons by which your lordship is supported—especially from working-class constituencies.

Now Sir, there is the fact, and yet the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding), has actually said that no man with a head on his shoulders (or words to that effect), could be found that would advocate any such thing. The Times newspaper of March 10, 1896, said:

The Prime Minister has addressed a letter to Sir Howard Vincent, as honorary secretary of the United Empire Trade League, in reply to the memorial presented last month by the council of that body, praying that notice might be given denouncing the clause in the commercial treaties with Germany and Belgium preventing British colonies from levying a lighter duty upon British goods than upon foreign goods, should they elect to do so. Lord Salisbury says that 'since the accession to office of Her Majesty's present advisers the question of the trade relations between the mother country and the colonies has been taken into serious consideration, and that he is in thorough accord with the views expressed by Mr. Chamberlain as to the extreme importance of securing as large a share as possible of the mutual trade of the United Kingdom and the colonies for British producers and manufacturers, whether located in the colonies or in the United Kingdom.'

I do not think that bears out the statement made by the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding). Then on the 25th of April, 1892, the Canadian parliament passed this resolution:

That if and when the parliament of Great Britain and Ireland admits Canadian products to the markets of the United Kingdom upon more favourable terms than it accords to the products of foreign countries, the parliament of Canada will be prepared to accord corresponding advantages, by a reduction in the duty it imposes upon British manufactured goods.

That is our policy to-day, that is the position we take. We say it is a question of business: that it is a question of trade. That is a question which, under our constitution, has been confided to the people of Canada, and, Sir, we respond to the appeal made from high authorities in Great Britain on this question, and, we believe, with them, that it will promote the unity of this great empire. We believe that we are right, and that it is just and proper we should ask from Her Majesty's government, that they should adopt the same policy with reference to Canada, that Canada adopts in regard to Great Britain. I may say that at the second meeting of the Chambers of Commerce of the Empire, I moved a resolution, proposing that a 5 per cent duty should be imposed by Great Britain in favour of the products of her colonies, and against foreign products, and that was defeated by a vote of the Chambers of the Commerce of the Empire, 47 voting against and 34 voting for. In an article I contributed to one of the magazines of the day, I showed that if the delegates from Australia and South Africa had voted in accordance with the instructions they had received from the Chambers of Commerce that sent them there, that resolution would have been carried. In the Ottawa conference, it was resolved :

That this conference records its belief in the advisability of a customs arrangement between Great Britain and her colonies by which trade within the empire may be placed on a more favourable footing than that which is carried on with foreign countries.

That resolution was sent home to the Imperial government. Lord Rosebery was at that time, I think, in power; if not, he was Foreign Minister, and Her Majesty, in her speech at the closing of parliament, said :

A conference was held at Ottawa in the month of June last, at which representatives of the Imperial government, the Dominion of Canada, the Cape and the Australian colonies met to consider questions relating to inter-colonial tariffs and communications.

I have learnt with satisfaction that the proceedings of the conference were of a character calculated to strengthen the union of the colonies concerned, both among themselves and with the mother country.

There, Sir, you have from the Prime Minister of England, speaking through the mouth of the sovereign in closing parliament, the declaration that that policy which was propounded and adopted by the Ottawa conference, at which Her Majesty's government, Canada, Australasia and South Africa were represented, was calculated to strengthen the unity of the empire. Then, the Toronto Board of Trade took this question up in 1896, and passed a resolution of a similar character :

Whereas, while the trade legislation of other nations is framed to subserve their local interests, all British trade and other legislation should aim to secure within the empire a union of interest of a federal character, and the policy of each British community should be designed to retain within the empire subjects whose labour would otherwise go to foreign lands ;

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Resolved, that, in the opinion of this conference, the advantage to be obtained by a closer union between the various portions of the British Empire are so great as to justify an arrangement as nearly as possible of the nature of a Zollverein, based upon principles of the freest exchange of commodities within the empire, consistent with the tariff requirements incident to the maintenance of the local government of each kingdom, dominion, province or colony, now forming part of the British family of nations.

Well, Sir, Mr. Chamberlain opened that Chamber of Commerce with a speech of immense significance. He said :

And I admit that, if I understand it correctly, I find the germs of such a proposal in a resolution which is to be submitted to you on behalf of the Toronto Board of Trade. What is that resolution? I hope I correctly explain it. That resolution I understand to be one for the creation of a British Zollverein or customs union, which would establish at once practically free trade throughout the British Empire, but would leave the contracting parties free to make their own arrangements with regard to duties upon foreign goods; except that—this is an essential condition of the proposal—that Great Britain shall consent to replace moderate duties upon certain articles which are of large production in the colonies. Now, if I have rightly understood it, these articles would comprise corn, meat, wool and sugar, and perhaps other articles of enormous consumption in this country, which are at present largely produced in the colonies, and which might be, under such an arrangement, wholly produced in the colonies, and wholly produced by British labour. On the other hand, as I have said, the colonies, while maintaining their duties upon foreign imports, would agree to a free interchange of commodities with the rest of the empire, and would cease to place protective duties upon any product of British labour.

Hon. gentlemen opposite say that there are no protective duties now, but that they have a revenue tariff; and, therefore, that comes entirely within the statement made by Mr. Chamberlain. That congress passed a resolution to this effect :

That this Congress of Chambers of Commerce of the empire is of opinion that the establishment of closer commercial relations between the United Kingdom and the colonies and dependencies is an object which deserves, and demands, prompt and careful consideration. The congress, therefore, respectfully represents to Her Majesty's government that, if the suggestion should be made on behalf of the colonies or of some of them, it would be right and expedient to promote such consideration, and the formulation of some practicable plan, by summoning an Imperial conference, thoroughly representative of the interests involved, or by such other means as Her Majesty may be advised to adopt.

I was a little surprised to learn that the Finance Minister could so asperse the leader of the government of which he is a member as to intimate that this question is scoffed at by everybody, that it is an utterly idle and impracticable story, and to assert, like other hon. gentlemen, that not a word nor a suggestion along that line had been uttered by Mr. Chamberlain. What did the Prime Minister say on the 17th of May, 1896, when seeking the sweet voices of the people? On this question of preferential trade, he said:

In regard to this question of preferential trade, Mr. Laurier desired to say that Sir Charles Tupper was no more favourable to the idea than himself.

My hope is, nay, my conviction is, that on the 23rd of June the Liberal party will be at the head of the polls; and then it will be the Liberal party, with its policy of a revenue tariff, that will send commissioners to London to arrange for a basis of preferential trade.

The hon. gentleman went more fully into the subject at London, Ont., where he said:

Now, the statesmen of Great Britain have thought that the governments of the colonies have come to a time when a new step can be taken in their development? What is that? That there shall be a commercial agreement between England and the colonies. That practical statesman, Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, has come to the conclusion that the time has come when it is possible to have within the bounds of the empire a new step taken, which will give to the colonies in England a preference for their products over the products of other nations. What would be the possibilities of such a step if it was taken? We sell our goods in England. We send our wheat, our butter, our cheese, all our natural products, but there we have to compete with similar products from the United States, from Russia, and from other nations. Just see what a great advantage it would be to Canada, if the wheat, cheese and butter, which we would send to England, should be met in England with a preference over similar products of other nations. The possibilities are immense.

Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, the new and progressive Secretary of the Colonies, has declared that the time has come when it is possible to discuss that question. But, Sir, if England is going to give us that preference, England would expect something from us in return. What is it she would expect? England would expect that we would come as closely to her own system of free trade as it is possible for us to come. England does not expect that we should take her own system of free trade, such as she has it; but I lay it before you, that the thing the English people would expect in return is that, instead of a principle of protection, we should adopt the revenue form of tariff, pure and simple. These are the conditions on which we can have that boon.

The right hon. gentleman says now that he has got that power, and I say that he gave the most emphatic pledge that it was possible for a man to give to the people of Canada, that if he obtained power his first act would be to send commissioners to England to negotiate for that preferential trade. I am sorry to say that for some cause not yet explained to the people of Canada nor to this House, the views of my right hon. friend underwent a radical and complete change, and that before he touched the soil of England.

Well, Sir, the Minister of Trade and Commerce read for the third or fourth time in this House a letter of His Grace the Duke of Devonshire on this subject in response to a communication which had been made to him by the Postmaster General. That hon. gentleman sent that communication without referring the matter to me, as I think he was bound in courtesy to do. Seeing that he was sending what purported to be a speech of mine in order to obtain an opinion upon it, I think he should have taken the trouble to verify that speech before sending it. However, the Duke of Devonshire says in his letter that he never made a formal offer of inter-Imperial trade to my right hon. friend.

Nobody supposed he had any power to do so. As a member of the government he could discuss the question, but was not in a position to make an offer; but I put it to my right hon. friend whether he did not understand the speech made by His Grace the Duke of Devonshire to be an invitation to the colonial Premiers to make known what they thought on this question of an inter-Imperial commercial arrangement. If that was not his understanding of the speech, why did my right hon. friend reply that he did not want anything of the kind? Will he tell this House that the other Premiers did not consider it an invitation to them to state how far they would be able to go in making proposals to Her Majesty's government. The evidence is clear that they did, nor does the letter of His Grace in the slightest degree contradict that view. On the contrary, he said:

Very few disciples of free trade fifty years ago would have believed for a moment that at this time France and Germany would be carrying on an enormous trade under strictly prohibitive conditions, and not only that they would not have opened their markets to us, but they would be competing over us for the possession of as large a portion as possible of the surface of the earth, not for the purpose of opening it up out of the universal benefits of free trade, but for the purpose of excluding from those portions English trade. The world has not become the commercial paradise which was predicted in the early days of free trade opinion, when it was hoped that free trade would bind all the nations of the earth so closely together that it would be a matter of comparatively little importance by whom they were ruled, or under what influence they were governed. We have since learned by painful experience that no old nor new markets are being thrown open to us by the influence of free trade alone, and that if we want to provide for increasing commerce, which is necessary for the support of our increasing population, we must find those markets for ourselves, and must use every opportunity either of expanding or consolidating our colonial possessions.

Lord Salisbury said that he was at one with Mr. Chamberlain in the views he had announced on that important question and His Grace the Duke of Devonshire accentuated that statement. But my right hon. friend, instead of redeeming the solemn pledge he had given the people of this country, betrayed the people. What did he do? In answer to that speech, he said:

I claim for the present government of Canada that they have passed a resolution by which the products of Great Britain are admitted on the rate of their tariff at 12½ per cent, and next year at 25 per cent reduction. This we have done, not asking any compensation.

There is a class of our fellow-citizens who ask that all such concessions should be made for quid pro quo.

The Canadian government has ignored all such sentiments.

We have done it because we owe a debt of gratitude to Great Britain. We have done it because it is no intention of ours to disturb in any way the system of free trade which has done so much for England.

Many schemes of union had been suggested, but they all had the fatal objection of interfering with the freedom of trade of the colonies.

The colonies had already granted certain concessions to the mother country, but they asked for no quid pro quo, no pound of flesh.

What we give you by our tariff, we give you in gratitude for the splendid freedom under which we have prospered. It is a free gift. We ask no compensation. Protection has been the curse of Canada: we would not see you come under its baneful influence—for what weakens you must weaken us.

I ask my right hon. friend is that what the people had a right to expect at his hands. When asking their suffrages, he declared that if they would clothe him with power he would send a commission to negotiate inter-Imperial preferential trade between Great Britain and Canada, but having obtained power, he deliberately turned his back on this pledge, and down to this hour there is not a man in this country who has been taken into his confidence and been told what was the cause of this overwhelming change of opinion on his part. It is very significant that he should have gone out of his way to curse that which he was sent to bless.

I may say that Lord Salisbury does not agree with my right hon. friend in his view that inter-Imperial preference would interfere with free trade. He was written to by a gentleman in England as long ago as April 5, 1887, and he instructed his private secretary to reply as follows:

I am to reply that Lord Salisbury does not imagine that differential duties in favour of our colonies, whatever may be said for or against them, can properly be described under the term protection.

There is a sweeping away of the whole foundation of my right hon. friend's position when on the high road to obtain a Cobden medal. His Grace the Duke of Devonshire, made another pronouncement; and if by his speeches he did not mean to invite the colonies to propose what measures they considered would contribute most to the unity of the empire, I do not know what he meant. At the Merchant Taylors' Hall, London, on July 5, 1897, he said:

We know that while our colonies and our dependencies can by a strengthened unity greatly enlarge and enhance our power and influence in the world, yet at the same time we have much that we can offer to them, and which we do offer to them; and it is not in the interest of the islands alone—it is in the interest of the whole English-speaking race—that we advocate the idea of unity, and we urge upon you to take every measure that it is in your power to take to cement and strengthen it. But, ladies and gentlemen, we believe ourselves, the British race both here and abroad, that we are not only a sentimental people, but a practical people, and the idea which must have occurred to many of us, after witnessing the demonstration at home and abroad which we have witnessed in these recent times is, what is to be the practical outcome of it all; what are the measures which we are about to take in order to satisfy the aspirations which many of us have formed; and how are we going to give effect to the sentiment the existence of which, as I have said, is now undoubted?

The hon. gentleman was using every means to induce the Premiers whom he was addressing to take this question up.

On the 21st of June, my right hon. friend again said:

Realizing this, and at the same time realizing the great utility which would follow from a closer union between England and her colonies, the Canadian government have undertaken in some degree to solve the difficulty. They have given to Great Britain a preference in their own markets.

My objection to this preference is stated in the resolution for which we voted in 1897. My objection was that it was an inducement to England not to give us anything in return. Down to that hour the question had been discussed on the basis of mutual benefit and with the object of using the tie of self-interest to knit and bind more closely together the colonies and the empire. That could best be done by the empire benefiting us and we it, and every one knows that hundreds of thousands of men would be brought into the Dominion by a policy that would give Canadian products a preference in the English markets over the products of foreign countries, and every man brought into this country is an additional strength to the empire, as has been recently shown. Therefore, the great objection we had to this preference was that we were throwing away the greatest incentive and the strongest argument that could be used by those who were seeking to have an arrangement made by which the products of the colonies could enter the British market on better terms than the products of foreign countries. It is on that ground that we object to this preference clause. We object to it as throwing away the most effective means by which a preference in the British market could be secured for our goods. This is what the right hon. gentleman said:

Now, Sir, this we have done deliberately, and for this let me tell you, gentlemen, the Canadian government and the Canadian people ask nothing in return. They have done it out of gratitude for the motherland. They do not ask any quid pro quo; they do not ask for the pound of flesh; they do not require a price for their loyalty.

I am afraid he was not exactly speaking then under the inspiration of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, who says that we owe nothing to the motherland except forgiveness, in a spirit of Christian charity, for the wrong she has done us. I am afraid he was not acting under that aspiration.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. It shows what high Christians we are.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Quite so.

They have done it out of gratitude for the motherland. They do not ask any quid pro quo; they do not ask for the pound of flesh; they do not require a price for their loyalty.

The question had, up to that time, been discussed upon the broad principle of mutual benefit to Great Britain, and to Canada, and the outlying portions of the empire. But, the right hon. gentleman narrowed it down and gave it an entirely different character, taking the strongest means he could to prevent anybody ever accomplishing anything in favour of this great measure that the whole people of Canada desire, that every man in Canada to-day longs for, and that every intelligent man knows will do more for Canada than any policy that has ever been propounded in Canada, or that can be conceived.

And, what does Mr. Chamberlain say in reply? He evidently saw that my right hon. friend was labouring under some hostile spirit, that could not very well be explained. Mr. Chamberlain knew what the position was. I was over in 1896, after the defeat of my government. I had the honour of dining with the United Empire Trade League. And, some members of that organization expressed their deep regret that I should have been defeated, because of the support that I was prepared to give to inter-Imperial preferential trade. I said: I am happy to be able to tell you that you are quite mistaken; that, instead of my defeat being an injury to inter-Imperial trade, it will be the reverse: the hon. gentleman who has defeated me, and who is now the Premier of Canada, is pledged as strongly as I am in favour of inter-Imperial preferential trade, and has declared that one of the first things he would do, if he got power, would be to send a commission to England to negotiate it, and I have the most unbounded confidence that he will keep his pledge: and the result will be that you will have the Liberal party of which he is the head, struggling to obtain this great boon, and the Conservative party standing behind them, giving all the aid and sympathy they can. Mr. Chamberlain said, in reply to the right hon. gentleman on June 21, 1897 (Sir Wilfrid Laurier)—for he spoke later:

My Lord Mayor, if our self-governing colonies desire now or at any future time to take their share in the glories and in the responsibilities of the empire they will find that we are ready to meet them more than half-way, and that we will make it our duty to establish firmly that principle of our connection: 'Each for all, and all for each,' upon which alone the stability and the prosperity of the empire can depend and—

Mark this, Mr. Speaker:

—if they are wishful to draw closer the commercial relations between themselves and us, now or at any future time, again I say we will meet them, and in no huckstering spirit. We will not treat this as a transaction in a ledger, to be weighed in proportion to the exact balance of profit and loss. No, there is a principle, and, as I have said, a sentiment behind it which will carry all before it, because we see in such tightening of Imperial bonds a guarantee for security and continued unity.

I say, that the man who, in the face of that will say that there is no public man in England who will listen to the discussion of this question, that it is scorned by the press and the people in that country, utterly fails to grasp this subject, utterly fails to see it in its true light. But, my right hon. friend came back, and, I wish to remind him of a point which, it seems, has escaped his notice. He was attacked for having betrayed the interests of Canada, for having failed to redeem the pledge he gave to the people. He went to Toronto and gave his answer. And, what was it? I will give his exact words, as taken in his speech in Toronto, after his return in 1897:

Certainly, if I thought I could have obtained for my country, for the products of Canada, a preferential treatment in the markets of Great Britain, I would not only have been wanting in patriotism, but I would have been wanting in reason—I would simply have been an idiot—if I had failed to obtain such a preference. But let me say that above all things, in matters political, I have learned my lesson from British precedents, and I know that all reforms have to be taken one step at a time, and he who endeavours to do more than that is likely to end in failure.

Then he went on to say that the treaties had been denounced, and that they were the great hindrance in the way, and proceeded:

There is nothing in the way now. The coast is clear. The ground is ready for discussion, and it can be discussed with a hope of obtaining some satisfactory solution of the problem.

There is another pledge, a pledge made since he came back—that the great difficulty out of the way, he would do everything in his power to obtain this great boon for Canada. What step has he taken, down to this hour? He has done nothing but block every effort made in this House to take a single step in that direction. Though he declared that the great difficulty had been removed, and he was ready to do everything, he has done less than nothing.

The Minister of Finance says that Mr. Chamberlain has never committed himself on this question. I want to know how he accounts for the declaration of the leader of his own government, that Mr. Chamberlain had committed himself in the fullest degree, and had proposed a policy that was perfectly practicable, and that under a policy of revenue tariff—which the hon. gentleman says he has now—it could be carried out without difficulty. Does he say that the leader of the government does not know anything about this subject? Does he cast ridicule upon that gentleman, and say he is incapable of reading the English language and of learning the sentiments of a public man from his express declaration on manifold occasions? The hon. gentleman's (Mr. Fielding's), statements are a serious reflection upon his leader. As the hon. gentleman knows, the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, Secretary of State for the Colonies, in the presence of these Premiers, said in effect: What are you prepared to do in reference to commercial matters? I see that a conference of the Premiers of Australia declared in favour of having a commission appointed, and we want to know if these are your views still. We know that the Premiers of Australia had agreed, that they had passed a resolution asking for a commission on this subject. And who stopped it, who blocked it, who prevented anything being done? The onus rests on the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who had given his pledge that he would do everything in his power to support this policy. Speaking to the Premiers, the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain said:

In the meanwhile, however, I may say that I note a resolution which appears to have been passed unanimously at a meeting of the Premiers in Hobart, in which the desire was expressed for closer commercial arrangements with the empire, and I think it was suggested that a commission of inquiry should be created in order to see in what way practical effect might be given to the aspiration. If that be the case, and if it were thought at the present time you were not prepared to go beyond that inquiry, if it were the wish of the other colonies, of Canada and of the South African colonies, to join in such an inquiry, Her Majesty's government would be delighted to make arrangements for that purpose, and to accept any suggestions as to the form of the reference and the character and constitution of the commission, and would very gladly take part in it.

Does the hon. gentleman dare to tell me, or any hon. gentleman in this House, or out of it, that the Right Hon. Mr. Chamberlain, who had followed step by step, line by line, the declarations that had been made in regard to this subject, by the Premiers, and ended in proposing to these gentlemen that he would form part of a commission to take this subject up and inquire into it—does he mean to say, that that indicates that there is no man in England that we can quote a line from, or any public journal of influence, to show that there is any utility in doing anything in regard to this matter? Now, Sir, Colonel Sir Howard Vincent was interviewed on this subject, February 12, 1897, and this is what he said:

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

In view of Mr. G. E. Foster's and Sir Charles Tupper's speeches, and the action of the Canadian parliament, a correspondent asked Colonel Howard Vincent, M.P., to-day what action was intended in the Imperial parliament respecting a tariff of preferences with the empire. He replied: 'I cannot say definitely, but we shall march forward day by day, and stage by stage, in accordance with Sir Charles Tupper's views and those of the Canadian government.'

Col. Vincent continues:

The United Empire Trade League now numbers quite two-thirds of the ministerialists in the British Commons.

And yet, the hon. gentleman tells this House that no man can be found in England that will lend any countenance or any sanction to these proposals. I have been obliged to detain the House at length on this question because I consider it of vital importance, and I am anxious to place before the country, clearly and distinctly, the great issue that is between the parties. Hon. gentlemen opposite propose to give a preference which we on this side of the House think is calculated to prevent anything ever being done that will induce the British government and the British parliament to negotiate on this question, because all these questions have to be negotiated on the principle of reciprocity. We take our stand on the principle of protection. We say we are prepared to protect the great industries of this country, and we couple with that the proposition that no protection, no boon, as the right hon. gentleman has justly said, and repeated again and again before the elections, can be given to the great agricultural interests of Canada that will compare for a moment with the advantage it would derive in securing the imposition of a duty upon the products of foreign countries going into the British market that will give an advantage to Canada.

Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman says that every London journal scoffs at the idea of preferential trade. Why do they scoff at it? They did not scoff at it before the preference was thrown at them, and before they were told that we wanted nothing for it, that it was given out of sympathy for the gigantic blunders that they had made, as a member of this government has declared, but we wanted nothing for it. Here is what the Times said on February 13, 1896:

It is believed that the accession of Sir Charles Tupper to the ministry will lead Canada to make some kind of an effort of preferential trade with the mother country. It is probable that the united governments of Australia will make a similar effort. The recent turn of foreign affairs, especially regarding Germany and America, have given much popular impetus to this movement.

And yet, every London journal, according to the hon. gentleman, scoffs at the idea of obtaining inter-Imperial preferential trade. Now, let me refer to the boards of trade. I suppose there are some men in the boards of trade of Montreal, Toronto and Ottawa, who have heads on their shoulders, some men who have a little knowledge of commercial affairs as well as the Minister of Finance. Now, Sir, this proposition that the hon. gentleman scoffs at, derides, and says is out of the question, that it is a waste of time to discuss it, is not so regarded by the boards of trade of Montreal, Toronto and Ottawa, who have, within the last month, passed resolutions strongly affirming the desirability of sending delegates to a congress of the Chamber of Commerce, to press this very policy upon the associated chambers of commerce of the empire. I will ask the permission of the House to have these resolutions of the boards of trade entered on the record, as I have really no time to read them :

Ottawa Board of Trade :

Whereas, the second congress of the Chamber of Commerce of the empire declared, in 1892, 'That arrangements should be devised to secure closer commercial union between the mother country and her colonies and dependencies,' and, 'That a commercial union within the British Empire on the basis of freer trade would tend to promote its permanence and prosperity ;'

And whereas, it has been generally admitted that the colonies should contribute towards the cost of Imperial defence, and, as a matter of fact, colonial forces have participated with those of the United Kingdom, in defending the integrity of the empire ;

Therefore, be it resolved, that, in the opinion of this congress, a certain degree of closer commercial union among the countries of the empire can be most conveniently established a step towards the introduction of inter-British free trade most readily taken, and the responsibilities of each part of the empire most equitably borne by providing a revenue for its defence, and, other common Imperial purposes, from the proceeds of a small uniform duty (over and above those of the local tariffs, where any such are levied) on all importations from foreign countries, into every part of the empire.

Montreal Board of Trade :

That in the opinion of this congress the bonds of the British Empire would be materially strengthened and the union of the various parts of Her Majesty's dominions greatly consolidated—

(a.) By the colonies contributing towards the naval and military defence of the empire ;

(b.) By the adoption of a commercial arrangement that, while conserving the present freedom of action as to the fiscal policies most suitable to the geographical conditions and diversified interests of the individual countries composing the empire, will provide for the imposition of a moderate special ad valorem duty on importations from foreign countries to be levied uniformly by all parts of the British Empire, thus not only providing revenue for joint Imperial responsibilities, but also inaugurating a policy of mutual benefit whereby each component part of the empire would receive an advantage in trade as a result of its national relationship.

Toronto Board of Trade :

Whereas, it is generally recognized that an advantageous commercial bond is the strongest link in national unity, and maintenance and strengthening of trade is the keystone of a state's successful development ;

And whereas, the existence of an empire is largely dependent upon the material prosperity of its people :

Therefore, be it resolved that, in the opinion of this congress, the bonds of the British Empire would be materially strengthened and the union of the various parts of Her Majesty's dominions greatly consolidated by the adoption of a commercial policy based upon the principle of mutual benefit, whereby each component part of the empire would receive a substantial advantage in trade as the result of their national relationship.

Sir, I do not propose to take up further time than to move the resolution which I hold in my hand, and which is seconded by Mr. Foster :

That all the words after 'That' be left out and the following added instead thereof:—'this House is of opinion that a system of mutual trade preference between Great Britain and Ireland and the colonies would greatly stimulate increased production in and commerce between these countries, and would thus promote and maintain the unity of the empire; and that no measure of preference which falls short of the complete realization of such a policy should be considered as final or satisfactory.'

That is the policy that we propound to-day in opposition to the policy proposed by the hon. gentleman of increasing to 33½ per cent the preference given to English imports. I have no hesitation in saying that, although the condition of things is flourishing to-day, and although that preference, if it should take effect, might not be very seriously felt at present, yet, let a little stringency come and the hon. gentleman will find industry after industry going down in Canada. They will find that without having accomplished anything beneficial to Great Britain, without having increased by one pound or by one dollar the exports sent from this country to Great Britain, without having accomplished anything that will promote in any measure the unity of the empire, the action of the government are taking is going to be fraught with danger to the best interests of the country. I say that the policy that we propose is a policy of 'fitting protection.' That was the original term, that is the term we use now, 'fitting protection' to the manufacturing, the mining, fishing, lumbering, agricultural and shipping industries, and to Canadian labour. There is the ground on which we are ready to go to battle with hon. gentlemen opposite any moment they may choose to select. I have no hesitation in saying that the claim the hon. gentleman made in his budget speech, claiming the earth for themselves, claiming that recent events had brought about a tremendous effect upon Great Britain, is wholly unwarranted. The hon. gentleman closed his speech by saying :

It is the story of a people who bear cheerfully every obligation that comes upon them for the maintenance of their own public service, and who have found their devotion to the Throne and the person of their Sovereign so quickened by the inspiring events of recent years, that they quite freely give of their blood and of their treasure for the defence and the honour of the empire in lands that are far away.

Does the hon. gentleman think that that is due to this government?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Yes.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Let me remind the House of what the Prime Minister of Canada said in Sherbrooke. He apologized for having done anything. He said he had not consented to anything, not even to allowing men to enlist in the British army from Canada, he had not consented to anything until he was borne down by the overwhelming sentiment of the country. Let me call a witness from that side of the House. The hon. the junior member for the city of Halifax (Mr. Russell) has borne this testimony:

It was the opportunity and the privilege of the leader of the opposition to initiate the proposal to offer Canadian troops for service in South Africa. It was a proud, and enviable, and distinguished opportunity.

Then, what do we find the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) saying on this subject:

After parliament was prorogued, events went on, until it came to the point where the Prime Minister declared that Canada was not at war with the South African Republic; that our Militia Act forbade the sending of our troops outside of Canada unless her territory was threatened; and, moreover, that parliament was sovereign in the matter, and that, without the sanction of parliament, the government could do nothing. I think this is a fair résumé of the position taken by the right hon. gentleman in his often-quoted interview with the 'Globe.' The leader of the opposition took issue with the Prime Minister. In a telegram which did not reach its destination, but which was published broadcast—

And known well to the hon. gentleman.

--the hon. gentleman advised the government to send troops right at once and not to mind parliament. I need not say where my sympathy stood. Ten days later the government gave up, and decided to send troops.

I commend that to the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite. What more have we, Sir? At this moment we have the fact that supporters of the government are now agitating the question and are holding public meetings in the province of Quebec. The hon. member for Laprairie and Naperville (Mr. Monet), the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), and the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Angers), are holding public meetings in the province of Quebec denouncing the sending of troops, apologizing for the Premier, and saying that he was forced by that dreadful man, Sir Charles Tupper. This may be a farce that is being carried out, but, I think, if it is one, it is not particularly creditable to the hon. gentleman.

If my hon. friend the Minister of Finance will excuse me for invading his patent of the very eloquent peroration that he made in concluding his budget speech. I will, after having stated the policy of the great party which I have the honour, at present, to lead, conclude my remarks by saying that the story of the party and of the government of this country is the story of a party who glorify the federation they did their utmost to obstruct.

It is the story of a party, who, having failed to defeat the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, now boast of what it has achieved for the country.

It is the story of a party, that, after the denunciation of protection, have adopted it as their policy.

It is the story of a party who pledged themselves to secure reciprocal trade between England and Canada, and afterwards declared they did not wish that policy adopted.

It is the story of a party who have violated every pledge they gave to the country when seeking power.

It is the story of a party who avowed the policy of promoting trade with the mother country and so changed the tariff as to cause a diminution of the imports of England in three years of 3.90 per cent, and an increase of imports from the United States of 40.37 per cent in the same period.

It is the story of a party who opposed sending a Canadian contingent to aid England in South Africa until forced by their opponents to do so, and now claim the entire credit themselves.

It is the story of a party who opposed every measure that has caused the great development and prosperity of Canada and now attempt to reap where they had not sown.

I beg to move:

That all the words after the word 'That' be left out and the following added instead thereof:—'this House is of opinion that a system of mutual trade preference between Great Britain and Ireland and the colonies would greatly stimulate increased production in and commerce between these countries, and would thus promote and maintain the unity of the empire; and that no measure of preference which falls short of the complete realization of such a policy should be considered as final or satisfactory.'

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). Mr. Speaker, I trust that the honourable baronet (Sir Charles Tupper) has not concluded his speech and left the Chamber without hearing a few words in reply to some of the observations that he has made.

Mr. BERGERON. He is going to Quebec.

An hon. MEMBER. He will hear you.

Mr. DAVIN. Speak a little louder.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The only reason I would like to have him present is that I may feel constrained to make, for a moment or two, a few references to him, perhaps, more personally, nothing in the way of anything personally objectionable, nothing in the way of anything that could be termed personalities, but in regard to things in which he has taken a prominent part. He told us, in the eulogy which he passed upon the speech of the hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), by way of criticism of the speech of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), that it was such an able, such a marvellous speech—of course, it could not be anything else but marvellous when delivered by an hon. gentleman who was said to be possessed of more financial knowledge than any other man in the Dominion of Canada—and he had gone so exhaustively into the subject that he had really left nothing for the hon. baronet to say. There was a mere crumb left. The hon. leader of the opposition has been masticating that crumb for four hours, so that, it is reasonable to conclude that if he had left a whole loaf we would have been detained here during the whole of this session by the hon. gentleman. The first hour of the two hours during which the hon. gentleman spoke last night was taken up in abusing the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), and while that hour lasted the hon. gentleman remained present, in order, by his presence, to give an additional zest and force and zeal to the hon. gentleman while he was pouring out his abuse upon him.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). It was for Auld Lang Syne.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. When the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) devoted the next hour to lauding himself, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce felt that the noble baronet had enough reserve power by way of self-esteem to enable him to do full justice to himself without his presence, and, therefore, he withdrew from the Chamber. During these two hours I think that the only remark that he had occasion to make, outside of these personal references to the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce was that the Liberal party were disloyal when they adopted the principle of seeking unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. He denounced them very strongly in that respect, but, as was pointed out, and that is one of the reasons why I wanted to have him here at the present moment, he forgot to tell the House, and to tell his party, that if the Liberal party were willing, at one time to trade, or to see if it were possible to trade with the American people on a broad basis, on an unrestricted basis, if you will, the hon. baronet himself, who declares it to be so disloyal, was himself the one who, I think, made the actual proposals, or offers to the United States on that very basis. Hon. gentlemen opposite will please to remember, whenever any of them see fit to allude to the subject, that the gentleman they have chosen as their leader, the one who leads their forces, was the one who is said to have led in this movement. What do I find? From the Hansard of 1888, page 1047, I find that Sir Charles Tupper spoke as follows:

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. To-day they (the Liberals) have escaped sudden destruction on the rock of commercial union only to be stranded on the shoals of unrestricted reciprocity.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). You were very near there yourself.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman says I was very near there myself. I am puzzled to know what sort of mental organization a man must possess who cannot discover the distinction between an unrestricted offer and unrestricted reciprocity. When as a negotiator, when as one of Her Majesty's plenipotentiaries, it became my duty to ascertain whether the United States were prepared to meet us half way, or to do anything to remove the obstructions to the freer commercial intercourse which we all desire, when I was in that position, I put an unrestricted offer before them certainly, but did I say anything about unrestricted reciprocity? What was the offer? Did it commit me to anything except that I was prepared to negotiate in regard to the question of freer commercial intercourse? The hon. gentleman said, you made an unrestricted offer. I said I did, and I did so deliberately, because if the statesmen of the United States were prepared to offer us unrestricted reciprocity, I wanted to know it, but I was not committed to it. I said that I was prepared to negotiate the settlement of the fisheries difficulty on the basis of freer commercial intercourse, but I ask any hon. gentleman on the other side if I would not have had a perfect answer to any proposition, either that the proposal did not go far enough, or that it went too far.

Mr. MACKENZIE. You made an offer, but you did not mean it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman says that I made an offer which I did not mean. That would be a very mean thing to do. I think my hon. friend cannot mean that. I made an offer in a broad and comprehensive form, meaning exactly what I said, that I was prepared, or that the British plenipotentiaries, who authorized me to make the offer, were prepared to negotiate the settlement of the fisheries question upon the basis of greater freedom of intercourse between the United States and Canada; but did that commit me to unrestricted reciprocity? I was asking for what every public man in this country, every man on both sides of this House, has endeavoured to obtain, and has asked for over and over again.

Mr. MACKENZIE. If they accepted your offer, would not that have committed you?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, it would not have committed me to unrestricted reciprocity. I tell my hon. friend, as I have already explained, that if they had accepted the offer, and had said: Yes, we will settle this question on terms of greater freedom of commercial intercourse, and had then said: We are prepared to negotiate in regard to those terms, and had asked: What greater freedom do you wish? I would have formulated the greater freedom which we desire, and would have put a distinct statement before them. Then I would have been bound to formulate my policy and to say how far I was prepared to go or how far I required them to go in order to negotiate the question on that basis. I had to take up more time to teach hon. gentlemen the difference between an unrestricted offer and unrestricted reciprocity. I should despair, and I will save my breath for something more important.

There is the history of it, from the very man who made a formal offer to the United States. True he tells us it was an unrestricted offer, and he pities the mental organization of the man who cannot see the difference between that and an offer of unrestricted reciprocity. If the plenipotentiary of a great power made an unrestricted offer of reciprocity to another great nation, could it mean anything else but an offer of unrestricted reciprocity? Suppose the Americans had said: We want reciprocity in minerals, as you have offered, and that Sir Charles Tupper replied: I did not offer that; the natural reply of the Americans would be: Oh, yes you did, for your offer is an unrestricted one. Suppose the Americans said: We want reciprocity in manufactures. Could the hon. gentleman have said: No we will not grant that. Would not the Americans say: What do you mean? you made an unrestricted offer, and if you leave out manufactures, surely it is a restricted offer. The same remark would apply, suppose the Americans had said that they wanted reciprocity in farm products, or in anything else. If the American government saw fit to ask for reciprocity in any one article, the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper), and his party were bound hard and fast to give it to them, for there is no man of honour could claim that he did not mean to give it, when he made an unrestricted offer. He made the offer as a member of the Canadian government, and for the Canadian government, and he committed the Conservative party to that offer. The Liberal party asked the people of Canada to return them to power with a view of showing how broad a treaty they could get, that would be advantageous, both to Canada and the United States, and no one in the Liberal party ever understood that there was to be commercial union. No one in the Liberal party ever said that their offer was to be a joining of the funds of the two nations. A little while after that the Conservative party went to the country, and they gave as a reason why they had brought on the elections, that they were going to the United States government to secure reciprocity, and that they wanted the opinion of the people of Canada in reference to it. But, the Conservatives wanted to go to the United States on the old lines, and the Liberal party said: No, we never can get a renewal of reciprocal relations with the

Mr. PATERSON.

United States, while they are in their present frame of mind, if our offer is to proceed along the lines of the old reciprocity treaty, we hold that it is the duty of the Canadian government to go there with a view of discussing all the commercial questions involved between the two countries, and all the items in the tariff. No one would have expected, and, I myself, never on any platform, or anywhere else, treated our proposal in any other shape, than that it was to be understood that if it were possible, a broad reciprocity treaty would be accomplished. I do not think anybody contemplated anything else, than that there would be a scheduled list of goods upon which the parties might not be able to agree: as to which their interests would not be mutual, and on that basis was unrestricted reciprocity discussed in the country, and on that basis would negotiations have proceeded. But, Sir, I have shown from the words of the hon. gentleman, that if there was anything disloyal in it, then the leader of the Conservative party (Sir Charles Tupper), was the man that made that disloyal offer, as a member of the Canadian government, or if he was not a member of the government at the time, then he made the offer as its agent. That is about the only remark the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper), made in his two hours speech that I thought was worth taking a note of. By the way, I think he made the extraordinary statement, that when the Conservatives were in power from 1868 to 1873, with a low tariff, the reason why that tariff was in force, was because there was a tremendous civil war in the United States during these years, and that that made sufficient protection for him. Of course, we all know that history relates that the American civil war had terminated some time before the year 1868. I believe the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper), alluded to the fact that the post office deficit of $342,000, as acknowledged by us, was not as great as the three-quarters of a million deficit which he predicted. But, he was equal to the occasion and ready with the excuse, that while there was a shortage of $342,000, yet we were paying $387,000 to the North-west mounted police in the Yukon, and as we availed of their services to carry the mails—they having the time on their hands to do so—he, therefore, charged the whole expenditure for the North-west mounted police against the Post Office Department, in order that he might try to vindicate his prediction.

I wish now to call the attention of the House to the position taken by the hon. gentleman in 1897, when the tariff of this government was introduced, and when he predicted that it would result in disaster and ruin to the industries of this country. The hon. gentleman's speech on that occasion has been quoted time and again. The hon. Finance Minister alluded to it, and the hon. gentleman accuses him of having done so in the most disingenuous statement he ever heard. But I do not think that was the case, for the hon. gentleman made the speech, and he does not deny it. The hon. gentleman, however, says: 'I made that speech with reference to the original tariff which you brought down on April 23, 1897, but some weeks later you brought down amendments to that tariff; deputations waited on you; they pointed out mistakes which you had made, and then you changed the tariff, I do not know in how many items; but it was not the tariff which you first brought down and which was the one to which I drew attention.' Now, what were the changes made in the tariff between the 23rd of April, when it was first brought down, and some time in May, when the second resolutions were laid on the Table? What did the changes amount to which removed the occasion of the hon. gentleman's wail and gave continued life to industries which he feared the original tariff would send to destruction? I have had prepared a summary of the changes made by the subsequent resolutions. As hon. gentlemen know, there are 641 items in the tariff, taking free and dutiable together. The duty was reduced on 40 items by the tariff resolutions introduced during the session of 1897, subsequent to the resolutions of the 23rd of April, 1897, the reduction in duty based on last year's importations being $435,813. There were 21 items transferred from the dutiable to the free list by the tariff resolutions introduced during the session of 1897, subsequent to the resolutions of the 23rd of April, 1897; the duty that would have been paid on such items last year, under the tariff rates of the resolutions of April, 1897, amounts to $117,583. The total reductions in duty by the changes made by the resolutions of 1897 subsequent to the 23rd of April, amounted to $553,396. The tariff was increased during the session of 1897 after the 23rd of April on 21 items; the increase of duty on last year's importations of these items amounted to $100,157.85. Therefore these changes, which, according to the hon. gentleman, changed the character of the whole tariff so completely that from being one which would destroy and ruin the industries of the country, it became one which he says is modelled after the Conservative tariff, gave us, in a total tariff revenue of $25,000,000 or $27,000,000, reductions amounting to $553,396, and increases amounting to $100,157.85, making the net reductions $453,238.15. This statement will show how hard driven the hon. gentleman is when he attempts to justify his wail in 1897 and his subsequent position in regard to the tariff.

But the hon. gentleman says that another thing he objected to in the first tariff was that the preference was not confined to Great Britain alone, but applied to all other countries that would admit our goods on as favourable terms as we admitted theirs. Well, he ought to have known what other countries would come in under the preferential tariff. He well knew that the great imports that come from the United States could not come in under the preferential tariff, because their tariff was far higher than ours. They could only secure that privilege by making their tariff as low as ours, which would have been of great advantage to this country—to manufacturers and producers as well as to consumers. He knew that the goods of Belgium and Germany could come in under their treaties; but he should have known, and I have no doubt did know, that there was scarcely any other country with which we did any trade worth mentioning that was in a position to avail itself of the preferential tariff, except the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. Let us see what the effect was upon our trade with these two countries. Let us see whether it was so great that it made all the difference between the tariff which the hon. gentleman now says is a good tariff, claiming that it is a copy of his own—though I cannot see that he is correct in that—and the tariff of 1897 as originally introduced. Here is a statement which I have had prepared, showing the imports for consumption from France, Germany and Belgium in the last three years:

France.

1897—Last year prior to preference....	$2,601,351
1898—When preference in operation....	3,975,351
1899—Preference only in operation for one month	3,889,295

Germany.

1897—Last year prior to preference....	$6,493,368
1898—When preference was in operation	5,584,014
1899—Preference only in operation for one month	7,393,456

Belgium.

1897—Last year prior to preference....	$1,163,632
1898—When preference was in operation	1,230,110
1899—Preference only in operation for one month	2,318,723

But, we brought down our preferential tariff, which he said was going to ruin the industries of this country, so that when the hon. gentleman takes the ground that his prediction of ruin and disaster to the industries of this country was perfectly justified, and that its non-fulfilment is due only to the changes subsequently made in the session of 1897, his contention is destroyed by these tables. He should now candidly confess that my hon. colleague, the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding), had greater wisdom and foresight than hon. gentlemen opposite, and was better able to gauge the conditions of trade than those hon. gentlemen who fought against this tariff, which has been one of the greatest blessings, so far as fiscal legislation is concerned, that was ever enacted in this country.

Let me allude briefly, before the House rises for recess, to the statement of the hon. gentleman, that the late government had been the means of introducing capital into this country, and of causing an increase in our population. We are accustomed to boasting from the other side, but in boasting that the national policy had been the means of introducing population into this country, the hon. gentleman out-heroded Herod. Why, the record show that after the late government, by the expenditure of millions of dollars, had succeeded in inducing some 800,000 immigrants to enter this country, it was discovered, when the census was taken in the year 1881 by these hon. gentlemen's own officers, that not only had the whole of these 800,000 left the country, but that 200,000 or 300,000 of our own sons and daughters had gone besides. Instead of having had the benefit of the natural increase in population, which would be about one-fifth, we lost these 800,000 immigrants, and 200,000 of our own people as well.

Then these hon. gentlemen boast of having brought capital into this country, they boast of the millions invested in the iron industry through their policy. Where were these millions invested? When they brought down their tariff in 1888, what iron industry did they bring into the country? Perhaps one in Hamilton, but these industries, to which the hon. gentleman referred as coming into Canada with their $18,000,000 capital, came in under the Fielding policy.

Let me draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to one test as to whether the country is increasing in population more rapidly since the advent of this government to office than previously. There is no absolute test except the taking of a census, but I give this as a test, which ought, at any rate, to have some force in leading us to the conclusion that never, during the history of Canada, when the Tories were in office, has our population increased in anything like the ratio at which it is increasing at present. Let me give the imports of settlers' effects, as taken from the entries made at the customs-houses:

IMPORTS—SETTLERS' EFFECTS.

1899—Page 611, Trade and Navigation Returns.

From Great Britain.....	$ 458,888
" United States	2,183,861
All other countries.....	163,207

1896—Page 343, Trade and Navigation Returns.

Imports, 1899	$2,805,956
" 1896	2,188,975

Increase of 1899 over 1896..... $ 616,981
An increase of 28 per cent.

This shows an increase of 28 per cent in 1899 over 1896, which clearly indicates a considerable increase of immigration.

Mr. PATERSON.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is made up of the Doukhobors and Galicians, who do not count, or ought not to count.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. These tables shows that from the United States, the settlers' effects imported, amounted to $2,183,861, from Great Britain, $458,888, and from all countries, $163,207, and yet the hon. gentleman says, the increase is made up of Doukhobors and Galicians.

There is also a movement among our population, more or less—people going from this country to the United States, and people coming back, and, therefore, let us look at that side of the question. I have showed that there is an increase of 28 per cent in those coming in, but now let us take those going out, as judged by the exports of settlers' effects. The following is the statement:

EXPORTS OF HOUSEHOLD EFFECTS.

1899—Page 696, Trade and Navigation Returns.

To United States.....	$910,409
" Great Britain	71,340
All other countries	11,064

Total $992,813

1896—Page 476, Trade and Navigation Returns.

To United States.....	$1,163,605
" Great Britain	53,314
All other countries.....	20,374

Total $1,237,293

Exports, 1896	$1,237,293
" 1899	992,813

Decrease of 1899 from 1896..... $ 244,480

Or a decrease of 20 per cent.

According to these tables, settlers' effects coming in, have increased 28 per cent, whereas, the exports of settlers' effects have decreased 20 per cent.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 67) respecting La Banque Jacques Cartier, and to change its name to La Banque Provinciale du Canada.—(Mr. Brodeur.)

Bill (No. 72) respecting the Merchants Bank of Halifax, and to change its name to 'The Royal Bank of Canada.'—(Mr. Russell.)

Bill (No. 76) to incorporate the Canadian Loan and Investment Company.—(Mr. Clarke.)

Bill (No. 82) to incorporate the Crown Life Insurance Company.—(Mr. McCarthy, by Mr. Stubbs.)

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). The question of the expenditure and of the debt has already been dealt with so fully and so ably by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) that I do not feel it necessary to add any observations upon that point. I must say, however, that while nominally the expenditure has increased, that the annual expenditure is larger by some millions last year than it was during the reign of hon. gentlemen opposite, it by no means follows that the burdens of the people have therefore been greater. As has already been explained, in our system of bookkeeping large items may be added to the expenditure during the year that may not be a burden to the extent of one cent upon the people, as is the case with more than one item that goes to swell the expenditure charged against the government. Again, where a country is growing very fast, where the population is largely increasing and becoming wealthier, an extra expenditure would not necessarily mean that so much more would have to come out of the pockets of the same number of people that were in the country some years previously. There can be no doubt, as I remarked before six o'clock, that there has been a large addition to the population in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. WILSON. How many?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That is a matter of estimate; the hon. gentleman might make one estimate and I might make another. In the Trade and Navigation Returns that have been alluded to, there is put down in the column of the amount of customs duties per head of the population, a star note which says:

The calculations in this column are based on a re-estimate of the population of the Dominion in each year by the Department of Agriculture and Statistics.

An effort has been made to show that this is my own personal estimate. It is not so there, it is not so printed. I do not hesitate to say that if I were asked to make an estimate of the population at the present time I would very largely exceed the figure that is placed here. Nor do I hesitate to say that the estimate that I would make of the population of Canada at the present time would be a larger one than was made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in his speech at Toronto to which a reference has been made; and there is no contradiction whatever between the figures that appear here and the figures he gave as his estimate, and which I consider were under the mark. These figures are simply what they profess to be, or what they are said to be, a re-estimate of the population of the Dominion of Canada as made by the Department of Agriculture and Statistics. How is that re-estimate made? Is it by taking the amount of immigration that is coming into the country, is it by taking the amount of the lessened emigration from the country, is it in any way based upon an inference which might be drawn from an increased importation of settlers' effects, or a decreased exportation of settlers' effects? Are any of these, which are material factors in making a true estimate, taken into account by the statistician of the Department of Agriculture when he makes his estimate? Not at all; he does not profess to do it. This is purely a mechanical re-estimate. He takes what the increase was during the previous decade and adds a proportionate amount from year to year, paying no attention whatever to the circumstances of the country, as to whether trade has decreased or as to whether trade has increased, as to whether people are leaving the country in large numbers or coming to it in fewer numbers, as to whether it be a period of prosperity in which people are seeking the country in large numbers or as to whether emigration from the country is very much lessened. Therefore, that column is only valuable looked upon in that light. The only estimate by which you can arrive at the burden of taxation upon the people is by taking the rate of taxation that is imposed by the government for which they are responsible. We arrive at that, in a rough and ready way. I grant it is only a rough and ready way, as it has never been claimed, on either side of the House for a moment, that you can take the percentage of customs duties and apply it to the total importations of goods, dutiable and free, and say that it is an absolute test as to correctness. But, it is an approximate test and one which is valuable. An argument was sought to be made by the hon. baronet, this afternoon, when he said that he had been addressing audiences all over the Dominion, and that where he had asked the question, having addressed thousands upon thousands of people, if they were buying anything cheaper from England than they did before, the answer, in every case, was, No. One of less intelligence than the hon. baronet knows that this is no question to ask with the view of having any bearing upon the question as to whether the taxation imposed on the people has been increased or not. The government of Canada and the parliament of Canada do not make the prices of goods that are imported into Canada. They are determined by a source more powerful, more mighty and more universal than that. The government of Canada and the parliament of Canada have no power and no desire to exercise it, if they had, to say to a man, or to a family, that they shall buy a larger, or a smaller, quantity of goods. In neither of these cases have the parliament or government of Canada anything to do with reference to the cost of the goods. But, there is one thing that the parliament of Canada can do in reference to dutiable goods. They say to the people of this country that before you can get these goods into your possession to be your property you shall pay so many cents on the dollar to Her Majesty's collectors of customs at the various ports in this Dominion, to go into the revenues of this country to carry on the affairs of this Dominion. In that respect, and in that respect alone, the parliament of Canada stands between the people and the price that they pay for their goods. When the great Liberal convention assembled, their declaration was that the rate of taxation which was imposed by the government, was excessive, and they called for a reduction of the amount of taxation. This government, when they came into power, recognized that this was a requirement of the people of that convention that they must give heed to, and acting upon that, they proceeded to reform the tariff in such a way as to lessen the rate of taxation, as to lighten the burdens that had previously been imposed by the government and parliament upon the people. That reduction is arrived at in a rough and ready way, as I said before. I do not claim it to be perfectly accurate, but it is a rough and ready way of getting at it, which has been adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite in arguing upon the question and seeking to minimize the percentage of the decrease. They have been willing to assume that. I call attention now to the remarkable calculation that was made by the hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) in his speech when he was dealing with this question. He took the figures of 16·70, which was the percentage of customs duty collected in our last year, and he admitted that it was 18·28 in their last year. Assuming that to be so, he admitted that, taking these figures, we had remitted $2,435,000 of taxation to the people. But, he said, while this is the case, it is nothing to what I did myself. I remitted taxation to the amount of $5,900,000, because he says—it is printed 1889, but it is evidently a mistake in the figures as he compares 1889 with 1895—that there has been a reduction of 4·66 per cent in the rate of taxation under the Liberal-Conservative government:

If you take the imports of 1895, which were $105,252,000, you will find that 4·66 per cent of it is $5,900,000, that is to say, the reduction in the rate of taxation from 1889 to 1895 is 4·66 per cent; and the actual volume of taxation taken off upon that basis is $5,900,000.

Having said this, he says:

Does the hon. Minister of Customs dispute these figures?

To which I reply:

No, but I would treat them somewhat differently.

Mr. FOSTER. How would the hon. gentleman treat them differently if he treated them honestly? I take my hon. friend's statement now. He would treat them different. How?

Mr. PATERSON.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Because you are speaking of reductions made on your own figures. Our reductions are made upon your revenues and your figures.

I, therefore, would treat them differently in this way: The hon. gentleman says: I had a certain rate of taxation in 1889; in 1895 I reduced that rate of taxation by 4·66 per cent, and that reduction upon the imports of that year meant that I took off taxation from the people to the amount of $5,900,000, while you, according to your own calculation, have only thrown off $2,435,000. The hon. gentleman says that he took off taxation to the amount of $5,900,000, but, he threw off taxation that he had imposed himself, while the $2,435,000 that we have saved to the people of Canada is $2,435,000 less than the lowest amount that he imposed without this $5,900,000. That is the difference. Supposing we take him at his own test. We will take the year 1889, in which the rate per cent of duty was 21·65. Our rate, in 1899, was 16·70, which is 4·95 per cent less duty imposed by us in 1899 than was imposed by him in 1899. Now, the imports, dutiable and free, last year, were $154,051,593. If you multiply that by the reduced rate of taxation we have made in 1899, which would be 4·95, it would give you the reduction that is made between our tariff in force in 1899, and his tariff in force in 1889 of $7,625,553. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), claims that he brought the rate of taxation down to 16·99, and that he saved by that $5,900,000 to the people, but we gave $1,725,553 more of a saving to the people over and above his $5,900,000. There is another point which must be remembered. When the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) had made that reduction in 1895 (for which he claims credit in having thrown off taxation amounting to $5,900,000, and we had a deficit of $4,153,875. We took off $1,725,553 more than his $5,900,000, and we have a surplus of $4,837,749. And, while the Conservative rate was 16·99 when it was reduced in 1895, it rose next year to 18·28, and still in that year of 1896, the Conservative government had a deficit of $330,551, notwithstanding they did not pay all their liabilities during that year. I wish the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) were here, for I would like to have tendered him my personal thanks for calling our attention to the rate of duty that he imposed in 1889, and which he took credit for reducing in 1895; because we will be able to see what the rate of taxation was for the parliamentary term of five years from 1887 to 1891, during which gentlemen opposite were in power. We will see whether there was not good ground for the Liberals in those days, telling the people that they were being bled freely in the matter of taxation. Hon. gentlemen opposite have the Trade and Navigation Returns before them with the percentages for these various years from 1887 to 1891 inclusive, and if they take the trouble to average these five years they will find that it amounts to 21·14, or 4·44 more than our rate in 1899. Now, Sir, if we were to take that rate of taxation on our total importations of last year we would have collected $6,839,890 more than we did, and if we continued it for five years, as he (Mr. Foster) did, we would in that time have taken $34,000,000 extra taxes out of the pockets of the people of this country. During the five years the Conservatives had this excessive rate in force, their net surpluses, with that enormous taxation, were only $7,273,954, while we, taking $6,839,890 less than their rate of taxation had a surplus last year of $4,837,749. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) thus called our attention to the taxation he had wrung from the people in these years, while he claims that he reduced the taxation by nearly $6,000,000 in 1895. Well, Sir, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) were here I would have asked him: Why he took this $6,000,000 extra taxes out of the pockets of the people for five years, and why now he seeks to have credit because after a long five years he reduced the heavy taxation on the people. Instead of giving him any credit for the reduction of $5,900,000 in taxation of 1895 over 1898, we censure him now as we did at the time, because for five long years he kept on that enormous rate of taxation. There is another point to which I ask the attention of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster). He told us that he took the taxation off sugar, that he made sugar free, and that that was a boon to all the people of Canada. Well, did he make sugar free? No, he did not. He made the raw sugar that the refiner uses free, but he put 80 cents per 100 pounds on the refined sugar, and it is refined sugar that the people of this country use almost entirely. Now, Sir, in the Reform tariff brought in by this government, we put 50 cents per 100 pounds on raw sugar and $1 per 100 pounds on refined sugar. We thus gave the refiner the difference of 50 cents per 100 pounds to compensate him for loss in manufacturing, and to give him, as it would, an incidental protection to the extent of that 50 cents. But all the time that the Conservative tariff was in force, grinding the people down—and which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) asked credit for reducing by $5,900,000—all this time the Conservative government were giving the refiner his 80 cents protection. Now, under the 50 cents incidental protection in our tariff the sugar refineries are working, the sugar refiners are profiting, and if they can do that now, they could do it during these five long years of Conservative rule when they had 30 cents per 100 pounds extra given to them by that government, one cent of which did not go into the treasury, but all of which came out of the pockets of the people, and with the consumption in Canada of 200,000,000 pounds of sugar annually, that meant $600,000 a year taken from the people, not one cent of which went into the Dominion treasury. That is how the financial management of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) worked out. I have already pointed out the reduction that was effected in the taxation by our readjustment of the tariff which brought it down to 16·70 per cent. 'Ah!' the hon. gentleman says, when he tries to weaken the argument with reference to our reduction in the rate of taxation, 'Ah,' he says, 'there is a large importation of Indian corn, since you put it on the free list, which is entered in the home consumption column now, which was not entered in the same column before, and that goes to swell the amount of the imports, but if that were eliminated it would advance the rate of taxation beyond 16·70 per cent.' He intimated as much as if there was some fault in the department as to the manner in which the entries were made, and he says that either the clerks did not choose to do the right thing, or, when the minister was calculating the rate he did not give fair and honest information in reference thereto. Well, Sir, the clerks did do what was right, and we gave the calculations just as they appeared in the returns. When goods are free and come into this country they pass through the customs, and when they pass the customs, being free goods, they pass into the possession of the man who owns the goods, and the Department of Customs has no further charge or interest in reference to them. When corn, therefore, went on the free list, and passed through the customs, it had to be entered in the column for home consumption. If there was a duty upon goods, and it was not paid at the time, then those goods would go into bond and appear in the column of general imports; they would not appear in the general consumption column at the same time. But as they are withdrawn little by little, it may be, from the warehouse, and the duty is paid upon them, then they are put into the home consumption column. But when goods come in free, the law makes no provision for putting them in bond. We do not want our bonded warehouses, which cost us money, to be burdened with free goods for people's convenience. We have passed the goods, they are free, they belong to the parties importing them, and they take them; and they are free to work them up, to export them, or to do anything else they please with them. Therefore, they go at once into consumption, whether that consumption be by way of grinding, transforming them into some other articles, or exporting them; and the government is then relieved of those goods. Therefore, there is nothing wrong in the transaction; there is no other way in which the goods can be kept or entered. 'Well,' the hon. gentleman may say, 'After all there was a large quantity of the corn exported.' True, there was ; and yet these hon. gentlemen will go before the farmers and point perhaps to 23,000,000 bushels of imported corn, and say, 'There—that is what is displacing your coarse grains.' But when it suits their purpose, they will find that perhaps 16,000,000 bushels are exported, and when it comes to calculating percentages, they say, 'You must take that off.' If you are going to analyse critically in that way, you will have to go through your whole trade and ascertain how it is affected. You would have to take the coin and bullion, which is in the same category, and of which some millions more are exported in one year than another. You might have a large quantity of corn that would be in your elevators and not exported at all. It might be that you would bring in more dutiable goods in one year than another. All these things you would have to take into account, and all we can do is to make a rough and ready test. All we can do is to take the articles, dutiable and free together, and ascertain the percentages upon them ; and does the hon. gentleman mean to say that even if that corn is exported, it has not done good to the people of this country ?

Mr. CLANCY. That is another question.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Why, Sir, what did the hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) say, when he denounced this government as having done something utterly outrageous because for a few weeks before the close of navigation, when there was a pressure of grain to reach the seaboard, and there were not enough Canadian vessels to carry it, they gave permission, as far as they were able to give it, for some American vessels to carry some of that grain, which was only a small proportion of the whole traffic ? The hon. gentleman said that we had done an outrageous thing. But there was no profit in keeping that grain in the country, whereas, on the other hand, the export of it meant employment for our shippers, our elevators, our railroads and many others of our people. And why are we enlarging the watercourses of this country, and aiding transportation in every way, except that we may do a larger carrying trade, and enrich the country thereby ? That is what we have done, and if you are going to deal with this question, you must not stop at Indian corn.

Mr. CLANCY. Will the hon. gentleman permit me to ask him a question ? Does he pretend to say that he can afford, in making a calculation as to the percentage of taxation, to disregard 16,000,000 bushels of corn which he knows has gone out of the country ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I have told the hon. gentleman that this is but a rough and ready way of getting at the percentage, and that it will be effected not only by corn, but by coin and bullion, and by other circumstances which I have mentioned. But I say if you are going to be critical in one case, you should deal with other cases in the same way.

Mr. CLARKE. But that does not affect the argument of the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster.)

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes, it affects the argument of the hon. member for York very clearly and distinctly. Then, let us take it in this way. I suppose that if there be an increase of traffic and trade in this country, and if the government have brought that about by legislation, they ought to have credit for that.

Mr. CLARKE. Certainly.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Very well. When they had corn on the dutiable list, it went into the total imports. Now that it is free, it goes into the column of home consumption, and it also goes into the column of the total imports. When there was a duty upon it, it did not go into the home consumption column until it was used and taken out of bond. Very well ; let us apply that test, applying the percentage to the total imports, in which the cases will be equal, save and except that there may have been more corn imported in one year than in another. If that is brought about by our legislation, that is to our credit. The percentage on the total imports of 1896 was 17.13, and the percentage on the total imports of 1899 was 15.81, a lower rate by 1.32 per cent. The total imports in 1899 were $162,764,308, which, multiplied by 1.32 gives a saving in that year of $2,148,488. As I said before, this is but a rough and ready test for reaching the conclusion ; but it is a test which these gentlemen cannot deny. It is a test which shows that a very large reduction has been made in the taxation of the people. But, Mr. Speaker, I desire to do this, and I think it is well that I should do it. I propose to take this matter out of the realm of dispute and division. I have here a table of nearly a hundred articles, which, if hon. gentlemen will allow me, I will hand in to Hansard without reading it, as to read it would tire myself and be tedious to the House. It is a calculation which I asked the officers of the department to make—an actual calculation on the goods that were imported into this country last year. I asked them to take the amount of the duty that was paid under our tariff upon those goods, and then to apply to the same goods the tariff that was in force in 1896, in order to show whether there was any distinction or not ; and I do not think hon. gentlemen opposite will be able to dispute these figures.

Mr. SPROULE. Does not the hon. gentleman see that the changed values of the goods would make all the difference in the world ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The changed values cannot affect the matter when we are dealing with the percentage of taxation, which the people would have to pay under the Tory tariff as compared with the percentage they have to pay under our tariff. I will read a few of the items which would concern the farmers more directly perhaps than other classes, and I venture to say that the large sum of $1,000,000 less duty on articles chiefly used by the farmers was paid last year than would have been paid under the tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. CLANCY. How much on Indian corn ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. There was no duty on Indian corn, but the duty that would have been paid under the Conservative tariff on the difference between the amount imported and the amount exported was $549,977. On binder twine, the farmers paid no duty this year.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. CLARKE. How much did he pay for the twine per pound, as compared with 1896 ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Surely the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Clarke), will not put himself in the same category as the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor), and gentlemen of that kind, who would hold this government responsible for the war in the Philippines and the consequent advance in manila and all the other circumstances connected with the raise in value of binder twine. All that the government can do is to stand between the consumer and the producer, and we let the farmers take their binder twine without paying a cent of duty. If we had made them pay the same rate as the Tories charged, we would have taken $102,300 out of their pockets. Then, take barbed fencing wire, of which a large quantity came into this country last year, we let it in absolutely free, but if we had charged the same rate of taxation as the Tories did, we would have made the consumer pay $126,885. Galvanized iron or steel wire, No. 9, 12 and 13 gauge, we let in free, and, if we had made the farmer pay what the Tories charged him, we would have collected $42,980 of a tax on this article. Cream separators, so valuable to our farmers and dairymen, we let in without charging a cent of duty, but if the Tories had remained in power they would have collected a tax on these of $45,000.

Mr. CLANCY. How much reduction on mushroom spawn ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I believe they are free, and whatever came in did not pay any duty. Pronged forks are dutiable under our tariff, and paid $2,753 duty, but if the Tory tariff had been in force, they would have paid $3,858. Hay tedders paid $1,163 duty, but under the old tariff, they would have paid $1,628. Hoes and other implements paid $772, and under the old tariff, they would have paid $1,093. Rakes n.e.s. paid $1,226, on the quantity that came in, but the late government would have collected $1,716 on the same quantity. On scythes and snaths, sickles or reaping hooks we collected $8,258, but under the old tariff, the farmers would have paid $11,994, or they paid one-third less than the Tories would have made them pay. Yet, you will find men like the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), asking where there is one item that has been reduced in price to the farmers. Why, I am giving you some of the items, and could give you them by the hundred.

Mr. CLANCY. That is exclusive of the British preference ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. This is the actual duty paid on the importations, and I am contrasting the actual duty paid with what would have been paid under the old tariff. It is well that our farmers should have access to this information, so that they can understand how ridiculous is the statement made by hon. gentlemen opposite, that our tariff has not operated to the advantage of the agricultural community. On spades and shovels, the duty paid was $8,865, but under the old tariff, it would have been $10,851. On all other agricultural implements, our farmers paid $5,409, as compared with $7,616, which the Tories would have charged them. Here are a few more items, showing what was paid under present tariff and what would have been paid under old tariff :

(b) Cannot be ascertained with any degree of certainty, as they are differently classified in each tariff.

But I must pass on. It is a little tiresome reading these figures, not only to myself but also to the House. And yet they are valuable. Coal oil—

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Coal oil—

Mr. TAYLOR. Ought to be ashamed to mention it.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) says I ought to be ashamed to mention it. If I ought to be ashamed when I tell what we collected under our rate, what will the hon. gentleman say when I tell him what they collected under their rate? We took $424,888 in duty on coal oil—

Mr. TAYLOR. You promised to make it free.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. And we ought to be ashamed, the hon. gentleman says. And yet will the hon. gentleman raise a blush of shame when he learns that they collected $509,866 in taxation on coal oil?

Mr. TAYLOR. It is six cents a gallon higher now.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. But we have taken about $85,000 less taxation on it than hon. gentlemen opposite. If we ought to be ashamed to mention these figures, what double shame should overwhelm these hon. gentlemen who took $85,000 a year more for all these years?

Mr. PATERSON.

Mr. DAVID HENDERSON (Halton). Before the hon. minister leaves the items of cottons, I would remind him that he has not given gray or unbleached cotton. Perhaps he has passed that by unintentionally.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. It was not intentional. That also would show a lower rate.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think not.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Speaking off-hand, the rate on gray and unbleached cottons was 25 per cent, and there is 25 per cent off that under the preference, making 18½ per cent; and it was 22½ per cent under the old tariff. And we propose now to take off one-third instead of one-quarter.

Mr. HENDERSON. But the rate of taxation on these goods was higher last year than under the Conservative tariff, and I thought that was the reason the hon. gentleman left it out.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman will find that that is not correct.

Mr. HENDERSON. Quite correct.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Very well; the hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson) knows what the rates are and he can figure it out.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am afraid the hon. minister left it out because the figures would not tell in his favour.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. My hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) asks if the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) objects to the rate from the United States being too high. I do not think he does.

I have given these, and there are many more. A large number of these lines of goods do not come in under the preferential tariff, but under the general tariff, as the goods do not come from England at all. And yet I have shown an actual saving to the pockets of the people. On those that do come from Great Britain in a large measure, and I have given many of them, the hon. gentleman can see the saving that has been effected. Whether under the general tariff or under the preferential tariff, it is one tariff so far as this government and this parliament are concerned, it is an enactment of this legislature. I have given these figures now so far as they could correctly be ascertained, with some difficulty in the classifications, I admit, but I believe they were honestly prepared by the officers of my department, and I have given them to show by the actual transactions the savings that have been made to the people. In many of these cases they will show that reductions have been made to such an extent as to reduce the rate of taxation upon the people perhaps one-quarter or one-third, or more, while in many cases they have been absolutely put upon the free list, giving the people the benefit.

Then I might mention this, that English goods coming from Britain under the preferential tariff require to be accompanied by a certificate in order to make sure that they are goods that are entitled to get the benefit of the preferential tariff; therefore we require certificates that will satisfy our department that there has been at least 25 per cent of British labour or additional cost added by British labour to the article before we admit it into the country. Many invoices have reached us that perhaps lacked this certificate, and when an invoice lacks this certificate then the officers of the customs require the importer to pay the full rate, do not give him the benefit of the preferential. But when the importers send back to the parties from whom they purchase and get a certificate in proper shape and bring it to the customs, then a refund is granted to them, and last year the sum of those refunds amounted to $54,000 on this account. That $54,000 would represent goods to the value of $1,000,000 on last year's importations, and these refunds are still continuing to be made.

Now, I think I have put it beyond the possibility of hon. gentlemen, unless they wish to be supremely ridiculous, taking the platform and using such expressions as have been used, I think by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), as well as by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague). These gentlemen say they would like to know one single item that has been reduced in price by virtue of our tariff. I have not given them all, they can go through the list themselves. I do not claim that all lines of goods come in under our preferential tariff, but I say that the rate under the preferential tariff on the whole list of between 900 and 1,000 items as found in the Trade and Navigation Returns, with the exception of a paltry dozen or so, every article that comes in from England comes in under a lower rate under the preferential tariff than it did under the tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite. Articles amounting to millions of dollars worth come in and get the benefit of it. I wish to enforce this upon hon. gentlemen when they speak about importations from Great Britain and the benefits that arise; I say that there is a benefit to the consumers of Canada that they get through this tariff of ours that are not revealed in the figures that I have given to the House. Why? Because in articles where Great Britain and the United States are competitors, the United States importer, in order to get the Canadian market in competition with England, has got to lay his goods down as cheaply as the Englishman. Therefore, when an American comes over here and wants to sell his goods he will say to the Englishman: I can get in a hundred dollars worth of goods for $26.25 now, and he will get them in for less after the 1st of July. If I buy a hundred dollars worth from you I have got to pay $35 to get them in under the customs. Therefore, he will have to reduce his price by the whole 25 per cent, which will go into the treasury of the country; but the man that buys the goods, the consumer, will get them as cheap as if they came in under the preferential tariff; the Yankee has paid it. So when you talk about the benefit of a preferential tariff extending only to certain articles, it extends to millions and tens of millions dollars worth of goods. More than that, if there be anything to fear in the position hon. gentlemen opposite take that by a reduction in the tariff you are in danger of hurting our manufactures, it can only be by making them sell at lower prices, then there is a saving on all the home productions in reference to that matter. The manufacturer will look after himself, and he will introduce cheaper methods of working, he will see to equipping with the latest machinery, and he will meet in the future as he has done in the past, competitors under this tariff. I venture to say that one of the beneficial results of this reduced tariff which we have enacted has been to give an impetus to manufacturing in this country, and I believe to-day our manufacturers are better equipped and better able to turn out not only more but better and cheaper goods than they would have been had they been hampered as they formerly were under the tariff of the old days.

Now, let me give you the gross sum. I have here a table that has been prepared containing a list of articles in the gross, showing the amount of duty saved to the people on last year's importations as compared with the Conservative tariff. On bituminous coal there has been a saving of $157,000; on coal oil, $85,000; on Indian corn, $550,000; on iron and steel manufactures, $850,000; on binder twine, $102,000; on barbed wire, $126,000; on galvanized fencing wire, $43,000; on cream separators, $45,000; on books and printed matter, $69,000; on cotton goods from Great Britain, under the preferential tariff, $163,000. I call the attention of the hon. member for Halton to these figures in order to show that the reduced price of cottons from England governs the price of cottons that the Americans send into this market. The hon. gentleman knows that. In woollens from England, under the preferential tariff, there was a saving of $451,000. Now, woollens are as much an absolute necessity in every household as coal oil or many other articles. If we are not able to show a reduction on each separate item that any member of this House would like to see—and yet our views do not all agree on each individual item—still the great thing is that we have given to the people a benefit on many things that they actually do use. We know that there is no article more generally used in every household than woollen and cotton goods, and these other things that I have enumer-
