SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform this House that when the House did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day, in the Senate Chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both Houses of Parliament, and, to prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy of the speech, which is as follows :—

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

It is again my pleasing duty to congratulate you on the continued prosperity of the Dominion and on the remarkable increase in the general volume of the revenue and of the exports and imports of the country.

Hostilities having unfortunately broken out during recess between Great Britain and the South African Republic, it appeared to my Ministers expedient to anticipate the action of Parliament by equipping and forwarding two contingents of volunteers to the seat of war as a practical evidence of the profound devotion and loyalty of the entire people of Canada to the Sovereign and institutions of the British Empire.

In this connection it is a matter of pride and gratification to the people of this Dominion that, in addition to the contingents sent by the government, another Canadian force is being organized and despatched at the personal expense of the High Commissioner of Canada. This generous and patriotic action upon the part of Lord Strathcona reflects high honour on him and on the Dominion he represents.

I have been instructed to convey to you Her Majesty's high appreciation of the loyalty and patriotism thus displayed, which, following the preference granted under the present tariff to articles of British manufacture, has had the happiest effect in cementing and intensifying the cordial relations subsisting between Canada and the mother country.

A Bill will be submitted for your approval making provision for the cost of equipping and paying the Canadian contingents.

The measures which have been taken from time to time to facilitate the safe transportation of food stuffs to European markets have resulted in a large increase in the exportation of several important articles of produce, and it may become necessary in the interest of this very important branch of industry to require a more careful inspection than has been customary for the purpose of maintaining that high standard of excellence heretofore secured and which is absolutely indispensable if the people of Canada are to increase their large and profitable trade with other countries in these commodities.

I am glad to observe that the returns from the Post Office Department afford good ground for believing that the temporary loss of revenue caused by the great reduction recently made in letter postage, will speedily be made good by the increased correspondence consequent thereon.

Negotiations are now in progress with several of our sister colonies in the West Indies which it is hoped may result in increasing and developing our trade with those islands, and possibly with certain portions of the adjacent continent of South America.

It gives me great pleasure to observe that, in pursuance of the policy which was defined at the last session of parliament, a carefully devised body of regulations has been adopted, applicable to all railways and public works within the federal jurisdiction, making adequate provision for the sanitary protection and medical care of workmen.

The attention of the government has been called to the conflicts which occasionally arise between workmen and their employers. While it may not be possible to wholly prevent such difficulties by legislation, my government think that many of the disputes might be averted if better provisions could be made for the friendly intervention of boards of conciliation, the conclusions of which, while not legally binding, would have much weight with both sides and be useful in bringing an intelligent public opinion to bear on these complicated subjects. You will be invited to consider whether the provincial legislation in this matter may not be usefully supplemented by an enactment providing for the establishment of a Dominion tribunal for assisting in the settlement of such questions.

I am happy to observe that the number of settlers who have taken up lands in Manitoba and in the North-west Territories is larger than in any previous year, and affords conclusive evidence of the success which has attended the efforts of my government to promote immigration, and I have no doubt that the greatly increased production of the West will henceforth add materially to the growth of the trade of the whole Dominion. While the efforts made to secure increased population for the West have thus been successful, much attention has also been devoted to the repatriation of Canadians who in less prosperous times have left Canada. You will be pleased to learn that this work has been attended with satisfactory results.

My government, during the recess, has been giving its attention to the subject of a railway commission. Valuable information has been and is still being collected, which when completed will be submitted to you, and will, no doubt, receive at your hands the earnest consideration which the importance of the subject requires.

I am pleased to say that our canal system, connecting the great lakes with the Atlantic seaboard, has been completed so as to allow vessels having a draft of 14 feet to pass from the head of Lake Superior to the sea. The vigorous and successful prosecution of these works by my government has already attracted the attention of those interested in western transportation, and there are good grounds for the hope that, when the necessary facilities for the quick and inexpensive handling of ocean traffic are provided and which are now in progress, Canadian ports will control a much larger share of the traffic of the West.

Measures will be introduced to renew and amend the existing banking laws, to regulate the rate of interest payable upon judgments recovered in courts of law, to provide for the taking of the next decennial census, for the better arrangement of the electoral districts, to amend the Criminal Code and the laws relating to other important subjects.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

The public accounts will be laid before you, and also the estimates for the coming year, which have been prepared with due regard to economy and the rapid growth of the Dominion.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

I commend to your consideration the subjects I have mentioned, confiding in your patriotism and judgment.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved :

That the speech of His Excellency the Governor General, to both Houses of Parliament, be taken into consideration on to-morrow.

Mr. BOURASSA. Mr. Speaker, as the discussion on the speech from the Throne is to begin to-morrow, and, of course, as that discussion is going to involve many considerations, I would like to ask, although, perhaps, this course is rather unusual, if it is the intention of the Government to lay on the Table of the House the whole of the correspondence that has been exchanged, since last session, between the British government and the government of Canada, or His Excellency the Governor General, in relation to the participation of Canada in the Transvaal war.

The PRIME MINISTER. Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend (Mr. Bourassa) is aware that it is not in accordance with the practice of the House to lay on the Table any documents before the address has been voted upon. But, on this occasion, it seems to me, that the request of my hon. friend is a reasonable one, and that it would be conducive to the better discussion of the speech of His Excellency the Governor General if the correspondence were laid on the Table of the House. But, if we do this I must ask the House to allow a change to be made in the motion and to substitute Monday for to-morrow, because it would not be possible to have the correspondence in shape for to-morrow afternoon. If agreeable to my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper), I will undertake to have the papers laid on the Table of the House on Monday, and, probably, on Saturday morning, or to-morrow evening, I will be happy to transmit a private copy of the same to my hon. friend for his own information.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved :

On Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.—4. On Miscellaneous Private Bills.—5. On Standing Orders.—6. On Printing.—7. On Public Accounts.—8. On Banking and Commerce.—9. On Agriculture and Colonization,—which said committees shall severally be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the House; and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon; with power to send for persons, papers and records.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 3.55 p.m.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

OFFICIAL DEBATES OF THE HOUSE.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved :

That a select committee be appointed to supervise the official report of the debates of this House during the present session, with power to report from time to time, to be composed of Messrs. Fortin, Bergeron, Champagne, Charlton, Craig, Davin, Earle, Ellis, Haley, LaRivière, Monet, Richardson, Sriver, Somerville and Taylor.

He said: This is the same committee as last year, with the exception of Mr. Fortin, who takes the place of Mr. Beausoleil.

Motion agreed to.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved :

That the Order for the consideration of the motion for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, have precedence over all other business except the introduction of Bills, until this motion is disposed of.

Motion agreed to.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—CANADIAN CONTINGENTS.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). By command of His Excellency, I beg to lay on the Table certain papers in connection with the sending of the contingents. These are the papers which were mentioned the other day on the opening of the session. I had the honour on Saturday last of sending my hon. friend the leader of the opposition all the papers I had at the time. I have given orders to have them printed and expected to have the printed copies distributed to-day to the members of the House. The papers I lay on the Table of the House are only part of the papers. I did not take the precaution of having them completed, because I expected to be able to lay on the Table the printed copies, which I expect to be distributed in a few minutes. Apart from that I have other correspondence on the same subject which I shall lay on the Table later in the day.

CERTIFICATE OF ELECTION.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery the certificate of the election and return of Edmond Fortier, Esquire, for the electoral district of Lotbinière.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 2) to further amend the Fertilizers Act (Mr. Domville).

THE DOMINION ELECTION ACT.

Mr. INGRAM moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 3) to further amend the Dominion Election Act.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Explain.

Mr. INGRAM. I explained very fully a similar Bill which I introduced last session, amending, as I thought, several of the grievances that honest electors have to complain of. I may say that in this present Bill

there are something over thirty sections or subsections dealing with the election law, and in it I am trying to do away with some of the imperfections that have been developed in the operation of this law, with the view of conducting honestly elections in this country. I presume that we are all anxious to amend the present Dominion election law. Hon. gentlemen on the government side are, of course, aware that whatever tactics their friends may resort to in their favour, can also be adopted by friends of the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House; but I assume that we are all anxious to perfect the Dominion Election Act, so as to secure honest elections.

Now, in this Bill I provide, in the first place, that only resident returning officers and poll clerks shall be employed in each locality, and no others. Instead of allowing the returning officer to say to any candidate or his agent that he declines to furnish them with the names of the deputy returning officers or their poll clerks, I propose to make a provision by which the returning officer shall, within a certain time previous to the election, expose in his office for public inspection the names of all the returning officers with the poll clerks, and the polling booths at which they are to act, so that the public may have an opportunity of knowing those things if they see fit. Instead of leaving it discretionary with the deputy returning officers to furnish a statement of the state of the polls in which they act, I propose an amendment to make it compulsory on their part to furnish that statement to the candidates or their agents at that poll.

Now, with respect to the $200 deposit, I may remark that it is a liberal principle which was advocated in this House by the Hon. Edward Blake when in opposition, that a $200 deposit ought not to be required. In the Provincial Act of Ontario no such deposit is required, and I cannot see any reason why it should be required in the case of Dominion elections. I also find from the manner in which elections have been conducted in Ontario—I will not here speak of the other provinces, because I am not so well acquainted with their mode of conducting elections—that under the new system of conducting elections in our province, something more stringent is required to prevent the crookedness that has been practised. So I propose in one or two sections, which are explanatory or directory to the deputy returning officer, to adopt a new method of opening the polls, by which the candidates or their agents are entitled to inspect the ballot papers, the ballot boxes, and all documents that are to be used at the election. I will tell you one of the reasons why I propose that amendment. In the election in East Middlesex the other day, they ran short of ballot papers at one of the polling booths, and I propose to prevent the possibility of that thing occurring again. If the number of voters at that polling booth is known, and a sufficient number of ballot papers are provided for it, then there is no possibility of the ballot papers running short at that booth. At the close of the day's polling, at five o'clock, under section 53 of the present Dominion Election Act, certain things are required of the deputy returning officer and those who attend at that booth. As I have already remarked, according to the way we conduct elections, that section has proved inadequate, and under the new mode I propose to make it practically impossible that any crookedness can be carried on, except at very great risk.

Now, with respect to the recount, we had some difficulty in 1896 in one or two constituencies where Dominion elections were held, owing to the deputy returning officers not doing their duty under the law. I propose an amendment in that respect so that it will not be necessary to deposit $100 before you can have a recount. I propose to strike that provision out. I cannot see why a candidate who believes that he has been defeated dishonestly and that votes have been counted against him, which ought not to be counted, should be forced to deposit $100 in order to get justice—and from whom? From a judge who is already paid a very good salary for performing his duty; and the candidate has to pay a returning officer or poll clerk to attend, who may, perhaps, have been doing something which prevented him from winning in the election. So I say there is no necessity why he should be called upon to deposit $100.

There are several other amendments to the Act. I propose to retain some of the sections and subsections in the present Act, while others I propose to replace by entirely new ones. As to the crimes of personation, plugging, switching, stealing ballots and ballot boxes, stuffing, bribing, intimidating and other such tactics, which are now pretty well known to those who take part in elections, my object is to prevent them occurring in the future so far as possible. I would like to draw the attention of the First Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to this fact, that in preparing amendments to any Act now on the statute-book it is a very difficult matter even for lawyers, I fancy, and much more so for laymen, to avoid coming into conflict with the various other Acts that are now on our statutes, and for this reason, that since 1886 there has been no consolidation of the Dominion statutes, and I think it is in the interests of the public that such a consolidation should take place, and such consolidation should take place in the near future. I wish to say to the right hon. gentleman that the present law is in a very bad state, that it does not meet the requirements of the people of this country; and I would ask him and all other hon. gentlemen to assist in perfecting that law, so that we may have on the statute-book an Act that will give satisfaction to the public generally.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

REPORT.

Public Accounts for the year ending June 30, 1899.—(Mr. Fielding.)

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House proceeded to the consideration of His Excellency's speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. GOULD. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of moving that a humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech from the Throne. I am deeply sensible of the great honour that is conferred upon me and upon my constituents in having been selected to perform this important duty. I feel that, perhaps, it would have been better had this important task been placed in other and better hands—in the hands of one who had more experience in federal politics. However, I feel assured that I shall receive from the members of this House that same kind consideration and indulgence that they have ever shown to new members who have found themselves placed in the position I find myself placed in to-day. Permit me to refer briefly, before I proceed further, to the sad event that caused the vacancy in the riding of West Ontario, the riding that I have now the honour to represent. For fifteen years the late Sir James Edgar was the esteemed representative of that riding. His services to his country and to his party can scarcely be overestimated. He was a true, noble Canadian in the very best sense of the term, and was ever ready, both by voice and pen, to uphold and advance the interests of his country. He was an able statesman and a strong loyalist. The people of West Ontario rejoiced over his elevation to the position he occupied in this House as the First Commoner of the land, a position that he filled with so much credit to himself and to the Parliament of Canada, and I believe, in such a way as to meet with the entire approval of both sides of this House. His passing away was a distinct loss to the nation. The people of West Ontario felt keenly his death, and they sympathize sincerely with Lady Edgar and her family in their great bereavement.

I propose, for a few moments, to refer to the position of our country as we find it now from the commercial point of view. Comparing the present position with that of a few years ago, a complete transformation has taken place. A new Canada has arisen; we seem to be living in a new age; business conditions, political conditions, national conditions have all changed and materially for the better. Never in the history of Canada were the people so prosperous and contented. Never have they had such unbounded confidence in the future. Never did Canada stand so high in the estimation of the nations as she does to-day; industrial life and prosperity are evident on every hand and progress and development are to be seen on all sides. The farmers are thriving, farm mortgages are being rapidly paid off, the manufacturers are over-run with orders, the mechanics are being fully employed, and are receiving greatly increased wages, our lumbering industries are advancing by leaps and bounds and our mining interests are attracting the attention of the whole world. Our banking institutions, too, find safe and profitable investments for all their funds and our great railway corporations are receiving largely increased returns. The present Premier (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) when in opposition, once said, in reply to a long quotation of figures from the then Finance Minister (Mr. Foster), that when his party came into power it would not be necessary to quote figures to prove to the people that they were prosperous. The people would feel the jingle of prosperity in their pockets. I think that prediction has been abundantly verified; I think that the people are feeling the jingle of prosperity to-day as they never felt it before. Our foreign trade has wonderfully increased. Permit me to give a few figures in connection therewith. Our foreign trade has increased in the three years since 1896 by no less than $82,000,000, but to enable one fully to grasp the greatness of this increase, a comparison is necessary. I find from the trade and navigation returns that the increase is greater by some $16,000,000 than the increase for the eighteen years from 1878 to 1896. But, great as has been the increase in the last three fiscal years the trade of the present fiscal year bids fair to surpass it by many millions. Our total foreign trade for the six months ending December was $208,000,000, which is within $1,000,000 of the total foreign trade for the full fiscal year of 1899, and within $25,000,000 of the total foreign trade for the full fiscal year of 1896. Our exports too, have largely increased; our exports are greater by $20,000,000 for the six months of the present fiscal year than for the full year of 1899, and within $12,000,000 of those for the full fiscal year of 1896. If the present rate of progress in our trade continues to the end of this fiscal year we shall touch the $375,000,000 mark. Our highest foreign trade under the late Administration was $247,000,000, and if expectations be realized our foreign trade for 1900 will exceed that of the best year under the late government by over $125,000,000. These figures are eloquent in themselves and must make every true Canadian proud of his country. This abundant prosperity is, I am sure, very gratifying to all of us, and more especially to the government who have done so much to bring it about. I am aware, Sir, that the opposition do not admit that the government are entitled to the credit for this prosperous state of affairs, but I venture to say that the great thinking public do not take that view. I believe that the great majority of the people of Canada are fully satisfied that the government are entitled to a very large measure of credit for this prosperous state of affairs. At all events, Sir, we cannot close our eyes to this fact, that immediately upon the advent of the present administration to power prosperity at once returned. Confidence was restored and business has progressed amazingly ever since. At the Reform Convention in this city, in 1893, the Liberal party declared in favour of a sound fiscal policy—a policy of tariff reform, a policy that would lighten the burdens of the people without doing any injustice to any class, and would at the same time bring back prosperity to the country, and I am bound to say that that declaration has been carried out by the present administration. The tariff has been reformed; the taxation of the people has been reduced, prosperity has returned, and the farmers especially are receiving great benefit by the changes. But, it is not through the changes in the tariff alone that the government has advanced the interests of the country. Its vigorous policy in respect to transportation is highly commendable and will receive the approbation of the country. The transportation problem is one of the greatest that can engage the attention of the government. It is of prime importance that our products be conveyed to the best markets in the cheapest possible manner and with the utmost despatch. Every dollar saved in the cost of transporting grain and other farm products is so much saved to the agriculturists, and through them, to the people. In this connection the government and the country are to be congratulated upon the completion of the St. Lawrence Canal system. We have now a system of water transport from the head of Lake Superior to the city of Montreal which will accommodate vessels drawing 14 feet of water. The greatness of this accomplishment cannot be realized now, but our own and succeeding generations of Canadians will be vastly benefited by it. And, Sir, though much has been done to develop the interests of transportation, much remains to be done. I think we are safe in saying that the present government is fully alive to the situation and that they will deal with the matter in a sound businesslike way. I am pleased to notice that the Department of Agriculture has pursued a progressive policy in reference to our cold storage and shipping facilities. Canada has now obtained a strong foothold in the markets of Great Britain, and it behooves the government and all exporters to see that they strengthen their hold on that market. It must be a source of pride to all Canadians to know that Canadian butter, bacon and cheese take such a high place in the estimation of the British consumer. The export of these products in Canada is largely increasing, so that we may well expect to maintain our hold on the British market. Permit me for a moment to give a few figures as to the volume of our trade in these articles. In 1896 we shipped to Great Britain nearly 5,000,000 pounds of butter; in 1899 we shipped to Great Britain 19,000,000 pounds of butter. In 1896 we shipped to Great Britain 164,000,000 pounds of cheese; in 1899 we shipped to Great Britain 189,000,000 pounds of cheese. Our exports of bacon to the old land have increased enormously. In 1896 we exported 47,000,000 pounds of bacon; in 1899 we exported 111,000,000 pounds of bacon. I am pleased also to notice that the government contemplate a more efficient system of inspection in reference to our food products which are shipped to Great Britain. If we are to maintain the position we now hold in the British market it is of the very greatest importance that we not only send over commodities of the best quality, but that we shall also only send these commodities in the best possible condition. A proper system of inspection will tend towards that end, and the British consumer in buying a Canadian product will realize that he is buying of the very best.

I now propose, Mr. Speaker, to refer for a moment to a matter that is at present occupying the minds, not only of Canadians, but of the people of all the civilized world. I allude to the war in South Africa, and I specially wish to speak of the part that our Canadian volunteers are taking in it. The British Empire is now undergoing a severe strain. The events of the last few weeks are such as to try all our souls. However, Sir, disaster has not daunted the courage of the British people; it has only stimulated them to greater efforts. Reverses to our arms have served only to make the nation stronger, strong in the sense of the justice of her cause, strong in the belief that right will ultimately prevail. Although judging from present appearances, it may be long before the end of the war is reached, yet there can be but one ending, and that end is the ultimate triumph of the British arms; the establishment of law and order, of liberty and good government, with equal justice and equal rights to all in South Africa under the British flag. Sir, we all regret this war; we regret the causes which brought it about. We regret exceedingly the loss of life which it has entailed, but there is another side to the shield. The war has welded the empire together. It has given to the world the spectacle of the colonies standing behind the mother country to support her. It has presented the firm and united front of the British Empire to the enemy, and when the war is over, the world will behold a united South Africa and a united British Empire.

The part Canada has taken in this war is, I submit, to their infinite credit. When hostilities commenced, our government found themselves confronted with a very grave and serious question and one entirely new in our constitutional history. The question arose: Whether or not the people of Canada should take a part in the wars of Great Britain. Reference has been made to the action of the government sending these contingents without first having called parliament together. Sir, the principle that parliament should control the expenditures of all public moneys is a sound one, and one which the Liberal party has always adhered to. It is a principle which is the very corner stone of responsible government. But there are times in the history of countries, as there are times in the lives of individuals, when it becomes necessary to move quickly; times when the letter of the law may be violated yet the spirit of it be maintained. I believe the government did right in taking the course they did, and I am confident that their action will be sustained by the country.

Great praise is due to the government, and especially to the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Borden, King's, N.S.) for the efficiency and despatch shown in fitting out and transporting our brave volunteers. The contingents that have been sent to the front are a credit to Canada, and it is with pride we all observe that they have already distinguished themselves by bravery in action. That they will continue to render a good account of themselves, I have not the slightest doubt. Canada's action has been gratefully welcomed by the Imperial government. The daughter has stood up nobly for the mother and proved her loyalty, by more than the word of mouth. Some persons appear to be alarmed lest Canada should not pay enough of the expenses of this movement, but I have no doubt that when all the facts of the case become known the public will be satisfied—as the Imperial government are satisfied—that Canada is acting very liberally in the matter. What is it that Canada is doing? The government have undertaken to raise, arm, equip and provision these contingents and supply them with transportation, paying all expenses of every character until the landing of the troops in South Africa. Up to this point the troops will also receive their pay from the Canadian treasury at established Canadian rates. During the period of actual service in Africa the troops will be paid by the British government at the Imperial rate. This is the desire of the British government and the adoption of any different policy, as respects payment in the field, would be opposed to their wishes. But Canada is doing something more. The Imperial rates of pay are less than those of the Canadian service. Our government is providing the difference between the Imperial pay and the Canadian pay. The amount so provided is not to be paid to the men in the field, for the reason already given, but it will be used for the benefit of their families at home, or placed to their credit, to be paid to them on their return.

Just a word more, Mr. Speaker. I wish to express my satisfaction and the satisfaction of the great majority of my constituents, as shown by my election by acclamation, with the general course pursued by this government. I believe it to have been in the best interests of the people. Mistakes there may have been, but on the whole the policy has been dictated by prudence, wisdom, and good business judgment. The reforms inaugurated have been striking and beneficial. The reform of the tariff; the reduction in the postal rates brought about by economical and efficient administration of the department; the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal; the development of the Kootenay country by the construction of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway; the abolition of the Franchise Act; the sturdy patriotism maintained by our leaders in negotiations with foreign governments, and their steadfast loyalty to our motherland, have all tended for good. The expressed aim of our leader is inspiring. Surely no greater ambition could be held by any Canadian statesman than to make the Canadian family a united family under the same flag, and I am satisfied that for many years to come the destinies of the country will be in his hands.

I thank the members of the House for their kind indulgence, and I conclude, Mr. Speaker, by moving that an humble address be presented to His Excellency in reply to the speech from the Throne.

Mr. VICTOR GEOFFRION. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to second the proposition of the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Gould) that an address be voted by this House in reply to the speech from the Throne.

It would seem, Mr. Speaker, that I ought to have contented myself strictly with declaring that I support the proposition of the hon. gentleman, thus leaving the House under the agreeable impression created by the judicious and eloquent remarks just fallen from the lips of the hon. gentleman. However, let the House allow me to add a few personal remarks on certain portions of the speech from the Throne, to which I desire in a particular manner to draw the attention of this House.

First, as to the prosperity of the country, referred to in the speech from the Throne, a point which has been so eloquently dwelt upon by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. I may say that such prosperity is patent and undeniable, and I am not aware of the fact being called in question by any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House. Prosperity, as a matter of fact, prevails from one end of the country to the other, an unprecedented fact in the annals of Canada.

Never were the farming community so prosperous; never were their products disposed of under more favourable conditions and at more satisfactory prices. The farmers have money to loan; and the price of farming lands has increased in proportion to the profits yielded by those lands.

Ask the farming community what they think of the present regime and they will answer your query by pointing at their improved farms, no longer burdened with debts, while cheese and butter factories are springing up in almost every parish and running the year through. They will give you the same answer as that just given by those numerous rural constituencies who, having been appealed to within the few last months, did give their support to and endorsed the government policy. Every branch of industry is also in a flourishing state. The manufacturers who, at the time of the general elections of 1896, had felt some anxiety when listening to the alarming prophecies of the Conservative speakers and newspapers, now acknowledge that they were fully justified in trusting in the declarations of the leaders of the party who now ruin the country. Every branch of trade from the bottom to the top of the ladder is doing a rushing business as shown by the reports of the various commercial agencies. Failures have decreased by one-fourth within the last three years and forced sales are now the exception, things having reached such a pass that in some districts sheriffs are forced to give up their offices and to carve out for themselves new positions.

The improvement of our canals and of our navigable streams has given a new impetus to our merchant shipping. I have the honour of representing here a rural constituency in the district of Montreal, and one in the immediate neighbourhood of the great commercial metropolis where I live. I had the opportunity, as well as several other hon. gentlemen sitting in this House, to watch the enormous development, from a commercial standpoint, of that great district and more particularly, that of the city of Montreal.

To ascribe to chance alone the enormous impetus given to our trade and industries, since the coming into power of the Liberal party, would offer no reasonable explanation of that phenomenon. Four or five years ago, business in the city of Montreal was in a state of depression; the failures were increasing in an alarming proportion; the coasting trade and navigation proper were dwindling away; the stoppage of our manufactures was the order of the day; but no sooner had the Liberal government inaugurated their policy, than our trade increased in a wonderful way; prosperity went forward by leaps and bounds; failures decreased by one-fourth, business improved in all directions, and the government had to set to work to improve the channel of the St. Lawrence and extend our harbour in order to accommodate the ever-increasing number of ships coming into it from all parts of the world.

We are bound to build grain elevators and warehouses which will cost millions of dollars, if we wish to keep pace with the increase of trade. Now, Mr. Speaker, in corroboration of the facts I have just pointed out, let me call the attention of the House to the report of the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal, just published by the Montreal Gazette and the Star. That report is signed by Mr. Smith, in his quality as president of that body, a gentleman who, so far as I know was never a supporter of the Liberal party. Therefore, it is obvious that the government policy has brought back peace and prosperity throughout the country. But, say certain opponents of the government, that prosperity, which is self-evident, is not the outcome of the policy of the Liberal party. but, on the contrary, it is the result of the Conservative policy! I am quite ready to admit, Mr. Speaker, that the bountiful harvest with which the country was blessed last year, was not the result of the policy of the Liberal party. But, it is not enough to have a bountiful harvest; outlets have, moreover, to be provided, to dispose of the products of the soil, and to enable us to obtain paying returns for them.

The Conservative party, I presume, do not pretend to claim as a result of their policy, the tariff reform; the extension of the Intercolonial Railway; the important improvements made in the harbour of Montreal and in our canals and our navigable streams; the arrangements entered into with Great Britain for the transportation of our products, and, from the standpoint of our trade relations with the mother country, the abrogation of the Belgian and German treaties; the postal reforms, the adoption of the penny-postage; the cold storage system, established by the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) for the transportation of the dairy products and of perishable products; the abrogation of the Franchise Bill, with its costly machinery, to the general satisfaction of the public; the peace restored to the country since the settlement of the Manitoba school question. All those measures which have brought about the result referred to, have been bitterly opposed by the hon. gentlemen opposite. Therefore, I think the general policy of the government has restored peace and brought back prosperity into the country, and the people will give them credit for it.

Now, Sir, I am delighted to see that the government have given evidence of the great interest they bear the working classes, by adopting a body of regulations to the effect of compelling the railway companies and the undertakers of important public works, necessitating the agglomeration of working men, to put into effect more practical hygienic rules and to afford workmen a larger measure of protection, which will result in decreased diseases and accidents. If there is a class of our population which is entitled to the protection of the state, it is, beyond question, the workmen and the labourers, inasmuch as they are less in position than other classes, owing no doubt to their lack of education, to protect themselves from the ill-will or the greediness of their employers.

It is contemplated to create a tribunal of conciliation for the settlement of conflicts arising between workmen and their employers, which would result in putting a stop to strikes, or, at least, in averting in a large measure those difficulties which always prove disastrous to both interested parties, and which bear almost invariably more heavily upon the workmen than upon their employers.

The influx of immigrants into Canada has considerably increased, and our vacant lands are being taken up in all the different parts of Canada, and what is still more satisfactory, many of our fellow-countrymen are being repatriated. Those who have closely watched the evils caused by the exodus of our farmers towards the United States, observe with pleasure that this exodus is being stopped, and the deserted farms are once more being occupied by their former owners.

I see with pleasure that the government contemplate renewing and amending the banking laws. The recent disasters which have occurred in connection with some banks shows the necessity of promptly remedying the defects of the law; otherwise, the confidence reposed in our monetary institutions will grow weaker from day to day.

It is of the utmost importance that the deepening of our canals should be proceeded with without any delay; a large portion of those works has already been carried out, but there still remains something to be done, and when they are completed, we will be able to transport by the St. Lawrence route hundreds of millions of tons of grain, which, up to the present, have taken the other route to reach the ocean.

The most important event of the year, and the one, among those referred to in the speech from the Throne, which has chiefly engaged the attention and inflamed the public mind throughout the empire, is without question, the war which Great Britain has to carry out in South Africa against the Transvaal Republic. All Canadians, irrespective of party ties, have stood up nobly for the mother country in this crisis in her history, and have, in no uncertain tones, expressed their intention that Canada should send a certain number of volunteers to fight side by side with the soldiers of the Queen. Before that great outburst of popular feeling and sympathy, the government thought it their duty to fit out and despatch a contingent, without first consulting parliament. I believe the government did right in taking that course, and that their action is endorsed by the almost entire population of our country.

We have, in Canada, government by the people and for the people, and there could not possibly exist any doubt as to the endorsement of the government policy by the representatives of the people on that question. We are a British colony, and we owe Great Britain a debt of gratitude on account of the large sum of liberty we are enjoying under her flag.

The government, in fitting out and sending the contingents to South Africa, have complied with the conditions laid down by Great Britain herself. There was no interference with our constitution, and under the circumstances, as I said, the government did right and as they were bound to do.

Some newspapers seem to think that the people in the province of Quebec are somewhat in lack of loyalty. No more ungrounded, no more unjustifiable charge could be levelled at our people. The French Canadians never lacked loyalty to the British Crown, and if ever, in the past, acts of disloyalty, in the true acceptance of the word, were perpetrated, the perpetrators of those acts are to be found elsewhere than in the ranks of the French Canadians. We, French Canadians, never wished to change our allegiance, realizing as we do, that under the protection of Great Britain, we enjoy as large a sum of liberty as is to be found in any country of the world.

We, French Canadians, also wish to see the British flag majestically waving over all the seas; we also wish to see the British troops victorious, and at each reverse of the British arms during this hard-fought war, our warmest sympathies went forth to that venerable and glorious Queen who, for over sixty years, has presided over the destinies of the British Empire.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker—for this House, it seems to me, is anxious that I should draw these remarks to a conclusion—but I may assure the hon. gentlemen that I am not less anxious than they are to resume my seat; let me tell them that it is always a new pleasure for hon. members, on both sides of the House, to see the hon. leader of the opposition, resume his seat at the opening of each succeeding session, more hale, more hearty and more vigorous than ever. One would be inclined to think that for the hon. gentleman, the role of leader of the opposition is a pledge of longevity and good health. And I think I am but voicing the feeling of the hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House in expressing the wish that long may he continue to occupy the post he now fills so well.

As to the right hon. leader of the House and his colleagues, may they long continue to administer public affairs with the same wisdom as in the past, and the people will give them credit for it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, it now becomes my very agreeable duty to congratulate the hon. gentlemen who have moved and seconded the address in answer to the speech. I may say that these gentlemen both succeeded very eminent members of this House. The position they are called upon to fill requires, in order that they may compare at all favourably with their predecessors, very great ability and very great knowledge. All of us agree in lamenting the loss, to which the hon. mover referred, of the late Speaker of this House, and all of us concur in the eulogium that was passed by that hon. gentleman upon his distinguished predecessor. I am happy to be able, from the brief acquaintance we have all had the pleasure of making with the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Gould), to congratulate the House, and to congratulate my hon. friend the leader of the government, upon having secured in the successor to the late Speaker a gentleman whose ability has already been made manifest to the House by the very able manner in which he has moved the motion placed in his hands. I may say, also, that the hon. member for Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion) succeeds, as we all know, one of the most distinguished members who has ever occupied a seat on the floor of this House on either side. The late Hon. Mr. Geoffrion brought to this House not only signal professional ability, which placed him in the front rank of professional men and constitutional lawyers, but that high personal character and that wide acquaintance with public affairs and that independent spirit in dealing with them, which made him an ornament to the House, and caused us deeply to regret his loss. Although I have not been able to follow his successor, the present member, bearing the same name, and of the same family, as well as I would have liked to do, yet, so far as I have been able to form a judgment, I think we may all congratulate ourselves that able and distinguished as the late member for Verchères was, he has been succeeded by a gentleman who bids fair to become a very valuable acquisition to the House of Commons.

Now, Sir, I may say that anxious as I understand the Government are to proceed with the public business of the country with all possible promptitude, and overshadowed as every other question that has been placed before us in the speech from the Throne is by the reference to the position the empire now occupies, I do not propose to make any reference to any of the subjects which have just been discussed in the very able speeches of the hon. mover and seconder of the address other than that of the troubles in the Transvaal. The debate on the Budget, which we shall probably reach at an early day, will enable us to deal fully and completely with a large number of the matters that have been referred to by these hon. gentlemen; and the other measures foreshadowed in the speech will be more conveniently dealt with when we have the measures themselves before us. Therefore, I think I shall be consulting the wishes of both sides of the House if I adopt the course at the present time of dealing at not too great length, I hope, with that great transcendent question that occupies the thoughts of all of us to-day, rather than to go into those other questions, which may be dealt with more fully and completely hereafter, and when they are dealt with, I am afraid I shall be obliged to differ in some degree with many of the statements that have been made by the hon. mover and the hon. seconder of the address. I may say that since the first day the parliament of Canada assembled in this Chamber, we have never met in such a position as that in which we now meet. Never have we met on any occasion when the Imperial government stood in any position at all to be compared with that in which it now stands. Some parties, labouring under a very great misconception of the struggle in which the empire is now engaged, altogether underrate it. The position in which the government of the empire finds itself in, carrying out the policy to which it has been compelled to commit itself, is without parallel since this confederation has been established. I may say that from one end of this country to the other, there is no question on which men of all classes, of every section of the community, feel so strongly as on this great transcendent question that occupies our minds to-day, and the minds of all British subjects in every portion of Her Majesty's Empire. As I have said already, I propose to confine myself therefore, on the present occasion, to some reference to the existing condition of things in that regard. I may say that it is with the deepest possible regret that I feel myself compelled to dissent from the statement made in the second paragraph of this address regarding the position that we occupy. I must take exception to that statement that:

We have received practical evidence of the profound devotion and loyalty of the entire people of Canada to the sovereign and institutions of the British Empire.

I need not express to members of this House, or to any one in this country who has any knowledge of the opinions I have always entertained upon this momentous question, the extreme regret with which I feel compelled to declare that the term 'entire' would be better replaced by the term 'the overwhelming mass of the people of Canada.' No one can regret more deeply than I the fact that I am obliged to make that qualification; but it is worse than idle to conceal from ourselves the actual position and facts as are known to hon. members on both sides and all the intelligent people of this country; and no terms that we can use in the speech from the Throne, unless they are sustained by the actual, existing facts, can be used with any advantage, either to the House or this country or to the empire.

Now, I may say that I have always treated this question of the Transvaal war and the part that I felt Canada was bound by every possible tie and obligation to take in it, as one above and beyond any party consideration. From the outset I have treated it from that standpoint.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh, oh!

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I hear an expression of dissent from that statement, and therefore the House will perhaps be indulgent if I draw, for a few brief moments, its attention to the grounds upon which I claim that that is the position I took from the first. When this question was first drawn to the attention of this House, what was the attitude that I assumed? The hon. member for North Victoria (Col. Hughes), whom I may venture to name, under the circumstances, brought to the attention of the right hon. First Minister, on the 12th of July last, the fact that Queensland, one of the Australian provinces, had already offered to send a contingent of volunteers to aid Her Majesty's government in South Africa, and indicated to the government that, in his judgment, it was desirable that Canada should take similar action. But the right hon. gentleman, who leads the House with so much ability, met that suggestion by the expression of the hope, in which we all concurred, that, menacing as events were, there would be no war, but that a peaceful solution would be arrived at. What then did I do? I ventured on that occasion to suggest—and it was a suggestion made, I have no hesitation frankly in saying for the purpose of obtaining the united, hearty, spontaneous expression of both parties in this House, and all parties in this country, in relation to the question to which I attach so much importance—on that occasion I ventured to suggest to my right hon. friend that if a peaceable solution were to be obtained, it would be in consequence of the feeling exhibited by both the great parties in the House of Commons of Great Britain on this question, and that nothing would more contribute to secure a peaceful solution than to have the various outlying portions of Her Majesty's possessions show promptly their readiness, as Queensland has done, to sustain by arms the Imperial government, in the position that government had assumed. I do not think that any one will find in that suggestion any intimation of any desire to do anything more than place the First Minister and the government of the day, at the earliest possible moment, in possession of the fact that the opposition in this House were ready to co-operate with them, in every possible way, with regard to such a measure as might be usefully adopted.

Well, Sir, we all know that some time after that a delegate from South Africa visited Ottawa. I will not undertake to say what passed between that gentleman and my right hon. friend, but I may say to the House that he came to me and expressed his great satisfaction at the sympathy I had shown and the intimation I had thrown out as to the desirability of Canada assuming such a position as would strengthen the arms of the British Empire with regard to that great question; and he was good enough to suggest that I should in this House take some action on the line which I had suggested in my remarks. I told him at once, and frankly, that I could not do anything of the kind, that, in my judgment, it was of the most vital importance that no party character should be given for a single moment to this momentous question with which we were confronted, but I told him that he was at liberty to say to the First Minister that any action he would take in that direction would obtain from me the most hearty and enthusiastic support.

I do not think that that indicated any desire on my part to drag down so momentous a question into the miserable arena of party politics. Well, Sir, matters remained in statu quo for some time after that, and on July 28 I received a copy of the Star, published in Montreal, containing a cable from London of that date, which I will read:

Regarding the proposed resolution in the Dominion parliament in support of Sir Alfred Milner's proposals for the removal of the grievances of the British subjects in the Transvaal, I learn to-day, on the highest possible authority, that the British ministry would cordially welcome such an expression of Canadian opinion. New South Wales, Queensland, India, Lagos and Natal have each sent expressions of sympathy, and have offered troops in the most improbable event of hostilities. The British feel that their efforts to secure justice to British subjects and bring the Transvaal crisis to a speedy and pacific end would be greatly aided by evidence that the Queen's subjects all the world over, including Britain's premier colony,

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Canada, are of one mind when British rights are jeopardized.

Now, Sir, what did I do when I received this? Did I take the opportunity of drawing the attention of the House to this subject, or of pressing my hon. friend across the floor of the House, as I could have done, in regard to this important cable? I did nothing of the sort. I went to my right hon. friend and showed him the Star of that date, and ventured to express my opinion to him that the time had come when it was obviously desirable, and I thought eminently necessary, that Canada should take action. My right hon. friend at once said, after reading over the cable carefully: 'I will move a resolution on Monday'—that was on Friday—and I will ask you to second it.' I said to my right hon. friend that I would not be able to do so, as I had an engagement in Toronto on that date, and he said he would send me a copy of the resolutions, and would ask me to write him a letter which he could read in the House on the subject. Well, Sir, I received a copy of the resolutions, with which the House is already familiar, as they are on our journals, expressing sympathy with Her Majesty's government and approval of the action that was being taken by Her Majesty's government. Now, I draw the attention of the House to the letter which I sent to my right hon. friend as a further evidence of my great anxiety to indicate what, in my opinion, was required of Canada, in order rightly to discharge our duty as the parliament of this country in relation to this great matter. I may say that I did not confine myself to the limits of the resolutions which had been prepared by the leader of the House, and I will read what I wrote:

Dear Sir Wilfrid Laurier,—I regret to say, in reply to your note just received, that it will not be in my power to attend the House to-morrow, or it would have given me much pleasure to second the resolution of which you have sent me a copy in relation to the Transvaal, as I think—

And I draw attention to this:

—we are bound to give all the aid in our power to Her Majesty's government in the present crisis.

I went beyond the question of sympathy, it being a matter upon which I felt very strongly, and I wished to make the leader of the government acquainted with the strong view that I entertained upon the question. Now, Sir, I do not think that any person will say, under these circumstances, that I did anything that was calculated to show that I was desirous of making any party capital in relation to this matter.

I may say that I was obliged, as the House is aware, to leave for England just before the House rose, and I returned to Canada on the 18th of September, going immediately to Halifax to fulfil an engagement which I had made with the president of the provincial exhibition to deliver an address there. On that occasion, finding that nothing had been done, finding that all these other colonies were in advance of the position we had taken, finding that the state of things which then existed left no reasonable doubt that war must take place, I felt it necessary to make this further declaration. Let me remind the House that on the 8th of September the British Cabinet asked for a war credit of five millions; that on the 16th of September General Buller sailed for South Africa; that on the 18th of September the London newspapers declared that war was inevitable. That was the position of things which I found when I was called upon to address the exhibition at Halifax, and where I had an opportunity of meeting a very large number of people, and on that occasion the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) did me the honour of being one of my auditors. Sir, there in the presence of a member of the government, and carrying out the policy I had indicated, I felt it was due from me, as leader of Her Majesty's loyal and constitutional opposition in this House and in Canada, to express my opinion of what I felt the interest and the honour of our country required. I said on that occasion:

I believe that the government of Canada only correctly interpreted the sentiment of the people of Canada when they unanimously passed a resolution expressing their sympathy and hope that their grievance would be overcome. I believe they will be correctly interpreting the sentiments of the people of Canada if they avail themselves of every means for enlisting a regiment of stalwart Canadians to bear arms for Her Majesty's government should it need them.

I felt that I was doing a service to the government in this indirect though proper way, to express not only to the leader of the government my conviction as to the authority that we already possessed under the resolutions unanimously passed by this House, but to say that in my belief, the sentiment of the people of this country would entirely sustain the government in adopting such a measure as would strengthen the hands of the Imperial government in that connection. Now, Sir, as the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) has taken great exception to the spirit by which I was animated and the course which I took, I may quote what, I think, the House will regard as an authority quite as great as that of the Minister of Railways and Canals, I will quote a statement made by the hon. the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), sitting alongside of him at this moment. That gentleman in a very able and eloquent speech, which he delivered at the Board of Trade, on the 16th day of January, said:

He personally had taken the stand, in private conversation, nearly a year ago at Ottawa, when the idea of parliament adopting a resolution upholding the claims of the Uitlanders for redress of their grievances, that any expression of opinion of this kind by Canada should be backed up by a subsidy or a contingent.

It was not thought then that Kruger would actually go to war, but the unexpected happened, and the crisis was upon us. He was glad Canada was unanimous in backing up her loyalty in a substantial manner.

I ask the attention of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), who has formed an opinion so entirely at variance with these statements which I am now about to read:

It was the opportunity and the privilege of the leader of the opposition to initiate the proposal to offer Canadian troops for service in South Africa. It was a proud, enviable and distinguished opportunity.

I regret to say, that what I intended in the best possible good faith as a suggestion to the Prime Minister, that the time had come when it was absolutely due to the honour and to the interest of this country that the government should take action, was not accepted in the spirit in which it was intended. I went on from Halifax to Yarmouth to deliver an address at the agricultural exhibition in the county of Yarmouth. I learned on the morning of my address, by a communication that had been made by the right hon. Prime Minister to the Globe correspondent on the 3rd of October, I learned, to my deep regret—I do not hesitate to say it, in the most unqualified manner, that I learned with the deepest possible regret that the Prime Minister, instead of acting upon what I hoped would be a suggestion that would meet with his hearty concurrence and approval, a suggestion that he knew I would not take the responsibility of making unless I believed it would meet with the concurrence and approval of the great party that I have the honour to lead, that instead of taking the suggestion I had hoped he would, he stated, in an elaborate communication to the Globe reporter, which appeared in the Globe newspaper the next day, on the 4th of October, that he had carefully examined the law and found that it was impossible for him to do anything, that, in fact, he would do nothing because he could do nothing, that under the law and the constitution of the country he was actually precluded without the direct authority of parliament, from spending a single dollar in regard to this very great and very important measure. Well, Sir, the right hon. Prime Minister and the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals may accept my statement or not as they please, when I say that I read that statement with the greatest regret. I felt not only that the right hon. Prime Minister himself—and it was not on that ground I regretted it, I may say—had lost a great opportunity, but I regretted it because the country had lost a great opportunity and because Canada was placed in the position in which no patriotic Canadian could wish to see her placed. It was with feelings of the greatest regret that I read that statement which came from the right hon. Prime Minister, and I took the only means in my power to endeavour to remedy and improve that condition of things. I may say that in this communication to the Globe, in which my right hon. friend stated that he would do nothing, because the constitution of the country precluded his doing anything, he went on to say :

As to Canada furnishing a contingent, the government has not discussed the question, for the reasons which I have stated.

So that, down to that period, it appears, that, although this matter had been agitating the mind of nearly every person in Australasia and in the outlying and most remote portions of the empire, a question which had been stirring the mind of every patriotic British subject throughout the world, according to the statement of the right hon. Prime Minister, the government of which he was the head had not taken any action in that relation. Under these circumstances I ventured, after some little hesitation, I confess, to do what I felt to be an important and imperative duty as a Canadian, and I sent the following telegram to the right hon. gentleman :—

Yarmouth, N.S., Oct. 5.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Ottawa :

I hope you will send a contingent of Canadian volunteers to aid England in the Transvaal. I know it will be warmly welcomed by the British government, be of great service to Canada, and promote the unity of the empire. A friend of mine will insure the lives and limbs, at his expense, to a million dollars, and I will heartily support in parliament your action in this matter.

(Sgd.) CHARLES TUPPER.

The reason that I gave that information to my right hon. friend as to what this gentleman was prepared to do was because I knew that these matters are, to some extent, questions of cost and of expenditure, and I believed that by mentioning that provision would be made to the extent of one million dollars to meet the casualties that a contingent of a thousand volunteers might bring about would show my right hon. friend that there was no reason to suppose that any extraordinary expenditure would result. Therefore I mentioned that in my telegram. That telegram, unfortunately, after travelling some hundreds of miles—I do not remember the exact distance from Yarmouth to Halifax—was interrupted at Halifax. But my hon. friend afterwards said, not very graciously—he was aware of the telegram, although he had not received it until October 13 when he found, by referring to the office that a message had been sent and delayed at Halifax on the way—that I had taken the precaution of notifying the whole public of Canada of the telegram I had sent him. Why did I do that? I felt that the right hon. gentleman might say :— ‘It is all very well for Sir Charles Tupper to say that he will give me this support in regard to this great question, but his followers in the House, the party which usually act with him, may see this from a very different standpoint.’ I thought that there was no means by which I could bring the solid Conservative party in Canada so entirely at the back and support of the right hon. gentleman as by stating, as I did, at the meeting which took place, in the address which I delivered at Yarmouth, that I had sent this message. And I believed that if the government would take action upon it they would find parliament at their back. It was with the view of strengthening the effect of the message that I made this statement to the public. I said on that occasion :—

My own opinion is that I believe the time has come when it is the duty of Canada to send to the assistance of Great Britain a corps of Canadian sharpshooters. I know that the Canadian volunteers in this respect cannot be surpassed by any in the world.

I believe the time has come when it is important that Canada should show her readiness to aid the mother country to whom she owes so much, and from whom she expects so much.

I am going to tell you a secret, that is except that it is known to the telegraph operator. I to-day took the responsibility, with full knowledge of what that responsibility means, of telegraphing to the Premier of Canada the hope that he would offer to send to South Africa a body of Canadian volunteers, and assuring him that such a project would not only have all my support, but I believed that of the people of all parts of Canada.

Hon. gentlemen opposite may think that they find something in this to indicate a desire to turn this grave and great question to party purposes. I believe that no person who dispassionately looks at this action of mine will come to the conclusion that I did anything else but my duty in making this appeal to the First Minister under the circumstances which existed. The telegram which I sent and which my right hon. friend was advised of, unfortunately did not produce the desired effect. The right hon. gentleman having delivered his ultimatum to the people of Canada through the Globe newspaper, that after a careful examination of the law, he found it would be unconstitutional for him to take any action without the authority of parliament, and that such being the case he did not propose to do anything; the right hon. gentleman having delivered this ultimatum, apparently felt that his duties were at an end, and he departed for the purpose of gracing a civic exhibition in the city of Chicago. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) then told us that the Ministers were not asleep, but it would certainly appear that they were not awake to the importance of this question, because they dispersed incontinently over the country, and the Major-General commanding the militia went, I think, to British Columbia. That is the sort of attention which the government gave at that time to this very important matter.

Now, Sir, there is a part of this subject which I wish to deal with in all fairness and frankness, and I regret that I shall have to deal with it somewhat in detail as the only effective means at my command to prevent a great injury being done. I shall be obliged to give to the House, evidence that my right hon. friend is not rightly stating the case in the speech from the Throne, when he says: that the entire people of Canada are of one mind upon this subject. I am compelled, with regret, to give to the Prime Minister evidence which leads me to the conviction that that statement is not founded in fact, and that there was a grave difference of opinion on this matter which is so vitally important to the British Empire, among the very members of the cabinet themselves. A minister who has again and again shown his great authority and influence with this government, adopted a position of entire and unqualified hostility to anything being done by Canada towards helping Great Britain in this crisis. We find that this minister was apparently not only able to use sufficient influence with the Premier to induce him to make the declaration, that he would take no action in the matter; but that this same minister was able to draw to this aid a considerable number of the supporters of the right hon. gentleman in this House, who followed him in his position of antagonism to Great Britain. Sir, there is no advantage to Canada in avoiding that frank dealing with this question which I believe to be absolutely necessary in order to remedy it. I need not say to the House that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) is the person to whom I allude. I draw attention to the fact that he had just come from France, a country that unhappily at this moment is in the most bitter antagonism against England. He had just come from that country which daily through its press, and through its public men, is declaring the most enthusiastic sympathy with the Boers. He had just come from a country that is denouncing England, that is gloating over every misfortune to our arms and rejoicing at every triumph of the enemy. It appears to me that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) became imbued with the atmosphere by which he was surrounded, and so let us hear his first declaration after his arrival in Canada. At a banquet given to Mr. Herbet, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) said:

I return from France, where I received the care that French science can give, and I return to Canada more French than ever. I am a minister in a British government, and I have the right to say that I am French. But I tell you this: if to declare myself a British subject would prevent me from being French, then I would refuse to call myself a British subject. We make no threats, as the ballot-box is our best defence. We are happy and free under British institutions, but France is always my dear country.

I am not going to express my own opinion of what I think of such a statement made by a Canadian cabinet minister. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) said he was a French Canadian, and would always remain a French Canadian to the core, we would all sympathize with him; but when he had just come from a country which was exhibiting the most bitter hostility to everything that was British; to announce that he would not be a British subject if he could not be French first, was to make a declaration which I will not myself characterize, but which I will leave it to Le Soleil of Quebec, the organ of the Prime Minister, to tell the hon. gentleman what was thought of it. Le Soleil of December 11, says:

What good comes of certain of our public men claiming to be French in the first place and British subjects afterwards. To think so may be permitted, but to write and proclaim such sentiments is criminal and foolish provocation.

When the organ of the right hon. gentleman in the province of Quebec expresses such sentiments in regard to this language of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), is it any wonder that the people who are not under the immediate influence which surrounds and pervades the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) have taken a less favourable view of his position. Sir, it would be impossible for any minister of the Crown, it would be impossible for any man in Canada to have taken an attitude of more determined, more inveterate or more undying hostility to any aid or assistance being given by the Canadian government to the British arms, than this hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) steadily pursued. La Patrie of Montreal, the organ and property of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) or of his family; La Patrie, which he declares to be the organ of this government, in the Montreal district, at all events, on October 10 used this language:

Not one of the speakers who addressed the meeting at St. Liboire had the energy to denounce the dangerous policy adopted by the chief of the Conservative party during the last few weeks, namely, the participation of Canada in the war of the Transvaal, and, consequently, in all others that might break out in Europe or elsewhere. M. Taillon, M. Beaubien and M. Bergeron constitute themselves the lay figures of Toryism and of the Orangism of Ontario, that is to say, of the most fanatical and baneful influences that exist in this country.

We denounce them in the name of sound public opinion. We ask of our fellow-citizens to brand them as criminal cowards.

And what had been done by these gentlemen whom La Patrie denounces, what had they done? These gentlemen had had the courage of their convictions to say that they believed that considering the position which England occupied, it was the duty of the government of Canada to come to the aid of the mother country, and to give effect to the declaration which the House of Commons of Canada and the Senate of Canada had by unanimous vote placed upon their journals.

Mr. BERGERON. And the government did it afterwards.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, and the government did it afterwards. And, Sir, the moment the members of this government adopted the very suggestion made by Mr. Bergeron and his friends in the province of Quebec, that moment they became entitled to be branded by La Patrie as criminal cowards. What keeps the Minister of Public Works in the same cabinet with the Prime Minister, and the other ministers whom, by inference, his newspaper has branded as criminal cowards. Sir, it would be unparliamentary to suggest the only reason which can keep these gentlemen holding such diverse opinions on a great national question in the same cabinet. But I have not done justice to La Patrie. On the same date it says:

What have we to do with the affairs of Africa? What interests have we in the Transvaal? Why should we take the money and the blood of the ratepayers of this country to squander them in these far-away regions?

Was that calculated, Sir, to strengthen the hands of this government in carrying out what was obviously intended by the resolutions that were passed by this House and placed upon its journals? The next day La Patrie follows this up by saying:

Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the other day, very clearly defined the government's position in stating that there was no justification whatever for the government offering or sending a contingent without previously consulting parliament. It, therefore, follows that the Canadian government did not offer any military contingent to the Imperial government.

For our own part, we have no hesitation whatever in stating that if the Laurier cabinet had taken upon itself the responsibility of exposing the future of Canada in sending a military contingent to the Transvaal at the expense of this country, we should have blamed its policy.

Therefore, the hon. gentleman, through his organ, threatened his colleagues in the government that they would be struck down by that powerful organ of public opinion, La Patrie, if they ventured to differ with him in opinion on this question.

The Canadian contingent leaving for the Transvaal is composed of men who have voluntarily offered their services. The Canadian government had neither the right nor the power to officially engage our country without consulting parliament.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Now, Sir, I come to the hon. gentleman's own language, over his own signature, and what does he say?—though it did not require that, because every person knows that not a line can find its way into La Patrie on matters of public policy without the sanction and approval of the hon. gentleman. It would be extraordinary if it could be otherwise with that paper, which is declared to be the official organ of the government in the district of Montreal. In La Patrie of the 10th of October, the hon. gentleman says:

I am in a position to give you the most positive assurance that the government has not come to any decision relative to the sending of a military corps to the Transvaal. The merits of the dispute between England and the Transvaal are one thing, the interference by Canada in the foreign wars of the empire is another. It is sought to create precedent which would have for result the compulsory participation in the future by Canada in any and all the conflicts which may sweep over Europe and over the various parts of the world in which the large European governments are interested.

Everything to terrorize the public, everything to make it impossible for his colleagues to force his hand or differ from him on this important question. But the hon. gentleman was good enough to add:

The government will be happy to favour the departure of all those whose warlike instincts and patriotism make them want to go to the Transvaal to fight, but I do not believe that public opinion in this country asks more, and I will add will never consent to more in such an eventuality as now exists.

What is it that holds the hon. gentleman in association with these 'criminal cowards,' branded as such by him if they adopted such a policy? Whatever the inducement may be that keeps the hon. gentleman as a minister of the Crown, I say that if he had proper respect for himself or for his colleagues, such an association would be absolutely impossible. Either he held these opinions or he did not. If he did not, then he was endeavouring to deceive and delude and mislead the people of this country; if he did hold them, he should have had the courage of his opinions, and when it came to the question of resigning a position which no man in this country should occupy a single hour, when separated by such a gulf from the action his colleagues were determined to take, then the hon. gentleman if he respected either himself or his opinions or his associates, would have instantly severed that connection. Now, I am going to call a gentleman from the other side of the House and put his opinion in contradiction with that which I have just quoted. The hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Préfontaine), speaking in Montreal on his return from Chicago, where he had been with the Premier on the 12th of October, used the following language, which I am proud to place alongside of that which I think has discredited, and will for ever discredit, the Minister of Public Works. The hon. member for Maisonneuve said :

Very serious events have happened since I left Canada last Friday. These events have a great bearing in the British Empire. I am not one of those who would dictate the government's policy. I am a full private in the Liberal army. I remember that at the last session the Canadian parliament pledged itself to help the British Empire; and now I think the time has come when this pledge should be redeemed. I say so as a French Canadian and a member of the Liberal party.

Contrast this candid, outspoken declaration, which will commend itself to the dispassionate judgment of every hon. gentleman with that of the Minister of Public Works. Instead of there being any violation of the constitution, as the hon. Minister of Public Works was evidently able to convince the right hon. First Minister there would be if anything was done, the hon. member for Maisonneuve tells the people of this country—and he spoke with the authority of a gentleman well versed in public affairs, not only in this House but out of it—that he regarded the resolution which had been passed unanimously by both branches of the parliament of Canada as a perfect and complete justification for giving that aid and assistance to the empire; and I am quite certain that the sentiment of the members of this House, however their inclinations may be in one direction or another, will say that the position of the hon. member for Maisonneuve on this question was correct and sound. La Patrie continued day after day to attack the government and to threaten everything that was possible to prevent them giving any aid or assistance. On October 14 it published the following:—

The most sacred prerogative of a British subject is not to pay taxes either in money or in blood without having the right of representation. Canada has no voice in Imperial affairs. We are not represented in the parliament of Great Britain.

Therefore an utterly false and delusive principle was propounded that will not bear investigation for a single moment, because it had no relation to the question under consideration. But what occurred? The hon. gentleman was not satisfied with threatening his colleagues through Le Patrie, and with blocking and shutting them off when they wished to make a move in the right direction, but he brought to his aid another organ of the party which he subordinated to his views. I refer to Le Temps of Ottawa. Le Temps thus expressed its views:

We already know that it is Mr. Tarte who opposes the ridiculous idea of taking our money to carry on Imperial wars. The Minister of Public Works considers the question of the Transvaal from the Canadian point of view. What should we go to Africa for? To help England to conquer an undisciplined army of 50,000 farmers? The empire can do without us in this easy affair. Besides she does not ask us to come, and did she do so, such an audacious and unusual proceeding would be a new reason for distrust of her.

Is it not plain that Great Britain, seeing the storm about to burst over her head, seeks to engage us in a conflict created or provoked by her, the responsibility for which in no wise can be shared by Canada, and that in order to establish a dangerous precedent which would permit her in future to call on our country for money and for men whenever she might need them. Truly we should be great fools to sacrifice our present security, as well as that of the future, and our painfully-acquired autonomy, for the doubtful advantage of sharing the fortunes of England.

Can the hon. gentleman who leads the government, now tell this House, in the face of the declarations of these French organs supporting his government, but evidently under the malign influence of the Minister of Public Works, that there is entire accord in Canada to-day in regard to this great question. Why, the right hon. gentleman knows that everything that has been done, has been accomplished by applying the point of the bayonet to the Minister of Public Works. Every one knows that it was only when that hon. Minister had to choose between going out or abandoning his opinions and showing how little they were worth, that he decided to yield and remain. Fortunately for Canada, the overwhelming public sentiment of this country, excited on this as it never has been before in our history upon any question, soon taught my right hon. friend that he would have to choose between abandoning his contention that nothing could be done, because to do anything would be a violation of the constitution, and that either he would have to violate the constitution or somebody else would be in charge of it at a very early day. Under the circumstances, he consented to do that which he declared he never would do because he could not do it without violating the constitution of the country. After he had placed himself, as I have shown, at the mercy of the Minister of Public Works and other gentlemen in this House, he was obliged to yield to the overwhelming pressure of public opinion, and do that which he declared could not be done because it was impossible.

The right hon. gentleman, when he does do anything, however, does it well. When I read his speech at the embarkation of the volunteers, and when I remembered the circumstances under which the sending the volunteers had been brought about, I could not but admire the marvellous eloquence of my right hon. friend. It would be impossible, I do not hesitate to say, for any one to have placed the question in a better and stronger light than he did by his eloquent speech on that occasion. But what then happened? While the right hon. gentleman was declaring that this was a war of justice, a holy war, in which Canada was bound to take part by coming to the aid and support of Her Majesty's government, his hon. friend the Minister of Public Works was addressing the people at St. Vincent de Paul. The Minister of Public Works there violated the first principles of parliamentary and constitutional government by holding up in his hand what he declared was the Order in Council permitting this contingent to go, and declared that he had forced his colleagues to put into that Order in Council the declaration that it should never be done again. Let me quote the words of the hon. Minister of Public Works:

And it is because these words, 'it is not to be a precedent,' are in the Order in Council, it is because I, for my part, requested them, and I say it aloud and I say it to the country, that I am denounced as disloyal.

Why should he not be denounced as disloyal for taking this line of conduct, when the representative of the Crown in New South Wales, the Governor of New South Wales, was sending this message to the Queen regarding the contingent which New South Wales had sent:

The people of this colony will be ready always to share the duties and responsibilities of Her Majesty's Empire.

When New South Wales was covering itself, in the eyes of every patriotic man within the bounds of the British Empire, with honour, by declaring that what it had done on this occasion it would always be ready to do, whenever the interests of the great Empire required it, the Minister of Public Works was shaking this Order in Council before the people and boasting that he had forced his colleagues to put into it the reservation that what had been done would not be done again, and that no precedent would be established.

At St. Vincent de Paul the hon. Minister of Public Works further said:

I call the attention of the Canadian electorate to the fact that in the debate which then took place, not one member of parliament suggested the idea of sending troops to the Transvaal to aid England. Sir Charles Tupper was in his seat when that resolution was passed.

The hon. gentleman was mistaken in that assertion, because at the time I happened to be in Toronto. The hon. gentleman went on to say:

Sir Charles Tupper was surrounded by his colleagues, and I repeat, not a member suggested the idea of sending the Canadian troops to the Transvaal.

Did the hon. gentleman read my letter sent to the First Minister on the occasion, in which I committed myself fully and unequivocally to the position that it was the duty of this government to send aid to Her Majesty's forces. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) gave the hon. gentleman an emphatic contradiction in that very illogical and contradictory speech of which he was so proud as to have it published in pamphlet form and distributed for the purpose of carrying the elections in the province of New Brunswick and Sherbrooke. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) said at Campbellton on the 21st November, 1890:

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

In adopting that resolution, there were none, I think, who did not consider—

I call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to these words:

—that it involved an expression, at least, of willingness on the part of Canada to aid the empire should the need for our assistance arise.

So that the hon. Minister of Public Works was contradicted, not only by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Préfontaine), but by his colleague, the Minister of Railways and Canals, who sympathized with him to a considerable extent in this matter.

Again, look at the hon. gentleman's baneful influence on the right hon. gentleman's colleagues. Last year the right hon. gentleman boasted in this House that he had at his back his French colleagues as a unit. But how does he stand to-day? Under the potent, malign influence of the Minister of Public Works he stands in this position, that a number of his strong supporters of yesterday are to-day denouncing his conduct as unconstitutional and pledging themselves all over the country that they will oppose any conduct of the kind. The hon. member for the St. James Division of Montreal (Mr. Desmarais), speaking to the East End Liberal Club of that city, on October 11, said:

I do not fear to say that the Laurier government would be seriously blamed by the electorate if it approved of such a measure (sending a Canadian contingent to the Transvaal), and I, for one, would rise on the floor of the House, as member for St. James Division, if such a proposal were brought before parliament, and signify my disapproval.

I do not know whether the hon. gentleman will change his mind; but, in view of such statements made by members of parliament representing important sections of this country, in view of the position taken by them of determined, unqualified antagonism, following the wake of the Minister of Public Works, to the policy propounded, is it possible for the hon. gentleman to say truthfully—and if it cannot be said truthfully, it only invites unfavourable comment—that there is entire accord, that his action has proved the loyalty and devotion of the entire people to the British Crown and British institutions?

Then, the hon. gentleman, in the speech at St. Vincent de Paul, tried to strengthen his own position by libelling the greatest statesman that Canada has ever known, the late Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald. He endeavoured to cloak himself by showing that that right hon. gentleman had taken a position of antagonism to this general feeling on the part of the Canadian people. I say nothing of myself, for that is a matter of comparatively little moment. But this statement of the hon. gentleman with regard to Sir John Macdonald is as libellous a statement as could be uttered. When he made that statement, he made it in the face of the fact that no man ever lived in Canada with stronger Imperial instincts than the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald. In the very first hour of his public life, he made the declaration that he regarded the continued connection of Canada with the British Empire of the most sovereign moment and that he would insist upon it and contend for it throughout his public career. And, Sir, true to his declaration, he ultimately sacrificed his life in a struggle against hon. gentlemen opposite and the policy they had adopted, which would have resulted in the severance of Canada's connection with the empire. He marshalled his hosts to resist what hon. gentlemen opposite sought, and he roused the people of Canada to enthusiasm for the cause he loved by his impassioned declaration 'a British subject I was born, a British subject I will die.' He fell in that struggle. His life was sacrificed to the anxiety and care which, in his weakened state and at his advanced age, this memorable campaign imposed upon him. But he was victorious in this struggle; he did not fall until he had planted securely upon the ramparts of his country the standard which meant 'British connection for ever.' Sir, how dare the Minister of Public Works libel that eminent Canadian statesman now that he is in his grave? On the record stood this memorable declaration from him made in 1884. Addressing a public meeting in Toronto in that year, Sir John Macdonald said:

Great is the future of the British Empire, that empire of which we are a component part, and to which we hope to be attached for ever and for ever. We are passionately loyal to the sovereignty of Great Britain. We love our Queen and we love British institutions. We draw our inspiration from the great men who have governed England and who are now governing England, and we believe and know that our future prosperity depends greatly upon the continuance of union with the mother country. The Australian colonies will soon be united in a bond similar to, though not identical with, the Canadian confederation. Then what shall we see? We shall see England, with her thirty-five millions, united to Canada with her five millions, soon to become twice that number, and to Australia with a similar population, and the world will know that if the old mother country is attacked she has two auxiliary nations standing at her back and bound to make common cause with her. It has been said we are running great risks in venturing to make common cause with England. Gentlemen, if I know the people of Canada aright, they are willing to run those risks. But there really is no risk. When any foreign nation knows that the thirty-five million people in England and the twenty millions in the different colonies, forming one great nation, will exert all their military and naval power in one common cause, that fact will prevent possible war with England, and England will be in a complete moral domination of the world as was the Roman Empire in the days of old. But we are not, as I said before, going to count the cost. Who can look back to the time when the Crimean war broke out and not remember with pride how Canada rose as one man to stand by the mother country and by France when the French tri-colour and the Union Jack were joined together fighting the battles of liberty against absolutism on the shores of the Crimea? There was a rush of Canadians to get to the battle-field, and I had the great pleasure, as a member of the government of Sir Allan MacNab, to be instrumental in carrying a vote of £20,000 given unanimously out of the public treasury in order to show that Canada made common cause with England and with France in the Crimean war.

This is the most complete and thorough refutation of this libel upon that great man's memory—or attempted libel rather.

I do not intend to detain the House any more than I am obliged to, for I know how painful it is to my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) when any reference to myself is made. But I may say that, in the speech to the Tyneside Geographical Society on November 21, 1895, I said:

The past history of Canada warrants the belief that one of the first things for which they (the fast Atlantic steamers) would be utilized would be to carry brave Canadian volunteers to any part of the world where the honour and interests of this empire were threatened. . . . Is the past action of Canada not sufficient to prove that she is not insensible to the responsibility that devolves upon her as a component part of this great empire, and that in future, as in the past, she will be always found ready to discharge her duty to the utmost extent of her ability. . . . A short time ago, when there were threatenings in the East, I was directed to place a regiment of Royal Canadian infantry at the service of the Imperial government to be maintained by Canada.

I may say that these are the terms in which I pressed the acceptance of Col. Williams's proposition:

London, February 9, 1885.

The Under Secretary of State,
Colonial Office.

Sir,—I have the honour to transmit, for the information of the Earl of Derby—

—Then Colonial Minister—

—a copy of a telegram received from Colonel Arthur Williams, M.P., of Port Hope, Canada, commanding the 46th East Durham (Ontario) battalion of infantry, placing his services and those of his regiment, at the disposal of Her Majesty's government for immediate foreign service. In requesting that Lord Derby will be so good as to bring the matter before the Secretary of State for War, I venture to hope that His Lordship will be able to strongly recommend the acceptance of this offer.

I am, &c.,
(Sgd.) CHARLES TUPPER,
High Commissioner.

And here is the despatch of Lord Lansdowne, then Governor General, to Lord Derby, on that subject. The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) may say that the statement I have made from recollection, that the force maintained by Canada is not contained there.

February 12, 1885.

Government ready to sanction recruiting by Canada for service in Egypt or elsewhere. Force should be specially enrolled from the different parts of local battalions under Imperial Army Discipline Act. Laurie—

That is General Laurie, who was then a member of this House—

—Laurie preferable to Williams. I would suggest brigade of three battalions, 500 each from maritime provinces, old Canada and North-west. Laurie might command brigade and Williams one battalion. Melgund would like to serve as brigade major; entire cost would fall on Imperial exchequer.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman says 'Hear, hear.' I ask him to contrast the position of Canada at that date with Canada's position to-day. I ask the hon. gentleman if he does not know that the resources of Canada had just been taxed to the extent of an enormous sum of public money to secure the construction of a great transcontinental line of railway, regarded by Great Britain as of vital importance to the strength of the empire. I ask him also not to forget that at that time we were on the eve of an insurrection in the North-west that cost Canada $6,000,000, and this was a reason which perfectly justified the government of Canada at that time for not doing that which our honour and our duty alike would make proper at the present moment. Why, Sir, we were in the throes of a war in which the Dominion of Canada without the aid of a British soldier, bore the whole brunt and the whole expense.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Will my hon. friend kindly give me the date of that despatch?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. February 12, 1885. As my hon. friend tells me who was then Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Adolphe Caron).

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It commenced in February.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. So I give that at once to the hon. gentleman as a proof.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). A bad certificate to the late government that saw the rebellion coming and did nothing to prevent it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Now, I am afraid my hon. friend is trying to draw a red herring across the track.

Mr. FOSTER. Remember that old musket.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Now, Sir, what was the result of this action, this sentiment that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) brought with him from France and with which he permeated this country, when he used all his power in the government to prevent anything being done, and used all the power of his press to stir up and excite the people in Lower Canada, the people in Quebec in regard to this question? Sir, I am only expressing the general public opinion, an opinion founded upon undoubted evidence of a very strong character, in what I am about to say regarding the resignation of the hon. member for L'Ange-de-la-Croix (Mr. Bourassa). What brought about that resignation? The Minister of Public Works is credited, at all events, by the people of this country with having induced one of his supporters to resign and to denounce in the most emphatic terms the conduct of the Prime Minister of this country as unconstitutional and indefensible. That is the position. Has any gentleman in this House, on either side of it, ever seen such a spectacle before in the past history of Canada as that of a member of the government absolutely inducing a supporter of the government to resign and to denounce over his own signature the action of the Prime Minister, and to quote his own language, to prove out of his own mouth, that he had violated the constitution of the country; that consequently he could no longer support the government, and must place himself at the disposal of his constituents? Well, Sir, he did resign his seat, and what happened? Why, this government was challenged as no government in any other country was ever challenged before, challenged by one of their supporters with having betrayed and trampled upon the constitution of the country; and when this former supporter went back to his constituents the government dare not put up a candidate against him. I say a more pitiable exhibition was never seen before.

Sir, this is the letter addressed to his chief, the leader of this government:—

To the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, P.C., G.C.M.G., Prime Minister of Canada:

Sir,—In a statement published in the Toronto 'Globe' on the 4th inst., you said with reference to the sending of Canadian troops to the Transvaal: 'As I understand the Militia Act, and I may say that I have given it some study of late, our volunteers are enrolled to be used in the defence of the Dominion. They are Canadian troops, to be used to fight for Canada's defence. . . . There is no menace to Canada, and although we may be willing to contribute troops, I do not see how we can do so. Then, again, how could we do so without parliament granting us the money? We simply could not do anything. In other words, we should have to summon parliament.'

He quotes the language of the right hon. gentleman and proves out of his own mouth that he had violated the constitution, and refuses to serve any longer under a Prime Minister that so trampled upon the constitution of the country. Then he goes back to his constituents, because he cannot come here as a supporter of the right hon. gentleman, and secures a re-election. Then what do we see? The right hon. gentleman puts in the mouth of the Governor General of Canada the statement that there is entire unanimity of opinion among the whole people of Canada—no words in the English language could be stronger, and this in face of the fact that the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) secured a unanimous verdict of approval from the people of his county after he had thus denounced the action of this government in sending military aid to the British government in the Transvaal. And yet, Sir, it is sought to delude the people of this country into the belief that there is no difference of opinion. Then what took place? Then we find in the press the malign influence of the Minister of Public Works, disseminating hostility to the government of which he was a member. How he can remain a member of the government under these circumstances I leave it to the members of the government to settle among themselves. The hon. gentleman goes on to say:

The question is to decide whether the Canadian people shall be called upon to take part in all the wars of the empire without the doors of the Imperial parliament and cabinet board opened to them, without even being consulted through their representatives and the government on the advisability of those bloody contests. I shall never consent to uphold such a retrogressive policy.

Is the member for the county of Labelle nobody? Are his constituents nobodies? It would seem so, in face of that declaration that he has gone to them and asked them to denounce the government for its action in sending aid to Her Majesty's government, and has procured from them an unanimous verdict of approval. Yet in the face of this fact, this House is asked to say that there has been absolute unanimity upon this important question on the part of the whole Canadian people, without any exception whatever.

Now, Sir, commenting upon the resignation of the hon. member for Labelle, La Patrie, on the 22nd of October, says:

We state in the most emphatic manner that the departure of the volunteers, under the present conditions, is not and will not be a precedent.

How long was it not to be a precedent, I would like to know, Mr. Speaker. I would like the hon. gentleman to tell me what he meant when his paper said that it was not to be a precedent, whether it was not to be a precedent for a fortnight, or for three weeks, or for a month.

The violent discussions which take place, the sensational resignation of Mr. Bourassa—

Mark this, Mr. Speaker, I draw the attention of the First Minister to this statement, that instead of there being a unanimity on this question, there are violent discussions going on in his own province, among the people of the province of Quebec.

The violent discussions which take place, the sensational resignation of Mr. Bourassa, place on the order of the day the question of our future relations with the Empire. No taxes without representation, which is the political gospel of British citizens the world over, cannot be ignored here any more than elsewhere.

These are valiant words inspired by the hon. Minister of Public Works, but he was far from giving them effect when it came to the question of whether he should stay in or go out. What more? It is not only the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), but take the case of the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Monet). These are the gentlemen who stand shoulder to shoulder, who stand in a united phalanx, sustaining this government! They are all broken up amongst themselves, giving out, over their own signatures as the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville did, statements denouncing the action of this government and declaring, in the face of the world, that they never would come out in support of doing such violence to the constitution of the country. On December 30 that hon. gentleman said:

The federal cabinet, without consulting parliament, has just decided to send a second Canadian contingent to South Africa. It is not a question, like the first case, of a simple act of courtesy towards Great Britain. We espouse her quarrels and we make our own a war which Hon. Edward Blake has qualified as unjust and as oppressive. It is no longer a feeble pecuniary contribution that is asked. It is our contribution of blood which is demanded, and that in a war which threatens to be the most bloody of the century. Why should we contribute? Canada has nothing to do with the causes that provoked this war, and not being represented in the parliament which brought it about, I ask for what reason I should be called upon to contribute anything whatever. It has been said that the first contingent was sent to Africa as an act of politeness to England, which was not supposed to be in want of men, the Order in Council declaring that it was not to be a precedent. The second contingent is being sent because of the reverses which England has met with. I do not trouble myself as to whether the second Order in Council contains this restriction, 'this does not serve as a precedent.' This restriction is quite delusive.

As it proved.

I am a Canadian and my idea is to see Canada take rank amongst the independent nations as soon as she is sufficiently developed by the vitality, population and immensity of our national resources. In order, therefore, to reach this end we want all our revenues here to develop our resources and attract emigration, instead of sending our people as targets to South Africa.

Yet, we are all united,, we are of one voice and one sentiment on the whole of this question. I do not intend to tell hon. gentlemen what I think of the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville, but I will tell you what one of the most influential French papers says on this subject. I refer to La Presse, in the city of Montreal. That paper, referring to the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville, says :

There is neither equivocation nor restriction. Mr. Monet knows that the matter is one of urgency, and yet he is opposed to sending Canadian aid at a time when England needs it. This is disloyalty pure and simple.

This is not my charge against the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville, but it is the declaration of the most influential French paper in the whole province of Quebec, the most widely circulated paper and an independent paper, as my hon. friend (Mr. Bergeron) says :

Here is a flag which defends our commerce upon every sea, yet Mr. Monet pretends that we should accept the protection without being obliged to render any assistance therefor. It matters little to him whether we are to belong to a power of the first rank or to one of the second. He sees no difference between a nation of the first, second or third order. He desires the prosperity of Canada, but he expects to effect it in this way.

It is by such outbursts as this that we, a minority in the Canadian Dominion, make ourselves ridiculous in the eyes of the other provinces.

There is another of the right hon. gentleman's supporters driven away from his side, taken away from giving the support he would have loyally given by the fact of the government of Canada being undermined by a man within their own ranks and in their own counsels, who is using his press, his influence and his power among the people of Canada to break down and destroy the confidence of the vast body of the people of this country in this action. It is madness to shut our eyes to the facts as they are and to believe the statement, which is not founded in fact, that the entire population of this country is sustaining this action of the government of Canada in regard to the Transvaal. In order to deal with a question of this kind you must adopt the course of a surgeon dealing with a disease. If a cancer makes its appearance in the most remote extremity you will have to cut it off or you will have death resulting through the whole body becoming permeated. So, I say with this moral cancer existing in the heart of the government, you have no alternative but to cut off that cancer, to separate and dissever it from the body politic of Canada or it will result in the political death of the body that does not adopt such heroic means of treatment as those which are adopted by surgical operation. I am happy to say that nothing is so distasteful to me as to be compelled, by a sense of duty, to animadvert upon the conduct of any gentleman in this House or out of it. I want to turn to a subject of a much more agreeable character and to draw the attention of my right hon. friend to the fact that he, himself, personally, stood pledged and committed on this great question. When the right hon. gentleman was sitting alongside of the Prince of Wales, at the Imperial Institute, on the 18th of June, he made a very memorable, and, as usual, a most eloquent and most admirable speech, and I am very happy to say that, so far as I am able to judge, I take very little exception to a single word that the right hon. gentleman said. I want to draw his attention just now to what he did say on that memorable occasion of the Diamond Jubilee of the Empire, when British subjects from all over the empire were surrounding Her Majesty and vieing with each other in their devotion to the Crown and British institutions. He said :

My answer is this simply : Canada is a nation; Canada is free, and freedom is its nationality. Although Canada acknowledges the suzerainty of a sovereign power, I am here to say that independence can give us no more rights than we have at the present day.

I agree with the right hon. gentleman most fully and heartily in that statement, and a most important statement it is.

Lord Lansdowne has spoken of a day when, perhaps, our empire might be in danger—

A very curious coincidence that that suggestion should come at such a time from a gentleman who is now burdened with Imperial duties as Secretary of State for War.

England has proved at all times that she can fight her own battles, but if a day were ever to come when England was in danger, let the bugle sound, let the fire be lit on the hills, and in all parts of the colonies, though we might not be able to do much, whatever we can do shall be done by the colonies to help her.

That requires no comment; it speaks for itself; it is a volume in a word. It covers the entire case and I congratulate the right hon. gentleman upon having had his usually felicitous mood of dealing with important questions. Let me call attention to a speech made by Mr. Chamberlain in presence of the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), the sentiments in which speech will I am sure be endorsed by every member of this House. Mr. Chamberlain said :

The mighty fleet, of which we exhibited a portion to our visitors the other day, and those military preparations to which reference has been made, they are not a threat to other nations; they constitute no danger to our neighbours. They are the pledge we give to our colonies and to our dependencies that so long as they value their connection with us we will use all our resources in its defence. . . . The evidences that they have seen here will convince them that we are willing to make all the sacrifices that are necessary to maintain their honour and their interests as well as our own. I hope they will also take back with them the conviction that we sincerely entertain that the continued unity of the British Empire is the best guarantee for the peace and the civilization of the world.

I shall not comment on that, nor shall I quote the reply made by the Prime Minister, for that raises another issue which I do not intend to deal with now. While I am drawing attention to the eloquent speeches made by the Prime Minister—and all his speeches are eloquent—permit me to quote the following from a speech which he made at Sherbrooke so late as January, 1900:

We believed it our duty as a British colony to take part in the war, and to permit 2,000 Canadian volunteers to enlist in the English army and to fight for the mother country. We did it because we believed it our duty to do it, in response to the unanimous sentiments of the people of this country. We are a free country; ours is a constitutional government, and our duty is to put into execution the popular will, and the moment the popular will was known to us we had but one duty to discharge, and we discharged it of our free will. There was no power to constrain us to act as we did; but in the plenitude of our legislative independence, we had the right to reply to the popular will.

I quote this to show that the Prime Minister committed himself absolutely to the principle that under our constitution, the government should respond to the popular will. Let me say, that I do not dissent from a single word in that quotation. Sir, when I read the speech from the Throne, I was greatly delighted. I was pleased to believe that the government had bowed to the overwhelming—I shall not say unanimous expression of public opinion, because some of the Prime Minister's friends are dissentients—I say I was glad to find that the government bowed to the overwhelming public sentiment of all parties, of all classes, of all races and of all creeds in this country, in favour of the principle that Canada should bear all the expenses connected with the Canadian contingents. I found in the Governor General's speech that in deference to the unequivocal opinion of this country the government announced that provision would be made 'For the cost of equipping and paying the Canadian contingents.' I profess to have some little knowledge of the English language and that sentence seemed to say without qualification, that Canada was going to pay all the expenses of the contingents. When the news reached me that the government had wisely decided to offer a second contingent to Her Majesty's government, I was about to address a mass meeting of political friends as well as political opponents in the city of Vancouver. I told them there, that I had heard with great delight that the government had decided to send a second contingent, and I at the same time expressed the hope that when parliament met, the speech from the Throne would announce that all the expenses connected with our Canadian volunteers in South Africa, would be borne by the government. I stated then that I would only be too glad to give all the support in my power to such a policy. Sir, since then I spoke to one of the ministers—it is a public matter, and not confidential—and I said to him: There is no doubt about the statement in the speech from the Throne; Canada is to pay all the expenses; but to my great regret I found that this was a Delphian Oracle statement in the speech, and that it might mean one thing or the other. I believe, Sir, that the government never made a greater mistake than that. My right hon. friend has been good enough to favour me with some of the correspondence—there is, I believe, some which I have not yet seen—that was to be laid on the Table with reference to this matter; and amongst other papers, is the following telegram sent by Sir Wilfrid Laurier to Lord Stratheona:—

In view of discussions upon subject here, I desire to know definitely what is arrangement between British government and different Australasian colonies respecting pay of men serving on colonial contingents after landing in South Africa. Are colonies paying, in any case? Give details.

The following is Lord Stratheona's reply:—

Have communicated with colonial officer regarding your cable, 26th instant. Arrangement with Australasian colonies precisely same as with Canada. In no case are colonies paying their contingents after landing South Africa. New Zealand government offered to provide pay for their contingent, but Her Majesty's government were of opinion that arrangement by which pay at Imperial rates should be provided from Imperial exchequer from date of disembarkation South Africa should be applied all colonial forces. See Nos. 13 and 16, parliamentary paper, 16th November, 1899. Copies sent Secretary of State 15th ultimo.

I think there must be some little mistake there. I am quite aware that parliamentary papers Nos. 13 and 16 do propose on the part of New Zealand that they should pay, and that the British government suggests that it would be better to adopt the usual course of having the payment made by the Imperial government for service in the field. But, I want to draw the attention of my hon. friend to the fact that there was further correspondence on the matter. If the hon. gentleman will look at Nos. 82 and 92, he will find a very great change in that position. The Earl of Ranfurly, writing to Mr. Chamberlain, says:

THE PRIME MINISTER. At what page?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Page 2, despatch 82. Lord Strathcona refers to papers Nos. 13 and 16, which is a correspondence that took place a long time before. The Earl of Ranfurly says on September 29, 1899 :

I have the honour to inclose you a resolution passed by the House of Representatives on September 28.

On the declaration of the division, fifty-four in favour and five against, there was a scene of the greatest enthusiasm, the whole House rising and singing the National Anthem, followed by rounds of applause.

The same evening my Premier had an interview with me, asking me to cable the resolution and offer of services of two companies mounted rifles.

Each company is to consist of 100 rank and file and at least four officers.

The New Zealand government will provide outfit, transport to African port, rations and horse-feed en route, but on landing transport, rations and ammunition to be provided by the Imperial authorities.

This colony has no transport corps, or at the present moment, any of the ammunition proposed to be used there.

Tents can be sent, if desired.

The number of horses it is proposed to send for the two companies is 250.

The payment of the corps throughout will be made by the government.

The legislative council have passed a resolution approving of the resolution of the House of Representatives.

The resolution was passed by thirty-six votes to one against.

Now, if you turn to the answer to that despatch, you will find that there is not a word of objection raised on behalf of Her Majesty's government to the statement that New Zealand is going to bear the entire expenditure. It says:

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your despatch of the 29th September last, transmitting a resolution passed by the House of Representatives respecting the offer of a contingent of New Zealand Mounted Rifles for service in South Africa, and reporting the arrangements made for the composition and equipment of the force.

The patriotic enthusiasm with which the government and people of New Zealand have taken a share in the defence of Imperial interests in South Africa has been received with warm and sincere gratification by the government and people of this country; and the promptitude of the arrangements for the despatch of the contingent has been cordially recognized by the military authorities.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Now, Sir, I have read the speech made by my right hon. friend at Sherbrooke with the object of drawing his attention to the very sound statement which he made, declaring it to be the duty of a government to give effect to the undoubted wishes of the people; and I now want to draw his attention to the fact that I have had an opportunity within the last three months of addressing tens of thousands of people throughout this country—in the province of Nova Scotia, in the province of Quebec, in the province of Ontario, in the province of Manitoba, in the North-west Territories and in British Columbia—and on this question of Canada furnishing all the aid that is required by the mother country in the present great emergency and paying the entire cost of the same, there was not on a single occasion a dissentient voice. I had the pleasure of addressing thousands of the right hon. gentleman's friends, who will continue to be his friends, no doubt, because they are strong Liberals; and in the province of Quebec, where a large body of my hearers were French, and where I had the advantage of having my views fully explained to them by my French colleagues, there was the same unanimity of opinion that existed all over Canada. There was one undivided public sentiment that the honour and the interest of Canada alike required, that the entire expenditure connected with the aid given by the government of Canada to the British government in South Africa should be borne by Canada. I hope it is not too late yet. Threatened as my hon. friend no doubt is by the Minister of Public Works and by his contingent of revolters that he has got into a cave, I do hope it is not too late for my right hon. friend to reconsider that question. Down to the present hour I find no statement made by the government of any wish or desire that Canada should be permitted to bear the entire expenditure. But I say more. The right hon. gentleman knows that the press of the Conservative party is unanimous on that question. He knows that the Conservative press throughout Canada heartily and warmly endorses the policy of Canada doing all that is required and doing it thoroughly and completely, as eminently for our honour and in our interest. But, Sir, I take the press supporting the government, and what do I find? The Montreal Witness, a very strong supporter of this government, except in cases which are so monstrous that it is absolutely compelled to turn its back upon some particular act, on October 16, says:

There is one part of the arrangements as published which we do not like, and that is the statement that the Imperial government is to bear the whole cost of the contingent. Certainly, Canada, when she sends a contingent, should insist upon bearing, not a part, but the whole, of the expense. These are prosperous years for Canada—

Not like 1884 or 1885; but, as the hon. mover of the address pointed out, Canada never in her history was in a condition of such unbounded prosperity, and her people never were so rich as at the present moment; and no person rejoices in that more than I do——and it is a good time to begin to contribute to the cost of the maintenance of the empire. Canada should support her own contingent, no matter what it costs. We suppose the arrangement of the British government supporting the Canadian contingent is based upon the precedent in the case of the East Indies, which furnishes troops, but does not pay for them after they leave India. But Canada is one of the nations of the empire, and in an altogether different position from India.

But, Sir, what does the Globe say? The Globe of January 9 of this year had a statement of what it expected the speech from the Throne to contain; and it was supposed by some people to be an inspired statement, but this turned out not to be the fact. In that statement the Globe said:

Provision for full payment by Canada of the contingents of Canadian troops sent to South Africa and some more definite determination of the measure of our responsibility for the defence of the empire.

Returning to the subject on January 13, and referring to a criticism by the Star, the Globe said:

In the programme in question only one new subject is touched upon—the contingents of Canadian troops sent to South Africa, and there we declare our opinion that parliament should bear the full cost of these contingents. That has been our position ever since it was decided to send out a contingent and will continue to be our position.

That is from the organ of the government in the province of Ontario. Le Soleil, the right hon. gentleman's own organ in the city of Quebec, on January 3, said:

It seems to us that Mr. Laurier should yield to the current and announce in the speech from the Throne that Canada will pay all the expenses of her soldiers.

The Montreal Herald, which is known to be one of the strongest supporters of the government in the province of Quebec, on January 12, said:

There is little question but that parliament will authorize the payment of the entire expenses of the contingents Canada has given to the empire.

And the Free Press of this city says:—

The likelihood is that the Canadian government will propose, in the speech from the Throne, to bear all the expense of the contingent, including their full pay while in South Africa. This can only be done by the sanction of parliament, but, as it is already being urged by Sir Charles Tupper, the scheme is certain of practically unanimous approval. This would bear but lightly on Canada from the fact that even after paying for the men already sent to the Cape, the Finance Minister will have a surplus of several million dollars in his Budget speech. The plan is endorsed by the government's leading supporters.

I draw the attention of the hon. minister to that.

It being six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I was just, Mr. Speaker, before recess, concluding an appeal to my right hon. friend and endeavouring to show him that, in accordance with the principle propounded by him in his speech at Sherbrooke, it was the duty of the government to comply, in questions of this kind, with the unqualified sentiment of the great body of the people, and that I had no doubt he would find that preponderance of sentiment his justification for adopting a policy which, in my judgment, the honour and interest of Canada alike demand, namely, that the expenses of the Canadian contingents should be borne by the people of Canada. I drew the attention of my right hon. friend to the fact that not only had he the press of the Liberal-Conservative party, but the press of the most leading and influential sections of the Liberal party urged the carrying out of that policy; and I have had myself the opportunity of ascertaining, by addressing great meetings of the electorate in almost all the provinces of the Dominion, that on that question all parties, Liberal and Conservative, all races and creeds, were entirely in unison. Therefore, I think it very worthy the consideration of my right hon. friend, that he should take such a course as will meet the approval of the great body of the people.

There is another evidence, and it is one of the most striking that possibly has perhaps ever been exhibited in Canada. I now refer to the various charitable associations, the various associations of the public throughout Canada, in connection with the patriotic fund, and I think that the House will agree with me that there has never been in the history of Canada anything approaching the unanimous sentiment of all parties and all classes in exhibiting a desire to spend their money in doing everything possible to promote the comfort of our volunteers who have gone to represent Canada in South Africa. There can be no stronger evidence perhaps than when the people of large means and people of moderate means and people of small means are all ready, as has been shown throughout Canada in every section of the country, to come to the front and give their money and support to the utmost extent of their ability in doing everything possible to show how thoroughly Canada appreciates the conduct of her brave volunteers in going to promote the honour of Canada and maintain the integrity of the empire on the field of battle. I do not intend to press this point further, but will leave it to the consideration of my right hon. friend; but I do feel that if he wishes to be the exponent of the unqualified sentiment of Canada in every section of the country, he will take every means in his power to show that whether Her Majesty's government will accept the offer or not, Canada stands ready to provide all the expenditure connected with the maintaining of the Canadian force in South Africa. Anything short of that will entirely fail to meet the views of the country.

It is now apparent from the correspondence already down, that no proposal has ever emanated from Canada with regard to that matter. Her Majesty's government have never been pressed to permit Canada to discharge what I believe the overwhelming mass of the people regard as an imperative duty, alike demanded by the honour and interests of our country.

I shall say no more upon that subject, but I wish to draw the attention of the House for a few moments to one of the most extraordinary exhibitions that has perhaps ever been witnessed on the floor of the House of Commons of Canada or of any country where parliamentary government exists. I regard as one of the gravest constitutional scandals that this House, or any House where the British parliamentary system exists, has ever presented, the exhibition which we witnessed on the opening day of the session. What did we see? We saw a gentleman who had resigned his seat in this House on the ground that the government had so trampled the constitution under their feet, had so ignored every principle of constitutional government, that they were no longer deserving of support; and he felt bound, having been elected as one of their supporters, to go before his constituents and denounce their conduct, and defended every point of his case by quoting the absolute dicta of the Prime Minister himself and asked them to sustain him in thus abandoning the party he had been elected to support, and place him in a position to denounce their action on the floor of this House. Sir, can you show me, can any gentleman on the government benches or any gentleman in this House, show me a single instance, in any country where parliamentary government exists or where British institutions are established, in which a man took the extraordinary step of abandoning his party and appealing to his constituents against that party with any other object than that of coming back and driving them out of power if he could? Is it not making a perfect farce of everything like constitutional principles for a man to pretend to abandon the government he has been elected to support and ask his constituents to support his attitude of hostility to them, and then coming back as one of their supporters in the representative Chamber? Such a farce tends to bring everything like constitutional principles into perfect contempt with the House of Commons and with the whole people. What have we witnessed? We have witnessed the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) taking the very course I speak of. He took, apparently, a very independent, high-handed and dignified course. No doubt he did so under the direction of the members of this government, under the direction, as I believe, I do not hesitate to say, of the Minister of Public Works, and in order to strengthen the French position—not the Canadian French position but the French position—he had taken, and to prevent anything being done to show sympathy with Great Britain in the struggle with the Boers in which she is now entangled. This government was challenged in a most vital point, it was held up to public contempt all over this country by the hon. member for Labelle in a letter of resignation over his own signature, in which he declared that he had no course as an honest representative of the people but to turn his back upon them and turn them out of power. And what followed? This House witnessed a parliamentary and constitutional scandal that, I say, has no parallel in the history of Canada or the British Empire. A man has secured a verdict of his constituents in denouncing the action of the government as a violation of the constitution of the country—the highest crime of which any government can be guilty—The government not having even dared to take up the glove he threw down and put a supporter of their own in the field to defend the position they had taken—and when this man who has denounced them comes back with the unanimous endorsement of his people, the House witnesses the scandal of a Minister of the Crown introducing that man. The hon. member for Labelle, having triumphed over the government, having secured the condemnation of his government by the unanimous vote of his people, we find him introduced to this House by the Minister of Public Works, and sandwiched in between that hon. gentleman and the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Monet), who is denounced by the most influential portion of the French Canadian press as a thoroughly disloyal man, unentitled to the support of this country. It would not be exactly right to speak of them as arcades ambo, for there are three of them; but they are three well associated—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Mr. WALLACE. Three of a kind.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Three of a kind—yes; men who have taken a position in the face of this parliament calculated to bring upon themselves the utter contempt of every man who has any regard for constitutional government or parliamentary principle. And yet, Sir, we find this Minister of Public Works sitting behind the leader of the government after having introduced on the floor of this House and presented to you as a worthy member of this House a man who was sent here by the unanimous voice of his constituents to vote down this government for having trampled the constitution of Canada under their feet. This is a scandal, I say, such as we have never witnessed before, and I trust that, in the long future history of this country, such a scandal shall never be known again. If my right hon. friend has so completely lost his grasp upon the control of public affairs, if he has become so completely subordinate to any member of his government as to still retain that minister, he cannot hope from the intelligent people of this country or from the intelligent members of this House on one side or on the other anything but the contempt which must always fall upon a man occupying his high position who makes himself the vassal and tool of one who sits behind him.

I shall not say more upon that subject, but I have one more point to refer to in which the Minister of Public Works is interested, a subject to which I shall draw the attention of the House directly.

I am happy, however, to say that there is one paragraph in the speech from the Throne to which I give my most hearty approval, and it is this:

To every word of that, I subscribe most heartily. Never in the history of Canada has any Canadian done an act that reflects greater honour upon himself or one that establishes greater claim upon the confidence of his country than this noble and generous act of Lord Strathcona. Why, Sir, it puts to blush the action of the government. The government shrink, they hold back, they are only pressed from point to point by the power which alone appears to influence them—the upheaval of public sentiment all over this country, to which they are compelled to bow because their fate depends upon it. But in contrast with this we find this noble action of a great Scotch Canadian, a man of Scottish birth, who spent his boyhood and the prime of his life in Canada and became identified with Canada's greatest interests, a man whose princely generosity in the cause of suffering humanity is instanced in the enormous amount contributed by him to one of the finest and most magnificent hospitals in the world, the Royal Victoria Hospital in Montreal, a man whose princely benefactions to the great cause of education have raised an undying monument to his name and character in the city of Montreal, in connection with McGill College and the Strathcona Institute—I say that no act of his life, great and princely as his services have been to the people of Canada, will shine with greater lustre, and nothing he has done will be handed down from generation to generation as a more munificent and glorious act than this contribution of his own private means to pay the expenses of the equipment and transport of a regiment of cavalry to uphold the stability of the British Empire and the honour of Canada. I say that under these circumstances I rejoice to see that the government have made a fitting recognition of his claims to consideration by the tribute they have paid him in this speech from the Throne, every word of which I most heartily endorse. But there is another man whose name is not known but who is equally entitled to recognition at the hands of this government, there is a man who, comparing his means with those of Lord Strathcona, has done still greater service to Canada, and has shown even higher patriotism than Lord Strathcona: I need not say that I refer to the gentleman whose modesty will not permit me to disclose his name, but who enabled me, as representing him, to secure an insurance on the lives of the first contingent to the extent of a million dollars. Of this gentleman, whose act, however, I communicated to the government, as I felt it was in the interests of the country that it should be communicated, the government have not a word to say; but on the contrary the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) assails, and vilifies and traduces this gentleman, whose name stands in the shade. What does the Minister of Public Works say:

It is easy to play a farce as Sir Charles Tupper does at this moment in giving guarantees to insurance companies; but it is not thus that the future of this country is decided; it is not thus that a government that understands its duties decides and acts.

I say that if Canada and the colonies are called upon to take part in the wars of the empire they should have the right of representation and of voting in the Imperial councils.

Why should the hon. gentleman denounce as a farce, the munificent act of this gentleman on behalf of those brave soldiers who have gone out to do battle for the honour and interests of Canada and the empire, giving each one of them the assurance that if he falls in battle, as there is too much risk that he will, those depending upon him will not be left homeless and houseless? Where is there a man with a spark of patriotism in his breast, with a spark of manly sentiment in his bosom, that would undertake to vilify, and deride, and treat with contempt one of the most magnificent acts of private generosity that has ever been exhibited in the whole history of Canada? I say again, that in view of the private resources of the gentleman I refer to, no greater evidence has ever been given of genuine patriotism, when he felt that the honour and interest of Canada demanded that this contingent should be raised, and that the life of every one of its members should be insured against the casualties of war, and when, out of his own pocket, he paid for an insurance to the extent of a million dollars on the 1,000 men of the contingent. And yet, Sir, that gentleman is to be assailed and traduced by the Minister of Public Works, with the full knowledge of the Prime Minister of what had occurred, and with the official proof in his hands from the company that every one of those thousand men carried that insurance to the aggregate of one million dollars, Sir, the Prime Minister has not a word to say in reference to that gentleman, and why? Because, unfortunately, he is a friend of Sir Charles Tupper, there can be no other reason. What other reason could exist except that? I took care to place in the hands of the right hon. gentleman the following official statement from the company:—

Montreal, October 23, 1899.

To the Officers and Men of the Canadian contingent for the Transvaal:

As a result of negotiations for some time pending with this company, we have this day concluded an arrangement with Sir Charles Tupper, Bart., whereby he effects insurance to a limit of one million dollars upon the men of all ranks in the Canadian contingent going to Africa. To each officer and to each man, or to their heirs, the sum of $1,000 is to be paid by this company upon receiving satisfactory proof of death while engaged with the enemy in Africa, or death within thirty days of engagement, or for loss of both feet, or both hands, or both eyes. In case of loss of one hand, or one foot, or one eye, $500 will be paid.

It is desired, as far as practicable, before embarkation, that the names and home addresses of the officers and men be forwarded to the office of this company, 185 St. James Street, Montreal, by letter or wire, that they may be recorded in the company's books.

(Signed),

The Ocean, Accident and Guarantee Company, Limited,

ROLLAND, LYMAN & BURNETT,
General Managers.

An Hon. MEMBER. Oh, oh!

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is a subject of amusement, is it, to the hon. gentlemen opposite? There is the evidence for this House of whether the entire population of this country is heartily engaged in sustaining the action of this government; that burst of laughter is the evidence, backed up, as it is, by the insolent assault of the Minister of Public Works upon this transaction, there is the voice of his claqueurs trained to turn their scorn and contempt upon every man that will come to the aid of Canada and her troops. What is the position of the government upon this question? They entered into negotiations with an insurance company to insure the lives of that contingent to the extent of a million dollars, and I will read what the Globe newspaper, of October 28, said upon the subject:

ANOTHER MILLION OF INSURANCE.

Mr. G. H. Allen, of Kingston, inspector of agencies for the Standard Life Assurance Company, of Edinburgh, has been in the city for the past few days, and has completed an arrangement with the Dominion government for placing one million dollars' life insurance on members of the Canadian contingent who are going to the Transvaal. This will give one thousand dollars' insurance to the relatives or heirs of any officer or man who may die during their absence. The insurance will take effect from the time the contingent starts from Quebec, and will be paid on all parties who die from any cause. The government will pay the premiums. The secretary of the Standard Life, Mr. J. Hutton Balfour, arrived to-night to look over the arrangements which Mr. Allen has made and give his sanction to it. The insurance which Sir Charles Tupper negotiated, was merely for accidents, and it is understood will only take effect from casualties after reaching South Africa.

Now, Sir, what occurred? Every man of that thousand of brave and patriotic Canadians went off with the glowing language of the First Minister of the Crown in his ears, went off with his heart lightened and his feelings buoyant. He knew from the official announcement made by the organ of the government that an additional $1,000 had been placed on his life and that in case he lost it, those who depended upon him would not be left homeless and houseless. Where are these gentlemen who, with a burst of laughter, greeted the provision of $1,000 to meet the casualties of war, where are they when I point out to them the humiliating position in which this government, that they support, stand in relation to this question. With this announcement made, with every man carrying away with him the happy, delightful thought, that if his life were lost, his family would be provided for, to some extent, what would be their feelings upon reaching South Africa to find that this was a delusion, that this government, when they took up the question of insurance had not the ability to deal with it or to provide for the insurance of each man to the extent of $1,000, and who, when they found what it would cost them to do it, backed out of it, and when the organ of the government, after it had given this gratifying announcement, at which every man in Canada rejoiced, stated three days afterwards, on November 1, that 'there was no ground for the report recently published that the government are insuring the lives of the members of the contingent.' It is a tragedy, a tragedy of the deepest, blackest dye; it was a successful attempt to buoy up the contingent, who were going away with their lives in their hands to fight a British battle, with the joyous reflection that the government had come to their aid and that in case of death they would be provided with this additional insurance. But, they are told, in the most unfeeling manner that the government have backed out, that all the hopes that had been excited were false hopes ending in the same delusion that the promises of this government usually end in, in regard to anything they undertake to do. I will only say that I hope, when the hon. Minister of Public Works next has occasion to refer to this handsome, generous act of a private individual who was prepared, out of his own means and resources and at his own personal cost and who stands to-day pledged to an insurance of $1,000 for every man who loses his life or two limbs in that encounter, I hope that when he next deals with that subject he will remember the black, disreputable tragedy enacted by the government in allowing these people to go away feeling that they were provided for when they are afterwards told that it is a delusion and that there is not a single farthing provided by this government for those they left behind in case of death.

I want to return for a few moments, and for a few moments only, because I was sorry I had not the opportunity of concluding before the House rose, and I must ask the indulgence of the House for again being obliged to repeat it after coming back here, but I want for a few moments to draw the attention of the House to the position of Canada on this question. I have no better evidence to offer to the House than the evidence offered by the right hon. Prime Minister, when sitting alongside of the Prince of Wales, and when he declared that Canada was a great nation, that she was as independent a nation now as it was possible for a country to be, that she had every right and enjoyed every privilege that any independent nation, in any country in the world enjoyed, and he was quite right. Canada has reached, aye, and had reached that position before the right hon. gentleman occupied a position at the head of this government—Canada had reached a position in which she had the most absolute control of her own affairs and of the government of her country. Canada has committed to her care the northern half of this great continent of North America, and in my judgment, not the least valuable or important half. Canada has been endowed by nature with all these boundless resources. Canada bids fair—it is now every day being developed—to become one of the most important and wealthiest countries in the world. Canada has the northern half of this great continent under her control, she has boundless, inexhaustible treasures to add to her wealth and to develop it rapidly into a great country, and now that all the lines of communication of this country are established, and there is inter-communication from end to end she has reached the position in which she is going ahead, as the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Gould) said, by leaps and bounds. Whether you take her position in regard to the fisheries, in regard to her coast, in regard to her timber, in regard to her mineral resources, in regard to her soil, in regard to her climate—take the position of Canada from any standpoint and you cannot find, on the face of the globe, 5,000,000 of people, or 5,500,000, and I hope, approaching 6,000,000 of people, occupying a prouder, a more advantageous, or a more splendid position. She has the glory of British institutions; she offers a security for life and property which is alone to be found under British institutions. I will not say alone to be found under British institutions, but which will not be exceeded by any other institutions that human skill or sagacity has ever devised. That is the position she occupies. You cannot show me to-day, on the face of the globe, a population equal to the population of Canada, enjoying greater advantages or enjoying the blessings of greater wealth, greater prosperity or greater progress. That is the position we occupy. As to foreign aggression, every person knows that not a foreign foot can touch the soil of Canada, no finger from any foreign power can be placed upon a Canadian without we have, as I have already shown you, in the magnificent reference to it by the hon. Secretary of State for the Colonies, Mr. Chamberlain, in which he said, surrounded by the right hon. Prime Minister and the other premiers, that the great army and the unrivalled navies of England were not for aggression, but that they were evidence to the outlying portions of this great empire of their complete security and complete immunity from foreign aggression. Will you show me any people in any country in the world that enjoy these advantages on the terms that Canada enjoys them, with the most absolute, the most perfect, as the right hon. gentleman has stated, the most complete independence, enjoying everything that complete independence can give us and standing to-day as part of the British Empire. We have the fact that we are part of that great empire, under whose aegis all our rights and liberties are secured from foreign aggression. What is the position of any other country in the world compared with that of Canada? Countries, with the comparative resources and population of Canada, are borne down with heavy, onerous, oppressive taxation to sustain an army and a navy to protect them against foreign aggression. Under these circumstances where is the man to be found who will say that Canada, in this hour of her great prosperity, will shrink for one single moment from the duty imposed by the grandeur of our position, the strength of our position, will shrink for a single moment from standing by in the hour of her necessity that great empire, that great country, that gives us all this and absolutely for nothing. That great navy which is equal to the combined navies of the two other greatest maritime powers of the world; that great navy, as Mr. Chamberlain has shown, is always ready to come with speed across the Atlantic to the rescue of Canada, yet we are not called upon to contribute one dollar either to the army or the navy of England? This is the hour of England's need as every one must know who has witnessed the fearful cost of blood and treasure which England has been put to in the struggle in South Africa. Where is there a man to be found in Canada, who under these circumstances, would ask, that an additional penny be charged against the people of the British Isles for the maintenance of the forces sent by the Canadian government to aid the mother country in her necessity. When certain gentlemen speak of taxation without representation, do they know what they are talking about?

Mr. WALLACE. No they do not.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My hon. friend says they do not, and the people of Canada will agree that they do not. Do they know what they are talking about when they speak of taxation without representation? If the Parliament of Great Britain were to impose a single dollar of taxation upon the people of Canada for the support of the great navy which gives security to our commerce, that would be taxation without representation; but to tell me that the free parliament of Canada cannot vote the money of this country to help in her hour of need the great empire of which we are proud to form a part, is to tell me that which every person knows to be at variance with the facts.

And what about the constitutional question? We may be told that parliament did not vote the money. True. But under the constitution of England as in the constitution of Canada, what utter folly and absurdity it is to talk about violation of the constitution because parliament was not assembled to vote the money expended. We have the same system as the British parliament, namely: That while you must have the vote of parliament for the expenditure of all public moneys, there is the great exception, that whenever an unforeseen emergency arises, whenever the government feel they would be justified in taking the public money, leaving it to parliament to endorse their actions afterwards, they have the same power as in England to take that money in order to meet that emergency. To speak of this as a violation of the constitution is an absurdity. Even if my right hon. friend had not the resolution of the House of Commons and of the Senate of Canada,—and under circumstances where delay might be irreparable—he must have known what the public sentiment was, and he knew he had a perfect right according to the British parliamentary practice in force in Canada, to take from the public treasury what money was necessary to meet the unexpected conditions that had arisen, and to ask parliament to sustain his action afterwards. Has the Prime Minister any doubt as to what the fate of the Bill will be, which he proposes to introduce to indemnify the government for this expenditure? He had before him the overwhelming public sentiment of this country; he had before him the determination of free Canadians to rise superior to technical objections, he knew their determination to pay whatever expense might be entailed in order to help the mother country. The only doubt there can be is as to whether he will go far enough in his proposition to meet the views of the people of Canada. In the speech from the Throne, the Prime Minister has referred to Lord Strathcona in fitting terms, but there is a grave omission in that speech, for I can say here, that there are 2,500 Canadians who have done even more for the empire than Lord Strathcona has done. No person in this country has ever asked the government to impress a man for service in South Africa; no person has ever asked the government to take a member of the permanent force or a mounted policeman and send him to the Transvaal against his will. All that the people have asked is, that the government should avail of the services volunteered of their own free will by the gallant yeomanry of Canada and send them for the honour and integrity of the British Crown, and to do credit to this great colony. I say, Sir, that every man of those 2,500 Canadians who has offered his life for the defence of the British Empire, and for the honour and glory of Canada, is making a greater sacrifice than even Lord Strathcona, great as that gentleman's sacrifice has been. I thank the members of this House for the indulgence they have extended to me. I believe, Sir, that this is one of the gravest questions that has arisen in the history of Canada, I believe, Sir, that it is the gravest emergency that has perhaps ever presented itself to the British Empire, and for that reason I have confined my remarks exclusively to it, postponing the consideration of other questions until the government is pleased to submit their measures to the House. In view of the fact that this great Dominion is now enjoying unexampled progress and prosperity, and remembering the remarks made by the First Minister at Sherbrooke, I trust that the government will to the fullest extent meet this great patriotic upheaval of public sentiment throughout the Dominion of Canada, and leave nothing undone which will tend to reflect the highest honour on Canada, as a part of the great British Empire to which we are so proud to belong.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I am happy at the outset of this discussion to be able to join with the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) in congratulating the mover and seconder of this address. My hon. friend who has placed in your hands the motion now before the House has been selected by the West Riding of Ontario to take the place on the floor of this House of the hon. gentleman who, before you, Sir, discharged, and discharged with much acceptance, the high position of Speaker of the House of Commons of Canada. My hon. friend has shown that he is no unworthy successor of that hon. gentleman. The speech which he delivered was practical, lucid, to the point, and without any undue waste of words, a quality which, I am sure, ought to be duly appreciated in this House. My hon. friend who seconded the motion had been preceded in this House by the reputation of two hon. members, his close relatives, who, before him, represented the riding of Chambly and Verchères. Such is the fleeting motion of time in this feverish age that perhaps there are but few members of this House who remember the late Mr. Felix Geoffrion in his early days, before he had been stricken down with the dread disease from which he never fully recovered; but those who remember him will gladly testify that in his brighter days he was one of the brightest ornaments of this House. As to his successor in the representation of the riding, the late Mr. Alphonse Geoffrion, I am sure his memory is and will ever be held green in the hearts of those who came in contact with him. His great ability, his genial qualities, his kindness of heart, were such as will never be forgotten by any who had the privilege of his acquaintance and still less of his friendship. My hon. friend has shown himself a true scion of that gifted family, and will continue in this House the traditions left by the two gentlemen whose name he has the honour to bear.

May I be permitted also to offer my congratulations to the hon. leader of the opposition. I have been anticipated in this very pleasant duty by my hon. friend from Chambly and Verchères. My hon. friend, with the acceptance of this side of the House, and I am sure with the still greater acceptance of the other side, congratulated the House in general, and my hon. friend in particular, upon the fact that we see him at the opening of this session, still hale, hearty and vigorous; and we all appreciate the great efforts he is making for his party, and in his own opinion, for his country at his time of life. Long may he enjoy a green old age; and, if I am to speak still more intimately, for myself and for those for whom perhaps, I may claim the privilege to speak, long may he continue to adorn the seat he now occupies and from which he may still thunder forth his denunciations of the government. May I likewise be permitted to offer him another compliment, if he will accept it from me? May I be permitted to offer him the congratulations of this side of the House at least, upon the happy and novel feature which he has introduced in his speech to-day. If it were not out of place and if I might be critical without offence, perhaps I might be pardoned for saying that my hon. friend has never particularly cultivated the art of condensation. He has always relied more for effect upon reiteration and emphasis than upon concentration. Last year, upon a similar occasion, though the subjects we had to deal with, were not of the same character of importance as the subject we have to deal with at this time, my hon. friend occupied very nearly five hours of the time of the House to tell his thoughts to his fellow-members. Upon this occasion my hon. friend would have got through within two hours had it not been for the insistence of his friends beside and behind him; but on their insistence he took three hours, in spite of this. I congratulate him upon the good example he has given to his followers; and, if his followers profit by that example, we may perhaps hope to conclude the session in some reasonable space of time.

My hon. friend has consecrated the whole of his speech to the question of our policy and our conduct in regard to the war in Africa. I quite approve of the conduct of my hon. friend in this particular. Certainly there never was before the Canadian parliament a more important question. It is important in itself, important in its incidents, important in its causes, important in its possible consequences. I would have preferred if my hon. friend had approached the question in a more judicial and calmer spirit than he has done. My hon. friend has been in turn severe and somewhat patronizing. He has approved and he has blamed our course. I am not indifferent, I may be pardoned for saying, to the kind things he has said of us—of me in particular; but I can afford to lay them aside to come rather to the severe things which he has said of myself and the government in general. If I may now analyse the criticisms which have been offered by my hon. friend on this occasion upon the policy followed by the government, they can be summed up under two heads. He approved of what we did, but he found fault with the manner in which we did it. He approved of our policy and our action, but he found fault with us for two particular circumstances. He found fault with us because, as he said, we were not prompt enough in acting—we were too slow; and he found fault with us because we had not done enough—we should have done more. Let me now examine the criticisms of my hon. friend. As to the first, my hon. friend says that we have been very slow in acting—that we did right in the end, but that it took us a long time to do our duty. Sir, we were slow to move—this is the charge which my hon. friend brings against us. I do not see that any man can properly find fault with us for having reflected and weighed before we came to a conclusion. It was due to the country at large, whose interests were entrusted to our hands, that we should not move hastily, but only after due consideration. Simply by showing the facts as they are, it will be easy for me. I am boastful enough to say, to show that there is absolutely nothing in the charge of the hon. gentleman. I take the essence of the charge as he laid it before the House, and what was it? The charge which the hon. gentleman brought against us was that we had not moved until public opinion had spoken its will in no uncertain tones. Did the hon. gentleman expect that we should do anything else? Will the hon. gentleman tell us, when we had no parliamentary appropriation, that it would have been in order or permissible for us constitutionally to take money from the public treasury and lead the country into military expenditure unless we had behind us the strong verdict of public opinion. But Sir, that is the contention of my hon. friend, and he only shows how incongruous are his ideas of responsible government; this is a responsible government. This is a constitutionally governed country; this is a government of the people for the people. We have no power here but the power which is vested in us by the people. We have no authority but the authority which is vested in us by the people. We have no mission but the mission confided to us by the people. And the hon. gentleman knows very well that there is only one way, under constitutional government, by which the people can speak, and that is by the voice of their representatives in parliament assembled. There is this difference between the Australian colonies and the Canadian parliament, that in the month of September and October, when the war broke out, the Australian colonies had their legislatures in session and could act immediately. But the parliament of Canada was not in session. It had been in session a few months before, and had made no appropriation for the event of war, although at the time a war was contemplated and known to be possible. There is this to be remembered, that the unfortunate condition of things which existed in South Africa was not unknown in this country. It had been known for a great many years. It had reached the acute stage, and we knew it, and it engaged the attention of this House. During last session parliament took the matter under consideration and voted a resolution of sympathy for the Outlanders and expressed the hope that their grievances would be remedied, but parliament never made an appropriation for the carrying on the war, supposing a war were to take place. The thing was pending, it was mentioned across the floor, but no appropriation was ever made; and I repeat that unless we had a strong mandate behind us of public opinion, it would have been criminal in us to plunge our hands into the public treasury, however worthy the motive might have been.

When the conduct of the people of the Transvaal made it clear that they were seeking war, and when the ultimatum of President Kruger aroused a storm of indignation all over British-speaking countries, from that moment not one hour was lost, and in three weeks from that day our volunteers were on the ocean. Sir, the hon. gentleman has held it a crime in us that before taking such an important departure in our colonial history, or, as I should say, in our national history, we should have thought and reflected and pondered as to what was to be done. But the reptile press of this country which supports hon. gentlemen opposite, that reptile press which has done so much reptile work in this connection, endeavoured to sow the seeds of discord, endeavoured to impugn our motives and attributed our delay to motives which are too low to be mentioned here. I tell the hon. gentleman that one of the things which made us ponder and reflect as to what should be our course in this matter is the very opinions held by himself, and more than once, as to the advisability of the colonies taking part in a war of the motherland. He repeated this afternoon the words I spoke in England two years ago, when I said that Canada was a nation perfectly independent, that the lien of the empire over us did not weigh the weight of one feather, but that we were just as independent to-day, under the suzerainty of England, as we could be if absolutely independent. And I said likewise that if England at any time were engaged in struggle for life and death, the moment the bugle was sounded or the fire was lit on the hills, the colonies would rush to the aid of the mother country. When I said this, I did not speak only my own mind or the mind of my hon. friend, but the mind of every Canadian. There are no two opinions upon that point. But while every Canadian admits that he would be ready to contribute our treasure and our blood, and the resources of Canada at the disposal of this country, for the rescue of England, were she engaged in a life and death struggle, there are many Canadians who are not ready to take part in the secondary wars of England or to contribute to the defence of the empire in any part of it. Amongst the men who have taken that view, amongst those who have stated, time and time again, that it would not be fit for Canada to take part in the secondary wars of England or to contribute to the defence of the empire at large, one of the most, if not the most eminent, is my hon. friend who leads the opposition. My hon. friend has spoken more than once upon this subject. He has written upon this subject. He has not been content to wait to discuss this question until it arose, but went to the trouble of writing to the press and the higher magazines in order to educate public opinion and to show what should be the true position of Canada in this respect.

In an article published in the Nineteenth Century, October, 1892, under the title 'Federating the Empire,' my hon. friend, under his own name, discussed this very question we are now discussing, and thus spoke of it:

And now comes the next question, that of defence. No one can fail to see how advantageous it would be for England to appear before the world with the knowledge, on the part of every foreign country, that she was not standing alone, but acting with the united influence and support of these great British dominions which, at no distant day, will have a population larger than that of Great Britain. The moral weight and the prestige thus given would be considerable, but the means of concerting united action for the defence between those outlying portions of the empire and the government of the day here would be the most effective and practical method by which they could aid and support each other.

Many persons, I am aware, both in the colonies and here, have looked upon the question of the defence of the empire as best promoted and secured by a direct contribution to the support of the army and navy of this country. That I regard as a very mistaken opinion, and I believe that there is a much more effective means of promoting the object in view. In my opinion, no contribution to the army and navy of England on the part of Canada would have contributed to the defence of the empire in a greater degree than the mode in which the public money in Canada has been expended for that purpose. We have expended, in addition to an enormous grant of land, over a million pounds sterling per annum, from the first hour that we became a united country down to the present day, in constructing a great Imperial highway across Canada from ocean to ocean, not only furnishing the means for the expansion of trade and the development of Canada, but providing the means of inter-communication at all seasons between the different parts of the country. Louis Riel and a mere handful of half-breeds were able to terrorize the whole of the North-west of Canada in 1870 for half a year, until the arrival of Lord Wolseley, who occupied three months in reaching that place after the spring opened. Lord Wolseley could now perform the same journey within two days. On the last occasion in which a rising occurred, in 1885, but ninety miles of the Canadian Pacific Railway remained incomplete. In twenty-four hours 4,000 men had volunteered from every part of Canada to go at once to the North-west, and the disturbance was quelled without calling upon this country for the slightest assistance. We have, therefore, not only provided the means of inter-communication, the means of carrying on our trade and business, but have also established a great Imperial highway which England might to-morrow find almost essential for the maintenance of her power in the east. Not only has Canada furnished a highway across the continent, but it has brought Yokohama three weeks nearer to London than it is by the Suez Canal. I give that as an illustration that there are other means which, in my judgment, may contribute much more to the increased strength and the greatness of the empire than any contribution that could be levied upon any of the colonies.

That was not all. In 1893, my hon. friend published a letter in the Toronto Mail, addressed to Mr. Casimir Dixon, Secretary in Canada of the Imperial Federation League. That letter was as follows:—

Victoria Chambers, 17 Victoria St., London, S.W., January, 1893.

To Casimir Dickson, Esq.:

My dear Sir,—The pressure of important questions which I could not defer has prevented me dealing earlier with your letter of November last. When you remember that the Council of the Imperial Federation League embraces many strong free traders, you will see how impossible it must be at once to obtain unanimity in a proposal for preferential duties within the empire, and how important it was to obtain from all the committee what is contained in sections 36-37 of the report. The policy of the United Empire Trade League, which has received the support of the House of Commons, and of your branch, is making very steady and great progress in this country, and will, I believe, be adopted at no distant day. It is impossible to effect such a revolution in public opinion in this conservative country without much time and patience. Knowing, as I do, that the most active members of the Imperial Federation League were mainly intent on levying a large contribution on the revenues of the colonies for the support of the army and navy of Great Britain, I am delighted to have been able, almost single-handed, to obtain such a report from such a committee. Unfortunately, they captured Mr. Parkin, and, having used him here, are now using him in Canada to create the false impression that we do nothing to maintain the defence of the empire, instead of showing, as he truthfully could, that we have entitled ourselves to the gratitude of every man who has the interest of the empire at heart.

Yours faithfully,
CHARLES TUPPER.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read some more.

The PRIME MINISTER. I shall be very glad to gratify hon. gentlemen who want more of that kind of literature. There was a meeting here, about two years ago, of the British Empire League. Sir Charles Tupper is reported to have spoken as follows at that meeting. I read from the Mail of March 11, 1898 :—

'Before sitting down,' said Sir Charles, 'I must take exception to some statements which the chairman has put before the meeting. No person will go further than I will in joining with every man and every class in this country in adopting such a policy as will unite the component parts of the British Empire, but I do not think it is wise, or in the interest of the object we all have in view, to present as you have presented to-day, the attitude of Canada as the utterly humiliating attitude of not doing her duty in showing that she is prepared to shoulder her responsibilities and her obligations in reference to this matter. I am very sorry that on this occasion you have referred to Sir Michael Hicks-Beach's speech.

'I say that the menace contained in that speech on a recent occasion of Sir Michael Hicks-Beach is not only grossly unjust to Canada, but is not calculated to promote the object we have in view. The question has been fought out and discussed very fully before the British public. A very insignificant section of the Imperial Federation League, as you know, headed by Sir John Colomb, and a young man who was acting as secretary, broke up the Imperial Federation League on this very question. They did so on a demand that the British colonies should either consent to contribute substantial support to the Imperial navy, or should leave. That position was met by other gentlemen and myself, who did not believe they had any warrant for adopting such a policy. At present we only want 30 cents a head on defence, which is a very small amount, less than a man pays for an evening newspaper.

'What are the facts? In 1865 a delegation of Canadian statesmen went to England, consisting of Mr. George Brown, Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir George E. Cartier and Sir Alexander Gait. These gentlemen went from Canada to arrange with the Imperial government the measure of our mutual contribution for Imperial service, and the Imperial government on that occasion reduced the matter to writing. Although the despatch was held to be confidential, it has been long known to the world. It was that if Canada would agree to spend a million dollars per annum on her militia, England was prepared, with all the power of her empire, to maintain the interest and the security of Canada on every occasion. That which was reduced to writing has been done. Canada not only has lived up to the obligations assigned to her, but has done vastly more. (Loud applause.) In addition to providing a militia force, she has built the Canadian Pacific Railway without a dollar of contribution from Imperial funds. (Applause.) And what does Mr. Chamberlain tell you? He tells you that the construction of that great inter-oceanic highway, by which England is able to man her fleets in the Pacific, has enormously increased the importance of the mother country, and has conferred an inestimable boon upon her. (Applause.)

Now, Sir, these are commentaries of the hon. gentleman himself upon the proposition he had laid down in the magazine article I have just read that Canada had fully discharged her duty to the empire by what she had done in building the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Intercolonial Railway, and by providing for defence. My hon. friend has changed his mind—

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

The PRIME MINISTER. It is of little use to argue with gentlemen who say 'no' after hearing the opinions I have just read. He said that Canada had discharged fully the duties she owed to the empire. If my hon. friend has changed his mind, I have no fault to find with him. If he thinks that, in 1889 Canada was in position to do what she could not do before, I have no fault to find. We hear much of the growing wealth of Canada and her increasing strength, and that consequently she could act more effectively than she has done in the past, not only in the way of railway expenditure but in the matter of military equipment. Again I say, I have no fault to find with my hon. friend. But he should not be so severe on others, he should remember that not every man can turn a corner as sharply as he can. My hon. friend changed his mind and his course of action, and on the 4th of October sent me the following telegram :

If war is declared I hope you will send a Canadian contingent of volunteers to aid England in the Transvaal. I know it will be warmly welcomed by the British government, and be of great service to Canada in promoting the unity of the empire. A friend of mine will insure their lives and limbs at his own expense to a million dollars. I will heartily support in parliament your action in this matter.

Sir, this was a new departure in the policy of my hon. friend; but great as is his position in this country, he is only one out of five or six million people; great as is his place in this country, valuable as is his opinion, I would not be willing to base my own opinion upon his alone. I attached considerable importance to the views formerly held by him on this subject. But I am free to say that whilst I cannot admit that Canada should take part in all the wars of Great Britain, neither am I prepared to say that she should not take part in any war at all. I am prepared to look upon each case upon its merits as it arises; and when I considered the object for which Great Britain was fighting, when I remembered that the primary cause of the war was the refusal by the government of the Transvaal to the Uitlanders of those privileges of equal rights which we enjoy in this country, when I saw the enthusiasm manifested by the people in all parts of Canada, then and there I made up my mind, we decided to send a contingent, and it was sent immediately.

My hon. friend has recalled the opinion which I expressed in the Globe, and after reading that opinion he triumphantly and exultantly exclaimed that the government had been strongly condemned for that opinion. Now, I will try the logical powers of my hon. friend on this question. During all the summer the problem of war and peace was trembling in the balance of fate. Many were the hopes that peace would prevail, and many were the fears that war would ensue. During all this time offers were reaching the War Office of aid from all the colonies, asking for the privilege to serve the Queen in the war which was impending. Just about the date that my opinion appeared in the Globe, the Colonial Office issued a circular, not to Canada alone, but to all the colonies, stating the conditions under which aid would be accepted from the colonials. The despatch which I referred to is dated on October 3, and is addressed to Canada, to New South Wales, to South Australia, in fact to all the Australian colonies. That despatch reads as follows—

Secretary of State for War and Commander-in-Chief desire to express high appreciation of signal exhibition of patriotic spirit of people of Canada shown by offers to serve in South Africa, and to furnish following information to assist organization of force offered into units suitable for military requirements. Firstly, units should consist of about 125 men; secondly, may be infantry, mounted infantry or cavalry; in view of numbers already available, infantry most, cavalry least serviceable; thirdly, all should be armed with 303 rifles or carbines, which can be supplied by the Imperial government if necessary; fourthly, all must provide own equipment, and mounted troops own horses; fifthly, not more than one captain and three subalterns each unit. Whole force may be commanded by officer not higher than major. In considering numbers which can be employed, Secretary of State for War guided by nature of offers, by desire that each colony should be fairly represented, and limits necessary if force is to be fully utilized by available staff as integral portion of Imperial forces; would gladly accept four units. Conditions as follows: Troops to be disembarked at port of landing, South Africa, fully equipped at cost of colonial government or volunteers. From date of disembarkation Imperial government will provide pay at Imperial rates, supplies and ammunition, and will defray expenses of transport back to Canada, and pay wound pensions and compassionate allowances at Imperial rates. Troops to embark not later than October 31, proceeding direct to Cape Town for orders. Inform accordingly all who have offered to raise volunteers.

Now, Sir, when this despatch reached Canada, His Excellency the Governor General was absent in New York. I had an engagement that took me to Chicago, I came back from Chicago on the 12th, we took up the question that very day, and two days afterwards we issued an order offering our first contingent. Now, why did we do that? True, the action which we took was contrary to the opinion which I had given in the Globe that we had no appropriation and ought not to move without the sanction of parliament. We did not call parliament first of all for this reason: The cost of the contingent proposed at that time was so limited that to call parliament in special session would have been more expensive than the cost of the contingent.

Moreover, public opinion was then speaking in such energetic tones that there was no misunderstanding it, and we felt warranted in undertaking the expenditure, relying upon parliament to indemnify the government and to sanction our illegal action in that respect. This was on October 14, and on October 30 our contingent sailed from Quebec. Certainly, to those who were present it was a most impressive scene, it was a most impressive moment—that moment when, from the walls of old Quebec, the scene of the last great conflict between the two races in the last century, the two races now happily reconciled, Canada bade farewell to those men who were going to fight for those principles which applied here, made them the happy citizens of a free and united country.

The hon. gentleman has referred to what I said of the Militia Act. I am still of the opinion that we could not have acted under the Militia Act. We did not apply the Militia Act, we were not bound to apply it, because, under the terms of the despatch which I have just read, we could not apply it to our volunteers. The moment they landed in South Africa they became British soldiers, they did not go as part of the Canadian militia, but they went as full British soldiers, with the full quality of Tommy Atkins.

Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman having taken up this position, has blamed me somewhat in his speech this afternoon for having been, as he said, rather lukewarm—I do not exactly remember the word he used at this moment, but it conveyed the impression that I had been lukewarm in regard to the war, that I had not been enthusiastic. Sir, I have no hesitation in admitting that I was not enthusiastic for that war, or for any war. I have no sympathy for that mad, noisy, dull-witted and short-sighted throng who clamour for war, who shouted 'On to Pretoria,' who complacently prophesied that General Buller would eat his Christmas dinner in the capital of the Transvaal. War is the greatest calamity that can befall any nation, and if ever there was a calamitous war it is this one. The uncertainties of war must always make men shudder who take the responsibilities of entering into it. Sir, I have no hesitation in admitting that I entertained a strong hope that the old historic associations which, in the 16th and 17th centuries, bound together in Europe the Dutch race and the English race, would prove sufficiently powerful to keep the peace; I strongly hoped that the Dutch and English races which have done so much for civilization and for freedom, would be able to patch up their differences in Africa, and so continue the work of civilization and freedom in that continent. I deprecated the war because I have long been of the opinion, as a result of the thought I have been able to give to the problems which now face the British government in Africa, that the only solution of those problems is a confederation of the Dutch States and the English States, after the pattern of our Canadian confederation. I was of the opinion that if, unfortunately, war were to break out, as it has broken out, that grand scheme would inevitably be postponed, and, perhaps, it might be for ever killed. That was the reason why I was not enthusiastic for the war; that was the reason I did not move as hastily as my hon. friend would have me do. But the moment it appeared to me that the people of the Transvaal would not grant the equal rights which British people in that country had a right to expect, then, Sir, I felt no longer any hesitation, my mind was made up, because I saw there was nothing else to do but to prosecute the war to the bitter end.

Sir, the hon. gentleman has attempted to be very severe upon us to-day, but, he has forgotten, or passed over lightly, the only weak point as to which our position is weak. From the constitutional point of view our position is weak, from the constitutional point of view our position might be absolutely indefensible. In fact, there is no defence for it. We are without the law; our only justification is what I said a moment ago that we knew, that, in acting as we did against the provision of constitutional government, we were simply carrying out what was the desire and the will of the Canadian people. Had it not been for that, had it not been that we had with us the whole of the Canadian people, without the distinction of race or creed, had it not been that we had with us the great majority of our fellow-countrymen, our action would have been simply indefensible, but we relied on the fact that we well knew, from all the evidence we had, from the evidence of the action of my hon. friend himself, from the evidence of the press, of public meetings, from all the modes by which public opinion can express itself, we well knew that in acting as we did we were simply carrying out the will of the Canadian people. In passing the Order in Council which we did we put a restriction upon it. The hon. gentleman has found fault with it, and it is just as well that the matter should be threshed out here and now. When we decided to send the first contingent to South Africa we passed the following Order in Council:—

The Committee of the Privy Council have had under consideration a despatch, dated October 3, 1899, from the Right Hon. Mr. Chamberlain.

The Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, to whom the said despatch was referred, observes that the Colonial Secretary, in answer to the offers which have been sent to him from different parts of Canada expressing the willingness and anxiety of Canadians to serve Her Majesty's government in the war which for a long time has been threatening with the Transvaal Republic, and which, unfortunately, has actually commenced, enunciates the conditions under which such offers may be accepted by the Imperial authorities. Those conditions may be practically summed up in the statement that a certain number of volunteers, by units of 125 men, with a few officers, will be accepted to serve in the British army now operating in South Africa, the moment they reach the coast, provided the expenses of their equipment and transportation to South Africa are defrayed, either by themselves or by the colonial government.

The Prime Minister, in view of the well known desire of a great many Canadians who are ready to take service under such conditions, is of opinion that the moderate expenditure which would thus be involved for the equipment and transportation of such volunteers may readily be undertaken by the government of Canada without summoning parliament, especially as such an expenditure, under such circumstances, cannot be regarded as a departure from the well-known principles of constitutional government and colonial practice, nor construed as a precedent for future action.

I believe that these were wise words and saving words, to say that this action should not be a precedent for future action. It could not be a precedent for future action, certainly from the colonial point of view.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the number of that?

The PRIME MINISTER. No. 93. But, I will go further, and I will say that not only from the British constitutional point of view it is not to be construed as a precedent, but that even from the colonial point of view it is not to be construed as a precedent. If the result of our action were to be, that in any war of Great Britain, we were to be constrained to take a part, as upon this precedent, I would strongly object. What we have done we have done, as I said at Sherbrooke, in the plenitude, in the majesty of our colonial, legislative independence. I claim for Canada this, that, in future, Canada shall be at liberty to act or not act, to interfere or not interfere, to do just as she pleases, and that she shall reserve to herself the right to judge whether or not there is cause for her to act. In the words of Rudyard Kipling I repeat:—

Daughter am I in my mother's house,
But mistress in my own;
The gates are mine to open,
The gates are mine to close.

That is the position we have taken upon this question. We are independent, as I said in London, absolutely independent, and though we are ready, and though we hope that condition shall never rise, if that condition shall arise we shall act in regard to it just as we have done upon this occasion, consider, reflect, think, weigh, and if we think that there is cause for interference we shall interfere. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman found fault with the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bonrassa), because the hon. member for Labelle did not see eye to eye with us upon this question, and the hon. gentleman found great fault with me because I had not offered any opposition to the hon. member for Labelle. The hon. member for Labelle and I agree upon many questions; we differ upon this one question, but my hon. friend, the hon. leader of the Opposition, differs with the hon. member for Labelle on every question, this one included. If it was criminal, if it was impolitic—I do not know how to qualify it—but if it was criminal on my part not to offer any opposition to the hon. member for Labelle, what language shall I find strong enough to qualify the action of the hon. leader of the opposition. I need not come to the rescue of the hon. member for Labelle; he is quite able to take care of himself even against so formidable an opponent as the hon. leader of the opposition.

The main point of my hon. friend's attack upon us is that we have not done enough, that in this matter, in his opinion, we have been remiss in our duty because we should have provided for the whole payment of our volunteers whilst they are in Africa and not allow the British government to pay one single cent. I must say that I have been surprised at the mildness of the criticism of my hon. friend upon this subject. I had expected an amendment upon this question. I have read the speeches of my hon. friend—I cannot say that I have read every one of the fifty-six speeches that he delivered when he was in the West, but I have read a good many of them.

An hon. MEMBER. They are all alike.

The PRIME MINISTER. Well, then, I read them all, in that respect. But, I know that there was the same tone to every one of them, and that the pledge was given to the people that if, at the opening of the session the government did not provide for the payment of the volunteers while in South Africa, the hon. gentleman would bring down a resolution condemning the government and stating the opinion of himself and his friends that parliament should provide for the payment of the troops while they are in Africa. My hon. friend has not been up to his word in this matter; he has not carried out his pledge. He is a man of broken pledges, not a government of broken pledges, but a man of broken pledges in this matter. Whatever may be his motive I do not know. Yes, I know; the position he has taken is absolutely untenable and I will give to my hon. friend the reason why we do not propose to ask parliament, as we will not ask parliament, to pay the volunteers while they are in Africa. It is not a question of money; having taken the position which ye have taken, having decided to come, if I may say so, to the rescue of England, having decided to do our best to help England fight her battles, a few dollars more or less, would not count.

The reason why we have not provided and do not ask parliament to provide for the payment of the troops is, that the question has to be approached from a higher than a purely Canadian ground. The reason why we took this course, I can tell my hon. friend, is because of this very Imperial ground of which he talks so much but of which he apparently understands so little. The following are the colonies which have tendered their services to Great Britain: Queensland, Victoria, The Malay States, Lagos, New South Wales, Hong Kong, New Zealand, Western Australia, Tasmania, South Australia and Canada. All these offers have not been accepted. The offer of Lagos has not been accepted and the offer of the Malay States has not been accepted; in fact the offers of the Crown colonies have not been accepted and the only offers accepted are those of the self-governing colonies. It is notorious that all these colonies do not occupy the same financial position, the financial position of some being stronger than others, and the British government probably took that into consideration. At all events the British government laid down a rule which would apply equally to all British colonies whether their financial position was strong or whether it was weak. They laid down the rule that no one colony should have more glory than another, that all should be upon an equal footing, and in the despatch which came to us and which was issued to all the colonies, they determined that the colonies should be allowed to provide for the pay and equipment of the troops up to the time they landed in Africa; but that from that day they would become incorporated with the British Army and be paid by the Imperial authorities. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) knows very well that this is the rule laid down by the Imperial authorities after due consideration. New Zealand passed a resolution on the 28th of September which is summarized in the Blue Book which has been brought down as follows:—

Resolution passed by a large majority of House of Representatives with great enthusiasm, that offer to Imperial government for service in Transvaal contingent Mounted Rifles; that in the event of offer being accepted, my government is empowered, after selection by commander forces, to provide, equip, despatch forces. Two full companies mounted, fully equipped, delivered direct wherever desired at short notice. Transport and pay defrayed by New Zealand, Imperial government to provide supplies on arrival.

Remark the words "transport and pay defrayed by New Zealand." On the 3rd October the following despatch was sent from the Colonial Office:—

(Telegram.)

Referring to your telegram 22nd September, Secretary of State for War and Commander-in-Chief highly appreciate signal exhibition of patriotic spirit of people of Queensland, desire that mounted infantry offered by colony be organized in two companies, 125 men each, armed with 303 rifles or carbines, with their own horses, but rifles or carbines can be supplied if necessary by Imperial government. Not more than one captain and three subalterns each company. Officer not higher than major may command whole force. Troops to be disembarked at port of landing South Africa, fully equipped at cost of colonial government. From date of disembarkation force is to be treated as integral portion of Imperial forces. After that date Imperial government will provide pay at Imperial rates, supplies and ammunition, and defray expenses of transport back to colony, and pay wound pensions and compassionate allowances at Imperial rates.

Now, Sir, that is not all. As soon as the rules of the House permit I will lay on the Table another paper bearing directly upon this subject. On the 2nd of October the War Office issued to the Colonial Office the following despatch :—

War Office, London, S.W.,
October 2, 1899.

Sir,—In view of the many offers of troops for co-operation with Her Majesty's forces in South Africa which have been made, either officially by colonial governments on behalf of their colonies, or unofficially by officers and gentlemen on behalf of bodies of men whom they know to be willing to serve, the Secretary of State for War will be obliged if the Secretary of State for the Colonies will express to both the government and the individuals concerned his gratification at the fact that such offers have been made. The Secretary of State for War and the Commander-in-Chief highly appreciate this signal exhibition of the patriotic spirit by which Her Majesty's colonial subjects are animated.

Lord Lansdowne would also submit for transmission to the proper quarters such information as may assist in the organization of the troops thus offered into units suitable to the military requirements of the situation. Such requirements and the conditions necessary to fulfil them can best be indicated in outline, leaving details for further consideration and arrangement.

After giving details of organization and arms, the despatch goes on to state :—

Conditions of pay, pension, transport, &c.:

Whilst noting the generous offer by the government of New Zealand to furnish pay in addition to transport Lord Lansdowne is of opinion that the same conditions should be applied in the case of each colony, viz.:

Every colonial force should be landed at the port of debarkation in South Africa fully equipped at the cost of the colonial government or other body furnishing the force.

The Imperial government to provide from that date pay at Imperial rates, supplies and ammunition and to defray the cost of transport back to the colony when the services of the force are no longer required. Wound pensions and compassionate allowances to be paid by the Imperial government at Imperial rates.

You see, Mr. Speaker, that these rules were laid down by the War Office after mature consideration, and they were not at all the result of accident. My hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) called my attention, this afternoon to the despatch of the Colonial Office to Earl Ranfurley in which the offer is apparently accepted without any qualification. It reads as follows :—

Downing Street, November 10, 1899.

My Lord,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your despatch of September 29 last, transmitting a resolution passed by the House of Representatives respecting the offer of a contingent of New Zealand Mounted Rifles for service in South Africa, and reporting the arrangements made for the composition and equipment of the force.

The patriotic enthusiasm with which the government and people of New Zealand have taken a share in the defence of Imperial interests in South Africa has been received with warm and sincere gratification by the government and people of this country; and the promptitude of the arrangements made for the despatch of the contingent has been cordially recognized by the military authorities.

I have, &c.,
J. CHAMBERLAIN.

When I read this despatch I thought that after all perhaps there had been a subsequent arrangement, and with a view of ascertaining that I wired to our High Commissioner to ascertain the facts. My hon. friend has read the telegram and the answer to it, but it may bear repetition. This is what I cabled to Lord Strathcona :

Ottawa, January 26, 1900.

In view of discussions upon subject here, I desire to know definitely what is arrangement between British government and different Australasian colonies respecting pay of men serving on colonial contingents after landing in South Africa. Are colonies paying in any cases? Give details.

Here is the answer of Lord Strathcona :

London, January 30, 1900.

Have communicated with Colonial Office regarding your cable 26th instant. Arrangement with Australian colonies precisely same as with Canada. In no case are colonies paying their contingents after landing South Africa. New Zealand government offered provide pay for their contingents, but Her Majesty's government were of opinion that arrangement by which pay at Imperial rates should be provided from Imperial exchequer from date of disembarkation South Africa should be applied all colonial forces. See Nos. 13 and 16, Parliamentary Papers, November 16, 1899. Copies sent Secretary of State, 15th ultimo.

Therefore you have the principle laid down and determined by the Imperial authorities, and absolutely put outside the pale of discussion. Why therefore should we discuss the question any more? Why should my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) attempt to create political capital—I can attribute to him no other motive than that—why should he attempt to make political capital out of this? Why does he insist so much that we should pay, if not for the advantage of being able to say to the country, 'Oh, the government have no heart in this business; they do not want to pay.' Why, Sir, the matter has been settled by the Imperial government themselves. Why do you want to force your money on the Imperial government when they do not want it. Instead of having the majestic movement which you have to-day, of uniform action between Great Britain and all her colonies, the hon. gentleman wants to have a balky team with no two members pulling in unison. Is there not more patriotism in observing the conditions which the government of Great Britain has laid down, and which place the smallest of the self-governing colonies upon a footing of equality with the largest and the highest? But now, Sir, what shall we do with our own men? They are in the field as members of the Imperial Army. They are soldiers of the Queen to all intents and purposes. They are there just like the Lancashire Fusiliers, like the Highlanders, like all the other troops now fighting in South Africa—they are on a footing of equality with all others. They are receiving Imperial pay, which we know is not as high as Canadian pay. Take the case of the members of the mounted police, who have left their work on the prairies to serve in South Africa at half the pay they received as mounted police. It strikes me as a thing that is not fair that these men should not receive the same compensation that they had in the service of Canada. But, Sir, we cannot pay these men as we would like to pay them in the field. My hon. friend realizes that nothing would be so destructive of the discipline of the army if on pay-day the ordinary Tommy Atkins were to receive one shilling a day and the Canadian Tommy Atkins two shillings a day. Every one realizes, the Imperial government realizes, that such a condition of things would be intolerable. We do not propose to suggest that to the Imperial authorities; but what we propose to do is to ask parliament to provide a fund sufficient to pay the men their full Canadian pay, but to keep it in reserve, and in the meantime to allow their families to draw from it sufficient to keep them in comfort. In this way we will help our own soldiers who want the money. But I do not think the Imperial government is in need of money. I think England can fight her own battles. It is not the money nor the soldiers that England wants at this moment. But she wants the strong moral support of all the colonies, especially such colonies as Canada, which has the advantage of those equal rights for which she is fighting in South Africa. The government are aware that the policy which they have proposed has received and will receive the commendation of the great mass of the people. There are exceptions, I know. There are men who will oppose our policy, and who will oppose it from very different motives. There are those who believe that we have not done enough. We have just heard the chief exponent of that school. There may be those who feel that we have done too much, or who feel that we should have done nothing at all. On that question we appeal to the broad national conscience of Canada. We appeal to those who take pride in their imperialism; and ask them to be not more imperial than the Imperial government of the Queen. To those who believe in exclusive and restrictive autonomy we ask to rise superior to mere colonial level. We ask all Canadians to sink those minor differences in view of the grandeur of the idea from which we have received our inspiration.

The spectacle given to-day by England and her colonies is unique in the history of the world. It is unprecedented. The causes of the war are likewise unprecedented. This war is not waged for conquest; it is not waged for territory; it is not waged for the subjugation of a proud people. The causes of the war may be summed up in a few broad, comprehensive lines. During the present century, especially during the last sixty years, there have sprung out of the wilderness of South Africa into existence and into very great importance some five or six states—I use the word 'state' in its broader, generic significance—the Cape, Natal, Rhodesia, the Orange Free State and the Transvaal. Two races, the English and Dutch, have founded those states, and brought them to the condition in which they are to-day. Three of them, the Cape, Natal and Rhodesia, are British colonies. In two of them the legislative power belongs to the native Dutch population. In all of them the two races are more or less mixed and intermingled. In some of them the British population has the ascendancy in point of numbers. In others the ascendancy belongs to the Dutch population. The question is, how is the dominant power in every one of these states to treat and deal with the population of the other origin? How is England to treat and deal with the Dutch population under her domination? How are the Dutch population to treat their English fellow-citizens? This is the problem which, in one form or another, has been exercising British statesmen and Dutch statesmen for a great many years. So far as England is concerned, she has solved the problem already. She has solved it in her usual liberal, high-minded, highly civilized method. Wherever England has the sway, in the Cape, in Natal, in Rhodesia, she has given to the Dutch population every right and every privilege which is the birth-right of her own children. Everything which she gives to the English-speaking people she gives to the Dutch-speaking people. Everything she retains from the Dutch-speaking people she retains from the English-speaking people as well. On the other hand, in the Transvaal the Dutch government has refused to give to the English population those same rights and privileges which are willingly extended by Great Britain to the Dutch population in her own colonies. The government of the Transvaal has done this with the full and open assent of the Dutch population there and in the Orange Free State. Indeed, rather than give to the English population those equal rights which England gives to the Dutch population where she has the domination, the government of the Transvaal has declared war; and rather than give up those rights and privileges of which she has been the champion all over the world, England has accepted war. Now, the issues are in the hands of that supreme power which builds up and destroys empires and nations, whose ways are inscrutable, whose judgments are ever righteous even though they bring disappointment and bitterness. Fondly do we hope and fervently do we pray that this mighty scourge of war may soon pass away; that it may end in a victory which, when achieved, shall take away from the Dutch population none of the rights which they have to-day, but which will compel them to give to others the same treatment upon which they have always insisted for themselves; which, when achieved, will probably bring about a grand confederation of those warring states, in which the rights, the privileges, the sentiments, the traditions, nay, the prejudices, of all sections of the population will be respected, in which there will be justice and freedom for all, and absolute equality before the law. With these grand ideals, these aspirations, these purposes before them, the colonies of Great Britain to-day stand behind her—not to give her any assistance—she does not need that—but to affirm to the world that the unity of the British Empire is a real and living fact; to affirm to the world that the unity of the British Empire is based upon and derives its strength from the most ample local autonomy and the most unbounded respect for the rights and privileges of all its subjects. It is this which has inspired our policy, and that policy we submit with confidence for the approval of parliament.

Mr. FOSTER. Although, Mr. Speaker, not altogether in a complaining mood, I think I have the right to call your attention and the attention of this House to the most unbusinesslike position in which we are placed in the discussion of this answer to the address. The right hon. gentleman, who leads this government and this House, has had access from the first to all papers in the negotiations which have gone on and which have culminated in the action which is being traversed to-night in this discussion. The right hon. gentleman knew very well that this would be the main topic of discussion upon the answer to the address. He knew that he took his opponents and the members of this House at a complete disadvantage, when, having access to all that information himself, he steadily kept it from every member of this House, as well on his own side as on this. And when, on Friday last, the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) arose— If we cannot, Mr. Speaker, have order, I will move the adjournment of the House until hon. members opposite are in a mood to listen. I do not care to speak while gentlemen on the other side are continually getting up and down, and I think it would be better for me to move the adjournment of the debate.

The PRIME MINISTER. I have no objection.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

MESSAGES FROM HIS EXCELLENCY— COLONIAL CONTINGENTS.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message as follows:—

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons a copy of an approved Minute of Council appointing the Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright, G.C.M.G., Minister of Trade and Commerce; the Hon. Sir Louis Henry Davies, K.C.M.G., Minister of Marine and Fisheries; the Hon. William Stevens Fielding, Minister of Finance, and the Hon. Joseph Israel Tarte, Minister of Public Works, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons, as commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of the 13th chapter of the Revised Statutes of Canada, intitled: "An Act respecting the House of Commons.

COLONIAL CONTINGENTS.

The PRIME MINISTER presented the following Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the message as follows:

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons the correspondence relating to the despatch of the colonial military contingents to South Africa.

MINTO.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

ADJOURNMENT—THE CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am advised that a London despatch just arrived says that before the Imperial government consented to the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty, the proposal was submitted to the Dominion government, and the latter consented to giving the United States control of both shores of the American continent. Is this statement well founded?

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend is aware that I could not, without the consent of the Crown, give any information upon any such subject.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to ask my right hon. friend to obtain that information.

The PRIME MINISTER. I intend to apply for it immediately.

Mr. FOSTER. I would ask if the papers my hon. friend read are included in these that have been laid on the Table?

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes, that is the Message I brought down a moment ago.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, February 6, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

CERTIFICATE OF ELECTION.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, certificate of the election and return of John McIntosh, Esq., for the electoral district of Sherbrooke.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

John McIntosh, Esq., member for the electoral district of Sherbrooke, by Sir Charles Tupper and Mr. Pope.

REPORT.

The report of the Auditor General for the year ending June 30, 1889—The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding.)

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 4) to establish a Bankruptcy Court.—(Mr. Maclean.)

FRANCHISE ACT.

Mc McINNES moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 5) to amend the Franchise Act, 1898. He said: The object of this amendment is to prevent Chinamen and Japanese from voting at Dominion elections. Under the Franchise Act as it now stands, all naturalized Chinamen and Japanese are entitled to so vote. The amendment proposes an explicit prohibition against these people exercising the federal franchise.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to ask my right hon. friend if he is in a position to answer the question I put to him last night with regard to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am not.

THE LEINSTER REGIMENT.

Mr. McNEILL. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to ask for some information with reference to a matter of, as I think, great public urgency. I see by the papers that the Leinster Regiment, which is stationed at present at Halifax, has been ordered for service in South Africa. I should like to know from the government whether arrangements have been made to supply its place with a Canadian militia regiment, so as to obviate the necessity of any further drafts or drain being made upon the military resources of the mother country at the present moment. I may say, while referring to that, that I believe there is also an Imperial force of about a thousand men in Bermuda which could be utilized at the present time, if a Canadian regiment or a certain number of volunteers were sent there to take their place. I do not suppose that anything more effective could be done at the present moment to assist the mother country than to take steps of that kind. I shall be very much obliged if my right hon. friend could inform the House and country whether anything of that kind is in contemplation or has been done.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I have to say to my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill) that, so far as I am personally concerned I have had no intimation of the regiment at Halifax having been ordered to the front. I shall have to inquire from my hon. friend the Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden) whether he has more information than I have. I am not in a position at present to give my hon. friend the information he desires.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not wish to trespass upon the rules of the House or to move a resolution, but I may just say to my right hon. friend that this is a matter which is mentioned in the public press, and it is one to which I hope the government will direct their attention at the earliest possible moment, because I see that the Leinster Regiment is under orders to embark this month.

The PRIME MINISTER. What paper is it in?

Mr. McNEILL. I saw it in the Journal of last night.

The PRIME MINISTER. I will inquire.

Mr. McNEILL. I see the Minister of Militia is now in his place—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. McNEILL. You need not call order about a thing of this kind. Surely we are all agreed upon this matter, and it does not matter if I take up a moment or two in reference to a question of this magnitude. The Minister of Militia is in his place, and perhaps I may be allowed to ask him whether his attention has been called to the fact that the Leinster Regiment is about to be removed from Halifax to South Africa for active service; and whether if that be the fact, he will take steps to place Canadians as a garrison in Halifax in place of the Imperial troops which are about to be moved, so as to obviate the necessity of a militia regiment being sent across the Atlantic from the mother country; also, whether he will take into consideration the advisability of offering a Canadian regiment to take the place of the regular troops which are at present in Bermuda, and who would then be set free to assist in South Africa. My hon. friend, I see, is smiling at that, but I do not think that this is a matter for levity at all; I think this is a very serious matter with which we are face to face at the present time.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). My hon. friend is opening up a very wide subject, I think, one that can scarcely be discussed in the manner in which the hon. gentleman has brought it forward. It would require some notice and some consideration. With reference to the first question which he has put, I may say that I have only the information he has, that which is derived from the press. I know nothing further with reference to the withdrawal of the Leinster Regiment. As to the other matters to which he has referred, I should be very happy to give them, as I have already done to some extent, careful consideration.

Mr. McNEILL.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Gould for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

MR. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, under happier auspices I may venture to ask the attention of the House for a very short time, I hope, whilst I make a few comments on the address in reply to the speech from the Throne. But before proceeding to the question which took up so large a part of the attention of the House yesterday, I have some observations to offer on some of the other clauses of the address. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Gould) who made his maiden speech in this House in moving the resolutions, said that he did not think that any person had ever risen in the House of Commons at a more auspicious period than he himself did to move the reply to the address. I have a fairly distinct recollection that I made myself almost the same remark when, in 1883, I had the honour of performing that duty. I imagine it is a feeling in which most movers of the Address for the first time, indulge. I must say, however, that outside the general observations of that hon. gentleman, I have one or two criticisms to make provoked by another statement of his, which was to the effect that this great and abounding prosperity was due to the policy and to the administration of the present government. In the first place he declared that it did not require figures to prove prosperity at this time; but I notice that he did still have some faith in the efficacy of figures, as he gave to the House rather an abundant quota of them.

Now, so far as the prosperity of this country is concerned, all my colleagues on this side of the House join me in the pleasing duty of congratulating the country on its continued prosperity. When I use the word 'continued,' I use it because I think it expresses a truth. I suppose that no sensible man on the other side of the House, in his cool moments, however partisan he may be, will attempt to argue that prosperity had its beginning with the advent to power of the present administration. I know that this is a euphemistic way of putting the matter in praise of the administration; but I always imagine that I see a smile lurking somewhere on the countenance of the hon. gentleman who uses it, and at the very time that he is using it. Everybody with good common sense and the average intelligence, and, I suppose, all of us in his House may lay claim to that, knows that there are cycles in prosperity, that there are periods of lesser and greater prosperity. I think every one residing in Canada, who has paid any attention to the history of this country, knows that, commencing about 1890, there was a period of rather hard times, of commercial depression, the world over, and that these were due to causes not inherent in any government policy, or any government administration. Every person knows also, if he is fair to history, that the Dominion of Canada from 1890 to 1895 passed through that period of world-wide depression with, I think, the least number of scars and the least degree of trouble and difficulty of any large country in the civilized world. Everybody of common sense and intelligence knows that in 1895 the cycle of depression began to roll into a cycle of improved business, as shown by every test which can be applied to it, by the statistics of the country, by the general business of the country, by the statistics gathered by this government, and the officials of this government, and placed in our blue-books. Whether this present administration had come into power in 1896 or not, no sensible man has any other idea than that we would at this time in Canada, as all the rest of the world, have been enjoying great and abounding prosperity. We might as well be honest and fair with ourselves. For my own part I congratulate the government, I congratulate the opposition, I congratulate every citizen in Canada upon the great and abounding prosperity which has marked these last two or three years in the history of Canada. I hope they will long continue. I am quite willing to give to the present administration any credit that may be due to them for administrative methods, either in maintaining a wise policy already inaugurated, or in introducing a newer and better lines, if they have done so. But I am not at present in a position, nor do I think we ought to be asked to place ourselves in a position, to deny the facts of history and to go against common sense and common intelligence.

Now, Sir, we are in the midst of an increasing prosperity, as is shown by certain figures and certain statistics. I am glad of it, as I said before. Prosperity is good for this country, prosperity is not confined to this country, prosperity is general in all the foremost countries of the world, whether they are ruled by a Liberal or a Conservative administration, whether they have a policy of free trade prevailing, as in Great Britain, or a policy of a revenue tariff, or a policy of extraordinarily high protection.

In every one of these countries, as we may gather from their statistics to-day, they are enjoying a period of more than ordinary prosperity and progress. But, these waves of prosperity are due to greater causes and other causes than even the high and mighty ability and the wise administrative policy of the thirteen—no, of the eighteen gentlemen, who, to-day, are supposed to be guiding the affairs of the country. I do not imagine, that at this particular period of our history, these eighteen gentlemen have very much to do with the affairs of the United States of America. Not many years ago they thought they would have when they came into power. A good many years ago, in their pretensions, they believed that all that was necessary for certain things was that they should occupy the seats of power, and, behold, the United States, in its various fiscal and trade affairs, would open its arms, take Canada to its bosom, and, in loving commercial and trade embrace they would go on as a completely happy and united family. Is there not a period of great prosperity in the United States of America? Will the right hon. Prime Minister listen for a moment to what is the average tariff of the United States of America? There is no pretense about that being a free trade tariff, such as it is in England, or a revenue tariff; that is an out and out ultra protectionist tariff, averaging about 51 per cent of the value of dutiable articles introduced into that country, and yet, in the whole period of the history of the United States, you cannot point to two more prosperous years than 1898 and 1899. Is not that sufficient, of itself, to prove the fallacy and the foolishness of the attempts of the hon. gentlemen opposite, to claim for their policy and for their administration the wave of prosperity that is passing over this country as over the world. Well, Sir, they also ask us to congratulate them on the general volume of the revenue. It is not many years ago that we remember to have heard this House ring with the proposition that all revenue was simply a contribution from, or an imposition upon the hard earnings of the people of this country, and in so far as its height and volume were contributed through the two sources of internal revenue and customs, it was taxation and a burden, and as the right hon. Prime Minister was fond of saying: taxation is not a virtue and not a boon: taxation is the opposite of that. They have their volume of revenue which is seven and a third millions more, taken out of the people of this country in taxation proper, in inland revenue and customs, than what was taken from this country in 1896. They ask us to congratulate them on the increase, and we have to congratulate them on adding seven and a third millions to the taxation of the people of this country. My hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright), that distinguished and gallant patriot, who in 1892, took occasion to write over to the Economist and to have distributed everywhere through Great Britain a brochure in which he declared, amongst other things, that the taxation which was being raised from this country, $6,500,000 less than it is to-day, was bleeding the farmers and the people of this country white. We congratulate my hon. friend, though, now, I am sorry to say, he is but an onlooker, so acknowledged by himself, upon going so far back upon every conviction that he had formerly declared he held, and as to this year of grace 1899, taking seven and a third more millions out of the poor white blood that was left in the farmers and the people of this country, and terrible to tell, in this story of decadence and deterioration, the hon. gentleman cannot find time to sit down and indict an article to the people of Great Britain, whom he was so anxious to enlighten then. as to the extra bleeding process which is taking place to-day in one of Her Majesty's dominions. It has been said that the exports and imports have increased, and it is referred to here as being the volume of exports. We have here no figures as to the volume of exports; everything that is stated by hon. gentlemen opposite is as to the value of exports, not the volume. When we come to take up the financial aspect of the question, as we will later, I think we shall be prepared to show that volumes and values are very different as applied in different periods, to the imports and exports of this country. Three years ago we imported into this country more than $10,000,000 worth of iron goods representing a certain volume; should that same volume, in the same way, be introduced into this country in the year 1899, the values of that import would be, at least, double of what the values were in 1895, while the volume would be exactly the same. Apply that to the heightened scale of prices which runs along the whole line nearly, with the sole exception of one or two staples that the farmers of this country have to sell, the farmers' wheat for instance, apply the same argument in that way, and I think hon. gentlemen will crawl down a little from their high and mighty position, as comparing the volumes of trade, when they are really simply comparing the values of trade in two different periods. Let me go to another point. I noticed a strange conjunction—I thought it strange, but I do not now—I noticed a strange, as I thought, and a somewhat forced conjunction in this paragraph:

I have been instructed to convey to you Her Majesty's high appreciation of the loyalty and patriotism thus displayed, which—

And there something else follows. The two paragraphs preceding that and the paragraph succeeding it all have reference, solely and wholly, to the Transvaal war and to the contingents and in the essence of consistency and uniformity of composition and idea, no extraneous matter ought to have been dragged, by force, into this paragraph lying between them. But hon. gentlemen opposite could not forego the small opportunity of hitching on one of their pet policies to the question of the Transvaal war, and there is the conjunction:

—which, following the preference granted under the present tariff to articles of British manufacture, has had the happiest effect in cementing and intensifying the cordial relations subsisting between Canada and the mother country.

But these hon. gentlemen are not looking for political effect. They do not want to tie any of their little paper theories on to this great and tremendous and all absorbing question of a united empire—the aid of all the colonies and the fighting out of the destinies of Great Britain on the plains of the Transvaal. They are away above a thing of that kind. I said, that I thought it was a strange conjunction, but I can see exactly how it happened to come in. Whoever drafted it had in his mind the blunders of the administration. Why have we this partial preferential policy to-day? Because these hon. gentlemen never having intended it were forced into it and had to take it as the less of two evils. Does anybody on the other side of the House pretend to deny that? I will quote from my friend, the 'Onlooker' of the administration, who having leisure on his hands in that position, will have his memory unobscured and be able to keep in touch with all these varying phases of the policy of a varying administration. When he introduced—no, not he. He ought have done it by right; but, when the gentlemen by his side introduced the financial policy of the government in 1897, did they introduce a preference policy for Great Britain? No, Sir. They denied it. The motto then was: All the world for Canada. Oh, they were broad-minded men. The whole world was their theatre, and they were not going to be bound down to trade with a country of one million inhabitants, and another country of twenty million inhabitants, and another country of five millions. Oh, no; the whole world was to be open to this business administration, and they meant to take it for Canadian trade. And when it was suggested that this was a preference meant for Great Britain—at least that must be enjoyed only by Great Britain in view of the existing Belgian and German treaties, what did the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) say? He said:

I say with respect to the offer we are now making, that it is not a preferential offer at all in the true, legal sense of the word. That offer is open to all the world. The Americans may avail themselves of it, and so may the Germans and Belgians. The whole world are welcome to avail themselves of it on the same terms and the same conditions on which England may take advantage of it.

And, when I interjected:

And the United States.

The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) answered:

If the Americans are willing to give us full and fair reciprocal advantages.

And did not these gentlemen opposite believe that the Americans were so willing?

Did they not tell the people of Canada that the Americans were willing, and did they not asseverate, upon their honour, that as soon as the wicked and distasteful Tories were out of office, our cousins in the United States would meet them more than half way and give them reciprocity. And so the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) further said :

If the Americans are willing to give us full and fair reciprocal advantages, I would recommend trading with them for the benefit of Canada and the Empire^otoo; and I think Mr. Foster will find out before he is many years older, that very probably—although I admit it is a little roundabout way—it is not a bad way to get it. We have to-day offered better terms to these countries who will trade with us fairly, but that offer has been made to the United States just as it has to any other country, even to Great Britain herself.

So much for that. Why then was this conjoined to the Transvaal contingent policy? It was for the reason that the government did at last what they did not intend to do at first, and they were enforced into doing this thing as they were in the other. When the right hon. gentleman, the leader of the government—after I have no doubt consulting his cabinet and speaking for every member of that cabinet—when he came out with his ultimatum to the people of Canada: that the constitution was against it, that power was lacking, that there was no vote, that they could do nothing, and that consequently nothing would be done; he remained quiet thereafter. And, Sir, he and his government would have remained quiet to this day, and to this day not a Canadian soldier would have found himself on the plains of the Transvaal fighting under British colours, to this day not a single gun or man would have been sent out of this Dominion of Canada, if the country had acquiesced in that ultimatum. If the country had sat down quietly under that ultimatum of the Prime Minister of Canada we would to-day have no Transvaal contingent in South Africa, and we would have no paragraph in the speech from the Throne on this subject. That is the reason, Mr. Speaker, why I think the minister who penned this had in mind, what a beautifully apposite thing it would be to tie the two things together, which the same government, equally in the case of both, never intended, and equally in the case of both had ultimately to perform.

The Governor General's speech further says:

The measures which have been taken from time to time to facilitate the safe transportation of food stuffs to European markets have resulted in a large increase in the exportation of several important articles of produce, and it may become necessary in the interest of this very important branch of industry to require a more careful inspection than has been customary for the purpose of maintaining that high standard of excellence heretofore secured and which is absolutely indispensable if the people of Canada are to increase their large and profitable trade with other countries in these commodities.

I wonder at the excessive modesty of that paragraph. I am quite certain that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) could not have been consulted when it was penned. Why? Because I have met the Minister of Agriculture within the last few weeks in a fine little town down in Quebec by the name of Sherbrooke. I hold in my hand a pamphlet entitled, 'The Laurier Government and the Conservatives,' with the maple leaf fortunately and appositely under the word 'Conservatives.' The 'Laurier Government and the Conservatives'! There are many astounding assertions made in that pamphlet, and I was very anxious for my part to trace its paternity. I traced it. How? I got an envelope—not addressed to myself but addressed to an elector in that constituency—said envelope purporting to start from the city of Ottawa, said envelope being undeniably a government envelope, said envelope bearing the undeniable frank of 'Sydney A. Fisher,' and said envelope being one of a multitude of a like kind, which if I or any other poor member of the House, had posted, would have cost us 4 cents in the Queen's postage, but which under this very convenient method of operating came free to the enlightened electors. I found the 'Laurier Government and the Conservatives' neatly reposing between the flaps of that envelope, which bore the signature of 'Sydney A. Fisher,' worth 2 cents—in this case 4 cents. I must ask the hon. the Postmaster General whom I believe to be an honest man—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Other hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, whom I believe to be the very watch-dog of the Treasury, whom I believe would shoot at sight any man, even one of his own colleagues, that would attempt to steal a 2-cent postage stamp out of the public till—I call the attention of my honourable and honest friend (Mr. Mulock) to the fact that in the contest that took place in Sherbrooke, Mr. Sydney Fisher, the Minister of Agriculture, a member of an honest business government, has actually defrauded this country out of hundreds and thousands of 2-cent stamps for the purpose of sending his election pamphlet down into the county of Sherbrooke on a partisan mission. I challenge the Postmaster General, with that information before him, I challenge him to find out one line of authority by statute, or by Order in Council or by any other way which authorized Mr. Fisher, or the government or the party to send these pamphlets through the country in sealed envelopes at the cost of the tax-payers of Canada.

And whilst my hon. friend is about that investigation, I ask him to take up another—no other than the case of my redoubtable and long-known friend, the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), whose special mission for eighteen years was to thunder up and down this wide country of ours declaiming against pilfering, pillaging, stealing and corruption; and yet, Sir, I am not beyond the mark in declaring, I think, that hundreds of thousands of a pamphlet which purports to be a speech uttered by this hon. gentleman, outside of the session of parliament entirely—at Massey Hall—a purely extraordinary campaign speech by a member of a party and for the purposes of a party—in sealed envelopes, and government envelopes at that, were sent out to the people of this country, and that every one of those pamphlets has taken four cents out of the treasury of my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock). Well, Sir, I would convey to my hon. friend my most earnest suggestion that a little more careful oversight on his part with reference to his co-members of the cabinet would lessen that deficit which he deplures, and would be a great step forward towards an equilibrium of expenses and income in the department over which he presides. But, Sir, I merely state this by the way. The important point was to establish the pater- nity of this brochure. It is established. It comes under the sign-manual of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher). I do not intend to read it; I will read only a little of what it says. It gives the exports of certain agricultural products in 1895-6—$35,000,000 in round numbers. It goes on to give the value of the same in 1897-8—$65,000,000. Thus there is an increase between these two periods of $30,000,000. What is the statement in the appeal?

Is it because the policy of the Laurier government has thus put $30,000,000 more into the farmers' pockets that the electors should turn that government out at the elections?

I commend that as an example to the framers of the next address to be brought down to this House, if hon. gentlemen opposite should have the extreme felicity of preparing that address. I should say to them, 'Gentlemen, do not live so far beneath your privileges; when you put an item into the speech from the Throne, in which you talk of the great increase of exports, apply this brilliant idea of the Minister of Agriculture, who is paramount in that respect at least, for that is his own department, and say that all of this $30,000,000, $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 is actually money that has been put into the pockets of the farmers through and by the policy of the present administration.'

I am also bound to say that the framer of this address in that passage did not fairly cover the measure of what might have been done, taking the same Minister of Agriculture as authority. For this precious pamphlet, in three-fourths of its pages, is nothing more nor less than a fulsome and exaggerated compliment to the Minister of Agriculture for the immense benefits that he has conferred upon the country. All the credit for the increase in the exports of agricultural products, for cold storage, for all the extended plans and the like of that, is modestly claimed in this brochure for the Minister of Agriculture. Where was this hon. gentleman when this passage in the address was being indited? He should have been close by, for he has defrauded himself in this most flagrant way of what he certainly claims to be an appanage of himself and himself alone as Minister of Agriculture in this government.

The next reference is to the Post Office:

I am glad to observe that the returns from the Post Office Department afford good ground for believing that the temporary loss of revenue caused by the great reduction recently made in letter postage will speedily be made good by the increased correspondence consequent thereon.

I notice that everywhere great credit is taken to the government for the reduction of postage. Is history silent with reference to the previous work of the Post Office Department in the reduction of postage? Was there not a time when it cost five cents to carry every letter to its destination? Was there not a reduction of the postage from five cents to three cents, and was not that reduction made by a Liberal-Conservative government? Was there not a time when five cents or three cents carried only a single half-ounce, and did there not come another time when the same amount of money covered double the weight? In reality, for all that kind of correspondence the postage was cut in two. Was that something to the credit of a previous administration, or was it not? There was a time when every newspaper in this country bore postage. There was another time, and for a long period, during which no newspaper in this country carried any postage, and when the people's magazines went free from one end of this country to the other. That also was due to a Liberal-Conservative administration. And if these hon. gentlemen have undertaken to reduce the postage, somewhat further, that is in line of the progress which has been made already. I am not going to repeat my criticism in regard to that. But I have one criticism to make upon my hon. friend, who has, I believe, in 1899, a deficit of a little less than $400,000. He congratulates the country upon the deficit being no more than that; but in the Public Accounts, if I am not mistaken, there is debited to the Post Office service $21,000—for what? For the Yukon mail service of the year 1898-9; and what is more, only $5,000 of that is debited on account of the service into and out of the Yukon. Now, Mr. Speaker, will any man, however partisan he may be, stand up in this House and maintain that in the year ending July 1, 1899, it did not cost more than $5,000 to perform the mail service into the Yukon and out of it. Will the Postmaster General affirm that now? And if the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) cannot affirm it, as he cannot, what is he guilty of? He is guilty of the crime charged against myself, without any warrant, by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). He is guilty of cooking the public accounts, for if he had charged against the revenue of the post office the cost of the actual service in the year 1899, the cost of taking the mails in and out of the Yukon, which probably cost at least $100,000, the hon. gentleman would have had quite a different result. But what did he do? He used the mounted police, he used the other officers of the government out there and charged their time and expense, not against his department, but against the other departments, thus relieving his own department of that expenditure which was properly chargeable to it. Then, with that absurd cooking of accounts, he comes before the country and plumes himself upon the magnificent achievement of bringing down the deficits in this first year of reduced postage to something like $400,000.

What is this that I see next:

Negotiations are now in progress with several of our sister colonies in the West Indies, which it is hoped may result in increasing and developing our trade with these islands, and possibly with certain portions of the adjacent continent of South America.

Do our ears deceive us? Or did our ears deceive us three years ago, four and five years ago—any time within the last ten years previous to 1896? Where is the Boanerges voice of the Minister of Customs? I have a distinct recollection of his stentorian tones—they are sounding in my ears yet—as he declaimed on the utter futility and flippancy of these hon. gentlemen, who then occupied the Treasury benches, searching in Australia, China and Japan—searching, he said, in Alaska and Timbuctoo for markets, when there was a market close by our side, a $65,000,000 market.

A notable trio, three of a kind, occupied the boards in a dramatic star exhibition throughout Nova Scotia shortly previous to the elections of 1896. Let me quote first what star number one said:

Mr. Foster has gone to Jamaica to try and get a market for the manufacturers. . . . They have cut themselves off from our best market in the United States, and to-day are obliged to seek for others.

I said Mr. Foster had gone to Jamaica to find a new market. The flippant way they speak of these new markets is simply trifling with the matter. These new markets, Jamaica, South America, China and Japan, come in at the tail of the list, with a fraction of 1 per cent of our commerce; the United States at the head of the list takes one-half our whole commerce.

If my leader—

And the hon. gentleman's leader stood by his side.

—comes into power, it would not be a rash prediction to say that within six months from that date, by a scratch of a pen—

How easy it was then.

—a treaty of reciprocity would be put into force between Canada and the United States.

That may stand as the utterance of the star performer, Mr. Sydney Fisher at last time, now Minister of Agriculture.

Let me read another quotation:

You hear certain politicians who never engaged in trade—

That was a very bitter side hit.

—in their lives, talking flippantly about opening up new markets in other countries. When a great political party declares that this policy consists in obstructing trade with our natural markets, and then tell us they want to open up markets with China, Japan, Timbuctoo, I almost lose my patience. New markets, indeed! You have a market to the south of you where everything you can draw out of the sea or delve from the mines, or grow from the soil, will find a ready and profitable sale. If the people of Canada approached the United States in a fair and reasonable spirit they would obtain a reciprocity treaty in a short time.

That performer was Mr. Louis Davies, at the present time Sir Louis Davies.

But besides them stood a star, greater in magnitude than all—and from every one of the five points of this constellation, even at that remote period, fire and brilliancy sprang out into space. What did this third performer declare? He looked into the confiding gray eyes of the Haligolians and said: You want bread to eat and have coal to sell, and yet when you want to buy bread you are met with a tax—and if there is anything that ought not to be taxed in this country it is bread; and when you want to sell your coal you are met with a tax. You have to send it by a long and burdensome route through Quebec to Ontario, and you cannot get into your natural market. Yet this Tory government taxes coal—yes. And they tax flour, peaches and peach baskets. Let us have reciprocity; we must change all this.

Who was this star performer who thus spoke? He was then plain Wilfrid Laurier, a democrat to the hilt, who at that time did not believe in taxing the poor people's bread. Oh, no; he was then after votes, and he drew tears from the eyes of the honest yeomen of Nova Scotia as he bewailed the fatuity of the government that would tax bread which went into the people's mouths to sustain their brawny forms. And he told them, if ever language told anything, that when he came into power, their coal would find its best markets free from tariffs, and their bread they would get for their sustenance without any tax upon it. That gentleman is now Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and no longer the democrat to the hilt, and no longer shedding tears over the taxed bread of the poor Halifaxians.

Then what happened? These star performers—yes, and my hon. friend the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) was the presiding angel, and spreading his sheltering wings over this magnificent trio, told his own people of Nova Scotia: These are the men who will deliver you out of this worse than Egyptian bondage.

Well, Mr. Speaker, here are all these gentlemen before us almost in one row. Where is their reciprocity? Where is their $65,000,000 market? Where is their free coal? Where is their untaxed bread? What has become of all these promises which they made to get office? After they got office, they simply come here and stick their thumbs in their waistcoats, and say, as the right hon. Prime Minister has said: Well, what are you going to do about it? We are here and you are there.

And yet these hon. gentlemen went to the United States on bended knee for six months, lavished all their arts on our American friends, and came back without even a reciprocity coat on their shoulders, for the Prime Minister declared last year in this House his abnegation and denial of the necessity for or of any feeling in favour of reciprocity. They are now on quite a different tack. To-day these hon. gentlemen have put into the speech from the Throne a paragraph announcing that they are off to Timbuctoo, China and Japan, and every small colony in the world, looking for trade. For the manufacturers? That is the allegation they made against us when we were trying to open markets. For the manufacturers? Oh, no. Is it to get this $65,000,000 market, this natural market, near at home? Oh, no. All their promises have evaporated, all their pledges trodden to fine powder beneath their heels. But they have the offices and the emoluments, and those they intend to hang on to, however bread and coal may be taxed.

The next paragraph in the speech reads:

It gives me pleasure to observe that, in pursuance of the policy which was defined at the last session of parliament, a carefully devised body of regulations has been adopted, applicable to all railways and public works within the federal jurisdiction, making adequate provision for the sanitary protection and medical care of workmen.

Who says this? The Governor General? I may ask my right hon. friend as to these regulations 'carefully devised,' this fine body of regulations—has he deigned yet to give them to the House?

The PRIME MINISTER. I do not think so.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. FOSTER. 'I do not think so,' the hon. gentleman says. He treats the House with a fine scorn, with fine contempt. The hon. gentleman knew, if he knew anything, that the moment the debate on the address opened this session, every man here, his equal as being sent to represent independent electors of this country, had a right to the information referred to in the speech. Yet, what do we find? We had to adjourn from one day to the third day because no papers relating to the Canadian volunteers were down, and yesterday, the day to which the House adjourned, the papers came into my hands, for instance, as one of the representatives of the people, five minutes before he closed his address. And here is something else that they vaunt themselves upon, yet neither the public nor any member of parliament has been given even a squint at this 'carefully devised' body of laws and regulations. But, of course, this is a business government. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) has said so, and, of course, we must believe it.

The attention of the government has been called to the conflicts which occasionally arise between workmen and their employers. While it may not be possible to wholly prevent such difficulties by legislation, my government thinks that many of the disputes might be averted if better provisions could be made for the friendly intervention of boards of conciliation.

And so on, and so on, 'you will be invited to consider' something about this matter. When a stone was given where bread had been asked, there was an outcry in the olden times. My hon. friend has not said anything with regard to the Alien Labour Law. There is a law now on the statute-books of this country, placed there by the hon. gentleman himself, placed there with the promise that he would enforce it, placed there with the belief reposed in him by every labouring man this whole country through that his rights would be protected in relation to the labourers of the United States of America. And from that time to this, the law which is actually on the statute-books has remained to all intents and purposes a dead letter. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been importuned to bring it into effect. They would not, and the reasons they gave for not bringing it into effect have passed months and months ago, and yet the Alien Labour Law is not yet in force. And now they come down with another sprat to catch a whale, they come down with the idea of giving something else in the way of future hope and prospect to the men whose votes they would like to get to support them in power. Sir, I think the labouring men of this country may well ask the government to carry out the laws at present on the statute-book before they encumber it with more; or, if they choose to put more laws on the statute-book, that they will at least carry out the fundamental laws which they themselves have declared necessary and which have been enacted at their suggestion.

The government is then happy to assure us that the lands in Manitoba and the North-west are being taken up by settlers, and they say that this affords conclusive evidence of the success which has attended the efforts of my government to promote immigration, and I have no doubt that the greatly increased production of the west will henceforth add materially to the growth of the whole Dominion.

I think that is a claim which cannot be successfully upheld. Evidence before a judge or court of justice would have to be far more pertinent before it would be conclusive. I think that Manitoba and the North-west has a history with regard to this question of settlement. I think that Manitoba and the North-west would never have had a settler had it not been opened to the markets of the people of the world. And I think that, struggling against all odds and taking their political lives in their hands, time and again the Liberal-Conservative party, in a hand-to-hand contest with hon. gentlemen opposite, opened up the North-west and Manitoba and made it a place for the settler. And when hon. gentlemen opposite in the thick of the fight, one of their strongest men, who was in parliament when the Canadian Pacific Railway Bill was before this House and a subsidy was being asked for, said :

I venture to say that from one end of the Dominion to the other, no more joyful news could be spread than the tidings that the telegraph would flash from the Atlantic to the Pacific saying that this contract was abandoned and saying that Canada was emancipated from the terrible consequences likely to flow from it.

Who said that? Mr. G. W. Ross, one of their foremost advocates in this House, and now Premier of the province of Ontario. But a new light has come, and the other day Mr. Ross made this public declaration :

I remember when the Canadian Pacific Railway was constructed, we thought Sir John Macdonald was undertaking a herculean enterprise, one which would crush the country. I think, perhaps, he was right, and we were wrong. I think, perhaps, he builded more wisely than he knew. No one will say to-day that the building of the railway was a mistake. Canada to-day would be a very small country, would be weaker in the councils of the empire, would scarcely be a confederated Dominion, as it is, were it not for the Pacific Railway.

I think, Sir, that the historic policy of the past, which, in the first place, acquired these great Territories, which submitted to the bond of their union, to wit, the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the determination which carried out that policy in dark and troublous times when Canada's future hung in the balance, as hon. members of this House well know, and which did that in spite of hon. gentlemen opposite—that historic policy and that determination had something to do with the opening up of that country and attracting to it a body of settlers. Remember that the first days in this work of settlement are always the most difficult. Checks to a country's growth are most severely felt in the early years. In that country frosts and dry winds were more rife in the first years of settlement. Through all difficulties the people struggled on, until the time came when, with improved methods of cultivation and the extension of settlement, even the climate to a certain extent changed. Good crops repaid the farmers' toil and good prices for those crops were realized. And so went out throughout Europe and throughout the world the fame of the Canadian North-west as a grain-growing and cattle-raising country. That had something to do with this influx of settlers. And if we take this policy of immigration, the very plan of despatching throughout the world information with regard to Canada, is a policy borrowed from the old Liberal-Conservative government. The very plan of going into the United States and getting the best class of farmers we could—repatriated Canadians and frontier farmers—into the North-west, was a policy introduced by my friend Mr. Daly and successfully carried out by him. That policy is being carried out by the government of to-day. But the hon. gentleman who has charge of that department may well revise his opinion with regard to some elements of immigration that he has brought into that country. I had the pleasure of being in Manitoba not many weeks ago, and, so far as I could gather, the opinions and feelings of the settlers and the people of that country is they have, certainly to say the least of it, enough Doukhobors and Galicians. They have enough of them. They want no more of them; they do not wish that class of immigrants to be located in blocks over that country. They will treat well those that are there now. Not one of them will be allowed to suffer if the open-handed, generous inhabitant of the North-west can get relief to him. There is no spirit of animosity against them. But the people there simply say: We do not want any more of that class; we want a different class; better producers, people more in unison with the life and spirit of our civilization, and of our political and constitutional history.

But, Sir, if this speech is eloquent in these points in which ministers have made statements, it is equally eloquent in what it does not touch. These gentlemen are coming up to the end of their existence. The pangs of death have already caught hold of them. They have seen the thunderbolt flashing in the sky. They are coming up to the end of their political five years existence. Looking behind, they watch the trooping ghosts and spectres dogging every man of them close at his heels. These spectres are crying out in ghostly voices: 'Fulfilment, fulfilment, as honest men.' Gentlemen, let me tell you, through you, Mr. Speaker, that you have very few weeks left in which to fulfil those promises and to lay those ghosts. The member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) knows that. There is one following him; he shakes it off on to the First Minister. There is the ghost of unfulfilled pledges in regard to economy and expenditure. In all the four pages of this address there is no hint of economical expenditure. Down at the very end, however, there is an intimation that 'the estimates will be prepared with a due regard to economy and the rapid growth of the Dominion,' rapid growth in the matter of indiscriminate and huge railway subsidies for instance. There is another ghost following the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), who, in 1895, took the patron beauty upon his aged knee, who wooed her in soft and mellow terms, and who told her, with all the ardour of an 18-year-old swain, that if she would but prove true to him for life he and she would waddle down the pathway of life in beautiful consonance—upon this point at least, that no railway subsidies should be scattered as a blight among the constituencies. There is the Prime Minister of this Dominion, who, Sir, actually had the hardihood to go out into the intelligent province of Ontario, stand up before an intelligent and well-read people, look them in the face, or over their heads, and declare: We have kept every promise we ever made, with the exception of the promise to abolish the Senate, and that we propose to perform. I do not need to follow that, it would be superfluous to do so. Why, the man himself must know what he is saying when he makes a statement of that kind. The Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) tries to parry the blow by saying: We have performed every promise. Read our promises. Where are they? They are in the 1893 convention. That is what we are pledged to, and not to any irresponsible utterances of individuals. The Minister of Customs said that, he knows he said it, said it in Winnipeg. Who are those irresponsible persons? One sits a little behind him, who stood up in the plenitude of economical principles and declared in Ontario, before the election: If we do not reduce the expenditure of this country by three millions as soon as we get into power, turn us out. Then there is a still more irresponsible person, the Prime Minister, who stood up before the face of a Toronto audience, in face of the electors of this whole country, and declared to them that though they might not bring the expenditure back to the days of Alexander Mackenzie, they would reduce it one, two, three, and, as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Mills) said, they would reduce it by four million dollars. And yet that same gentleman stood up and declared in the face of an intelligent people that he had performed every pledge that he had ever made. Do I need to go any further, Mr. Speaker? I know, Sir, that this is a painful subject for you, and I will spare you, because, being now in that position, where you look with fair and open eyes on both sides of the House, or, perhaps, more properly, look on neither side, but straight down on the pathway before you, you must feel your heart-strings wrung by the exhibition of your former friends and associates in this matter of unfulfilled promises and unredeemed performances. But the unfulfilled pledges are the least reprehensible part of their conduct. The awful thing about it is that, not only did they fail to fulfil their pledges, but they actually turn around and declare that they have fulfilled them. My right hon. friend said last night that there was no greater calamity than war. Yes, there is. A greater calamity than war is to sit down in cowardly submission to wrong and insult. There is a greater calamity than unfulfilled promises. What is it? It is to brazen it out before honest men, and in the face of day, to say that you have fulfilled them, when you know that you have not. The first is perfidy, the second, Sir, is turpitude added to perfidy.

Something is said about transportation, and one passage of this address congratulates the country—on what? And here I am amazed again at its modesty. It congratulates the country on the vigorous policy of the government with reference to finishing the canal system of this country. Where was the Premier when that modest paragraph was indicted? For I find that this Premier of Canada stood on a platform at Bowmanville, on October 16th last, before a magnificent, but, as I am informed, very cool and critical audience, and made his apology for the sins of his cabinet. In that capacity and on that platform he said:

To Alexander Mackenzie is due the policy we are now forwarding.

That is the canal policy.

He commenced the deepening of the Welland Canal, he deepened it to the depth of fourteen feet.

Mr. GIBSON. That is right.

Mr. FOSTER (reading).

And for eighteen years afterwards the work went on at a snail's pace. The Conservatives did practically nothing with this work,—but when we came into office we undertook, and successfully too, to complete it in three years.

That was the Prime Minister of Canada, let loose upon an audience in the province of Ontario. Well, Sir, what happened; what are the facts of the case? The policy of canal transportation was adopted and entered upon before confederation, and up to that period $20,692,244 had been spent upon the canal system of the country. The decision to enlarge the Welland and St. Lawrence canals to 12 feet was adopted in 1871, under Sir John Macdonald's leadership, and the work was well in hand, certainly as far as contracts were concerned, when Mr. Mackenzie came into power in 1873. Mr. Mackenzie is not here; a distinct denial has been given to the statement I made as to the 14-foot depth. Let Mr. Mackenzie speak for himself. On February 8, 1875, Mr. Mackenzie said, Hansard, page 20 :

It is not the intention of the government to go to a greater depth than twelve feet of water. I may tell my hon. friend that the harbour capacity of the lakes does not seem to fairly contemplate a greater depth of water than that, as they could not possibly be used without an enormous outlay, and the outlay on the canal even would be so serious as to deter the government from entering into such a great expense. We have given the question careful consideration, and think that the plan adopted is the one we must adhere to.

On the same day, in answer to Mr. Wood, at present, I believe, a member of this House, Mr. Mackenzie said:

It is the intention of the government to proceed with the enlargement of the St. Lawrence canals at an early date. There is not any pressing hurry for them, however, as we believe transshipment to smaller vessels in Kingston harbour can be accomplished without any very great expense. The plan for the ultimate works is to make the locks the same size. The survey has been made upon an intention to deepen the St. Lawrence River to no greater depth than twelve feet. The expense to get fourteen feet would be still more enormous than to get the same depth on the Welland, as it would involve the deepening of a large portion of the channel of the river.

And in 1879, Hansard, page 1656, he declared that:

Any attempt to get fourteen feet below Kingston should be given up as impracticable.

The Liberal-Conservative government came in and they adopted and carried out the 14-foot basis. What has been done? From 1863 to 1873 inclusive, $693,834 was spent on the canals. That was just the commencement of the work after confederation. From 1874 to 1878 inclusive, under hon. gentlemen opposite, $13,267,868 was spent. From 1879 to 1896 inclusive, when the right hon. gentleman, the Prime Minister of this country declares, that they proceeded at a snail's pace and did practically nothing, $32,418,690 was spent. During that time Liberal-Conservatives had introduced the scheme of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal and practically finished it, they had built the Murray Canal and subsidized the great Canadian Pacific Railway, besides which they had not failed in deepening and widening the harbours and river stretches all over this country. These canals were how far finished? I intend to complete this subject while I am at it. I have in my hand a return which I asked the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), to bring down; he brought it down at the end of last session, and here is the analysis of it. I asked him for all the canals completed, cost thereof previous to or up to July 1, 1896. Here they are :

Name.	Depth. ft. in.	Cost.
Welland	13 9	$23,769,353
Murray	14 0	1,247,470
Beauharnois	9 0	1,611,690
Total		$26,628,513

I also asked him for a return of the canals under construction on July 1, 1896, with the contracts then running, and this is the return :

Name.	Cost to July 1, 1896.
Sault Ste. Marie.....	$ 3,448,011
Galops	1,401,365
Rapide Plat	1,496,078
Cornwall	4,008,037
Soulanges	2,275,908
Lachine	7,536,439
Lake St. Louis.....	54,383
St. Lawrence River.....	1,201,795
Total	$21,422,016

In addition to these contracts running and to be completed there were also brought down these figures to be added to the expenditure :

Name.	Cost to complete under existing contract.
Galops	$ 257,360
Rapide Plat	286,911
Cornwall	515,096
Soulanges	2,093,539
Lachine	421,695
Lake St. Louis	183,617
Total	$3,758,218

Now, Sir, I asked besides, what was the amount of money which is estimated to be necessary to complete the system in addition to the contracts existing on July 1, 1896, as they have been worked out or the money paid. How much does it amount to? It amounts to $6,151,000, and they have given contracts for a little over $4,600,000 from July 1, 1896, up to the present time. There is no necessity at all to comment upon that statement. I only bring it to the attention of the House and the country to show what hazardous proceeding it is for his own party to allow the present Prime Minister to get entirely loose upon a public platform in this country. I do not propose to spend any more time upon that branch of the subject, although it is a fruitful one. When we come to the budget I think this House will have something more to say in reference to it.

I now desire, for a few moments, to say something in reply to what the right hon. gentleman, who, last night, occupied the attention of this House, said in answer to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition upon the subject of the Transvaal contingent. There are three accusations which are made by hon. gentlemen opposite, from the Prime Minister down, against the Liberal-Conservative party on this matter, and I propose, briefly, to touch upon them. The first is that the hon. leader of the opposition and the Liberal-Conservative party are agitating this matter for party purposes and for party purposes alone. That statement was made on the floor of the House last night, and echoed by hon. gentlemen sitting behind the ministry. Now, all I need to do is to appeal to the record, and the first record I will appeal to is the statement made by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, in this House and before the country, last night, on that subject—and I defy any honest-minded man to show, that in the whole relation of the history of his action, and that of the Liberal-Conservative party in that matter, there is anything which can be fairly called an excess of party spirit. I for my own part listened with pleasure, and I believe the country will read with pleasure the unimpassioned, straightforward and frank way in which that statement was made before the House, and every accession of fact that was gathered to the one that preceded it showed my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) as far from moving in the interest of party, and as being actuated by broad patriotic motives in the interests of Canada and the empire. There is only one party advantage that ought to be, or that will be allowed to be taken by any party in this country on a matter of this kind. It is the party advantage which fairly accrues to the opposition because of hesitancy, because of incompetency, and because of incapacity on the part of the government in dealing with even the most important questions. All that fairly goes to the discredit of the party that is guilty of it, and accrues to the advantage of the party which points out the better and the surer method. That party advantage, if there be any, is fairly due to the Liberal-Conservative party. The advantage to hon. gentlemen opposite, if any, will be derived from a fair and cool and collected review of their action by their friends. But, Sir, from the first time that Sir Charles Tupper rose in this House, when our hon. friend from North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) brought up the idea of in some way showing active help for Great Britain in the then probably coming struggle; from the first time that Sir Charles Tupper rose in this House to make a suggestion (and he gave it merely as a suggestion), from that time to the present, every suggestion that Sir Charles Tupper has made has been an offer of frank and fair support to the Prime Minister and the government of the country, in forwarding what he believed, what we believed, what we all believe, I hope, is the sentiment of this country, namely, that there should be a hearty and united effort made to help the empire in this crisis. I am not going to debate that question any further.

There is another cry that is raised, and I propose to say something about it. I am sorry that any one in this House is obliged to say anything about it. It is a matter which I would rather see both parties relegate into the limbo of absolute forgetfulness and oblivion. But it is here, and it is my duty to speak of it. It has been urged against the Liberal-Conservative party and it becomes the duty of the Liberal-Conservative party to sift it out; anyway, to make a statement on it and let it go to the country. What is that allegation? It is in the words of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte): That there would have been nothing heard of this agitation if it had not been that there was a Frenchman at the head of this government. What does that mean in plain language? My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) last night, in a passion, with quivering lips and with pale face, hissed out his condemnation of what he called the reptile press which dared to criticise his high mightiness. The reptile press! No paper supporting the Liberal-Conservative party is to-day fawning on the hand of my right hon. friend or on any one of his cabinet colleagues for favours, present, past, or prospective. No Liberal-Conservative newspaper to-day is feeding at the trough so liberally supplied by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte)—

An hon MEMBER. They cannot get anything.

Mr. FOSTER. I thought I heard a sound. There will be enough left for my hon. friend and the others—the trough is not yet empty.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It was nearly empty when you left it.

Mr. FOSTER. The good tax-payers of Canada have been called upon to fill it up since. Every Liberal-Conservative paper in Canada to-day is maintaining itself through its own honest, assiduous endeavours, and is doing its work independent of subsidies or fees of any kind, and it ill-becomes my right hon. friend to try to stop the mouths of independent critics in the great Liberal-Conservative press of this country by hissing out the word 'reptile' in connection with them. If there is a reptile press anywhere—and I do not like to think there is within the broad bounds of Canada a paper on either side of politics, which would sink its manhood and its principles, and trim its advocacy of those principles for any government pap or government subsidies whatever. But, if there is any reptile press in this country, it belongs to the side where the Prime Minister is, and where his Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) and his Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) and his Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) care for the faithful around the camp fires.

Mr. McMULLEN. Nonsense.

Mr. FOSTER. From the doleful sound I hear, I imagine that my hon. friend (Mr. McMullen) is hungry.

Mr. McMULLEN. Not half as much as you are.

Mr. FOSTER. The groan of my hon. friend (Mr. McMullen) sounds very much like the pangs of a very hungry man. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to the reptile press or to any press to substantiate my charge, that the accusation is forced against the Liberal-Conservative party; that the whole agitation that is being carried on in reference to this matter is chiefly due to the race cry which the Liberal-Conservatives are striving to raise. I will take perhaps higher authority. I will take the words of a man who stands on the press; a man who owns one of the greatest organs in this country; a man who commenced his cabinet ministership with the idea that he could be an editor over his own name and a cabinet minister as well. I will take the words of a man who thought that as a cabinet minister he could be responsible for what he said as a cabinet minister, and that then he could indite articles on public policy in his own paper signed by his own name and not be held responsible for them. However, he was very quickly called down by his colleagues in that respect—it was inconvenient to say the least of it. But the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) has just as surely his personal organ now as he had then, and on matters of public policy it reflects the sentiments of my hon. friend (Mr. Tarte) and its writings on these public questions are without doubt indicted and censored before they get publication in the columns of that paper. Now, what does this hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) say? In his celebrated speech at St. Vincent de Paul, he said:

They (the Liberal-Conservatives) decided long ago to raise the question of race.

Where is the proof? My hon. friend (Mr. Tarte) is going to speak in the course of this debate.

Mr. TARTE. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. He is not now before an admiring coterie of friends under the shadow of St. Vincent de Paul. He is here as a minister of the Crown, and as a minister of the Crown I tax him for having made that allegation—most dastardly, if it be not true, and, coming from a cabinet minister, most mischievous, even if it were true—most mischievous, making it with his own words on his own responsibility as a minister of the Crown and making the whole government responsible for the charge. I want him (Mr. Tarte) to give the proof by which and upon which he declares, that the Liberal-Conservatives decided long ago to raise the question of race. What further did he say? Listen to this from the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte):

There are writers in the pay of Sir Charles Tupper who call us an inferior race, who threaten to crush us by the force of arms if they do not get rid by the force of the ballot, of the first French Canadian Prime Minister.

That is high politics—for a member of the Liberal cabinet to make an assertion of that kind, to make it when he did, to make it for the purpose and the only purpose for which he did—as though to say that Sir Charles Tupper employed and paid men to raise a crusade against the French Canadian people as an inferior race in order to get rid of a French Canadian as Prime Minister. I ask my hon. friend to make good that word, and to make it good by proof, or to stand disgraced before his colleagues. My hon. friend is not in the Parliament House at Quebec, nor even on the outside of it. My hon. friend is not before a chosen band of his own stripe. My hon. friend is where he is a sworn privy-councillor; he is bound to state the truth before his Queen and country; and when he makes a statement like that, which is a venturesome, a bold, a most grave and important statement, he shall not go out of this House this session until he proves that statement or abandons it disowned and disgraced. I quite understand that our hon. friends opposite know that they are playing at government. They laugh over these things. Why, Sir, last night, when my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, was praising a gift of unparalleled benevolence, by which some gentleman through him, unfortunately, for appreciation on that side of the House, did the most munificent thing of securing for the soldiers of the first contingent insurance to the amount of $1,000,000, so that, as he explained, if a man died within thirty days of battle or was killed in battle, his heir would get $1,000, if he were maimed in certain members he would get $1,000, and if maimed in others he would get $500, there was a wild laugh from some gentlemen on the other side of the House.

An hon. MEMBER. A number of them.

Mr. FOSTER. If it had been an outside audience, the thought that flashed through my mind was: was that the laugh of a fool or a fiend? My right hon. friend may smile over it; but that mother of the Canadian boy who has gone out to the Transvaal with his mother's prayers about him to fight for his country, and who falls with his face to the foe in defence of the flag, when, Sir, the cable flashes back to that mother's heart the news that her son has died, that poor mother would not laugh and revile, and ridicule. She would thank for many a day the kind and beneficent donor whose act enabled $1,000 to be placed to the credit of her lost breadwinner. A fine sneer curled the lip of the Minister of Agriculture when my hon. friend began to speak about that insurance. My hon. friend does not need it; but there are many poor families in this country, who, before this cruel war is over, will have reason again and again to thank the kind and benevolent spirit that made that munificent provision for times of darkness and distress.

Now, Sir, the Minister of Public Works gives a wonderfully naive and imposing turn to his sentences. After having read that miserable and unfounded accusation, he, a Minister of the Crown, turned around to his French confreres, and said:

I hope that in the presence of provocations like these, you will understand your duties, whatever your political opinions may have been in the past.

That is high politics from a gentleman who accuses others. What kind of politics ought that to be called? The hon. gentleman makes a statement that he has never proved, that he cannot prove, an audacious statement, and then he turns to his confiding French friends and says: 'There you have it: they are trying to kill a Frenchman. Now, you vote against them, for their purposes are deadly and fell to-high politics for a Liberal government. He says:

I am come to ask you if Sir Charles Tupper and those about him taunt us with being an inferior race—

Will my hon. friend make a note of that, and give us the page, the time and the place where Sir Charles Tupper made any statement like that, taunting the French people with being an inferior race?

—when they declare they wish to give the minority power by force of arms, if it is not time to say to Sir Charles Tupper, 'Stop there, you are going too far.'

Now, will my hon. friend, a cabinet minister, sworn as a privy-councillor, make the least approach to the proof that Sir Charles Tupper or any person accredited by Sir Charles Tupper ever made a statement of that kind?

Sir Charles Tupper goes about crying and making his followers cry everywhere that the French Canadians are disloyal men.

That is said by a minister of the Crown; that is said by the government; they take the responsibility of it. My hon. friend is to speak: let him name the time and the place where Sir Charles Tupper or any other Conservative leader ever stated that the French people were a disloyal race. La Presse declared that my hon. friend's supporter was a disloyal man, both of them French Canadians, because of the statement of something that the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Monet) said:

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Over his own name.

Mr. FOSTER. Over his own name. The assertion that a leader of a great party and his colleagues go about in a country which has two millions of French Canadian citizens, with whom we live and do business, declaring that they are a disloyal race, is contrary to reason and is absolutely untrue.

It has been sought to make this a race question—why? Because Sir Wilfrid Laurier is the Prime Minister of this country, and because my name is Tarte.

Mr. BENNETT. His name will be Dennis.

Mr. FOSTER. Who has sought to make it a race question because Sir Wilfrid is the Prime Minister and a Frenchman, or because the Minister of Public Works has the euphonious name of Tarte. He says:

If Sir Wilfrid, instead of being French, had been English, we would have heard nothing of all that.

There is a statement which any man can test by his own common sense. Let me put it to you. If the unthinkable thought could be thought that the Hon. William Mulock was Prime Minister of this country—and perhaps it will not, in the long future be an unthinkable thought—and he acted in the same delaying, hesitating, inconsistent way as the Prime Minister did—does any one doubt that Liberal-Conservatives would have been on his track just exactly as they were on that of the Prime Minister. There is an absolutely fair way of thinking out this matter, each man for himself, and every man knows that the criticism is not against the race of the one who happens to be in power, but against his action or lack of action in this case. Then in this wise the hon. gentleman winds up by saying:

I regret that he (Sir Charles Tupper) is devoting the last years of his life, of a career which is nearly terminated, to arousing in this country racial and religious animosity.

But in Sherbrooke the right hon. gentleman made the statement that Sir Charles Tupper is saying that I did not move because I am French, and in Quebec his followers are saying that I go too far because I have English sympathies.

I challenge my right hon. friend to prove by one quotation, by one single bit of evidence, the statement he then made in order to gain votes, that Sir Charles Tupper was saying in the province of Ontario that the Prime Minister would not act because he was a Frenchman. What is the difference between the Prime Minister and the Minister of Public Works on the plane of political action in this respect? It is only that the Prime Minister, as head of the government, ought to be most specially careful how he makes statements such as that, and on all subjects on which he makes a statement, he should be most specially careful when the question is one of either religion or race. What did the Minister of Public Works say in Sherbrooke? He said:

The question to-day is to know whether a French Canadian is as good as an Englishman. I say yes, without fear. The English have had their turn. For the first time we have a French Premier. I think he has no reason to be ashamed of his race. Our English friends are as proud of it as we.

I hope that there are Conservatives among you who hear me, and I beg of you to speak to all the French Canadian Conservatives of Sherbrooke, and ask them why they should wish to drive Sir Wilfrid Laurier out of power. All Canada has its eyes on you. It wants to know if because the government has at its head one of ourselves it does not merit confidence.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Shame.

Mr. FOSTER. Here is the race cry—a pure, unadulterated appeal to the meanest feeling that could be invoked in political life.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Shame.

Mr. FOSTER. And the hon. gentleman repeated that idea, not once nor twice, but over and over again. Now, Sir, the issue in Sherbrooke was as to whether the policy of this government ought to be upheld by the people. It was as to whether the party which had left its pledges unfulfilled, to the detriment of the people of the country, ought to be rejected or not at the polls? There was no question as to whether we should put one man out and another in simply because he was of French or English or Irish extraction. Mr. Speaker, in this country of ours, composite as it is and necessarily must be, the great lesson that we cannot learn too soon is that, despite all the lines of difference which must necessarily mark people of different races and creeds and religions, arising from inherent, constitutional reasons, from associations and environments, acting for hundreds of years, from modes and habits of thought which have grown up essentially different on the principles on which they are founded amongst different civilizations and different nationalities—aside from those rifts and differences which must exist in this country to a large extent, and which it is impossible to eradicate—I say that outside of those, it is a lesson that we cannot learn too soon and inculcate too widely, that we must be charitable to each other's point of view, and endeavour to discover the excellencies in each rather than the deficiencies. Your Englishman, Irishman and Scotchman—each has his faults. And so has your Frenchman. But every nationality has its excellencies, and we would have a hard time getting along in this world if we were simply to look at the faults and exaggerate them, and not give due credit to the excellencies. It is impossible absolutely to prevent in political life some little coming to the surface of this friction of race and creed in this country. But if ministers of the Crown drag in these causes of friction by the heels at every opportunity and accentuate them, if from their high and leading position they inflame those prejudices, what is to become of the unity of this country, and the harmony between its two dominant races? I am not here as sponsor for the French people, but I believe that this is absolutely true, that if you were to take the vote of the French people in this country to-day, if you were to give them the absolute and speedy choice of transferring themselves to a colonial position under the colonial administration of France as it is to-day, or remain as they are now, there is not an intelligent Frenchman in the Dominion who would make the transfer.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. I think that is a statement which cannot be controverted. I believe that is a truth upon which we can build up a people in a fair and good working union. I believe it is something which stands like the ages and will always stand. Before I came to this parliament, I had very little commerce with French Canadians of any class. But since I have come to this parliament I have become acquainted with the French people, I have mingled with them as colleagues and honourable opponents, and I know them better and appreciate them more than when I knew comparatively nothing of them. All the attrition of commerce, social intercourse and political intercourse, superadded to that principle I spoke of before, will make of us, not a people who will all have the same language and religion, but a people of two languages and origins, each, however, good citizens and vieing with each other in furthering the progress of this country. I commend to the Minister of Public Works that he should change his course in this particular, and that it is not seemly that a member of the cabinet should enkindle the inflammable prejudices and feelings of people, whether they be English or French, for all people have their feelings and prejudices; that it is better for us, from this day forward, to act on the assumption that every man is a good citizen of this country, and to cultivate that feeling until every man feels that he must aspire to be a good citizen, for we live here, English and French and Irish and Scotch, all together under the flag of the country which has been a mother to us all in securing the blessings of freedom. So much with reference to that cry.

But the criticism of the Liberal-Conservative party is on other lines—not because we are over-anxious for party advantages, absolutely not because we wish to bring up any question of race or religion, but because we feel that in certain respects the administration of this country failed to grasp the importance of a great idea, failed to carry out that idea with promptitude and consistency. I believe, Sir, that hon. gentlemen opposite failed to grasp the ground-truth which underlay this whole matter. What was that great ground-truth? It was not simply that Canada wished to shine as one of the dependencies of Britain. It was not that Canada simply wished some of her people to gain glory on a foreign field. It was not that Canada wished to obtain commercial advantage through the sale of her products. No, the great ground-truth which underlay this whole sentiment was this—that within these last years there has been growing up in every dependency of Great Britain, and in the old country as well, the belief that the future of these countries was intimately bound up with the unity of the empire. And, Sir, if there is one thing that thrills in the blood of the Canadian volunteer to-day it is the subtle symbolism of the flag of the empire. It is not the Maple Leaf, it is not the Australian flag, it is not the flag of Cape Colony, but it is the flag of that grand old empire which he feels symbolizes the progress of his race as a whole, which symbolizes the permanency and extension of liberty civil and religious. It was a pitiable contention to my mind, that the hon. gentleman made—that he was waiting for public opinion. No contention was ever made so self-condemnatory as that single sentence. Why should the hon. gentleman wait for public opinion to hurtle its hailstones around him? Had not he the depth of heart and grasp of mind to know that there was a spirit abroad in this great empire of ours which would not countenance a man without condemnation who, having the power, did not reach out his arm at once to assist the mother country? Are hon. gentlemen such poor readers of the sentiment of this country, have they such a poor understanding of the spirit which thrills every dependency of the British Empire to-day? Why, the hon. gentleman does not do justice to himself. He felt a thrill of that spirit when, two years ago, he sat by the side of the Prince of Wales in the metropolis of this great empire, and breathing the atmosphere of imperialism, filled with the glory of the occasion, declared that whenever Britain should light her signal fires and call for Canadian help, he, as Canadian Prime Minister, could assure them Canadian help would come. Two years passed with all its tide of great events rolling on in the same direction, but when it comes to sending a thousand Canadian volunteers—to allow them to go—my hon. friend says he wants to see the hurricane of public opinion go by before he leaps upon its wings and is swept to the goal toward which it moves. Sir, a leader is a man who keeps even with public sentiment, who precedes public sentiment and leads it. My hon. friend declared, with seriousness and earnestness it seemed, that he was waiting and considering and weighing. He declared that it was the most important question that ever was before Canada, he did not want to move hastily, it would be criminal to do so. He was waiting, considering, weighing. In the name of all that is great, if he was waiting and considering, weighing, why did he open his mouth on the 3rd of October? The hon. gentleman condemned himself in these very words that he spoke during the time he said he was watching and waiting and weighing to find what the sentiment of this country was. As Prime Minister, representing every member of the cabinet, no doubt having talked to every one of them before making a statement on the most important question that had ever engrossed the attention of Canada, he said: We have no constitutional authority, we have no money, we cannot do anything; we do not intend to do anything. That is a fine method of waiting and weighing and considering. So far as he could he tried to chloroform the feeling which was setting toward the goal which it ultimately obtained in spite of him. The weight of his statement as a lawyer, as a Prime Minister, as a man who knew public opinion, as one versed in the affairs of nations—his opinion went out to the people of this country before they had a chance to make themselves heard saying to the people with all the weight and power of his influence: Stay just where you are, do nothing, by-and-by parliament will meet and we will see what will be done. That was waiting and weighing and considering. But, he says: I had no warrant that public opinion was setting in that direction. No man ever had more. Why, Sir, from 1897 should date the conversion of this hon. gentleman, and, by his profession of faith made in London, we thought that conversion was definite and complete. Then, the beacon fires had only to be lighted and the troops would go. From that time the great wave of Imperial feeling sweeping through the British Empire was constantly increasing, and should have been heard by the ears and felt by the heart of my hon. friend. He says he had no warrant. What greater warrant could he have of the will of the people than this independent House of Commons? Where else should he seek for it over the heads of this independent House of Commons. This House of Commons last July, passed a unanimous resolution which, if it meant anything meant a declaration of hearty accord in the purposes of the British Empire and of the support of those purposes by every means that we could compass. Is the justice of the cause any warrant that right-minded people should support it? My hon. friend admitted and argued the justice of the cause in July, 1899. He has never questioned it, he says. Then he had certainly a good cause to believe that this parliament expressed as nearly as it could be expressed the sentiment felt throughout this country, a sentiment expressed without a discordant voice. All those whose ears were attuned to the expression of the people's will could hear from every part of the country the earnest, strong whispers going up: Let us do our part as Canadians in this the hour of Britain's trial. What more could he have had? And yet he declared that he did not act and could not act until Kruger's ultimatum. Now, Mr. Speaker, will you just allow me to mention the statement made by the right hon. gentleman, after Kruger's ultimatum, that is the 9th of October. What did my right hon. friend say? He said: From that date we had no hesitation, there was no delay. Who? The government of this country? Yes. After the 9th of October there was no doubt, no hesitation, no delay. Where was your Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) after the 9th of October? Every one of these statements which he has made, he made after the 9th of October, when the cabinet having decided, having no difference, being convinced, brooking no delay, should have marched with the step of one man. And yet after the 9th of October, a colleague, and a dominant colleague of my right hon. friend, in public, in the press, everywhere, was using his strongest influence to get this country to declare that nothing should be done in this matter. Now, what position does the Ministry stand in on that subject? Everything was without doubt and hesitancy after the 9th; yet the Minister of Public Works was going through this country denouncing his own colleagues, denouncing them because of the opinions which they held with reference to this. He was not satisfied with having a bout with General Hutton, that was only a skirmish. He attacked Chief Justice Meredith, which, I suppose, was just a preliminary canter. Then he went into it with right good will and fell foul of the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), in his own government, and criticised in the public press one of his own colleagues for acting unconstitutionally and not knowing what the constitution of a free country meant. Yet there was no hesitancy, no doubt, after October 9!

But my right hon. friend found another lion in the path. He was deterred for a long while from action—by what? By the weighty statements of Sir Charles Tupper.

Well, we all know that the leader of the opposition has had a great influence over this government. It has been an open question as to who was doing the leading, the man who pushed, or the man who reluctantly walked ahead. But from this time forward there is no doubt upon that point. My hon. friend's impulses were to do right, but he looked over at the sturdy form and the determined countenance of Sir Charles Tupper, and he shrank back appalled. And actually, last night, he took up the time of this House reading consecutively from Sir Charles Tupper's speeches to prove—what? Well, I do not know what he thought to prove, but what he succeeded in proving was exactly what Sir Charles Tupper himself would like him to have done. Did he prove that Sir Charles Tupper was against colonial aid in Imperial affairs? Nothing of the kind. The hon. gentleman read it with such gusto, and his followers clapped their hands with such animation, that he believed he was making a fine point. He was, but it was a point against himself. If my hon. friend would just get a grasp of the circumstances, and not simply pick up a paragraph in a speech, or in a paper, and try to put it forward as a fair illustration of the circumstances and the expression on the whole subject, he would do better. What was the proposition that Sir Charles Tupper was combatting? It was a proposition that was advanced somewhat on these broad lines by a society, that England should levy a contribution upon every one of the independent colonies to support her army and navy. That was the proposition, and in arguing for that proposition they declared that Canada had done nothing; some of them went even so far as to say: You must either do that or get out of the empire, one or the other. And what was Sir Charles Tupper's argument? It was to show that, in the first place, that was not the right principle to go upon; it would have been really taxation without representation. Suppose Great Britain or the British Empire at any time, within the last ten years, in these bitter times of public and Imperial sentiment, were to pass a proposition to levy an absolute tax for naval and war purposes on every one of the dependencies of the empire, every one of the dependencies would have something to say about it. It would be going the wrong way to work. It is for the dependency to offer the contribution, and not for the demand to be made from an outside power, politically speaking, to the colony for a forced contribution. The leader of the opposition did not believe that that was the proper way; he did believe, however, that it was not fair that Canada should be held up as not having done anything towards Imperial defence. And so he instanced the expenditure of from one to two million dollars every year on our militia system, the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which made an Imperial war road for the British Empire, and the proposition to have fast lines running on the Pacific and on the Atlantic; and in one of his addresses he says that one of the first uses to which the fast line would probably be put would be to carry Canadian volunteers to help England in some foreign war. Yet my hon. friend took up the time of this House in trying to prove that the leader of the opposition was inconsistent. He was frightened and deterred by these ghosts that he had conjured up.

Well, now, one of the oddest explanations was the explanation given by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), on the 13th of October, and repeated here last night by my hon. friend. The Minister of Finance said—I will quote him as nearly as my memory allows—in a statement he made to the papers on the 13th of October, that a great many statements had been going the rounds, but there had been very little truth in them. Here, he said, is the statement of the case. As to the desirability of sending troops there never was any question; but the first thing that occurred was the constitutional difficulty, and it is only within the last few days that that difficulty has been removed. How removed? Who removed the constitutional difficulties? The Prime Minister last night said much the same, and how did he undertake to prove it? Constitutionally he had no power; in the parliamentary sense he had no money, therefore, he could not do anything. But this communication of the British government lightened it all up. Why? Because, under it he could send men in units of 125. That was his explanation; nothing more. As to the constitutional difficulty and the money difficulty they are not as binding and imperative in the case of half a million dollars of expenditure as in the case of one million expenditure. And so, he says, that lets us out. The British government did nothing, and could do nothing, to take the constitutional difficulty out of the way if there were a constitutional difficulty, and the right hon. gentleman, himself, acknowledged that, because he afterwards sent a thousand men with all the costs and charges, which were, to that extent, put upon the country. Well, the right hon. gentleman condemns himself out of his own mouth. Will he allow me to read one section of the Order in Council, which he, himself, signed and passed:

The Prime Minister, in view of the well known desire of a great many Canadians who are ready to take service under such conditions, is of the opinion that the moderate expenditure which would thus be involved for the equipment and transportation of such volunteers, may readily be undertaken by the government of Canada without summoning parliament.

On October 3, he declared that the constitution was in the way, that he had no money and could do nothing, while, here, he declares, in his own Order in Council, that for a moderate expenditure of about $1,000,000 and for the purposes named, he thought it might be done without summoning parliament. Then he goes on to say:

Especially as such an expenditure, under such circumstances, cannot be regarded as a departure from the well-known principles of constitutional government and colonial practice.

Had he not the same authority on October 3? There was the same constitutional government and colonial practice then. All that he was asked to do was to send a thousand men. He refused to send them and he gave us the excuse that constitutional practice was against him. His own Order in Council declares that he is amply justified by constitutional usage and colonial practice in sending out these men. What made the change? What? Public opinion came to the right hon. gentleman's ear; he felt something push him and he found out a different interpretation of the constitutional practice from that which he held when he did not want to act. Now, much has been said about this question of precedent. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Public Works what led his audience to understand when he said, flourishing the Order in Council in his hand, which we did not get at all until last night; troops have been sent once, but here is the document which says that this shall be no precedent, and I got it put there. It has been done this time, but it will not be done again until we get Imperial representation in the councils of Britain. The whole point that is in view by the right hon. Prime Minister in his report to council is the question of expenditure. Listen while I read it:

The Prime Minister, in view of the well known desire of a great many Canadians who are ready to take service under such conditions, is of opinion that the moderate expenditure which would thus be involved for the equipment and transportation of such volunteers, may readily be undertaken by the government of Canada without summoning parliament, especially as such an expenditure, under such circumstances cannot be regarded as a departure from the well known principles of constitutional government and colonial practice, nor construed as a precedent for future action.

What construed? The expenditure of money without the authority of parliament and nothing else. Now, the hon. Minister of Public Works, either through faulty reading or through some carelessness, has misrepresented what that means. It does not mean that it is the sending of the volunteers to take part in the quarrels of Britain, as it has been said, which is not to be a precedent, but it states that the expenditure, without constitutional and parliamentary appropriation, shall not be construed as a precedent, and that is all that it says. But, this says something else. The right hon. Prime Minister himself, the hon. Minister of Public Works, the seconder of the address (Mr. Geoffrion), yesterday, Le Soleil newspaper, the hon. Minister of Public Works in Toronto, over and over again have made this statement, and I ask his attention in it: We have only done what the British government asked us to do. The Prime Minister stated that, the newspapers stated it, the hon. Minister of Public Works stated it in a letter to Mr. J. Castell Hopkins. He said:

It is very well to say that the people of Canada, or of other colonies, have this time made a voluntary offer. In point of fact, the Secretary of State for the Colonies has sent a circular to all the colonies the meaning of which is an invitation to send troops. In my opinion, such an invitation means practically a request. Well, if we have to take our share in the wars of England, let us have a word to say about it.

In Toronto, on the 30th January, he said:

When I read in the cables from the other side that the Secretary of State for the Colonies had issued a circular inviting the colonies to send troops to South Africa, I will frankly admit that I did not feel any very strong inclination to comply with his wishes.

You can multiply these instances; that is the interpretation that has been put upon that circular by my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, by the right hon. gentleman who leads the government, by the seconder of the address yesterday, and so on all the way through, giving that as the excuse for doing the thing that has been done. I deny that the British government ever asked Canada to send a single volunteer to aid them in the Transvaal. The British government have not asked any of the dependencies of Great Britain, in this crisis, to send troops to help them. What the British government have done is that when offers were sent to the British government by the colonies asking to be permitted to contribute their quota to the struggle they sent a circular directing how these offers should be made operative, and it is an untrue way and a positively wrong way to represent it as much as to say: Oh, well, Great Britain asked us to do it, and what else could we do? Great Britain simply, gratefully, took the offers that were made and sent out a plan saying in what way these offers should be made practicable and operative.

Now, Sir, I have not very much time left, but I do want to say a word as to the most extraordinary position occupied to-day by the government and by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), and the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Monet). The right hon. gentleman did not meet that question last night, and that is where he showed again that they are simply playing at government. I echo the words, which were stated so strongly by the hon. leader of the opposition that it is little else than a scandalous thing for a cabinet to play fast and loose with principles as regards its supporters.

The only course that is dignified, the only course that is constitutional, the only course that is British, is, for the government to stand on what it thinks is right and to hew to the line, no matter whether it be a supporter or an opponent, who thinks differently from them. You have no warrant for anything like constitutional and dignified government if you play fast and loose, as the right hon. Prime Minister is doing in this case. How did he meet it? 'Oh,' he said, with that peculiar shrug of his, 'the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) did not see eye to eye with me. Does the hon. member (Mr. Bourassa) see eye to eye with the Prime Minister yet? The First Minister told us last night that the member for Labelle did not at that time see eye to eye with the government. Does the member for Labelle see eye to eye with the government now?

Mr. BERGERON. He sees eye to eye with the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte).

Mr. FOSTER. Let me see what Mr. Bourassa says.

Mr. BOURASSA. I will show the hon. gentleman before long what my position is.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, but 'before long' is not just now. Mr. Bourassa's own letter has been read, but Mr. Bourassa's speech at Papineauville has not been read to this House. I am not going to read it—

Mr. BOURASSA. I have no objection.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not going to read it, but I am going to say that from the beginning to the end it proves his unalterable antagonism to a cent from out of the treasury of Canada being paid to our volunteers in part or in whole, unless we have representation, unless the constitutional method is applied, by obtaining the consent of parliament first. Here is the resolution which was passed by the hon. gentleman's own constituents, and which binds him and which he carries in his pocket this day in the House. Will the Prime Minister listen to this:

Be it resolved, that we, British subjects, free electors of united Canada, assembled in a public meeting at Papineauville and Montebello, on the 22nd of October, 1899, protest of our loyalty to the British Crown and to our most respected sovereign, Queen Victoria, and our attachment to the constitution that rules us. That without any distinction of political parties, we approve of the fair and independent attitude taken by Mr. Henri Bourassa, our deputy, on the question of the Transvaal. That we oppose all attempts of greater federation on behalf of the empire, and also the participation of Canada in the Imperial wars without any right of representation in the Imperial councils.

Mr. BOURASSA. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. member (Mr. Bourassa) bows his assent to that. That is his guiding principle. That was his principle then, is now, and will continue to be if I read the hon. member for Labelle aright. He is not a boy who is going to play with principles. When he took the most responsible and grave action a man can take to show his disapprobation of a cardinal policy of the government and appealed to his constituents against the government, he did so because he believed it. There is the answer of his people, and 'any participation in Imperial wars without representation in the Imperial councils,' Mr. Bourassa is here to oppose, and will oppose if he has any regard to consistency and principle. Now, the Prime Minister himself said: 'This is the most important question that ever has arisen in Canada.' On that most important question, he and Mr. Bourassa are poles apart, absolutely sundered, and the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) is bound to oppose the Prime Minister by all honourable political warfare until he drags him from power for violating that principle.

Mr. BOURASSA. And let the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) get the Prime Minister's place.

Mr. FOSTER. What has happened? The constituency of Labelle was opened and it passed that resolution of condemnation on the government, and it authorized its member to come here and stand up for that principle, and yet that member has not put his face within the doors of the House of Commons before that same government which was condemned by his constituency, goes out and takes him by the right hand, and introduces him as a supporter into this House. And, Sir, they emphasize the position, in what way? By asking the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Monet) to help introduce him (Mr. Bourassa) to this House.

Now, what is the position taken by the member for Laprairie (Mr. Monet) who, I believe, intends to stand by what he has stated to his constituents. The hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Monet) is back here with just as strong a verdict from his constituents as the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). He gave broadcast to his electors this:

If there are twenty-five of you who will signify by your own signatures that you disagree with me, I will resign.

He did not get twenty-five, I suppose, for he has not resigned.

Mr. MONET. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. Therefore, you may say that his county is absolutely behind his back in opposition to the policy of the Prime Minister. And what did the hon. member (Mr. Monet) tell the people? He told them that he is willing to spend a little money for courtesy's sake, and there he shows his true French descent. He told them that he is willing to do a little more for the sake of the party—there he shows another admirable trait. But, when it comes to real hard knocks in expenditure of money, Mr. Monet told his people that he set his face like flint against that; that he did not want to strengthen any ties between Canada and the empire unless it was the commercial tie. Here is what he said:

We have almost nothing in common with the old country. I do not wish to spend a cent to tighten the ties other than commercial ties that bind us to Great Britain. I am a Canadian. My idea is to see Canada take rank among the independent nations as soon as she is sufficiently developed by the vitality of our population and the immensity of our national resources. In order, therefore, to reach this end, we want all our revenue here to develop our resources and attract immigration, instead of sending our people as targets to South Africa.

Sir, that is the language of the son of a well-known political father. The very sentiment that Mr. Monet placed on record there was taught him by the right hon. the Prime Minister, who spoke it in the heart of Boston, in the centre of the United States. Did not the Prime Minister say there and from platforms in this country, that he knew that the two ways would verge apart, that the two countries would separate, and that as the ripe apple fell on maturity from the trees, so Canada would ultimately fall away into an independent power, and drop from the great parent bough.

Mr. MONET. Does not the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) believe the same thing.

Mr. FOSTER. No, sir. I would be very sorry indeed to make a statement such as my hon. friend (Mr. Monet) made. I would be very sorry indeed to claim the protection of the British flag, to claim the privileges of one of the citizens of this country, and then to insult the very best feeling in this country to-day—the feeling of the Prime Minister if he is honest, the feeling of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) if he is honest, the feeling of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), and I know it is that gentleman's feeling; the feeling of the people of this country; that everything that we can do to bind firmer and stronger the ties that are uniting us with Great Britain, is the one absolute thing for us Canadians. Where is the man on that side of the House who will get up and deny it? There you are, hard-headed, sensible men. There sits the gentleman who says that he would not give a cent to strengthen the tie to Britain; and yet he asks me if those are not my sentiments. They are not my sentiments, nor yours, nor any other man's in this House to-night.

Mr. MONET. I did not say that. I thought the hon. gentleman was dealing with the question of spending money to tie more closely the ties that bind us to England. My interruption meant only this: did the hon. gentleman believe that later on Canada will have to take rank among independent nations?

Mr. FOSTER. That is a fair question; and, first, so far as I am concerned, I think we have enough to do, to do the work that is presently before us. At this present time I am absolutely opposed to independence, and I do not believe the time will ever come, unless the genius of things changes greatly from what the history of the past teaches me that it will, when independence away from Great Britain would be better than independence within the lap of the British Empire. On what ground? Less expense? Greater security? Greater honour? The heritage of a nobler history? Is there any single feeling of an independent man that is outraged by the position we hold to-day as a member of the British Empire? Is it not a fact that the dearest interests of every man would be rendered less secure if we were to drop out of the British Empire in these days of national predatory instincts? Look at Germany, look at Russia, look at France to-day, and what do you find? Every one of these powers stands like a tiger ready to spring—looking for what? Unoccupied territory? Yes, or territory that they are powerful enough to occupy; and what a glorious opportunity would be offered if this broad Dominion of Canada became the hunting ground for national rivalry and national absorption. The hon. gentleman does not want to spend money. How much money, and how much blood would it then take to keep your country and your security? On none of these grounds can I see where the advocate of independence has any chance at this moment. That, Sir, is the statement of the case. The right hon. Prime Minister brings these men into this House as supporters. May I say one word to the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa)?

Mr. BOURASSA. Oh, yes, as many as you like.

Mr. FOSTER. He is a young man full of promise, with a fine career before him. No one hopes more than I that it will be a distinguished and successful one. But he will make his career just now according to the way in which he sets and conducts himself on this most trying and important occasion; and he must think for himself whether he can play fast and loose with his principles, and support men who have, not once, but twice and three times, struck, and who perhaps in the future will continue to strike, at the very principle which he considered sound and strong enough to induce him to condemn them and to get his constituency to condemn them.

Mr. BOURASSA. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Suppose he had been in power, would he have been prepared to uphold the principle I upheld?

Mr. FOSTER. Now, let me ask my hon. friend another thing. What is the political morality of this appeal? That when a man believes that a principle is wrong and he cannot support it, he is seduced to support it simply because one whispers in his ear that the other fellows may gain a political advantage if he stands by his principles? Is that a sound political morality? That is the excuse of the Minister of Public Works. That is the excuse of Le Soleil. 'Yield,' says Le Soleil, don't you see that Sir Charles Tupper is after you? If he gets into power, you will have to send a hundred thousand. Therefore, yield, Mr. Laurier.' What did the Minister of Public Works himself say? 'I held a strong view; I dissented from my colleagues; but do you want me to throw myself into the hands of Sir Charles Tupper?' God forbid!—(that is my own interjection). But is that political morality? A principle is great with you; but you will stand upon its shattered remnants rather than do a thing which you believe is right for fear perchance it may help those opposed to your party. That surely is not the highest plane of political action.

And, now, Sir, to come to the end. The right hon. gentleman finished his speech with a very pretty passage, in which he threw a tremendous responsibility upon Providence. I know that Providence is all-powerful; but I would be very sorry to hold Providence responsible for the atrocities suffered at the hand of the Turk. I would be very sorry to hold Providence responsible for the want of strong arms and good rifle shooting and pluck and vigour on the battlefield. Providence has its over-ruling sphere, and it is neither for the right hon. gentleman nor myself to trace it. What we have to do is to work by means, and those means are the hearts, and the strong, steady arms and cool heads of men who love liberty and right, and who are willing to lay down their lives in order to secure it. The right hon. gentleman was good enough to say that when this war ended, as end it would, the Boers would have every right that they before possessed, and that the English would have every right that they had given to the Dutch settlers. I deny it. My hon. friend has not grasped the idea that this war on the Transvaal is not a war inspired by surface motives. It is one ideal, one civilization, battling with a totally different ideal and a totally different civilization, and it is impossible for the two to stand together. The Boer has now the right to do what? The Boer has the right to tax and give no representation; he has the right to pillage and rob and deny justice; he has the right to erect a court of justice, and then pass a law nullifying the decrees of the judges he has appointed. He has the power to murder and rob, and give no redress. Those rights and powers will not remain to the Boer when the Boer is conquered. I would rather take this strong sentence from Mr. Chamberlain, who, speaking only yesterday in the House of Commons at home, said :

Speaking for the government, I say that there shall be no second Majuba. Never again shall the Boers erect in the heart of South Africa a citadel whence proceed disaffection and race animosity. Never again shall they be able to endanger the paramountcy of Great Britain. Never again shall they be able to treat an Englishman as though he belonged to an inferior race.

And once this whole war is over, that is the end that must be attained and that absolutely and wholly.

I agree with my right hon. friend, that the British are generous when they are victorious, and when they conquer that country, as conquer they will, they will make it for ever after an integral part of the British Empire, and grant to every law-abiding peaceful Boer in the Transvaal the very same privileges that they allow to the Englishman, the Scotchman and the Irishman.

These are wonderful days in which we live. The chains are being forged to-day on the anvil beneath the swift moving hammers of history, which shall unite for ever within their bonds every dependency of Great Britain indissolubly and so long as British civilization exists. Unity is the great resistless undercurrent. Canadians feel the thrill and beat of this aspiration within their beings to-day from Vancouver to Cape Breton and Halifax. That is the undercurrent note in Australia, in South Africa, in every dependency of Great Britain, even though it be a dependency where millions once hostile and then conquered are to-day the most loving and loyal British subjects that exist in the wide world. That is the sentiment which prevails among the multitudinous people who live in every quarter of the British possessions, secure in their rights and privileges, and glad am I that Canadian blood is sealing, in this great war now going on, that sentiment and compact which unites all British subjects.

War is the greatest calamity that ever can befall a nation, said my right hon. friend. I deny it. There is one calamity which is tenfold greater. It is to lie down beneath insult and not avenge it, to suffer wrong and not vindicate the rights which belong to national manhood. War is not always a calamity. How it beats down the pettiness of modern social and commercial life and enthrones patriotism and principle, and upon the altar of patriotism and principle consecrates its best and dearest. And who shall say that England now, as compared with England months ago, Canada to-day, as compared with Canada months ago, is not on a higher, an immeasurably higher plane, with broader ideals, and a renovated life, a life instinct with the feeling of sacrifice and devotion for great principles and the achievement of a wider and higher civilization.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Mr. Speaker, I somewhat regret to perceive that neither my ancient friend, the leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), nor his first lieutenant (Mr. Foster), are in their places to-night. But we will do the best we can to deal with this important subject without the help of these distinguished personages. The debate seems to have taken a very curious turn. For some weeks, I am not sure but I might say some months, before this House assembled we were notified with much pomp and ceremony that the moment this House assembled, unless the wishes of the leader of the opposition were given due effect to, we should be straightway confronted with a motion in amendment. The leader of the opposition has been present, he has heard our statements, he has seen the speech, he has heard our views expounded—and the amendment which he threatened is not forthcoming yet. Neither he nor his lieutenant has seen fit to implement the pledge or the promise, whichever you choose to call it, which they placed before the public some weeks or months ago.

Now, Sir, on the present occasion I am not disposed to follow the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster), through the very rambling discussion which he addressed to us for the greater part of this afternoon. I will, however, take this opportunity of saying a few words in reply to certain strictures with regard to the policy of the present government and with which he associated my name. The hon. gentleman was good enough to charge us with having been false to the principles and professions of economy which we had professed for some 18 years. The hon. gentleman ventured to insinuate that in that and a variety of other things, we had entirely failed to redeem the pledges which we had given to the people. Sir, I take issue with the hon. gentleman in toto. I say that the hon. gentleman's conclusions are entirely unwarranted; I say that his promises are incorrect; I say that his facts are false and his logic is falser. Now, neither the hon. gentleman nor his friends pretend to say that the taxes levied on the people of Canada are too high. If they do, the remedy is in their own hands. If they allege that the taxes or any part of them are too high, I challenge them now and here as I have challenged them before to move in reduction of those taxes, or else to hold their peace. If the expenditure which the government of this country have incurred is in any respect excessive, I challenge them, I challenge them on the floor of this House, to move and to vote in reduction of those items that they object to. I am no believer in that kind of criticism which makes general charges but refuses to abide by particular issues. It is not the way in which I conducted debate when I had the honour of a seat as a member of Her Majesty's loyal opposition; and I think the hon. gentlemen will find that it redounds very little to their own credit, either here or in the country, if they occupy the time of this House in general charges of extravagance and corruption, in general charges of excessive taxation, yet, when challenged and put to the proof, utterly fail to implement by their votes the assertions they have made in our disparagement. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman made a point that the expenditure under the present government was much in excess of the expenditure under his own. But he forgot to tell this House, as he and his friends and his press always forget to tell the people of this country, that the bulk of the additional expenditure costs the people of Canada nothing. Sir, I say to the hon. gentleman that the burdens which the people of Canada are now called upon to bear gauged by any fair test which he chooses to apply, are very considerably less than the burthens which were inflicted under his administration. In the first place, thanks largely to the operations of our preferential tariff, the taxation, as a whole, is very considerably less than it was under their regime. In the second place, our revenue is much greater than it was in their time. In the third place, the wealth of the people of Canada is much greater than it was then. I say further, what even they cannot venture to deny, that the volume of our trade is vastly greater than it was when they held the reins of power. The hon. gentleman and his friends quote statements made by myself and some of my hon. friends around me, a matter of five years ago. Mr. Speaker, those statements were perfectly right, were perfectly true, were perfectly just under the conditions that then existed. But, when we find ourselves in the condition in which we find ourselves to-day, when we find that in that interval of something like five years the public income has risen, speaking roughly, from a gross amount of about thirty-three millions to a gross amount of well-nigh fifty millions—if the income continues to increase as it has done in the past seven months—when we find that the volume of our trade and commerce has increased by nearly one hundred and fifty millions within the space of the last three years—if the same ratio continues to prevail in the present year—when we find, what in my eyes is more important than any or all of these other tests, that, to a very great extent, the exodus of our people has stopped and that the growth of population is one hundred or two hundred per cent greater per annum than it was in the eighteen years when these gentlemen held power—then, I say, there are good grounds, not for extravagance, this government would not ask its friends to support them in any extravagant measure, but there are good grounds for a reasonable and liberal outlay, particularly in those directions in which we may look for an ample return for the money expended by us.

Now, Sir, again and for the last time, I repeat my challenge to those hon. gentlemen. If they dispute our policy, I invite them to vote it down on the floor of this House. If they do not like the preference we grant to England, I invite them, when the Budget is brought down, to bring in a measure to repeal the preference to England. If they object to the railway subsidies which, under the circumstances, we have thought fit and proper to grant to certain portions of the country that needed railways, I invite them to do what, if my memory serves, they did not attempt to do, last session or any session before, I invite them to move to strike out those particular subsidies to which they object. I invite them again, if they object to any item of our expenditure, be it for public works, be it for railways, be it for agriculture, be it for immigration, be it for what you will, I invite them to move to strike them out. I repeat, if they do not choose to give emphasis to the views they hold by their votes, I invite them, at any rate, to be quiet and leave us to govern the country as best we can.

But, Sir, it was not my intention to occupy much time of the House in the consideration of these questions, for, however important they are, however desirable it is that they should be discussed in the proper place and in a proper way, I agree with the hon. leader of the opposition in believing that they are not the questions which the people of Canada most desire to hear discussed on the floor of parliament at this time. Sir, it is my purpose to speak at some little length on the question of the contingent, or contingents, if you will, which we have lately seen fit to send to the aid of the mother country. And here let me say that I believe that this is the very last thing which any true patriot would have thought of turning to party ends, and using to stir up party strife. It is not merely that the issues raised are of the first moment, issues which will affect the whole future of Canada, issues which will affect the whole future of this empire, issues which call for the best statesmanship, not merely of Canada but of the empire, to bring to a successful result, and which call for the very gravest consideration at the hands of every man in this House; but also because the sending of this contingent does imply, as many hon. gentlemen on both sides see, a new and very important departure from the policy which has hitherto governed our relations with the empire.

Now, Sir, there are several points to which it is worth while for the House to devote a little attention. There is first the question, not by any means to be lightly passed over, of sending a contingent at all. There is the question of the action of the government in connection therewith, there is the question of the criticisms which the opponents of the government have seen fit to level at our action in this regard. Now, as to the question of sending the contingent at all, or of sending it without consulting parliament in the first instance, I say here, speaking as a member of the Canadian parliament, speaking as a Canadian statesman, speaking as one responsible to the people of Canada, and I say it most explicitly, that in ordinary cases and under ordinary circumstances we would not have been justified in sending a contingent, at any rate, without the full concurrence of parliament and after fully debating the question here. Sir, I say that we are not by any manner of means called upon to take part in every war in which England may engage. I say more, that it cannot be demanded of Canada, as a right, that she should contribute to every war in which the empire is engaged, under present circumstances. What Canada has done has been an entirely voluntary act on her part; what Canada has done has been a free gift, and therein lay its value and its importance to the empire. Sir, I know better, perhaps, than a good many of his quondam colleagues, what was the position assumed by the late Sir John A. Macdonald on this very point; and I say without hesitation that I entirely acquiesce in the position which Sir John A. Macdonald, on more than one occasion, laid down, that if ever Canada was required, as a matter of right, to interfere in the wars of the empire, Canada must have a direct voice in deciding with what countries the empire should go to war. More than that, I say that any man in Canada who advocates a different doctrine is a political flunky who is not fit to hold a seat as a representative of the Canadian people.

But while this is true as a constitutional doctrine, I desire to lay it down with one qualification; while that is the attitude that all free men should maintain on a question like this, yet if serious danger menaces the empire then it becomes our duty to act and to act promptly. Sir, I contend that just such a case has arisen on the present occasion. I will admit that until Mr. Kruger issued his proclamation offering war to the British Empire unless his terms were complied with in the very briefest possible time, there was room for doubt; I will admit that if we had been called upon to contribute a contingent towards the invasion of the South African Republic, to an attack upon the South African Republic, there might have been room for doubt. But an attack on the South African Republic is one thing, the invasion of British territory by any power under heaven, is another and a very different thing.

Sir, in the proclamation to which I refer, Mr. Kruger put a question, and the question rightly understood was neither more or less than this: Shall the British flag continue to float in South Africa at all? Shall South Africa, and with South Africa, the huge domains that have fallen under the control of the British sovereign in that great continent, shall they be British or shall they be Boer for evermore? I say to such questions so put, there could be but one answer. From the Yukon to New Zealand, from Vancouver to Halifax, from Hudson's Bay to Sydney Head, wherever the British flag floats, wherever the British tongue is spoken, wherever British subjects dwell and British institutions prevail, to such a question there can be but one answer, and that answer is: Never, or over our dead bodies first. Sir, that means the preservation of the British Empire, that directly and powerfully affects the common interest, and I wish my hon. friends on both sides to consider that well. In that fact lies our justification and our defence for the action which we took, and which we are now calling upon parliament to ratify. I grant that had time allowed it would have been very desirable that we should have summoned parliament together. But as even hon. gentlemen on the other side admit, Mr. Kruger's proclamation having been issued on the 9th or 10th of October, we were called upon to put our contingent on shipboard before the 31st of October, and on the 30th of October, thanks largely to the excellence of the management of the department presided over by my hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Borden), a thousand Canadians were on shipboard heading for the Cape, twice the number the British government had asked us to send.

Sir, Mr. Kruger gave us no time to summon parliament. Eight-and-forty hours was all that the President of the South African Republic allowed Great Britain to withdraw her armaments, to haul down her flag and to give up her pretensions in South Africa. I repeat, that, under the circumstances, it was not a question of attacking his Republic, but it was a question of repelling an invasion of British territories. And, Sir, a very dangerous invasion it was, too. The British generals, it seems to me, have been somewhat harshly judged, perhaps, even by the British people and by ourselves. It has not been sufficiently understood that they had to deal, not merely with foes without, but with traitors within. It has not been, I think, sufficiently understood, that they were called upon, for the first time in modern history, to wage war under new and strange conditions. Now, I do not pretend to be an expert in military matters, but I do know that those who are qualified to judge and to form an opinion have expressed the view that the changes which have taken place in military affairs within the last five-and-twenty years have been so great and so far-reaching that they almost equal if, indeed, they do not fully equal, the change that took place in modern warfare when powder was first introduced into action. We can remember—it is not so many years ago—when the first lesson in the marvellous power of modern arms was taught by the British themselves on the banks of the Nile at the battle of Omdurman. We have seen, to our cost and sorrow, that same lesson repeated on the banks of the Modder and the Tugela, and the lesson it teaches is that the most desperate valour and determined energy are useless against modern armaments unless that valour and energy are well led and well directed. There is not the slightest doubt that the strength of the Boers was enormously underrated from the first. I well remember, something like a year and a half ago, or two years ago, after the Jameson raid, reading a speech that the Hon. Joseph Chamberlain delivered in the British House of Commons, in which Mr. Chamberlain, who may be supposed to be the best informed man, apart from a small military circle, in the British Empire, on that question, deprecated war and said that, under the circumstances and conditions which prevailed in South Africa if we engaged in a war with the Boers it would cost us ten millions and twenty or thirty thousand troops to subdue them. If, under these circumstances, Mr. Chamberlain could be so far mistaken there is not much wonder that our generals should have found this a more difficult matter to handle than they at first supposed. It is a fact, and a fact well worth noting, that this is the first time in history, so far as my reading goes, that a half civilized race were ever supplied with the best arms and munitions of war and were ever guided by the best scientific skill that Europe can bestow, and provided with almost unlimited quantities of English gold or gold derived from the revenues produced by the energy and enterprise of British capitalists. But, none of us can tell the surprises that may be in store for us. It is a fact that it is very evident that the defence is far stronger than the attack, but it may be that to-morrow, some new and strange discovery may be made, and it may be that some new chemical com-ination may be found which will make fortifications that seem to-day impregnable, almost useless, if indeed war itself be not made equivalent to mutual suicide. The suggestion was made, I think, from the other side of the House—it may have been made by some of our own friends—that it was necessary for us, if we chose to send a contingent to have defined our position first and ascertained what relation to the empire we were to occupy in future, under circumstances of this kind. To my poor mind this is not the time for bargain-making; that question will be taken up in good time. The problem is a difficult and complicated one, but I have great faith indeed that what has happened before in so many cases in English history will happen again; I have very great faith that the practical instinct of the English people will find a way to solve this problem, difficult as it may be. As the schoolmen say, the question is solvitur ambulando. One thing is certain, one thing my hon. friends on both sides of the House may rely upon, and it is that the action of Canada in this matter and the action of our sister colonies has already had a great and marked effect, not merely upon the public opinion of England, but on the public opinion of all Europe as well. The statesmen of Europe are in the habit of looking a little ahead, and they know, and it may interest this House to know, that to-day, the combined population of Canada and Australasia is very little short of the total population of the British Isles in the early part of the last century when they were called upon to resist all Europe under the guidance of the First Napoleon, when they had a thousand ships of war in commission, and when the army and navy, together, employed nearly 500,000 men. The statesmen of the continent have not forgotten what England did then when England was numerically very little stronger than we are to-day. The statesmen of the continent and of the world recognizes the fact that if England is able to rely upon her colonies in her times of need, then, in all human probability, within the space of the next half century, probably the next five-and-twenty years, England will possess an ally equal in strength, equal in resources and in potential fighting power, to any first-class European power. These men appreciate the consequences of our act; they appreciate the possibilities that are involved.

Now, Sir, I come to another question which has been put, and the question is: Did our government go far enough in this matter, did our government act promptly and of the world recognize the fact that those who are best qualified to judge are unanimous in approving of the action of Canada and of Canada's government. With not one single dissenting voice, with a unanimity which is perfectly unparalleled the English people, the English press, the English parliament and the Sovereign of England herself have all agreed in tendering their thanks through His Excellency the Governor General to the people of Canada, for what Her Majesty was pleased to call the magnificent display of loyalty and patriotism which we have witnessed. And, Sir, when these applaud who, pray, is it that condemn the action of the government? I will tell you who it is. It is that section of the Conservative journals rightly described by my hon. friend, who sits beside me, as its reptile press: it is a certain section of Canadian politicians, of whom, I am sorry to say, the two leaders of the opposition are among the chief. These are the responsible critics, forsooth, who sit in judgment on the action of the government! These are the responsible critics who never spent a cent, who never shed a drop of blood, who never risked one acre of land for the welfare of the empire. These are the men who will force their comparisons upon us. What makes it the more absurd, what makes it more ludicrous even, is that these men or their predecessors, were for eighteen years in power, England had many wars in these eighteen years, and they never dreamt of lifting their little finger to assist her. As I have said, I do not want to make comparisons, but these men have forced comparisons upon us. They talk of their superior loyalty—let them look at our cabinet and they will find that nearly every other man around our council board has sent his own son to the field.

Now, I am not the man to disparage the loyalty or the courage of my Conservative friends. I well believe that had the chance been afforded them, that the gentlemen in the front benches of the opposition might, perhaps, have done the same, and we would have been glad to welcome them shoulder to shoulder. More than that, I know that in the field to-day there are probably as many Conservatives fighting for Canada and the empire as there are Liberals; and I know what is more—and to their credit be it said—that the Conservative press have universally admitted that in the selection of that contingent, in the choice of officers, my hon. friend the Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden, King's, N.S.), has known nothing but the one thing: Which of these men who offer their services is fittest to be trusted with the lives of Canadians under their command.

I as a Canadian have a few words to say to these men who, for party ends or for selfish purposes, would endeavour to stir up strife among the two races on whose union the welfare of Canada depends. It is idle for these gentlemen to tell us here that attacks have not been made on the loyalty of French Canada. I do not suppose that the two leaders of the opposition would dare to rise in their places and attack French Canada—and for very excellent reasons. In the first place, I know enough of the comparatively small number of French Canadians who support them, to know that they would make it exceedingly hot for them if they dared to impugn the loyalty of French Canada. But, Sir, I say that through their press, through their minions in the country, they have done all they could do and dare do to stir up evil feeling between the races. The language, the taunts, and the sneers and the jeers and the flouts which have disgraced some Conservative journals in speaking of the attitude of French Canada, have been as ignorant as they are malicious. Our history teaches us, or ought to teach us, the lesson of the loyalty of French Canada. These men are doubly traitors, traitors to Canada and traitors to the empire, who cast a suspicion on the loyalty of the people of the province of Quebec. Sir, the lesson that South Africa is teaching us to-day is the extreme impolicy, the extreme misfortune it may bring upon the empire, if we allow racial hatreds to prevail or develop. Four-fifths of the difficulties which the English generals have to deal with arise from the fact that a large portion, I am sorry to say, of the inhabitants of Cape Colony are rather in sympathy with the Boers than with the British authorities. Surely, our own history ought to teach better the men who cast reflections on French Canadians. Twice since the British flag was raised in Canada, twice has Canada been in great peril of being a conquered country—once, in the early years of the American revolutionary war in 1776, once in the war of 1812, and I tell this House that had the province of Quebec at either of these periods been hostile to Great Britain, or had the people of that province been even passively neutral, we would never have been called upon to sit in this parliament of Canada to-day.

There are certain things that none of us particularly care to speak of, and yet the time often comes when it is necessary to speak out and to speak plainly. Every man who has paid any attention to the subject—and I may claim for forty years to have given it considerable attention—every man who has paid any attention to the subject knows that Canada at the best would be a hard country to defend—at any rate, to defend against an invasion from the south. And if under such circumstances we found the province of Quebec hostile or disaffected, or even neutral, I ask you all calmly to consider what chance we could have of making a successful defence. I repeat that the man who attacks the loyalty of the French Canadians, whether it be on the floor of this House or elsewhere, that man is a worse foe of the British Empire than it was ever in the power of Mr. Paul Kruger to be. And to-day, if you need a proof of the loyalty of French Canadians, call over the roll of those officers who are fighting in South Africa to maintain British power and British institutions there, and amongst the foremost in their respective ranks you will find the name of Panet, and Pelletier and Girouard and de Lotbinière.

There is a more excellent way—and as he is absent I may speak the more freely—which our hon. friend, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, has shown us, and that is, to weld these two races into one solid union, so that shortly—and the sooner the better in my mind—we in Canada shall know neither French, nor Saxon, nor Irish, nor Scotch, nor English, but we shall be proud to call ourselves all alike Canadians. One thing more. I notice that some of these gentlemen, not particularly acquainted apparently with constitutional history or doctrine, have cavilled at the demand which was made by some parties in Quebec, that we should submit our action to parliament before we proceeded to take this new departure. Let us ask these men: Did no Englishmen hesitate before they took this new departure in the case of Australasia? Are these hon. gentlemen aware that in the several Australasian colonies, the question whether a contingent would be sent was put to the vote, and that in almost every instance a considerable minority, and in some cases a large minority, dissented. Do they know that in the case of one important colony, if I remember aright, the decision to send a contingent was carried only by the casting vote of the president? Now, Sir, under those circumstances, bearing in mind that the Australasian colonies have far more close connection with the Cape than we can possibly have, and are far more directly affected by anything that would sever the Cape Colony from British control—I say that it is utterly absurd to cast it as a slur against certain gentlemen of French origin, that they, rightly understanding the British constitution, thought that this was a case which should be submitted to parliament. I agree with them that in an ordinary case it should be. But I repeat that our justification and our defence lay in the fact that this was not an ordinary case, that we were called upon to act with great promptitude and that the safety of the empire was at stake.

I ask again, why should this question have been brought into the arena of politics? Why should an attempt have been made to stir up political strife between the two divisions in Canada? I am sorry to say that I can conceive of but one reason why that was done. Four years ago the present leader of the opposition did not scruple to try to set French against English for the purpose of maintaining himself in power. Sir, he failed, notably, signally and ignominiously, in that attempt. Now, four years later the same hon. gentleman is attempting to set English against French for the purpose of regaining the power that he justly lost; and I will venture to prophesy that in this case, as in the former, he will fail, notably, signally and ignominiously, as he deserves.

I am sorry the leader of the opposition is not here. I suppose that like some others, he may have pleasanter engagements than listening to me on the present occasion. However, present or absent, I take leave to say that I have considerable sympathy with the hon. gentleman. I make allowances for his position. Already round his neck he feels the bow-string tighten that was so fatal to Mackenzie Bowell. If he looks to the left, he sees the member for East York (Mr. Maclean); if he looks to the right, he sees the member for West York (Mr. Wallace); if he looks beside him, he sees the member for the other York (Mr. Foster); and it is just a question which of the three will be first and quickest to give the final twitch. Under such circumstances much may be forgiven to that hon. gentleman. But there is one thing I cannot forgive, one thing I will not forgive, one thing which to my mind is the unpardonable sin of Canadian statesmen: that is, the attempt to gain or to keep power by setting the two races of Canada against each other.

Mr. Speaker, three things have occurred in my time which I think in their respective ways have done a good deal to cement the ties between Canada and the mother country. One of these, although a small thing in a sense, was the foundation of the Royal Military College, which has given some hundreds of admirable officers to help lead Her Majesty's troops; another was the preferential tariff, which gave to Great Britain an advantage of nearly one-third in the Canadian markets against any foreign competitor; and the third was the sending of this contingent. Well, Sir, who founded the Royal Military College? It was founded by a Liberal administration, presided over by Alexander Mackenzie. Who granted the preferential tariff? A Liberal administration presided over by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Who have sent forward this contingent? The same Liberal administration presided over by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Why do these heathen rage? Because, Sir, we did what they talked about. Again I say I dislike to make comparisons, but they force me to do it, and when we do, we have to compare Liberal acts against Conservative promises; we have to compare Liberal successes against Conservative failures.

Mr. BENNETT. In Manitoba.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I rather think that in Manitoba Mr. Greenway had the majority of the popular vote by some hundreds over Mr. Hugh John Macdonald.

Mr. TAYLOR. We had the same here in 1896.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I am speaking of 1899. I say that this attempt to divide the people of Canada has no chance of success if the Liberals of Canada act together in the future as they have done in the past; and Sir, speaking for myself, and speaking for my colleagues, I may say to our supporters, here and outside the House, that this government asks for no servile submission at their hands. We do ask for such trust and loyalty as self-respecting men can grant to leaders who have shown themselves worthy to be entrusted, to leaders who have had to deal with serious difficulties, and have solved those difficulties well, to leaders who have earned the thanks of their sovereign, to leaders who have raised Canada to a higher pinnacle than Canada has ever before reached in the eyes of the world, and in so doing have helped to weld Canada together into what will be, I hope, a united and powerful nation. And, I ask, will this House undo this good work? Will this House listen to factious intriguers who endeavour to irritate one section against another? I say that the government have done in this matter exactly what they ought to have done; that they have acted with due promptitude and with due consideration and deliberation. Also, I say, they have acted with due regard to the future possibilities—with due regard to the difficulties which may be laid upon them under certain not impossible contingencies. For, remember, Sir—and there I agree with the leader of the opposition—that Canada took no light task upon her shoulders when she undertook to maintain law and order, and to repel invaders over the whole of this northern half of North America. More, Sir, I say: that if need arose Canada and the government of Canada would be prepared to go further. Whether need will arise it is entirely premature to say. According to the statement of the English Secretary of State, England has to-day something like 213,000 men in Africa, or on their way to Africa. What England needs to-day is not gallant, but undisciplined men, however willing they may be. England needs, perhaps more than ever she did before, trained and tried soldiers; and I believe that the men we have sent, and are now sending to South Africa, will in many important respects approve themselves tried and good men, fit to stand beside the best troops in the whole empire.

There was one other attack which might have been spared, made upon the government by the hon. leader of the opposition. The hon. gentleman thought that we had acted very improperly because we had not thought fit to insure the lives of our troops before they left for Africa. Sir, that hon. gentleman has a very low and poor idea of the duties of a government in a case like this. I beg to tell that hon. gentleman that when Canada sends her sons to the front, Canada becomes responsible and will know how to redeem that responsibility to the widows and orphans of the brave men who may fall in this conflict. We do not propose to shift that duty on to the shoulders of any insurance company, and I may remind the House that, with the full concurrence of his council, my hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) gave that assurance to the last contingent that sailed from Canada. Sir, I have no fear that the Canadian people will shrink from that duty. The success of the contributions to the patriotic fund is a clear proof that they are ready and willing to do their part. I am glad to see that individuals contribute generously out of their means to so good a cause, but I repeat that there is a right way and a wrong way of doing these things. I say that the government have chosen the right way, and I say again that the brave men in the front need have no fear, if it should please Providence that they should remain on the soil of Africa, that their widows and little ones will not be the wards and the care of the state and the wards and care of every true and honest-minded Canadian.

Motion (Mr. Gould) agreed to.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright) moved:

That the said address be engrossed and be presented to His Excellency the Governor General by such members of this House as are of the honourable the Privy Council.

Motion agreed to.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Business, business.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I hail this as a good omen that we are going to be a united Canada and a united parliament after all; and in view of this happy termination I think hon. gentlemen might take a little holiday, and I move the adjournment of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, go on with business.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman state what business he proposes to take up to-morrow?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. To-morrow is private members' day, and I see there is a considerable number of private Bills on the paper.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 9.15 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, February 7, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

Edmond Fortier, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Lotbinière, introduced by the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and Mr. Lavergne.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved :

That a special committee of five members be appointed to prepare and report with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose the Select Standing Committees ordered by this House on Thursday, the 1st inst., and that Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Sir Charles Tupper, Sir Richard Cartwright, Sir Louis Davies and Sir Adolphe Caron compose the committee.

Mr. FOSTER. That is very aristocratic, no democrats on that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No doubt the House will agree with entire unanimity to the motion which has just been made by the right hon. leader of the House. I would like to take this opportunity of saying that I think it would facilitate business very much, and the progress of the session, if an early meeting of that committee were called in order that the permanent committees may be struck without delay.

The PRIME MINISTER. Would tomorrow be convenient to my hon. friend?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Would it be equally convenient to say the day after tomorrow?

The PRIME MINISTER. Very well.

Motion agreed to.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved :

That a Select Committee composed of Messieurs Borden (Halifax), Bourassa, Caron (Sir Adolphe), Clarke, Davies (Sir Louis), Davin, Flint, Foster, Fraser (Guysborough), Laurier (Sir Wilfrid), McNeill, Monk, Powell, Russell and Scriver be appointed to assist Mr. Speaker in the direction of the Library of Parliament so far as the interests of this House are concerned, and to act as members of a Joint Committee of both Houses on the Library.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved :

That this House will, on Tuesday next, resolve itself into a committee to consider of a Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). These motions may not mean as much as some hon. gentlemen imagine. I beg to move :

That this House will, on Tuesday next, resolve itself into a committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising a Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE—PENSIONS.

Mr. N. F. DAVIN (West Assiniboia) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 6) respecting pensions for the North-west Mounted Police.

Mr. GIBSON. Explain.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that my hon. friend (Mr. Gibson) has asked me to explain, because I should like to say why I feel it necessary to introduce this Bill. I have introduced this Bill twice before, and the need for it now is, I think, greater than it was on either of these occasions because, owing to circumstances that it is not necessary to dwell upon, but partly owing to the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, the North-west Mounted Police, at the present time, hardly exist. Since the first Pension Act was passed in 1889 that great body of men progressed in such a manner that we know that it became, in a few years, the admiration of every man who visited the North-west Territories. Every soldier, whether he was militia or Imperial, whatever country he belonged to, felt great admiration for this force. High German officials visited us and no man ever contemplated that force, until two or three years ago without admiration, without feeling that he was in the presence of a splendid body of men that would do honour, although they were police, to any army in the world. On a previous occasion, when I introduced this very Bill, one voice, at all events, from the other side of the House, almost challenged my right to dare to interfere with such an important thing as the pensions of the North-west Mounted Police. It so happens that I was the first man in this country and the first man in this House who ever mentioned pensions for the North-west Mounted Police. We petitioned the government of Sir John Macdonald in that behalf and made representations to the government of Sir John Macdonald with the result that the Act of 1889 was passed. When the Act was proposed it was proposed by the late Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald, and at that time it was opposed by the Liberal party, then in opposition, and they divided the House. Mr. Jones, of Halifax, who was then the military critic of the Liberal party, moved an amendment joining issue with the principle of granting pensions to the North-west Mounted Police, the House divided and amongst those who voted against giving pensions to the police we find the names of Laurier, Cartwright, Mills and all the leading members of the opposition of that day. Notwithstanding that the Bill was passed and it has been one of the means of contributing to the formation of a corps which culminated in the excellence to which I have referred. In 1898 an Act was passed having one clause, and that clause runs :

The Mounted Police Pension Act, 1889, is hereby amended by striking out the words 'twenty-five'—

As the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) is Superintendent General of the North-west Mounted Police, I must ask the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) not to distract his attention for a moment or two.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The conversation was akin to the subject the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) is talking about.

Mr. DAVIN. If the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) was pouring any light on it, that is all right. The clause of the Act of 1898 runs as follows :

The Mounted Police Pension Act, 1889, is hereby amended by striking out the words 'twenty-five' wherever they occur in sections 3, 7 and 8 thereof, and inserting instead the word 'twenty.'

The right hon. gentleman will remember that when that Act was passed I pointed out to him that it was not worth the paper it was written on, and I might have gone further and shown, as I will show him now, that it was actually, to a certain extent, disfranchising the North-west Mounted Police. It was taking away advantages from them that they had before and therefore, in this Bill the first thing I propose to do is to repeal that Act. I should like to ask the right hon. gentleman whether he has done what he promised in regard to that Act. When I pointed out the character of the legislation, the same session it was passed and suggested a clause that would have made it effective, the right hon. Prime Minister said :

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). On what date ?

Mr. DAVIN. On April 26, 1898 :

I will move the adjournment of the debate, with the view of having the point of order investigated, and with the view, moreover, of having the views advanced by my hon. friend—(Mr. Davin)—referred to the officers of my department for a report, for I am not prepared to deal with them at this moment.

I should like to ask the right hon. gentleman if he has had that report yet.

The PRIME MINISTER. I do not know if I have it, I must say, at this moment.

Mr. DAVIN.

Mr. DAVIN. It does not require a report from the Department of Justice on a matter like this, as I will show him in a moment. This Act passed in 1898 strikes out the words 'twenty-five' from sections 3, 7 and 8. Section 3 reads as follows :

Subject to the provisions of this Act, every constable who became a member of the force on or after the 23rd day of May, 1873, or who becomes a member of the force after the passing of this Act—

(a) If he has completed not less than twenty-five years' service, shall be entitled to retire and receive a pension for life.

That is the only part of that section where 'twenty-five' is mentioned, and you will see what it provides for. Suppose that a man has served twenty-five years, no matter how strong he may be, let his health be ever so sound he is able to retire and with a pension. Section 4 provides for pensions as follows :

That the pension to a constable on retirement shall be according to the following scale, that is to say :

(a) If he has completed fifteen but less than twenty-one years' service, an annual sum equal to one-fiftieth of his annual pay for every completed year of service ;

(b) If he has completed twenty-one but less than twenty-five years' service, an annual sum equal to twenty-fiftieths of his annual pay, with an addition of two-fiftieths of his annual pay for every completed year of service above twenty years ;

(c) If he has completed twenty-five years' service, an annual sum equal to thirty-fiftieths of his annual pay.

According to the Act of 1889 a man retiring after twenty-five years is entitled to thirty-fiftieths of his pay. This Act, passed in 1898, takes away the clause empowering a man to retire in full health after twenty-five years' service. That is all it does, and it provides that he shall retire after twenty years' service. When you come to the pension that can be given according to the Act to a man who has served twenty years, it runs thus :

If he has completed fifteen, but less than twenty-one years' service, an annual sum equal to one-fiftieth of his annual pay.

So that the old Act enabled him to retire with thirty-fiftieths when he is in full health at twenty-five years' service, and all the new Act does is to enable him to retire in full health at twenty years of age and get one-fiftieth instead of thirty-fiftieths. Palpably that is no advantage whatever to the North-west mounted policemen. As far as that goes, therefore, it is not worth the paper it is written on, but when you come to section 7, it actually circumscribes the men in the Mounted Police. Section 7 reads :

When any constable who became a member of the force on or after the 23rd day of May, 1873, or who becomes a member of the force after the passing of this Act, has completed a service of twenty-five years, the commissioner may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, require him to retire upon the terms as prescribed by this Act.

Therefore, under the old law, the commissioner could not require a man in full health and without anything against him, to retire on a good pension of thirty-fiftieths until he had been twenty-five years in the service; but under the change, the commissioner may require a man who has only served twenty years—who may be in good health and nothing against him whatever—to retire on one-fiftieth of his salary. I propose, therefore, that the first clause shall repeal the Act of 1898, and that the second clause of the Act should run as follows:

If he has completed not less than twenty years' service, shall be entitled to retire and receive a pension for life; and

If he has completed not less than ten years' service and is incapacitated for performance of his duty by infirmity of mind or body, shall be entitled to retire and receive a pension.

Then, I enact as follows in the second clause:

If he has completed ten but less than sixteen years' service, an annual sum equal to one-fiftieth of his annual pay for every completed year of service.

If he has completed sixteen but less than twenty years' service, an annual sum equal to twenty-fiftieths of his annual pay, with an addition of two-fiftieths of his annual pay for every completed year of service above sixteen years.

If he has completed twenty years' service, an annual sum equal to thirty-fiftieths of his annual pay, with an addition of one-fiftieth of his annual pay for every completed year of service above twenty years, so, however, that the pension shall not exceed two-thirds of his annual pay at his retirement.

Therefore, by this I will accomplish a little more than the present law accomplishes, but I will mainly accomplish by these two sections what was undoubtedly aimed at by the Act passed in 1898, and which the right hon. gentleman is responsible for, because it was by means of his support that the Act was passed.

I then propose by this Bill to provide that the officers shall be recruited from the ranks. All our best officers to-day have risen from the ranks. Col. Steele has risen from the ranks, and his second in command of the Strathcona contingent has risen from the ranks. Mr. Baker, the adjutant in the second contingent, rose from the ranks, and so on. That men who have risen from the ranks are the best men would be a matter of inference. When I dealt with this matter in 1896, I think, the right hon. the Prime Minister replied to me by saying, that it was not necessary to make such a provision, and he gave me a list of the large number of men who had risen from the ranks. But, Sir, what has occurred within the last few years? I cannot recall a man who has been promoted from the ranks under the right hon. gentleman's regime. They have been political appointments most of them, though the great bulk of them have been made from quarters that it may be fit enough to select from, such as from the Military College or from the officers of the officariate of the militia; but nevertheless, it strikes at what I hold, and what most of those who were interested in the North-west Mounted Police held was of vital importance to the efficiency of that force, namely, that the officers should be recruited in the main from the ranks. I, therefore, have a clause in this Bill which reads as follows:—

The position of superintendent in the North-west Mounted Police shall be filled by promotion from among the non-commissioned officers, but in special cases cadets from the Military College or commissioned officers of the Canadian militia or of the Imperial service, may be appointed to such position.

I put in that proviso so that if it should become absolutely necessary to depart from the rule it can be done. Then, Sir, there is another great injustice to the officers of the North-west Mounted Police. Take the man who is going out second in command to Col. Steele. I think he is only five or six years an inspector, but if he were to retire, his superannuation allowance would be counted only from the day he became a commissioned officer. What I propose in a clause I have in this Bill is—of course, I will have to put it in italics, because it is beyond a private member to propose it—what I propose is, that in the case of a commissioned officer, if he retires on superannuation, that his superannuation shall be calculated on the base of his service from the time that he joined the force as a constable. The right hon. gentleman will probably recall that at the end of last session or the previous session, he himself proposed or supported a measure in regard to the superannuation of certain civil servants, and I rose in my place and called attention to the fact that in voting as the right hon. gentleman was then voting, he was endorsing the principle of the Bill that I had explained that session to the House, and which contained a clause such as I have described just now. It is palpable that this Bill cannot become law unless the government carries it through, because it affects the revenue, but if it does become law, I hold that it will accomplish a great deal of good. It is a Bill that I think necessary to the efficiency of the North-west Mounted Police force. If the right hon. gentleman looks at his own words he will see that he felt conscious that he was responsible for the present Act, and this Bill of mine will make that Act of his effective, and take it out of its present position of offering a mere simulacrum of benefit to the North-west Mounted Police.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

MILITIA ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 7) to amend the Militia Act. He said: The Bill is very short, and needs very little explanation. Its object is merely to alter the Militia Act of Canada, so that we shall not be compelled, whether we like it or not, to accept an Imperial officer to command the militia of Canada. The Act states at present:

There shall be appointed an officer who holds the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel or rank superior thereto, in Her Majesty's regular army, who shall be charged, under the orders of Her Majesty, with the military command and discipline of the militia, and who, while he holds such appointment, shall have the rank of Major-General in the militia, and shall be paid at the rate of $4,000 per annum in full of all pay and allowances.

That provision bars us from having a Canadian officer. It may be said that we have never had anybody competent for the position; but some of our officers are now seeing service in South Africa, and when they return, that reason will no longer hold. Apart from that, I think we shall hear enough before this House rises to convince anybody that it would be far more prudent to have a Canadian in command of the Canadian army. I merely ask to have this clause in the Militia Act amended to allow of such an officer being appointed either from Her Majesty's regular army or from the militia of Canada. I think the whole country will endorse the idea that Canada is for Canadians, and if Canada has sent men to South Africa to help to fight the battles of the empire they will be far better able to handle the Canadian militia than people who come from the other side.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

FRANCHISE ACT, 1898, AMENDMENT.

Mr. A. B. INGRAM (East Elgin) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 8) in further amendment of the Franchise Act, 1898. He said: Under the provincial law a certain residence is required to enable a man to have his name placed on the voters' list; and as a large number of men have left Canada for service in South Africa, they will become disfranchised under the several provincial laws, which now form the basis of elections to this House. I wish to amend the Act so that their absence from Canada will not deprive them of the privilege of voting on their return, should they return one day before an election.

Mr. CASEY. What class of people does that apply to?

Mr. INGRAM. I will read the section:

No person, otherwise entitled to vote, who has or shall have left Canada under enrolment or entry under Dominion or Imperial authority or sanction for military or naval service to Her Majesty in the South African war, shall by reason of absence caused thereby be disentitled to vote; but every such person shall upon his return after such absence be entitled to vote as if he had remained resident of the place of which he was resident at the time of his so leaving; and if his name is omitted from the voters' list while so absent he shall nevertheless be entitled to vote on his offering to take, and taking if requested, before the deputy returning officer or other person in charge of the polling station, the following oath, in addition to such parts as are applicable to him of the oath he might be required to take if his name had been on the list:

I (A.B.) do swear that I am legally qualified to vote at this election, and that I verily believe my name was omitted from the list of voters by reason of my absence caused by leaving Canada under enrolment or entry for military or naval service to Her Majesty in the South African war, and for no other reason.

There is another point. I have noticed, while attending the Court of Revision in my own constituency—and I have no doubt that a large number of the members of this House have noticed the same thing in other provinces—that the names of Dominion voters frequently disappear from the lists simply because they have removed from one municipality to another in the constituency. The courts of revision in the various provinces are controlled by the provincial authorities, and the judge says, 'It is true, this man has only moved into the next municipality, but I can take no other course than to strike him off the list.' Therefore, I propose to amend the Act so as to provide that if a voter has moved from one municipality to another, so long as he is still within the Dominion constituency, his name shall not be struck off the list, but he shall be allowed to vote on taking a special oath somewhat similar to the oath I have read and which applies to the soldiers who have gone to South Africa. There is another point. I understand that the government intend introducing an Act to correct a number of errors in the Dominion Franchise Act, and there are a great many. I think hon. gentlemen, especially those from the province of Ontario, will bear me out in saying that the Registration Act of that province is not a good Act, that it is expensive, and that it bears no comparison with the old system of preparing voters' lists. In the city of Toronto, in the city where I live, and in other cities, it takes practically four days, and in lesser towns it takes practically two days outside of the regular election days. Under that Act there are ways of stuffing the voters' lists and of doing things that could not have been done under the old system. We are perfectly powerless to wipe out that legislation, and I would ask the government to use their influence with their friends in the province of Ontario to have that Registration Act abolished altogether.

Mr. MACLEAN (East York). In reference to this Bill, I would suggest that the government advise their friends in Ontario either to abolish that Registration Act or to extend it to every constituency in the country. I believe the best way to enable the men who are away in South Africa to vote is to adopt the principle of registration universally, and to give every man who is twenty-one years of age, who earns a dollar a day, and who is a citizen of the country, an opportunity to register his vote within thirty days preceding election day in the constituency where he votes. Our experience is that there are partisan assessors who strike off names of voters as quickly as we can put them on, and it is a constant fight to keep the proper names on the lists; whereas, if we had a proper Registration Act applied everywhere, every man would know that within thirty days before an election, he could go before a registrar and have his name registered. I am in favour of the widest franchise. We have not got it in this country to-day, and I hope the leader of the government will consult with his friends in Ontario and give us universal suffrage on that system. At present, as the hon. member has just said, this House is at the mercy of the provinces with regard to the franchise. We should control our own franchise. The greatest mistake ever made here was made two years ago when we abandoned that control, and the way to overcome the evil now is to adopt universal suffrage.

Mr. WALLACE. I cannot quite agree with the remarks of the previous speakers on this question. My own opinion is that the Registration Act is very defective and expensive, and, in the case of cities, involves the trouble and expense of an election for three or four days in bringing up those whose names are not on the municipal list to have them registered. I would suggest another remedy which would be cheap and effective. I am speaking now of the province of Ontario. The voters' list of that province is divided into three parts. The first embracing the municipal and legislative vote, and the second the municipal vote only, and the third the legislative vote only. Under the present system of registration, list number one is taken, and list number three is added to it by compelling the attendance of the voters to have their names put on. I would suggest that we begin with list number one, and then take list number three, which has already received two revisions—one by municipal court of revision, and one before the county court judge, and, therefore, does not require further criticism and examination—and then add those names which are not on either. That would be a cheap and inexpensive method. Let us suppose there are 1,000 voters in a municipality. Six hundred are on list number one, and are not interfered with now, but the other 400 have to be registered. Perhaps 350 of those are on list number three, and are, therefore, struck off and the parties have to make a personal application to be put on. Suppose you take list number one with 600 names and list number three with 350 names, both of which have been revised twice; that gives 950 names. You have then only to add the other 50, and both political parties will see that they are added. That would give very little expense and trouble, and more complete representation to the electors than can possibly be given by the present cumbersome and expensive system in Ontario.

With regard to the other clause of the Bill of the hon. member for Elgin, to permit the soldiers who are now in South Africa, to vote on their return, I think it is one that would commend itself to the approval of every member of this House.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DRAINAGE ACROSS RAILWAY LANDS.

Mr. GEO. E. CASEY (West Elgin) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 9) to facilitate drainage on and across the lands of railway companies.

He said: In asking leave to introduce this Bill, I merely wish to say a word or two as to its general scope and the reasons for its introduction. It is known to every member of this House that there are many sections of Canada which require artificial drainage by open drains, sometimes in the lines of existing watercourses and sometimes not. In the case of railway lands, a great difficulty has been experienced in some cases in getting liberty to drain across the railway property at all, and in other cases in arranging the terms on which such drainage will be permitted. I shall not go into any details on that point just now. Some years ago the province of Ontario enacted legislation to avoid these difficulties and to impose upon railway companies, under the control of that province, the usual duties and responsibilities of land-owners in regard to drainage affecting their neighbour's property. But when the Dominion took charge practically of all railways, and brought them under the Canadian Railway Act, it was held by the courts that the Ontario Act did not apply, and the railway companies have since then been able to act independently of provincial legislation, and compel parties requiring drainage across their property to agree to such terms as they see fit. There has been, of course, always a court of appeal in matters of this kind, namely, the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, but experience has shown that that committee is a most imperfect and inadequate relief to a person requiring to improve his property in this way; and in the word 'person' I include, of course, municipalities having township drains to open up. The expense attending an appeal to the Railway Committee—employing costly counsel to meet the counsel retained by the railway company, and the making a trip to Ottawa by somebody representing those concerned, has been a bar to a great many settlements that might otherwise have been obtained. Sooner than go to this expense, parties aggrieved have preferred to pocket their grievance and let the thing slide.

Again, I do not know that the Railway Committee is the best possible tribunal in cases of this kind. It includes the Minister of Railways, specially charged with some knowledge of railway matters, but the other members of the committee have no particular knowledge of these matters, but are occupied with the business of their own departments and can only give a necessarily desultory attention to those that come before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. That committee is an expensive and rather unwieldy and awkward tribunal to settle the differences between parties who wish to drain their lands and the railway companies.

The Bill that I beg to introduce again, for the third or fourth time, is one based on the Ontario Act, and has the same object in view. It provides for due notice to the railway companies on the part of those who intend to drain land, and afterwards for the appointment of an arbitrator by each party and of an umpire by those two, who will visit the spot and settle the whole matter from personal inspection and such evidence as they may see fit to take.

The machinery of this Act has to be changed somewhat from the Ontario Act, because we have not the control over municipal officers that they have. I have tried to introduce such changes in this Bill as seemed to be required by the circumstances. As I said, I have introduced this Bill several times before, but it has not made much progress for several reasons:—In the first place, the Bill which I have brought in is rather tentative than otherwise; it is a Bill indicating one method by which this difficulty might be settled. I have attempted by introducing it to invite the attention of the House, and especially of the government to this subject. This has been before governments of both parties, and efforts have been made to induce them to find some settlement which would be satisfactory, if the Bill does not offer such settlement. With that in view, I introduce the measure again. I do not pin myself to the particular words or to the particular plan of this Bill. Probably there will be other Bills on the same subject brought before the House. My idea is that all these Bills should be referred to a committee to take such evidence as they can get and frame a Bill therefrom such as the House can accept. Then, again, with the exception of two or three, the localities and municipalities have not taken such an interest in the matter as they should have done, they have not made such full representation of their interests to the House and the government as they should have made. I take this opportunity of inviting the municipalities throughout the country and private individuals who may be aggrieved, and the railway companies on the other hand, to lay their views fully before any committee to which this Bill may be entrusted, in the hope that at last some conclusion may be reached beneficial to the parties concerned. What I urgently press upon the government, whose attention I have already called to the subject on many occasions, is to look into the Bill and see if it does not seem applicable to the circumstances, and if it does not, to ask them to introduce a Bill of their own which will meet the case, or such amendments to this Bill as will make it acceptable, in their opinion, to the House and the country.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE WINTER OVERCOATS.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

1. Of what skins is the regulation winter overcoat used now in the North-west Mounted Police made? 2. What does it cost? 3. By what firm or firms were overcoats supplied in the years 1897-8-9?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows:—1. Sheepskins. 2. $17.44 per coat. 3. No winter overcoats were purchased in the years 1897-8-9. During 1898 and 1899, 300 cloth overcoats were purchased from Messrs. Shorey & Co., of Montreal, at $8.38 each.

POPULATION OF THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

Whether the Department of the Interior has the means of making an approximate estimate of the population of the North-west Territories at the present time? If so, has such estimate been made, and with what results?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The Department of the Interior has not the means of making an approximate estimate of the population of the North-west Territories at present.

MR. JAMES H. ROSS, INDIAN COMMISSIONER.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

How much per day was Mr. James H. Ross, of the North-west government, paid by way of remuneration as Indian Commissioner? What for expenses? How many days was he employed as Indian Commissioner? What was the gross amount which he received? Did he, while acting as Indian Commissioner, also draw a salary as Minister of Public Works for the Territories?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Mr. James H. Ross was paid $10 a day as remuneration while acting as Indian Treaty Commissioner. He received for expenses $37.35, but there is still a balance due him, for which he has not yet received his accounts. He was employed 124 days. The total amount paid him as remuneration, and on account of expenses, was $1,277.35. The department has no information to enable it to answer the question as to Mr. Ross's salary as Minister of Public Works for the Territories.

THE GENERAL OFFICER COMMANDING AND LIEUT.-COL. HUGHES.

Mr. DOMVILLE asked :

1. Whether the following has come to the notice of the government:—

DENIES THE REPORTS.

Major-General Hutton Explains 'Mysterious Influence' Rumours.

Ottawa, January 29 (Special).—So many rumours of 'mysterious influences' being at work to prevent Lieut.-Col. Sam. Hughes from obtaining military employment in South Africa have been afloat that Major-General Hutton has found it necessary to deny that he is in any way responsible for this condition of affairs. In conversation about the matter, the Major-General said: The 'mysterious influence' is simply that Col. Hughes went to South Africa unrecommended, and it is not customary for the British military authorities to employ officers who are unrecommended. I should like the public to know that nothing has transpired during my tenure of office that has touched me so keenly as to deal with Col. Hughes in the manner that became necessary. The Colonel has many estimable qualities, but unfortunately these are overweighted with others not quite so commendable. He has enthusiasm and patriotism in large degree, qualities which I possess myself and which I like to see in others. But the strictest discipline is essential if the effectiveness of the volunteer force is to be maintained unimpaired.

Colonel Hughes seemingly lacked the smallest perception of discipline; it was to him apparently an unknown quantity. I like the Colonel personally and associated him with myself in the staff ride in the hope that he would gain some knowledge of what discipline in military matters really means. But the lesson was altogether lost. The public so far has only become possessed of one side of the story. The other side is disclosed in the correspondence between the Colonel and myself. But I do trust—as I said in my speech on the occasion of the banquet to 'D' Battery just before its departure—that no misguided friends of Colonel Hughes would call for the correspondence, as it cannot fail to place the Colonel in a most unenviable light. Those who have seen the correspondence so far—and all the letters are now before the government—are of the opinion that Colonel Hughes could not have been exactly in his right mind when he wrote in the manner in which he did. The incident possesses most unfortunate features—features that I trust will not again be repeated.

2. If so, have they taken any steps to ascertain if it is correct? 3. If so, what steps have been taken?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. Yes. 2. Yes. 3. The General Officer Commanding the Militia was requested to state if the interview published was a correct report of what he said, to which he replied that it was substantially correct, but was not intended for publication.

ONTARIO INDIAN RESERVES—PROHIBITING EXPORT OF LOGS AND LUMBER.

Mr. BENNETT asked :

Is it the intention of the Department of Indian Affairs to prohibit the exportation of saw-logs or other timber cut upon Indian reserves in Ontario, to the United States during the coming season of navigation?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The department has not, as yet, decided upon the policy of prohibiting such exportation. The matter is under consideration. I shall be able to give my hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) further information in a few days.

ONTARIO RESERVES—QUANTITY OF LUMBER EXPORTED.

Mr. BENNETT asked :

What quantity of timber or saw-logs cut upon Indian reserves in the province of Ontario were during the last season of navigation exported to the United States?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The Department of Indian Affairs has not the information necessary to enable it to give a statement as to what quantity of the timber or saw-logs cut upon Indian reserves in the province of Ontario was exported to the United States during the last season of navigation.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—SYDNEY AND NORTH SYDNEY TRAFFIC.

Mr. GILLIES asked :

1. How many first-class tickets were issued at the Sydney and North Sydney stations respectively over the Intercolonial Railway, from the 1st day of September, 1899, to the 25th day of January, 1900?

2. How many first-class tickets were issued to each of these stations respectively during the said period?

3. How many parlour car tickets were issued to and from each of these stations respectively during this period?

4. How many cars of freight and the aggregate number of tons of freight that were shipped from and arrived at each of these stations respectively during the stated period?

5. The aggregate amount earned at or received from each of these stations for passenger rates and freight during the period stated?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The information the hon. gentleman asks for is not available in the department here, but I will procure it from Moncton as speedily as possible. I would suggest that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gillies) should move for a return of this information, which is quite voluminous. I shall be very glad to furnish it.

DOUKHOBORS AND GALICIANS.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

How many Doukhobors have been settled in the North-west and Manitoba since January, 1897? How many Galicians? How are they settled, scattered amongst other settlers or in bunches and colonies? How much per head has their incoming to Canada cost the government? Have any had to be assisted after coming to the country? If so, to what extent?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The complete information which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) asks for I could not give at the present time. If the hon. gentleman will put his question two days later, I hope to give him the information he desires.

YUKON MINING CLAIMS.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked :

1. Does the government approve of the following statement of policy (on p. 199 of the Report of Evidence, in the Yukon Inquiry) made by Mr. Ogilvie when dealing with mining regulations: 'It is part of the government policy that no man shall suffer through any act on the part of an official. If you were put wrongly into a claim and lost it, the government would consider that you were entitled to some compensation and the only way would be to give you some other claim.'

2. Does the government approve of the action taken by Major Walsh on the report of Mr. Fawcett (p. 197, Yukon Evidence Blue-book, 1899) in the case of Alexander Macdonald, and placer claim 16 B, below Lower Discovery on Dominion Creek?

(a) If so, under what statute or Order in Council had the Minister of the Interior, Major Walsh or other officer, authority to grant the said claim to Alexander Macdonald on the terms and under the conditions existing?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows:—1. Yes. 2. Yes. 3. Orders in Council of the 21st May and 17th August, 1897.

THE YUKON—LEASE OF WATER FRONT.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked :

Has the attention of the government been called to the evidence of Mr. Wade at p. 19 of the further report of Mr. Ogilvie, 1899, respecting the approval of his action touching the letting of the water front?

(a) Is his statement correct?

Mr. BLAIR.

(b) If yes, at what date was his action approved by the Department of the Interior?

(c) Has a formal lease of the water front ever been granted? If so, when? If not, why not?

(d) If no formal lease has been granted, has the government confirmed the letting of the property to Macdonald & Morrison, and if so, when?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Yes. (a) The statement is substantially correct. (b) Major Walsh's official report (page 323 of the annual report of the Department of the Interior for 1898) shows that he approved of the action. The department did not disapprove but allowed the matter to stand. (c) No. It was not considered necessary. (d) No. The rent was collected for the property during the period for which it was let, which period has expired.

THE YUKON—EXTENSION OF TIME TO OFFICERS.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked :

What officers or employees were, in 1897 and 1898, given extension of time in representing their claims, as in cases referred to on pp. 251, 252, 253 (Yukon Evidence Blue-book, 1899)?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). So far as the department is aware the names of such officers or employees are Mr. Justice Maguire, Mr. Wade and Mr. McGregor.

THE YUKON—RATES OF PAY OF OFFICERS.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked :

At what date and at what rate of pay and allowances did the following officers in the service of the government in the Yukon district respectively enter and leave the government service:

(a) Phil. Walsh.

(b) Louis Carbeno.

(c) McBeth (referred to at pp. 258 and 259, Yukon Evidence).

(d) Callum boys (referred to at p. 261, Yukon Evidence)?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). (a) Phillip Walsh entered service 25th September, 1897, at $60 a month; and left 31st August, 1898, when his salary was $100 a month. No extra allowances were paid apart from actual travelling and living expenses. (b) Louis Carbeno entered service 25th September, 1897, at $60 a month; he is still in the service; his allowance for living expenses is $100 a month. (c) Two men named respectively E. V. and M. McBeth were employed as dog drivers. The former was employed in December, 1897, and January, 1899. His pay was $40 a month. The latter was employed from the 13th January, 1898, until the 13th March, 1899. His pay was at first $40 a month, but was increased to $45. Both received rations. (d) There is no record of boys by the name of Callum being employed; but two Indians named Isaac and Simon Collin were employed by Major Walsh from the 25th September, 1897, to the 25th September, 1898. They were both paid at the rate of $1 a day except during the months of May and June, 1898, when they received $10 each in addition to the $1 a day, and the months of July and August, 1898, when they were paid at the rate of $40 a month instead of $1 a day. Their living was provided.

THE YUKON—LEVERE VILLENEUVE.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked :

Is Levere Villeneuve (referred to in Blue-book Yukon Evidence, p. 30) still in the employ of the Canadian government in the Yukon district or elsewhere ?

(a) If so, in what capacity ?

(b) If not, when did he cease to be in government employ ?

(c) If he was dismissed from the government service, for what reason was he dismissed ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. (a) No. (b) 17th August, 1899. (c) As far as known he left of his own accord.

THE YUKON—CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS AGAINST OFFICIALS.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked :

Have criminal proceedings been instituted against any of the officials referred to in the evidence taken before William Ogilvie, Esq., respecting Yukon affairs ? If so, against whom ? If not, why not ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1 and 2. No. 3. Because no sufficient ground for doing so was shown.

THE YUKON — ACTION RESULTING FROM INQUIRY BY MR. OGILVIE.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked :

Has the government, or any department thereof, taken any action upon any of the matters arising out of the inquiry into Yukon affairs conducted by William Ogilvie, Esq., in 1899 ?

(a) If yes, what action ?

(b) If no, is it proposed to take any action ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). As to this question I am bound to say that it is drawn in such vague and general terms that I cannot frame an answer to it. If the hon. gentleman will put his question in a more categorical way I will try and give him the information which he asks for.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If it will not be too much trouble for the hon. the minister to specify in what particular this question is vague, I would be much obliged, because to my mind it is clear and intelligible. I am aware that it is not in order to discuss the question, but I am perfectly willing to elaborate the question if the minister has any difficulty in replying to it.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The inquiry the hon. gentleman speaks of contains the evidence which forms a large printed book, and as a matter of course the result of the inquiry was the subject of examination and study by officers of the department and by myself. I have no doubt a great many things were done in consequence of the inquiry, but the hon. gentleman evidently desires to get information in regard to some particular thing, and if he will indicate what it is, or the line of action concerning which he desires to get information, I will be happy to give it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I will certainly comply with the hon. gentleman's request. I may say by way of explanation, with the indulgence of the House for one moment, that my desire was to ascertain whether for instance, if there had been no criminal proceedings as the hon. gentleman has stated, on another matter, arising out of this report, the evidence had suggested to him irregularities that should be checked by some other system.

THE YUKON—SALARY OF MR. OGILVIE.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked :

1. Has the salary or have the emoluments of William Ogilvie, Esq., Commissioner of the Yukon District, been increased since his appointment ? 2. If yes, at what date was provision made therefor, and by what authority and what was the amount of such increase ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. Yes. 2. The increase was granted under authority of an Order in Council of the 14th October, 1899. The amount of the increase was $1,000 per annum, and its payment dated from the 1st July, 1899. Under an arrangement made on the 15th September, 1899, instead of the government providing rations and supplies, Mr. Ogilvie was granted a living allowance of $2,000 per annum. In addition to this he is allowed $250 a year for house rent and $60 a month for a housekeeper. The amounts are paid out of the general vote for government of the Yukon district.

THE YUKON—DISPOSAL OF ALTERNATE CLAIMS.

Mr. CLANCY asked :

Have any of the alternate sections or claims or fractional sections or claims on Eldorado, Bonanza, Bear, Dominion and Hunker Creeks been disposed of? If so, on what terms and conditions? If not, is it the intention of the government to dispose of during the present year any of the said sections or claims or fractional sections or claims?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Alternate and fractional claims on Dominion Creek have been disposed of by public tender. No such claims on Eldorado, Bonanza, Bear or Hunker Creeks have been disposed of except certain claims granted to persons who furnished satisfactory proof that they had lost other claims through error in the Gold Commissioner's office. 2. The terms and conditions upon which the claims on Dominion Creek were disposed of by tender may be seen by reference to the advertisement calling for tenders for placer mining claims on Dominion Creek in the Yukon Territory, which advertisement will be brought down on its being moved for. I may say to the hon. gentleman that if he does not care to take the trouble to move a motion he will find the advertisement in the Canada Gazette. The claims disposed of, as already stated, on the other creeks named, were disposed of in accordance with the terms of the mining regulations. 3. The government will probably dispose by public tender or auction of alternate and fractional claims during the present year.

Mr. CLANCY. Would the hon. gentleman be prepared to state to the House the names of the parties to whom these claims have been disposed?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). That would imply the bringing down of a long list, and if the hon. gentleman will move for a return, I will bring it down at once.

PROVINCIAL SUBSIDIES.

Mr. CLANCY asked :

Is the capital sum of $5,397,503.13, on which a yearly subsidy of $269,875.16 is paid by the Dominion of Canada jointly to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, a debt due and payable to the said provinces when and if demanded by one or both of the said provinces in lieu of and instead of the yearly subsidies now paid the said provinces under the provisions of Act 47 Vic., chap. 4?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The sum mentioned is dealt with by chapter 4 of the Acts of 1884, which declares that the moneys therein mentioned shall be 'deemed capital owing to the said provinces respectively, bearing interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, on which interest shall be payable to them as part of their respective subsidies from the Dominion.' We think that practically the Act of 1884 operates as an extension of earlier Acts relating to the debt account of the provinces and that the sum mentioned in the hon. member's question stands in the same position as a balance of debt account, favourable to a province, under the British North America Act. We do not think that the provinces of Ontario and Quebec would have the right to draw these moneys for the ordinary purposes of government, but with the previous sanction of the respective legislatures, and with the consent of the federal government, these moneys could be drawn by the provincial governments for local improvements.

TRENT CANAL.

Mr. BENNETT asked :

1. How many tenders were received for the Trenton-Frankfort section of the Trent Canal?
2. Has the contract been awarded for the above section? If so, to whom? If not, why not?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). There were tenders received for the Trenton-Frankfort section of the Trent Canal, but the contract has not been awarded; the tenders are being held for consideration, and it will be necessary that the matter should remain for a short period in that condition. I am not free to state to the House just what the matters are which are being considered by the government.

Mr. BENNETT. How many tenders were there?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If my memory serves me there were six in all.

ST. LAWRENCE CANALS.

Mr. BENNETT asked :

1. How many contracts of the St. Lawrence System of Canals let by tender prior to the 1st of July, 1896, for deepening to fourteen feet, were cancelled, if any, by the present government?
2. If any were cancelled, who were the tenderers for the same?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I will have to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) to move for a return for this information.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that perhaps it would be convenient and would facilitate the business if we pursued the usual course of taking the unopposed motions first.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I think there are none debatable except one or two. I have no objection to taking the non-debatable motions first.

YUKON TERRITORY — CORRESPONDENCE, ETC., RE DOMINION CREEK.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER moved for :

Copies of all reports, papers, telegrams and correspondence on file at Ottawa relating to the closing (so called) and opening (so called) of Dominion Creek, referred to on page 79, Yukon Evidence Blue-book, including (a) minutes or notes of meetings or of council, such as referred to on pp. 79, 81, 85, 88, 89, 112 (Yukon Blue-book Evidence).

(b) Report of Mr. Fawcett, referred to, p. 80.

(c) Typewritten statment, p. 100.

(d) Order of Major Walsh, p. 110.

(e) Returns, memoranda and reports of Corporal Wilson and other officers respecting inspection of mines and collection of royalties, p. 121.

(f) The letter from Mrs. Koch to Major Walsh, p. 128.

(g) The permit to Mrs. Koch, pp. 127, 128.

He said : Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose that there is any objection to that. I may say that it is only such papers as are actually here that are asked for. I suppose that some of them are in the Yukon, but the return asks for those that are at Ottawa and not those which may be in the Yukon.

Motion agreed to.

GRAIN SHIPMENTS TO GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. N. F. DAVIN (West Assinibola) moved for :

Copies (1) of any correspondence between Mr. James Ross, M.L.A., Minister of Public Works in the North-west Territories government, on the subject of the desirability of the Department of Agriculture of the Dominion handling wheat in the same manner as dairying is handled, so as to secure that the highest grade of North-west wheat should reach the English market. 2. Copies of letters inclosed in the aforesaid correspondence which had passed between Mr. A. J. Hunter, farmer, Assinibola, N.W.T., and a Plymouth miller, respecting a certain sample of wheat.

He said : At the Elevator commission held at Regina, Mr. A. J. Hunter was sworn, and deposed amongst other things that he sent home a sample of wheat to a miller in Plymouth, and the miller was ready to take any quantity of it. Mr. Hunter, however, could not handle such a large quantity as this miller wanted, and he took the correspondence to Mr. James Ross, the local Minister of Public Works. Mr. Ross told him that he would see, through his friend, Mr. Fisher, the Dominion Minister of Agriculture, what could be done. The witness deposed further that Mr. Ross told him that he had sent this correspondence to the Minister of Agriculture and that nothing was done. The witness wrote to the miller that it was impossible for him to send the quantity required of the same sample. The miller wrote back that he knew it was impossible, because he found that the Canadian Pacific Railway and the big millers had such a pull with this government that it was impossible to fight them.

Motion agreed to.

SEED GRAIN INDEBTEDNESS.

Mr. DAVIN moved for :

Copies (1) of all correspondence which has passed between the Minister of the Interior or any of the officers of his department, and any persons in the North-west Territories or in Manitoba on the working of the Act respecting securities for seed grain indebtedness passed in 1899; (2) more particularly all correspondence respecting the claim of any homesteader to get his patent and which claim may have been refused because of the homesteader being bondsmen for the seed grain indebtedness of other parties, including the application of homesteader and the letters refusing his application.

He said : When the present Minister of the Interior took office, I took the earliest opportunity of communicating with him on the subject of seed-grain indebtedness, and he will remember that, on the first occasion of his paying an official visit to the North-west Territories, I headed a deputation to his private car and laid the whole subject before him. He will further remember that I again and again brought this matter before the House. The hon. gentleman was not willing, I think, anyway he was not ready to deal with the matter in 1898, and at first in 1899 he did not hold out very glowing hope that anything would be done. But towards the close of the session of 1899, he came to me on the floor of the House and told me he was going to meet my views on this subject.

My views were these, as I have laid them before the hon. gentleman and the country frequently. That the lands of the primary debtor being value for the amount of the indebtedness of those who went security, should be relieved. The system on which the seed grain was lent to the settlers was this, that each farmer was bound for two other farmers, and so they were linked together until it became like the shell of a tortoise, and we find now that a number of men in the territories are responsible for the seed grain furnished to those who cannot or will not pay and for others who have gone away. I proposed that the bonded indebtedness should be got rid of altogether as superfluous and unnecessary.

It may be asked why that policy was ever adopted. It was adopted for the same reason that other legislation of a similar character was adopted, namely, because hon. gentlemen opposite, when in opposition, could not see, without active and aggressive disapproval, any proposal made from the government of that day to do anything for the North-west Territories. Any expenditure for the benefit of the North-west Territories was condemned by these hon. gentlemen on the ground that the government were in this way buying the people of the territories. We had to fight that sort of thing, and no doubt it was this unwillingness on the part of the opposition to agree to any expenditure in the interests of the North-west Territories that led the government of that day to resort to this system of dove-tailed security in order to meet the criticism of such strong critics and economists as the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and others.

What I proposed was that the bonded indebtedness should be entirely got rid of. I then proposed that in the case of quarter sections, for which patents were issued and the patentees had left the country, that indebtedness should not rest against the quarter section and be saddled on the poor settlers coming in, but that the government should wipe it off as private firms do frequently, in the case of large transactions, wipe off certain indebtedness by charging it against profit and loss.

The justification for this course is this. At that time it was not demonstrated, as it is now, that we have in the North-west Territories the most fertile region on the face of the globe. At that time, before population had gone in, that was doubted, but now that the country is filling up and climatic conditions have been effected, so that frosts are not so frequent or severe, and now that our farmers have discovered how to farm that country, a different condition exists. At that time instead of our farmers being, as they are to-day, rich, with their granaries filled and with large balances to their credit in the bank—the most prosperous and best farming community in the world to-day—we had an anxious community, not certain about the future. Well, those who joined with the government in making that great experiment at that time were doing service to the country, they were laying Canada under an obligation, and it is not fair that the settler, either the old or the new settler, should bear any burden that may have been left as a legacy of the population of that time. I therefore propose that any claim against an abandoned quarter section, for which a patent has been issued, should be entirely wiped off. I then proposed that the debt of the primary debtor should be handed over to the government of the North-west Territories, with instructions that they could either receive money for that debt or, in the case of persons who were unable—and there may yet be a few such persons—to meet that debt, they might be allowed to pay, by means of statute labour. Well, Sir, the result was that when the Minister of the Interior came to me and said: I am going to meet your views in regard to the seed-grain business, I thought he was going to bring in a comprehensive measure that would deal with the whole matter and set it at rest. But instead of that he brought in a Bill with a single clause:

The Governor General in Council may discharge from liability persons who are liable to the Crown as sureties upon bonds given to secure repayment for seed grain furnished by the Crown to persons in the North-west Territories in every case where, upon inquiry, it is shown to the satisfaction of the Minister of the Interior that land owned by or entered as a homestead by the primary debtor is liable, and is, in the opinion of the said minister, sufficient security for the sum owed by the primary debtor.

When that was passed, although it was very far, as I thought, from meeting my views, still I supposed, as everybody in the North-west Territories and everybody in this House must have supposed, that those who were security for these debts, the bonded men, were relieved. But, on looking closely at the clause, I find that the minister has, in very many cases, handed the settler of the North-west Territories a stone when he should have given him something much more grateful and more satisfying. The way the Department of the Interior interprets it is that when the patent has not been issued for the homestead, the bondsmen are not relieved. As a consequence, there have been a number of cases like this. One Thomas Bond, of Balgonie, wants to get his patent, and makes application for it. He is told that there is so much due for seed grain against the homestead, and if he will pay that, he will get his patent. He pays it. Then comes a letter telling him that he is responsible for some other person's debt, and if he will pay that, he will get his patent. I believe he paid that. And then came another letter telling him he was responsible for still some other person's seed-grain and if he paid that he would get his patent. Well, he balked at that; he did not know when it was going to end. Another case is that of Mr. Bradshaw, of Moosejaw. The same principle is involved in that. I would urge the minister to look over this correspondence, and let us have copies as soon as he can; and, meanwhile, let him consider whether he cannot bring in another Bill this session, amending his legislation of last session so as to do full justice to these men who are hampered by this bonded liability, in regard to which, I think, he must feel, now that his attention has been directed to it for some time, that it is not creditable to us who are in this House, and certainly not creditable to the government, that they should be held liable any longer.

Motion agreed to.

NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE SUPPLIES.

Mr. DAVIN moved for :

Copies of all correspondence between any officer of the Interior Department and any officer of the North-west Mounted Police in the inside service at Ottawa, respecting the giving of contracts for supplies for the North-west Mounted Police since 23rd June, 1896. Copies of all correspondence between Mr. Fred. White, Comptroller of the North-west Mounted Police, and Col. Herchmer or any officer of the North-west Mounted Police, respecting the giving of contracts for or the buying of supplies for the North-west Mounted Police since 23rd June, 1896. Copies of correspondence which passed between Walter Scott, of Regina, and the Minister of the Interior, or any officer of his department, in 1899, respecting the purchase of large quantities of teas at the hands of a Regina merchant.

He said : It will be within the memory of the House that, in regard to the supply of drugs for the Mounted Police in Prince Albert, the Prime Minister told me last session or the session before, that the contract for these supplies had been given without tender. We want this correspondence for this reason. I believe I am only saying what is now notorious—I think I have seen it in black and white—that the Prime Minister has handed over the management of the Mounted Police, so far at least as tenders and contracts go, to the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton). I see that the right hon. gentleman shakes his head. Well, I know this, that the Minister of the Interior has been taking an active part in these matters, and I am strongly under the impression that their management has been handed right over to the Minister of the Interior. And not only that, but the Minister of the Interior is making the contract-letting, the supply-buying, in connection with the Mounted Police part of his machine in the North-west Territories.

Mr. BENNETT. Is that the Manitoba machine?

Mr. DAVIN. No, we have a machine now in the North-west Territories. Five days before I left the North-west Territories, one active gentleman in the Liberal party declared openly in a public store, in reply to a Conservative who was making some statement as to the prospects of one of the constituencies: 'All that you say may be correct, but we have the machine.' So he openly declares that the machine, that machine that has been in existence in Ontario and which issued in the reward of Mr. Preston, that machine which we saw working in Manitoba, has now been introduced in the North-west Territories where, up to the present moment, it was a glorious thing to be able to say that the constituencies there had not a shadow of corruption over them. But the baneful shadow of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) is now over them. We have an election in prospect. I may tell the House in regard to this correspondence, if we get it, that it will show that the machine in its worst form is in active operation in the North-west Territories.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT—THE LEINSTER REGIMENT.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. But we are not tired.

The PRIME MINISTER. There is nothing else to do. The only two items left are the motion of the hon. member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Domville), and the motion of the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver), who is not ready. We have exhausted the programme.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope the government will be ready with business to-morrow.

The PRIME MINISTER. To-morrow is not a government day. I hope the opposition will be ready with their business. I hope they will show more fight than they did yesterday.

Mr. McNEILL. Before the House adjourns I desire to recur to the subject I referred to yesterday. I understand that the ship which is to convey the Halifax regiment to South Africa is to leave England on the 12th, and prepared to convey troops from England here, that is to say, that she would leave England on Monday next. Under these circumstances, of course, it becomes a matter of great urgency, and that is my excuse for recurring to it again so soon. I would like very much if the right hon. gentleman could give the House some assurance that he will do everything in his power to induce the authorities at home to allow Canadian militia to take the place of this regiment. Within the last few minutes a despatch has been placed in my hands which seems to throw doubt upon the removal, at the present moment, of this regiment from Halifax. It seems, from what I gather from this despatch, that it is proposed to send to South Africa the militia regiment which was to have come out here in place of the Leinsters. But what I wish to urge upon the right hon. gentleman is this, that if this information which has been communicated to me is correct, I hope he will still do all he can to set free this regiment for service at the front, and urge the Imperial authorities to let it go to South Africa on the ground that we are prepared to place men of our own in Halifax, to guard our own territories at once.

The PRIME MINISTER. I may inform my hon. friend that the Department of Militia is engaged at this moment with the War Office in correspondence upon a subject closely touching the one to which he has just alluded. The correspondence is pending at this moment, and I am not in a position to state anything definite upon it, or even to state anything at all. But I may say to my hon. friend that the subject is engaging our attention.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. May I remind the right hon. gentleman, in the absence of the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Borden), that as I understand it, this is a matter so urgent that the correspondence, if the hon. gentleman means by that ordinary correspondence, would of course not meet the suggestion of the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill). The time is so pressing and the sailing of the steamer so near, that I trust, as one member of the House, that the cable will be used, and that no difficulty, for instance, of this kind may intervene, and that Her Majesty's government would not have notice of the readiness of the Canadian government to meet the suggestion of my hon. friend, before having completed all arrangements, and before the sailing of the trooper from England. That seems to me to be an urgent matter that should be settled one way or the other, in a couple of days, else the opportunity for placing it before Her Majesty's government would perhaps be lost.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend knows that this is a progressive government, and we will use the cable.

Mr. McNEILL. If my hon. friend will pardon me—I would like to understand from him whether the communications which are at present proceeding between the Imperial government and this government will necessarily answer my question, and whether the proposal to place a militia regiment of Canada in Halifax in place of this regiment of the line, will be covered by the correspondence which is now going on.

The PRIME MINISTER. I must repeat to my hon. friend that the correspondence that we have received up to the present time by cable is pending, and is not yet concluded. We shall be able to give the information to my hon. friend which he wants at an early date.

THE CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be permitted to ask the right hon. Prime Minister if he is in a position to reply in regard to the subject I drew his attention to the day before yesterday, and that was the report that the Imperial government had consented to the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty, that the proposal was submitted to the Canadian government, and that the latter consented to giving the United States control of both shores of the American continent. I hold in my hand the New York 'Tribune' which says, under date of Washington, February 5:

Mr. McNEILL.

Secretary Hay and Ambassador Pauncelote at eleven o'clock to-day signed the new convention between the United States and Great Britain which guarantees the neutrality of the Nicaragua Canal, and abrogates those portions of the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty which had long been irksome to this government.

It is further stated in the same paper, on February 5:

About a fortnight ago, in consequence of the attitude of the Senate, Joseph H. Choate, the United States Ambassador here, received instructions to endeavour to press the conclusion of the old negotiations. As a result of his efforts the British Cabinet considered the matter, after first having submitted the convention to Canada, and receiving the Dominion's sanction to grant the request of the United States.

I should imagine that there can be no difficulty now that matters have reached that stage, about the question being answered, and that is, whether the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty was referred to the government of Canada, and whether they had given their assent to that previous to its coming into operation.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I would have no objection at all, in so far as the government is concerned, to giving to my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) all the information we have on this question. But my hon. friend is aware, that in these matters, we do not proceed as they proceed in the United States. We observe some rules of etiquette, and until we have the sanction of the Imperial authorities we cannot divulge anything that has taken place. I think, in a few days, I will be able to place on the Table of the House all the correspondence that has taken place on this subject which has been going on for more than twelve months past.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This is not confined to the American press. A cable from London on February 6 says:

The 'Daily News,' commenting on the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty, says that England has renounced control without getting anything in return. Something, it says, might have been asked for Canada or ourselves.

The 'Morning Standard' says that 'Britain gets nothing in the shape of a quid pro quo, either in Alaska or elsewhere, and we must assume that further information will modify this view of the matter.'

I think my right hon. friend will see that this subject having reached a point in which it is being freely discussed as having been accomplished both in England and in the United States, there should not be much difficulty in giving the Canadian parliament a statement of it in answer to the question that has been asked.

The PRIME MINISTER. There is no difficulty at all except having the assent of the Imperial authorities.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I presume that will be obtained in a day or two.

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes, perhaps to-morrow.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I must ask the indulgence of the House one minute more on a very different subject. The House will remember that I have had occasion to call the attention of the House to two or three instances in which the courtesies given to gentlemen of the press to sit in the gallery of this House has been singularly and greatly abused. I hold in my hand now the following telegram sent to me by my son, J. Stewart Tupper, from Winnipeg. He says:

Referring to your speech yesterday, the 'Free Press' Ottawa correspondent says: 'He attacked the French in a most bitter way, but said that he did not include all French Canadians.'

I believe that I am correct in saying that this is the same gentleman who has, on two or three, or more, occasions so scandalously abused the privilege he is permitted to enjoy in having a seat in this gallery, and that is Mr. Magurn. This is one of the comments which has been published in this paper of which he is the editor, in Winnipeg:

He attacked the French in a most bitter way, but said that he did not include all French Canadians.

My right hon. friend knows that it is impossible, in the English language, to place the facts as they occurred in this House in a more disgracefully false position than that. The time has come when it will be absolutely necessary that measures shall be taken by this House to protect hon. gentlemen on both sides of it from being falsely maligned by parties who abuse the privilege they possess of sitting in the Press Gallery of this House, and I want to say to the House that unless these false and malicious statements—more false, more malicious statements could not be put into print, and every hon. gentleman on both sides of the House will regret it as much as I do—I want it to be perfectly understood that unless a proper retraction is given in this case and an apology for thus abusing the privileges that you, Mr. Speaker, permit these gentlemen to enjoy in this House, I shall feel it to be my duty to move a resolution that that individual shall be expelled from the gallery of this House and that he shall not be permitted to sit here as a press correspondent.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I would not pass judgment upon the statement made by the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) until I had an opportunity of looking into the paper itself and judging more accurately of what may have taken place. I may say, however, that I will be ready to support any motion of the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper), or any other hon. gentleman in order to prevent misrepresentations of speeches in the press. Yesterday, my hon. friend, the member for York (Mr. Foster), in the speech which he delivered, made a quotation from what purported to be a report of the speech which I delivered some weeks ago in Sherbrooke and in which the hon. gentleman used the sentence that I had said that Sir Charles Tupper, speaking in Ontario—I cannot quote verbatim—made an appeal to the prejudices of the people against me because I was a Frenchman. I made a speech, but I never used the name of Sir Charles Tupper in the speech at all. I am not accusing the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster)—he must have taken it from somewhere, but it is altogether inaccurate. I did not refer to Sir Charles Tupper by name or in any way in connection with this subject. I alluded to the subject but not bringing up the name of Sir Charles Tupper. I looked at the report of La Patrie, which was the only full report published, of La Presse, and of the Montreal Herald and nothing is suggested in these that I referred to Sir Charles Tupper by name or otherwise. So that, if my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) has suffered, I am a victim with him in this respect. I think it is only due to the privileges of Parliament that the words which are spoken here should be reported just as they are, and that headlines, when they are indulged in, should be a summary of what is stated and not a garbled signification of words which may be uttered here.

Mr. FOSTER. I would be very glad indeed, if the statement which the right hon. gentleman has made is carried out so far as the papers from which I took the lines are concerned. I think I have them still, and I will look them up, and if they carry out what I did say it will have to go with the right hon. gentleman's statement. If they do not carry it out, I will be very glad to make a retraction.

British Columbia.—New Westminster and Victoria have been distributed. Copy for the others is incomplete.

Mr. INGRAM. Can the hon. gentleman say which nine lists for the province of Ontario ?

The PRIME MINISTER. I could not today.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Would the right hon. Prime Minister object to giving us the information as to when these lists came in ?

The PRIME MINISTER. If my hon. friend (Mr. Montague) will put a question on the Order paper, that will be the easiest way to get the information.

DISTRIBUTION AND PRINTING OF PAMPHLETS AT SHERBROOKE.

Mr. TAYLOR asked :

Was the pamphlet entitled 'The Laurier Government and the Conservatives' distributed through the electoral district of Sherbrooke during the late by-election, printed at the Government Printing Bureau ? If so, how many copies were printed thereat ? What charge per 1,000 was made for them ? Have they been paid for ? If so, by whom ? Were they or any of them put up in government envelopes in the Department of the Minister of Agriculture ? Were they or any of them franked and sent through the mail by the Minister of Agriculture ? If so, under what legal authority ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). In answer to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor), I have to tell him that the pamphlet 'The Laurier Government and the Conservatives,' was not printed at the Printing Bureau.

Mr. TAYLOR. I wish the right hon. gentleman would read the question ; if not, I will read it for him, and let him answer to the whole question.

The PRIME MINISTER. As to the other question, I will have to ask it to stand until the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) is in his seat.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then let the whole question stand.

The PRIME MINISTER. I have no objection.

DISTRIBUTION OF ELECTION PAMPHLET 'POLITICAL POINTERS.'

Mr. TAYLOR asked :

How many pamphlets entitled 'Political Pointers, No. 1,' being the address delivered by the Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright at Toronto, on the 24th day of August, 1899, were sent through the mail to the electors of Canada? Were they sent in sealed envelopes? Were they sent through the mail free of postage? Were they franked or initialled R. J. C., M. T. & C.? Were the envelopes to inclose said pamphlets furnished by the government? Were the envelopes containing said pamphlets, or any of them, addressed by civil servants?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I will have to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) to allow this to stand until tomorrow, as I have not received the information yet.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman is in his seat, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), who could answer it.

The PRIME MINISTER. He is not at the head of the Printing Bureau.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I really do not know how many were sent out, but I regret that a great many more were not sent, because it contained much valuable information.

Mr. TAYLOR. If I understood the Prime Minister aright, he said that my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce did not control the Printing Bureau. There is nothing in this question referring to the Printing Bureau. I asked a separate question altogether. I am satisfied that these were printed outside of the bureau, and I am satisfied that the others were printed there.

REPATRIATION OF THE 100th REGIMENT.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

Has the government already taken, or is it their intention to take, any steps looking to the repatriation of the 100th Regiment (now the Leinster Regiment) of the Imperial Army?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). The government has taken steps looking to the repatriation of the old 100th Regiment. The matter is now the subject of correspondence between this government and the Imperial government.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day, I beg to call the attention of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition to a matter which he brought up yesterday in connection with some report that appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press. I trust that the hon. gentleman will regret the language that he used towards a respected member of the press, Mr. Magurn. Mr. Magurn has always been known to be a respectable member of a respectable profession. I thought at the time that my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) was somewhat hasty, but as I had not seen the paragraph in the paper referred to, I did not express an opinion on the matter at the time. I have received the following letter from Mr. Magurn:—

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

Ottawa, February 8, 1900.

The Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

Dear Sir Wilfrid,—I was surprised to hear at my hotel last evening that my name had been mentioned in the proceedings of the House yesterday, and an attack made upon me by the leader of the opposition, under the guise of a question of privilege. I cannot conceive it to be the privilege of a House composed of gentlemen to attack in it an absent man and a person occupying simply the position of a private citizen of this country.

I am not a member of the Parliamentary Press Gallery. I did not write, or dictate, or even see the report to which the hon. gentleman takes exception, in a vague and general way. As a visitor, I heard some short portions of Sir Charles Tupper's speech, in common, I presume, with many other visitors. Not being a member of the Press Gallery, and not having a seat there, I am under no obligation to the House, either real or fancied, and his reference to me yesterday was, therefore, wholly gratuitous.

The leader of the opposition sets up his privilege; I claim the protection of the House against an attempt to injure private reputation, and, in the case of a journalist, it is the more to be deplored. I have always had a deep sense of responsibility in the discharge of my duties, and, if necessary, could have the testimony of nearly every member of this House on both sides during the last four parliaments. In a well-known passage a great poet has characterized the conduct of a man who will attempt to deprive another of his good reputation.

In conclusion, it appears to me that as the question of an apology has been mentioned, that apology should come, not from me, but from my detractor.

Yours faithfully,

(Signed) A. J. MAGURN.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. So far as Mr. Magurn is concerned, I was aware that he was the correspondent of the Free Press in this House during previous sessions, and in that capacity I had occasion to bring to the notice of the House a gross violation of his duty in having published some malicious and scandalous falsehoods in regard to what had taken place before a committee of this House of which he was an employee. The present Judge Lister, who was then chairman of that committee, said that he would compel Mr. Magurn to retract, and to withdraw and correct the lying telegram which he had sent to the Morning Chronicle. Therefore, I think Mr. Magurn hardly deserves the high character which the Prime Minister has ventured to give him just now. I am speaking in the judgment of the House when I say, that no man ever sat in the press gallery of this House, so far as I am aware, who so grossly abused that privilege as Mr. Magurn has. On various occasions he has been charged in the same way in terms that admitted of no qualification. When I referred to the correspondence of the Free Press yesterday, I was told that Mr. Magurn himself was here.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He is in the press gallery now.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He is, I am informed, in the press gallery at this moment. Previously, I know, he occupied the position of correspondent of that paper of which he is now, I believe, the responsible editor. I quoted a telegram from the city of Winnipeg giving the words used in the Free Press, and I knew that Mr. Magurn was in the press gallery here. It appears now that the party employed on the Free Press is Mr. Mackenzie. If Mr. Magurn or Mr. Mackenzie think they are going to avoid the just right which I have, to claim protection at your hands, Mr. Speaker, and the protection which the members of this House have a right to claim, against lying misrepresentations of what takes place here, they are very much mistaken. I shall take an early opportunity, Mr. Speaker, of moving in a formal way that the representative of the Free Press, who sent that lying telegram which I read, be excluded from the House. I quoted yesterday the evidence of my son, Mr. Stewart Tupper, whose name only requires to be mentioned in this House or in the city of Winnipeg, to secure for his statement the most implicit credence. I gave the very words from the Free Press, and called the attention of the leader of this House to them, and I ask the right hon. gentleman now: If that statement was not as gross a falsehood as could be put in the English language in reference to what had taken place in this House. I received this telegram from Mr. Stewart Tupper:

Referring to your speech yesterday, the 'Free Press' Ottawa correspondent says:

I now understand that the Free Press Ottawa correspondent is Mr. Mackenzie, and I see here alongside of him, and associated with him, Mr. Magurn:

The 'Free Press' Ottawa correspondent says: He (Sir Charles Tupper) attacked the French in a most bitter way, but said that he did not include all French Canadians.

Is that true or is it a lie?

Some hon. MEMBERS. It is a lie.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Every man in this House knows that is as gross a falsehood as a man could print. Where in the history of my life did I ever attack

French Canadians? Let any gentleman show that in any hour of my life, either in this House or out of it, I personally, or any one under my authority and direction, assailed the character of the French Canadians, and I will retire into private life. Sir, no man can show it. Sir, no man living has throughout his whole career, from the very first hour of his public life set his face more determinedly than I have against everything or anything that would cause race or religious rancour in this Canada of ours. And, Sir, the first man in this House who ought to protect me against such attacks is the Prime Minister who represents that race and that religion. He should protect his own people from the foul aspersion that is cast upon them by falsely charging me with having assailed the character of the French Canadians.

I brought this matter before the attention of the House as was my right. I gave my authority, and I did not shrink from giving the names of the parties whose statements I challenge. The statement that I attacked the French Canadians as a people, the right hon. the Prime Minister knows to be as gross a falsehood as a man could utter. I claim from the right hon. gentleman the support which he said last night he would give me when he said he would endorse any motion to expel any man from the gallery of this House who violated his privilege by spreading false information through the press of this country in regard to what takes place in this House. I shall hold my right hon. friend to that promise. Why, Sir, what has followed this insolent attack made upon a member of this House by a man who is now in the press gallery, and who has been a press correspondent, greatly to his own discredit in the past. What does the Prime Minister think, appears in the Winnipeg Free Press to-day? Instead of an apology, instead of a retraction, instead of correcting the false report, sent all over the country by it, the Free Press to-day contains the following statement from its Ottawa correspondent. This is the language used by the same person who has so grossly abused your hospitality, Mr. Speaker, and the hospitality of this House by being permitted to sit in the gallery:

Sir Charles Tupper, on a question of privilege, referred to a report of his speech in the Winnipeg Free Press, but as he refrained from attempting to establish the accuracy of his assertion, and as the matter will be fully discussed to-morrow, when Sir Charles Tupper will be asked to apologize for an unwarranted attack on a private citizen, the report of the matter may well stand over until the facts are known.

What does the Prime Minister think of the gross insolence of such a travesty of what took place in this House? As was my right, I drew the attention of the House to this gross and false libel uttered by this correspondent sitting in the gallery of this House, under the authority of the Speaker. My right hon. friend very properly said that he would refrain from dealing with the matter until he had the facts before him. We are not discussing now whether Mr. Magurn, in his capacity as correspondent, or Mr. Magurn in his stronger and more important position of the publisher of that libel, was the person who actually sent it, but we have the double fact before us that Mr. Magurn, the editor, is here and alongside him his correspondent who sent this lying message. That being brought to the notice of this House, my right hon. friend stated at once, as became him in the position of leader of this House, that he would be prepared to support me in any course that would prevent false and libellous statements in regard to the transactions of this House, being sent broadcast throughout the country by any representative of the press who is permitted to sit in the gallery of this House, and to-day we have the right hon. gentleman condescending to bring forward this statement, that Mr. Magurn is not at this moment a press correspondent. That does not matter; that does not touch the essence of the question. He is here in a double capacity—responsible as the editor of the paper, and responsible for his correspondent, Mr. Mackenzie, who sits beside him; and I will take the opportunity now to ask you, Mr. Speaker, to take the proper measures to protect in his rights every hon. gentleman sitting on either side of this House from these false and libellous statements, and to move the expulsion of the correspondent of that paper from the gallery of this House; and we will let the people of this country know whether a party have condescended to so low a position that they can only sustain themselves by means of papers which thus violate every principle of honour, and by having correspondents of these papers sitting under the authority of this House in the press gallery, libelling, traducing, vilifying and lying in reference to what hon. members in this House state. If that is the position my right hon. friend intends to take, instead of the honourable, straightforward position he took yesterday, I do not envy him the responsibility he assumes.

Now, Sir, as this matter is under discussion, I may as well take this opportunity of dealing with the question that underlies this statement; and in order to put myself in order, I will conclude with a motion. I say a more vile thing never was done by a party or by public men in this country than to assail the character and reputation of a public man on one of the most vital and important questions, that is, his action in reference to race and religious hostility in this country. The time has come when we must deal with this subject in the way in which it deserves to be dealt with. My attention has been called to an organized attempt on the part of hon. gentlemen sitting on the Treasury benches of this House to grossly libel, calumniate and traduce me throughout this country in regard to this most vital and important question. I will therefore take the liberty of drawing the attention of the House to some of the evidence by which I sustain that charge. I do not look for anything from those gentlemen who, when they are attacked, run away, who, when they have no answer to give, hide themselves from this House, when none of their colleagues on the Treasury benches will venture to say one word in their behalf. What do we find? Instead of a manly defence or apology, which would be much more appropriate for their misconduct, we find them disappearing and seeking refuge in places of hiding. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) at a banquet of the Young Liberals of Toronto on January 30, said:

He (Sir Charles Tupper) is raising the race cry. He started that cry in the campaign of 1896, in his speech in the meeting at Winnipeg. He was speaking before an English and Protestant audience, and there he said: 'Are you going to vote against me, an Englishman and a Protestant, and give power to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, a Frenchman and a Roman Catholic?' That war-cry has since been followed by him and by his friends, and now to-day you can scarcely open a Tory paper without finding accusations of disloyalty against the French Canadians. I regret that he is devoting the last years of his life, of a career which is nearly terminated—

Which seems to give the hon. gentleman great satisfaction, because he refers to it continuously as apparently the only hope his party have——to arousing in this country racial and religious animosities. He is seventy-nine. I admire his strength and his vitality, but instead of seeking to divide citizens among themselves, instead of seeking to sow national and religious hatred, why does he not devote his eloquence to cementing the bonds of union and peace among the different races who live in Canada.

And, Sir, what does the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) do? Why, Sir, he lends his countenance, his imprimatur, to those lying and calumnious statements. He franks, in violation of the statute, a tissue of the grossest misstatements in reference not only to the public affairs of the country, but to myself. He franks a pamphlet which is headed, 'The Laurier Government and the Conservatives.' Well, Sir, what right has Mr. Fisher to take from the public revenue the means of disseminating these false and malicious statements all over the country? Thousands of copies of this pamphlet, a tissue of falsehoods have been circulated under the frank of the hon. Minister of Agriculture, and therefore he has made himself directly and personally responsible for its contents; and to do that he has robbed the public revenue of this country. If the hon. gentleman will look at the franking privilege of ministers of the Crown, he will find that it is confined to public business and to official documents during the recess of parliament, and they have no right or privilege during the recess of parliament to frank any other documents. Is this an official document? Will any hon. gentleman dare to say that it comes within the law or the regulations for the exercise of the franking privilege? I am glad to know that we have somebody in this House to be held responsible for the misstatements in this paper. I do not intend to discuss it at length. I will simply call attention to the parts which apply to the question which is now before the House, and we shall, I think, soon arrive at a tolerably correct conclusion as to who in this country have held their success in the past and rest their hopes in the future upon exciting race and religious cries in this country. This pamphlet, for which Mr. Fisher has made himself responsible, says:

After the elections, as well as during the elections, of 1896, it was upon the Manitoba school question that Sir Charles Tupper fought the Liberal party.

Before the elections, Sir Charles and his partisans stated on every public platform in Ontario and in the west that Sir Wilfrid Laurier, being a Catholic and a French Canadian, could not do otherwise, when he came to power, than impose coercive measures upon Manitoba, and they put the electorate on its guard against the danger of seeing the separate schools restored in Manitoba by the present Prime Minister.

The Laurier government entered into negotiations with the Greenway government with a view to secure important concessions for the Catholic minority, and in the month of November, 1896, the famous Laurier-Greenway arrangement was concluded.

In passing, I would just draw the attention of the House for a single moment to the position in which my right hon. friend stands in regard to that. He never made a speech in Ontario or in Quebec, in which he did not plume himself upon having settled and disposed of for ever the Manitoba school question. I am very glad he has done so; but I ask the hon. gentleman if he is in a position to claim the redemption of the pledge he gave to the people of this country when that question was brought up. At St. Roch, during the election, in the presence of his constituents, what did the hon. gentleman say? He said:

If the people of Canada put me in power, as I am convinced they will. I will settle that question to the satisfaction of all interested parties. I will have with me Sir Oliver Mowat, who, with his popularity at stake, has always been in Ontario the champion of the minority and of separate schools. I will place him at the head of a commission, which will look into all the interests in jeopardy, and I am sure I will succeed in according justice to those now suffering.

The hon. gentleman there committed himself to the declaration that the minority had been deprived of their rights and were suffering. He continued:

Is not the very respected name of Mowat a guarantee of the success of this scheme, and lastly, should those means of conciliation fail, I shall have recourse to constitutional means, and these I will use fully and in their entirety.

What did that mean? Did it not mean that if the right hon. gentleman did not succeed in inducing the government in Manitoba to restore, in their entirety, the rights of the Catholic minority in Manitoba, he was pledged to bring an Act into this House, under the law and constitution of the country, restoring to them these rights. What did his own organ, Le Soir, say with regard to that:

Could any one bind himself in a more emphatic manner?

But where is the hon. gentleman to-day. Every one knows that he is a great supporter of Mr. Greenway, and I have under my hand Mr. Greenway's manifesto published in 1899. What does it say? Does it say that the right hon. gentleman had succeeded in restoring in their entirety the rights of the Catholic minority in Manitoba? Here is what Mr. Greenway said in November, 1899:

When I last appealed to you the main subject then presented for your consideration was the attack menaced by the government of that day upon our national school system. That attack was supported by those within the province who oppose us to-day; but despite their efforts, we succeeded in preserving the system, which will continue so long as I maintain the confidence of the electors.

There is, on the one hand, the declaration of the right hon. gentleman that unless he succeeded in getting the Greenway government to restore the rights of the French minority in Manitoba he would fall back on the law and constitution of the country and carry a measure much more stringent than anything Sir Charles Tupper promised, which he regarded as altogether too weak and inefficient. He promised solemnly that he would restore the rights of the minority in all their entirety. And you have following that pledge given to parliament and the people by the right hon. gentleman, the declaration by Mr. Greenway that he has yielded nothing, that he stands in November, 1899, exactly where he stood in 1896 when we were in power. I am very glad to learn that it has been settled, and I do not want to hear anything more about it, but I can only tell my right hon. friend that he will have to settle with the people of this country who is telling the truth in this matter. These statements cannot both be true. They are as wide apart as the poles; and under these circumstances I would recommend my right hon. friend not to boast that he has settled the school question, when he stands face to face with his own pledge before the people on the one side and the absolute contradiction of that pledge by the ex-Prime Minister of Manitoba, who declared that he had not yielded one jot or tittle of the position or attitude he had taken in 1896.

I propose to occupy the attention of the House a few minutes as this question has been forced upon my attention by the extraordinary conduct of the Prime Minister in defending as he has done, this lying correspondent of the Free Press. I propose, as that is the question at issue, to deal here and now with this question of race and religious antagonism in this country, and show at whose door lies the indelible disgrace which must rest upon the men, whoever they may be, who will lend themselves to anything so utterly detrimental to the interests of the people of this Dominion.

I have said that the hon. Minister of Public Works declared that I made this appeal at Winnipeg: 'Are you going to vote against me, an Englishman and a Protestant, and give power to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, a Frenchman and a Roman Catholic?' I never said anything of the kind. The hon. gentleman knows that on the floor of this parliament I took the earliest opportunity of meeting that slander, and disposing of it, as it ought to have been disposed of, for ever. What was the position? As you know, I was called upon, in discharge of what I considered my duty, to support the Remedial School Bill for the purpose of restoring to the French minority in Manitoba the rights which the highest judicial authority of the empire had declared had been improperly wrested from them by the local government, and the responsibility was thrown on this parliament and government of doing them justice under the constitution of this country. I took my life in my hand. More, I took the life of the party I have the honour to lead in my hand, in order to carry out what I regarded a duty to the country and the constitution. I brought forward a measure in this House, I supported it as strongly as I was able, and when defeated here—not by a majority, for you know, Sir, an overwhelming majority was at my back, a majority comprised of almost nine-tenths of the right hon. gentleman's supporters in this House.

The PRIME MINISTER. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, you will find on the journals of this House the fact recorded that when I was met, not by argument, not by parliamentary means, but by obstruction of the most disgraceful character, the right hon. gentleman found himself deserted by his French colleagues and found them standing at my back and voting down the attempts made to obstruct the business of this House, and prevent a settlement being arrived at.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). We had good men of yours with us.

Mr. CASEY. What about the hon. gentleman for West York (Mr. Wallace)?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman had the good fortune to have the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) acting with him. And why? Because the hon. member for West York believed in his heart and conscience that the measure was an unwise one.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, that was the reason. These gentlemen who now assail the hon. member for West York are the followers of a leader, now the Prime Minister of Canada, who was then sandwiched between the hon. member for West York and the hon. the late Mr. Dalton McCarthy, the man who of all others had raised questions of race and religion in this House. They were only too glad to have his support then as against the Conservative party, but when that question is, as the right hon. gentleman declares, disposed of and removed from the arena, do they expect that the hon. member for West York is going to abandon all his principles in reference to the fiscal policy of this country and everything else, in order to remain associated with a party which he found not sincere in the attitude they adopted. When the hon. gentleman was sustained in this House by the hon. member for West York, it was when he was declaring that he never would be a party to the policy I proposed. His policy was a Janus-faced policy, one face looking toward Ontario and the Protestants of this country, declaring that there should be no coercion of Manitoba; and the other face turned to the Catholics of Quebec, telling them that my measure was a weak and pitiable measure that would not accomplish the object it sought, and pledging himself and his reputation as a public man that, if he were returned to power, he would give them a measure far stronger and one that would restore to the Roman Catholics the rights of which they had been deprived. And now where is he? Why, Sir, with all his boasting, the late leader of the government of Manitoba, with whom he made the negotiations that are heralded in this pamphlet as a magnificent settlement of this question, tells him to his teeth that he has never yielded anything and that he stands in November, 1899, exactly where he stood in 1896, when the right hon. gentleman was not in power.

Well, Sir, I do not intend to take further time with this except to say—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am not quite through with it. I am aware that the government who have called us together are utterly unable to proceed with the business of the House. I am aware that it was a mere farce they went through on the opening day, of having one member of this House ask for correspondence. Did not that hon. gentleman know that in England—and we have the same institutions here—the whole of the correspondence had been published to the country long before the House met? And yet the Premier, having no correspondence to bring down that was of any consequence or importance, nothing that could not have been laid on the Table in an hour, has the House adjourned for two or three days, and leaves the members he had called here kicking their heels about the city of Ottawa with nothing to do—simply because he was not ready to proceed with the business of the country. I am not done with this Manitoba story. I am here inaccurately and falsely charged with having made the appeal to the electors: Are you going to vote against me, an Englishman and a Protestant, and give power to Mr. Laurier, a Frenchman and a Roman Catholic? What I said was this, and it was perfectly consistent:—I was addressing a great public meeting in the city of Winnipeg, the very day when the Free Press newspaper had published with comment the remarkable statement that the right hon. gentleman had made at St. Rochs, utterly at variance with anything he had said in this House or anywhere else outside of the city of Quebec. I then put the question, not to the public, not to the electorate, but to my own friends who were deserting me: Gentlemen, I ask you as Liberal-Conservatives and as supporters of the party, are you going to turn your backs upon me, a Protestant, because I have introduced this measure, when you have the evidence here, in the mouth of the hon. gentleman who opposed me in regard to the measure, that if he gets power and it is necessary to do it, he will carry a far stronger measure than I brought forward. Why should you leave me your leader, why should you leave the party to whom we both belong to bring in a French Catholic premier, who declares that the moment he gets power, he will give these people—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Is it possible, Mr. Speaker, that hon. gentlemen opposite are unable to draw the distinction? If they think that the people of this country are so ignorant as not to be able to draw the distinction, they are deceived, and they will find that out. When an argument, clear, logical and conclusive, is put they have no means to meet it but by laughter and jeers. It is a pitiable position for them to occupy. Though this government has been assailed as no other government ever was, there has not been, either from the Treasury benches or from the men assailed, any attempt to vindicate their course. That is the position in which they find themselves on this question. But they are beginning to learn, Sir, that it is not always to a packed jury that they have to appeal. They are beginning to learn that there is a great independent electorate in this country who have enough intelligence, even if these hon. gentlemen have not, to draw the distinction, and that they are drawing it, as shown by recent events in Manitoba, in Ontario, in Quebec, in Prince Edward Island and in New Brunswick. These hon. gentlemen charge me with exciting race and religious animosities. They say this when, with the great majority of the Protestants of this country, I stood up in this House and fought the battle of a feeble minority in the province of Manitoba. Was I appealing to race and religious antagonism in so doing? No, I have been ever incapable of anything of the kind—and hon. gentlemen opposite know it. And I shall take care to place that question right before I sit down. They talk about race and creed animosity, but what did the right hon. gentleman do himself? He perverted the language I used in Manitoba—not to the same glaring extent as the Minister of Public Works has done in the extracts I have read, but in the same spirit—and with what result? Why, Sir, he went from one end of the province of Quebec to the other addressing his French compatriots and telling them that the issue he put before them was, whether they would permit Sir Charles Tupper to appeal to Protestants to strike him down because he was a French Catholic. And the right hon. gentleman sits where he sits to-day by virtue of the perversion of my statement at Winnipeg. And his supporters went throughout the province of Quebec with the same story of race and creed antagonism, in order to achieve success for his own party. I have heard of sneak thieves who, having stolen something, and afraid they would be pursued, raise the cry of 'stop thief,' and ran off after somebody else. That is the pitiable position to which these hon. gentlemen are reduced on the present occasion. Now, in this pamphlet to which I have drawn attention, this pamphlet fathered and adopted by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), it is stated:

For the purpose of satisfying his senile ambition, of securing the realization of what was, perhaps, the dream of his life, that is, to become Prime Minister of Canada, Sir Charles Tupper does not at the present moment hesitate to appeal to racial and religious prejudices against the people of the province of Quebec, who, nevertheless, have in the past generously given him their support and their votes. Sir Charles Tupper imagined that by arousing in the English provinces fanaticism and racial prejudice against the 'French premier' and against the people of Quebec of French origin, he may perhaps run a chance of regaining power. Now, Sir, I ask where is an act in my life indicating either a senile or a juvenile ambition to become Prime Minister of Canada? I can point to the records to prove the contrary again and again. When I was offered the position of succeeding to that high position in the Conservative party, I rejected it; and again, when I resigned my seat here in 1888, and the late Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald implored me to remain and become his successor whenever the time might come. On that occasion, and when it was pressed upon me by members of the cabinet, I placed the matter before that right hon. gentleman in the strongest terms I could, and said to him that in my judgment I ought to decline. I told him: 'Sir Hector Langevin has been led to expect that position.' He said: 'I will send for him and he will agree, here and now, if you will remain, that you shall become, so far as I am able to bring it about, my successor, and he will agree to it.' I said: 'No, Sir John, I don't forget that in the past history of Canada there was an arrangement between the two great races in Canada that there should be an alternation of French and English premiers, that such an arrangement took place between you and Sir George Cartier when you were in power, and the government was defeated, and at the next formation of a government Sir George Cartier became Prime Minister. And I added that, looking to the fact of the great French Catholic population in Canada, I thought it was much wiser to adhere to such a policy and to adhere to what had been the practice then, that in case of a change Sir Hector Langevin, the representative of the French race and the French religion in this country should be his successor. Did that show any senile ambition? Did that show any desire on my part to become premier? Again, Sir, when on the death of that eminent man, Sir John A. Macdonald, and when I learned at Vienna that some of the leaders of the party in this House were anxious to see Sir John Thompson, then Mr. Thompson, succeed to that position, what did I do? Did I show any ambition to become Prime Minister of this country? No, and the testimony is on record. I at once telegraphed to my son that nothing would induce me to accept the position, because no one should ever have it in their power to say that the party had been divided by me, and I hoped he would give to Sir John Thompson all the aid and assistance in his power, as I regarded him as eminently a worthy successor to Sir John A. Macdonald in that high position. I give this House that evidence, which is on the public records of the country, to show that I had no overmastering ambition in regard to that question. I was only induced to accept the position when, in the unfortunate position of the party, it was pressed upon me to return to parliamentary life in order to prevent a great disintegration taking place in the Conservative party. I never consented more reluctantly to any act in my life than when I consented to take that position, and which resulted in my being called upon to form a government.

I have now shown that if there is a party in this country who owe their present position, whose future hopes are now founded upon this race and religious antagonism, it is the party of hon. gentlemen opposite. They know that by this means they obtained the position they now occupy. Now, Sir, the school question having been happily removed from the arena of public discussion in this country, what does the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) do? Why, Sir, he sits down and he devotes all the energy that he possesses, the influence of the paper that he owns, La Patrie, to promoting race and religious animosity in this country. Its columns are filled with such articles as I have read and which are reproduced as original matter in the pamphlet fathered by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher); the very same articles are found in La Patrie, which I hold in my hand. Any person who will look at La Patrie of January 31, will find the same articles to which I have drawn attention appearing as editorial matter, and they are reproduced in that pamphlet. Sir, I say that no charge that could be launched against myself could be more unfounded; but on the contrary, all the evidence that exists to-day shows an attempt on the part of the administration to endeavour to grasp at power by exciting a war of race and religion in order that they may continue to hold on to that power which they find is rapidly slipping from their grasp. I may say that my whole life as a public man gives the lie in the most emphatic manner to any charge that I have been guilty under any circumstances of fostering in this country an antagonism of race and religion. Why, Sir, at the first hour of my entry into public life, nearly 45 years ago, what did I find? I found the organ of the Liberal party in Nova Scotia, the Morning Chronicle of Halifax, engaged in the unholy work of exciting antagonism of race and religion. The Morning Chronicle of that time, now the principal supporter of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) in that province, declared in its columns, officially, that in the province of Nova Scotia no Roman Catholic should be permitted to have a seat in the government. It said that a Roman Catholic was a representative of the Pope, of a foreign potentate, and that he was by that fact disqualified from sitting in the government of the province of Nova Scotia. What did I do, Sir? Why, I did then what I have done ever since my entrance into public life, I took the ground that in this country every man should stand equal in the eyes of the law and the constitution, irrespective of race or religion. That is the platform that I adopted then, that is the principle that, from that hour down to this I have never, under any circumstances, at any time or any occasion, shrunk from maintaining to the fullest extent with whatever little ability I possess. The Liberal party were broken down in the unholy attempt to build a party upon religious domination; they were broken down, and I am proud to say that no man had a greater part in breaking them down on that occasion than I had myself. From that hour to this we disposed of that question, and from that hour to this, the question having been fought out, the Liberal party having for three years adopted an anti-Catholic platform on every hustings, they were beaten down and defeated, the question was settled for ever and you cannot find in the whole realm of the British Empire any portion of it in which the two races and religions live in any greater mutual confidence and esteem than the Catholic and Protestant population of the province of Nova Scotia. Does any person suppose that in these, the last hours of my life, which the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) gloats over so, as a sweet morsel under his tongue, that I am going to go back on that glorious record of which I am so proud? From the first hour of my public life down to the present I have treated that man as an enemy to his country who would raise the question of race or religion. That is the position I occupy to-day. When, in 1866, I was fighting the battle of confederation, in London, England, when the anti-confederation party sent a number of gentlemen there to oppose confederation and to break it down, and when they adopted, as one of their arguments, the disloyal character of the Canadian population, I met them on that occasion and in a letter which I wrote to the Right Hon. Earl of Carnarvon, which hon. gentlemen will find at length in the Library, they will find this reply. I said:

That certain parties in Canada carried to an extreme length their struggle for constitutional privileges, which have since been frankly conceded, must be admitted; but the charge of disloyalty has been disproved by her whole history. So long ago as 1776, the overtures of Franklin, Chase and Carroll, sent by the revolting states to turn the Canadians from their allegiance to the British Crown, proved unsuccessful; and those emissaries had to return home discomfited. These diplomatic efforts were followed by hostile armies led by Arnold and Montgomery, two of the ablest American generals, whom, with but a handful of soldiers sent from England to assist them, the Canadians successfully resisted, raised the siege of Quebec and recaptured Montreal.

I may say that in the recapture of Montreal the gallant French Canadians who were there, and who in all numbered only 800, beat back and overwhelmed the enemy under an able general at Chateauguay with a force of no less than 7,000 men—

The struggles of 1812, 1813 and 1814, when Canada was attacked at every point, again proved the indomitable courage and loyalty of Canadians, who, unheeding the specious allurements held out to them, met and drove back the enemies of England, and Canada was once more saved to the empire.

Canada may now safely put the following well-earned tribute to her loyalty uttered long after these events, by His Grace the Duke of Wellington, alongside of any detraction. His Grace said:

That the Canadians had, by their vigorous exertions in the war, carried England through a period of great difficulty and danger, and had, by their gallant conduct at a time when England's hands were tied in European wars, raised a monument to their power equal to that which any country in the civilized world could boast of. . . . A feeling of profound devotion to the Crown of England, of unqualified attachment to British institutions, pervades every portion of British America, including all races, religions and parties. They have the same pride in all that has made the empire glorious that is felt by the inhabitants of these islands, and they are all animated with the conviction that, under the free institutions that prevail in British America, there is a security for life and property and personal freedom which is to be found neither under the despotic governments of Europe nor the republican institutions of America. Our greatest incentive to a union of British America is that we may be better able, as an united people, to discharge our duty to our sovereign, and that we may hand down more securely to our children, the priceless blessings of the British institutions which we so highly value.

I was fighting the battle of confederation against the misrepresentations of the emissaries of the anti-confederationists sent from Nova Scotia for the purpose of defeating that object. I give you that as the language that, in the face of the parliament of England, I adopted in regard to the character and position of all classes and all races of the people of Canada. I ask Sir, with such a record as that, and having never swerved from the maintenance of those same principles, I ask the right hon. gentleman who leads this House, I ask every honest and intelligent and patriotic Canadian, irrespective of party, if there could be a more dastardly thing done by any man living than to attempt to place me, as has been said, in the last remaining period of my life, in the position of having gone back upon that great and glorious principle which from the first hour of my public life I have maintained, the equal claim of every man, of every race and of every creed in this country. I hold in my hand the report of a speech which I did not see until I saw it some months after it was delivered at Yarmouth, Nova Scotia. I was addressing a great body of electors in the Royal Theatre at Yarmouth. What did I say? I said:

It is gratifying that after eighteen years of power, when the change came, the Liberals did not obtain the verdict of the people upon any great question. I was glad that the Prime Minister should be a French Canadian. I have always attached vital importance to the enforcing of the conviction that the bond between Canada and Great Britain would last for ever. A weak point in the Dominion, it was said, was Quebec. An English gentleman once said to me, 'You have two millions of French Roman Catholics in Canada—what would happen if war should break out with France?' I said, 'You wrongly judge the French Canadians.' The Quebec Act has given them such guarantees of the continuance of their laws, language and religion that they are thoroughly loyal. They know if they became a part of the United States they would lose these advantages. I agree with Sir Etienne Taché, who said that the last gun in support of British institutions would be fired by a French Canadian. Sir Wilfrid Laurier had an opportunity, the like of which has seldom been seen. At the Jubilee, statesmen of Europe, America and Australia were assembled to do honour to the greatest woman who has ever sat upon a throne. They found a French Canadian Prime Minister outvying in loyalty other colonial statesmen. The influence of this circumstance, in impressing the solidarity of Canada, quite reconciled me to seeing Sir Wilfrid so creditably discharging the functions of Prime Minister.

That is an address which I did not know had found its way into print, an address delivered in Nova Scotia on the 7th of October last, and I ask the right hon. Prime Minister, I ask any hon. gentleman opposite, if he finds any evidence in that of a disposition on my part to excite a war of races, or creeds in this Canada of ours. And, it has been suggested to me that there is no more Protestant community to be found, perhaps, than that now so well represented by the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Flint), in the town of Yarmouth, as every person knows. These are the grounds upon which I repel the vilest slander that can be uttered against my reputation as a public man, namely, the assertion, that for any purpose living I could be induced to depart from that great principle of equal rights and equal justice for every race and creed, a principle that, which from the first hour of my public life I have continuously maintained.

But what about these hon. gentlemen opposite? Did they not attempt to raise questions of race and religion during the general elections of 1896? Why, the right hon. gentleman knows that the most dishonourable means to delude the French Canadian population were resorted to in order to bring him and his party into power. And, Sir, one of the curses that is coming home to roost to-day is the policy which the right hon. gentleman and his friends committed themselves to in that struggle of 1896. Has he read this brochure which was scattered all over the province of Quebec as a means of bringing him into power. If he has read it he must blush for shame when he reflects that a confiding, but not in some instances a very well informed, people, should have been deluded by means so dishonourable. I was a member of the government of Sir Mackenzie Bowell, and when the Venezuelan difficulty cropped up, I took the ground that the time had come when it was absolutely necessary that the militia of Canada should be armed with the best weapon in the world. The government of the Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell, of which I was a member, committed themselves to an expenditure of $3,000,000 for the purpose of arming the Canadian militia, with what the right hon. gentleman knows the British government has declared to be the arms with which the soldiers in the Transvaal must be supplied. What was the result? The result was that several French Canadian members in this House endeavoured to excite hostility against the Conservative government, and there was published this brochure in the interests of the Liberals, a small portion of which I will read. When the House hears this language they will learn whether it is the Conservative party or the Liberal party of Canada which resorts to low and contemptible and dishonourable means for the purpose of exciting a war of races and creeds. Here is what the Liberal campaign pamphlet said:

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

One of the blunders of old Tupper is Imperial federation, which signifies a more intimate alliance between England and her colonies in general and Canada in particular.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What is that from?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This is from a brochure issued by these gentlemen opposite to help them to carry the elections in the province of Quebec in 1896.

Mr. BERGERON. And published in their own organ in Quebec.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes. I ask my right hon. friend now: Whether Imperial federation is one of the blunders of old Tupper. How does that language compare with his brilliant peroration of the other night, in which the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) gloried in the manner in which he was promoting Imperial federation and the United Empire. I am glad to see this change of heart on that subject. I think it is Watts who says:

While the lamp holds out to burn,
The vilest sinner may return.

This brochure continues:

One of the conditions of this alliance will be that in times of war Canada will be called upon to pay its share of the cost in money and in men.

Thus, as England is always at war with somebody, we will have to continually tax ourselves to find money and to draw lots to furnish the men.

In return England will create these droll baronets, knights of this, and commanders of that.

But the people will remain food for the cannon.

Why all these armaments if we are not to have war?

And why fight for England?

That is the motto under which these gentlemen went to the country in 1896. This is the manner in which people not well informed of the true condition of affairs were induced to return these gentlemen opposite to power. The brochure continues :

The electors should remember that these great big chiefs who are so anxious to show themselves more patriotic and more loyal than others, and ready to throw us into war for the benefit of others, will not be the ones to support the burden of it. It is the electors who will have to use these carbines and these cannons. We are considered quite good enough to furnish food for cannon.

The Tupper, the Angers, the Tallons, will be in their ministerial offices when they will send us to the posts.

It so happens that they were not exactly prophetic in that particular, and gentlemen of a different stripe have had to act. Something more from this pamphlet :

With joy in their hearts and a glass of champagne in their hands, they will send our children to Africa—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

They will send our children to Africa or to Asia, whence they will never return.

If you vote for the bleu candidates you approve of these preparations for war.

Vote for Laurier and his candidates, if you wish to see your country enjoy tranquillity, and not expose yourselves to have to leave one of these fine mornings for distant shores, leaving behind your wives, your children and all that is dear to you.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is the most disloyal sentiment that was promulgated by these gentlemen opposite. Sir, we on this side of the House stand on this question where we stood then. Not daunted by the fact that we might be assailed, the right hon. gentleman knows that I have all along adopted the same attitude which I took when, as a member of Sir Mackenzie Bowell's government, I endeavoured to carry the measure through the House for the purpose of placing the most effective arms in the hands of the Canadian militia. Since the present government has been in power I have continued in the same attitude. When appealed to by hon. gentlemen opposite, to support them in obtaining the highest qualifications on the part of the commander of the militia, when appealed to to support measures to put the Canadian militia force in the best possible condition to discharge the duty for which they are enrolled, I gave the right hon. gentleman on the floor of this House just as hearty and as warm support as I did the government of Sir Mackenzie Bowell, in providing for proper and suitable arms.

I do not intend to detain the House further than to say that if there is one charge that I can afford to repel with the strongest possible indignation, it is this vile charge of pandering to race or religious antagonisms in this country for the sake of power. Nothing in life could induce me to do that. No consideration that this House, this country, or, that the empire could present before me would induce me at the close—nearly at the close of a long career of forty-five years of public life, for a single moment to tarnish that character which I have endeavoured to maintain; that character which I have maintained from the first hour of my public life. Sir, my policy always has been equal rights for all without respect of race or creed, and, that the only quality which a Canadian should require for promotion is ability and character, irrespective of what race he may spring from or what creed he may profess. But I was induced to take this opportunity of dealing with this matter, in consequence of finding myself assailed and calumniated by a person in the press gallery of this House, and accused falsely of having attacked the French of Canada, although he was good enough to say not all the French. I stand here to repel that attack with indignation, and I shall ask this House, as I said in my opening remarks, to take such an independent course as will fully and completely protect members of this House, whether they sit on one side or the other, from these vile and false attacks on the part of persons who have abused the privilege accorded to them of sitting in the gallery of his House. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle). Mr. Speaker, I am sure that neither you nor any other member of this House expected that such a small cause would produce such a big effect. At first I felt disposed to stand as a defender of the gentleman who sent the report to the Free Press, but I feel now rather disposed to vote for the expulsion of any member of the press gallery if the shortest newspaper report forces us to listen to such a long page from the history of this country, and to such a complete autobiography as we have been subjected to. In a general way I fully partake of the view expressed by the right hon. Prime Minister and the hon. leader of the opposition, that every speech which is uttered not only in this House, but on every public platform in the country, should be faithfully and correctly reported by the representatives of the press, whatever may be the political shade of either the speaker or the reporter. If there is anything wanting in the political life of this country, it is accuracy and independence in the reports and articles that appear in the public press. But in the present instance, let us look at the sentence which was objected to by the hon. leader of the opposition :

He (Sir Charles Tupper) attacked the French in a most bitter way, but said he did not include all French Canadians.

The hon. gentleman has thought proper to give these words an interpretation which, if correct, would lead me to agree with him that the reporter had misquoted the hon. gentleman. But there is a slight distinction to be made, which is very important under the circumstances, and which the hon. gentleman did not make. The report did not say that Sir Charles Tupper attacked the French Canadians in a most bitter way, but said he did not include the whole of them. It stated that he attacked the 'French' in a most bitter way, but said he did not include all French Canadians. Now, what do I find in Hansard? Speaking of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), whom the hon. gentleman has thought proper to attack to-day, not knowing, I am sure, that that hon. gentleman is now lying in his bed and is therefore not able to be here to defend himself, the hon. gentleman said:

I need not say to the House that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) is the person to whom I allude. I draw attention to the fact that he had just come from France, a country that unhappily at this moment is in the most bitter antagonism against England. He had just come from that country which daily, through its press, and through its public men, is declaring the most enthusiastic sympathy with the Boers. He had just come from a country that is denouncing England, that is gloating over every misfortune to our arms and rejoicing at every triumph of the enemy. It appears to me that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) became imbued with the atmosphere by which he was surrounded, and so let us hear his first declaration after his arrival in Canada.

Again, the hon. gentleman, referring to an incident which I shall have another opportunity to speak about, said:

We have witnessed the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) taking the very course I speak of. He took, apparently, a very independent, high-handed and dignified course. No doubt, he did so under the direction of the members of this government, under the direction, as I believe, I do not hesitate to say, of the Minister of Public Works, and in order to strengthen the French position—not the Canadian French position, but the French position—he had taken, and to prevent anything being done to show sympathy with Great Britain in the struggle with the Boers in which she is now engaged.

Mr. Speaker, I ask any man of good faith in this House if these words which I have just quoted are not to the effect that Mr. Tarte, having been in France, brought to this country the feelings of the French people against Great Britain. I am not here to defend the Minister of Public Works, who, when he is in the House, is quite able to reply to the hon. leader of the opposition. Nor am I going to defend myself as to my personal relations with the Minister of Public Works. I shall have an opportunity on the proper occasion of placing before the House the whole course which I thought proper in my conscience to take since last session, and I will then deal with the large and the small incidents connected with my resignation, my campaign in the county of Labelle, and my re-entrance into the House. If I needed to borrow reasons from anybody to defend my course, I might adopt the words in which the hon. leader of the opposition to-day tendered such kind absolution to the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace). But I will not use them; I shall have a better defence.

But the point I want to make is this, that the hon. leader of the opposition, misquoting facts and forgetting dates, has tried to prove that the position taken by the Minister of Public Works and by the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Monet), and by myself was the position of Frenchmen and not of French Canadians, and therefore that the loyal British citizens, electors in the county of Labelle, who thought proper to send me here unanimously, and the British citizens who are electors of Laprairie and Napierville, who have not thought proper to differ from the view of their member, did not act on this occasion as French Canadians, but as Frenchmen.

With regard to the report sent to the Winnipeg Free Press. I do not know what the context was, but, taking the words themselves as quoted by the hon. leader of the opposition, they are a perfectly correct résumé of his speech. It is certainly the right of the hon. gentleman, if he thinks proper, to attack the policy of the French government or the feelings of the French people. I am not here to defend them. But the hon. gentleman, who is sometimes apt to mix dates, forgets that at the time the Minister of Public Works was in France and at the time he came back to Canada, the feelings of the French people had not been roused on the subject of the war in South Africa; but there had been an incident developed in Paris shortly previous to that time which called for an exchange of messages between the French government and the British government—an unfortunate incident which, for the sake of the peace of Europe and the peace of the whole world, was settled in the proper way, thanks to the good spirit and the courtesy of the French government of the time. I refer to the Fashoda incident, which was made so much of by the jingo element of England and the jingo element of Canada and to which the Tories of England and the Tories of Canada resorted so freely in their appeals to the fanatic sentiment of the lower sort of electors.

Fortunately, broad-minded journalists in both countries endeavoured to restore feelings of reconciliation between the people of France and England, and that reconciliation was effected, thanks to the broad policy of Lord Salisbury in England and the wise, intelligent policy of Mr. Delcasse in France. Therefore to say that the sojourn of the hon. Minister of Public Works in France was the means of causing discord and antagonism between French and English in Canada is utterly false and not borne out by any words that may have fallen from the lips of that gentleman whom the hon. leader of the opposition has thought proper to attack in this debate. I never try to judge the intentions of any man; and as a young member of parliament I would not attempt to belittle the intentions and purposes of the hon. gentleman. But, as a matter of fact, the words that he uttered the other day, a résumé of which was sent to the Winnipeg Free Press, and those he has uttered to-day are just of a character to prejudice people who do not know thoroughly the feelings of the French Canadians of the province of Quebec and to misrepresent the real intentions of those who, on the present occasion, have not thought proper to go as far as the majority of the people of this country, or speaking for myself, as far as the government of the country has thought proper to go. He has no right to attempt, as he has done, to prove that our feelings correspond with those of the French people of France; and I take this occasion to make a statement which is nothing new but which, strange to say, has to be repeated often though it ought to be well known to this country. It would be one of the greatest mistakes made by public man in Canada and a mistake that might be the cause of great misfortune, to think that the feelings which exist between French Canadians and English Canadians in Canada are the same as those which exist between the people of France and the people of England. I do not say this because I am ashamed of my origin or of the country from which my ancestors came, who were first loyal subjects of the king of France and afterwards became as loyal subjects of the king of England. I glory in my French origin. I have no reason to be ashamed of the people who live in old France; but it is utterly false for any one to compare the differences that may exist between the English and French in Europe to those that may exist between English and French Canadians. I do not wish to go at length into this matter but may take another occasion to do so.

As regards the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper), who went over the whole story of his life in order to prove that he is not a fanatic or a bigot, let me here say that I do not believe he is either. I believe that the hon. gentleman, whatever may have been his political faults in the past, on which I am not called to pass judgment to-day, is a broad-minded man in those matters. But unfortunately circumstances have placed him at the head of a party which has based its success too often upon religious and national cries.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BOURASSA. I am not going either to say—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

Mr. BOURASSA. No, I shall not. I will prove it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

Mr. BOURASSA. I am not going to say now—

An hon. MEMBER. Be a gentleman.

Mr. BOURASSA. I am not going to say that the Conservative party has had in the past, or has in the present, a monopoly of those appeals to religious and national prejudices. I am free to admit that in some instances, unfortunately, some groups of Liberals also have appealed to national and religious prejudices. I know that in the Conservative party there have been in the past, as there are in the present, among both English and French members of that party, men of good will and broad minds who would be ashamed to appeal to those prejudices; but there is at the same time an element in that party that has very often forced the leaders of that party to make declarations which, left to themselves, they would never have made. But does that excuse them? I must say that the hon. gentleman himself, who leads the opposition, whatever may be the differences between us, is after all one of the most remarkable figures in Canada. He was one of the founders of confederation, he has been one of the noted public men, not only of Canada, but of the British Empire, and I am proud to say it; but it is most unfortunate that that hon. gentleman, for the purpose of securing votes, felt himself compelled to use such language as has been quoted to-day and to make such appeals as he was obliged to resort to in the city of Winnipeg.

The hon. gentleman has tried to-day, and not for the first time, to explain the speech he made in Winnipeg. I quite agree that he might have told the people of Winnipeg that they could just as safely put their confidence in him as in Sir Wilfrid Laurier, that they could just as well rely on the policy of the Conservative party to settle the school question as on that of the Liberal party; but I ask, what was the use of his appealing to the people of Winnipeg on this ground—'I a Protestant and he (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) a Catholic'? How did that religious difference affect the question? What did it matter, as regards the policy of either party, if Sir Charles Tupper was an English Protestant and Sir Wilfrid Laurier a French Catholic? We know that one word or two, falling at a particular moment from the lips of a man occupying the position which the hon. gentleman then held, are more pregnant and more effective for evil than a whole tirade of religious appeals by smaller men.

It has been said, Mr. Speaker, that during the elections of 1896 the French Liberal party resorted to racial and disloyal appeals.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BOURASSA. It has been stated that during the elections of 1896 all the French Catholics in the province of Quebec, supporting the Liberal party, appealed to the French electorate in this way: Put into power Sir Wilfrid Laurier, a Frenchman and a Roman Catholic, and he will certainly settle the question better than Sir Charles Tupper could, an Englishman and a Protestant. Well, during the elections of 1896 I looked after my election. I went through some of the surrounding counties and I read a good many newspaper articles. Of course, some of those articles had a bellicose tone, fully equal to that of the newspaper articles supporting hon. gentlemen opposite. But I think it would be childish for real statesmen to come here and go through all the columns of newspapers to try to prove that one party or the other held feelings that the people really never entertained and which were really never given utterance to by the leading men of either party.

Sir, what was the argument of the French Liberal candidates of the province of Quebec as to the school question. When the Bill came up for the second reading in 1896 and the leader of the opposition of that day, followed by the large majority of his party, voted against the second reading, hon. gentlemen opposite knew, and their newspapers knew, and their stump speakers knew, that the French Liberals had not voted with the intention of appealing to the racial and religious feelings of Quebec. I am not here to pass judgment on the conduct of either of the great political parties at that time. I was not a member of this House then. I may say that if I refrain from passing judgment, it is not because I am afraid to do so, but because it is useless. I am merely pointing out that the position taken by the French Liberals of Quebec was not a position that was supposed to bring them into favour with their countrymen and co-religionists. But they gave that vote, and in the campaign that followed, this was their general argument, throughout the province of Quebec: The Conservatives have been in power for six years since this question arose. During that time they did nothing until the very last session of parliament, when so short a time remained that they could not hope to secure the passage of the measure they proposed. They did this in spite of the notice and advice that had been given them as soon as in 1895 by the then Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Angers, who thought fit to leave the cabinet on that ground. He told them that whatever might be their good will, if they waited until the last session of the parliament, they would not be able to settle the question. Still, they waited until the last session, and had only three months before the time of the expiry of parliament. They knew that their Bill could not pass. The policy of the Liberal party was different. Instead of trying to take legal means that could not apply, they wanted to try by conciliation to bring the Manitoba people to settle by themselves this question which they themselves had brought into the political arena. That was the difference between the two parties. And I say that if the province of Quebec voted in favour of the Liberals on the school question, it was because the feeling prevailed in that province, and has always prevailed, that, as so often expressed by the Liberal leader, an ounce of conciliation is better than a pound of coercion. Whatever may have been the local feeling in one part of the province or the other, the broad line that differentiated the two parties throughout the province was that one tried to settle the school question by law, while the other tried to settle it by conciliation. That was the real difference.

And, speaking of racial and religious appeals, when we came back to this House and this government tried to settle the school question by conciliation with the Manitoba government, when they entered into negotiations and when the Roman Catholic supporters of this government, anxious to see that question settled, anxious to see peace established, not only in Manitoba, but in their own province, took steps to that end, what did we see? These members sent, as it was their right to send, a petition to the head of the Church, asking him to send to this country a representative of his high moral authority—not to do anything against the civil authority of this country, not to do anything against the power of the Crown, but simply to settle with the least friction the religious differences that had existed between a certain portion of the clergy of the province of Quebec and a portion of the laity. And what was the spectacle that we saw in this House? We saw members, and particularly the hon. member to whom the leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) has, this afternoon, tendered so kind a hand, telling the people that the Liberal government had appealed to the Pope of Rome to assist them in ruling this country. Sir, if ever a strong appeal to religious feeling was made in this House, since I became a member of it at least, it was in this effort to fasten a charge of disloyalty upon the Liberal party and the Liberal government, because the Catholic members of the party thought proper, without asking the permission of the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), to use the liberty guaranteed under British rule to citizens of all creeds and nationalities to take the proper means established by their Church to settle a question of religious difference.

There was another question which the hon. gentleman thought proper to bring into the discussion. He speaks of a brochure that was distributed in 1896 concerning the three millions of dollars which appeared in the budget of the Conservative government for buying guns, carbines and other weapons. Sir, knowing as you do, the feelings that I entertain on the question of war in general, you will not be surprised to hear me say that, if all the words contained in that brochure are not right, at least the spirit is not wrong, from my point of view. Sir, the hon. gentleman tried to say that the Liberals who issued that brochure in the province of Quebec entertained disloyal feelings toward England because they saw in the buying of these weapons an effort on the part of the Conservative government to bring Canada into such relations with Great Britain as would force Canada to act with England in all her wars. I have never read the brochure referred to; I did not have it distributed in my county. The position I took in my county was this: I am opposed to militarism for Canada. I consider Canada a pacific country, a country happily situated far from the rivalries which always threatened to destroy the peace of Europe and bring into armed conflict the great powers of the world. It is fortunate for us that our country is so situated, that we may invite the peaceful people of all nationalities to come and settle here. I was in favour of the policy of conciliation, not only for the races that live in Canada, but also for the nations of the wide world. Therefore, I did not think proper to approve of a policy that meant that we were going to war. I am speaking now of my personal position. But certainly, when that brochure was written and circulated and when the general elections came on, there was never any idea generally propounded in this country, either by one party or the other, that Canada was to be an armed nation. Therefore, I say, that it was proper, at least it was open, for any candidate, either Liberal or Conservative, to declare himself opposed to any military preparations for this country, to declare himself opposed to any policy that would bring Canada into closer relationship with Great Britain, so far as military operations were concerned—and for any candidate taking such a position did not lay himself open to a justifiable accusation of disloyalty to Great Britain.

I am not going to discuss that point now, because we shall have another occasion to discuss it at length, along with the other points that have been mentioned. I merely want to say that times change, and when we wish to criticise members' words and acts we must place ourselves at the time when they spoke and acted. I say that at the time that brochure was written and published nobody could accuse any man of disloyalty to England because he was opposed to Canada preparing for war. Times have changed, as we have often been told by hon. gentlemen opposite, and at the present time a different spirit has developed in this country. At that time it was perfectly legitimate—I do not say to use all the words that may have been used in that brochure—but to entertain those ideas and to speak upon those issues.

Now, I have spoken at much greater length than I had intended, but I have been compelled to do so by the lengthy remarks of the hon. gentleman himself. But to sum up my argument, let me say that the hon. gentleman has no right, based upon anything which may have been said by hon. gentlemen on this side, to accuse of disloyalty any French Canadian British subjects in this country. We have a right to understand and to interpret the constitution of this country according to our judgment, and we have a right to do so without being charged with disloyalty. We have a right to interpret the British constitution, and the Canadian constitution, according to our judgment, without laying ourselves open to the charge of disloyalty because our interpretation differs from that of the Tory party. There was no occasion for charging us with entertaining different views from those our words express, there was no occasion at all for insinuating that we were acting as Frenchmen in sympathy with France, instead of as British subjects. I say that the hon. gentleman opposite having uttered those words, that I have quoted, he cannot now complain if the press of the country interpret his words as an attempt to raise the race and religious cry in Canada.

Mr. JOHN McINTOSH (Sherbrooke). As one of the latest members elected to serve the country in this House, and as representing a constituency in the province of Quebec, it may not be out of place for me to say a few words. The position of the Conservative party on the main question was well defended by my respected leader, and needs no further defence from me. But I may say that it seems to me that the government ought at this time to come to the rescue of a man who has been admitted by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), to have not been guilty of an action that this House ought to condemn. As you, Mr. Speaker, have allowed the hon. gentleman from Labelle to roam from Winnipeg to Rome and back again, perhaps you will allow me a few moments to discuss the question of who is responsible for this race cry. Now, it is admitted on both sides that the race cry has been raised, it has been raised in the province of Quebec. Some one is responsible for it, but I desire to take this early opportunity of stating here that the Liberal-Conservative party has no part in that race cry. Now, who has anything to gain by this race cry? Let me go back to the year 1886 and remind you that in the province of Quebec the Riel cry was raised in the local elections, and who raised it? It was raised by an hon. gentleman who sits opposite, and it was approved by other hon. gentlemen who are sitting opposite to-day. That was the chief topic of the Liberals in their campaign literature and in their speeches. The Hon. Mr. Mercier came to power on that race cry, and remained in power for just five years. Now, I want to say right here that I come from a loyal province, and I want to say that the French Canadian people are a loyal people. But I want to make this distinction; we have a few fire-brands in that province who are causing all this trouble, and this government is responsible for them. When a minister of the Crown, who has taken an oath of allegiance to the Queen, will make such speeches as he has made, when he makes such a speech as he made near St. Vincent de Paul, near that institution where such men as he ought to be incarcerated—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. McINTOSH. I want to say that we have a loyal people in the French Canadians of Quebec.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

Mr. McINTOSH. If the word is unparliamentary I will take it back.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. member had better withdraw it.

Mr. McINTOSH. Then I will take it back. I want to say that we have a remarkable people in the French Canadians of Quebec. They have their feelings, they have their sympathies, and we admire them for it. Remember that any people who is in a minority as they are, in this Dominion, are naturally more jealous of their rights than the majority. Now, Sir, can you point to any other nationality that had they such fire-brands amongst them would stand the same test as the French Canadian people have. We have a few fire-brands in the province of Quebec, and they are a source of great mischief to that province and to the Dominion of Canada, but I am glad to say they are only a few.

Mr. TALBOT. Is Thibault one of them?

Mr. McINTOSH. Well, he is a wrecker. But you can scarcely put him on a par with the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte).

Mr. McINTOSH.

If the Liberal party is not responsible for raising the national cry and keeping it in flame, then why do they make such speeches and distribute such literature as they have done in the Sherbrooke campaign? Now, I want to put it on fair grounds; can you cite a case among the Conservatives, from the leader of the opposition down, to any speaker on the hustings in that election, using such language as that? Well, Sir, I had to contend with such men as I see sitting in this House and who used such language as this from house to house: 'Ladies,' one of these gentlemen would say in travelling around from house to house—if he had stated it publicly we would excuse him—'you have a duty to perform in this; do you know that in those veins of yours runs the same blood that runs in the veins of Sir Wilfrid Laurier?' He first elevates the women because he knows, and I know that that gentleman occupies a high position. I speak with all reverence, but he said: 'You have a duty to perform towards your husband.' And, what is more, he says to the woman: 'When I mention the name of Sir Wilfrid Laurier you ought to drop down on your knees.' Is that high politics? Is that a race cry? Name me a man on our side of the House who talks in that way. But, Mr. Speaker, that is not all; right in public and on the hustings at the nomination we had these words coming from one hon. member. He said: 'Our candidate is a descendant of the old Norman race; in his veins runs the same blood that runs in the veins of the leader of the government.' He said: 'You can see they are that kind of a build, and that is French.' Is that high politics? I would name him if I knew what seat he occupies. In addition to that we had that brochure which has been spoken of, to contend against. When you come down to treat electors in that way, where are we going, Mr. Speaker? Where are we going to land when such politics are introduced in a rural municipality? Such politics as that is the curse of the nation. Then, they ask the question: How are you going to stop it? It will never be stopped, in my humble opinion, until the leaders rise above that and say to their subordinates: This is not the kind of politics that we want. The right hon. leader of the government said the other day that the government had acted in response to public opinion. Does he know that public opinion is rife in this country on this question. Well, stop it; that is my advice. It is only when the men who lead this House stop it that it will cease to create those terrible disasters that have taken place. Now, I shall go back a few years; in 1886 Mercier got up that cry, and came in, and in 1892 he went out on that cry. While I am on my feet I want to say that such a cry does not have much effect on the French Canadian elector. He is about tired and sick of it, and in proof of that I may say that in my county, where in one parish they are all French, I got majorities time and time again. He is tired and sick of this cry, and he is ready, as all true French Canadians are, when the time comes, to turn right over the other way, when they have the general elections, if that cry is raised. I will tell hon. gentlemen opposite that they will have to get up a new cry because the French Canadian electors are tired of this one. I may tell my hon. friends on this side of the House that the first contingent of the government forces came to Sherbrooke, headed by the right hon. leader of the government with forty of his subordinates, some of the greater lights, but mostly the lesser lights, and that failing to arouse the sentiments that they expected, they brought back, on nomination day, four other ministers. The hon. Minister of Public Works was brought there the second time, and that was an indication of the introduction of the machine. That is what put us on our metal; if they had not brought him perhaps we would have lost our election. When we saw that he was coming we knew that it meant the introduction of the machine. The third contingent was sent into the riding; the hon. Minister of Public Works came again with some more of the ministers, but their arguments fell flat. If the majority was reduced at all it was reduced by money, by the machine and by whisky. I am sorry that this cry was raised in Sherbrooke; I have to live there; do not make it any worse in my province. You have gone far enough and you have hurt that province immensely. I do not know how you are going to gain by such a course. I want to say that the French Canadians are as loyal a people as there are in this Dominion, and I do not know whether I am going too far, but I cannot understand why a member of this government is allowed to make such speeches. I cannot understand why it should be allowed. I think every hon. minister is responsible for what any other member of the government says. Mr. Speaker, I will have occasion, at some other time, of saying something more upon this subject; I would not have spoken if it had not been that I wanted, in my feeble way, to show that the Conservative party are not responsible for the race cry. We have nothing to gain by it; our opponents are in power to-day, but if they wish to remain in power they will have to get another cry, because they cannot any longer rely upon this one.

Mr. GEORGE E. CASEY (West Elgin). Mr. Speaker, this is a day of surprises. Out of a little matter a great debate has sprung and out of a great debate has sprung a debater who seems fit to rival the leader of the opposition himself. A purer example of what we may describe as the Tupperian school of oratory in strength of assertion, and of the peculiar characteristics of that style has yet to be discovered. A new member who signalizes his maiden speech by saying that a French Canadian member of the government ought to be in the penitentiary will not lack for want of self-confidence. He may go very far, and I advise the hon. leader of the opposition to look out for his laurels.

But, we must return to the origin of this debate. It was asserted by the hon. leader of the opposition that a certain gentleman had telegraphed to the Winnipeg Free Press from the gallery of this House a tissue of lies and fabrications in regard to his speech. The hon. leader of the government expressed a willingness to assist him in preventing any such thing, but he suggested that it would be better to wait and see the full text of the offending article before deciding upon any course, and what has taken place this evening has shown the propriety of waiting. The hon. leader of the opposition is the subject of many hallucinations; one of these was that a certain Mr. Magurn, well known to us here, must have been the author of this objectionable telegram, and that the report in the paper must have been very libellous and untrue. He proceeded to denounce that gentleman on the floor of this House last evening. He denounced him in language which, if it had been used outside of the House of Commons, would have been compared to that of a scolding fishwife who had been insulted by calling her a female, but which cannot be properly described in parliamentary language. To-day, it appears that he was utterly mistaken in the main facts of his assertion. Mr. Magurn never sent any such telegram, and in stating that fact suggested that the leader of the opposition should make an apology. The leader of the opposition had another illusion here. Instead of admitting his mistake and stating that he was too hasty in charging this on Mr. Magurn, he thinks it an honourable thing to further insult Mr. Magurn by saying, that if he was not guilty of this particular abomination, yet he had done so many bad things before that he should be expelled from the press gallery—although he is not a member of it. It is easy to stand on the floor of this House and bully-rag men who sit in the reporter's gallery and who cannot say a word in their defence. The leader of the opposition seems to revel in the delight of speaking in the worst terms possible of men who are within the sound of his voice, but who are unable to defend themselves. It is a much easier job than to discuss with his equals on the floor of this House the important questions of the day. Sir, I ask you, is such conduct worthy of any member of this House—I need not ask you if it be worthy of a gentleman holding the exalted position of leader of one of the great parties, for the answer would be too obvious.

It appears to be thought by the leader of the opposition, that the time has come when he must make a supreme effort of some kind to recall himself to the minds of the public. Perhaps the cheers that were given the other night for his first lieutenant (Mr. Foster) are ringing in his ears, and he may think that 'the lean and hungry Cassius' is becoming too much appreciated by the members of his party. There were no cheers when the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) closed his speech, and so it is his turn now to make a bid for popularity in the only way he knows how; namely, by a flow of language which is peculiar to himself. In the course of this diatribe, he has been affected by another hallucination—and I must say that his political hallucinations extend to the extreme limit at which genius is said to divide itself from a different frame of mind closely allied thereto. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) labours under the hallucination to-day, that he has never been the author of any race or religious agitation. Why, Sir, what was the whole agitation on which the Conservatives fought the last general elections but an appeal to race and religion? It was the only hope of the party, that by appealing to the race feeling of our French Canadian citizens, and to the religious feeling of all Catholics, they could sweep the country. And so, Sir, they made that appeal in the strongest possible way, and their friends in the hierarchy of the province of Quebec made that appeal in an infinitely more pressing and forcible way than any party leader could make it. Sir, I am happy to say that it was the people of the province of Quebec, to whom that race and religious appeal was made, who gave the Tories their coup de grace and who showed in returning Sir Wilfrid Laurier to power, that the only sentiment which governed them was a sentiment of conciliation and a regard for provincial rights.

But the leader of the opposition for once reached his ambition, and he was the premier of Canada for six weeks. He was something like the early peas which used to be advertised, and called 'early six-weeks peas.' They were ripe in six weeks and fit for destruction, and Sir Charles Tupper as premier of Canada for six weeks, was ripe at the end of that time, and went to pot like the peas. He had his ephemeral period of glory, but he does not seem satisfied with it. In his present frame of mind he thinks he is burying the hatchet by repeating to-day the offence with which he was originally charged. In the course of the very speech in which he said that all the rewards of earth and heaven would not induce him to tarnish his reputation for political fairness, he has actually repeated his appeals to race and religion. I agree that literally speaking no reward of heaven and earth could induce him to tarnish his reputation for political fairness—the thing is utterly impossible. He has no reputation for political fairness. Why, in the very speech which we heard from him this afternoon, he charges the French Canadian Liberals with not being loyal to British rule. You may cover it up with any paraphrases you like, and you may say that he only charges them with not being sufficiently prompt in lending their aid in the present war, but undoubtedly what the leader of the opposition means to imply is, that the French Canadians are not loyal. He read quotations tending to show that the French Canadian Liberals are tinged with disloyalty. May I ask, who are the French Canadian Liberals? Sir, judging by the popular vote in 1896, and judging by the representation on the floor of this House, the French Canadian Liberals are the vast majority of the French Canadian people. and in charging the French Liberals with disloyalty, he is charging the vast majority of that race with such a crime.

It is not the first time, Sir, that the loyalty of a Minister of the Crown has been called in question in this House, and I shall refer to that, in order to show that appearances are not always conclusive. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), then Commissioner of Customs, once made a speech at a meeting in Kingston which was considered to require notice in this House. It was a propos of the apparent danger, as he considered, that home rule for Ireland would become the law. At various meetings in Ireland, the Orangemen had claimed that they would not submit to home rule. Dr. Kane, a leading Orangeman, at a certain meeting, at which 5,000 were present, said:

Ulster was determined to defend herself to the last against the proposals of the Home Rule Bill. The men of Ulster need not feel, however, that they will be alone and unaided in the fight for their liberty. We have the sympathy of Englishmen throughout the world. We have received letters from military and police officers in England and Ireland and telegrams from Canada and Australia promising to cooperate with the men of Ulster if the latter resorted to arms to defend their liberties against the tyranny of their historic foes.

In other words, the Orangemen of Ulster were proposing to rise in rebellion if the Home Rule Bill passed the British Parliament, and it was sought to enforce it in Ireland. This was all in the year 1893. The hon. member for West York, as reported in a Kingston paper on March 15, said:

We find to-day in the old country that brethren, the descendants of the heroes of two hundred years ago, are perhaps facing difficulties of a similar character to those which their ancestors had to face in 1688—that the men of 1893 are threatened with a rule which is antagonistic to freedom there, to the liberty which they have always enjoyed as citizens of the British Empire. What is proposed is not only to shake off their allegiance to Great Britain—the bonds of love that bind them to the empire—but to put them, forsooth, under an alien and hostile government. Our friends in that land are preparing and have asserted their unalterable determination never to submit to that home rule which Mr. Gladstone and his government have laid out for them. I am sure that in their efforts they shall have the sympathy of the Orangemen of Canada—more than sympathy; they shall have our active aid, if that active aid is necessary.

Now, Sir, it appeared to myself, who first brought the matter up in the House, and to others, that this language indicated distinctly that the hon. member for West York, in his capacity of Grand Sovereign of the Orangemen of British North America, was prepared to assist the Ulster Orangemen by force of arms, if they rebelled against Her Majesty the Queen. That language speaks for itself. The hon. gentleman admitted in the course of the debate that this report of his speech was substantially correct. You can draw your own conclusion whether that language meant sympathy with rebellion or not. It undoubtedly did mean that the hon. gentleman would sympathize with an Orange rebellion in the North of Ireland against Home Rule, if such a rebellion took place. The hon. member, while admitting his language, and not denying the inferences that might possibly be drawn from it, claimed high authority for using such language. He claimed the authority of no less a person than Lord Salisbury himself, who, when Premier of England in 1892, as quoted by the hon. gentleman, said:

I am a Tory, yet I cannot accept in all their width these doctrines of unrestricted, passive obedience. I believe that the title of both kings and parliaments to the obedience of their subjects is that these kings and parliaments should observe the fundamental laws and the fundamental understandings of the compact by which they rule. Parliament has a right to govern the people of Ulster. It has not a right to sell them into slavery; and I do not believe in the unlimited, unrestricted power of parliaments any more than I do in the unrestricted power of kings. Parliaments, like kings, may take a course which, while it is technically within the legal limits of their attribution, is yet entirely at variance and in conflict with the understanding of the institutions by which they rule. James II. forgot that law. He stepped outside his attributions. He stepped outside the limits of the spirit of the constitution, and we know how the people of Ulster met him. If a similar abuse of power—be it on the part of a parliament, or on the part of a king—should ever occur at any future time, I do not believe that the people of Ulster have lost their sturdy love of freedom or their detestation of arbitrary power.

Now, the hon. member claimed, and I think with some justice, that he had the sanction of the present Prime Minister of England in hinting that under certain circumstances rebellion in Ulster would be justifiable. I do not quote this speech for the purpose of saying that the hon. member for West York was disloyal. I am convinced that he spoke under the influence of the peculiar feelings which an Orange meeting seems to excite in him, and that he expressed a purely speculative view of the possibility in question. I do not think the Prime Minister of England is disloyal because he used these words. But I quote these passages to show that things can be quoted against leading men of both parties which may have an unfriendly and unkind construction put upon them. Then, it does not lie in the mouths of gentlemen on the other side of the House, subject to such quotations, to try to read a false meaning into things that have been said by gentlemen on this side of the House.

The larger question, as to the present agitation to arouse race and religious feeling, may come up again. It is sufficient to say now that it is not to be wondered at that our friends opposite have felt bound to resort to such an agitation. They have given up all hope of winning the people of Quebec, especially while the present right hon. gentleman is leader of the government. They feel that their only chance of returning to power is to stir up an anti-French, anti-Catholic feeling throughout Canada. They are somewhat more guarded in their personal utterances than are their organs in their printed utterances. But the campaign is going on through the press, in this House, in the Orange lodges, and I do not know what other organizations all over the country—the campaign of no Popery and down with the French and wooden shoes—that is the amount of it. If they think they are going to gain anything by such an agitation we are glad to see them go on with it. Judging by the results of the last election, we are willing to await with confidence the result of the new departure.

Mr. N. CLARKE WALLACE (West York). Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is necessary to say many words in reply to the hon. member who has just taken his seat. He has quoted the report of a speech I made at Kingston, and he has quoted the report of a speech of Lord Salisbury, who was then, as he is now, the Premier of England, taking exactly the same position that I had taken in my remarks at Kingston on that occasion. In neither of these was there any rebellion, as the hon. gentleman terms it, but simply a protest against Great Britain handing a portion of her dominions over to the control of another authority or power—that while she had a right to govern it herself, she had not the right to confer the power she exercised on another. That was the whole question. He referred to the question brought up this afternoon. I can say for myself that there is no man of this House who has done more to prevent religious questions being brought up and discussed in this chamber than myself. My experience in parliament has been a continual protest against such questions up in our House of Commons. As hon. members know, I parted from my old political associates, I parted from the government of which I was a member, because I thought that that government had made a mistake in bringing religious questions into this House. I was opposed to the bringing up of such questions. I said then that I thought the question which then divided us should be left to be dealt with by the provincial legislature of Manitoba. That was the position I took. I have never been in favour of, but always have deprecated, the introduction of religious and race questions into this House.

Sir, when we look back at the history of this government, what do we find? We find a member of it, and we cannot disassociate one member of the government from the other, for when a member of the government speaks on a question of great public policy, he must be taken to speak for the whole government—we find the Minister of Public Works giving utterance to disloyal sentiments and thus subjecting to the same measure of condemnation all his colleagues because he spoke as the mouthpiece of the government, and as the representative of every one of its members.

The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) says there is an element in the Conservative party which has compelled that party to take up grounds of religious and national prejudices. Sir, I do not know to whom he refers. I challenge him to produce the evidence. So far as I know, if there is one political party in this country that is more free from the charge of bringing up racial questions or religious questions, it is the Liberal-Conservative party. Take its history in the past. Take the history of its former great leader Sir John Macdonald, and you will find that his whole aim was to join the two races that compose the greater portion of the population of this country, not on racial, but on political lines. He did not ask what your religion or nationality might be, but asked you to support the national policy and the policy of the Conservative party, which he claimed was the best for this country. But what about hon. gentlemen on the other side? What about the leading men of the Liberal party? I read the statement made by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), whose word will be taken in my opinion as undoubted as the word of any gentleman in this House or out of it, and statements made by the hon. member for Montmorency, and the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), that prominent members of the Liberal party had said on the hustings in scores of places, dozens at any rate, in the province of Quebec, that there the cry was made: Will you vote for Sir Charles Tupper, a Protestant and an Englishman, against Sir Wilfrid Laurier, a Frenchman and a Roman Catholic? I heard these gentlemen make that statement, and I accept it as an absolute fact. If it is, it is a sorry thing for Canada that prominent public men, occupying high positions in this country, should descend to such arguments and appeals. I may say that in all my political experience I have never heard such arguments used in the province of Ontario. A gentleman who will get up and use such arguments on the hustings in Ontario and the other provinces to the west, where I have been, and in the other provinces to the east of Quebec, would be considered unworthy of public confidence. Yet such an attempt to divide the country on racial and religious lines has been made by prominent members of the Liberal party led by the right hon. gentleman. Then let us come down to later day. We find that the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) who, as such, represented the whole government, and who got his inspiration and pointers from the right hon. leader of the government himself, making similar appeals. We find the right hon. leader of the government saying, when speaking about Imperial unity:

It was indeed absurd. It would make Canada take part in all the wars which Great Britain might have to wage in every part of the world. The only tie which binds Canada to the mother country is Canada's own will. Canada and England have interests apart and the day will and must come when Canada and England will have to separate from each other.

That is the language of the right hon. First Minister. That is the inspiration he gave to the Minister of Public Works and the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), and the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Monet) and others, who have been, it seems, but too apt and willing pupils. They have accepted the doctrines laid down by the right hon. gentleman, doctrines which are not in accord with the sentiments of the people of this country. But the right hon. gentleman, at a later day, after we had passed the resolution in the House of Commons during last session, pledging ourselves unanimously, when war seemed imminent and inevitable, to assist Great Britain, sympathizing with her, in the course she had taken, and declaring that her position was a righteous one, and that we would stand by her as we were bound to do in the bonds of empire in every emergency. But when that occurred, what position did the First Minister take. His first position was one that will not be endorsed to-day by any loyal citizen of Canada. It was that we have no business to interfere, for two reasons. First, that parliament had not voted the money to send contingents to South Africa. Why, he forgot apparently that Governor General's warrants can be used, that his government had supplied themselves with millions of dollars, through the medium of such warrants, in 1896, without the authority of parliament or without that necessity which existed in this case. He said, further, that we had no power to send men out of this country. Had he read our Militia Act? He said he had given the question great study of late, but I am afraid that in that statement he was indulging in a little bunkum. Why, he had failed to learn the A. B. C. of the British constitution, which declares in a hundred different ways, that wherever the Union Jack floats the Queen can call upon her subjects to defend the old flag. He had forgotten that and the Act of this parliament. What did he say? He said: 'I have given much study to the question; our volunteers are enrolled to be used in the defence of the Dominion; they are Canadians to be used here, but not outside this country. They are Canadian troops to be used to fight for Canada's defence. Then he says further, as if hedging a little:

Perhaps the most widespread misapprehension is that they cannot be sent out of Canada. To my mind, it is clear that cases might arise where they might be sent to a foreign land to fight. To postulate a case, suppose Spain should declare war upon Great Britain. Spain has, or had, a navy, and that navy might be got ready to assail Canada as part of the empire. Sometimes the best method of defending oneself is to attack, and, in that case, Canadian soldiers might be sent to Spain, and it is quite certain that they might legally be despatched to the Iberian peninsula. The case of the South African Republic is not analogous. There is no menace to Canada. And although we may be willing to contribute troops, I do not see how we can do so.

I can tell him. Take up the Militia Act, sec. 78, and you will find that 'Her Majesty may call out the militia'—this, remember, is the Militia Act of Canada passed by the parliament of Canada—'or any part thereof, for active service, either within or without Canada at any time when it appears advisable to do so, by reason of war, invasion, insurrection, or danger of any of these.' It allows the widest latitude. The Prime Minister said he had given considerable study to the question, and that, under the circumstances, he could not send out the troops. Why? There is the Act of parliament as authority. As my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Prior) says, every militiaman knows that; every private member of parliament knew it whose feelings were guided by right impulses. But the hon. Prime Minister was trying to get out of the responsibility resting upon him as the leader of the government in a great and loyal Dominion. He did not realize the position—he said that he was blown hither and thither by the wind of public opinion. He wanted to find out what public sentiment was. And where did he go to learn what public sentiment was? He went to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), and the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Monet), instead of finding out the sentiment of the people of Canada. He evidently did not want to study the Militia Act. What more does this Act say? It provides 'that the militiamen so called out shall continue to serve for at least one year, if required so to do, or for any longer period which Her Majesty so appoints.' Subsection 4 provides for the time when the active militia or any corps may be called out by the Governor in Council. And reading section 81 our attention is called to another question. The First Minister said: We have no money. Section 81 provides for the militia called out for active service, and places officers and men, in this respect, upon the same footing as the Imperial troops. 'They are to receive such pay as may be fixed by the Governor in Council, who is given complete authority, even to raising of money, in case of war, without calling parliament together.' The hon. gentleman says it is unconstitutional, and begs pardon all round for breaking the constitution. He says that the circumstances justify this breach of the constitutional rule. Sir, in sending these troops to South Africa the government violated no constitutional rule; on the contrary, they were simply carrying out the constitution of this country, they were simply obeying the law as it was laid down. But they obeyed it in a very perfunctory and half-hearted manner. They did not go into it with the spirit the Canadian people desired. According to the admissions of the Prime Minister himself, the people had to force him step by step. The leader of the opposition showed a loyalty and self-abnegation which does him credit. He might have made political capital out of the inaction of the First Minister, but he did not seek to do so. He gave the Prime Minister his advice, and pledged, not only the support of himself, as he was perfectly justified in doing, but the support of the great Conservative party, in furnishing troops and paying these troops. But it was a humiliating despatch that was sent by the government. These hon. gentlemen boast of the wealth of Canada, of the great surpluses rolled up year by year, and of the great progress we are making. We are delighted with these things. But when the troops came to be enlisted, those dull-witted people that the Prime Minister so scornfully and insultingly referred to the other day—when they were offering their services to fight the battles of the empire, he said: We will permit you to go. We will permit you! Why, he could not prevent them. He dared not raise a hand to prevent them. England did not propose to pay for transporting them, but said: Deliver them safely in South Africa, and we will take charge of them. If the government had come out and said, as they ought to have done: We will furnish a thousand men, we will not 'pernit' them to go, but we will enroll them, pay them, take charge of them and look after them in every way as a nation should look after the men who fight its battles.

But they abandon them on the shores of Africa without a dollar, and we cannot get a word from them to-day as to how they are getting along—a complete abandonment of the men who loyally stood up for the defence of the empire and who are there in South Africa representing this portion of the empire. I say, it was offensive from start to finish. The government said: We will permit a thousand men to go, we will send them to Africa, but we wash our hands of them after that—and this is to be no precedent. I think it should not be a precedent. I think, Sir, that Canada should not make a precedent of such a shabby course as that; she should be too much ashamed of it to repeat it. But that was not the sense in which the minister intended it. It was a slap in the face for the British government, virtually saying: You must not ask us for any more men, nor must you think we are bound in any way. We sent troops, but we did it in the most offensive way, instead of in the loyal, patriotic and brotherly way that should have characterized the government in such a crisis.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair at six o'clock I was referring to the fact that the government never made an offer of the first contingent, they had permitted the British government to remind them of their duty. Offers had been made by others, but the government themselves never had made an offer. The correspondence just brought down, in the despatch from the Right Hon. Mr. Chamberlain on the 3rd of October, gives directions as to the formation of the contingent. He says, in winding it up: 'Inform accordingly all who have offered to raise volunteers.' Showing that the government had made no offer, but that offers had come in to the knowledge of the British government, which offers had been transmitted, I presume, by the Governor General of Canada.

The attention of the House and the country has already been called to the extraordinary circumstance that Canada, the first in the Jubilee celebration, the first in the Jubilee procession in 1897, was the last when material help came to be given to the empire. It was not, as we all know, that the empire required either men or money, it was not that the empire needed our assistance, because the British Empire is pre-eminent over all other nations in her wealth, and in the strength of her navy, and not second to any people in the character of her citizens and their ability to hold their own against any other nation, as they have proved in a hundred fights, in a hundred wars. But, Sir, at this critical period it was a matter of paramount importance to show the hostile nations of Europe that Great Britain could count upon the assistance of her colonies, because we see to-day and we knew then that all the nations of Europe were more or less hostile to Great Britain; we saw and we knew, that some were bitterly hostile to Great Britain, that they had been watching for years an opportunity to attack Great Britain when her hands were tied, when she was involved in some serious undertaking, when they would execute that hostility which they have against Great Britain, a hostility excited by their envy of Great Britain, because Great Britain is the richest, because she is the most powerful, and because she is the freest and greatest nation of the world to-day. This is what excited the hostility of the powers of Europe, and they were watching for their opportunity. We knew that. We are an integral portion of the empire, a portion that day by day and year by year must take a more prominent part in the affairs of the great empire to which we belong, and are taking to-day a more prominent part than we have ever done in our history, so I say it was of paramount importance that at that crisis, just at the moment when all the other colonies, all the other possessions of the empire, were flooding the offices in London with their offers of material assistance in men and money, of all that would be required, I say it was of paramount importance at that moment that Canada, the first among the possessions of Great Britain, the first of her dominions, the one with the greatest population, the one with the greatest number of free citizens, should be the first to offer her assistance. But, Sir, Canadians were humiliated, and the empire, too, was humiliated by the fact that the Premier was waiting to get the course and current of public opinion. He got that course; he was fishing for it. Where? With the Tates, the Bourassas, the Monets and other men, apparently, because his interview with the Globe newspaper indicates the kind of instruction, or inspiration that he was getting from those whom he consulted. What does he say? He says:

Then, again, how could we do so without parliament granting us the money? We simply could not do anything. In other words, we should have to summon parliament.

I think I have demonstrated already, by reading from the Militia Act of Canada that it amply provides for raising volunteers and for providing the money without calling parliament together:

The government of Canada is restricted in its powers.

He did not know its powers; he had not read the Militia Act, the law of the country, although he tells us, in the beginning, that he had given it much study of late. He had not studied the Militia Act, which I have read to the House this evening, because we had that Act on the statute-book and we have that power to-day. He says :

There is no doubt as to the attitude of the government on questions that mean a menace to British interests, but in this present case our limitations are very clearly defined.

I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman where our limitations are clearly defined, I would like to ask him now to give an answer, briefly, to the question as to where our limitations are defined. Why, Sir, our powers are the most extensive, the most widespread, the most full and complete that could possibly be desired by any government that desired to do anything in the matter. He says further :

So it is that we have not offered a Canadian contingent to the home authorities. The Militia Department duly transmitted individual offers to the Imperial government and the reply from the War Office, as published in Saturday's 'Globe,' shows their attitude on the question. As to Canada furnishing a contingent, the government have not discussed the question, for the reasons I have stated.

Why, Mr. Speaker, the whole Dominion of Canada, from one end of it to the other, was discussing this question, the loyal sentiment was rising up among the people showing their determination that Canadians should do their duty, and the government, we are told, have not even discussed the question, have never considered it. It was not of sufficient importance in their minds, for discussion or consideration. They were the only men in this broad Dominion who had not discussed the question, they were the only men who lacked that feeling, that desire to look after the interests of Canada and to see that Canada should do her duty to the empire, the only men in this Dominion who failed in their duty in this regard. What more ?

As to Canada furnishing a contingent, the government has not discussed the question for the reasons I have stated, reasons which, I think, must easily be understood by every one who understands the constitutional law on the question.

Here we are brought face to face with this great constitutional law. Where did the right hon. First Minister get his constitutional law ? Where did he get this authority ? It is not in the Militia Act, it is not part of the statute-book. Where does he get this prohibition, this constitutional law, that he is continually referring to ? The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) quotes the right hon. First Minister's constitutional law, but the right hon. First Minister's dictum is not constitutional law; it is not the statutes of Canada. I challenge him to quote a statute of Canada that will justify the position that he has taken in this matter. Then again, they say that parliament should be summoned. The great argument of the hon. Minister of Public Works is that parliament should be summoned. Very well, we have no objection to parliament being summoned ; we had no objection to its being summoned months ago. We never made any objection; this is a matter that might be discussed in the cabinet behind closed doors where the ministers could fight out their difficulties. The hon. Minister of Public Works said : I contend that parliament should be called together. Who was he arguing against ?—not against anybody on this side of the House because no member on this side of the House was opposed to the meeting of parliament. We are always ready to have parliament meet, to have the great council of the nation consulted, because we know that these hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House are always blundering into mistakes and difficulties, and the safety of the country requires that we should be called together to give them sound advice and to keep them in the straight and narrow path from which they are continually straying. So, I say that this argument of the hon. Minister of Public Works was a piece of moonshine. It is a family matter among themselves; it appears that they have disagreed and that they have fought it out. It is disclosing apparently what has occurred in their councils, when the hon. Minister of Public Works and the right hon. First Minister and other hon. ministers have had a disagreement whether parliament should be called or not. Let them settle that among themselves. If they had called parliament together before we would have been delighted because we think a better solution would have been arrived at than the government have arrived at by the mere pressure of outside public opinion without the discussion of parliament. Now, Mr. Speaker, for four years, nearly, these gentlemen have controlled the affairs of this country, and they have, as the hon. Minister of Public Works has told us, controlled the province of Quebec because the hon. Minister of Public Works tells us that so completely have they controlled and dominated that province with their opinions and ideas that there will not be six Conservative members elected from the province of Quebec at the next general election.

An hon. MEMBER. It is not true.

Mr. WALLACE. It is not true, an hon. gentleman says. I do not think it is true, because I do not place the slightest credence in any statements made by the hon. Minister of Public Works. He pretends, and others pretend that they have completely dominated the province of Quebec. What is the result ? I am told to-day, Mr. Speaker, by men qualified to know, living in the province of Quebec, that never in its history, so far back as the recollection of hon. members of this House goes, has there been as much cleavage between the two nationalities as there is to-day in the province of Quebec. I am assured of that by men who are capable of knowing, and if it be the case, who is responsible for it?—the hon. gentlemen who have dominated sixty constituencies, according to their own statement, out of sixty-five of the province. If this be a fact it is a most deplorable fact, and I lay the blame for it at the door of the government of Canada, led and dominated by the hon. Minister of Public Works, followed by the right hon. First Minister himself. I am not going to make a subdivision because, as I said before, the government, on all important questions of public policy, must be a unit; there must be no division. The utterances of one man are the utterances of the whole of the members of the government, and therefore the statement of the hon. Minister of Public Works is the statement of every member of the government. What does he say? He has never been very backward in expressing his views. I am very sure that the expression of them has not always been a pleasant ordeal for the other members of the government. He is always making a cleavage, making a division, calling up the national question and the religious question. He never makes a speech, he never writes an article, he never makes a programme but he endeavours to divide the country on racial and religious lines. The right hon. First Minister, Mr. Speaker, is not entirely guiltless in that regard. The First Minister is always doing the same thing. He made a speech at Sherbrooke the other day, and instead of saying that we are all Canadians, as we should be, and that we are all inspired by the same Canadian sentiment, he, without any necessity in the world, took occasion to show that there are lines of race cleavage in this country. Is it loyal or patriotic to remind us of these things? No, Sir, it is not. The Prime Minister said:

This war does not affect English and French Canadians in the same way.

Well, Sir, we are all loyal British subjects, and it should affect us all in the same way. The ancestors of these gentlemen of the French race came under British rule in 1759, 140 years ago—how many years have they got to be here in order that they may acquire the same loyal British sentiments which the Prime Minister says belong to English-speaking Canadians? We should live in Canada as one people; we should be all Canadians, and no one should endeavour to distinguish between us and divide us into classes as the Prime Minister has done. The right hon. gentleman further said at Sherbrooke:

This war does not affect English and French Canadians in the same way. With Canadians of English origin it was the voice of the blood that spoke, the most powerful voice that can appeal to the human heart. When Canadians of English origin knew that their brethren were fighting in Africa their blood boiled, and they burned to go to their kindred's aid.

Mr. WALLACE.

Sir, our soldiers went to the aid of every British subject, never inquiring whether he was of French extraction, or Dutch extraction, or Irish extraction, or any other extraction, so long as he was a fellow-subject under the British flag. Further the right hon. gentleman said:

It was not the same voice that spoke to us of French origin; it was the voice of gratitude, the voice of national solidarity, which summons us all to be united under the flag of the country in which we live.

Under which class does the First Minister place himself? We know where to place the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), we know where to place the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), we know where to place the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Monet), and those men who express sentiments such as a loyal Canadian should not express; but will the First Minister please tell us where he places himself. It is stated by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane), that during the Northwest rebellion, the Prime Minister told us that he would like to shoulder his musket and go to the banks of the Saskatchewan—but he did not go. Here is some more of his Sherbrooke speech:

I do not ask my fellow-countrymen of French origin to feel the same enthusiasm about that war as that which naturally inspires our fellow-countrymen of English origin. I know how to make the distinction; but I ask my French fellow-countrymen to do from a sense of duty what our English countrymen do under the impulse of enthusiasm.

Have we English-speaking Canadians no sense of duty? Are we not all inspired by the same sense of duty, and yet the First Minister classifies us under different headings. No wonder that after such language from the First Minister, the ruler of the cabinet, as he is called, and the other satellites of the government should take their cue and go much further. Here is what the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) says:

Violent efforts are being made to induce the government of Canada to send a military contingent to South Africa.

'Violent efforts' mark the words.

This attempt is being made by the principal organizers of the Tory party. The Montreal 'Star' has made the most fuss of any of the newspapers about this question. We must admit that it was closely followed by several of the other important Conservative organs. We have, then, the right to conclude that the policy of the Tory party is to adopt as a plank in its platform participation as a power in the European and foreign wars of Great Britain.

Well, Sir, that was the policy of the Conservative party and they impressed that policy on the Liberal party so that the Liberal party were forced to do what the First Minister, on the 3rd of October, said they would not do because they could not do it under the law—a law made in his own imagination. Here is some more of Mr. Tarte's language :

The Transvaal Republic is a very small state. It is against this insignificant power that mighty England is preparing to fight. No one will pretend, let us hope, that the mother country needs the help of its colonies to vanquish so small an adversary. It is a question, then, not of the Transvaal, but of the adoption of a policy that is entirely new and full of responsibilities—the future participation of Canada in the struggles of Great Britain on the battle-fields of Europe and everywhere else that she engages in conflict. Nothing is easier than to go, as the 'Star' reporters did when ordered by Mr. Graham, and ask for interviews right and left from business men, manufacturers, members of the bar, &c. And let us add, too, that nothing is easier than for these business men, these manufacturers and these lawyers to declare that it would be a good thing for Canada to send troops to the Transvaal.

We are in America. Canada has not and should not have any ambition to play a role in European diplomacy.

Now, this is what we are being exposed to by a certain number of those who in this Transvaal matter wish to make us take the first steps towards such a future.

For our part, we are astonished at the easy way in which some citizens whose characters we respect have, in conversation with the 'Star' reporter, provided their words have not been distorted, expressed the opinions reported in the columns of that paper.

We take the liberty of calling their attention to the grave consequences of an undertaking and of a policy like that upon which the Canadian government are invited to venture, even without the consent of the Senate and Commons.

What have we to do with African affairs? What interests have we in the Transvaal? Why should we take the money and the blood of our people to spend them in such far-away regions? We leave the question with all who are capable of reflection.

That is the statement of one of the members of the government, and that is the statement of the whole government, and it is the policy of the whole government, because I emphasize the fact that the whole government is responsible for whatever one of their ministers does. Says Mr. Tarte :

What have we to do with African affairs?

Yes, Mr. Speaker, what have we to do with African affairs? The British Empire is invaded. The other portions of the empire are going to fight to maintain the integrity of the empire, and this sneering Canadian minister, who draws his pay from the loyal people of Canada, thinks it fit to sneer at the loyalty and patriotism which we as Canadians are proud to possess. He said further :

I returned from France, where I received the care that French science can give, and I return to Canada more French than ever.

What was the necessity at this particular period, or at any other period for that matter, for a Canadian minister to be parading his French before the eyes of the people of Canada. What was the necessity for it at a period when the country from which he came was bitterly hostile to Great Britain. Was his conduct not on the line he has always pursued, of trying to divide the people, because that is his only chance of getting any prominence in the public eye of this country. Mr. Tarte said further :

I am a minister in a British government, and I have the right to say that I am French. But I tell you this: if to declare myself a British subject would prevent me from being French, then I would refuse to call myself a British subject. We make no threats.

That is just where he does make a threat. You do not hear of the Minister of Inland Revenue going around parading in that utterly obnoxious fashion; but you find men of the stamp of the Minister of Public Works. He made a speech at Laval University on the 21st of November, 1899, on the occasion of a banquet there. I think our friend, the member for Jacques Cartier, (Mr. Monk), was there. The Hon. J. I. Tarte, Minister of Public Works, in the course of his reply, said :

You are favourites of fortune, you are blessed by fate. Be proud of having professors in this Catholic and French university to which those who have at heart the advancement of the French language are glad to associate themselves. French Canadians had formerly been in a position inferior to that of their English-speaking neighbours, who received help from the motherland. He hoped to see the young men of his race compete with them and become their superiors.

He said further :

One of the paramount duties of the French members of the House of Commons was to show that they were Frenchmen.

Mr. Speaker, I think the paramount duty of a member of the House of Commons is to show that he is a Canadian, and a British Canadian too; and I repudiate the sentiment contained in that remark, as the people of Canada will repudiate it and the government that makes it. We are all Canadians. We come here or we were born here; we are going to make our homes here; and we must be loyal to the flag and to the institutions under which we live, if Canada is ever to become a great and powerful nation. Those men who are continually endeavouring to stir up racial and religious differences are not true Canadians, are not loyal to the country in which they live.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WALLACE. I am glad to find that my sentiments meet with the approval of some members on the other side of the House, and I hope they will visit with their condemnation their leader, the Minister of Public Works, who takes a diametrically opposite course.

Mr. BOURASSA. That is why we do not vote with you—that we are full of the sentiment you have just expressed.

Mr. WALLACE. I am afraid the hon. gentleman gets his inspiration from a very bad source. Now, Mr. Speaker, I see behind me the picture of the hon. member for North Victoria, Col. Sam Hughes. There is an impression abroad throughout this country that the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Borden), in regard to Col. Sam Hughes, is trying to hide behind a bigger man, Major General Hutton. I have personally no reason to come to the defence of the hon. member for North Victoria; but I think Col. Sam Hughes is a much better soldier than he is a politician, and owing to his military experience and his possession of military qualities, he is exactly the class of man who would do great service for the British cause in South Africa in connection with our Canadian contingent. I believe he was given to understand that he would be taken on the contingent. He was the first Canadian who called the attention of this House and of the government to that matter. Every one must admit that he had always been urging that Canada should take a share in the defence of the empire; and the sending of the contingent was just in the line of the policy he had previously been advocating. He was determined to go, the newspaper press gave it out that the government had decided to send him, and public sentiment approved of that course, because the public believed that it was a proper recognition of the policy which Col. Hughes had been advocating. It was therefore with a great deal of disappointment, when the contingent sailed away, that the member for North Victoria went on the vessel in civilian's clothes and without an appointment of any kind or a letter of any description to the authorities in South Africa. In my opinion, such a course was unfair and unjust to that hon. gentleman. The papers have been asked for and will come down. I do not know anything about the correspondence, but I do know that Col. Hughes is a loyal Canadian citizen, that he has studied the art of war, and that, in the peculiar military tactics prevailing in South Africa, he would have been a most valuable acquisition to any military organization. The Minister of Militia and Defence permitted Col. Hughes to go away without a line of recommendation and without any assistance, we presume, on the ground that he had not been quite subordinate to the Major General; but we are told in the public press that a son of the Minister of Militia was insubordinate to his superior officer the other day and we will look with some interest and curiosity to see how he is to be treated.

With reference to exciting racial and sectional divisions in this country, I assert that the Conservative party is the party that has the fewest sins to answer for in that regard of any political party in Canada. Do hon. gentlemen opposite remember the campaign of 1882, when we had Edgar's War Song:

The traitor's hand is on thy throat,
Ontario, Ontario.

Who was the traitor? The province of Quebec, according to the war-cry and the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite, had its hand upon the throat of Ontario, and was bound to destroy her. The Conservative party in their career have stood on higher and more loyal grounds.

Let me refer to another matter with regard to this contingent. When it was decided to send out a full regiment of more than a thousand men, the government were bound to take proper precautions. They were not going, as they announced themselves, to undertake the responsibility for a dollar's worth of expenditure after the troops landed in South Africa, but were merely going to equip them with the cheapest material—I presume this khaki uniform, worth a few cents a yard, and which may be suitable to this warm climate. I am not finding fault with that, but only wish to point out that the uniforms were exceedingly cheap. The government were bound to look after the safety of those who left their positions and volunteered to go to the front. The First Minister said that the government permitted them to go. Why, Sir, the government could not have prevented their going. The government should have said: We have enlisted them and have promised to pay them and look after them. Lord Strathcona gave perhaps one year's income and has done more, so far as cash contributions are concerned, than any man in the British Empire. But 2,500 of our Canadians have given up each his one year's income and risked their lives in addition. So that I say, while Lord Strathcona's contribution is one that makes every Canadian proud of having such a liberal, loyal citizen among us, we are still prouder to know that we have 2,500 Canadians, and can have ten times as many more should the necessity arise for their service, who would risk not only their years' income, but their lives as well. It was then the solemn bounden duty of the government to take every care of those men. But what did they do? They engaged the steamer Sardinian, a steamship that I know well because I crossed the Atlantic in her once. I think that 400 passengers would fill her up, but the government put on board 1,060 soldiers and 80 of a crew, making more than 1,000 all told. The correspondent of the Globe newspaper, in criticising that vessel, makes some charges that show the government failed to realize its duty when it sent out on board that steamer that large number of men. The summer season was coming on to the south of the equator, a season of great heat, and which required that particular precautions should be taken. Those precautions were neglected. The Globe correspondent, who was with the troops, said :

In the soldiers' pocket book it is laid down that troops should never be lodged on a deck without side scuttles. Theory might be disregarded, however, if the fittings of the ship permitted a free current of air to be maintained throughout the deck in every part where troops are obliged to sleep and live. But our steerage deck does not conform to this rule. Painstaking effort has been made to ensure ventilation, and the ventilating fans are aided by wind-sails. But the fittings of the ship are so arranged that the air currents cannot reach certain corners.

Sometimes about thirty men are sleeping in a row. The tops of these are from twenty to twenty-four inches from the deck above. It will readily be seen what an obstacle to ventilation these berths are. The question as to why these bunks are used instead of the far more hygienic hammock finds various answers. One is that more men can be accommodated in the same space by means of the bunks. This I have heard contradicted by those who assert that the hammock could accommodate just as many men as the berth. Not infrequently during our brief experience of hot weather the thermometer on that deck went up to 120, and I have heard statements of even higher temperature being registered.

Just imagine, Mr. Speaker, putting those volunteers into a close, stuffy place, where the thermometer registered 120 degrees, and no ventilation during the nights' rest.

Mr. MACDONALD (East Huron). What was the mortality.

Mr. WALLACE. Very low, no thanks to the care of the government, but thanks to Providence. The correspondent continues :

No wonder the men fled to the spar deck and availed themselves gladly of permission to spend part of their nights under the sky. It was stifling in the state-rooms, and many of the officers slept in hammocks slung on the quarter deck. I did not like to think of that steerage deck on those hot nights.

This gentleman had state room accommodation, and he said he did not like to think of the steerage accommodation on these hot nights. What more ?

For private soldiers a trooping voyage cannot be anything less than an ordeal. A far more serious defect is the condition of the sanitary arrangements. These are, on the whole, to be pronounced inadequate and their fitting up has been defective in the extreme, with great resultant discomfort to all on board. The ablution rooms sail close to the wind in the matter of adequacy; thirty-seven basins are provided for over 900 men. The arrangements also are primitive. No reason can be seen why the water should not be laid on, but it is not, and buckets have to be used. Incidentally this affords an excellent explanation of the waste of fresh water which caused some heart-searchings when the voyage was about two-thirds over.

Summed up, then, the ship's accommodation is not sufficient for the number of men upon her, and the fittings are extremely inadequate. The opinion generally expressed upon board is that she would have made an excellent transport for half the number of men now upon her.

That is the opinion of the correspondent of the Toronto Globe newspaper, and he says very much more in the same line, which I will not take up the time of the House by reading. But I must say this, that he discloses a state of affairs which is not creditable to the government. The government should have looked after the care of those men better than it did, and I am sure there will be nobody to endorse that statement more readily than the hon. member for East Huron.

It was said here the other night, but as I have not the right to refer to a former debate in this House, let me say that it was said in the Globe newspaper that in the province of Manitoba, in the recent elections, the Liberal party was sustained by a majority of the people's vote. Well, I happened to be in Manitoba last November, and when I got there I found that a general election was in progress for the local legislature. I was easily persuaded to stay for a week or two. I did not have the pleasure of meeting our friend, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), though I was told he was travelling all around in his magnificent private car.

Mr. TAYLOR. And drawing his salary of $7,000 from the people of Canada.

Mr. WALLACE. Surely not. I think his salary must have been dropped during the time he was there. There was a drop of some kind, I know.

Mr. DAVIN. He dropped his influence.

Mr. WALLACE. The Globe newspaper said there were one or two constituencies whose returns came in four or five days later than the others. One of them was called Dauphin, and it was said by the Globe that there was a remarkable revolution of public opinion already in Manitoba because a constituency named Dauphin, that had given nine of a Liberal majority in the last election, gave 450 of a majority when the returns came in, showing that the people had regretted supporting Hugh John. Well, I was told that in two polling subdivisions in the electorate district of Dauphin, in one night 604 names were added to the list, and when that came to be investigated they were found to be the names of Doukhobors, Galicians, Finns and Poles, and all possible kinds of settlers. It is a curious coincidence that these 604 were the same names as appeared on the pay roll of Messrs Mackenzie and Mann, two famous contractors, sometimes known as Bill and Dan. These 604 names were transferred bodily from the pay roll of Messrs Mackenzie & Mann to the voters list in the district of Dauphin. By that means, every vote was polled during that day, there was not one left off. By polling these 604 votes, they got a majority of 455, which the Globe said was a remarkable instance of the revulsion of public feeling in one constituency. And then we are told: Look at the province of Manitoba, where, though Mr. Greenway is not in power, he had a majority of the popular vote. In this case he got 604 votes, every vote being polled, as I believe, dead or alive. I presume that the first duty of the new government—and it will be performed with neatness and despatch will be to strike off these 604 names and give the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Roche) a fair square chance for his life and that is all he asks.

An hon. MEMBER. Did those whose names were put on vote at the election?

Mr. DAVIS. No, they did not; they were not there.

Mr. WALLACE. My hon. friend from Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) has a history in connection with that campaign. If he had been given the same treatment as his colleague who was with him and who was lodged in the county jail in Winnipeg, he would not have opened his mouth quite so wide here to-night. It is because of misplaced leniency that he is able to sit here and interrupt those who address the House. There are other inquiries to be made and we will make them in this House. And those who have been operating in the country, we will make them face the music in this House. Those investigations that were burked in the past hon. gentlemen opposite will not be able to burk any longer. We will call this government to account. They are already in fear and trembling. Last year they might act in high and mighty fashion; but the handwriting on the wall in the form of results of elections throughout the country gives them warning that they cannot continue to play their games. We will compel them to obey the rules of parliament and to grant those investigations which they were afraid to grant because the political lives not only of private members but of ministers would be endangered. Mr. Speaker, I will not trespass further upon your time. I had not intended to speak so long. The questions that have been referred to are interesting questions, and I am sure we shall have another opportunity of discussing these matters which are of so much importance to the country.

Mr. T. O. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). I had no intention of taking part in this debate, and should not have done so had not the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) dragged in my name in a very peculiar manner. I believe that the subject of discussion is the question who raised the race cry in this country. So far as the Western part of the country where I live is concerned, the statements that some of the hon. gentlemen have made that the Conservative party have not tried to raise that cry are without foundation. At a meeting held in my own constituency about a year ago, the hon. member for West Assinibola (Mr. Davin) addressed the people; and I was there and heard what he said and took it down. At that meeting he asked the English speaking people how they liked to have the French tail wagging the Anglo-Saxon dog. I would like to know what that means if it is not intended to raise racial strife in this country. But that is what that hon. gentleman said, and he claims to be the leader of the Conservative party for that part of the country. Now, with reference to the Manitoba elections, which have just been mentioned by the hon. member for West York, and more particularly with reference to the election in Dauphin, I may say that I was in Dauphin during that election, and that there is no truth in the hon. gentleman's assertion that the voters' list was packed. There were names put on the list, but the men were not there and they did not vote in many cases. If the hon. gentleman will take the trouble to look at the different polls on the line of railway owned by Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, he will find that very few votes were polled. Though there may have been five or six hundred names on the list, there were not more than 100 votes polled in that portion of the country.

Mr. WALLACE. How many names were put on the lists?

Mr. DAVIS. Only those were put on that had a perfect right to be put on. If the hon. gentleman knew about the franchise of Manitoba, he would know that every one of those men had a perfect right to have his name on the list.

Mr. WALLACE. How many?

Mr. DAVIS. I have not counted up the list. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) made the statement that there were 600 on the list.

Mr. WALLACE. I said 604, and I repeat the statement and can prove it.

Mr. DAVIS. They may have been on the list, and I have no doubt they were. They have a perfect right to be on the list. But it does not follow that they voted, because, as I said, they were not there and they did not and could not vote. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) made another statement with reference to myself. He said that a friend of mine was placed in confinement or something to that effect. I may tell the hon. gentleman that the less he says about that the better for his friends, as the matter is no credit to the Conservative party. They made a statement in the reptile paper—I cannot speak of it in any other way, I refer to the Winnipeg Telegram that this man travelled in a private car with the Minister of the Interior, or was travelling with him, and that he came with me. There was no truth in the statement and I fancy that the man who made it knew there was no truth in it.

Mr. WALLACE.

Mr. WALLACE. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davis) deny it?

Mr. DAVIS. The party referred to did not come in the car and, to my knowledge, the minister had not seen him or spoken to him. This man came to Manitoba, as he had a perfect right to do. He came in to Winnipeg, and some of the hon. gentlemen's (Mr. Wallace's) political friends got hold of him and took him around for a couple of days. They introduced him to parties under assumed names, and filled him up with tory whisky. After they had filled him with liquor, they proceeded to get up some bogus charge. I understand that the man who swore out the information was the editor of the newspaper I referred to, who had never seen the man. He laid that information and took the affidavit and had the man arrested on a bogus charge. They had really nothing against him. They found some old letters in his possession. One of these was written to him 14 years ago, by the present leader of the House, who was then in opposition. They printed this letter, after garbling it and omitting the date, with the intent of trying to lead the public of Manitoba and other portions of this Dominion to believe that the Prime Minister was in correspondence with this gentleman, who had been the secretary to Riel. The object of this was to affect the elections by trying to make it clear that this Garneau, who was a French Canadian, was in league with the leader of the government, another French Canadian, and, as he had been secretary to Riel, no doubt they wanted to leave the impression with my hon. friend (Mr. Wallace) who has just taken his seat that they were connecting the Prime Minister with this, and making out that he was disloyal.

Now, with reference to who is raising the race and religious cry in this country. I want to go further, and I want to tell the hon. gentleman that there is to-day a member of Mr. Macdonald's cabinet, a gentleman by the name of Campbell, who attended a meeting I was at in the county of Morris. It was a French meeting, and this gentleman accused the Liberal candidate of that riding, Major Mulvey, with having, as he said, passed some resolutions in an Orange lodge with reference to these French Canadians. He got up and said: How can you gentlemen here, Frenchmen, vote for an Orangeman, and a man who passed these resolutions? When I questioned his right to read them, when I asked if it was possible for him to get any resolutions of that kind passed in an Orange lodge, when I said that I did not think Orange lodges were accustomed to scatter their resolutions around the country for political heelers to get hold of them, and when I asked if he could produce anything with the stamp of the Orange lodge upon it, he turned around and said: I have an Orangeman here to prove that it is true. Still, hon. gentlemen opposite are trying to accuse the Liberal party of carrying on a campaign of that kind. I want to tell the hon. gentlemen that in my riding, at the present time, which is largely a French riding, this campaign is going on all the time, a kind of still hunt, trying to raise dissatisfaction with the Liberal government because they are led by a French Canadian. There is no doubt at all of that, because it has already been thrown in my teeth. It is a still hunt, and I think the less hon. gentlemen say about these things the better.

Now, as I said, the hon member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) made that statement in a hall in my town, in the presence of a great many parties. He may be like the leader of the opposition, who, when he made a statement about Mr. Philp, whose only crime was that he had been at some time in the past a law partner of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), when the hon gentlemen made a slanderous statement about him and was in consequence served with a writ, he turned around and said that he never made the statement at all, although a thousand people heard it. I venture to say the member for West Assiniboia will say that he did not make the statement, although a great many people heard it, and a great many got up and left the hall, amongst them, French Canadian Conservatives who were not satisfied. There are scores of people who will give affidavits to show that that was a fact. And yet this hon. gentleman, I suppose, thinks himself the leader of the Conservative party in that part of the country.

Now, my hon. friend has accused me of travelling around with a certain party by the name of Garneau, but I say there is no truth in it whatever. I have good reason to believe that the member for West Assiniboia, not more than a month ago, was travelling around the North-west Territories with a very respectable gentleman by the name of Chamberlain; the hon. gentlemen opposite know him. I am given to understand that this same Mr. Chamberlain is to-day going around through the North-west Territories in the interests of the Conservative party. Now, my hon. friend knows who this Mr. Chamberlain was. We had an election in Winnipeg a few years ago between the Hon. Joseph Martin and Mr. Colin H. Campbell. A number of Conservatives sent this Mr. Chamberlain up there, but our people looked after him and the consequence was that he was put in the penitentiary for ballot box stuffing and crookedness, where he should be yet.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon gentleman is quite mistaken, and he knows it. The charge was not for ballot box stuffing.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the hon. gentleman tell us what he charge was?

Mr. WALLACE. They might have made any charge they liked, but the only charge that was sustained was that he was addicted to drink, and they took him up to make him vote when he was incompetent and did not know what he was doing. He was convicted on the charge of personation.

Mr. DAVIS. Personation and perjury was the charge made against him, and, I believe, he was convicted and was put in the penitentiary, and I have no doubt if he had his just deserts he would have stayed there until the end of his sentence. Now my hon. friend knows there was more of that kind of thing going on, when he is talking of Mr. Garneau. I suppose he is aware that in 1896 a certain gentleman by the name of Freeborn came to the province of Manitoba for the purpose of opening a school for the education of deputy returning officers, so that they could travel around the province of Manitoba and steal the people's franchise. I suppose the hon. gentleman has forgotten that. Why, it is a well-known fact that came out before the Public Accounts Committee, that this gentleman got a jar and showed them how to carry it around, and how to manipulate the ballots and to steal the ballots of the people. He got a number of gentlemen to travel around on this business, many of them had not a good reputation, some had just escaped from jail. He sent them around the country to steal the people's ballots. Some of them told about it as a good joke, they said they had actually got round the reeve of a township, who is a well-known Liberal, and made him cast a Tory vote, they told of that as a good joke. My hon. friend knows that is true.

Mr. WALLACE. Was he in West Elgin?

Mr. DAVIS. My hon. friend appears to know more about West Elgin than I do. But I want to say that when any one is talking about Mr. Philp and Mr. Garneau they had better see that their own backyard is kept clear.

Mr. WALLACE. Would the hon. gentleman permit me to say that while Mr. Freeborn told this story, not a jury could be got in Manitoba to believe him.

Mr. DAVIS. My hon. friend knows very well that in a case of that kind you cannot get juries, very often, to convict, because they disagree. He knows that you can pack a jury with three or four Conservatives, and if it is a Conservative who is accused, it is hard to get a conviction. My hon. friend knows that very well.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not believe the electors in Manitoba are the perjurers that the hon. member would make them out to be.

Mr. DAVIS.

Mr. BENNETT. They took no stock in you up there.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I was given to understand that a brother of the Conservative candidate, Mr. Boyd, who, I believe, was the gentleman that imported all these beautiful workers into Manitoba, was on one of the juries, and I wonder why my hon. friend thinks a jury of that kind would not disagree, in a case of that kind. Now, I do not want to take up any more time, I would not have spoken at all if my name had not been dragged into this discussion with reference to Mr. Garneau, and I want to set myself right. I had nothing to do with Garneau, good, bad or indifferent. That paper went so far as to say that I had signed a blank cheque, and connected me with Garneau. I never signed a blank cheque.

Mr. BENNETT. Was the cheque marked good?

Mr. DAVIS. I don't think my hon. friend's cheque would be marked good. I want to say that I had nothing to do with Mr. Garneau, the hon. member to the contrary, notwithstanding, and therefore, I wish the hon. gentleman, in future, to confine himself to what are facts.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier). Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to prolong this incident unduly. I am well aware that the government are anxious to place before us the measures for the consideration of which we have been called together, and certainly, we have no desire to detain them in any way. But I think this discussion was necessary. If the state of affairs which exists in the province of Quebec, exists to a similar degree, as regards race and religious questions, in the constituency represented by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davis) who has taken his seat, I can say that it is extremely desirable that some change should be brought about. I had not the advantage of hearing every one of the arguments presented by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), as I was obliged to leave the House, but I heard him place the interpretation on the remarks made by the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) that he had, in reality, attacked the loyalty of the province of Quebec, and it was enough for me. But, referring more particularly to what was said by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), I may say that I have known the hon. gentleman since he was a very small boy, and I am free to say that he is possessed of many qualities, and among the many gifts which I know him to possess there are two which I have the misfortune not to enjoy, having lost them a long time ago. One is that he is extremely young, and the other is that he must be a very fresh man, because otherwise I fail to see why he should have taken upon himself to take up the defence of Mr.

Magurn and Mr. Mackenzie when he had, not long ago, himself, the opportunity of giving some explanation about his own conduct that we very much required and that we were anxious to hear. The hon. gentleman must not lose sight of certain facts that strike the public. He, at a certain moment, took it upon himself to protest against the conduct of this government, and he gave to that protest the form which, as far as I am conversant with constitutional usage, rendered it obligatory upon him, to take up an attitude hostile to the government. He went so far as to resign his seat in this House, and then he comes back to the House, he is sent here to make a protest against the government, a protest in regard to which, as I said before, constitutional usage obliged him to take up an attitude hostile to the government. He comes here, is introduced to the House by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), and when the moment arrives for him to give a sanction to that protest, to give an essence to it, we find him remaining silent. His conduct, upon that occasion, reminds me to a very considerable extent of the conduct of that gentleman who started off on his wedding tour and who, upon reaching New York, found that he had forgotten his wife. The hon. gentleman forgot at the precise moment that he should have given this explanation to put it into proper form.

Mr. BOURASSA. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk) permit me a word. If he looks at the Order paper for to-morrow he will see that I have found my wife.

Mr. MONK. I consider that it is a great piece of audacity, perhaps, on my part, to venture some advice to him, but if he will allow me I would tell him that we will always be very glad to hear him on this subject, but, preferably, later on. I think he will do very well to follow the example of the British statesmen belonging to his own political party, who, upon this occasion, probably consider that they have a great deal to say upon many subjects connected with the war and who have thought fit to postpone their criticism of the action until a later date. Mr. Speaker, there are, perhaps, at the very moment I am now addressing this assembly, a number of those brave and heroic men who have left our shores, who have gone to fight for and defend the flag, on a far-off continent, exposing their lives, many of them dear to us, many of them very dear to some of us who are sitting around this assembly, who may be suffering from the consequences of their bravery, and if I might be permitted to make a suggestion to an hon. gentleman, who appears to have so much confidence in his own opinions, as the hon. member for Labelle. I would suggest to him to postpone, as he has done already, his explanations until a later date. But, Sir, referring more particularly to what gave rise to this question,

I will say that unless the conditions of the warfare that is waged against our party in the province of Quebec are changed, it is possible that the sinister prediction of the hon. Minister of Public Works will be realized, and that it will be impossible for members of our party to be elected in that province, because there is a continual appeal to race by a certain number of people and by certain men in conspicuous positions. If we had had the mere advantage, which we have had to-day, of hearing the hon. member for Labelle state before this House that he considered the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), a broad-minded and liberal man, it would have been an advantage to have had this debate, because in very different colours is he shown up daily in the province of Quebec, and shown up by the press which, to-day, is defending the hon. member for Labelle and this government. What would you say of an honourable and broad-minded man who, not having the courage to attack the province of Quebec, would systematically pay and subsidize people to wage war against that very province. What would you think of such an accusation? Take the trouble to open the organ of the hon. Minister of Public Works, which is published in the city of Montreal, and you will find that idea repeatedly expressed in La Patrie. Not only is it stated there that the hon. leader of the opposition is not a man who belongs to the same race as the majority in the province of Quebec, but for a few months it has done it systematically, and I appeal to my colleagues from the province of Quebec to support me in the statement that he is charged with undertaking to wage warfare against the province of Quebec. Take up this newspaper, not looking over old numbers of the newspaper, but take up La Patrie of the 7th of February, which is yesterday, and there will be found an article upon the hon. leader of the opposition bearing this title: 'Get along, Old Clam', referring to the address by the hon. leader of the opposition. Let the hon. members who have some knowledge of French read that article, and see what is the tone that is adopted in it, and whether it is a tone of criticism which commends itself to the public men of this assembly. To go further and to refer to the point which I raised particularly, read the correspondence from Ottawa. Here you will find that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) nobly avenged the province of Quebec for the insults which have been offered for several months and which have been heaped upon that province by certain papers paid by the chief of the opposition, or which are in the pay of the chief of the opposition. Take up that paper any day and you will find allegations of this kind. You will find, for instance, that the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), as well as myself, and every other hon. member from Quebec, are charged with making it the especial object of their lives to detract from that province. I say the time has come when these things should be shown up wherever they occur. I think it is in the interests of both sides of the House and of both political parties. I do not wish to refer again to this particular point, but I will lose no opportunity of referring publicly, in this assembly, to articles and insinuations of that nature. Let these gentlemen in the province of Quebec, in a province where the largest spirit prevails, where, amongst many qualities, perhaps not sufficiently appreciated, of the French Canadian people, there is above all, that predominating quality of justice, that largeness of view, let those few who are continually using that argument against that party be satisfied, that at every opportunity, I will denounce that kind of warfare.

We have in the province of Quebec a singularly broad-minded population, and if that were not the case matters would be a great deal worse than they are to-day. Those who are familiar with the province of Quebec know, that in many of the French Canadian counties, members have been returned to this House, and gentlemen have been elected to high office who are not of the religion or of the nationality of the majority. You remember the case of Mr. Holton who was repeatedly returned to this House from a French Canadian county. We have had as Prime Minister of that province the present Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) who was never open to any attack on account of his religion. He was repeatedly returned to parliament by his Catholic constituents. If you go to the other counties in that province you will find English speaking Protestants repeatedly elected mayors and councillors. That is the case in my own county which has a large French Canadian majority, and I may mention that the president of the agricultural society there is an English speaking Protestant. The people of Quebec have not any tendency at all to bigotry against their fellow Canadians of different race and religion, and it is a matter of extreme importance in my opinion that this phase of our history should be mentioned in this House and made known to the world.

Now, Sir, I do not think that the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) has interpreted in the proper way the despatch to the Winnipeg Free Press which he undertook to defend. No person who reads this phrase, can come to any other conclusion than that what was really meant by it is what irritated, and justly irritated, the leader of the opposition. The despatch says :

He attacked the French in a most bitter way, but said that he did not include all French Canadians.

Mr. MONK.

How is it possible to place any other construction upon that phrase, than that given it by the leader of the opposition and endorsed by the right hon. the Prime Minister, who admitted that there was a grievance and stated that he suffered similarly. There can be no question but that the object of that despatch was to lead the people who read it to believe that the leader of the opposition had made an attack upon the French Canadians. It was an unjust statement, it was an untrue statement, and it was the duty and right of the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) to contradict it before this House and before this country. The hon. gentleman from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) entered into a discussion of the Manitoba school question. I do not know why it is, Mr. Speaker, that upon every possible occasion, hon. gentlemen opposite who come from the province of Quebec are continually discussing this school question. There is a theory—I do not know if it was expressed by Alombroso or Orviete or some other great criminologist—that murderers are continuously visiting the scenes of their murder. I can find no other reason for the constant reference by these gentlemen to that unfortunate question. When the great settlement was accomplished, we had down in Montreal the Hon. Mr. Greenway. He was given a grand reception, and if I mistake not, it was at a banquet in that city that he announced that this question was fully settled and that the minority had received, or were about to receive, entire satisfaction. For my own part I have no desire to again discuss that question—a statement which may perhaps satisfy the government, for it might provoke a discussion of several weeks and prevent them submitting the public business to the House. I will, however, say, Mr. Speaker, that the settlement which has been arrived at has not in any manner changed my own views. I took a strong stand upon that question in 1896. We were told in my own county by the Prime Minister himself (then the leader of the opposition) that a great commission of inquiry would be established, having at its head Sir Oliver Mowat, and that a full and entire restitution of their rights would be made to the minority. Has that restitution been made? If it has, why are these gentlemen opposite continually discussing the question on public platforms in the province of Quebec. If there has not been sufficient restitution, then what has become of the promise solemnly made in the province of Quebec in 1896?

Just one word more, as regards the explanation given us for the absence of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte). What strikes me is this: The Minister of Public Works throughout the entire management of our contribution to the defence of the empire in South Africa, has taken up a most contradictory position. He has daily in his paper advocated opinions which were the exact opposite of the policy adopted and carried out by the government of which he is a member. Was it not our duty as members of the opposition; our duty to ourselves and to the country, to ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) and the government, for some explanation of such an extraordinary attitude. We might have been informed that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) was unable to come here and give us that explanation which the House and the country demanded? He was here when these legitimate demands for explanation were made. It was from him as a member of the government that these explanations were asked, and his colleagues were here, yet not one minister of the cabinet rose to explain. When last year the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) was attacked by my hon. friend from Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) he was defended from the Treasury benches and from outside the Treasury benches, and the member for St. James, Montreal (Mr. Demarais) took up his defence. Why do not some of the ministers to-day give us the explanations to which we are entitled? Is it really the case that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) has among the followers of the government some men who are not prepared to take up his defence? Is it the case, as we have heard it said, and as I believe, that some of these gentlemen opposite are at the present moment after the scalp of the Minister of Public Works? If that be not so, why did not some of his colleagues in the cabinet attempt an explanation of his extraordinary conduct? The attitude of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) in undertaking the defence of the Minister of Public Works, and of the representative of the Winnipeg Free Press, is as illogical as the rest of his position upon this important position.

Mr. DAVID HENDERSON (Halton). Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago I rose to address the House but failed to catch your eye at the time. However, I do not intend to detain the House for more than a few moments, and I would not have done so had it not been for the remarks made by the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis). That hon. gentleman spoke in terms that did not commend themselves to me, with reference to an hon. gentleman, who is now a member of the government of Manitoba, with whom I have had the pleasure of an acquaintance for many years, who was born in the county I represent, whose father has been an elector there for the last forty years—a gentleman held in the highest esteem by the people of the county of Halton, and whose wife, I may say, is a daughter of one of the most prominent Liberals of that county, who, I feel sure, will not read with much pleasure the words uttered by the hon. member for Saskatchewan. I believe that the hon. gentleman to whom he referred is incapable of committing the wrongs attributed to him.

The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) taunted the leader of the opposition with having been the Prime Minister of Canada for a very short time indeed, remarking that the early peas matured in about six weeks, which he said was about the length of time the leader of the opposition was Prime Minister of Canada. I thought at the time that the hon. gentleman should not have forgotten that years ago a man who stood high in the esteem of the Liberal party of this country, and whose memory will ever remain green in the minds of Liberals, and I may say Conservatives as well, the Hon. George Brown was at one time a member of an administration that lasted only two days. In fact, the Hon. George Brown's peas never sprouted.

Now, one word with regard to the matter we have been discussing this afternoon—the charge of disloyalty which we have been told comes from the people of Ontario against our French Canadian friends in the province of Quebec. I desire briefly and very plainly and pointedly to express my opinion with regard to that matter. I live in the central part of the province of Ontario, I read the newspapers from day to day, and I can say without hesitation to my French friends from Lower Canada that no such sentiment prevails in Western Ontario, it is not expressed by the people, either in their press, by their public men on the platform, or in ordinary conversation. Such a sentiment is never hinted. We believe our French Canadian friends are not only good Canadians, but loyal to the empire, and good citizens in every respect. Where we do hear this charge of disloyalty is from prominent men in the province of Quebec—even from men who are at the present time members of the administration, and controlling leading newspapers in that province. We quite understand what they mean. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), and I am sorry to say other members of parliament who may not be members of the government, use their positions as such and as publishers of leading newspapers, to disseminate this false teaching for the purpose, and the sole purpose, of creating a prejudice in the minds of the people of Lower Canada against the English-speaking people of the province of Ontario, with a view of cementing into a solid phalanx the French electors of the province of Quebec. I had occasion a few days ago to travel some distance into the province of Quebec; and in the course of my travels I met a very intelligent young man, a French Canadian. He spoke English very clearly, though with a French accent. I was much interested in the young man, who, I learned was a member of the local legislature of the province of Quebec. He said to me that he felt very sorry indeed that people in the province of Ontario accused the people of the province of Quebec of being disloyal. He expressed his regret, not only once, but twice. I said: 'My dear sir, you are entirely mistaken; we have no such feeling in the province of Ontario where I live. I read the public press, I hear public men speak. I know what the people are talking about, and they express no sentiment of the kind; but that sentiment comes from your own people in the province of Quebec, and it is put forth wholly and solely for the purpose of prejudicing the French people against the leader of the opposition and against every Conservative of English, Irish or Scotch descent. This young man listened to me carefully, when I reiterated my statement, and at length he said to me: 'I am glad to hear you say so; I have heard that statement before.' The young man quite well understood the tactics of these men, and fully realized the absolute truthfulness of the statement I made. I regret indeed that a party can so far forget itself, can sink so low—I mean a few members of the party. I am glad to believe there are only a few in the party who would do it. It is a matter of regret, in a country like Canada, where we have so many different religions and nationalities, that men will allow themselves to sink so low for mere party purposes as to attempt to excite prejudices and create divisions such as I have referred to. I do not charge the Prime Minister with having disseminated these teachings; but I do say to him that so long as he continues in his government men like the Hon. Mr. Tarte and the Hon. Mr. Fisher, who do so, he must be held responsible by the country for the action of these hon. gentlemen. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your kindness in listening to these few remarks.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR (South Leeds). Mr. Speaker, just one word, and one word only. My hon. friend, the Prime Minister, made a statement yesterday that the press supporting the Conservative party was a reptile press. When I read the article which I purpose quoting from the right hon. gentleman's official organ, the organ owned by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte)—an article penned by himself as an editorial, and I have no doubt approved of by the Prime Minister, because his colleague certainly would not write and publish it in the official organ of the government without his approval, I will ask the hon. Prime Minister to say if he should not apply the term reptile press to his own organ as he applied it to the Conservative press of this country. I refer to this article particularly because it slanders a body of men scattered all over this broad Dominion, of whom I am a member myself; and on behalf of this loyal body of men I hurl back the in-situation that is made in that reptile press owned by this government. The article was published in La Patrie of the 28th of December last, and reads as follows:

The government is to be congratulated on the early calling together of parliament, as summer sessions are detestable.

The opposition cannot reproach the government on a single administrative act. The country is more prosperous than it ever was and the finances of the country are in a brilliant condition. Sir Charles Tupper has only one resource—an appeal to the English and Protestant prejudices against the French Prime Minister who is at the head of the country and against the province of Quebec, which has given him such a generous majority. It is this appeal which the whole Tory press has used for months with a violence which does not relax. In the Orange press, of which Clarke Wallace is the great monitor, it has been seriously considered to conquer the province of Quebec by arms.

I ask the hon. Minister of Public Works when he or any of his emissaries ever visited an Orange lodge? As an Orangeman, I repudiate that slander. If ever any member of the order made such a proposition in an Orange lodge it would be immediately repelled, because the Orangemen are loyal, and loyal to their French brethren in the province of Quebec, and if they were oppressed it is the Orangemen of this country who would be the first to come to their rescue. The late Sir John Macdonald was a member of that honourable body, and what was his life task? It was to cement the races which the Minister of Public Works, through his paper, is to-day trying to set at loggerheads for the purpose of carrying out his prophecy that at the next general election the Conservative party would carry but six seats in the province of Quebec. I rise particularly to repudiate the charge made by the Minister of Public Works, through his organ, that the Orange lodges throughout the country have considered the advisability of suppressing the people of the province of Quebec by force of arms. I say that that is a slander, and I hurl it back in his teeth as malicious and designed only for the purpose of arousing his co-religionists in the province of Quebec against the English Protestant community and the Orange community in the other provinces.

The article goes on further:

Only a few days ago a local Tory, Col. White, at a dinner in Guelph, said in a speech that there was in Canada a people as disloyal as the Boers, and that very probably the English would very soon have to suppress the French element in Quebec.

I do not know who Col. White is, but I know that he never said that in an Orange lodge. I know not whether the statement be true or false, but the chances are that Col. White never made it. It may possibly have been manufactured by that reptile press of the government out of the whole cloth, as the other charge against the Orangemen. Then the article goes on :

This is only a repetition of what the 'Mail and Empire' and other newspapers are saying every day.

Now, I have been a reader for years of the Mail and Empire, and I challenge the Prime Minister or the Minister of Public Works to point to one line of editorial in its columns ever written in the direction of arousing race feeling in this country.

The question—the whole question—therefore, is whether Sir Charles Tupper and the Tories who surround him are able to arouse enough prejudice to lead to a war of races, which it is needless to say, will lead to the speedy breaking up of confederation.

There is what the reptile press of this government is saying, owned by the Minister of Public Works and purchased out of the money obtained from a subsidy voted by this parliament. I have no hesitation in saying, and backed up by this government simply to do the dirty work of that minister.

Mr. F. A. MARCOTTE (Champlain)—(Translation)—Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to participate at any length in the debate before the House. In a country like Canada, composed of various nationalities, one should guard against arousing religious and national animosities. We all live here together under the protection of the British flag, which allows us the fullest enjoyment of our rights and privileges. Now, I say that, if we have at heart the progress and advancement of this country of ours, we ought to refrain from raising racial issues, which create bitterness of feeling, stir up bad blood, and are fraught with such danger to the community in general. But it is impossible to dissemble the fact that there are certain newspapers in the province of Quebec which seem bent upon reviving the conflicts of the past, sowing dissension and strife, and setting race against race. Let me mention here, among others, La Patrie, the organ of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte). Every day that paper reproduces in its columns articles, borrowed from the English press, which may be more or less correct, but which are, nevertheless, calculated to inflame the minds of the French Canadian people. The explanation of this recent revival of the racial question is no doubt to be found in the war which has broken out between Great Britain and the Transvaal. This racial question is by no means a new one. As stated by the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Mackintosh) this afternoon, such an agitation broke out in 1886, and, later on, in 1896. And I may say here that my political opponents did not fail to raise this racial question in my own constituency, during the two electoral contests which took place in 1896 and in 1897. Upon those occasions, they raised the question of the purchase of the rifles by the government. If my memory serves me right, this is what they said, among other things : 'If you vote for Sir Charles Tupper you vote at the same time for war ; you vote in favour of Imperial federation.' But, since that time, they have changed their mind. And notably, they have materially varied in their opinions, when they had to endorse the policy of their leader, the Prime Minister. Telegrams were sent by the Herald to the hon. gentlemen, asking them what position they took in connection with the war question. And the hon. gentlemen replied to the Herald that they approved of the sending of a contingent to South Africa. The hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Godbout), the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau), the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Brodeur), the hon. member for Maskinonge (Mr. Legris), and several others who had denounced us on the hustings throughout the province of Quebec for the purchase of the rifles, all these gentlemen, I say, declared in favour of sending a contingent to South Africa. Because we had purchased three million dollars worth of rifles, for the defence of our country, these gentlemen had denounced us everywhere as being supporters of Imperial federation, telling the electorate that they would be called upon later on to fight England's battles ; that their children would be enlisted in the Imperial army, and sent into Asia and Africa ; in short, that they would have to take part in all the wars of the empire would, in a more or less remote future, wage against other powers.

Now, Sir, the hon. gentlemen, after all those heated appeals to racial prejudices, after kindling ill-feeling between the races, have to endorse what they formerly denounced, and to approve of that policy of ours, in connection with the purchase of rifles.

When I first read in a public print that a movement was on foot for sending a contingent of volunteers to take part in the war, it occurred to me that the contingent should be sent upon one condition, namely, that the gentlemen who were opposed to the purchase of rifles in 1896 be also called upon to enlist in the army, and supplied not with modern rifles, but with the old rifles they wanted to be used exclusively by our militia.

There is another question, Sir, which, the Liberals said, was dead and buried, and still always crops out in debate. I refer to the Manitoba school question. It was again raised to-day in this House, though, they pretend, it is settled. How is it, then, that this great constitutional question so often comes up before the House ? Obviously, it is because it is not yet settled. I was quite astonished to read the statement made by the hon. leader of the House at a meeting held at Drummondville. He said :

You all know that in 1896, there was a vexed question which was agitating the country. It was a question in which religion was mixed up with politics. It was a question which called forth the exercise of the highest statesmanship. Our predecessors claimed that they had settled that question through the Remedial Bill they had brought down. But that legislation was such as to create bad blood among the people of a sister-province. That Bill did not pass, and then we came into power. We had promised to settle that question within six months from our coming into power. And you see that we have redeemed our pledge. The school question is now a dead issue, anxious as our friends the Bleus are of resuscitating it. At their political meetings, they no sooner open their mouths, than they pitch into us and denounce our policy in connection with the school question, when there is nobody there to reply to them; but when there is some of our friends at hand, ready to defend our policy, they dare not open their mouths. They have referred to the matter at their political meetings in Beauharnois and elsewhere, but they have not dared to bring it up in the House of Commons.

Such are the utterances fallen from the right hon. gentleman at Drummondville, with reference to the Manitoba school question. Now, humble as is my position in the party to which I belong, I had the opportunity of referring to that question on the floor of this House, and I stated that it was not settled. No, Sir, the Manitoba school question is not a dead issue, and we have it from no less an authority than Mr. Greenway himself, who, in 1899, stated that the school question had made no progress since 1890.

It is a well-known fact that last year public collections were made throughout the province of Quebec, which amounted to $16,000. An appeal was made to public charity, in favour of the Catholic schools in Manitoba. If the school question is settled, I would like to know why the Manitoba Catholics appeal to our charity in favour of their schools?

No, the school question is not settled, and it is an outrage to Catholics to pretend that it is settled, at the very time when our fellow-countrymen in Manitoba have to appeal to public charity, and raise funds to support their schools.

I was very glad to hear the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) state today that he meant to uphold the constitution of the country; that he was in favour of equal rights for all. He has stated that, if the Prime Minister said that the school question was settled, he was satisfied. But I am still of the same mind on the matter. It was that hon. gentleman who stood up by the rights of the Catholic minority in Manitoba, and brought down a remedial Bill, in favour of which he voted, as well as the whole Conservative party, while the hon. gentlemen opposite voted it down. And it is the very same man, who took his political life in his hands, when he brought down that

Mr. MARCOTTE.

Bill, for restoring to Catholics their separate schools—a measure for which he had the support of Mgr. Langevin, archbishop of St. Boniface—it is the very same man, I say, who is now being accused of being a fanatic! I say, without hesitation, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. leader of the opposition, for taking such a course under those trying circumstances, is entitled to the greatest credit at the hands of the country.

I am free to state, Sir, that, in 1896, I took no stock in the promises of the present Prime Minister, Catholic and French Canadian as he is; and experience as well as later events have shown that I was right, as the school question is not yet settled, the right hon. gentleman having not had recourse to the constitutional means which he had promised the electorate in the province of Quebec he would resort to.

It is to be hoped that we have heard the last of the charges levelled by the press against the hon. leader of the opposition, who has so manfully stood up for the rights of the Catholic minority in Manitoba, and who, as a matter of fact, has stood up, under the constitution, for the rights of minorities throughout the country, and that due credit will be given to that broad-minded statesman, who did not hesitate to constitute himself the champion of French Canadians, and who has ever upheld that constitution which he was instrumental in framing, as one of the fathers of confederation.

Motion (Sir Charles Tupper) to adjourn negatived.

BRITISH COLUMBIA OFFER OF MEN FOR SOUTH AFRICA.

Mr. E. G. PRIOR (Victoria, B.C.) Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire if possible, to elicit a little information from the government in regard to a matter that I consider of greatest importance at the present time. I am sorry that the hon. Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden) is not in his place to-night. But I have no doubt that the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who leads the government will be able to give me the information I require. It is in regard to the offer of the British Columbia government to raise and equip one hundred men to go to South Africa. Several telegrams have passed between the provincial and Dominion government, and, as yet, neither I nor any other person in British Columbia, I believe, has been able to find out what the Dominion government intend to do in regard to that offer. The last step, so far as I have seen, is that the matter has been referred to the War Office. Now, Sir, I took occasion some weeks ago to telegraph to the Minister of Militia—

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Order. Let the hon. gentleman (Mr. Prior) ask his question.

Mr. PRIOR. In order to place myself in order, I will conclude with a motion.

The PRIME MINISTER. You cannot do that now.

Mr. PRIOR. Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of very great moment, and I wish, if I may be allowed to ask a question—

The PRIME MINISTER. If my hon. friend (Mr. Prior) will ask his question, I shall be glad to answer; but this is no time to make a speech.

Mr. WALLACE. It seems to me the hon. gentleman (Mr. Prior) is making an explanation in regard to a matter of urgent importance.

Mr. PRIOR. If the hon. gentleman will allow me—and I know it is not quite in order—of course, I can only ask the question. I desire to know what the Dominion government intend to do with regard to this matter, whether they are going to accept the offer or whether they are not. I would like to be allowed to say more on the subject, but if I am out of order, I shall merely ask the question.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am sorry that my hon. friend the Minister of Militia is not in his seat. He would have been in a position to give more details than I can at this moment—

Mr. WALLACE. He ought to be in his place.

The PRIME MINISTER. It may be said that several gentlemen ought to be in their places who are not here. But if a man does not remain to listen to such talk as a great deal of that we have had to-night, perhaps he may be pardoned. I can only give the substance of the decision in this matter. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Prior) has followed the despatches, he will remember that the British Columbia government wanted accommodation on some of the steamers which were provided to carry our contingents, but this could not be given. The answer we have telegraphed to the British Columbia government is that we shall be happy to give them or any other province that makes such an offer the same treatment that we have accorded to Lord Strathcona, that is, to put at their disposal all our machinery, officers, organization, to organize the contingents that may be offered, the province bearing all expenses.

Mr. PRIOR. Do you make any conditions as to the number of men?

The PRIME MINISTER. No. I suppose my hon. friend (Mr. Prior) understood me. We are ready to assist the province. We would treat any such offer as we have treated the offer of Lord Strathcona. He bears the expense and we organize.

DEFENCE OF MANITOBA AND NORTH WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. DAVIN moved:

That it is the duty of the government to at once make provision for the defence of Manitoba and the North-west Territories, and that more particularly provision should be made whereby rifle associations, duly formed, shall be provided with military instructions as well as with rifles and ammunition.

He said: The position of the North-west Territories at the present moment is one which may well cause the government grave concern. The Mounted Police, as a body, practically does not exist. It has been reduced to such small dimensions that it can no longer be considered as able to cope with the problems that, at any moment may present themselves in the North-west Territories. And I can assure the right hon. gentleman that there is serious alarm in the North-west Territories. That alarm has been expressed in one of the Calgary newspapers, the Herald, in an article going over the conditions of the country and pointing to the North-west Mounted Police as practically reduced to zero, and strongly condemning the government—I do not say I endorse this part of it—for having recruited from the Mounted Police for Lord Strathcona's contingent. And though the Mounted Police has been practically reduced to zero, we have a large number of Indians and a large number of half-breeds. These half-breeds, as I may show at another sitting, have been dealt with by the government during the past year—or rather they have not been dealt with, for it is a sin of omission rather than of commission—in such a way, in the opinion of persons well acquainted with them and well capable of forming an opinion as likely to irritate them.

Mr. TAYLOR moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT—GOVERNMENT BUSINESS.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the house.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will the right hon. gentleman tell us what business the government proposes to take up to-morrow?

The PRIME MINISTER. We will take up the resolution of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) of which notice was given yesterday.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. And after that.

The PRIME MINISTER. There is no other business ready, as the hon. gentleman knows, and cannot be ready.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). There is a number of government Bills on the Order paper.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

THE PILOTAGE ACT AMENDMENT.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 11) to further amend the Pilotage Act:

He said: The provisions of this Bill relate entirely to the pilots engaged on the portion of the St. Lawrence River between Montreal and Quebec. Hon. gentlemen will recollect that some three years ago there was a great deal of friction existing between the Harbour Commission of Montreal, which is made by law the pilotage authority for the port of Montreal, and the pilots of that port. The pilots number nearly fifty and they had a great many complaints as to the manner in which they were treated by the pilotage authorities. They caused a Bill to be introduced into this parliament for the purpose of constituting themselves into a close corporation. That Bill received a good deal of attention at the hands of the Private Bills Committee of this House, and in an amended form, and somewhat satisfactory to the pilots, it went through this House, but when it reached the Senate that honourable body did not concur in the suggested amendments and the Bill was thrown out. The consequence was a serious strike on the part of the pilots, resulting in a great deal of damage to the shipping of the port of Montreal. I had several interviews with the pilots and had from them a very full statement of the grievances of which they complained. I promised them that if the strike was declared off I would issue a commission for the purpose of inquiring into and reporting upon the grievances of which they complained, and, if on that report it was found that the grievances were substantial, I promised I would take the necessary measures to remedy them. That commission was issued in the beginning of January, 1898, and subsequently made its report. That report to a very large extent endorsed the complaints of the pilots and recommended they should be removed in the way the commission suggested. The pilots complained that when any one of their number was charged with dereliction of duty he was tried before the pilotage authority for the District of Montreal, namely, the Harbour Commissioners, pilot if found guilty, applied to the court was not properly fitted to discharge such important duties. The results frequently were, that owing to the form in which the investigations were held, the incriminated pilot if found guilty, applied to the court for a certiorari to remove the proceedings into the Superior Court, and in most cases, on account of defects in the manner of conducting the inquiries these certiorari were granted and the proceedings removed into the Superior Court, so that before they were finally disposed of the suspension of the pilot's certificate had lapsed and he was not punished at all. The shipping interests complained very strongly of the then existing conditions. The commission which was appointed by the authority of His Excellency consisted of Mr. Justice Lavergne as chairman, the Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and Commander Wakeham. They examined a very great number of witnesses, and held a very complete inquiry with the result that they reported, as their opinion: That it would be preferable to constitute an independent court, a court independent of the Harbour Commissioners altogether, which would be empowered to make the important examinations which in the interests of shipping and in the interests of the pilots themselves should be made. This suggestion in the opinion of the commission would be received with approval by the shipping interests on the one hand and the Pilot Board on the other. The pilots contended that in matters affecting their interests, in all consultations held by the Harbour Commissioners which related to the buoying or lighting of the St. Lawrence, one of their number should be permitted to be present as an adviser of the Harbour Board. That recommendation I have adopted so far as my department is concerned by drafting a by-law which I have referred to the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal for approval if they see fit. The committee also recommended that these pilots, who have charge of most valuable property, should be subjected from time to time, as masters of vessels are, to a colour test, to ascertain whether their eyesight is good or not. That suggestion after consideration was adopted, and I drafted a by-law for the approval of the Harbour Commissioners with reference to it. I also provided a by-law that the number of pilots should not be increased beyond fifty, and that until that number is reached, no new pilots shall be appointed, and that every third year the same test as regards eyesight shall be under gone by each pilot, so that if he is found to be colour blind, he would be declared incompetent further to discharge his duties. These minor matters can all be remedied by by-laws of the Harbour Commissioners, but the constitution of the court requires legislation from this parliament, and the Bill which I am now asking leave to introduce takes away from the Harbour Commissioners the jurisdiction hitherto exercised by them of making investigations into accidents happening through any fault of the pilot on the St. Lawrence River, and invests that power in this proposed court. The court will consist of three persons, two of whom shall possess nautical or pilotage experience. They are to be appointed by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries—one on the minister's own nomination, to be the president, one on the nomination of the Montreal pilotage authority, that is, the Harbour Commission, who represent the shipping interest, and the other on the nomination of the licensed pilots themselves. This court, when so constituted, shall have sole and complete jurisdiction, which is now possessed and exercised by the Board of Harbour Commissioners, for the trial and punishment of all offences against the Pilotage Act. These are very numerous; I need not go over them; and the decision of the court is to be final and binding. The Bill goes on to provide for the manner in which the court shall be called together, and the time when it shall hold its sittings. No investigation shall be held after the expiration of thirty days from the happening of the damage or ten days after the arrival of the ship at its destination, so far as inward bound ships are concerned; and, in the case of outward bound ships, no investigation shall be held after thirty days from the happening of the damage, unless within six days after the arrival of the ship at its destination a proper complaint is made by the ship's owner or master. The remuneration of the members of the court is very small—$5.00 a day while actively engaged in the examination; which shall be paid out of the funds of the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal. In this way we shall have constituted an independent court, in which the pilots, by nominating a member of it, shall have a fair voice. If this Bill receives the approval of the House, and the Harbour Commissioners ratify the by-laws which I have sent for their approval, every grievance of the pilots will have been removed, and we shall have harmony and good-will existing where heretofore there has been nothing but suspicion and ill-feeling. I therefore move the first reading of the Bill with very great pleasure, and with confidence that it will bring about a state of affairs which I am sure everybody would desire to see brought about, and prevent a recurrence of such a dangerous strike as we had a year or so ago among these important persons.

Mr. BERGERON. Will that court sit only in Montreal, or is it provided that it shall sit somewhere else?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Only in Montreal.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE SAFETY OF SHIPS.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 12) to amend the Act respecting the safety of ships. He said: Mr. Speaker, I had the honour last session of introducing a Bill to the House relating to the safety of ships, which had reference to the size of deck loads which ships were permitted to carry after October 1 of each year. That Bill provided that after that date the deck load should be a restricted deck load of the height of three feet from the deck. It was contended by the shipping interest that recent changes in the character of steamships were such that we might very well extend the time from the 1st to the 12th of October. Provision was also made in the Bill that no steamship should leave any port in Canada at any time in the year without a certificate from the port warden that the deck load was safe and prudent. I had the Bill printed, and sent copies of it to the different shipping ports in the Dominion. The first provision of the Bill, extending the time during which steamships should be allowed to carry unrestricted deck loads, met with general approval; but in the maritime provinces there was a very determined opposition to the provision appointing port wardens to regulate what was called the summer deck load. The merchants contended that they knew more about that business than the port wardens could know, and that it might very well be left to themselves. Owing to the great opposition generated to this provision, I deemed it prudent to drop it, and confine the Bill to the extension of the time during which steamships might carry the unrestricted deck load, giving them twelve days more. When the other provisions were taken from the Bill, a mistake was made, which I propose to remedy by the Bill I am now introducing. The clause as left in the Bill provided that a steamship sailing from any port in Canada on or before the 12th of October of each year should not be subject to the restriction; but there was nothing to cover the time between the 1st of January and the 16th of March; and this Bill is to supply that omission.

Mr. PRIOR. May I ask the hon. gentleman if he has had any communication from British Columbia in regard to this subject?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. None.

Mr. HAGGART. Have we power to legislate in reference to British ships that are loaded, say at St. John or Halifax, and go to Britain? Would not the British Shipping Act apply to them?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No. The British Shipping Act regulates the admission of any ship into Great Britain, no matter what her nationality may be, so that if she went in during the restricted period she would be stopped by the British Act. But unless we amend this Act, it might be contended that as Canada allows ships to leave between the 1st of January and the 16th of March, they would be subject to the British Act, and it is to remove that doubt that I desire to have this amendment made.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

REPRESENTATION IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 13) respecting representation in the House of Commons. He said: Mr. Speaker, this Bill comes back as an old acquaintance in this House.

Mr. BERGERON. The same one as last year?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It is in the same words, and it is one year older. This House and the other Chamber have had one year more in which to consider its merits, and I have no doubt they will decide this time in favour of the measure. Hon. gentlemen are aware that it received but a brief discussion in the other House, considering its importance. Since that time it has been before the country, and no doubt wiser views have been formed, so that a different result will now be reached. The Bill itself is exactly in the words of the measure of last session, which contained a provision that ought to have commended itself to the other House. That Bill was carried by a very large majority in this popular assembly, representing the people in the fullest sense of the word, and it contained a provision that was novel in connection with redistribution measures in any legislature of Canada, so far as my knowledge goes. Instead of following the practice heretofore obtaining whereby the House itself, perhaps influenced by political or party considerations, determined the limits of constituencies, it proposed to hand that task over to a committee of three judges of the Superior Court of Ontario, men occupying the highest and most responsible positions in the land, men wholly aloof from party warfare and party strife, and beyond all question the most independent tribunal that could be found in this country. That was a departure from the political and party standpoint, which might have been properly regarded as an act of self-abnegation on the part of the party now in power.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

Take what occurred in 1882 and 1892, and there is no conscientious man who can truthfully say that the redistribution Acts of 1882 and 1892 were not a travesty of the principle of the representation of the people in parliament. They were destructive of the fundamental principle of responsible government, they purported not to seek a fair representation in this House of the different opinions in the country, but to destroy representative institutions and prevent the will of the people being declared by the members sent here to represent them. Therefore, the measure I now introduce cannot too soon become law in order to restore the rights to which the people are entitled.

I do not think that on the present occasion it will be necessary for me to go into details. They are familiar to hon. gentlemen, but I might venture to express the hope that the Senate, which I wish to treat with every respect, will not strain the right it possesses, as a portion of our legislature, to veto, by its arbitrary will, this measure which is essential to the proper representation of the people in this House. Technically, the Senate is an integral part of parliament, and has the power to do what it did before, and I am not now criticising what it did or the manner of its doing, but expressing the hope that after fuller consideration it will to some extent rise superior to any other considerations than what this measure ought to evoke, and at the earliest moment undo the wrongs committed against the people of Canada by the parliaments of 1882 and 1892. The Bill of last year met its death in the Senate on the motion of the leader of the opposition, if there is such a leader in that body. Perhaps the Senate is a disinterested body, not influenced by party considerations; and if so, then I have no right to imagine that there is in it an opposition or the leader of an opposition; but I am afraid it will be taking too Utopian a view to suppose that the Senate has altogether risen equal to the height it was expected to attain when confederation was formed, and when it was thought that by nominating Senators for life that branch of our legislature would thereby become judicial rather than partisan. I am not saying that senators are all partisans, but it is a coincidence, at least, that those who defeated the Bill last session were not in accord politically with the government of the day and the majority in this House. I, however, trust that now, after a year's experience and the introduction of new members—

Mr. LaRIVIERE. How will they vote?
Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL—new light will be afforded them, and that the case will be so represented that those who took a different view last session will give their support to the measure this session. Some hon. gentlemen on the other side appear sceptical with regard to that prophecy. Surely they cannot have information in advance as to what will occur. I am satisfied that the case has not been pre-judged, but that, when the Bill goes to the Senate, it will there receive fair and impartial consideration on its merits, and become law, and then we will have the satisfaction of not only having wiped out improper legislation, but also the advantage of having enabled the government to do what hon. gentlemen opposite appear so desirous that they should do, and what they have done in almost every other respect, namely, carry out almost the last of their unredeemed pledges.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. And the unredeemed pledges of the Liberal party as set forth in the platform adopted by the convention of 1893.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am glad to find that my hon. friends opposite receive with such approval this expression of desire on our part, and, therefore, cordially invite their most active co-operation here and elsewhere in order to successfully carry through this measure.

Mr. CLANCY. May I ask the hon. gentleman if the Bill is precisely the same as that introduced last year?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I did not compare them, but it is the Bill reprinted in the Senate, and I presume is literally in the words of that passed by this House. It is meant to be, at any rate.

Mr. CLARKE WALLACE (West York). I judge from the tone and manner of the hon. Postmaster General, in introducing this Bill, that it is an effort on the part of the government to mark time and put in time this afternoon, and that the Bill is introduced without the slightest idea of its ever becoming law this session. Why, the farcical nature of it can be seen when we find that in the same paragraph in the speech from the Throne announcing the introduction of a representation or gerrymander Bill, there is also a declaration that a Bill will be introduced to take the census in 1901, on which the law bases representation in parliament. Would it not be a farce? In 1900 we are passing a representation Bill, and in 1902 we must pass another one based on the new census. The Postmaster General told us that the one last year was carried in the popular House by a large majority.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Hear, hear.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, because these hon. gentlemen were afraid to appeal to the constituencies that elected them in 1896. That is why they had a large majority in this House. Hon. gentlemen opposite are going to have their constituencies gerrymandered so that they need not appeal to the constituencies that sent them here last time, which they know will not send them here again, but to cut up the constituencies in the most outrageous manner, as was pointed out in the House of Commons and in the Senate last year. The hon. gentleman says that there is a new feature about this Bill which is commendable, and that is that it refers matters to the judges. But what have the judges to go upon? The census of 1891. Nine years have elapsed since then. My constituency in the last decade from 1881 to 1891 increased its population from 18,800 to 41,880, that is, the population has been multiplied two and a quarter times. Other constituencies will be changed in that way, during the present decade, but the judges will not have a particle of information to guide them for these years, and so they will be compelled to work in the dark under this infamous Bill. As was pointed out last session, the Bill gives two members to 36,000 people in the county of Brant, and only four members to 200,000 people in the city of Toronto.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Five members.

Mr. WALLACE. It is five now, but the Bill as introduced by the Postmaster General had only four. The reason is that the county of Brant is Liberal in politics and the city of Toronto is Conservative. The same principle runs through the whole Bill. The hon. gentleman says that the Bill of 1882 was a travesty on the representation of the people in parliament. Sir, the Bill of 1882 was not perfect; no one can say it was, for no handiwork of man is. But the Bill of 1882 recognized the great principle of representation by population, while this Bill does not recognize that principle from one end of it to the other. The hon. gentleman said he had great confidence that the Senate would give it fair and impartial consideration. So have I. They gave it fair and impartial consideration last year, and threw it out; and I have no doubt they will pursue the same righteous course this year, if they have the opportunity.

Mr. GEO. E. CASEY (West Elgin). I beg to congratulate the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) upon the task that is imposed upon him to-day of leading the opposition. It appears that more than one of the Yorks has ambitions in that direction. The hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) may well ask to be delivered from the 'glorious sons of York.' The hon. gentleman made one or two allusions that, it seems to me, call for attention, even at this early stage of the discussion on this Bill. He goes to the root of the matter by arguing that this is not the time to redistribute. There is a surface appearance of logic in that contention. But the fact remains that what we consider an injustice, a mis-distribution, a gerrymander, was perpetrated in 1882 and 1892. What this government pledged themselves to do, when they took office, was to remedy that injustice and put things back where they should have been in 1892, and to go into the next election, whenever it may be held, on the basis on which the country should have been arranged when the last distribution took place. I consider that the government are only fulfilling their pledge and doing their necessary duty after making such a pledge in bringing in this Bill.

The Bill is not theoretically perfect, as the hon. member for West York admits that the Bill of 1882 was not. It does not apply the principle of county boundaries to all the province of Ontario. And why? Simply for the reason I have already pointed out—it is not intended by this Bill to arrange constituencies as they should be arranged now, but as they should have been arranged in 1892. We have not the census to guide us. We have statements such as are made by the hon. member for West York about his own constituency, that this, that or the other constituency has grown vastly in population; but we do not know these things officially; we can only take the last census. It may work unfairness for one election, but that will be due to the change of population. It was inevitable, no matter how fair the redistribution of 1892 had been made, that it must have been based on the figures of 1891; and that now, nine years after, it must work unfairness in some of the constituencies. But the argument that this is not the time to redistribute falls to the ground when we consider in the first place that this is a measure to remedy something that was done wrong, to put right, partially, and for one election, such constituencies as were affected by what we call the gerrymander of 1892, and not to propose a general scheme of redistribution. That accounts for doing the thing now, and for the partial character of the Bill, to which otherwise exception might be taken.

Now, the hon. member says that the previous redistribution Act effected representation by population, that such was the intention and that it did effect it. It will be shown, when this Bill comes up for serious and full consideration—

Mr. BENNETT. Then, you are not serious now?

Mr. CASEY.

Mr. CASEY. Well, it is unusual to discuss the details of a Bill on the first reading. I am only making a statement of what can be shown in regard to it. Previous Bills did not establish representation by population. There were anomalies of representation under these measures almost as great as those which they were professedly intended to remedy. Admitting, however, that there was an attempt in these Acts to arrive at representation by population, admitting that that was the alleged raison d'être, it does not follow that this Bill, which prescribes adherence to county boundaries, is unfair or unjust. The principle of representation by population is one which it is impossible to carry out accurately and consistently with the natural associations of the people who are formed together into constituencies. It has been our contention as a party, uniformly and ever since confederation, that, with the exception of a few administrative districts like Bothwell or Cardwell—and we object even to these—county boundaries formed the only proper line of demarcation between the people who should be united in one constituency and those who should be united in another.

Mr. COCHRANE. You did not carry it out.

Mr. CASEY. We had not a chance to redistribute.

Mr. COCHRANE. Yes, you had.

Mr. CASEY. No census was taken during the term of the Mackenzie government, or when any Liberal government was in power in Canada.

Mr. WALLACE. Was there not the same opportunity to redistribute as there is now?

Mr. CASEY. The cases are not comparable, because, as I say, we could not affect the general redistribution except when a census had been taken. This is merely putting the things that were—

Mr. CLARKE. Why not restore county boundaries?

Mr. CASEY. We will restore them under the next census. We will do everything regularly, arithmetically and judicially under the census.

Mr. WALLACE. Does the hon. gentleman know how many constituencies are affected by this Bill?

Mr. CASEY. I cannot say off-hand.

Mr. WALLACE. Would the hon. gentleman like to know. If so, I can tell him that about half the constituencies in Ontario are affected.

Mr. CASEY. That only speaks all the worse for the iniquitous measure introduced and passed by the hon. gentlemen opposite.

If it affects as many as half the ridings in Ontario, so much the greater reason for passing it this session. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman said with a sneer that the members on this side of the House were afraid to face the constituencies that elected them the last time. Speaking for myself, I may say that I am not at all afraid to face the constituency that elected me in 1896; but if this Bill passes into law I shall have a much more difficult constituency to face than I have now. Yet I am a strong supporter of this Bill.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman will find shelter before that time comes, he will never be a candidate there.

Mr. CASEY. I beg leave to say that that is a point not for the hon. gentleman to decide, that is a point for the Reform convention of the west riding of Elgin to settle at the time of the election; it is they who will decide whether I shall be a candidate or not, and I am very glad that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) has no voice in that convention. One of the hon. gentlemen opposite said something about a post office. The organ of hon. gentlemen opposite has been very fond lately of appointing me to post offices to deputy headships of departments, and different things, but I never had a hint of any such appointment from any more authoritative source, and have not sought for it. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman himself, in 1882, I think, was in the position in which he charges members on this side of the House with being. He did not like to go back to the constituency that he had previously, and one of the most iniquitous things of the Gerrymannder Act of 1882 was the fixing up of West York to satisfy the hon. gentleman, and he still represents it, I think, purely and simply in virtue of the changes that were then made in the boundaries. I, on the other hand, representing a Grit hive, have great pleasure in saying that I am willing to take my chances, if that hive was broken up and the honey scattered amongst the neighbouring constituencies where it properly belongs, I am willing to take my chances of re-election, and am not afraid of it either.

Mr. HAGGART. I do not intend to discuss the Bill, but I want to know from the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), if I understood him correctly on one point. Does he mean to say that the instructions to the committee are as nearly as possible on the lines of the county boundaries and the equality of population, and is the basis of population to be the census of 1891?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I presume the census of 1891 will be a guide to the judges. The Bill contains a provision saying what information they shall proceed upon. It sets forth the various diviions proposed to be made, the reduction or wiping out of some constituencies, and the number of constituencies assignable to other counties. In no case will county boundaries be disregarded. Where a county has not a population large enough to justify its having two members, it is given one; where its population is sufficient to give it two members, but not three, the Bill gives it two; where it is large enough to have three members, the Bill proposes to give it three; and it will be for the judges to divide those counties according to the number of constituencies assigned to them respectively.

Mr. HAGGART. I wanted a distinct statement that it is to be done on the basis of the population of 1891.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. There cannot be any other population basis.

Mr. BERGERON. But, as a matter of fact, it does not represent the population at all.

Mr. CLARKE. I would like to ask if it is the intention of the Bill to provide for the restoration of county boundaries in the province of Ontario, east of the county of Ontario. The Bill last year allowed the boundaries to stay as they were fixed by the last Gerrymannder Act. Will there be any attempt made in this Bill to destroy county boundaries in the eastern part of the province of Ontario?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I presume my hon. friend refers to the Act of 1892 when he speaks of the last Gerrymannder Act. I do not quarrel with his designation of that Act, I think it is quite apt. I may say that the features of the Bills of 1882 and 1892 to which the term gerrymannder may be applied, are limited to the country including North and South Ontario and westerly of that. I am not aware of these measures having done any injustice east of that line.

Mr. TISDALE. I do not exactly understand the Postmaster General's statement about county boundaries. Will the Bill itself abolish all boundaries of ridings unless they are in some county? If I understood him right, that is what he said. For instance, at the present time a riding may be composed of parts of two counties. Do I understand him to say that a riding is all to be in the same county without reference to population?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman was illustrating the case of a riding composed of municipalities in different counties.

Mr. TISDALE. Yes.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. In every instance where the Bill affects a county it does not create, or lay the foundations, or permit a constituency to be created out of territory not embraced within the county. It entirely does away with the late system of disregarding county boundaries, as, for example, in the case of North Brant which, I think, is composed of parts of several counties and wanders about touching seven or eight different ridings. That is all done away with by the measure, and in every case where it affects a county it limits the representation to either one, two or three members, in that county, according to the population of that county.

Mr. TISDALE. Does that apply to all ridings? Do you propose to abolish all cases or affect all ridings, parts of which may be in two counties?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman is aware that in 1882 the legislature proceeded upon the fixed principle of creating about eight Grit hives, and in order to do so it had to disturb the boundaries of some forty or fifty constituencies. The whole of that outrage took place west of the county of Durham. It began at the county of Ontario and extended westerly to Lake Huron. In order to accomplish that purpose of creating these eight hives and grouping together the Liberal vote in those hives, so as to strengthen the Tory vote in a large number of constituencies, a new political map of Ontario was created. This Bill proposes to deal with that outrage, and nothing more.

Mr. BERGERON. My hon. friend will remember that in 1882, on account of the increase in population, new counties had to be created in Ontario for the increased population. But we are not in the same condition to-day. We do not know whether the representation will have to be increased or decreased.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Well, will you help us to work up the measure?

Mr. BERGERON. You had better wait a year or two before you do that.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Motion agreed to.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—CANADIAN CONTINGENT.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that the following notice of motion be set down for consideration on Tuesday next :

1. Resolved, that it is expedient to provide that from and out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada there shall and may be paid and applied a sum, not exceeding in the whole the sum of eight hundred and fifty thousand dollars, being the sum of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars authorized under Order in Council, dated the fourth day of November, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-nine, and the sum of six hundred thousand dollars authorized by Order in Council, dated the fifth day of January, one thousand nine hundred, towards payment of the expenditure incurred, or to be incurred, in sending the contingents of Canadian volunteers to South Africa, or in connection therewith, and the members of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, and the officers and persons who authorized or made the expenditure of any of the said sums under the Orders in Council above referred to, or under any warrant of His Excellency the Governor General issued in consequence of or on the authority thereof, are hereby indemnified and exonerated from all liability by reason of having used or authorized the use of the above-mentioned sums of money, or any portion thereof without due legal autho-riety, and all expenditure heretofore made of any of said sums shall be held to have been lawfully made.

2. In addition to the said sum of eight hundred and fifty thousand dollars referred to in the preceding resolution, there shall and may be paid and applied, from and out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada, a further sum not exceeding in the whole the sum of one million one hundred and fifty thousand dollars towards defraying any further expenditures that may be incurred in connection with the sending of Canadian volunteers for active service in South Africa, and for providing as hereinafter mentioned by way of allowance to such volunteers or their dependents.

3. The word 'expenditures' in the foregoing resolutions includes the following:—

(a) All expenses of every kind in connection with the raising, enrolling, arming, equipping, provisioning, despatching and transporting of the said contingents up to the time of their arrival at the place of debarkation in South Africa;

(b) The payment of the officers, non-commissioned officers and men composing the said contingents up to the time of debarkation as aforesaid, at the rates authorized by the regulations and orders of the Department of Militia and Defence;

(c) All separation allowances paid to the wives and children of the married non-commissioned officers and men at the rates laid down by the Imperial regulations;

(d) The difference between the rates of pay of the officers, non-commissioned officers and men which they receive or are entitled to receive from Her Majesty's government during their period of service in South Africa and the respective rates of pay received by them up to the time of debarkation in South Africa—such difference not to be paid to such officers, non-commissioned officers and men while on such service, but the amount which would be payable to each such officer, non-commissioned officer or man to be placed to his credit, and to be applied in such manner as the Governor in Council may determine for the benefit of the dependents on him, or failing such application to be paid to him or his representatives at the close of his period of service.

He said: I beg to inform the House that His Excellency the Governor General recommends it to the consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

THE CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY.

Mr. N. F. DAVIN (West Assiniboia). Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) when we may expect the correspondence re the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty. I notice that the American papers are full of comments on it, and they seem to know a great deal more about it than we do here. We ought to have official information as soon as possible.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, there is a part of this correspondence which can be brought down at any time. It is official and of record, but there is a part of it coming from the Imperial authorities, which is confidential, and I have not yet the authority to bring it down.

DEFENCE OF THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, as I see that the hon. Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden) is in his place, I would like to mention something that is of great importance to the North-west Territories, and that is the necessity of, at once, taking steps to meet the wishes of the population of the Territories to be placed in a position of defence in case they should be molested either from within or without the Territories.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. DAVIN. I will conclude with a motion if necessary.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). My hon. friend (Mr. Davin) has a motion on the paper which he will reach directly and upon which he can speak.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, that is all right.

THE LEINSTER REGIMENT.

Mr. ALEX. McNEILL (North Bruce). Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Borden) if he has any announcement to make in regard to the proposition that has been made as to the substitution of a Canadian militia regiment in place of the regulars who are at present at Halifax.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). Mr. Speaker, I have much pleasure in informing my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill), and the House, that the government have decided that in case the Imperial government desire, or find it necessary, or convenient, to withdraw the Leinster Regiment from Halifax, to South Africa, temporarily, this government will undertake to supply the place of that regiment and to provide a garrison at Halifax from the militia force of Canada.

Mr. McNEILL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that I am much gratified and delighted to hear the statement that has been made by the hon. minister in reference to this matter. I would like to give to him and to his colleagues all possible credit for having acted so promptly in connection with it. I would like also to ask him in regard to the other matter that I spoke of, the Bermuda question, whether anything has been done?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I am not able to-day to make a statement in regard to that.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

Mr. LANDERKIN. He will give you more happiness to-morrow.

Mr. McNEILL. Mr. Speaker, if I may be allowed to make an observation, and if it is necessary, I will conclude with a motion, although I would rather not do so. I would like, at the outset, to say that I do not wish to make any criticism at all in reference to the action of the government, or to make any remark in regard to the action of the government in the past as to our contingents. That matter has been already criticised on the floor of parliament, and it was necessary that there should be criticism; the country would not have been satisfied with less. The criticism has gone out, the government's answer has gone with it, and in view of the fact that the address has been passed, and that we had a debate on that subject last night, also, I venture to think, Mr. Speaker, that what is required of us now, at this moment, is that we should consider in what way we can best give aid to the mother country at the present time. I say this all the more in view of the grave statements I see posted this afternoon on the bulletin boards. They may not be true, of course, but they are, at all events, grave in their aspect, and as I say, I think the time has come when we should take counsel together and endeavour to discover in what way we can best aid the mother country in her attempt to suppress a most formidable conspiracy directed against the well-being of our fellow subjects in South Africa, a conspiracy aimed against the well-being of our fellow colonists in South Africa, and in fact against our empire there. Mr. Speaker, this is no party question at all. It is a question upon which both sides of this House can entirely unite. I will venture to say to my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), whom I see in his seat, that I hope that while he objected to action in anticipation of the course that parliament might pursue; he now may be able to join with us heartily when we attempt to discover what is best to be done at the present moment. It seems to me that it would be well if the leaders of both sides of the House were to consult together and were to act together in this crisis. We are face to face with a very grave national emergency. This, Sir, is a question not of party, but of the status and security of the country. That is the issue we have to face to-day. No one can presume to say what the result may be if this war be dragged out to any considerable length. No one can foretell what international complications may arise. I say, Sir, this is a question of our national security. I want to know what position Canada would occupy in presence of—if I may so describe it—the land hunger which is gnawing at the hearts of the great powers at the present moment;—I want to know in what position Canada would be placed if any great misfortune were to overtake the mother country at the present time. I want to ask especially: in what condition would the province of Quebec be placed, and in what condition would our French Canadian friends be placed if anything of that kind were to occur? I say, Sir, that their position would be even more unhappy than our position would be, because if the worst came to the worst we might make a common cause with our neighbours to the south—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. McNEILL. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) laughs. We are making a common cause with them to-day, as far as that is concerned, but I am speaking of emergencies which are not upon us, and which I hope will never be upon us, but which we must consider—I say that in view of that condition of things, while we English-speaking Canadians perhaps would be in a position to join hands with them, in what condition would the province of Quebec be in reference to its special institutions? I would like our French Canadian friends to consider that, and to ask themselves whether that is not a question as vitally affecting every one of them as it is affecting us. I believe that the overwhelming majority of the thinking people of the province of Quebec are just as much attached to British institutions as we are.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McNEILL. I would like that they who do think so and who are the leading people of that province, and I do not wish to say one word hurtful to any individual—but I say that I would like that those who do think so, should endeavour to teach those who may not be so well informed in that province, the truth that I am now pointing out: that for them as much as for us, the maintenance of British supremacy and the maintenance of the British Empire is essential. Therefore it is, Mr. Speaker, that I say, that at the present moment, and in view of the gravity of the situation, I think that all party considerations should be set aside, and that the leaders of both sides of this House ought to join together and endeavour to discover what best can be done in order to strengthen the hands of the empire in the present crisis. I know it has been said that the United Kingdom does not require any help from us. I cannot assent to that proposition. I would have been prepared to agree to that proposition last August when we thought that all that was required was to settle the matter with the government of the Transvaal; but now we know that a very different condition of things exists. We know that a most formidable and dangerous conspiracy has been discovered to exist all over the great regions under Her Majesty's dominion in South Africa. We know that there is not a single portion almost of that vast region which is not honeycombed with this conspiracy which has its headquarters in the two republics. We know that by reason of the fact that that conspiracy exists, it has been necessary to retain for the protection of lines of communication a vast armed force, which the British generals have not been able to send to the front. The result of that is, that comparatively few British soldiers were able to go to the front in the beginning of the struggle, a struggle which is being carried out amidst an almost interminable sea of natural fortresses. We are not merely dealing with a handful of men as was supposed last fall, we are dealing with an army, the individuals composing which have been trained from childhood in the most perfect methods of carrying out the system of warfare best suited to that country. We are dealing with an army of from 60,000 to 80,000 men.

Mr. DAVIN. There must be more than that.

Mr. McNEILL. At least that at all events. We are dealing with an army of from 60,000 to 80,000 men officered by some of the ablest and most scientific military experts to be found in Europe, and possessed of the very best weapons which money can buy. That is the position of affairs at the present time, and the mother country is called upon to deal with this enemy at a distance of something like 8,000 miles from the United Kingdom. We have heard a great deal about the forces of two little republics being opposed to the might of the British Empire, but we all know that a very famous philosopher once said: that if he only had a lever long enough he could move the world, and it seems to me that 8,000 miles is a pretty considerable leverage in the hands of the Boers, for that is about what it comes to. Under these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, and in view of the fact that Mr. Chamberlain said two days ago: that the colonies were increasing their offers, and that all the offers they made were gratefully accepted by the Imperial authorities, I venture to say that our first duty as representatives of the people of Canada, is to see what we can do best to assist the mother country in the struggle she is making. And what Great Britain is doing to-day in defence of the liberties of her colonists and her subjects in South Africa she is prepared, if necessity arose, to do to-morrow in defence of the province of Quebec, if any foreign power were to attempt to encroach upon the rights and privileges of the people there. The people of Canada, Mr. Speaker, consider their empire as one and indivisible, and they are perfectly satisfied that an attack upon any part of it is an attack upon Canada. So it is; and they will not, I am sure, be satisfied with the conduct of their representatives in this parliament if they cannot feel that they have done all that they could to uphold the empire in the struggle which is now going on. Under these circumstances, and again saying how much gratified I am to find that the government have moved so promptly in this matter of the Halifax regiment, I beg to move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. JOHN CHARLTON (North Norfolk). Mr. Speaker, I hardly know whether to consider that my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) has been indulging in a criticism and condemnation of the conduct of the government in connection with the contingent or not. I understood that the hon. gentleman did not approve of the action of the government in regard to providing a garrison in Halifax.

Mr. McNEILL. Will my hon. friend forgive me? If he wishes for information, I may just say that my desire was very carefully to avoid making any criticism of the conduct of the government with regard to the contingent. I may make some criticism hereafter; that will depend on what occurs, perhaps; but in the meantime I have no desire to do anything of the kind.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am glad to hear the hon. gentleman's statement; but it struck me, as a listener to his remarks, that he was engaged in a criticism of the government.

Mr. McNEILL. I had no such desire.

Mr. CHARLTON. There was one feature, however, of my hon. friend's remarks which I must deprecate. He stood up and spoke in the tone and attitude of an alarmist—a very grave crisis was on the country, and we required the joint action of the government and the opposition—a careful comparison of views, and a serious attempt in this grave crisis to act in harmony. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am unable to believe that a very grave crisis confronts this country. Of course, the British government is engaged in a task of considerable magnitude, that will require a large force of men and a large expenditure of money. But I have no idea that the British Empire is in danger. I have no idea that 140,000 semi-civilized Boers in the Transvaal and the Orange Free State threaten the existence of this mighty empire; and I think that a great amount of impatience and ignorance of military matters is shown by the criticisms in the public press and on the part of men, public and private, with regard to this affair. It is an easy matter, here in Canada, or in a club in London, or in any newspaper office, to criticise the actions of British officers in South Africa, to show where they made mistakes, in what respect they might have done better, and how, if we had control of those operations, a different result would have been reached. The British government at this moment is assembling its forces. This crisis was precipitated on the British government by the action of Kruger before adequate preparations were made; and it seems to me for one that so far the results of the military operations have proven satisfactorily the great superiority of the British troops. We have had isolated and feeble garrisons at Mafeking and Kimberley which the Boers have been unable to reduce; while, on the other hand, every position that has been occupied by British troops has been carried with the utmost gallantry at the point of the bayonet. We have been fighting a foe hidden behind rocks, and armed with the best armament known to modern warfare, and with all the conditions of such a character as to render the task of our troops a herculean one; and we have not done these men justice in our criticisms, or adequately estimated the difficulties they have met or what they have accomplished. Sir, I have no doubt about the issue of this struggle. I have no fears about its outcome. I do not regard it as necessary for the opposition and the members of this government to meet in solemn conclave or enter into a discussion or a grave consideration of what measures are to be taken to avert disaster and ruin from the British Empire. The government of Canada, in my opinion, have acted promptly and judiciously in this matter. They did not, of course, lead public sentiment by deciding to take a course of great importance without taking the trouble to ascertain what the public feeling and sentiment was on the subject; but they have responded to public sentiment.

Mr. McNEILL.

An hon. MEMBER. They had to.

Mr. CHARLTON. They were willing to. No great leader will attempt to lead public sentiment. No great leader will attempt to take a course which public sentiment may disapprove of. To have taken such a course in this instance would have been disastrous. It would not have been prudent on the part of the government to have assumed that public sentiment would support them in any given line of conduct; and they were perfectly in their right and were acting judiciously in waiting for the evidence of the existence of a public sentiment that would warrant the course they have taken—a course involving the sending of thousands of our sons to South Africa, a course involving the expenditure of millions of money, a course of the gravest character, but a course which is certain to produce the grandest and most beneficent results relating to ourselves as a part of the empire and relating to the empire at large. The British Empire has assembled in Africa at this moment probably 200,000 men; more are going; and it is fighting a foe entrenched in positions of great natural strength. It is engaged in a contest that will require time, careful generalship, and a great many other things that we know nothing of here : and, in my opinion, we had better let the British generals work out the problem themselves without dictating to them what we think should be done. We had better rest in quiet confidence that British knowledge and valour will bring us out of this conflict victorious. For this reason I rise to deprecate this pessimistic and alarmist tone which my hon. friend has assumed in regard to the present crisis. Of course, we must all deprecate the great loss of life and the great expenditure of money that will be incurred ; but this war has got to be carried through to a successful and triumphant issue. The British are not going to abandon South Africa. The loss of prestige such a course would entail is not going to be met by the British nation. If my hon. friend and those connected with him on the opposite side of the House will heed and act consistently with the advice that he gave a few moments ago, to refrain from making this a party question, if they will not deal with it in a party sense, if they will not attempt to make political capital out of it to injure the government, and will pursue instead a patriotic course in the matter, then the country will form a better opinion of these hon. gentlemen than it has at present. But they have not done that. On the contrary, I do not hesitate to say that the right hon. leader of the opposition and his followers have been influenced in the course they have taken in this matter by a desire to make political capital out of it. I am afraid that that is the object of these hon. gentlemen opposite in making this demand that we should pay the troops while in South Africa and send on more troops ; and possibly some farsighted man who will look down the vista of the future will believe that should such a course be adopted, the vast accumulation of public debt that will thereby be entailed, can be made use of against the government in a future election campaign on a charge of extravagance and reckless increase of debt.

Mr. CLANCY. That is party politics.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes, of the kind I deprecate, and that I fear the hon. gentleman is only too ready to put to use. At all events I re-echo most heartily the sentiment of my hon. friend from North Bruce that we should avoid making of this a party question, that we should approach its consideration with a desire to see the interests of the British Empire promoted and guarded, and that whatever else we may quarrel about, we should not attempt to make political capital out of a great question like this, in which an empire is at stake, in which the interests of the greatest empire in the world are involved, and in which it is the patriotic duty of every citizen to stand by the empire and do what we can to aid a cause which is common to us and a cause which is in the interests of civilization and humanity.

Mr. McNEILL. I desire with your permission, Mr. Speaker, to say a word of personal explanation. In the first place, I may congratulate my hon. friend on having made a patriotic speech. It is the first time I ever heard him make one, and I was delighted to hear it. It is most satisfactory to find that the overwhelming opinion of the country has brought him to that healthy frame of mind.

Mr. CHARLTON. That is not a personal explanation.

Mr. CLANCY. It is very pertinent.

Mr. CHARLTON. It is impertinent.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not wish to refer to my hon. friend's remarks except for the purpose of correcting a misapprehension under which he seems to labour. He says that I rose here as a pessimist and implied that a terrible calamity was about to befall the British Empire. Such a thought never crossed my mind. I am quite satisfied that we are going to come out of this struggle a much more united and stronger empire than ever before. I quite agree with what Conan Doyle said the other day, that it would be well to raise a monument to Paul Kruger because of the benefit he has conferred on the British Empire. I should be sorry, therefore, to have the statement which the hon. gentleman attributed to me allowed to go uncontradicted. I also want to say that I had no thought of suggesting that the British generals at the front were not doing their duty as well as any other generals on the face of the globe would be able to do it. I would like to ask my hon. friend if he would be just kind enough to tell me what I did say which led him to declare that I had made any such implication. I did not refer to the British generals at all, from the time I rose to my feet until I sat down again, and can only say that the hon. gentleman, in making that statement, made a gratuitous mistake. I do not wish to use stronger language.

Mr. CHARLTON. I had not the slightest intention of doing an injustice to the hon. gentleman. I merely judged, from the tenor of his speech, that he thought a crisis had overtaken the country and that things were going wrong, and we wanted to look around and see what could be done.

Mr. McNEILL. I did not say that things were going wrong. I never made any observations which would justify my hon. friend in assuming that I thought things were going wrong. I said that a great crisis was upon the British Empire and I say so again ; and in saying so, I am borne out by every British statesman in the United Kingdom.

And when the hon. gentleman makes remarks with reference to me in the future, I would ask him to be kind enough to confine them as nearly to the facts as is consistent with his temperament.

Mr. CHARLTON. I shall always endeavour to do my hon. friend justice.

Mr. DAVIN. I wish to say a word or two on the subject, because I confess that I think my hon. friend who introduced it was misrepresented by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). Mr. Kruger was congratulated the other day on being one of the greatest unifiers of the British Empire. But he has also accomplished a great task here for us, because he has made a Britisher out of my hon. friend from North Norfolk. I never heard from his lips before anything so enthusiastic about British valour and British prestige and British predominance. But I want to deal with the position taken by the hon. gentleman. His position seems to be this: That any government, whether it be Liberal or Conservative, which may happen to undertake the prosecution of any purpose of a patriotic character is removed from criticism. It would be a very extraordinary thing if the government at this moment were to be removed from criticism, when a member of that government has allowed himself, both in spoken and written speech, the utmost latitude of criticism on all and sundry, including one of his own colleagues at the Council board. So that when we find an hon. gentleman, occupying the position of a minister of the Crown, criticising English generals, the English government and the members of the opposition, declaring that the members of the opposition in this very regard are guilty of the grossest misconduct that public men could be guilty of, and even criticising the Solicitor General and condemning him for the attitude he took, it would be an astonishing thing if we were to be forced into the position of not venturing to criticise anything the government may do or may have done or may have failed to do in this matter.

The opposition in this House have, I think, shown their patriotism and their self-restraint in the way they voted the address. Our whole attitude on this matter has been that of patriotic citizens of Canada and of a patriotic and loyal opposition. Well, Sir, are we to be deprived of the right of saying what is in the minds of the people? The hon. gentleman has just laid down the extraordinary doctrine, with regard to his leader, that his leader is bound to follow public opinion and not to lead it, that he is bound to be not at the head but at the tail—not to come in at the front but at the rear. That is an extraordinary position for a leader. Why, the word 'leader' implies one who leads, but the ideal which the hon. gentleman has held up before us of a leader is one who fawns himself on circumstances, who waits on opportunity, and who crawls after events instead of taking them by the forefront.

There was discontent with the right hon. gentleman respecting the sending of the contingent. What was it? It was this, that he made it appear to the world at large as if Canada hesitated. He was in fact playing the role and living up to the ideal of the hon. member for North Norfolk. Here was Canada, this vast country of imperial proportions, vibrating from end to end with enthusiastic patriotism and determined to rush to the support of the mother country in a great crisis, and show Christendom that England had her colonies by her side. Yet at that moment our leader was hesitating. That is the charge against him made by the people, and the offence has not been forgotten nor will be forgotten, because in taking the course he did, the right hon. gentleman showed that he was not ready to give voice to the bounding enthusiasm of the people of Canada. Some question has been raised here as to whether a certain portion of the people of Canada are loyal or not. I do not find any evidence of any public man, of any public print worthy of the name, saying one word impugning the loyalty of the French race. Nowhere do I find it. But I find a systematic attempt in the pages of La Patrie, aye, and as far west as my own constituency, people whispering around that men who believe that the greatest calamity that could befall this country would be racial or religious differences, or the casting of doubts unworthily upon the loyalty of any portion of our citizens—that these men are saying that French Canadians are disloyal. The other day we had a meeting in the west, and a politician attended that meeting and stated, as was reported afterwards in the newspapers, that that man was an enemy of Canada who would throw doubt upon the loyalty of the French Canadians. And what was whispered around that city by the creatures of the leading wire-puller of the Minister of the Interior? Why, that at that very meeting the gentleman who had spoken in this way had attacked the French Canadian character from the point of view of loyalty. But, Sir, there were gentlemen there of different races and religions, every man of whom was ready to say that that statement was a falsehood. Why should the French Canadian not be loyal to the empire? Why is he in a different position from the Irishman or the Highlander, or even from the man of British descent in England itself? He has done his part, as the history of this country shows, where there was a great Christendom-wide crisis in the face of England, to maintain the solidarity and integrity of the British Empire. Why should not he be proud of the empire? Why should not he be grateful to it? The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) is at the head of this nation.

He wears the Imperial honours bestowed upon him by his sovereign. Sir, if this had remained a French colony, with seigneurs and predial slaves instead of free citizens, would the right hon. gentleman be in his present position? Would Sir George Cartier have arrived at the high position he arrived at? Would one French Canadian after another, with habitant blood in their veins, and who rose to the highest positions, have had the happy, distinguished and useful careers they had? No, Sir; there is no class of the community that should be so loyal to the empire as the French Canadians, and there is no class of the community therefore, I am more ready to believe loyal to the empire, unless some evidence very different from what I have seen were brought before me to lead me to a different belief.

Sir, we in Canada occupy, in my opinion, about the happiest position that a race or people could occupy. We have a strong executive, but we have boundless individual liberty. There is no country in the world where the citizen is more free, and there is no country where law and order are so certainly and steadily maintained. Here in this country, therefore, Scotsman, Irishman, French Canadian, Englishman, or German, whether he be born on the soil or whether he has become naturalized, would be a dastard unless he felt grateful to the great empire that has conferred upon him such priceless privileges. And there is this to be said in regard to our position—that we have certain material advantages purchased at a very low price. We have behind us miles and miles of ships, the great 'sea-dragons her seas have bred' of the empire; we have all her prestige and power, as my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill) who has introduced this subject, said. We have all this behind us; and every man, be he a settler of three years' residence, or be he born on the soil, wherever he goes, not a hair of his head shall be touched, for all that power and all that overshadowing prestige are behind him. And, Sir, especially I say that the French Canadian should be instinct with the feeling of Sir Etienne Pascal Taché, the chairman of the Quebec conference whence confederation sprang, when he said that he believed that the last shot fired in defence of the British Empire on this continent would be fired from a French Canadian gun, and the trigger pulled by a French Canadian finger. A few years ago, when, on the other side of the line, there was some growling in regard to Canada, when the feeling was not as friendly as it is to-day, I stood in the later autumn on the citadel at Quebec and looked down on our great St. Lawrence stretching her mighty arms to the sea. I looked up and saw the star of evening, and I felt that whatever planet might shine there, that for all Canada, and I will say even for the French Canadian who has a true conception of what he owes to the empire, the real star that will always for the patriotic heart, shine over Quebec is Wolfe's glory and Wolfe's victory. As I thus reflected the evening gun was fired, as the evening gun is fired on Pacific waters and at Halifax, and it seemed as if the august mother put her arms around her Canadian child and said: Sleep in peace, my invincible arms are around you. It is because those arms are around us that we have that sense of security, that confidence in the present and in the future that belongs to us to-day. Now, while I deprecate as unworthy of our patriotism, unworthy of British power and British resources, any undue alarm, still, Sir, why are we confronted in South Africa to-day with the state of things that makes us all uneasy? Undue security, sitting down confident that nothing could touch us, believing that we were equal to any emergency, and that it was time enough when there was a fence to be crossed to look to see whether on the other side there was a ditch which may be awkward for our steed and for ourselves. And I think that all my hon. friend means is this—that now if the danger is greater than any of us supposed a short time ago, we should not wait as we waited, I think unworthily, before—no, Sir—not we, not the people of Canada, but the government that did not express the opinion of Canada—we should not wait until the unwilling sides of our intent were pricked from across the Atlantic, but we should be ready to tender to the Imperial mother our good offices in every possible way, in case more help should be needed in her arduous task. With natural fortresses against her arms, manned by foes numerous beyond anticipation, and brave beyond anticipation, it may well be that more men will be required. And if more men and more help should be required, I say we should be forward to let the Imperial authorities know, as I am sure the other colonies are, that we are ready, that we have only given her a mere foretaste of what we can do, that these five millions of men with the blood of the great heroic races in their veins are ready to stand by her side and see to it that the empire is not impaired or its prestige dimmed or a shadow allowed to rest upon its glory.

Let me say, while thus speaking, that I deprecate using such language as that used by the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) — 'semi-civilized Boers'. I deprecate speaking of them with that contempt. The other night the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) spoke of them with similar contempt. He called them a half-civilized race. I deprecate that. Why, Sir, they are descended from the choice races of Europe. They have in their veins the blood of the choicest fighting stocks of Europe. Those of them who are Dutch are descended from the men who bearded Philip II. when he had all the power of Spain behind him ; those of them who have French blood in their veins are descended from the Huguenots who fought beside Henri IV., I suppose both stocks are now long mingled ; but such as they are they have the choicest fighting blood of Europe in their veins. They are poor in some respects, they are men accustomed to hardships, but notwithstanding regrettable instances of conduct that we must all deplore, their demeanour to the wounded, their demeanour on the battlefield, stamps them as gallant and chivalrous men. England has in these men no unworthy foe ; she is not dealing with semi-civilized men and a semi-civilized race, as these leaders of the government call them, she is dealing with a highly civilized foe that has prepared by long years for this great crisis which they foresaw. They saw the advantages the country gave them, they got the best guns, the best ammunition, the best skill of Europe, and under these circumstances it is a fact that when England went into this struggle originally, she went into it handicapped because of that sense of security which my hon. friend here now would on our part try to dispel. Therefore I say I sympathize with the suggestion made by him. I deplore what occurred in October ; I deplore the hesitancy shown by the Prime Minister—one week saying : I can't do it, the law is against me, I have no power ; and then turning around in less than a fortnight and sending a contingent, and out-Heroding Herod in flaming rhetoric when they took their departure from Quebec. The spectacle of inconsistency, the spectacle of weakness, is something that will never leave the mind of Canada. Because, Sir, Canada is instinct with the heroic blood and brain of the sea kings of old, instinct with the same heroic blood and brain that has fought on every sea and under every sun, in Asia, in Europe, that fought in the Peninsula, that fought on the Dargai Heights, that fought in the Soudan, and that are fighting with equal heroism against greater odds in the Transvaal. Canada instinct with our ancient valour is determined to stand by the empire as its right arm. Something like a hundred years ago that empire, not nearly what it is now, had to face a world in arms and to fight the Apollyon Europe, when those two little heroic islands were the last refuge of freedom. England met all that overwhelming power then, and never took her seat, as she will never take her seat now, never sheath her sword, until she has put around her brow the laurels of a bloody and yet stainless, an unqualified and humanizing victory.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON (Three Rivers). I desire to say a few words upon the motion of the hon. gentleman, the member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), and in rising to do so I may be allowed to express to my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Davin), my admiration for the eloquent way and brilliant manner in which he has referred to the history of the French Canadian race. Sir, I would consider myself wanting in respect for the House of Commons of Canada, in respect for the French Canadian race, were I to discuss any question as to whether the French Canadian people are loyal or disloyal. Such discussion would indicate on the part of members of this House of Commons an ignorance of the history of that race on this continent far from flattering ; consequently I will say only a word or two on that point. Discussions of this nature which are occasionally taking place, seem to me fraught with more mischief than anything else, discussions concerning the loyalty of the French, the loyalty of the Scotch, the loyalty of the English, or the loyalty of any other nationality, such discussions seem to me far beyond the field of usefulness, for the simple reason that Canada has proved on more than one memorable occasion, that all her sons, whether coming from English stock or from those who peopled this country for the first time, who came from France, are thoroughly devoted to British connection. Sir, we admire France, and as Frenchmen we love her still ; but that admiration and that love for the country of our ancestors has never prevented us on every occasion from being loyal and true to the British flag which has given us liberty, the greatest liberty that can be afforded to any people in the world. Sir, standing here as a French Canadian let me express my opinion that if any disaster occurred to the British Empire, the race of all others who would suffer most keenly from that disaster would be the French Canadians. And the reason is obvious. My hon. friend has spoken of the possibility of the English people making good terms on the other side of the line. It may be so or it may not be so. But we French Canadians, occupying our peculiar position on this continent, have rights which have been accorded to us by treaties, which have been respected by England, and the respect which England has shown by her conduct and treatment of us is a reason why we have remained on every occasion true and loyal to Great Britain.

During the course of these discussions some newspapers have attacked the clergy of Quebec, and have hinted that possibly that clergy was not as loyal as it should be. Mr. Speaker, I leave it to every historian of my race to settle that question. One of the great reasons why the French Canadians remain so true to England is because they were led by their priests. It was the clergy who sounded the first note of loyalty, a note which was taken up by the people of Quebec, which has maintained them a loyal people under the British flag, and has made of them one of the best allies of England on this side of the water. Now, Sir, one of the most eminent of our clergy, Mgr. Begin, archbishop of Quebec, was attacked a little while ago, and permit me to read some of his words, which are more eloquent than mine could be, and which express very clearly the feelings that animate not only himself but his clergy and the people who follow his clergy:

It is truly deplorable that the history of our country should be so little known. Should not a century and a half of true and unswerving loyalty to the British Crown suffice to convince our fellow countrymen of English origin of our attachment to the flag that shelters us?

The loyalty of the French Canadian bishops and priests is written in letters of gold, traced in lines of fire in the annals of history, and all the sovereigns, all their representatives who have succeeded one another here since the cession of Canada to England—even those among the latter against whom it was necessary to contend lawfully in the defence of the most legitimate rights—have all borne the most solemn and hearty testimony to it.

Shall I recall here a Monseigneur Briand, who, while occupying the See of Quebec, when a fresh page was turned over in the history of New France, living successively under the white standard with the golden fleur-de-lis and under the British flag, loyal at first to the former, until on the Plains of Abraham all was lost save honour, and then generously transferring to the latter the homage of his entire loyalty, brought all his sacred influence to bear, during the terrible days of 1775, to keep French Canada faithful to its new masters? And yet God knows how great must have been the temptation for the children of France in America to join those sons of Albion, less scrupulous, less loyal than they—and might we not add less vilified and more easily pardoned for a real and successful revolt than we are to-day for a fancied disloyalty. If the Catholic emissaries from the United States, if the pressing appeal of the French officers who were serving the cause of American independence were unable to overcome the last resistance of the Canadian people, it was because the potent voice of the head of the church in Canada, invoking the sacred principles of the respect due to the reigning authority and stigmatizing as 'rebels' those who allowed themselves to be carried away, opposed an insurmountable barrier to the revolution. And England, already robbed of the richest portion of her inheritance in America, owed to a French bishop the preservation of this country of Canada, one of the most precious gems in the Imperial Crown.

What could I not say—did I not wish to be brief—of a Monseigneur Denaut, whose devotedness to England manifested itself by deeds of heroic generosity, and of a Monseigneur Plessis, who, in 1807, reminded his flock that it was impossible to be a good Christian without being a loyal and faithful subject, and that they would be unworthy of the name of Catholics and Canadians if they manifested disloyalty or were indifferent when they had to perform the duties of subjects devoted to the interests of their sovereign or to the defence of the country. It was this illustrious prelate who in 1812 spared no effort and succeeded in keeping the Canadians faithful in their allegiance to England. We find the same attitude maintained by Monseigneur Panet, the maternal uncle of the lamented Cardinal Taschereau.

Then, in the regrettable days of 1837-8 it was Monseigneur Signay, in Quebec, and one of your predecessors, Monseigneur Lartigue, in Montreal, who interposed in the name of religion to put an end to fratricidal conflicts, an act of loyalty which has often caused them to be bitterly reproached by some of their fellow-countrymen; a sacred duty which they had to accomplish notwithstanding that the ties of blood and the voice of paternal tenderness appealed to them. Later on, we find Monseigneur Baillargeon, who laid down the same line of conduct for his flock in connection with the Fenian invasion, and Monseigneur Taché, who, at a critical moment, pacified his half-breeds and kept them loyal to England.

And if I might venture to mention myself, I could repeat what I said in France itself, in the cathedral at Rouen, at the solemn celebration of the 14th centenary of the baptism of Clovis and of his Franks—that, while retaining affection for our old mother country, we were happy to live under the shadow of the British flag, and that we inhabited one of the freest countries on earth.

As may easily be seen, history has repeated itself from the cession of Canada to our days, and it will repeat itself so long as there will be a Catholic bishop in our Canada. Our good friends seem at times to forget this: Loyalty for the children of the Church of Christ is not a matter of sentiment or of personal interest, it is a serious and strict duty of conscience, derived from a sacred principle, immutable, eternal as the divine Law-maker. Let them, therefore, reassure themselves as regards the attitude of the Catholic clergy on similar occasions: the past has been beyond attack, the future will likewise be so, because our Catholic principles never change.

As a matter of fact, I have no hesitation in saying that it would be impossible to find, even among the highest of England's aristocracy, a succession of men who have been more loyal than the bishops, than the clergy of Quebec to the British Crown. This should suffice, it seems to me, to protect us from imputations devoid of solid foundation, supremely unjust and improper.

If ever—which God forbid—the question of annexation to the United States should seriously arise, it would be a curious thing to observe the respective attitudes of our two nationalities—English Canadian and French Canadian—in presence of such an eventuality. I am sure that we should not have to blush for our people under the circumstances, because they would once more do their duty as loyal subjects of Her Britannic Majesty.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that the extract may be somewhat long which I have just quoted, but it is—I do not mean to say to reassure the public mind, because it would be almost impossible to imagine that any set of men, living in any part of the Dominion of Canada, could for one moment, doubt the loyalty of the French Canadian people, who have so signally proven their loyalty. Take up the history of that people, take Chateaugay, take up all the brilliant pages which have been recorded to the credit of the French people, and there is not an intelligent man, or a man at all familiar with the history of Canada, who can doubt the loyalty of the French people. My hon. friend (Mr. McNeill) has spoken about a meeting of the leaders on the government side and the leaders of the opposition side for the purpose of finding out the true needs and of helping Great Britain when the time comes. Well, I know the deep loyalty of the hon. gentleman, and let me congratulate him upon it, because I have seen it displayed on more than one occasion, but really, my hon. friend had only the report on the board as a basis to go upon in proposing this very important measure.

Mr. McNEILL. Not at all; that is merely one instance.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Well, as I understood, it was the instance that was used as making necessary—

Mr. McNEILL. No, no; it was not so intended at all.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Well, I may have misunderstood my hon. friend, but for the purpose of my argument, I wish merely to say, that in so far as I understand, Canada has done well, and there are no people in any part of the world who can complain of the action taken by Canada in showing how cheerfully she is ready to take a share in the defence of the British Empire when the British Empire requires it. I have a belief which was well expressed in a copy of Punch which I saw the other day. The arm-chair generals were represented as discussing amongst themselves where General Buller was wrong and where they could make it all right if their views prevailed. I believe that the English army is well generalled by men like Lord Roberts, General Buller, General Wolseley and the other officers who are taking part in this war. I believe that the army is generalled by men who are able to look after the trust which the British nation has placed in their hands. And, I am prepared to say more: If anything should occur, and if anything does occur, to place England under the necessity of calling upon her colonies for greater sacrifices than the sacrifices already made, I am quite prepared to make them. But, do not let us induce other people to believe that we think that England is in very great danger. Any one who will take up a topographical map of that country can easily see, without being a military man—and I am not posing as a military man—he can easily see how difficult it is for the British army to advance in that country. Our soldiers are always on the attacking side, and the enemy is defending these fortified positions which are almost impossible to capture. It is only the pluck and energy and determination of the British people, that has enabled them to attain even their present measure of success. My hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) says: Do not make a party question of this. I agree with him, but unfortunately he never practises what he preaches, for he at once proceeded to make a party question of it. He told us it might be said at the next general election, that there has been too much expended, or that the money which was asked for was beyond the requirements of the situation. Mr. Speaker, who was the first who came straight before the people of Canada to say that anything he could do to strengthen the hands of the government in this matter he was prepared to do? Sir, it was the trusted leader of the opposition who made that offer, and when Sir Charles Tupper sat in this House, responsible to a great political party for his words, he again stated that as far as money was concerned, he was prepared to go even beyond what the Prime Minister proposed, and would pay all the expenses of the contingents. However, I do not want to follow the bad example of my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) and enter into questions which might be considered of a party nature. I am very glad, Mr. Speaker, of this opportunity which has enabled me to give expression to, not only my own opinion, but the opinions of the French Canadian people. My personal opinion has never changed. Year in and year out whenever the question of French Canadian loyalty came to be discussed, I was not afraid to state my views. I belong to the French Canadian race, and I have made a study of that race. I believe that I know our history probably as well as most of the people who are criticising us, and I am prepared to state that it is absolutely ridiculous even to discuss in parliament the question of the loyalty of the French Canadian people. Nay more, if you want further testimony, go to any Englishman in the province of Quebec who lives side by side with us, like my hon. friend from Sherbrooke (Mr. McIntosh) who rose in his seat the other day and said, he did not wish to live with a people who are more loyal or whose character was higher than the character of the French Canadians. At any rate, Mr. Speaker, the French people have come to Canada to stay; the English people have come to Canada to stay, and the policy that should be pursued by every intelligent man is to promote harmony amongst the two races, and to prevent any friction which may occasionally arise, and only occasionally does it arise. One of the newspapers here in speaking of the French Canadian government in Quebec called it a 'Moccasin government.' Well sir, I am prepared to recognize myself as a moccasin. It is a word we are not ashamed of, because it was the moccasin-footed Frenchmen who opened up this continent to civilization and to religion. I am not ashamed of the term, but unfortunately it was not used with a view of bringing the people of the province of Quebec and the people of the other sections of the country together as united Canadians. It was used for an entirely different purpose, and that is why I find that these people who employ such an expression in such a form are guilty, more guilty, much more guilty than they think they are.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

Motion (Mr. McNeill) to adjourn the House negatived.

BRITISH COLUMBIA'S OFFER OF MEN FOR SOUTH AFRICA.

Mr. E. G. PRIOR (Victoria, B.C.). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to draw the attention of the leader of the government to his answer to a question which I put last night, in regard to the offer of a contingent from the British Columbia government. The right hon. gentleman is reported as follows in Hansard :

The answer we have telegraphed to the British Columbia government is that we shall be happy to give them or any other province that makes such an offer the same treatment that we have accorded to Lord Strathcona, that is, to put at their disposal all our machinery, officers, organization, to organize the contingent that may be offered, that province bearing all expenses.

Am I to understand that if the British Columbia government should raise a contingent of mounted men, that they will be expected to pay transportation, not only from Victoria, Vancouver and other points in British Columbia, to Halifax or St. John; but also from Canada to South Africa?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Yes.

DEFENCE OF MANITOBA AND NORTH WEST TERRITORIES.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Davin :

That in the opinion of this House it is the duty of the government to at once make provision for the defence of Manitoba and the North-west Territories, and that more particularly provision should be made whereby rifle associations, duly formed, shall be provided with military instruction, as well as with rifles and ammunition.

Mr. N. F. DAVIN (West Assinibola) The Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden) knows that I made some suggestion to him in regard to the contingents, and he knows well that I made them with the sole desire to further his work. This matter that I am bringing before the House is of too much importance to admit of thinking of it in connection with any other end or aim than the interests of the North-west Territories. We are at the present time in a position in the North-west Territories in which we need defence from within, and defence, it may be, against attacks from without. We have a large Indian population and a large population of half-breeds, and I may say that owing to the fact that the commission did not complete its work, there is a great deal of discontent amongst them. Now, the Mounted Police practically no longer exists.

The PRIME MINISTER. Oh, no; it does exist.

Mr. DAVIN. I wish to read an article which appeared in the Calgary Herald, which is published over 600 miles west of where I live. Calgary is practically the capital of Southern Alberta, if not of all Alberta. This is what that paper says :

The announcement that volunteers for Strathcona's Horse will be accepted from the officers and men of the North-west Mounted Police will be received with a good deal of surprise and disgust by the people of the Territories.

Last night, when I referred to this, I guarded myself from endorsing that view. I read this for the purpose of showing that there is a sense of alarm in the Territories. I do not see how anything better could be done than to take officers from the Mounted Police, because it would be much easier to get others to do the work of these gentlemen in the Territories than to get men of the same ability to do the work that has to be done in South Africa. This article goes on :

The police force, when it was 1,000 strong, was no stronger than was necessary, and since that time it has been systematically reduced, while the population has materially increased.

The 'Herald' has time after time pointed out the gross injustice to the settlers of this country of depleting the strength of this body by repeated drafts for the Yukon, and it was thought that the limit had been reached when the few men who were left were ordered to South Africa.

Now, however, it seems that the police are to be wiped out of existence altogether. If volunteers are needed for Strathcona's Horse, every member of the force who has not already been accepted will feel it his duty to volunteer. This is all right and proper from the policeman's point of view, but how about the settlers of the North-west who are indebted to the police for the existence of law and order in this new country? Every settlement in the Territories objects to what is being done, and has said so as plainly as it was possible to say it. The press of the Territories, regardless of politics, are a unit in demanding that the force be restored to something like its strength four years ago, but not only is no notice taken of the just demands of the people, but even the few remaining men are now wanted elsewhere. The people have sufficiently good memories to recall the special promises that were made regarding the police force when the Liberal party were seeking office, and they well know how to treat in the future those politicians who have so unblushingly violated their most sacred pledge.

I read this for the sole purpose of showing that a leading journal in the town of Calgary, which is one of the most considerable towns in the North-west Territories, feels it necessary to sound a note of alarm, and what I would suggest is this, that the Mounted Police be recruited up to its full strength, and that means be at once taken first, to instruct and as soon as may be arm rifle corps at different centres in the Territories. There is a rifle corps at Moosejaw, which the Department of Militia, when it was presided over by Mr. Patterson, I think, supplied with Snider rifles. The Snider rifle is now an obsolete arm. They would like to be supplied with Lee-Metford rifles. Then, there is a strong desire on the part of large numbers—I have the names of some forty gentlemen in Swift Current—who have formed a rifle corps, and want Lee-Enfield rifles. I have also communications from gentlemen at Medicine Hat to the same effect; and I have received a letter from Edmonton saying that there are gentlemen there who desire to form a rifle corps. Here is this desire on the part of the people of the North-west in various centres to fit themselves without pay, without any expense, to do the work required. I have had a few words with the Minister of Militia, from which I infer that he looks sympathetically on the course that should be taken. When General Hutton was out west, I met him. I attended his meetings, and heard his scheme explained; and any little influence I had I gave in support of his scheme. Since General Hutton, however, has come east, and other events have occurred, and I have been able to meet the people, I have found that even if the same circumstances existed to-day that existed when General Hutton was there, his scheme of mounted rifles, each man having a horse of his own, is not feasible in all parts of Manitoba and the North-west Territories; and the suggestion I have to make to the government is this. Part of it sounds at first like a bull; but after it is looked into more closely, its bull-like character will disappear. What I suggest is, that as far west as Swift Current corps of mounted rifles without horses should be formed. That is to say, let them be drilled as mounted riflemen. They can easily get the loan of horses for the purpose of learning to ride. Let them be taught to ride, as well as drill; let them, at Regina or at any other point, pass an examination as horsemen at the hands of the riding-master; and let them also pass an examination in drill at the hands of the drill sergeant. In that way you will have men trained as mounted riflemen, because, after all, the mounted rifleman fights on foot; but you have got rid of what would be a bar to your scheme, the requiring each man to supply his horse at first. Some of them would do it. For instance, at Regina, at Qu'Appelle station, and at other points, some men would supply their horses; but at least seventy-five per cent of those who would desire to be drilled and are good horsemen would not have their horses, and would find the necessity of providing a horse a bar. I suggest, that action be taken at once. We have heard talk, which I hope is pure talk, of a Fenian raid on the part of some loose-tongued persons below the line. The same thing was talked of in 1885, when men came across the line, and caused some trouble. These men have been talking of visiting the North-west. You have the possibility of an attempt being made to disturb the public from that quarter or from some particular reserve or or from those who disturbed it in 1885, so that I think the government cannot take a course that will commend itself more to patriotism and to the needs of the North-west at present than for the Minister of Militia to at once take steps to see that those gentlemen, who desire to put themselves in harness to-day and strike a blow if necessary for Canada, for their homes and families, shall be put in such a position that they would be fit to do the work efficiently and be given possession of the requisite arms. I do not think it is necessary for me to say anything further, and I hope that we may hear something from my hon. friend the Minister of Militia that will be satisfying to that portion of the North-west for which I speak.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). The subject to which my hon. friend called our attention is most interesting and important. The uneasiness, I may say, at the outset, which he has expressed as to the present condition of matters in the North-west, in view of the fact that a large number of the North-west Mounted Police have been withdrawn to go to South Africa, I may set at rest by assuring him, in the most public manner, that it is the intention as I understand, of the government to promptly fill up the ranks of that corps. I am sure that everybody will agree that no better men could have been sent to South Africa to assist the British Empire than those who were withdrawn from the North-west. Two squadrons of those men have gone over or are about to sail from Halifax, as the result of the action of the government, endorsed by the people; and in addition, a distinguished Canadian, Lord Strathcona, is now fitting up and sending out at his own expense from Manitoba, the North-west Territories and British Columbia, three other squadrons, composed, not exclusively of North-west mounted policemen, but of men who and officers who have had special experience to fit them for the service that will be most useful in South Africa. While that is being done, the ranks of the mounted police will be filled up promptly to the strength at which the force was before this draft was made upon it.

With reference to what may be done in my own immediate department, I may say to the hon. gentleman that the question of the defence of Manitoba and the North-west Territories, and I may include British Columbia as well, is a question which has been occupying the attention of the administration particularly since the defence committee sat here, some year or eighteen months ago. It is a very difficult one and might be a very expensive one, but it is one which I think it is our duty promptly to grapple with. I am inclined to agree in much the hon. gentleman has said. I certainly agree with him that it is our duty to encourage, as far as possible, the organization of rifle associations in that country and to do everything in our power to encourage the formation of such associations by supplying them with rifles and ammunition and the necessary instructions. As head of the Militia Department, I intend submitting a proposal to inaugurate in Manitoba and the North-west and a portion of British Columbia corps of mounted rifles. I think that the events of the war now going on in South Africa have demonstrated beyond question that mounted soldiers are the soldiers of the future, and that in a new country like this, with an immense area and a sparse population, it is absolutely necessary that we should, so far as we are able, adopt that idea. That idea has taken shape to some extent, and I intend, when the Militia estimates come before the House, discussing it at greater length. But I may say that a beginning will be made this year in the way of organizing special corps of mounted rifles in the North-west. The suggestion of the hon. gentleman that these corps, which are really infantry on horseback, might be organized, even without all the men being provided with horses, drill being carried on and preparations made for emergencies which might hereafter arise, is one which has occupied the attention of the department. I have only to say to the hon. gentleman, in conclusion, that the matter is receiving the most careful attention of the government, that prompt action will be taken, and I would ask him in view of that statement whether he will be good enough to withdraw his motion.

Mr. DAVIN. After that very satisfactory assurance, I will be glad to act on my hon. friend's suggestion.

Motion withdrawn.

Mr. WALLACE. I would ask the Minister of Customs when the annual report of his department will be on the table?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). It is being printed with all possible speed. It has been in the hands of the printers for some time, and the Printing Bureau are being urged to hasten its completion with all possible despatch, but of course they are giving precedence to the Auditor-General's Report, which all hon. members are anxious to get.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 5.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, February 12, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

REPORT.

The Civil Service List of Canada.—(Sir Wilfrid Laurier.)

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 14) to regulate the grain trade in Manitoba and the North-west Territories.—(Mr. Douglas.)

CARETAKER OF ORILLIA PUBLIC BUILDING.

Mr. BENNETT (by Mr. Sproule) asked :

Who is caretaker of the public building at Orillia, and what is his salary?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). His name is John Frawley. His salary is $15 per month.

DOUKHOBORS AND GALICIANS.

Mr. DAVIN (by Mr. LaRivière) asked :

How many Doukhobors have been settled in the North-west and Manitoba since January, 1897?

How many Galicians? How are they settled, scattered amongst other settlers or in bunches and colonies? How much per head has their incoming to Canada cost the government? Have any had to be assisted after coming to the country? If so, to what extent?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). According to the report of the immigration office at Winnipeg, the number of Doukhobors who have settled in the North-west and Manitoba since January, 1897, is 7,427, and the number of Galicians during the same period, 16,787. These people are located in colonies, some of which are small and some large, in different parts of Manitoba and the North-west Territories. The cost per head for the Doukhobors was $7.47, being bonus and a proportionate amount of cost of locating and taking care of settlers during the year 1899. The estimated cost to the government for Galician settlers for bonus and proportion of cost of taking care of and locating, was, in 1897, $4.65; 1898, $4.86; and in 1899, $4.80, an average of $4.77 per head. The records of the department show that advances were made to Galicians to the amount of $5,954.56, included in above, for which liens have been taken as security. No direct advances, over and above the bonus which was paid at Winnipeg in connection with the Doukhobors, have been authorized, although some slight assistance has been given where it was felt necessary to do so, a portion of which has been repaid. If there are any balances when the accounts are adjusted, it is proposed to make them a lien against the property of those who have received the advances.

BENNETT AND DAWSON TELEGRAPH LINE.

Mr. CLARKE (by Mr. Clancy) asked:

1. What was the total cost for constructing the government telegraph line between Bennett and Dawson?

Mr. SIFTON.

2. What was the cost of the wire, and from whom was it purchased?

3. Who supplied the insulators, and at what price?

4. How many men were actually engaged in the construction work under Overseer Charleson? What are their names, where were they engaged, and what was the rate of pay which they received?

5. Were public tenders invited for any of the supplies required? If so, for what material and from whom?

6. Were private tenders invited for any of the supplies required? If so, for what and from whom?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). I beg to reply: 1. The cost of the construction of this line is reported by the Superintendent of Construction as $146,937.99, or an average of $222.63 per mile. 2. Wire was purchased from W. G. Charleson at $2.50 per 100 lbs., and from Alexander Macpherson & Son at $2.74 per 100 lbs. 3. Insulators were supplied by the Potters' Manufacturing Association, $1,828.50, and The North-west Fixture Co., $42.50. 4. In order to prepare an answer to this question, it will be necessary to tabulate the several pay lists, which will require several days' time. 5. No. 6. Yes; for wire from W. G. Charleson, the Edward Cavanagh Co., Montreal; Lewis Bros. & Co., Montreal; J. A. Seybold & Co., Ottawa, and Alex. Macpherson & Son, Montreal. Tenders for provisions were asked from the following: McMillan & Hamilton, Vancouver; Kelly Douglas & Co., Vancouver; Braid & Co., Vancouver; W. H. Malkin & Co., Vancouver; F. R. Stewart, Vancouver; Wilson Bros., Victoria; Simon Leizer & Co., Victoria; Bate & Co., Ottawa; Eby Blain & Co., Toronto; H. P. Eckhart, Toronto; Jas. Osborne & Son, Hamilton; A. T. Gilmour & Co., Brockville; Lockerby Bros., Montreal; Hudon & Hébert, Montreal; Herritt Bros., St. John, N.B.; John Tobin & Co., Halifax; Bauld, Gibson & Co., Halifax; McKay & Powis, Winnipeg; W. K. Cunningham, Ottawa.

MR. J. B. CHARLESON'S SALARY, ETC.

Mr. CLARKE (by Mr. Clancy) asked:

What were the amounts paid to Mr. J. B. Charleson, superintendent of construction of the Bennett-Dawson telegraph line for (a) salary, (b) travelling expenses, and (c) living expenses from the day he left Ottawa on March 13 last until his return to the capital?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). I beg to reply: (a) Salary, $2,668.66; (b) travelling expenses, $762.63; (c) Mr. Charleson lived in camp with his party, and it is impossible to distinguish between his personal expenses and the general outlay.

BENNETT TO ATLIN TELEGRAPH LINE.

Mr. CLARKE (by Mr. Clancy) asked :

1. What is the estimated cost of the telegraph line from Bennett to Atlin City ?
2. When will the work of construction commence ?
3. How soon is it expected that this line will be completed ?
4. Who has charge of the work of construction, and what instructions have been given to him ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). I beg to reply : 1. Connection between Atlin City and the Bennett-Dawson telegraph line has been made by the construction of a line from Tagish to Atlin at the cost of $15,500, and the line is now in full operation.

DISTRIBUTION AND PRINTING OF POLITICAL PAMPHLETS AT SHERBROOKE.

Mr. TAYLOR (by Mr. Borden, Halifax) asked :

Was the pamphlet entitled 'The Laurier government and the Conservatives,' distributed through the electoral district of Sherbrooke during the late by-election, printed at the Government Printing Bureau ? If so, how many copies were printed thereat ? What charge per 1,000 was made for them ? Have they been paid for ? If so, by whom ? Were they or any of them put up in government envelopes in the Department of the Minister of Agriculture ? Were they or any of them franked and sent through the mail by the Minister of Agriculture ? If so, under what legal authority ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The pamphlet entitled 'The Laurier Government and the Conservatives,' distributed in the electoral district of Sherbrooke during the late by-election was not printed at the Government Bureau. It was paid for, along with the envelopes in which it was sent, by private individuals from private sources. Some were franked through the Department of Agriculture, but not by the minister, and in doing that, there was, in a slight degree and at a very far distance, followed out the precedent set by my predecessors.

REVOLVERS FOR CONTINGENTS.

Mr. POPE (by Mr. McIntosh) asked :

1. Has the government purchased any revolvers ?
2. If so, how many and for what purpose ?
3. What was the price paid for same, and (4) name of the firm or firms from whom they were purchased ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). I beg to reply : 1. Yes. Colt's revolvers. 2. 700 ; for Canadian Mounted Rifles sent to South Africa. 3. 300 at $14.50 and 400 at $15.50. 4. Messrs. Lewis Bros., Montreal.

GRAIN COMMISSION—DEATH OF JUDGE SENKLER.

Mr. LARIVIERE asked :

Will the death of Judge E. J. Senkler, chairman of the Royal Commission on the shipment and transportation of grain, prevent that commission from making a report, and is it the intention of the government to appoint another chairman, so that the commission may complete its investigation ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). It is not anticipated that the death of the chairman of the commission on the shipment and transportation of grain will prevent the completion of the work of the commission and the making of the report. It is the intention of the government to appoint another chairman.

REMOVAL OF CERTAIN JUDGES TO MONTREAL.

Mr. FAIRBAIRN (by Mr. Casey) asked :

Has the Minister of Justice received a communication from Chief Justice Lacoste respecting the removal of Judges Lynch, Tellier and Charland to Montreal ? If so, what is the nature of such communication and what action does the government contemplate ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Speaking under correction, and in the absence of the Minister of Justice, I beg to say that no such report has been received from Chief Justice Lacoste.

RECIPROCITY TREATY BETWEEN NEWFOUNDLAND AND THE DOMINION.

Mr. MARTIN (by Mr. Macdonald, King's) asked :

1. Have any proposals been made by the government for the establishment of a commercial treaty of reciprocity between Newfoundland and the Dominion of Canada ?
2. Has any such proposal been made by Newfoundland to Canada ?
3. If no such proposals have been made, is it the intention of the government to make Newfoundland an offer of reciprocal trade relations ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). There have been no proposals respecting reciprocal trade relations with Newfoundland. The general question of the relations between Canada and the British colonies is engaging the attention of the government.

ELECTRIC LIGHT ON BROTCHEES LEDGE BEACON, B.C.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

1. Has the Department of Marine and Fisheries yet obtained the cable for laying on the electric light to Brotschees Ledge Beacon, opposite Victoria, British Columbia ?
2. If not, why not ?
3. If already obtained, why is it not laid in position ?
4. Can the department state when the beacon will be in proper working order ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. No. The cable intended for the purpose offered to the department by the Department of Public Works was found to be inefficient and unfit for the purposes required, and since that was discovered, in the present state of the market, it has been found impossible to place an order for the electric cable. The cable makers refuse to accept any more orders, and especially will not look at a small order for a special make of cable. Arrangements have been made for the immediate lighting of the beacon with one of Wigham's thirty day oil lamps, and the light is now in full operation.

PACIFIC CABLE.

Mr. CASEY asked :

Has the attention of the government been called to the following paragraph, which appeared in the Toronto 'Globe' of the 6th instant:

THE PACIFIC CABLE.

There is considerable disappointment in parliamentary circles over the cabled statement that the Imperial government had no objection to the Western Australian government making an arrangement with the Eastern Extension Cable Company, whereby that company should receive a land grant in consideration of building a cable line to the colony. Some days ago Sir Sandford Fleming expressed to the 'Globe' correspondent his conviction that there was nothing in the story, but some members of parliament are apprehensive that the story may be true and that the Pacific cable scheme will be seriously injured.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Yes, the attention of the government has been called to that paragraph in the Globe newspaper.

EASTERN EXTENSION TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

Mr. CASEY asked :

Has the Imperial government signified its approval of any Australian government granting permission to the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company to open offices or to acquire any other facilities for promoting its cable business ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The government has no information of any such action being taken by the Imperial authorities. We have been making inquiries and have not received an answer.

HENRY LOGAN LOUCKS.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

Whether, at the close of January, 1898, Henry Logan Loucks, and some seven or eight others, all of or near Prince Albert, N.W.T., were hired by Capt. Gagnon, on behalf of the government, to go to Dawson to drive dogs ? 2. Whether the agreement with them was $40 a month, expenses and fares both ways ? 3. Whether those who came back to Prince Albert have been paid their fare back ? 4. If not, why not ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I beg to reply : 1. Yes. 2. Pay, $30 per month for one year with a bonus of $10 per month if service satisfactory ; also free rations and free transportation to the Yukon. 3. No. 4. The reason is that it was no part of the undertaking that the government should supply transportation for their return.

RIFLE RANGE, VICTORIA, B.C.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

1. Is it the intention of the government to provide a rifle range at Clover Point, Victoria, B.C. ?
2. If so, why is not the work proceeded with without any further delay ?
3. What amount of the sum, voted for this purpose during last session, has been expended ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. Yes, if suitable location can be found. 2. There has been a difficulty owing to the existence of a public road too near the proposed site. 3. The amount voted last session for the purchase of land for rifle ranges was $75,000. Out of this sum $2,000 only was expended on the Bedford rifle range. I may say that the vote which was taken specially for the rifle range at Victoria lapsed, and this larger vote was intended to cover the expenditure that might be necessary there.

COTE ST. LUC RIFLE RANGE.

Mr. MONK (by Mr. Prior) asked :

1. When was the Cote St. Luc rifle range closed by the Militia Department ?
2. Has the Militia Department selected a new rifle range in the vicinity of the city of Montreal, and if so, where is the proposed rifle range situate ?
3. When will the new rifle range be open and ready for use ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. It was closed on the 31st August, 1898. 2. The matter is under consideration. Several sites are proposed. A decision will soon be made. 3. It is expected that the new rifle range will be opened early in the summer.

BLANKETS FOR TROOPS IN SOUTH AFRICA.

Mr. BERGERON asked :

1. Has the government bought blankets for the soldiers who left for South Africa ?
2. If so, from whom were such blankets bought ?
3. What was the amount of money paid for such blankets ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. No; they were issued from the supply in stores. This covers questions 2 and 3.

THE MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS AND THE FOX BAY SETTLERS.

Mr. TAYLOR (by Mr. Clancy) asked :

Did the president of the Montreal conference of the Methodist Church in Canada write a letter to the Hon. J. Israel Tarte, Minister of Public Works, or did the missionary committee of the said church, appointed to inquire into the grievances of the Fox Bay settlers on the Island of Anticosti, pass a resolution, and send a copy of the same to the said Hon. J. Israel Tarte, demanding a public retraction and apology of the following statement made by him in this House on the 28th day of March, 1899, and recorded at page 575 of the 'Hansard' of 1899, as follows:—'Everybody who lives in the province of Quebec knows that nearly all those who live on that island are professional wreckers, people who deceive the captain of the ship in order that the vessel might be wrecked, that they might steal everything that is on board.' If so, has the Hon. Mr. Tarte made the apology? If not, is it his intention to do so?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). Although I do not see very clearly what the hon. gentleman has to do with this matter, which is personal to me, I take great pleasure in saying that whatever misunderstanding may have existed as to the words I have uttered in the House in reference to the Fox Bay settlers, I have reason to hope has been explained away. Statements that have been lately put before me have convinced me that I have been unwillingly unjust towards the Fox Bay settlers, and I have written to that effect to their representatives.

NORTH-WEST FARMERS AND AUSTRALIAN COMPETITION.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

1. Whether the attention of the government has been called to the fact that the steamship 'Mlowera' recently arrived at Vancouver from Australia with 1,840 carcasses of frozen mutton for British Columbia? 2. Whether the company owners of this ship receive an annual subvention of $120,000 from the Dominion government? 3. Was not the bonus to the Crow's Nest Pass Railway supported on the ground that the mining population of British Columbia would be fed from the farms of the North-west Territories? 4. Whether the principal exports to Australia from Canada do not consist of machinery, mostly agricultural implements? 5. Whether a rebate has been given to any manufacturers of agricultural implements in the iron and steel used in the manufacture of the implements exported to Australia? If so, how much? 6. Whether the government intends to protect the North-west farmers from competition of Australian mutton? If not, why not?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). 1. No. 2. The company running this steamer receive, under a contract entered into in 1893, the amount of the subsidy mentioned. 3. The vote for the Crow's Nest Pass railway subsidy was an unanimous one. No doubt the reason suggested by the hon. member (Mr. Davin) was one of the reasons that had weight with the members in favour of the construction of the road. The fact that the desired result has been in a large measure attained is a source of gratification. 4. The total exports of Canadian produce from Canada to Australia for the fiscal year 1898-9, amounted to $1,498,344. Of this amount $589,802 represents the value of agricultural implements exported. 5. A drawback of 99 per cent of the duty paid on imported iron and steel used and wrought into certain agricultural implements exported from Canada to Australia has been allowed under regulations prescribed by Order in Council under date November 2, 1894. 6. The government has no reason to believe that the farmers of the North-west are suffering from competition from Australia, but, on the contrary, believe that these farmers are finding good markets for their products.

YUKON—MR. JOSEPH ENO GIROUARD.

Mr. BERGERON asked :

1. When was Joseph Eno Girouard appointed to a public position in the Yukon?
2. Was he appointed by Order in Council?
3. If so, at what date?
4. What was his position?
5. What was his salary?
6. Is he still employed and paid by the Federal government?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Mr. Joseph Eno Girouard was appointed to the position of registrar of the Yukon Territory by Order in Council, dated the 3rd August, 1898, with a salary of $2,000 per annum. He is still employed and paid by the Federal government.

PARADE GROUNDS AND DRILL SHED, ST. THOMAS, ONT.

Mr. INGRAM (by Mr. Davin) asked :

1. Have the government purchased the military parade grounds at St. Thomas, Ont., owned by J. H. Wilson, M.D., ex-M.P.?
2. If so, what was the price paid?
3. Did the military authorities here or elsewhere rent the drill shed at St. Thomas for the purpose of having a skating rink therein?
4. If so, what is the amount of rent to be paid, and to whom rented?
5. Who made application to rent the drill shed from the party or parties who rented it or gave authority to parties to use it?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. No. 2. Answered by No. 1. 3. Yes. 4. The rent to be paid was $100 for the skating season. Rented to Thomas Cross and J. Baker. 5. The above tenants.

LAND SUBSIDIES TO THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. RICHARDSON (by Mr. Landerkin) asked :

1. How much land has been voted by the Dominion parliament to the Canadian Pacific Railway as a subsidy in connection with the construction of the company's main line and branch lines (the Manitoba South-western and Glenboro roads being included in the branches)?
2. What proportion of the land subsidies so voted has been allotted by the government?

3. At what dates were the several allotments made ?

4. Were the allotments made by the government and the lands set apart for the uses of the company immediately or shortly after the lands were selected by the company ? If not, what periods were allowed to elapse between the selection and the allotment of the various land subsidies or portions thereof ?

5. For what proportion of the land subsidies earned by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have patents been issued by the Crown ?

6. Under the terms of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's charter from the government, when will the first allotment of land made to the company by the government become amenable to taxation for school and municipal purposes ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. The original land subsidy to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company on account of its main line was 25,000,000 acres, but it was subsequently reduced to 18,206,986 acres. The land subsidy on account of branches, including the branches named in the question, amounted to 2,983,680 acres, making a total of 21,190,666 acres of land for the main line and branches. 2. 3. and 4. It is not possible to give categorical answers to the 2nd, 3rd and 4th questions, on account of the way in which the questions are framed, but the following information appears to cover the points sought to be brought out by the questions. The railway company indicated between 1881 and 1891 the tracts or belts within which it agreed to select 14,644,871 acres on account of the land subsidy in connection with the main line. In February, 1891, the company agreed to select from the lands reserved for the purpose along the international boundary 1,000,000 acres of the land subsidy in connection with the branch known as the Manitoba and South-western Colonization Railway. The company has selected the lands to which it is entitled on account of what is known as the Pipestone branch. Nothing has been done in the direction of selecting the lands to which the company is entitled on account of the Glenboro, or as it is known in the department, the Souris branch. The government from time to time as the land grant was earned set apart tracts of land out of which the selection was to be made. A question was raised as to whether or not the land comprised in the tracts so set apart was 'fairly fit for settlement,' and this question of the selection of the balance of the land subsidy is still the subject of correspondence between the department and the company. 5. Up to the end of January last patents had issued covering an area of 1,649,880 acres. 6. This is a matter of legal opinion, which, if disputed, can only be settled by a judicial decision.

GARNOT AND LOUIS RIEL.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

Whether Garnot, formerly associated with Louis Riel, has been taken into the employ of the government ? If so, what position does he hold, at what salary, and why has he been employed ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). In reply to the hon. gentleman I beg to say, no. The man Garnot has not been taken into the employ of the government.

J. B. CHARLESON.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

1. Is it true that J. B. Charleson lately left for British Columbia, taking with him some twenty-five men, more or less, to work on the construction of a telegraph line from Bennett to Atlin ?

2. If so, did these men defray their own travelling expenses, or were they paid by the government ?

3. What wages per diem are these men paid by the government ?

4. Are their wages exclusive or inclusive of board ?

5. What are the names of the men who went out with J. B. Charleson, or were sent out by him ?

6. Why were British Columbians not given the opportunity to take these jobs instead of men being sent from the east ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). 1. Mr. Charleson has left for the Yukon. He has charge of constructing, not the Bennett-Atlin, but the Quesnelle-Atlin telegraph line. He has taken with him 23 men for that telegraph construction. 2. Paid by the government. 3. The pay of these men is to be settled by Mr. Charleson, according to the importance of the labour done by them, and their location on the field of operation. 4. Exclusive of board. 5. Caliste Clément, Healy, Sullivan, Ranson, C. J. Jones, Félix Hudon, John F. Phelan, James Mooney, Semple, J. A. Lafortune, Murphy, J. Tassé, A. Larose, McLaughlin, McLaughlin, L. Picard, Tel. Gorrell, O'Connor, O'Neill, Forest, C. Rogers, C. Lacroix, White. 6. These 23 men are a nucleus of skilled workmen, some having already worked on the Dawson line. When the force is to be completed, the men to be employed will be engaged either in British Columbia or any other available point where required.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—ACCOMMODATION AT SYDNEY.

Mr. GILLIES asked :

1. Is the government aware that great dissatisfaction exists in the town of Sydney and the southern parts of the county of Cape Breton, as well as among the travelling public generally, at the express train to and from the west to Sydney running in and out twice every day from the junction to North Sydney, a distance of some six miles ?

2. Have representations been made to the government against this condition of matters, and has the Railway Department been requested to discontinue the present arrangement of running the whole train into and out from North Sydney twice every day, thereby subjecting the travelling public to much inconvenience, annoyance and delay?

3. Does the department contemplate changing the present arrangements so as to allow the express train to and from the terminus at Sydney to run direct, and thereby avoid the present delay and inconvenience of running in and out from the junction to North Sydney? If so, when will the change be made?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. Yes, the government is aware that some dissatisfaction exists at Sydney for the reason mentioned in this question, but there would probably be equal dissatisfaction on the part of the people of North Sydney if the present or some similar arrangement were not continued. 2 and 3. Upon examining the second and third questions carefully, the hon. gentleman will see that I cannot be expected to answer the same. I am asked to subscribe to the statement that the travelling public are now being subject to annoyance and delay, an admission which I cannot possibly make. Such is not the case.

SUPERINTENDENT PERRY.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

Did Supt. Perry volunteer for service in South Africa? If so, why was his offer not accepted?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I may say to my hon. friend that Inspector Perry has volunteered his services to South Africa. His offer was not accepted for the reason that the force having already been depleted of many of its best officers and men, the government deemed it would be inexpedient further to deplete the force by parting with the services of so valuable an officer as Superintendent Perry.

J. H. ROSS, M. L. A.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

Were the expenses of Mr. James H. Ross, M.L.A., Minister of Public Works in the Northwest Territories government, when acting as Indian Commissioner, provided for at so much a day, or was he entitled only to his actual expenses?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Only the actual expenses of Mr. Ross were allowed.

GRAND TRUNK TARIFF ON OIL.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

1. Whether Mr. F. Stanton showed before the Railway Committee that the Grand Trunk tariff of the date of December 26, 1898, for freighting oil between Buffalo and Black Rock and Montreal was 36 cents per 100 pounds, and between Sarnia and Montreal 25 cents per 100 pounds?

2. Was this tariff sanctioned by the Governor in Council? If not, is it illegal? If illegal, what steps have the government taken in the premises?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). At a recent hearing before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, Mr. Stanton produced two tariff sheets apparently issued by the Grand Trunk Railway, one purporting to give the tariff between the points named on illuminating oil and another on gas oil, and alleged that these tariffs were not covered or authorized by any tariff approved by the Governor in Council. The hearing was postponed at the request of Mr. Stanton, and will be resumed, but no definite conclusion was arrived at, nor can any further reply be made to the question at present.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER ROTHWELL.

Mr. McINNES asked :

1. Did the government transmit to the British Columbia government or communicate with them regarding the reports of Commissioner Rothwell on the claims of certain settlers upon lands within the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway land belt on Vancouver Island? If so, how often, and when?

2. What reply, if any, has been received from the government of British Columbia?

3. Has the government of British Columbia taken any exception to the finding of Commissioner Rothwell, or proposed to the government any method of settling the said claims?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. Yes. On the 28th November, 1898. 2. No reply has been received. 3. This government has not been made aware that any exception has been taken by the government of British Columbia to the findings of Commissioner Rothwell; and no proposal has been made by the provincial government as to the settling of the claims which formed the subject of Mr. Rothwell's inquiry.

INSPECTION OF UNITED STATES STEAMERS.

Mr. WILSON asked :

Is it true that in future United States steamers carrying passengers to or from any port in the province of Ontario shall be exempted from steamboat inspection, tonnage dues, and also from steamboat inspection fees?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Yes. In 1884 an arrangement was made with the United States government by which steamships of the Dominion arriving at ports in the United States from a port in Ontario would be exempt from tonnage or light dues or other equivalent tax in consideration of similar exemption in favour of United States vessels arriving at ports in Ontario.

Mr. WILSON. Why?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not know why the arrangement was not different from what it was. I am telling the hon. gentleman what the arrangement in 1884 was.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Was it under Order in Council?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I assume so.

Mr. FOSTER. That does not seem to be an answer to the question: Is it true that in future United States steamers will be exempted?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. In future, as in the past, of course. I said this in answer to the first question.

GENERAL SERVICE MEDALS.

Mr. CLARKE (by Mr. Clancy) asked:

1. Have the terms and conditions under which the long service decoration and medal are to be issued been sent from the Militia Department to the Imperial authorities in London?

2. If so, what are said terms and conditions?

3. Does Canada possess a national colour, and if so (4), will such colour be incorporated in the ribbon for the decoration and medal above-named?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. No. But they have been prepared and will be forwarded at once. 2. They will be published after approval by the War Office. 3. I am informed by Major Rivers of the Medals' Claim Board that there is no national Canadian colour, but if one is chosen such colour will be incorporated, I presume, in the ribbon or the decoration medal.

W. H. BAILEY.

Mr. PRIOR asked:

1. Is one W. H. Bailey still in the employ of the Post Office Department, or Public Works Department, in Victoria, B.C.?

2. If not, when did he cease to be in such employ, and what was his position?

3. Did he leave of his own accord or was he dismissed?

4. If dismissed, what was the cause of his dismissal?

5. Has any one been appointed in his place; if so, whom, and at whose recommendation?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). 1. No longer in the employ of Department of Public Works. 2. Since 1st March, 1899. Caretaker of the old post office building. 3. His services were dispensed with. 4. Being no longer required. 5. No one appointed in his place by the department.

ST. VINCENT DE PAUL PENITENTIARY—RELEASE OF ONE VANDAL.

Mr. M. J. F. QUINN (Montreal, St. Ann's) moved for:

Copies of all petitions and other documents in the possession of the Minister of Justice concerning the release of one Vandal from the St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary.
Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I have to ask my hon. friend (Mr. Quinn) not to persist in this motion. I am informed by the Minister of Justice that all the documents concerning this matter are confidential, but I am asked by the Minister of Justice to say to my hon. friend, that if he will call at the office, the minister will be very happy to put everything at his disposal for his own perusal.

Motion withdrawn.

FREIGHT CARRIED BY SS. STANLEY AND SS. MINTO.

Mr. A. C. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) moved for:

Return showing the amount of freight in tons, barrels or other convenient form discharged and taken on board the winter SS. 'Stanley' at Georgetown, P.E.I., during the current years 1895, 1896, 1897 and 1898, and for the year 1899 in SS. 'Stanley' and 'Minto,' and to February 1, 1900. Also amount of freight collected thereon per month, and amount paid per month for labour in connection therewith, apart from the crews of said steamships.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am informed by my hon. colleague (Sir Louis Davies) that there is no objection to this motion, but that it must take a very long time, perhaps several months before these reports are completed.

SALARIES OF COUNTY COURT JUDGES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER moved for:

Copies of all despatches, papers and correspondence respecting the salaries of county court judges in the province of British Columbia, not already brought down.

He said: Though some correspondence has already been brought down, I do not think we are in possession of the complete papers in regard to this matter, and though the terms of the motion would seem to relate only to the province of British Columbia, it covers a very important question, in regard to the responsibility of the federal government respecting any arrangements made for supplementing the salaries of the judges appointed by the federal authorities. There seems to be no difference in the opinion held by the present Minister of Justice and the judges in the province of British Columbia in regard to important facts connected with their appointment and the fixing of their salaries. Let me remind the Prime Minister of the facts of this case. Some of the British Columbia judges were about to be appointed, and the salaries then paid by the federal government amounted to about $2,000 a year for the first three years, and $2,400 afterwards. Correspondence took place between the government of British Columbia and the federal government, in the course of which the provincial government pointed out that the county court judges in that province had in some respects much wider and higher jurisdiction than similar judges in some of the other provinces, and that competent men could not be obtained in British Columbia for the salaries that prevailed in the eastern provinces. The long and the short of it was that the federal government agreed to make the initial salary $2,400, and the provincial government, by appointing those judges stipendiary magistrates for the whole province, voted them $500 a year additional, thus making their salaries $2,900, and the judges were appointed. Some of these judges—two, at any rate—held their positions under that arrangement, and for several years they had left their practice at the bar. Suddenly and without any notice whatever, the attorney-general of the province (Mr. Martin) wrote to each of the judges—according to papers brought down already to this House—the following letter, in October last :

Sir,—The salary paid by the provincial government will be discontinued after November 30.

I wish to call the attention of the government to one or two passages in the report of the Minister of Justice, which has been laid on the Table of the House. The Minister of Justice is now dealing with the position put before this government by the local government when the county court judges appealed to the federal government to protect them from interference with their vested rights in regard to this increase in their emoluments. He says :

If in the opinion of the present provincial government competent judges for the county courts may now be secured at a salary of $2,400, this remark of the Attorney General may hold so far as the future is concerned, but as to the present judges good faith requires that the payment should be continued. They accepted office upon the assurance that they would receive an allowance of $500 per annum from the province, in addition to the salary paid by the Dominion, and as it appears in the opinion of the provincial government of the time it was necessary to give that assurance in order to obtain competent men for the office.

Further on, the report of the present Minister of Justice says :

While the judges would doubtless be satisfied to have their previous salary maintained from whatever source the moneys were paid, it is clear from the correspondence to which they refer that the obligation does not rest with Your Excellency to supply the allowance which is being withheld by the province.

From the correspondence before us it would seem that the federal government extend to the judges their sympathy and their concurrence in the view that they have not been treated in good faith ; but they put the burden on the local authorities. It is quite clear, if this state of the facts be correct, that there has been a breach of faith on the part of the local government, and this government is not morally responsible for anything that has happened. That, I do not think, can be disputed. But my point is, apart from the particular individuals who hold those judicial appointments, that the government here should take a far broader view of the position. If they have failed to induce the provincial government to continue that annual vote of $500, and for this reason, that these judges are after all federal judges, the appointees of the federal government, and the government here was indirectly responsible for the arrangement which induced those gentlemen to occupy their judicial positions ; and if they are fit for the positions and fit to continue as judges, when an arrangement of that kind—which I am glad to say does not continue in any of the other provinces, so far as I am aware—falls through, it seems to me, after a full review of all the facts and circumstances, that it is too small a position for this government to take, that because there has been a misunderstanding if not worse, on the part of the other party to the bargain, the provincial government, these outside parties can receive no redress. It seems to me, not pressing the matter too far, to say that, under these circumstances, the federal government should step in and supplement these salaries on the expectation that was held out to these men when they received their commissions from the federal government, and settle as best they can the matter with the local government. Apropos of that, there is a precedent, though not one on all fours with this case. The Prime Minister will remember that some years ago, when Sir John Macdonald was leading the government, there arose a feeling in the province of Ontario on the part of the bar that the judges of the Appeal Court were not being paid a sufficient stipend by the federal authorities ; and to strengthen that court and maintain its dignity, the local House voted $1,000 additional salary to each of the judges. After some official or semi-official correspondence between the Department of Justice and Sir Oliver Mowat, who was then Attorney General of the province, the federal government took the whole matter over, the local authorities abstaining from voting the $1,000, and it was recognized that the case made out for the court of appeal was a good one, and that the whole salary ought to be paid by the appointing power. I make this motion for the papers at this time so that we may have the whole case before parliament, and particularly in order that the government may have it before their minds before completing the estimates to be laid before the House.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The question which has been brought by my hon. friend to the attention of the House is one of some importance—not so much, perhaps, in respect to the money consideration involved as in respect to the importance of our preserving understandings, so far as we can, and keeping good faith with all public servants. The views of the government, as my hon. friend is aware, have been embodied in the Minute of Council passed upon the report of the Minister of Justice from which my hon. friend has just quoted. The government deeply regret the attitude taken on this matter by the government of British Columbia; but they have no control over that government, who acted within their powers in doing as they did. Whether they acted judiciously or not is a matter more for the people of British Columbia than for us. So far as we are concerned, my hon. friend rather suggests that we should, by a vote of this House, make up the proportion of the salary of the judges which has been taken away from them by the action of the government of British Columbia. There is this difficulty. When these members of the bench were appointed, some twenty years ago or more, parliament did not think it advisable to give them more than the salary of $2,400 a year. It was felt, however, that in view of the remoteness of British Columbia at that time, and the higher cost of living there than in the eastern provinces, that the salary was scarcely adequate; and yet, with these facts in view, parliament did not deem it proper to give them more than $2,400 a year. But parliament depended on the action, subsequently taken by the provincial government, that this salary would be supplemented by their giving the judges additional jurisdiction involving additional salary. The understanding which was arrived at, tacitly or openly, between the two governments at that time was carried out; but after the lapse of twenty years or more, the provincial government has deemed it advisable, for reasons upon which I shall not pass any judgment, to do away with that part of the understanding, and to take from the judges the $500 additional salary which had been voted to them for the additional duties which had been laid upon them by the legislature. Now, the question is whether or not it would be advisable for the federal parliament to do in the year 1900 what it refused to do at the outset, and to give to the judges of British Columbia the salary which parliament at the time they were appointed refused to them. It is a question that is not free from difficulty, as my hon. friend will see. I can assure my hon. friend, so far as my own wishes and the wishes of the Minister of Justice are concerned, we would be glad to be able to carry out in its entirety the understanding which was come to at the outset. The question is one which the government is not, perhaps, primarily, to decide. I know that at this moment the attention of the Minister of Justice is engaged on the matter, but further than this I cannot say at present.

Mr. E. G. PRIOR (Victoria, B.C.). The matter which the member for Pictou has brought up is one which I think the right hon. gentleman must see is of great consequence to men holding high and responsible positions in the province of British Columbia. There evidently has been a breach of faith by the provincial government in failing to fulfil promises made to these judges. As far as I know they are paid less for the work they do than similar judges in Ontario and the maritime provinces. I am given to understand that gentlemen holding similar positions in the maritime provinces and Ontario are paid as high as $3,000 a year, besides being allowed to accept fees. The county court judges in British Columbia do not get any fees whatever, and their maximum salary, when they had the $500 allowed them by the provincial government, was only $2,900 per year. The right hon. gentleman has told us that some twenty years ago it was thought advisable to make their salaries $2,400 per year on account of the higher cost of living in British Columbia. I do not know that the cost of living there is quite as high now as it was twenty years ago, but it is still more expensive than in the maritime provinces or Ontario. Besides, the work which these judges do has increased four or five-fold since they were first appointed. These gentlemen left good practices, which, if they had retained, instead of accepting their present positions, would no doubt have given them much greater remuneration than they can ever look to in their present position. I think the matter well worthy the consideration of the government. I have the greatest possible sympathy not only for the county court judges but also for the Supreme Court judges who are, in my opinion, and in that of a great many in British Columbia, underpaid. Why should not the judges in British Columbia get just as much as they do in Ontario? They have to deal with a large number of cases, involving very heavy amounts, mining and land cases, they have to work night and day, and they are men who, in point of ability and in every other respect, will compare favourably, I think, with any other judges in Canada. I am informed that the provincial government in British Columbia is now taking some action looking towards the raising of the salaries of these judges, and I hope that the right hon. gentleman and his cabinet will also give that question every consideration.

Motion agreed to.

GRANTS OF SCRIP TO HALF-BREEDS.

Mr. N. F. DAVIN (West Assiniboia) moved :

That it was wise and just of Canadian governments in the past to recognize the agrarian claims of the Indians of Canada;

That this statesmanlike policy of justice to the Indian has been attended with advantages to peace and progress;

That departure from it would be a retrograde step and certain to entail regrettable consequences;

That no feature of the Indian policy of Canada is juster or more incumbent on the ministry of the hour to observe than that which provides that in the case of half-breeds who do not take treaty money and live on a reserve, the agrarian title in them, which comes from their Indian blood, shall be recognized and compounded with by grant of land;

That once it has been adopted as policy that, the half-breeds preferring it, scrip entitling the holder to the amount of land considered sufficient as a grant, may be given instead of the land itself, it is the bounden duty of the government not to withhold scrip from such of our half-breed fellow-citizens as are entitled thereto, for it is no gratuity, but a just payment, and it being not only possible, but probable, and even certain, that delay in discharging the country's obligation to this class of our citizens, many of whom are poor, may result in loss to them and render some of them the victims of designing knaves, and, constructively, the government a party to a cruel and repulsive pillage of simple and almost defenceless persons.

He said : This motion is one arising out of the Act we passed last year, and in passing of which we discussed the merits of giving scrip to the half-breeds. It will be remembered that some hon. members took the view that what should be done was to give land to the half-breeds ; but the hon. Minister of the Interior assured us that the half-breeds would not have been satisfied with that, and would not have been satisfied unless they received scrip, and he further told us that the policy of the government was to give scrip to children born before 1885, and to treat the half-breeds in the same way as the Manitoba half-breeds were treated in 1870, and on the same principle. You will find in Hansard, page 4,894 of volume 2, 1899, that the hon. Minister of the Interior spoke as follows :

The law at present only enables the government to give scrip on the basis of the half-breeds who were entitled to it on April 15, 1870, and was passed for the purpose of applying to the half-breeds in the immediate neighbourhood of Red River. Of course, that date has no application whatever to the Athabasca district, and we purpose taking power to deal with this question on the basis of giving to the half-breeds scrip up to the time they are dealt with. The same amendment would enable us to deal with the disputed cases in the North-west Territories, and to give scrip to half-breeds there who have been, since the settlement of 1885, urging that they should be dealt with upon the same principle as that on which we now propose to deal with the half-breeds of Athabasca district.

It will be remembered that I supported the policy of the government in that respect, and the hon. gentleman will further remember that years ago in this House I contended that that was the true policy, and that the half-breeds in the North-west Territories should be dealt with on precisely the same principle as the Manitoba half-breeds were in 1870, and that the giving of scrip to the half-breeds around Saskatchewan and elsewhere in the territory in 1885 could not extinguish the title in their children who had been born before that time. Therefore I contended that the proper thing was to do what the Minister of the Interior announced in that speech last year as the intention of the government. Again, on page 4,895 of the same Hansard, the hon. minister said :

What I mean is this. The hon. gentleman is aware of the fact that since scrip was issued to the half-breeds immediately after the rebellion in 1885, there was a large number of half-breeds there who claim that, as the children born between 1870 and 1885, of the half-breeds who were dealt with in 1885, they should receive scrip as well as their parents, and that is what the government propose to recognize by taking the authority referred to in the Bill.

And in October last, the commissioners, authorized by this government to deal with the matter, advertised that they would deal with it immediately and would extinguish the Indian title in those children. The half-breeds in the Saskatchewan around Prince Albert and Battleford and Wood Mountain and around Edmonton were in consequence led to believe that they would be dealt with forthwith. Of course they should have been dealt with forthwith. The commission was up there and it is impossible to find any good ground why they were not dealt with. Last year there was a promise of a very good harvest and consequently those half-breeds who expected that good harvest let out a little, but the harvest did not turn out what they expected.

The consequence is that there is a good deal of distress now. And the delay of the government in settling with these people—a delay contrary to what was held out to them and to the advertisement circulated—has been made use of by speculators. Of course, as the half-breeds were not in possession of the scrip, and were, therefore, in the position of selling a future title, they could not make as good a bargain as if they had had the scrip in their hands. To my knowledge, on the line of railway, the delay of the government in dealing with this matter has been made use of by speculators to the great disadvantage of the half-breeds who are entitled to scrip. I have just read from the speech of the Minister of the Interior last year his positive statement that the policy of the government is to give scrip to the children born between 1870 and 1885 and whose Indian title has not been extinguished by previous settlement. I read this before the Minister of the Interior came in, and I had better refer to the page—

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) need not take the trouble to prove that. That was announced as the policy of the government, and it is the intention to carry it out.

Mr. DAVIN. Then, at page 6,401, the minister says :

After the rebellion of 1885 a commission was sent up there and gave these half-breeds this scrip, but they always claimed, and I think with justice, that they should have been dealt with on the basis of a settlement in 1885, so that their children, born up to 1885, should have scrip issued to them.

I am quoting from the minister's speech—

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. There is no dispute about that; the hon. gentleman need not take the trouble to prove it.

Mr. DAVIN. I am glad to hear that. Indeed, there can be no dispute, because the minister is three times pledged on the floor of this House to do that. Well, Sir, the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis), two days after he saw that I had put this motion on the paper, placed a motion on the paper as follows :—

That, in the opinion of this House, scrip should be granted to all half-breed children born in the North-west Territories prior to 1885.

Thus he asks this House to endorse a proposition in regard to which the Minister of the Interior tells us that there is no dispute whatever, and which the government state, through the Minister of the Interior, was the fixed policy of the government last year. Why, Sir, it was the act of a farceur. I have in my hand a letter written by a prominent man in the Prince Albert district, which is dated 26th January and addressed to myself. It is as follows :—

January 26.

Dear Sir,—I am taking the liberty of writing to you about the way the present government are acting with regard to the payment of half-breed scrip in the Saskatchewan.

Before going further, I may say that for the last forty-six years I have been dealing with the Indians and half-breeds all over the country, and I am well acquainted with both them and their way of looking at things.

Now, take the way they have dealt with them. The Manitoba half-breeds were settled with long ago. Last summer they settled with the ones in the north, and up to now nothing has been done in the Saskatchewan, except that the commissioners advertised that they would settle with them last October. It is a well known fact that all the grain was frozen in the Saskatchewan last summer, and as nearly all the half-breeds have very small farms, they were consequently ruined. Had scrip been issued last fall, as promised, it would have been a God-send for them. Failing that, these poor people had to part with most, and, in some cases, with all, of their cattle to meet their debts and live. As the crops promised to be the largest ever known, they naturally took larger debts than they would otherwise have done. Some people say, Look at the great increase of cattle shipped out this season as a sign of prosperity, whereas it is the very proof of the poverty of the poorer classes that more cows than any other kind have been sold, and sold principally by the half-breeds.

Another thing to look at is the great dissatisfaction among most of the Indian reserves, caused by the dismissal of the Indian agents, who had experience and knew the Indian character, and replacing them by men who hardly know what an Indian is, and whose only commendation is that their votes can be bought by a paying position.

Indians, half-breeds and whites all know that great numbers of the North-west Mounted Police have gone to South Africa, and that they have not been replaced—report says will not be.

I am glad to say that, in answer to inquiries and motions of mine, we have the assurance of the Prime Minister that the force will be brought up to an efficient level.

Now, it seems strange that the government are taking away as fast as they can all means of protection from the country, and they are doing all they can to disgust and irritate the Indian and half-breed population. If trouble comes, and come it will if this goes on, and the police force are reduced, they will be to blame for the whole thing.

Now, the longer the scrip is kept from the half-breeds, the harder they will be pressed, and the better it will be for the speculators. Report has it, and I think with good reason, that our present Liberal member has been doing a good business all winter in scrip, i.e., making bargains with the half-breeds to hand him over the scrip for $80 or $90 when it is issued, and he makes them some small advance on it. Is this all the scrip is worth, and is it right?

I think if you showed up the real reasons for and against having the scrip given out soon, that the government would have to do it and not hold it off too long.

Hoping that I have been able to give you some useful pointer,

I ever remain, yours truly,

The gentleman who writes this is well known, but it is unnecessary to give his name. Now, what could be the reason for not dealing with the half-breeds last year? The government advertised that they would deal with them last October. But then came the time when they began to doubt whether they could go to the country or not; and dealing with the half-breeds was put off, so that when they are dealt with, it may be on the eve of a general election, hoping that thus dealing with them will give the government a pull. But, Sir, the half-breeds are intelligent men, many of them clever men; and they are far too clever, now that this conduct on the part of the government has been exposed, to be taken in by a dodge for which they are made to pay. I venture to say that, when it is seen that the government is delaying dealing with them and postponing a settlement that should have been made last August, the result will be that the half-breed will feel that he has been mulcted out of an amount that he might otherwise have had, and so, what was meant as a weapon of offence will turn out to be a boomerang.

Mr. DAVIS. I am very much pleased—

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Perhaps my hon. friend from Saskatchewan will allow me to say a few words now. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friend from Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) who has just risen to his feet, is much more conversant with the general question in relation to scrip than, perhaps, any other member of the House. The claims of these people to the issue of scrip existed from the year 1885 to the present time, and from 1885 until the time when the legislation of last session upon the subject was introduced, these claims were vainly pressed upon the government which the hon. gentleman from West Assiniboia supported, and the era of justice in regard to them was only ushered in when a change of government took place in 1896. Legislation having been pressed upon our attention from time to time, a Bill was introduced at the last session of parliament, which authorized the government to deal with this question, and at the same time with a similar question which existed in regard to the unceded territory north of the organized portion of the North-west Territories. The session of parliament at which we obtained the necessary legislation to deal with this question, adjourned on the 11th day of August last, and at that time the half-breed commission was in the far north dealing with the question of the half-breeds in that territory. The commission returned late in the fall, and had in the meantime, while they were away, dealt with the questions of the half-breeds of the far north in the unceded territory, leaving still to be dealt with the half-breeds of the organized territory who had claims which had remained since 1885 without being dealt with. It is my intention immediately to proceed with the work of settling the claims of the half-breeds in the organized portions of the North-west Territories, to whom the hon. gentleman refers. I say without any hesitation that there has been no improper delay in connection with that question at all. When we received the legislation at the session of parliament which was adjourned on the 11th of August last, our commission was then in the field dealing with a large and important portion of this question. A large and important portion of the question has been satisfactorily dealt with and disposed of. I have only been waiting until I might receive further information in regard to some phases of the question which it will be somewhat difficult to deal with and to settle, before issuing instructions to the commissioners to go to the North-west and finally settle the question of these particular half-breeds to which the hon. gentleman has referred. I expect these matters will be settled in the course of a few days, and I have no doubt the commissioners will be in the field in the course of a month or, perhaps, two months, and the half-breeds will be enumerated and the question will finally be set at rest. I think under all the circumstances that the method in which the government will have dealt with the question will compare very favourably with the method in which it was dealt with by their predecessors in office.

Mr. T. O. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). I am very glad that the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has seen fit to take the half-breed population of the North-west Territories under his wing on this occasion. I may say that this question has been before the country for a great many years, not only previous to, but since the rebellion of 1885, and from that time, somewhere about 1886, until the present time, this question has been before the country. An agitation was going on in the North-west Territories, and, I believe, resolutions have been passed by the assembly in the North-west Territories in favour of getting scrip for the half-breeds of the North-west Territories; but up to the present time I never heard of the hon. member for West Assiniboia taking a very lively interest in trying to get these claims of the half-breeds settled. Now, Sir, when he knows that legislation has been enacted here allowing the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) to deal with this question, when he knows that in a certain portion of the country this question has already been settled with the Indians, and when he knows that it is the intention of the government to treat with the half-breeds in the older portions of the Territories, now he comes down with a resolution for the purpose, doubtless, of trying to make a little cheap political capital for himself. I cannot see any other reason for his making this motion. He alludes to a motion that I have on the Order paper declaring that all children born previous to 1885 in the North-west Territories should be entitled to scrip. Now, it is very evident to me and must be evident to this House that the hon. gentleman does not know what he is talking about when he speaks of that motion. I will briefly place before the House how the matter stands. It is a well-known fact that in 1878, when the half-breeds were treated in the province of Manitoba, the government went into the Territories and treated with the Indians of the North-west Territories, but they failed to treat with the half-breeds of those Territories at that time. They treated with the half-breeds in Manitoba and gave scrip to all children born before the date of the treaty, and they stopped at that. In the Territories there were a large number of half-breeds that had never participated in this grant, and they were agitating from time to time to have the government recognize their claim. The agitation went on, as the hon. member well knows, for several years until it ended in the unhappy rebellion of 1885. He knows that if the government of which he was a supporter had taken this matter up and dealt with it in the same manner and spirit in which my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior has done, there never would have been a rebellion in the North-west Territories in 1885, and this country would have been saved not only the loss of the blood of its sons but of millions of treasure. The government of the day did not take the matter up; they pigeon-holed the petitions of the half-breeds of the North-west Territories, they paid no attention to their letters or anything of the kind, and at last a rebellion broke out. After the rebellion broke out and almost before the sound of the last gun had died away, a commission was sent up by the hon. gentlemen who were then controlling the business of the country to treat with the half-breeds. This was after the rebellion was over. Had they sent up that commission one month before the rebellion took place, there would never have been any rebellion at all. How did they propose, when they came to settle with the half-breeds? Here were a lot of people who had been living in the North-west Territories for years, who had an interest in the soil, who had raised families in the Territories, and whose families had just as much interest in the soil of the North-west Territories as they had, and the commission said: We are going to give scrip to the heads of families, but we are not going to recognize the children at all. It seems to me that if the parents were entitled to scrip their children were also entitled to scrip. But these gentlemen did not concede that they had such a right, and they refused to grant scrip to the children of half-breeds born up to 1885 in the North-west Territories. This question was made an issue in every election in the North-west Territories. I do not know about the hon. member for West Assiniboia; I was not in West Assiniboia at the time to listen to his melodious voice, but no doubt he was making the same statements as the hon. gentleman who then represented Saskatchewan. Years rolled on, time went by, and we heard nothing more about that; we never saw a motion put on the Notice paper by the then hon. member for Saskatchewan, or the hon. member for West Assiniboia, calling upon the government to do justice to these half-breeds. Time went on; this government came into power, and the first thing they did was to take this matter up and to deal with it in a manner satisfactory to the half-breeds. The hon. member for West Assiniboia comes forward with the object of making a little cheap political capital in an effort to make the half-breeds believe that he is the champion of their cause in this House. To show how much the hon. gentleman thinks of the half-breeds, I want to read a little speech delivered by him on Friday last.

Mr. DAVIN. Order, order.

Mr. BERGERON. Past debate.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, I will take another opportunity of bringing this matter before the House. It is evidently with the intention of making cheap political capital that the hon. gentleman brings forward this motion. In addition to the other half-breeds, there is another class of half-breeds; they were resident in the North-west Territories previous to 1885, and their parents were settled with in the province of Manitoba in 1870. These half-breeds claim scrip on the ground that they were in the Territories before they were ceded to the Dominion government, and they hold that that entitled them to consideration. That is what I am dealing with, and the hon. member for West Assiniboia does not attempt to explain that. The hon. gentleman tells us that the Indians are in an unsettled condition, and he gave as his reason that competent men, who had been appointed as Indian agents by the late government, had been replaced by men who are not competent to look after the Indians. Now, the less the hon. gentleman, or any other hon. gentleman on the other side of the House, says about that, the better it will be for themselves. In one case there was one Indian agent by the name of Keith. Why was he dismissed? The reason was that the clergy petitioned the government to have that man dismissed from the position of Indian agent, and we found, when an investigation took place, and if the hon. gentleman wants the papers I will give them to him, it was proven by no less than five or six competent witnesses that this gentleman had been in the habit of giving liquor to the Indians. There is a statute which provides that any person who is shown, on the evidence of one credible witness to be guilty of giving liquor to Indians, is liable to a fine of from $50 to $200, whereas, on the evidence not of one, nor of two credible witnesses, but on the evidence of five credible witnesses, it was shown that this agent had been giving the Indians liquor, and not only giving them liquor, but handing over liquor to the possession of the Indians. Yet the hon. gentleman complains that these parties were dismissed. Take the other agent at Battleford, in my riding. The same thing was going on; the man was intoxicated all the time. I do not want to go into these matters, but the hon. gentleman has raked them up to try and show that these gentlemen have been dismissed from these positions, and that they have been replaced by men who are not properly qualified officers. The men who have replaced these persons are doing their duty in every way, and I may say that there has not been a complaint from any association or from any person since these agents have been appointed. I saw a report in a newspaper the other evening of a speech made by the hon. member for West Assiniboia. Here is what it says.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What paper ?

Mr. DAVIS. It was in the Globe of Saturday, February 10. The hon. member for West Assiniboia, in talking about the half-breeds and Indians of the North-west Territories, to show the amount of respect he holds these people in, says :

There was a large Indian population and a large population of half-breeds, and owing to the fact that the commission did not complete its work, there is a great deal of discontent among them. He suggested that steps be taken at once to instruct and arm rifle corps at different centres in the North-west.

As well as to increase the Mounted Police. There is an insinuation that the half-breeds of the North-west Territories are rebels. It is an insinuation, and the hon. gentleman cannot make anything else of it. I say it is a slander, it is a malicious proceeding to come out and slander a respectable portion of the people of the North-west Territories in that way. He says that we should increase the North-west Mounted Police and arm rifle corps in the Territories to keep the Indians and half-breeds in subjection. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman what grievances Indians have ? How has he found out any grievances that they have ? He says on account of the commission. As far as the Indians are concerned, the commission has completed its labours, and it has settled with them. I would like the hon. gentleman to point out where any unrest exists in the North-west Territories amongst the Indians at the present time and to state what grievances they have. Yet the hon. gentleman gets up and makes such statements as these. He says that the Indians and half-breeds are in a state of unrest, while, here, we are spending thousands of dollars in the effort to get immigrants to settle in the North-west Territories. I am quite well aware that the hon. gentleman has been at variance with the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) on the question of immigration. He would do anything to try to stop the flood of immigration that is coming into the whole of the North-west Territories, as well as into the district of Saskatchewan, and these are the means he is adopting, giving it out to the world that the half-breeds and Indians of the North-west Territories are in a state of unrest. I am sure that the half-breeds will remember the hon. gentleman when they read that he considers them a lot of rebels, and that we have to put police and rifle corps there for the purpose of keeping them in subjection. This is a nice thing to say of a respectable portion of the community in the North-west Territories, a class of men which has given to this country a man of the character of John Norquay. The hon. gentleman knows that in the legislature of Manitoba there are two very respectable and very intelligent half-breeds, that in the legislature of the North-west Territories there are two very respectable and very intelligent half-breeds, men of more than average ability, men of recognized ability, yet he tries to make it appear that the half-breeds of the North-west Territories are absolutely unworthy of confidence, and that we want a big force of mounted police and two or three rifle corps to keep them in subjection. In reference to the half-breeds, I want to say a few words more. How were the hon. gentleman and his political friends at that time treating the half-breeds after the rebellion was over ? The day the rebellion was over they sent up a commission to treat with the half-breeds in reference to their claims. They recognized that any losses that have occurred to the people from that rebellion should be compensated, and they appointed a commission, but how did the commission work ? Whenever a political friend of the hon. gentlemen opposite had a claim against the government he was paid, but whenever the claimant happened to be of another political stripe from hon. gentlemen opposite, he got nothing. It was not a question of loyalty, but a question of party. These gentlemen opposite are daily crying their loyalty from the housetops, but in one case I know of they paid a chief counsellor of Riel in the rebellion $8,000 or $9,000 ; and in another case they paid Riel's high priest in the rebellion, a large sum of money because he happened to say he would support the Tories. I know another gentleman who got $20,000 for nothing at all, and it is a well-known fact that he was one of the men who furnished arms and ammunition to the half-breeds. But, Sir, there were numbers of Scotch half-breeds and French half-breeds who took up arms to restore law and order, and after the rebellion was over not one cent did they get. If a list of the rebellion claims paid is looked at, it will be found that every political friend of hon. gentlemen opposite was paid and had his claim settled ; but those who were not political friends of theirs got nothing. I am quite certain that the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) intends to settle in a proper spirit, the claims of the half-breeds in the North-west Territories. My hon. friend (Mr. Davin) does not understand the question at all or he would not talk as he does. He (Mr. Davin) will agree, I think, that most of the half-breeds are in my district, but he is not satisfied to confine the scope of his operations to his own constituency, and he goes junketing around the North-west Territories trying to look after everyone else. I am able to look after the interests of my own constituents, and my own constituents know it, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) need not bother himself about the matter. A question arose, about children who had died previous to 1885, and I have asked the minister (Mr. Sifton) to take up this matter so that we may know on what basis the settlement is to be made. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) said that I had been buying scrip in my own store.

Mr. DAVIN. I did not say that.

Mr. DAVIS. He read what purported to be a letter from some gentleman unknown containing the statement that speculators were getting hold of the scrip. I suppose if the hon. member (Mr. Davin) had a store, he himself would be buying in odd scrip if any one came along and offered it for sale to him. I do not think I am deterred from buying scrip if any one wants to sell it to me, so long as I give value for it, and I do not think it is a matter which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) should bring into this House. The hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has sat in this House for years and years when his own party was in power, and he never thought it worth while to fight the battles of the half-breeds, but now, when the whole thing is settled by this government, and the half-breeds are to get this scrip, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) comes up with a clap-trap motion to try and make these people believe that he is acting in their interests. Well, the people of the North-west Territories know where to place this hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) and they do not take stock in nonsense of that kind any longer.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I rise for the purpose of stating that the government have no fault to find with the sentiment contained in this resolution. Perhaps it is couched in more flowery language than I would have indulged in, but the substance of it is, that it is the duty of the government to promptly see that the half-breeds get their scrip or have their Indian titles extinguished. Well, the government have always been of that opinion. We have passed legislation to this effect, and at this very moment the government is trying to speedily carry out this intention which was embodied in the statute last year.

Mr. N. F. DAVIN (West Assiniboia). It would be impossible for the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) to deny that he had laid down the proposition that the children born between 1870 and 1885, would be dealt with. My complaint is that they have not been dealt with promptly, and the object of the motion is to get them dealt with promptly now. My complaint is, that not having been dealt with promptly they have suffered loss, and the rambling statement of the hon. gentleman from Saskatchewan (Mr.

Mr. DAVIS.

Davis) amounts to nothing. He talked about every mortal thing except the question, and like the hunted animal that tries to dodge the pursuer, ran here and ran there, until at last the gopher got into the hole and sat down. I think you will agree with me, Sir, that the manner of his defence showed that the bringing of this matter up made him uneasy. What I pointed out in regard to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davis) was this: That when he saw I was dealing with the interests of these people, and bringing the government to book for not being prompt in settling with them; two days afterwards, he put this motion upon the Order paper:

That in the opinion of this House, scrip should be granted to all half-breed children born in the North-west Territories prior to 1885.

What is the meaning of putting that there unless he wanted to throw dust in the eyes of the half-breeds of the North-west Territories? He asserts a proposition that was laid down twelve months ago by the Minister of the Interior in this House. If he were to say: In the opinion of this House, that white was white or black was black, or if I were to follow in the wake of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) and use some very opprobrious epithet and then predicate and copulate it with the verb 'to be,' and make a proposition asserting something like that black is black, it would not be more absurd than this proposition of the hon. member (Mr. Davis). I said that the action of the hon. member was the action of a farceur, and I say that if the motion was the act of a farceur, still more so was the speech of the hon. member (Mr. Davis). What had we to do with discussing what led up to the rebellion of 1885? The gentleman who wrote me the letter which I have read, did not mark it 'private.' He is one of the most respectable men of the North-west Territories, and I do not know that he would object to give his name. If it would add any force to it I would have given his name, but the only personal charge made in that letter, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davis) admits. He admits that he is dealing with these half-breeds, and he has not denied that the amount mentioned in this gentleman's letter is the amount he is giving them, and if he is giving them only that amount, he is doing what others are doing along the line, namely, taking advantage of them owing to the fact that they have not the scrip in their possession, and therefore cannot have the advantage of competition for the scrip. He (Mr. Davis) takes the view—and it is a very extraordinary view to be taken by a gentleman who has been three or four years in this House—he takes the view that a member of this House is debarred from taking up grievances that happen to affect a number of persons in another constituency from that which he represents. Why, Sir, every member here is a representative of the whole of Canada, and each one of us has the right to take up any grievance from Halifax to Victoria, or from the Saskatchewan down to the boundary line. However, I have half-breeds in my constituency, though perhaps not as large a number as there are in the Saskatchewan. The hon. member (Mr. Davis) is mistaken in supposing that I never previously brought this case before the House. The very thing I have advocated to-day, I have advocated before now in and out of this House. Sir, if I could fix on anything that that hon. gentleman (Mr. Davis) has done since his delightful presence has dawned upon this chamber, to stamp him I would take what he has just done in regard to my advocacy of prompt dealing with the half-breeds. He has stated that I have suggested that the half-breeds were to be guarded against as rebels. In the speech to which he refers, what I said was this. I said the government were dealing with them in such a way as might well irritate them—that I had information that they were irritated in consequence of the way they were dealt with, namely, in the delay of the settlement promised by the Minister of the Interior and advertised to take place as far back as October last. Is that not a proper thing to say when I was advocating defences for the North-west Territories? But, Sir, look at the logic of the hon. gentleman. In reply to my advocacy of defences for the North-west Territories, the Prime Minister rose and told the House that the government were going to raise the Mounted Police to their full strength, and his colleague the Minister of Militia told us that he was going to establish rifle corps in the North-west Territories and arm them with rifles. If my advocacy of defences for the North-west implied, as it did not, that the half-breeds were rebels, how much more did the government's statement imply that they considered them rebels. But there is no cogency in the hon. gentleman's reasoning, and the action of the government does not imply, any more than my remarks did, that the half-breeds are rebels. The hon. gentleman said that his constituents recognized him as a person fit to look after their interests. I have visited the Saskatchewan, and I have found that they do not regard him as a fit and proper representative; and the very fact that he has to wait until I put a notice of this kind on the paper, before he puts on the paper the notice that I have referred to, farcical as that notice is, proves what? If it was necessary that he should put that notice on the paper, why did he not put it on before? And if he felt it necessary to do it in consequence of my putting this notice on the paper, does it now show that he is to that extent incompetent? I have addressed meetings all over the Saskatchewan. I have had meetings at Prince Albert at which the hall was crowded to overflowing; I have had no meetings there at which the hall was not crowded. But the hon. gentleman, who says he has the confidence of his constituents, held a meeting there a short time ago, on the eve of his departure for parliament, at which forty-two persons were present.

Mr. DAVIS. That is ten more than you had the last time.

Mr. DAVIN. When I was there the last time, I had a meeting, which for weight and volume, has never been surpassed in Prince Albert. That was in the afternoon. Moreover, in the evening, when we held a meeting for organization, and when only Conservatives were asked to attend, that great hall was three-fourths full, and a son of the president of the Liberal Association marched up and signed the roll of the Conservative Association.

Mr. DAVIS. He is only fourteen years old.

Mr. DAVIN. At the meeting held by the hon. gentleman, a Mr. McLeod was chairman, and in giving the hon. gentleman a character, this is what he said of him:

Mr. S. McLeod was chairman, and in a few words introduced Mr. Davis as the only member of parliament that had nerve enough to go into a minister's room without knocking.

So that because the hon. member can do a boorish thing he is a fit and proper person to represent the people of Saskatchewan; that is the highest praise Mr. McLeod can give him. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the people of Prince Albert, who were represented for years by a gentleman, do not relish very much the way they are represented here to-day. I am glad to hear from the Prime Minister that he consents to this motion, and that I have been able to get a declaration from the Minister of the Interior that in a month or two months he will do what he should have done six months ago.

Motion agreed to.

THE CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to ask my right hon. friend if he is yet in a position to answer the question with reference to the Nicaragua Canal and the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am not in a position to answer that question now, and I do not expect to be in a position to answer it until action is taken by the Senate of the United States one way or the other with regard to the ratification of the new treaty.

RETURNS ORDERED.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

CERTIFICATE OF ELECTION.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery certificate of the election and return of Arthur W. Puttee, Esq., for the electoral district of Winnipeg.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

Arthur W. Puttee, Esq., member for the electoral district of Winnipeg, by Mr. McCarthy and Mr. Stubbs.

INFRINGEMENT OF COPYRIGHT.

Mr. McCARTHY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 15) to amend the Criminal Code, 1892. He said: Under the existing law, an infringement of a trade-mark is punished as a criminal offence; but, at present this does not apply to copyright. The object of the amendment is to put infringement of a copyright upon the same footing as infringement of a trade-mark.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. T. O. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to say a few words on a question of privilege. I see in the Gazette of Montreal, the issue of Friday, February 9, 1900, a report of the transactions of the House for the day previous, in which the following appears:—

Mr. Davis briefly addressed the House in reference to ballot-stuffing and other irregularities as practised by Liberals in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, as well as elsewhere.

Now, I think that any person who was in the House at the time and heard what I had to say must come to the conclusion that the reporter who made that report should be treated much the same as my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) wished to treat another gentleman in the gallery on a similar occasion. I never made a statement of the kind attributed to me, nor do I think there is any foundation for such a statement. As far as the North-west Territories are concerned, I do not think our political opponents can find any ground for a statement of that kind. I know of no irregularities practised by the Liberals of Manitoba and the Northwest Territories. But, if I come home to Ontario, I find that within the last few days nineteen of the political friends of hon. gentlemen opposite have been placed behind prison bars—

Mr. SPEAKER. I would draw the attention of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davis) to the fact that he must confine himself to the original matter.

Mr. DAVIS. I have said all I wished to say, Mr. Speaker.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE—REPORT CONCERNING LT. BORDEN.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). Before the Orders of the Day are called I would like, in justice to a member of the militia who was referred to by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), to speak a single word of explanation. The hon. gentleman for West York used the following language :

We are told in the public press that a son of the Minister of Militia was insubordinate to his superior officer the other day, and we look with some interest and curiosity to see how he is to be treated.

About the time the report to which the hon. gentleman refers appeared in the newspapers, I received from my son, who is going to South Africa as a member of the contingent, a statement by wire that the report was absolutely without foundation. I also received from Major Williams in command of the detachment to which my son belongs, a statement in the same terms. However, I did not think it proper to bring the matter up at that stage. I waited until the officer in command of the district, the Nova Scotia district, No. 9, had communicated officially with the headquarters staff here at Ottawa, I wish to read to the House that officer's statement :

Hallfax, N.S., Feb. 10, 1900.

To the Chief Staff Officer of Militia, Ottawa, Ont.

With reference to the report of unpleasantness between Major Williams, commanding the detachment of this division, C.M.R., and Lieut. Borden, commanding a troop therein, the whole story is absolutely without foundation, no difficulty of even the slightest nature having occurred.

Mr. N. CLARKE WALLACE (West York). Mr. Speaker, the facts are not just as stated by the Minister of Militia. It was not just at the time the report appeared in the newspapers, that I called attention to this matter, but it was many days afterwards, and the report was not contradicted up to that day, although there was time enough for a contradiction.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) doubt the statement I have made?

Mr. WALLACE. I am not doubting the statement the hon. minister (Mr. Borden) has read, but I am contradicting the statement he has made to the House that about the same time that I made the remark he has referred to there appeared a report in the newspapers. I say, and I repeat, that that statement had appeared in the newspapers many days before.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Not many—about three days.

Mr. WALLACE. I think it was the week before. Many days had elapsed during which the report might have been contradicted.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The report appeared on Monday, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) made his statement on Thursday.

Mr. WALLACE. Then four days had elapsed, and no contradiction had appeared.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) should not prolong the discussion.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not desire to prolong it ; but the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) has contradicted the statement I made. I accept what he has read, and I can say I am glad to hear that statement. I do not desire to have reflection cast upon any member of the volunteer force, if it be not correct.

I did not originate the statement and waited those four days to hear it contradicted, and it has not yet been contradicted. That is all I have to say about it.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—ORGANIZATION OF COMMITTEES.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask my right hon. friend if he would take the earliest opportunity to have the committees of the House organized. The House is aware that there was unfinished business left at the close of last session, which passes over to the present, and that owing to the loss of time in not having the committees organized at an early stage last session, a great deal of important business was delayed until a late period, when some of the most important business was brought before the committees when half the members of the committees had absolutely left for home. It will greatly expedite the business of the House if my right hon. friend would see that the committees are organized as promptly as possible and thereby save a good deal of time.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I will.

THE DEPARTURE OF GENERAL HUTTON.

Mr. E. G. PRIOR (Victoria, B.C.) Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to address the House, and as my remarks will be of somewhat lengthy character, I shall conclude with a motion. I wish to bring to the attention of the House a matter that is of the greatest interest to the people of Canada, especially those belonging to the militia force. I refer to the near departure of Major General Hutton, who has been in command of the Canadian militia for some eighteen months past. We are informed by the press that he is leaving the Dominion in order to go to the front in South Africa as an Imperial officer. It seems to me that this is a case of swopping horses in the middle of the stream. We know that at present Great Britain is in the throes of a mighty struggle, in which, I am proud to say, Canada and the other colonies are taking a hand and thereby showing that they are heart and soul with the mother country. It shows also that the time has come in the history of this country when one would naturally expect the government to do everything possible to put our militia force on the best possible basis and the affairs of the department in the best running order. All the information we have up to the present is that General Hutton is leaving because he has been offered a position in South Africa, but there is a widespread feeling all over the Dominion that that is not the true reason for his departure. We have had British generals here before, good men, who left Canada somewhat under a cloud, whether owing to their own faults or to unfortunate friction that has occurred between them and the various Ministers of Militia, I leave it for hon. members to decide; but I am sadly afraid that the present instance is one in which the general commanding is leaving on account of friction. I have no reason for saying so except general rumour, but I think there must be something in it, because I cannot believe that a gentleman who has the welfare of this Dominion so much at heart, as General Hutton has, who has done his duty so well—in which statement I think nearly every man in the militia force in this Dominion will agree with me—would give up a position in which he knows he would be of immense value to this country. It is most deeply to be deplored if his departure is owing to friction between him and the government, and if the government has not seen fit to try and bring about a good understanding between it and the general. General Hutton is acknowledged by almost every military man in Canada, to have a splendid grasp of the whole situation. He is an infantry soldier, but also well versed in the cavalry and artillery branches, a combination rarely found, and he also has had large experience on the staff and in the field and among militiamen in dealing with the volunteers in the Australian colonies. With regard to his qualifications in the latter respect, I may say that I have met many Australians who have been under him, and have taken great interest in the work he did, and they were all loud in their praises of the manner in which he carried out that work.

I think that any one who has read the first report he issued must agree with me that Canada was very fortunate in getting a man of his calibre to look after her military force. His ideas were no provincial, no narrow ideas, but broad and imperialistic, and I am perfectly certain that anything he has done in this country was done with the sole motive of enabling the government of Canada to put our militia force into such a state that it would not only be a credit to ourselves, but the whole British Empire, and be able to hold its own with any troops from any portion of the empire.

I am well aware that the general has unfortunately had some disputes with gentlemen in our militia, one of whom, I am sorry to say, is a gentleman who has a seat in this House, but who is now at the front. I do not intend saying a word on that subject, and I am sure the hon. Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden) will not ask me to, because the papers have been called for, and until they are laid on the Table it would not be fair for any one to discuss the dispute in question. Everybody who knows Col. Hughes knows that he is a most enthusiastic militiaman, who has always done his best to carry out successfully anything to which he has put his hand, but every one who knows General Hutton can also say that no dispute could have come about unless he had really thought there was some cause for his strictures. However, as I have said, until the papers are down I do not wish to say anything on that point.

But if it be true that politics are at the bottom of the general's leaving this country, I think that is a fact to be deplored by the whole country. When the present Minister of Militia took office, we were told that he was going to do his best to keep politics out of the department, which, every militiaman knows, is the curse of the whole thing. At meetings of Rifle and Artillery Associations, the hon. minister laid great stress upon the point that he was going to devote his whole time to seeing that the Militia Department was run on military principles alone, and that politics were left out of the question altogether.

The positions were to be given to the men who were best fitted for them, independently of whether they were Liberals or Conservatives. Now, I believe the hon. gentleman really meant what he said, I believe he tried his utmost to carry that out, but I am sadly afraid that the pressure brought to bear upon him has been too much. If such is the case, I say that there can never be a militia force in Canada that will be what it should be. Until we can keep politics out of it, I do not believe the present government—and I speak of past governments as well—until we can keep politics out, there is no earthly chance of having that Militia Department carried on with credit to itself or credit to the country. For another thing, we shall never get an Imperial officer to come out here from Great Britain and stay. Some gentlemen say we have had enough officers sent out to us from the War Office at home. Well, I do not agree with them. Personally, I believe it would be the greatest mistake, a most fatal mistake, to break that link that now binds us to the mother country. We must have an officer who has had large experience in organization, large experience in the service, and a man who is perfectly free from all political taint. Such a man, I believe, cannot be found in Canada. We have, Mr. Speaker, splendid officers in Canada, we have sent many of them to the front to represent us in South Africa, men who cannot be beaten for the positions they hold anywhere else in the British Empire. But I say fearlessly, and speaking from my own knowledge of the militia for the last twenty-five years, that there is not a single man in Canada to-day who is fit to take the position of general officer commanding the forces of Canada. We may in time train men fit to take that position, and when we find Canadians who have passed through the Royal Military College, and who have served with distinction in the British Empire, I would say if possible we should get a Canadian who has had that experience. But until we find such a man we cannot do without an Imperial officer in that position.

Now, Sir, I do not wish to make a long speech on this subject, because it is a matter on which any man can say in a short time all he wishes; but I do say this, that I think it is deeply to be regretted that a man of General Hutton's attainments and abilities should either have seen fit voluntarily to retire, or, which I believe is nearer the truth, has been forced to leave Canada at this juncture. I feel perfectly certain that my feelings are shared by a very large number of men in Canada. We cannot all agree, but anyway, speaking for myself alone—I have no wish to bind any one on this side or on the other side of the House to agree with me, as I do not know what their feelings may be—but I feel it my duty to my country and to the militia at large, to lay this matter before you and to speak these few words on this subject. I only trust that General Hutton, when he leaves Canada, will be encouraged by the consciousness that he has done his duty, as I know he has done it, and that he may be fortunate in the new field to which he is going. I beg to move that the House do now adjourn.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Whilst I appreciate fully the motive which has actuated my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Prior) in bringing this matter before the House, I desire to say that for reasons of equal moment, at least, I submit to the judgment of the House that it is not desirable at this time to enter into a controversy as to the causes which have led to General Hutton's recall. General Hutton has been recalled by the Imperial authorities to take service in South Africa. Whilst he has been here he has in many respects rendered good service to the militia of Canada, everybody acknowledges that he is a meritorious officer; but that he is not free from faults, like everybody else in the world, even his best friends will admit. I think at this moment it is just as well to leave the matter where it is, and to allow General Hutton to leave this country for Africa carrying with him the best wishes of all Canadians in the career in which he is about to enter, a career which, we believe, he will fill worthily by his courage and his ability as a soldier.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I entirely concur with the remarks just made by the right hon. gentleman. I think it would be extremely difficult to do any kind of justice to this question in the absence of the correspondence, for which there is a motion standing on the paper, and which, I suppose, will be brought down in due course. When the House has all the facts before them, it will be much easier to deal with that subject satisfactorily. I believe my hon. friend who has introduced this motion is quite right in saying that it is a source of deep regret to everybody that at this particular crisis the gentleman who was sent here from England at the request of the government to discharge such important duties, should now be obliged to break the continuity of his service. But that is, of course, a matter which we cannot control, and I agree that we should have the papers before discussing the matter further.

Mr. D. TISDALE (South Norfolk). I do not intend for a moment to question the wisdom of the advice of the First Minister and the leader of the opposition; I quite agree with them that if there is to be any discussion at any time upon this subject it is better to wait until the correspondence shall be brought down. At the same time, I think the government should go a little further and give us some information as to whether his place is to be filled by another Imperial officer, or whether there is to be an evasion of the law as it now stands. I heartily concur in every word uttered by the hon. member for Victoria. I heartily agree with him that the time has not come when we should have anybody but an Imperial officer of experience and of the qualifications which he has enumerated, to command our military forces. I also agree with him in hoping that the time will come when a Canadian can properly be called upon to fill that position. I believe that time will come, but at present, and for a good many years yet, we shall need an Imperial officer. But while the law remains as it is, I think we ought to carry it out. This is not a time to be silent, on the contrary, as we all agree, it is a time when military matters have come to the front, and it is a time when Canada ought to be assured that, though so excellent a man has departed, we are going to get one equally good in his place. We should be prepared in Canada to take whatever steps and afford whatever assistance is necessary, and to spare neither money nor effort to get the right sort of men in the right places, and to make abundant preparations for any exigencies that may arise. I quite agree with what some gentleman said the other day on this matter, speaking on another motion, that while it is no time for making any alarmist observations, at the same time it is due to the empire, and it is especially due to Canada, that we should be in a forward state of preparation in every possible way.

I think it would be a very serious thing if we were to attempt to have the militia force in this country, or part of it, administered by any one less capable than an Imperial officer of high standing. One word further in regard to my agreeing with the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior); I had the pleasure of a short experience in the Militia Department, and I came to this conclusion, which I will give the hon. minister the benefit of, that with an officer such as the late incumbent before the last one—I mean General Gascoigne—or with an officer such as General Hutton, that one thing was necessary, one thing that ought to be carried out, and that was, that although the law must remain as it is, that the minister must be responsible and should be responsible, as the head of the department, that he should abolish politics, and I believe, that if he would become unpopular with his own party for a couple of years, and if, to use a common expression, he had backbone enough to let it be understood that no politics should be introduced, but that qualification should be the rule, he would become a very popular man, not only with his own party, but, particularly, with our militia. It is a difficult thing to do, and would be a very hard thing and a very unpopular thing with many hon. gentlemen on the side of the House to which the hon. minister belongs, but it is a thing that is necessary. Consequently, there should be a distinct understanding between the minister and his general as to where one was to govern and as to where the other was to govern, and wherever they ran so near to the line as to which should reign they should have an understanding that they should quietly discuss matters of that sort together and decide them together, and act upon their decision. With these two simple rules, though very difficult to carry out, I believe that much might be accomplished, but, without them, I am like the hon. member for Victoria: I begin to feel hopeless that our militia will ever have a chance of being put in an efficient state, such as I believe the application of these simple rules would result in. I can only say in regard to General Hutton that, I believe, from reading his reports and from what I have heard of him, as to matters that he has accomplished, that he has brought a faithful intention, great abilities and great experience to the discharge of his duties, and as far as I am concerned, I propose to suspend any judgment, not only in reference to this matter, not only in justice to him, but in justice to the hon. minister and to the department, until all the papers are down, when a more opportune time will present itself and when we can more clearly discuss the case and ascertain if there is any blame to be attached to anybody. For the present, I am content to understand and believe that General Hutton is ready and willing and desirous to go to South Africa. I believe he is a man of the sort that would prefer to be there than here, and I hope that the government will be able, as quickly as possible, to secure as good a man or better to take his place, because, I believe, at this time, more than at any other time, we should have an Imperial officer, and I think that the whole country would feel better satisfied that our preparations would be, not only on a large scale, but under proper supervision.

Mr. JAMES DOMVILLE (King's, N.B.) Mr. Speaker, I think it is rather unfortunate that the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior) should have got up an apologetic for the general on the eve of his departure. It rather challenges the question as to why he was going away, and wherefore this sudden departure. There are charitable people in this country, and perhaps in this House, who would rather have liked to have let him slide out, not only quietly, but quickly, which he is doing. If the hon. member for Victoria was correct, that his case requires investigation in this country and in this House, there should be a state trial instead of trying a man after he has gone. Nor would I pass a whitewashing act before he leaves. It seems to me that my hon. friend has gone a little too far in reference to this question. The press says that the general has gone under a cloud, but the press does not say that he is going away with the well wishes of this country.

Mr. PRIOR. He is though.

Mr. DOMVILLE. There may be an officer, in this country, who has, perhaps, been a little more particular in his attentions to the general and he may have been held in position or got some little favours, but I have some correspondence in my desk here, which I just received to-day, of the most violent case that ever occurred. I refer to the case of Lieut.-Col. Van Wagner. While it is stated General Hutton is going to do duty for his country in South Africa, it is not known that he has not got an offer to go, although some people have been kind enough to say that he is going to get a position. Well, many will perhaps get positions some day a little higher up than they occupy to-day. It is contended that this discussion is likely to place him in a false position before the War Office. But it should be remembered that the War Office is not so wedded to any officer that they will show him favour because some hon. gentleman in this House will get up and attempt to cover his tracks. The War Office is bound to look at these questions in an Imperial way. We are not to have every general coming over here and turning the Minister of Militia down. We turn to the Journals of the House of New South Wales and we find five or six volumes of the very same trouble occurring there as have occurred with General Hutton here. If hon. gentlemen will turn up the Journals of the New South Wales House they will find what occurred there. Not only is it here that Major-General Hutton has been troublesome, but you will find that the same thing occurred there. Seventeen months have elapsed since General Hutton came to this country. Where was the militia before he came here? Where was Sir Patrick McDougall? He was the best officer that ever came to Canada, and he was content to occupy a position subordinate to the minister, the position of Deputy Adjutant-General. He laid down the best system that was ever laid down for the Canadian militia. He went out of this country with honour, came back afterwards to Halifax as the General there, and, I think, that for a time he administered the government of this country. Yet we hear so much about the services of this Colonel, or General Hutton. He never held any position very long. Let us take the times that he has held the positions that he has occupied. He was A.D.C. to the Major-General of the Expeditionary Force, Egypt, for two months; Assistant Military Secretary to the G. O. C., Egypt, for seven months; Brigade-Major, Aldershot, for five months; D.A.A.G. and Q.M.G., Egypt, for seven months; D.A.A.G. at Aldershot, for seven months; Commander of Mounted Infantry Regiment at Aldershot, six months, and Brigadier Commanding 10th Brigade, 5th Division, Aldershot, for one month. He has done better here, because he has been able to hold his position here for seventeen months. I do not think there is anything in the record to lead us to the conclusion that the government have been hasty. I am not in the confidence of the government, and

I do not know what he has done and what they have done, and will not until the papers come down. But I am satisfied that when they do come down, in the case of Lieut.-Col. Hughes and in many other cases, it will be found why he left Canada. I am not pro-Boer; I am in favour of the British nation. I think nobody will accuse me of being opposed to the British, although, in one way, I would rather select a Boer general than an officer such as General Hutton. It is not because the British nation has not the pluck, but, as Napoleon said, the army of England was an army of lions led by jackasses. The point I want to make from this is that officers assume a position that they are not qualified for. In England, General Hutton will have to take some subordinate position, if he gets one there, and he will have to learn what he never learned here, that there is somebody superior to him. There he will have a chance to learn from some one superior to him. Instead of his dictating to the government, and dictating to the Minister of Militia, and dictating to parliament he will have to go back to the old story of his youth; he will have to obey and not dictate. I join with the hon. member for Victoria, B.C., (Mr. Prior) in expressing regret that this gentleman is leaving Canada, but my regret is that he has not been found equal to the task allotted to him. All of our general officers commanding have had trouble in Canada, but most of them when they left had friends both inside and outside of the House. This, Sir, is the only occasion on which a general officer commanding ever left Canada with almost a consensus of public opinion against him.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I say yes.

Mr. PRIOR. Very far from it.

Mr. DOMVILLE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Prior) denies my statement, but anyway he cannot get over the fact that General Hutton is going, and the hon. gentleman himself admits that he is going under a cloud, whatever that cloud is. General Hutton has not served his time out here, and I know that the excuse given, namely, that he is going to get a position in South Africa, is not the correct one. They do not remove British officers that way. The rule of the service is that when an officer takes a position he must abide by it, and when he got that position it was perhaps a little better than he could get anywhere else at the time. The rule of the service is that an officer in a high position has no right to volunteer, but his Queen has a right to call on him for service and he has to obey. General Hutton's going now means that there is disapprobation in connection with him. I have not seen that the press on either side takes up his case very strongly. No one seems to stand by him. General Hutton was not a Commander-in-Chief in the same sense as Lord Roberts or Lord Wolseley; but he came to Canada simply as a superior officer to direct the militia and to give advice to the minister. Instead of doing his duty, he thought he could dictate to the whole country. If the British government cannot send men to Canada who have more discretion, and who are better able to learn the character of the people of the country and the requirements and wants of the country, then I hope we shall never have another Imperial officer sent here. We have lots of Canadian officers able to do the work, and if they are not considered up to date then they can be sent to England to learn. I may say that some of the Imperial officers we have had here, have never been able to learn. I trust that I will not be accused of any vindictiveness in any remarks that I have made. For four years I have been trying to get the Militia Act altered so that if we have a worthy officer in Canada, he may not be debarred from attaining this position. Even if an Imperial officer is employed, the proviso must be sent to England by the Canadian government, that the Imperial authorities must send out some one who will behave himself before the people and before the militia. We will not allow them to import into this country this Buckingham Palace business we saw in England during the Jubilee. We trust that they will not send Imperial officers out here who will endeavour to arrogate to themselves all the power that belongs to parliament. We trust that officers will be sent whose sole idea will be to serve our militia and serve the nation. The present war in South Africa has taught England that she has greater responsibilities of empire on her shoulders, and that she has to rely more and more upon her colonies. England has been taught that she must look on her colonies no longer as colonies, but as allied nations. This incident will, I trust, teach England that she must send out here an officer who is better fit to take charge of our militia than was General Hutton. I agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Tisdale) that the position of the minister and the position of the general officer commanding must be defined hereafter. The position of the minister must be one of superiority and free control, and while the general shall have the power of the administration of military affairs to a certain extent, the third line must be marked down so that we, the people of Canada who are paying the bills for the militia and who are doing the fighting will have something to say in the matter. I regret to have to repeat that I believe it to be in the best interests of Canada that General Hutton is leaving. I am pleased to think that it is in his own interest as well as in the interests of the country, that he should be going from Canada so suddenly. It is better for himself that he should leave now, than to hear the criticisms of his character which his conduct has deserved.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). As a member of the House who is in no way connected with the militia of Canada, I trust I may be permitted to express what I believe to be the sentiments entertained by a large majority of the members of this House, as well as by a large majority of the people of Canada, in reference to this matter. I regret that the hon. member (Mr. Domville) has availed himself of this opportunity to criticise in such uncalled-for language the general officer who is leaving Canada, and who in leaving Canada carries with him the well wishes of the majority of the people of this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. SPROULE. I regret that personal considerations can so blind the judgment of some men as to carry them further than either reason or discretion would justify. So far as I can judge the sentiments of the people of this country, General Hutton as commander of the militia, has been the right man in the right place. We believe he has done most valuable work, that he has accomplished a better organization amongst the militia, and that he has made our military forces more competent and better able to give a return for the money that is spent on them. It is to be regretted, if it be the case, that politics has had anything to do with General Hutton leaving the country. Time after time, when the General Officer Commanding the Militia has been called away from us the thought has occurred to me: What a great pity it is that we in Canada should mix up politics with military matters. I cannot disabuse my mind from the impression, that in many instances politics have had a great deal to do with the adverse criticisms which we have heard on the different generals commanding our militia. I believe that the present case is the worst of all. To the same extent as General Hutton was a greater man than any of his predecessors, to that extent is the offence against him the greater. I cannot imagine for a moment that the trifling difference of opinion which arose between the hon. member from King's, N.B., (Mr. Domville) and Major General Hutton, and Col. Hughes, can have anything to do with the removal of the major general from Canada. I regard them as too insignificant to seriously engage his attention; but if there is anything of the kind, I certainly very greatly regret it. I believe the general is too large a man to take any notice of such incidents, or in any way to allow them to sway his conduct. The hon. member has referred to the fact that General Hutton has occupied several very important positions during his life. I think that no higher eulogium could be passed on a man than to acknowledge that he has been capable to occupy these various positions. The very fact that he has so, and that he has been transferred from one to another, always going higher in the scale, is the strongest argument for his fitness and capability for the various positions he has occupied, in the estimation of those best able to judge. I have nothing more to say with regard to this matter beyond expressing my belief that the country will regret the departure of General Hutton. It will no doubt be pleased to know that he is going to South Africa, where good men are wanted, and will have opportunities of doing valuable work; but at the present juncture in the military affairs of Canada, it is to be regretted that he is leaving, because it may seem to some that he is leaving under a cloud. I do not believe that this is the case; but those who will be under a cloud, in the judgment of the people of Canada, will be those who have contributed in the least degree to his removal at the present time, no matter whether their motives have been political or otherwise. I can only say I express the regret of the people of Canada that he is leaving, because there was a good work for him to do if he had remained. He has done well so far, and had he remained a sufficient length of time in the country, I have no doubt he would have stamped his impress on the militia of Canada in such a way that it would have redounded to his credit for all time in the future.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON (Three Rivers). I wish to say a few words in reference to the matter that has been brought up. I feel some regret that the hon. member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Domville) has not considered it consistent with his duty to adopt the suggestion of the leader of the House and the leader of the opposition not to discuss, at the present moment, the merits or demerits of General Hutton. I speak with some diffidence, owing to a protracted absence from Canada, and not having been able to follow closely the course of General Hutton's administration of militia matters since he came to Canada; but one thing I can say is that no officer in the British army stands higher in the opinion of military authorities in London than General Hutton. I can also say that from my frequent intercourse with members of the militia force, I have heard from them the expression of the opinion that since he has been in Canada he has contributed more largely than any other commanding officer to improve our militia force. But my object in rising is not so much to discuss that point. I feel it a possible injustice to the subject, and certainly an injustice to the general, to discuss a question of this kind before the papers, which have been called for, are laid on the Table of parliament. But I may be permitted, from the fact that for many years I occupied the position of Minister of Militia, to say that I do not agree with the opinion expressed that the efficiency of the militia force in Canada would be better promoted by having a Canadian instead of an Imperial officer. The great desideratum of a force such as ours, which is not a permanent army, but which is drilled only for a short period every year, and until recent years was only drilled once in two years, is to have a man in command who comes fresh to his task, with a knowledge of all the improved methods of the modern science of warfare. We all know that it is a science which is developing to-day as rapidly as any other science. I had to study this subject very fully when I was Minister of Militia, and I came to the conclusion that it was essential, owing to the rapid development of military science abroad, that the general should be changed every five years. In the great armies of continental Europe, there are every year evolutions which indicate the progress being made in that branch of science, and a general or a staff officer is usually sent by each country to witness these manoeuvres, in order to be informed of the progress that is being made and utilize them for the instruction of others. When one of these men comes to Canada, he comes with the fresh knowledge thus acquired. I am a Canadian, and I believe in the doctrine of Canada for the Canadians; I am prepared to admit that within our ranks we have men as able as the men sent to us from Great Britain to command our militia force; but I am also prepared to say that able as our men are, they have not the same opportunities for acquiring the knowledge that is indispensable to maintain our force at the highest point of efficiency, as the men who come from the Imperial army. I do not dispute for one moment the ability of the Canadian people to take any position; but in the conditions in which we are placed we have not the same facilities, as the British officers of following as closely as they can the development of military service. I think we should draw upon the best possible sources in order to keep our force up to the proper state of efficiency.

Mr. A. McNEILL (North Bruce). Mr. Speaker, I am only a civilian, and perhaps should not say anything on this matter. But, as one of those who pay for the militia of Canada, I may have a right to say something on behalf of others who do as I do in that regard. I venture to think, Mr. Speaker, that what fell from my hon. friend who opened this discussion is absolutely correct, that is, that unless the general commanding the militia forces in Canada receives a generous support, not only from the public, but from the government, in the difficult task which is assigned to him, and unless he is relieved from political pressure and from political intrigue, it will be impossible for us to have such a militia force in Canada as the people who pay the money are entitled to have. I want to say, in reference to what has fallen from the hon. gentleman opposite, that I was astonished to hear him state that there was even any considerable feeling in Canada to the effect that General Hutton had been in any sense a failure here. If I had been asked—and I have made it my business to make inquiries with regard to this matter for some considerable time past—what the opinion of the militia in Canada was, I should have said that the consensus of opinion was that General Hutton had done signal good work for that force and the country, and I am satisfied that that is also the opinion of the military authorities in England.

Of course I do not know what the opinion may be of a gentleman who, I believe, holds a commission in Her Majesty's forces, but who says that he would prefer a Boer general to a British general. I do not know what the opinion of this country may be with regard to a gentleman who thinks proper to suggest at the present moment that British generals are jackasses. I know that a great general, who is said to have made that remark on a former occasion, met one of those jackasses, who was rather too great a man for him.

I would like to say that I am surprised at the silence of the government in view of the remarks which have fallen from the hon. gentleman opposite. I would like to know whether they intend that General Hutton shall leave this country under the imputations cast upon him in this House without saying one word in reply. Do they endorse the statements made by the hon. gentleman opposite? By their silence it would almost seem that they do. But if they do not, I hope that some member of the government will rise and say so.

I do not know what the pressure may be that was brought to bear to drive General Hutton out of this country. I see the hon. Minister of Public Works leaving the House, and I wanted to refer to him. I would like to know whether this (holding up a newspaper) has anything to do with it or not.

An hon. MEMBER. What is that?

Mr. McNEILL. It is an organ called La Patrie, and it has this heading in enormous letters, this display at the head of its despatches: 'Buller et McDonald battent en retraite.' That is not a very sympathetic heading for an organ belonging to or controlled by a Minister of the Crown at the present time. The statement in that heading is false, because General McDonald was not beaten, but on the contrary did not withdraw until he had driven all the

Mr. McNEILL.

Boers in that neighbourhood out of it, so that they could not be found by the cavalry he sent out to look them up. We know that the hon. minister, who is supposed to control this organ, threatened General Hutton—or at least his organ did—last fall, and I think it would be very much to the enlightenment of the people of Canada that they should understand whether it is in revenge for the course he ventured to pursue at that time in opposition to the Minister of Public Works that this agitation has been promoted against General Hutton which has resulted in his withdrawal from this country, and in this country being deprived of the services of a most able administrator and splendid soldier.

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY (North Simcoe). I desire, after the remarks which have fallen from my hon. friend from King's (Mr. Domville), to place myself on record. I do not agree in his proposition or suggestion that silence may be taken to mean that the consensus of opinion in this country is against the retention by General Hutton of the position which he has held in Canada, and that such consensus of opinion is the cause of his withdrawal or departure from this country. We have seen in the press of Ontario, and no doubt also of the other provinces, a considerable amount of discussion over the fact that difficulties have arisen between him and hon. members in this House. The general may have been right or wrong, the hon. members in question may have been right or wrong, but surely this is not the time to discuss that question. The introduction of this subject at present may have been a friendly act, and no doubt the hon. member who started the discussion did so out of friendliness to General Hutton; but admitting that to be the case, it is, to my mind, a very doubtful act of friendship. It has evoked considerable criticism and discussion of a harsh nature in regard to General Hutton on the eve of his departure from this country, and we who are not in the confidence of the government or of the opposition do not know what the cause of the friction is. I know nothing about it beyond the fact that I have seen on the Order paper a motion asking for papers and communications which have passed between the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) and the department and General Hutton, concerning the friction existing between them, nor do I know what friction may have existed between the hon. member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Domville) and the general, beyond the fact that the hon. gentleman has asked a great many questions of the Militia Department with regard to certain acts of the general, in certain matters. Surely this is not the time for us to discuss this matter. Nothing is on record before this House giving any reasons for the belief that any dissatisfaction exists with regard to the general. General

Hutton has been in command of our militia force for some seventeen months. He previously held, under the direction of the War Office, many important positions in the Imperial service for greater or shorter lengths of time, and it is not fair to read out of any book an account of the positions he held and the length of time during which he held them, and attempt to draw any conclusion unfavourable to the general. It may be proved that during the length of time he occupied the various positions he has held, he proved himself an officer worthy of promotion and received promotion. On the other hand it may be shown that he was not competent to fill these positions, but owing to what is called 'political pull' was promoted from one position to the other. That could only be ascertained by an investigation, if it were within our competence, to bring the whole record of that officer before the House. But as regards what has taken place in this country, I desire to withhold my judgment until we have before us all the papers relating the causes of friction, if any friction existed between him and the department.

I would go so far as to say that as a citizen in this country, familiar to a certain extent with the militia, and having some knowledge of the subject, I have no hesitation in saying that as a general commanding our militia General Hutton has worked exceedingly hard and done his best in the interests of that force.

There is one point in this discussion, that we may consider. The hon. member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Domville) has said that we do not require an Imperial officer in this country, because we have men in Canada competent to fill the position. But whether we have competent men or not in this country to take command of our force, I think we should look at the question from another point of view. If I read public opinion aright, it is that we Canadians should be ultra-Imperialists. Such has been the opinion given expression to in this House, and such I venture to say is the consensus of opinion prevailing in this country from east to west. There may be some dissentient voices, but let me say that the community or the government which will endeavour to oppose that sentiment is doomed. If that be the case, what more binding link could there be between the motherland and ourselves than to have an Imperial officer sent over from her own War Office to supervise and educate the militia of this country, which in any war that may take place will have to fight side by side with British soldiers. They will thus be educated by men brought up in the best institutions of the old country and create confidence in the War Office that we are being educated on the same lines and subjected to the same training as English soldiers, and thus be able to hold our own side by side with those soldiers in company with whom we will have to fight the battles of the empire. That seems to me to put it above and beyond all discussion as to whether we should still have an Imperial officer. There cannot be any doubt that an Imperial officer will be as good as our own, and, if this is so, the cutting of that link which draws us closer to the motherland is one to be well considered and well thought out before it is cut.

Now, perhaps, the discussion has ranged somewhat far afield. I do not intend to deal with the question whether we would sooner have a Boer general or a British general. I do not think the insinuation could be made seriously.

Mr. DOMVILLE. They are all Boers.

Mr. McCARTHY. My hon. friend (Mr. Domville) goes further now. I will not endeavour to answer him because it seems to me that when he was a commanding officer perhaps the appellation he used in regard to the British officers might apply to him in common with some other officers.

Mr. E. B. OSLER (West Toronto). There is one statement of the hon. member for King's, N.B., (Mr. Domville) that I cannot allow to go uncontradicted. The statement has been made that the general who is now retiring is the most unpopular man in the country, that he is going away by the wish of the people, and that the militia will be glad when he goes. I must contradict that so far as the west is concerned. When General Hutton came here, his appointment was looked upon with great favour. He has been growing in favour ever since; and I venture to say that if his retirement is caused by politics, those who have had to do with it will regret it. The hon. member for King's, N.B., and the general had a difference of opinion on one occasion and I suppose that is the reason why that hon. member assumes that all the people in Canada are averse to the general. I venture to say that the general has now the confidence of the people of Canada, and the confidence of the volunteers, and that there is in Canada universal regret at his retirement whatever be the cause.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). The discussion, I think, has clearly proven to the House the wisdom of the observations made at the outset by the right hon. leader of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), supported by the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), that it was inadvisable and undesirable to discuss questions of this kind in the absence of papers, if there be any papers, and in the absence of notice. My hon. friend from Victoria, B.C., (Mr. Prior) did send across to me a little slip of paper, I should think about five seconds before he rose to his feet, but that is all the notice I had that this subject was to be brought up. I doubt if that

hon. gentleman will conclude—or, if he spoke at the instance of anybody outside of the House, that that person will conclude—that it has done him or anybody any good to bring forward this discussion in this way to-day.

One word with reference to an observation made by my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill). That hon. gentleman seemed to take the view that the government was bound in some way to make some defence or some observations with reference to the remarks that had fallen from the hon. member for King's, N.B., (Mr. Domville). I was surprised that an old parliamentarian like my old friend from North Bruce should speak in this way. He knows that my hon. friend from King's, N.B., is an independent member of this House, just as independent as the hon. member himself—and we know that on occasion he has proven his independence. I doubt if that hon. gentleman, at the times when he has been independent, would say and hold that any member of his party, or that any of the leaders of his party, or any members of the government representing his party at the time he may have expressed his independent views, should be held responsible for anything he said. I am sure my hon. friend from King's, N.B., will not hold any member of his party or any member of this government responsible for a single remark he has made here to-day. In the course of the discussion two or three things have been said by my hon. friend who introduced the subject and my hon. friend, the ex-Minister of Militia (Mr. Tisdale), my immediate predecessor. One point is as to the danger to the militia at this particular moment, because it has lost or is about to lose the services of the General Officer Commanding. Now, I may say to my hon. friend, paraphrasing the old song that generals may come and generals may go, but the militia of Canada goes on for ever—goes on improving, goes on developing. I am not aware that, in the past, any serious check has ever resulted from the changes that have taken place. Certainly a successor to the general will be found. Steps to that end will be taken at the earliest possible moment, and every effort will be made to get the best man possible. In this connection, let me refer incidentally to one matter which is of some importance, and, I think, which was referred to by nearly all who have spoken—the question whether we should limit ourselves any longer to the Imperial army as the source from which we should draw a commander of the militia force of Canada. Speaking simply for myself, and not for the government, I may say that my own personal view is that the time has come when we should enlarge the field from which we draw our commanding officer; and that, while we shall be glad to benefit by the opportunity of drawing our commanding officer, for many years to come, perhaps, from the Imperial army, we should not limit ourselves to that, that if it should happen that there is in Canada a man competent to fill the position, we should not be tied down to the Imperial army, but should be able to put our Canadian officer in that position if we choose. Now, one word with reference to another matter, which nearly every speaker on the opposition benches—three or four of them at least—referred to, the charge, direct or implied, that politics is and has been the bane of the Canadian militia, as my hon. friend from Victoria, B.C., (Mr. Prior) said, and that politics in some mysterious way or other, has something to do with the events we are now discussing. I observed that my hon. friend from Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) who so long adorned the position I now occupy, did not re-echo that charge. Now, I wish to say at once, and I think I shall be supported in this at any rate by my hon. friend from Three Rivers, that I do not believe that in the administration of the militia of Canada from 1867 down to the present time, there has been any extraordinary political influence improperly exercised in connection with the Canadian militia. I had the opportunity of making a speech in Montreal in the presence of some twenty or thirty colonels and ex-colonels and I appealed to them to know whether any Minister of Militia had ever attempted to exert any pressure upon them in the matter of carrying out the discipline of their regiments, or with reference to the appointment of a single officer whom they had recommended to headquarters, and I could not get one of those officers to stand up and make any such admission. As a matter of fact I think it would be difficult to find a force anywhere where politics in the worst sense of the word has had less to do with such force. I may say this at once, and I challenge contradiction, that so far as the present government is concerned, politics has been excluded from the administration of the militia. In the contingents which have just been picked out for South Africa, I challenge any man in this House or out of it to put his finger upon a single officer who has been appointed for political reasons—it cannot be done. The Conservative press throughout Canada have admitted that politics have not entered into the administration of the department. The general officer commanding the militia and who has just resigned, at a dinner given recently to the second brigade of artillery which has gone with the second contingent to South Africa, did me the credit of saying that to his knowledge not a single political appointment had been made on either contingent. Therefore I think it is only fair to myself and to the officers under me to deny promptly the charge which has been made here to-day, that the militia department of this country is being run upon political lines. With reference to the officer himself who is leaving us, as I said in opening. I think it is much fairer to that gentleman that discussion of his conduct and of the results of his zeal should be left to some more fitting occasion.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.). I am not a military man, and I do not propose to discuss this question from a militia point of view; but I could have wished that the Minister of Militia and Defence who has just taken his seat, should either have said less or a little more. I will tell him frankly why I think so. I regret that this discussion has ultimately run into the line in which we find it. But what are the facts of the case? We have had an English general, an English army officer of undoubted standing and holding a high position in his country, coming over to Canada to take charge of our militia, that charge which such an officer has from confederation held in this country in conjunction with our government. I am not qualified to judge for a single moment as to his military skill and the like of that; but I have followed from a civilian's standpoint the course of the generals as they have successively come and gone in Canada, and I am bound to say that I believe General Hutton has been a most painstaking man, that he has been a thorough gentleman, that he has been frank, and if sometimes he has been frank almost to a degree, and it may have been imputed to him as a fault, that is not one of the worst faults that may attach to even a general in this country of ours. No general we have ever had, I believe, has worked harder and with a stronger desire to put the militia of this country on the footing that he as an Imperial officer would like to see it, than has General Hutton. To-day he leaves us. A discussion is brought up in this House, and statements are made in this House, and the Minister of Militia and Defence, I think, might have gone one step further than he did, and might, at least, have said one generous word with reference to the retiring general. He cannot disassociate himself from the statements which have been uttered in this House just on the eve of the general's departure. It has been stated here, and at this moment is uncontradicted, that the general is leaving under a pretense, that he is leaving under a cloud, that he has not behaved himself while he has been in this country; and I think the Minister of Militia and Defence of this country should have thought it due to himself, and due to the general, and due to the British and Canadian public as well, to say at least one generous word with reference to General Hutton—if he could do it, and I believe that he could do it with an honest heart. So far as I can judge, though my opinion is not worth much, General Hutton goes from this country with my most sincere regrets. I believe he has been a good general, I believe that he has acted as a gentleman. He may have faults, and who amongst us has not? I am sorry that a more generous farewell could not have been given to him by the minister who has known him and worked with him from the time that he has come into this country.

Mr. FRANK OLIVER (Alberta). Like the hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) I am not a military man, and I do not propose to discuss military subjects in connection with this matter. But there is one question that, I think, is well worthy of discussion, and that is the question of politics in the administration of the militia department. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me a very popular thing that while hon. members have declared that there should be no politics in connection with the militia, they have deliberately brought up in this House a question and taken part in a discussion with the express purpose of making the retirement of General Hutton a political question in the country. I am not finding fault with them at all, but I say that it comes with ill grace from the hon. member for Victoria, B.C., (Mr. Prior) beside whom I see the picture of a colleague (Mr. Hughes) who has gone to South Africa to serve the empire, and to whom be all credit due for his action. I say it come with ill grace from the member who sits beside that picture to call in question the action of the minister, if action has been taken, when the first friction that occurred, so far as the public knows, occurred between the member who is now in South Africa and Major General Hutton. It seems to me that the position is this: The hon. members who have taken up this case at first wished to find fault with the Minister of Militia and Defence because the case of the hon. member now in South Africa was not backed up against General Hutton; but they now reverse their action and attack the minister for having, I suppose, to some extent, backed up the militia officer and not the major general.

Mr. PRIOR. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) say where I made an attack upon the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence? Will he show one single sentence in which I made an attack upon the hon. minister?

Mr. OLIVER. I did not say that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Prior) made an attack upon the hon. minister. I said that his whole speech and his whole action in the matter was evidently for the purpose of making this question of the resignation of Major-General Hutton a political question on this country, and there can be no other construction put upon it. Just one word on the general question of the propriety of a British officer managing the militia force of Canada. I am one of those who have always believed in the desirability of the militia force of Canada being managed by a member of the Imperial forces. I always believed that there were good reasons for that, but I am sorry to say that recent circumstances have proven to the world and to the empire at large that all British officers do not understand their business, and that it is not enough to say that we have a British officer in command of the militia of Canada; that is to say, that any British officer is fit to command the militia. We need a choice of British officers; and there is a possibility that all the military knowledge of the world is not contained amongst British officers. It is not our fault that it is so, but, it being so, and the fact is not capable of contradiction, it is well for us to look the matter in the face and to say that we want men who are suitable for the purpose whether we get them from one country or another.

Mr. W. H. MONTAGUE (Haldimand). Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) who has just sat down has not added to the information of the House, nor has he, I submit, added to the dignity of debate by charging the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Prior), with a political object, when he arose to discuss this question. Hon. gentlemen in the House listened to the hon. member for Victoria, and I think that all, with the exception of the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) will agree with me that there was not one word of politics in any of the statements made by the hon. member for Victoria in dealing with that subject—I mean of party politics. The hon. member for Victoria, when he was criticising the management of the militia of the country, and when he was asserting that his chief desire was to keep politics out of the Militia Department, said that he referred to past governments as well as to the present government. And, I presume he also meant future governments, who may have something to do with the militia of the country as well as the present government, because, I might repeat again for the benefit of the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Borden), that while men may come and men may go, the militia system goes on for ever. It is equally true that while men may come and men may go, Liberal governments do not go on for ever as the experience of this country has proven in the past.

An hon MEMBER. They are not going in the meantime.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is quite true, but it is no guarantee for the future. But the fact is that as they are 'going' on in the meantime, it seems to be a guarantee of the fate of the government in the future. In the first place, I think, if bad taste were displayed in the discussion, it was displayed by the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence when he rather suggested that the hon. member for Victoria had brought this matter up on the suggestion of someone else whose cause was not helped by this discussion here, this afternoon. It was an exceedingly delicate way of asserting that someone had asked the hon. member for Victoria to discuss this question. It was hardly the way you would expect a minister to speak of the officer commanding the Canadian forces, an officer of his department, because evidently, the hon. minister had the party in that position in mind when he made the statement I have just referred to. It is just possible, I fancy, and I think this House will see that in its entirely probable that out of his warm feeling for Major-General Hutton, out of his desire to see an officer who has done his work, receive his reward, in a measure, in the praise of members of the Canadian parliament, out of his love for the militia, and out of his pride in the achievements of the militia, the hon. member for Victoria introduced that question here this afternoon. I am here to say, that, though I am not a militiaman, I know something of the opinion of the militia officers and members of the militia in Canada, I know something of the opinion of the volunteer force of Canada, and I am here to say, that, while there may be a fault found here and there with the strictness of the manner in which Major-General Hutton has commanded, there is, outside of those who have met him in personal conflict as to personal interests, a clear and definite conviction that General Hutton did his duty in Canada manfully, that he did it ably, to the best of his ability, and as a British soldier and commander should do his duty to this country.

In saying that, I am in nowise criticising my gallant colleague, at my right, here, whose picture the hon. member for Alberta has frequently referred to, who is a good soldier—as good a soldier as Canada has—who has gone, with the pulse of his loyalty beating strongly to fight the battles of his country in South Africa. That is a matter which will stand upon its own footing; that is a matter that will stand upon its own basis, and if, when the correspondence is brought down, we find that General Hutton badly treated the gallant Lieut.-Col. Hughes, there will be no one more anxious to condemn him than I am upon the floor of this House. But, can we, for a moment, think that any such minor matter as that would send Major-General Hutton from Canada; can we for a moment think that his dispute with Lieut.-Col. Hughes would cause him to leave Canada. It is only a small matter in the work which a general has to do in this country. He has to deal with the Militia Department in Canada, he has to deal with the Minister of Militia in Canada. We found the hon. member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Domville) asserting that British generals were jackasses; we have heard the hon. member for King's, N.B., asserting that General Hutton was practically a nuisance to Canada, that we were glad to get rid of him, that the unanimous sentiment of this country desired his recall and his return, and we have the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Borden) standing up immediately afterwards and saying that the government could not be held responsible for these sentiments, but he never, for one moment, suggested that these sentiments were improper, or untrue. Is it not an evident fact that there are reasons, other than a mere dispute with Lieut.-Col. Hughes, that are taking Major-General Hutton away? I am not going to suggest what these reasons might be; certainly, the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence must, to a certain extent, be connected with these reasons, otherwise, he would have made a disclaimer to the House of Commons this afternoon. But, we have had the announcement, as I understood it by the hon. minister, an announcement which seems to have caused a sort of unpleasant shade to cross over the faces of the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), and of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), for a moment, that the Militia Act is to be changed, that it will be no longer necessary that the officer commanding the Canadian forces shall be an officer from the Imperial army. In other words, we have practically had the announcement from the Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden) that the Bill promoted by my hon. friend (Mr. Domville) is to be adopted by the government, and that hereafter it will rest with the Canadian militia authorities to say whether a Canadian or an Imperial officer shall command the militia in Canada. The question immediately arises: Where will politics then be in the Militia Department? At the present time—I am not charging it is true, because I have no charge to make—at the present time there may be political influence in the selection of minor officials and minor officers, but there can be no politics in the selection of the general commanding, because he must be an Imperial officer. If we are to be permitted to appoint a Canadian officer, then I fancy we shall have come to the millennium days if we do not have political influence and political pull brought into the selection, not only of the minor officers, but into the selection of the general officer commanding. We are all anxious that Canadians should occupy the very highest positions in Canada, and we are anxious as well that the highest positions in the British army shall, if possible, be filled by Canadians and by graduates of our military college. If the government will pledge themselves to us that they will only select Canadians who have the very best of service record, such men, for instance, as

Lt.-Col. Otter, who is now commanding the Canadian contingent in South Africa, if the government could give us that assurance, so far as I am concerned, and speaking for myself—I am not quite so military as some of the hon. gentlemen around me—I say that it will require that assurance before we should be willing to accept the suggestion that we shall have a Canadian officer, with possibly a political pull, to occupy the position which hitherto has been occupied by an Imperial officer.

Mr. JAMES SUTHERLAND (North Oxford). It is not my intention to discuss the merits of the question raised by the hon. member (Mr. Prior). That hon. gentleman, in the course of some remarks made by a member from this side of the House, took the opportunity to deny that he stated that politics influenced the present minister (Mr. Borden) in the administration of the Militia Department. Let the House and the country read the speech of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Prior) and then ask him: For what reason did he bring this question up at the present time?

Mr. PRIOR. I will tell you.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Prior) commenced by referring to the promises made by the hon. Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden), and the burden of the balance of his speech was, that politics influenced the action of the Minister of Militia at the present time. Well, Sir, I need not leave it to this House, but I leave it to the militia force of Canada, whom I confidently believe will say, that never since the Militia Department of Canada was instituted have they found a minister at its head, freer from politics and freer from political considerations in administering the department, than is the present Minister of Militia.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Sir, I am willing to accept the judgment of the militia force of Canada on that score. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Prior) told us that the empire was in the throes of war, and that it was unfortunate that such an occurrence should take place at such a critical time, but it did not seem to occur to him that it was unfortunate that a lieutenant-colonel in the militia, and a member of the House of Commons, should at this very critical time get up and criticise the action of the Imperial government. I regret, too, that the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) should be guilty of the same indiscretion. So far as my humble judgment goes, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Prior) took this course simply for the purpose of trying to make a little political capital out of the matter. As an officer of the militia of Canada, as a member of this parliament, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Prior), not having the papers before him, might have said to himself, that this was an unfortunate time to insinuate censure on the Minister of Militia, who to-day has such important work in the interests of the empire thrown upon his hands. Why did not the hon. gentleman (Mr. Prior) wait until he had all the facts before him? Did it occur to him that it was unfortunate that the Major-General Commanding was not aware that this was a critical time in the history of the empire, and that he might have so conducted himself that no such occurrence would take place. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Prior), in his attempt to make political capital out of it, has by insinuation been very unfair to the Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden). I leave it to the Conservative members of this House who are officers of the militia to say, whether the minister (Mr. Borden) has not conducted the affairs of his department without any reference to politics. Sir, my hon. friend and colleague (Mr. Borden) and his officials, deserve the greatest possible credit for the manner in which they have discharged their arduous duties during the past few months. The hon. member for Victoria, B.C., (Mr. Prior) is the last man in this House whom we would expect to take such a course as he has taken to-day. My hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Montague) seems to have become much exercised that any one should pass the slightest criticism on the hon. gentleman (Mr. Prior). Surely when a subject is brought before this House, we have a right to form our judgment and to express our opinion upon it. If it is necessary to have a discussion at all, I say Sir, that it is in the interests of the empire, in the interests of Canada, in the interests of our militia force, and in the interests of General Hutton, that this discussion should not take place in the absence of the papers bearing on the matter. For my own part, I am willing to submit to the judgment of the Imperial authorities on this matter. It is a question out of which no political capital should be attempted to be made. It is a question which should be discussed at the proper time, and that proper time is not now.

Mr. PRIOR. The hon. member for King's, N.B., (Mr. Domville) and others, have seen fit to accuse me of bringing this matter before the House for political purposes. Sir, I deny that in toto. I had no such thought. It was my belief that when this matter was mentioned the Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden) would be the first man to uphold General Hutton, an officer who has been under him in his department for so long. But, instead of that, the hon. minister (Mr. Borden) sees fit to keep his seat without saying a single word in defence of General Hutton.

It was also hinted by the hon. member for King's, N.B., (Mr. Domville), as well as by the minister, that I had brought this matter up at somebody's request. Let me tell this House that I have not had a single word from anybody, either inside the House or outside the House, either in the Militia Department or from any gentleman who was in the Militia Department, requesting me to bring this matter forward. I did it because I think I have enough of the spirit of fair-play in me to see that it was a most cowardly thing to allow a general officer commanding our militia to leave the country without one word being said as to the reason why he was leaving. If there is anything against Major General Hutton, let the government say what it is and give him a chance to refute it. If he were not a man of such sterling fairness himself, I believe he could enlighten the country as to the reason why he is going; but no doubt he prefers to let the onus fall upon himself rather than upon the government. If the matter had not been brought up, it would have been a virtual condemnation of him, and I am sure there is no person in this House to-day who wishes to treat a man so unfairly as that. I have nothing further to say except that I am very glad I did bring this matter up, as General Hutton now knows the worst that can be said against him in the country.

Mr. N. CLARKE WALLACE (West York). I desire to say a few words on this matter before a vote is taken. The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) has made the statement that the hon. member for Victoria, B.C., (Mr. Prior) did a great injustice in not waiting until the papers came down. What papers? The correspondence with reference to the member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) are the only papers I know of. Then it must be that the removal of Gen. Hutton is in consequence of the dealings with the member for North Victoria, that is, if we are to accept the statement of the member for North Oxford as correct. I would like to ask another question. It is rumored that the government of Canada have asked for the recall of General Hutton. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Militia, is that correct?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). Put a notice on the paper.

Mr. WALLACE. I could do that, but if the hon. minister is not desirous of giving that information on that important point to-day, he would be no more willing if a notice were put on the paper, because we know from past experience that when the ministers do not wish to answer questions, they find many excuses for not doing so. At any rate, I would like to ask the government another question—whether the statement of the hon. member for King's, N.B., (Mr. Domville) is correct, that Major-General Hutton had received no appointment in Africa or no request to go to Africa. If the hon. member made that statement from information received from the government, I think we should have information on that point too. I think, as some other members on this side of the House have expressed themselves, it is a lamentable fact that Major-General Hutton, who left his home in the old country and come here to Canada, and, as we all know, has devoted himself with diligence, energy and earnestness to improve the militia of Canada, leaves to-day without a kindly word from the First Minister, who not only did not utter a kindly word but deprecated the utterance of such a word from any member of the House of Commons and that the Minister of Militia himself, though he was anxious that the major-general should give him (the minister) a certificate and he quoted that, had not one word of kindness or recognition to say of the ability, the energy and the soldierly qualities displayed by the Major-General Commanding for these years past. For my part, I can re-echo what has been said, at any rate from this side of the House, that the major-general carries with him to South Africa or wherever he may go the best wishes of the large majority of the people of Canada. I can also at the same time repudiate the brutal utterances—if that is not unparliamentary—of the hon. member for King's, N.B., a supporter of the government—utterances in reproof of which the government had not a word to say, and which I am sure no loyal man in this country would use towards one with the regard and reputation of Major-General Hutton and those British generals who are so freely shedding their blood to-day in South Africa for the maintenance of the great British Empire.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

BROCKVILLE AND WEST HURON ELECTIONS.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to give notice that when motions are called to-morrow, I will move:

That the poll-books, voters' lists and all other papers, letters, documents and memoranda relating to the last election for the electoral district of Brockville and the last election for the electoral district of the west riding of the county of Huron, which were referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections during the last session of this House, and also all proceedings and evidence had, given, taken or received by or before the said Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections during the last session of this House respecting the matters aforesaid, be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections appointed during the present session of this House for further consideration, and for the purpose of inquiring into and investigating the conduct of the respective returning officers and of the several deputy returning and other officers at and in connection with the said several elections respectively.

LEGISLATION RESPECTING FRIENDLY SOCIETIES.

Mr. W. H. MONTAGUE (Haldimand). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance at this early period of the session, because it is a matter interesting a great number of people and societies, whether he intends to re-introduce his Bill of last year respecting friendly insurance societies.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). No. In answer to some gentlemen who called on me with reference to that subject some time ago, I stated—and my answer was communicated to the press—that it was not the intention of the government to proceed with that measure.

Mr. MONTAGUE. In no form at all?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No measure touching friendly societies.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—THE CANADIAN CONTINGENTS.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved:

That the House resolve itself into committee to consider the following resolutions:—

1. Resolved, that it is expedient to provide that from and out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada there shall and may be paid and applied a sum, not exceeding in the whole the sum of eight hundred and fifty thousand dollars, being the sum of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars authorized under Order in Council, dated the fourth day of November, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-nine, and the sum of six hundred thousand dollars authorized by Order in Council, dated the fifth day of January, one thousand nine hundred, towards payment of the expenditure incurred, or to be incurred, in sending the contingents of Canadian volunteers to South Africa, or in connection therewith, and the members of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, and the officers and persons who authorized or made the expenditure of any of the said sums under the Orders in Council above referred to, or under any warrant of His Excellency the Governor General issued in consequence of or on the authority thereof, are hereby indemnified and exonerated from all liability by reason of having used or authorized the use of the above-mentioned sums of money, or any portion thereof, without due legal authority, and all expenditure heretofore made of any of said sums shall be held to have been lawfully made.

2. In addition to the said sum of eight hundred and fifty thousand dollars referred to in the preceding resolution, there shall and may be paid and applied, from and out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada, a further sum not exceeding in the whole the sum of one million one hundred and fifty thousand dollars towards defraying any further expenditures that may be incurred in connection with the sending of Canadian volunteers for active service in South Africa, and for providing as hereinafter mentioned by way of allowance to such volunteers or their dependents.

3. The word 'expenditures' in the foregoing resolutions includes the following:—

(a) All expenses of every kind in connection with the raising, enrolling, arming, equipping, provisioning, despatching and transporting of the said contingents up to the time of their arrival at the place of debarkation in South Africa;

(b) The payments of the officers, non-commissioned officers and men composing the said contingents up to the time of debarkation as aforesaid, at the rates authorized by the regulations and orders of the Department of Militia and Defence;

(c) All separation allowances paid to the wives and children of the married non-commissioned officers and men at the rates laid down by the Imperial regulations;

(d) The difference between the rates of pay of the officers, non-commissioned officers and men which they receive or are entitled to receive from Her Majesty's government during their period of service in South Africa and the respective rates of pay received by them up to the time of debarkation in South Africa—such difference not to be paid to such officers, non-commissioned officers and men while on such service, but the amount which would be payable to each such officer, non-commissioned officer or man to be placed to his credit, and to be applied in such manner as the Governor in Council may determine, for the benefit of the dependents on him, or failing such application to be paid to him or his representative at the close of his period of service.

He said : Mr. Speaker, the general question of sending Canadian contingents to South Africa having already been discussed in the House, I do not think it is necessary for me to make any extended remarks in presenting the motion which stands in my name. When the House goes into committee, no doubt the House will expect from the Minister of Militia, whose department is charged with the expenditure, such information as is usually asked in relation to the expenditure of public money. I shall therefore be content to move these resolutions in the briefest terms. They are for the purpose of appropriating the sum of $2,000,000 from the treasury of Canada for the expenses connected with the sending of the Canadian contingents to aid in the defence of the empire in South Africa. It is, as it should be, the largest contribution made by any of the British colonies on this great and important occasion. We have had some expressions of opinion as to whether or not it was wise to deal with this matter without first having parliament summoned. I only refer to that to-day for the purpose of saying that whatever differences of opinion may have been entertained on that subject by one or two members of this House, now that parliament is in session and we are in a position to invite the attention of parliament to this matter in the usual form, I trust there will be no division of opinion whatever, but a unanimous vote of the House of Commons of Canada for the appropriation of this money to this great Imperial purpose.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to make a few remarks upon this question, and I think it is unfortunate that my hon.

friend, in making the motion, did not go more fully into particulars. I may say that I heartily approve of the motion, but I think it would be desirable to have a little fuller information in regard to what is intended and the bearing that motion has upon the position in which we stand in relation to this question.

I wish to take the opportunity, as I see the hon. Minister of Public Works is in the House, of correcting that hon. gentleman with regard to certain statements which he has made concerning myself. I am quite satisfied that he has been entirely misled in the statements he has made on various occasions with reference to the position which I have taken with regard to this question of a contribution by Canada for the purpose of sustaining Her Majesty's government, when engaged in wars in any part of the world. The hon. gentleman will, I am quite sure, on correction be disposed to withdraw the assertion he made. Not only has he, from some cause or other, been entirely misled, but he has also been able to mislead my right hon. friend; and as this is a matter of great importance, as it concerns a question that I have always regarded as one of prime importance, I am quite sure the House will indulge me while, as briefly as I can, I draw their attention to this matter.

The hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), at the Reform Club, in Montreal, on the 11th October, said :

He (Tarte) was the first Canadian to become a member of the Imperial Federation League. That was in 1887, but three years later, 1890, Sir Charles Tupper expressly said that Canada should not be expected to become embroiled in European wars, and he was surprised that Sir Charles Tupper took another step to-day.

The hon. gentleman also, on a more recent occasion, at the banquet given by the Young Liberals in Toronto, on the 30th January, said :

I have been, during the last twelve years, a member of the Imperial Federation League, and it is no injustice to Sir Charles Tupper to remind you that that gentleman has persistently fought, before the Imperial League, the idea of helping England in her outside wars.

That is a very strong statement, and being the very reverse of the truth, being opposed to everything I have ever done or said, as a member of the Imperial League or in any other capacity in public life, the House will see the importance of my setting the hon. gentleman right and showing him that he has entirely misapprehended my position with regard to that question. The hon. Minister of Public Works said :

Sir Charles Tupper has changed his opinion on several occasions, and perhaps I should not blame him much, because I have done the same thing myself.

I am afraid the hon. gentleman will have to shield himself behind somebody else as to change of opinions, because I have never changed my opinion with regard to this important question. I have always held the importance of the outlying portions of Her Majesty's Dominion being in a position to give the most substantial aid in their power to the mother country wherever and whenever the occasion might require it. And I am sure that hon. gentlemen on both sides will agree with me that that being the case, I would fail in my duty on this occasion if I did not draw the attention of the House to the great, I will not say wilful, inaccuracy of which the hon. gentleman has been guilty, for I presume that when he made that statement so publicly on two occasions, he really believed he was stating what was the fact. I think, however, I will satisfy him, and I am sure I will satisfy my right hon. friend the leader of the House, that the position the hon. Minister of Public Works took is entirely inaccurate and unfounded on anything I have ever said or did.

In 1884, the Right Hon. George W. Foster brought forward the project of founding an Imperial Federation League. He did so at a very important meeting held in the Westminster Palace Hotel. A motion was made by the Right Hon. Mr. Smith, the leader of the House of Commons, seconded by the Earl of Rosebery, if I remember right, and Mr. Foster was good enough to call upon me to support that motion. The motion was stronger than I felt warranted in supporting, because it declared that unless the federation of the empire could be accomplished the empire would go to pieces. I stated frankly to that meeting, at which was present a large number of peers and members of the House of Commons, that I was unable to commit myself to a declaration that I thought was of a dangerous character, and likely to be misunderstood abroad and do mischief. I may say that, upon my suggestion, the resolution was modified. The Imperial Federation League was founded, and the Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald became a member of it, and in 1889, when I was pressed to give to the Imperial Federation League at its annual banquet, my views as to the position of Canada on that question, I took the matter up and subsequently became a member of that league and was for some time associated with it.

But the speech to which the hon. Minister of Public Works referred was a speech made, in the first instance, at a meeting of the Imperial Federation League, when I moved a resolution for the appointment of a select committee to examine into and report in what manner the unity of the empire could be best accomplished, and I subsequently embodied the substance of that speech made in moving that resolution, which was also, at a very large meeting of the Imperial Federation League, carried unanimously—I subsequently embodied my views with regard to the best means of promoting the unity of the empire in an article in the Nineteenth Century. My right hon. friend was wrong in quoting the date of that article as 1892. It is contained in the Nineteenth Century of April, 1891. I may say to my right hon. friend that I felt greatly flattered at his doing me the honour of reading so large a portion of the article I had written. And I regret very much that he had not gone a little further—because, if he had done so, he would have found that that very article in the Nineteenth Century contained an absolute refutation of the statement made by the Minister of Public Works and the opinion that my right hon. friend had been led to adopt in regard to my position on that question. I may say that the ground I took on that occasion and the ground I took upon subsequent occasions, was this: When the question was brought forward of imposing a tax upon the colonies for the support of Her Majesty's navy, I joined issue, holding that it would be most mischievous. I believed that for an arrangement to be made for the colonies to be called upon to levy a heavy burden, contribution, or a contribution of any kind for the support of Her Majesty's navy was not only the best means of supporting the British government, but it was fraught, I believe with dangerous consequences that would result in promoting anything but the unity of the British Empire. I may draw the attention of the House to the omission made by my right hon. friend as shown by the very article from which he did me the honour to quote a long extract to the House. I will not read what the hon. gentleman quoted, but I will read a further portion of that article. This is an article in the Nineteenth Century for October, 1891:

There is no doubt that in a comparatively few years a large population will occupy Canada, and that England will be strengthened by a great British auxiliary on the northern half of the continent of North America. Canada has, in addition, expended since confederation over forty millions of dollars upon her militia and Mounted Police, and in the establishment of a military college, which I am proud to know from one of the highest authorities, is second to no military school in the world—

In passing, I may say that I thoroughly concur in the sentiment expressed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) that the Royal Military College is a proud and enduring monument to the late Alexander Mackenzie when leader of the government in this country.

—and of nine other military schools and batteries in the various provinces of which Canada is composed. In 1839 Canada expended no less than two millions of dollars on the militia, and the North-west Mounted Police, which any one who knows the country will admit is a most effective means of defence. It is true we have a comparatively small permanent force, but we have established military schools, and we have such a nucleus of a further force as, in case of need, would enable us to develop the militia in the most effective manner, consisting of 37,000 volunteers who are trained annually, and a reserve of 1,000,000 men liable to be called upon should the necessity arise. One of the most effective means adopted by the Imperial parliament for the defence of the empire is by subsidizing fast steamers built under Admiralty supervision, with armament which can be available at a moment's notice. These steamers could maintain their position and keep up mail communication in time of war, or be used for the transport of troops. Canada has contributed £15,000 a year to a splendid line of steamers, such as are now plying between Canada, Japan and China, and has offered no less than £165,000 per annum to put a service like the 'Teutonic' between England and Canada, and a fast service between Canada and Australia. All these splendid steamers would be effective as cruisers if required for the protection of British commerce and the transport of troops and thousands of volunteers from the colonies to any point that the protection of the empire demanded. These actual facts illustrate, in my opinion, the best mode of contributing to the strength and defence of the empire.

My right hon. friend will see that this is entirely inconsistent with the idea that we were to incur no further obligation, and take no further part in aiding Her Majesty's government in any difficulty in which the mother country might be placed. Now, I would draw the attention of my right hon. friend and the Minister of Public Works to this. I have here an article in the Nineteenth Century for April, 1892, in which I was dealing with the criticisms that the first article had evoked. In that article I say:

I may say, however, that I did not refer to what Canada had done to promote the security of the empire as in any way absolving her from further expenditure, but as an indication of her readiness to discharge her duty in this regard.

So, the right hon. gentleman will see that I entirely protected myself against any such impression as he seemed to have gathered, that I thought Canada should not come to the aid of the mother country in case of any wars that might take place. At a meeting of the Royal Colonial Institute in 1894, when the most noble the Marquis of Lorne was in the chair, I read a paper in support of Imperial aid being given to the fast line of steamers between the mother country and Canada, and in support also of the proposition that the mother country and the colonies should unite in establishing a Pacific cable between Australia and Canada. Replying to certain criticisms of Sir John Colomb, I said:

This further I may tell to Sir John Colomb—and I am speaking by the book—that one of the first services for which this line of steamers will be available in case of war is in carrying volunteers from Canada and Australia to fight the battle of England and maintain British institutions.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Now, I ask you if it is possible, with these statements put on record in the strongest manner in an influential review and in discussion before the Royal Colonial Institute, for any person to say that the attitude I assumed was one in any degree whatever in conflict with the view that Canada was bound, and that Canada was prepared whenever and wherever the necessity arose, to send her volunteers in aid of the mother country. I may explain where I joined issue with others on this question. Sir John Colomb, who was a member of parliament, and a member of the Imperial Defence League, took up very warily and actively the question of colonial contribution to the navy. It seemed that the only thing he proposed to do in regard to the promotion of the unity of the empire was to adopt a policy under which the various colonies should be compelled to support the navy. As I say, I joined issue with him, and when, consequently, the Imperial Federation League was dissolved—and dissolved largely in consequence of the inability of the parties who were taking that line to secure the co-operation of the Imperial Federation League—a defence committee was formed, of which Sir John Colomb and Mr. Arthur Loring, the Secretary of the League, were members. Mr. Loring published a letter in the London Times, August, 1885, in which he used this language:

Either means must be found for including the great self-governing colonies, containing eleven millions of our own race, in the system by which the navy is provided and administered, or they must be fairly warned that if this cannot be done they must see to their own safety.

Well, I do not hesitate to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I resented that action and that attitude in the strongest manner I possibly could. I took that question up when called upon to address the Royal Geographical Society at Tyneside, with the Hon. Sir Edward Grey in the chair, who was either at that time Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, or who had been so. With this gentleman, one of the leaders of the Liberal party in the chair, I discussed this question that had been raised in that way by this young gentleman who had been secretary of the Imperial Federation League. I do not wish to inflict on the House all that I said in that long address, but I will give a few points to show the House exactly the attitude I took in regard to what I considered a most important matter:

No statesman of the present day would venture to make such a statement as the one referred to, as they all—of whatever party—hold the opinion so well expressed by the late Lord Derby when, in the little England days, Sir William Molesworth moved his famous resolution in favour of a like proposal to relieve the mother country from civil and military expenditure on account of the colonies. Lord Stanley—as he then was—said:

'I am compelled to come to the same conclusion as the Under Secretary of State, and with him to believe that the effect of this motion, if carried out, would be the entire abandonment of the colonial empire. To that step, I will never consent.

That was from so eminent a man as that great Rupert of debate, Lord Derby. Mr. Loring added :

In order to effect this, it will be necessary to induce these colonies to contribute to the cost of naval defence, and the people of the United Kingdom to admit the colonies to a share in the ownership and the administration of the navy.

Now, Sir, I took the position in the strongest way that any proposal on the part of the Imperial government to levy any taxation whatever upon British colonies for any such purpose, would be taxation without representation. I may say here that some hon. gentlemen opposite seem to have entirely misunderstood my own opinion in regard to taxation without representation. My objection to the whole proposal was that it would involve at once taxation by the Imperial government of the British colonies by a parliament in which they had no representation, and would, in fact, bring about a condition of things as objectionable as that which led to the revolt of the American colonies. I may add that in this speech before the Tyneside Geographical Society, on November 21, 1895, I used the following language :—

The Lords of the Admiralty, after the most careful consideration, have placed on record the opinion that no better means exists of strengthening the naval power of the empire by a moderate outlay than by fast mail steamers, built under Admiralty supervision and prepared to take on armament and to be available for Her Majesty's services as 'royal navy reserve cruisers' whenever required by the British government. Canada stands pledged by Act of Parliament to pay £190,000 sterling per annum for a fleet of nine such steamers, five of which are now on the Pacific, and the remaining four, I trust, will soon be put on the line between this country and Canada, bringing it and the mother country within five days of each other. These cruisers, in time of peace, will be strengthening the empire by promoting commerce and intercommunication; be able to maintain that communication by their speed and armament when ordinary mail steamers would be compelled to abandon the route, and be ready, if required, to carry troops to any part of the world. The past history of Canada—

Mark that, Mr. Speaker.

—warrants the belief that one of the first things for which they would be utilized would be to carry brave Canadian volunteers to any part of the world where the honour or interests of this empire were threatened. Let those who sneer at what Canada has done to promote the unity and integrity of the empire read the testimony of Lord Jersey, who so ably represented the Imperial government at the conference at Ottawa:

I may say, in order to make that point plain, that the whole demand that a levy should be made upon the British colonies, and upon Canada especially—because it was said that Australia had done something in the way of creating a navy—the whole demand was based upon the principle that Canada was contributing absolutely nothing towards the strength of the empire, either in its army or navy; and in consequence of that contention I brought forward what Canada had done, that in my judgment was eminently calculated to strengthen the empire, giving the evidence in that direction. I will quote what Lord Jersey said at the time of the conference here in Ottawa :

Suffice it to say, that the spirit which inspires me—and I doubt not, inspires all my colleagues—is one of absolute sympathy with the far-seeing policy that has called us together, and could there be any more fitting place than the grand Dominion of Canada. His Excellency has well pointed out her splendid position in this question. It is with wonder that I think what Canada has done to bring the northern and southern parts of this empire together. She has linked the two great oceans, after an exhibition of courage, constancy and skill which has never been surpassed in the history of the world.

At that conference the representatives of Canada, Australia and New Zealand united in a proposal to join this country in laying a Pacific cable to Australasia—free from the dangers that beset the existing lines—declared by the highest military and naval authorities to be of vital importance to the defence of the empire. Is the past action of Canada not sufficient to prove that she is not insensible to the responsibility that devolves upon her as a component part of this great empire, and that in future, as in the past, she will be always found ready to discharge her duty to the utmost extent of her ability? . . .

My right hon. friend will see at once that instead of having put forward what Canada had done as a discharge of all claims upon her, I put it forward as an evidence of the great contribution that she had made in the past to the strength of the empire, and I referred to it as an evidence that whenever and wherever the interests of the empire required she would be ready to discharge her duty. Now, I may say that the Times newspaper, which had watched this controversy on the question of the support to the navy by a levy upon the outlying portions of the empire, made this very authentic statement, and I may add that I could give you, if time permitted, statements from every prominent journal in the city of London and throughout Great Britain, sustaining precisely the position which the Times took. The Times of September 17, 1895, referring to Mr. Loring's proposition made in that newspaper, said :

The colonies are to be invited to share the control and administration of the navy, in consideration of a contribution to be made by them towards the cost of its maintenance; and the committee express the truly astonishing opinion that a change of the kind suggested need not necessarily lead to any serious alteration in the present methods of controlling and directing the royal navy. We really must protest against a proposal to shift the centre of gravity of the British Empire in this light-hearted fashion.

The navy exists primarily for the defence, security and prosperity of the United Kingdom. The defence, security and prosperity of the United Kingdom depends on a world-wide maritime commerce. If, solely for the sake of argument, we assume for a moment that no single colony retains its connection with the mother country, it by no means follows that the cost of the naval defence of the United Kingdom, with its world-wide maritime interests, would be reduced to any appreciable extent. . . Thus the gratuitous defence of the colonies by the British navy is perhaps the strongest bond of Imperial union that could be devised, because the colonies obtain an appreciable advantage at little or no appreciable cost to the mother country. It is certain that the colonies would be less secure if they could no longer rely on the protection of the navy: it is by no means certain that the cost of the naval defence of the United Kingdom and its commerce would be materially diminished if the navy were relieved of the responsibility of defending the colonies. The question brought forward by these hon. gentlemen (Sir John Colomb and Mr. Loring) was this, a proposition to show that 11,000,000 of British colonists in Canada, South Africa and Australasia would have to contribute, and if they contributed it would naturally assume the character of a relative contribution proportionate to the population. That would be, in any mode in which it could be devised, establishing a precedent that, in my judgment, would absolutely propound the doctrine of taxation without representation, and it was therefore objectionable in the highest degree. I pointed out what Canada had done, what she was prepared to do, and, again and again, on every occasion I stated, in regard to this fast Atlantic service, that one of the very first services that these steamers would be called upon to perform, under the arrangement with Her Majesty's government, which placed them entirely at their disposal in case war was declared, would be to carry thousands of brave Canadian volunteers to the scene of action and to aid Great Britain in fighting her battles in any part of the world in which need might arise. I am quite sure that I need not detain the House another moment in pointing out to my right hon. friend and to the hon. Minister of Public Works that they have entirely misapprehended the whole scope and attitude of the position I have taken on that question, and that no further discussion need be added in regard to that.

Now, Sir, I may say that I want to refer for a single moment to the resolution which the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has placed before the House, and I want to repeat again my statement of extreme satisfaction at finding that the government have become so much alive to their duty, and it is undoubtedly an imperative duty, to take the course which the government have taken in placing this very considerable vote before the House for its support. But in doing so, I want to meet, what I suppose was intended as a sneer by my right hon. friend, or a taunt, that he was waiting for the amendment to be moved by myself in virtue of statements I had made at Vancouver, in the first instance, at all events, statements that I had made in various parts of the country, that I should be prepared to support, in this House, the payment by Canada of the entire cost of the Canadian contingents. I may remind my right hon. friend that I do not think that I am exposed to any sneer or taunt for not moving an amendment to the address, and I will venture to say why. In the first instance, the point on which we differed was whether there should be any aid given by Canada to the mother country on this occasion. My right hon. friend gave an official pronouncement on this question in which he declared that the law and the constitution of this country forbade him doing anything, that he would do nothing, because he could do nothing, and he was good enough to say, I think, on a recent occasion, that the attitude which I had taken on this question had cleared the way for him. I think, now that he has had explained the position I had taken on this question of Canada giving support to the Imperial arms, it will relieve him of any such impression or idea. But I may say that the matter was happily settled by the government having changed their position and deciding that they would send a number of volunteers, or a number of parties who had volunteered to go to South Africa. I do not hesitate to say, in view of the correspondence which has been laid on the Table of the House, correspondence with the Imperial government and with other colonies, that I regret that Canada, the brightest jewel in the Crown of England, which forms a portion of Her Majesty's dominions in this wide empire—should not have been the first to offer its services instead of the last. And I deplore the fact that my right hon. friend and the government did not at once, promptly, make the offer to Great Britain that was made by the colony of New Zealand. New Zealand proposed to send a troop of mounted men and horses, equipment and everything of that kind, and they asked that they should be allowed to pay the full charge of that contingent. I regret to say that I cannot find any evidence that the government of Canada ever gave the faintest intimation to Her Majesty's government that we were willing to pay the cost of the Canadian contingent. I shall not detain the House with that, as it has become a subject of discussion before, further than to say that the answer that my right hon. friend gave is not sufficient that the proposals to Her Majesty's government, to the right hon. Secretary of State for the Colonies, and the arrangement proposed by the right hon. Secretary of State for War, precluded such an offer. It did not preclude such an offer, because I will show my right hon. friend that they took exactly the same position in reference to that that they took in respect to the units of 125 men that were to go over without any indication of their colonial character, and were to be incorporated in the British army. I took strong exception to that, and as my right hon. friend will remember, I ventured to offer the suggestion that the honour and interest of Canada required that the force sent out by Canada should be a Canadian force, officered by a Canadian officer, although embodied, under a British general, as part of the great force that Her Majesty's government had sent to South Africa. My right hon. friend ventured to use some rather strong language at Bowmanville in reference to that. He said now that they had agreed to do what the colonies were required to do, to send these units forward, they were yelling at Toronto that they should be sent as a contingent and officered by a Canadian officer. But that did not prevent my right hon. friend from taking a wise course and pressing upon Her Majesty's government that the Canadian force should go, not as units, but as a distinctive Canadian contingent, and if, without saying anything about being more loyal than the Queen, or wiser than the Secretary for War, they had said what New Zealand said, in the strongest, clearest and most emphatic terms, that they wished to pay the entire cost of the contingent, they would have met the expectations of the country. But I am grateful for the smallest concessions on the part of this government. I am grateful, in the first place, for the Prime Minister has changed his original attitude of hostility to any aid being sent to the mother country. Then, when my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) gave out an official communique or memorandum of what was proposed to be done, and again having ventured to address my right hon. friend, I am gratified to know that he adopted the suggestion made to him, and decided that our soldiers should not go as units, as stated in that communique, but as a Canadian contingent officered by Canadians and commanded by a distinguished Canadian officer. I was at Vancouver when it was announced that my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was going to send a second contingent, and, as I have already said to the House; I then stated I was rejoiced to learn that the government had become so fully alive to their duty, and I trusted that the speech of the Governor General at the opening of parliament would announce that Canada proposed to pay the entire cost of the contingents. I repeat to the House that on every occasion whenever and wherever throughout Canada this question was raised—and it was raised in my presence before thousands of people—it was the universal opinion of men of all classes, of all races, of all creeds and of all parties, that the honour and interest of Canada demanded that we should send substantial aid to Her Majesty's government, and that the Canadian soldiers should be paid by Canada and not by the British government.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER.

A few days ago, on the floor of the House, I drew the attention of my right hon. friend to the fact, that although he had given us Lord Strathcona's correspondence, I still was in doubt upon the question of New Zealand not paying the entire cost of her contingent. The population of New Zealand is not 800,000 people, and we in Canada have seven times more, and are in a better position financially than the government of New Zealand to deal with such a matter. I pointed out then to the Prime Minister, that although Lord Strathcona had gone to the Colonial Office, he had based the decision of the Colonial Office on despatches Nos. 13 and 16, in which New Zealand offered to pay her contingent, and the answer of the British government that they preferred themselves to pay their men in the field. I pointed out that in the same correspondence was to be found a later despatch, No. 82, from the New Zealand government stating that they intended to pay the entire cost of their contingent. I was afraid that some misunderstanding had taken place, because despatch No. 92, answering that, did not contain the slightest objection to the proposal of New Zealand to pay the entire cost of its contingent. I attached a good deal of importance to this matter, and so I cabled to the Prime Minister of New Zealand, and I may state here that I found that the statement made by Lord Strathcona was absolutely correct. I addressed the following cable to the Prime Minister of New Zealand

Do your government pay your contingent in the field?

And the reply I received was:

We pay difference between Imperial pay and colonial pay.

That sets at rest the question. I naturally felt that there might be some misunderstanding about it and entertained the same idea which prompted the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to cable Lord Strathcona to ascertain what the actual facts were. I find that under these circumstances, Canada and all the other colonies are in the same position so far as is concerned the actual pay of the force in the field by the British government.

I found in the speech from the Throne at the opening of this session, the following statement:

A Bill will be submitted for your approval making provision for the cost of equipping and paying the cost of the Canadian contingents.

I was delighted to see that, but I regretted to learn from the Minister of Militia (Mr.

Borden) that that announcement did not include the payment in the field. However, as I find now, that this is the universal practice in all the colonies, and as the British government has not yielded to the request from New Zealand that that colony should be permitted to pay the cost of its contingent throughout, I cannot, of course, press that matter further upon the attention of the House, because my right hon. friend is fortified by the action of the Imperial government and the decision which they have come to in regard to all the other colonies. I still express my regret that upon no occasion did the Canadian government do as the New Zealand government did, which not only once but twice pressed on Her Majesty's government that the colony should have the opportunity and the pleasure of paying the entire cost of the contingent. I am delighted and gratified to find that although the Canadian government have not been allowed to pay the services of the men in the field, they propose to do as they have a right to do, and which will, I am sure, receive the unanimous commendation of every member on both sides of the House, namely, to provide the additional amount between the sum paid by the Imperial government and that which the officers and men of the North-west Mounted Police, and of the Canadian forces generally would receive if on active service in Canada. I cannot see that I am exposed to any very great taunt on the part of my right hon. friend. I think it is not usual for governments to press for amendments to the address in answer to the speech from the Throne, but, however, I will let that go.

I am very anxious to draw the attention of my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) and the Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden) to a point raised in the speech of the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). Although perhaps it may be held that I am referring to a past debate, my right hon. friend will see, as I am sure every member of the House will see, that the discussion in relation to the subject of this resolution which took place on a former occasion, must necessarily be referred to here; and I want to draw the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) to a statement which was made by Sir Richard Cartwright in his speech on the address. He said:

There was one other attack which might have been spared, made upon the government by the hon. leader of the opposition. The hon. gentleman thought that we had acted very improperly because we had not thought fit to insure our troops before they left for Africa.

I did not say that. I said that it was a cruel thing for the organ of the government to announce to a thousand men just sailing for Africa that their lives had been insured by the government to the extent of $1,000 each, when the same paper said a few days afterwards that nothing whatever in that respect had been done; and I shall take another opportunity of asking for the papers to be laid on the Table of the House so that the House will be informed of what communication did take place on that subject between the insurance companies and the government. I am quite certain that the Globe newspaper occupies too high a position in this country to have manufactured such a statement out of whole cloth, for it stated emphatically that the insurance had been effected, gave the name of the gentleman who had arranged it with the government, and stated the amount; and the press all over the country expressed its gratification that the government had made the arrangement. So that I do not see why what I said should be called an attack. It was not an attack. I wanted some explanation why it was that that statement was made, and why these thousand brave Canadian volunteers should have left our shores with the hope in their minds that in case any of them fell in battle those depending on them would receive that thousand dollars—a hope to be swept away four days afterwards. The statement was made on the 28th of October, and on the 1st of November it was declared that there was no foundation whatever for it. I think we should have some information in regard to what induced the government to abandon that proposal. It appears we have it here to a certain extent:

Sir, that hon. gentleman has a very low and poor idea of the duties of a government in a case like this.

Well, I cannot imagine any lower or poorer act on the part of a government than to mislead, as undoubtedly those thousand volunteers were misled by the announcement of the government's own organ in the great province of Ontario and by the statement made afterwards that there was no foundation whatever for the announcement.

I beg to tell that hon. gentleman that when Canada sends her sons to the front, Canada becomes responsible and will know how to redeem that responsibility to the widows and orphans of the brave men who may fall in this conflict.

Well, Sir, these are brave words, but the acts do not seem to me to run parallel with them. I find that under this arrangement the British government not only pays our men in the field, but pays the transport back to Canada of those who live to return, and wound pensions and compassionate allowances. I want to know if the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) wished to lead us to believe that the government were going to cover all the expenditure.

We do not propose to shift that duty on to the shoulders of any insurance company, and I may remind the House that, with the full concurrence of his council, my hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) gave that assurance to the last contingent that sailed from Canada.

I want to know what assurance that was. Was it that every man should feel that there would be $1,000 paid to his heirs or dependents? What was that assurance that enables the Minister of Trade and Commerce to sneer at any attempt on the part of anybody in this country, from their own private means, to secure against the casualties of war no less than $1,000 per man on 1,000 men? The hon. gentleman said:

Sir, I have no fear that the Canadian people will shrink from that duty.

I am glad to find that the government have come up step by step until we find this resolution placed before the House. I shall give it my most hearty support, and I shall give my hearty support to anything that will carry out to the fullest extent the recognition Canada owes to those brave Canadian volunteers who are taking their lives in their hands to maintain the honour of Canada in South Africa. The hon. gentleman says:

I say that the government have chosen the right way, and I say again that the brave men in the front need have no fear, if it should please Providence that they should remain on the soil of Africa, that their widows and little ones will not be the wards and the care of the state and the wards and care of every true and honest-minded Canadian.

That, Sir, is most gratifying to me; and if anything would justify me in not moving an amendment, which hon. gentlemen opposite seem extremely anxious that I should move—though it would be for the first time in my life the violation of a promise I had made in relation to a public matter—it is that the government have at last realized their responsibility on this great question; and I am quite sure that they have made no mistake in feeling that they can rest confidently on not only this House but the people of this country for the most thorough support of anything they may do in this direction.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. JOHN CHARLTON (North Norfolk). In the course of the remarks, Mr. Speaker, presented to the House this afternoon by the hon. the leader of the opposition a good deal of time was devoted by him to the task of proving that his past record had not been inconsistent with his present attitude upon the question of Imperial defence. I certainly have no disposition to call in question the accuracy of the hon. gentleman's remarks in that regard, and it would be far from affording myself or any member on this side any pleasure, were we able to prove any inconsistency in that regard. No member of this House, no citizen of this country will, I apprehend, raise the claim that the hon. leader of the opposition is not a truly loyal man—loyal to the empire and loyal to Canada.

His speech further was devoted to an attempt—justifiable perhaps from a partisan standpoint, as the leader of the opposition—to cast a certain measure of discredit upon the government for alleged tardiness in grappling with the great duty which confronted them in connection with the South African war and for half-heartedness in the course they at first pursued. His criticisms as regards this alleged lack of readiness of the government were of a character that I shall deal with in detail later on, and I think that I shall be able to convince myself at least that the government have acted in this matter with prudence, sagacity and dignity. It is to be lamented that an attempt should be made to make party capital part of this matter. This is a question above party politics, above politics in any sense. It is a question which should appeal to the patriotic impulses of every Canadian, and we should never permit an attempt to cast discredit on one party or make political capital out of this matter to be a factor in the discussion now before the House.

I propose to enter briefly into a discussion of the question as to whether the action of the government is justifiable. Of course we have this wave of patriotic fervour that has swept over the country. The government are unquestionably acting in accordance with the popular will. They have the mandate of the people to warrant their taking the course we are pursuing; but it would be well perhaps to calmly and dispassionately examine this subject and satisfy ourselves, if possible, whether, aside from excitement, aside from the general feeling that prevails in the country, there are really sound and sufficient reasons to justify the conduct of the government in this respect, and I propose briefly to deal with that question. I propose to do so because there are a great many people in Canada—more perhaps than is imagined—who are a little distrustful as to the propriety of the course the government have adopted, and who perhaps secretly cherish the opinion that this course is scarcely warranted. In my own constituency, the people are not influenced by the excitement which pervades great commercial, business and population centres; and in calmly considering this question, when this vote of $2,000,000 is asked, some of these constituents and other citizens in other rural constituencies of this country may possibly be disposed to cavil at the line of action adopted by the government, the first result of which is so palpable in the asking of this House to vote $2,000,000 to defray the expenses of the contingents. In looking this matter over, I propose to cover some little extent of ground. I propose, first of all, to inquire into the character of the British title to South Africa. We hear asserted that this is a war for independence on the part of the Boers, that they are oppressed, that they have gone back into the wilderness and established a state with a government of their own, and that now, when the impingement has come with British population and British interests, they are being trampled into the dust by the superior power of the British nation. I propose, then, to inquire into the character of the British claim in South Africa. If our title is not a good one, of course the arguments which we base upon that title are false. I propose next to inquire, very briefly, as to the importance of South Africa. It may be asserted that this is a barren, inhospitable region, incapable of supporting a great population and that the importance of the country does not justify the exertion necessary to put down this rebellion, pacify the country and make it a secure British possession. I propose next to inquire what our own interests are in Africa. Our own interests there seem to be a somewhat remote matter. We are separated from Africa by the width and length of the Atlantic Ocean. It is a voyage of over 6,000 miles from one of our seaports to Cape Town, and the impression might prevail that, whether the British title was good or not, whether the country was good or not, we at least had little or no interest in the matter, and were not called upon to make sacrifices or undergo exertion, or in any manner to interfere. I shall examine next, very briefly, into the causes of the war. If we have a good cause, the war can be justified; if not, our action cannot be upheld. I shall next deal with the question of Canadian duty, viewed from the standpoint of our connection with the empire, viewed from the particular standpoint of the fact that we are a part of the empire, growing in population and power, joined to other portions, and with common interests with the rest of the empire. Taking this view, I shall inquire what is the duty of Canada in the premises. I shall next inquire whether the government has moved in this matter with due promptitude, whether their conduct is such as to warrant them in asking the people of Canada for their approval. I shall next have something to say about the propriety of avoiding an attempt to make party capital out of this affair, and to reduce this great question to the low level of party politics.

Now, Sir, with regard to the British title to South Africa. Cape Colony was founded by the Dutch in 1652. It was taken by the English in 1795. It was ceded to the Netherlands under the provisions of the treaty of Amiens in 1803. It was again occupied by the British troops in 1806, and in August, 1814, the British government extinguished the title of the Netherlands to Cape Colony and all their colonies in South America for a consideration of £6,000,000 sterling. So, the British first conquered the country, then they occupied the country, and then they paid £6,000,000 sterling for South Africa and some colonies of insignificant importance in South America. So, our title rests upon conquest, occupation and purchase. There can be no question as to the title.

The explorations of Africa by British subjects from an early day have fairly entitled Great Britain to claim almost any portion of the continent she might desire. Mungo Park and Lander first discovered and descended the Niger from Timbuctoo to the sea. Bruce, away back in the early part of the century, traced the blue Nile to its source, supposing that it was the true Nile. Sir Samuel Baker traced the white Nile to its source, and discovered the great equatorial lakes of Albert Nyanza and Victoria Nyanza. Burton and Speke discovered the great inland sea of Tanganyika. Stanley, a British subject, and now a member of the British parliament, traced the Congo from where Livingstone had left its descent to the sea. And Livingstone, the greatest of all African explorers, gave to the world knowledge of the whole South African empire, which now claims attention. He commenced his explorations in 1841. He was a missionary, and when he commenced his explorations, the whole of Africa was a blank from Kolobing, the most northern missionary station in South Africa, to Timbuctoo and Kartoun. He penetrated to the Zambesi in 1851, and discovered the Victoria Falls. Unaided and alone, he succeeded in getting the assistance of a party of Makololo, and made the journey from Linyanti to Loanda, on the west coast of Africa in the Portuguese colony of Angola. He retraced his steps to Linyanti, near the centre of the continent, and in 1853, he took a party of 126 Makololo and traced the course of the Zambesi to its mouth, being the first white man to cross the continent of Africa. He went to England, and returned under the auspices of the Geographical Society and the British government, and explored the Zambesi, discovering Lake Nyasa, a larger body of water than Lake Erie, traced the Zambesi and the Shire River, and discovered the great inland sea of Bangweolo, on the shores of which he afterwards died. He, as a British explorer, gave us knowledge of this whole region, which now forms or which will form the South African empire.

This is a country of very great importance, a country of an importance and magnitude which very few in this country understand. It is the richest mineral country in the world. It is rich in iron, in lead, copper, in coal—richer than any other land under the sun in gold and diamonds, and rich in silver. In this country are situated the mines of the Witwatersrand, from which in 1898, £11,400,000 of gold were taken. Rhodesia, lately added to this country, extending north from the Transvaal to Lake Tanganyika, possesses, unquestionably, the richest gold-bearing region on the face of the globe, a region not developed, and only now commencing to be explored. In this region are found the traces of ancient mining, and ruins of great magnitude. Everything points to the correctness of the belief that this is the ancient Ophir. In Rhodesia, south of the Zambesi, within the next twenty years, if British supremacy is established, undoubtedly will be placed more than a million white men engaged in the cultivation of the soil, and digging from the bowels of the earth gold from the quartz reefs, and working the alluvial deposits in the valleys of the rivers. This is a region of breezy, salubrious upland, of rich valley, fertile corn lands, excellent fruit lands, and lands for the vine, a country admirably suited for settlement by whites, and possessing resources beyond the reach of imagination, resources which English statesmen are conversant with, but of which we are comparatively ignorant. The stake in this war is of immense magnitude, a stake of first-class importance, it is an empire with potential wealth beyond almost the dream or imagination of man. This South African empire, as at present constituted, contains five provinces, Cape Colony, Basutoland, Mashonaland, Natal and Rhodesia, with an area of 1,286,000 square miles. It has a native population of about 7,000,000, a white population of 475,000, and an Indian population from Hindostan, and centred in Natal, of 53,000. In addition to this are the territories of the Transvaal and the Orange Free State. The Transvaal has an area of 119,000 square miles, the Orange Free State an area of 48,000 square miles, a total of 167,000 square miles. Of these two states, the Orange Free State has a white population of 77,000, and a native population of 130,000. The Transvaal has a Boer population, according to Whitaker's almanac of 1900, of 63,000, a Uitlander population of 87,000, and a native population of 600,000. Therefore the white population of these two Dutch states now in rebellion is 227,000, with a native population of 730,000. The Boer population in these two states is 140,000. The total population of British and Dutch Africa, including these two states is 8,500,000; the total white population is 700,000; and the total Dutch population of South Africa is, in round numbers, 340,000, as near as I am able to make out. The total area of Dutch and British Africa is, in round numbers, 1,500,000 square miles.

Mr. DAVIN. May I ask my hon. friend a question? Does he separate the white from the Boers, or include the Boers with the white population?

Mr. CHARLTON. I stated that the Dutch population of South Africa was, in round numbers, 340,000, out of a total white population of 700,000. In addition to this area of 1,450,000 square miles, this South African empire abuts upon the Congo Free State with an area of 900,000 square miles, and a native population of 30,000,000; upon Portuguese West Africa with 200,000 square miles, a rich country; and upon Portuguese East Africa, Mozambique, with an area of 620,000 square miles, and a population of 1,500,000. It is not reasonable to suppose that the limits now occupied by the Anglo-Saxon race of that country will continue to measure the bounds of their African empire, and they are almost certain to acquire Portuguese East Africa, and possibly the wheel of fortune may bring around some change by which they will take what they are justly entitled to by virtue of the discovery of the great basin of the Congo, the most of the Zambesi valley with a drainage of 1,500,000 square miles. They already have most of the Zambezi valley with a drainage of 800,000 square miles embraced in that territory. Now, I have said enough with regard to this matter, I think, to make it apparent that the claim I make that South Africa is a country of great importance, is well founded. With regard to the Transvaal, I have a few interesting figures to present. The Transvaal, or the Dutch Republic of South Africa, as it is called, has for the last five or six years extracted an enormous revenue, considering the extent of its population, from the foreign residents mainly, in that territory. In 1882 the revenue of the Transvaal was $870,000. Subsequent to that the gold mines of the Witwatersrand were discovered and worked, and in 1897 the revenue of this state was $22,000,000, mainly derived from the working of the mines. The total production of the mines in 1897 was $57,000,000, of which a taxation of $22,000,000, or 38 per cent was exacted from the Uitlanders who were working those mines. This revenue was obtained by exactions of the most outrageous and unjustifiable character, monopolies of various kinds; and the money so raised was expended, not for the benefit of the community, but for the purchase of arms and munitions of war that this state of the Transvaal might place itself in a position to enter upon the career of rebellion which it is now pursuing. The city of Johannesburg, with over 100,000 inhabitants, had 250 voters; and out of the vast amount contributed by those who had their homes in that city not a dollar was expended for drains, for sewerage, for school purposes, or for anything in the shape of public benefit. When Kruger invited to the Transvaal foreign immigration, a residence of two years entitled the immigrant to the franchise ; but as the immigrants began to pour in and it became apparent to this astute old Hollander that there was danger of the Boer element being submerged by the great tide of immigration flowing in, the franchise laws were utterly repealed. After a great effort a concession was made granting the franchise at the expiration of 14 years upon condition that when that period had expired the man who wished to exercise the franchise should get the written consent of two-thirds of the Dutch men who resided in the district where he voted, and then get the consent of the authorities of Pretoria. And these men, denied the franchise, these men from whom were wrung $22,000,000 of revenue in unjust taxation, these men were liable at twelve hours notice to be called into the military service of the Transvaal, without food, without clothing, without pay. These men were living in a country in which British authority should by right have been paramount, but they were helots, slaves, without rights in the country where they lived. There were of those Uitlanders 83,000, and 63,000 Boers ; there were of those Uitlanders 70,000 British subjects, or 80 per cent ; there were 7,000 more British subjects than the total number of Boers in the Transvaal. And these men were trodden upon, these men were denied every civil right, and the purpose of the Transvaal government was to continue denying them those rights and to make their life in the Transvaal one of bitterness and humiliation.

Now, British policy in South Africa has not always been a prudent or a wise policy. This struggle that is being fought out now ought to have been fought out in the days of Majuba Hill. That was the time to settle whether Africa should be Dutch or British. And in the Soudan where Gordon's life was sacrificed at Khartoum, it was a lack of courage, a lack of comprehension of the importance of the issue that led Gladstone to fail to secure the Soudan and to rescue Gordon when it could have been done at comparatively slight cost. At that time the great colonial possessions which have since fallen into the hands of Germany, of France, and of Belgium, might have been had by the British government by merely claiming possession of them ; but the policy of the British government of that time was one which failed to comprehend or failed to grasp the situation, and we are paying to-day the penalty of the mistakes made 20 or 30 years ago. But the British authorities understand the case now, and they have now clearly defined purposes as to South Africa. Whether those purposes are right or wrong is a question to be decided later on, but the character of those purposes and the policy of the British government with regard to South Africa, are clearly defined. Those purposes are to procure just as much of South Africa as they can get, and the more they get of Africa the better for the country. If they had it all it would be a God-send to the country over which British rule would prevail. And if we look at their accomplishments we will see that they are making tolerably good progress. They have recently smashed the power of the Mahdi at Omdurman, they have nearly constructed a railway from Cairo to Khartoum, a distance of almost 2,000 miles ; they are building a railway from Mombossa, on the Indian Ocean, to Victoria Nyanza, the great equatorial lake in Uganda, a distance of 700 miles, they have pushed their railway system from Cape Town northward, they have nearly reached Mashonaland, they are almost to Salisbury, and but for the little unpleasantness that has occurred they would have reached the Zambesi. In one or two years more this line would have been pushed on northward to Lake Tanganyika ; then the gap from Tanganyika to Victoria Nyanza would have been rapidly constructed, and the dream of a railway from the Cape to Cairo would have been realized, and will be realized in due time. The scope of these English possessions is a grand one. They have acquired the entire valley of the Nile. There was a little question at one time whether France might not plant a post at Fashoda, but France has withdrawn. England has the valley of the Nile from the mouth to the Albert and the Victoria Nyanza, extending over 37 degrees of latitude, an empire in itself ; she has Uganda and great possessions in the equatorial regions of Africa. She has the great empire in South Africa, the position of which, the history of which, the value of which I am discussing to-night. This question as to the possession of Cape Colony and the country north of Cape Colony is one of importance to every person who is interested in British supremacy, and who wishes well to British interests. Cape Colony, as a strategic position, is as important as Gibraltar, is as important as any other strategic position on the globe. Its relation to Australia and its relation to India makes it a matter of prime importance that England should control it, because, in the hands of a foreign power, it would be a perpetual menace, not only maintaining the line of communication in the case of the closing of the Suez Canal, but as a rendezvous and harbour possibly for some maritime power hostile to British interests. Its strategic importance is one that cannot be overestimated. Its importance to England is a matter which, in a lesser degree, makes it a matter of importance to ourselves. Our own interests, it is unnecessary to say, are intimately blended with those of the empire, and what is calculated to injure the empire is calculated to injure ourselves. We are interested in maintaining the Imperial power from the mercenary standpoint, from the standpoint of self-interest. We cannot afford to have the Imperial power destroyed, we cannot afford to have the power and prestige of England weakened. We want her markets. Last year we sold to England 63 per cent of our exports—I say England, I mean Great Britain—we sold 63 per cent of our total exports to Great Britain, $99,000,000 worth, and to the whole world, Great Britain included, $158,000,000. Now, I repeat that the loss of territory by England involves the loss of trade, involves the loss of prestige and involves for us the loss of markets, so that we are directly and intimately interested in this question, and what is in the interest of England is in the interest of every portion of the empire, and especially in the interest of Canada, which is barred out by hostile tariffs from her natural market at her doors, and must continue to find her chief markets in the British islands. That market will be maintained and extended and will become more valuable only by the progress of British commerce and British wealth and by the continuance of British prosperity. I was talking with a young man, about 22 years of age, in my own county, who had volunteered to go to South Africa. His name is Stringer. I asked him why he was going to South Africa, and he gave me a theory of his own which he had. 'Yes,' he said, 'I am going to South Africa, not on account of England, but on account of Canada. I would like to know what would become of Canada if England is destroyed.' His reasoning was sound, he is a noble boy, and may God be his shield in battle in Africa, where he has gone to fight for the British cause.

We have certain obligations to England, and we do not, perhaps, always stop to realize what they are. We have enjoyed, from time immemorial, the protection of England, we have enjoyed the protection of England's navy and army, we have had the advantage of the services of England's diplomatic corps, we have had the advantage of the services of England's consular corps, and these advantages have not been of a less efficient character because we have not been called upon to pay a dollar for them. I say that we are under obligations to England, obligations the money value of which will infinitely exceed all that we will ever incur in the shape of expense in sending two contingents to South Africa. Then, this sending of the contingents is an epoch in our history. It is more than that, it is an epoch in British history, and the world is taking note of this thing, perhaps not saying very much about it, perhaps not fully, in some cases, realizing the significance of the thing; but, in the majority of cases, the significance of this movement is realized. I was reading an article in the January number of the North American Review, by a Russian writer, who refers to this country and says that this new movement is immense; it means that England's military strength is increased to the extent of the population of her colonies, and we may possibly have to face the eventualities of millions of the colonists of England and India being summoned into the field. When I hear talk about the magnitude of this struggle and the amount of difficulty that it imposes on England, and the strain that is to be put upon her resources, it seems to me the height of absurdity. I look back upon the struggle in the United States from 1861 to 1864, and in looking at the records I see that the North, with a population of 20,000,000, put 2,500,000 soldiers in the field, and that when the war closed they had a million veterans in arms. If this is the case, figure it out on the same basis, and it will be seen that England has a population, in round numbers, of 40,000,000, and her colonies a population, in round numbers, of 10,000,000, besides the vast hordes in India out of whom good soldiers can be made. The efforts necessary to be made to demonstrate England's capabilities as a great military power has as yet scarcely begun, and when people make pessimistic statements about the magnitude of this struggle, I laugh them to scorn. It is a large matter in one sense, it is going to cost a good deal of money and a good many lives, but to suggest that England is not capable of coping with this emergency, of putting down this rebellion of the Dutch element in South Africa is supremely preposterous.

And now, a word in regard to the character of British rule in South Africa. Of course, if we were engaged in forcing upon these people a tyrannical form of government, not calculated to bring blessings to the people, not calculated to afford to them that which every British subject has the right to demand—protection to life, protection to property, and enjoyment of liberty; if we were engaged in forcing any other kind of government on South Africa, the movement would not have my sympathy at least. But what is the character of British rule in South Africa? Sir, the character of British rule in South Africa is precisely the character of British rule in Canada. Cape Colony has representative institutions. It has two branches of the legislature; one elected by the people for seven years and the other for five. It has a governor appointed by the English government. Its premier at the present moment is an Afrikaner. Its laws and institutions are administered in the same way as our own. Two languages are permitted in the assembly, the Dutch and the English, just as French and English are permitted here, and the same degree of care for the rights of others, of generosity towards others, of respect for the rights of all, characterizes British rule in South Africa as it characterizes British rule in Canada. All these British institutions in South Africa are institutions which Great Britain does not propose to change. She proposes to conquer that country, she proposes to crush the rebellion into fine dust, and then she proposes to give to every man in South Africa—Englishman or Dutchman, white man or black man—equal liberty before the law, the right to enjoy all that he lawfully possesses, and perfect security in life, in liberty and in property. These are the institutions which South Africa, when it is erected into a dominion, would enjoy to the fullest extent and to the same degree as we do in this country. Now, Sir, I ask is not this consummation preferable to the erection of a Boer semi-civilized government—I beg pardon of my hon. friend from West Assinibola (Mr. Davin), for he challenged that expression the other day—I repeat that the Boers are semi-civilized nomads; men who did originally come from a good stock, the descendants of Dutch and Huguenot ancestors, but who got mixed up with Hottentots and Zulus and Basutos and other tribes of South Africa, and are somewhat mongrel in their character now. Ten or fifteen per cent of them perhaps can read, the majority wander over the veldt, respect no rights, and enslave the natives. They are men who trekked off from Cape Colony many years ago because the British had there the same law for the white man that they had for the black man, and the same law for the black man as they had for the white man. They could not stand that, and so they went off to the north, following the Old Testament usage, as they supposed, of visiting the wrath of God upon Canaan, and enslaving the natives, and making their lives miserable in bondage, and denying them every right that pertains to humanity.

Boer versus British civilization is in the balance to-day, and one or the other has to prevail in that country. I for one have no doubt as to where the sympathies of every man in this House and of every man in this Dominion of Canada should rest in this great struggle between those two elements. Sir, I have heard criticisms upon the conduct of Mr. Chamberlain outside of this House, and in private conversations inside of this House. I have heard it asserted that Mr. Chamberlain on the one hand was just as much to blame for this war as Mr. Paul Kruger was on the other, and that this war could have been averted, and was a proof of a lack of diplomacy in the management of this matter. Why, Mr. Speaker, for the last eight years, ever since the mines of the Witwatersrand have yielded a revenue, the Boers have been devoting that revenue to the purchase of arms. For the last ten years the Afrikaner element in South Africa has steadfastly kept in view its ultimate object to make South Africa Dutch. There is just one underlying issue that has prevailed from the outset, and that is the issue to-day, viz.: Shall South Africa be Dutch, or shall South Africa be British. That is the question to be settled now. There is no outcome but to decide which it shall be, and either it will be Dutch and we will leave South Africa as Paul Kruger in his ultimatum practically demanded we should do last October; or South Africa will be British and the Dutchman will have to be content with the same degree of liberty that the Englishmen possess. Notwithstanding all, England will see that the Dutchman has that liberty. The outrages that have been perpetrated on British subjects by the Boer government will have to cease. The tone of that ultimatum in last October is but a very poor basis for the assertion that the British in their treatment of the Dutch element in South Africa were arrogant, and rash and overbearing, and that they were to blame for the war. Sir, this war was a foregone conclusion. The Dutch had decided it should come, and they purposely precipitated the contest while the British troops were being gathered in South Africa so that they might strike the first blow under the circumstances which gave them a decided advantage, and which for the time being has seemed to have placed the British troops at a disadvantage, and has led perhaps to the belief that the Boers are fully the equal, if not the superior of the British soldier. Mr. Speaker, that is not the case. We heard quoted in this House not very long ago the aspersion once cast upon British generals, but, Sir, the very man who was reported to have said that the British general was a jackass, was himself conquered by a British general and as a result of his defeat, sent a prisoner to St. Helena. Of course, Sir, the British army is now engaged in a war under new conditions, as the American army was engaged in war under new conditions not long ago. This war is going to demonstrate a good many things that were not before known. It has already demonstrated the great advantage possessed by an army acting upon the defensive, behind rocks and entrenchments, and armed with Mausers and rapid-firing guns. The Boer, as he has been situated in Natal in the military operations up to the present, has been, I admit, an ugly customer. But, Sir, as I said the other night, the Boers have accomplished nothing in this war which has evinced great bravery and dash. They besieged a little garrison at Mafeking, consisting of colonial troops, and not many of them, and they have had Mafeking under siege for several months but have failed to capture it. They have besieged two or three thousand British and colonial troops in Kimberley, but have not been able to take that town. They have besieged six or seven thousand British soldiers in Ladysmith, and beleaguered it, with forty or fifty thousand men, but for months they have been unable to overcome the gallant resistance of the British soldiers there. I repeat: The British soldiers time and again have driven them from strong positions at the point of the bayonet, with gallantry such as could not have been excelled; and if you will give them a fair chance on an open field, the character of this war will soon demonstrate itself, and its result will very soon be known, and will prove the superiority of British arms.

Now, this maintenance of British supremacy, I said a moment ago, is a matter in which we colonists in Canada are very directly and intimately interested. England has built up a very wonderful empire. If you look around the world, you will be struck with this fact. Here we have half of the North American continent, just in its infancy. We have room here for 75,000,000 people who can be fed from our own soil. We have in Australia an empire which will support probably 100,000,000 people. We have this magnificent region in South Africa which I have been describing. We have our hands upon every important naval strategic position in the world. We command the entrance to the Mediterranean at Gibraltar. We have our coaling and naval station at Malta in a commanding position half-way to the east. We control Egypt; we have the Suez Canal; we control the outlet to the Red Sea with our fortresses at Aden. We have a great naval position at Cape Town. We have our coaling stations and naval positions scattered over the whole face of the marine globe. We have Zanzibar, midway off the east coast of Africa, commanding the Zambesi, the German sphere of influence in Africa and the Portuguese sphere of influence in Africa. The British empire has its colons of vantage and its strategic positions in every part of the globe; and its power is ubiquitous. Its sails are found on every sea; and its armies are collected in almost every part of the globe. Its accomplishments have been almost beyond human belief; and to talk of the incapacity of the leaders of the great movements or the lack of bravery on the part of men who have carried England's flag in triumph over so many quarters of the globe and over so many fields of action is the supremest folly. Of course, as I said a few moments ago, we have difficulties to meet; and perhaps, Mr. Speaker, it is a fortunate thing for Great Britain that we have occasion now to test our strength. Perhaps it is a fortunate thing for us that we are taking a short canter over the military field under these changed conditions, to adjust our chronometers, to test our armaments, to ascertain where weak points exist, so as to get ready for any great difficulties that may come in the future, and to know how to strike great blows unerringly and efficiently when the occasion arises. In that respect the two great Anglo-Saxon nations of the world, the United States and England, have passed through the training required to fit them to meet great emergencies. Sir, we have lost some men in the Transvaal. It is an unfortunate thing. We may expect to lose some more. You do not go to war and fight battles with an enemy capable of handling arms without loss of men. You have to expect that; but we have lost very few men compared with the numbers that have been lost in other wars. We have had some reverses; but the reverses have reflected no dishonour on our arms. We have had no reverse like Bull Run, the opening episode in the American struggle. We have had no fighting like the fighting at Cold Harbour, where 10,000 men were swept out of existence in twenty minutes through the mistake of a general. We have had no fighting like that at Gettysburg, where Pickett's brigade of 20,000 men made its assault on the Union centre and the fire was held till the assaulting column was within twenty rods, and 6,000 men went to their death in sixty seconds. We have lost no such numbers of men as were lost at Chancellorsville. And we have had a greater reserve to draw upon than the republic which sustained these losses, and yet fought through and came out triumphant at the end, having buried, indeed, half a million men, but having proved its capacity to subdue the rebellion and its right to claim the position of a first-class power. No, we do not need to borrow trouble about this matter. You do not need to sit down and talk about the necessity of calling the leaders of the opposition and the leaders of the government in this House together, or to resolve ourselves into a Committee of the Whole to determine what is to be done. In the first place, we have not anything to do with what is to be done. We are not fighting this battle. We are not managing these military movements. That belongs to the British War Office. We are doing what lies in our power to promote the interests of the British Empire, and we are called upon not to direct the military operations, not to tell England what is to be done, but to send as many men as we can spare, to raise as much money as we can, and to do our duty as a child of the motherland, loyal to her interests, and well aware that her interests are ours.

And now, Sir, I think I have satisfied my own mind, and I hope I have satisfied those who have listened to me, that we have a good title to South Africa, that it is a country of importance which we want to retain, that we have a just cause, that our interests have been trampled upon in that country and our citizens subjected to indignities and wrongs which we could not brook, and which we would have been craven if we had permitted to pass unchallenged. I am not one of those prepared to support a resolution like the Redmond resolution, which I consider the resolution of enemies actuated by treasonable feelings. No, Sir, our motto should be 'No Surrender;' and I believe that Canada in this matter has acted in a proper and patriotic spirit. We have a personal interest now in this struggle, and I believe that our hearts all reach out to the brave boys, our own brothers and sons, who have gone to South Africa. I deprecate the evident attempt that has been made to make party capital out of this matter. It has been said that the government moved too slowly, that they ought to have led public opinion, that they ought to have jumped right into the breach and decided incontinently that they would send their contingent to South Africa. Well, governments as a rule are elected to carry into effect certain lines of policy. They do not originate these lines of policy; but the people decide questions at the polls, and a government is installed in office for the purpose of giving effect to the policy which the people have decided upon as a proper one. The question of sending a contingent to Africa had never been passed upon by the people of Canada. The government had no mandate in this matter, and the government, in my opinion, were not called upon to assume that they knew what the people wanted until the people expressed some indication as to their own opinions on the matter. In the great struggle of the United States, to which I referred a moment ago, when President Lincoln took office, state after state seceded. Why, then, did not President Lincoln at once call out the troops? Because he was uncertain of public opinion, and he waited until the American flag was actually struck down at Fort Sumpter and until American blood was shed, before issuing a proclamation calling out a single soldier, and then he only called out 75,000 men, committing the error with which the British government has been charged, of underrating the magnitude of the task before him. He recognized that slavery was the cause of the civil war, he was an anti-slavery man from his youth, he was always ready and anxious to destroy slavery, he was petitioned to abolish slavery by the anti-slavery societies, and by ministers of the gospel, who preached that the negro should be free, he was pressed to issue a proclamation emancipating the slaves, but he withheld his decision and waited. Not because he was not willing and ready and anxious to do it. No, he waited until he knew he had public sentiment behind him, and when that point was reached, when he knew that public sentiment would back him up, he issued his proclamation emancipating the slaves. He issued it two years after the struggle had begun—on January 1, 1863. Why did he not jump in and lead public opinion? He knew better. He knew it was necessary to have public opinion to back him up, and that it was not for him to create public opinion, that he could not do it. So, with hon. gentlemen occupying the Treasury benches here. The issue was a new one. They were confronted by a crisis of a grave character that had never confronted Canada before. It was proper for them to see that any steps taken in this case should be taken only after being fully certain of popular approval. It would have been quite constitutional to call parliament together. It would have been a proper, perhaps, but not a practical thing, because the first thing that would have happened would have been a debate perhaps of a month on the address, and in the meantime we would not have been sending the contingents to South Africa, but the government took action in this case as fast as public opinion crystallized, and as fast as they felt public sentiment behind them with sufficient distinctness and force to warrant them in believing that they were acting in a line that would receive public approval. I hold that the government proceeded in this matter as promptly and as courageously as the condition of the case would warrant, and as rapidly as their duty required. And the government to-day is undoubtedly ready to do whatever the people ask, and I am sorry to hear these carping criticisms, because I repeat, this question is above politics. We want, as parties, to make our capital out of some other kind of issues than this. I am, therefore, sorry to hear these carping criticisms about the tardiness of the government in not proposing at once to pay all the expenses and give full pay to our soldiers, and all these other things. Why, Mr. Speaker, the government are doing all that is necessary, and all that we can require as soon as it is necessary. They have the responsibility of office resting upon them. They cannot jump up and propose rashly one thing or another, but have to reflect that in every step they take they are accountable to the people, and are custodians of the public interests, and must give an account of their stewardship; and if mistakes should be made in a grave crisis like this, they are responsible, and the government are to be commended rather than censured for the course they have taken in this matter from beginning to end. For myself, I say they have taken a course which I approve of, which I think no party in this country is called upon to disapprove, and I think we had better get up our political quarrels on some other issue and join hands in this matter to preserve the honour of Canada and to hold up the hands of the mother country and do our duty as loyal subjects.

There is one consideration in connection with this matter, Mr. Speaker, that has occurred to me, and it would have a great amount of force with me if I were upon the opposition benches. I should be very much afraid, Sir, of placing myself in a position where I would be liable to the charge of having sought to embarrass the government by making demands which I foresaw would lead to a large increase of debt and a great drain of human life, and that when these things came back, when the consequences returned upon our heads,

I might turn round and upbraid the government for its recklessness in incurring an enormous debt, and in the sacrifice of Canadian lives and interests. I do not accuse the opposition of being animated by any motive so base, but these are considerations that might have weight with an unscrupulous opposition. It might be that the opposition would hound and dog the government for having incurred great expense and sent a great number of men abroad, with the result that there would be mourning in due time at home, as many would never return, and might be looking forward to the time when the people, on reflection, would say: You went too fast, you piled up an enormous amount of debt, thousands of our sons have never returned, you were too precipitate in this matter. These charges, which might be urged by an opposition without scruples, and actuated by mercenary motives, as of course this opposition would never be—these charges might be made, not from patriotic motives, but from a desire to ultimately embarrass the government. We want to bear these things in mind. The gentlemen of the opposition ought to remember that the government have all these considerations to take into account. The government will have to meet, in the future, the accumulation of debt, and the fact that a great many gallant Canadians have gone from our shores who will find graves in a foreign land. These are matters requiring due consideration, and concerning which patriotic and generous feeling should sway all classes and parties in this country.

I am sure that these reasons I have urged are a justification of the course that I intend to take, as a representative of the electors of North Norfolk, in supporting the government in the policy it has inaugurated. I am ready to face the consequences of voting any amount of money that may be deemed necessary to vote for maintaining the honour of Canada and the interests of the empire. I am ready to say: Send as many men as are required, feeling sure that willing hearts are ready to respond to the call, and that these men will never bring disgrace upon their native land. I am for all this, and I am ready to confront, if need be, any contingency and any crisis that may arise. I have no fear as regards the position and condition of affairs as they exist to-day, but something more serious may come up. There may be interference. England is not very popular in Europe, I believe. I suppose it is due largely to the fact that she has out-distanced all her rivals. But we might have interference, we might have a condition of things that would cause us to deliberate as to what course we ought to pursue, and to summon to our aid our utmost resolution. If these things come, in God's providence, they will have to be met, but I feel that we can hardly have a general European interference, because we can hardly expect the Dreibund and Russia and France to act together, and we hope that we shall find Great Britain sailing smoothly along without interference. But if interference takes place, we shall simply have to meet it, and I hope we are able to meet it, believing that we have the power behind us.

Feeling that the interest of the great empire with which we are associated and bound up to-day, and of which we are a part, and rapidly increasing part in importance, I venture to implore those who are listening to me to-night to look upon this question calmly and dispassionately, from the standpoint of patriotic Canadian citizens, scorning to make out of such an issue, base political party capital, seeking to promote the interests of the grandest empire of the globe, by doing our duty manfully and honestly in the crisis that confronts this empire and this great colony.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle). It is not my intention to follow the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) over the full score he has just placed before us. Nor is it my intention to offer any opposition to the motion of the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding), that we should go into Committee of Ways and Means in order to carry the proposed resolutions. Of course, the House is aware that some days ago I gave notice of a motion I proposed to bring before the House the next time the motion should be made for the House to go into Committee of Supply:

That this House insists on the principle of the sovereignty and the independence of parliament as the basis of British institutions and the safeguard of the civil and political liberties of British citizens, and refuses consequently to consider the action of the government in relation to the South African war as a precedent which should commit this country to any action in the future.

That this House further declares that it opposes any change in the political and military relations which exist at present between Canada and Great Britain unless such change is initiated by the sovereign will of parliament and sanctioned by the people of Canada.

It may be thought strange that I did not bring forward this resolution as an amendment to the address, or that I do not move it as an amendment to the present resolution. My reason for not moving an amendment to the address may not be in accordance with the strict understanding of parliamentary procedure; but in these days of new policies and new movements, perhaps a little variation as to the time a principle should be laid down does not make so much difference as to the opinion that the representatives of the people should entertain upon the merits of the question. My reason was that I wanted to see this House pronounce upon the principles laid down in my motion in that broad spirit which the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has asked us to show. It is with that same broad spirit, I may say without boasting, that I have approached this problem from the day when I felt it my conscientious duty, at the sacrifice of personal and political friendship, to resign my seat and go back to my constituents to test their opinion upon the question. Of course, the debate on the address, at the opening of any session, is always more or less animated with the party spirit, perhaps even with a little rancour between the two parties. Stump speeches, newspaper articles read and written during recess, and especially by-elections, after which the victors are a little too proud and the vanquished feel somewhat sore—all these give the debate on the address a partisan spirit which I did not wish to see prevail in the debate upon that resolution. My reason for not bringing my motion forward to-day is that, if I am well informed, moving it would mean that I oppose the motion of the hon. Minister of Finance, and this, I repeat, I do not want to do. At the same time, there is another reason that I may state frankly to the House. It is that I want the representatives of the people of this free country to lay down their straight opinion and vote upon the motion I have just read without seeing that motion emasculated and discoloured in such a way as to cover all shades of opinion. Sir, in the action of the government upon the South African question, a part of which is submitted to us to-day for ratification, there are, as in every other human action, public or private, two points of view to take. There is the general question, or the question of right; and the question of fact, the actual concrete question. By the general question, I mean the right of the executive to presume public opinion, to presume the sanction of parliament, and to act upon undefined expressions of public will so as to frame a constitutional change for the country, or to take any important step of political government. There is for us the general question of our participation in Imperial wars: there is also the question of the introduction of militarism into a country heretofore peaceful and devoid of that plague which is poisoning the blood of European countries, which is threatening our neighbours to the south, and which, unfortunately, is getting into our own veins. How far the action that the government saw fit to take on this question involves the problems I have just enumerated is exactly what I shall discuss before the House when I move the resolution I have just read. The questions of fact are the Transvaal war, its causes, its merits and its consequences; our participation in such war and the still smaller question of the appropriation of public money by the government, before it is voted by parliament. Sir, from the beginning of my campaign I expressed myself very clearly on these points. I made that distinction, and said all along that the questions of fact, and especially the money question, were, in my mind, very small and very unimportant compared with the constitutional questions I have just mentioned. I may be permitted—though I may weary the House a little, still in my position I am obliged to defend myself—to give a few extracts of reports that appeared in the newspapers of some of my meetings in the county of Labelle. At the first meeting, which was held two days after I sent in my resignation, I am reported in La Patrie to have spoken as follows. I translate:

Mr. Bourassa is not so much anxious about the expenses that this military campaign is going to entail upon this country as about the principle at stake. The country is prosperous enough to stand the $100,000 or $200,000—

Of course, I was far below the mark then.

—that will be required, but why take shares in a war which interests Canada in no way and the issue of which will inevitably be in favour of Great Britain? Great Britain has a powerful navy, which she can send to the coast of the South African continent; she has a powerful army which she is about to land there nearly as considerable in number as the total population of the Boers. Why, then send a thousand Canadians to be used as bullet targets in those far distant regions? It is useless to this point that the 'Star' has recently published a despatch from London stating that England wanted only 500 Canadians to share in this war. It is not, then, our soldiers that Mr. Chamberlain wants, but our moral adhesion, so as to be able to claim one day or another that as a matter of principle the colonies should share in Imperial wars.

At another meeting which I held later on, I am reported as having said:

Mr. Bourassa says that the only question at issue in the present fight is the sending of Canadian troops in the Transvaal, or rather the larger question of the participation of Canada in Imperial wars. The actual expedition is only the first step towards Imperial federation.

At a meeting I held in Buckingham, I am thus reported by the Montreal Star, a paper which did not support me in my campaign, I need not say:

It was not because he wanted to protest against sending soldiers to the Transvaal that he had taken his stand. That was a small question as compared with the constitutional one, and in the course of two or three years he would not be abused as now because of the stand he had taken.

In a newspaper published in Buckingham, I wrote a letter containing these words:

I have repeated time and again that I had resigned, not for the mere fact of the government sending a contingent to the Transvaal, but because such action constituted a radical change in our relations with Great Britain.

Sir, as to the merits of the war I will state frankly to the House that a few weeks before I began that campaign I had no decided opinions about it. My pretension was that Canada was not obliged, either as a nation or as a colony, to fight outside of her own territory unless, as stated by the Prime Minister in that interview published in the Toronto Globe and frequently quoted in this House, Canada might be indirectly threatened. I had not given to the South African problem more attention, probably, than the average member of this House, or the average citizen of Canada, a little studious, may have given to it. I had not given it special attention, until after the resolution which was moved and carried in two days without discussion by this House, approving of the policy of the British government, or rather of Mr. Chamberlain's policy in relation to the South African problem. I may say 'en passant' that I was absent when that resolution passed this House, when the members of this House solved in two days a problem which has taken so many years of study on the part of eminent British statesmen, and upon which they cannot yet agree, though they have much more knowledge of the subject than we had. But after I saw that we were going to take a hand in the struggle, I began studying the question. I do not boast of having mastered it, I do not boast of having achieved a right conclusion; men of high political standing, men that have given to this problem years of their life, still disagree. Many prophecies have proven to be false, many previsions have failed to materialize, and yet who can tell what the future of South Africa is to be? That future as well as the fate of the brave men who are fighting on both sides are now in the hands of God; and the man who states that he knows all about the South African problem, that he knows what policy the British government should have pursued, is far more in advance of his time than I do propose to be. I may say that from the start two ideas directed me in my study. First, I realized that there was from my own point of view and from the point of view of my fellow-countrymen, no racial sympathy whatever for the Boers. I am glad to find in the Montreal Gazette a report of a few words that I uttered at the Club National, in Montreal, before the Order in Council was adopted sending Canadian troops to the war in South Africa. I am reported as saying:

Referring to the Transvaal question he said: It should be faced with great coolness and that nobody should yield to what a certain class of people falsely consider patriotism. . . . Thank God there was no racial interest in this matter. The Boers were not our race and we could not have much sympathy for them. We would not be worthy of the freedom we are now enjoying under the British flag if we failed to give this question all the serious and unbiased consideration it deserved.

So far as racial sympathies are concerned, I think the Boer element is more closely connected with our Anglo-Saxon friends than with us. A gentleman said to me: Why don't you get up in the House and tell Mr. Wallace that King William was a Boer? I admit that through the French Huguenot blood that has been united to the Dutch blood in Africa, there is some connection with us. But you will admit, Mr. Speaker, that two hundred years of African life, with Dutch assimilation, and the difference of religion, are sufficient to prove that the contention that the French Canadians have racial sympathies with the Boers is perfectly absurd. Sir, I do not wish to deceive anyone. The French Canadians have an admiration and a sympathy for a small nation struggling for independence. This I cannot deny, but I say that this feeling is at the same time coupled with the strictest and sincerest loyalty to the British flag and to British institutions. Besides that, I was convinced, from the start, and I am still convinced, that there were two sides to the question; that there was a right and was a wrong to the contention both of the Transvaal Republic and of the British government; and that in this case, as in most others, the last drop that filled the glass was caused by diplomatic friction rather than by the real questions at stake.

It is not my intention here to give a lengthy study of the South African problem. As I said in the beginning, I do not propose to follow the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. He has given this House interesting facts and figures that will no doubt be useful to hon. members hereafter. But the hon. gentleman has forgotten one point. He has spoken of the Boers being in rebellion against Great Britain; he has spoken of the people of the Orange Free State and the South African Republic as British subjects ungrateful to the British Crown, and fighting against their suzerain. There is a little bit of history that I could add, I think, to the one given by the hon. gentleman. After Great Britain became possessor of Cape Colony, and before she had covered by her capitalists as well as by her missionaries, those new countries that the hon. gentleman has referred to, Bechuanaland, Basutoland, Rhodesia and those other new colonies, the British government acknowledged the complete independence of the South African Republics then called the Transvaal and the Orange Free State. Before the British flag had been planted north of Cape Colony, a convention was signed, on the 17th of January, 1852, by Her Majesty's High Commissioner and by the representatives of the Boer emigrants, acknowledging that the Boer emigrants that had crossed the Vaal River had a right to manage their own affairs and to govern themselves without any interference on the part of Her Majesty's government.

This was proclaimed by Her Majesty's High Commissioner in the Cape of Good Hope on the 15th of April, 1852, and in 1858 the Transvaal became the South African Republic. Of course, I need not go into all the treaties that were entered into between Great Britain and the South African Republic as to boundaries, but it is sufficient to say that from 1852 to 1877 three or four treaties were signed between Great Britain and the Transvaal republic, and that therefore the question of the complete sovereignty of the Transvaal up to 1877 was acknowledged by the British government. In 1877, April 12th, after troubles between the Boers and the natives, Sir Theophilus Shepstone claimed the Transvaal to be a British colony. Hon. members of this House are aware of the events that came afterwards, of the war of 1881, of Majuba Hill, and of the peace that was signed by the representatives of the Gladstone government. Of course, many people have said, since that time, that Gladstone was a blunderer, that his policy was a bad policy. I state frankly to the House that I do not feel big enough to pass judgment upon the policy of Mr. Gladstone, but I might give the opinion of a man who has studied the South African problem far more than I have done, and I think a little more, at least with more practical knowledge, than the hon. member for North Norfolk has done. In an article which Mr. James Bryce published last fall, he said :

No one, however, denies that the war in which England will, of course, prevail, is a terrible calamity for South Africa, and will permanently embitter the relations of Dutch and English there. To some of us it appears a calamity for England, also, since it is likely to alienate, perhaps for generations to come, the bulk of the white population in one of her most important self-governing colonies. It may, indeed, possibly mean for her the ultimate loss of South Africa.

Between Mr. Gladstone's policy, which is upheld in England by Mr. John Morley, by Sir William Vernon Harcourt, by Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman and by Conservatives like Sir Edward Clarke, Sir Robert Reid, and Mr. McLean, and the policy upheld by Mr. Chamberlain and his supporters, I do not feel big enough to pass judgment. But I think that we should wait a little before condemning the policy of the Liberal party of England. That policy was not only, as it has been stated, founded upon a poetical magnanimity. It was based upon one of the principles that has made England the greatest colonial power, I mean a full knowledge and appreciation of the national and religious sentiments of the people who, being English colonists, are not of the Anglo-Saxon blood, or do not profess the same religion as the majority of the people. I say, that we might have paused a little before condemning a policy which has brought so much glory to England, which has attached to England so many foreign peoples that rebelled at first against her former oppressive policy. The Liberal party of Canada could have hesitated a little before attaching its name to the glorification of Mr. Chamberlain's policy.

I am not going to enter into the details of the differences between the two countries, but I shall say a few words in reference to the main difficulties. First of all, there is no doubt that the franchise difficulty was the greatest of all; there is no doubt that the government of the South African Republic showed a good deal of stubbornness, that it manifested an exclusive spirit and did not grasp the real situation. I am quite ready to agree with hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House in regard to that point. But, belonging to a race that is not always acknowledged the same freedom of thought, when I express opinions, I may be obliged to support these opinions with the opinions of others. I will quote the opinion of a man who has written an article in favour of Mr. Chamberlain's policy; I refer to Mr. Sydney Brooks. Here is what he says about the feelings of the government of the South African republic on the question of the franchise :

The Uitlanders had come into the country uninvited and undesired, seeking only gold and with full warning that it was a Boer republic they were entering. By what right could these strangers of yesterday claim to be on a level with the old burghers who had fought and bled to keep the state free from alien control, and what Boer looking to the past experiences of his people with the English, could guarantee that their capture of the franchise would not lead to their capture of the entire state, that the Republic would not become an English Republic with an English President and its original founders a despised and oppressed minority ?

I have read with a great deal of attention, the official report of the Bloemfontein Conference, in which Sir Alfred Milner, as the representative of the British government, met President Kruger, and where they discussed the whole situation. It is a very interesting document, and perhaps, if the hon. members of this House had read it last session before declaring themselves so unhesitatingly as supporters of Mr. Chamberlain's policy, they would have paused a little. Mr. Kruger puts the question, right at once, on the real ground. He asks the British commissioner if he has come there to give orders from the British government, or if he has come to give friendly suggestions as to the treatment of the Uitlanders in the South African republic. There, the question as to sovereignty and suzerainty was placed before the commissioner, and what was the reply of the British representative ? It was that he had come there to give friendly advice to the president of the South African Republic. Then, taking up the franchise question, the president of the South African Republic puts the question very frankly. He says: If you have come here to ask me to give the same franchise rights at once to all the Uitlanders, to those who have come to reside in this country and to become citizens, as well as to those who have come here to make a fortune and go back to their own country without any intention of remaining with us, I cannot grant the request. Though I want to give satisfaction to just claims, at the same time, I want to preserve the independence of my country. What was the reply? That the British government did not want to ask the immediate franchise for all the Uitlanders, but that they wanted to submit to a tribunal of arbitration, the conditions upon which it could be done. It has been said that the franchise laws of the Transvaal republic were abolished, and that a new franchise law was introduced making it impossible for the Uitlanders to get any rights which would enable them to control the government.

First of all, there is the little fact which should not be forgotten, that the second volksraad has been created for them, and that to vote for electing members to that chamber, the Uitlanders require only two years' residence, and are not asked to renounce their allegiance. The second volksraad initiates all laws concerning taxation and the gold laws, but as that House is controlled by the first volksraad, I admit that so far as individual rights are concerned, it was more or less inefficacious. It should not be forgotten above all that the Uitlanders who go to South Africa have not gone there to settle or to farm, nor to acquire property, unless it be mining property. As stated by Mr. Brooks, they have gone there uninvited and undesired. I admit that they have a right to ask a certain control in the laws of the country if they are called on to pay for the maintenance of the institutions of that country. There is one thing which is perhaps not known to all the members of this House, and that is, that the taxation which falls upon the Uitlanders is exactly in principle the same taxation which falls upon the burgher. The moment a Frenchman, or an Englishman, or a Turk, or a Russian acquires a mining property, he is submitted exactly to the same taxation as the burgher who acquires a similar property. The taxation is not so very high after all. The taxation is half a crown monthly for a prospector's claim and one pound for a digger's claim, of which one-half goes to the government and one-half to the owner, so that if the digger is the owner he gets back his share. Therefore, the greatest taxation that can be paid by a miner is twelve pounds sterling a year, and I do not think that is so heavy taxation. Of course, it will be said that the bulk of the taxation of the South African Republic is paid by the Uitlanders. True. But why? It is because the Uitlanders possess all the richest properties. As was truly said by the Prime Minister at Sherbrooke: The Dutch population is to a certain extent a primitive population. They are the only living example of the people of the sixteenth century. They despise gold, they despise diamonds, they want to lead a pastoral life as the first settlers of all countries. They want to lead the same life as the first settlers of New France; they want to lead the same life as the first settlers of New England. They are content with their horses, their cattle and their sheep; they are content with their share of the soil and they do not care for the mines. Is it a surprise that mines that are yielding millions and millions of dollars, that are giving to their owners in one week what the whole of the South African soil is giving to the Boers; is it a surprise to find that this gold is paying more revenue to the state than the horses and the cattle and the sheep of the burghers? I ask gentlemen who come from the North-west Territories, would it be right to say that they were undertaxed because the people of the Klondike give more money to the Treasury of Canada than do the people of Manitoba and the North-west Territories? Is it because they do not have gold on their prairies that they should be overtaxed so as to make their taxation equal to the people of the Klondike?

Now, a good deal has been said of the religious and educational disabilities to which the Uitlanders were submitted. I agree with the Prime Minister's statement at Sherbrooke, that that population which has lived isolated from outside communications, which has lived outside of trade and industry, is a primitive population. No doubt the Boers have the defects of their times and surroundings. They are a primitive people and they are fanatics, I agree. They believe in what they think is right, and that they are ready to die for what they believe to be true, they have proved. But, Sir, the doctrine is new to me that under the British flag and under the Canadian flag, we should go and broaden people's minds with dum-dum bullets.

In all this, the question of arbitration has been lost sight of. Taking for granted, as I am quite ready to do, that the claims of the Uitlanders are real and that they have not been properly met with by the Transvaal government, there is yet one consideration which remains. Nearly three years ago, on the 7th of May, 1897, Mr. Kruger offered to the British government to submit to arbitration the whole of the difficulties existing between the two countries. Five months afterwards he received from Mr. Chamberlain a refusal to arbitrate on account of the suzerainty which Her Majesty was said to hold over the South African Republic. It was for the first time in thirteen years that the question of suzerainty had been spoken of by a British government. As is well known, in 1881, after Majuba Hill—whatever may be the opinion we entertain on the policy then pursued by the British government—a convention was signed between the representatives of Great Britain and the representatives of the Transvaal, acknowledging the independence of the South African Republic, subject to the suzerainty of Her Majesty. Several articles were embodied in the convention giving effect to that suzerainty. For example, the British resident at Pretoria was put upon a different footing to the representatives of other countries, and several clauses were contained in that convention, proving the fact that England meant to keep her suzerainty over the Transvaal. There was great difficulty in getting that convention ratified by the volksraad, because, as has often been shown, the great aim of the Boer people was to have thorough independence. They had left their homes, they had left their lands, they had left a far better country in Cape Colony, to trek on and settle in the Transvaal, so as to have a country of their own. The agitation went on for three years, and then a new convention was signed on the 3rd of March, 1884. The old name of the South African Republic was restored, and the suzerainty of Her Majesty was dispensed with. All the articles which in the convention of 1881 gave sanction to that suzerainty, disappeared from the convention of 1884, and the only restriction which was put upon the complete sovereignty of the republic was, that she was not able to make a foreign treaty without the sanction of Great Britain—or rather, that she was at liberty to make treaties with foreign powers, but that these treaties could be vetoed by the British government within six months; the exception being made in the case of the Orange Free State, with which the Transvaal republic could at any time make a treaty. Since that time, as Mr. Morley said in the House of Commons of England, as Sir William Vernon Harcourt said, as Sir Edward Clarke said when he abandoned his party on this very question, from 1884 to 1897, no foreign minister nor colonial minister of England ever thought of raising the question of suzerainty. But here is a declaration which was made in the House of Lords at the time the new convention was discussed, which I think clears up the point. The convention was signed on the 3rd of March. Fourteen days afterwards, in the House of Lords, the Earl of Cadogan gave an explanation of it and said:

Sir Hercules Robinson, who had signed the convention on behalf of Her Majesty, had lately described the instruments saying . . . that it gave the Transvaal as complete internal independence as was enjoyed by the Orange Free State; and that in regard to its relations to foreign powers, a veto only was reserved to Her Majesty's government. In fact, as he understood the matter, the suzerainty of the Queen was practically abolished.

Sir, it may be that the policy of Mr. Chamberlain is the best policy for England and the best policy for the empire at large, but I do not think that the act of Mr. Chamberlain, thirteen years after a declaration was made by a minister of the Crown that the suzerainty of the Queen over the Transvaal was practically abolished—I do not think the act of Mr. Chamberlain in invoking that suzerainty was such as to inspire confidence in the word of the British Crown on the part of the Boer republic. After the arbitration was refused by Mr. Chamberlain, it was offered again; and finally Mr. Chamberlain accepted it. He accepted it by a document which was sent to Sir Alfred Milner in Cape Colony, and kept there for about three months. Before that, the Bloemfontein Conference had taken place, and there again the Transvaal republic offered to reduce the time for the franchise by five years, and leave the whole dispute to arbitration. Later on, after the conference was broken off, the Transvaal threw off two years more, and offered a franchise of seven years, expressing their willingness to submit the rest of the questions to arbitration. The acceptance of this offer was sent, as I have said, to Sir Alfred Milner at Cape Colony, and kept there. After that, the Transvaal republic sent a despatch making another proposal of a five years' franchise, with certain conditions attached to it, but on the condition that their offer of a seven years' franchise and arbitration made to the British government should not be considered as set aside. They received an affirmative reply. The five years' franchise with the conditions attached being refused, the South African Republic came back to their first proposal, on which they received a communication from the British government informing them that the offer would no longer stand, and the whole thing was broken. I think there is enough in the blue-books to show that if the claims of the Uitlanders were right—and I say they were right—and if these claims have failed to be gained, and if England is to-day engaged in one of the most bloody wars it has had in the century, a great deal of the blame must rest on the diplomacy as it was directed by Mr. Chamberlain.

I do not propose to go at any greater length into these questions: but I will fall back on the question of arbitration. I do not want to bring back to debate a question which formerly interested us. I know that comparisons are odious, but sometimes they are true. A question has agitated this country, involving the rights of British subjects, based upon the same principle as is involved in this case—I mean the rights of the French minority of Manitoba. The difference is that the minority in Manitoba were British subjects who had settled that country under the British flag. They were the first settlers, and other British subjects came afterwards. A document was framed and acknowledged by the Federal government and by the British government upon which the French settlers and the English settlers of Manitoba came to agree. I need not repeat the history of that school question. It has been repeated too often in this House. But what happened? Certain laws were passed which the French minority considered as infringing upon their rights. They came to this government. This government submitted the question to arbitration. The arbitration decided that as a question of legal right the new laws adopted in Manitoba were right; but that as a question of equity and justice, those British citizens had good claims. The conservative party proposed to settle the question by law and by force. The Liberal party proposed to settle the question by conciliation. I have supported the Liberal policy, not because I thought the French minority of Manitoba had no rights, but because I thought that for the peace of Manitoba as well as the whole of Canada it was better to settle the question by conciliation. And, Sir, the views which I held on the Manitoba school question I hold on the South African question; and I regret very much that the Liberal government which has come to power on the principle of conciliation and arbitration in cases where the rights of British subjects are attacked in this country, is using its power and its influence and is asking this House to vote money, to force by war the granting of rights which are certainly not so well consecrated by law and by facts as were the rights of the Manitoba minority. Therefore, when I say that I consider this war unjust, I am simply consistent with myself; I am upholding the principles of true Liberalism, which I upheld in the election of 1896.

But, Sir, whatever may be the causes of the war, guilty as I think are the men who have led England into it by bad diplomacy and by bad policy, wrong as I think it for us to participate in it without having had the right to pronounce upon the causes of it, I repeat that I do not oppose these resolutions, for one reason. I feel disposed to take the same stand that the English Liberals have taken upon this question. It has been said in this House that we should not discuss the merits of the war of to-day, because the time has passed for discussing them. Well, Sir, when was that time or when shall come the time to discuss them? In England, in all the Australian colonies, in all the British constitutional countries except Canada, the representatives of the people were called together and given the opportunity of expressing their views and casting their votes upon the constitutional question as well as upon the merits of that war. In Canada, however, we have been treated differently. Therefore, I say I have the right to pronounce myself upon the merits of this war. Appeals of a similar kind were made to Sir Henry Bannerman and to the Liberals of England to give a free course to the British government. What did they reply? They replied: We have the right to discuss the war. They did it during the war session of October last, and in the session and are doing it in the session now going on. They blamed the policy of the government, which they charge with having brought this war upon England. During the session now going on, they have blamed the conduct of the war, but at the same time they have not refused to Her Majesty the subsidies required to carry it on.

Of course, I admit that there are two differences between the position taken by the Liberals of England and the position I am now taking, not speaking of the numerical difference. Those differences are these. One, I think, is in my favour, and the other against me. One is that England is at war with the South African Republic but we are not. I do not admit that we are, because I do not admit that Canada, any more than any other free country, can be plunged into war by an Order in Council without obtaining the opinion of the representatives of the people. But the other difference, I think, is in my favour. By blaming the British government for their policy and by giving afterwards the subsidies, it may be argued that the Liberals of England have given to the British government the means of carrying on a war which they have condemned. Sir, my position is not this, and I offer this point as one worthy of consideration to men who are ready to throw us into the midst of Imperialism and make us share in all the wars over which we have no control, as regards their causes, their management and their consequences. What would be the result of my vote against these resolutions as affecting the men whom I consider blamable for this war? Supposing, what of course is not the case, that the majority of this parliament were condemning, as the Liberals of England are, the policy of Mr. Chamberlain and contending that it is the actual cause of the war, what means would we in this parliament have of reaching the men we considered guilty? I repeat it, this is a matter worthy to be considered by those who think the time has come when we should go to war, but who do not think the proper means should be given to the representatives of the people either to approve or blame the conduct of the men responsible for the war itself and its conduct.

But the reason for which I am going to let these resolutions pass is that there is one fact we cannot forget. Two thousand Canadians, of all origins and creeds, have gone to South Africa. For the war, they are not responsible, its causes they did not study, they were led to it, by enthusiasm and true patriotic fervour. We know how many are gone, but how many will come back we do not know. Let their blood, let the tears of their mothers, let the sorrows of their families fall upon the men who have played upon their enthusiasm and loyalty; but for my part I do not feel disposed to offer any opposition to the engagement that has been contracted between them and this government.

Sir, I am proud to take advantage of this occasion to repudiate the accusation which was made against me, not in this House but at several places in the country. When the first contingent sailed from Quebec, I happened to be there, and met several people who accused me of disloyalty and who told me that I was going there to sneer at the brave men who were starting for South Africa. No, Sir, I never blamed them or sneered at them, but I admired them far more than I do the men who are the cause of their departure, but who have not gone themselves. A few days ago, I read a despatch stating that at an engagement near Belmont some of our Canadian boys had captured a few prisoners, and that great was their indignation on discovering that these prisoners were British subjects. Poor, brave, straightforward boys! If they only knew the secret motives and reasons that are underlying this war, their indignation would be greatly increased.

According to the new policy the governments of free countries are to be conducted by newspaper articles. Of course, I am too much of a little Canadian and of the old Liberal stock to admit that the policy of any country would be properly framed by big inflammatory headings of newspaper articles or wood engravings. But at the same time, I admit that you sometimes find in these sources of information striking illustrations. I have here one from the Montreal Star, which is the great organ of the jingo-imperialist party. It consists of two little engravings. On the one side I see a man seated comfortably in a cosy chair, smoking a good cigar, drinking a glass of wine and surrounded by cases of preserved meat, and the epigraph beneath is: Cecil Rhodes, in his underground room in Kimberley mine, where he defies Boer shot and shell. On the other side of the page I find depicted a young soldier, British or Canadian, dying on the kopje, and standing over him a sturdy, harsh-looking Boer holding in his hand the weapon with which he has just shot the enemy. There is no inscription to this picture, so that I cannot tell whether the gun came out of the factory of which Mr. Chamberlain's brother is a director. But, Sir, I do not wish to go any further on this question. As I have said I am ready to help in ratifying to the letter the engagement contracted between the government and the volunteers, but the government have added to that engagement a clause, the last one, which provides to give our soldiers, as an additional pay, the difference between British and colonial rates.

This, our volunteers did not expect to get. When they landed—and this is exactly one of the reasons that have been given by the Prime Minister for not calling parliament to settle this question—once landed on the soil of Africa, our soldiers are to become part of the British army; they share the British soldier's tent, they eat his bread, they get the same pay. This, I think, our boys subscribed to joyfully, and they did not expect any more. Now, Sir, we are called to add to that an amount, which, it is true, is very small in itself, amounting to about 25 cents a day, or a total of about $500 a day. I need hardly repeat that the question of money has always been a small one from my point of view. But, if we are going on at this rate towards militarism, it may become an important question. For example, we have now offered 2,000 men. That increase would mean $500 a day or $15,000 a month, or $180,000 a year. If we send six contingents, as the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) said the other day in Montreal, he would be ready to send, that would mean $540,000 a year. Should we send 10,000 men, as the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries said in London that Canada would be happy to supply, it would mean $900,000 more a year. Should we send 100,000 men, as General Hutton had decided we shall send in the next war, it would mean $9,000,000 more. Or, should we follow the advice of the Prime Minister of Ontario and send all the men in the country, it would amount up to hundreds of millions. And, mind you, that is only for the extra 25 cents a day. You may say I am talking of eloquent exaggerations and fictions. Sir, in these days when, as I have stated, a new policy is to be initiated by the jingo press, everything is possible, especially the impossible. But I repeat, I do not consider this question of money of any importance compared with the question of principle. I am opposed to militarism. I am in favour of a policy which will induce the youth of this country to go on the farm, to go and work peacefully at intellectual or manual work; but I am opposed to giving the young men of this country too much inducement to go into the army. We expend millions to bring foreigners into this country. I am in favour of that policy. Are we going now to start a policy of spending as many or more millions to take the flower of our youth, descendants of the two great races that have settled this country, and send them, as the Montreal Star has said, to Africa, Oceanica or Asia? I am opposed to that policy.

I shall, therefore, support the government in carrying out their engagement with the volunteers, in fulfilling the conditions that have been laid down between them and the British government, making, of course, my reservation as to the constitutional bearings of the question, which I propose to treat when my motion is before the House. But, when the present resolutions are in committee, I shall move to strike out the last clause, for the reason I have just given to the House.

Mr. T. D. CRAIG (East Durham). The House has listened to two speeches on this subject, and I must say that I have never heard two speeches wider apart than they were. I was rather surprised at the patriotic tone of the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and I may say I was also much pleased. I agreed with nearly everything he said. One or two things he said are open to criticism, and I shall criticise them in a little while. But I must say that I have never, since coming into this House, listened to a speech that gave me greater pain, I may say, than that to which we have just listened. I am almost ashamed to think that a member of this House should make such a speech. It would almost seem as if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bourassa) held a brief from Paul Kruger to present his case to this House and to the country as well as it could be done. He started out by saying that he would not oppose the motion to go into committee, and then went on to discuss the merits of the war. He said he had studied this question a great deal, that, in fact, had the hon. member for North Norfolk studied it as much as he had, he would not have made the speech he made this evening. There is one thing upon which I can congratulate the hon. member for Labelle, and that is on the possession of a vast amount of self-confidence. I would not say that but for the fact that I feel sure that if he were a little older in political life and had had a little more experience he would not have made the speech he has just made. He started out by saying that when he had first studied this question he came to the conclusion that Canada was not obliged to fight outside of her own territory. I can tell the hon. gentleman that he is quite right, that Canada is not obliged to fight outside of her own territory. Nobody has said that she is. There is no question of compulsion in this matter at all. Great Britain did not issue an order that we should send so many men to the Transvaal. An opportunity was given to Canada if she wished to send men; Great Britain only said to Canada: If you do send men, you can send them under such and such conditions, and in such and such a way. It is foreign to the spirit of Great Britain and the manner in which its colonies are governed to issue any commands of that kind. I think that the remark of the hon. gentleman that he came to the conclusion, after a search and consideration, that Canada was not obliged to fight outside of her own territory, shows that he knows very little of the British constitution. The hon. gentleman tells us that, after the war began, he studied the question of the merits of the war more seriously. I am not going to follow him all through what he said on this question. There is no necessity of my doing so, because I am sure that there are hardly any members of this House who have the least sympathy with what the hon. gentleman said about the merits of this question. One thing that the hon. gentleman said was that the French Canadians had sympathy with a small nation struggling for liberty. I suppose by that he wishes us to infer that the French Canadians have sympathy with the Transvaal Republic. I do not believe that; I believe he misrepresents his fellow-subjects in the province of Quebec. It would seem that the hon. gentleman sympathized with the Transvaal Republic from the speech he has made. But those who sympathize with a small nation of people struggling for liberty, should have sympathy for the Uitlanders, for they are the men who are struggling for liberty. The liberty of the republic was not threatened by England. In fact, England made very moderate requests. They had denied liberty to the Uitlanders, and wished to keep them for years in an inferior position. These men, who have been developing the country, and paying the taxes have been denied rights that have been accorded by every other civilized country to men of that kind. The hon. gentleman spoke of Mr. Gladstone's policy, and referred to it in sympathetic terms. He said it was defended by the Hon. John Morley and others of whom he spoke.

John Morley is a man for whom I have the greatest respect as a literary man; as a statesman I have very little respect for him. John Morley is a man who lives in dreams and ideas. Dreams and ideas are all right outside of practical life, but when you get into practical life you have to meet men who have ideas different from yours, and you have to combat those men. You are not living in an ethereal world away above all these troubles and practical questions. John Morley lives in a world like that. If he could have all his own way and make everybody think as he does, everybody would be all right. But the world is not made of people of that kind. One thing the hon. gentleman did not mention, that was that Lord Rosebery, the man who stands high in the Liberal party, who stands almost at the top of the Liberal party in Great Britain to-day, does not approve of the policy of Mr. Gladstone at the time of the Majuba Hill defeat. He said that policy was not one that Great Britain should have pursued, he took issue with Mr. Gladstone lately in making a speech on that policy, and no doubt the views he gave utterance to are the views of the great mass of the people in Great Britain. I may say that even in the parliament of Great Britain men who are friends of Mr. Gladstone think he made a very serious mistake at that time.

The hon. gentleman criticises strongly Mr. Chamberlain's policy. There is no use in saying anything about Mr. Chamberlain's policy in reply to the remarks of the hon. gentleman. Mr. Chamberlain is well able to take care of himself, as he has abundantly shown in the parliament of Great Britain. But I was rather amused, as I suppose a good many of us were, when the hon. gentleman said that had the members of this House studied the question last session before they voted they would not have so readily passed a resolution endorsing Mr. Chamberlain's policy. Now, I think they would. I think the hon. gentleman has no right to say that the Premier of Canada, that all the government of Canada, that the leader of the opposition, that all the members on both sides of the House, voted with their eyes shut, that they did not know what they were doing. He was the only man that knew anything about it, and he happened to be absent. Unfortunately, he was not here to enlighten us. But the parliament of Canada did not vote endorsing the policy of Mr. Chamberlain; the parliament of Canada at that time passed a vote endorsing the policy of the British government, and pledged themselves to support the British Empire against the Transvaal. The hon. gentleman says that he holds the same opinions on the Transvaal question as he holds on the Manitoba school question. He said on that question he supported the present government because their policy was a policy of conciliation, and so he would support a policy of conciliation in reference with the Transvaal. Well, I can only say in reply to that, that the hon. gentleman has missed his vocation altogether, and instead of being a member of this House he ought to be a member of the Imperial parliament; then, perhaps, he might be able to urge his views on the government there and show that this policy of conciliation was the best policy. For myself, I do not pretend to set myself above Mr. Chamberlain, and the government of Great Britain, and Lord Salisbury, and these great men who have studied this question. We know that Lord Salisbury and his colleagues were willing to do almost anything in order to have peace, there is no doubt of that. Lord Salisbury is a man who hates war, he tries to preserve peace with honour, we see that all through his career. The Queen herself was averse to the war; and we may rest assured that when war broke out between those two peoples, it was a source of great sorrow and disappointment to the government of Great Britain.

Now, I want to ask right here who commenced the war? It is very well to criticise Great Britain now, but who began the war? Who issued the ultimatum to Great Britain and gave her 48 hours to carry it out? Who invaded Natal? Why, it is absurd for a gentleman to get up in this House and criticise the action of the British government with reference to this war. Now, Sir, the other day I picked up a paper, the Canadian Baptist, published in Toronto, a religious journal, and I noticed a piece there copied from a paper called the Christian Budget, a paper published in England. I will just ask the House to listen while I read a portion of an article, which is the best thing that I have seen on this question. The article is headed: 'Was the war inevitable?' and was written by the Rev. Charles Phillips, of Johannesburg, a man who was on the spot. It is very well for gentlemen who are in Canada, or in England, to talk when they know nothing at all about the circumstances, when they never saw a Boer in their lives, and do not know what he thinks or what his ideas are. This is the article I mentioned:

The Reverend Charles Phillips, Congregational minister who has just returned to this country after eleven years' pastoral work in South Africa—the last four having been spent in Johannesburg—writes: There is one remarkable fact to which I would call the attention of your readers. In South Africa there are some hundred of ministers of free churches. They are akin in training and creed, in feeling and sympathy in politics and religion, with the ministers of the Free Churches at home. They are on the spot, and have had practical experience of all that has led up to the present war. They may, therefore, be supposed to understand it better than the same class of men in England. It has involved the Transvaal section of them also in very serious consequences. We are houseless, and homeless, and salaryless. Our people are scattered; our houses, furniture, books as well as churches, are exposed to devastation, and I fear there is little prospect of any of us finding them as we left them. Our interests, therefore, were all on the side of peace. And yet (and in this we may include Episcopalians) there is in reality no dissentient voice among us. We all believe that this war was inevitable; that whatever may be the defects of the diplomacy it did not cause the war; that the object of it has been the dream of a quarter of a century; a dream that seemed likely to be only a dream, until the Uitlanders provided for them the sinews of war; that since then there has been steady, persistent, unflinching preparation for the present conflict. 'Africa for the Afrianders'; a united Dutch Republic from the Zambesi to the Cape; the exclusion of the English from South-Africa; that is the true explanation and the true inwardness of our present conflict.

This gentleman goes on writing more in the same strain, but that is enough to show the facts of the case. I find here a letter copied from the Outlook, an American paper, from their correspondent in Africa, a man also on the spot. I will read a few words from what he says in a private letter:

If the Boers should succeed—what I think impossible—South Africa would be a perfectly unlivable place for any one who spoke the English language. They hate all Anglo-Saxons with a bitter, unreasoning hatred that is beyond describing.

I just read the first article to show what these men think who criticise Mr. Chamberlain's policy. I suppose the gentleman who writes that belongs to the Liberal party, but he lays down the proposition that this war was inevitable, that it had to come. It was foreseen all the time by the Boers. The dream of the Boers and of the Orange Free State was to possess the whole of Africa and drive all the English out of the country. That was the dream that they have been indulging in for years. They have been preparing for this war for years, they have secured the latest weapons, the most modern rifles and cannons, and no doubt they have been training under the most skilful officers from Europe in preparation for this war. On the other hand, what was the attitude of the British government? They did not want war, they were not ready for war, they were hoping the war would not come, but that something would turn up and prevent a war, that the Boers would give way on this question. The circumstances show that Great Britain had no desire for this war at all, and they commenced to fight because they were forced to fight. But I hold this is not the time to ask whether this war is justifiable. The war is going on to-day.

This is not the hour to discuss the question as to whether the war is justifiable or not and to find excuses for criticism. What we have to do is to do all we can to sustain the empire and back up Great Britain in this war if we are loyal, as I believe we are. The hon. gentleman said that he objects to the government acting without the sanction of parliament, although he does not object so much to giving the money. That is something, but after all it is not such a great thing. He objects on principle; he lays down the proposition that this must not be a precedent. I care nothing about that. If there was no precedent when action was first taken there was no need of a precedent when another contingent was sent, and if still another contingent is needed, we will not talk about precedents. We are not asking questions about precedents, we have not to talk about precedents, but we have to do our duty. If it was shown to be a wrong precedent, it would not make any difference. The hon. gentleman says that he objects to action being taken without the sanction of parliament. That point has been answered already by hon. members who have spoken on this subject. There is no doubt that, theoretically, he is right. But how often do we act against that principle? Something unforeseen arises, and the government get Governor General's warrants for, perhaps, half a million dollars. If it is right they know that their supporters will sustain them, and they are not afraid to do it. And, in this case, they did it without any fear at all because they knew that the sentiment of the country was strongly behind them. I do not wish to say anything more harsh about the hon. gentleman than I have said, but I have it down here, that, apparently, his sympathies are with the Boers. I do not say they are, but his speech misrepresents him if they are not. His speech really represented him as being in sympathy with the Boers. Of course there is no need of discussing that now, but he says that when we come to the last clause of the resolution he is going to oppose it. He will support them in whatever the government have agreed to do, but he has declared himself as being opposed to the last clause. I can tell the hon. gentleman that it makes no difference whether he objects to the last clause or not. The last clause is going to be carried by hon. members on both sides of the House who are in perfect sympathy with it. The hon. leader of the opposition has proposed that something more than this should be done, but we are glad that the government are doing what they propose to do in this matter, and it is fortunate for the government that there are not many who are going to oppose them. They know that they have nearly the whole of parliament behind them, and that they have the whole of the country behind them in this matter. The hon. gentleman expressed great sympathy with the poor Canadians who have gone to this war without being parties to the beginning of the war and without understanding the circumstances of the war. He is not going to oppose the government paying them because they went away without knowing what they were doing. The hon. gentleman is very kind indeed, but I can tell him—he is not in the House; if he were I would like to tell him that these Canadians have volunteered, and that they went away understanding perfectly what they were doing. I do not say, that they stopped, as the hon. gentleman did, to criticise the policy of Mr. Chamberlain, or of the British government, or, to read a book, written, no doubt, in opposition to the government of Great Britain, by some man who is opposed to it, and who wants to find all the fault he can with it. I say that these volunteers are intelligent men and they knew that what they went away to do was to support the empire. They did not go out to assist the Boers, they knew what side they were going to fight on, they were intelligent, they went away with their eyes open, and I can tell the hon. gentleman that these brave men would not thank him for his sympathy if they had heard the speech that he has made to-night. Some times, hon. gentlemen in speaking of this question, like the hon. member for Labelle, talk as if these men were forced to go. That is a thing that we must never forget, that every man who has gone to the Transvaal is a volunteer. Nobody has asked him to go, he has begged to go, he wanted to be allowed to go. I had a young man here the other day from East Durham, and I am happy to say that several volunteers went from East Durham, that the people of the town of Port Hope in giving them a send-off had the greatest time they ever had in their history. Before allowing these volunteers to go away they insured their lives and thus showed their sympathy with the cause for which they were to fight. This young man, to whom I have referred, enlisted, but, becoming ill, he was obliged to go back home. Then, his place here was filled, and now he wants to go with the second contingent. These men have not been forced to go, they have asked to be allowed to go, they have gone with their eyes open, and they knew what they were going for. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have done with the hon. member for Labelle. I want to say that war is not always as bad a thing as it is represented. I do not like war, but wars are a necessity for strong nations, and nations that cannot fight are no good in these days. They might as well stand aside because the strength of every nation is judged by its fighting capacity. This war, I believe, will be a blessing in disguise to the British nation, but, apart from all this, the war has been a blessing, because it has done more to bind together the various parts of the empire than anything else that could have happened. While there will be a great loss of life, while this war will cost a great deal, it is worth it all. The result will be worth it all to South Africa and to the empire if South Africa is acquired, and no matter how much Canada spends, it will be worth every cent to Canada. We have been trying all the time to make the people of England realize how important we are. We want to get their trade; we have given them a preferential tariff; we want them to realize how important a part of the empire we are, and nothing else could have happened to make them feel an attachment for this country like what has happened. No matter what Canada may spend in this war, it will come back to Canada; even in the monetary point of view it will all come back to Canada, besides which it will open the eyes of the people of England to the resources and greatness of this country, and to the fact that this country is an integral part of the British Empire. I intended, before referring to the hon. member for Labelle, to speak a few words in reference to the speech of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). I congratulate him upon his speech. There is one thing that I must criticise, however, and it is that the hon. member deprecated the attempt made to make political capital out of this war. I deprecate that, too, but while I think the hon. gentleman alluded to this side of the House, I would ask him who is attempting to make political capital out of it. I do not think that the Conservative party have done so. I know that I have not. I am only a humble member of the party, but I am one. I have not attempted to do that, and I have never heard any one else on this side of the House trying to make political capital out of it. I do admit that the hon. leader of the opposition criticised the action of the right hon. Prime Minister, and I must say that the subsequent action of the government justified that criticism. There is no doubt that the hon. leader of the opposition did criticise the government, and if some political capital was made, well, that was not his fault. That was the fault of the government, because the government might have acted a little quicker than they did. Sir, the Conservative party have not tried to make capital out of this, but from what I have heard some other parties have tried to make capital out of it, and I believe they have met with no success in that attempt. I agree with the government in these resolutions, and I congratulate them—or rather I congratulate the country, because the Premier has told us that it was public opinion in the country which forced him to act, and therefore for what has been done by the government the country must get the credit. After the country, I give the government credit. It is my opinion that in a crisis of this kind the government should not have waited for public opinion and in that I disagree with the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who stated that the government should await public opinion. On an important issue like this, the government should have known public opinion, and should have led public opinion, and they might have done so with advantage to themselves in this case. I think the government waited too long, and the Premier gave his opinion too freely in the first place, although I congratulate him on having changed his opinion afterwards. There are crises which arise in the history of nations in view of which the government should not wait for public opinion to force them to act, and this was a case in point if ever there was one. True, public opinion moved rapidly and strongly in this matter, and it is a matter of congratulation to us all that the government had sense enough to recognize that public opinion when they saw it. I notice in this resolution that the government says with reference to the expenditure incurred in sending the contingents to South Africa, they :

are hereby indemnified and exonerated from all liability by reason of having used or authorized the use of the above mentioned sums of money, or any portion thereof without due legal authority, and all expenditure heretofore made of any of said sums shall be held to have been lawfully made.

I wish to say, Sir, that the government need have no fear of any opposition to that proposal from this side of the House. The Conservative party are a unit on this question. We will heartily vote this money, and we are prepared to indemnify them and to release them from all blame. We are more generous than some of their own friends in that, and I hope they will appreciate it and give us due credit for it. At any rate, whether the government do or not, the country will give us credit for our patriotic course.

Mr. D. MONET (Laprairie and Napierville). Mr. Speaker, it is with some regret that I rise to enter my protest against the motion which has been placed in your hands. As is known, I suppose, to all the members of this House, I have always been a loyal supporter of the Liberal government, but I am very sorry indeed that in their new policy of involving Canada in a contribution to foreign wars, I cannot follow my political friends. The motion which you have read, Sir, asks this House to go into Committee of Ways and Means in order to ratify a large expenditure of $2,000,000 which has been incurred without the consent of parliament for the purpose of sending our Canadian soldiers to the South African war. On that policy I am at variance with my friends in the government. The position which I now take on the floor of this House I already took several months ago in the public press, and since doing so, I have been charged with disloyalty by both friends and foes. My friends have suspected my loyalty to my party and my political foes have charged me with disloyalty to my country. If ever I have been sorry not to be more familiar with the English language than I am, it is certainly at this present moment when I would like to be able to utter my thoughts as plainly as I have conceived them. However, I shall do my best, and I leave it to the kindness of my fellow-members to do the rest.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONET. Sir, what are the facts which render necessary these resolutions now before the House. On the 11th of October last, war was declared between the Transvaal and Great Britain. The population of the Transvaal, as has been stated by the hon. member of North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is about 350,000, and the population of Great Britain in round figures is 40,000,000, so that this war is being waged by a population of forty millions against a population of about a quarter of a million. When the war was declared, an agitation commenced all over the Dominion to the effect that Canada should contribute to assist Great Britain, but the leader of the government thought he would not be justified under the existing law in forcing Canada to so contribute. However that may be, Canada did contribute a little later on. This is the interview which the Prime Minister gave to the Globe newspaper, an interview which is very familiar to all the members of this House, but which I may be permitted to read in order that I may base my argument upon it:

As I understand the Militia Act, and I may say that I have given it some study of late, our volunteers are enrolled to be used in the defence of the Dominion. They are Canadian troops, to be used to fight for Canada's defence. . . . There is no menace to Canada, and although we may be willing to contribute troops, I do not see how we can do so. Then, again, how could we do so without parliament granting us the money? We simply could not do anything. In other words, we should have to summon parliament.

The hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) did not take the same stand as the Prime Minister then took, and he wrote to the right hon. gentleman expressing his disappointment that Canada should not send a contingent of her soldiers to South Africa, with the obligation on our country to pay all the expenditure entailed thereby. Every member of this House is familiar with the Woodbridge platform, a platform which has been endorsed by the member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), and 'en passant' I may congratulate him on the fact that he has since been selected as one of the leaders of the Conservative party in the province of Quebec. This Woodbridge platform having been endorsed by the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) it was then endorsed by the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Casgrain) at Granby; the third Conservative leader in the province of Quebec remaining dumb for the time being. It was the opinion throughout the country that the Conservative party had unanimously agreed upon sending Canadian soldiers to South Africa, and an Order in Council was passed by our government, the following extract from which I shall read:

The Prime Minister, in view of the well known desire of a great many Canadians who are ready to take service under such conditions, is of opinion that the moderate expenditure which would thus be involved for the equipment and transportation of such volunteers may readily be undertaken by the government of Canada without summoning parliament, especially as such an expenditure under such circumstances cannot be regarded as a departure from the well known principles of constitutional government and colonial practice, nor construed as a precedent for future action.

Sir, this small expenditure which is spoken of in this Order in Council amounts to the sum of $2,000,000; an expenditure that has been incurred, as I have said, without the consent of parliament. In the Order in Council, a detrimental precedent, a most detrimental precedent has been established and a most criminal attempt has been made by a responsible government to trample under foot the constitution. It is in order to protest against this infraction of the cardinal principle of responsible government that I rise in my seat to-night, and in so doing, I may state I am backed by the unanimous feeling of the constituency I have the honour to represent. You have been told already, Mr. Speaker, that a few months ago, I took a certain position on this question in the public press of the country. I told my electors that I was opposed to this policy of my friends in the government. I told them that I understood full well that a member ought to represent his constituents, and if these views were not the views of my constituents, I was not ready to yield to their views, but I was ready to resign. I do not want to read the whole of my letter, but I will read the conclusion. I said :

For my part, I am opposed to any contributions to foreign wars of the empire, and I shall oppose such contributions as well, on the floor of the House of Commons if I am still a member at the coming session of parliament.

It is not because I am a Canadian of French extraction that I have adopted this course : I do not make it a question of sentiment. My language would be the same were I the citizen of a French colony. I am opposed to the expenditure of one cent which has for its object to tighten closer the ties of Canada to Great Britain (except the commercial bonds which unite us to our mother country). We have almost nothing in common with the old continent.

I am a Canadian, and my ideal is to see Canada rank among independent nations as soon as the vitality of its people and the immensity of its natural resources will have sufficiently developed our country.

Therefore, in order to attain this end duty to our country compels us to apply all our actual revenue for the development of our resources. Moreover, we must attract foreign immigration here instead of sending our fellow men as targets in Africa.

Now is the object of my letter : I understand quite well that a member of parliament must represent his electors, also that he should resign if his opinions differ from those of his constituents, and if I do not resign immediately it is because I believe my opinions coincide with those of my constituents. At all events, if I mistake their feelings, my determination is hereby made known, and, if it is not in conformity to popular will, let my constituents present me a requisition signed by twenty-five electors, either Liberal or Conservative and I shall resign at once if so requested.

Sir, I did not want to say, 'Here are my views, and if 200 or 300 of my electors are not satisfied with them, I am ready to resign.' I did not want even to confine the challenge to my Liberal friends who supported me. I said as plainly as possible, 'If twenty-five of my electors, either Liberal or Conservative, ask me to resign, I am ready to do it.' Sir, that challenge was not taken up. Some newspapers have said that over two thousand men asked me to resign. This was a falsehood ; I have not been blamed nor asked to resign by a single elector, either Conservative or Liberal. The Conservatives in my county have been sensible enough not to look at the question from a party point of view ; I thank them for it. The Liberals who fought with me the contest I had to sustain in 1896 were independent enough to understand that, however close a member of parliament has been instructed by his constituents to stick to his leader, he has the right to be something more than a mere machine ready to move or to stop at the first touch of the finger of the master. Sir, these independent Liberals I am glad to represent in this House, and it is with their moral support that I want to say to-day that this appropriation of $2,000,000 is a detriment to the country and quite unconstitutional.

Mr. Speaker, without going any further, let me say that I have not examined just now whether the war is right or wrong, is just or unjust. Let me take for granted that the war is a just war, or, rather, that a loyal subject—and I claim that I am a loyal subject—has not the right to question the justice of a war, when once that war has been decided upon by the legitimate authority of the country. But by the force of the same argument, Mr. Speaker, you will have to admit that any future war of Great Britain, whether Canada is interested in it or not, will be as just as this war. By the force of this very argument, you must admit that Canada will never have any less reason to contribute to future wars than she has had to contribute to the present war on the ground of merit. But I do not want to deal just now with the question of precedent or no precedent. I will only look at the bare facts of the expenditure already incurred. This expenditure amounts to $2,000,000. On what ground were these $2,000,000 spent ? Did we owe these millions to England by law ? Did we owe these millions to England by necessity that knows no law or at least, as the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has said, is the expenditure of these millions for the best interests of this country ? Sir, did we owe these millions to England by law ? I say no. It is easy for me to explain my views on that point. The hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig), who has just taken his seat, has admitted that the law did not oblige Canada to contribute a single penny to a war except a war in defence of Canada, either externally or internally. I suppose this will be admitted by every member of this House. If we do not owe it by law, what was the reason why this expenditure was incurred ? Was it because England was in need of help ? Let us examine what were the circumstances of the war, and see if necessity from England cried for colonial help. Let us examine the respective forces of the parties who are now warring. At the beginning of the war England sent about 20,000 soldiers to the front ; to-day England has over 200,000 men in South Africa. So that when we first intervened, when we sent the first contingent from Canada to South Africa, there were over 180,000 soldiers remaining idle in England at the disposal of the British government. Where was the necessity of Canada intervening ? It seems to me very sensible to say that as long as England keeps her own soldiers at home Canada is not called upon to contribute directly or indirectly. Now, was this expenditure incurred for the best interests of our country? The hon. member for North Norfolk has said that this expenditure was for the best interests of Canada: but he failed to prove that Canada was in the least interested, or will derive any profit from the spending of these $2,000,000. Sir, we are a young country: we are a comparatively small people and we are a comparatively poor people.

We are a young nation and a small people, and every year we are paying immigration agents who are rapping at the doors of every country filled up with population to induce settlers to come and settle in this peaceful Canada, and, therefore, I ask, is it proper that we should send the best blood of this nation to South Africa, from which perhaps a great many soldiers who went will never return. I repeat it, we are poor, everybody knows that every year deputations come to the capital asking for substantial aid to develop this or that national industry, and in nearly every case the government replies: Your scheme seems to be a very fair and promising one, but we are sorry that the condition of the public exchequer does not warrant such an outlay of money as you require. Everybody knows that in half of the speeches made every year on the Budget, the burden of complaint is that our debt is now very large, but at least we can show that this debt has been the means of producing a very fair revenue to the people or to the government. But what will be our revenue from the debt incurred in carrying on this war in South Africa? Why, we are not to be allowed even to call to account those responsible for the war, whether just or not, or those responsible for the imprudent management of the British soldiers, which has so far characterized it. I may be told that the cost will be very large indeed for Great Britain herself, but I do not expect that the practical mind of England will fail to reach some benefit from it. The greater may be the cost of the war, the greater will be the Kimberley diamonds which England will cut off from the Boer dominions. But so far as we are concerned, we have no means of recouping ourselves for the millions we will have spent. If there was no necessity for England calling for colonial help, and if it is not proper for this young country to spend millions on this war, what reason can be urged to justify this large expenditure? The only reason which can be given is the very one that has not been given by the government. It is that the intention was to create a precedent that will for ever bind Canada to contribute to the carrying on of the future wars of Great Britain.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONET. I hear an hon. gentleman say 'hear, hear,' and, therefore, take it for granted that he assents to this point. Then if the intention was to create a precedent, why should not the whole truth be known and the real position disclosed. I really believe it is intended to create a precedent.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. Minister of Public Works says not.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The hon. minister will say just what he thinks later on.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I hope I may be mistaken, but the hon. gentleman was reported as having said that.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman was engaged elsewhere and did not know what was going on.

Mr. MONET. I would like to be able to think that it will not be a precedent, and I admit at once that this clause in the Order in Council is certainly a little better than nothing, though I do not suppose it is much better. The hon. leader of the opposition says it is nonsense to say it is not a precedent, and the Montreal Gazette says that certainly it is. The very following day after the address was adopted, I find the Gazette of Montreal, the leading organ of the Conservative party, publishing this editorial:

A great precedent has been set and sanctioned; and while, in petty border wars, there will in future be neither call nor contribution by the colonies, when grave Imperial crises occur, and the forces of the central power are called on to put out all their strength, as they are called on now, the rule will be for the colonies to be represented in the fighting line, as they are now. To have done something to create this situation is a thing to mark one session of parliament as distinctive, and it is to be noted, as the most interesting feature of the thing, that it is the work of parliament, as a whole, and not of any one party in it.

But regardless of all these opinions, let us reason out the question whether it is or not a precedent. Similar causes always call for similar effects, and therefore let us examine the reasons which induced the government to contribute to the war between England and the Transvaal. The only reason given—I have no right to refer to the speeches delivered in this House—but the only reason given in the speech from the Throne is this:

It appeared to my ministers expedient to anticipate the action of parliament by equipping and forwarding two contingents of volunteers to the seat of war as a practical evidence of the profound devotion and loyalty of the entire people of Canada to the sovereign institutions of the British Empire.

So that the only reason given to justify Canada's action is based on gratitude and loyalty or devotion and loyalty. Well, in the very next war which may take place between England and any other country, are we to be less grateful, and will those who make it a standard of loyalty to bleed their own country for the benefit of England be less loyal in the very next war that may take place? I am afraid that a precedent has been created which will be for ever followed in the future. And if so, let us boldly face the uncertainty of the future and endeavour to ascertain what will be the position of Canada if we are always to contribute to the carrying on of British wars outside of this country. I will take just 50 years, not the whole reign of our great sovereign, but 50 years of that reign, and in that period I find that thirty-two wars have been waged by Great Britain with other countries. Here is a list of those wars :

The second war of Burmah, 1852-53 ; Crimean war, 1854 ; third war with China, 1856-58 ; the Indian mutiny, 1857 ; the Mavre war, 1860-61 ; the new war with China, 1860-62 ; the second Mavre war, 1863-66 ; the Ashantee war, 1864 ; the war of Rhouton, 1864 ; the war with Abyssinia 1867-68 ; the war with the Bagondi, 1868 ; the third war with the Maoris, 1868-69 ; the war with the Luki, 1871 ; the second Ashanti war, 1873-74 ; the third Kaffir war, 1877 ; the war with the Zulus, 1878-79 ; the third Afghanistan war, 1878-80 ; the war with the Basutos, 1879-81 ; the Egyptian war, 1862 ; the war with the Transvaal, 1879-81 ; the war with the Soudan, 1884-85-89 ; the third war with the Burmese, 1885-92 ; the war with Zanzibar, 1890 ; the Indian frontier war, 1890 ; the war with the Matabeles, 1894-96 ; the Chitral war, 1895 ; the third Ashanti war, 1896 ; the second war with the Soudan, 1896 ; the Indian frontier war, 1897 ; the third war of the Soudan, 1898 ; and lastly, the war with the Transvaal, 1899.

Supposing that in the ensuing fifty years there shall be as many wars between England and other countries of the world as in the last fifty—and I suppose I shall not be called a false prophet, when I say that we are on the eve of a general conflagration in Europe, and that if England wants to keep her colonies and her possessions all over the world, there will be at least as many wars in the next fifty years as there have been in the last fifty. Assuming that to be the case, we can have an idea of the large expenditure that will be incurred by Canada in the next fifty years, if this is to be a precedent.

I should like to be understood by everybody in this House who might be led to believe that were I not a Canadian of French extraction I should not hold the same views as I do. I admit that we have been very generously treated by England. And why do I say so? For the reason that we have the same responsible political institutions that England has herself. But it is because I appreciate the value of those British institutions that I want to see them respected by those who are in charge of them in this country. I say at once if parliament had been summoned, not to ratify a vote as we are called upon to do, but to discuss the question in this House, to have the views of those who oppose this contribution on the part of Canada as well as the contrary views placed before you, Mr. Speaker, and if a decision had been arrived at, especially if this had been done after a general election where the matter or plan had been openly stated in the country, I would be the first one to give in to the will of the majority. Parliament is the supreme authority for me. I am a democrat to the hilt, and parliament is supreme authority for me as for everybody in this country. Law binds everybody in Canada, but everybody in Canada has the right to be heard, either by himself or by the representatives of his constituency, in framing the law ; and it is only when a free discussion is had in this House that a decision arrived at by parliament takes the shape and has the force of law. But, so long as there is no law to change the relations of Canada with Great Britain, I object to sending our men to take part in the wars of Great Britain when Great Britain does not need them. I object to force the drop of water from the glass of the thirsty man to that of the Queen of the seas ; I object to taking the money or our workers to aid the millionaire country of England. Discussion is free in this House. Since the Bill of Right was passed in England, discussion is free to such an extent that you, Mr. Speaker, with all the authority you are entrusted with, have no right to stop these eight and nine-hour-long speeches that are delivered every year in this House. Discussion is free, because it is the very spirit of British institutions that the will of the people may be known before action is taken, that all the country may be aware of the matters discussed, and the way in which they are discussed. I repeat, as long as there is no legal or constitutional change arrived at by the will of parliament, as expressed by representations coming fresh from the country after a general election, I object to tearing up the written contract between Great Britain and Canada, the British North America Act.

Now, this leads me to examine for a moment the constitutional aspect of the question to which I will come again when the motion of my friend from Labelle makes his motion. It is well known that by our constitution all the subsidies that are to be voted are to be voted by the House of Commons, and, however, great may be the majority of the government, it has no right to spend a single penny unless it is voted by the members of this House. And this right, this sacred right, which has been conquered by the people of England, first of all the nations of the world, is surrounded by safeguards which are very plainly stated. Under our constitution not only the money is voted by parliament, but the senators who are not responsible to the ratepayers, have no right to take the initiative in voting public money. Here are articles 53 and 54 of the British North America Act :

53. Bills for appropriating any part of the public revenue, or for imposing any tax or impost, shall originate in the House of Commons.

54. It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address, or Bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or any tax or impost to any purpose that has not been first recommended to the House by message of the Governor General in the session in which such vote, resolution, address, or Bill is proposed.

Now, there is an exception which is provided for by the Audit Act, which says :

If, when parliament is not in session, any accident happens to any public work or building which requires an immediate outlay for the repair thereof, or any other occasion arises when any expenditure not foreseen before or provided for by parliament is urgently and immediately required for the public good.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONET. Will the hon. gentleman who says 'hear, hear,' claim that the sending of our contingents was something urgently required for the public good ; will he reflect for a single moment that between the offer of a second contingent and the departure of that contingent for South Africa, more than four weeks passed ? If he does not forget that how can he claim that this is a matter of urgency ? Why was not parliament called to ratify the offer of the second contingent ? Can the hon. gentleman explain that if he has the Audit Act in his recollection ?

Mr. SPROULE. Ask the government to explain it.

Mr. MONET. I hear the hon. member for East Grey say that the government claims so. I do not suppose—

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman misunderstood me. I say that he had better ask the government to explain it. They have the power to call parliament. An explanation from them would be very important.

Mr. MONET. It would not be fair for the hon. gentleman to try to involve me in a contradiction when he himself shares the sentiment and opinion of the government, and when I differ from the government on this matter. I will go on with the extract in the Audit Act :

—Then, upon the report of the Minister of Finance and Receiver General that there is no parliamentary provision, and of the minister having charge of the service in question that the necessity is urgent, the Governor in Council may order a special warrant to be prepared, to be signed by the Governor General for the issue of the amount estimated to be required.

I suppose this has always been the law as understood by everybody in this country since 1848. I will read an extract from the Globe of 1872, which was then, as it is to-day, perhaps the most important newspaper of the country. The Globe on the 6th of July in that year published the following words :

The policy of the Liberal party is to make parliamentary government supreme, and to take from the government all power to use any portion of the people's money without a direct vote for such service.

In a debate that took place in 1887, the hon. Mr. Mills, the present Minister of Justice, said :

Not a dollar had they the right to take from the public treasury under the law, and every dollar which has been taken in that way has been taken in flagrant violation of the law.

Sir Richard Cartwright, in this very same debate, uttered the following words :

It is a very cardinal principle on which parliamentary institutions hinge that ministers of the Crown should not under any pretext whatever expend public money until that money has been voted by parliament, and until the reasons why the Crown asks for the money, have been fully explained and discussed. To that rule there is but one exception : in cases of public emergency, in cases of unforeseen expenditure.

Mr. Davies, who is now Minister of Marine and Fisheries, said on the same occasion :

Two things that must concur are : first, that the expenditure is unforeseen, second, that it is urgently and immediately required.

And the present member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) said in his graphic language :

It is time that a stop was put to this expenditure of money without the consent of parliament.

In 1891, Sir Richard Cartwright held the very same views as those I have just quoted. So I assume, Mr. Speaker, that it has been pretty well understood up to the present that parliament should vote all the money to be spent on any purpose whatever. This is not the case of a public building falling down, it is not even the case of the British Empire being overthrown. The member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has said to-day that it was ridiculous to claim that this trouble was of such enormous danger to Canada and to the empire itself.

Sir, the right of the people to control the vote of public money to be spent for any purpose whatever is a very old right in the British constitution. It is a right that England has conquered from her kings, because the kings of England were not better men than the kings of any other country. They were disposed to tyrannize their subjects, as all other masters of nations have been. But the glory of the people of England is that they conquered their right five or six centuries before the people of other countries conquered the same right. As early as 1215 King John was obliged to give his people what is called in English history the 'Magna Charta.' By this grand Bill of rights the people obtained by their representatives a certain supervision over the levying of taxes. In 1689, at the same time that in France, under the reign of Louis XIV., public moneys were being spent to supply the debaucheries of the court, the Bill of Rights was voted by the House of Commons and accepted by the King of England. Although this Bill of Rights must be known to everybody in the House, allow me to quote two or three of its most important clauses :

That it is illegal for the Sovereign to suspend or execute laws without the consent of parliament.

That parliament ought to be frequently held.

That it is illegal to levy money without the consent of parliament.

Sir, this magnificent franchise was given to the people, as I have just said, in 1689 ; but so jealous was England of that beautiful gem in her constitution, that she was not willing to concede it to anybody else outside of her own territory. What she had acquired for her own people she was not willing to concede to Canada, and England tyrannized Canada as France would have had done. It was only in 1791 that a kind of popular government was given to Canada, popular, because the councillors were taken from amongst the people, not a responsible government, because they were not responsible to the people. But what does this franchise represent in England, and what does it represent in Canada. In England it represents a victory for the people in their struggle of four centuries with the kings ; in Canada it represents over 50 years of constant struggle in parliament by our best men. It was only in 1841, over half a century after Canada was ceded to England that Canada was granted responsible government, as they had it in England. This concession was only granted to Canada after years of persistent struggle by our public men.

Mr. MONTAGUE. When did she offer it first ?

Mr. MONET. In the very Act by which Canada was ceded to England, and in spite of this pledge the promise had never been fulfilled. Sir, I do not say this with any animosity whatever. I think this is not the proper time to make recriminations against anybody ; but we must take history as it stands.

Now, what is the reason given by the government for not following the constitutional course in this matter ? The reason given is that the government were forced to yield to a wave of public opinion. Sir, although I am a democrat, I do not consider myself bound to yield to a wave of public opinion when I don't share that opinion. I must retain my right to oppose this wave of public opinion when I believe it is in the wrong direction. I cannot understand what kind of statesmanship that is which says : My only justification is that the public demanded it. Sir, I say that if the public at large demanded a contribution from Canada to this war, the true course for the government was to summon parliament and take the voice of the members who have been elected by this public opinion. Where is the leader of a party who, on the eve of an election, does not claim that he has public opinion in his favour ? If we were always so sure of public opinion, and if we always knew what public opinion was we would not need to have general elections. We would always be sure that when the press of this party took such and such a ground it represented public opinion. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to refer to a past debate, but the right hon. gentleman who leads the government has said many times, not only in his answer to the speech of the hon. leader of the opposition in the debate on the address, but he has said a great many times elsewhere that the Conservative press is a reptile press, and I agree fully with him. On a great many occasions it has shown itself to be a reptile press, and if it is a reptile press, which is admitted almost, I wonder if this reptile is a proper indication of public opinion and if it was proper to base upon it the policy that has been pursued. I am afraid that the reptile has crossed the threshold of the council board to present the apple of temptation. I won't say that the cabinet took the whole apple, but they took half of it, and the balance is still in litigation between the Liberal and Conservative parties. What is this public opinion ? As regards what I have said of the Conservative press, public opinion may be influenced by some interest as the public press of England, I have been told, has been influenced by the power of gold. But, without throwing any unkind imputation on the press of this country, let me quote a few articles from newspapers to show to the House what was the state of public opinion in regard to the new policy that was to be inaugurated. Le Temps does not belong to the reptile press ; it is a Liberal newspaper. It is printed in Ottawa. It must be a faithful echo of the public opinion of the capital. Le Temps says :

We already know that it is Mr. Tarte who opposes the ridiculous idea of taking our money to carry on Imperial wars. The Minister of Public Works considers the question of the Transvaal from the Canadian point of view. What should we go to Africa for ? To help England to conquer an undisciplined army of 50,000 farmers ? The empire can do without us in this easy affair.

Le Temps, which is now quoted as being a strong supporter of the government on this question, admits that there was no urgency, that there was no necessity :

Besides she does not ask us to come, and did she do so, such an audacious and unusual proceeding would be a new reason for distrust of her.

Mark you, how Le Temps has changed.

Is it not plain that Great Britain, seeing the storm about to burst over her head, seeks to engage us in a conflict created or provoked by her, the responsibility for which in no wise can be shared by Canada, and that in order to establish a dangerous precedent which would permit her in future to call on our country for money and for men whenever she might need them. Truly we should be great fools to sacrifice our present security, as well as that of the future, and our painfully-acquired autonomy, for the doubtful advantage of sharing the fortunes of England.

Where was public opinion at that time? And that was only a few days before the Order in Council was passed on October 14, 1899. This is the only French Liberal organ of the government in the capital. Let us see what is said by La Patrie. La Patrie is the only daily Liberal French organ of the government in Montreal. La Patrie must be read by quite a number of readers, and it must echo, to a certain extent, public opinion. Here is what La Patrie says:

Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the other day, very clearly defined the government's position in stating that there was no justification whatever for the government offering or sending a contingent without previously consulting parliament. It, therefore, follows that the Canadian government did not offer any military contingent to the Imperial government.

For our own part, we have no hesitation whatever in stating that if the Laurier cabinet had taken upon itself the responsibility of exposing the future of Canada in sending a military contingent to the Transvaal at the expense of this country, we should have blamed its policy.

Where was public opinion in Montreal? Where was public opinion in the office of La Patrie, which echoed public opinion as being against a contribution by Canada towards the cost of the war. Let me read some more articles. I will take the Globe. I do not suppose that the Globe belongs to the reptile press. I suppose that the Globe must echo, to some extent, the feelings of some of its readers. It has a large circulation indeed. Here is what the Globe says:

If parliament becomes merely an instrument for registering the decrease of the executive, one of the greatest safeguards of our liberties will be gone, and parliament itself will fall into a position of weakness and contempt.

Suffer not the old king under any name.

Sir, this language of the Globe I admire. This is the policy I would have liked to have seen pursued by my friends of the government. I have given you a little history of British parliamentary institutions. The old king had always been, as early as before 1689, an enemy of the British constitution, and we are suffering now from the old king under a new name. L'Evenement is a Conservative paper. At this time it must not, however, have suffered very much from the influence of the reptile press, because L'Evenement although a Conservative daily newspaper, with quite a large number of subscribers, pronounces itself quite strongly against a contribution by Canada to that war. Le Tripartite says:

We don't want Canada to take any other official part than that of the defense of our country.

Before reading extracts from English newspapers, let me say a word about Le Soleil, the Liberal organ of the party in Quebec. Le Soleil this year is extremely loyal. It does not understand why the farmers of Quebec should not take their guns and go to South Africa, but, when guns were bought by the late government Le Soleil had quite another opinion to give to its subscribers, and here is the opinion it gave at that time, under a display heading, with letters one inch high:

Do you want war?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). That was not Le Soleil.

Mr. MONET. That was L'Electeur quite true, but, Le Soleil of to-day is only a spot on the sun of the ancient L'Electeur.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That is what you say it is.

Mr. MONET. My hon. friend (Mr. Fitzpatrick) can have his own opinion on that. Will he deny that Mr. Ernest Pacaud, who is editing Le Soleil to-day is the very same gentleman who edited L'Electeur. Now, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) is silent I must accept his silence for consent to my assertion. L'Electeur said:

Do you want war? Three million dollars for rifles, guns and bayonets. A near danger for your farmers.

How he warned them at that time. After saying that Sir Charles Tupper was in favour of Imperial federation, I quote the following words:—

Mr. WALLACE. Read it all.

Mr. MONET. I do not want to take up more than reasonable time.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It is extremely interesting, we ought to have it all.

Mr. MONET. L'Electeur said:

One of the conditions of this alliance would be that in time of war, Canada would be called for to pay her share in money and blood.

Why all these armaments, if we are not going to get war? And why would we fight for England? Your sons will be sent in Africa, in Asia wherefrom they will never come.

Just fancy, Mr. Speaker, the faculty of L'Electeur for prophecy. He told us four years ago that our sons would be sent to South Africa. Well, that is really what has been done this year, but what does Le Soleil say about it now? Why Le Soleil endorses the policy of the government on that point. Sir, is this public opinion? Can the members of this House judge from that, that there is any public opinion in this country. Le Soleil said: Farmers, are you not afraid that your sons will be sent to the war; it is a shame for the Conservative government to spend $3,000,000 for arms. But, Sir, three years afterwards, the same exponent of public opinion changes front, and while the government has sent our sons to the wars, he says now: You should do much more, you should endorse the policy of the leader of the opposition, and not only send 2,000 men, but 5,000 men if necessary, and pay the whole expenditure in connection therewith. Mr. Speaker, I for one do not admit that such is the honest public opinion of the province of Quebec. But let me read a few extracts from the English press of Canada on this very matter. The Sentinel Review on the 25th of October headed a long article 'Our Real Duty,' which concludes as follows:—

Our real duty is to provide for our own defence instead of contributing to foreign wars.

The Weekly Sun said this:

To attack people who have done no wrong, slaughter them and desolate their homes is either a necessity or the greatest of crimes. It will not do to leave such questions to be settled by secret influences such as those by which Sir Wilfrid Laurier was approached; by a tide of passion, sweeping through the British music halls; or by vague guesses at the sentiment of our own country. If Canada is a responsible community, the questions of peace or war must be fairly submitted to the reason and conscience of her people.

There was the public opinion in the office of this English newspaper at Toronto. Let me quote the Huntingdon Gleaner to show that not only in Toronto, but even a portion of English-speaking people in the province of Quebec was against Canada contributing to this war. The Huntingdon Gleaner said:

What is Canada's justification to send our men to kill Boers. The Boers have never provoked us, never done us any harm. Is it not a murder to take the life of a man who has neither provoked nor threatened?

And the Montreal Herald. The Montreal Herald! It must be a scandal to mention the Montreal Herald here as a paper opposed to Canada sending a contribution to the war. But let us tell the whole truth, and as my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa and myself are accused of being traitors to the party, we shall know who are all the traitors to the Liberal party. The Montreal Herald says:

It is in the highest degree essential to Canada's interests that a discussion in parliament, free, complete and unengaged on the whole question should determine the situation of Canada in the sense of constitution.

Let me ask this: was this contribution of Canada determined in the sense of the constitution, in the face of the admission of the right hon. gentleman on the floor of this House: that he was outside of the law when he did it? It is true that the leader of the opposition said to him: You are not guilty; it is absurd to claim that the constitution has been trifled with and violated. But, Sir, the fact remains that the man who will be charged before public opinion at the next general election is the man who admitted in this House that he was outside the law in taking this course. In the words of the Montreal Herald, this question ought to be settled according to the constitution, but it has not been.

Mr. BERGERON. The Herald got $15,000 from the government last year.

Mr. MONET. I suppose the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron) would describe it as one of the reptile press.

Mr. BERGERON. There are eight or ten of them in the same position.

Mr. MONET. I do not admit the insinuation of the hon. member (Mr. Bergeron) because the Herald had earned all that money before giving the opinion I have quoted. But, Sir, not only did the newspapers give their opinions in the sense I have already shown, but certain members of this House expressed their opinion publicly. My hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) went back to his constituents and said to them: I do not approve of the policy of my friends in the government; do you agree with me. The Conservatives did not take up his challenge, and the Liberals, although I suppose they were a little dissatisfied with my hon. friend (Mr. Bourassa) did not dare to oppose him. Where was the public opinion of the county of Labelle? Was it in favour of a contribution from Canada to British foreign wars? Not at all. Was the public opinion of the county of Laprairie and Napierville favourable to Canada contributing to this war? Not at all. Not a single voter in that county has come forward to condemn me for what I said publicly. Not only have Mr. Bourassa and myself taken that ground, but Mr. Fortin, the hon. member for Laval, has taken about the same view as we did. He said in substance at St. Vincent de Paul:

One contingent—well let it go, but don't do it again, because if you do it I will most likely oppose it.

Mr. Ethier, the hon. member for Two Mountains, held the same view. He said, in substance:

The first contingent, all right—no not all right; but it will do, if you don't do it again.

Well, the government have done it again, and where let me ask is the public opinion to justify the government in doing what they have done. If they only rely on public opinion as unanimous for their justification, I do not think they have it. Mr. Desmarais, the member for St. James Division, Montreal, a most prominent member of this House, and a most eloquent French speaker, one of the best orators of the French Canadians of the province of Quebec, if not the best, said in a certain club in Montreal:

I do not fear to say that the Laurier government would be seriously blamed by the electorate

if it approved of such a measure (sending a Canadian contingent to the Transvaal), and I, for one, would rise on the floor of the House, as member for St. James Division, if such a proposal were brought before parliament, and signify my disapproval.

Sir, that hon. member is still of the same opinion, but this opinion does not count, and will not amount to anything, I suppose, because public opinion is unanimous in the four corners of the country, saying, let us send our men and let us contribute the money of the ratepayers of this country. Sir, there is only one way to account for the change of opinion on the part of these hon. members if they have changed.

Mr. WALLACE. Is that the whole list?

Mr. MONET. If the hon. gentleman has any suggestion to make to me, I am ready to listen to him.

Mr. WALLACE. I am only asking if that is the whole list.

Mr. MONET. That is the whole list which I have in my hand; but I have a pretty good memory, and if the hon. gentleman gives me any more names, I will quote them. I might quote the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron), who attended a meeting and did not make any protest against the speeches of those who spoke against the action of this government.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I had no reason to protest. I made my speech.

Mr. MONET. The hon. gentleman was reticent. He did not say much.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. You will not, however, read it.

Mr. MONET. Now, Mr. Speaker, there has been a little cooling in public opinion, everybody must admit. Le Temps, referring to a meeting which was held at Quebec to secure some funds for the relief of the families of the members of the second contingent, said this:

The preparations for enlisting the volunteers of this city for the second contingent are moving very slowly. Up to to-day there are not ten citizens who have given their names.

This is headed 'Very little enthusiasm.' There is, perhaps, one way to explain the change of view of the members, if they have changed, and the newspapers which have changed on this point. I remember a story of Cuvier, one of the most eminent naturalists of France, who was asked one day, while among a group of very learned naturalists: 'Do you believe in spontaneous generation?' It was in the time of the regime of Napoleon the First, and Cuvier merely answered, 'The emperor does not want it.' So I think the only way to explain this change of view is that the leader does not want it. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have said at the beginning of my remarks that I have been charged with disloyalty.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). It is true.

Mr. MONET. The hon. Solicitor General says it is true. He should remember that I am not the only man from the province of Quebec who has been charged with being a traitor to his party; and if he does not know his own history, perhaps, later on, we can give him a little of it.

Mr. Speaker, before dealing with the question of my loyalty, I want to say one word about the justice and the merits of the war. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has claimed that the titles of Great Britain to the Transvaal were so just that nobody could refuse to help England to enforce them. I listened very attentively to what the hon. gentleman said. He spoke of all the discoveries that have been made in South Africa by English discoverers; but when he came to say what was the just title of England to the Transvaal, he stopped. He did not say a single word of the convention of 1884, nor a single word of the convention of 1881, nor a single word of the first convention of 1852. If it was a sound argument to say that a country has a right to go and conquer and possess another country because some citizens of the conquering country have discovered that other country, how would that argument apply to the province of Quebec, or even to the whole of Canada? Was not Canada discovered by Frenchmen? Would it be a good argument to say that because of that fact, Canada is still French? If I said that to the hon. member for North Norfolk, no doubt he would reply to me that the Treaty of Paris of 1763 settled the whole dispute as to what power Canada belongs to. The same argument will apply to the Transvaal. It is true, some English discoverers discovered not only a part of the Transvaal, but a part of South Africa, but there were treaties which defined very clearly the powers of England before the war. Mr. Speaker, there has been some talk about suzerainty. If it was true that England had a right of suzerainty over the Transvaal, I would at once admit that England had a right to make the war she is now waging in South Africa. I do not say she has not that right. I take the same stand as the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), that the question is a very doubtful one, to say the least. But let us take the question of suzerainty. The hon. member for North Norfolk will admit that if there is no right of suzerainty on the part of Great Britain, this changes altogether the question of her right to make the war she is now waging against the Transvaal. Lord Derby and Lord Rosemead negotiated the treaty of 1884. In explaining that treaty, Earl Cadogan said:

That the object of the convention had been to abolish the suzerainty of the British Crown. The word 'suzerainty' is a very vague word, and I do not think it is capable of any precise legal definition. Whatever we may understand by it, I think it is not easy to define. But I apprehend, whether you call it a Protectorate or suzerainty, or the recognition of England as a paramount power, the fact is that a certain controlling power is retained when the State who exercises this suzerainty has a right to veto any negotiations into which the dependent State may enter with foreign powers.

The hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig), whose attention I would like to have for a moment, has said, in criticising the opinion given here by the hon. member for Labelle, that it is absurd to question the right or justice of this war. Will the hon. gentleman say that if England has no right of suzerainty over the Transvaal, the war is still just. If he does not, then he will be obliged to define what he understands by 'internal affairs.' That embraces the question of the franchise, which is not an international, but an internal affair; and by this very convention of 1884, the right of suzerainty was abandoned by England altogether. The only right—and I challenge contradiction on this point—left to England over the Transvaal by that convention was the right to veto in six months any treaty negotiated between the Transvaal and a foreign power, except the Free Orange State. Nobody can contradict this, for it is borne out by the very words of Lord Derby and Lord Cadogan uttered by them in the House of Lords.

Let me say one word about equal rights. Of course I admit that the Uitlanders are not treated as they ought to be, but I do not admit the contention of the hon. member for North Norfolk that the Boers are a semi-civilized people, and that England had the right to impose on them her own rule, even if the Boers did not want to accept it. Of course it would be better for the Boers to accept British institutions, for, these institutions are certainly the best in the world, and for my part I would be glad to see them flourish in South Africa as they do in England and in Canada to-day. But where is the right for England to impose these institutions on these people, if they do not want them, and to seek to impose them on the Transvaal, because England is the strongest nation. It would be better for the Boers that they should enjoy the British institutions; I admit, of course, that it would be better for the sheep to eat with the lions, but when the lions eat the sheep, they can only do so by brute force, and England has no right to impose her British institutions on the Transvaal if the Transvaal does not want to accept them.

If any hon. member will show me that England has a right of suzerainty over these people, I will admit that I am wrong. If England has so plainly the right on her side in waging this war on South Africa, why did she not accept the tribunal of arbitration offered her? It seems to me that the frontiers of Venezuela would have been decided on the battlefield, if England had no other policy than the one she is acting on to-day with regard to the Transvaal. But the United States interfered, and England recognized that the United States were a lion too, and a big people who might be terrible to meet on the battlefield, and thought it prudent to settle the matter by a tribunal of arbitration. Is it then to be said that because the Transvaal is a small country, and because, as the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has said, there are some rich diamond mines there and wealthy agricultural districts, England has the right to claim suzerainty and make war on these people. If England has not the right of suzerainty, will the hon. member for East Durham say that this is a just war?

Mr. CRAIG. I would ask the hon. gentleman who started the war?

Mr. MONET. I am sure that it was the Boers who fired the first shot, and who were the first to cross the frontiers, and who sent to England a rather ridiculous ultimatum, one which a big, strong nation would never have sent. But I am not going here to plead the case of the Transvaal, I am simply trying to ascertain whether England was right in waging this war as is urged by those who claim that she was. I am not the only one who doubts the justice of this war, and I do not question it because I am a French Canadian or a Catholic. Let me read to you an extract from a memorial forwarded to the British government, through Sir Alfred Milner, by the representatives of the Dutch Reform Church in South Africa:

As men holding the responsible position of members of the Moderamen of the Dutch Reform Church in South Africa, as preachers of the Gospel of peace, as representing a church one in creed, language, membership, blood relationship with the burghers of the Transvaal, as loyal subjects of our beloved Queen, we desire to urge upon your Excellency to leave nothing undone which may tend to avert active hostilities. We shudder to think of the consequences which are sure to follow such an eventuality. The race feeling between the Dutch and English will be intensified, the breach between the two sections of our South African community would become irreparable, the allegiance of Her Majesty's loyal Dutch subjects would sustain the severest shock it has ever been subjected to and hope of a United States Africa would be gone for ever.

Sir, this is the opinion of the Reform Church of South Africa sent to the British government through Sir Alfred Milner, and it is a strong one.

Coming back to the question of my loyalty, I have told you that I have been charged with disloyalty to my party. I do not mind much about that. I do not say that I am altogether insensible to what people think of me, but I say that I do not mind it so much as I would if I had taken the opposite point of view. But hon. gentlemen opposite and the Conservative press have charged me with disloyalty to my country for two reasons. First, because I said in my letter to La Patrie of the 20th December, 1899, that my ideal was to see Canada an independent nation in the future. I was also charged with disloyalty to Great Britain, because I said I would oppose any contribution by this country to the foreign wars of Great Britain. I am sorry that the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) is not in his seat. He is the one who has made the most noise because I said that I did not want to spend money in the wars of the British Empire as long as the empire does not need it. The law is fixed. I do not suppose we shall ever attempt to change it. But, perhaps, while we say we will not create a precedent, we may go on doing the thing anyhow. But who are the men who framed the law fixing the relations of Canada with Great Britain? Were they not the leaders of the Conservative party? That point was settled under the Militia Act of 1868. And what has the Conservative party done to oblige Canada to contribute to foreign wars more than I have said I would be ready to do? The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) sat in the cabinet from 1885 to 1896. Did he do anything during that time to force Canada to spend a single cent toward a foreign war? Did he ever attempt to change the law, which has been rightly interpreted by the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig). But, a great deal is said against the member for Laprairie and Napierville, because he declares himself opposed to do more than they have done themselves he is declared to be disloyal to Great Britain. Where is the logic of these gentlemen? They have never done anything, but because I am sincere enough to say what I think, because I am frank enough to have my own plain talk in the matter, I am disloyal. I am a kind of traitor to Great Britain. There were eight wars in which Great Britain was engaged during the time which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) was Minister of Finance. Miss Loyalty went to him and said: Will you not contribute a little to the war with China, to the war with Afghanistan, to the war in the Soudan. The hon. gentleman did not say what the member for Laprairie said. No, but he did nothing and he did not answer at all. What then, is the difference practically, between the hon. gentleman and myself? For my part, I do not see any. Now, because I have said that I would like to see Canada become later on, an independent nation, I am declared to be a disloyal man. The very man who said that, sat for ten years, I believe, in this House beside the late hon. Mr. Chapleau, who was declared, and very properly, by La Presse the other day, to be one of the greatest of French Canadians. Can the hon. gentleman recollect that not once but many times the late Mr. Chapleau declared that he hoped that, later on, Canada would be an independent nation. The ex-Minister of Finance says that I have taken these lessons of independence from the right hon. gentleman who leads the government. That is true, but it is not the whole truth. I admired the leader of the government when he said that Canada would have to be detached from Great Britain by and by, as the ripe fruit is detached from the tree. But, it is not from him alone that I have learned this lesson, but from my own instincts and nature. It seems to me that a man who is worthy of the name should prefer to be free rather than a slave. I do not say we are slaves within the British Empire, but I do say we are not free. For instance, we have not the right to negotiate our own treaties. Is that not an important right? It is that right which is in question now between Great Britain and the Transvaal. In what way do I say that I wish Canada to be an independent nation. Do I say that I wish this independence to come by war, illegally and unconstitutionally? This is what I said:

I am a Canadian, and my ideal is to see Canadian rank amongst independent nations—

When? Did I say that I believed that we were now ready for it? I do not believe so. I do not believe that we are ripe for independence. We are not rich enough. But it is not the best means to enrich the country to spend two or three millions every time there is a war between England and another country.

--as soon as the vitality of its people, the immensity of its natural resources will have sufficiently developed our country.

This is called treason. Has freedom of thought been abolished in this country that one is not allowed to say that he wishes Canada to be independent later on? I have only one way of explaining—not justifying but explaining—the feelings of gentlemen who charge me with disloyalty on this account. You know, Mr. Speaker, that the galley slave who has had a ball chained to his leg, even though he may become a free man, the walk that he has learned in slavery always betrays him. He is always known to have been a galley slave. The ex-Minister of Finance, who has been taught in the school of Sir Allan McNab, who, for a portion of his life, fought against responsible government, will always be willing to remain a colonist, but I am not. I am ready to wait for the moment when Providence shall fit us for independence, but, in the meantime, I am ready to do all I can to secure that most sacred right, the same for a nation as for an individual, freedom and liberty.

Mr. DAVIN moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12.20 a.m. Wednesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, February 14, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BROCKVILLE AND WEST HURON ELECTIONS.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). In accordance with the notice I gave yesterday, I desire to move :

That the poll-books, voters' lists and all other papers, letters, documents and memoranda relating to the last election for the electoral district of Brockville and the last election for the electoral district of the west riding of the county of Huron, which were referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections during the last session of this House, and also all proceedings and evidence had, given, taken or received by or before the said Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections during the last session of this House respecting the matters aforesaid, be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections appointed during the present session of this House for further consideration, and for the purpose of inquiring into and investigating the conduct of the respective returning officers and of the several deputy returning and other officers at and in connection with the said several elections respectively.

It will be remembered that, at the last session of the House an order was made referring the papers in connection with these two elections to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, and on the 9th of August, 1899, that committee presented their third report, which is as follows :—

Your committee, under the order of reference made on the 9th day of July, 1899, have partially inquired into and investigated the conduct of the returning officer and of certain of the deputy returning officers at the last election for the electoral district of the west riding of the county of Huron.

That in so doing they have heard the testimony of ninety-nine witnesses, and have submitted interrogatories for the examination by the county court judge of the county of Huron of four witnesses; that twenty-five sittings have been held for the purpose of taking evidence, covering seventeen days and comprising seventeen morning sessions and eight afternoon sessions—

Mr. MONET.

Mr. JAMES McMULLEN (North Wellington). Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I wish to know if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) is in order in bringing forward this matter as he does. He has not given notice of motion.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, yes.

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not think so.

Mr. BORDEN. I gave notice yesterday, when the Orders of the Day were called.

Mr. McMULLEN. There is no notice on the Order paper that the hon. gentleman would bring forward this motion, and I contend that it is not a subject that can be brought forward on the Orders of the Day being called. I desire your ruling on that point.

Mr. SPEAKER. Perhaps the hon. member for North Wellington will allow the hon. member for Halifax to complete his statement.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax), (reading)— —that the committee determined to hold the last session for the examination of witnesses on Monday, the 7th day of August, 1899, and for that reason nine witnesses then in attendance for the purpose of giving evidence were discharged without examination; twelve witnesses also failed to attend, and the attendance of three was countermanded. The proceedings of the committee being thus incomplete, the committee do not feel warranted in reporting any conclusions.

Your committee therefore report herewith the evidence given by the witnesses who were examined that the House may take such action thereon and as to continuing and completing the inquiry and investigation as may be deemed best, and they recommend that the said evidence and exhibits be printed for the use of the members of the House.

It is apparent from the report of the committee that the investigation is still uncompleted, that a number of witnesses who were in attendance were not examined, because the committee, having fixed its last meeting for the 7th of August, could not continue, and very shortly afterwards parliament was prorogued. In fact, the report of the committee states that the investigation is still incomplete and that the proceedings are reported to the House to take further action. As to the point that has been suggested by the hon. member for North Wellington, I may say that this matter was dealt with last year as a matter of privilege, and was given precedence on that account, and on that account alone. I do not suppose it has ceased in the meantime to be a matter of privilege. Referring to Sir John Bourinot's work on Parliamentary Procedure and Practice, on page 378, he says :

The precedents go to show that the Canadian House of Commons, in its desire to deal promptly with all questions affecting its members, has generally waived the strict rules which govern matters of privilege, properly speaking, and given every possible facility for inquiry thereon.

I also observe, on the same page :

When a debate on a question of privilege has been adjourned until a future day, priority will still be given to it.

And at page 377 :

It is the practice to give questions of privilege the precedence over other matters when they appear among the notices of motions.

I therefore submit that I am in order in making a motion on this notice. Certainly, I am dealing with the matter in exactly the same way as it was dealt with last year.

Mr. SPEAKER. In dealing with the objection taken by the hon. member for North Wellington, I think it only fair to this House that, instead of expressing my own opinion, I should quote the opinion of a Speaker of longer experience. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) has correctly quoted from pages 377 and 378 of Sir John Bourinot's book. But I draw his attention to page 379 of the same book, where it is distinctly stated :

The Speakers of the English Commons have decided that 'in order to entitle a question of privilege to precedence over the Orders of the Day, it should be some subject which has recently arisen, and which clearly involves the privileges of the House and calls for its immediate interposition.'

I recall that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden), in making his statement, mentioned that this matter was before parliament at its last session incomplete. It can scarcely, then, I think, come within the term 'a subject which has recently arisen.' Speaker White, in the London election case in 1892, in a similar case to this, ruled that a member had no right to proceed by taking precedence before the Orders of the Day. In accordance with these two expressed views, I think it my duty to protect the privileges of the House by requiring the ordinary two days' notice.

FREIGHT RATES ON RAILWAYS.

Mr. REID moved for leave to introduce a Bill (No. 16) to regulate freight and passenger rates on railways. He said: This is just the same Bill as the one I introduced two years ago. Its purpose is to provide for the appointment of a commission with power to regulate freight and passenger rates on railways, and to settle differences that may arise between the railways and individuals. Such cases are arising in this country which call for remedy, and as the law now stands it is very difficult for the aggrieved persons to get justice. I read an editorial in the Toronto Globe of Monday last, showing the great wrong that is now being done to the people by the action of the Standard Oil Company and the railways. A rebate is given to this company by which other persons in the same business are working at a great disadvantage. I think if this Bill were passed it would overcome difficulties of this kind. When the Bill comes up for the second reading I shall be prepared to explain it more fully.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SEDUCTION AND ABDUCTION.

Mr. CHARLTON moved for leave to introduce a Bill (No. 17) to amend the Criminal Code of 1892, so as to make more effectual provision for the punishment of seduction and abduction. He said: I may say, in a word, that this is the same Bill that I introduced last session, and which was passed by this House but failed to receive the assent of the Senate. In addition to the provision of the Bill of last session raising the age of consent to 18 years, it has an additional provision, making seduction and illicit intercourse between a step-son and a step-mother, and between a step-father and a step-daughter, subject to the same penalties as seduction under clause 181 of the Criminal Code.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DOMINION LANDS ACT AMENDMENT.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton) moved for leave to introduce a Bill (No. 18) to amend the Dominion Lands Act. He said: I may perhaps explain the provisions of the Act now as well as at a later stage. The first clause deals with the authority to grant and issue patents in cases where the settler, who may have earned the patent, has died without having received it. A few cases have occurred in which the settlers have been of foreign extraction, and their legal representatives are subjects of foreign countries; in such cases it has been impossible to tell what disposition to make of the lands. This clause will authorize a patent to be granted to the legal representative, although not a British subject.

As to section 2, an amendment to the Dominion Lands Act was made two years ago which, in case of second homesteads, permitted the homesteader to perform the residence duties, when he had formerly had a first homestead, by residing upon his first homestead. The object was to enable the settler to earn his patent for his second homestead without moving from his permanent residence and going to another place, and putting up temporary buildings and living there for a few months. There was no object in compelling that to be done. Some cases have occurred of persons who have second homesteads and who were residing, not upon the first homestead, but upon other land which they had purchased. There does not seem to be any reason for making a distinction between them and other cases, and this clause will enable such a person to earn a patent by his residence upon the land which he may have purchased.

Section 3 relates to the case of issuing a patent where the government has a lien upon the land.

Section 4 is for the purpose of dealing with the case of a settler who may volunteer for military service, particularly for military service in South Africa, and to allow the time during which he has served in the body in which he may have enrolled himself, to count as residence upon his homestead just as if he had remained a resident upon his farm.

Section 5 is for the purpose of enabling a patent to be issued to such homesteader in case he is unable through illness resulting from military service to perform his residence duties.

Section 6 is for the purpose of enabling the department to deal with some cases where buildings upon a homestead have been destroyed by fire or other cause out of the control of the person owning the buildings. There have been some cases where such persons have applied to be permitted to leave their homesteads in order to earn sufficient money to enable them to go back and perform their settlement duties. With these explanations, I beg to move for leave to introduce this Bill.

Mr. DAVIN. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether the third clause will meet the case of those persons that have been brought to his attention, and who have been refused their homesteads in consequence of the seed grain liens?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. No, this Bill does not affect the case of seed grain at all.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE.

Mr. DAVIN moved for leave to introduce a Bill (No. 19) to amend the Mounted Police Act, 1894. He said: This Bill consists of one clause. The clause was in the Bill I have already introduced, but on looking it over I found it was inappropriately in that Bill, and it is better to have a Bill amending the Police Act of 1894. This Bill deals with promotion from the ranks.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CARRIAGE OF GRAIN BETWEEN CANADIAN PORTS BY AMERICAN VESSELS.

Mr. BENNETT asked:

Under the permission given by the government of Canada to that end, how many bushels of grain, if any, were carried between Canadian ports by American registered vessels during the year 1899? What were the names of the vessels carrying such grain, if any? What were the points between which said vessels sailed, and the number of bushels carried by each of said vessels?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). As soon as this question appeared on the paper, and also No. 2, standing in the name of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett), communication was had with the ports. The answers have not yet been received, and I will have to ask the hon. gentleman to allow the questions to stand until another occasion. I will intimate to him, at the earliest possible moment, when I can give the information he seeks.

VOTERS' LISTS FOR VANCOUVER AND VICTORIA CITY DISTRICTS.

Mr. McINNES asked:

1. Is the voters' list for Vancouver district, British Columbia, prepared? If not, what is the cause of the delay?

2. Is the voters' list for Victoria City district, British Columbia, completed? If so, when was it completed and printed?

3. When will the voters' list for Vancouver district be ready?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The list for Vancouver district has been received only lately. It will be printed as soon as the printing, immediately required for the session, is completed, probably within a few weeks. The list for Victoria has been received and printed and was distributed in September last.

PAYMENTS ON ACCOUNT OF SUPER-ANNUATION.

Mr. MARCOTTE (by Mr. Bergeron) asked:

1. What is the additional amount granted last year, as a pension fund, to public officials placed on the retired list?

2. Was Monsieur Legris, the member for Mas-kinongé, consulted as to the said increase, or as to the expediency of some of these payments?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). 1. The amount paid for superannuation during the fiscal year 1898-9 was $325,560.47; during the fiscal year 1897-8 the amount was $340,185.67. There was, therefore, no additional amount paid last year, but a reduction of $14,625.20. 2. The department or Minister of Finance have had no communication with Monsieur Legris on the subject referred to.

IMPROVEMENT OF TRANSPORTATION—SPEECH OF POSTMASTER GENERAL AT COLLINGWOOD.

Mr. DAVIN asked:

Whether the Postmaster General is correctly reported as having spoken as follows in Collingwood:—

'We felt,' he said, 'that something should be done towards the improvement of transportation accommodation to the seaboard. We tore up old contracts and recast the whole situation, thus giving a uniform depth of fourteen feet.'

If correctly reported, is the statement historical?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). The extract, though not in the precise words, is a substantially correct statement of the Postmaster General, made at Collingwood, to the effect that, when the present government took office, the condition of the works on the St. Lawrence canals, and the slow progress being made under the then existing contracts, indicated that the canals would not be completed for several years; and accordingly that the Minister of Railways and Canals cancelled or modified the contracts, so as to secure the completion of the canals, to a depth of fourteen feet, within a much shorter period, namely, about two years.

CLAIM OF MR. WILLIAM BEAUMONT.

Mr. McINNES asked:

1. Has Mr. William Beaumont, of Cowichan district, filed a claim with the Postmaster General for salary due him as postmaster at Maple Bay at the time British Columbia entered confederation?

2. Did the Postmaster General refer the matter to the government of British Columbia?

3. What reply, if any, has been received from the government of British Columbia regarding the matter?

4. Has the government of British Columbia, or any member thereof, recommended that the said claim be paid?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). 1. Yes. 2. No, but Mr. Beaumont was informed by the secretary of the Post Office Department that the claim would have to be presented through the local government. 3. A minute of the Executive Council of British Columbia, approved by the Lieutenant Governor of that province, on the 27th of November, 1899, has been received referring the claim to the Postmaster General for consideration. 4. No recommendation was made by the British Columbia government, or any member thereof, that the claim be paid. In the minute above referred to, the Provincial Secretary of British Columbia reported that he was not in a position to express an opinion respecting the equity of the claim.

Mr. FOSTER. Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) allow me one question? It seems peculiar as to why an application had to be made through the local government. Was there any peculiarity in the case which made that necessary?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). Just giving the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) my own recollection, it is that when the claim came to my department I made some little inquiry and found that it was a claim against the province of British Columbia prior to confederation, and it had to be considered as a claim against confederation.

Mr. FOSTER. I wondered whether it was a late or an old case.

YUKON TERRITORY—MR. CHARLESON.

Mr. BERGERON asked:

1. Has Mr. Charleson returned from Dawson?
2. Has he reported on the telegraph construction work and rendered full and complete accounts for the same?

3. Is he still in Ottawa? If not, when did he leave Ottawa, and for what destination did he depart?

4. What are the names of the men employed by him from Bennett to Dawson? What is the nationality of each man?

5. What wages and allowances were given to the men per day?

6. How long were they employed?

7. Did the men strike for further pay? If so, when, and what was done?

8. Who supplied the poles for the wire? At what price and on what terms?

9. Were the standing trees en route used for stringing the wires? If so, for what distance, approximately, in comparison with the distance where poles were used?

10. Did the government pay for poles distributed along the route and not used? If so, how many poles not used did the government pay for?

11. Are the linemen employed at Dawson, Ogilvie, Selwyn, Selkirk, Five Fingers, Lower Le-Barge and Tagish, British subjects? If not, to what nationality do they belong?

12. Were the following men employed: William McNamara, Oly Martinson, Carter, Laurity Oleson, Brown and S. E. Chambers? If so, at what wages and in what capacity?

13. How many linemen are employed?

14. What was the name of the contractor for the supply of poles, and what was the name of the sub-contractor?

15. Where does the sub-contractor reside?

16. Did the government charter the SS. 'W. S. Stratton'? If so, from whom, and on what terms?

17. What was the tonnage of the 'W. S. Stratton'?

18. Who was her master? Was he a British subject when engaged or acting as master?

19. How much was paid for the use of this boat?

20. What use was made of the 'W. S. Stratton'?

21. Were scows used for supplies?

22. What boat, other than scows, was used for supplies?

23. How many scows were used, and on what terms?

24. How much money was charged or paid for transportation by water other than by the steamer 'Stratton'?

25. How much of the time during construction was Mr. Charleson actually present with the construction party?

26. Did the government buy or charter the 'Lillie C.' above White Horse? If so, from whom and on what terms? What has become of this boat? If sold or disposed of, on what terms and to whom?

27. What arrangement was made for supplies to the men?

28. Is the government aware of the price charged to the men for boots, tobacco, pipes, linens, underwear, overalls, &c.? Were middlemen acting in this regard, or did the government directly deal with the men? If middlemen were acting, what arrangement was made by the government, if any, to protect the men from imposition?

29. What arrangement, if any, was made with the men engaged at Bennett respecting pay for their time when returning from Dawson?

30. What amount of money has already been paid for the telegraph line under Mr. Charleson's charge, and how much is now due, as per accounts rendered and certified?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron) be good enough to make a motion, and I will have the papers prepared as soon as possible? He will see that I cannot possibly answer a question of this size. I will prepare the papers as soon as possible.

YUKON TERRITORY—INQUIRY BY MR. OGILVIE.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (by Mr. Montague) asked:

Has the government, or any department or any official thereof, taken action upon any of the following matters arising out of the inquiry into Yukon affairs conducted by William Ogilvie, Esq., in 1899:—

- (a) Payment of expenses of witnesses.
 - (b) The 'pass' system.
 - (c) The conduct of Villeneuve.
 - (d) The opening and closing of creeks, or other mining districts or areas.
 - (e) The leasing or disposal of public lands (un-surveyed).
 - (f) The dealing with and disposal of placer grants by confidential instructions and confidential correspondence.
 - (g) The action of Carbeno and other paid officials in staking claims on Dominion Creek, and the Walsh agreement for staking of claims.
 - (h) Payment to officials for overtime work by private parties.
 - (i) Compensating parties who buy void claims, as in case of Nos. 18 and 26 below on Dominion Creek.
 - (j) Extension of time in representation of claims by officials.
 - (k) The condition of the official books and records (see p. 53, Yukon Evidence).
 - (l) Granting time for payment of royalties.
 - (m) Obtaining opinions from judges, as in the case of Hon. Mr. Justice Maguire (pp. 246, 249, Yukon Evidence).
1. If yes, what action?
 2. If no, upon what matters arising out of the inquiry has any action been taken or direction given?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). (a) The department authorized the payment of witnesses. (b) The department took no action in respect to what is called the 'pass system,' because the practice was discontinued as soon as it came to the commissioner's knowledge and before the inquiry took place. (c) Villeneuve was a dog-driver in the employ of the police. He was not in the employ of the government when the facts referred to were disclosed, and no action was, therefore, taken in regard to him. (d) The department approved of the action of the commissioner of the Yukon Territory in closing Dominion Creek. This is the only case of the closing of a creek that is of record in the department. (e) The action of the department in respect to the leasing and selling of public lands in the Yukon Territory can be ascertained by moving for the proper return. (f) It is not known to what this clause of the question refers. If it has reference to any matter touched upon in the evidence taken at the inquiry held by the commissioner it will be answered if a reference to the evidence is given. (g) No action has been taken in these cases. (h) No action has been taken by the department in connection with the payment of officials for overtime by private parties, because the practice was discontinued by the commissioner as soon as it came to his knowledge and before the formal inquiry was held. (i) The department has endeavoured in all cases where it has been proved that the person holding a claim had been deprived of the same through an error of a clerk in the mining recorder's office, to admit of such person acquiring another claim in lieu thereof. (j) No action has been taken. (k) The present gold commissioner on taking office gave prompt attention to the improving of the system of keeping the records and the official books. (l) Action was taken by the local officials to collect arrears of royalty. (m) No action was called for, and accordingly none was taken. A gold commissioner was placed in office who possesses the legal qualifications necessary to enable him to decide matters in dispute. 1. The answer to this question has been given in the replies to the various clauses of the preceding part of the question. 2. If further information is desired it will be necessary to draw attention to the particular matters upon which such further information is sought.

YUKON—WHITE HORSE RAPIDS—GRANT OF LANDS OR MINERALS.

Mr. PRIOR asked:

Has any grant or have any grants of land, or minerals, or both, adjacent to the White Horse Rapids, Yukon Territory, been made by the government to any individual or company within the last six months?

If so, what were the boundaries and what was the area of said grant or grants?

To whom issued?

Are there any conditions attached to same? If so, of what nature?

Do said grant or grants, if any, include the precious and baser metals contained therein?

Were applications received from one or more persons for same? If so, what were their names and where did they reside?

Were offers by tender called for?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The hon. gentleman, I think, will admit that this is hardly information which I could give in answer to a question, and I will have to ask him to move for a return. I may say there have been dealing with lands and mines in that neighbourhood, but they are somewhat extensive and they can only be satisfactorily placed before the House by bringing down a return.

Mr. PRIOR. If the hon. gentleman looks at the Order paper he will see that I have moved for a return.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. If the hon. gentleman calls attention to it, I will have the return made at once.

MILITIA IN YUKON DISTRICT.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

What number of militia are now stationed in the Yukon district, and how are they distributed?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. 88 officers, N. C. O.'s and men are stationed in the Yukon district (6 officers and 82 N. C. O.'s and men). 2. 6 officers and 72 N. C. O.'s and men are stationed at Dawson and 1 N. C. O. and 10 men are stationed at Selkirk.

THE ELEVATOR COMMISSION.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

When will the evidence taken before the Elevator Commission be laid on the Table ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The evidence taken before the Elevator Commission will be laid on the Table of the House as soon as the report and evidence are received from the commission and sufficient time has elapsed thereafter to have it copied.

CONSTRUCTION OF LEE-ENFIELD RIFLE.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

1. Has the attention of the Hon. the Minister of Militia and Defence been called to serious charges made in several well-known English newspapers against the construction of the Lee-Enfield rifle, now used in the British army and also by the Canadian militia, viz.:

(a) That it is undersighted at all ranges, the amount varying from 30 to 100 yards according to the full or fine sight taken by the soldier;

(b) That it throws constantly to the right, owing to the foresight being set too much to the left, thus making the rifle liable at a long range to be practically useless;

(c) That there is no allowance for 'drift' with the long range sights.

2. Have any complaints of this nature been received by the Minister from either officers or men of the militia who are considered to be competent judges of such matters ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. Yes. 2. No formal complaints have been made ; but a confidential report has been recently made by the superintendent of the government cartridge factory, and has been forwarded to the High Commissioner at London, to be submitted to the War Office.

NEW BRUNSWICK ELECTORAL LISTS.

Mr. McINERNEY asked :

1. From what counties or electoral districts in New Brunswick have the electoral lists, revised in the autumn of 1899, been received by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery ?

2. Are such lists being printed; if not, when will they be printed ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The lists from the province of New Brunswick which have been received so far are, Charlotte, Kent, Northumberland, Restigouche, Queen's and Sunbury, St. John City, St. John County, Westmoreland. They are being printed at this moment.

DATES OF LOBSTER FISHING.

Mr. McINERNEY asked :

On what dates does the lobster fishing season legally begin and end in the different parts of Canada in the year 1900 ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The answer to this question involves reading the regulations. 1. On and along that part of the coast or the waters thereof, of the province of New Brunswick, embraced and included within the county of Charlotte, and also on and along that part of the coast or the waters thereof, of the province of Nova Scotia, embraced and included within the counties of Yarmouth, Shelburne, Queen's, Lunenburg and that part of the county of Halifax, west of a line running S.S.E. from St. George's Island, Halifax Harbour, Nova Scotia, and coinciding with the fairway buoys in the entrance of the said harbour, lobster fishing legally begins on the 15th December, and ends at midnight of the 30th May then next following.

2. In any part of the Bay of Fundy, or on any part of the coast or waters thereof, inside of a line drawn from the division line of the counties of Charlotte and St. John, near Point Lepreau, running outside of Brier Island, to the boundary line between the counties of Yarmouth and Digby, in the province of Nova Scotia, lobster fishing legally begins on the 15th January and ends at midnight of the 29th of June.

3. On and along that part of the coast of the province of Nova Scotia or the waters thereof, from the aforesaid line, running S.S.E. from St. George's Island, Halifax Harbour, Nova Scotia, and coinciding with the fairway buoys in the entrance of the said harbour, extending eastwardly and following the coast line as far as Red Point, between Martin Point and Point Michaux, in the Island of Cape Breton, and including Chedabucto Bay and St. Peter's Bay, and the coasts and waters of all the islands lying in and adjacent to these bays, and including the coasts and waters of the Gut of Canso, as far as a line passing from Flat Point in Inverness County, to the lighthouse in Antigonish County, opposite, lobster fishing legally begins on the 1st April, and ends at midnight of the 30th June.

4. On and along that part of the coast of Cape Breton Island, in the province of Nova Scotia, or the waters thereof, from Red Point, between Martin Point and Point Michaux, in the Island of Cape Breton, and extending to and around Cape North, as far as and including Cape St. Lawrence; also the coasts and waters of all the islands known as the Magdalen Islands, including Bird Rocks and Bryon Island; also the north shore of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, from the Bay of Blanc Sablon, in the province of Quebec, westward to the head of tide, embracing the coasts and waters of all the islands adjacent to the said shore, and including the Island of Anticosti, lobster fishing legally begins on 1st May and ends at midnight of the 31st July.

5. Along the coasts and in the waters of Northumberland Strait, between a line on the north-west, drawn from Chockfish River, in New Brunswick, to West Point in Prince Edward Island, and a line on the south-east drawn from Indian Point, near Cape Tormentine, in New Brunswick, to Cape Traverse, in Prince Edward Island, lobster fishing legally begins on the 25th May and ends at midnight of the 10th August.

6. In any part of Canada or the coasts or waters thereof not embraced within the limits described in the foregoing regulations, lobster fishing legally begins on the 20th April and ends at midnight of the 10th July.

LAND GRANTS TO RAILWAYS IN MANITOBA AND THE N.W.T.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

What is the name of the different railroad companies in Manitoba and the North-west Territories that have received land grants by way of subsidies? What amount did each company receive per mile of road to be constructed? What is the total amount of land reserved for each company, how much has been earned by each company, and how much patented? What is the total amount of lands granted to all companies in Manitoba and the Territories?

Mr. DAVIN. I will ask the government to let this question stand. There seems to be some mistake, for I do not think it is my question.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

BLANKETS FOR SOUTH AFRICAN CONTINGENTS.

Mr. BERGERON asked :

1. How many blankets were furnished to each man who left for Africa, in both contingents?
2. If not furnished by government according to last answer by Minister of Militia, from supplies in store, when were the blankets made and from whom bought?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. Two blankets per man were issued to the first contingent, with a reserve of 400 placed on board ship, and four blankets per man were issued to the second contingent. No reserve for second contingent. 2. All the above blankets were issued from military store stock.

RIFLE RANGE AT MONTREAL.

Mr. QUINN asked :

Is it the intention of the government to provide a rifle range for the city of Montreal? If so, when and where? If not, why not?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. Yes. 2. During the coming spring. The government has several sites under consideration in the immediate vicinity of the city of Montreal.

LIGHTS ON SAVAGE BAY, P.E.I.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) asked :

1. Upon whose advice were spar lights erected on Savage Island, Cascumpec Bay, P.E.I., and at what cost?
2. By whose advice have they now been removed?
3. How many times were the spar lights removed from place to place and by whom, and at what cost?
4. Are they now in a satisfactory position and how long are they likely to remain where they are?
5. At whose instance was Sandy Island light hauled over the channel to its present position?
6. By whom, and for what reason and at what cost?
7. The names of those employed in connection with the removal, and amounts paid to each?
8. Amount paid for material, and to whom?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. Upon the advice of the agent of this department for Prince Edward Island, who, on the 26th of May, 1897, examined the channel in company with the harbour master, Mr. John McKay, Pilot Richards and Captain John Champion. Two range light masts formerly used at Darnley were utilized. The cost of removal was $52.90. 2. Upon the advice of the agent, who reported that the channel had changed. 3. They were moved from Savage Island to the South Sand Heads on 23rd September, 1899, where one of them was set up in range with the lighthouse; on the 20th October they were moved to a new alignment to suit change in the channel. The removals were made by Mr. M. Walsh, at a cost of $54.57. 4. Yes. Until a heavy storm makes another change in the bar outside the harbour. Cascumpec, like all other harbours on the north coast of Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, has a sand bar stretching along the coast outside the entrance, with a more or less defined channel through the bar. All these channels are subject to alteration by storm, and consequently it is only possible to maintain range lights of a temporary character that admit of easy removal. 5. At the instance of the chief engineer of this department, after a personal inspection; and with the approval of Mr. McLellan, M.P.; Hon. B. Rogers and the provincial agent. 6. The removal was made under the supervision of Mr. M. Walsh, foreman permanently employed in the agency of this department, who employed local labour. The reason for removal was that the former site was in danger of being washed away by the sea, and it was cheaper to remove the lighthouse than to protect the old site, while in its new position it is better located for use as a coast light. The total cost of removal, including the building of a new foundation, was $585.37. 7. James Graves, $10.95; Thos. Graves, $7.70; Wm. O'Mara, $1.40; John T. Profit, $8.45; teamsters paid through B. Rogers, $47; labourers paid through B. Rogers, $149.25; Wm. Clark, $50.60; Jas. C. Tuplin and assistant, $43; Jas. Gard, $9.20; Rod. Campbell, $18.14; Peter Gillis, $5.62; Geo. Oulton, $8.75; total, $360.06. Mr. Walsh, foreman, is paid an annual salary, and his work was not charged against the job. 8. B. Rogers, $193.23; Geo. Gard, $5.27; total, $198.50. There remains sums paid for freight and board, &c., not classified above, $26.81; making total cost of work as in answer No. 6, $585.37.

FENIAN INVASION MEDALS.

Mr. CASEY (by Mr. Landerkin) asked :

1. How many volunteers (approximately) were called out in the autumn of 1865 in anticipation of the Fenian invasion ?

2. How many (approximately) on March 8 and 9, 1866 ?

3. How many (approximately) on June 1, 1866 ?

4. How many deputations, on what dates, have waited on the government asking for recognition for volunteers who served in the Fenian troubles ?

5. How many petitions, and when, to the same effect ?

6. When, and by what minister, were first steps taken to meet these requests ?

7. What was the date of asking of Queen's approval for grant of medals ?

8. What was the date and amount of appropriation for same purpose ?

9. What was the total number of applications for medals passed by the board ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. 500 volunteers were called out in the fall of 1865, and were stationed at Windsor, Sarnia, Niagara and Prescott. 2. 10,000 volunteers were called out on the 8th March, 1866, and in a few days the number was increased to 14,000 men. This force was reduced to 10,600 by militia order of the 26th March, 1866. 3. 14,000 men were called out on the 31st May, 1866, and by the 3rd June, 1866, this force was increased to 20,000 men at least. These three answers apply to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and do not include the maritime provinces, for which we have not been able to get the figures. 4. There are no records of the deputations which waited on the government, in this department, but there were deputations in the fall of 1896 and early in 1897. 5. In September, 1886, the first petition, largely signed, was received in the department, and from that date numerous petitions were received until the granting of the medals. 6. By the present Minister of Militia and Defence on the 27th of May, 1897. 7. In June, 1897, and Her Majesty approved of a General Service Medal being granted for Fenian Raids and Red River expedition, in October, 1897. 8. In 1898-9, $5,000 was placed in the estimates; in 1899-1900, $10,000 was placed in the estimates. It is proposed to place a further sum in this year's estimates. 9. About 10,000 to date. There are a considerable number of late applications not yet passed.

GRAIN TRANSPORTATION TO THE SEABOARD.

Mr. BENNETT moved :

That, in the opinion of this House, the time has arrived when a fixed and definite line of action should be undertaken on the question of the transportation of the grain and other commodities of the North-west Territories, Manitoba and the Western States, with a view to centreing the same to the greatest possible extent in Canadian channels.

He said : I make this motion with the view of evoking, as no doubt it will, a considerable amount of discussion from hon. gentlemen on both sides, considering the importance of the subject to be discussed. The question of the transportation of grain and other commodities, not only from the western part of this Dominion, but from the western part of the United States, has been a subject that has called for a great deal of comment and also the exercise of a governmental action in both countries. So much so, that in this Dominion we have expended upwards of $70,000,000 already in the construction and equipment of the St. Lawrence canal system. To-day there are before the public in this province, and likewise in the whole Dominion, a number of propositions, each having its own features of commendation and its own supporters. And it is well for the House, in view of the huge expenditure made in the past, and the large expenditure that must of necessity be made in the future, that a halt should be called in order to arrive at what should or should not be the system to be followed for all time to come. Expenditures in respect of the St. Lawrence system of canals have been made in this country without their evoking comment or discussion in this House or the public press, owing to the fact that political ends had of necessity, to a great extent, to be served in meeting the wishes of the different localities interested, and it is therefore a question worthy of consideration whether the time has not come when a fixed and definite line of action should be established.

In all business ventures, in all affairs of ordinary trade, one looks to the success of others in order to guide himself in the future, and in this connection we may fairly look to the example and influence of the people of the United States. There is to-day more than one proposition before the people of the United States on the question of the transportation of grain. First, they have demonstrated apparently that the proper or the natural system for the carriage of the grain and other commodities of the west is by means of a system of rail connection and waterways. When one refers to the reports of the great cities of Chicago and Buffalo, one is at once struck by the startling figures they present as to the great trade of both of those cities. A reference to the report of the Board of Trade of Buffalo will show that in the year 1898, there was handled at that port the immense quantity of upwards of 275,000,000 bushels of grain, and when one looks back, one finds that in a decade there has been an increase, startling in its figures, which would indicate that the public of the United States evidently view with favour the proposition of the carriage by water and by rail. It is well, therefore, to consider that, despite the number of railways from the west to the east, from Chicago and Duluth to points on the Atlantic seaboard, the American people have evidently viewed with favour the proposition of the carriage for a portion of the route by water and a further carriage by rail.

The next question for us to consider is whether or not the system known as the water carrying route of the St. Lawrence Canal should be looked upon as a competitor, and a fair competitor with the system of the United States. The trade of the United States, in the carriage of grain and other commodities from the west to the east, is a trade in which, had we in Canada superior facilities and advantage, we should be able not only to successfully compete with our neighbours, but take from them a large proportion of that trade. Sentiment may weigh in these matters, and other things being equal, no doubt the people of the United States would prefer to ship their goods through American channels; but if it should occur—and I contend it possibly might occur—that we should have superior facilities in Canada for the transportation of grain and other commodities from the west to the east, then we should not only be competitors with the Americans in holding our own trade, but should encroach on theirs. From Duluth and other points on Lake Superior, as well as Chicago and Milwaukee, large quantities of grain are carried, aggregating millions upon millions of bushels. Why is it that in the past Canada has not been able to secure a large part of that trade? Not only have we been unable to do that, but we see, to our mortification and regret, that we have not been able to hold the trade from Canadian ports on Lake Superior; and the result is that despite the fact that the export from Port Arthur is upwards of 20,000,000 bushels, a large proportion has gone through Buffalo and other American ports to the seaboard. I contend that from the outset we have always been hampered to a great extent in connection with the Welland system. First of all, the depth of water was such that it was impossible to carry boats and other craft down that waterway of sufficient size to make it pay. Experience has demonstrated on the great lakes that the day for the small carriers has gone by, and the construction of vessels a few years ago, which were able to carry 25,000 to 40,000 bushels of grain, is to-day a thing of the past. Instead they have vessels carrying 250,000 bushels, and there is a craft being built in Cleveland that it is estimated will carry 300,000 bushels of grain. Looking back to the past, looking to the fact that the grain handled at Buffalo has reached 275,000,000 of bushels, and that through the St. Lawrence waterway there only passed about 15,000,000, we are brought face to face with the question: Why have we met with such failure after such a large expenditure of money? True, in this House both political parties acquiesced in the proposition that the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterway was absolutely necessary before any headway could be made.

And the administration which preceded this one made a proposition and entered into contracts for the deepening of these waterways from ten to fourteen feet of water. It was announced last fall that next year, that is the season of navigation of 1900, we might hope to see in full swing navigation on the St. Lawrence canal system, with a depth of fourteen feet of water throughout the system, and that by the large expenditure made in the enlargement of these works, we might hope to be in a position successfully to compete for the trade of the great west, trade that was now passing largely to American channels. But what did we see last session as a line of action indicated by the government? In the absence of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) the government last year laid before the House a proposition for the expenditure of three-quarters of a million dollars for Port Colborne; and when the plans were produced it was claimed that the intention of the government was not to stop at the expenditure of three-quarters of a million to deepen the harbour, but to expend about five million dollars for certain purposes plainly set out by the plans. According to my recollection, and I think I am correct, the government proposed to deepen the harbour so as to accommodate the large vessels of the great lakes. I refer to vessels with a carrying capacity of a quarter of a million bushels and drawing twenty feet of water. But the proposition was not only that the harbour at Port Colborne should be deepened, but that the government should assume the responsibility of erecting at that point grain elevators for the transfer of grain from the larger to the smaller vessels, and in other ways to provide means to cope with the trade. So, while the government were making this proposition to deepen the St. Lawrence canals to fourteen feet of water, they were saying, in effect, that they had no confidence in this fourteen-foot system. With fourteen feet of water, vessels carrying from 60,000 bushels of grain might ply from Port Arthur, Chicago, or any other point on the upper lakes to Montreal. It was assumed by many that with this depth of water, we should be in a position to compete with the American system of transportation. But the government instead of depending on this, declares, by these plans for Port Colborne harbour, its intention to follow the system in Buffalo, that is, to bring large vessels carrying a quarter of a million bushels to Port Colborne, and then transfer the grain to vessels carrying 60,000 bushels, and have these carry the grain to Montreal. That was their proposition, and was based upon the belief that the carriage of grain in quarter-million-bushel vessels could be done more cheaply than in sixty-thousand-bushel vessels. What has experience demonstrated in the past? We have been able to carry through the Welland Canal vessels with a capacity of about 75,000 bushels of grain. These vessels went on to Kingston and Prescott where the grain was transferred to barges carrying fifteen to twenty thousand bushels, and by these carried to Montreal.

The result of that transportation system was that we were unable to draw to the ports of Montreal and Kingston a greater quantity than 15,000,000 to 20,000,000 bushels, when we saw to our regret about 275,000,000 bushels of grain entering the port of Buffalo, and, included in that, was a large proportion of Canadian grain that had been shipped from Port Arthur. The present proposition will mean that while we carry from Fort William through to Montreal a vessel carrying 60,000 bushels of grain on a 14-foot depth, we shall only be in a better position in that we shall avoid the elevating of the grain heretofore made at Kingston from the sixty-thousand bushel boat to the fifteen-thousand-bushel boat. It is to be regretted that, after this large expenditure of money—because the expenditure on the St. Lawrence has been upward of $75,000,000—we have not been able to attract to the Canadian channel more carrying trade than we have. The government by their action in asking for this large expenditure at Port Colborne admit that they do not believe, now that they have completed their fourteen-foot waterway to Montreal, that they will be able to compete with the Buffalo and great lakes or rail transportation. This is the effect of the proposition brought forward last session, which, doubtless, will be brought forward this session also, to expend the large sum of $5,000,000 at Port Colborne in the erection of elevators, deepening the harbour and so on, so that the larger carrier of the great lakes may seek Port Colborne and there transfer to the sixty-thousand-bushel boat. That proposition means so large an expenditure of money that, I contend, the government should hesitate and think twice before they plunge into it, especially having regard to the fact that, even if you do accomplish all this you will not be by any large percentage in a better position than we are at the present time, when the sixty-thousand-bushel boat goes to Kingston and its cargo is transferred to the fifteen-thousand-bushel boat.

Not only is this proposition before the people of Canada under the auspices of the leader of the government, but, as was announced by the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) a year or so ago in the city of Halifax, the government, in view of the fact that they have become possessors of railway communication from the seaboard, from St. John and Halifax through to Montreal, have in contemplation the purchase of what is known as the Booth system of railway in order to be able to tap the Georgian Bay. The distance from Montreal to St. John, both by the Intercolonial Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway, it will be seen, is very great to be traversed by rail, and that if that system were to come into force, it has an active and lively competitor in the Grand Trunk Railway. I do not say anything in connection with that proposition by the government except that I believe that it would be a wiser act on the part of the government, if the road could be obtained at a reasonable price, than to expend these large sums in deepening the harbour of Port Colborne and providing these other works there.

In connection with the system of transportation by water, we have in Canada, and shall have for years to come, very serious drawbacks; and it is a matter for consideration whether the canal system in Canada can ever be made to pay. It is even asked, and, on the face of it, it is a reasonable question to ask, how it is that we in Canada are doing so little in lake marine, while the Americans are so extensively engaged in it. The answer to that question can easily be found when one looks attentively at the trade done by American vessels, and on the other hand, at the trade done by Canadian vessels. From ports on the great lakes to Buffalo and other points on Lake Erie, but particularly to Buffalo—we find vessels of the lake marine carrying upwards of 300,000,000 bushels of grain. We see that on their return from the west to the east these vessels are afforded a very considerable trade in the carriage and transportation of coal and other commodities from the east to the west, namely, to points like Duluth, Superior and other places on the lakes. Now, what trade is there to-day for the lake marine of Canada? There is none practically except the carriage of grain in the fall of the year, when it has to be hurried eastward to the seaboard. All the summer through when American vessels are having high rates in carrying ore from Lake Superior points to points on Lake Erie, Canadian vessels are practically lying tied up at the docks. A farmer never purchases a dozen wagons in order to hurry in his grain in harvest time, but he does the best he can with the vehicle he has. So to-day the Canadian vessel owner, or the investor in Canadian marine interests, always sees the fact plainly ahead of him that there is only a limited time for Canadian marine shipping to do business, and that is in carrying grain to the east in the fall of the year. The result is that year after year we see on the American side shipping interests increasing at a most extensive rate. We see larger vessels built year after year. If one glances at the figures of the quantity of ore carried from points on the great lakes and points on Lake Superior, we are afforded a fair idea of the trade that has been worked up in that respect. In the past year there has been no less a quantity than some 15 million tons of ore carried from points on Lake Superior. Now the Canadian vessel owner has no trade in that respect at all, and so of necessity he is forced in the fall of the year to make what money he can out of the grain carrying trade. If to-day we were to expend a million dollars more on the St. Lawrence canal system, how are we going to attract trade upon those canals from Canadian ports in Canadian bottoms? For this reason, there never was and never will be, at least for years to come, any capitalist who will invest in this country in the purchase of vessels with a view to coping with the Americans. And worse than that. Last year, when the Canadian vessel owner had a chance to make a little money, when there was a rise in grain rates, much to the disgust and annoyance of all Canadian vessel owners, the government placed to one side the restrictions against what is known as the coasting laws, and permitted American vessels to come in and ply in the same trade. What was the result? From Port Arthur to points on the Georgian Bay freights had been about five or six cents a bushel, but when American vessels were cut loose and permitted in that trade the rates dropped from about five and six cents a bushel down to four cents a bushel only.

Now, Sir, my argument is that the government of Canada should hesitate before they plunge into a large expenditure on the canal system. Having now about accomplished the work of making a fourteen feet depth of water channel they should hesitate to plunge into a large expenditure such as contemplated at Port Colborne; they should be guided by the experience of the United States and endeavour to take a leaf out of their book. Now, what other systems are there to-day in force in Canada? After years of trial of the St. Lawrence canal system, there has been a system undertaken by private capitalists somewhat similar to the Buffalo and New York system. What has been the result of that trade? Mr. Booth, of this city, with very commendable energy, has constructed a line of railway from Montreal clear through to the port of Parry Sound, and last year, I believe, I am in the mark when I say that Mr. Booth carried more bushels of grain over that line of railway than were carried through the ports of Kingston and Prescott. In addition to that, the Grand Trunk Railway have a line constructed from the port of Midland clear through to Montreal, and over that system there were carried last year some 12 million bushels. So that if we look at the system from ports on the Georgian Bay to Montreal, we are brought face to face with the fact that the expenditure of private capital has succeeded in diverting more trade into Canadian channels than the expenditure of seventy million dollars by the Dominion of Canada.

Now what is the position of these points on the Georgian Bay with their part water and part rail routes? The position is this: From Buffalo to all these points on Lake Superior and on Lake Michigan the distance is greater than from either Parry Sound to the same ports or from Midland to the same ports. In fact the difference is so great that a vessel leaving Chicago and going either to Parry Sound or to Midland can make five trips to any point on those lake ports as against three trips to Buffalo. When you consider that vessels carry to-day as high as 250,000 bushels of grain on the great lakes, and that rates in the fall run up as high as four and five cents a bushel, you can see the advantage of making five trips as against three. That has been demonstrated in many seasons past, and that is one of the reasons, no doubt, why Mr. Booth went into this expensive railway construction, and why the Grand Trunk Railway people are also making a bid for that carrying trade. Now, in connection with this matter I may quote some statistics in support of the statements that I have made.

From Buffalo to New York, I have seen the distance stated at 440 miles; from Midland to Montreal the distance is 383 miles, and from Parry Sound to Montreal it is 383 miles. So that according to these figures, both these Canadian systems have an advantage as against the Buffalo and New York system. Then, in addition to that, as I have pointed out already, there is the advantage of being able to make five trips to any of these points on the Georgian Bay as against three trips to Buffalo.

With these facts staring us in the face, that our railway communication from Georgian Bay ports to Montreal is shorter than the Buffalo and New York communication, and the fact that water communication is shorter on the upper lakes to Georgian Bay ports than to Buffalo, the question naturally arises. Why then should we not be able to cope with the people of the United States and divert all this trade into our own channels? The fault lies to a great extent at the port of Montreal. At Montreal we have not the same advantages that they have at New York. I presume I am within the mark when I say that there are ten outgoing sea vessels from New York to points in the empire and Europe as against one vessel from the port of Montreal. That is, of course, a large proportion, and as a matter of necessity the larger the number of freighters the lower the rate will be. Whether the statement is correct or not, I have seen it made, that the rates for grain from the port of Montreal to some points in Europe are as a rule three cents higher than from the port of New York to European ports. If that is the case, then the port of Montreal is suffering from serious drawbacks, and will do so until we have at Montreal a larger outgoing shipping than we have at the present time. My hon. friend from Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) also suggests that Montreal be made a free port. I am not conversant with the restrictions that may exist upon shipping in that regard, but if there are any, I think the government should endeavour to remove all these shackles, because they are shackles, in restraint of trade, and endeavour to attract as much trade to that port as possible.

Now, Sir, there are other serious drawbacks at the port of Montreal. We are all aware of the fact that New York is an ocean-going port all the year around, while, unfortunately, at Montreal the trade is hampered for a considerable portion of the year, and I think that I am within the mark when I say that ocean navigation rarely starts from Montreal before the 1st of May, and that, as a rule, it closes on the 15th of November. That is the most important season of the year, because the holder of the grain in the North-west is anxious to get it out in the fall. Just at the time that the grain is offered for shipment to European countries is exactly the time that we are unable to export our grain from the port of Montreal. Fortunately for the success of the Grand Trunk system, and also for the success of the Booth system of railways, provision has been made to meet this condition. Mr. Booth has a connection by way of Boston, and he is therefore able to ship through the winter months, and the Grand Trunk have superior accommodation at Portland which they get there by the erection of very large elevators. As a result they are making a big bid for the carrying trade of the whole west, and as I before stated, the carrying trade from Midland to the port of Montreal has risen in a few years from 1,000,000 bushels to upwards of 12,000,000 bushels. From Montreal to Portland it is a comparatively short distance, the distance from Midland to Portland being 680 miles, while the distance from Midland to Montreal is 383 miles. What is to be done under the circumstances? It has been demonstrated that our canal system, in the past, has not been a success. It has been shown that these systems from Parry Sound to Montreal, and from Midland to Montreal, which follow closely after the fashion of the mixed route by water to Buffalo, and from Buffalo to New York by rail are popular systems, although they have some advantages and some drawbacks. It is true that the route from Buffalo to New York has many advantages, and very great advantages, because we are all well aware that there are several large trunk lines of railway practically paralleling one another from New York to Buffalo, and the result is that there is a cutting of rates that is unknown on the lines of railway between Georgian Bay points and the port of Montreal. These are matters which we will have to attempt to obviate. I am told that there are no lines of railway on the continent better equipped than the lines between Buffalo and New York. They are fine railways in point of construction and equipment, they are free from grades, and they are in such splendid condition that with the large engines with which they are equipped they are able to carry 40 cars each of 1,000 bushels capacity behind a single engine, and I have heard the statement that they exceed that. The difference with the Booth line and the Grand Trunk line, today, is that, while, on these lines between Buffalo and New York they are carrying 40 cars, each of 1,000 bushels capacity per engine, the Booth and Grand Trunk lines are only carrying 15 and 18 cars with a capacity of 1,000 bushels, and it must be manifest the great disadvantage under which these lines labour in that respect. What then as to the future of the transportation question of this country? It concerns every man in Canada, not only the farmer in the west, but the manufacturer in Ontario, because, the more farmers we have in the western country the more manufactured goods we will ship to that country and the cheaper the rates of transportation for the farmers in the west and the farmers in Ontario, the greater will be the advantage given to the manufacturers in this province, and not only to the manufacturers, but to the farmers in this province and in Quebec, because they can turn to good account the trade of the country which is increasing in importance from year to year. What the government's action shall be in reference to this large expenditure at Port Colborne we know not until the House shall have closed, but, if it is contemplated by the government to expend $5,000,000 on Port Colborne before they have tested the capacity as to carrying with a depth of 14 feet of water, this government should hesitate and halt, and they should rather give a fair trial to the 14-foot system of navigation by way of the St. Lawrence canals, and if it is a failure then, something else can be done along other lines and through other channels. I need not discuss the many other projects that have been brought before us in Ontario, in reference to other constructions. The very fact that the Booth and the Grand Trunk systems have invested their money in the construction of these lines of railways, apart and aside from the ordinary government assistance that is given for the construction of railways all over the provinces and all over the Dominion, is a guarantee that these gentlemen saw that there was a prospect for a trade being worked up, and they have, from year to year, demonstrated the possibilities of that trade in the vast increase which has gone on. Unless a scheme is backed up by the private capital of men who are enterprising and who are willing to invest their money, it must be that it lacks in that great essential that should be assured to it, success. That the Booth system has been a success is evident from the large trade that has been done. That the Grand Trunk system from Midland to Montreal has been a success is also evident from the large trade which has gone on in that respect. In the city of Montreal I have noticed, from time to time, that the Montreal Witness, the Montreal Star, and other newspapers have seen fit to find fault with the management of the Grand Trunk Railway, in this, that they complained bitterly that the Grand Trunk are not trying to centre their trade at Montreal, but that, on the contrary, they have made such provision at Portland that they are augmenting and adding to the trade that they have established there. In that connection the government of Canada should start at the threshold, and I believe, that in a matter of this kind, the commencement point should be the outlet to the ocean. The outlet to the ocean, of course, with the present system of transportation, is the port of Montreal, and last year, when the announcement was made that the government had in contemplation the erection of a large elevator or more than one elevator, at the port of Montreal, I believe that the proposition met with general favour on both sides of the House. However, the House and the country, I am sure, were astounded after parliament had prorogued when the announcement was made in regard to the proposition to the government of Canada by what is known as the Conners Syndicate. I am not in a position to say whether or not it will be a success, but I do say, that, involving as it did, the trade, not only of Montreal, but, involving the trade of the whole Dominion, it was an indiscreet and ill-advised action on the part of the government of Canada to enter into a contract or an agreement with the Conners Syndicate during the interval between the sessions of parliament, but rather that it should have been postponed until parliament met. This is not only the opinion of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, but I will read the remarks of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) made last fall when the construction of elevators was under consideration. The hon. member for Lincoln then said, in reference to the construction of elevators at Port Colborne as supplementing the construction of elevators at Montreal:

It would be quite within the mark for any company in Buffalo to erect an immense elevator in the harbour of Port Colborne, getting a site from the government and getting one also in Montreal, or even if not in the city of Montreal, so long as they have the accommodation in the harbour of Port Colborne they could practically tie up all the work the government had done by charging such excessive tolls for the elevating the grain; and those vessels would be obliged to go to Buffalo and transfer by way of the Erie Canal. So I say in the interest of the country it would be well for the government not to give any right to elevate the grain. My own candid opinion is that after the harbour of Port Colborne is completed, if there is a necessity for elevators, transfer the grain out of larger vessels into the smaller ones—they should be the property of the government—and if elevators for storage purposes are required, they should be built by the government, and the smallest charge should be made.

Now, Sir, that is a sentiment that I quite agree with, and I will be bound to say that the commercial world was rather startled when they saw that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) had launched this proposition with the Conners Syndicate. And who composes the Conners Syndicate? It is composed in the main of Mr. Conners, a well-to-do gentleman of the city of Buffalo; a gentleman who is largely interested, as I am told on reliable information, in the transportation trade of that city. Strange to say, there figures with Mr. Conners in this, no less a personage than Mr. Harcourt, then a member of the Ontario government and its provincial treasurer. I say here, speaking apart from politics, that as a public man, it was ill-advised for Mr. Harcourt, a member of the Ontario government, to have been mixed up in that transaction, either as an advocate or a capitalist. It is a remarkable fact that Mr. Harcourt had never heretofore been known as a capitalist, and yet he embarked in this large undertaking. I am free to admit that from what I have seen of the so-called Connors Syndicate contract, certain safeguards are thrown around the interests of the people of the Dominion. I am free to admit that no monopoly is created; that is, upon paper at all events; but it must be borne in mind that monopolies can be created by action, as well as by express contracts. What is the position to-day? There are 275,000,000 bushels of grain passing through the port of Buffalo, and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) and the government—because the government must have acquiesced in it—said to Mr. Connors and those associated with him: If you will pass 30,000,000 bushels of grain through the port of Montreal, we will be satisfied. Sir, are the people of Canada to be hampered and confined to a 30,000,000-bushel trade. After having spent millions upon millions of dollars upon our canal system; after having subsidized railways to run from ports on the Georgian Bay to Montreal, are we to be asked to restrict the trade of the port of Montreal to a paltry 30,000,000 bushels of grain? Are we to be hampered in this, especially in view of the fact that we can confidently look forward to a largely increasing yield of wheat in Manitoba and the North-west Territories.

Mr. DAVIN. Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT. Well, Sir, the Minister of Public Works and the government in excusing themselves for this conduct say: It is true Mr. Connors is to take thirty million bushels to the port of Montreal or his contract will be forfeited, but do not imagine that Mr. Connors is going to restrict himself to thirty million bushels. That may be true, but at the same time Mr. Connors is not bound to exceed thirty million bushels of grain and Mr. Connors fulfils the letter of the law if he transports that quantity. With the advantages at Buffalo, it is patent to any man that for years to come the firm of Connors, Harcourt & Co. will not handle over thirty million bushels through the port of Montreal. But the government further say: If Connors & Co. do not do that, the way is left open for other persons to come in. That is all right on the face of it, but the fact must be borne in mind that the Connors Syndicate have selected the very best sites in the port of Montreal on which to transact their business. They have been given the very cream of the choice of locations, and, as a result, if any others want to compete with the Connors Syndicate, these others are at once placed at a disadvantage. Just look at the position Mr. Connors has established for himself. Through his connections with the American capitalists at the port of Buffalo, and the vantage ground he has obtained at the port of Montreal, if other capitalists wish to invest in elevators at that port, Mr. Connors and those associated with him, can for one year or two years offer such heavy competition, that the others will be driven to the wall, because it would be a contest between the strong and the weak. Mr. Connors and his friends have secured such advantages in Montreal that for years to come the trade of that port will be restricted to the trifling amount of thirty million bushels of grain. What is the transportation of thirty million bushels at Montreal, compared to the 275,000,000 bushels at Buffalo, not to speak of the other points on the lakes.

It is the complaint of the people of Canada voiced in the Montreal press, that the Grand Trunk Railway Company are availing themselves of their facilities at Portland to export from that port in preference to Montreal. Under this new condition of things, the Grand Trunk Railway Company will be driven more and more out of Montreal, owing to the privileges accorded the Connors Syndicate, and so the complaints of our people under this head will be all the greater. Worse still, for years to come capitalists will be deterred from trying to compete against Mr. Connors, knowing as they must that Mr. Connors will have the advantage over them. I reiterate the statement, that having regard to the importance of the subject, having regard to the fact that any work cannot possibly be done until navigation opens this season, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) and the government should have first secured the approval of parliament to this Connors proposition, rather than enter into a contract in the hurried and improvident manner that they did. In my humble opinion, based on what I have been able to read on this live question of transportation, based on conversations with men engaged in the shipping trade, I am forced to the conclusion, that if we are to compete with the people of the United States in the carrying trade, we must follow the system which they have successfully pursued in the past.

Whether state aid should be granted to the Booth Railway system and the Grand Trunk Railway system, I am not now going to say. Bounties have been given by the government to stimulate trade in one direction and another, and the present government have stimulated the production of iron by giving bounties. I say it would be a parallel case if the government would go to these railway systems and offer them a bonus or a preference for all grain which they might carry through Canadian channels. That would confer a benefit not only on the farmers in the west, but on the large number of Canadians that would be employed in this trade. To-day our railway lines from points on the Georgian Bay are at no disadvantage in regard to mileage compared with the lines which traverse between Buffalo and New York, and if our railways were equal in point of equipment we would have the satisfaction of seeing a vastly increasing Canadian trade grow up from year to year. I do not expect that anything will be accomplished by this motion so far as the action of the present government may be concerned; but, Sir, I have submitted it to the House believing that hon. gentlemen on both sides are greatly interested in the question. I feel that the people of the whole country, irrespective of politics, have their eyes on parliament and on the government in respect to this transportation problem, and, Mr. Speaker, in the hope that a beneficial and appropriate discussion may arise, I beg to move the motion which has been placed in your hands.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). Mr. Speaker, we all agree upon the principle enunciated in this motion, that the time has arrived when some definite line of action should be taken on this subject. The transportation question is in my humble opinion the question of the day, and I believe I am not going too far in saying that the government has grappled with this question with energy and success. My hon. friend (Mr. Bennett), who has just taken his seat, has not made his position very clear; but if I understood him correctly, he meant to say that we should not spend any more on our system of canals. He has stated, what is true, that the Welland Canal has not been so far a great success, commercially speaking. The reason of this is obvious. My hon. friend has repeatedly alluded to Buffalo, and has invited us to take a leaf from the book of our American friends. The hon. gentleman knows that the port of Buffalo is one of the best equipped ports in the United States. It is twenty miles from Port Colborne. It is, as we all know, on the American side of the Erie Canal, while Port Colborne is on the Canadian side. Well, Sir, what have we got at Port Colborne? I hope many members of the House have visited that port. It is incredible, but it is true all the same, that we have not the shadow of a harbour there, while our American friends have a magnificent harbour at Buffalo. Port Colborne has a solid rock bottom, is without any great depth of water, and is on the open lake. How can we expect that any ship would come there and load and unload in the absence of any harbour facilities? And yet my hon. friend asks us not to equip the terminal point of our Canadian system of canals. How could the Welland Canal receive or handle trade without any terminal facilities at Port Colborne? My hon. friend is quite mistaken when he suggests that these would require an expenditure of $5,000,000. There is no necessity for such a vast outlay of money. There is no doubt that if we wanted to carry out a vast scheme of improvement, we could spend $5,000,000, but I do not hesitate to say that with a much smaller sum we could equip Port Colborne in a very proper manner indeed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What sum?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am not prepared to say on the spur of the moment.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I mean in general terms.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I will not bind myself to any definite figure; but I believe that with an expenditure of a million or a million and a half we could equip Port Colborne in a very decent way. It is necessary, as every one who knows anything about terminal facilities will admit, to have a breakwater. This could be constructed on the same plan as the breakwater at Buffalo, though on a smaller scale. Moreover, to tranship grain requires docks and harbour facilities, and we have nothing of the kind at Port Colborne. That port, as I have said, is the head of our Canadian system of canals on the lakes; Montreal is the terminal point at the other end. These two points have to be equipped in a proper way if we make up our minds to handle the trade. My hon. friend has spoken of an arrangement that has taken place between the Montreal Harbour Commissioners and what is known as the Connors Syndicate. I may remind the House at once that the Harbour Commissioners are the parties who have made the arrangement, though, of course, it has been submitted to the government and been approved. The hon. gentleman is under a misapprehension when he expresses the belief that the whole port of Montreal has been handed over to Mr. Connors and his associates. They have been given the privilege of erecting elevators and warehouses on what is known as the Windmill Point Basin. On the north side they have been given, I think, 1,500 feet, and on the south jetty, 2,000 feet. They have been given also the privilege of erecting elevator and terminal facilities in the eastern portion of the harbour. The conditions that have been imposed upon them are very severe indeed. I would be very glad if anybody would ask for the papers; they will be found interesting. The most important right that has been reserved by the Harbour Commissioners is the right to control the rates and the right to take over all the properties of the syndicate on certain conditions. I may say at once that my own personal opinion was that the government should erect elevators themselves. I stated my views in the House last year, and it was to a certain extent agreed that they would be carried out—so much so that $500,000 was placed in the estimates for the erection of an elevator in Montreal; but on further consideration and in face of a strong opposition, my colleagues made up their minds that it was better not to carry out the views which had been to a certain extent agreed on. However, the result of the agitation has been very good indeed. When Mr. Connors and his associates came to Montreal, we were in a position to tell them that the country would certainly erect an elevator themselves if we could not secure proper and stringent conditions.

There are two important means of transportation by which trade can be diverted to the St. Lawrence route—the canals and our system of railways. Our canal system has not been successful so far for the reasons I have given. The port of Montreal was not properly equipped, and neither was the port of Colborne. Moreover, we had not reached the depth of 14 feet of water which we have now. What is the position? From Port Colborne to Montreal, the distance is 374 miles, and from Buffalo to New York by rail it is 445 miles. By way of the Erie Canal and the Hudson River the distance is 495 miles. The question then is whether, having the shorter distance of 374 miles and the greater depth of water of 14 feet, we can successfully compete by water with the American water system. The Erie Canal is only six feet deep, and it will be deepened to eight feet in a year or two; but even when deepened to eight feet, it cannot possibly compete with us. The rates from the west to Buffalo and to Port Colborne are the same, and the distance is the same; and if we make all things equal, if we equip Port Colborne as Buffalo is equipped, although on a smaller scale, we will undoubtedly be in a position to make a very successful fight against our American friends. That is so much the case that the American syndicate, headed by Mr. Connors, saw immediately that there was a great future for our Canadian system of canals. The rates so far between Buffalo and New York average about six cents, and from the western ports to Buffalo, I think that during the last season they were one cent and a third. I am told by people who know what they are talking about, that they will be in a position to take a bushel of grain from Port Colborne to Montreal for inside of three cents. I would rather see the rate a good deal less than three, say two and a half. So much for our waterways.

Mr. BERGERON. How much is it now?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The rates on the Welland Canal have been about eight cents, but we have not carried much grain, and the reason is very obvious. Port Colborne has no harbour whatever, and Montreal has no accommodation, so that we could not possibly handle the trade.

Mr. BENNETT. Is the hon. gentleman aware how many bushels of grain they carry to Kingston and Prescott through the Welland Canal? I think the figures are about 25,000,000 bushels.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Not quite as much, but still we have carried a certain amount. Montreal received during the last year about 25,000,000 all told by railways and water.

Mr. BRITTON. The exact figures of the grain carried through the Welland Canal are 24,713,333 bushels. It came over the Canadian route to Kingston, Ogdensburg and Prescott.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. A good deal to Ogdensburg.

Mr. BRITTON. That is the quantity that came through the Welland Canal to these three ports, and there was not more than 4,714 bushels diverted from Ogdensburg to the Eastern States for home consumption. There were twenty millions that came through.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Not to Montreal. Montreal did not get more last year than I have said, but I have not the exact figures.

Mr. BERGERON. I am asking the hon. gentleman where he takes his figures, because they are very interesting.

Mr. BRITTON. There should be deducted from that amount the grain that went into home consumption through the Kingston elevator. That is not very much.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I should be very glad indeed to bring down the figures as they are most interesting. I was going to refer to what my hon. friend has said. He said that the arrangement made by the Montreal Harbour Commissioners with the Connors Syndicate will divert the Grand Trunk Railway from Montreal. I do not understand how that could occur. We all know that the Grand Trunk Railway have settled themselves in Portland and have equipped, out of their own private means, the port of Portland. I wish to heaven that they had equipped Montreal or a portion of the port of Montreal as they have equipped that American port. I do not blame them. The Grand Trunk Railway is located in such a way that Portland is their natural port, and money and business have no patriotism. The shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway have a right to expect the best possible dividends, and Portland being their natural port, the Grand Trunk Railway carry to it a large quantity of grain. My hon. friend knows as well as I do that most of the grain that comes to Midland, for instance, is taken from that Canadian port to Portland. The last time I visited Portland I inquired from the manager of the elevator there what grain he was handling, and he said that he was handling nearly all the time Canadian grain. I do not think I am exaggerating in saying that out of ten bushels of grain discharged at Port William by the Canadian Pacific Railway, nine bushels have so far gone to American ports. In fact, nearly all the grain that the Canadian Pacific Railway takes from the west to Port William is carried through American channels.

Mr. BERGERON. By Buffalo.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes. The grain is landed there, where it is open to every vessel to come and take it; and so far as we have not a large Canadian fleet the American bottoms have taken that grain and carried it to American ports. I claim that the arrangement that has been made between the Harbour Commissioners and the Canadian-American syndicate is a good bargain. I do not expect, I may say frankly, that that syndicate will divert much Canadian trade. They will give their attention to diverting American trade. That is just what we want. I hold that the Canadian people are unable to take care of their own trade. We have spent, as my hon. friend has said, about $80,000,000 on our system of canals. The question is why, having the shortest route, having to-day the best route, we should not take from Buffalo and from the west a large part of this 275,000,000 of bushels that my hon. friend has spoken about. The arrangement with the American-Canadian syndicate will result in diverting a large portion of the American grain, and not only of American grain, but American produce of all kinds. I would remind the House that the port of Montreal is already receiving a large quantity of American produce from the west. The Elder-Dempster Company has been one of the first to initiate a policy of this kind. When Mr. Harling was manager of that line, and came first to Montreal, he was told that there was no trade for his company. He had then only three or four steamers at his disposal. He answered that there was an immense amount of traffic in the west, and that, with energy and intelligence, it would be possible to divert a large portion of that trade. And so he did. The result of his efforts, and the efforts of those who have succeeded him is that to-day the Elder-Dempster Company, instead of three or four boats has seventeen or eighteen large steamers trading between England and Montreal, and carrying a very large quantity of American produce. Mr. Harling is no longer the manager of the Elder-Dempster Line but the manager of Leyland Line in Montreal.

Mr. TARTE.

Now, I quite concur with every word my hon. friend has said with reference to the Booth system. The Georgian Bay is destined, in my opinion, to be a very great reservoir of trade. But railways are one thing and waterways are another thing. We have spent about $80,000,000 on our waterways. Our duty is to complete them, and to take every possible advantage of our past efforts and of the great facilities that we have at our disposal. The Parry Sound road has been carrying a large quantity of trade. I hold that the Canadian Pacific Railway, in the near future, will divert to the St. Lawrence route the millions and millions of Canadian grain that have so far gone to American ports. Some allusion has been made in the press to a project by which the French River would be made navigable for Canadian barges and steamers, to take our Canadian grain from Fort William right down to North Bay. The distance from North Bay to Montreal is 360 miles. The Booth system has been able with a railway of 384 miles to carry a very large quantity of grain. There is no reason why the Canadian Pacific Railway should not carry a large quantity also by that new route. I think that my hon. friend should not have taken the stand he has taken. There is no use in fighting any of our national means of transportation. There is such an immense store of trade in the west, that there is business for our waterways, and for our railways also. There are many schemes proposed that are worthy of our attention. The efforts that we have made in the last few years have been very successful indeed. Kingston was alluded to a moment ago. When I took office, it was represented to me that if additional depth was given to that harbour a much larger amount of grain could be carried down there. That depth was given, and what has been the result? Between ten and twelve million of bushels of grain are taken to that port. And now, Sir, Collingwood, Owen Sound, Midland and other ports are receiving additional trade. The last time I had the pleasure of visiting Toronto, the members of the Board of Trade were kind enough to invite me to a lunch, and there the question was discussed of an air line between Toronto and Collingwood. I am not prepared to say that that scheme should be carried out immediately; but I say as I said a moment ago, that all these propositions deserve consideration.

My hon. friend does not seem to have any great faith in our winter ports. He thinks we cannot compete successfully with the American ports. I agree that the distance is a little against us. But there has been a revolution in the transportation question. In past days when a car could carry 500 bushels of grain, it was thought a very fine car indeed. But the measure has been doubled and even more than doubled. Now, instead of light rails of 45 to 50 pounds to the yard, we have rails to 100 pounds to the yard, which means that heavy locomotives and heavy cars can carry heavy loads. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company, who know their business, have repeatedly told me that, with proper treatment they could successfully compete in St. John against Boston. For my part I think the Intercolonial Railway, although the distance is longer by that route than by the Canadian Pacific Railway, can and should be made a real national transportation route. We have the advantage that the Intercolonial Railway has been built, not to earn dividends, but as a part of the confederation compact. The people of this country do not expect dividends from that company. Having that advantage over railway companies which are obliged to pay shareholders dividends, I do not see why we should not carry a large quantity of traffic to our winter ports of St. John, Halifax and others.

Mr. BERGERON. Would the hon. gentleman kindly give the names of those who form the Conners Syndicate?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I really do not know the names. My hon. friend will remember that we had only to approve or disapprove of the arrangement. I think the syndicate is not yet quite completed. They have given all the money and other guarantees that we required.

Mr. BERGERON. I asked that question because, a moment ago, he said that if the papers were asked for they might be brought down.

Mr. DAVIN. Who owned the land?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The Montreal Harbour Commissioners. The proposed works of the Conners Syndicate are going to be erected on properties that are under the control of the Harbour Commissioners.

Mr. DAVIN. I did not ask whether the land is under the control of the Harbour Commission, but who are the owners of that land.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The port of Montreal was handed over to the Harbour Commissioners about fifty years ago. These works are erected on what is now public property. I have not much more to say. But I may remind the House that it is quite impossible to carry out all these works without spending some money. I cannot be asked during this session to dredge the port of Midland, to dredge the port of Collingwood, to dredge the port of Owen Sound, to give additional water at Kingston and other ports, without asking parliament for money. I believe, however, that our expenditure on the lakes will not be as large as my hon. friend thinks. I do not see any reason why, for instance, at Port Colborne, we should spend more than a million and a half—from all I can see now. We do not need to dredge all the space that is available.

Mr. HAGGART. Does the hon. gentleman not know that the officers of his own department have reported that the cost of the harbour of Port Colborne would be over $5,000,000?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I know what my officers have done and what they have said, and they have not said that. My hon. friend was not in his place when I gave the explanation on this point. My officers, and those of the Department of Railways and Canals, have been out there, and have taken soundings and prepared plans. The hon. gentleman has administered a large department; he knows very well that there are plans and plans. For instance, if you want to build a whole breakwater at Port Colborne in a year or two, you will need to build it 5,000 feet long. My own opinion is that half that length will be quite sufficient. If we dredge only a couple of thousand feet it will not cost much. The plans that have been brought down to the House were plans that the House could either carry out or not as they saw fit. There is no need of spending five or six million dollars if it is shown not to be necessary.

Mr. BERGERON. What has been done with the money voted last year for the deepening at Port Colborne?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am sorry to say that the works have not yet begun, but the plans are ready. The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) has asked tenders for certain parts of the work; I think the tenders will be in by the 28th of this month. The plans for the work entrusted to me are ready. The departments had some discussion, and I could not act any sooner. But those works will be carried out as speedily as possible now.

Mr. BERGERON. Does not the Conners Syndicate rely a great deal upon the completion of these works?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It will be necessary for the success of the Conners Syndicate that the entrance to the canal be deepened so as to allow the largest ships to come there that now go to Buffalo. A great many ships now going to Buffalo draw eighteen, and even twenty, feet of water. At this moment there are five big ships of 6,000 or 7,000 tons being constructed for that trade. The reason why it is necessary to proceed as speedily as possible with the equipment of Port Colborne, is that we must give accommodation to all these big ships. We expect trade not only from the smaller craft, but from the larger craft.

The House must not lose sight of the fact that a ship going to Port Colborne, after having unloaded its cargo, will be able to proceed to Buffalo and take a return cargo. The great difficulty with the Georgian Bay route is that return cargoes are scarce and difficult to get. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to take this occasion of congratulating Mr. Booth on having achieved what, perhaps, no other company has achieved in the past: He has been able last year to secure return cargoes from American cities to the west. That was a great feat, I think. For instance, it is to my knowledge that on one or two occasions he successfully tendered for cargoes of sugar from New York to Chicago. That proves that we have a system of railway and water routes which deserve our best consideration.

Mr. DAVIN. What does it cost at present to take a bushel of grain from Chicago to New York?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The rates from Chicago to Buffalo are about a cent, or a cent and a third. They vary, of course, but they are about that. From Buffalo to New York, with terminal charges included, the charges so far have been about 6 cents, at times a little less, and at times a little more.

Mr. POUPORE. You mean by rail.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, by rail. My hon. friend (Mr. Poupore) knows that three-quarters of the trade is being carried by rail. I may say that the American railways are equipping themselves for transporting the trade at better rates, and we will have now to look out for ourselves. But, I verily believe that when our system of canals is fully equipped we can take the life out of them. The St. Lawrence route between the Strait of Belle Isle and Montreal also plays a most important part in the transportation question.

Mr. HAGGART. If the hon. minister will excuse me, for the purpose of following his argument, I would like to know what is the cost, per bushel, of carrying grain from New York, including insurance and freight, to Liverpool, and what is the cost, per bushel, from Montreal to Liverpool?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have no figures under my hand, but I am sorry to say that, so far, the rates from Montreal to Liverpool have been higher than the rates from American ports to Liverpool, and the reason is obvious. The terminal facilities at the port of Montreal have been simply abominably bad. Any one who has visited that port knows that just as well as I do. When the port of Montreal is equipped, as we are equipping it now, we will be in better shape. When the biggest ships are in a position to sail to the port of Montreal and the port of Quebec just as safely as they can to American ports we will be in better shape. The House knows that the rates at Lloyds are simply horrible. What we have to do is to make the St. Lawrence route safe, and then I think that Lloyds cannot do otherwise than decrease the rates of insurance. The work of deepening and widening the River St. Lawrence is going on speedily, and perhaps, I may be permitted to add that in a few months, during the next season, I hope, in July or August, the telegraph line to Belle Isle will be completed. This will make our trade safer and will tend to decrease the rates of insurance.

Mr. QUINN. I would like to ask the hon. minister if the increase of these rates in reference to shipment from Montreal to Liverpool, about which the hon. ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart) has spoken, is not due, in a large degree, to the excessive charges on the ships at the port of Montreal?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My hon. friend (Mr. Quinn) has lived in Montreal, and he knows very well that the class of ships that has come to our port has been very inferior, up to a few years ago, to the class of ships that has gone to American ports.

Mr. QUINN. Yes.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Unfortunately, our Canadian lines of steamers, some of them anyway, have allowed themselves to be distanced altogether, but I am safe in saying that the new ships which are being built to-day will be quite capable of competing with success against the ships going to American ports. Take such ships as the Bavarian, the Montfort, Montcalm, and several others of the same class which are equipped with every modern facility, and I think that there is no doubt whatever, that, when the St. Lawrence has been made even safer than it is now and that when we have completed our terminal facilities at Montreal and Port Colborne and at Quebec—we must not forget old Quebec—we will be in a position, as I said, to compete against the American ports. We have the advantage of the distance from west to east, we have an advantage of about 600 miles over them.

Mr. QUINN. It is not in connection with insurance alone, but it appears that the port of Montreal is saddled with certain charges which weigh heavily upon the shipping interests of Montreal and which necessitate the imposition of this higher rate that is charged from New York to England.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I would like to see the rates decreased; I would like to see the port of Montreal a free port. I do not know but that some of these days our canal system should not be made free. The Erie Canal is a free canal. But the charges in Montreal are not very high. The great trouble is, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn) knows, that we have no equipment whatever, that the cheese and the butter and all the produce that is shipped from that port has to be carted most of the time at enormous cost. I hope that, during the next season, when we will have the large wharf that has been erected and the facilities which will be added, we will be able to handle the trade at a less cost. But, we have a great deal to do yet. My hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) has repeatedly invited us to take a leaf out of the book of our American friends. He has only to look at the vast expenditure of money that the Americans have made on their harbours, at the large amount which they have spent at Buffalo, at Boston, at Newport, and which they have spent millions and millions, and I am sorry to say that when we come before the House and ask for a few hundred thousand dollars some hon. members seem surprised. There are no party politics in such a question, and I hope the House will give its best attention, during this session, to this important transportation question.

Mr. BENNETT. Can the hon. minister tell the House, or has he been furnished, or has his department been furnished with a calculation of this nature: At present vessels carrying 70,000 bushels of grain come to Kingston, the 70,000 bushels is taken from the steamers and placed in the elevator, and then the grain is placed in a barge carrying 20,000 bushels and conveyed to Montreal. When the Port Colborne scheme is accomplished you will probably have vessels carrying a quarter of a million bushels of grain to Port Colborne, which grain will be transferred to barges of 60,000 bushels capacity. What will be the difference in favour of the latter proposition per bushel?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am not in a position to say that, but competition is the life of trade.

Mr. BENNETT. You have it now.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My hon. friend (Mr. Bennett), if he permits me to say so, should not fall into the mistake that, evidently, the American people have fallen into. The American people have allowed the big railway corporations to prevent the improvement of their waterways. The railway companies of this country have no better friend than I am, but I cannot allow our waterways to be choked off by them. Our waterways are too important to permit of that. Why has not the Erie Canal been improved? The reason is obvious; it is because the big railway corporations have simply stopped it. I know that some of our railway friends are not altogether pleased with the Connors Syndicate, but they must not forget that there is an enormous total quantity of trade, and they have only to improve their means of transportation to get a large share of that transportation.

Mr. B. M. BRITTON (Kingston). Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the St. Lawrence route has not had a fair chance in times past, and in my opinion there are three things necessary to be done in order to give it that chance. When these three things have been done, I am quite sure that the increase in the trade of the St. Lawrence will be most marked. In the first place, there must be work done at Port Colborne. As I said last session, I am not in favour of this very large scheme of building these elevators there, but what is absolutely necessary is that the harbour at Port Colborne shall be deepened so that vessels drawing eighteen feet of water can enter it in any kind of weather. That cannot be done now. Every one who has any idea of navigation knows, that in stormy weather when a heavy sea is rolling, even if the water were eighteen feet deep a vessel drawing that, cannot pass without danger of grounding, although she might navigate in safety when the water is smooth. It is now necessary to the economical carriage of grain that it shall be brought in vessels drawing at least eighteen feet. These large vessels could bring the grain down as far as Port Colborne. They could then lighten so as to allow the vessel to go through the canal and come on to Kingston or Prescott as the case may be. The second requirement is this, and I wish to press it on the attention of the government. Although the canals have been deepened to 14 feet, yet as all vesselmen know, there are three or four places on the St. Lawrence where the water is not now 14 feet. That is to say, the channel is so narrow that unless persons are most skilled in river navigation, they are afraid to take a full cargo even although they might perchance pass these danger points in safety. Then we have the third requirement, and that is increased harbour accommodation at Montreal. That port has not had a fair chance so far, and for this reason amongst others. In order to get grain to Montreal in time for European shipment it must reach there early in October each year, and vessel owners are not willing to take freight unless it can be delivered in Montreal at that time. I do not know what is the latest date that ocean-going steamers leave that port, but it must be comparatively early in the fall, and hitherto there have been no storage facilities for grain in Montreal. As I understand it this Connors Syndicate, whatever else they do, must tend to the advantage of the St. Lawrence route in two ways. First, they will create these storage facilities by the expenditure of money, and sec-only, as it is said they are doing it to make money and not for the good of their health, it will be necessary for them to have their own line of vessels canvassing for freight on the St. Lawrence route. This double advantage will therefore be derived from the Conners Syndicate. There is another factor which must cause this trade on the St. Lawrence to increase. We know that in the early years of grain producing in Minnesota and Dakota the farmers could not afford to put their grain in elevators, and they were obliged to place it on the market at the earliest possible moment, no matter what the market price at the time being was. That is exactly the position of the people of Manitoba now, but I am glad to say that our farmers in the North-west are rapidly getting out of that condition, and acquiring the advantages possessed by the Dakota farmers. With these storage facilities for grain our farmers will be able to hold their produce for a longer period in each year and thus reap the advantage of a good-priced market. The St. Lawrence route being superior to other routes when it is furnished with these facilities, it must naturally have a very large portion of the trade. An elevator has been built at Kingston with a capacity of 800,000 bushels, and we can give greater despatch to vessels coming there now than we could in the past. Formerly these vessels had to wait for the transshipment of grain by the floating elevators, into the barges for river transport. At the present time there is immediate transshipment, the grain is put in the elevator, no delay is occasioned to the lake vessels, and in that way we have been attracting trade to the St. Lawrence route. Another consideration is that we are now building a larger class of vessels for the upper lake trade. If the company at Kingston were depending simply on the river trade last year they would have lost money. But, because they had the larger lake vessels to bring the wheat to Port Colborne, lightening sometimes there, so as to come through canal and so taking it down to Kingston, they were able to carry it from Kingston at no profit or perhaps a little loss; the profit on the upper end of the route thus making the business a paying one last year. All these things tend to the improvement of trade via the St. Lawrence route, and all these things emphasize what is suggested as to deepening the harbour at Port Colborne. I have the greatest hope of the best possible results accruing from the harbour improvements at Montreal, and the elevator accommodation to be given there. I do not know the particulars about this Conners Syndicate, but I do know that if elevators such as are proposed are built at Montreal, whatever profit the persons interested in the syndicate may derive, it seems to me that there cannot be any two opinions about this new venture being a benefit to the St. Lawrence route.

Mr. BRITTON.

Mr. R. R. DOBELL (Quebec West). Mr. Speaker, the question of deepening our canals and of transportation from the extreme west of this continent, and from the ports of Port Arthur, Duluth, Milwaukee and Chicago to the ports of Montreal and Quebec, has occupied my attention ever since I entered parliament. The very first effort I made was for the deepening of our canals from Kingston to Montreal; and when the hon. member for the east riding of Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) brought this question up, I thought, Sir, that he deserved not only the thanks of this House, but the thanks of the government, for giving us the opportunity of thoroughly threshing out this matter, which I believe is the most important one brought before this parliament. I do not think it is possible, Sir, to exaggerate the desirability of opening up every channel of transportation, both by water and rail, that we can open up. I think that any expenditure in that direction is well laid out; because, Sir, what do we find? We find that up to three years ago our magnificent waterways conveyed from the west to the Lower St. Lawrence not more than 8 per cent of the great trade of the west. Over 90 per cent found its way from Buffalo and other American towns to the Atlantic seaboard through American channels. Well, Sir, I felt perfectly satisfied that if we changed places with our American friends, they would have a very different case to show at the end of two or three years. This government set resolutely to work to complete in the shortest possible time the deepening of the canals from Kingston to Montreal, and this work is now virtually accomplished. It is not quite finished; it wants a little more masonry to build up the sides of some of the locks; but the channel is completed, and vessels drawing fourteen feet of water can pass through to Montreal without let or hindrance, and that work will be in operation at the opening of navigation.

Mr. HAGGART. Is the hon. minister certain of that statement—that there will be a fourteen-foot navigation from Kingston to Montreal at the opening of navigation?

Mr. DOBELL. Yes, in May.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). With the exception of the canal at Cardinal.

Mr. DOBELL. I make no exception, in deference to my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals. I followed this up yesterday, and I found that there was not an exception, even at Cardinal.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The canal is not completed, but there is the river.

Mr. DOBELL. Taking the canal and the river, I repeat that from Kingston to Montreal at the opening of navigation the waterway will be free for all vessels drawing fourteen feet of water.

Mr. TAYLOR. When ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Just as soon as there is any navigation in the river.

Mr. DOBELL. I did not say when the ice was in the river. I said at the opening of navigation that channel will be open, and there is nothing this government have done that reflects on them more credit. We had constructed at great cost at Sault Ste. Marie a canal twenty feet deep ; we had a depth of fourteen feet in the Welland Canal ; and then where were we ? We were dammed up at Kingston, and from there we had not more than seven feet of water. The consequence was that the whole of the trade found its way to Buffalo and was carried thence to New York. That is the answer to my hon. friend from East Simcoe as to why Canada has not heretofore been able to compete with the American ports. From this time forth I claim she will not only compete, but that instead of having 7 or 8 per cent of the western trade she will soon score 20 per cent or 30 per cent of that trade ; and what will be the result ? The result will be the employment of a great many large steamers crossing the Atlantic that now go to Boston, New York, Philadelphia or other American ports. You ask why it is that New York can compete in rates successfully as against Montreal. There are two or three reasons, none of which have been named. One is that to-day there is a discrimination in the rates of insurance against the St. Lawrence route of not less than 3 per cent. Three per cent on a steamer costing £90,000 would amount to £2,700 per voyage. On a tramp steamer costing £50,000 there is a discrimination of £1,200 or £1,500 per voyage. We cannot stand that discrimination. We must have that removed, and we can have it removed. If I am asked how we can have it removed, there is only one way. Canada must adopt measures to make the channel way from Belle Isle to Quebec and Montreal as free of risk as possible, and also initiate a sound, safe insurance company that will take a portion of the risk, and the moment it does, there will be other companies that will take the other portion of the risk. We must bear a portion of the burden. I agree with everything that fell from my hon. colleague the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) ; but he did not go quite far enough. He did mention Quebec once ; but my contention is that if our great North-west develops and opens out as it promises to do, Montreal cannot supply the necessary accommodation for the tonnage that will go up to be loaded. We must not look at this matter in any narrow, selfish way. We must prepare to make our country the great highway of this vast continent, and we have everything to favour us. I will give you one instance that came to my knowledge in England last year.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Six o'clock.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). There is only one order on the Order paper for this evening which is ready for discussion ; that is the Bill of Mr. Denville ; and as that is not to be proceeded with this evening, I beg to move that the House do now adjourn.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENTS.

Mr. BRITTON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 28) to amend the Criminal Code, 1892. He said: The Bill that I now introduce is somewhat similar to the Bill that was introduced by me last session, and for the same purposes. I have, however, from this Bill, left out the second section which I understood to be the more controversial section of the Bill. I think, notwithstanding what was said last session in regard to any member of this House attempting to lay what is called violent hands on a thing that was regarded by some hon. members as perfect, namely, the Criminal Code, my position has been amply vindicated by a Bill that was introduced in the Senate last session by the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Mills). Of course, it is almost beyond the expectation of any private member to carry through the House, without the consent of the government, a Bill so important as the one I now present, but, I dare say the larger Bill introduced by the hon. Minister of Justice last year, will, or something like it, be introduced again this year, and I desire to have amendments, suggested by myself, and which are incorporated in this Bill now presented, brought to the attention of the hon. Minister of Justice and of the House in order that they may be discussed. There are some of the amendments suggested by me that are manifestly necessary in the working of the Code. There are others that are so much matters of substance, that, no doubt, a good deal of opposition will be met with from some of the hon. members and which is only to be expected. I mention to the House that all the suggestions in this Bill are worth discussing even though they are not finally adopted by the House. I may say that there are two or three things proposed which I will just mention here. The second section is a controversial one, and therefore I will leave it out. It has reference to an offence which will be considerably discussed. The first section of the Bill deals with a condition that manifestly ought to be changed, and that is in the case of an appeal. At present an application to the Court of Appeal, in criminal matters has either to be made to one of the three divisions of the High Court of Justice for Ontario. The result of this is that each division, being an independent Court of Appeal in reference to criminal matters, may give an independent decision; therefore, there may be at any time, as there have been in the past, conflicting decisions upon one point. In order to obviate that I propose that the Court of Appeal in criminal matters for the province of Ontario shall be the Court of Appeal for Ontario. I suppose there will be no objection to that. Then, the next section is one amending the section of the Criminal Code that requires corroborative evidence in regard to certain offences. Another section is in reference to reserving a case for the Court of Appeal, and the next is as to a very much disputed question and proposes to strike out section 748, which gives the Minister of Justice power to order a new trial. The next section is in regard to depositions taken in the presence of the accused and as to when they may be used at the trial. The next section gives magistrates the power to deal with offences without the consent of the accused; for instance, in the matter of an attempt to commit theft, when the value of the property is under $10, and to remove the anomaly that although they may try the offence, they may not try an attempt to commit the offence in such a case. The next section is one which allows the informant, or complainant, to prefer a bill of indictment against an accused person, whereas at present the law is that unless the complainant is bound over to prosecute, he may not, as a right, prefer such a bill. These are the leading features of the Bill, and as I say, I think they are worth discussing, so I move the introduction of the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT.

Mr. BRITTON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 29) to amend the Dominion Elections Act by providing for the use of the Macdonald voting machine.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is the Bill introduced last session, and the object of it is to have voting done by a machine which will register—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BRITTON. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that the only objection that I have to the Bill at the present stage, is that it is called the Macdonald voting machine. Since the election in Manitoba I rather object to that name.

Mr. COCHRANE. That machine voted all right.

Mr. BRITTON. I am afraid it did for you. This machine has a box which is placed in the compartment or room into which the voter retires to register his vote.

Mr. MILLS. Is it fireproof?

Mr. BRITTON. The hon. gentleman may need something of this kind as well as the other side. The object of it is to have, instead of paper ballots, a pellet which will, in addition to being deposited for a candidate, register the vote at the same time. The box is placed inside of the compartment to which the voter retires. That box has in it two tubes, or more, according to the number of candidates. Inside of the tube is a registering machine which registers the vote for the person whose name is on the top of the tube. On the top of the ballot box is a cylinder, and in the cylinder are slots, or places where this pellet may be placed, according to the person the voter desires to vote for. The end of the cylinder comes through the partition or curtain, as the case may be, and is within reach of the deputy returning officer. When the voter comes, and if it is found by the returning officer that he is entitled to vote, he is given the pellet, or more than one if he is entitled to vote for more than one candidate, as in the case of Hamilton where there are two members elected. He is furnished with a pellet for such number of candidates as he is entitled to vote for. He places this in a slot in the top of the cylinder under the name of the candidate for whom he desires to vote and returns to the deputy-returning officer. The handle of this cylinder is within reach of the deputy-returning officer and is entirely under his control; and he turns it, and in turning the pellet is deposited in the tube, and passes down, registers the vote and drops from the ballot box; so that before the voter retires, he sees returned to the deputy-returning officer, the same ball or pellet that was given to him on entering the polling place, and that he has placed in the top of the cylinder for the purpose of registering his vote.

Mr. WALLACE. How does he know it is the same ballot?

Mr. BRITTON. It is the official pellet, which is given to each voter. It is really like a marble or a little ball. One object is to avoid spoiling ballots and it facilitates the enumeration of the votes at the close of the poll. The machine registers the number of votes just as a turnstile registers the number of people passing through at a fair.

It is so simple that it is not likely to get out of order, and it is a most inexpensive machine. I saw one of those complicated machines at Buffalo last fall just before the November elections; and, while it was very perfect in itself, it cost something like $500 or $600. This machine will cost about $30 or $40, and can be made with perfect accuracy, so that with its use frauds would be practically impossible. It does away with the spoiling of ballots and the insufficient marking of ballots, as it does away with all printing of ballot papers. The name of each candidate is simply printed on a tablet attached to the machine, and perfect certainty can be attained by the identification of the pellet which is used.

Mr. INGRAM. Is this the same Bill that the hon. gentleman introduced last year?

Mr. BRITTON. The same.

Mr. BERGERON. Will you put it through this year?

Mr. BRITTON. I hope so. I will try to do it.

Mr. McMULLEN. I wish to say a word or two on this Bill. I shall have something more to say about it when it comes up for a second reading. I would certainly oppose the adoption of any voting machine without giving every person in the Dominion who has invented such a machine an opportunity of exhibiting his invention before a committee of the House, so that they can all be investigated. Our esteemed friend has not been as long in this House as I have been, or he would know that some years ago we had a committee of this House appointed for the purpose of examining a number of these voting machines. No less than seven or eight were exhibited before that committee; and, after the committee had thoroughly investigated them, the consensus of opinion was that it would be better that such a system of voting should be first introduced in municipal elections in cities and smaller municipalities, so that the people would gradually become educated in their use; afterwards they might be introduced in provincial elections, and then it would be time enough for this House to consider whether, in view of all the inaccuracies that have attended the recording of votes throughout the Dominion under the present system of balloting, it would be wise to adopt it here for Dominion elections. I know of several men who have spent a good deal of time on a voting machine that can be operated by simply drawing a knob in front of the name of the candidate for whom the voter wishes to vote. When he draws that knob he records his vote, and he cannot draw more than one. I think that every one who has a machine of this kind should have an opportunity of placing it on exhibition before a committee of this House before we adopt any particular one.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

LAND TITLES ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. DAVIN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 31) to amend the Land Titles Act, 1894. He said: The object of this Bill is to get rid of an anomaly that exists at present in the North-west Territories. If a person dies there, under the Act of 1894, his will cannot be registered, nor can an exemplification from a court in England be accepted, though an exemplification from a court in Canada can be taken. That seems to me to be an anomaly, and this Bill will remedy that by providing that an exemplification from the proper court in the United Kingdom shall be accepted.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Might I ask the hon. gentleman whether he considers whether an English court would accept an Act of this parliament as determining what should be received as evidence in England?

Mr. DAVIN. I am not concerned at the present time as to what shall be received as evidence in England. What I am trying to do is to get an unnecessary expense removed that attaches to persons in the North-west under wills made in England.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not know whether this Bill would fulfil what my hon. friend desires or not. In some of the provinces any will which has been proved in England can be admitted to probate on the mere production of the exemplifications of the letters of probate taken out in England.

Mr. DAVIN. We have not that in the North-west Territories.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It is only the rule by virtue of the statute, and that statute has been enacted recently in my own province. Without the statute, you have to prove the will in the ordinary course.

CAMPAIGN LITERATURE.

Mr. TAYLOR asked:

1. How many pamphlets, entitled 'Political Pointers, No. 1,' being the address delivered by the Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright at Toronto, on the 24th day of August, 1899, were sent through the mail to the electors of Canada? 2. Were they sent in sealed envelopes? 3. Were they sent through the mail free of postage? 4. Were they franked or initialled R. J. C., M. T. & C.? 5. Were the envelopes to inclose said pamphlets furnished by the government? 6. Were the envelopes containing said pamphlets, or any of them, addressed by civil servants?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I am not exactly in a position to state how many pamphlets entitled 'Political Pointers No. 1' have been issued to the electors of Canada. I am inclined to believe, however, Sir, that though not merely as many as ought be issued, have been issued, some hundreds of thousands have been distributed. As regards question No. 2, the answer is 'yes.' As regards question No. 3, the answer is also 'yes.' As regards question No. 4, I am not sure, but I rather incline to think that some were franked with the initials described and some by other members of the government. As regards question No. 5, so far as I am aware, any envelopes that were furnished were paid for by the parties who got them. As regards question No. 6, the answer is 'no.' As regards the general subject, Sir, I have been at some pains to ascertain what were the precedents established in the year 1896.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly in order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I am strictly in order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. You are making a speech.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I am perfectly in order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the House had better come to order.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). What is the point of order?

Mr. FOSTER. He is making a speech.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly in order. I have the right to give the House all the information I see fit bearing directly on the question. If gentlemen put questions, they must take the answers given as the minister chooses to give them. I find that in the department over which I have at present the honour to preside, Miss Bertha Marks was employed by the department for two months, December, 1895, and March, 1896, (see Auditor-General's Report, p. T-2) during which time she was employed exclusively in addressing envelopes for this campaign literature. I find that a present member of the staff entered the department in April, 1896, and until the elections in June, her time was wholly taken up in addressing envelopes. I find that both the present messengers during that period sealed many thousands of envelopes and franked them with the late Mr. Ives' frank. I find that there is one item in the Auditor-General's Report, 1895-6, p. T-3, 'Envelopes, 42,775, price $59.30'; which envelopes I have every reason to believe were used for the purpose of distributing the aforesaid campaign literature.

Mr. COCHRANE. And you said it was wrong at the time?

Mr. TAYLOR. You double distanced the other minister.

DEATH OF GUNNER WALLACE.

Mr. CLARKE asked :

1. Have the militia authorities appointed a board of inquiry or a commission to inquire into the cause of the death of the late Gunner Wallace, of Toronto, at Kingston, and as to the allegations of negligence on the part of the hospital assistants who were attending on Wallace during his illness ?
2. Who compose the board or commission ?
3. Will the government make public the report of the commission as soon as it is received ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. The officer commanding 'C' Battery, R.C.A., being the unit to which the deceased Gunner Wallace belonged, assembled a court of inquiry to investigate the cause of death. 2. The board was composed of: Captain Mackie, Lieuts. Irving and King. 3. It is not customary to publish the reports of the proceedings of such boards, but if the hon. gentleman will come to the department I shall be glad to show him the report.

MAGDALEN ISLANDS STEAMSHIP SERVICE.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's) asked :

Was the contract made with Robert J. Leslie, of Halifax, for steamship service for the conveyance of mails, passengers and freight to and from the Magdalen Islands, substantially as follows:—'A weekly service from Pictou, N. S., commencing with the opening of navigation until the close of navigation at Pictou, thereafter until close of navigation at Magdalen Islands, from some port in Cape Breton to such port or ports in the Magdalen Islands as the minister may approve. Subsidy $9,000 per annum, payable July 1, October 1, and at the close of the service. The ports of call to be Georgetown and Souris, in the province of Prince Edward Island, and once a month during the months of June, July, August and September, a trip to be extended to Bryon Island. Calls at Grand Entry need not be made after close of month of September.' The class of steamships to be equal to the 'St. Olaf' or such other steamer of equal class, speed, equipment, capacity and accommodation as may be approved by the minister.

The 'St. Olaf' is of a class and capacity of not less than seventy-two tons net, triple expansion engines, carrying 160 pounds of steam, capable of a speed of not less than twelve miles an hour, the service to be run at an average speed of not less than ten miles an hour. Saloon accommodation for at least fifty first-class passengers, and for at least 100 second-class passengers, suitable accommodation for mails, &c.

Have the foregoing conditions been complied with by the present contractor during the past season ?

What is the size, class, equipment, speed, power and freight and passenger capacity of the steamer employed under the present contract ?

If the boat employed during the past season is not up to the requirements of the contract, is it the intention of the government to insist on an improved service as was promised the people interested ?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). The service to be performed between Magdalen Islands and Pictou is practically as stated. The conditions have been complied with by the present contractor—in fact while the service only calls for four trips to Bryon Island, five trips have been made. The service is performed by the steamer Lunenburg, a boat 124.9 feet long, 23.5 feet broad, and 12.5 feet depth of hold; net tonnage 113, speed capacity 13 knots per hour, accommodation for fifty first-class, and for 150 other passengers. The contractor in a letter dated the 15th January, stated that he was leaving for England to either purchase or build a boat especially adapted to the Magdalen route. The service was not continued after the close of navigation at Pictou from some port in Cape Breton, as navigation closed at Magdalen Islands this season before it closed at Pictou. The contractors, however, are prepared to proceed with the service next spring before the port of Pictou is free of ice, if necessary.

LATE POSTMASTER AT ST. JOHNS, P.Q.

Mr. MILLS asked :

1. Were Messrs. John Black and Henderson Black bondsmen for the late postmaster of St. Johns, in the province of Quebec ? If so, for how much ?
2. Was the said late postmaster, when removed, in default, and for how much ?
3. Was action in law taken against the said John Black and Henderson Black, or either of them, in consequence of such default ?
4. Has judgment been obtained against said bondsmen, or either of them ? If so, for what amount, debt and costs ?
5. Has said judgment been executed ? If not, why not ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). Messrs. John Black and Henderson Black were sureties for the late postmaster of St. Johns, in the province of Quebec, for $1,600 each. The postmaster died on the 27th August, 1896, and, shortly afterwards it was discovered that he had, at various times, between the 3rd November, 1890, and the 6th July, 1896, appropriated to his own use certain post office moneys, amounting in all, with interest, to $4,718.31. One of the sureties, John Black, died, and an action was brought upon the bond against the surviving surety, Henderson Black, and Mary Jane Black and said Henderson Black as beneficiary heirs of the late John Black, and judgment was obtained against Henderson Black for $1,600, the amount of his personal liability, and the said Henderson Black has paid the amount of this judgment against himself, including the costs of the Exchequer Court and the Supreme Court, to which the case had been carried. With reference to the judgment against the beneficiary heirs of the late John Black, it is represented that the estate of the late John Black was insolvent. As yet nothing has been recovered against that estate. The Department of Justice is making the necessary inquiries with a view to ascertaining whether the amount of the judgment can be collected.

YUKON TERRITORY—REGISTRAR'S FEES.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked :

1. When were the fees fixed for the Registrar of Land Titles, under the Torrens system, in the Yukon ?

2. About how much patented land is there in this district ?

(a) What return of fees has been made by the Registrar, if any ?

(b) How many townsite Crown grants have been issued in the district, if any ? For what townsite ? At what dates, respectively ?

(c) How many grants of land have issued for private lots in the district of the Land Registrar's office ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I beg to reply : 1. 29th August, 1897. 2. 115 acres. (a) $2,895.70. (b) There have been no Crown grants of townsites. (c) The total number of patents issued is 165.

APPOINTMENT OF MR. J. B. O'REILLY, Q.C.

Mr. BRODER (by Mr. Taylor) asked :

Has Mr. J. B. O'Reilly, Q.C., of Prescott, Ont., been appointed a county judge ? If not, has he been promised the appointment ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The government is not in a position to say what advice it will give to His Excellency the Governor General with regard to this matter.

RAILWAY FROM CANSO TO ST. PETERS.

Mr. GILLIES asked :

Has a contract been entered into between the government and any company for the subsidy revoked at the last session of parliament towards the construction of a railway from the Straits of Canso to St. Peters ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). My hon. colleague, the Minister of Railways, is absent, but it is my knowledge that no contracts have yet been given for the railway in question. I understand that two companies are seeking the work, one called the Cape Breton Extension Railway Company, and the other, I think, is the Canso and Louisburg Railway Company. There are, at any rate, two sets of people applying for the subsidy, and no contracts have yet been awarded. It would not be expedient, I am sure, for the minister to make any further statements on the subject at this moment.

Mr. MULOCK.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—THE CANADIAN CONTINGENTS.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) Might I ask the hon. Minister of Militia if he has the information which he promised me the other day with reference to the four or five men left in Halifax on the occasion of the departure of the last contingent, in care of the sick horses ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). I overlooked the matter for a day or two, but telegraphed yesterday for the information to the district officer commanding. I will let the hon. gentleman know at once when I receive the answer.

THE SUSPENSION OF COASTING LAWS.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). Before the Orders are called, I would like to call the attention of my right hon. friend to the visit of the deputation which waited upon the government about the suspension of the coasting laws. On that occasion, my right hon. friend promised to look into the matter and said that probably the Order in Council, under which the suspension of the coasting laws was adopted, would be rescinded. Has that Order in Council been rescinded as yet ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). There is no necessity for rescinding it, because it was only for the present season, and is, therefore, now at an end.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. W. H. MONTAGUE (Haldimand). I wish, Mr. Speaker, to correct a report in the columns of the Toronto Globe. I am sure the intention was not to misrepresent me, but I certainly was misrepresented. In a report of some remarks I made with reference to the recall of General Hutton, the correspondent of the Toronto Globe says this :

He knew that to say this might be to criticise Col. Hughes.

That has reference to a statement I made with regard to the opinion existing in the country as to the general conduct in Canada of Major-General Hutton ; and I need hardly say to the House that I made no such statement. What I did say was that I felt, and the members of this House felt, that the case of Col. Hughes and his dispute with the general had nothing whatever to do with the recall of General Hutton, but there was a much more serious cause for that recall than any dispute with an officer of the militia. What I said further was that the case of Col. Hughes would not be dealt with now, but would stand on its own merits, and need not be discussed at all at present.

THE STRATHCONA HORSE.

Mr. FRANK OLIVER (Alberta). I would like, Mr. Speaker, to draw the attention of the Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden) to a report in circulation in our western country with regard to the purchase of horses for the Strathcona contingent. It has been rumoured for some little time that arrangements are being entered into by the gentleman who has the authority to purchase these horses—an officer of the government, I believe—whether acting in this matter for the government or not—with a private individual in that country for the purpose of having horses imported from the States to supply the requirements of the contingent. The Calgary Herald communicated with Dr. McEachern on the subject, and received the following reply:—

No horses are being bought in Montana by me. It is Lord Strathcona's wish—and every effort will be made in accordance therewith—to purchase all the horses in the Territories. It is doubtful, however, if nearly 600 well-broken, sound and suitable horses can be found within the limits, and purchasing agents will probably not refuse to buy suitable horses from within the Territories if such be imported by Canadian dealers.

Dr. McEachern has left the matter an open question in this answer, if he has not actually said that it is his intention to purchase horses from the outside. I bring this matter to the attention of the hon. minister in order that it may be settled, for it is an important one, not only to Lord Strathcona, who furnished the money, I understand, to pay for these horses, but also to the people of the North-west Territories, and also as affecting the credit of the Territories in the matter of horse rearing. For my own part, representing a part of the Territories, and only a part, I will say that there is absolutely no question as to the possibility of purchasing 600 well-broken and suitable horses in the Territories, if any reasonable time be given and reasonable means taken to make the selection. There was no difficulty in doing so in regard to the horses required for the first contingent; and I can certainly say that, as the supply of men was not exhausted with the first contingent, neither was the supply of horses. I should like to say further that if the Territories are good enough to get men from, they are just as good to get horses from. There is no question that it is Lord Strathcona's idea to get the best he can for his money, and his desire is to have the horses purchased in the Territories.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). As my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) has said Lord Strathcona is furnishing the money, and to a very large extent, the corps that is going to South Africa at his instance, is being arranged for by him. So far as the purchase of horses is concerned, I can only say to my hon. friend that this matter is entirely under the control of Dr. McEachern, who was appointed for that purpose by Lord Strathcona. Dr. McEachern came here to see me on his way west, but he had his instructions already. For anything he may have done, or may be doing, he is in no way responsible to me, nor is this government in any way responsible for him.

Mr. N. F. DAVIN (West Assiniboia). In the absence of the hon. Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden) four or five days ago, I spoke to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) on this subject of the purchase of horses in the North-west Territories, and told him that what I now tell the Minister of Militia—that if Dr. McEachern finds any difficulty in getting 600 horses in one part of the Territories, all he has to do is go further afield, and he can get all the horses required. For instance, in East Assiniboia, in West Assiniboia, on the Saskatchewan, and, I have no doubt that my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) who has just addressed the House could inform Dr. McEachern as he has informed us, in the northern part of Alberta, ample provision can be made for the horsing of the new contingent.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Supplementing what has been stated by the Minister of Militia, I may state that, after Dr. McEachern was selected by Lord Strathcona to look after that part of the equipment of the force, he applied to the Department of Agriculture for leave of absence, and was granted that leave of absence in order to apply himself exclusively to this work.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). I understand, from what appeared in the papers some time ago, that an effort was made to ascertain whether Canada could supply the right class of horses and in considerable numbers. Some buyers came into our part of the country, professing to buy horses for that service. But they could only pay from $45 to $60 apiece. Any person who knows anything about the matter knows that you cannot buy suitable horses at those figures. Unless this were understood, the impression might be left that a sufficient supply of suitable horses cannot be had in Canada. There are plenty of suitable horses to be found in Canada, but if only the prices I have named can be paid, the horses cannot be bought, at least in our part of the country.

Mr. J. G. RUTHERFORD (Macdonald). I think the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) has touched the root of the matter in this question of price. I understand that the prices offered by Dr. McEachern in the North-west Territories are such as to make it quite possible, in fact probable, that he will not be able to secure what he wants.

Mr. DAVIN. May I ask what the price is ?

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Eighty dollars, I understand to be the price, and we all know that at the present prices, it is quite impossible to procure suitable cavalry remounts at that figure. I feel that the class of horses brought in from Montana, bought by Dr. McEachern at that price, will probably be no great credit to Canada. I regret the incident now under discussion, all the more because we in the west have been for some time trying to get the Imperial authorities to countenance the establishing of a purchasing depot in the North-west. For a year, we have been pressing this matter, and have been urging upon General Hutton the advisability of carrying it out. General Hutton himself is keen on it, and is well aware that we can raise the class of horses wanted for the British service. Only last month, the Horse Breeders Association of Manitoba and the North-west Territories passed a very strong resolution upon the subject, pointing out the advantages which would accrue to the empire through the purchase of remounts for the British army on British soil. I need not occupy time; but, when we are trying to persuade the Imperial authorities that they can procure a sufficient number of horses for the British army in British territory, the publication of such an item as appeared in the Calgary Herald, authorized by a man of Dr. McEachern's standing—namely, that he cannot procure 600 horses in Manitoba and the North-west Territories—is likely to have a bad effect upon the reputation of that country as a horse-raising country. I think it is unfair to Manitoba and the North-west that such items should appear. Whether Dr. McEachern is authorized by the government or not, we know that he is a government officer; and I would suggest that he be reprimanded and cautioned, so that he may not again do anything to create a false impression in the way he has done in this instance.

PRIVILEGE—INDEBTEDNESS FOR SPEECHES.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR (South Leeds). I rise to a question of privilege, in order to make a personal explanation. It would appear from page O-51 of the Auditor-General's Report that I owe the Printing Bureau $61.31.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, ch.

Mr. TAYLOR. I just wish to say that, personally, when the Auditor-General's Report was printed I did not owe nor do I now owe the Printing Bureau one cent. I may explain briefly how that item was there. An arrangement was made between the Queen's Printer and myself that in case of orders for speeches from members of the opposition, if I would send the names and the number wanted, he would send the account to me and ask me to collect. It will be seen on the same page of the Auditor-General's Report that I paid $295.05 last year. Coming on to the close of the session, a number of speeches that had been ordered were not printed in time for members to receive them before they had to leave. They left their voters' lists behind them to have the speeches addressed and sent out. I received the bills from the Queen's Printer, but could not collect the $61.31, owing to the fact that the members had gone home. I wrote them, and some of them sent me orders on the Accountant's Department for the amount. I took the orders there and received the accountant's cheque, but made payable to the members themselves. I sent these down to them, and asked them to return them to the Queen's Printer; but I presume they came to the conclusion that another session would be on in a short time, and they would settle the account then. These members did pay me the amount immediately on their arrival here, and to-day I received from the Queen's Printer this receipt:

Ottawa, February 15, 1900.

Received from Geo. Taylor, Esq., M.P., sixty-one dollars and 31 cents ($61.31) for balance for copies of speeches, session 1899.

(Signed) FRED. G. BRONSKILL, for Accountant.

Now, I wanted to make this personal explanation because I knew—and know better now from the exclamations from our friends opposite—that some of them will be showing the Auditor-General's Report, and saying that I am indebted to the government in this sum. The amount was not for myself, as I have explained; but, in any case, I want this receipt and my statement to be on Hansard, so that when any gentleman rises in any constituency in this country and quotes the Auditor-General's Report to show that I am indebted for the amount of $61.31, I can place this record and this receipt alongside of it to contradict it.

GRAIN TRANSPORTATION TO THE SEABOARD.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Bennett:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is advisable to take a definite line of action with regard to the question of transportation of the grain and other commodities of the North-west Territories, Manitoba and the United States, with a view of centring the same to the greatest possible extent in Canadian channels.

Mr. R. B. DOBELL (West Quebec). In replying yesterday to the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), I endeavoured to answer the question he put, 'Why it was that Canada had not been able so far to compete with the United States in the transportation of grain to the seaboard,' and I stated my belief that it was largely owing to our canal system from Kingston to Montreal not having been deepened to a greater depth. I also drew attention to the results on our Sault Ste. Marie Canal, and stated that in the year 1897 four million tons of American shipping passed through our canal. Since yesterday I have obtained a statement showing the amount of tons that passed last year, not only through our Canadian canal but also through the United States canal; and I consider it startling, because it shows how small a part of that western trade is carried by Canadian boats. I will give you the figures: The total tonnage passing through the two canals amounted to 25 millions, of which three million tons passed through the Canadian canal and 22 million tons through the American canal. Out of the three million tons that passed through the Canadian canal, only 496,000 tons were carried by Canadian bottoms. Well, Sir, I also made another statement, and that was that to-day our canals and water stretches will enable Canadian steamers, or American steamers, for that matter, any steamers or vessels not drawing more than 14 feet of water, to pass from Kingston to Montreal at the first opening of navigation this spring.

Mr. BERGERON. Is the hon. gentleman sure of that?

Mr. DOBELL. I think the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) will shortly publish an official announcement in the press of this country that such will be the case.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words pointing out the advantages of our route. In the first place, by using both our railways and waterways we have an advantage in the distance between Chicago and Liverpool of 500 miles over the American route. That is of itself a very striking advantage, but I believe we have other advantages still. One is that our route being so much cooler, corn is transported much more safely through our northern waters than when it is sent down the Mississippi to be shipped at New Orleans, which has so far attracted a large portion of that traffic. I believe that when our waterways are used to the full extent, after the 14 feet depth has been secured, a large proportion of that corn will take our route for Great Britain. A question arose as to the most economical way of carrying our corn, either from Chicago or from Port Arthur. Of late there has been a strong inclination to favour these immense steamers carrying 6,000, 7,000 or 8,000 tons each. But it is found that there are great drawbacks to these large steamers. I learn that they have considerable difficulty in entering the harbour at Buffalo, as they have to enter stern foremost, and with the aid of tug boats to put them in position before the elevators. I have been told by a number of men that the most economical and expeditious way of transporting grain would be to put it on steamers attended by two vessels carrying not less than 8,000 tons, a quantity about equal to that carried by the larger steamers on the lakes when going through our canals without breaking bulk, and delivering that cargo either at Montreal, or Quebec, or any other point, as may be desired.

Mr. FOSTER. That is, the three vessels will carry 8,000 tons.

Mr. DOBELL. Yes, Now, Sir, I have heard a good deal respecting the benefits we can give to our farmers. I do not think there is anything that can conduce more to the prosperity of the farming community than by contriving means by which we shall be capable of moving the grain the year it has been housed and elevated, at the least possible cost, at any place from which it can be shipped to Europe or transferred into cars and distributed in the Eastern States. I do not think that there is any advantage that we can give the farmers equal to that of providing means of getting their grain shipped the same year that it is housed or put into the elevators, where they can deal with it, either by shipment, or by sale.

Mr. FOSTER. In regard to that steamer and its two consorts—do they go through the Welland Canal?

Mr. DOBELL. Yes, I made the statement that they would come from Port Arthur or Chicago without breaking bulk either to Quebec or Montreal, or wherever they may be consigned.

Mr. BERGERON. What is the tonnage?

Mr. DOBELL. The three will carry 8,000 tons on a 14-foot draft of water. One of the great drawbacks to our adopting large steamers is this: It will cost a very large sum of money to prepare Port Colborne for the reception of these steamers, and I think the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) has done very wisely in holding his hand and not rushing into a great expense there, because, I believe, the large steamers will not be the best and most effective way of moving our grain. While on the other hand, I believe they afford the most economical way of moving iron ore from Duluth to Cleveland, when we come to carrying grain, I believe they are too cumbersome, too expensive, and they are not the most economical. In favour of these vessels it is interesting to learn that the Messrs. Connors, who have the contract to build these large elevators in Montreal, have contracted in England for five or six steamers to draw 14 feet of water, and which are to be utilized in our lake service with this object.

Mr. FOSTER. To haul consorts?

Mr. DOBELL. There will be a consort to one steamer or two consorts. I believe that two steamers are now being built by a Hamilton firm with the same object, and the only regret I have is that the western ship owners have had so little faith in our canal improvements that we find ourselves now, that our canals are deepened, with no steamers to take advantage of them. This brings me to mention a matter that was brought up by the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), and it was that he questioned the policy which this government adopted last fall in removing the restrictions which our navigation laws put upon American vessels in regard to their carrying grain from one Canadian port to another. Perhaps it will not be uninteresting if I put before the House exactly the case as it was presented to us. Mr. Booth, as you know, has moved large quantities of grain from Parry Sound to the seaboard, he was offered a large quantity of grain from Manitoba, and here, I may mention, that I have heard many hon. members remark upon the small quantity of grain that Canada has taken from Manitoba to be shipped via the St. Lawrence. I believe that nearly the whole of this grain has gone via Buffalo and New York. Mr. Booth presented his case, and he said: 'I am prepared, if you will remove this restriction, to send my steamers'—'which were American steamers'—to take Manitoba grain to Parry Sound and send it to the seaboard. I cannot do it under your present navigation laws, and I leave it for your consideration in future whether it is more desirable for the country to have the transshipping of that grain through Canadian territory and probably by Canadian steamers, than to prevent American steamers bringing that grain from Port Arthur to Parry Sound.' If there were plenty of steamers of Canadian ownership to do the work it would be another question, because no one would stand by the rights of Canada more strongly and more clearly than I would myself, and I hope that we will soon be able to provide sufficient tonnage to move what will be the greatest wheat crop in the world, if our North-west Territories go on increasing at the ratio they have increased in the last two or three years. It is not a question of one route or two routes, or of two, or three railways. We cannot estimate what is before us, and not only that, but look at the greater safety we have in our northern climate. As I have mentioned before, in moving Canadian corn, it is much safer to send it by the St. Lawrence route because of the cooler temperature. In our climate, unlike that of Philadelphia and Baltimore, we can winter wheat with perfect safety. I do not think we can overvalue the privileges we have in having such an important waterway as we have in our lakes and canals at the present time. In defence of the hon. Minister of Public Works, in approving of the lease to an American syndicate to build elevators in Montreal, I may say that I think, if they carry out that scheme, it will do us a great deal of good, and I think we ought to get all the capital we can to make provision for the removal of our western crop. There is no question that we shall have to spend a large sum of money even to provide for 14 feet of water at Port Colborne, because I believe that to-day the depth of water there is only about 12 feet, and I am told that at times there is a very heavy sea running in there which will make it necessary to provide for vessels drawing 14 feet of water, a depth of no less than 17 feet. I believe, also, that it would be necessary to build a large and expensive breakwater there, because, to get vessels to carry grain to any port, we must provide that that port is easy of access and provides perfect security against storms, or any other casualties such as any boulders being dropped into the channel, which we must carefully guard against. I would like to draw attention to the parallel position which is occupied by places like Quebec, Three Rivers, Sorel, or Montreal, and those great grain emporiums in Europe. Cities such as Dantzic, Memel, Riga, and St. Petersburg receive vast quantities of grain during certain months which is put in the elevators and held there during the winter months, until the winter ice breaks up, when a vast fleet of small-sized steamers, and some large steamers also, go and bring that grain to the European markets. We are no worse off than they are. It is quite true that our canals and our lake navigation are closed during five or six months in the year—certainly not over six months in the year. There is another matter to which I wish to direct the attention of the House, and that is with regard to the navigation of the St. Lawrence. I do myself firmly believe that there is nothing to prevent ordinary commercial steamers coming to Quebec, with perfect safety, up to the 1st of February. I know that is a bold statement. I know it may be challenged by many, but I have watched it for many years, and I contend that if we will only help nature to form an ice bridge at Cap Rouge, navigation to Quebec can be continued up to the date I have mentioned. The piers of the proposed railway bridge across the river there will form a key which will enable the ice to take with the first severe frost in the fall of the year. I want hon. gentlemen to fix it in their minds, that Quebec harbour will from that time be kept as free of ice in winter as at any time of the year. There is no reason in the world why Quebec harbour should not be kept free of ice. The reason why it is so dangerous now in winter time, is that they prevent the ice bridge from forming, and the ice flows down from St. Foyés Bay, and forms up as far as Three Rivers, flows to and fro with the tide, and so it continues until the latter part of February, when what is called the jam bridge forms. At a very low tide with an easterly wind the ice is driven up in the harbour, and it has positively been known to measure 80 feet in thickness at this jamb. If there was a regular ice bridge it would disappear as soon as the spring came, and navigation would be opened earlier in the year. It is therefore quite a question for us whether we should not try to make the St. Lawrence available for the transport of our grain up to a much later date in the year than it is now, and at an earlier date in the spring. This, however, is less likely than to extend the time in the fall, because the Northern Labrador ice is brought down to the Gulf and makes it more dangerous in the spring than the fall and winter of the year. I saw building in Armstrong's yard, at Newcastle-on-Tyne, two immense ice breakers for the Russian government. We have no ice in the St. Lawrence that requires crushing by such steamers. Nature does that for us, by the rapid current and the large expanse of water, so that the ice drifts to the north shore and the south shore, invariably leaving an open channel.

Mr. BERGERON. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Dobell) is now speaking about winter navigation; but there is no ice in Quebec harbour during summer, and would he tell us why it is that, for years past, vessels have passed by the beautiful port of Quebec, and taken the trouble and risk of coming up to Montreal?

Mr. DOBELL. I can only say that we have had a great many drawbacks in Quebec, and it would be only ancient history to refer to them now. A short line railway was built which went through the Eastern Townships and the State of Maine, and which was afterwards found not to be the shortest route to St. John, N.B. Another great drawback has been that in the past, we have not been able to bring down grain to Quebec in sufficient bulk to pay for the haul from Montreal to Quebec. When we have elevators in Quebec, and when we can bring 8,000 tons down in one tow, and tranship it in one night, then Quebec will assert the position which nature destined her to hold, as the great transshipment port of North America. There is no question but that the more you deepen your waterways and the more railways you build, it will tend to that happy consummation. We are building larger steamers every year. Three or four years ago a steamer of 6,000 tons was thought to be a very large one, but they are now taking steamers to New York of from ten to twelve thousand tons. Do you think that they will attempt to take a 12,000-ton steamer, carrying perhaps 15,000 tons of dead weight, and go 180 miles up the river to Montreal with it, when you can bring the barges drawing 14 feet down without any risk, and put their cargoes rapidly on board the steamers at Quebec. We have in Quebec a harbour capable of accommodating almost any number of steamers, and they can use it without risk or danger. I never raised my voice against Montreal. I say that the Montreal people are deserving of all credit for the energy and enterprise they have shown in deepening the channel, and I would support a proposition to-day to go on deepening and widening it. I believe, Sir, that we are going to have such immense quantities of grain and other produce sent to Europe by the Canadian route, that it will require not only Montreal, but Three Rivers, Sorel and Quebec to provide the necessary accommodation. All we have to do to-day is to erect elevators so that we can bring the grain our way, instead of allowing it to be shipped out of Buffalo, New York and Philadelphia.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Dobell) has been telling us of the advantages of our water route; would he be kind enough to tell us what are its disadvantages. At present we are not getting the trade; why is that so? The hon. gentleman's speech is very interesting and practical, and as a business man, I would like to hear him speak on the question of rates, via Buffalo and New York, as compared with the rates over our route.

Mr. DOBELL. I am thankful to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) for his commendation. In reference to the expense, I am informed on good authority by Capt. McDougall, of Duluth, a gentleman largely interested in the construction of steamers, that as soon as our canals are deepened to 14 feet, he would be prepared to bring a steamer and two consorts to Quebec and deliver the grain on board the ocean-going steamers, at 4 cents per bushel.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). From Duluth?

Mr. DOBELL. From Duluth, Port Arthur or Chicago, he would deliver grain at Quebec for 4 cents a bushel.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the cost at present by the Buffalo and New York route?

Mr. DOBELL. It varies very greatly both from Chicago to Buffalo, and from Buffalo to New York. It depends very much on the demand for grain, but I should say that the average would be about one and one-third or one and a half cents from Chicago to Buffalo, and from Buffalo to New York it would come to 5 or 6 cents a bushel.

Mr. POUPORE. You mean by rail from Buffalo to New York.

Mr. DOBELL. Yes.

Mr. POUPORE. What is the rate by water?

Mr. DOBELL. Very little less; perhaps four cents. Then there is the terminal charges at New York, and I wish to refer to that. Mention was made yesterday of making Montreal a free port. I have no objections to that, but if Montreal is made a free harbour, Halifax, St. John, Quebec and Three Rivers and all other ports in Canada must be made free. Why should we make these harbours free? There is no such thing to be found in any other commercial country in the world. It is not a natural harbour. Why should the farmers of this country have to pay the whole cost of steamers and wharf accommodation? I believe in free trade and in every industry paying a fair proportion of the cost of providing these accommodations.

Mr. POUPORE. What is the comparative cost of wharfage at New York and at Montreal?

Mr. DOBELL. I will give you an example. I believe the Cunard people pay $150,000 a year for their wharf, and the White Star people pay $175,000 a year for their wharf at New York. I may be wrong, but my belief is that the steamship owners in Montreal, such as the Allan Line, the Dominion Line and the Beaver Line, do not pay more than $1,000 a year. Their wharfs are practically free to them to-day. The charges in Quebec are also very light indeed. Just now the most unfortunate influence against us is the insurance rates, to which I referred yesterday. This is a matter which I do not think can be ventilated too much in this country. We are entirely dependent on the insurance companies and the underwriters of London. Although we do not own the steamers, we may charter them for three or four or five trips, and provision is now always made that after the 1st of September they must not go by the St. Lawrence. This is very damaging to us, so damaging that it behooves every Canadian to support the forming of a Canadian Lloyds. I do not mean to say that we should try to cover all the risks; but we should be prepared to take a portion of the risks on all first-class steamers and a portion of the risks on the freight. If we did this, we should be in a position to bring such influence to bear on the London underwriters that they would gladly take the risks which we were prepared to take ourselves. At present the rates are prohibitory. It was common knowledge last fall that it was very difficult to get steamers to load at Montreal, owing to the very high rates of insurance. We had to pay three per cent additional insurance on each voyage of each steamer, not between Montreal and Quebec, but between Montreal and Great Britain. I will mention a very pertinent case. We had a steamer chartered, and we had to pay three per cent extra insurance upon her to send her to Quebec. We could have sent her to Bangor, Maine, without any extra insurance.

Mr. POUPORE. Does that apply to Quebec, or only to Montreal?

Mr. DOBELL.

Mr. DOBELL. It applies to the St. Lawrence. We are handicapped to the extent of one per cent till the 1st of September, and to the extent of three per cent after the 1st of September. The rates are really prohibitive. At such a rate it would pay better to send grain to New York than to send it by the St. Lawrence. The evil is one for which the remedy rests in our own hands. We should see that our lighthouses are perfected, and I believe that the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) is desirous of taking every precaution that is possible. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) informed us yesterday that he intends to have a cable, or at any rate communication by telegraph to Belle Isle this year.

Mr. FOSTER. What will that do for the ships? Will that lessen the insurance?

Mr. DOBELL. Yes, I think it will, in this way. We shall hear of steamers leaving the north of Ireland, and three days and a half afterwards we shall be able to telegraph her arrival at Belle Isle. The man who takes the risk of that steamer will feel that his premium is very easily earned. Again, take the case of the Scotsman: It was eight days before we heard of her loss, whereas, if we had had such a telegraph line, we could have heard of it in three hours, and in three days we could have had steamers sent in time to have saved the bulk of the cargo.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman thinks that the facilities for salvage would be so great that they would offset the rates of insurance.

Mr. DOBELL. Not only that, but I believe that it would often be possible to save the steamer. At present there is a good chance of keeping a vessel afloat until she can be saved. We ought to make the ports of our great Dominion as complete as possible, and provide all the facilities possible for saving ships and their cargoes. Last year the Minister of Marine sank a permanent pier in the Traverse, which is of immense advantage to shipping. The hon. leader of the opposition can bear testimony to that fact, because last summer, while on board of a steamer he saw that solid pier set in the river and lighted up by a strong flashlight. That pier is there summer and winter, and steamers coming to Quebec can at all times take their bearings from that light. I remember a steamer coming up there four or five years ago, and when she arrived at the entrance to the Traverse, not knowing where the passage-way was, she waited two days for assistance to come to her, and, not finding it she turned around and went to Halifax. These things impress me with the necessity of our removing the difficulties and dangers to navigation in the Lower St. Lawrence to the greatest extent possible. When this is done, we may reasonably look for lower rates of insurance. The underwriters naturally look at the results of the last three or four years' experience, and they find that instead of receiving a fair return for the risks they have run, they have really lost money, and therefore they put up the rates. That is one reason why we are suffering to such an extent as materially to hamper us in getting steamers in the fall of the year to carry our grain across the Atlantic. I shall not take up the time of the House at any greater length. I think we are all indebted to the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) for having introduced this important subject at this most opportune moment, because now that our canals are just being finished, is the time when we should make every effort to provide accommodation for the great trade of the west. Our American friends will soon have their Erie Canal deepened to eight feet and probably more, and may possibly undertake the project of opening up another waterway by Lake Champlain. To-day we have the opportunity of making the St. Lawrence a great highway, not only of our own western Dominion, but of the far distant western districts of Ohio, Indiana and Minnesota of which the St. Lawrence is the natural outlet. I believe that our government will succeed in accomplishing this, and that in three or four years more we shall have a very different return to make from that which I have presented to the country to-day.

Mr. J. D. REID (South Grenville). I have listened, Mr. Speaker, with a great deal of pleasure to the remarks made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Dobell). I had not the pleasure of listening to the speech of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) yesterday; but on reading it in the newspapers, I came to the conclusion that the government had come to a decision to spend a lot of money at Port Colborne, and were unanimous on that point. After listening, however, to the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just preceded me, I have come to the conclusion that there is still some uncertainty about the matter and that therefore the question is still open for discussion as to what we require to do in the interests of the transportation of grain from the west.

The hon. Minister of Public Works said it was necessary to spend $5,000,000 at Port Colborne in order that large vessels might discharge their grain in that port and tranship it into 60,000 bushel vessels for Montreal. I do not believe that that is where the trouble lies. I believe that had Montreal been able to take care of the grain, a greater part of the grain from the western provinces would have gone that route long ago. Even now, if Montreal were able to take care of the grain, large vessels can bring it to Buffalo—250,000 bushel vessels—and tranship into Canadian vessels of 60,000 bushels, which would take the grain through to Montreal without spending a dollar at Port Colborne. The elevators in Buffalo will handle the grain and deliver into Canadian bottoms just as readily as into American barges to be taken to New York.

During the year previous to 1889, the rates of grain from Buffalo to New York were very much more than they have been since, and a great deal more grain has been going through the St. Lawrence canals. And why? Simply because larger Canadian vessels have been built and are carrying the grain to Kingston and Prescott, where it is transhipped. The quantity has increased simply because these large lake carriers are able to bring it much cheaper. The hon. Minister of Public Works said yesterday that the rate of grain from Chicago or Port Arthur to Montreal is eight cents. I know for a fact, however, having had a little experience in the matter, that the rate of grain from Chicago during 1898—I see it here stated in the official report—to Prescott, where it was transhipped, was one and five-eighths cents per bushel, and from Prescott to Montreal one and three-eighths, thus making a total rate from Chicago to Montreal of three cents per bushel. I also know for a fact that during the whole season, from the opening of navigation until the end of the season, the rates of freight averaged, taking one month with another, less than three cents per bushel from Chicago or Duluth to Prescott, where it was transhipped, and from Prescott to Montreal the average rate was less than one and a half cents per bushel, thus making an average during the whole year from those points to Montreal of less than four cents a bushel. But the great trouble is this: If you want to charter a vessel at Chicago or Port Arthur for Prescott or Kingston, the very first question asked is: Can those vessels be discharged promptly? and unless you can guarantee prompt discharge, you cannot charter to those points. I am referring to the years previous to last, because in 1899 that question was not asked. And why? Simply because the Rockefellers and other large iron shippers on the other side chartered all the vessels they could possibly get, and consequently there was no delay at either Prescott or Kingston, owing to the elevators not being worked to their full capacity. But take the years 1897 and 1898, the elevators were worked to their full capacity, and the reason was that in Montreal the grain could not be taken care of and the elevators were compelled to store their grain. If in the city of Montreal the government had provided sufficient elevator capacity, so that vessels could be discharged quickly, the grain could be carried to-day from Port Arthur to Montreal as cheaply, as, and I believe, a great deal cheaper than, from Buffalo to New York. At present vessels carrying 80,000 bushels can come through to Prescott. It is true they have to lighten at Port Colborne to go through the canal. But the great difficulty is that a small railway owned by a private company, running between Port Colborne and Port Dalhousie, about 14 miles, charges them two cents a bushel for carrying the surplus grain. A vessel carrying 80,000 bushels from Port Arthur or Chicago to Prescott, will carry it for two cents or less, but she cannot carry her full cargo, because she would have to pay two cents, or the full amount she would get, for carrying the surplus grain this short distance by rail. This railway company, I understand, is making a great deal of money out of this little enterprise. If that railway were worked at what it would actually cost to handle the grain, if it were operated by the government, so that the vessel owners would get the grain carried for its actual cost, I believe they would ship their full cargoes. If they could make even half a cent a bushel, they would carry full cargoes, and thus increase the total amount of freight by that much more. With reference to the canal system from Prescott to Montreal, I see by some of the papers that a cry is being raised for the purpose of injuring our St. Lawrence route. Now, I would like to see all the grain possible going by the St. Lawrence route, and, therefore, I deplore anything appearing in the newspapers that will be circulated in any way to injure the route. It is true, at least I understand, that vessels can now go through the Soulanges Canal. As to the rest of the route from the Soulanges Canal westward, a vessel can go down or go up to-day, safely drawing fourteen feet of water. I have not the slightest doubt of that. There is one part of the canal system right through the village in which I live, which is called the Cardinal Cut, but which is not completed. The government, I understand, say that it will be completed and ready for the opening of navigation. So far as that is concerned, I do not think the government can get it ready in that time; I believe it will take all of next year before they can complete it. At the same time, I wish to say that that does not interfere with the fourteen-foot navigation from Montreal. A vessel going down to Montreal would not go through this part, even if it were completed. It would enter the head of the canal, go through the locks and out into the river by a route which is now completed, and so on to Montreal. I believe there are one or two places between that point and Dickinson's Landing where boulders have been found, and where, at present, there is only eleven or twelve feet of water. But I know for a fact that at these points a vessel can go around the boulders without the least trouble. These boulders are in the centre of the river, and there is sixty feet of water on either side of them. Therefore, on the first day of May next, a vessel going through from Prescott to Montreal and drawing fourteen feet of water will have not the slightest trouble.

Mr. BERGERON. That is going down?

Mr. REID. Yes, that is going down; nor is there any trouble coming back. A vessel westbound gets through all right until she strikes this Cardinal Cut, which, as I say, is not intended in any way for vessels going down. When the vessel gets to Iroquois, she has the same channel to go up as she had to go down. But the currents are a little stiffer, and if she were drawing fourteen feet of water, it would be necessary to have a large tug to assist her up to this lock, when she can pass on safely to the upper lakes. The only extra expense required will be this large tug to take her from Iroquois up to the head of the canal. But there is one point to be remembered. I do not believe that vessels going westward will want fourteen feet of water for a great many years to come. It is all well enough going down; I believe that a vessel will want every inch of water she can get; but, going up, it is impossible for them to get return cargoes at present. At the present time, vessels carrying to Montreal from Fort William or Chicago generally go up light. The only vessels that go up through the canals loaded are the small vessels trading from Lake Ontario ports.

I regretted very much when I read in the papers last session that the amount was in the estimates for the improvement of Port Colborne harbour. I felt that the government had been doing everything they possibly could to help our St. Lawrence ports, but in entering upon this Port Colborne expenditure, they were spending money foolishly. And when I read of the Minister of Public Works advocating this North Bay route, it appeared to me that he was only frightening people in all parts of Canada from going into the construction of elevators and so on for the purpose of handling the grain from the North-west. I have not the slightest doubt that when Montreal is able to take care of the grain there will be no trouble whatever, in fact that the quantity of grain going through the St. Lawrence route will largely increase. I believe there will be no more trouble with this grain question when the facilities are there to handle the traffic.

Mr. B. M. BRITTON (Kingston). I would like to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Reid) one question. In disapproving of the deepening of the harbour at Port Colborne, has he considered the question of transshipping grain brought in Canadian vessels from Duluth to Buffalo? As I understand, he proposes that the grain shall be transhipped through elevators at Buffalo for the St. Lawrence route.

Mr. REID. What I mentioned was that at present you can take a cargo of grain from Port Arthur or Duluth to Buffalo. The elevator will take it in there and tranship it into another boat for half a cent a bushel.

Mr. BRITTON. But the difficulty is that that works a discrimination against Canadian bottoms. You cannot bring grain in a Canadian vessel from Duluth to Buffalo and have it transhipped at Buffalo to a Canadian vessel.

Mr. REID. I admit that, in case of grain coming from Duluth, it would have to be brought from a Canadian port. But I am speaking of our grain in Manitoba. You can take it from Fort William or Port Arthur. Also, you can take American grain which is sent to those ports. If you can quote a man a rate from Fort William through to Liverpool or Montreal cheaper than he can get from Duluth to New York, he will send his grain from Fort William or Port Arthur. He can tranship it there in bond just as well as he can ship it from the Duluth elevator.

Mr. GEO. E. CASEY (West Elgin). I am glad to hear from the hon. gentleman (Mr. Reid) who has just sat down a statement which is, on the whole, highly favourable to the exertions of the government in this matter, and approving the condition of the St. Lawrence route as improved by them. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) who brought up this matter for the consideration of the House has not approved of what the government has done. But, on the other hand, that hon. gentleman has not seen fit to give us any indication of what ought to be done. He has done a service to the House and the country in securing the discussion of this question, but his own contribution to the discussion is really nil. He has not been able to advise or recommend or suggest anything, and he has ignored all that has been actually done.

I am sure the government are very glad of the opportunity to have this transportation question discussed. There is no question the discussion of which will redound more to their credit than the question of what has been done for the transportation of grain from our inland territory since they have come into power. This is not a subject in regard to which they are on the defensive. It is a subject in regard to which they are in a position to boast. I, as their follower, feel inclined to boast a little just now and here as to what they have done. We have been told by the hon. member who started the discussion (Mr. Bennett) and by others, many of the reasons why our canals do not pay. I shall consider presently what the government have done to remedy the difficulty, and to do away with those reasons.

But I must begin by saying that they have evidently conceived a comprehensive scheme of through transportation all the way from the Rocky Mountains to tide-water. Let us begin with one of their earliest achievements, I refer to the building of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, and especially to the bargain with the Canadian Pacific Railway incident upon the building of that road. The Crow's Nest Pass Railway itself is an important avenue of transportation, both into and out of British Columbia, for farm produce going in and for coal and other minerals coming out. But, to the mass of the people, probably the most important feature of that bargain was the reduction in freight rates to and from the North-west, which was imposed upon the Canadian Pacific Railway as a condition of assisting them to build the Crow's Nest extension. Without going into details, we all know that very important reductions were thereby obtained in those freight rates, some to take effect immediately, and others after the completion of the Crow's Nest road, all being in effect at the present time. I leave it to those from the prairie districts to estimate more in detail the amount of money saved to the farmer up there on the transportation of his wheat by these arrangements, but it must amount to an immense sum, equal to a respectable profit to many of those who are concerned in the production of grain on a large scale. But this is not all, even in the way of railway construction. Although the Canadian Pacific Railway is a great national highway, it has been seen that it does not fully serve all the needs of the North-west and of Manitoba. There has been growing up bit by bit, under the fostering care of this government, what may be called an alternative route. The Rainy River Railway has been subsidized, reaching from the head of Lake Superior to the boundaries of Manitoba, that province looking after it the rest of the way. Portions of road are being subsidized opening up the Saskatchewan district, a district which will probably prove to be the greatest grain and cattle producing district yet unsettled in the North-west. Unfortunately, not by the fault of this government, not perhaps by the fault of the Canadian Pacific Railway officers themselves, but unfortunately, at all events, the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway does not run through the best farming district of the North-west. After you leave the boundaries of Manitoba it goes into a district affected by the droughts and dry winds coming from the great American desert to the south, and where the artificial application of water is necessary to produce crops. The Saskatchewan valley does not suffer from these disadvantages. The roads now building, subsidized by this parliament at the instance of the government, will open up a vast new country of the best quality of soil and of the best climate, to an uncounted number of new settlers. At the same time it will give an alternative route to the seaboard to some of those districts that are already settled and producing grain.

Then, Sir, we come to the other end of the scheme, the bringing of the Intercolonial Railway into Montreal. I think that no more important contribution to the transportation service of Canada was ever inaugurated up to that time than the bringing of the Intercolonial Railway into Montreal. It amounted to turning a non-paying property of this Dominion into a property which will probably in the future fully pay its expenses, as we do not expect and do not wish it to pay dividends. It gives us an alternative route to the sea independent of the Canadian Pacific Railway and other roads. Using that road, not as a dividend payer, but as an outlet for other roads, it is giving us a most complete and perfect check upon the expense of transportation from Montreal eastward. This whole matter has been discussed before, and I am only giving now my own concrete opinion of a past act when I say that this one achievement alone would be sufficient to justify the confidence that has been reposed in this government, and to justify them in asking the approbation of the people to their policy as concerns railways and transportation.

This extension brought into play another connection westward, namely, the Parry Sound road, a road whose merits have been fully stated already in this debate, a first-class road in every respect, capable of carrying a very large quantity of grain furnished at its other extremity, with a first-class harbour, requiring no dredging or any other artificial means to enable it to accommodate ships of the largest capacity on the lakes. Here has been established, as the direct consequence of the government policy, a second through grain route from the waters of the upper great lakes down as far as the Atlantic. These two alternative routes, then, one established from the prairies to the head waters of the great lakes, the other from the lower waters of the great lakes to the Atlantic, have been achievements of the government in respect to transportation up to within a very few weeks. They were sufficient in themselves, as I have already said, to form a subject for boasting and self congratulation on the part of the government and of their supporters. But we all know from experience that the government are not in the habit of boasting, they won't do it. We have tried to get them to boast on this occasion, but as they won't, their supporters have to do it for them, and I consider I am fulfilling a public duty in doing so in this case.

Then, Sir, we come to consider the improvements in the canal system. It is admitted that the canals have not paid. I do not mean merely that the revenues have not paid a dividend on the cost of the capital expended on them, but the canals have not served the purpose for which they were intended. That purpose was the development of a large trade between the upper lakes and Montreal, Quebec, and other seaport cities, and affording thereby cheap transportation to the farmers. They did not pay, for one reason, because they were not large enough. That has been remedied by deepening them to 14 feet throughout. This, of course, was begun under a previous regime. The present government is entitled, however, to the credit of hastening the work and bringing it, as my hon. friend who last spoke admits, to a practically successful conclusion at an unexpectedly early date.

But it is admitted on all hands that the mere deepening and enlargement of the canals will not enable them to do what our canal system was intended to do for the improvement of the country. A canal system must have terminal facilities at both ends, like a railroad, in order to be of any great use to the country. It is admitted that the Lake Erie terminus at Port Colborne has not terminal facilities, that it has no harbour, that it will take a considerable amount of money to make it a harbour. My hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) who started this discussion, exaggerated the probable amount of the cost by assuming that the government are going to undertake all the works which their engineers had suggested as possible in connection with such a harbour. We have now the statement of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) himself that he does not think it will cost more, speaking roughly, than $1,500,000 for the works which he intends to undertake and which he thinks will be necessary. It is clear that to compete with Buffalo at all, we must have a deep water port at Port Colborne so that large vessels will be able to unload into such vessels as can go through our canal system. My hon. friend (Mr. Reid), who spoke last, was very unfortunate, as was shown by my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Britton), in suggesting that the grain could come in American bottoms as far as Buffalo, and then be transferred to fourteen-foot craft in which to go through our canal system. It is not at all likely, that, once landed at Buffalo, it would be transferred to such craft and be brought around the end of the lake again and down through our canal system. It would likely be taken on through the United States. Even if this scheme was workable to any extent, we would lose the profit of carrying this grain all the way down from its western origin. The only solution of the problem of how to get traffic for these canals at its western terminus is the one suggested by the hon. Minister of Public Works, the one which he intends to pursue, the one which we have voted money for, and that is to make a deep water harbour of a reasonable size at Port Colborne.

Even with a clear depth of fourteen feet to Montreal, how do we find ourselves situated? We find ourselves in a position to move an immense traffic to Montreal, and to move it there cheaply, but we find ourselves absolutely unable to avail ourselves of the facilities of transshipping it into ocean-going vessels which are usually to be found at a great grain-exporting seaport. The practice at Montreal has been to bring grain down in barges of a small size; I will not say how many thousand bushels of grain they carry, but I think that something like 8,000 bushels would be a fair average. I am told by shippers that the practice has been to bring them down the canal, to take them out in the harbour basin and to leave them there, stowed away in some corner, until the vessel is ready, and then to bring them alongside and transfer their cargo to the ocean craft. There were no elevator facilities in the port, and it was impossible to profitably use large vessels to bring grain down the canals. The late Mr. Ogilvie told me himself, in Montreal, that no matter how deep, or wide, the canals were made, it would not pay to bring down his large craft from the upper lakes to Montreal, because of the lack of facilities for transshipping grain to ocean-going craft. They would have to wait too long to unload that grain and it would cost too much. The cheapest way was to tranship the grain into barges, bring these down the canal, let them lie around in charge of a caretaker and his family until it was possible to tranship the grain and put it into ocean-going vessels. That practice, it is admitted, went on for many years, and the government have been pressed to put up elevators; the railway companies have been pressed to put up elevators, they promised to do so, but they have hitherto not carried out this promise. During the last season, there comes along an enterprising man from Buffalo, and I am proud to say, that he owes some of his enterprise, probably, to the fact that he is an Irishman by race, and that his father was a good Canadian citizen. He made a proposition on behalf of an American syndicate, that they will put up four large elevators at Montreal at a cost of $1,000,000 each, that they will put on a fleet of steamers to bring grain to these elevators, that they will allow the public to use these elevators at certain rates agreed upon with the government, and embodied in their contract, that they will bind themselves to bring down so many million bushels a year—I think it is 30,000,000 bushels to start with—and that they will allow the public the use of these elevators at fixed and even rates with themselves. They do not ask any subsidy from the government for doing this. They say they can make money out of it and they want to enter into it as a money-making speculation. This scheme, to which I have already alluded, goes further. It perhaps may be rendered suspicious in the eyes of a great many Canadians simply because it is an immense undertaking that does not ask for a government subsidy. We are so accustomed to subsidizing everything of an enterprising character that we naturally look with some doubt on this scheme. However, the Conners Syndicate entered into negotiations with the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal, who control the land and make the regulations of that port. The syndicate satisfied them of their good faith and of their ability to carry out what they undertook, and satisfied them also that existing interests at Montreal would not be injured by what was proposed. I take that for granted, because the Board of Harbour Commissioners of Montreal is composed of men who have large interests there themselves and who know the views and interests of others who are large property owners in the harbour and in the city. The local jealousy of foreign competition seems to have been allayed by the satisfactory representations made by this syndicate. They made a successful bargain with the commissioners and that bargain has been confirmed by the government. The hon. Minister of Public Works yesterday, disclaimed both the responsibility, and in some degree, the credit of the bargain which has been made. But in view of the fact that the government have considerable influence with the board and that the whole bargain was subject to their ratification, I am sure that he and other ministers are entitled to a considerable share of the credit for obtaining this enormous development of our transportation trade without costing the country one cent. All that these people asked was the use of certain sites on the property of the Harbour Commission. That they have been granted. Two elevators, I understand, are to be built on the canal basin, and the other two farther down the harbour, so that both ends of the harbour of Montreal will be accommodated.

Now, what is the result of this whole scheme? In the first place, four or five million dollars, probably nearer $5,000,000, of United States money will be spent in Canada, spent in the building of the elevators, the material and labour for which are to be Canadian, and spent in the building of ships for this trade, which are to be built in Canada, as far as possible. I am aware that some contracts have already been let in Toronto; and no doubt others will be as much as possible. It may be that, at first, some foreign-built craft will be employed, but as the scheme is fully developed, Canadian-built craft, and Canadian-built elevators will be used. Canadian men will be employed in the carrying out of this great scheme. It is the most hopeful scheme that has yet been presented to develop our canal system, and to divert the trade from the American route, or at least, to secure the transport of our own Canadian grain through our own country. But, Sir, it will have far-reaching effects outside the scheme itself. The Canadian Pacific Railway, the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canada Atlantic Railway will not be able to stand idly by and see these immense elevators controlling the whole grain trade at Montreal. Each of these companies will have its own elevator or elevators, and their sluggish intention to do something of that kind has been quickened by the enterprise which has so suddenly sprung up. This scheme will not only secure the construction of the four immense elevators belonging to the new syndicate, but it will result in three or four more elevators being built by the different railway companies.

We have the deepest and widest canal system for its length of any on the American continent, and with good terminal facilities at the port of Montreal, and at Port Colborne, our trade is bound to increase. Then, the increased export trade at Montreal must result in increased import trade, and of course the preferential tariff will year by year increase the importations from England. When ships leave Canada, with grain they will naturally seek cargoes of some kind coming back, and so Canadian ocean freights will necessarily be reduced. We have been told that freight rates from Montreal are considerably higher than the rates from New York. That is due to the smaller amount of trade done at our port, and especially to the want of return cargoes. That condition of things will, I believe, disappear during the next few years. If our ocean rates should continue to be somewhat higher than from Montreal to New York, it is all the more necessary that our inland rates should be cheapened as much as possible. The policy of the government is in that direction. But, it is not the port of Montreal alone that will develop, for when our exports have so vastly increased, it is quite impossible to overlook the fact that the old original seaport of Canada, the grand old city of Quebec, will share in this prosperity. A great deal of this freight must be taken to Quebec for shipment on ocean steamers. Although the channel between Montreal and Quebec is an easy waterway for barges and craft of that sort; yet it is not the easiest navigation in the world for large ocean-going vessels. In all that I have said as to the prosperity of Montreal that will arise from the government's policy, and the policy they have encouraged on the part of this new syndicate, I wish to be understood as saying that Quebec will share largely, and I trust more and more in proportion as time goes on.

I should like to consider the Georgian Bay Canal scheme as a feature of this transportation question, and all the more so as the Minister of Public Works has already made suggestions as to the opening up of the French River from Lake Nipissing to its mouth, but discussion on that subject will probably be more appropriate later on. I have stated in previous sessions that I view the Georgian Bay Canal project favourably, as one of the many means of bringing the grain production of the west to the head of ocean navigation. Sir, I believe that not all these schemes together will be sufficient to carry the enormous volume of grain trade which in a few years will be offered from the west to the east. That trade is increasing rapidly now, and we can hardly realize how much more rapidly it will increase in the future, when our own North-west begins to boom as did the American North-west. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) has given us figures to show the enormous influx of immigration during the past year or two, and each one of these settlers means a new farm occupied and an increased production of grain. I do not believe that existing railways have any reason to fear that they will be seriously injured by anything that can be done to increase the volume of transportation via our waterways from the west to the east. There will be enough trade for all, and the railways themselves must benefit from these increased facilities which it is the policy of the government to afford.

Mr. E. B. OSLER (West Toronto). Mr. Speaker, the transportation question is an all-important one, and one which concerns the people of Canada perhaps more than any other question at present before them. But, Sir, there is a foundation that must be well laid before the government or the people proceed to expend money, and that is the foundation of knowledge, and the foundation of truth in the statements and the facts and figures which are given. I was very much surprised at some of the figures quoted by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) last night. If the figures upon which he bases his schemes for the expenditure of money are as incorrect as some of the figures he gave us last night, then it is a very bad lookout for this country with regard to the proper expenditure of public money. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) gave the cost of carrying grain from Buffalo to New York as somewhere about six cents a bushel. Now, as a matter of fact, the cost of the carriage of grain from Buffalo to the ship's side in New York, at the present time when there is no competition by water, is 2½ cents. If the figures upon which the minister (Mr. Tarte) bases his calculations for his other schemes which he submits to this House, have no better foundation than these figures I have quoted, then it behooves this House to look very closely into any scheme which he proposes. There is no proposition that can be put before this House for the proper expenditure of public money, that I believe will meet with such cordial approval from hon. gentlemen as the proposition to expend money to increase our transportation trade from our great west to the seaboard and to the market. If one looks back, to the advancement that has been made in railway construction during the past few years, one is forced to the conclusion that the future carrying trade of this country from the eastern part of the Georgian Bay to the point of ocean shipment must be by railways. With their heavy steel rails of from 90 to 100 pounds, their improved gradients, their enlarged cars and freight trains, capable of carrying four or five times as much as they could a few years ago, they can carry grain at rates which would afford practically no profit to vessels making a long and tortuous way down the canals. The amount of grain carried to New York for shipment is about 136,000,000 bushels. Of this amount the canals carried three years ago 4.9 per cent; one year ago they carried 4.8 per cent, and last year they carried slightly less. So that the transportation of grain to New York was almost entirely by rail, and the grain carried to southern ports other than New York was also carried by rail. The City of New York has of late been grumbling that the New York Central Railway has been discriminating against the city, and that the city consequently has not been getting its fair share of the grain business. As a matter of fact, the City of New York has been getting all the grain business it is entitled to, and the railways are carrying grain to that port at lower rates than it could be carried by water. If we can improve our waterways, if we can cheapen our carriage in any shape or way, let us do it; but let us first be quite sure what we are doing. With regard to the proposed expenditure at Port Colborne, I do not believe the Minister of Public Works or this House has anything like a proper estimate of the cost of that work. The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) stated very correctly that the lake bottom is all rock. It is a shallow lake, with a rock bottom a long way up. I do not believe it is possible—I am so informed by captains who know the lake—to build breakwaters far enough out in that lake to afford adequate protection to large vessels in stormy weather for even the $5,000,000 which is suggested as the outside cost. Time is an important element in transportation, and no vessel carrying 200,000 or 300,000 bushels of wheat will go where there is risk of being delayed by storms for two or three days or of being wrecked on the shore. This government, before they commit this House to an expenditure of even $1,500,000, as now proposed by official authority, should make sure that they can get anything like a safe harbour for such boats. Our railways in Canada are year by year carrying a larger quantity of grain. As their roadbeds are improved, their gradients lessened, their tracks doubled and laid with steel rails, they are becoming able to carry more grain at a much lower cost. Let us by all manner of means improve our transportation facilities; let us spend what money is necessary for that; but I confidently assert that at this moment this House has not sufficient information to warrant the expenditure of any such sum of money as is proposed at Port Colborne. It would be a disaster if, after work were commenced and a large sum of money spent, it had to be stopped. It would retard the improvement of transportation in this country for many years. I agree most thoroughly with the resolution moved by the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) that the government should adopt a plan and should not begin a large expenditure without making sure that they are moving in the right direction. The general manager of the New York Central Railway, Mr. Callaway—and no abler man, I think, is to be found in the railway world to-day—in discussing the cost of the canal system proposed in the State of New York, the deepening of the Erie Canal, says that on the cost of $60,000,000, which is proposed, and which is probably very much within the mark, the interest and the cost of maintenance, amounting to say $500,000 a year, would reach $3,000,000 a year, or equal to three cents a bushel on every bushel of grain carried to the city of New York. That same grain is carried to New York by railway and delivered on the vessels at two and three-quarter cents a bushel, or one-quarter cent a bushel less than the interest on the proposed cost of enlarging the present Erie Canal. Mr. Callaway winds up his statement, which I think is applicable to the question under discussion, by saying:

I do not oppose the canal; I do not want to enter into a controversy with the commissioners; but I should like to have statistics of the trade and the plain facts as to the cost of these great improvements set out before the charge is made that railways are discriminating against New York, and that it will cheapen transport to build this proposed canal system.

I think that is a warning to us to refrain from any large expenditure without knowing exactly what it means, or without knowing that it is going to accomplish the object in view.

Mr. JAMES McMULLEN (North Wellington). I desire to say a few words on a point bearing on this question that has not been touched upon so far. I am sure we all feel proud of our great waterway; we have a right to do so; because it has cost the country a great amount of money; and it is our duty to take every step necessary to preserve that magnificent waterway from the lakes down to the sea. Hon. gentlemen who have been in this House for some years are aware that the subject of the Chicago drainage canal has been brought before this House by myself once or twice on previous occasions, and I wish to touch upon the same subject now. I contend that the construction of that canal is going to be an exceedingly serious matter for the harbours on Lake Huron and the Georgian Bay. Any hon. gentleman who has read the history of that canal, and studied the question of the amount of water that will pass through it, must come to the conclusion that it is going to have a very serious effect on the height of the water in Lake Huron and the Georgian Bay. That canal is now in a finished condition, that is, so far as it is intended to be carried at present. It is only 125 feet wide at present; but the rock excavation is such that it can be made 250 feet wide. It takes a volume of water of 10,000 cubic feet per second, 600,000 per minute, and will run at an average of a little over two miles an hour. The speed of the water through the canal depends to a great extent, on which way the wind is blowing; but any one who will consider what an enormous drain must take place on the waters of Lake Michigan and the very serious decrease that will result to the flow through the Straits of Mackinaw into Lake Huron, can come to no other conclusion than that the depth of water in our harbours on Lake Huron and the Georgian Bay will be very seriously affected.

The Georgian Bay route for grain is developing very rapidly, and is destined, owing to its being a short and direct route, to become the leading avenue for the carriage of grain from the North-west to the seaboard. But if that drainage canal is going to have the effect on the Georgian Bay harbours which I believe it will, it is going to very considerably reduce the depth of water in these harbours. For instance in the Owen Sound harbour, the depth is three feet less than it was twenty years ago, and has not come up in recent years to anything like what it was years ago. We have reason to believe that the cause of that reduction is, in a great measure, the dredging that was done in the St. Clair flats and river, the result of which has been to facilitate the exit of water from Lake Huron into the Detroit River and on into Lake Erie, and consequently lower the water in the harbours in Lake Huron and the Georgian Bay. But if we are to be subjected to the additional drain of the Chicago drainage canal, I contend that that is a matter which requires serious consideration, and which should have had our serious attention before now. The American government should have been appealed to and warned that in the event of this drainage canal affecting harbours in Canada, Canada would undoubtedly claim indemnity and be entitled to indemnity. I admit that the United States have no control over the construction of that canal, simply because it will be built under a charter of the State of Illinois, and therefore will not come under federal control until it is a navigable stream. The United States are unquestionably none the less responsible for any injury it may inflict on Canada. I do think that this is a question which should have been considered long ago in the interests of our farmers and which will eventually prove a very serious question.

Again, we find that the State of New York is moving in the direction of improving its waterway from Buffalo to New York. My hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Osler), who has just addressed the House, has told us that the rates on grain from Buffalo to New York are something like two and a quarter cents per bushel. But my hon. friend knows perfectly well that the rates fluctuate in proportion to the demand. When the markets of Europe are sluggish and the railways are seeking freight, they lower the rates. But when the market jumps suddenly, the freights immediately jump up in sympathy. In that way these railway companies have, to some extent, militated against the trade of New York, and New York has been laying a very large portion of the blame at the door of the New York Central. The New York people blame that company for taking advantage of the market and insisting on a share of the rise in the market by charging increased freights, and only lowering freights when the market falls.

There is another point which we should not lose sight of. The State of New York intends expending $60,000,000 for the purpose of building a deep canal between Buffalo and New York. What effect will that have on the St. Lawrence route? It is going to take a very large body of water out of what now flows over Niagara Falls and helps to swell the St. Lawrence River. We know that the river at present has not too much water to accommodate boats drawing 14 feet. We know that if you diminish the volume of the St. Lawrence you are going to injure the value of that river and the utilization of our canal system built at enormous cost. The State of New York appointed a commission which has decided unanimously in favour of the construction of that canal, the construction of which cannot fail to injure the water flow through the St. Lawrence. All those questions, when we consider the enormous expenditure which this country has gone to in order to furnish us with our present magnificent canal system, deserve the attention of the government, and I do hope that they will receive the most careful attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals, who, I am sorry, is not present, and that whatever move is necessary to be taken will be taken by the government to bring the United States to understand that we, as a people and as a nation will demand of them damages, if any are sustained by our harbours and our lakes owing to the enormous drain to which our waterways will be subjected by these various schemes I have enumerated. Canada will certainly be entitled to some consideration, and we will demand and insist on fair-play.

Mr. FOSTER. How are you going to enforce the claim ?

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not know. We have had claims before and asserted them, and had them settled. This is a very serious international question, and we are entitled to some consideration. Another reason why New York is suffering from a depressed condition is this, and why she has become greatly agitated over her loss of trade. That depression is not altogether owing to the course pursued by her own railway system, but largely owing to the diversion of the trade of the western states southward. Mexico to-day is doing an export trade for the south-western states that she never did before. Three lines of railway have been constructed from the Missouri valley, and are carrying two-thirds of the produce of the south-western states down to the Gulf of Mexico, thus avoiding the long line of land travel to New York, Boston and Baltimore. The result is that the rates of grain from the south-western states, of which Kansas City is the centre, to Liverpool, are one-third less than before those roads were built, and the eastern lines have lost the trade to a very considerable extent. This has seriously affected New York, which was the focusing point for this trade.

And you can depend upon this—that New York city is going to fight very determinedly for a portion of the Canadian trade. She has lost her south-western trade and is not going to get it back, for the simple reason that these lines are held by western owners and are operated by them in the interest of the western section, and they are to-day offered more traffic than they can handle. I have it on good authority that there was last year five steamer-loads of freight lying on the wharfs in the Gulf of Mexico, freight that was going to points north and north-west in the United States that had been delivered direct there in place of going by the port of New York. I do not much wonder that New York is getting excited and is talking of the construction of a new canal to control the trade. I am afraid she has reached the zenith of her greatness as an exporting city, and is bound to suffer seriously by the developments that have taken place for the upbuilding of her rivals.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 6.00 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, February 16, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

THE COMPANIES CLAUSES ACT.

Mr. GILMOUR moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 32) in further amendment of the Companies Clauses Act. He said : Mr. Speaker, this amendment deals only with mercantile and manufacturing companies incorporated by special Act and subject to the Companies Clauses Act. It does not interfere with mercantile and manufacturing companies incorporated by Dominion Letters Patent. The object of the amendment is to give such companies the liberty to change the locality of their head offices without coming here and getting a special Act for that purpose. The law, as it stands, at present, makes it necessary for them to come here and get a special Act. This is considered to be very inconvenient and expensive.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for leave to amend the Act respecting the Senate and House of Commons. He said : Mr. Speaker, I may say that the Bill is so satisfactory that it will commend itself to the House of Commons. It has simply one clause, to remove the disability of an officer of the militia serving as a member of parliament. Under the Act to-day he is disqualified, although he is qualified for everything else. and I propose, with the consent of the House and of the government, to place militia officers in the same position as officers of the army of England, namely, by adding three or four words to the Act which will allow them to be members of parliament while they are serving as militia officers in any capacity.

Mr. SPEAKER. The rules of the House forbid the introduction of a Bill in blank form.

Motion withdrawn.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—THE CANADIAN CONTINGENTS.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding : That the House resolve into Committee of the Whole to consider certain proposed resolutions to provide for the payment of the expenditure incurred, or to be incurred, in sending contingents of Canadian volunteers to South Africa.

Mr. N. F. DAVIN (West Assiniboia). Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in this debate because I thought that the resolution probably called for very little discussion after we had allowed the address to go through pretty well undiscussed, at least, not discussed at any length, but, the spectacle that was presented here on Tuesday evening was one that it was impossible not to take notice of—either from the point of view of the surface issue, still more from the point of view of anybody interested in responsible government. What we witnessed was this, one hon. gentleman of great prominence in this House, who has had a leading position in this House for many years, but who is not a member of the government, acted as a sort of proxy for a certain portion of the ministry and chastised one of its members. Those who were here on that occasion and observed the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) expected to hear from that hon. gentleman. The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) was in that way that indicates that an hon. gentleman is going to speak, and the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Monet) also had that uneasy air that characterizes an hon. gentleman about to be oratorically delivered. But, while this scene was going on, the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) went down and spoke a whisper to the Treasury bench, and we found, when the time came, that instead of hearing from the hon. Minister of Public Works, or from the hon. member for Labelle, to hear whom was the natural curiosity of the House, or from the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Monet) to hear whom also was a natural anxiety on the part of the House, up rose the hon. member for North Norfolk, and I must say that I listened to that admirable, patriotic speech of his with great interest and almost entire assent—almost entire assent; I repeat with great interest, because the hon. member presented the spectacle, a heretic of long standing reading his recantation. After the manner of converts he passed enthusiastically over from the side with which he used to be identified, to the side to which he had come—let us believe, and I certainly am ready to believe—with the best motives grounded on conviction. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) not only appeared as an enthusiastic Britisher and Imperialist, and as a man interested in sustaining the empire and ready to go to the assistance of that empire, almost as enthusiastically as the Prime Minister of Ontario; but strange to say the hon. gentleman, who is on record as having made at least fifteen or twenty, aye, probably fifty speeches from this side of the House in favour of the proposition that not in England but the United States would Canada find her best market, came forward, and in strong and eloquent terms, and giving statistics, declared that Great Britain was the best market for Canada. But, Sir, while that was satisfactory, the most interesting feature was the Minister of Marine (Sir Louis Davies), the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) and the Prime Minister sitting with satisfaction, contemplating with faces beaming with delight, the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) while he struck hard at the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), struck the blows they themselves had not the courage to inflict. The Minister of Marine (Sir Louis Davies), who is a lawyer, will not object to my applying the legal maxim to that situation; that what one does by another he himself does; and these gentlemen who put up the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) to strike at the minister (Mr. Tarte) must themselves be held to have struck at him. I never in my life saw the Postmaster General so gratified with anything as he was when sentence after sentence, falling from the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), echoed on the back of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte). Subsequently the member for Laprairie (Mr. Monet) made a speech, and taking the standpoint of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Monet) as defined by himself, I will not characterize that speech as disloyal from him; but regarding it as a speech from the standpoint of a minister of the Crown it was one of the most disloyal utterances that could be listened to. And yet, Sir, we saw the Minister of Public Works, cheering that speech, and when he cheered the Prime Minister turned round to him and warned him not to cheer. My hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) made his profession of faith in regard to the constitutional question involved in the matter before the House. And what did he declare? He declared, pointing down to the First Minister's seat: There sits the Gamaliel at whose feet I learned these principles. The hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Monet) in the same way, pointed to the Prime Minister and said: It may not be pleasant for you to hear these principles, but I learned them from the gentleman who leads this party, and who leads the government of this country. When I heard these startling statements I went back and recalled how the member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), differing with the last position taken by the Prime Minister, but standing on the base of the first position taken by the Prime Minister, resigned his seat. In other words, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bourassa) backed the Prime Minister of the 3rd of October against the Prime Minister of the 15th of that month. He resigned, and said: I will see whether the country is with me, and after having formally stated to his constituents that what he desired was a vote of want of confidence in the government, his constituents sent him back not merely by a majority but by acclamation. His constituents in fact voted want of con-confidence in the government. Well, Sir, who introduced the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bourassa) to this House? On one side of the embodied want of confidence in the government of the county of Labelle was the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) and on the other side the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Monet), who made that speech which so astonished us the other night and to which I have referred. There is therefore a deeper question in the situation than the question which appears on the surface, and that question is: Have we at the present time responsible government in operation in this country? I shall read to the House three or four lines by a great hand, stating what is the position of the Cabinet of Great Britain ever since 1693. Says this great writer:

Mr. DAVIN.

The Cabinet Council, properly so-called, dates from the reign of William III. and from the year 1693, for it was not until some years after the revolution that the king discovered and adopted the two fundamental principles of a constitutional executive government, namely, that a ministry should consist of statesmen holding the same political principles and identified with each other. And if differences of opinion arise, their existence is unknown as long as the cabinet lasts—when publicly manifested, the cabinet is at an end.

And, Sir, are not these differences and dissonances publicly manifested in the case of the present cabinet? Why, you have had the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) declaring in the strongest terms that the second position taken by the Prime Minister was a wrong one, that he would not tolerate it, and you have the same position taken by the member for Laprairie who says to the Prime Minister: There is my mentor and teacher, and you have leading members of the cabinet putting up the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) to chastise the Minister of Public Works for criticising them. Have you a united cabinet here? Have you a cabinet whose disunion has been kept in the dark? Sir, you have not. I do not refer to the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) for he is not in the cabinet.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He is in the government.

Mr. DAVIN. He is in the government, and he came in for the lash of the Minister of Public Works, and it emphasizes the open disunity that exists in that government which I say has ceased to be responsible.

Mr. McNEILL. Who is the author you quoted from?

Mr. DAVIN. The Encyclopedia Britannica.

Mr. FOSTER. That is an Imperial authority for you.

Mr. DAVIN. The member for Laprairie (Mr. Monet) says in the course of his speech:

I cannot understand what kind of statesmanship that is which says: My only justification is that the public demanded it.

And the hon. gentleman (Mr. Monet) in saying that, shows that he has a profound and just grasp of the principles of responsible government. We do not choose—because that is practically what the government is—a committee of this House to carry on affairs merely to take up any opinion or doctrine that comes along if only they are left to enjoy their salaries. That is not the doctrine of responsible government. If you adopted a doctrine like that, you would have one ministry of brigands follow another ministry of brigands. You would have a ministry that would not have the respect or confidence of the country, and that reckless as to political principles would probably be abandoned as regards the ordinary principles of honours and morals. The idea of responsible government is that men holding certain opinions and determined to carry them out are placed in the government to carry out those opinions as long as the people and parliament support them; and when neither the people nor parliament will support them any longer, they say: 'Very well, get another set of men; we cannot serve you any longer.' But, Sir, that is not the position of the present government on this question; even as it is notorious, it has not been their position on other questions since they came into power. Their position is this: they are advocating views and carrying out principles which a short time ago they denounced.

Now, I have here the famous interview of the Prime Minister. It will bear having attention called to it again, because the more it is read, the more light will be thrown on the extraordinary situation with which we are face to face to-day. On the 3rd of October, the Prime Minister gave an interview to the correspondent of the Globe, in which he said:

'There exists a great deal of misconception in the country regarding the powers of the government in the present case,' said Sir Wilfrid. 'As I understand the Militia Act, and I may say that I have given it some study of late, our volunteers are enrolled to be used in the defence of the Dominion. They are Canadian troops, to be used to fight for Canada's defence.' In order to bring out the meaning of this you have to emphasize the word 'Canada's'—'they are Canadian troops, to be used to fight for Canada's defence.' He regards the empire as something apart from Canada, certainly when it comes to fighting any battles.

Perhaps the most widespread misapprehension is that they cannot be sent out of Canada. To my mind, it is clear that cases might arise when they might be sent to a foreign land to fight. To postulate a case: Suppose that Spain should declare war upon Great Britain. Spain has, or had, a navy, and that navy might be being got ready to assail Canada as part of the empire. Sometimes the best method of defending oneself is to attack, and in that case Canadian soldiers might certainly be sent to Spain, and it is quite certain that they legally might be so despatched to the Iberian peninsula. The case of the South African Republic is not analogous. There is no menace to Canada, and, although we may be willing to contribute troops, I do not see how we can do so.

There you have the doctrine stated by the Prime Minister which has offended Canada, the doctrine that has led to all this indignation against the government, the doctrine which shows the right hon. gentleman to be unfit for his position; because he lays it down that a loyal British colony has nothing to do with fighting the battles of the empire unless on its own soil or for its own immediate benefit. That is not the position of a loyal son of the empire in any part of that vast empire. The position of a loyal son of the empire is that the empire is one, that its solidarity is complete, and that if the empire is menaced in any part, it is menaced in every other part, because it is an organic whole. Sir, that empire's prestige or power could not be impaired in any part without the status of every Canadian being injured by that impairment. Again, the right hon. gentleman says:

Then, again, how could we do so without parliament's granting us the money? We simply could not do anything. In other words, we should have to summon parliament.

Well, a fortnight passed when he found that he could do it without having the authority or sanction of parliament, and that there was no necessity for any change of law. This is the first time, Mr. Speaker, I suppose, since the Prime Minister has been the leader of a great party that he was ever known to give a positive opinion on any question, and a little over a week after that positive opinion was given, he himself treated it as it deserved.

The government of Canada is restricted in its powers. It is responsible to parliament, and it can do very little without the permission of parliament. There is no doubt as to the attitude of the government on all questions that mean menace to British interests, but in this present case our limitations are very clearly defined. And so it is that we have not offered a Canadian contingent to the home authorities. The Militia Department duly transmitted individual offers to the Imperial government, and the reply from the War Office, as published in Saturday's 'Globe,' shows their attitude on the question. As to Canada's furnishing a contingent, the government has not discussed the question, for the reasons which I have stated—reasons which, I think, must easily be understood by every one who understands the constitutional law on the question.

It will be observed that he states there that only individual offers at that time had been sent to the Imperial authorities, although he has told us—and the evidence is in a pamphlet that has been laid on the Table—that from the beginning of July our sister colonies had been offering their help. But there is more than that, Mr. Speaker. It is incredible; not only had they made no offer, but he says, 'the government have not discussed the question.' Now, that raises some nice inquiries. Up to October 3rd, the government had never discussed this question; it had never been brought up even by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies); it had never been brought up by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright); nobody mentioned it in Council. Our Napoleon, the member for the west, by his silence, showed that there is nothing in the theory of Walter Shandy as to the influence on character of names, because his cognomen proved to be utterly nugatory on that occasion.

Mr. BENNETT. They took all the war out of him in Manitoba.

Mr. DAVIN. I think they did.

The statement in the 'Military Gazette,' published this morning, is a pure invention, far from possessing any foundation in fact; it is wholly imaginative.

It is quite clear from that interview that the Prime Minister at that time shared the opinion of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) and the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Monet) that nothing should be done without calling parliament; and these hon. gentlemen point to him as having taught them that principle. The hon. member for Laprairie again and again asserts that he had learnt the principles he enunciated from the leader of the government; and the hon. member for Labelle said the same. These gentlemen, before they content themselves with the answer that has been given with regard to the first contingent, may very well ask, as I think they do ask, why was it that parliament was not called in regard to the second contingent? The reason given by the Prime Minister for not calling parliament was futile, that it would not have been expedient to call parliament together because there was very little money to be expended on the contingent, and that consequently the government might break the law, and, in fact, the right hon. gentleman in his speech in this House, asserted that he had gone outside the law and the constitution. With regard to the second contingent, there is a most extraordinary statement made by the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Monet) which emphasizes the extraordinary distrust that has entered into the ranks of hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. gentleman does nothing less than accuse his right hon. leader of treachery.

An hon. MEMBER. What?

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, of treachery. Let me read to you his words, and let me repeat that I would not have spoken in this debate if I had not been impressed by the seriousness of the situation, as disclosed by the speeches of these hon. gentlemen. When addressing the House the other evening on this question, the hon. member for Laprairie said :

. There has been a little cooling off in public opinion, everybody must admit. 'Le Temps,' referring to the meeting held at Quebec to secure some funds for the relief of the families of the second contingent, said: 'The preparations for enlisting the volunteers in this city for the second contingent are moving very slowly. Up to to-day there are not ten citizens who have given in their names.'

This was in the city of Quebec, of which I believe the right hon. gentleman is one of the members, and this paragraph is headed 'Very little enthusiasm.' Let me still further quote the hon. member for Laprairie, and call the attention of the First Minister to this remark, which probably he has not noticed :

There is, perhaps, one way to explain the change of view of the members and the newspapers on this question. I remember the story of Cuvier, one of the most eminent naturalists of France, who was asked one day, while among a group of very learned naturalists: Do you believe in spontaneous generation? It was in the time of the regime of Napoleon I. Cuvier merely answered: The Emperor does not want it. So I think the only way to explain this change of view is that the leader of the government does not want it.

Why, Mr. Speaker, here we have a follower of the right hon. gentleman, who declares himself one with him on every subject except the sending of these contingents, stating that the right hon. gentleman, while appearing to the public as advocating—not advocating indeed, for he has never gone as far as that—but arranging for a second contingent, had been secretly whispering to his friends and henchmen in Quebec to cool down their enthusiasm, so that no one should go from that city on the second contingent. What an opinion of the character of the right hon. leader of the House does that show to be held by one of his trusted followers! Take the speech of the right hon. gentleman made in this House, which I will not analyse because I might be held to be going back to a previous debate, though no doubt the debate was on the same subject—take that speech, take that interview, take what he said some days afterwards, take what he said about having to go himself to Chicago while Lord Minto went to New York and then take the bold assertion made by the Prime Minister, and while it is a harsh thing to say, I cannot help saying it, nobody can believe him when he said that the moment war had been declared, he took action. Why, the whole of Canada was looking on at what was taking place during those two days in the council chamber. Every one was taking note of the conduct of the Minister of Public Works, the dark figure in this—shall I call it a tragedy? Yes, a moral political tragedy—while that minister was fighting to prevent any contingent being sent with which the government would have anything to do. We know what happened in those two days? We know that when the Prime Minister was interviewed on the 13th of October by one of the reporters as to what his government was going to do, he said: I cannot tell you anything, but I am going down to Government House to see the Governor General. The Minister of Public Works, however, at last gave in, but he insisted on a rider being added to the Order in Council, namely, that this should not be drawn into a precedent. I do not think that the rider amounts to anything. It is of no importance in operative power, but what is of importance is the animus behind it.

We have heard some talk about loyalty and disloyalty. Let me say what I consider loyalty is. There have been in the past and there are to-day and will be in the future, protestations of loyalty, but I do not suppose that there exists anywhere in the world to-day such loyalty as used to animate the bosom of the royalists in the time of Charles I., when loyalty was almost a religion, nor is it desirable there should be. There is, however, in the breast of every citizen of a free state the feeling that he owes a sacred duty to that state, a duty as strong and sacred as the duty of providing for his family, and that duty is to guard the state against the enemy, to fight for it and, if necessary, to die for it. I think I will be able to convince even my hon. friend from Laprairie that there is no reason why any man of any nationality, born in Canada, or who having settled here, has taken the oath of allegiance and has identified himself with us, should not feel loyal to the empire which throws its protecting mantle over him wherever he goes. One hour after he has taken the oath of allegiance and become a British subject, let him go where he may, the ægis of the greatest empire of the world is over him to guard him against injury and wrong. And in travelling over the world—and I have travelled over a good part of it—I know very well what advantages it is to a man to have behind him a power which makes its influence respected. It makes a great difference whether a man hails from a paltry state or one that puts him into the position of being able to boast: 'I am a Britisher,' as proudly as did the ancient Roman declare: 'I am a Roman citizen,' and which enables him, go where he may, to rely on the protection of the great empire simply on his uttering the magic words: I am a British citizen. I cannot see any ground of self-respect, be a man's nationality what it may, which can make him hesitate in loyalty to such an empire. My hon. friend from Laprairie (Mr. Monet) spoke, however, as if he could not very well feel that sentiment, and he asked this question: Do we owe this to England by law or by love? Well, Mr. Speaker, we do not owe it by law in a way. But I suppose he used the word 'love' in the sense in which we would use the word 'loyalty.' I have no hesitation in saying we owe it by loyalty. Does the German citizen who comes and throws in his lot with us, does the Russian who comes here and becomes a Canadian and who has, therefore, all the privileges of the British Empire, who may rise to any height of office, or place or power or to any title the empire has to bestow excepting only the Crown—does that citizen owe the empire such love, to use the language of my hon. friend or, to use my own language does he not owe such loyalty as would lead him to go to the Transvaal or to send his son or brother or friend? Why, Sir, of course he does. And, if I may say so, he actually owes more than a man born in the empire. Take a man whose family has belonged to the empire since remote times, who is one of a line who, as far as he is able to trace back his family, have been working for the empire in various civil walks, and whenever there has been a war have had one or other member of the family fighting its battles and sometimes falling on the field—that man will be ready to fight for the empire, and we would despise him if he were not. But here is a new citizen who, when he comes in finds every place of honour that the empire has to bestow open to him. The empire says to him: All our noble walks of liberty are open to you; every rung of the ladder of promotion is free to you; there is no position you cannot climb to; there is no disability upon you. Why, Sir, surely logically he owes more to the empire, which has done so much for him than a man whose family has already laid the empire under obligation.

And I may say, in passing, that, for my part, I never have been able to understand how some of my own countrymen can feel that it would not be consistent with self-respect for them to work for and be proud of this empire. I think it is perfectly absurd. The empire, properly speaking, is only about 200 years old. If you take those great passages in Shakspeare where his patriotism causes him to speak of the glory of England and to declare that if England is but true to herself:

Come the four corners of the world in arms,
And we shall shock them;

In these passages Shakspeare is thinking of England. He was, in a sense, a little Englishman. He could not anticipate this mighty empire that has grown up. And who built up this empire? Englishmen, certainly; but not they alone, side by side with them, Scotchmen and Irishmen. There is not a room in that great temple of liberty into which every Scotchman and Irishman has not as good right to go as an Englishman. In art, in war, in statesmanship, in commerce, in literature, in exploration, in every field of endeavour, the three races, for these two hundred years, have been working for that empire. They have done the building, Scotchman and Irishman side by side with their English fellows. And, Sir, in that great structure of empire, there is not a stone on which there is not the mark of Irish and Scotch as well as of English chisels. I wonder at the perfect folly of those countrymen of mine trying to exclude themselves from the franchises of this vast empire, which they have done their part in upraising, and some of them thinking that they would do those who are living in Ireland a service if they were to banish them and themselves from all the magnificent opportunities this empire offers. Why, when I entered the Middle Temple, half the judges on the English bench were Irishmen. Go to Westminster to-day and you will find that half the judges are Irishmen. When I entered the Temple, there was Chief Baron Kelly, an Irishman, Baron Martin, Mr. Justice Keating, my friend the late Mr. Justice Willes, and, as I tell you, about half the judges. I never heard an Englishman say: Is it not a dreadful thing to have these Irish fellows coming over and taking our judicial positions? Lord Cairns, one of the greatest chancellors, was an Irishman, and Lord Killowen, the present chief justice. Fancy men to whom all the avenues of this great empire are open saying: Let us cut the painter with the whole empire, coop ourselves up in a little island—an island about the size of my own constituency—and confine ourselves to the small careers which are all that a small country can offer.

My hon. friend from South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) asks me: How about the two Bobs? I do not like to dwell upon that because my object is not to glorify Irishmen, but to express the proposition, that it is perfectly absurd for any Irishman, as it would be for a Scotchman or a Welshman, to say: Self-respect compels me to exclude myself from the empire. And I want to say—and I hope that my words will go wherever there is an Irish ear to hear—that hatred of England on the part of Irishmen is unhistorical. And I will tell you why. Who were the men who oppressed Irishmen? Ireland has been oppressed, but by whom? You will find that the oppressors of Ireland were the very same men who oppressed Englishmen. Englishmen gave us the British constitution as it is to-day, fighting against the men who sought to oppress England. And, as Disraeli once said when he was pointing to the folly of those melancholy walls around the mouldering ruins of the past: Why should men dwell on the fate of having been conquered; all races have been conquered at one time or other; my race has been conquered; England has been conquired, more than once. The hatred of England on the part of some Irishmen is unhistorical. And as for cutting themselves off from the empire, they could not if they would, because you could not fire a cannon in London or Liverpool or Manchester without killing as many Irishmen as you would Englishmen.

This in passing. I know that some gentlemen because they speak French and are of French origin, think that somehow or other this loyalty to the empire is more forced on their part than it would be on the part of an English-speaking man. I cannot take that view at all. As has been again and again said, I accept most loyally and frankly the proposition that the French Canadians are loyal to the empire. And I do it for this reason—how foolish it would be of them not to be. If Quebec had remained a French colony, would French Canadians be in as good a position as they are to-day? Would the habitant be the free man he is to-day? Would he be educating his sons for the bar and for political life and living to see them climb to high positions? For those of them who have certain special views, let me ask: If they were within the bounds of the United States, would they be in as satisfactory a condition from their point of view as they are to-day? No, Sir. Every French Canadian will admit that they would not. Why, then, even from the point of view of common gratitude, should not the French Canadian be loyal to the empire? just as loyal as any other man? We know that we have had in this House French Canadians of the highest genius who have been as loyal to the empire as any of those I will not say of another race, but speaking another language, because a little historical analysis would show that there is less diversity of race than is supposed.

Now, Sir, the hon. member asks: Do we owe this to England from love? He stated that if it could be shown that England possessed the right of suzerainty over the Transvaal, all his difficulties would disappear, that he would at once agree to the view that contingent after contingent should be sent to fight England's battles in South Africa. I regret that the hon. gentleman is not here, he came to tell me last night that he would not be able to be here to-day. If he were here I think I could show him that England's suzerainty over the Transvaal is intact, or was intact, up to the time that Mr. Kruger issued his ultimatum. But after all the hon. gentleman is not in a position to question that, and I will tell you why. All these important questions connected with the suzerainty were settled last year by his leader, as you will find if you turn to the 3rd volume of Hansard, where we read of when the Prime Minister was proposing a resolution of sympathy with the Uitlanders in the Transvaal, which I will read:

1. Resolved, That this House has viewed with regret the complications which have arisen in the Transvaal Republic, of which Her Majesty is suzerain, from the refusal to accord to Her Majesty's subjects now settled in that region any adequate participation in its government;

2. Resolved, That this House has learned with still greater regret that the condition of things there existing has resulted in intolerable oppression, and has produced great and dangerous excitement among several classes of Her Majesty's subjects in her South African possessions;

3. Resolved, That this House, representing a people which has largely succeeded, by the adoption of the principle of conceding equal political rights to every portion of her population, in harmonizing estrangements and in producing general content with the existing system of government, desires to express its sympathy with the efforts of Her Majesty's Imperial authorities to obtain for the subjects of Her Majesty who have taken up their abode in the Transvaal such measure of justice and political recognition as may be found necessary to secure them in the full possession of equal rights and liberties.

Well, of course, that settles it. I do not suppose at the time that any of his followers objected, because the House rose and sang God Save the Queen. I happened to be in Toronto, but I did not hear that there was a single dissentient from that resolution. Now, Sir, what is to be thought of a man in the position of the right hon. gentleman who, in July, in August, in September, for three long months, when he was aware that our sister colonies were offering help to the mother country, and that the mother country desired their help—did not ask it, but desired it, for reasons that we are all familiar with—what is to be thought of a Prime Minister who can move and pass such a resolution as that, but who was not ready to offer material help, who was not ready to offer soldiers and to offer money? Now, Mr. Speaker, that interview of the Prime Minister, to which I have already referred, and his attitude has a feature about it that has not yet, I think, been commented on. That was really an attempt to suppress the rising opinion of Canada, it was an attempt that failed. The Prime Minister said that the law was against him, he said he had no money, he said he could not do it, he said he was limited. So far as he could, he sought to suppress the rising opinion in Canada. Well, of course, if that be true, Mr. Speaker, he is in such disaccord with Canada, in such disaccord with the mass of the people of Canada, that he is unfit for his high position—I say it with great respect and with great regret. He is completely out of sympathy with Canada; it is demonstrated by that interview, even if it stood alone. In the resolution moved by himself he declares that there is suzerainty, and in regard to this suzerainty one of his most distinguished opponents declares that if he could only be convinced that the suzerainty exists, then he would no longer have any difficulty, notwithstanding his own strong opinions, in sending a contingent to South Africa. If any one will only read the speeches, the speech of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), the speech of the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Monet), and take this resolution passed at the instance of the Prime Minister last year; read his interview, and then listen to these gentlemen declaring that they must go against their leader and against the principles he has taught them—why, Sir, anybody who looks at the whole situation will see that it is one of the most sorrowful and lamentable that has ever been presented by a prominent public man in the history of constitutional government. The hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville is not here, but, I have no doubt that he will read what I say. I think I will convince him, because he is a lawyer, that suzerainty still exists. I have here in my hand the two treaties, the treaties of 1851 and of 1854. Now, Sir, in regard to these two treaties I believe that it is a complete misconception on the part of those persons in this House and outside of it who have held that the suzerainty of England has been abandoned, by the convention of 1854. Before comparing them, I would like to refer to what took place. My hon. friend, the member for Norfolk, in going over the various points that established that paramountcy of the British Empire in regard to the Transvaal did not, I think, mention what occurred in 1833, 1834 and 1835, when in consequence of the emancipation of the slaves throughout the entire British dominions the slaves were emancipated in South Africa. The Dutch people in Cape Colony trekked. They wanted to have slaves. They went north, and after some time, when they were not able to get on very well, there was some slight trouble, and then we had the Sand River Convention which my hon. friend referred to and which I will not dwell upon. But, in 1860, the revolt of the natives took place, the republic collapsed, and then England had to interfere. Then, in 1877, Cetawayo was about to pounce down upon the republic when England came to her help and delivered the Boers and Cetawayo and his young men were prevented from bathing their spears, as they had intended, in the blood of the Boers. Then England annexed the Transvaal, and sent there a resident. It was declared to be British territory—British territory, according to the words of Lord Wolseley, as long as the sun would shine. What happened? Sir, what did we see? We saw Mr. Gladstone go into Midlothian, having denounced the conduct of Lord Beaconsfield, for, as he said, a free people trying to take the liberties away from a free republic. We saw Gladstone come into power, and after having declared that it was a wrong thing to annex the republic, having become Prime Minister himself, he said that he would do what he had condemned in the case of

Mr. DAVIN.

Disraeli, and give casuistical reasons why England must retain the Transvaal, then, after Majuba Hill, while Sir Frederick Roberts was on the sea, sending a telegram offering to make conditions with the Boers. Then came the convention of 1881. When that convention was on the eve of being made, Sir Hercules Robinson asks of Mr. Kruger:

Sir H. Robinson—Before annexation, had British subjects complete freedom of trade throughout the Transvaal; were they on the same footing as citizens?

Mr. Kruger—They were on the same footing as the burghers; there was not the slightest difference, in accordance with the Sand River convention.

Sir H. Robinson—I presume you will not object to that continuing?

Mr. Kruger—No, there will be equal protection for everybody.

Sir E. Wood—And equal privileges?

Mr. Kruger—We make no difference as far as burgher rights are concerned. There may perhaps be some slight difference in the case of a young person who has just come into the country.

There are no disabilities with regard to trade either?

Mr. Kruger—No.

Dr. Jorissen—At No. 244 the question was: 'Is there any distinction in regard to the privileges or rights of Englishmen in the Transvaal?' And Mr. Kruger answered: 'No, there is no difference'; and then he added, 'there may be some slight difference in the case of a young person just coming into the country.' I wish to say that that might give rise to a wrong impression. What Mr. Kruger intended to convey was this: according to our law a new-comer has not his burgher rights immediately. The words 'young person' do not refer to age, but to the time of residence in the republic. According to Grondwet (constitution) you have to reside a year in the country.

Sir H. de Villiers—Is the oath of allegiance required from a person, not being born in the Transvaal, coming to reside there, who claims burgher rights?

Dr. Jorissen—In the law relating to the franchise there is a stipulation for the oath of allegiance to be taken to the state.

Article twelve of the convention declares:

That all persons holding property in the state on the 8th day of August, 1881, will continue to enjoy the rights of property which they have enjoyed since the annexation. That no person who has remained loyal to Her Majesty during the recent hostilities shall suffer by reason of his loyalty, and that all persons will have full liberty to reside in the country, with enjoyment of all civil rights and protection for their persons and property.

By that convention you have for the people of the Transvaal:

1. Self-government, with the franchise guaranteed, to all inhabitants under laws then existing.

2. Full liberty to reside in the state, to possess houses, manufactories, warehouses, &c.

3. To carry on commerce, either in person or by agents, and to be subject to no taxation whatever other than might be imposed on Transvaal citizens.

And lastly, no law should be passed inconsistent with or repugnant to the provisions of this convention.

Well, Sir, that was all right. But, three years after, Mr. Kruger having pondered the humanitarian speeches of Mr. Gladstone and measured the character of Gladstonian foreign policy, and when he had gone to England, they sought to have and secured a new convention. That new convention never mentions suzerainty nor by that new convention was suzerainty done away with. It refers to certain articles, for which they wish to substitute other articles, but, as a matter of fact, all the guarantees of 1881 remain intact. You have the suzerainty intact and you have practically all rights intact. Well, what happened? Within two years after 1881, they passed a law which took away some of the rights they professed to give and they passed a law providing that nobody should have a franchise except after fourteen years' residence. After two years he might take the oath of allegiance, abjuring his allegiance to any country that he might come from, but acquiring none of the rights of citizenship, but being able to elect to the second Raad, which is a sort of debating society. To the higher Raad he was allowed to go only after certain conditions, which might happen after fourteen years' residence, so that, for twelve years he is disfranchised after taking the oath of allegiance! Fourteen years out of the life of a settler—it is his whole life. Then, you know what happened. Gold and diamonds were discovered, and then you had oppressive laws robbing the men that brought capital into the country and enriched it, and one has only to go into the history of the Transvaal to be deeply impressed with the fact that the guarantees that had been secured by the conventions of 1881 and 1884 had been swept away, had been trampled upon and that the Uitlanders were reduced, so far as a government of oligarchs at Pretoria could do it to the level of Kaffirs. The white man who had been guaranteed all the rights of British citizenship under the suzerainty that still exists; he was deprived of all the rights that should belong to any citizen in this day in any free country. But the iniquity of the law is of course intensified when we remember that the citizens who were so treated were British citizens whose rights had been guaranteed by the power which had again and again rescued the Boers from destruction at the hands of the savage enemies around them. The plunder of the Uitlander, come from where he might, going to the monopolist on the one hand, and in vast boodle to the local oligarch, and thus striking as fatally at all general Boer prosperity and progress as at the honest gains of miner and settler. Having looked at this question as a lawyer, having consulted with other lawyers, I have no doubt that any one who compares the convention of 1881 with the convention of 1884 will come to the conclusion that the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was quite right when he asserted in the resolution, which was endorsed by the vote of this House, that the suzerainty of Her Majesty had remained unimpaired after that convention of 1884.

Mr. BOURASSA. Then what becomes of the declaration made by Earl Cadogan in the House of Lords in 1884?

Mr. DAVIN. I do not know whether or not my hon. friend (Mr. Bourassa) is a lawyer, but he must know that an instrument of that kind is not controlled by the interpretation placed on it by any one in the House of Lords or elsewhere. An instrument like that rests upon what is within the four corners of it, and not upon the interpretation of Earl Cadogan, who, however, was speaking against the convention and condemning it. You have to go to the convention of 1881 and the convention of 1884, and you will find that the suzerainty remains intact, and the guarantees, so far as an instrument of that kind can secure them, remain intact also. Now, Mr. Speaker, I confess that when first this war broke out, I had a natural sympathy with a small republic. I am ready to confess that I had not paid as much attention to South Africa as I have since, and I had at first a good deal of sympathy with this small nation fighting a tremendous power.

Mr. McNEILL. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. But since I came to look closely into the history of the position of the Uitlanders there, since I came to study the legislation of the Volksraad, I cannot conceal from myself that our fellow British subjects have been face to face for a series of years with very great oppression, and if we follow the history of the diplomacy we cannot but conclude that the utmost fairness was shown by the British government and by the British diplomats—in fact, they probably pushed fairness too far. And, Mr. Speaker, the real sin and crime is at the door of Mr. Gladstone. His weakness, his vacillation, his unreadiness to stand by those who were fighting the battles of the empire in outlying portions of that empire; all that has cast a dark shadow over his memory, notwithstanding his great power and extraordinary brilliancy. That fatal weakness is a thing that will qualify the estimate which the historian will make of an otherwise great man.

I thank the House for the attention they have given me. I reiterate, I would not have spoken at all on this resolution, which might well be passed as a matter of course, if I did not feel bound to emphasize the extraordinary position of Her Majesty's government in Canada as revealed by the debate which took place here on Tuesday night. I also felt it necessary to stigmatize the position of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) and I think I have done that a great deal too mildly. While I am ready to accept the statement of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) and of the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Monet) that, taking into account their standpoint, they may be able sincerely to declare that with the qualifications they give us, they are loyal to the empire, yet, taking the leading articles of La Patrie from day to day, and taking the interviews and speeches of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), I have no hesitation in saying in this parliament, that the Minister (Mr. Tarte) stands, in my opinion, convicted before all Canada as a disloyal man. And, Sir, the serious thing is that he still retains his hold on this ministry, and, that after the Prime Minister was made aware of public opinion through the press—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The reptile press.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, the reptile press, and thereby hangs a tale. Why was it that the Prime Minister did not know public opinion before it was forced upon him through the reptile press? Sir, we had this disloyal man (Mr. Tarte); we had that dark figure dragging back the Prime Minister from obeying—I cannot call it the impulse of loyalty or patriotism—we had that dark figure drawing the Prime Minister back from the impulse of what I will call 'saving his ministerial skin'; we had that dark figure keeping the Prime Minister back for two days. Why, Sir, I can fancy the Prime Minister in a moment of reproach, turning around to his colleague on October 16 or 17, and saying: Ah, Tarte, those two days' hesitation killed us.

Mr. FOSTER. He very likely said it.

Mr. DAVIN. I can imagine it anyway, and I dare say that the Prime Minister can tell us whether he said it or not. Now, Sir, as there has been something said about the reptile press, let me point out that I find in the Auditor General's report (a—45) that the Montreal Herald received $15,000 last year.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is the paper of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. DAVIN. Does that paper belong to the Minister of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. BENNETT. It belongs to the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, the minister looks well after it. Then there is La Patrie down for $1,700.

Mr. GILLIES. Who owns that?

Mr. TAYLOR. The Minister of Public Works.

Mr. DAVIN. Here is the Regina Leader, and the Regina Leader received $1,140, exclusive of some $10,000 or $12,000 which it received from the local government for the ordinances.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). It does not revel, as it used to do, in old times.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman is quite mistaken. I have moved for a return which may enlighten him, for it will show that at the time I was the principal shareholder of the Leader, and when the Conservative government was in power, the patronage went to other and hostile papers in Regina, and not to the Leader, and I never said one word about it to any minister, and never complained, and never pointed it out until when the company was about to sell paper and plant, leading Conservative politicians wanted me not to sanction it. But a list was published the other day, and any one who looks over those pages, a—43 and 44, will find how heavily subsidized is the Liberal press—and that, I suppose, is what is to be understood by the word 'reptile.' The Conservative press which represents public opinion, the right hon. gentleman has characterized as reptile; but anybody who has made himself acquainted with the sentiment that prevails in Canada from Halifax to Vancouver, will find that loud as that press spoke, it did not fully voice the loyal feeling of the people of this country towards the empire. The views I am uttering here to-day are not views which I imbibed yesterday. When twenty-five or twenty-six years ago there was a movement in this country in favour of that independence which my hon. friend from Laprairie (Mr. Monet) looks forward to, and which I hope will never come, and when there was very little or no talk about Imperialism, a Dr. Tiffany came across to Toronto and delivered a lecture in which he declared that the new civilization was that of the United States which was to teach us all, and he declared that annexation was our manifest destiny. Mr. George Hague—I do not know how he knew anything of me—waited on me with a deputation, and asked me if I would reply to Dr. Tiffany, and I did so. One of the writers on the Mail the other day found somewhere a report of that speech, and came to the conclusion that it was the first note of Imperialism that had been heard in Canada. I do not know whether that is true or not, but that is the conclusion of the Mail writer. In that lecture I said:

That day will never come when scattered nations of the British race, looking with loyal love from every compass to the little mother isles—

Girt by the dim strait sea,

And multitudinous wall of wandering wave, and reposing safe and glorious in that sapphire embrace, shall turn round to call on Canada to add her voice to swell the peal of filial gratulation, of proud assurance, of co-operation, and, should need be, of help—and will turn in vain.

The writer in the Mail says this has proved to be a prophecy.

It was uttered when certainly I did not know whether anybody had uttered any sentiment of Imperialism before. At that time Goldwin Smith and some young men in Toronto were engaged in a movement in favour of independence. Although I was only a very short time in the country, I saw that independence would mean only ruin and engulfment for Canada; and the more I live in Canada the more I feel that we can have here every blessing of citizenship that a man can crave every resource of material well being; sky-touching mountains which mock Mont Blanc, lakes mirroring unrivalled skies, rivers ampler than the Thames, as beautiful as the Rhine, with wider and more fertile shores:—

The haughtiest breast its wish might bound
Through life to dwell delighted here.

There is no ambition of the most aspiring man which cannot be gratified within the bounds of the empire and in Canada. The true course for colonists here and under other suns and other stars, is to look forward to the ever-increasing expansion of that empire, to make that empire greater—freer it cannot be. No doubt there may be still ampler power for colonists in that empire in the future; but even if they remain as at present—because it is a mere sentimental complaint of my hon. friend from Laprairie that we have not the direct power of making treaties—I hold that no citizen of any country can have better conditions than are enjoyed by the citizens of this great colony of our free, glorious and unrivalled empire.

Mr. J. ROSS ROBERTSON (East Toronto). Mr. Speaker, in speaking for a few moments on this vote in connection with the Canadian South African contingent, I wish to say that I think the hon. the Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden) is to be highly commended for the manner in which the Canadian troops have been assembled, handled and despatched. With reference to the expenses of the contingent, I believe that Canada was a nation even before the right hon. First Minister visited England on the occasion of Her Majesty's Jubilee; and I rise to express my conviction that Canada should act as a nation in the matter of the British cause in South Africa. There have been nations, or rather monarchies, which have sent out soldiers and allowed their people to pay the cost. The Canadians are not Hessians, and Canada need not hesitate to risk her money in a quarrel in which so many of her sons are risking their lives. This government has in the past been generous with subsidies for the purposes of peace. The government which has built railroads at the public expense for private individuals ought to be willing to pay soldiers at the public expense for fighting the battles of the empire. I am not condemning the government, for, of course, we all hope that the expense of this war will come out of the Transvaal. When, however, the day of reckoning comes—and it will have to come pretty quickly if it is to be here before the present government goes out of office—I think that the government should get the vouchers for every cent that Britain has spent upon the Canadian soldiers, and send a check for the entire amount to the Imperial treasury. If they will not accept it on that account, let them keep it and with it build a ship and call it 'The Canada.'

Mr. FRANK OLIVER (Alberta). Mr. Speaker, I quite agree with all the loyalty of sentiment that has been expressed so far in this debate. I am sorry that it has not been altogether unanimous; but I am still more sorry that what has been expressed, has not taken a more practical form, and been directed to what seems to me to be the more worthy purpose. Our loyalty to the empire is expressed by the men whom we sent to fight the battles of the empire. I think that while they express their loyalty and ours by their action, it remains for us to express our loyalty to the British Empire by our loyalty to them. That I take it to be the beginning of the matter, and where the responsibility rests directly on this House. I do not want to be the means of any controversy with regard to a matter upon which we ought all to be unanimous, but I do say that if it is right and proper for Canada to pay the whole of the expenses of these contingents in South Africa—and I am perfectly willing to agree that it might be, or would be, or, if you like, is right and proper—I think that in the very beginning those who believe that so strongly, might have gone so far as to have been willing to give a little more remuneration to the men who have gone to the front. It sounds very patriotic to say that we are willing to pay the whole of the expenses of our contingent, but it seems to be that that assertion lacks strength when we are willing to let ourselves out, by paying only one-half of what we admit is the proper pay of these men. I understand very well the contention that can be made on behalf of the last clauses of these resolutions, namely, that if these men get their regular pay, whether from one source or another, they are getting enough. Allow me to say, looking at it from my point of view, that their regular pay is not enough under the circumstances, and that when you say you are giving these men regular pay, you thereby say you are not giving them enough to meet the extraordinary circumstances and conditions under which they are serving. No doubt the pay of the Canadian regular is better than that of the British regular; and in so far as these resolutions provide that instead of the Canadian volunteer in South Africa only getting British pay he is to get full Canadian pay, they are desirable. But I cannot hold, nor will it be held in this House, without my protest, that the Canadian regular pay is a sufficient consideration for the special services rendered by these men. The difference between a soldier who is one by profession, and a citizen, engaged in the ordinary avocations of life, who only takes up soldiery for the moment, at the call of his country, for the honour of his fellow-citizens, and for the safety of the empire, who drops his particular avocation and sacrifices his future prospects, besides incurring the ordinary risk of loss of life and limb, must be evident. The citizen does not stand on the same level and should not be considered on the same level as the man who goes into soldiering as the business of his life and who only risks life and limb. It may not be possible, and, I am afraid, judging from the debate so far, it will not be possible in this House to secure a sufficient expression of opinion to justify the government in changing these resolutions and offering these men full Canadian pay for their services, outside of the British pay, although it seems to me that would only be a fair and graceful thing to do; but it is my business to draw the attention of the House and the government to the special circumstances of these men, the special conditions under which they are serving, and the special sacrifices they are making, so that if it be possible a change shall be made in these resolutions and that special consideration shall be given in all future financial arrangements that may be made in recognition of their services.

I have been very much astonished at the tone in which the sacrifices made by these volunteers have been alluded to, or rather ignored. Speaking from my own personal knowledge—and I do not suppose I am singular in my knowledge—I know men who have sacrificed every prospect in life for the purpose of serving their country in this war. I know of men, who, inside of six days, have dropped their farms and closed out their business for the purpose of joining the second contingent. You may say that these men were foolish. Certainly, looked at from the material point of view, they were, but if they were foolish at any rate they were enthusiastic and loyal, and they are the men and theirs is the spirit which will be a credit to this country in South Africa, or anywhere else, and this country will do very much less than credit to itself, if it does not recognize very liberally and generously such devotion. It is a mistake altogether to consider that the Canadians who have gone to South Africa are at all in the position of ordinary soldiers. The ordinary soldier is, no doubt, a very good man in his profession, but it is not throwing any discredit upon him, it is merely stating an absolute fact, when I say that the ordinary citizen, engaged in the ordinary avocations of life, does offer to the service of his country a wider range of observation, a greater knowledge of men and affairs than does the private soldier. By reason of the change in the system of warfare resulting from the improvement in weapons, it is evident that the higher the intelligence, the more valuable the soldier, and that by sending our volunteers to South Africa, by sending the men we are sending, full of the enthusiasm and loyalty that has inspired them to offer their services, we are making a more valuable contribution to the fighting strength of the empire than could be made by an equal number of men from the line regiments of the empire. We are making a more valuable contribution than we would by sending even our own regiments. Therefore, when we consider the recognition of the services of these men, we ought to consider them not only as soldiers, but as volunteers, as our fellow citizens, more worthy as soldiers, because they are citizens, and more worthy as citizens, because they are soldiers. And that in any financial arrangement we have to make in regard to them, it is not so much for their benefit as it is for our credit that we should recognize the services they are rendering to us and to the whole country. It is a poor thing for us to accept the services of these men for little or nothing, because they have offered them that way. Because these men have dropped their avocations, because they have severed their family ties, because they have come simply at the sound of the bugle without asking for pay, pension, or recognition, it is poor business for us to say: They came forward on these terms; we give them all they asked; there is nothing more to be said. The very fact that they came forward under these conditions, that they came forward without haggling, without asking a price, without asking consideration of any kind, without asking if they were to get British pay or any pay, makes it necessary that Canada, if she is to do credit to herself, shall deal with these men in the most open-handed and liberal manner, and that she should not for an instant assume to be controlled by the rules or usages which fix the pay and allowances, and considerations of ordinary soldiers either in the British army or in the Canadian regulars.

Mr. M. T. STENSON (Richmond and Wolfe). Representing a mixed community, as I do, I think it my duty to state here on what grounds I will support the resolution now under consideration before this House. About three-quarters of my electors are French Canadians; and in supporting this resolution to pay the expenses entailed by sending contingents to South Africa, I feel satisfied that I shall have the support of my electors without distinction or nationality. Canada owes a great deal to Great Britain. For the last half century Canada has been governed in the same manner as a family is treated by a kind mother; and therefore we owe to Great Britain any assistance we can give her in her time of need. The first contingent was asked for, not as a necessity from England, but as an expression of sympathy from Canada for Great Britain in this matter. Some pretend that the government has not been quick enough in acting; but I believe that the government has acted wisely and well. As I have had occasion already to state, I believe that the government has acted even outside of the letter of the constitution, but not beyond the spirit of it. According to the letter of the constitution, I believe, the government was not justified in spending money for this service without the sanction of parliament. But the case was one of urgency. Our sympathies were with the mother country, and I believe that the government made no mistake in relying upon the support of all loyal Canadians in this matter. I feel satisfied that the support of this House will be almost unanimous for this resolution. What my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver) has said with regard to the pay of the men I will agree to it to a certain extent; but I think we can safely leave in the hands of the government the rewards to be given to these men after this war is over. I do not think that the government can go any further than they have gone. Great Britain has asked us to give her soldiers who would form a proportion of the British army, and they should be considered as a portion of the British army. We have given what she has asked, and the government has declared, and the purport of these resolutions is to declare, that there will be further pay given to these men, not only during their time of service, but when this war is over. I trust the government will act liberally with the heirs of those who shall have fallen in this war; that it will not be a question of observing the army regulations of Great Britain or any other country. I think the Canadian parliament will deal generously with the orphans and widows of the Canadians who fall fighting for the honour of Canada and the benefit of Great Britain. But this is a question to be considered later on. I, therefore, give my cordial and complete and hearty support to this resolution.

I might not have thought it worth while to occupy the attention of the House, or to give my opinion on this subject, but I was painfully struck with a word which fell from the lips of one of the principal members of this House while debating this question. The hon. gentlemen was speaking of what had taken place in the House of Commons in England. Here in Canada we are far from the base of action; and I do not want to discuss here the merits or demerits, or whatever we may call them, of this war. The mother country has called upon us to act, and we have acted. In the House of Commons at home, the members have the right to give their opinion. An amendment was proposed to the speech from the Throne, and those who supported that amendment, which is known as the Redmond Amendment, were characterized in this House of Commons as 'cravens.' I protest against the title of 'cravens' being applied to any members of the House of Commons of Great Britain, and particularly when that name is applied to men of my own nationality. I am a Canadian, and am proud of being a Canadian; but I am also proud of having been born on the soil of Ireland. Ireland is my mother country; and I protest against the title 'cravens' being given to any number of Ireland's children. No one has any right to apply that word, nor would any one who knows the history of Great Britain and Ireland think of applying the title 'craven' to any number of the citizens of those countries. But the hon. gentleman did apply that title to those who voted for that amendment, and who were mostly Irishmen, though there were others with them, and men of distinction too, and there was one among them to whom the title was applied, who at one time was a leading light in this House of Commons, and is now a leading light in the House of Commons of Great Britain. That title should not be applied to such men. They have their opinions, and they were discussing this matter in the House of Commons as they had a right to do. They had a right to bring in that amendment and to support it. And, if the hon. gentleman who used the title of 'craven' applied it to those who approved that resolution, had read the history of Great Britain and Ireland as carefully as he appears to have read the history of the United States and its army, he would not have thought of applying that title to any body of the inhabitants of the British Isles. I do not mean to occupy the time of this House by discussing this matter further. I merely enter my protest and will call the hon. member's attention to the fact that the Irish and the English and the Scotch have always been known to be far from 'cravens.' There are now representatives of these countries fighting in the Transvaal, shoulder to shoulder, and if more are required they will be there. I would just call the attention of my hon. friend to these lines of Moore, the Irish poet. Speaking to his countrymen, he says:

Contempt on the minion who calls you disloyal;
Though fierce to your foe, to your friends you are true,
And a tribute most high to a heart that is royal,
Is love from a heart that loves liberty too.
While cowards who blight your fame, your right,
Would shrink from the blaze of the battle array,
The standard of green in front will be seen.

Oh! my life on your faith, were you summoned this minute,

You'd drive every bitter remembrance away,
And show what the arm of old Erin has in it,
When roused by the foe on her Prince's day.

That was addressed to my countrymen years ago, and the same words may be addressed to them to-day, that 'standard of green' is seen in front to-day. Those who have borne that standard forward have been mown down by the fire of the enemy, yet there are others to take their places. No matter what our differences of opinion may be with regard to the way of carrying on this war, or whether we may feel that the war should not have taken place, nevertheless, while this war is on, the Irish people and the Irish members of the House of Commons will, I believe, see it to be their duty to help Great Britain out of this trouble; and not only the 'Standard of Green,' but the Orange mixed with it, and the Thistle, will be there fighting for the cause of Great Britain. Now, was it a mistake on the part of the hon. gentleman when he applied the word 'treason' to the Irish members of parliament, or was it ignorance of the etymology of the word he used? I would call his attention to these facts, and I trust that such an expression will never again fall from his lips, or from the lips of any one else in this House—an expression treating any number of British subjects and particularly Irishmen, as traitors.

Mr. G. V. McINERNEY (Kent, N.B.). I do not rise for the purpose of making a speech on this subject, but there is one argument which has been made by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) which I think ought to be met. The hon. member contended that in the treaty of 1884 and the treaty of 1881 there was no suzerainty or paramountcy written over the South African Republic. In order to sustain the position that he took on that question, he quoted the opinion of Lord Cadogan, and in support of the opinion of Lord Cadogan, he also quoted the opinion of Lord Derby. Well, Mr. Speaker, he would indeed be quoting a splendid authority to destroy any contention for suzerainty in these treaties, if the hon. gentleman were right in the quotations he had made. But what do I find? In turning to the debates in the House of Lords, in 1884, on Monday, the 17th of March—St. Patrick's Day it happened to be—we find that Earl Cadogan made a contention against the treaty which the Gladstone government had a few days before laid upon the Table of the House, the treaty that they had entered into with the South African Republic. Some time before that, the question had been asked in the House of Commons as to whether England had consented to the name of the South African Republic being given, and a debate arose on that occasion. Earl Cadogan, I suppose I may be permitted to say for political purposes, to a certain extent, was endeavouring to minimize the treaty which the Gladstone government had made with the Transvaal Republic; he was criticising it on the point that it had not written in it, in specific terms, the suzerainty which he thought England should have had written into the treaty. But he was answered by Earl Derby in a way that I think completely destroyed his contention, and which deprived the hon. member for Labelle of the authority which he quoted in this House. This is what Earl Derby said:

Then the noble Earl said—

Referring to Earl Cadogan.

—that the object of the convention had been to abolish the suzerainty of the British Crown. The word 'suzerainty' is a very vague word, and I do not think it is capable of any precise legal definition. Whatever we may understand by it, I think it is not very easy to define. But I apprehend, whether you call it protectorate, or a suzerainty, or the recognition of England as a paramount power, the fact is that a certain controlling power is retained when the state which exercises this suzerainty has a right to veto any negotiations into which the dependent state may enter with foreign powers. Whatever suzerainty meant in the convention of Pretoria, the condition of things which it implied still remains; although the word is not actually employed, we have the substance. We have abstained from using the word because it was not capable of legal definition, and because it seemed to be a word which was likely to lead to misconception and misunderstanding.

There Earl Derby states that although the word suzerainty was not written into the treaty, though they had omitted the word, they had retained the substance; and so he made the contention that suzerainty was still to be inferred from the treaty of 1884. Now, what has the hon. member for Labelle to say for having come into this House, before an intelligent body of men, and quoted the high authority of Earl Derby in favour of a contention which Earl Derby's argument in fact completely destroys? When the hon. member for West Assinibolia (Mr. Davin) was on his feet, the member for Labelle asked the question across the House: What had he to say against the contention of Earl Derby in the House of Lords that suzerainty was not written into the treaty? Why, Sir, Earl Derby had contended that although suzerainty was not written into the treaty, the power given to England in that treaty to veto any treaty that the South African Republic might make with a foreign power, was practically paramountcy, was practically suzerainty. Is that not giving a right of jurisdiction over the state with which the treaty is made? I think the argument of the hon. member for Labelle is completely destroyed. He is a gentleman of good sense, I think he is a lawyer, and I think his own good sense would have convinced him that the power of vetoing treaties which was contained in that convention, was sufficient to maintain the right of England to suzerainty over the Transvaal Republic.

Now, Sir, although I did not intend to make a speech upon this question when I rose, I may take advantage of the occasion to differ a little from my hon. friend for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Stenson). I take a different view of this subject from what he does. While I have not one word to say against the way in which the Irish party in the English House of Commons manage their affairs, I may be permitted to state here, as a Canadian born, but still as a man of Celtic blood, that I think it would have been the part of wisdom in the Irish delegation in the English House of Commons at this crisis in England's affairs, to have attempted to draw with silken ties the people of England to them. I admit that in the past there has been hatred and there has been bitterness; but the hon. gentleman is aware that a very short time ago a large number of the people of England, and a very large majority of the people of Scotland, and a large majority of the people of Wales, joined Mr. Gladstone in a great endeavour to give a certain measure of home rule to Ireland. And, I believe, that at the present time, home rule is in the interest of the empire. Take myself—of Irish blood, and still an Imperialist. Still an Imperialist, I believe, Sir, that it is the part of wisdom on the part of England to grant a certain measure of home rule to Ireland. I am an Imperialist because I believe that when the unity of the empire is brought about, as it will be some day inaugurated, in fact, I put it upon the same ground as His Grace the Archbishop of Halifax, who is also an Imperialist—I put it upon the same ground that he does, that when the day comes in every part of Her Majesty's great dominions in Canada, in the islands of the sea, in Australia, in India, and in Ireland, too, there will be a house representing the local wishes of the people. I put it upon that ground. I regret exceedingly that the Irish leaders at home, whose judgment I do not wish to criticise—I regret that the leaders of the Irish people in the English House of Commons, have not seen fit, at this time, to uphold the hand of England in this war. This is a war of civilization, this is a war which is not a war of invasion by England, but in which England is on the defensive, striking for the rights of men, striking for the liberties of men, striking for the liberties of our fellow-subjects in Africa. I am only sorry that I did not give sufficient attention to this matter to enable me to have met many of the arguments used on the other side, but I do contend that the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) is in a most illogical position. The hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Monet) is somewhat logical, but the hon. member for Labelle stands in a most illogical, and if he will permit me to say so, a most absurd position. He first says that this war is a war of invasion, that England has invaded this country in South Africa.

Mr. BOURASSA. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. McInerney) permit me? I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. McINERNEY. I listened very attentively and with great pleasure—I mean from the literary standpoint—to the speech of the hon. member for Labelle. I think that he struck a great blow at the honourable claim to distinction which his abilities give him. I listened with a great deal of pleasure to the literary style in which that hon. gentleman delivered himself, and I understood the hon. gentleman to say that this was a war of invasion, of spoliation, that it was an unjust war waged by a great nation against a small country.

Mr. BOURASSA. I do not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I cannot allow such an interpretation to be put upon my words.

Mr. McINERNEY. I will ask the hon. gentleman if he did not say that it was a war of spoliation?

Mr. BOURASSA. No.

Mr. McINERNEY. I would ask him if he did not say that it was an unjust war?

Mr. BOURASSA. I did say that it was an unjust war, on account of the means that had been taken to bring it about.

Mr. McINERNEY. I am quite prepared to allow the hon. gentleman to retract part of the assertions that I understood him to have made, but I understood him to have said that it was a war of spoliation, an unjust war, a war of a powerful nation against a very small people; on these grounds he condemned it, and in the next breath he stood prepared to vote $2,000,000 to help to carry it on—a most absurd position. Now, the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville says that he is for the independence of Canada. Well, I am broad enough, I hope, and I think it is in the best interests of the country, to permit gentlemen to have their own views on these questions, to express them openly, and in the light of day, because, I believe, that if they do so the good sense of the country will, after all, weigh them and sift them and will pass judgment upon them. The hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville was more logical. He being for independence, not an Imperialist, opposed to the Imperialistic idea, the hon. gentleman was prepared to oppose the government in this plan, and in that he was logical. The other hon. gentleman, the hon. member for Labelle, was perfectly illogical. I believe that this war on the part of England is a war of justice, I believe it is war for the extension of freedom and truth, and for the rights of men, and in that view I am prepared to sustain the government in the vote they have now brought down to the House. I would have been prepared to have gone much farther; I would have been prepared to have helped to vote through this Canadian parliament, in these growing times, a sufficient amount of money to pay all the expenses of the contingents incurred on the way to South Africa and also while they are there fighting the battles of the empire. There is no question in the hearts of the people to-day, I believe, in this battle, as to whether a man is an Englishman, an Irishman, a Scotchman, a Welshman or a Frenchman. Numbers of Frenchmen have gone from Canada to take up this fight; numbers of Irishmen have gone from Ireland to take up this fight. What was the answer made by Mr. Wyndham, only the other day, in the English House of Commons, to Mr. Redmond, when Mr. Redmond was attacking the government for carrying on this war and saying that the Irish people were opposed to it? As for the Irish people, said Mr. Wyndham, the best answer I can give on the part of Ireland is, that her sons are at this hour shedding their blood in the cause. I do not wish to be more loyal than the Queen or than Englishmen. I do not wish to appear one jot or tittle more loyal than I am, but I believe in my heart of hearts, that when this matter is put plainly, fairly and honestly before the different branches of the great Canadian people, they will support a movement such as has been lately taking place in Canada, and that they will support the government in helping England in this war. May I be permitted to add, that I know a little of the French Canadian history in Canada? I am not surprised at the views which the hon. member for Labelle expressed in this House, I am not surprised at the views which the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville expressed in this House. Sir, as you know, there have been two great schools of thought in French Canada in this matter. There was the great school of thought led by Sir George Cartier, followed up by Chapais, Taché, and such men as DeBoucherville, Masson, Chapleau, Caron, Langevin, and many men of that sort. It was the Conservative school of thought; it was that school of thought that is loyal to British institutions. There has been another school of thought in French Canada, as you know well, men of eminent ability, men of grand ability, taking part in the government of the country, such men as Dorion, Mercier and Honoré Beaugrand, and, might I say, that the right hon. gentleman who now leads the government some years ago was one of the highest and most eloquent exponents of that school of thought? From them such men as the hon. member for Labelle and for Laprairie and Napierville have taken their inspirations, and they come to this House and utter the sentiments they drank in from these great leaders of the party, in days gone by, in their own province. I am not going to say that any section of the great Canadian people is disloyal. I am not going to say that, but I do say that it is the duty of the right hon. Prime Minister and the duty of the French Canadian members of this House, and they cannot perform it at too early a day, in my opinion, to go down into their counties and to tell their people that their best interests, that their highest interests, call upon them, at this time, to sustain England in this great struggle in which she is engaged. In what part of the world has a Frenchman greater liberties than in Canada, taking it from the point of view of his religious liberties? There is no part of the civilized globe to-day in which the church to which the great mass of the French Canadians belong, has wider liberty and greater security than in this country of Canada. In what country under the sun, outside of the great country of France, is the French language protected any better than it is in the British ruled province of Quebec? Look at the example of Louisiana, a French state. That country was incorporated into the United States of America, and at once the people lost the official use of the French language in their legislature. Sir, the same thing would inevitably happen to the French people of Canada if they should be drawn into annexation; aye, or if this were declared to be an independent nation.

It cannot be denied, Sir, that the great growth of this country in the future will be to the west. That is inevitable. I am no prophet, but I can conceive the time when millions of people will have taken up their abode on the plains of the west. I maintain, that the greatest guarantee, the greatest protection to French rights in Canada is the protection they receive from the sovereignty of the British Crown, and the protection of the British Imperial parliament having an eye to the maintenance of these rights guaranteed to them by treaty many years ago. The British parliament in its justice will see; the British people will see, that these rights are maintained in their full integrity, and they will allow no despoiling hand to be laid upon them. No fanatical hand can tear away from our French Canadian people the rights which the justice and the wisdom of the British people gave them years and years ago. I believe it is the duty of the French-speaking members of this House at as early a date as possible, to teach such lessons as are necessary to the people of every part of the province of Quebec. I am here to speak for the French people of the province whence I come. I represent a constituency in which there is a large majority of French Acadian votes, and I am not afraid in this free Canadian parliament to express the views I have expressed. I am not afraid in the face of the people of Irish blood in this Dominion to express my views. And, Sir, I am not afraid that any punishment shall be visited upon me for heartily and sincerely stating to this House the views and sentiments which actuate me at this time.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR (South Leeds). I wish to call the attention of the Prime Minister to the fact that the War Office has confirmed the news that Kimberley has been relieved. I wish to ask the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) or the Minister of War (Mr. Borden) whether they have ordered the flag to be hoisted on the public buildings in commemoration of this joyful event. The people throughout the country are all ready to cheer for the victory that that Irishman Lord Roberts has achieved in the relief of Kimberley, and I think it would be only fitting that the House of Commons of Canada should be adorned with the Union Jack on this occasion.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). There is, I believe, an officer whose duty it is to look after the hoisting of the flag, and I do not know whether he has done it or not. For my part, it is only within the last few minutes that I have heard the welcome news that Kimberley has been relieved. If it is deemed proper on the part of the House that the flag should be raised, the idea will meet with hearty approval on the part of the government.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. N. CLARKE WALLACE (West York). I wish, Mr. Speaker, to call attention to some remarks which have been made in the course of this debate. The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Stenson) told us a few minutes ago that the mother country had called upon us to act, and that we have done so. Sir, the mother country did not call upon us to act. The mother country might have called upon us to act, but she did not do so, and there was perhaps good reason why she should have called upon us on account of the dilatoriness of the present government, and the conduct of the First Minister. What did happen was that volunteer offers were made to England from certain Canadians, and it was to these volunteer offers that Mr. Chamberlain referred in the official correspondence. The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Stenson) protested against certain persons being called traitors.

Mr. TAYLOR. Cravens.

Mr. WALLACE. I would like to know what other term but 'traitors' would describe a man who is not loyal to his country, who is not loyal to the institutions under which he lives, who is not loyal to the country which provides him a very remunerative salary and emoluments. I would like to know what other term but 'traitor' will describe such a man who is doing all he can to injure the reputation of his own country. Such a man is a traitor to his country, and no other term will describe him. Sir, when we consider some of the statements made in this House by certain members, we can only believe that Canada looks with apprehension and alarm at the fact that men occupy seats in this House who so far forget their duty to their country and their allegiance to their Queen, as to be guilty of uttering such language in this British Canadian parliament. The speech of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) was in the first place an attack upon the policy of the government. Where is the reply of the government? Where is the Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden)? Where is our gallant friend the major from North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), who is so recently admitted a member of the Cabinet? Where is the Premier? Where is the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) who endorsed the member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) in resigning his seat, as a protest against the course which the government was compelled to take by the force of public opinion? In the case of some members of that government, I believe they took a loyal and patriotic stand, but in the case of others the reverse is decidedly the fact. Where is this Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) who introduced the member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) in company with the member for Laprairie (Mr. Monet), who used such disloyal language in this House? Sir, when I saw these three members coming together into the Chamber, I could not help thinking that they were three of a kind, all painted with the same disloyal sentiments to the country and to the empire. They say they are loyal to Canada. Nonsense. They cannot be loyal to Canada and disloyal to the other portions of the empire. We are one and indivisible with the empire, and disloyalty to one part of the empire is disloyalty to all. The whole speech of the member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) was a series of dissimulations. He had nothing in common with the Boers, neither race, language nor religion. His whole conduct, in my mind, is based upon one hypothesis. For eighteen years the Boers have evinced the most bitter hostility against the British Empire. They have been for eighteen years, as we know, planning, contriving, gathering up arms, and doing everything a nation could do to drive the British out of South Africa. We know that to-day. Britain perhaps should have known it better, as events were passing along; but there is no one to-day who does not know it. They were bitterly hostile to Britain's power, and I can only attribute the hostility of the member for Labelle to the same source—not sympathy with the Boers, but hostility to British power. The member for Laprairie comes out with it flat-footed. What does he say? He says in the letter that he wrote to his constituents:

I am opposed to the expenditure of one cent which has for its object to tighten closer the ties of Canada to Great Britain (except the commercial bonds which unite us to our mother country). We have almost nothing in common with the old continent.

I am a Canadian and my ideal is to see Canada rank among independent nations as soon as the vitality of its people and the immensity of its natural resources will have sufficiently developed our country.

What does that mean? He wants to see Canada an independent nation just as soon as we are strong enough; but he is willing that Canada shall be a sucker on Great Britain. He is willing that we shall enjoy the protection of the greatest navy in the world—and the greatest army in the world too, and the British consular power, and the great moral strength of the empire, with the influences that make Great Britain the dominating power she is in the world to-day. We are to have the full benefit of all this; and this loyal gentleman says we are not to spend one cent for Great Britain's power or strength, nor to bind closer the ties that bind us to the motherland. Why, Sir, a low-down policy, a degrading statement for any man to make, that we will take everything we can get from Great Britain, that we will suck the teats dry, but will not give a single thing in return; and then when we get strong enough to kick the motherland over, we will declare our independence and our hostility to the empire. That is the policy which the member for Laprairie advocates in this House, and the policy which the member for Labelle endorsed, though he had not the courage of the member for Laprairie to speak out his opinion. That is the policy of the government of the day, Mr. Speaker; else why did they, the day before yesterday, as announced in yesterday's Globe, make Mr. Bourassa one of the government whips, after he had made this disloyal speech in the House of Commons? Why, Sir, such a thing has never been witnessed before, if we except the fact that the member, who had attempted to bring discredit upon the government of which he was a supporter, was afterwards introduced to the House by a member of the same government. This gentleman, we are told by their official organ, was elected to be a government whip, a position of confidence and responsibility and honour in the ranks of the party to which he belongs. Such a thing, I think, has never been seen or heard of before in any representative parliament. The hon. member for Labelle spent a great portion of his speech in an attempt to show that the war in South Africa was an unjust war on the part of Great Britain. Why, Sir, he had no care nor consideration for that question at all. That was not his object. His object was to destroy the influence of Great Britain, to assist in discrediting the power of Great Britain and every one who has gone to the assistance of the motherland. What does he say in another place in his speech? He says:

When the first contingent went from Quebec, I happened to be there, and met several citizens who accused me of disloyalty—

They knew the man, evidently.

—and who told me that I was going there to sneer at the brave men who were starting for South Africa. No, Sir, I never blamed them or sneered at them, but admired them much more than I do the men who are the cause of their departure, but who have not gone themselves. A few days ago I read a despatch stating that at an engagement near Belmont some of our Canadian boys had captured a few prisoners, and that great was their indignation on discovering that these prisoners were British subjects. Poor, brave, straightforward boys. If they only knew the secret motives and reasons that are underlying this war, they would be much more indignant than they are.

I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that those boys who went out to South Africa were just as independent as the member for Labelle, that they knew the causes of the war just as well as he did, that they are a reading people and as intelligent a portion of the people of Canada as we can find, that they knew, too, what the member for Labelle did not know, or did not care to know, that the empire was in danger, that not only the Boers in South Africa, but the nations of Europe were uniting in hatred and hostility to Great Britain. They knew all these things, and it was for these reasons that they offered their services for the defence of the empire. As the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) says, it was not for pecuniary considerations. He cited instances of men who had left large properties and great prospects. He said that many of them had jeopardized, if not sacrificed their whole future career in order to go out and fight the battles of the empire. They were stimulated, Sir, by a sentiment that never existed in the breast of the member for Labelle. They had the loyal instinct which recognizes that no country has ever become great and powerful which has not loyal sons ready to defend her empire—that no country will ever amount to anything where this spirit of patriotism and loyalty does not inspire the minds of its people. The hon. gentleman says, 'If these men only knew the secret motives and reasons.' They do not require to know any secret motives and reasons. They knew the great broad fact that England's Empire was threatened. The hon. gentleman as he talks further, opens his mouth a little wider, and says some things which he had not said or which he had denied before. He says:

I am opposed to militarism. I am in favour of a policy which will induce the youth of this country to go on the farm, to go and work peacefully at intellectual or manual work; but I am opposed to giving the young men of this country too much inducement to go into the army. We are expending millions to bring foreigners into this country. I am in favour of that policy and am opposed to the policy advocated by the Montreal 'Star' of sending our soldiers out of this country.

The preaching of these men has apparently borne fruit. A gentleman from Montreal, whom I do not know very well, has sent me a statement which shows the practical result of the preaching of such men as the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) and the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Monet) and, as they claim, the right hon. the First Minister. I do not know if this statement is correct or not, but it was sent me by a gentleman of repute, and it says :

The officers of the first contingent were forty-two, of which six were French Canadians. The officers unattached seven, French Canadians one; staff-sergeants seven, French Canadians one; non-commissioned officers, rank and file 989, French Canadians 45, and so on.

So that if the French Canadians have not taken the same active part, have not been inspired by the same motives as other citizens of Canada, it is simply due to the preaching of such men as the hon. members for Labelle and Laprairie and the Minister of Public Works and other members of the government of Canada.

I listened with much pleasure to the speech of the hon. member for Kent, N.B., (Mr. McInerney), a loyal citizen of Canada, recognizing his duty to his country, a speech which I am sure every loyal citizen of Canada will read to-morrow with the greatest pleasure. When we read such speeches as that, when we see every class attempting to close up the ranks and show that Canadians are loyal to their country and the empire, it is a most deplorable fact that opposition should come from the ranks of the government and of the supporters of the government. On this side, I venture to say there will be no such expressions of disloyal feeling as we have been compelled to listen to during some days past.

I do not wish to take up the time of the House any further, although I could take up some time criticising statements made by those gentlemen, but the task is so thoroughly distasteful that I do not care to undertake it. When we find men of this stamp giving utterance in this House to disloyal sentiments at a time when all Canada should be united as one man, at a time when there ought not to be a discordant voice in this country, when at such a time we find these men disturbing that harmony which should exist among the various portions of the Dominion, we cannot but deplore the fact. But these men will find that the great heart of the citizens of Canada is not with them. They will find that on this question we are as loyal a portion of the empire as exists to-day; and if sacrifices are to be made in the future, if the empire is still threatened, as according to Lord Rosebery's speech of to-day, it is, if dangers are imminent, Canada will regard no sacrifice too great to maintain the independence of the empire and its supremacy all over the world.

Mr. A. C. BELL (Pictou). I think that on one ground at least, Mr. Speaker, Canada may be congratulated, and that is on the fact that the discussion which has taken place on the motion of the hon. Finance Minister has resulted in showing that the parliament of Canada is practically unanimous on the subject of voting the money required to send the contingents to Africa. From the government side of the House only two members have given expression to any dissent; from the opposition side it is gratifying to observe that every one, without exception, is in hearty accord with the policy of the government. It was hardly to be expected, owing to the discussion that took place in the press before the first contingent was sent, and the utterances which fell from certain members of the government and certain gentlemen supporting the government, that so happy a state of affairs would have been exhibited, and, therefore, I think that those of us, who are and always have been thoroughly in accord on this subject, have every reason to congratulate the country and the government on the fact that Canada is practically unanimous upon this occasion. I am sure that nothing could be more satisfactory or gratifying to those who hold views favourable to the course taken by the government on this occasion, and for my part I feel as though it were a gracious act on the part of members sitting on the opposition side to find no fault whatever either with the government as a whole or any members of the government for any delay in the taking of any steps to send these contingents to Africa. It was fair and reasonable to expect that the government, holding the views they did, should have hesitated somewhat before deciding to commit Canada to the course we have taken, but I think that the fact that the government so correctly interpreted public opinion and sentiment is creditable to them, as also the fact that they acted as promptly as they did, because we must give them credit for having, once they decided to send the contingents, shown great activity and great efficiency, especially in the Militia Department, and the country has no reason to find fault.

It seems to me scarcely necessary to criticise any statements made on the government side in opposition to the policy adopted, so few have been the utterances in that sense. Such opposition has been limited really to two members, so that I think we might look upon these exceptions as simply proving the rule. The fact that only two members out of 213 have expressed any dissent whatever to the course taken by the government shows that this House is practically unanimous, as I believe the country is. I really think that I should not have spoken on this occasion, were it not for the fact that this strikes me as a very significant and gratifying event in the history of Canada and the empire. The day on which this House resolves itself into committee in order to pass this vote of $2,000,000 for the purpose of taking an active part in the wars of the empire will be looked upon in the future as a great and historic occasion, as the day upon which the people of Canada set their seal upon the idea of Imperial federation. I feel as though I should congratulate every member of this House, who has had the opportunity of participating in an event of such importance to us as a parliament. While we need not argue at all the question that our country in this matter is waging war in a just cause, I feel that we ought to congratulate ourselves upon the fact that our cause is so just. In this country, I say, we have every reason to feel that we are not straining our loyalty, not straining our affections to the empire in embarking as representatives of the people on an undertaking that we can look forward to with distrust, but we are taking part in what we must look upon as a duty to the empire. It seems to me important that we should not lose sight of the fact that in this vote, in this practical unanimity in the House as opposed to the opinions expressed either by the hon. member for Labelle or the hon. member for Napierville (Mr. Monet), practically, we in this country all hold the same views as to the relations of Canada to the empire, which have been gradually gaining strength and growing in vitality in this country for the last twenty-five years. I suppose this Imperial federation movement is a very old one, yet I cannot find any trace of it in English opinion much further back than 1874, and at that early date and for some years afterwards there was a strong tendency on the part of those opposed to that idea to laugh at it, to look upon it as a thing that was not at all a practical issue in politics. But to-day, so far as I can read the action of this parliament, so far as I can understand the sentiment of the people, we are all practically of one mind, we are federationists, we have all come to believe that the British Empire, or the country which we used to know as Great Britain and Ireland, with the outlying colonies has now become an empire, only one country. For that reason I think we ought all to be proud and pleased to take part in this vote, which we are going to pass to-day.

I know for my own part that throughout Canada so strong was the sentiment in favour of the action which the government of Canada are here pledging themselves to take, that even if the government had decided to adhere to the opinion which was freely expressed by the Prime Minister, that it was not competent for the government to muster forces and send them abroad, though the country might loyally submit to the ruling of the government in that matter, still there can be no question whatever that so unanimous was the sentiment in favour of Canada coming forward and taking an active part in the battles in which Greater Britain was engaged, that contingents equal in number, equal in efficiency, would have been sent to Africa at private expense. The very fact that one Canadian citizen alone is equipping at his own expense and sending to Africa a body of men equal to one-fourth of all those whom the country are sending, I think is sufficient proof that there is enough patriotism, enough devotion to the empire, enough enthusiasm in the ranks of the people of Canada to have equipped at least 2,000 men and sent them to the front. But while that, perhaps, would have been as large a service, and perhaps even a higher proof to our fellow-citizens in England of our devotion to the mother country, it would not have been so satisfactory in any respect to us living in Canada as is the course which the government is asked to take. I think they deserve high credit for their acuteness and the readiness with which they bowed to public opinion; and I am proud to see that the course they have taken in this regard is so thoroughly supported by the people of Canada. One of those that have spoken against it, with regret for what he thought the country required, with regret, perhaps, for the course taken by the government, has done everything in his power to assist the government in this matter, and it does him a great deal of credit for he has spoken against the resolution, he is going to vote for it. The other gentleman representing Napierville, even he may not vote against the resolution. He has expressed himself on it with a great deal of sincerity and honesty, and with a considerable amount of logical effect; but I do not know that even he is committed against it. I dare say we may have occasion to congratulate the country and the government, and the House, upon the fact that the resolution submitted by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), pledging this country, not only to-day but for the future, to stand beside the mother country in every great crisis of danger, has passed this House unanimously, without a dissentient voice. If so, I think it will be merely an expression given by the parliament of Canada of the sentiment of the people of Canada as a whole.

Now, Sir, I cannot for my own part feel disposed to admit that there is any disloyalty in Canada. I believe that in Canada to-day there is more unanimity, more heartiness, more loyalty, than ever existed even in the mother country at times of stress and of danger. We cannot all be expected to think alike. Even in England, even in any country of whose history we have any knowledge, there has never been a time when all were of one mind. In the United States during their great civil war, there were the Copperheads who did not think as the majority did. And when Great Britain was threatened with the Armada, there was not unanimity, there was a large portion of the population who dissented from the views of the majority. I believe to-day that Canada presents the proud spectacle of a united people whose only desire is to contribute to strengthen the arm and encourage the heart of the mother country. In this way everyone can contribute to secure for England and for Canada the safety, welfare and permanence of the British Empire, of which we are proud to form a part.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. CHAUVIN (Terrebonne). (Translation). Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville (Mr. Monet) referred, the other day, to a meeting held at St. Jerome, in the county of Terrebonne, I wish to read to the House the resolutions passed by that meeting, on the 21st December, 1899 :

Resolved, that the loyal subjects of Her Majesty, who compose this meeting wish to express, first, their deep gratitude for the benefits conferred on Canada, during her glorious reign, and more especially, for having endowed Canada with political institutions which have so greatly contributed to her development and prosperity.

That, in the conduct of her free and responsible institutions, Canada, as a self-governing colony, always aimed at developing her natural resources, extending her territory, drawing closer the bonds between the provinces and the various elements of the community, and that, while achieving that object at the cost of great sacrifices, Canada has been instrumental in making the empire greater and more powerful.

That they cannot too strongly emphasize the fact that in the protection afforded Canada by the mother country is to be found a safeguard and a guarantee which could be secured through no political change whatever ; that their present political regime commands their respect and most absolute devotion, inasmuch as the British parliament and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council have, under all circumstances, given full redress to the grievances of the various classes of the community and secured a faithful observance of such laws, statutes and constitutions as it has been Her Majesty's pleasure to confer upon and extend to Canada.

That the colonial policy of the British government, at the suggestion of Pitt and Durham, has ever resulted in giving this colony such self-governing power as were consistent with the rights and dignity of the British Crown, and that, as a matter of fact, Canada is in the full enjoyment of self-government with the exception of the treaty-making powers, and that of appointing the head of the Executive.

That such policy has contributed to the unification and strengthening of the empire, to a greater degree than could have been brought about by any direct or indirect interference with the public affairs of the Dominion ; and that this meeting are of opinion that such policy ought to be maintained in the future as in the past.

That this meeting earnestly pray for the success of the British arms in the Transvaal, and that their most sincere sympathies go forth towards the heroes who have fallen on the battle fields of Africa, for the honour of the British flag.

That they do not ignore the duty they owe their Sovereign ; but, that for the sake of that harmony which is so necessary to the unification and maintenance of the empire, this meeting deprecates any attempt at causing Canada to take part in any war, without the free consent of her government, under the sanction of parliament and of the electorate.

That they are of opinion that, Canadians, who have enjoyed the benefits of self-government for over half a century, are quite ready to take to their charge, the necessary expenditure for the defence and protection of Canadian territory ; further, that, in cases of emergency, under the sanction of parliament, they are willing to contribute to the defence of other portions of the empire, but that they cannot abdicate the rights of having a voice in the public affairs of the country, either in connection with the fiscal policy, or public works, and especially with regard to the policy of participating in the wars of the empire, a policy as to which the electorate were never consulted.

That this meeting wish to give a repeated assurance of their deep gratitude for the benefits conferred upon the country by Her Majesty, and of their entire loyalty to Great Britain ; and while praying for the success of British arms and for the maintenance of the empire, they say without hesitation that under the ægis and control of the constitution of 1867, which Her Majesty was pleased granting Canada, our country cannot but grow and prosper, provided that constitution be strictly adhered to and fully enforced in the spirit of the men who framed it, so as to be a guarantee of fair play and equal rights for all.

The members of this meeting think it their duty, before closing, to register here their impartial protest against the charges levelled at the French Canadian people by certain newspapers in the country. And look upon as the most dangerous enemies of British connection and of the maintenance of the empire those mischief-makers who do not scruple to provoke men who, through gratitude for the past and for the liberal construction put by the Imperial authorities upon the treaties and the constitution which protected them, and through their admiration for those British institutions which have proved so stable and so powerful, rank among the most loyal subjects of Her Majesty.

Mr. DAVIN. (Translation). What paper is that taken from ?

Mr. L. A. CHAUVIN. (Translation). From a Montreal paper, La Presse. By the resolutions now before us we are asked to vote a sum of two million dollars to defray the cost of the Canadian contingents. Now, in my opinion, it would be going against every principle of parliamentary government were we to sanction those resolutions.

It is within the province of parliament to give authority for making expenditures, rather than voting the same, after they are made. The plain duty of the government, under the circumstances, was to call parliament. Prior to making those expenditures, parliament should and could have been summoned.

In fact, hardly had the last steamer which was carrying away the second contingent, weighed anchor, when parliament was called together. Why is it that parliament was not summoned a month earlier, just as the British parliament was called to vote sums of money for this war?

The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) said that to call parliament in special session would have been more expensive than the cost of the contingents; but this is a puerile excuse, under the circumstances and in this serious crisis of our history; and had he called parliament in special session, I have no hesitation in saying that the government can depend upon it, the members of this House would have been loyal enough to come here and perform without any indemnity the duties they were called upon by the constitution to discharge. I am positive that had the government, after the example of the British government, called parliament, the members of this House would have volunteered their services, without asking for any indemnity, in order to meet here in special session and safeguard the rights of the constitution.

Mr. H. BOURASSA. (Translation). Hear, hear.

Mr. CHAUVIN. (Translation). We are told that the government were not ready with their measures, but even now the hon. gentlemen are not yet ready to proceed with the business of the country, and here we have to sit waiting for them to be ready, and doing half a day's work instead of a full day's work, as we ought to and as we are bound to, in the interest of the country. The government ought to have summoned parliament, and I doubt not that the hon. members of this House would have, out of loyalty, volunteered their services without claiming any indemnity, in favour of a cause which is of the utmost importance to Canada and to the empire at large. The principle at stake would have remained unimpaired, to the great satisfaction of the country in general, and especially, to the satisfaction of the province of Quebec, which is more jealous, than the other provinces are, of the rights guaranteed them by the constitution.

We are told that this is no new departure from the settled policy of the country, but that the government had availed themselves of this opportunity of offering of their own free will material help to the mother country, and to assist in maintaining the supremacy of the British flag in South

Mr. CHAUVIN.

Africa, thus voicing the devotion and loyalty of the people of Canada to Our Gracious Sovereign, whose armies are engaged in this calamitous war. I have no doubt that the government were actuated by such motives, but it is impossible to dissemble the fact that this movement has assumed an imperialistic shape and meaning, which cannot escape the attention of the people of the province of Quebec, in particular. The hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches are responsible for the turn assumed by this movement. Nobody has forgotten, for instance, the statements made by the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) in London, statements which strongly savoured of imperialism, and which were reported at the time by the press, without the right hon. gentleman ever having contradicted them.

Let us take the statements of the commanders of the Canadian militia, who also declared that Canada ought to be ready to mobilize 50,000 men, and even 100,000 men, to take part in the wars of the empire, and to fight England's battles.

Upon the occasion of the departure of the first contingent, the hon. the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Borden) is reported by the Montreal Gazette of the 31st of October, 1899, to have thus spoken:

Canada is now taking part in the wars of the empire, without any one being able to tell how it all came about; but we are all pleased that it did come about.

Take the statements made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Mills) who is reported to have said in the Senate:

No man in his senses would undertake to frame for the British Empire a constitution and say it should be governed by one or two legislative bodies, or a political body, or what its powers should be. It is only by the voluntary action and good sense and co-operation of the government of the United Kingdom and the governments of the different dependencies that you can gradually develop an Imperial constitution suited to the requirements of an empire such as ours.

And further on he added:

No doubt, in time an Imperial constitution will grow up just as the constitution of Great Britain has grown up out of the exigencies of the people and the requirements of the Imperial service, and I have no fault to find with men who perhaps have not reached or do not occupy the same standpoint that we do.

And still further:

And I say if there are men in Canada who think that before we undertake such responsibility that we ought to have an understanding with the Imperial government and ought to have a sort of Imperial constitution, in skeleton form at the outset, I do not quarrel with them. I differ from them. My opinion is that it is not in that way an Imperial constitution will grow up. I think it will be formed out of the exigencies of the situation and the demands of the public interest of the nation.

Let us also take the statements made on the floor of this House, this afternoon, by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell), who told us that we were making rapid strides towards Imperial federation; that we were federationists; that, so far as he read the action of this parliament and understood the sentiment of the people, this was but the first step towards Imperial federation, and that we, in our quality of members of this House, and as representatives of the people of Canada, ought to feel proud to be able to participate in this movement.

And outside this House, let us see what was said by the organs of public opinion in the country, and here is what the Montreal Gazette said, on the 10th February, 1900:

The current of Imperial feeling is too strong for his no precedent, and, in case of another crisis arising, it would simply be swept away, as Mr. Tarte's has been.

Here, the editor refers to the proposition of which the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) has given notice:

There can be no purpose in setting up a doctrine that, precedent shows, would be ineffective. The guarantee against a repetition of what has lately happened would be the defeat of the government on a direct vote censuring its conduct. That could not be obtained in the present parliament, and anything less is of no value.

Now, Sir, I say that all those articles, all those speeches, all those statements emanating from the hon. gentlemen opposite and from the influential organs of public opinion in this country clearly show that the people have good reason to believe that this movement means more than a simple offer of help in favour of Great Britain, but that it is a movement, a step of far wider significance, that it is paving the way towards a political change calculated materially to affect and modify the constitution of 1867; and that it constitutes a new departure in our policy, with a view to bringing about Imperial federation, a policy which will alter our political and military relations with the empire.

That policy of Imperial federation, as stated by several hon. gentlemen on the floor of this House, has been a policy of very slow growth, having been looked upon, for the last twenty years, as a thing that was not all a practical issue in politics. It may be said that those appeals in favour of that policy never found a responsive echo in the country. The people were distrustful of the very name of Imperial federation, still more than of the thing itself, and to use the words of the fabulist Lafontaine:

That lump of flour boded no good.

But since this war broke out we have apparently embarked with full sail in Imperial federation. Imperial federation has 'crept into the place' and we are now asked to put our shoulder to the wheel in order to give strength to that movement.

I think, Sir, that the crisis we are going through is not a proper time for attempting to frame a new constitution. Let us wait till this movement of sympathy in favour of Great Britain has cooled off—a movement which is most creditable to our English-speaking colleagues, and which we, French-speaking members, fully share in—and then will be the time for us, if need be, to lay the foundation of a new constitution. The electorate will have first to be appealed to, and parliament will be called upon to sanction it, after fully considering and discussing the matter. But, Sir, as I said, this is not the proper time for parliament to approach the consideration of such a momentous question.

Some hon. gentlemen have expressed surprise at the fact that the people are taking alarm at the present movement; but I may tell them that, if the people are alarmed, it is because the hon. gentlemen themselves have given ground for it by their reckless statements. If the people are alarmed, it is that the government have not been guarded enough in their statements, and that they had led the people to think that they were embarking in a new policy, which we have not yet had time properly to consider.

Let me tell the advocates of Imperial federation that they have no cause to feel elated at the part they are playing in this new movement, because, as things stand now, and as they would have it, Great Britain has the lion's share, the colonies having nothing but duties to perform, while every right is given to England. So long as the question of the representation of colonies in the Imperial parliament is not settled, the problem of Imperial federation will not have advanced a single step.

We have been told that the government had gone outside the letter of the law, but not beyond the spirit of the constitution. In this connection, Sir, allow me to refer to a statement made by the late Sir George Etienne Cartier, when addressing, in 1867, before a French Canadian audience at a meeting held at Ste. Rose, in the province of Quebec. This statesman, as I was told by a gentleman who attended that meeting, in order to induce his hearers to vote in favour of confederation, told them that never should they be called upon to give military aid to Great Britain. If I invoke here that statement, if I appeal to the authority of Cartier, it is in order to show in what spirit our people voted in favour of the constitution under which we now live; it is to emphasize the fact that, if the people of the province of Quebec under the circumstances, object to this new departure in our policy, it is because they are alarmed at the statements made by the hon. gentlemen opposite, or by some members of the cabinet, and by the public press. The people wish to be consulted and to have a voice in the framing of the new policy, before it is finally adopted.

Since I have mentioned the name of Sir George Etienne Cartier, let me further say that it was he who stated that our Gracious Sovereign had no more devoted, no more loyal subjects than the French Canadians in this country. The hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney) told us, this afternoon, that there were two great schools of thought in the province of Quebec in this matter of loyalty: the Liberal school of thought, and the Conservative school of thought. Let me tell you, Sir, that there is only one single school of thought in the Quebec province in the matter of loyalty, and the best representatives of that school are found in the ranks of the Roman Catholic clergy. The Roman Catholic church is a great school of respect; our clergy respect authority, and under the guidance of our clergy, well might the French Canadians exclaim with the Swiss patriots: 'We have given our souls to God and our bodies to the defence of the mother country.'

England is our mother country and we, French-speaking members need not go the round of our constituencies and take the stump in order to preach to our constituents, as the hon. member for Kent suggested, the gospel of loyalty to the British Crown.

But should Great Britain, without interfering with our constitutional rights and liberties, appeal to our hearts, in her hour of need, gladly would we respond to the call of the mother country, and in no haggling spirit. But if there is one thing more than another that we resent and which alone could estrange us from Great Britain, it is that systematic attempt on the part of some of our English-speaking fellow-countrymen at outraging our feelings and persecuting us in this free country of ours. And in this connection, Sir, I cannot let go unchallenged the statement just fallen from the lips of an hon. member of this House who seems to have made it a specialty to outrage the feelings of the French Canadians. That hon. gentleman stated on the floor of the House that the French Canadians had not taken the same active part as other citizens of Canada, and that the number of the French Canadians gone to South Africa with the two last contingents is not in proportion to the number sent by the other elements in this country. This is not the place for figuring that out; still, it would be interesting to find out the number of English-speaking volunteers of Canadian birth who have left with the two contingents. Should the hon. gentleman take the trouble of looking up the records, perhaps he could tell us what is the proportion of English-speaking volunteers of Canadian birth, compared with that of the French Canadians, who have enlisted to serve in South Africa. The hon. gentleman would perhaps find out that the number of French Canadian volunteers is equal to that of English-speaking soldiers of Canadian birth who have gone to the war.

But, Sir, it is upon the return of our soldiers from South Africa that their services will be duly considered, and I have no doubt that the French Canadians enlisted in those two contingents will not come last. Let us, in passing, bow to the sons of two hon. members of the Upper House: the son of the hon. Speaker of the Senate (Sir Alphonse Pelletier) and the son of the hon. Senator Fiset; and may the conduct of these two French Canadians on the battlefields of South Africa be a credit to the Canadian name and to the British flag.

Mr. G. E. CASEY (West Elgin). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, if I take the liberty of addressing the House in French, it is not that my French Canadian friends in this House would not understand me better in English; but because I wish to claim my right, as a Canadian, to use either of the two official languages of the House.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle). (Translation.) Hear, hear.

Mr. CASEY. (Translation.) I do not intend to follow the speech of the hon. gentleman for Terrebonne (Mr. Chauvin); but I only wish to remark that he occupies exactly the same position on this question as two of his friends on this side of the House, I mean the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) and the hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville (Mr. Monet).

As to the question of loyalty, I do not accuse the hon. member for Terrebonne of being disloyal—I think he is as loyal as ourselves—but he occupies exactly the same position as those two hon. gentlemen who have been declared disloyal by the hon. gentleman's leader (Sir Charles Tupper) and by his deputy-leader, the hon. member for West York (Mr. Clarke Wallace). If the hon. gentleman bows to the ruling of his deputy-leader, he is bound to consider himself as disloyal.

Sir, the French Canadians are as loyal to the empire as their Anglo-Saxon fellow-countrymen, and, what is still more, as those of Irish origin. I even dare say that they are as British as ourselves. And why not? Are they not, for the most part, descended from the Celtic people of Brittany and from the Normans? The inhabitants of Ireland, of Wales and of Scotland belong to the same race as those of Brittany.

The Celts were the first people to settle down in the British Isles. The ancestors of the French Canadians were Britons, like the Welsh, the Irish and the Scots of our times. A portion of the people of the British Isles spring from people who migrated, a few centuries ago, from the French provinces of Normandy and Brittany. There was in England, nine hundred years ago, a people which was very nearly related to the Dutch and their descendants, the Boers. The Normans invaded their country and became the dominant race. Nowadays, what is there more British, nay, more English, than those aristocrats who boast of their Norman descent? Could not the French Canadians as well become British?

But, apart from the question of race and origin, I think that our French Canadian fellow-citizens are British in their sympathies and thought, and in the knowledge of the principles of responsible government. So, for instance, they have always claimed the purely British right of grumbling. Never did the French Canadians prove more truly British than when they fought against English bureaucrats, in order to conquer the advantages which the British governmental system procures, by claiming, in 1837, the enforcement of British constitutional principles.

We have been told, Sir, that the present war is not a war waged for the benefit of Great Britain alone. As a matter of fact, it is a war which concerns the closer union of the British people inhabiting the empire, Greater Britain, and I believe that the sympathies of our French Canadian fellow-citizens are as strong in favour of the success of British arms as those of any British citizen in this great Dominion of ours.

Mr. Speaker, having claimed my right to use a language which is not habitual to me, I beg leave to say a few words in one in which I may express myself with greater freedom. I shall avoid, if possible, repeating too much of what I have said already, but I may have to touch on some of the ideas. The discussion, up to this point, has been rather a cool and matter-of-form affair. It has been so, because, as my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Bell) has properly acknowledged, there is a practical unanimity in this House and in this country on the question of granting this money for the Canadian contingents. But it is time, perhaps, that warmer words should be said on both sides of the House than have been uttered hitherto. I am afraid that some of the leaders on the other side of the House have mistaken the sentiment of the country, in that they have limited themselves to pointing out what they considered faults in the method of conducting the arrangements for this contingent on the part of the government, and have failed to give due credit to the government and to both sides of the House for the universal spirit which has moved the whole country. I think that, from this period of the debate onward, following still the sound advice of the hon. gentleman from Pictou, we should drop accusations of disloyalty, should drop claims of superior loyalty, and make it evident to the world at large that we are all united on this great question.

There is only one voice of the people in regard to this grant of money, and I do not see why it should be obscured in this House by petty wrangling. That feeling is that we are ready to vote these millions, and more millions, and as many millions as the government of the day may think it necessary to call for in order to give whatever aid is required for the armies of the empire battling in South Africa. That I take to be the voice of English and French, the practically unanimous opinion throughout the country. I do not say it is absolutely unanimous—no public opinion is unanimous. Even in Great Britain itself there is not a unanimous opinion in regard to this war. We have heard gentlemen accused across the floor of being disloyal because they have indulged in the mildest form of criticism on the action of the government. What is the strongest position adverse to the government action that has been taken in this House? It is that this war is due to Mr. Chamberlain's mistake in diplomacy; that if the diplomatic negotiations had been properly carried on this war might not have occurred; that it was all Mr. Chamberlain's fault that there is any war; that when the war broke out it was not proper for this government to send men and spend money without consulting the parliament of this country. That is the strongest position taken in this House, and what does that amount to? It does not amount to one-tenth of the criticism or bitterness that has been given voice to on the floor of the British House of Commons. Only the other day in that House, 125 members, I think it was, voted that it was time for the war now to cease, that it was time to make peace with the Boers in the best way possible. I think that was the drift of the motion proposed, though I do not profess to remember its exact terms—

Mr. WALLACE. That was not it at all.

Mr. CASEY. I bow to the superior knowledge of my hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace). Now, Sir, in taking the course some hon. gentlemen in this House, and some outside of this House, have taken, what have they been doing? They have been simply exercising the British right of free speech and free criticism of the government of the day. To say that the most severe criticism of the government's action, to say that the most severe criticism of the conduct of the British government in this matter, carries the least shadow of disloyalty with it, is an absurdity which only requires to be pointed out. Even that mild form of criticism, as has been already remarked, has been extremely rare in this House. The House is practically unanimous.

And why? Is it because we consider that the empire is in danger? No, Sir. I do not think it is. I do not think that anybody considers that the empire is in danger. But there is one thing quite certain, and that is that the existence of the empire is at stake. The existence of a nation may be at stake in a contest without being in danger. We have no doubt that British arms will eventually succeed. If British arms were to fail, there is no doubt that the victory of the Boers would be the beginning of the dismemberment of the British Empire. If the great Britannic power were unable to protect its colonies in farthest Africa and America, in Australia and the islands of the sea, the crumbling of that empire would begin. It is because the empire is at stake that the people of this country are so unanimous. It is not because we are all English, it is not because we are all British—that is, by race. Why, Sir, those of us who are of Irish race believe that in the past—some of us believe that in the present—there is not a great deal of reason to thank England for her treatment of us and our country. But when it comes to an Imperial question that involves the interest of all the British peoples, who are more loyal than the Irish? One of our poets has said, when replying to the accusation of disloyalty against the Irish soldiers in one of the battles in the Transvaal 'Go ask for the names of the dead.' That is the point. Who were those who gave their lives on that occasion? The list is made up almost entirely of Irish names similar to those that have been associated for generations with rebellion against England, and with discontent in Ireland down even to the present day.

I believe that in the conception of the great Imperial idea the people of Canada are far in advance even of their brethren in the British Isles. It is difficult for an Englishman to conceive of the extent of the empire to which his little island gives the name. It is difficult for him to conceive of the various interests involved in that empire, the different peoples who compose it and who claim to be British subjects, all now justly claiming to be British citizens also. I say that in the comprehension of the Imperial idea we are ahead of our friends at home, and that we are teaching them by many things we are doing, even in this House, perhaps most strongly of all by our conduct on this occasion, that there is a greater Britain infinitely more important as we believe, certainly more extensive than Great Britain herself.

Some people do not like the names of Imperialism, of Imperial federation and of empire. I confess that, although I like the things signified by these names, it seems to me that a better name could be found than the name of 'empire' for the British people, or the name of 'Imperialism' for the policy which has now become so general throughout that nation. The word 'empire,' from the time of its Latin origin, has signified military conquest and the subjection of foreign peoples by the strong arm. That word properly describes our government in India, but does not properly describe the condition of any British colony. We are not a conquered people; we are not military subjects of Britain; we are not subject to the empire—we are partners in what I think it would be proper to call the great British Commonwealth, the unity of British people all the world over. It is, perhaps, largely due to a certain poet whom I need not name that this great idea of Imperial unity has come home more to the masses lately than before. But the spirit has been growing among the British people the world over that British territory is one and indivisible wherever it may lie, whether in South Africa or in the Yukon, whether in Australia or in the islands of the South Sea; that the British people are one and indivisible and that the British people own the British territory. When I speak of British people, I mean, as I hope I have pointed out, not only those who have had their origin in the British Isles, but all those who live under British institutions, who have shown their appreciation of the British constitution, their adaptability to it, their fitness for self-government, and their ability to take part in great national movements. I mean not only the peoples who live in Canada, but the people who are the farthest possible removed from the common race, who have been brought under British rule and who have imbibed the British spirit. The self-governing colonies under the British flag are inhabited by the British people, and it the duty of any one of these, if the territory of any other such colony is invaded, to come to the rescue. It is all one common heritage and we are all common owners of it.

I do not think that enough has been made of the peculiar origin of the present war in Africa. A great many people, even in Canada, seem to be carried away with the idea that this is really a war of aggression, planned by Mr. Joseph Chamberlain and brought about by his diplomacy in order to annex these two little republics in South Africa; that these are really independent, self-governing republics, controlled by people who are civilized in our sense of the word, and that they are doing a good work for civilization and for the world at large. It seems to me that the very reverse is the case. The only fault that I can find with British diplomacy in the matter is that these so-called republics were not brought to their senses sooner. When the negotiations began, they were unduly protracted by British statesmen in the expressed hope—I believe in the real hope—that war would be unnecessary, that these people could be induced by negotiation to act up to the letter of their contract, and to give fair-play to British subjects within their boundaries. They were delayed too long; the Boers were simply protracting the discussion in order to load themselves up with all manner of quick-firing guns, heavy artillery and the latest kind of rifles, and when they were ready—not when England was ready, but when the Boers were ready—the war began. How did it begin? On twenty-four hours' notice there was an invasion of British territory by the Boers, of territory in which you and I, Mr. Speaker, and every inhabitant in Canada, can claim a share as our heritage, an invasion of the territory of the British Empire. What was the nature of that invasion? Was it an invasion merely for the purpose of protecting their citizenship and getting better terms for their respective countries? No, Sir; it was an invasion for the declared purpose of annexing all that part of South Africa which is now under the British flag, and the first move was to occupy part of that territory. Their next move was to proclaim the annexation of large districts either to the Orange Free State or to the Transvaal. It was a war of aggression for the purpose of stealing territory on the part of the Boers, and not on the part of the British. In a war of that kind I think there is no doubt that all British peoples must sympathize with the people of the South African British colonies, and of the empire which is bound to stand at their backs and help them to defend themselves. This is a war of defence by one of the British peoples, by a member of the family of British nations, and as a member of that family we are ready to go to the front and help them.

I said, speaking in French, that I felt convinced that our fellow Canadians of French origin, would feel as warmly in that direction as anybody else when they fully understood the circumstances of the case. In fact, I have heard a great many of them declare that it was quite enough for them to know that the mother country was at war; they did not require to hear all the details of the case because they were ready to go to the defence of the motherland when it was attacked. I have also said, in what perhaps might better be described as the dual language, that I considered our French Canadian fellow-citizens to be as British in their sympathies and thought—even in their race, descended as they are, from the Celtic people of Brittany and from the Normans of another part of the French coast—as any people inhabiting this Dominion of British birth, and that whenever an attack was made on the empire, whether British in their descent or not, they would be found British in their attitude towards this question.

There is a peculiar characteristic about Canadian loyalty to the mother country and to the Crown, which makes this, I think, by far the most loyal portion of the British Empire. We have been very well treated by the home government for a long time back, since the time when some of our French Canadian friends assisted us to demand constitutional government. For a generation and a half, or two generations, there has been no cause of difference between us and the British Crown. During that time the Crown has been on the brows of a Queen who has commanded the awe and respect of all nations, and not merely of her own. Joined with these considerations is the fact that we are far enough away from the headquarters of the government to see none of what I might call the stage machinery. We look upon the Crown and government of Great Britain with the sentimental respect which is due to the historical associations of the great past as well as of the great present, and nothing that is petty in connection with the government comes under our notice. Our loyalty is therefore more general, more free from anything small, than you will find in any part of the British Isles themselves. I believe that is the verdict of Canadians who have travelled there, and of British people who have travelled here. It is showing itself, in the present instance to be even more spontaneous than that of the British Islands. This government has been accused of being slow to act, but it has been proven on the floor of this House that this government did all that was suggested to it to do in the first place. The offer which was made subsequently was not accepted for some little time, and when that offer was accepted, the second contingent was ready at the fall of the hammer, so to speak.

Nay, more! We have reason to congratulate ourselves on the fact that the gentleman who is our representative in England, though not a Canadian by birth, but all his life identified with Canada, and who obtained his place in the British peerage on account of the distinction he gained as a Canadian citizen, has performed an act which has not only covered his own name with glory, but which reilounds greatly to the glory of this whole country. One of the youngest of the peers, a man who had made money by his own exertions in the first place, and by his great business intellect afterwards, has done more for the empire in this way, than any of the longest descended and richest peers of the realm. This is a thing of which Canadians are proud. Then, the request for money for the Patriotic Fund, a fund intended for the benefit of the families of soldiers who have gone to the front, and for the soldiers themselves when they come home, if there is anything left over, has met with a response which has been remarkably quick and ample throughout the country. This is not the first instance in which Canadians have shown their loyalty in this particular manner. It has been brought to my recollection, only to-day, by an item which I saw in the St. Thomas Journal, that so long ago as the Crimean war, a patriotic fund was started in Canada for the benefit of the widows and orphans of that war. At that time, 45 years ago, £28,000 sterling were raised for that fund in the old provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, partly by a legislative grant, partly by municipal grant, and partly by private benevolence; and £14,000 were subscribed in the colonies down by the sea, the people of those provinces contributing much more largely in proportion to their numbers than did the people of the other provinces. The sum total contributed then from Canada was considerably over $200,000. Such a large sum, coming from Canada 45 years ago, proved that the sympathies of our people were aroused on account of a war of a different kind from this one; a war in which the colonies of the empire were not at all concerned. That being true of the Canada of 1855-57, what may be expected from the Canadian nation of to-day, in the way of patriotic contribution and personal and private help? I have detained the House perhaps too long with my double-barrelled remarks, but I hope, Mr. Speaker, that when this debate closes the general impression left on the people of Great Britain, and on the people of foreign nations will be, that the voice of Canada is loud, unbroken, solid, and firm in support of the policy of the Canadian government in this particular respect.

Mr. E. F. CLARKE (West Toronto). With the closing remarks of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey) I quite agree. I agree with him in the hope that at the close of this terrible war, the feeling left will be, that the voice of Canada is as one voice, and that the action taken by the Canadian people is the action of a united people. I also agree with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey) in his remark, that there is practical unanimity in the House and in the country as well, as to the question of voting the sum of money asked for in the resolutions under discussion. But, Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey) and with some other gentlemen who have addressed you, as to there being unanimity in the country or in the House either, as to the wisdom of the policy which the government has pursued in this matter. When this parliament last assembled, there could be no reasonable doubt as to the feeling which then permeated its members. The House unanimously passed resolutions in reference to what was then a very grave question, and which has since resulted in this deplorable war; resolutions which did credit to the parliament of Canada, and which fairly reflected the views of the Canadian people. Sir, these resolutions gave no uncertain sound. They were unanimously passed in this parliament. They declared that the cause of Britain was the cause of justice; they declared that the Transvaal Republic was perpetrating gross injustices upon the Uitlanders; they declared that Britain as the supreme and paramount power had the right to interfere for the protection of our fellow subjects, who were entitled to all the rights and liberties and privileges which British subjects enjoyed in every other part of the British Empire. Sir, the right hon. the Prime Minister on that occasion announced that the cause for which Great Britain was contending, the cause of the Uitlanders, was a noble cause, a moral cause, and a just cause; and in giving utterance to these sentiments the right hon. gentleman expressed the opinion prevalent throughout the Dominion of Canada.

It is because that in my humble judgment the voice of the Canadian parliament, as it was then expressed, was not given effect to in a more potent manner by the government, since the House was prorogued, that I find fault with the government. It seems to me that the government, instead of acting promptly, and instead of acting with one accord, hesitated, vacillated and oscillated before they did what I believe was their duty to Canada and to the empire. The government did not present a united front to the people of Canada. Members of the government; important members of the government made declarations in the province of Quebec and elsewhere which showed that they were not in accord with the resolutions which were unanimously passed by this House last session. Obstacles were thrown in the way of those who desired to prove their fealty to the empire when offers were made by loyal Canadians to enlist in the service of the Crown and fight side by side with British soldiers in South Africa. It is a lamentable thing to find, when we look at the official report of the correspondence between the colonial and the Imperial authorities—I say it is a lamentable and a deplorable thing to find that Canada lagged in the rear in making an offer of assistance to the empire in its time of need. The action of the Canadian government was not in accord with the action of the Canadian parliament last session. I repeat, that in my humble judgment, it is a matter for regret, a matter for which the government will be held responsible by the people of Canada, that they did not supplement the resolutions which were passed last session, and that when this unfortunate war did break out, and when British territory was unjustly invaded, the Canadian government did not at once offer men and money to assist in maintaining the supremacy of the British flag in South Africa. It is also a matter to be regretted, that more than three months elapsed from the time that the first colonial offer of assistance was made on July 11th by the Governor of Queensland, before even a qualified offer of assistance was made by the government of the Dominion of Canada to the motherland. In my humble judgment, Sir, Canada did not occupy the position which she should occupy in view of the professions of loyalty which this parliament had given expression to less than three months before the war broke out.

The constituency of which I have the honour of being one of the representatives, would in my humble opinion have been much better pleased with this government, had they asked the Imperial government to be permitted to send a contingent equipped with all the necessary material, and to pay all the expenses of the Canadian soldiers of that contingent during the time they were operating in South Africa. That was the wish of the great majority of the people whom I represent, and, they are not satisfied with the course which the government has so far pursued in this matter. I am pleased that even at the last hour, goaded to it by public opinion—because it was the loyal public sentiment of Canada which goaded the government to action—I am pleased that at last they did agree to send one or two contingents, but I hold, Sir, that what is done quickly is done twice, and that the hesitation of the government, the vacillating policy it pursued, the doctrines and opinions which were enunciated by some of its prominent members; rather put a blot upon the fame of Canada, and rather discounted our loyalty to the motherland, of which we make professions from time to time. It seems to me, Sir, that the course of the government in this matter will not commend itself to the great majority of the people of this country, and that when an appeal is made to the electorate of Canada, the government cannot expect a loyal and hearty support from those who believe that its action was not in accord with its professions. An attempt has been made, in the course of this debate, to prove—I have not had the pleasure of hearing all of the speeches, but I read some of them—that the government of Canada had no right to interfere, and that the British Crown itself had no right to interfere in the internal affairs of the Transvaal. But, Sir, the speeches which have already been made—especially the speech made by my hon. friend from Kent, N.B. (Mr. McInerney)—have completely dissipated any argument such as that. Lord Derby, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. McInerney) has pointed out, in the House of Lords in 1884, ridiculed the idea that Great Britain had abandoned the suzerainty of the Transvaal, and declared that Great Britain continued to be the paramount power in South Africa; and because the cause of Great Britain was a moral cause, a just cause, a noble cause, there should have been no hesitancy on the part of the government to take the earliest and promptest steps to show the loyalty of Canadians by sending a fully-armed and equipped contingent to South Africa to fight side by side with the soldiers of other lands.

Mr. WOOD. Didn't they do it?

Mr. CLARKE. They did it when compelled to do it, but they did it in a half-hearted manner; and in the sister province of Quebec one of the members of the administration apologized for the action of the government, and tried to minimize that action as much as possible.

Mr. WOOD. You wanted to send a contingent before war was declared.

Mr. CLARKE. I am glad to see that my hon. friend has found his voice again—he has been very quiet of late—and I shall be happy to give him an opportunity of addressing the House after I shall have concluded my remarks. But I repeat that the action of the government was taken in a half-hearted manner, and was not taken until the public opinion of Canada forced it; but the people of Canada generally would have been better satisfied with the government if, when they decided to send a contingent to assist in maintaining British supremacy in South Africa, they had not hesitated to bear the expense of that contingent, as other colonies and dependencies of the empire were doing. My hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Wood) asks, did they not send a contingent? They permitted a contingent of British subjects to go as British soldiers to fight the battles of England in South Africa. They could not very well refuse to do that; but that was only done three months after the first offer of troops was made by another British colony.

Mr. WOOD. The hon. gentleman does not mean to say that it was three months from the time war was declared by Mr. Kruger before a contingent was sent from here.

Mr. CLARKE. I mean to say that it was more than three months after the first offer of assistance was received from other colonies of the empire before an offer was made by the government of Canada to send assistance. On the 14th of October the organ of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) made this statement:

The government had to decide between two policies—the official sending of a contingent at the country's expense or the payment of the passages and the clothing of those who have manifested a desire to go and fight in the Transvaal. The absence of the Prime Minister prevented the cabinet from coming to a decision before last evening. The sending of a contingent was put aside, but the government thought it could not refuse to pay the expenses of passage and equipment of volunteers anxious to enroll beneath the colours of the British army. The decision reached by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his colleagues does not in any manner pledge the country to any action for the future.

I speak subject to correction, but I have not seen that that statement has ever been withdrawn or repudiated. That was the policy agreed upon by the ministry on the 14th of October, and if the hon. member for Hamilton can take any comfort out of an action such as that, he is quite welcome to take it. But I say that that action was not the action which the great bulk of the Canadian people would have liked to see the government of Canada take. But realizing the privileges and advantages and blessings which obtain in this part of the empire, and feeling that the cause of the Uitlanders was the cause of justice and right, the government should not have hesitated to send a contingent fully equipped, and should have been ready to pay every dollar of the expense of that contingent from the time it left Canadian soil until its return. That was the action the great bulk of the people of Canada desired them to take. Not having taken that action, which was the right and proper and patriotic action, I cannot agree with the statement made by some hon. gentlemen on this side and by many on the other side of the House, that the policy of the government is acceptable to all the members of this House. That policy, for the reasons I have stated is not acceptable to me, although I am in duty bound to support the help measure now before us, and will cordially vote for the resolutions appropriating a certain sum of money to assist in the payment of these contingencies; and, if the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) speaks by the book in saying that the government of Canada are prepared to provide an additional sum of money, I wish to say that if I have a seat in this House when that vote takes place, it shall have my cordial support and approbation. But, in view of the credit which this government has attempted to obtain in this country, because of its so-called preferential tariff and its expressions of loyalty and fealty to the empire, its course in this matter was unworthy—was not such a whole-souled, straightforward course as will commend itself to the great majority of the people of this country. At the beginning, when the government were asked to send a contingent, why should the Prime Minister say that parliament had voted no money for the purpose? Why should he have put any obstacle in the way? If he knew the sentiment that prevailed throughout the Dominion, he must have known that no more patriotic action could have been taken—and in taking it he would have had the full sanction and approval of the leader of the opposition—than without waiting for parliament to be called together, to provide a contingent and equip it and pay its full expenses.

Now, there is just one word more I desire to say before taking my seat. The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Stenson) referred to the action taken by a section of the members of the Imperial parliament recently, when the question of supporting the policy of the British government was being discussed. I do not know whether we have any right to make reference at all to any action which any section of the members of the Imperial parliament may choose to take. In days gone by, as an humble citizen of Canada, I stoutly opposed the action of this parliament and the action of the Legislative Assembly of Ontario, in interfering in matters connected purely with the internal economy of the British Islands; but as the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe has referred to the action which certain gentlemen representing Irish constituencies recently took in the British House of Commons, I deem it my duty to say—and I say it as one who believes in Imperial federation, and who, until I can find a better name likes to call himself an Imperialist—that the Irishmen in the Imperial parliament who voted as those gentlemen did, were guilty, in my humble judgment, of a very reprehensible act. They grossly misrepresented the great majority of the people of the Green Isle. They tried to do an injustice to the brave men, from the leader of the Imperial forces in South Africa down to the humblest soldier of Irish extraction in the ranks, who have done and are doing such great things to maintain the supremacy of the Union Jack in that part of the empire; and, as one who believes in Imperial federation, holding as I do that the basic principle of Imperial federation is local autonomy, is home rule, I say that those gentlemen have justified, in some degree at least, the fears that have been expressed from time to time by Irishmen who are just as desirous of seeing their native land prosperous as are those gentlemen themselves. Such men belie the liberties of the people of Ireland and cannot safely be trusted; and until they recognize, as my eloquent friend from Assiniboia did to-day, the noble part in which Irishmen of both creeds have taken in uniting and consolidating the British Empire, and until they recognize that the greatest future of Ireland and her greatest glory can only be secured by that country being closely attached to the empire, they shall never realize the object they have in view. When men make a boast of their desire, to separate the Green Isle from the rest of the empire, they are asking something this generation never will grant to them; and, in pursuing the course they did the other day in the House of Commons, they are driving a nail into the coffin of Home Rule. Such a course is the one best calculated to defeat the object of hundreds of thousands of Irish Canadians who desire to see the same local autonomy given to Ireland that would be given to England and Scotland in a grand scheme of colonial confederation which would unite not only these three countries but the most distant colonies in one federation that will secure for all British subjects the advantages which follow from the domination of British institutions. I regret having taken so much time in digressing from the subject of this debate. I should with a heart and a half endorse the action of the government, if they had taken the course which duty and patriotism prompted them to take, had they reflected at once the views and desires of the great mass of the people of Canada by sending, not one or two or three, but as many contingents as may be necessary and providing every dollar of the expenses necessary for the sending of the contingents to secure in the Transvaal and every other portion of the British territory of South Africa for the British subjects who reside there the same privileges, liberties and rights that we happily enjoy to-day.

Mr. J. H. BELL (East Prince, P.E.I.). All portions of the Dominion, Mr. Speaker, appear to have been heard from except Prince Edward Island; and lest silence upon the part of the representatives of that province might be misinterpreted, I rise for the purpose of saying that in no part of the Dominion is there greater unanimity and greater enthusiasm manifested with regard to the sending of the contingents to Africa than in the Island province where I have the honour to represent a constituency. In no part of the Dominion are the relations between Canada and the mother country more clearly understood—in no part are the obligations which we are under to do our part in the great struggle in which England is engaged more keenly recognized. I deplore the statements which have been thrown across this House, from time to time, reflecting on the loyalty of a portion of the Canadian people. The loyal sentiment upon this question is practically unanimous, and that being the case certain members of this House might have manifested a little more generosity—aye—a little more justice to those who happen to differ from them with regard to the expediency of sending and paying these contingents. Sir, it has been said that the opposition to the sending of the contingents is confined to one or two members of this House, and to a very few people in the province of Quebec. I remember reading in the Star newspaper, when this matter was first prominently brought to the attention of the public. In that newspaper the question of the advisability of sending a contingent was put to prominent public men in different part of Canada. The mayors of three leading towns manifested their disapproval. In the province of Quebec certain newspapers, notably Conservative, were, in the first instance opposed to sending a contingent. Some prominent men in that province—men of both political complexions—hesitated to take a step the consequences of which they had reason to dread. It is but fair to say that the opposition to the proposition of the government was not confined to the province of Quebec or to the Liberal party of that province. It extended to other provinces and was shared by men of both political parties. But the number who manifested their disapprobation was a very insignificant minority, insignificant in this House and outside. In view therefore of the practical unanimity which prevailed throughout this country we could afford to be just and generous to the few who may have manifested different opinions from those entertained by the vast majority. In what way ought we to deal with people who entertain doubts and fears regarding our changing relations to the empire? Ought we to treat them as the leader of the opposition suggests as a sort of cancer in a body politic, and attack them with the surgeon's knife? Ought we to charge them with disloyalty as being enemies of the empire? That is not the proper course to pursue. The statesmanlike course is rather to demonstrate and emphasize our true relations to the empire and the nature and extent of the obligations which these relations entail, when the present and past and future benefits conferred by Britain upon Canada are fully recognized and felt, then all opposition to sending the contingents and paying the expenses will practically disappear. No honest man will object to pay his debts.

In no part of the world are the blessings and privileges of British rule more strikingly manifested than in the province of Quebec. I remember some years ago being in Europe and visiting Strasbourg, in the province of Alsace-Lorraine. In one of the courts of justice, a young man was brought up before a magistrate charged with a certain offence. He was fined twenty marks and sentenced to two weeks in jail. And for what? For singing a patriotic French song on the street. Another Frenchman in the same province was fined because, contrary to law, he had placed the word 'epicier' upon the sign that represented his trade. I could not help observing the contrast between the freedom that obtains in Quebec under the British flag and the oppression and restraint that prevail in a province of the German Empire. If you add to this the consideration that in Alsace-Lorraine the French language is prohibited, that a child of French parents is obliged to learn the German tongue; if you add the fact that a Frenchman is obliged to do military service, to spend three years in the German army in order to prepare him, perhaps, to fight against his own native country—if you consider all this, you will see what a striking contrast there is in the condition of affairs in that French province under the rule of Germany and that of a French province under the benign regime of British institutions. More than that, I think it must be manifest that even the French-people of Quebec are far better off under existing conditions than if they had remained colonies of old Mother France. What is the present status of the French colonies? Take Madagascar, or Tonquin, or Algiers—these colonies have no semblance of self-government. Their laws are made in Paris, the men who govern them are sent from Paris. All the institutions are primitive—the privileges of the people restricted. Add the fact that the French colonies are obliged to perform military service, and you will easily see that the condition of the people of Quebec to-day is far better and freer and happier than it would have been if they had remained colonies of France. It was a fortunate day for them when Providence cast their lot under the protecting folds of the British flag. Here they have their civil code and their national language—they have absolute peace—and the utmost civil and political and religious liberty. What more is there for the heart to desire? It is considerations like these that form the strongest argument in favour of sending the contingents. Those who oppose are not disloyal, but they are wanting in gratitude—they do not value at their true worth the great benefits that British institutions have bestowed. What is the cost of the British government of maintaining the British fleet? About $275,000,000 a year. What does that mean to the English people? It means something like $4.50 per head of her population. By whom is this heavy tax paid? It is paid by the British people, largely by the artisans and labourers, by men less able to pay it than the people of Canada. For what purpose is this fleet maintained? Is it to guard the shores of England? True, a portion of the fleet is required for that purpose, but only a small portion. It is largely—it is mainly for the benefit of the colonies that this large expenditure is incurred. We are not men, we have not a proper sense of our obligations, if we allow this condition of things to continue by which the people of England shall be compelled for all time to pay for the maintenance of England's fleet for the benefit and protection of Canada and the English colonies. Such a condition of affairs does no credit to honest Canadians. These will rejoice that an opportunity is presented by these resolutions of enabling them to contribute an instalment towards the payment of our national obligations.

Now, Sir, I would like to say a word upon a question which has been referred to in the course of this debate. It has been urged by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) that the cause in which England is engaged is an unjust cause, and that, therefore, the people of Canada ought not to be expected to engage in an unjust war or to make a contribution either of men or money to uphold an unjust cause.

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.)

That is his opinion. I would like just here to place side by side with that a statement I read in a newspaper a short time ago. It was to the effect that the Archbishop of Montreal was so convinced of the justice of the British cause, that on the 1st of January last, public prayers were ordered to be offered in Montreal for the success of the British arms in the Transvaal. We are not obliged, however, to inquire into the justice or injustice of the war. Why? Because Kruger himself has cut the Gordian knot of the difficulty. It was he who declared war, who invaded British territory, who destroyed British lives, who tore down the British flag, who annexed British territory. Under these conditions we are not called upon to inquire into the righteousness of the war. I would ask my hon. friend: Suppose the Boers had command of the sea, that they had sent over into this country their armies, that they had invaded Canada, that they had ravaged the province of Quebec, that they had overrun the riding represented by the hon. member for Labelle, that they had desolated the homes of the people, that they had torn down the British flag, how much time or energy would the hon. member expend in reasoning out the causes of the war? He would do, as he would be compelled to do, take up arms in the first instance and repel the invader, and re-conquer the territory. Apply the same considerations to South Africa. We are therefore relieved for the present from all obligation to inquire into the causes of the war.

But to satisfy the curiosity and appease the sensitive conscience of my hon. friend, I have no objection to go deeper into the question and inquire into the causes of the war. Sir, a great deal of stress has been laid by him on the suzerainty, as if it was that which determined England's right to interfere in the Transvaal. To my mind, the right to interfere does not depend on that alone. England is bound to interfere on behalf of the rights of her subjects, whether the Transvaal was a sovereign power or whether suzerainty existed. Further, the right to interfere depends not upon suzerainty, but upon compact. The relations between England and the Transvaal depend upon two conventions, one in 1881, and the other in 1884. What were these? Simply that England gave to the people of the Transvaal a charter, a constitution, not absolutely, but conditionally. If they did not fulfil the conditions they forfeited their charter, they forfeited their constitution, and the English government had a right to intervene and enforce the forfeiture. What were the conditions of this charter? One was that slavery was not to be tolerated; another that the Kaffirs were to be fairly treated. This agreement was violated. But the white people were treated worse than slaves. Now will any one say that under a fair interpretation of the charter the rights of the Kaffirs were to be respected and that no provision was made or contemplated to safeguard the rights of the white men? More than that, we find on examination of the document that this charter was given, not to a few burghers, not to an oligarchy, but to the whole of the people of the Transvaal. Then, what happened? The very moment the burghers got this charter they determined and attempted to create a monopoly, to form a close corporation, to have the privileges of civil rights confined to a few, and to exclude the great mass of the English people from the privileges of citizenship. This was in flagrant violation of the agreement under which all the inhabitants were to have equal rights. British subjects that were in the territory in the first instance or were invited in afterwards were entitled to the same rights under the constitution as the original burghers. But Kruger and his parliament trampled the constitution under foot. They declared that there should be only one religion in that country, that the Roman Catholics, for instance, should be excluded from the legislature as well as from citizenship. They raised nine-tenths of the taxes from British subjects, but refused them a voice in the disposition of the money. They invited immigrants into their country, they solicited people to come in and work the mines and enrich the country, but insolently refused them the right to vote. When these people complained, what was the answer given? Why, they were told that the money was invested in the purchase of arms, spent in the erection of fortifications, and if they did not mind themselves the guns from the fortifications would be turned upon them, and in that way they would be taught the virtue of silence and submission. In these and in other ways the burghers of the Transvaal state violated the constitution, and because they violated it the British government had the right and were bound to interfere on behalf of their subjects and enforce the provisions of the charter against the burghers.

I desire now to make a few observations upon the necessity of the war. The war was necessary—necessary for the purpose of re-establishing the reputation—the prestige of England in the Transvaal. I say that the war was necessary, it was also inevitable. It had to come; it could not be avoided. It was possible, of course, by diplomacy to postpone the war, but sooner or later the battle of the two races had to be fought to the finish. We can see now there has always existed a pre-determined and fixed intention on the part of the Boers to oust the British from South Africa. The English people have been slow to come to this conclusion. Mr. Chamberlain, however, was wise enough to look behind the scenes and faithfully interpret the signs of the times. But it is not until quite recently that the English people as a whole have come to the conclusion that the war was absolutely necessary in order to sustain British prestige and save British territory. British prestige in South Africa was on the decline—had been on the decline ever since Majuba Hill. It was on the decline among the Dutch, because, after Majuba Hill, the Boers got the impression that upon the field of battle, one burgher was equal to ten Englishmen. It was on the decline because the burghers had misinterpreted the magnanimity of Mr. Gladstone. Mr. Gladstone had acted, as he thought in the best interests of humanity. He had applied the charity and forgiveness and forbearance of the Christian religion. He had been magnanimous, he had been generous, but he was dealing with a people that did not understand his magnanimity or his generosity. He was dealing with a people that regarded his magnanimity as cowardice, and ever since, in the minds of the people of the Transvaal, there has remained the impression that the English were cowards. So, a feeling of insolent race superiority has arisen and been intensified. So the Dutch have formed the idea of becoming masters of South Africa and driving the hated and despised English into the sea. We have ample proof of this. Read the letter written by Sir Bartlett Frere in 1877, when the Transvaal was annexed. He tells the British government that the annexation of the Transvaal had created apprehension and dismay among all sections of the Dutch people in South Africa. Read the letter written by General Joubert to Lobengula, the chief of the Matabele, in which he says that it is the fixed intention on the part of the Transvaal burghers to blow the stink of the English into the sea. Consider the object of the Afrikaner Bund, with its motto of 'Africa for the Afrikaner,' but in reality, Africa for the Boers. Consider the treatment of the English by Kruger—treatment which shows a deliberate design on his part to prevent the English from getting a foothold in South Africa. Take the conduct of President Kruger at the conventions held in London and Bloemfontein, at which he refused to grant the slightest concession unless paid for by the express renunciation of English suzerainty. Look at the purchase of vast stores of modern guns and ammunition sufficient to arm the whole of the Dutch population in South Africa. What was meant by the drilling of troops by European officers and the concealment of modern weapons to evade suspicion? Read certain statements which appeared recently in the Pretoria press, where they complain of the action of the Afrikaner Bund. The Bund had promised 50,000 men and they had only sent 7,000. Look at the declarations of Kruger himself, when, after he declared war, he prophesied that within a certain time he would be in Durban, and another portion of his army would be at Cape Town. Do not all these circumstances point to a vast conspiracy on the part of the Dutch people of South Africa against British rule? Sooner or later the war had to come. The only regret is that it did not come after Majuba Hill, when it could have been fought on more favourable conditions. But, Sir, the time has come at last, the gauntlet has been thrown down. Britain must accept this insolent challenge and fight out the war to the very end. There must be no more Majuba Hills and no more conventions. No British government could survive for a moment unless it set its teeth and determined that this war shall never end until the British flag shall float in triumph from the Zambezi to the Cape, never again to be lowered in South Africa. Sir, the British people are determined that conditions shall never be again allowed to exist, when a state like the Transvaal shall be tolerated as an arsenal and a standing menace to the peace and prosperity of British subjects in South Africa.

Let me now refer for a moment, Mr. Speaker, to the resolution, notice of which has been given by my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). To my mind that resolution is useless and unnecessary. It is useless because even if it were passed, should the same conditions again arise, the government would be obliged to act in conformity with the conditions and in the face of the resolution. The resolution is therefore useless. It is also unnecessary, and why? Because the government have done all that is required to prevent its action being construed into a precedent. What course does the British government take under similar circumstances? It is often obliged to act as the Canadian government has done, and to take the responsibility of spending money which has not been voted by parliament. When an emergency arises, when perhaps a war is declared, when a famine occurs, the British government must needs take action immediately, and not wait for the convening of parliament. That is under the British constitution. Otherwise the constitution would be a menace instead of a blessing. How does the British government act when they have expended money that has not been voted? They take means to draw the special attention of the House to their action, either by mention of it in the Queen's speech, or by message, or by the introduction of a Bill of Indemnity. It is in this way declared and agreed that that which was done shall not be taken as a precedent. Sir, that is the course which this government has taken. They have called special attention to this matter in the speech from the Throne, and, as it were, admitted the irregularity of the procedure. They now propose to introduce a Bill the provisions of which are an indemnity to all persons who have in any way acted irregularly. Under these circumstances, the action of this government cannot be taken as a precedent, and consequently the motion of the hon. gentleman from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) is unnecessary.

The hon. member from Toronto (Mr. Clarke) stated that he was in accord with the resolution now before the House, and would support the voting of the money, but he was not in accord with the action of the government which led up to this resolution. What is his objection? He tells us that the Canadian government had not made an offer of a contingent for South Africa until three months after an offer had been made by Queensland. It was surely time enough for us to make the offer after the war was declared, and the necessity had arisen. It was surely more sensible to wait until war was declared and then to make the offer. That is what the government did. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clarke) raised another objection. He complains that the government did not act promptly enough, they waited until they were forced by public opinion to act. Suppose the charge were true, is it a political crime? Is it the function of the government to create public opinion? I do not believe that the government, even if it desired to do so, could create public opinion. The government can voice public opinion, but they are not masters so as to create it. They must wait till that public opinion has clearly manifested itself, then follow it and voice it. This is the democratic idea, as contradistinguished from the autocratic and insolent notion of some men who imagine they are born to rule—that they have merely to open their mouth and lo, public sentiment is forthwith created.

I wish to state in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that I am voicing the unanimous sentiment of the people of my constituency in the province of Prince Edward Island when I say, that they are all in accord, heartily in accord, enthusiastically in accord, with the policy of the government in sending a Canadian contingent to the Transvaal and paying the expenses.

Bill (No. 33) respecting the British Columbia Southern Railway Company.—(Mr. Prior.)

Bill (No. 34) respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Macdonell, Selkirk.)

Bill (No. 35) to incorporate the Comox and Cape Scott Railway Company.—(Mr. Morrison.)

TRANSIT OF GRAIN IN MANITOBA AND THE N.W.T.

Mr. DAVIN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 38) to regulate the trade in grain in Manitoba and the North-west Territories. He said: Mr. Speaker, I put the notice of this Bill on the paper for the same reason that I have put a similar notice on the paper in previous years, namely, for the purpose of being certain that this matter would be dealt with. In 1898, my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) had a Bill on the paper and I had a Bill on the paper in connection with this, and we thought that the legislation might be dealt with more successfully if it were left in the hands of one member from the North-west Territories, and so my hon. friend from East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) took charge of it. That Bill came to misfortune in 1898. Again in 1899, we left the Bill in the hands of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Douglas), and again the Bill came to grief. Well, Sir, I put this notice on the paper waiting to see if my hon. friend (Mr. Douglas) would put a notice on, and I find he did, and I have his Bill now before me. I have no desire to take this matter out of the hands of the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas), because my desire—and I believe it is the desire of other hon. gentlemen from the Territories who sit on that side of the House—our desire is to see legislation effected. The Bill of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Douglas) is before me, and if I move the first reading of this Bill, it is because his Bill is not quite satisfactory. It does not make the provisions that are necessary to meet the grievances, that are proved to exist by the commission which was appointed last year. Accordingly, I have drafted a Bill that has practically nearly all the provisions—not all, but nearly all—of the Bill of last year, and in addition to these provisions there are these clauses. First:

There shall be an officer, to be styled the General Inspector of the Grain Trade for Manitoba and the North-west Territories, whose duty it shall be to oversee the weights and scales used by grain buyers, and to investigate charges that false weights or scales, or defective weights or scales, have been or are being used, and who, on discovering that false weights or defective scales have been or are being used, shall report forthwith to the Attorney General for Canada.

The other clause which is new reads as follows:

Elevators built after the passage of this Act, used for the purpose of storing and handling grain for hire, shall be provided with machinery to enable the grain as hauled to be weighed and cleaned, and the resultant grain and cleanings severally weighed. The managers of all elevators having such facilities shall hand the farmer or other who has hauled the grain a certificate or wheat ticket showing the weight in each case, and stating the percentage of dirt. In a case where one of the existing elevators does not possess such facilities, then the buyer shall hand the seller a wheat ticket showing the estimated percentage of dirt. In testing for the purpose of arriving at the amount of damage a No. 10 tester shall be used.

Clause 10 reads as follows:

The grain buyer who stores the grain shall either give the seller a written contract that he will give him wheat of a given grade or else that he will put it in a separate bin, subject to his order.

Again:

No grain buyer shall deduct anything for shrinkage.

I think these clauses added to the Bill which met with general approval last year, will provide for any grievances that have been found to exist by the inquiry which went forward last year and in January of this year.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Mr. Speaker, I have no intention whatever of discussing at the present stage the Bill which the hon. gentleman has introduced; but it may be desirable, for the information of the members of the House who have not had an opportunity of following the progress of this matter, to state that in consequence of the Bills which were introduced by the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas), and which, as the hon. member says did not in any case become law, the government became convinced that this important subject required careful investigation; and during the recess a commission was appointed for the purpose of making an investigation. The late Judge Senkler of St. Catharines was appointed chairman of that commission, and the commission went to Manitoba and the North-west Territories, and made, I believe, a complete and thorough investigation of the whole subject. The untoward death of Judge Senkler, owing to a cold contracted in the prosecution of the work of the commission, has to some extent delayed the report of the commission; but another chairman has been appointed in the person of Mr. Justice Richards, of the Court of Queen's Bench of Manitoba, and we expect that the commission will report before a great while, and that we shall be able to lay upon the Table of the House the report of the commission, with the evidence taken. It is the intention of the government, in the light of the evidence and the report, to deal with this subject, and in that view of the case, of course, every member of the House will see that it is impossible for the government to express any opinion in regard to the matter at this stage.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 39) to amend the Act respecting the Senate and House of Commons.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Explain, explain.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I explained it the other day.

The PRIME MINISTER. I did not hear it.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY LAND GRANT.

Mr. RICHARDSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 40) respecting the land grant of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Explain.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, when the charter of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company passed the Dominion parliament in the year 1881, there was in it a clause, which still exists, exempting from taxation in perpetuity the company's property, including the rolling stock, right of way, capital, stations, station grounds, etc. That clause also exempts the land grant from taxation for twenty years from the date of the grant thereof by the Crown. I have gone carefully over the debates of the House which occurred when that charter went through, and there seems to have been no doubt whatever in the minds of any members of the House who participated in that debate that the twenty years' period dated at least from the time the land grant was earned if not from the time the charter was passed. It has come to my notice that some doubt exists in regard to the time when that exemption expires, and I have been informed that the late government took the view that it was a question which might be decided by the courts. I myself put a question on the Order paper a few days ago asking the government as to what their view was on that point, and the answer given on behalf of the government was that it was a question which would have to be decided by the courts. Now, I think, it was made so abundantly clear when the charter went through the House that the exemption should only be for a period of twenty years from the time the land grant was set aside for the use of the company, that the question should not in any way be referred to the courts, but should be settled by parliament at the present session, and it is for that purpose that I introduce the Bill now in your hands. The House will understand the desirability of having this question settled, and settled as quickly as possible, because the twenty years period will elapse in 1901, and inasmuch as there is a vast quantity of lands held by the company at the present time, it is particularly desirable that the question should be decided now, and not be dragged through the courts for four or five or six years.

These lands being located in the Northwest and the north-west now being rapidly filled up with settlers, it is particularly desirable that the lands in question should be taxable for the purpose of building roads, and for school and other purposes. When a settler gets a quarter section he has to pay his taxes, and I do not see why the Canadian Pacific Railway should not be held to the same liability. It is quite true that when the Canadian Pacific Railway, or any other company owning lands, sell a quarter or a half or a whole section to a private individual, the lands then become taxable; but should they revert to the Canadian Pacific Railway, they become non-taxable again, because that company, not having applied for a patent, assumes that until the patent is granted the lands are not taxable. Under the extraordinary interpretation which they place on this clause, namely, that until the patent is granted, the exemption period does not begin, the House will see that the exemption from taxation is probably in perpetuity. I am quite sure, from perusal of the debates, that the parliament of Canada never intended to indorse any such monstrous proposition, and I think it very desirable that the question should be determined by the highest court in the land by the parliament of Canada, which ratified the contract. For that reason I now introduce this Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE PACIFIC CABLE.

Mr. GEO. E. CASEY (West Elgin). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call attention to a matter, the importance of which justifies me, I think, in taking up the time of the House. It is one which involves, not only the interests of Canada, but of the whole British Imperial Commonwealth. I read in the Globe, on Saturday, the following special, copied from the London Times :

Melbourne, February 15.

The Victorian and the New South Wales governments have agreed to accept the Eastern Extension Company's proposals to lay a direct cable between the Cape and Australia. No contract has been signed, but the following terms are practically accepted: Australian military authorities to be consulted as to landing sites and shore ends; cable company, having reduced charges, cannot again raise them; company to be allowed to open local offices as soon as the Pacific cable or any other competing cable, is laid; meantime the reduced charges are to take effect three weeks after the contract is signed. In the Victorian Legislative Assembly Duffy and Gillies challenged the arrangements on the ground that they would injuriously affect the Pacific cable, which the colony is pledged to support. Mr. Watt, Postmaster General, replied that the government intended to adhere fully to the obligations of Victoria to support the Pacific cable, but wished in the meantime to give the public the advantage of cheaper cable rates.

It seems to me that this proposal of the Eastern Extension Company is an insidious attempt to get hold of privileges which may injuriously affect the building of the Pacific cable, and to get hold of such privileges from one of the Australian colonies, before federation is finally concluded in that great country, probably under the impression that they could make better terms with a single colony than with the whole federation. The bait of cheaper rates has apparently been used, and although the Postmaster General of the province has declared his loyalty to the understanding already arrived at concerning the Pacific cable, it is highly probable that if these cheaper rates are once established and this new cable laid, it will be very hard to get the general Pacific cable scheme carried out.

I therefore think I am justified in calling the attention of this House and the government to this report, and I shall conclude with the usual motion in order that the government and anybody else in the House may have the opportunity of expressing their views. I am sure that the hon. leader of the opposition, who has shown such a sincere interest in the matter all along, will be willing to assist in strengthening the hands of the government in any action they may take in this matter, a matter unanimously agreed upon by the whole House. I need hardly dilate upon the Imperial advantages of the Pacific cable scheme, as accepted by this House and by some of the Australian colonies and New Zealand. The present war and the exigencies which have arisen since it began, are proofs of the necessity of having around the world a cable entirely under British control. The home government should feel deeply interested in it, the colonies are no less interested individually, and Canada needs this cable, not only to ensure rapid communication with the mother country in case of trouble, in order to increase the protection which the mother country could give her—but also for commercial reasons, which have already been explained in this House. We are in a position to do an immense trade with the Australian and New Zealand colonies, if we only had direct cable communication, but until we have that, we cannot do that trade. Regular lines of steamships will not run where there is not regular and direct telegraphic communications, to enable them to stop at places on the route and obtain further orders as to their destination. We have a line of steamers subsidized by this government running to the Australian colonies. That line has not been the success it should have been, just for want of this cable communication. It is clear, therefore, that Canada has a very direct interest in carrying out the arrangements, which all the parties agreed to some short time ago. It appears now, as if this vast wealthy and influential corporation (the Eastern Extension Company) were trying to steal a march upon us, and cut away the probabilities of our carrying that scheme into effect. We all know the enormous influence which rich corporations have with governments. We need not go outside the boundaries of this country to point that out. We can easily imagine that that immensely rich cable corporation should be as influential with colonial governments, and perhaps the Imperial government, as other large corporations have been, pleading vested rights, and I do not know what else, and offering all sorts of baits like this one of reduced cable rates.

In view of all these considerations, I would like to ask the government whether they know anything more about this alleged proposal stated in the despatch I have read from the London Times. I would like to ask whether, if so, the case is correctly stated in that despatch; whether they have made any protest to either the colonial governments interested or the Imperial government in connection with the matter; whether the assent of the Imperial government to these proposed arrangements is necessary, and if so, do they know whether it has been asked for or obtained; have they protested against that consent being given, in case it has been asked for? Finally, I would urge them, if they have any correspondence on the general question of this cable construction since the date of the last return last session, to lay it on the Table of the House without the delay of putting a motion on the Notice paper and waiting for it to come up in the regular course. I think it is important that all the information the government have on that subject should be before the House and the country and the Imperial government, and that it should be known in England as well as in the other colonies, that we are inclined to take a stand in this matter, and that we object to having the bargain infringed upon or impaired by the action of anybody outside of Canada. I think that, under the present circumstances, Canada is entitled to have her wishes consulted and her interests considered in a matter of this kind. I have no doubt that the government are able to make the strongest representation of Canada's desires in the matter, and have done so, or will do so in the immediate future. I move that this House do now adjourn.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If I rise for a moment before the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), it is not because I am not anxious to hear what the government may have to say, but because I want to give my hon. friend the Postmaster General an opportunity of seeing the importance which I attach to the present position. I may say that I had a motion on the paper bearing on this question to a certain extent, asking that all the papers and correspondence be laid on the Table, because I was anxious at the earliest possible moment to draw the attention of the government to what I consider a grave and very important matter. The House will remember the unanimity in which we agreed to the proposals made by the Postmaster General last session in reference to this question. Now, after a considerable delay, which I do not intend to specially refer to at this moment, after the difficulties that at one time threatened this important question appear to be overcome, after the Imperial government, Australasia—or that portion of it which has taken an interest in this subject—and Canada had agreed practically upon the terms as originally devised as a matter in which all three of these parties were interested, and whilst the necessary time was being occupied in preparing that arrangement, it transpires that the Eastern Extension Company has made an application to New South Wales for the grant of very important concessions with reference to land lines and with reference to having collecting offices in certain portions of Australia. It appeared to me—and I wish to draw the attention of my hon. friend the Postmaster General, who has been especially dealing with this subject, to the point—that the moment an agreement was entered into between Her Majesty's government, Canada and Australia, to take this matter up jointly, it being a commercial undertaking of great magnitude, though involving, as I hold, no material liabilities, from that moment it was not legitimate, to use the mildest term, for any of the parties concerned to change the status quo by any concessions to the Eastern Extension Company that would militate against the financial success of the undertaking. Holding that opinion very strongly, I saw with very grave concern the statement that not only had the Eastern Extension Company made proposals to New South Wales and to parties who are interested in the matter in Australia to grant these concessions, but that Her Majesty's government had expressed concurrence in that being done. I could hardly believe that to be the case, because it seemed so at variance with anything like a business arrangement which had become absolutely one of partnership. It appears from the communication referred to by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) that Mr. Gillies, a leading and important public man in Victoria, Australia, has taken the ground that the proposal that is now under consideration would militate seriously against the Canadian Pacific cable project. Under these circumstances, I think the case calls for the prompt attention of the government and all concerned, so that no action may be taken by Great Britain, by Canada or by Australia that will militate against the success of the project or interfere with the arrangement entered into between the three parties. I hope that the Postmaster General or the leader of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) will be able to reassure us on that point, and to say that Canada will not consent to, and not only will not consent to, but will urge the strongest possible remonstrances against, anything being done either in Australia or with the consent of Her Majesty's government that would strengthen the hands of the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company, which has been the deadliest enemy of this Canadian Pacific cable project from the outset. That company has thrown the project back, it has interposed every conceivable objection. And, without passing upon the question of the laying of a cable from the Cape to Australia, I feel sure that the government will remonstrate in the strongest possible way to prevent any interference with the commercial prospects of this undertaking by concessions being granted to a company that has shown from the first that it was prepared to adopt any possible means by which it could obstruct and defeat the great policy undertaken by Her Majesty's government, Canada and Australia, to establish a Canadian Pacific cable.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). My hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Casey) has brought to the attention of the House a question of very far-reaching consequence, not merely for Canada or Australia, but for the empire. Although I cannot to-day lay the papers upon the Table, it may be reassuring to the House and to the country if at least I informed the House, in a brief way, what action the government has taken, and the views of the government with respect to the concessions which have been pressed for by the Eastern Extension Cable Company. I shall have much pleasure, with the consent of the House, in having copies of all the papers that may now be laid before the House, produced and submitted to-morrow. I am informed just now by the Premier that the leader of the opposition has a motion for these papers, and perhaps he could make his motion to-day so as to lay the foundation for my producing these papers to-morrow. In the meantime, I would state the situation of the matter, and the views of the government. It is correct that about the month of July last the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company made application to some of the Australasian colonies for certain concessions. The text of those concessions asked for has never been fully communicated to this government, but the substance of them has been communicated. This government put themselves in communication with the representatives of Canada on the Pacific Cable Commission Board in London, carefully studied the question, and has come to a definite conclusion upon the subject. These desired concessions, as the leader of the opposition states, practically mean that the Eastern Extension Company proposes to establish itself and to secure a foothold in Australia, where it may advantageously carry on competition with the Pacific cable, and compete with us in securing what may be legitimate traffic of the Pacific cable, and practically to set up a rival system in Australasia. The proposition, as I remember the details, is as follows:—The Eastern Extension Company propose to reduce the cable rates immediately between Australia and Great Britain from 4s. 9d. to 4s., and to secure a cable from Cape Colony to Australia at once. I believe that cable is now under construction. They propose to adopt a sliding scale which might or might not lead to a further reduction from time to time, to be dependent upon the financial results of the cable business, and to be ascertained at periods of three years. In return for these advantages the Australian governments were to grant concessions to the Eastern Extension Cable Company. The concessions were to allow them to establish collecting offices and otherwise to acquire facilities for gathering business in Australia. Now, it appeared to the government that action of that kind practically endangered the construction of the cable itself. It might be pointed out here that the land lines in Australia differ from those in Canada, in that they are under government control, and the governments that control the land lines or telegraph companies practically control the cable business. Now, it appears that if this Eastern Extension cable acquires the right from these Australasian colonies to establish offices, it will immediately develop interests in Australia, and will acquire a degree of public influence that will enable it to affect public opinion there. It will seek the influence of its patrons, and will be able to exert political influence with the community. It will doubtless make use of the press of the colonies, and gradually produce, perhaps, such a change in public opinion in Australia as may cause the governments, for the moment at least, if they are not prepared to abandon the Pacific cable policy, at least to consider the wisdom of delay. It is only a wise view to take, I think, that if the Eastern Extension Company is at the same time establishing itself in connection with the cable business in Australia, delay practically means defeat to the whole scheme. We have taken that view of it, and we take the further view of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, that the various governments that join in this scheme are partners, and the best of faith is due from one to the other, and none of the governments partners in this scheme should in the slightest degree alter the conditions without the consent of their co-partners. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition intimated that the Imperial government had given its consent to such a change. I do not know if that is correct, I trust there is no foundation for that fear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It was so rumoured.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am aware that it has been so rumoured, but it would come as a surprise. I think, and a shock to us here if we learned that any of these governments had really altered the conditions under which we came together, without the consent of the others. When the government came to this conclusion that I have mentioned, active steps were adopted with a view to prevent the granting of such concessions. It communicated by cable to the government's representative on the Board of Commissioners in London. The Eastern Extension Company, with a degree of astuteness that does it credit, desired if possible, to have this question dealt with by the commission in London. Our view is that that commission is not created for the purpose of aiding in the destruction of the Pacific cable. It was the intention of the statute we passed, that they should confine their whole efforts to the work of securing the construction of a Pacific cable at the earliest possible moment. Therefore, whilst pressing that view, we have informed our commissioner that we have a distinct objection to the granting of any of these concessions.

With reference to a later despatch read by my hon. friend as to what may have recently occurred in the legislature of Victoria, the government has received an intimation from the commissioner for Canada to a somewhat similar effect, and the government promptly cabled back to the commissioner our strong opposition to any such concessions. In like manner cables were sent to the Premiers of Victoria and New South Wales, pressing very much upon their attention the views that the leader of the opposition has advanced, namely, that we are partners in this enterprise, and we trust that no partner will in any way alter the conditions without the consent of the co-partners. That is substantially the position of the matter to-day. Within the last 48 hours those views have been sent by this government to all quarters where they are likely to be of effect, and whether they may be effective or not, the future alone can tell. The government take this view, further, that if the Eastern Extension Company should succeed in producing the withdrawal of one of these co-partners to this scheme, inasmuch as it would alter the whole basis upon which the present financial scheme is built, it would involve commencing practically de novo. We cannot conceive that any government, after carefully considering the situation, will take so retrograde a step.

Mr. WALLACE. Were the cablegrams sent on Saturday?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. They were sent on Saturday, or this morning; I do not know which. I think it was on Saturday night that we got our despatches.

Motion (Mr. Casey) to adjourn, withdrawn.

PRIVILEGE—GOVERNMENT WHIP.

Mr. BOURASSA. Mr. Speaker, I want to rise to a personal explanation. I see that in the speech made by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) on Friday night, he said:

That is the policy of the government of the day, Mr. Speaker; else why did they, the day before yesterday, as announced in yesterday's 'Globe,' make Mr. Bourassa one of the government whips after he had made this disloyal speech in the House of Commons.

I simply wish to tell the hon. gentleman that I do not accept that statement in whole or in part. As far as a disloyal speech is concerned this, I suppose, is not to be treated at this time, but I have my own opinion and other people will have their opinion. As to the question of fact, I wish to say that I have not been chosen as a government whip. Three years ago I was chosen as one of the Quebec government whips, but I have not exercised the function. I am of such a temperament that I never feel like being a whip; I have trouble enough in keeping myself in line; I have no desire to try to keep others in line.

Mr. MULOCK.

Mr. WALLACE. The Globe newspaper announced that at the caucus held on that day the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) was appointed a whip.

Mr. BOURASSA. This proves that the Liberals are discreet when they come out from their caucuses.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The Globe correspondent was not at the caucus, but the hon. member for Labelle was present.

Mr. WALLACE. That explains the whole thing. The hon. member for Labelle was at the caucus and he was proposed—

The PRIME MINISTER. No.

Mr. WALLACE. The Globe must be becoming a very unreliable medium of communicating news. We have never had any refutation of this report, although it has been published for some days that the hon. member for Labelle was reappointed one of the government whips.

PRIVILEGE—PARAGRAPH IN TORONTO DAILY STAR.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. The Toronto Star reports the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Stenson) as speaking as follows:

Mr. Stenson took exception to Mr. Davin's remark that certain Irishmen in the British House of Commons were cravens.

Mr. Speaker, in the first place, I have read the speech of the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe in the Hansard, and he makes no reference to Mr. Davin at all, nor could he make any reference to me as reported, because I made no reference whatever to any Irishman in the House of Commons.

THE BUBONIC PLAGUE.

Mr. PRIGR. Mr. Speaker before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to draw the attention of the government to the fact that the bubonic plague has committed great ravages in the Hawaiian Islands, and I would like to ask the right hon. leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), whether the greatest precautions are being taken at the quarantine station in British Columbia? This matter has been referred to in another place by one of the senators, but in view of the fact that British Columbia is within a few days' sail of these islands, that San Francisco is in daily communication, almost, with these islands and that a large number of people travel from California to British Columbia, it behooves this government to keep a very strict eye on the quarantine arrangements to see that this frightful plague does not get into Canada. There have been over 50 cases of it in Honolulu, many of them fatal, and we hear that some white people have died from it. I know that they have a very fine quarantine station in British Columbia; I believe that every precaution is being taken, but I thought it my duty to call the attention of the government to this matter.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I cannot give to my hon. friend (Mr. Prior) any information upon this subject. The hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) is detained by illness at this moment, but I will call his attention to the matter, and I am quite sure that the question will receive a satisfactory answer.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—GARRISON AT HALIFAX.

Mr. McNEILL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), whether any reply has been received from the Imperial government in answer to the offer made by this government to garrison Halifax?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I cannot inform my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill) to-day; I will tell him to-morrow.

SECOND READINGS.

IMMIGRATION OF CHINESE.

Mr. McINNES asked:

1. Why did the government not introduce a Bill last session to increase the entry tax on Chinese?

2. How many Chinese have entered Canada and paid the head tax during the years ending June 30, 1897, 1898 and 1899, and from June 30, 1899, to the present time?

3. Is the government going to introduce a Bill this session to increase the entry tax on Chinese? If so, to what amount is the tax to be increased?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). 1. The government on consideration, did not consider it advisable to introduce a Bill last session. 2. I shall give such statistics as the department possesses. They are perhaps not to be entirely relied upon, as there appears to be pretty good evidence that a large number of the persons who enter Canada do not remain there, but pass through Canada, en route to the United States. So far as the figures go, they are as follows:—

During the year ended 30th June, 1897....	2,447
Less 25 afterwards found to have been exempt and 'capitation tax' refunded, leaving net	2,422

During the year ended 30th June, 1898...	2,175
Less 25 afterwards found to have been exempt, and 'capitation tax' refunded, leaving net	2,150

During the year ended 30th June, 1899...	4,385
Less 19 afterwards found to have been exempt, and 'capitation' tax refunded, leaving net	4,366

For the six months ended 31st December, 1899	947
Less 46 refunds, leaving net	901

3. The matter is now engaging the attention of the government and they probably will be able to introduce a Bill on the subject within a short time.

LAND GRANTS TO COMPANIES IN MANITOBA AND NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. DAVIS (by Mr. Oliver) asked:

What is the name of the different railroad companies in Manitoba and the North-west Territories that have received land grants by way of subsidies? What amount did each company receive per mile of road to be constructed? What is the total amount of land reserved for each company, how much has been earned by each company, and how much patented? What is the total amount of lands granted to all companies in Manitoba and the Territories?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The answer to this question involves a lengthy statement of figures and I would ask the hon. gentleman to move for a return.

JUDICIAL BUSINESS IN THE YUKON.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (by Sir Charles Tupper) asked:

1. Has the government any information as to the condition of the docket of the court of Mr. Justice Dugas, in the Yukon district?

(a) If so, what was the condition when the vacation of two months was taken in June last?

(b) Is there difficulty of obtaining a hearing of civil cases in this district, owing to the congestion of court work? If so, how long has such a state of things existed?

(c) Was an additional judge not appointed since the provision therefor at the last session of parliament? If not, why not?

(d) It is proposed to appoint another judge for this court?

(e) Has the name of the member for Guysborough been before the government or any department or minister thereof, in connection with this appointment?

(f) Has the government, or any department or minister thereof, been advised that, owing to the congested condition of the docket in the court of the Yukon district, it has become practically impossible to collect accounts, and that litigants and merchants suffer accordingly? If not, has the government heard anything to this effect?

(g) Is the government aware that, under the ordinance, the Christmas vacation in the court in the Yukon district ended on January 4, and that Mr. Justice Dugas extended it a week, leaving Dawson for the Creeks?

(h) Has the government been advised that the population in Dawson City is decreasing rapidly?

(i) Is the government aware that the new mining regulations are causing dissatisfaction?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). The answer to subsection (a) and (b) is: The government have no official information on the subject. The answer to subsection (c) is: An additional judge was not appointed. The answer to subsection (d) is: The matter is under the consideration of the government.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. You omitted to give the reason. Question (c) says: If not, why not?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). That is under consideration:

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). The answer to subsection (f) is: That the government has no official information on this subject. The answer to subsection (g) is the same. The answers to subsections (h and i) are: (h) the government has no official advice that the population of Dawson City is decreasing rapidly; but members of the government have seen statements in the public press to the effect that an exodus is expected in the spring. (i) The government is not aware that the new mining regulations are causing dissatisfaction, but, on the contrary, has information to the effect that the new mining regulations are giving satisfaction.

THE YUKON—PRESENT POPULATION OF DAWSON CITY.

Mr. FOSTER (by Mr. Bergeron) asked:

What is the estimated present population of Dawson City?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The last estimate which the government had of the population of Dawson City, is 4,445. It was made up to about two months ago.

MOUNTED POLICE IN YUKON.

THE YUKON—MR. J. D. MCGREGOR.

Mr. ROCHE (by Mr. Bell, Pictou) asked:

1. Is Mr. J. D. McGregor now in the employ of the government in the Yukon district?

2. If so, where was Mr. McGregor between November 15, 1899, and December 15, 1899?

3. Had he received leave of absence and is the government aware he took an active part in the recent Manitoba elections?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. Yes. 2. The government has no knowledge of Mr. McGregor's whereabouts, between the dates stated, except that he was seen in Manitoba. 3. He had leave of absence, but the government has no knowledge that he took any part in the Manitoba elections.

REGINA LEADER—AMOUNTS PAID BY GOVERNMENT, 1898-9.

Mr. DAVIN asked:

Whether the amount of $1,142.39, shown by the Auditor General's Report to have been paid to the Regina 'Leader' in the year 1898-9, was exclusive of the amount paid by the Territorial government to that paper?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The Auditor-General states that the sum mentioned in the question includes the amount paid by the Lieutenant-Governor out of the appropriation for 'expenditure connected with the Lieutenant-Governor's office' and for incidental justice, but does not include any sums that may have been paid by the Territorial government out of the grant of $282,979 for schools, clerical assistance, printing, etc.

CONSOLIDATION OF DOMINION STATUTES.

Mr. MILLS (by Mr. Bergeron) asked :

Has the government appointed a commission to revise and consolidate the Dominion statutes ?

If so, who are the gentlemen selected for this important duty ?

If not, when is it proposed to provide for such revision and consolidation ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). No commission has been appointed ?

Mr. BERGERON. When do you propose to appoint one ?

The PRIME MINISTER. No provision has been made yet for a commission.

PRINTING OF ELECTORAL LISTS.

Mr. INGRAM asked :

1. From what electoral districts in Ontario have the electoral lists, revised in the year 1899, been received by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery ?

2. What number of them are printed and for what electoral districts ?

3. When will the balance of them be printed ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). 1. The lists have been received for all the electoral districts in Ontario, with the exception of the following : Algoma, Brant South, Kingston, Lincoln and Niagara, London City, Middlesex East, Middlesex North, Middlesex South, Middlesex West, Muskoka and Parry Sound, Nipissing, North Wentworth, South Wentworth. 2. Ninety copies is the regular number printed. The printing is going on now. Lists of the following Ontario electoral districts have been printed : Durham West, Hamilton, Hastings East, Northumberland West, Ontario South, Ontario West, Ottawa, Peel. It is expected that the printing will be completed probably in May.

A RAILWAY FOR ISLE MADAM.

Mr. GILLIES asked :

Is it the intention of the government, during the present session, to provide a subsidy towards the construction of a railway to the town of Arichat upon Isle Madam, in the county of Richmond ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Announcements with respect to specific applications for railway subsidies will have to be deferred until the government brings down, if it should bring down, any railway proposals which it may have to submit for the consideration of parliament.

LICENSING OF FISH WEIRS.

Mr. GANONG (by Mr. Bell, Pictou) asked :

Have the following named fish weirs, 'The Scott,' 'The Yankee Doodle,' 'The Wild Man,' and 'The Phelps,' which have been built and operated for several years on the Canadian shore of the passage between the Island of Campobello, N. B., and Lubec, in the State of Maine, been licensed by the Canadian government ?

If not, why not ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Fishery Inspector Pratt wires saying that these weirs have never received any licenses from the Dominion government, but the information is that they are located in certain middle grounds in Lubec Narrows near the international boundary line, where it has not been deemed desirable hitherto to grant licenses.

LIFE-SAVING STATION AT SEAL COVE.

Mr. GANONG (by Mr. Bell, Pictou) asked :

1. What equipment has been supplied to the life-saving station at Seal Cove, Grand Manan, N.B. ?

2. Is it the intention of the government to provide a steam launch or other steam vessel, capable of steaming from this station to the Ledges, where nearly all the disasters of recent years have occurred ?

3. Who is at present in charge of this station ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. A new boat-house, new lifeboat and the usual equipment. Launch ways to be laid with iron rails fitted with a trawley and hand-winch for hauling boat out. 2. It is not intended to provide a steam launch. 3. Coxswain Frank Benson is in charge.

MAJOR-GENERAL HUTTON.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

Has any Order in Council been passed dismissing Major-General Hutton or calling on him to resign his position of Major-General Commanding the Canadian Militia ? If so, what was the date of same ? Was said Order in Council signed by His Excellency the Governor General ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). No Order in Council has been passed dismissing Major-General Hutton or calling on him to resign his position of Major-General Commanding the Militia ; and, therefore, His Excellency the Governor General was not asked to sign any such order. I may add that a communication has been sent to the Imperial authorities concerning General Hutton, but I have not authority to-day to disclose it to the House.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

Has the attention of the government been called to the following words made use of by Major-General Hutton in a speech delivered by him at a farewell dinner tendered to him on the 14th inst. by the officers of the Ottawa Brigade: 'I have used my utmost endeavour to create a national militia army worthy of the responsibilities which are peculiarly its own, and which, to ensure success, must be placed upon a plane above all possibility of party political interference as regards its discipline, its personnel and its military machinery. . . . I should, however, feel more hopeful of the future of Canada if the government had even shown active interest in our recent efforts, for a higher efficiency, or indicated their approval of the principles upon which our efforts are based. . . . I would ask you, however, in all due seriousness not to suppose that the severance of my ties with you is due to petty misunderstandings with the Minister of Militia upon minor issues of appointments or disciplinary matters, but that it is due to broader, wider and vastly more important issues.'

Is it true that the government have not approved of the policy of the Major-General Commanding, as set forth above? Can the government inform this House what was the cause of the disagreement between them and the Major-General?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Yes, the attention of the government has been drawn to that portion of Major-General Hutton's speech mentioned in the question, and to other portions also, equally reprehensible. There have been differences of opinion between the government and General Hutton. The government were disposed, now that he has been recalled for service in Africa, to let these differences pass without any comment. The government had reason to believe that this was in accordance with General Hutton's views, and therefore when the subject was brought up in the House a few days ago, the government refrained from making any statement on the subject. There is now no reason to follow that course any further. General Hutton in his speech has insinuated that his differences with the government are due to a desire on the part of the latter to exercise improper political influence on the militia organization of the country. I desire, on the part of the government, to say that there is absolutely no foundation for such a statement. The causes of difference between the government and General Hutton were not over any broad questions of general policy; the causes of difference were that General Hutton was insubordinate and indiscreet, and deliberately ignored the authority of the minister in the administration of the department. The government desire to state that while they will, at all times, be prepared to give the most careful consideration to any representations which may be made by the officer commanding the militia, it must be distinctly understood that any such officer, on accepting the position in question becomes from that time, an officer in the employment of and subject in all respects to the government of Canada, and that he is to be regarded as the adviser but not as entitled to control the Department of Militia. The government are responsible to the parliament and people of Canada for the due administration of each and every branch of the public service, and they would be derelict to their duty, if they were to permit any subordinate official, under any circumstances, to take upon himself to disregard the instructions he may receive from the constitutional head of his department.

JAMES GLASS, FISHERY GUARDIAN.

Mr. GANONG (by Mr. Bell, Pictou) asked :

1. Is James Glass, whose name appears in part K of the Auditor General's Report for 1898-9 as having been paid $418.50 as special fishery guardian, still in the employ of the Fisheries Department?

2. If not, when was he dismissed and for what reason?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. No. 2. He never was dismissed. His term of service for season expired 31st October last as usual.

GRAND MANAN STEAMSHIP SERVICE.

Mr. GANONG (by Mr. Bell, Pictou) asked:

Who are the contractors for steam service between the Island of Grand Manan, N.B., and the mainland? What are the terms of the contract? From information received, is the government satisfied the service is being performed according to terms of contract? If not, has any action been taken to improve the service? If so, what action?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). The contractors for the service between Grand Manan and the mainland are Hugh Cann & Son. The contract calls for a regular weekly service between Grand Manan and St. John, calling both going and returning at Campobello, in the province of New Brunswick, and Eastport, in the State of Maine; also a regular weekly service between Grand Manan and St. Stephen, in the province of New Brunswick, calling both going and returning at Campobello aforesaid, Eastport aforesaid, and St. Andrews, in the province of New Brunswick; also, during the month of September of the current year, as well as during the month of June, 1900, a regular weekly service between Grand Manan and Eastport aforesaid, going and returning the same day and touching each way at Campobello aforesaid. The service is to be performed either by the Percy Cann or the Latour. From information received it is evident that up to the 31st December last the service was performed according to the terms of the contract. The service, however, is not exactly what is desired by the government, but was the best that could be obtained for the money. It was only after a great deal of difficulty that the present service was secured. The Deer Island and Campobello Steamboat Company offered to run three trips per week from St. Stephen to Grand Manan for a subsidy of $100 per trip. This would have taken $6,000 for the service without any trips to St. John. The Grand Manan Steamboat Company offered to continue the service for a subsidy of $9,000. It is the intention of the government to immediately call for tenders for this service for the current year.

THE ALIEN LABOUR ACT IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. McINNES asked :

1. Was the government requested to enforce the Alien Labour Act, 1897, in the Slocan district, B.C.? If so, by whom and when?
2. Did the government enforce the said Act as so requested? If not, why not?
3. Has Commissioner Clute made his report on the Slocan labour troubles? If so, when will it be laid on the Table of the House?
4. Is the government aware that larger numbers of aliens are now being imported to work in the Slocan mines than before or during Commissioner Clute's investigation?
5. Does the government intend to enforce the said Act in the said district?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The government received complaints from certain miners' associations of the Slocan district. The complaints came, I believe, either in December or January. On receiving these complaints, the government appointed a special commissioner, Mr. Clute, to investigate them. Mr. Clute has not yet made his report. The government intend to have his report and to consider it before taking any action in the matter.

MINES ON INDIAN RESERVES.

Mr. McINNES asked :

1. Has the government come to any understanding with the provinces regarding the development of mines on Indian reserves?
2. What steps have been taken to that end, and what, if any, is the difficulty in the way of settling the matter?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. No. 2. No steps have recently been taken further than to have the questions in dispute gone carefully into with a view to preparing the ground for an arrangement which would admit of the development of minerals which may be found upon Indian reserves. The matter is so complicated that it is not possible to state categorically in reply to a question the difficulties in the way.

COUNTRY POSTMASTERS' ALLOWANCES.

Mr. RICHARDSON asked :

1. Did the recent reduction of the postal rate on letters from 3 to 2 cents cause any appreciable decline in the revenue derived by postmasters from their office, especially in country districts? If so, to what an average or approximate extent were the allowances of country postmasters curtailed?

2. If the extremely low income which outlying postmasters have in the past derived from their offices, has been curtailed by the reduction of postage rates, notwithstanding the fact that their work has to some extent been increased, will the government propose any measure for the relief of such postmasters and to give them some more adequate return for their work than they receive?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). I beg to reply: The department has in no case reduced the salary of any postmaster on account of a reduction in revenue consequent upon the reduction of Canadian domestic postage from three cents to two cents per ounce, but where the revenue of an office has fallen in consequence of such reduction in rate of postage, the salary of the postmaster has been computed on the basis of the revenue of the office prior to such reduction in postage rate.

WAGES ON ST. ANDREW'S LOCK CONTRACT.

Mr. PUTTEE asked :

In any provision to be made, in awarding contracts for the construction of the St. Andrew's Locks, to ensure that the minimum or union rate of wages shall be paid on such works, or other precautions to be taken to safeguard the interests of the men who will be employed?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). As to the first point raised, which is a very interesting and important one, it is now engaging the attention of the government. As to the second point, all the ordinary precautions will be inserted in the contract.

THE GENERAL OFFICER COMMANDING AND LIEUT.-COLONEL HUGHES.

Mr. JAMES DOMVILLE (King's, N.B.) moved :

That as the following appears in 'The Mail and Empire' newspaper, February 3, 1900:—

Gen. Hutton and Col. Hughes.

A few days ago 'The Mail and Empire' published an interview with General Hutton, in which the General stated that Col. Sam. Hughes, while patriotic and enthusiastic, was utterly lacking in a proper comprehension of military discipline. The following two letters on the subject of this interview have been received :

To the Editor of 'The Mail and Empire':

Sir,—In your issue of the 30th ult., I notice the report of an interview with General Hutton, in which he comments very freely upon the conduct of Col. Sam. Hughes, in connection with the volunteer service in South Africa.

I have read very carefully the report of the interview, and the only meaning which I can extract from it is a deliberate accusation of madness; or at best, of temporary insanity. Surely, if such be the fact, nothing could justify either General Hutton or the government in allowing Colonel Hughes to retain his commission and proceed to South Africa as an active officer in the Canadian militia. The doing so under such circumstances would, it seems to me, institute a grave offence against the country.

If, on the other hand, the facts do not warrant the assertion so unequivocally made by the General, the accusation is a cruel and cowardly one, and demands a very strict accounting to the one so foully slandered.

Yours, &c.

FAIR PLAY.

Toronto, February 1.

To the Editor of 'The Mail and Empire':

Sir,—I desire to thank the people of Canada for the almost universal condemnation of the petty action of General Hutton towards my brother. The recent action of General Hutton in giving a statement regarding the correspondence between Col. Hughes and himself is on a par with his past conduct. A British gentleman of true breeding would have waited till the correspondence was laid before parliament before making remarks about it for publication. The friends of Colonel Hughes are willing to wait. Several charges have been officially made against General Hutton, and they will be investigated in due time. I know that the other officers and members of parliament whom General Hutton has insulted since he came to Canada are grateful to Col. Hughes for having the courage to ask that the recall of General Hutton be demanded.

Personally I hope that General Hutton may be the last officer sent to Canada to irritate Canadians and put Canadian loyalty to unnecessary strain by arrogance and red tape. There are plenty of wise and experienced officers in Canada who, in my opinion, could organize and train our volunteers better than General Hutton. If the colonies are to do their true work as parts of our empire, they must develop their own individuality in military matters, as well as in other departments of national life.

Col. Hughes deserves better treatment than he received from General Hutton. He has been an enthusiastic patriot and soldier since his boyhood. Since he went to Africa his family received his medal for services at the time of the Fenian raid, when he was only a youth of eighteen. He has been an officer for a quarter of a century. He organized the most active Imperial federation movement in Ontario outside of the large cities. He was the first man in Canada to propose to aid the mother country in the Transvaal. But he indignantly resented the insinuation of General Hutton against Canadian officers, and had the manliness to refuse to allow General Hutton to control his actions as a Canadian and as a member of parliament, so the temporary tyrant tried to rob him of his right to fight for the empire. Canadians will have little difficulty in deciding between Hughes and Hutton.

Yours, &c.,

JAMES L. HUGHES.

Toronto, January 31.

An Order of this House do issue for copies of all correspondence, telegrams and cablegrams that may have passed between Major-General Hutton and Lieut.-Col. Samuel Hughes, M.P., or between these officers and any members of the government of Canada, or others, touching the conduct of Lieut.-Col. Hughes, M.P., in connection with his volunteering for active service in South Africa; these papers to include all letters, cablegrams and telegrams sent to South Africa, England or elsewhere, and replies received. Also any report or reports made by Major-General Hutton on the conduct of Lieut.-Col. Samuel Hughes, M.P., in connection with such offer or offers for active service.

He said: Before this motion is carried I propose to say a few words. I should have taken this matter up when I first gave notice, but as there seemed to be a disposition at that moment to allow the general officer in command, now Col. Hutton of the Imperial service, to do what we might call 'creep out easy,' I allowed the matter to remain in abeyance. I was sure, from his erratic actions when he first came to this country, that he would not be judicious enough to allow militia matters to go along easily, and that he would leave the country in a hurry without the public or the authorities on the other side of the water being made aware of all that happened in connection with his administration here. These papers, when brought down, will permit us to make some kind of investigation for ourselves and show the people of Canada what has been going on for the last seventeen months. We have other cases to quote besides Col. Hutton's. There is the case of Major Griffith of the 75th Regiment. There is the case of Major Ryan of the King's County, N.S., Hussars, and the case of Col. Van Wagner. There are many other cases I could name all of which go to prove that the work of General Hutton was done in the most arbitrary way. He seemed to think from the moment he came to this country that he was superior to all authority. And to-day we have the very generous reply of the leader of the government, in which, while not going so far as he might, he clearly tells the House and the country that General Hutton did not go on account of political difficulties, but because of insubordination. There is no greater crime in a soldier than to be insubordinate; for it is a well recognized fact in military life that he who cannot obey is not fit to command. Therefore, he failed on that one point, and so could not longer remain here with benefit either to Canada or to the Imperial service. Had Col. Hutton been permitted to round out the course he was adopting, I do not hesitate to say, it would not have been eighteen months more before every militia regiment in Canada would have been demoralized. The force has been free from any such demoralization hitherto. It is true that there has been friction here and there, but, on the whole, the militia has been able to do good service. When volunteers are called for to go to South Africa to do work which their brothers in arms of the Imperial service find difficulty in doing, and we are able to pick up at a moment's notice equal to three corps, we can see that the militia has not been badly handled in the past. The officers must have known something, they must have been able to train their men, or the men would have been unfit to go. I make this statement to prevent Col. Hutton from taking to himself all the credit for the position of the militia of Canada to-day. There was another cruel statement made by him. I asked a question the other day. It referred to the following, which appeared in a public newspaper :

Denies the Report.

Major General Hutton Explains 'Mysterious Influence' Rumours.

Ottawa, January 29 (Special).—So many rumours of 'mysterious influences' being at work to prevent Lieut.-Col. Sam. Hughes from obtaining military employment in South Africa have been afloat that Major General Hutton has found it necessary to deny that he is in any way responsible for this condition of affairs. In conversation about the matter, the Major General said: The 'mysterious influence' is simply that Col. Hughes went to South Africa unrecommend—

Who was to recommend Col. Hughes? He was in the same position as many volunteers in this country. He was luckily within the age so that he could not be debarred from service on that ground. Long ago, before the authorities on either side made any move, Col. Hughes offered his services to fight for his country in any capacity. Was there any great crime in that? Col. Hutton says he was not recommended. Evidently Col. Hutton would not recommend him, because what he had said about Col. Hughes placed it beyond his power to do so.

—and it is not customary for the British military authorities to employ officers who are unrecommended. I should like the public to know that nothing has transpired during my tenure of office that has touched me so keenly as to deal with Col. Hughes in the manner that became necessary. The Colonel has many estimable qualities, but unfortunately these are over-weighted with others not quite so commendable. He has enthusiasm and patriotism in large degree, qualities which I possess myself—

He does not even ask the public to judge him. He tells the press that he himself possesses these estimable qualities.

—and which I like to see in others.

At least he seems to be willing to see them in others.

But the strictest discipline is essential if the effectiveness of the volunteer force is to be maintained unimpaired.

Colonel Hughes seemingly lacked the smallest perception of discipline; it was to him apparently an unknown quantity. I liked the Colonel personally, and associated him with myself in the staff ride in the hope that he would gain some knowledge of what discipline in military matters really means.

It was a piece of condescension for him to associate Col. Hughes with him because when he went to the county I have the honour to represent, he ordered posts to be put up and an inch rope stretched around the brigade staff tents, so that the public could not get with a 'ten-foot pole' of him. I had the pleasure of witnessing the rope, but I did not go into the ring with him. I am sorry he is not here now to go into the ring with me on this occasion.

But the lesson was altogether lost. The public so far has only become possessed of one side of the story. The other side is disclosed in the correspondence between the Colonel and myself.

That is the correspondence we want to get before we can form an opinion. So far, anything we have heard is in favour of Col. Hughes. He offered his services and even went to South Africa in order to have an opportunity to serve. He was not recommended, but was willing to go in any capacity.

But I do trust—as I said in my speech on the occasion of the banquet to 'D' Battery just before its departure—that no misguided friends of Colonel Hughes would call for the correspondence, as it cannot fail to place the Colonel in a most unenviable light. Those who have seen the correspondence so far—and all the letters are now before the government—are of the opinion that Colonel Hughes could not have been exactly in his right mind when he wrote in the manner in which he did. The incident possesses most unfortunate features—features that I trust will not again be repeated.

He cannot appear in a more unenviable light than Col. Hutton appears in to-day. He is going home to England and even if they want to let him down lightly they cannot close their eyes to his record. He went to Australia and gave a great deal of trouble there. I read four or five volumes of their Hansard and they are filled with the rows that they had. He arrested a brother officer almost as soon as he got there, and then he got the Attorney General of New South Wales to defend him without the consent of the government—he instructed the Attorney General to defend him. But it is not worth while to go over the fight there. That will be before the Adjutant General of the Horse Guards, where Col. Hutton has to report on his arrival. The Adjutant General will see that there has been the same difficulty with Col. Hutton in Canada as there was in Australia. If they think of sending him elsewhere as an organizer of volunteers the question will arise whether they are to have the same row with another colony and have the same request for his withdrawal. It is not the custom of the Imperial authorities to have their officers requested to withdraw—and Col. Hutton must have been asked to withdraw, because he would not have willingly withdrawn himself, having made all preparations to fight the campaign here.

Having quoted the correspondence, I asked if the government had taken any active steps to ascertain if it was correct, if so, what steps had been taken. And the answer of the government was that they had questioned Colonel Hutton and that he had replied that this was substantially correct, but was not intended for publication. Now, does any gentleman allow the press to interview him, does he open his heart to the reporter and tell him everything, and expect that the member of the press to whom he is speaking, is not going to use it? If he did think so, what right had he to give any gentleman in the press or anybody else such an opinion about an officer commanding a regiment, a brother officer in the service, and a member of parliament? It involves the dignity of Colonel Hughes's position in this House as a member of parliament, it involves his position in the militia of Canada; and I think it devolves upon us in this House, irrespective of politics, to defend the character of a brother member, who is in Africa, trying to do something for the empire, and who is at the same time a member of the militia. Had the general not gone away, when these papers came down—of course I cannot tell what is in them now—I should certainly have moved for a committee of this House to try Colonel Hutton, then General Hutton, in this matter. If I found that he had used Colonel Hughes badly, or if, on the other hand, I found that Colonel Hughes had so far forgotten himself as to be deserving of censure, then I think the House would have visited upon him such censure as it thought proper. Now, while this matter may appear unimportant to a great many, I propose to get on the Journals of the House the exact position of Colonel Hughes and of Colonel Hutton, and I hope the government will give us every facility of doing so, by bringing down the papers at an early day. Possibly we may get a committee of the House to look into these papers, and make a report upon them, so that in the future, whenever this case is referred to, it can be found clearly threshed out on its merits, and every one can see how the matter stood. Colonel Hughes is not the only gentleman who has suffered by Colonel Hutton. I have in my desk here, a lot of correspondence in connection with Major Ryan losing the command of his corps, in Kentville, Nova Scotia, but they are too long for me to read now. The case of Major Ryan was a very simple case. There was this point about it. There was an official general order sent down from the department, commending Major Ryan for his work, and saying how good an officer he was. Within two or three days, Colonel Hutton sent another despatch, another official letter, saying that the commanding officer could not ride and did not know his drill, and was unfitted for command. One despatch followed the other with three days' interval. He went on to say that an officer that he named, was a poor horseman, and was not fit to be in a corps. As a matter of fact, when General Hutton inspected that corps, the officer in question was not present. But he had some reason for driving away an officer here and an officer there. Perhaps he wished to make an example, but in doing so, he showed that he was not at all judicious. I think it is not wise to say very much more on this subject.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I am sure my hon. friends opposite will say, 'hear,' because the other day they were all howling for Colonel Hughes, and a little while afterwards there was not a man stood up for him. They have removed his picture out of the House. Perhaps, when Colonel Hughes comes back here he will find that he has some good friends on this side of the House who will say a good word for him. The present position is one that should be a warning to us, and for my part I hope that we shall never see another Imperial officer here unless he comes with the determination to do as the Premier said, in reply to the hon. member for Victoria, B. C. (Mr. Prior), the other day, that is, with the determination to do what Canada desires him to do, and to obey all orders from the department. I think we have got in Canada the men that can do the work, and I trust that when we get through the session, we will have the Militia Act so amended that an officer of our own can take command of the Canadian forces if necessary. I also hope that the Bill I introduced will be passed, so that the commanding officer shall not be prevented from having a seat on the floor of this House, where he may explain matters and guide the House with his military knowledge. Therefore, I trust that the government will bring these papers down at a very early day, and not wait until it is too late in the session to deal with them. As I said before, some of the loyal gentlemen on the other side of the House have been making a great deal of noise. It appears they have been establishing loyalty clubs. To hear them talk, you would imagine that nobody on this side of the House was loyal at all. Therefore, I hope that some of my loyal friends on the other side will back up this motion that I have on the Table. There is nothing partisan in it, nothing but a desire to do justice to an officer who has gone to South Africa, and to call to account an officer who has left Canada, certainly under a cloud, to use mild language, and a very serious cloud. My object, also, is to remove from Colonel Hughes any possible stigma that may have been cast upon him by Colonel Hutton.

Mr. WM. McCLEARY (Welland). I am in hearty accord with the resolution moved by the hon. gentleman who has taken his seat (Mr. Domville). I do not know anything about the merits of the dispute between Colonel Hughes and Colonel Hutton, who has recently withdrawn from service in this country. But I want to say this, and I think I am speaking the mind of all unprejudiced men who know Colonel Sam Hughes, that he has been very unfairly and ungentlemanly dealt with by General Hutton. Every one knows him to be a thorough Canadian, a patriot, and a splendid soldier, a man who was willing to go to South Africa, and to serve for the flag under which he lives. All Canadians who know him regret very much that Colonel Hutton should see fit in any way to interfere with the appointment that I believe would have been given Colonel Hughes by the government of the day. Of course, we cannot speak authoritatively of the merits of the case, until the papers come down. I hope the government will see fit to lay them on the Table at an early day. I am in entire accord with a great deal that the hon. gentleman just said. I want to say here that Colonel Hughes had on this side of the House just as many loyal friends who are ready to speak for him, as can be found on the other side.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). There is no objection at all to the motion passing. On the contrary, there are many good reasons why, I believe, in the judgment of the House, this motion should pass and that the papers should be brought down as early as possible. They will be brought down in obedience to the motion, and they will do justice to a colleague of ours. As to the quarrel which is involved in the production of these papers, it is certainly preferable to suspend judgment until they are before the House.

Motion agreed to.

THE YUKON—MR. COSTE'S REPORT RESPECTING TESLIN LAKE ROUTE.

Mr. N. F. DAVIN (West Assiniboia). Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to see the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) in his place. On the 17th of May last an order was made in this House for a return of certain correspondence and papers, including the report of Mr. Coste, respecting the Teslin Lake railway route. The correspondence and bills and accounts came down, but the report is not down, and no report has been brought down, as far as I know. I have inquired at the office and no report has been brought down from Mr. Coste. Before I say a word on this subject, probably, I might ask the hon. Minister of Public Works whether he is going to bring down that report.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). I really do not know whether there is such a report or not. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) will kindly remember that I have been away since June, and I have lost track of these papers. If there is such a report there is no objection whatever to bringing it down, but, I cannot remember whether there is such a report or not at the present time. I will look into the question to-morrow, and will certainly bring it down if it is there.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) is no doubt aware that whether there is a report or not, Mr. Coste condemns the Stikine route most emphatically. It is a matter of public notoriety, and I suppose that, on such an important question, the hon. Minister of Public Works, having sent Mr. Coste at the public expense into that country, I can hardly believe that he would allow him to resign his office and sever his connection with the department without giving the department the benefit of the information that he had discovered, as the engineer of the department, sent for that particular purpose.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I never sent Mr. Coste to make a report respecting the Teslin Lake railway. He was not sent out for that purpose by my department, which has no business with railways, and that is the reason why I do not remember whether there is such a report or not. The hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) is evidently better informed than I am, because I do not know that Mr. Coste has made such a report.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think it was stated to the House that he went at the public expense. He certainly was an officer of the Public Works Department when he went there, and it was stated that he went at the public expense. It is an extraordinary thing for the hon. Minister of Public Works not to know what took him there and not to be able to furnish the House with the information that he was sent to obtain.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. leader of the opposition cannot possibly forget that the Public Works Department does not manage railways. Mr. Coste was sent out for other purposes altogether, and he knows it.

Mr. DAVIN. I will now move—I did not move; I just asked the question.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). You have spoken if you have not moved.

Mr. DAVIN. I think it is a usual thing in this House, when one is speaking, to ask of a minister whether a certain fact is so or not.

The PRIME MINISTER. There is no objection.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There is no objection; if the report is there it will be brought down.

Mr. N. F. DAVIN (West Assiniboia) moved for :

Copy of the report of Mr. Coste, the engineer lately in the employ of the Department of Public Works, respecting the Teslin Lake railway route.

He said : My hon. friend (Mr. Tarte) is quite mistaken about the position Mr. Coste occupied on the occasion of his visit to the Yukon. He went there officially, paid by the Department of Public Works, and not only that, but his accounts and papers have been brought down and are in existence, but this report has not been brought down. In regard to that report my hon. friend says that he never meant Mr. Coste to make a report on the route. I do not think, considering all the agitation that there was in regard to the route, that it was an extraordinary thing for the hon. Minister of Public Works to ask the engineer, whom he was sending up there, and by that route, to report on the nature and feasibility of it. I do not think it would be foreign to the functions of the engineer of the Department of Public Works. Well, what happened? Mr. Coste made a report; I know he made it, and there are other gentlemen in this House who know that a report was made and was presented to the hon. Minister of Public Works. We can prove that that report was presented to the hon. Minister of Public Works, and yet we have the hon. Minister of Public Works standing up here, playing the role of a simple innocent and telling us that he knows nothing whatever about it, which, contrary to the order of the House, he is keeping from the hands of this parliament, a sort of thing, certainly, this House will not tolerate. Now, the hon. Minister of Public Works, said—I understood him to say, a moment ago, Mr. Coste was not sent up there officially.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No.

Mr. DAVIN. Probably I did not catch exactly what he said, but, the impression made upon myself and some other hon. gentlemen around me was that he said that Mr. Coste was not sent up there officially.

Mr. BERGERON. What was he sent up there for, then?

Mr. DAVIN. If he was sent up there by the Railway Department instead of by the hon. Minister of Public Works, and if he made a report we ought to have the report all the same. An order of the House was made on the 17th of May last for the accounts and report, and here are the accounts of Mr. Coste, but there is not a report on the Stikine route. That report on the Stikine route was in existence; it was handed by Mr. Coste to the minister who sent him, and that report of Mr. Coste condemned, in the strongest possible manner, the Stikine route. Therefore, there was a motive. I do not say that it was acted on. We will suppose it was a mistake; we will suppose it was owing to the illness of the Minister of Public Works, but we have to say that there was a motive that would influence the hon. Minister of Public Works and the government in keeping back that report, condemning a route that these hon. gentlemen had been going to use for the purpose of a one-horse, wheelbarrow, narrow-gauge railway of a few miles, and for which they were going to give 4,000,000 acres of land which, on the surface, not saying anything as to what is beneath, is valued by the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) at $10 an acre. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) for the report, and have the report, we must. It may be very unpleasant to the hon. Minister of Public Works and to those who want to hold up his hands, to those who want to play bottle holders to him, but, the order of this House cannot be gained, and that report must be forthcoming, because it will not do to tell us that it is destroyed, that it has disappeared, to extemporise a stove and send it up in smoke like the ballots which are required for a certain inquiry. We want that report and we must have it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Mr. Speaker, the bard from the western prairies is a very hard man to please. I have just told him that I will be very glad indeed to bring down such a report if such a report is in existence. I reminded him of what he knows very well, that I left this House in the month of June last year, and since then—

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I just wish to say that I hope the hon. gentleman will refer to me in a parliamentary manner.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I really thought that calling him a 'Bard from the western prairies' was a parliamentary expression.

Mr. DAVIN. No, it is not.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Well, I meant well.

Mr. DAVIN. You should address me as the hon. member for West Assiniboia.

Mr. WALLACE. He thought you called him a 'pard' and he objected to that.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. If my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) does not want to be called a poet, I shall not call him a poet.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, what I object to is the familiarity—I draw the line.

Mr. SPEAKER. If I were asked to rule, I should be obliged to rule both hon. gentlemen out of order.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not object to your ruling, how far he is out of order.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I bow to your decision, Mr. Speaker. I was about to say that if any such report is in our possession it will be brought down. I do not see any objection to bringing it down if we have it. I am surprised that my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) thinks we can burn reports. There is nobody on this side of the House, nor among the officers of my department, who would burn ballots or burn public documents.

Mr. DAVIN. I hope not.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. These insinuations are unwarranted, and I beg to protest strongly against them. I can inform my hon. friend of the fact that Mr. Coste was never instructed by me or by any officer of my department, as far as my memory goes, to make a report as to that route. He may have made a report, and if the report is in our possession, it will be brought down with pleasure.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And if there is a report which is not in your possession?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. If it is in our possession it will be brought down.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If it is not in your possession. Suppose this report was made to the Railway Department? Would it be brought down?

The PRIME MINISTER. Mr. Coste was sent by the Public Works Department and the report, if there is any, is in the archives of the Public Works Department. The Railway Department has nothing at all to do with it.

Mr. HAGGART. The Minister of Public Works says Mr. Coste was sent there on railway work.

The PRIME MINISTER. Mr. Coste was sent as a civil engineer. He is not a railway engineer. He had nothing to do with making a report on the railway. If he did, it was out of his way to do so. Moreover, I do not know that his opinion would be valuable on the subject, because he is not a technical man in that capacity. He was sent up there as a civil engineer and not as a railway engineer.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We sent him to report on the harbours and rivers.

Mr. BERGERON. The same demand as this was made on the 14th of June, 1899, and it was promised then by the Minister of Public Works that there was a report and it would be brought down, and it was not.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not remember what I said then. Will the hon. gentleman read exactly what I said. If there is a report it will be brought down.

Mr. BERGERON. The demand was made by Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, and I read from Hansard :

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Before the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) goes away—I am glad to see him able to be in the House again—I would like to remind him that an Order was passed on the 17th of May regarding the production of Mr. Coste's report, and his special trip to the Yukon district.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). I remember very well that all the documents were ready, and I do not understand why they are not already before the House. There is no objection whatever to having all these papers brought down.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Where is there any reference to a railway report there?

Mr. BERGERON. You say 'all the papers.'

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, but I did not say there was a railway report.

Mr. BERGERON. I know as a matter of fact, that there is a report made by Mr. Coste on that Teslin route.

Mr. LANDERKIN. How do you know?

Mr. BERGERON. He told me himself.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. LANDERKIN. He reported to you before he reported to his department.

Mr. BERGERON. There was a report made on the Teslin Lake Railway route. Mr. Coste in a casual way told me he made a report. There was no secrecy about it. He told me he could not give the details, because it was still in the hands of his minister, but he said: The report will be brought down before parliament, and you will see it, and you will be astonished when you see it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The leader of the opposition will remember that I placed in his hands a report of Mr. Coste. I was glad to be able to do it at the time. I do not know whether it is the same report or not. I gave him a copy of it. I had nothing to hide, and I showed him the report myself. I do not know if the papers have been brought down or not, but I remember distinctly I sent across the floor of the House a report on the works of the Yukon, and I do not know whether there was an allusion in it to the Teslin Lake route or not. I remember very distinctly having sent the report of Mr. Coste across the floor of the House to the leader of the opposition.

Mr. HAGGART. I am very glad the memory of the Minister of Public Works is refreshed. A few moments ago he did not know there was a report.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I did not know there was a report on railways, and I do not know it now. There is no use in putting in my mouth something I have not said.

Mr. CASEY. The motion is for a report about a railway.

Mr. HAGGART. There was a report about the railway last year, because I remember perfectly that there were two notices of motion put upon the paper. There was a motion put on the paper by Mr. Davin and another by myself, and we have the promise that that report would be down last session. Every one of us knew what was in the report. It was common talk all through the House.

Mr. LANDERKIN. How did you know ?

Mr. HAGGART. We got it from the officers of the department and we heard it. I heard about it and several others heard about it, and the government admitted there was a report last session and promised to bring it down.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. minister says that this officer was acting in a double capacity—that he was loaned part of the time to the Minister of Railways.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, I never said that anywhere.

Mr. HAGGART. Yes.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I never said that anywhere.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) said that there was a report to his department, and that there might be another report to the Railway Department.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, I did not say it. The Prime Minister said it.

The PRIME MINISTER. No ; I did not say that.

Mr. SPEAKER. I understand that the order is passed by the House, and the papers, whatever they are, will be brought down.

Mr. HAGGART. We are discussing the order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The discussion arose after the order was passed. I am obliged to rule that this is out of order.

TAXATION OF NORTH-WEST LANDS EARNED BY RAILWAY COMPANIES.

Mr. FRANK OLIVER (Alberta) moved :

That certain railways in the North-west Territories have earned certain lands in those terri-tries by way of subsidy granted in aid of their construction;

Mr. HAGGART.

That a large part of these lands have been allotted but are not yet patented to such railways ;

That by reason of such allotment the railways concerned are enabled to exercise the right of ownership to their own advantage;

That until the lands granted such railways are patented to them, it is impossible to collect school and local improvement taxes from them;

That, in the opinion of this House, all lands earned by railway companies in the North-west should be allotted and patented to them forthwith, so that they may begin as soon as possible to bear their fair share of taxation necessary for the support of schools and the making of road improvements in the North-west Territories.

He said : In support of this motion, Mr. Speaker, it is probably desirable that the House should be informed at some length in regard to the necessity for its being made. It is in connection with the land subsidy granted in aid of the construction of certain railways in the North-west Territories. In order that there may be no confusion of ideas as between the different classes of railways there, I may say that these land grants do not carry with them any exemption from taxation as do the land grants made to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. It was not thought by the parliament of Canada, when these lands were granted, that it was necessary for the construction of the railways nor in the public interest of the Territories nor of the country as a whole, that they should be granted any exemption from taxation. The amount of land affected is about as follows : For the Calgary and Edmonton Railway, 1,898,447 acres ; for the Qu'Appelle and Long Lake Railway, approximately 1,500,000 acres ; for the Manitoba and North-western Railway, 1,501,375 acres ; and for the Alberta Railway and Coal Company, 1,113,000 acres ; a total of about 6,000,000 acres of land granted to these railway companies without any exemption from taxation ; but by reason of the lands not having been patented to the companies, the school districts and local improvement districts find themselves unable to collect taxes from them. This has been going on for a number of years. It is from eight to sixteen years since these lands were earned, and for that length of time they have been running without the possibility of levying taxation upon them. The whole grant of the Calgary and Edmonton Railway Company is situated within the district of Alberta, and a large proportion of it in the northern part of Alberta. That part occupies a belt of land about forty miles in width lying along the line of railway for a distance of about thirty miles, from Didsbury station to beyond Innisfail station. I understand that it is believed by many members of this House that there is no local taxation in the Territories, but that the schools of the Territories are supported by the grant given by the North-west government, and that the roads and bridges are built by the same agency. That is a mistake, and I want to point out to the House just how much of a mistake it is. In the district in which this part of the Calgary and Edmonton land grant lies, there are about ten school districts in operation. These districts are about five miles square, and, therefore, contain about twenty-five sections, or twenty-five square miles of land. The railway company owns each alternate section, except the so-called school lands. Therefore, on the average, the railway company owns eleven sections of land, or forty-four quarter sections in each of these ten school districts, and enjoys exemption from taxation to that extent. To show the House that I am not talking merely theoretically, but am speaking of a subject which is of present moment, I will read a letter which I have just received from the secretary of one of the school districts affected—Berrydale public school district No. 409 :

The list of Calgary and Edmonton Railway sections in the Berrydale school district are as follows:—Township 33, range 2, west of the 5th meridian—sections 27, 31, 33 and 35; in township 34, range 2, west of the 5th meridian—sections 3, 5, 7, 9, 13, 15 and 17.

The secretary says :

We have not assessed any part of the above railway land.

So that there may be no mistake about this matter, and in proof that it is not the remissness of the school districts in failing to assess that leaves these lands exempt, I read a letter from the secretary of Hainstock school district No. 310, in which he says :

The railway land has been assessed in our school district for the last five years, and we have been unable so far to collect any tax from the company. We have always notified them of the sitting of the court of revision, also of the tax due for each year. I have inclosed a letter from the company, which is a sample of the letters they send us whenever they are notified of the court of revision.

The letter referred to is as follows :—

Winnipeg, Man., April 18, 1898.

Dear Sir,—Your notice with reference to certain lands in your school district proposed to be assessed to the Calgary and Edmonton Railway Company has been received by Messrs. Osler, Hammond & Nanton.

We have been instructed to look into the matter, and now beg to notify you that the lands are not liable to taxation, and should not be on the assessment roll.

Yours truly,
MUNSON & ALLAN.

These lands are listed by the railway company and appear on the maps issued by them as their lands; and yet this is their reply to the notification of the assessment, namely, that they are not taxable, although there was no exemption from taxation given by parliament in respect to these lands. As to just how this exemption affects the settlers in these several school districts, I propose to give the House a short statement of the expenses of running a school district in the North-west Territories. The great expense is of course the teacher's salary, which we will place at $600 per year. Of this amount seventy per cent, or $420, is paid by the North-west government, and thirty per cent, or $180, paid by the district out of the taxation of the district. The interest on the cost of the school, say $800, at eight per cent, is, say, $64. Fuel, say, $75, cost of assessment, say, $20. Repairs to school and supplies, say $11. Total expenses to be paid out of the taxation of the district, $250 per year.

There are, on an average, about 44 homestead quarter sections in each school district of full size. If 42 of these are occupied, the taxation would amount to about $6 per homestead. As there are 44 quarter sections available for homestead, so there are also 44 quarter sections of railway land. If this railway land were taxable, the $250 to be raised would be divided between 86 quarter sections instead of 42, and the result would be practically that the homesteader would pay $3 per quarter instead of $6 as he does at present.

By reason of this exemption enjoyed by the company in those ten school districts, the settlers are paying not less than $3 per year per quarter section more than they would, if the intent of parliament were given effect to.

But it is not usual to have 42 quarter sections in each school district occupied. In the early stages of settlement, a school district is frequently organized where there are only say 10 to 20 quarter sections occupied. Supposing there are only 22 of the 44 available quarter sections occupied, then the tax is $12 per year for each homesteader. That, you will agree, is a very considerable burden to be borne by the settlers in a new country. The burden is the greater as the inability to bear it is the greater, because when the first few settlers go into a district, and before they have succeeded in making their lands productive, is when settlers are fewest, and so the burden of taxation is heaviest. Therefore it means a great deal to them, and to the country in protecting pioneer settlement, that this unjust exemption should not be longer continued.

In the case of school districts where 22 quarter sections are occupied, where the people have at present to pay $12 per quarter section per year, if the railway quarter sections were available, the total taxation per quarter section then would be $3.75, a difference of $8.25 per quarter section in favour of the homesteader.

In the ten school districts in this particular part of the district that I represent, the exemption from taxation enjoyed by the railway company at present, on the scale I have given to the House, amounts to $1,320 per year. Or to put it in another way, the people whom I represent in this House, in that particular part of the country, have to pay $1,320 per year out of their pockets for the advantage of gentlemen to whom this House never intended to give that advantage.

But there is taxation in the North-west besides that necessary for the support of schools. There is in place of a general municipal system what is called the local improvement system, whereby each township, when it has a certain number of settlers, is set apart as such district, and a tax is levied upon the land occupied within it for the purpose of improving the roads within its limits. The local improvement tax is fixed on a flat basis of $2.50 per quarter section. In each township, which is six miles square, there are 36 sections, of which 16 are railway sections. An exemption of $2.50 per quarter section is $10 per section, or $160 per township, or statute labour district. Therefore, in each statute labour district set apart in that section of country, the railway company enjoys a benefit of $160 per year by reason of its illegal exemption, and in 10 statute labour districts in operation in that part of the country, the exemption in favour of the company amounts to $1,600 per year. And this exemption, again I say, it was never intended by this House to grant.

In that particular section of country, in 30 miles length along the railway, where there are, to the best of my knowledge, ten schools and ten statute labour districts in operation, the Calgary and Edmonton road is now yearly profiting to the extent of $2,920 by reason of these unintended exemptions from taxation; and a burden of that amount is placed upon the settlers. This is a matter of very great importance, and of direct financial interest, to a very important part of the community that I represent. The value of these exemptions increases as the settlement of the country increases. What we have to-day, as I have said, amounts to an exemption of about $3,000 per year, where only ten school districts and ten statute labour districts are in operation, but will amount to more and more every year as more school and statute labour districts are formed. To put the matter in a very few words, so that the House will understand the magnitude of these illegal exemptions, let me give the total figures. At present the exemption is $10 per square mile of statute labour tax, and $12 per square mile of school tax, or $22 in all. At the same rate, on the total grant to the Calgary and Edmonton of two million acres, the exemption would amount to $700,000 per year, and on the total grant to all the companies mentioned, that is to say, on a total of six million acres of land, the exemption would amount to $2,000,000 per year. In view of these facts, I ask the favourable consideration of the House for the resolution which I have the honour to present. Although, in its larger sense, we are not compelled to deal with it; in its more restricted sense, in relation to the school and statute labour districts already organized, we are compelled to deal with it, and move this burden of $3,000 a year which is unjustly and without authority of law laid upon the particular section of the country which I have mentioned; and which is not all, but only half the district affected by the Calgary and Edmonton land grant.

On the point of this Calgary and Edmonton land grant, let me say, that a part of it is located not along the railroad line. Some of it is more than fifty miles from railroad communication. The company assumes to own that land, assumes even the right to put settlers off, whose occupation began before survey; and yet, they refuse to pay taxes on it.

Mr. T. O. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). I quite agree with my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver) with reference to this matter. In Manitoba and the North-west, 64,000,000 acres of land have been granted to railway corporations, and these lands, as has been stated by my hon. friend, are exempt from taxation. It will easily be understood that the people are suffering great hardships through not being able to tax the land for the purposes of maintaining schools and other public purposes. There is, for instance, the road running into the Saskatchewan, the Regina and Long Lake road. It received a grant of 6,400 acres a mile. The lands have been located chiefly along the line of road, but they are where the land is fertile and good, and settlers have come in in consequence of the road having been built; and when people want to form school districts and statute labour districts, they find they cannot realize any taxes from these lands, because the company claims that they are exempt. As the hon. member for Alberta has said, I do not think it was the intention of this House when this Act was passed, to grant exemption to this corporation. In the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway, there certainly was exemption for 20 years; but I do not think a similar clause can be found in any other statute. Therefore, I think something should be done in the near future to let the people of the North-west know what condition they are in, in regard to these lands. Another point is that we are now getting in considerable immigration from different parts of the world. When people come in for the purpose of looking up a location, either for themselves or their friends, one of the first things they ask about is the law respecting schools. They get the desired information, and then they come to look up the question of taxation. That is a point regarded as very important by people coming from the other side of the line, because in the United States they are greatly troubled by heavy taxes, and, in changing to a new country, they want to get some place where the taxes are not so heavy. If they go into a township and find so many of the odd-numbered sections held by a railway company, it comes to this, that there are no lands that they can assess for the maintenance of schools except their own. As my hon. friend from Alberta has said, the cost of maintaining schools in the North-west Territories is greater than in the older provinces, for several reasons. We cannot employ teachers for salaries as low as are paid in the east. The expense of repairs is considerable, and fuel is a thing that costs the people of the North-west Territories a great deal of money. Figuring the whole thing up, it seems almost impossible for the people to maintain schools there, unless they are put in a position to tax all the lands in a school district. When people looking for locations find that these lands are exempt, ten to one they leave the country and will not come back, and will not recommend their friends to settle. Perhaps a party of people come in and find it a desirable location in a corner of a township. Under our school legislation, where there are six children, they can start a school district. But poor settlers coming in are not in a position to pay taxes for three or four years, and realizing that difficulty, the people decide not to come into the country.

Another question is the statute labour districts. That is a new thing with us. Up to two years ago, we had nothing of that kind. We have no municipalities in the North-west, except a few of the larger towns. But we have a system of what we call statute labour districts. We appoint an officer, and he has to tax the land in the statute labour district for the purpose of maintaining the roads and bridges. When he comes to the lands held by railroad corporations, it is impossible for him to tax them, and so the burden of taxation has to fall on the settlers in that locality. The position the farmers are in is this—by their labour they are increasing the value of all the land in the township. Every acre of land they cultivate, every rod of fencing they put up, increases the value, not only of their own lands, but of the lands held by the railroad corporations. Every dollar they pay to make roads and bridges, has a similar effect. So, year by year, the value of these lands is increased by the labour of the settlers, who get no return that they do not work for. I think something should be done in the near future to improve that state of affairs. The Hudson's Bay Company and all other such companies pay their taxes, and I do not see why the railroad corporations should not be called on to pay taxes as well. They claim that the lands are not granted until the patents are taken out. But they hypothecate these lands by issuing land grant bonds. We know also, as a matter of fact, that they lease the lands. Any person who wants to lease lands from a railway corporation has only to make application and send his money and he can lease the lands for a very small sum. These things show that these companies consider themselves the owners of the land. But when it comes to taxation, they say the land is vested in the Crown. But if they can mortgage the land and lease it, the land must, as a matter of fact, belong to them, and by right, it should be subject to taxation, as much as any other land in the North-west Territories. I hope the government will take this question into consideration, and will do something for the relief of the settlers in the way of forcing these people, if necessary, to take out patents, and if that is not necessary, then to give a decision, so that we may know where we are on this question.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). Coming from a section of country that suffered from a somewhat similar cause, I can readily understand the importance this matter is to the pioneer of the North-west Territories. The operations of the Canada Company in Ontario are well known in my section of the country. They held large tracts of land, and the pioneer who came in there was obliged to make roads, and build schoolhouses, and bear all alone the expense of increasing the value of the country around him, and the result was that the company got the benefit of the increased value to their lands as well as the settler. Now, it is very much the same with the settler in the North-west Territories. I do not think it was ever contemplated that the railway company should exercise the right to hold these lands until such times as, in their discretion, they took out a deed. I think an intimation was given to this House that the question was a matter for the courts to decide. If that be the case, and the government knew that the settlers of that country are suffering from that cause, why did they not state a case and let the courts decide it. The government are derelict in their duty in not doing so, because it is highly desirable that the company should know whether they are or are not entitled to take out a patent for that land as soon as they are located, as soon as they have been claimed, and when the government is willing to give it to them. If the patent is taken out then the land becomes taxable, and the settler in that country would receive a benefit from it. But that is not the only injustice that is done to the pioneer who goes into that country; he is not only deprived of the moneys which would go to the community from the taxes, but he is deprived of the money that he would be entitled to draw from the Education Department if these lands were settled on, and if children from those lands were attending school in that locality. So there is a double injury done to the settler in that country by reason of the railway company refusing to take out a patent on the lands they have located themselves, and that they are prepared to rent to others, or to sell to others. But until they take out a patent they hold they cannot be taxed for those lands. I think it is a great injury to the settler and a great injustice to the pioneer of that country, and the sooner it is remedied the better. Any one who knows what was the result in Ontario of the Canada Company's operations, and who goes up into that country and finds almost the same condition existing there, would be very chary of settling in any locality where that evil existed, knowing from experience the effects of it in the province of Ontario. Not only does it retard settlement, but it must injure immigration, and the country will suffer from that cause. Therefore, I say it is the bounden duty of the government to attend to this matter at once. I am in favour of this resolution for the reason that I know the injury that was done to the settlers of Ontario, and I think the injury done to the North-west settler is a great deal worse. As it is now six o'clock, I will not continue this debate, but will say once more that I am strongly in favour of this resolution, and I think the government are derelict in their duty in not having settled it before.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Mr. Speaker, the question which has been brought before the House by the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) is a question that is fraught with very great importance to the people of the North-west Territories, and also, to some extent, to the people of the province of Manitoba. I do not think that the hon. member for Alberta at all exaggerated the importance of the question, because, the facts which he has placed before the House, are quite sufficient to show every hon. member of this House the extreme hardships under which the settlers in the North-west Territories labour in respect to their municipal or statute labour taxes and their school taxes when they are settled in the midst of lands that are owned by the railway companies to which the hon. gentleman refers. The figures show that the incidence of taxation is rendered almost unbearably heavy by the fact that all these lands are owned by the railway companies and have not been subject to taxation. This is a very large subject and a very complicated one. The difficulties which attend the settlement of this question cannot be comprehended except by one who has been called upon to give some attention to the details of the subject. My hon. friends in the North-west Territories are quite justified in seeking for an early settlement of this question, and if the government had, in any respect, been derelict in its duty, as was suggested by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), I think the importance of the subject would justify the censuring of the government. The statements made by the hon. member for Alberta show that the effect of these exemptions from taxation is to render the taxation so heavy that in the case of school districts, where there is a very small number of heads of families, it is quite impossible to keep such districts alive and there have been many cases where settlers have gone in, have formed school districts, have gone to the trouble and expense of getting their schoolhouses built, and have been compelled to close up their schoolhouses because there was not a sufficient number of taxpayers in the district to keep the school going. That has been one of the difficulties that we have had to contend with in connection with the subject of immigration into the North-west Territories, because, we can very readily understand, that, particularly in the case of settlers from the Western States, or from England, the first question that is asked by an intending settler is as to what is the position in respect to educational facilities. I may say that, in my judgment, the government has not been derelict in its duty in respect to dealing with this question. The difficulties that have taken place have not taken place because attention has not been given to the subject by the government and particularly by the department of which I have charge and which is particularly charged with the dealing with this subject. The difficulty, in fact, has arisen from the history of the question, and from this fact in connection with it, that land grants were given by our friends of the late government under conditions which they were not in a position to fulfil at that time and which it is very difficult to fulfil at the present time. Land grants were given without due consideration and without taking into account the resources of the government in respect to these lands, the quantity of land which the government had at its disposal and the quality of the land, and the result of this is that we are called upon, now, to fulfil these contracts. We have a man travelling all over the North-west Territories to find land that will enable us to fulfil these contracts. There is one particular company, the Qu'Appelle and Long Lake Railway Company, one of the companies to which my hon. friend from Alberta referred, and the great portion—I may say three-quarters of the land which was scheduled to that company has been rejected by that company as being altogether unfit for settlement, and not in accordance with the contracts they had with the government. At the present time it looks as if the question as to the fulfilment of that contract by the government will have to be settled in the courts. I have not yet been able to get from the officers of my department a definite report as to the particular lands that we are in a position to offer to that company for the purpose of placing the government in a position to say that we had tendered the fulfilment of the contract, although I have had in special charge of this work for the last year and a half, under special instructions to close up this matter as rapidly as possible, one of the oldest, most capable and most experienced officers in my department. I refer to Mr. Pearce, who has been employed by the department for over twenty years, and who is better acquainted with this subject than any other man in Canada. This gentleman has been under special instructions to facilitate and hasten the settlement of this question for the last year and a half, but he has not made such progress as will enable us to issue patents for the land up to this time. This question has received constant attention at my hands and at the hands of my department. Difficulties have arisen, not only in connection with the Qu'Appelle and Long Lake Railway, but also in connection with the Calgary and Edmonton Railway. In the case of the Calgary and Edmonton Railway I came to the conclusion, a few months ago, that there was a large portion of that grant that could then, immediately, be patented, but, just about the time that I had arrived at that conclusion and was about to issue instructions to have the patents issued a question arose in connection with a very large portion of that land in the shape of a dispute raised by the company as to whether the land fulfilled the terms of the contract. It was claimed by the company that an enormous portion of the land which had been allotted to the company and which had been, as I understood, and as the officers of the department understood, accepted by the company, had not been finally accepted, and could only be accepted on terms which I was not, at the time, and am not now prepared to definitely accede to. It was claimed that this land was of an arid character, that it had not sufficient moisture to make it fit for settlement, and that is the question which, more than anything else, retards the solution of the difficulty. A very large portion of the land grant of the Calgary and Edmonton Railway Company is situated in a territory where there is a considerable number of water courses and a considerable number of springs which, taken with the land and evenly distributed, render the land fairly valuable. The department has for some years past, pursued the policy of reserving these water courses for public use so that certain persons could not secure control of the water courses and thus deprive all the rest of the land of value. The object, of course, in doing that was to render the land which was comprised within the even-numbered sections fit for settlement, so that persons taking up homesteads would have access to the water courses and the land would not be worthless as it would if a few settlers were permitted to monopolize the water. A difficulty arises between them and the government in connection with that question. Only some two weeks ago a deputation from the company waited upon me on that subject, and we were not able to arrive at an understanding because I was not able to accede to the view which the company presented, and the company refused to accede to the views which I presented. My hon. friend will see that it is not a question of simply taking a map and saying: A certain amount of land belongs to the company, and we will issue the patents for that to-day. There are complications and difficulties in this question which have been receiving my attention ever since I took charge of the department. There are certain elements in connection with this which I might suggest to the House as indicating further the difficulties in the way. There is this, for instance: The Qu'Appelle and Long Lake Company have been notified that there is land away to the far north far out of the reach of their railway, and far out of the reach of present settlement, which is fairly fit for settlement, and from which they could make their selection. The company dispute the right of the government to say that they must take their land there. They contend that the contract under which they are entitled to the land grant, properly construed, means that the land must be within reasonable distance of the railway, of the market, and that otherwise the land is not fairly fit for settlement. All these questions arise and, while I am quite prepared to accede to what my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) says in his motion: that the lands which have been allotted and in respect to which we can agree to fulfil the terms of the contract, should be patented at once, I must point out that there are serious difficulties which we will have to settle and serious questions which will have to be solved before this matter is finally disposed of.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) will see that so far as I am concerned, and so far as this government is concerned, we are charged with the duty of carrying out certain transactions which must be carried out in the terms of contracts made with our predecessors in office. We cannot alter the contracts, we cannot even say what was meant by the contracts. That would not make any difference even if we could, because the contracts must speak for themselves, and if the courts were appealed to for interpretation, we would have to do what the courts say the government is bound to do for the purpose of carrying these contracts out.

Mr. SPROULE. Then why not state a case and submit it to the courts so as to get their opinion, and then you would know where you are ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. That seems all very simple, but if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) were called upon to frame a case and ask the courts to settle in an academic way the question as to whether certain lands were fairly fit for settlement, and as to whether they fulfilled the terms of the contract, he would see that it is not so simple after all.

Mr. SPROULE. That is not the question I refer to ; but the question as to whether they would not be compelled to take their deeds after the lands were selected, so that the land would be taxable.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. There is no question about that at all. There is not the slightest question raised on that score.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood there was.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) is mistaken. He has in his mind the question of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which, necessarily, of course, affects a large portion of the North-west Territories, but that question arises in this way : The Canadian Pacific Railway charter provided that the land grant of the company shall be free from taxation for twenty years after the grant thereof from the Crown. The charter was granted, I think, in 1881. An immense portion of the land is not patented yet, and the contention of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is that the exemption runs for a period of twenty years from the time that the Crown grant is issued. I need not enter into a discussion of that, nor need I show the difficulty of scheduling and patenting these lands, because the motion does not touch that. The motion of my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) refers simply to those companies which have no exemption by statute and whose exemption simply exists until the land is scheduled and patented. That is the case of the Calgary and Edmonton, of the Qu'Appelle and Long Lake, and of, I think, the Alberta Railway and Coal Company. In pointing out the variety of difficulties which have arisen in connection with the scheduling of these lands, I desire to assure my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) and the House, that I appreciate the fact that it was not the intention of parliament in granting these lands to grant exemption from taxation. If parliament intended that, it would be so provided in the charter or in the Act which provided for the land grant. But recognizing that fact, it does not remove the difficulties which exist in a departmental way of arriving at a settlement of the question. If we had an amount of land admitted to be fairly fit for settlement which was in excess of the amount, or equal to the amount which we are bound under the contracts to give, it would be a simple matter to schedule and patent those lands. But disputes arise all along the line in connection with these lands and only a comparatively small amount has been readily accepted by the companies without dispute. I think what I have said will indicate to the House the view I take of the matter, the difficulties which have prevented a complete settlement of the question, and nothing further need be said on that point. In so far as the principle of the motion of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) is concerned, I have no objection whatever to it, and I readily agree that it is the duty of the government to see that the patents are issued just as rapidly as possible.

Mr. N. F. DAVIN (West Assiniboia). Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the House will hear—or the country either—with satisfaction, the speech of the minister (Mr. Sifton), because what it amounts to is this : that he endorsed the position taken up by these companies, namely, that unless they get the cream of the land, they are not bound to take it. It seems to me that the proposition made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) is shown in its flagrant fallaciousness, if we consider the last excuse he gave. That excuse is this : That the companies can actually say to the minister : We will not have this land ; it is fairly good land, it is A-1 land, and it will produce Red Fife, 60 pounds to the bushel, but it is some distance from a railway and we will not take it. Why, Sir, the idea of reading such a condition as that into the agreement made by these people, shows a desire to lean to the railways that I do not think is very creditable to the government or very creditable to the minister. It seems to me that the speech we have heard from the Minister of the Interior does away with all hope of expecting a near settlement of this most pressing question. It is a pressing question, Mr. Speaker, because it affects closely and dearly the settlers new and old in the North-west Territories. The Minister of the Interior understands it. He is himself a North-west man, but for some reason or other, although he is at the head of the department that should settle it, he says : Non possumus ; we cannot settle it. Why cannot it be settled ? Here are railway companies to whom land has been given under certain conditions. They are told they are to get so many acres of land and they are fit for settlement. I suppose what that means is that it shall be ordinarily fit for settlement. It could not mean—no court in the world would read it as meaning the cream of the land—the paragon acres of the North-west Territories; and the suggestion made by my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) is pertinent, because, although I think my hon. friend had in his mind the Canadian Pacific Railway agreement, nevertheless, his suggestion will apply to this.

Mr. McCARTHY. Will my hon. friend allow me? Has he the clause of the agreement to which he refers as not having the meaning which he said the minister had read into it?

Mr. DAVIN. I haven't it here, but I suppose the minister can produce it in a moment. Why did not the hon. gentleman ask him?

Mr. McCARTHY. Because I did not hear what the minister said, and I wanted to know what that clause was.

Mr. DAVIN. From memory, the clause runs this way—and I suppose the minister has read it more recently than I—that the land shall be fit for settlement. Is that so?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Fairly fit for settlement.

Mr. DAVIN. The very qualification! If it read fit for settlement, it would be stronger; but being qualified by the word fairly, it cannot mean the cream of the land, and must mean the average land fit for settlement. Every word of my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver) I can endorse. The people of the North-west have to meet school taxes and taxes accruing from the local government, while we have these rich corporations exempt, and the Department of the Interior working with them to prevent them being forced to take possession of these lands and become liable to bear their proper burdens. When we consider the pioneer settler who has gone into the North-west with his muscle, his sweat and his strong will, to struggle with his wife and his children, to make his way, and then go to Montreal, to Toronto, to London or to New York, and enter the palaces of the magnates behind these railways, who are shirking the school taxation and the local improvement taxation that properly belongs to them, and then find the Minister of the Interior coming forward and explaining to us in the tenderest manner how difficult it is to secure that these gentlemen shall be forced to bear their proper burdens, I hope, Sir, that the House will pass this resolution, not as a formal matter, not in the sense in which the Minister of the Interior says he has no objection to it, but I hope the House will pass it in a mandatory manner to indicate to the government of the day that they must do their duty in the premises. Mr. Speaker, I will even go further than this motion suggests. I say, even in regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway lands, that there is now at the head of the railway, as there has always been since Sir William Van Horne was placed there, a man of the highest intelligence and statesmanlike capacity. We have at present Mr. Shaughnessy, a man fit worthily to follow Sir William Van Horne, and he is too enlightened a man not to see that the extreme view taken by those who suppose they are acting in the interest of the railway, is contrary to a large and enlightened view of what is best for the corporation itself; because if you so act that the lands of the North-west which are thus bound up shall be more quickly brought into settlement, not sparse but congested, so that the traffic will be greatly increased, you will add to the earnings of the railway and to its general prosperity. Mr. Speaker, I am very much surprised and disappointed at the speech of my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, who has held out no hope whatever to my hon. friend from Alberta. He has shown my hon. friend from Alberta that there are a lot of lions in the way, that it is a complicated question, a difficult thing to deal with, and under these circumstances the Greek kalends would come before these railways will have their lands subjected to taxation. I heartily support the motion of my hon. friend.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). Mr. Speaker, I had intended before six o'clock to have said a few words with regard to this matter; but in view of the statement made on behalf of the government by the Minister of the Interior that the resolution is accepted and will be carried out, I presume it will probably be unnecessary for me to emphasize the importance of the question. However, while on my feet I wish to say I believe this is a question of the very gravest importance to the people of the North-west. The statement of the Minister of the Interior emphasizes that point. He tells us that the government has the very greatest difficulty discovering sufficient lands fairly fit for settlement to fulfil the contracts with these different railway companies. If that is so, Sir, the absolute necessity of bringing these lands under taxation, will be apparent to the House, because if sufficiently good lands cannot be obtained to fulfil the contracts with these companies—

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. If my hon. friend will permit me, least I might be misunderstood, it is of course understood that the grants are taken from the odd-numbered sections. I of course meant that it was difficult to select land from these, not from the even-numbered sections.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That puts a different face on the matter. I assumed that if it was extremely difficult to get lands for the railways, it would be difficult to get them for settlers, and therefore it would be extremely difficult to raise the municipal taxation of the country and to aid the schools. I have a good deal of sympathy with one of the statements made by my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), that is, that the time has come when the people of the North-west ought to have an innings. These magnates who have made their millions out of land grants and out of the construction of these railways, and who are living in their mansions in eastern cities, should not monopolize the special care of this House. I think we ought to devote some attention at least to the care of the settlers of that country who bear the burden and the heat of the day. I myself this afternoon introduced a Bill with reference to the taxation of the Canadian Pacific Railway lands. I was impressed with the statement which the Minister of the Interior has just made with reference to that question. I think I made a correct note of what he did say; if not he will correct me; that was that the government interprets the twenty years exemption clause to mean that the exemption period shall extend from the date on which the lands were allotted to the company. Is that a correct interpretation?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I did not make any statement on that point. What I said was that the company pretend that the period of exemption runs from the patent of the land.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The company makes the remarkable contention that the twenty years' exemption dates from the issuing of the patent for these lands. It will be twenty years in 1901 since that contract passed this parliament. I have gone over the debates very carefully, and it is perfectly clear to me, and it must be to every unbiased man who chooses to read those debates, that the House, without any apparent exception, understood that the exemption period, if it did not date from the passing of the contract, would at least date from the period at which the lands were earned by the company and set aside for the uses of the company. Hon. gentlemen will see that when the government sets aside lands for the uses of the company and the company issues land grant bonds on the strength of its land grant, it owns the land, has it for sale, and surely that would constitute a transfer by the government to the company. But we have the remarkable statement that the company actually interprets that clause to mean that the twenty year period shall date from the time the patent for these lands is issued. Let me tell the House that the Canadian Pacific Railway, although the twenty years' period is almost elapsed, has not up to the present applied for a patent for a single acre of its land grant of 25,000,000 acres; and unless this House takes the thing into its own hands and declares what the clause means, we shall have apparently an exemption in perpetuity, of that vast land grant in the North-west, in favour of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Surely no one will pretend that that is a fair interpretation of the clause, and I hope there will not be an hon. member who will refuse, when the Bill I have introduced, comes before the House for its second reading, to define what that clause actually means.

I could quote from speeches of the members of the government of that day and leading members on both sides of the House to show it was the clear understanding, when the clause was passed, that that exemption period should date at least, if not from the passage of the contract, from the date on which these lands were handed over and made available for the uses of the company. It is provided in one of the clauses that when the company has built twenty miles of railway and puts that section in condition for successful operation, the proportion of the cash subsidy and the land subsidy earned by the completion of such twenty miles will become available for that particular section. Clearly, therefore, it was the intention that the exemption period should then begin. Unless we take steps to enforce the idea brought forward by the hon. member for Alberta, and bring all the lands in the North-west under taxation, it will be extremely difficult to go on with the successful settlement of that country. Unless we have a proper school system, efficiently carried out, unless roads and bridges are provided, settlers will not come in and locate in that country, and, therefore, it is highly important that these lands should be brought under taxation at the earliest possible date.

Mr. J. M. DOUGLAS (East Assiniboia). I rise briefly, Mr. Speaker, to endorse what has been said by other members of the North-west Territories in relation to this vexed question. But I wish further to state that the principle we have discussed this afternoon and evening is capable of further extension, and should be made to apply to colonization companies, as well as to the railway companies. The same difficulty exists with regard to these colonization companies, of locking up large portions of land, thus seriously affecting the maintenance of public schools and the carrying out of local improvements in the shape of roads and bridges, and thereby preventing the settlement of the country. In my constituency, while the settlers are affected by the land grant to railways being exempt from taxation, they are also largely affected by the fact that 80,000 acres of land are to-day locked up by these colonization companies, and debarred, we may say, from settlement. These colonization companies received their land grant from the late government and have long since ceased to colonize, yet many of them hold large portions of land for which they paid a very petty sum. Then the moneys they advanced to settlers years ago are still registered against the quarter sections, so that when new comers wish to settle on these homesteads they find certain charges registered against these particular quarter sections, and in consequence they prefer to move further on, where they will find land that is unencumbered. The result is that in the neighbourhood of Saltcoats, Yorkton and White Sand River, large tracts of land, to the extent of 80,000 acres, are locked up in this way. These colonization companies appear to play the same game with the school boards when pressed for the payment of the school tax, as do the railway companies, and the letter read by the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver), as a sample of the efforts made to avoid the payment of taxation, is just a fair illustration of the replies received from the colonization companies when called on to pay the school or municipal taxes. I hope, therefore, that when discussing this matter in connection with the railway land grants, we will not lose sight of the fact that the same difficulty exists with regard to the colonization company grants. There is, however, this difference, that by the law, as it now stands, I am given to understand, these colonization companies are bound to have settlers upon their lands within two years, failing which the land reverts back to the Crown. I brought this matter under the notice of the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) and his department last session, and he very kindly gave me his promise in writing, that the department would go as far as the law would permit in the issuing of patents to these companies, so that at an early date the people entitled to receive patents should get them and become liable to taxation. How far the department has travelled in this matter, I am not prepared to say, but I believe an honest effort is being made to overtake and remove this difficulty.

I fully agree in what has been said by other members from the west on this important subject, and hope that at no distant date these parties will be compelled to take out their patents, where they are entitled to them, and be forced to assist in the improvement of the country, and thus remove an excessive burden from the shoulders of the early settlers.

Mr. N. C. WALLACE (West York). The hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Douglas) has made some extraordinary statements which I think should not go without some further reference being made to them. While he does not say anything very much about the question immediately before the House as to the position of the railway companies and the lands that these companies have earned and upon which they pay no taxes whatever, he says that the colonization companies are in the same position. I am connected with one colonization company that has performed every obligation it entered into with the government, that has asked no favour from the government, that has acquired its lands; and I can tell the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) that they pay their taxes and pay a pretty heavy rate, do not do it grudgingly, but do it willingly, because it is right that they should pay their taxes as well as the owners of any other land in the community. The hon. gentleman says that they have ceased to colonize. Where does he get his information? If he says that about Yorkton, I deny it, because the York Farmers' Company are the most active colonizers that can be found. But I can say that they do not get much encouragement or assistance from the Minister of the Interior. He seems to have another scheme in his mind, to send the settlers to the Dauphin country, and make that the great colonization ground. He might fairly be asked to give every portion of the country a chance, more particularly as the Manitoba and North-western Railway opens up the section to which I refer, where the settlers can have railroad facilities without travelling many miles. This part of the country, I may say, is well adapted for settlement.

Mr. DAVIN. Hear, hear.

Mr. WALLACE. There is no more prosperous settlement in the North-west, as the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) knows, if he has visited that part of the country, and, he will know that there is no more prosperous town in Canada to-day than Yorkton.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question.

Mr. WALLACE. Certainly.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The statement I made is that 80,000 acres of land are locked up in that way. A list of the lands has been prepared and submitted to me by the land agent at Yorkton.

Mr. WALLACE. I have not referred to that feature of the question yet, but I am going to. The hon. gentleman says that 80,000 acres of land are locked up. In what way? Acquired by the colonization companies in accordance with the regulations laid down by the government of the day—wise and judicial regulations I must say. The colonization companies can advance money to a settler, and take a lien upon his homestead and charge him not more than six per cent interest. At a time when money in the North-west under such circumstances was worth eight or ten or twelve per cent, the government tied down the colonization companies to six per cent. And, say, one of these companies has advanced $100 to a farmer on his homestead, would the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) say that that claim should be cancelled and the lender should no longer have the security that the government has provided he should have? Does he propose to despoil the creditor of the right he has secured under the regulation? If not, I do not see what sense there is in his objection unless he proposes that the government should pay off that indebtedness.

Then he says that the colonization companies are trying to play the same game with the school boards and municipalities. I suppose he means the same game as the railway companies, although he does not say so. I can tell him that the company around Yorkton has paid every dollar of their taxes, municipal, school, statute labour and every other, and does not owe a dollar for taxation up to the year 1900. Therefore, the point that the hon. member for East Assiniboia has endeavoured to make against them, I can tell him, is utterly without foundation. He says they are going to make a regulation that there must be settlers on the land within two years. Why, even when settlers are placed on the land, they cannot always be held there. Men will wander away.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Why do they wander? Because they cannot live under the regulations.

Mr. WALLACE. Because they like to wander. The hon. member for East Assiniboia himself must have wandered, or he would not have found his way up to East Assiniboia. Perhaps, when he is better known, he will have to wander to some other constituency to get a foothold, because they tell us up there that he cannot be re-elected to his present seat. Now, we come to the main question. The Minister of the Interior told this House with regard to this question on the 7th of March, 1898:

The view taken by the government is that exemption dated from the issue of the patent. It has been usual to allow long intervals to elapse between the selection of the land and the issue of the patents.

He says, further on:

The question is one that involves the interpretation of the statute by legal authority. When any practical necessity arises for determining the question, it will be referred to the law officer of the government, but up to the present time such representation has not been made.

What does that mean? Two years ago the Minister of the Interior indicated that the question should be referred to the law courts. But what did he tell the hon. member for Alberta to-night? Why, that it would be improper or childish to think of such a thing.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) will read the motion he will see that it has nothing to do with the question of the Canadian Pacific Railway lands.

Mr. WALLACE.

Mr. WALLACE. But the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) referred to the payment of the taxes, not to the matter that the minister—

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The hon. member for East Grey referred, by mistake, not understanding exactly the point to which I was referring, to matters relating to the Canadian Pacific Railway land grant. I was not discussing it. No question was raised about that in the motion. My hon. friend for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) joined with me in saying that the hon. member for East Grey was mistaken. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) is travelling beyond the record and dealing with a matter that has nothing to do with the motion before the House.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. member for East Grey was referring to the question of taxes on railroad lands.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. On Canadian Pacific Railway lands.

Mr. WALLACE. The case of the Canadian Pacific Railway is still weaker, because the exemption in that case had a twenty year limit.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. It is not referred to in the motion before the House.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) may try to obscure the question but we will hardly allow him. The hon. member for East Grey was referring to the demand for the taxation of railway land. The Minister of the Interior was trying to get off with some other questions, which he was dealing with very elaborately.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Oh, oh.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. minister thinks it is a matter to be laughed off, but it is not a laughing matter, but a serious and important question. He says that he has been dealing with it ever since he came into office, about three and a half years ago, and he has to acknowledge that he is no nearer a solution of the question than he was then—not so near it, as, according to this quotation, he was two and a half years ago. He thinks it of no consequence, but to me it seems a very important matter, whether a railroad, having acquired lands, and mortgaged them by issuing land grant bonds, should not have to pay taxes on those lands. The thing looks to me to be preposterous, and every one of the railway companies should be brought to time on this matter, and be compelled to pay the taxes which are justly their due to pay. But the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), when asked by these gentlemen behind him to inquire into this matter says: It is beset with difficulties. Well, what is the Minister of the Interior, what is any member of the government, there for? It is for the solution of difficulties, I should suppose, and the settlement of these questions. After three years and a half, all that he can tell us is, not that any conclusion had been arrived at, not that any settlement is made, but that it is a question beset with difficulties.' Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have these difficulties removed, or the Minister of the Interior removed, and somebody put in his place who can settle these difficulties, and the time does not seem to be far distant when that will occur. Now, what does the minister propose to do? Nothing, he does not propose to give any relief to the settlers in the North-west who are building up the country, who are spending their time, their industry, their energies in making the country great,—and it is becoming a great one, and every one should bear their share of the responsibilities, and every one is apparently doing so except these railroad companies that are under the protection of the Minister of the Interior. I would again call the attention of the Minister of the Interior to the fact that the people are watching the manoeuvres going on up there, they are looking to see why it is that the tide of population is sent away in advance of a railroad into a country that is more than one hundred miles further north, that has disadvantages, perhaps advantages also; and that the whole aim of the government seems to be to send settlers in along the Mackenzie and Mann line of railroad. The people are suspicious to-day, they know they have reason to be suspicious of the intimacy between Mackenzie and Mann and the Minister of the Interior. They know that there are good grounds for suspicion. They look over the country and what do they see? I shall not spread out on that, because it would be going away from the question, and I desire to stick straight to that one question. But I shall take another occasion of referring to these facts, and to show that the Minister of the Interior is bound in his duty to the House to give every portion of the North-west a fair chance, to give every portion an opportunity, and not be using the machinery of the government, of the Department of Immigration, to push these settlers into places where there will be dissatisfaction, where there will be unrest, when there are plenty of portions of the North-west that only ask for a fair show. That is all I have to say about this at present, but I hope that the government will come to the conclusion that it is their duty to move in this matter, and to make these railroad companies that have acquired lands, that have issued bonds on the strength of these lands, and have mortgaged their lands, to pay taxes as other people have to do on their property.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I do not desire to violate the rule by speaking again on this question, but as the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) has made a statement which constitutes a departure altogether from the first question that we were discussing, and as I can hardly allow that to go without remark, I desire to be pardoned for one moment for recurring to the subject. I desire to say that there is not a particle of foundation for the statement made by the member for West York that the government has attempted to divert the settlement of the North-west into any particular place. The statement he has made that it is the policy of the government to place settlers principally along the line of Mackenzie and Mann's railway, is altogether incorrect. No such effort whatever is made by the government. The instructions given to officers of the government are to furnish information generally in regard to every portion of the North-west, and there is no favouritism whatever shown. So far as the particular district to which the hon. gentleman refers, the district of Yorkton, perhaps there is a larger settlement around that particular place than around any place which has benefited by the immigration efforts of the government.

Mr. WALLACE. I could quote a speech made by the minister in this House during the present session in order to justify the statement that I have made.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to say in reference to something that I said, which I apprehend was misunderstood, that I understood the hon. member who introduced this subject to say that the railway companies, although they have selected their lands, neglected or refused to take their deed from the government because when they got their deed the land would become taxable. I said then that it would be in order for the government to do what the First Minister intimated when he said it was a matter for the courts to decide as to whether it should be compulsory upon the companies to take their deed, when their land would become taxable. I said it was the duty of the government to state a case and submit it to the Supreme Court to ascertain whether they could be compelled to take their deeds and make their lands taxable. I was not referring to the Canadian Pacific Railway land at all.

DISMISSAL OF A. MARCOTTE.

Mr. T. O. DAVIS (Saskatchewan) moved for :

Return of all correspondence, letters, telegrams or other communications relating to the dismissal of A. Marcotte from the employment of the Department of Agriculture at Duck Lake, Saskatchewan.

He said: I may explain that Mr. Marcotte was employed in Duck Lake, Saskatchewan, by the Department of Agriculture, having been placed in charge of the creamery station there. After he had been there for two seasons in charge of the creamery station, of which he had made a success by his energetic work, Professor Robertson, who is in charge of that branch, came up over the line last year on a tour of inspection. He passed the station at Duck Lake about two o'clock in the morning; Mr. Marcotte heard that he was passing on the train and went there to see him. He called on Professor Robertson and talked to him for a short time, and went back to his work. Two days afterwards, when the first mail arrived at Duck Lake, Mr. Marcotte got a letter which he found to be a dismissal from the office he occupied. He wrote to the department asking for an explanation, but he got no explanation as to why he was dismissed. This thing went all over and the citizens of Duck Lake have written letters, and in other ways, by representations to the department, have asked to be put in possession of the reason why this man was dismissed. At last they got word that he was dismissed on account of his intemperate habits. Mr. Marcotte is a very temperate man, and, of course, he does not feel like lying under a charge of that kind. He is not seeking to get back in the government employ, because he has a better situation, but he feels, and the citizens of Duck Lake feel, that some steps should be taken to clear his character of that charge, because a respectable man does not want to be dismissed from the employ of the government on account of being of intemperate habits when such is not the case. For that reason, I beg to move for these papers, so as to find what correspondence has taken place in connection with this matter.

NORTH-WEST REBELLION, 1885—CLAIM OF HENRY HALCRO FOR COMPENSATION.

Mr. T. O. DAVIS (Saskatchewan) moved for :

Copies of all correspondence, telegrams and papers in any way relating to the claim of Henry Halcro, of Prince Albert, N.W.T., for compensation for losses incurred during the North-west rebellion of 1885.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is a question that I have had occasion to bring up in this House for the last three or four years that I have had the honour of having a seat in this House—the question of rebellion claims in the Saskatchewan district. I will ask the indulgence of the House, because I may have to speak at some length, as this is a subject that affects a great many of my constituents. As hon. gentlemen are aware, in the rebellion of 1885 there were a number of settlers who lost all the property they had in consequence of that uprising. A great many of these settlers took up arms during the rebellion in order to assist in maintaining law and order in the district of Saskatchewan, and, of course, they were unable to be at their homes during that time that they were in the service of the Dominion. Later on, when the rebellion got under full headway, the officers in charge of the troops enrolled quite a number of farmers in that portion of the country and took them in Prince Albert. This was some time in the early part of the rebellion. These volunteers were in Prince Albert, and as spring came on a great many of the settlers, some of them half-breed settlers, wanted to return to their homes to look after their crops. The officers refused point blank to allow them to leave the town, as they had, so they said, to keep them there until they were relieved by Major-General Middleton. They had to stay there; there was no way out of it. But, when the trouble was over, in the latter part of May, they were allowed to go back to their homes. When they returned to their homes they found that their property had been destroyed, their stock driven away, and as it was about the month of June, they were unable to put in a crop to keep themselves and their families for the next year. They made representations to the government of the day, and the government took the matter up. I understand they proposed to settle all just claims in that district, and for that purpose they appointed a commission. The commission went up into the district of Saskatchewan and held sittings there for several months; they spent nearly the whole summer taking evidence in reference to these claims. The commission, of course, in order to make a show of fairness, had among its members a gentleman by the name of McKay, belonging to our part of the country, to see that the settlers were properly treated, and that they got fair-play at the hands of the government. We found that after the commission had travelled over a large portion of the district and taken a lot of evidence in connection with a great number of these claims, they started to pay claims, but they selected a party here and there to receive payment, while the great majority of the people were not paid at all. It was not a question of who had been in the rebellion and who had not been in the rebellion. A great many people might say that on account of the half-breeds being connected with the rebellion, they had no right to receive compensation at the hands of the government. Such was not the case. There were very few of the half-breeds connected with the rebellion, and the majority of them that were connected with it were forced into it against their desires. Very few half-breeds, in the first place, went into the rebellion of their own accord, but when it started, there was no protection for them, and of course, they were simply forced to join in. A few half-breeds got together and they forced them into the ranks. The major part of the property that was destroyed in that portion of the country by the troops was destroyed after the rebellion was over. The houses of a lot of people who lived on the South Saskatchewan River were burned two or three days after the rebellion was over at Batoche, and the half-breeds had given up their arms. A lot of houses were looted two or three days after the rebellion was over and a lot of horses and cattle, belonging to half-breeds, were driven off when hostilities had ceased. Outside of the half-breeds in the rebellion there was a great number of other parties not in the rebellion who took up arms when they were called upon by the government, and these people thought it was nothing but fair that they should receive reasonable compensation for what they had lost, because they claimed that they had lost their property through the action of the government in refusing to allow them to go home and look after it. They were unable to do this as they wanted to do it, because they were kept cooped up in Prince Albert and not allowed to go to their homes. Therefore, they think that the government should have compensated them for the property they lost during the rebellion. When this commission sat they seemed to select certain parties here and there, and their consideration was not confined to parties who were loyal and who had taken up arms when they were called upon by the government. We find that rebels who were on the other side were paid their claims. In one instance there was a gentleman by the name of Boyer, the chief councillor for Riel, who received between $7,000 and $8,000 in satisfaction of his claim. We find that Riel's high priest was paid a certain sum of money for the property that he lost. We find that another gentleman by the name of Batoche, who supplied arms and ammunition, and who was paid $20,000. Then, when we come down amongst other classes of the people, we find that, in some cases, men who had lost very little received compensation. In fact, we know that in one case a gentleman got $13,000, when he only lost about $1,000 worth of property. And so on all along the line. Some parties got paid three times the value of the stuff they lost, while others did not get paid anything at all. These people have got up an agitation for the settlement of these claims, and I think it is pretty nearly time for the government to take this matter up, to appoint a commission to investigate this question, to ascertain who have the right to be paid and to pay them. There is no doubt that a great many of them are entitled to be paid. The particular case I have brought before the House is that of a man named Halcro, a very deserving, honest Scotch half-breed, a hard workingman, who lives near the town of Prince Albert, and who has a family of eight or nine children. He was turned out of the town of Prince Albert in June, and when he got home his horses and cattle were stolen, his fences broken down, his house wrecked, and he and his family of eight or nine children were left without a cent. He made his claim, but the commission threw it out. Again, here is the case of a gentleman named Mackenzie, who sent his son out to fight for his country, the poor boy being killed in the engagement at Duck Lake. Mr. Mackenzie comes from Prince Edward Island, and is one of the most respected settlers we have in the district. Although he put in a small claim for $25, it was thrown out, notwithstanding that the claim was just and fair. On the other hand, gentlemen who had lost scarcely anything, got well compensated. In one case, a man who lost $1,000 got $13,000. Yet poor Mr. Mackenzie, whose son was killed at Duck Lake, got nothing. A gentleman at Battleford was paid $23,000 and every one knows in that part of the country that he never was possessed of half of that. J. D. McKay was a relative of one of the commissioners. As every person knows, he never was possessed of very large property, and probably $1,000 would cover all the property he had lying loose, but he got somewhere in the neighbourhood of $7,000. Several other of the relatives of the same commissioner were paid in the same way. If we look through the list of the parties who were paid, and the parties who were not paid, we find that those whose claims were paid, were all, or pretty nearly all Conservatives, and those whose claims were not paid, were Liberals. We all know how a gentleman named Batoche, was paid, and how another gentleman named Boyer, one of the councillors of Riel, was paid. We can all tell how that occurred. Shortly after the rebellion, this parliament gave a representative to the district of Saskatchewan, and the election was to be held in March, and the government of the day wanted to carry a supporter in that district no matter what the cost, so that they could tell the people down east that they were not responsible for the rebellion. The claims were still unsettled when the election was held and the agents of the government went around amongst the electors and told them, no matter whether they were rebels or not rebels, that if they would support the government candidate, their claims would be allowed, and if, on the contrary, they supported the opposition candidate, their claims would not be allowed. Take the case of Mr. Champagne. He was a man of great influence among the half-breed population, and he was told by the political friends of the hon. gentlemen opposite, that if he would support the Conservative candidate, his claim would be paid because they were going to pay the claim of Mr. Batoche. Mr. Champagne conscientiously told them that he could not support the government of the day, because of the way they treated the half-breed population, and if they were going to bribe him, by paying this claim, he would have to do without it. He told them he had a just claim and that he should be paid no matter whether he supported the government or not. As a matter of fact, Mr. Champagne never got a cent of compensation, while Mr. Batoche, who did support the Conservative party was paid $20,000. The satellites appointed by the Conservative candidate travelled from one district to another telling the voters that unless they supported the Conservative candidate, they would not get paid. There was a Mr. McLease, who is now dead, and who acted as solicitor for the half-breeds before the claims commission. He was a leading member of the Conservative committee and he sent a letter to the half-breeds all over the country, a letter, which I have in my possession, telling them that if they wanted to get their claims paid, they had better support the Conservative candidate. A few of them were drummed into supporting the Conservatives, and I must do the hon. gentlemen opposite the credit of saying, that when a man did vote for the Conservative candidate, they delivered the goods, and paid his claim. I had occasion to bring the case of Mr. Bremner before the House last year, and that was a case in point, but that is now settled. In the district of Battleford, it was the same way. There is a family at Bresaylor, named Sayers and another named Bremner, who were scouts for the government, and who lost their property, and their all, but the commissioners threw out their claims, because they were not Conservatives. If gentlemen like Batoche and Boyer, and gentlemen like Mr. Boucher, the high priest of Riel, got their claims paid, these poor people think they should have their claims paid, too. Ever since I have had the honour of a seat in this House, I have brought this question up, and so long as I continue to be a member of this parliament, I shall bring it up again and again, until it is settled, because these people have been unfairly treated, and no matter what government is in power, they should make restitution to them. If the late government wanted to do what was right, they would have done it, but I suppose their political friends did not tell them what was going on in the west. If the Conservative government were told by their friends the state of affairs there, we never would have had a rebellion, because there is no doubt that the rebellion was caused by the incompetent officials appointed by the Conservatives, when they opened up the west. The half-breeds brought their grievances to the attention of these officials, but the officials took no notice of them, and so the half-breeds were forced into rebellion. The half-breeds asked to have their scrip the same as their friends in Manitoba. They asked for their lands on the South Saskatchewan River, in the Two-mile belt, the same as their forefathers and relatives had in the province of Manitoba. But the government sent surveyors in there to survey the property in blocks, so that they would have three or four houses on one section, and the just claims of the half-breeds were not recognized. The half-breeds sent petition after petition to the government of the day, but these petitions were merely pigeon holed. If there was a rebellion there, the government was to blame for it, and not the half-breeds. The people lost their homes and their property through the rebellion, and I hold, Sir, that the government are in duty bound, to pay the people for the losses they sustained. There is the very small claim of Mr. Halero, which is mostly for his cattle, and the government should pay him immediately. I trust that when the papers are brought down the government will look into the claims remaining unpaid, and to these claims which I have brought to the attention of the House, and render prompt justice to the poor people concerned. I may say I do not intend to drop this matter. If these claims are not settled, I intend to keep the agitation up, and my people are not going to let it drop, because they think, as I do, that they have not been properly treated. I think it is time that their claims should be settled.

Motion agreed to.

SCRIP FOR HALF-BREED CHILDREN.

Mr. T. O. DAVIS (Saskatchewan) moved :

That in the opinion of this House scrip should be granted to all half-breed children born in the North-west Territories prior to 1885.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this question was taken up in the House a year ago, and legislation was passed giving the government power to settle this very important question in the North-west Territories. A commission was appointed early in the summer and proceeded to Athabasca and settled with the people in that portion of the Territories. Another commission at the same time settled with all the Indian claims in that part of the country. So that matter is all cleaned up. In 1870 the government, in taking over the province of Manitoba, treated with the Indians and half-breeds of that province, by giving scrip to the heads of families and also to all children born prior to the date of the treaty. After that they treated with the Indians of the North-west Territories, placing them on reserves, giving them annuities, furnishing them with schools, building industrial schools for the children, giving them cattle, and appointing instructors to teach them farming and teachers to instruct their children. All this was done for the Indian population; but up to that time the half-breeds of the North-west Territories were not recognized by the government at all until the rebellion of 1885 took place. After that event the government sent a commission to the North-west to treat with the half-breeds and give them scrip. When the commission went there, they wanted to settle with the half-breeds on the same basis as the half-breeds of Manitoba, that is, to give scrip to all who were born before 1870, saying that the treaty with Manitoba was a final treaty, and that the half-breeds should have come there to get their scrip. Well, it appears to me that the half-breeds of the North-west Territories, some in Athabasca, some as far away as York Factory, without any mail service or telegraph lines, did not know that any treaty was being made with the half-breeds of Manitoba in 1870. Even if they did know, I do not think it was right for the government to ask those people to go a thousand miles, or two thousand miles in some cases, to get this small amount of scrip. The half-breeds of the North-west claim, and claim rightly, that the first treaty made with them was made in 1885, and that they had never sold their interest in the country previous to that date. But the government of that day would not give them their scrip, and the agitation went on until my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior took up the matter, got the legislation of last session passed, and sent out the commission. There are a large number of half-breeds in the district of Saskatchewan which I represent. That district is 700 miles long and 600 miles wide, and the half-breeds are scattered all over it, so that it will take a considerable time, if a commission is appointed, to get all these half-breeds together and the question settled. I read in a paper the other day that the statement that I had placed this motion on the Order paper after my hon. friend from Western Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) had taken the matter up. I did not place this motion on the paper for the purpose of dealing at all with the matter that has already been practically settled by the Minister of the Interior, but for the purpose of dealing with another matter which my hon. friend from Western Assiniboia did not, I suppose, know anything about. Its purpose is to have scrip given to all half-breeds born in the Territories prior to 1885. There is a class of half-breeds born before that date whose parents came from Manitoba into the Territories after 1870, and settled there and raised families. They claim, rightly or wrongly, that they were in the Territories before that country was ceded to the Dominion government, and therefore they claim that their children are as much entitled to scrip as the people dealt with by the legislation passed last year. Whether that is a legal claim or not, I will not say; but, as a matter of public policy, I think it would be wise for the government to give scrip to these people, who do not exceed 150 or 200 in number. If the government do not give them scrip, they will keep up the agitation, because they believe they are entitled to it. I am not going to say that they have as good a claim as the half-breeds with whom the Minister of the Interior has arranged a settlement; but they have a certain claim from having been in the territory before it was ceded, and they are entitled to consideration at the hands of the government. Moreover, I think the government should deal liberally with all the half-breeds of the North-west Territories. There is no doubt that those people did a great deal for this country. They were the pioneers who stood between the white men and the Indians, and if we have been able to settle up that territory, we have largely the half-breeds to thank. Look at the amount of blood and treasure expended on the other side of the line in settling with the Indians, because the United States government had not the same class of half-breeds to assist in civilizing the Indians that we have had on this side. A great many of those half-breeds are descendants of old Hudson Bay officers, fine respectable people, and have invariably used their influence for good with the Indians; and one of the reasons why the Indians have been so peaceful all through the North-west Territories is the influence exercised over them by the half-breeds. Therefore, I say that the government should deal generously with those people in the matter of scrip. This agitation has been going on ever since the country was opened up, and if this settlement is made now, if these 150 or 200 children of half-breeds, who moved from Manitoba in 1870, are paid with the rest, we will never hear any more about the half-breed question in the Territories.

I hope the government will appoint a commission very soon. The sooner the scrip is paid out in that part of the country, the better for all concerned. We have had a very bad harvest this year, owing to the wet, and it will be a good thing for the half-breeds if they can get the scrip at this time. With regard to the statement that the half-breeds are giving their scrip away, there is nothing in it. Let me tell those hon. gentlemen who make statements of that kind, that the half-breeds are just as able to look after their own interests as any one in this House. They are upright and intelligent and are citizens, and if they want to sell their scrip, they have as good a right to sell it as any white man would. Whatever is given to them should be given without any restriction, and they will see that they get the highest price for it. I have not known any of them to give away their scrip for nothing yet, and I do not think that they are going to begin doing so now. Then there is the question of the land scrip. The government has been in the habit of giving scrip in two different ways—money scrip and land scrip. If the half-breed desires, he can get land scrip, representing 240 acres, but not transferable to anybody else, and many people think that the land scrip should be made transferable, for in that case the half-breeds would be able to get so much more money for it. But not being transferable, these people are forced to take the money scrip instead, which they have to sell at a discount of something like 50 or 60 per cent. A great many consider that that is a very small price, but when you take into consideration the fact that this scrip has to be held for years by bankers and brokers and the others who purchase it until some one requires the land, you will find that the price is a fairly good one. I know of a firm in Winnipeg that purchased a lot in 1885, and has some on hand yet, so that when people have to keep scrip for fourteen or fifteen years and pay 50 cents on the dollar for it, I think they are paying for it all that it is worth.

I hope that when considering the question of sending out a commission, the government will take up this matter of the half-breeds I have mentioned, who came to the Territories, and whose parents were settled with in Manitoba, and put an end to this agitation once and for all.

Mr. DOUGLAS. As some of these people are located in my constituency, I have much pleasure in seconding the motion of the hon. member for Saskatchewan.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). This question, which has been brought to the attention of the House by my hon. friend from Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis), is one which has already engaged the attention of the House more than once. It has been the cause of much concern to the present government and was, as we all know, a cause of much concern to the preceding government, and when settled, I think, we shall have removed with complete success all the causes of complaint which the half-breeds' population have had in the past. Whether or not the half-breeds of the Saskatchewan district should be given scrip to the year 1885 or whether, as at one time contended, only to the year 1870, is a question which after all ought to be settled on broad and generous lines. The half-breed population, as stated by my hon. friend from Saskatchewan, have a large claim upon our gratitude. On more than one occasion they have stood between the Indian and mischief, and on the whole their influence has been exercised for the better condition of the country. Perhaps, if we were to look at the claim strictly, we should hold the view that they should be settled with on similar terms to those of Red River and not given scrip after 1870. On the other hand, it may well be said that as the half-breeds of the Red River were settled with in 1870, and as no settlement was ever attempted to be made with the half-breeds of the North-west Territories until 1885, and as the title which the latter have in the land was not attempted to be extinguished before that date, it might be only fair, just and reasonable that the settlement should date from that time and that all the advantages which have accrued to them should be calculated up to that moment. I am not prepared to say that the government have come to a definite policy on the question. I only give my individual opinion, but do not pretend to speak on the matter with the knowledge of the Minister of the Interior, and as he could speak on it were he in his place. I can assure my hon. friend that this question is engaging the attention of the government at present, and would ask him to leave it in the hands of the government and withdraw his motion.

Mr. N. F. DAVIN (West Assiniboia). The right hon. gentleman was in the House the other evening, when the Minister of the Interior spoke on that question. I had called his attention to the fact that this motion was in the nature of a truism, that it was affirming what had been already affirmed by the government, and the Minister of the Interior twice rose in his place and said that I need not emphasize that point because it was not disputed. I was quoting what he had said in a previous session, when he laid down the settled policy of the government, that scrip was to be given to children born before 1885, and therefore the concluding remarks of my right hon. friend that the subject is one the government would have to consider, are quite as amusing as the motion. Of course, the motion is amusing. It is like asserting that white is white. It asks the House to assert what is already the declared policy of the government. I had turned over two or three pages of Hansard and was quoting what the Minister of the Interior said, when up rose the hon. minister and said that I need not continue because there was no dispute, it was the settled policy of the government. And the other day, I had a motion on the subject which was carried, the right hon. gentleman himself voting for it, and my motion was that as this was the settled policy of the government, there should be no further delay. I contended that what should have been done was to have carried out the announcements published in October last, that the half-breeds would be settled with. Then, Sir, if they had been settled with gentlemen, whether in or out of this House, who are ready to prey on these half-breeds, could not speculate in the interests of these poor people. The hon. gentleman makes an excuse for the small amount that is given to these half-breeds and says that the scrip is bought at fifty per cent discount. Why, he himself pleaded guilty the other night to a charge made in a letter I read here that $70 or $80 was given for scrip representing 240 acres. That land is worth to-day $3 an acre; so that scrip representing a value of $700 is taken for $70 or $80. And this sort of thing has been going on ever since these people should have been settled with. That is the reason why I urged so strongly the other day that these people should be settled with at once, instead of following the policy adopted by the Minister of the Interior—part and parcel of all his policy. But I may say that his overweening cunning has outwitted itself, because that overweening cunning is repelling the people of the North-west and Manitoba; is proving a boomerang to destroy the government. Consider what a chance the Minister of the Interior had. What a chance! If he had only risen to the occasion and conducted that department with a single eye to the advantage of the country, what results he might have achieved. I admit that he has been energetic; I admit that he is clever—he is too clever by half. But there has been running all through his policy the carefully sinister view, the narrowest view as to what would be in the interest of electioneering politics, and, as a consequence, from one end to the other of the territory he was given to deal with, the people are ready to spew him out of their mouth. And why not? Take these half-breeds on the Saskatchewan. They have been kept since October, almost six months, from a settlement that would have been of great advantage when their crops had failed, and for no reason except that the Minister of the Interior wanted to have this money paid to them just before an election. The object was that certain gentlemen of the reptile school of politicians could say to these people: See what the government are doing for you; see, I caused the House to pass a resolution that white was white and black was black; I got the House to stultify itself, to make a fool of itself, by declaring that that should be done which the government had decided twelve months before should be done. And see what a sweet speech Sir Wilfrid Laurier made—sweeter than honey and the honey comb. See what a friend he is of the half-breeds. Friend of the half-breeds! At the head of the government that, to a certain extent, has robbed every half-breed out of the difference between what they got for the scrip and what they could have got for it, which means all the way from $10 to $50, aye or $70 apiece. If you multiply this $10 to $50 by the number of half-breeds, you get the amount that this interesting class of the community has been deprived of by the tactics, the sinister tactics, of the Minister of the Interior. I would be the very last man to complain of any minister having a proper regard for the interests of his party. But, Mr. Speaker, I will always set my face, so long as I have any position in public life, against a government or a member of a government or a member of a party who allows party interests and party proclivities to overshadow duty, honour, loyalty to the people—and that is the charge that we can successfully bring against the Minister of the Interior. In everything it is the same, and nothing is more cruel. Why, take an illustration from the elevator commission, that we have had up in the North-west Territories. I represented the farmers, and I examined one man, whose evidence I may give as an illustration. He swore that he found that one of these elevator men had a bushel weight attached to the scales to his own advantage, and asked him: What do you mean by that? And the answer of the man was: I have been buying some grain from an Indian. Asked what he meant by that, the answer that he made was that he felt that he could with impunity rob these poor creatures. And I say, indignant as I am with the Minister of the Interior for his machinations in other directions, I feel more indignation after he, in the interest—as I believe, in the mistaken interest, but as he conceived, in the interest—of party tactics, should have allowed himself to give the lie to the advertisement of his own commissioners, delay the settlement promised these people in October last, and thus give an advantage to these brigands of scrip-scalping such as are dear to the hearts of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down.

Mr. T. O. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). The hon. gentleman has waxed very wroth in this discussion about scrip for the half-breeds. I am pleased that he is taking an interest in the half-breeds; he never did it before. Of course, he cannot be accused of seeking to make any party capital. He says that I have moved a resolution that means nothing, that I want to affirm that black is white.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIS. That black is black. Well, that just shows what the hon. gentleman knows about the half-breed's scrip. I do not mean to deal with the question settled by the government. I have brought this resolution before the House to deal with that question, because that question was settled, as I have already said, a year ago. I am dealing with a different question entirely. This resolution deals with 'half-breed children born in the North-west Territories prior to 1885.' I may tell the hon. gentleman, as he does not seem to know it, that there is a class of half-breeds that the government have not made up their mind to settle with—children born in the Territories prior to 1885. There are about 200 children born prior to 1885 of parents who were settled with in 1870 in the province of Manitoba. Whether rightly or wrongly, these people have got the idea that they are entitled to this scrip because they are born in the territory before it was ceded in 1885. They think they are as much entitled to the scrip as the half-breeds the government have arranged to pay. They have asked me to bring the matter before the House and I have done so. I hope the government will see their way clear, not, as I say, on the ground of legal right, but on the ground of public policy, and in view of the good service that the half-breeds have rendered this country, to grant scrip to the half-breeds born in the Territories prior to 1885, of parents settled within Manitoba. Now, with reference to the value of the scrip. Again the hon. gentleman shows his knowledge of the business. If he had known anything at all about the business he would have known that the statement that he made here about people scalping—some person, I am sure it would not be the hon. gentleman, as that would be a very difficult matter—was all nonsense. Now the bank in Prince Albert and in every other town where there are half-breeds are buying this scrip. The banks have notices up in all the stores and other places telling the half-breeds what they will pay for the scrip. Any merchant or any other person who wants to buy scrip, has to pay the very same price for the scrip as the bank, if they do not they wouldn't be able to get scrip at all. As a matter of fact, when any person buys scrip from the half-breeds he has got to take the half-breed's word for it, and if the half-breed is honest he will give the scrip, and if not, he will go and sell it to some other person. So the hon. gentleman does not know anything at all what he is talking about. Again, he accused the Minister of the Interior of holding over this question of appointing a commission, for political purposes. Again the hon. gentleman does not know what he is talking about, because I will tell the hon. gentleman it was held over at the request of a majority of the half-breeds in the district of Saskatchewan. If he wants to know why it was held over, I will tell him that it was because the government had not adopted the principle that they were going to pay the children who have died and who were alive in 1885. I believe they did not intend to do that. The half-breeds claim that the late government had paid the children who had died, and therefore they considered it was a precedent for this government to do the same thing. Through petitions and otherwise they asked the government to postpone action on this question until they had decided on that. Then again there was a majority of half-breeds in the district of Saskatchewan who made another claim. The heads of families were settled with in Manitoba, and the half-breeds in Saskatchewan thought they were entitled to the same. Those people petitioned the government and asked if the government would hold this question over till the House met and had decided whether they would be paid or not. So that scrip question has been kept up to the present time. If the hon. gentleman was well informed on this question he would know that the half-breeds themselves have asked to have the thing postponed until these different points were decided. Now, as the right hon. leader of the House has intimated that the government intend to deal in a generous spirit with the half-breeds in making this settlement, I beg leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion withdrawn.

MILITARY PARADE GROUND AT ST. THOMAS.

Mr. INGRAM moved for :

Copies of all telegrams, letters, reports and documents of every description between the Department of Militia and Defence, or any member of the government, and J. H. Wilson, M.D., ex-M.P., or any person or persons on his behalf, regarding the military parade ground at St. Thomas, Ont., and for which a large sum of money was placed in the Estimates of last year to pay the said J. H. Wilson as owner of the above property.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) called my attention to an error in this motion. My hon. friend will remember that there were no parties mentioned to whom the appropriation was to be made. The appropriation was taken, but it was not to be paid to Dr. Wilson nor to anybody else.

Mr. INGRAM. Dr. Wilson owns the property, and it is from him the government intend buying it, and to whom they will pay the money.

The PRIME MINISTER. But the concluding part of his motion is the statement of an error, and I would ask him to eliminate all the words after the word 'year' in the last line but one.

Motion as amended agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the House adjourns I would like to inquire from the minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) when we may expect the estimates.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The estimates are in a very advanced state, but I cannot now name a definite day. The information will be furnished at a very early day.

RETURN ORDERED.

Copies of all correspondence, reports, telegrams or papers which have passed between the government, or any member thereof, and the president of the Montreal Conference of the Methodist Church of Canada, or any member of the missionary committee of that church, who was approached to investigate the grievances of the Methodist Fox Bay settlers of the Island of Anticosti.—(Mr. Taylor.)

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10.15 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—GARRISON AT HALIFAX.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to answer the question that was put to me yesterday by my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) concerning the offer the government has made to replace the Leinster Regiment at Halifax by a Canadian regiment. The offer has been sent by the government to the Colonial Office, and by the Colonial Office referred to the War Office, which has not yet sent its answer.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—POSTAGE ON LETTERS.

Mr. THOS. BEATTIE (London). Before the Orders of the Day are called, there is a matter to which I wish to call the attention of the government, and more particularly the attention of the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock). I find that all the letters coming from our soldiers in South Africa, if not stamped, are charged double postage. I have here a letter from a boy to his mother on which eight cents has been paid. I think that is a mistake. It is impossible to obtain postage stamps on the field of battle. I believe that all British soldiers on the field have their letters forwarded free of charge, and I think the same privilege should be granted to our Canadian soldiers. I have no doubt the Postmaster General will see the reasonableness of my request.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). The matter which my hon. friend has brought to the attention of the House has already been dealt with by the department and by the government. The rule that has caused postmasters to impose a rate double of the shortage is not of the making of Canada, but is part of the Postal Convention. There is a postal union of all countries that contain post offices, and one of the conditions of that postal union is that each country of delivery shall charge on any letter not sufficiently prepaid double the amount of short postage. The object of that agreement was, I presume, to compel correspondents, to fully prepay their letters in the country of their origin; for whilst at one time the different countries kept accounts with each other, and settled up postage collected on letters coming from other countries, that plan was changed some years ago, and now the country of origin retains all the postage it collects on outgoing letters; and in order to compel correspondents to fully prepay, that penalty was adopted by all the nations of the earth that took any part whatever in postal arrangements. This matter, I may say, has been dealt with in the following manner: The government think that the convention could scarcely have contemplated such a condition of affairs as exists to-day, namely, the troops of one colony being in another colony, although, for the purposes of the postage invention, South Africa, Cape Colony, is a separate country. The various parts of the empire have their representation in the convention, are subject to the same stipulations, and are bound by the same regulations as if politically separate; and according to the rules of the convention, we are obliged to proceed in that way. But the convention could hardly have contemplated such a condition of affairs as exists now, and I have arranged for instructions to be sent to the postmasters that they shall only collect whatever is really short. More than that, we could not do without the consent of Cape Colony. The rate of postage being so small, only a penny, the shortage at the most can only be a penny on a half ounce letter, and therefore, I trust that arrangement will meet with approval.

Mr. BEATTIE. The amount is so small, I think the government could well afford to meet it.

Mr. FOSTER. Is this a matter of regulation or of law?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It is a matter of postal law. It is a provision in the Postal Union, and an agreement made among all the countries that are members of that union.

Mr. FOSTER. A matter of penalty?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Each country has agreed to be governed by these regulations.

Mr. FOSTER. My question is this: Is it a matter of postage penalty in Canada, and in this connection a matter of regulating, or is it a matter of law?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not understand the hon. gentleman. It is not a matter of statute law, because there is no statute upon the subject.

Mr. FOSTER. It is a matter of regulation then.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It is a matter of international treaty, under which the various countries are parties to that convention; and if Canada disregarded the provisions of that convention, then the union would have to consider whether Canada would be permitted to remain within it.

Mr. SPROULE. Your instructions are for the postmasters only, to collect the shortage, and not the double postage, but under the treaty stipulations, you are bound to collect the double.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I admit that the action taken is hardly logical, but communication is being sent to Cape Colony on the subject, and we have gone as far as we felt warranted in going, without previous consent.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Are you asking for consent to have the letters absolutely free?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Perhaps I had better bring down anything that may pass on the subject.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman said something about the course pursued by the United Kingdom, with reference to letters of the United Kingdom, but I did not catch exactly what he said. Do letters from the United Kingdom go free to the soldiers at the front?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. No. At one time, when the rate of postage was 2½ pence, the rate charged to soldiers was a penny, but since the rate has been reduced to a penny, there has been no other change made, and, therefore, the rate to-day between the citizens of Great Britain and the soldiers of the empire, is a penny, and the return rate is a penny.

THE PACIFIC CABLE.

Mr. GEO. E. CASEY (West Elgin). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I am compelled to again call your attention to the same subject which I brought up yesterday. If I call your attention to this subject two days in succession, it is because it seems to me the matter is one involving the necessity of immediate action, on the part of this government, and the Imperial government as well. Our experience for the last few years with the Colonial Office on this question has forced us to think that there is a deliberate attempt at obstruction of this great scheme of uniting the empire by a cable, to be controlled by the colonies and the mother country, and not in the hands of speculators—a cable which could be built without costing the country a dollar, and which would afford cheap and efficient accommodation to all the communities concerned. There was a totally unnecessary delay in publishing the report of the commission on this subject, which sat in England in 1896, a delay, I think, of two years, at the instance of the Colonial Office; and when that report did appear, there was nothing in it that, to an ordinary mind, could demand its suppression for that length of time. There was no reason why the report should not have been published at once and the steps suggested by that commission taken long ago. Then again, last summer, the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) went to the old country, accompanied by Sir Sandford Fleming, one of the greatest cable experts in the world, partly, no doubt, to consult with the Imperial government and the Colonial Office on this question. It is a matter within everybody's knowledge, that just a day or two before they arrived in England, the arrangements for the cable commission, as far as the Imperial government was concerned, had been settled, without waiting for the arrival of this delegation from Canada, who might have given most useful advice in connection with the matter, more especially as one member of that deputation was a cabinet minister, empowered to speak with all the responsibility of office. All these indications have led us to suspect that there was some unseen cause for the delays that have apparently been purposely opposed to the progress of this great scheme. But nobody in this country has spoken out so frankly on this subject, as that well known and influential English journal, The Outlook. In its issue of January 6th, in its column entitled 'A Week of Empire,' appears the following article headed, 'Impatience':

Canadians are clearly growing impatient at the lethargy of the Pacific Cable Board and the permanent official who is its chief support. The Toronto 'Globe' is the chief organ of the Dominion government in the Canadian press, and in an evidently inspired article it expresses in very straight words the Canadian disappointment at a delay which 'is all the more annoying because it is but a chapter in a history that consists chiefly of delays.'

'So far,' it says, 'as the general public can see, we are no further forward to-day than we were on July 6 last, when our representatives were told that the Imperial government had come over to the colonial view, and had determined to construct the work along with the colonies, on the principle of partnership.' Turning to a leading organ of the opposition—the Ottawa "Citizen"—we read:

'Verily, this masterly inactivity and delay is amazing, but it may have its serious side if carried too far. It may, indeed, be discovered, when too late, to be unwise and worse, to trifle with the whole colonial people in the interests of a huge and influential monopoly in London.'

These authoritative Canadian journals talk of 'mysterious influences' at work, and a Canadian of high position and authority, writing from Ottawa to the 'Canadian Gazette,' declares, truly enough, that 'this is not the time to trifle with the colonial people, when they are sending successive contingents to South Africa.'

A sentiment which, I think, will meet with the approval of this House.

Now, for these complainings the Pacific Cable Board and the Colonial Office have only themselves to blame. Here is a vital Imperial matter—how vital has been proved once again in this South African crisis by the imminent peril of a total breakdown in cable communication with the seat of war. In this vital Imperial matter the colonies, more alert than we to Imperial needs, have led the way with splendid persistence and even generosity. Yet all Downing Street can do is to act as a heavy drag on the coach. It is the more unfortunate that this should be the official attitude, because it happens that at this moment one of the temporary heads of the Colonial Office is himself a director of the Cable Group. A mere coincidence it may be—we do not suppose that Sir Robert Herbert is in any way responsible for the delay—but no one can measure the bad impression such a coincidence must create in Canada and Australasia, coming as it does on the top of a long series of delays difficult to explain, except on the assumption that the great cable monopoly, which Sir James Pender spent his life to create and preserve, has far more influence in English public life than is good for the empire.

Now, Sir, these are very plain words. There is a book called 'The Directory of Directors,' which shows me who Sir Robert Herbert is. He is chairman of the Telegraph Construction and Maintenance Company, one of the syndicate or ring of cable companies, which form the great monopoly alluded to by the Outlook as the 'cable group,' and is doubtless directly interested, as chairman of that company, in preventing the success of this Pacific cable scheme. It is impossible for any one to say that he has influenced the Colonial Office in this matter; but the coincidence remains, that here is this man, the chairman of a competing company and acting under secretary of the Colonial Office when this particular transaction occurs. The peculiar transaction to which I refer was alluded to in some newspaper quotations to which I called the attention of the government some days ago in the form of a question; and I may say that I got no satisfactory reply to that question. These cuttings allege that the Colonial Office had written to the Victoria government approving of and authorizing the bargain they were about to make with the Eastern Extension Company. The only answer I got from the government was that their attention had been called to these statements in the papers. Perhaps to-day the hon. minister who mostly takes charge of this subject will be able to give some further information in regard to these questions that I got on a former occasion. I will only say, to enforce the urgency of this matter, that the emergency referred to by the Ottawa Citizen in that quotation I have read has already arrived:

It may, indeed, be discovered, when too late, to be unwise, and worse, to trifle with the whole colonial people in the interests of a huge and influential monopoly in London.

The impression that such is the case has gone abroad throughout Canada. I think the impression must have gone abroad in England too that stock jobbing is at the root of the apparently intentional delays in this matter. The Colonial Office has been trifling with Canada and the other colonies in connection with this great scheme, and what reason had they to trifle with them, unless some such reason as that suggested by the facts of the case themselves? If the Colonial Office wishes to clear itself of the imputation of trifling with Greater Britain—for Greater Britain is practically unanimous in this matter—and the responsibility for the ill-feeling that must follow that trifling, it must take prompt action to dispel the suspicion that rests upon it. For that purpose, I have a second time called the attention of the government to this matter, and must, for a second time, move the adjournment of the House, in order to allow some debate.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). I had very little to do with this question. My able and energetic colleague, the Postmaster General (Mr. Mullock), was charged with this matter a year or two ago. He had to be in London for the Postal Convention, and he was instructed to look into this question, to which he has given since then all the attention it deserves. Last year, as I had to go to England and France, my colleagues were good enough to appoint me commissioner and give me as adviser Sir Sandford Fleming. The House knows that there is no man in Canada, or anywhere else, I believe, who has given more attention to this important question than Sir Sandford Fleming has done. I think he knows more about it than any other man. When we reached London, we reported immediately to the High Commissioner's Office. To my great surprise we found that the meeting which we were instructed to attend had taken place. I had not much to say; I had not much to do. Lord Strathcona told me, pure and simple, that the meeting had taken place. Later on, I had the privilege of an interview with Mr. Chamberlain, and, from the conversation that we had I concluded that our interests were safe. I spent about three weeks in London in full expectation that, perhaps, the Australians would appoint their representatives and we might have a meeting. But these appointments were not made before I left London. I spent a couple of months in France, and when I came back to England things were not very much more advanced than they were when I left London, as I thought my presence had not been considered necessary for the first meeting, I made up my mind that I should not wait much longer in London, and I came back home. I wanted to make that statement yesterday, but I was out of the House when the discussion took place. I may say that I am very anxious to wash my hands of the whole thing. I do not know why the meeting took place before a member of this government had reached London; I cannot explain satisfactorily to myself the reason why the meeting took place before I reached London. Sir Sandford Fleming has been the pioneer in this matter, and I think perhaps it would have been just as well if Sir Sandford

Mr. CASEY.

Fleming and myself had been present at this meeting, unworthy as I may have been to be there. If we had been present we would have done our level best to defend the interests of Canada.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). I have nothing to add to what I stated yesterday. My hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Casey) intimated in his remarks that perhaps the Colonial Office or the Imperial government was trifling with the Pacific cable scheme. This government has nothing to lead them to that conclusion.

Mr. CASEY. Could the minister say anything as to when the papers will come down?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I hoped to be able to lay the papers upon the Table to-day, but I find it is impossible to get them copied in time. They are all in the hands of the copyists.

Mr. McNEILL. I would like to ask my hon. friend the Postmaster General whether any steps have recently been taken by the government of which he is a member to impress upon the Imperial authorities the absolute necessity of proceeding in this matter without further delay.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I would ask my hon. friend to wait a few days, or until the papers are down, because they will doubtless answer the question he has put to me. The hon. gentleman is doubtless aware that permission must be obtained; at least I have not sufficient experience in these matters to know how far, even in a conversation in the House, I am at liberty to allude to anything without the production of the papers. I would therefore ask him to believe that we are doing everything that can be done in the proper quarters. We have nothing to withhold from the House, but will only be too glad to place everything upon the Table when the necessary permission is obtained.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not wish for a moment to suggest that my hon. friend has not done all that he could do in this matter; I am quite satisfied that he has been very desirous of pressing the matter through as rapidly and as energetically as possible. But there have been some matters coming to light within the last day or two, which perhaps have not been included in the papers which are about to be laid on the Table. I hope when my hon. friend does lay the papers on the Table they will show whether any action has been taken with reference to this last matter which has transpired, and to which my hon. friend referred yesterday.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I think it will appear that we have followed events up closely, even until and including to-day.

Mr. CLARKE. May I ask the minister if there has been any report forwarded to the Canadian government of the meetings which took place in London before the arrival of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte).

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That I do not know. My colleague perhaps knows something about it. So far as I am concerned, I do not know what took place there except what I read in the newspapers.

Mr. CLARKE. Perhaps the Postmaster General could answer the question.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). There have been several reports of the meetings which took place by the commissioners, and they will be included in the papers to be brought down.

Mr. CLARKE. Will there be a report of the meeting to which the Minister of Public Works was delegated, but to which he did not arrive in time?

The PRIME MINISTER. I cannot say as to that at this moment.

Motion (Mr. Casey) to adjourn, negatived.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—THE CANADIAN CONTINGENTS.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding: That the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider certain proposed resolutions to provide for the payment of the expenditure incurred, or to be incurred, in sending contingents of Canadian volunteers to South Africa.

Mr. E. G. PRIOR (Victoria, B.C.). Mr. Speaker, as I moved the adjournment of the debate on Friday night I wish to say a few words on this question on the present occasion, and my remarks will be brief, as physically, I am not able to speak long to-day. I think it is almost unnecessary for me to say how heartily in accord I am with the main features of the resolution now before the House, being, as it is, one asking a vote of money to pay the gallant men who have gone to the front to represent Canada and the whole empire in the struggle that is now going on in South Africa. It may, perhaps, not be out of place for me to mention here, if I may be permitted to do so, that within the last few minutes a telegram has come stating that the Boers are retreating from Ladysmith. Now, Sir, the stand taken by the government in regard to sending the contingents has been most ably dealt with by the leader of the opposition and by other gentlemen, and they have shown, I think, the government to be in anything but an enviable position in this regard.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. PRIOR. That is my opinion, whether gentlemen opposite agree with me or not. I must say that the stand taken by the right hon. gentleman who leads the government, and by his colleagues, in delaying so long before they offered assistance to the mother country, is, in my opinion, quite incomprehensible. As to the vagaries of the hon. Minister of Public Works, I think they are known from one end of the country to the other. I can only say that if the hon. gentleman thinks he is loyal to the British Empire, it is certainly not loyalty such as I understand it and as understood by the large majority of Canadians.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I am very glad indeed that it is not the kind of loyalty that you are talking about now.

Mr. PRIOR. Will the hon. gentleman stand up and tell the House what he says?

Mr. LANDERKIN. I just say I am glad he is not possessed of the same kind of loyalty you are talking about just now. We want no firebrands now.

Mr. PRIOR. Notwithstanding the adverse opinion of the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin), I contend that the loyalty that I am talking about is of the right material, of the very best kind, but that of the Minister of Public Works is at the best, only a milk and water loyalty. Now, we saw that the hon. gentlemen were very loath to take any action whatever until they were forced to do so by public opinion in this country. I should have thought that hon. gentlemen holding the position that they do, especially that the right hon. gentleman who leads the government, would have had his finger on the pulse of the people, and would have known that the great heart of Canada was pulsating with patriotism and with loyalty, and that there were thousands and thousands of our best men only too anxious to be sent to the front to uphold the flag. I say, Mr. Speaker, that it was not necessary for the government to wait until they were taught by the Conservative press from one end of the country to the other what their duty was.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. PRIOR. Mr. Speaker, hon. gentlemen opposite do not like to hear this sort of thing; they know it will go out in the newspapers and will injure them. They do not like to be told it, but if they think that they are going to stop me from saying what I consider is the truth, they are very much mistaken. Why, Mr. Speaker, I believe that if it had not been for the pressure brought to bear they would have been a great deal later in sending our men to the front than they were. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), who was in London at the time, I believe, was kept busy cabling word of the strong feeling that there was there and urging his colleagues to take action at once. I think I am right when I say so, and I am pretty certain that the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) had to put his utmost strength forward and use his greatest influence in bringing his colleagues to see what was the right thing to do in such a crisis. This resolution calls for money to pay the contingents the full Canadian pay, less what they are paid by the Imperial government. I go farther than this. I agree with the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) when he said that he thought that Canada should pay the whole thing; should pay the full Canadian pay over and above what our men get from the Imperial government. We know that there are hundreds of these young men who have gone to the front, who have given up good positions, and who, under the most favourable circumstances, when they come back, covered with glory, as I believe nearly all of them will be, will not be able to obtain these positions again, and are perfectly certain to make a large financial loss. Canada can well afford in a crisis like this to be generous. And I know the people of Canada will uphold any government that will take such action. I say, let them not only pay the transport for these men to South Africa and back again, but also let them pay the full Canadian pay for the whole time, from the time they leave this land until they come back again. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that on all hands, it is acknowledged that the men we have sent to the front are as fine a body of men as you could possibly find anywhere. I think the House will not be sorry if I read a letter I received the other day from a British officer, one of those gentlemen that the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville) seems to despise so much. He is an officer of high rank in the British army, who was out in Halifax the other day, a gentleman that I happened to meet. I will read a few words of what he writes in regard to the Canadian contingents:

I am greatly struck with the magnificent physique and smart appearance of the mounted contingents mobilizing here. I know our officers and 'Tommys' across the water will be struck when they see what Canada can produce. I never saw anything like the North-west Mounted Police—they are simply wonderful on a horse. What impressed me so deeply was the intense enthusiasm of the whole contingent. Every officer and man is fired to the utmost and considers it an honour of the highest degree to have been selected to go out to uphold the honour of the flag. Then, it is astonishing to think of men leaving comfortable homes and lucrative positions to serve as privates and troopers. If this is not loyalty and love for the mother country, I wonder what is. Well may we devoutly thank Providence for this magnificent colony of Canada. I saw the field batteries and was quite impressed with them. They were a very powerful-looking lot and meant business. I made the acquaintance of several of the officers. The horses were very fine animals, many of them much larger than the Imperial battery horses.

I have just read that to show that a British officer, who has had large experience, thinks that no better men could have been sent anywhere from the British Empire than Canada is sending to-day. I might also read a letter that I have received from the United States, just to show that there are some men anyway in the United States who are thoroughly in accord with the British Empire at the present time and are willing to go forward and take part in the present fight. Here is a letter addressed to myself, which says:

Col. E. G. Prior.
Victoria, B.C.

Dear Sir.—I would inquire if the offer of a battalion of American volunteers to go to South Africa would be accepted by your government—

Evidently not meaning my government, but the Canadian government.

—I hold a commission as lieutenant-colonel, have seen fourteen years' service as guardsman in various states, and can tender to your government a full battalion of Americans more than half of whom are veterans who saw service in the Philippines during our late war, and the balance to be National Guardsmen all well drilled. Of course, I understand that, as an organization, we would not be permitted to leave the States, but there is no law prohibiting us going to Canada as an unarmed body where arrangements can be completed. If this matter interests you I should be pleased to have a reply.

(Signed)

I think that will meet with the hearty approval of this House. We are not, I am glad to say, in need of any more men than we can get in our own country, but this is an evidence of the good feeling which is extant in some parts of the American continent for Canada and the British Empire in the present trouble. Before I sit down I wish, also, to call the attention of the House to a resolution that was passed in the city of Vancouver, British Columbia. It shows very fully the strikingly patriotic feeling that has extended from one end of the country to the other. At a meeting held in Vancouver on February 2, a resolution was passed, the end of which is as follows:—

Be it therefore resolved, that we respectfully but earnestly urge His Excellency the Governor in Council to tender to the British War Department for service in South Africa a force of at least 10,000 mounted infantry, the terms of such service to be mutually agreed on to the satisfaction of the Imperial government.

That resolution was passed unanimously ; all the other municipalities in British Columbia were invited to pass similar ones, and I am glad to say that similar ones have been passed in Victoria, in New Westminster, and in other municipalities in British Columbia. There is a strong feeling abroad that, although we may not, perhaps, need to send any more men at present, the government should have them ready to send out at any time, and I thoroughly agree with this resolution that it will be good policy for the government to put 10,000 men in training at once and have them thoroughly equipped, thoroughly drilled and ready to be sent at a moment's notice if they are needed by the mother country. I shall have other opportunities to discuss this matter, and, therefore, I will not say anything more in regard to this except that I am heartily in accord with the vote.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). This debate, Mr. Speaker, has served two purposes, at all events. In the first place, it has established beyond the possibility of a doubt that loyalty is a very cheap commodity at the present time. It has further served to establish this, that there are hon. gentlemen in this House who are prepared to trade upon that sentiment of loyalty for political and partisan purposes. Some days ago my hon. friend from Kent, N.B. (Mr. McInerney) addressed this House, and in the course of his remarks he sought to create the impression that a large portion of the province of Quebec were not loyal. In order that there should be no doubt—

Mr. McINERNEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to deny that I sought to create any such impression. I stated, at the outset, that I made no charge of disloyalty against any portion of the population of this country.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I was about to say that in order that there may be no doubt as to the accuracy of my statement. I beg leave to give to the House the remarks used by the hon. member. In the course of his remarks he said :

May I be permitted to add that I know a little of the French Canadian history in Canada? I am not surprised at the views which the hon. member for Labelle expressed in this House, I am not surprised at the views which the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville expressed in this House. Sir, as you know, there have been two great schools of thought in French Canada in this matter. There was the great school of thought led by Sir George Cartier, followed up by Chapais, Taché, and such men as DeBoucherville, Masson, Chapleau, Caron, Langevin, and many men of that sort. It was the Conservative school of thought; it was that school of thought that is loyal to British institutions. There has been another school of thought in French Canada, as you know well, men of eminent ability, men of grand ability, taking part in the government of the country, such men as Dorion, Mercier and Honoré Beaugard, and, might I say, that the right hon. gentleman who now leads the government some years ago was one of the highest and most eloquent exponents of that school of thought.

Then my hon. friend (Mr. McInerney) goes on to say, that it was from the Liberals, the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) whom he accused of disloyalty—

Mr. McINERNEY. I did not.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McInerney) goes on to say :

From them such men as the hon. member for Labelle and for Laprairie and Napierville have taken their inspirations, and they come to this House and utter the sentiments they drank in from these great leaders of the party, in days gone by, in their own province. I am not going to say that any section of the great Canadian people is disloyal.

There is the corrective. But what is the meaning of what follows ?

Mr. McINERNEY. The poison is the hon. gentleman's bad spirit ; that is the poison.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I will have occasion to discuss the question of spirit in a moment or two. Here is what the hon. gentleman (Mr. McInerney) said then :

I am not going to say that, but I do say that it is the duty of the right hon. Prime Minister and the duty of the French Canadian members of this House, and they cannot perform it at too early a day, in my opinion, to go down into their counties and to tell their people that their best interests, that their highest interests, call upon them, at this time, to sustain England in this great struggle in which she is engaged.

Sir, I leave to the consideration of any impartial mind in this House the question as to whether or not, by imputation, an attempt is not made there to create the impression that the great Liberal party in the province of Quebec is disloyal. If that is not the intention, why is it said that there are two schools of thought in the province of Quebec ? Why is it sought to point out that the Conservative school of thought is that which is loyal to British institutions ? Why is it sought to create the impression that it is from the Liberal school of thought that these two members of the House (Mr. Monet and Mr. Bourassa) who have been branded as disloyal men, have learned their disloyalty.

Mr. BERGERON. They said it themselves.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Why is it, that we are told to go down into the province of Quebec, to teach the people of the province of Quebec that they should support England ?

Mr. McINERNEY. To counteract La Patrie.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). La Patrie is not as bad as you think.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Why if they are loyal in the province of Quebec should we be asked to go down there and engage in this missionary work which the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney) asks us to undertake? Sir, I shall have occasion to point out to him cases where he may exercise his missionary genius for the benefit of his country, and for the benefit of his party. When he (Mr. McInerney) made that statement, what evidence had he to support it? What evidence had the hon. gentleman upon which he could possibly base the inference which he sought to draw? Had he been in the city of Quebec at the time the first contingent left for South Africa? Had he witnessed the enthusiasm of the French Canadian people in the city of Quebec at that time? Had he read the speech made by the French mayor of the French city of Quebec, when standing within a stone-throw of the Plains of Abraham, upon which was fought the last—thank God the last—great battle between England and France in this country; the mayor of Quebec said:

The people of various origin and different religious creeds that go to make up the population of this country are represented in your regiment, and now that we are for the time being assembled within the walls of the most French city of the new world, let us claim for the French Canadian element a large share of the warm and spontaneous outburst of sentiments of loyalty to England which marked your triumphant passage from your homes to Quebec.

And on the same occasion the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), addressing the same regiment, and speaking in the hearing of the inhabitants of the most French-speaking city of the French province of Quebec, used these words:

This is a unique occasion in the history of the world; it is a spectacle which ought to make every Canadian feel proud of his country. Who could have believed a few years ago that from this city, which has been the theatre of a bitter conflict between the two proudest races in the world, their descendants, who to-day were a happily united people, would go forth to help carry the blessings of their own institutions to a far distant land? Who could have believed, thirty-two years ago, that the scattered provinces of British North America would have reached such a point of development to-day that they would be able and willing, and cheerfully willing, to cement with their blood the unity of the empire in its most distant part? Men of the Canadian contingent, I have no recommendation or request to make to you, but if I had it would simply be to do your duty. More than this we cannot ask; more than this you cannot do.

Mr. FITZPATRICK.

Sir, these are the expressions used on that historical occasion, by the mayor of Quebec, and by the leader of the Liberal party in Canada. But we have more than that. Down in the French section of Quebec; down in the centre and in the heart of Liberalism in the province of Quebec, down in St. Rochs, at a meeting of the Mercier Club on the 28th of October last, this resolution was passed:

Proposed by M. J. H. Patry, C. Vézina, Elzéar Savard, E. Martineau, J. Beauchamp, N. Lachance, O. Ouellet, T. Savard, J. Laroche, seconded by M. P. Décourcy, J. A. G. Latulippe, J. T. Martineau, F. Cloutier: That in the presence of the crisis that has arisen and without being willing to pronounce on the political position of the Imperial authorities, we approve of the conduct of the Canadian government in sending troops to the Transvaal

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Is it on such evidence that the hon. gentleman (Mr. McInerney) relied when he made a charge against the loyalty of the French Canadians in the province of Quebec? But, no doubt, if he had not read these speeches, he would refer, as the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) did, to the speeches made by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), and by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), and by the hon. member for Napierville and Laprairie (Mr. Monet). He (Mr. McInerney) would no doubt speak to us in the first instance of the hon. member for Napierville (Mr. Monet). And what is the position which the hon. member (Mr. Monet), takes? As I understand it, the position taken by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Monet) is that it was not right and not proper to send Canadian troops from Canada to fight the battles of the Empire in South Africa. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Monet) reasoned, that we should keep our troops at home to defend the British flag if it were attacked within the limits of Canada. Upon that ground, Mr. Speaker, the charge of treason, that you have heard so frequently repeated in this House has been hurled against the hon. member for Laprairie. I do not want to pretend that I agree with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Monet), but let me explain his position as I understand it. He is charged with disloyalty because he said that the military forces in Canada should not be sent abroad to fight the battles of the empire. Let me answer hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House by simply referring them to one of their own colleagues. Let me quote the words used in this House by the Conservative member for Terrebonne (Mr. Chauvin), and no man who has spoken on this subject has shown that he has given it more serious attention than has the hon. gentleman. Addressing this House the other night, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Chauvin) said: (I quote from p. 554 of the Hansard).

In this connection, Sir, allow me to refer to a statement made by the late Sir George Etienne Cartier, when addressing, in 1867, before a French Canadian audience at a meeting held at Ste. Rose, in the province of Quebec. This statesman, as I was told by a gentleman who attended that meeting, in order to induce his hearers to vote in favour of confederation, told them that never should they be called upon to give military aid to Great Britain.

My hon. friend, the member for Terrebonne, speaking carefully, as he must necessarily have done at the time, said that he was told by a gentleman living at Ste. Rose, that Sir George Cartier, the high priest of the Tory party in Quebec, the head of that school upon the existence of which the hon. member for Kent insisted so much, told the French Canadians of the province of Quebec in order to induce them to accept the Confederation Act, that they would never be called upon to contribute to the military defence of the empire, beyond the confines of Canada. If it be the case, that at the time the Confederation Act was passed, the right arm of Sir John Macdonald, the man who was his confidential friend and adviser, the man who was, at that time, as his memory has continued to be since, the high priest of Toryism in the province of Quebec, made that representation to the people of that province, and that the confederation contract was entered into on the faith of that representation, what blame is it to the people of the province of Quebec, if they now say, 'If you change that important feature of the representation that was made to us, we want to know what all this is going to lead to.' What more just, more logical, or sounder position could the people of the province of Quebec take, if they did take it? I would like to know now what my hon. friend, the member for Kent, N.B., (Mr. McInerney) thinks of the leader of his school of thought.

Mr. McINERNEY. Will the hon. Solicitor General, allow me to ask him a question? Does he think as a lawyer, that that is very good evidence on which to convict Sir George Cartier—that some old man down in Terrebonne happened to tell something to the hon. member for Terrebonne? Is that not hearsay evidence?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am not going to discuss the question whether that is good evidence or not. That is a matter for the hon. member for Kent, N.B., to settle with his colleague, the hon. member for Terrebonne; and I will say to the hon. member for Kent, N.B., in regard to this little family quarrel, in which I am not concerned, that there is no man in this House who knows the hon. member for Terrebonne who will doubt, for one instant, that he told what he knew to be true.

Mr. McINERNEY. The other man might not have told what he knew to be true.

That is why hearsay evidence is not allowed.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I was going to say that the objection might be reserved, but I like these interruptions, and I will now say to my hon. friend from Kent, that my hon. friend from Terrebonne would not have made that statement on this historic occasion, as the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) called it, if he did not know it to be true. But if the hon. member for Kent is anxious for further light on the subject, let me ask him to read from Le Monde Canadien, the Tory organ of Montreal, of the 2nd of November last, page 2, and I see my hon. friend, the member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) laughing at the trap into which the hon. member for Kent has fallen—and he will find in that paper, not only the text of a speech made by Sir George Cartier, but the text of other speeches made by other leaders of that school of thought to which he referred, including Sir Adolphe Chapleau and Sir Hector Langevin, all denouncing Imperialism as a danger to the constitution.

I have dealt with the position taken by the hon. member for Napierville (Mr. Monet). I will now deal with the position of my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). That hon. member, as I understood his speech, takes this position. He says, in the first place, this war is an unjustifiable war, it is a war upon which England should not have entered, and then he goes on to say that the sending of this contingent is a new departure, is a departure from the settled lines on which the government of this country has been carried on for the last fifty years, it will entail on the people of this country an expenditure amounting, as subsequent events have proved, to several millions of dollars, and it is unfair that this new departure should occur and this expenditure should be incurred without the people of Canada having had an opportunity previously to sanction the expenditure. That is his position.

Now, when the hon. member for Labelle talks about the war being unjustifiable and indefensible, I do not agree with him. Hon. gentleman read, no doubt, the speeches made in the British House of Commons by Mr. Morley; they read the articles published by Bryce; they read the speech delivered by Sir Edward Clarke; they saw that these gentlemen denounced the English government in far stronger terms than the hon. member for Labelle has ever used; and I have yet to learn that these gentlemen have been charged with disloyalty to the empire. Is it because in that great arena of the British House of Commons, men have broader minds and are willing to adopt more liberal views as to the opinions expressed by their colleagues? Then, the hon. member speaks of the expenditure. So far as I am concerned, I will say this, and say it at once—that I am on this subject wide as the poles asunder from my hon. friend from Labelle. I do not see eye to eye with him on any branch of his case; but a large expenditure was incurred without the sanction of the people of Canada, if it were not for what has since happened, if it were not for the unanimous approbation shown by the people of Canada of the action of the government, what position would the government of Canada be in to-day? At the most, we can claim for this government that they correctly interpreted the combined thought of the people of Canada and correctly gave expression to that which was in the minds of all on this subject at the time. I may, perhaps, be permitted to quote, Sir, the words of Professor Austin:

But whatever may be the distinctive power, privilege or prerogative of Queen, Lords or Commons, they all are, and under responsible government of necessity must be, subordinate to the great controlling power over all, the tribunal of the last resort—public opinion.

And I say, in so far as my light leads me, that public opinion was correctly interpreted by the government of Canada, because we now have the seal of the unanimous approbation put upon their act by those who represent the public opinion of Canada, the Dominion parliament.

Dealing with the question of the war, the position to my mind, is just this. I say that the Uitlanders, who were within the confines of the Transvaal in 1881, when the South African republic came into existence for the last time, were British subjects, and as such were entitled to the protection of the British flag, and the British government. I say further that those British subjects, who since the South African Republic has been created, have gone into the Transvaal, brought with them, in all that is right, the power and might of the British Empire. It has been said that the South African Republic is an independent country and that England had absolutely no power or authority to interfere in its internal affairs. My answer is this, that no man can read that convention between the South African Republic and England without feeling that in every line England insists upon the protection of her subjects. In every line you can read the spirit conveyed by the words 'sovereignty and protection,' if not the words themselves. It is expressly stipulated that in every respect those in possession of property must be maintained in that possession in all its integrity. And I would ask, of what avail would it be to a man to be possessed of property in a country if the government of the country can impose taxes upon him to such an extent as practically to despoil him of his property, and he is allowed to have no say whatever in the matter. Of what avail is it that in this convention it is provided that slavery shall be abolished within the confines of the South African Republic, if the Britisher is to be subjected to a condition that is little better than slavery? If he is to see his property taken from him and himself deprived of every right which a free man prizes, where is the difference in fact between the Britisher in that position and the slave? But you have more than that. You have in terms in this convention the provision that no treaty shall be made with any country, except the Orange Free State, without the approval of England. In other words, the South African Republic is not free to make even a treaty of commerce, for instance, with any other country except subject to the approval of England, and notwithstanding the fact that it cannot make such a treaty without the sanction of England, we are to be told that it has the right to destroy the property of British subjects within the republic. No, Sir, in every line of that treaty, in every phrase, is embodied the idea of a protectorate, and British subjects had the right to expect that the British government would see that that treaty was enforced.

But, what do we find? We find that notwithstanding this convention, the Britishers in that country were deprived of every right. Then we find that these men feeling, to borrow the expression of my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), that proudly as the old Roman declared 'civis romanus sum' they could declare to the world, 'we are British citizens,' appealed to the motherland to see that their rights were respected. The motherland endeavoured to make President Kruger understand that British subjects in the South African Republic had to be treated as British subjects elsewhere. And in reply President Kruger sent the insolent ultimatum to England, which was practically a notice to her to quit. That ultimatum made a conflict inevitable. What took place? The domains of Her Majesty were invaded by the Boers, and then we are asked to consider whether or not it was our duty to go to the defence of that flag which guarantees to us in Canada every liberty which free men prize and hope to enjoy.

I say that the time had come, not only because of what was going on in South Africa—and subsequent events have shown that the issue there was whether South Africa was to be British or Boer—not only because of what was going on in South Africa, but because of mutterings on the continent, for British subjects the world over to prove once and for all that the British Empire is no mere geographical expression for a number of sundered and disunited provinces—the time had come when it was necessary for the whelps of the lion to rally to the defence of the old land. The time had come when every man must be made to understand whether on the European continent or in South Africa, that blow for blow whencesoever the blow might come, must be struck back by the British, and would be struck as freely from Australasia and Canada as from the heart of the empire itself.

I want now to say a word about the missionary duty that was pointed out to us by my hon. friend from Kent (Mr. McInerney), who told us that we ought to go down into the province of Quebec and teach our French people that it was their interest to be loyal to the British Empire. My answer to him is that I can find a much more profitable field for my hon. friend from Kent, and I think I will be able to show to any impartial man in this House that there is a much broader field to be found for missionary work on this subject of loyalty than in the province of Quebec. Let me ask him to read the daily Free Press of London, Ontario, of January 18.

An hon. MEMBER. Tory ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Tory, of course. Let me ask him to bear with me while I read this extract from that paper. On page 13, under the heading 'Orangemen in London district,' I find this stated :

In many ways we have reason to feel ashamed of the Federal government at Ottawa, headed as it is by a French Papist and dictated by another French Papist by the name of Tarte.

Does my hon. friend think for a moment that his missionary work among those gentlemen would not be useful in order to make them understand that neither in the province of Quebec or elsewhere are the avenues that lead to place and power barred by any man's religion or nationality. If my hon. friend is anxious for missionary work he has among these people an excellent opportunity of accomplishing it. More than that, he may, for instance, in case he should avail himself of my suggestion, inform these people to whom this appeal of the Free Press is made, that among those who betrayed the Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell, the past grand master of the Orangemen, were neither French nor Irish Papists, and you may be quite sure that neither French nor Irish Papist, either in the province of Quebec or elsewhere, would seek to betray his country any more than he would betray his leader.

Reference has been made also to the small number of French Canadians in the contingent. It is a matter of opinion and argument as to whether the number is small or large, and I do not wish to discuss the reasons which may have brought about this condition of affairs. But let me draw attention to this fact, that among the officers now serving under the British flag in South Africa, I find a French Canadian by the name of Girouard and he is not the least distinguished among those who are upholding British institutions and British honour and supremacy in that country. There are also among them two other French Canadian officers of the name of Pelletier, who are neither considered the least distinguished. You find a Fiset, you find a Parent, a De Lotbinière, and you will also find a Casgrain, who, though he is not now engaged in South Africa, is doing good service for the empire elsewhere.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Do you find a Foster there, or a Tupper ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. My answer to that, Mr. Speaker, is that good men may serve their country elsewhere than on the field of battle. Some time ago, reference was made on this side of the House to something that I think might better have been left out of the discussion. Reference was made to the resolution introduced in the British House of Commons by the Irish Home Rulers, and my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) was pleased to call these Home Rulers 'cravens.' I am not going to judge the actions of these men—I am not called upon to do so. They are too far away, it seems to me, to require to be attacked. They cannot talk back across 3,000 miles. But I will say this—that it is very much to be regretted that at the close of the nineteenth century England's difficulty should still continue to be Ireland's opportunity, and no man regrets that condition of things more than I do. We in Canada can afford to be loyal. We have here no legal injuries to redress; we have here no legal wrongs to remember. The English flag stands to us for self-government, for civil and religious liberty, for everything that liberty-loving men can prize. But when we sit in judgment on these men who represent the Home Rule cause in Westminster, let us bear in mind the terrible provocation they have received, and let us remember the many wrongs that have been inflicted on them and their forefathers during centuries of oppression. I will say no more on that subject now, except that misdirected they may have been, but, 'craven,' Mr. Speaker, they were not.

In conclusion, let me ask your permission, Mr. Speaker, to repeat here what I have said elsewhere. France and England have been rivals in many fields and through many ages, but, taken together their story of achievement entitles them to a place in the vanguard of the human race, and entitles them to be hailed among the nations as the twin leaders of the thought and worth of the world, and both have given of their best and richest heart's blood to cement the nationhood of Canada. It seems to me also that he does no patriotic work who seeks to create the impression that the descendants of those men who saved Canada to England in 1775 and 1812, are not prepared to do the same to-day. French Canada continues to stand in the ancient ways, and French Canadians, remembering that this country was opened up to civilization by their forefathers, ask but one thing—the right to work out their national destiny on this continent under the protection of the flag that, for a thousand years, has braved the battle and the breeze.

Mr. T. CHASE CASGRAIN (Montmorency). Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to follow my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) in his defence of his colleague the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Monet). I think the hon. gentleman, holding a brief for his friend behind him tried to correct the bad impression he created the other day when he interrupted the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville. My hon. friend from Kent, N.B., (Mr. McInerney) is charged with having accused different gentlemen in this House and a section of the province of Quebec with being disloyal. But let me remind the House what was said the other night when the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville was speaking. That hon. gentleman said :

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have said at the beginning of my remarks that I have been charged with disloyalty.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). It is true.

So, if anybody in this House accused the hon. member of disloyalty, it was not the hon. member for Kent, but the hon. and learned Solicitor General. Now, I intend to follow the Solicitor General only for a short distance. My hon. friend from Kent, quoting names and giving historical reminiscences said there had been two schools of thought in the province of Quebec—one school led by the late Sir George Etienne Cartier, and the other led by different gentlemen whose names he mentioned, including the late Sir Antoine Aimé Dorion. It is a well known fact that, for years, and, even in the time of Sir George Etienne Cartier, the Conservative party, having Cartier at its head, was looked upon by French Canadian Liberals as sold to the English, and this expression was used against them time and again in the public press and on public platforms. I remember when Sir George Cartier, having been knighted for the services he had rendered to the empire, was accused of being the valet of England and being sold to the English. This was the school that the hon. member for Kent referred to; and the hon. Solicitor General knows that if anybody in the province of Quebec suffered from this cry, it was the Conservative party. I would not recall these things but for the provocation given by the Solicitor General. Is it not true that from 1886 to 1890, there was such a reign of French sentiment in Quebec, due to the Liberal party, that it was almost impossible for a man calling himself a British subject to have any position in the conduct of public affairs. Why, when Mr. Mercier came to form his first cabinet, he could not get a single English-speaking member of any standing to accept a portfolio. And, if we come to 1896, what do we see? During the first session I had the honour of a seat in this House. I called attention to the circular that has been mentioned in this House, a circular issued from the office of L'Electeur, a circular which was spread broadcast through the province of Quebec calling on the French Canadians to vote against Tupper—as they called him, le vieux Tupper—because Tupper was said to be in favour of Imperial federation. Part of that circular was quoted here the other day by the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville in condemnation of the conduct of his own party :

Do you want war? Three million dollars for rifles, guns and bayonets. A near danger for your farmers.

One of the conditions of this alliance would be that in time of war, Canada would be called for to pay her share in money and blood.

Why all these armaments, if we are not going to get war? And why would we fight for England?

'Why should we fight for England?' asks the organ of the Liberal party in Quebec. This same paper continues :

Your sons will be sent out to Africa and to Asia wherefrom they will never return.

Sir, this circular was distributed, as I have said, all through the province of Quebec. It was distributed in the county of Montmorency. But not only, was it distributed surreptitiously a few days before the day of voting, but it was published in the Liberal organ, L'Electeur, two or three days before the voting took place so that it could not be translated into English and scattered through the English provinces. That was the way the Liberal party appealed to prejudices against England and against any help being afforded her by Canada. That is the way they tried to create prejudice after we in this House had carried a resolution, nobody daring to vote against it, appropriating $3,000,000 to rearm the militia with modern guns and serviceable weapons. That is the way we were treated. Nobody has suffered more, probably, from this kind of warfare than I did in the county of Montmorency, because, Sir, people went from door to door, minions of the Liberal party went from door to door, saying: 'Look at Casgrain, he speaks better English than French, he is an Englishman. Vote for Langelier and vote against Casgrain.' Those were the appeals to prejudice that we had to fight against; and still my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) gets up and says that there are not, or at least were not, two schools of thought in the province of Quebec. I say, Sir, if some French Conservative papers are still imbued with those ideas, it is because such sentiments were preached by these gentlemen.

from 1880 down to the present time, and it is not surprising if some vestiges of that sentiment should remain even in a few Conservative papers.

Now, Sir, I am not going to discuss the justice or injustice of this war, I am not going to look at it from that standpoint, because I think this is not the proper arena in which such a discussion should take place. For my part, with the little reading that I have done, with the little study that I have given to this question, I have no doubt in my own mind whatever that this is, as my right hon. friend the Prime Minister has stated, a most righteous war, a war for the advancement of civilization and progress, for equal rights to every man in any part of the world, wherever he may be. But, Sir, there is no doubt that it is a serious war. I am now addressing myself particularly to those who are my own fellow-countrymen who may have any doubts upon the subject, or who may have any doubts as to the propriety of the resolutions which are now before the House. I think it is the bounden duty of representative men, of whatever class or nationality they may be, to stand up in this House and to give their fellow-countrymen the result of the study which they have made of this question, and the result of their experience, be it ever so small. Sir, we are here representing not only our counties, but we are here to represent and to give a proper direction to the ideas and to the opinions which prevail in this country and in the provinces from which we come. I am going to try to speak of this question as a practical man. Sir, we are face to face with one of the most serious wars in which the British Empire has ever been engaged; it is certainly the most serious war which the empire has had upon its hands within the last half of the present century—not that I doubt for an instant that England will be successful, not that I doubt for an instant that the English generals will carry this war to a successful conclusion; but I say it is a serious war from the circumstances which surround it. The theatre of the war is far removed from England, it is thousands of miles away. Then, again, the country in which it is going on is full of natural fastnesses where every hill, every mound, seems to be a fortress. Then, again, the Boers are fighting for their own homes, they know every part of the country, and are able to fortify it so as to keep the English forces at bay.

Now, Sir, is it true that this war was forced upon the Boers simply because England wanted to aggrandize its colonial possessions in South Africa? Sir, I believe that this war has been forced upon England, and the Boers have been preparing for it for a long time. I find my proof, among other sources, in a report which was brought down to the Volksraad in the Transvaal, which proved beyond doubt that long before the Jameson raid they were arming themselves to decide the question who would be the paramount power in South Africa, the Afrikaner power or the British power. Let me quote the following from this report:

A private return which was presented by the members of the Transvaal government to the Volksraad just before the outbreak of the war has been forwarded from Pretoria to Durban, and given to the public. This shows that during the two years preceding the Jameson raid the Boers spent between one and two million dollars on heavy guns and small arms. In 1894—long before the Jameson raid was even contemplated—the Boers spent half a million dollars with Krupp, of Germany, on heavy guns, and another half million with an Austrian firm on small arms. The Krupp guns were delivered in 1895 and included two of what was then the largest pattern for a gun in the world. These guns are 48 feet in length, weigh 120 tons, throw a shell weighing 2,300 pounds, and require 904 pounds of powder for each discharge. Both are amply provided with ammunition, which, in addition to steel and iron shells, consists of shrapnel, holding 3,000 balls, weighing 3½ oz. each. Its bore is 13.38 inches. In 1895, another half million was expended with Krupp, and a number of field guns of long range were obtained, as were also several mountain and bush guns, these being especially adapted to the hilly country and the hot climate of the Transvaal.

Now, Sir, this war, I say, was provoked by the Boers, and the question to be solved was whether the Afrikaner race or the British race was to be preponderant in South Africa. The Afrikaners had long been preparing to oust the English from South Africa. That was the cause of the war. Now, on this question I have the testimony of that great churchman, Cardinal Vaughan, to support me in saying that the war was forced upon the English nation, that war was declared upon them in the first place, and that the question to be solved was the supremacy of the English race in South Africa. Now, Sir, Cape Colony is a most important colony to the British Empire, I may say that it is essential to the greatness and solidity of the British Empire that the colonies in South Africa should remain under British rule. Now, I ask myself what would be the consequences of the loss of Cape Colony to Great Britain as regards Canada. It is true that for almost a hundred years we have enjoyed in this country the greatest peace, prosperity and progress; we have enjoyed a happy state of things. But what may happen to-morrow, nobody can foretell. Look at what is happening in Europe to-day. The continent of Europe is getting too small for the great nations there, it is getting too small for their ambitions, and they are spreading out all over the world. Nations which have lived in security for hundreds and thousands of years are now seeing their territories divided up between the great nations of Europe. Of course on this continent we have been secure up to the present, but our security has lain principally in the fact that we are protected by the British flag. Supposing that a conflict broke out amongst the great European nations, supposing that England became involved in a war with any of the European nations, do you think for an instant that our shores would be free from a hostile attack? Who then would defend our shores? If war broke out, how long would we be at peace with our neighbours to the south of us? Because, although they now express great respect for us, a great deal of esteem, I do not know how long they could resist the temptation that is afforded them by our great mines, our great forests and our valuable fisheries which they have looked upon so long with envy.

Now, this, it seems to me, is the position in which we are placed if we look at Canada as a whole. But there is another question more interesting to us, who come from the province of Quebec, and it is the question of the protection which we have enjoyed for so long together with all the liberties which we possess and which we have enjoyed for over half a century. The Treaty of Paris guaranteed the exercise of the Catholic religion. In 1774, the Quebec Act, while introducing into Lower Canada, into that part of Canada which is now called the province of Quebec, the public law of England, preserved the French laws which had been handed down to the people by their forefathers. It is true that the time came when we had to agitate for constitutional freedom and the constitutional liberties which we enjoy now; it is true that some of our people even went further, Sir, that they bled and died upon the battlefield for the vindication of those liberties, but I would ask any impartial observer, who has studied the history of this country for the last fifty years, if it is not true, that, in the province of Quebec the French Canadian Catholic enjoys more liberty, civil, religious and political, than do Catholics in any other part of the world. I will ask you, Mr. Speaker, to point to any country in the wide world, whether it be monarchical or republican, whether it be a country which is a so-called Catholic country or a Protestant country,—I ask you, Mr. Speaker, if there is any country in the wide world where we have as much religious liberty as we have in the province of Quebec? Sir, it is said that Christianity is a part and parcel of the law of England. It may be said with the same truth that Catholicism is a part and parcel of the law of the province of Quebec. Tithes, in our province, constitute, not only a religious obligation, which is an obligation upon the Catholic inhabitants, but, the payment of tithes is a legal obligation which can be enforced before the courts. The assessments for building churches and for building the residences of priests are regulated by statute, and they are not merely a moral and conscientious obligation imposed upon Catholics, but they are also a legal obligation which can be enforced by the courts. Then, take our religious processions which walk through the streets, guarded by the strong arm of the law, and, again, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, if you can point out any country in the whole world where such religious liberty is enjoyed. Where is there more liberty of speech, or more liberty of the press than in the province of Quebec? Where is that liberty enjoyed more, where is it more protected, where is it more surrounded by safeguards, where can we speak and write with as much freedom as we do in the province of Quebec, this right being only forbidden to fall into license? We do not want these rights which we enjoy to be regarded as privileges or favours that can be as easily taken away as they have been enjoyed. No, they are not privileges and they are not favours. They are rights. We have earned them and history tells us that our forefathers were the men who discovered this country, that our missionaries were the first to implant upon its shores the cross, that great symbol of civilization, and that later on, our clergy, our bishops and our priests, when the time came to tell the French Canadian people what their duty was to Great Britain and the Crown of England, our bishops and priests led the people on and our ancestors afterwards fought in defence of the British Crown, as the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) said this afternoon. These are some of the special rights which the French Canadians enjoy in the province of Quebec. My hon. friend from Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Monet) talked about the right of making treaties, and he said that one thing he would like to have for Canada would be the right to make treaties. The hon. gentleman is cruel to his own friends, because, it has been a standing boast for the last two years that, now, treaties between Canada and other countries are made, not by Great Britain and these other countries interested, but by the great men who sit on the Treasury benches to-day. Does the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Monet) forget already—I am sure that the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) does not forget—that there was a commission which was called the Quebec Conference, which sat at Quebec and at Washington, on which the hon. member for Labelle was the worthy secretary, and in which four Canadians represented the British interests while only one Englishman was present. If success has not crowned their efforts it is not because we were not represented there by enough diplomats—I call them diplomats because I am speaking diplomatically now. The reason remains still to be announced, which, I suppose, later on we will know. To go back to the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville, our commerce is protected in every part of the world by the British flag, and when we travel, even to the confines of the earth, we are protected by the simple fact that we are British subjects. With all these benefits what would we be willing to take in exchange? The hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville mentioned that he was ready to accept independence, or, if not immediately ready, that he was in the near future when we would be ripe for independence.

Mr. MONET. I did not say 'in the near future.'

Mr. CASGRAIN. I am glad to hear my hon. friend (Mr. Monet) say that he did not say 'in the near future.' Then, I would like to know why mention independence here? To my mind, when we become an independent nation the time is so far off that none of us, not even the young member for Laprairie and Napierville will see the day. Let him consider the vastness of our territory, the length of our inland frontiers, the extent of our coast line, and let him tell me where he is going to get an army and navy to protect this great nation. The integrity of our territory is protected now.

Mr. MONET. If we are to achieve that result it will not be by sending our men and money to England.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I am coming to that in a minute. I have foreseen that objection. The integrity of our territory is protected by the certainty that if one of our farms, be it ever so small, or bays, be it ever so shallow, is ever invaded by a foreign foe, it would have to be restored even if the whole force of Great Britain had to be called out. Our commercial interests throughout the world are protected by the diplomacy of England, and I would like to know where we would find diplomacy on the other side of the House which would protect our commercial interests as England is protecting them to-day. I do not say that independence may never come, but the prospect of independence is so far away that no man living to-day will see it. At all events, it is so far away that its conception cannot be used as a factor in the discussion of this subject. My hon. friend says that the best way for us to become an independent nation is not to spend our money by sending our troops away to fight the battles of England. It seems to me that the best way for us to do is as long as we can, at least, to remain part of the British Empire so as to go on with the progress and prosperity of the country which our connection with the British Empire has brought us up to now. Of course, my hon. friend did not mention annexation, but if anybody did mention annexation as an alternative for the position which we occupy to-day, I, as a French Canadian, and I think my statement will be borne out by the French Canadian members of this House, would never be willing to exchange the liberties and the rights which we enjoy, for the problematical freedom which we might enjoy were we part and parcel of the United States.

Can we enjoy these rights and benefits without having any reciprocal obligations to perform? This, it seems to me, is a question which must be studied by anybody who has any hesitation in voting for the resolutions which are now before the House.

If it were possible that we could not find in our hearts enough of gratitude for the benefits conferred on us and which we prize so highly, then our actions and our policy should at least be directed by the simple instinct of self-defence and self-protection. As I have said, this is a most serious war, and the consequences may be most serious for us. It is a crisis in the history of England. Russia, Germany and France are all striving to attain the first place in the world, and is it to be wondered at that they all should be as hostile as they dare to England, which is the greatest of them all, in maritime power, in the number and extent of her colonies, and in the greatness and richness of her commerce. All these countries are simply waiting for an opportunity of humiliating England, waiting to take advantage of her reverses, waiting to wrest from her that power and that supremacy which she holds to-day. To all the combinations, to all the machinations, to all the alliances of the nations of the European continent, we must oppose the compact union and solidarity which exists among the different members of the British Empire throughout the world. It must be known once and for all, that if British influence and British prestige, that if the integrity of the British Empire is attacked in any one part of the world, then Greater Britain shall arise in its might to meet the assault and to repel it. It seems to me, Sir, that is the idea which prompted the sending of the contingents. It was an evidence that all the colonies were uniting with each other to prove not only their patriotism and their loyalty towards the British Crown, but to prove that the empire cannot be attacked in any one of its parts without all the other parts coming to its rescue.

Sir, the people of all the provinces of the Dominion are carried away by this patriotic conception of their duties, and I as a French Canadian will not stand aloof, and remain an indifferent spectator of the tremendous struggle which the British Empire is engaged in at this time.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CASGRAIN. It may be said: But this is Imperialism. That word 'Imperialism' is raised as a bugbear in some parts of this country. Does the word imply that we will have to keep up a standing army? Does the word imply that we will have to take part in every war into which England is drawn either against the savage tribes of Africa or the yellow races of Asia? Does it imply that we must assume all these obligations and duties and have no right of control? Sir, I do not look upon it in that light, nor do I think that any man in this country who reflects will look upon it in that light either. That is not the true meaning of Imperialism as I understand it to-day. Sir, if Imperialism means that in a crisis like the present which I have described, we are called upon to defend the prestige, the influence, the integrity of the empire, surely we are all willing and ready to do our duty as British subjects, and surely nobody will be found so attached to abstract principles, so near-sighted or so weak, as to stand aloof. Surely no one will be so blind to the teachings of our own history as to refuse to do his share in this truly patriotic work. Mr. Speaker, to take the opposite view would be to array ourselves against the teachings of the history of Canada. Let us make a retrospect; let us go back to confederation, and let me ask this parliament: What was the chief idea which presided at the bringing together of all these colonies in British North America. Was it simply to make what would be called a confederation; was it simply to have the pleasure of putting on the statute-book the British North America Act? No, Sir, there was a higher conception in the minds of the fathers of confederation. Their object was to strengthen the bonds between this country and the motherland, and that sentiment was expressed on many an occasion, by the late Sir John A. Macdonald. And when our late chieftain died, a monument was erected to his memory in St. Paul's Cathedral—erected, not to the memory of the colonial statesman, but to the memory of the Imperial statesman. We have heard a great deal this afternoon about the late Sir George Etienne Cartier. Who was the greatest help the late Sir John Macdonald had in this bringing about of this grand confederation? Who was there amongst the English Canadian confreres of Sir John Macdonald who worked more faithfully with him than did Sir George Etienne Cartier? Who more eloquently than Sir George Cartier, on every occasion most eloquently endeavoured to convince French Canadians of the necessity for confederation? During his lifetime, Sir George Cartier was honoured by his Queen; created a baronet of the empire, not so much because he was a colonial statesman as that he was truly an Imperial statesman. I have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that could Sir George Cartier come back to this House to-day and read this resolution, could he have seen our contingents depart for these distant lands to fight the battles of that flag which he loved so well, he would have been the last man to say that Canada should not take part in the contests for the defence of the British Empire in its hour of trial.

Mr. CASGRAIN.

Not only was confederation a step in the closer union of Canada with the motherland, but all the great projects which have been matured and carried out since confederation by one government or by another, by one party or by another, have been carried out with the object of binding us more closely with the motherland. That was the argument used in this House when we were asked to support these projects. Take, for instance, the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway. When the people of Canada were asked to tax themselves to an enormous extent for this work, what was the principal argument used to induce them to do so? Sir, the argument used was that the Canadian Pacific Railway was a great continental route which would bridge the distance from one ocean to the other, and would enable English troops to go from Halifax to Vancouver in eight days. Then, we have in the Pacific cable another Imperial project which has been taken in hand by the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. Not a protest came from the Liberal benches when the Pacific cable resolutions were submitted, and that is an Imperial work. Then, again, we have the establishment, or rather what was to be the establishment of a fast line of steamers, for which this House voted an annual subsidy of $750,000, and we were told that we should tax ourselves for this, because it would lessen the distance between the mother country and Canada, and would make stronger the ties which unite us. Let us come to contemporaneous history. I remember quite well that when hon. gentlemen opposite introduced their so-called preferential tariff, they announced that they did so because they were loyal to the empire, and they declared they were doing something great to strengthen the ties between Canada and England. You remember that when these resolutions were carried, these gentlemen opposite all rose to sing God Save the Queen, and not one of them raised a dissentient voice against this Imperialistic idea. But that is not all. When our gracious Sovereign celebrated the sixtieth anniversary of her reign, we sent over to represent us—and worthily did he represent us—the right hon. gentleman who leads this House. What was the meaning of the presence of the Prime Minister of Canada in that royal and Imperial procession? Did he go simply to assure our gracious Sovereign that in times of triumphal processions he would be glad to support her? Accompanied as he was by a representative of every arm of the Canadian militia, was the presence of the Prime Minister of Canada there simply to signify that we had fine uniforms and could make a fine appearance? Not at all; that was not the object of the great Jubilee. The object of gathering together representatives of the British Empire within the city of London, and the object of this parade before Her Majesty, was to teach the world that the British Empire, from north to south, from east to west, was a united empire. When the hon. gentleman, called upon to speak on different occasions during those great celebrations, got up and said: 'When the beacons are lit upon the hills, and when the bugle-call is sounded, you will find Canada doing its duty to the empire,' he was expressing Imperial ideas, he was showing himself to be an Imperialist, and there was not a protest from anybody on his side of the House; and I say it is too late for anybody now, on one side of the House or the other, to say that we are not going to join hands with the other colonies of the empire to defend its supremacy and its integrity. But, Sir, here is another evidence of the hon. gentleman's real sentiments. When the first contingent left Quebec, a speech was made by His Excellency the Governor General, and I have no doubt whatever, that in it, he expressed the views and opinions of his ministry; for I have too much respect for my right hon. friend, the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and for the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) to believe that if these were not their sentiments they would remain one day or one hour in the council over which His Excellency the Governor General presides. They Liberals, belonging to the Liberal school of thought—why, of course, if there they were not in perfect accord, every one of them, with the opinions expressed on that occasion by the Governor General, they would have simply said, 'Your Excellency, from this day we cease to be your advisers.' Here are the sentiments that were expressed by His Excellency:

This force has been gathered from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and represents the best men of the Dominion. Canada has freely made her offering of this military contingent to the old country, and in so doing has accepted the difficulties which she knows must follow.

I cannot see the 'no precedent' clause in this.

The people of Canada have no desire to consider the quibbles of colonial responsibility. What they have done is to insist that their loyal offers should be made known, and they heartily rejoiced when they were graciously accepted.

When my hon. friend, the Minister of Public Works, heard that speech, he was converted instantly. Mr. Speaker, I have expressed freely, the views which I hold on this question. I have expressed them without any fear whatever, because I am convinced, whatever may be said, that the population of Canada, in every part of the country, is a loyal population, a population, which, while guarding the rights which it has under the constitution, will ever be ready in a crisis like the one in which we now find ourselves, to assist in maintaining the world over the greatness and the supremacy of the British Empire.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). Mr. Speaker, I have been assailed so bitterly during the last three or four months, that at times the wicked thought comes to my mind that kind Providence has disappointed somebody. My death, however, would have been a great calamity indeed for my hon. friends opposite. What could they do without me? I am their daily bread; I am their only programme. Well, I made up my mind that there was no hurry in going up to heaven, and I have managed to pull through to the best of my ability, as usual.

Mr. BENNETT. No danger.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No danger at the present time, anyhow. May I hope, Sir, that judgment will not be pronounced upon me either by this House or by the country, from the vituperations that have been hurled at me in the clippings of newspapers.

Some hon. MEMBERS. La Patrie.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Often quoted and oftener misquoted. My strongest opponents on the other side of the House, will, I believe, give me the credit of not having always displayed much inclination to show the white feather. During my twenty-five years and more of newspaper work, I generally signed my articles, after the French fashion, which is so distasteful to the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) that he believed my colleagues had put me down and silenced me. Having signed thousands of articles, I know quite well, that I may have laid myself open to the accusation of having been inconsistent. Well, if I may be allowed to compare a very small man like myself, to bigger men, let me quote only a few words from a splendid biography of Mr. Gladstone, written by Justin McCarthy—in fact, one of the most interesting books I have ever read. Speaking of Mr. Gladstone, to whom, of course, I do not mean to compare myself, he says:

He may be charged with inconsistency, a charge which has naturally to be made against any statesman, for the essence of statesmanship consists in the recognition of imminent tendencies and actual facts. Nobody can possibly be called a statesman who starts in life with a pack of political nostrums which he proposes to apply indifferently to the cure of every constitutional malady in the state.

I am prepared to stand by what my political opponents would think fit to call inconsistency; but I altogether decline to be condemned, or to be damned politically, for inconsistencies of others, and for newspaper articles which I have never written, and which I have never read. I will give you a sample of the opinions that have been attributed to me through the press of this country, to prove that I am unworthy to be a minister of the Crown. In an article alleged to have been written by me, and circulated throughout the country, there occurred these words: 'Not a man, not a dollar.' There is not one member of this parliament who has not read that article, circulated in the Tory press, attributing these words to me. Well, Sir, I never wrote, I never uttered these words, and I beg to add, that up to this moment, I have not read the article in which these words appeared. What then? La Patrie has been quoted and misquoted against me on many occasions. Even the eminent baronet who leads the opposition has thought proper to have recourse to newspaper clippings. The hon. gentleman himself does not know one solitary word of the French language, but he has quoted, as other gentlemen from this side of the House have done, articles from La Patrie, translated by Tory newspaper men, who, I say it without any hesitation, have nearly in every instance distorted the articles that have appeared in that paper. I am very sorry that so very few of our English friends in the English provinces can read the French language. Would you permit me, Mr. Speaker, to say that in that respect we are better situated, and, I say it in all deference, better educated than our English friends. We read the English newspapers. Thousands of English newspapers are read by French Canadians. If French newspapers, if French books were similarly read by our English friends, accusations like those which are heralded every day against us, could not have any possible effect. I do not deny that I have some relations with La Patrie. My sons are something of the old block. I have been a newspaper man and they are newspaper men. I have no intention of killing them. They have started in life as newspaper men, and I hope that they will be successful.

But when the hon. gentleman who leads the opposition, with his fifty years' experience, tells me that I am the censor of La Patrie, that not a single line is published in that paper without my first seeing it, he cannot surely be serious. He is exaggerating as usual. I never feel any inclination to retaliate against the hon. gentleman, so well do I know him. I know that when he says a thing, there is always, in the best part of his heart, a discount of 75 per cent. He does not mean wrong. Well, in order that I may not forget altogether the good old way of roasting a goose, I am quite prepared to admit that occasionally I put the pan on the fire. I write some articles here and there, but I am sorry to say that I have not much time to spend in that healthy exercise, which has been the joy of my younger days and which, I fondly hope, will be the consolation of my older age.

Even the headings that appear in La Patrie are quoted against me as an evidence of my disloyalty to the British Crown. I think it was the hon. gentleman from Bruce

Mr TARTE.

(Mr. McNeill) who went to that extent. I would make a bet, Sir, I would take the Star newspaper and La Patrie, on the same topic mind you, on the same day, and I would bet my head that the headings of the Star are bigger than those of La Patrie. If my friends in the newspaper offices would permit me, I would say that I am sorry that such sensational methods have taken hold of the newspaper world, and it is to be regretted that the smallest news cannot be published nowadays without big headings. When the English armies were unfortunately defeated, surely La Patrie could not be asked to say that they were victorious, and its headings are just as big to-day when the English arms are victorious.

Mr. McNEILL. Would the hon. gentleman allow me to explain, as he has mentioned my name, that I was referring to the heading which declared that General McDonald was defeated when he had been victorious?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman will permit me not to answer that. News, as he knows very well, were changing from hour to hour at times. Now, Sir, I do not believe that in this controversy I have been guilty of any constitutional heresy, and I may say immediately that I do believe that if the same views had been propounded by a public man of any other origin, they would have been interpreted as mine have been. But I am a French Canadian, and there is a school in this country, it is evident, that has made up their minds to impress upon the English public that the French Canadians are disloyal. The ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), if I may be allowed to refer for a moment to a former debate, threatened me that he would not allow me to leave this House before I made good the accusation which I made outside this parliament, that there was in the Tory ranks a concerted organization to try and impress upon the English provinces that the French Canadians are disloyal. I shall not leave the House without settling my accounts with him on that point, but I am not going to do it to-day because it would take up too much time and this is not the proper occasion.

Mr. FOSTER. This is a respite.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I believe that the House will do me the credit of admitting that I have never wasted hours and hours in speaking as some hon. gentlemen have done.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). You ought to say thanks.

Mr. FOSTER. Thanks. One is about as valuable as the other.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. How are the French Canadian public men treated by some of the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite? For instance, when that contingent affairs was discussed, there was a reverend gentleman who spoke in this city. This is what he said:

And what is the outcome of the grave deliberations of our loyal representatives? They have actually given the Queen of England permission to hire our soldiers and pay for them out of her own purse, and this is the loyalty of our French Canadians. Our Premier did not object to go to England to assist in the great Jubilee pageant; he did not refuse to occupy the place of honour accorded almost spontaneously in that great procession because it was felt that he represented the foremost colony of the empire, he did not object to the homage rendered by the cheering multitudes which lined the route; and he did not fail either to express in glowing language the loyalty and devotion of the Canadian people to England's throne. And yet it is this French gentlemen, supported by followers even more French than himself, who dares to insult a loyal and devoted people by pretending to represent their views by the action to which the government has finally committed itself. . . . These Frenchmen, who control our country to-day, whose opinions are blazed abroad, are not our representatives. We repudiate them, and the sooner England knows it the better. The question of French Roman Catholic supremacy was settled once and for all upon the Plains of Abraham, and let them never forget it. If they enjoy privileges equal, nay, superior to the Protestants of this country, let them not forget that they were granted to them on the basis of English, not French citizenship. . . . Let it go abroad then that here, in the centre of commerce and intelligence, the disloyal act of the French Roman Catholic representatives of the government is repudiated and scorned.

Mr. SPROULE. Name.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The Rev. Mr. Gorman, a gentleman who is very well known for his devotion to and activity in the cause of the Conservative party in this city. At the same time, a newspaper which is one of the most important organs of the Tory party in Ontario, in fact, the evening edition of the Mail and Empire was writing in this strain. I quote from the Toronto Evening News.

AL hon. MEMBER. What date?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. October.

We can tell Honourable Mr. Tarte and his French compatriots that the people of this province are thinking hard just now. They are opening their eyes to the true character of their French neighbours, and they are forming convictions that will have their fruition sooner or later in depriving the French Canadians of the special privileges that were granted to them by the Treaty of Paris.

Unless the British Canadians of this province are cravens, they will not tolerate a condition of subjection to the French Canadians, and if through the ballot boxes there is no redress, they will find other means of emancipating themselves from the dominance of an inferior people that peculiar circumstances have placed in authority in the Dominion.

About the same time the paid organizer of the Tory party in New Brunswick, Mr. Hetherington, was making speeches in meetings small and large, in some of which he threatened to invade the province of Quebec some of these fine days. Affidavits were published to that effect by respectable citizens.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) allow me a word?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Most certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not wish to take away from the hon. gentleman's time, except with reference to the matter he has just spoken of. I give it a full and frank denial so far as my information goes, and I have looked into it. I have the affidavits of eight gentlemen who were in the audience at the time referred to, and they have sworn that such statements as alleged were never made by Mr. Hetherington.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have in my desk affidavits which I will take the first opportunity of reading, and we can then compare notes. The hon. leader of the opposition verily believes that I have imported from France what he has been good enough to call my disloyal utterances. The hon. gentleman has been good enough to say that, coming from France, a country that is so hostile to England that the people rejoice over every defeat of the British arms, I have imported ideas unfriendly to the empire. Would my hon. friend allow me to say that I did not hear in any authorized circles in France, in any official circles the ideas that he attributes to the French nation? During all these controversies has not France maintained a strictly correct attitude? When Mr. Chamberlain uttered those unfortunate words that even his colleagues repudiated, in what manner did the French Foreign Minister answer? Did he answer with threats? He answered by advising moderation, friendly feeling, a peaceful attitude.

I am glad to state from my place in parliament to-day that Mr. Delcasse, with whom I had the privilege of an interview, told me almost in these very words that not only would a war between England and France be a terrible calamity, but it would be a stupid thing. I have imported from France the idea of love for my ancestors, if I had not it in my heart before. But I have not received from any public man in France disloyal ideas. Far from it. All the important men in France that I met and whom I told of our happiness, our peace, our prosperity, gave me the advice to remain as we are. When the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) quoted, or rather misquoted—not wittingly, but misquoted—from a speech that I made at a banquet given to M. Herbetto, a distinguished Frenchman, who came to the city of Montreal and whom I had met in France. Here are the words I used on that occasion, only a part of which the hon. gentleman quoted :

I would not be a loyal subject to the Queen if I were not allowed to remain French.

The hon. gentleman stopped there. I went on saying :

There are but a few people in this country, there are but a few fanatics, who think of denying us the right to be French. If Sir Charles Dilke had been in London when I passed recently through that great city, I would have gone and thanked him for the words he has written about us in a book lately published under the title, 'The British Empire.' Do you know what Sir Charles Dilke has said in his book ?

'There probably are few of my readers who need to be reassured upon the subject of the loyalty to British connection of the French Canadian people. We conquered the French Canadians at the end of a terrific struggle for mastery in the new world between Great Britain and France, a struggle which raged over Europe, India and America, as well as the high seas. A great number of years after the conquest of Canada, we had so little understood how good relations which had been brought about for a time should be preserved, that our French Canadian subjects actually rose in arms for their liberties, their tongue and their religion, at the beginning of the Queen's reign. They are now, under the admirable institutions which in our late-born wisdom we have conferred upon them, perhaps the most loyal of all the peoples under the British Crown—and they are so in spite of the fact that they have remained intensely French, proud of their race and of its history, and deeply attached to their tongue and to its literature. . . . The double allegiance of the French Canadians, at the present day, on the one hand to the British Crown and to the liberties which they enjoy under it, and on the other hand, not to a foreign power which they regard as foreign, but to their own race and literature, is one of the most interesting spectacles that the world affords. The desire of the French Canadians to remain French in spirit kept them on our side during our wars with our American colonists, who were their old enemies, and it is highly probable that the provinces of Quebec and the French element in the Canadian North-west will always remain rather British than American in sympathy.'

It is just what I said there, it is just what I say here now—intensely French and intensely British. This is the position we take, this is the position we intend to keep. I have unbounded confidence in the future development of my race under the sun of Canada. We have developed under British institutions in the past in a way that I may be allowed to call marvellous. We are not English, we have no intention of becoming English. We are French, and the reason is obvious : Our fathers and our mothers were French, and we have no reason to be ashamed of them. Sir, my judgment has not been influenced by what I heard in France ; but I am not quite sure that my political attitude in the last few months has not been inspired by my former Conservative training. I was a devoted follower of Sir John A. Macdonald, and I may add of the hon. gentleman who leads the opposition. What is the past history of the Conservative party since confederation ? My hon. friend from Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Monet) has reminded the House of the fact that since confederation England has been engaged in twenty-three wars. The hon. gentleman who leads the opposition has been, during all that time, either a minister of the Crown in Canada, or has been standing very near the government. Has he ever offered any assistance to England in any of those twenty-three wars ? Not one government in the past has ever offered any military assistance to England.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question ? Among all those twenty-three wars, is there one which can be at all compared to the war which is now going on ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There were some much more important than this.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Which one, and where ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman must not forget that the Boer population of the Transvaal is only 80,000 souls all told—I do not speak of the Uitlanders. It is no use denying facts, there are only 80,000 Boers, as Mr. Bryce states in his book, which is at the disposal of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CASGRAIN. State where, please.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The names of the wars have been read in the House, when my hon. friend was away arguing some big case in Montreal. I do not think I was unfair to the leader of the opposition when I stated outside this parliament that he himself had always expressed the view that Canada should not contribute to Imperial wars. He has tried to shield himself from the effects of his position—but I want to ask him and those who follow him to point to one utterance of his in which he has offered any help to England. So far from doing that, he has stated over and over again that we had already rendered most important contributions to England, and that is eminently true. Important factors in the defence of the empire, for instance, are the two magnificent naval stations we have in our waters at Halifax, and at Esquimalt, on the Pacific Ocean the Canadian Pacific Railway connecting those two great stations.

We have done important things for England and ourselves, because, England and ourselves are bound together. I was just going to ask the hon. leader of the opposition if he does not remember distinctly, that, in 1885, General Laurie, and the late lamented Col. Williams proposed to raise two regiments. They wanted this country to pay something for these regiments. Sir John A. Macdonald was then consulted by Lord Lansdowne, and he wrote, as his deliberate opinion, that Canada should not contribute to Imperial wars. Well, then, having been brought up in that school it is no great mystery to understand why, perhaps, I hesitated a little before plunging into a new state of affairs.

Mr. McNEILL. Will the hon. gentleman allow me?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I would like to go on with my little speech quietly.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). Mr. Speaker, I have been accused of having failed in my duty as a minister of the Crown during this controversy. Todd, vol. 2, page 402 and 403, states as follows on the subject of the responsibility of ministers of the Crown:

In tracing the origin and development of the rule which requires political unanimity amongst the ministers of the Crown, we have seen that it has become an acknowledged principle that, so long as a minister continues to form part of a government, he shares with his colleagues an equal responsibility for everything that is done or agreed upon by them. Except in the case of an admitted 'open question,' it must be taken for granted that the whole cabinet have assented to the ministerial policy as officially transacted or propounded by any minister acting or speaking on their behalf. It is not therefore allowable for a cabinet minister to oppose the measures of the government—to shrink from an unqualified responsibility in respect to the same—to refrain from assisting his colleagues in the advocacy of their particular measures in parliament—or to omit the performance of any administrative act which may be necessary to carry out a decision of the government—even though he may not have been a consenting party thereto—or to withhold his support from the ministry when attacked by their political opponents. A minister who infringes any one of these rules is bound to tender his immediate resignation of office.

This is the rule, as stated by Todd, and all other constitutional authorities. Mr. Gladstone, speaking in 1873 on that point, said:

However, a question arises which all members of all governments have to put to themselves in the inner forum of conscience from time to time. If they are men of sense, as they sometimes are, they are occasionally obliged to forego their individual opinion on particular questions for the sake of avoiding greater evils, or for realizing less benefit than they personally deserve or think obtainable. I apprehend that happens to all members of the government.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman followed up that adverb there.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Well, I remember a government, the members of which differed publicly in this House. I remember seven of the ministers of that day standing aloof from their leader for one whole week, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) stood by them.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Which wing did he stand by?

Mr. SOMERVILLE. He was waiting to get in.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Have I controverted the rule laid down by the authorities, and as explained by so great a man as Mr. Gladstone? When the war broke out between England and the Transvaal, I will readily admit that I did not feel much inclination towards Canada taking part in that war, without mature consideration. I was in England when the negotiations were going on, and I remember very well that nearly all of the public men whom I met, and they were on both sides of politics, were then very strongly opposed to war. Public opinion in England then was that war should be avoided, and could be avoided. I do not intend to enter very deeply into the causes of this unfortunate conflict, but I must be allowed to say that there are two sides to the question. When such eminent thinkers as Mr. Bryce, as Mr. Courtney, as Sir Edward Clarke, as Mr. Herbert Gladstone, as Mr. John Morley and others have expressed, in stronger terms than will be used here, their disapproval of that war; we must certainly be allowed the right of thinking over the causes of that war. That right I claim the liberty to exercise to its fullest extent. In this free country of Canada, I hope that the right of free speech is not going to be abolished, even for a French Canadian public man. However, Sir, war has been declared and the government of this country was invited, as well as the governments of other colonies, to send troops to South Africa. Mr. Chamberlain's circular was addressed not only to this colony but to all the English colonies. It was published in the English newspapers before it reached this country. I do not wish to blame any one for that, but it is a fact that cannot be disputed, that the circular was published in the London newspapers before it became known to this government. As the Prime Minister has explained, when those events were going on, he was performing a public duty in the United States. As soon as he came back the question was taken up and the government decided by an Order in Council, which has been placed on the Table of the House, to comply with the request of the Colonial Minister and with the conditions that the Imperial authorities had themselves settled. I felt no great fascination, and I do not feel it now, for Canada going to war by Order in Council. I shall not hide my views on this point no more than I shall hide my views on any other point. There is nothing that I hate more thoroughly than political hypocrisy, and if I am to go down to history in disgrace for the views I hold, I am prepared for that result. The views that I tried to make prevail then were, that parliament should be called immediately to ratify the action taken by the government. Whether I was right or wrong, these are the views that I entertained. Canada had never taken part in any Imperial wars. Since confederation there have been many wars, several of them more important to England than this war then seemed to be, and Conservative governments headed by such strong Imperialists as Sir John Macdonald had stated as their policy, that this country should not take part in Imperial wars. I thought, and I still believe for I have not changed my views, that it would have been a good thing to call parliament immediately. From those who are able to judge on both sides of the House, I have not heard a single dissentient voice on that point. However, the majority of my colleagues; the government thought that, all things being considered and weighed, we might dispense with the immediate calling of parliament. Holding the view that I held, was it my duty to resign or not? Sir, I realize, as much as any other man the great responsibility that rests upon a minister of the Crown, and I may perhaps add immediately, on a French Canadian minister of the Crown, on such an occasion. Suppose I had resigned then, what would have been the result? The French Canadians would have been denounced more bitterly than ever; their loyalty would have been assailed all over this broad Dominion. I have not the slightest idea that by seceding from my colleagues, I would have weakened them. I am a very humble member of this government. However, I thought it was my duty not to resign. The Order in Council has been placed on the Table of the House, and it contains words which I am very glad to see in that historic document. It says that that action of the government must not be interpreted as a precedent. I see by the intelligent smile of the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Marcotte) that he understands fully the question.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation). I was looking at Mr. Monet.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I know I may be at once told that these words did not mean much; because a few weeks afterwards a second contingent was sent under the very same conditions. I was very glad to hear from the lips of the Prime Minister in the debate on the address that this country cannot be expected to take part in all the secondary wars of England.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Would the hon. gentleman permit us to ask him a question, without interrupting him?

Mr. TARTE.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Most certainly.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that the first contingent was sent at the request of Mr. Chamberlain, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and that the second contingent was sent under the same conditions.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I was speaking for myself, and I have a right to interpret that document. I said that the circular of Mr. Chamberlain was sent, not only to this colony, but to all the other colonies, which is true.

Mr. MONTAGUE. But the hon. gentleman used the word 'invitation.'

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I believe it was an invitation, which the Colonial Minister had a perfect right to send; I do not blame him for having sent it. Whether it was an invitation or not, history and further developments will show; but we must take the historical fact as it is: that the Colonial Minister sent a circular to all the colonies, and that that circular found its way into the London press before it reached Ottawa.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Was that circular sent—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MONTAGUE. This matter is important to the House, if it is not to the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock). I am asking the question by the courtesy of the hon. Minister of Public Works, was that circular sent previous to any intention having been sent by the colonial governments, offering services?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. As to that the hon. gentleman will have to look himself; he knows just as well as I do. The leaders of the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, organized a great clamour for sending troops. The chief organ of that clamour was the Montreal Star. We all know the Montreal Star. It is a very well conducted paper—a sensational paper. It has become the chief organ of the eminent baronet who leads the opposition. Each has promised the other the realm of the world. The Star has promised the eminent baronet this place of Prime Minister which he came from the other side of the Atlantic to occupy, to the relief of his then leader, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, but which he could not occupy very long; and the eminent baronet has undoubtedly promised Mr. Graham, that if he succeeds in putting him back here, very nice things will be done for Mr. Graham. He might be knighted; he might be made a big man; he might have social precedence. The Star then went on organizing that campaign of ultra-loyalty for the purpose of sending an army or several armies to the rescue of England. Well, at the time, who was the public man, either in this country or in Europe, who thought that war against the small republic of the Transvaal would be anything of a war? Only think what the English generals said? Sir Redvers Buller went so far as to say that as soon as he reached Cape Colony, he would cut the wires behind him, so as to be given full liberty to dispose very quickly indeed of the Boers. Everybody then thought that there would be no war. If there was going to be no war, or less than a secondary war, why should Canada, which had never taken part in British wars, be required to send troops, on this occasion? That was my point. Whether it was right or wrong, that was my point, and I was fully entitled to take that position. Circumstances changed. The English generals and all of us discovered later on that it was a war—a serious war. In spite of the fact that the Boer population of the Transvaal is only 80,000 souls, and in spite of the fact that the population of the Orange Free State is only about 150,000, we found that this was a war, and then the question arose whether we should not send another body of troops. I may say at once that to that second contingent I did not raise the slightest objection; my colleagues will bear me out in that—not the slightest objection under the same conditions. When the first contingent was sent, or rather when the Colonial Minister issued that circular, I thought with all other public men, that there would be no war, and then I thought we had no right to consecrate the principle of the intervention of this country in Imperial wars. When the second contingent was sent, I say it again, and I beg to be understood, circumstances had changed. There was undoubtedly a very strong feeling in the English provinces, especially in the cities, in favour of this government sending troops to South Africa. I think it will be an unfortunate day when governments will be obliged to yield to popular clamour and where popular clamour is substituted for the authority of parliament. However, we are living in a peculiar country, perhaps in the most difficult country in the world to govern, and public men who do not take note of our peculiar position are not worthy of the confidence of the people. Such public men do not understand where they are.

Our English friends in the English provinces, especially in the cities, were very strong in favour of this government sending the troops to South Africa. I will not hide from you, Mr. Speaker, the fact that in the province of Quebec there was no such feeling. I said a moment ago that I hate political hypocrisy. I verily believe that it is one of the most detestable and dangerous things that can be practised. We must understand each other and be frank towards each other. If parliament had been called—and I say it within the sound and hearing of the English and French representatives of the people—and if the majority had decided to send the troops, there would not have been a dissenting voice in the province of Quebec. I echo what my hon. friend from Napierville (Mr. Monet) said. However, by-gones are by-gones. Parliament was not summoned; and like the loyal province that we are, we are not going to raise trouble. We understand that in this country the majority must govern, but all the same our feelings are there, and you must not be surprised at that. Minorities have the right to be touchy; they have the right to insist on the written constitution being observed; and I hope that our English friends will understand the position that we are in. Constitutional government has cost us much in the province of Quebec. It has cost us blood, it has cost us long years of fighting, and you must not be surprised if we stick to the rights we have acquired as they are stated in our written constitution. Is a man disloyal because he would hold the view that Canada was not bound to take part in this Imperial war? I claim that there is no disloyalty in holding this view. Have we the right to differ in this country on political questions of this magnitude? If we have not that right, there is no liberty in this country, liberty is a vain word. But only jingoes will uphold the unholy doctrine that public men have no right to differ on questions like this. And if the Prime Minister of this country had not been a French Canadian, that cry would not have been raised any more than it was raised against the late Sir John Macdonald in 1885, when he distinctly refused to pay a cent towards sending a man to help England in a more costly war than the present one. He was not then accused of disloyalty, but the noble baronet who leads the opposition, who leads a hopeless opposition—

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS—thought that he had at last found a policy. He thought that he could raise the cry of races and excite the hatred of races. Sir, he made for the second time a mistake, as far as the province of Quebec is concerned. In 1896, he thought that he could coerce that province but did not succeed, and this time he thought he could oppress it, but he will not succeed this time either. French Canadians have not always agreed with their English compatriots, but they have managed in such a way as to go on in a most successful manner. When the union was imposed upon them, they were not consulted. They were then 585,000 of a population in this country. The Imperial government forced the union on them without consulting them in any way, at the request of their English friends of Upper Canada, whose numbers were then a little over 300,000. But the French Canadians did not lose courage, nor did they lose their heads. They made up their minds to work out the problem, and they worked it out, as I have said, in a most successful manner. Their language was then abolished. Several speakers in this House have alluded to the Uitlanders; they have said that the Uitlanders had no rights, that they were not treated in a very decent way, and that I quite grant. But do not be surprised, Sir, if the French Canadians stick to the written constitution which protects their rights. They cannot forget their past history; they cannot forget that on two different occasions, although they were in a majority, their language was abolished. They cannot forget that they were treated as Uitlanders never have been and never will be in the Transvaal. Do not then be surprised if the feeling in the province of Quebec is a conservative feeling; the constitution is there, and we want it to be preserved, and that is the reason why many of my colleagues and myself have insisted, and will insist, on the constitution of this country being respected. Our voices, our opinions may not prevail all the time, but we will stick to them, and our English friends will help us. Surely the union between the English and French at the time of Lafontaine and Baldwin still holds good. We must stand by each other.

I was alluding a minute ago to the cause of the war. I will not say much on this question except to show that there are two sides to it, and that those who have studied the question had some little right to pause before plunging into war. The Cape, as we all know, was finally taken possession of by England in 1814. The white population of the Cape was then exclusively Dutch. Mr. Bryce, writing on that point, says:

If the English government had been wise in its measures, if it had understood the country better and been careful to send out only sensible and sympathetic men as Governors, the Dutch of South Africa, who had no attachment to Holland, might soon have become attached to England, and would, at any rate have been, though they are naturally of an independent spirit, quiet and peaceful subjects. England, however, managed things ill. She altered the system of courts and local government, reducing the rights which the people had enjoyed. She insisted on the use of the English language to the exclusion of Dutch.

I might go on to quote—

Mr. CRAIG. Read the whole book.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Well, it might be useful to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Craig), because when I read his speech the other night I was surprised that he knew so little about the question. He knows nothing about it, though he knows many other things. I have made the quotation to show the reason why the Transvaal exists to-day. Things have gone on badly, and in 1835-6, there was a great emigration—the 'great trek.' Ten thousand of these Dutchmen started for the Transvaal, which was then a wilderness, a land that did not belong to anybody. They settled there, established their own customs and made laws for themselves. Unfortunately, perhaps, for them gold was discovered. To make a long story short, the Uitlanders, that is to say the foreigners, came from all parts of the world; and, when the war was declared they numbered about 160,000, and insisted on having certain rights. I am not here to say that President Kruger and his council acted wisely in refusing equal rights to these Uitlanders, but let us take the facts as they are. These Dutchmen had emigrated to evade English rule, they had settled in a land that, certainly, did not belong to England then. As Mr. Bryce puts it very well in his book, giving equal rights to these persons was simply transferring the government of their land to foreigners. Well, they would not do it, and war was declared.

Mr. TARTE.

Mr. McNEILL. By whom?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. By whom?

Mr. McNEILL. Yes.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Well, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) will read Mr. Bryce's opinion, which I have not time to quote, he will find out; and if he will be good enough to read the debates of the short session of the British House after war was declared, he will find out still better. I wish to refer to what Mr. Bryce says as to the result of the war. Mr. Bryce is not a French Canadian; he is a very important member of parliament, and is one of the greatest writers of England. He is not sanguine, as some of my hon. friends are, as to the result and consequences of that war. I will only quote a very brief extract:

To some of us it appears a calamity for England also, since it is likely to alienate, perhaps for generations to come, the bulk of the white population in one of her most important self-governing colonies. It may, indeed, possibly mean for her the ultimate loss of South Africa.

Whether these views are right or not I am not here to say. When Mr. Chamberlain issued that circular, I do not believe that I am very far from the truth in saying that the war was an unpopular war in England. I would call on any man who was in England at that time to contradict me. Mr. Chamberlain is a very able man, I think is one of the ablest men of England to-day. One may not approve of everything he does or of everything he says; but he is an energetic man and an advocate of the Imperialistic idea. I believe I am not far from the mark in saying that during nearly all the negotiations many of his important colleagues had some doubts as to the result of those negotiations. Mr. Chamberlain thought he was right from his standpoint, that to make England strong and to strengthen his hands, it was a good thing for him to have the support of the colonies. In point of fact, I think that the last speech he made in the House, he made that point—that the war is just, the colonies had approved it. He wanted to have the approval of the colonies. Well, from his standpoint he may be right. Now, whether this is a war of redress, or whether this is a war of conquest, history will say. If it is a war of conquest, as it appears to be—

Mr. DAVIN. No! Perfect stuff!

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS.
As it appears to be—

Mr. DAVIN. Perfect stuff.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS.
The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) is not a high authority on such an important point. If it is a war of conquest, England may have strong reason for having entered upon it. Those who have studied the history of recent years know very well that Germany has been intriguing on a large scale in the Transvaal and in South Africa. Does the hon. gentleman know that or does he not? At any rate it is a well known historical fact. We all know that South Africa, and especially the Cape is on the highway to India, and England may have the strongest possible reasons for taking final possession of South Africa. Let us not hide the facts, which I have stated as they are. The point I wish to emphasize is this: whether—I say it again—this is a war of redress or war of conquest, it is the right of every British citizen, whether he is English or French, to judge the causes of the war, and to say what he thinks to be the truth. Those who accuse the French Canadians of being disloyal because they felt and still feel that we should not take part in all the wars of England without knowing better where we are, are doing a very poor service to England and to this country—a very poor service indeed. The French Canadians are to-day two millions of people. They are in a minority, there is no doubt of that. They have no desire to change their political allegiance or condition. They live very happily. They could not desire any better political position than the one they enjoy to-day. I have no hesitation in saying that, in spite of their love for their ancestors, they would not on any consideration go back under the rule of France. I am expressing, I believe, the unanimous feelings of my countrymen in making that statement. We are French, but we are Britishers, and we intend to remain Britishers because we are happy here, and we do not know if we would be happy elsewhere.

Sir, I have been assailed on this question on two different grounds. I have been assailed in the English provinces because I am a French Canadian, and because I hold the view that I have placed before you. It appears I had no right to insist upon the immediate calling of parliament; it appears it was a disloyal act for me to ask this country to do what England did immediately after the declaration of war. Well, I will remain under that accusation. I have also been accused to a certain extent by my French Canadian countrymen of being an Imperialist. I do not deny that I am an Imperialist. I have said elsewhere, and I now remind the House of what I said, that I am the first French Canadian who became a member of the Imperial Federation League. Why did I become a member of the league then, and why do I hold my present view to-day? Just because I do not desire any change in our political position. We have to choose between independence, annexation, and our present political position. I believe that not only this country, but other English colonies will very soon kick if they are obliged to send men and to pay money on behalf of the empire without having a word to say in Imperial affairs. I may be mistaken, but that is my view. I have good reason to believe that the Imperial authorities understand that, because this very morning the cable brought to this country the statement of Mr. Wyndham in the English House of Commons yesterday, that the colonies would be consulted about the reorganization of the Imperial forces. Sir, I claim that if the self-governing colonies of England had been represented in a certain way at the Imperial Privy Council table, this Transvaal war might never have taken place. What objection could there have been, for instance, to the Prime Minister of this great colony having a right to sit in the Imperial Council? Where is the harm? My French Canadian countrymen will, perhaps, say to me: You are going very far, you are going to tighten the bonds that unite us to England. Sir, we are a part of this great empire, and neither the French Canadians nor the English Canadians have any other destiny than to remain a part of the British Empire. Then it will not increase our responsibility, it will not decrease our liberties. Suppose the Prime Minister of this country had a right to sit in the Imperial Council, what harm could result to this country? Would not his voice have a great deal of influence and importance?

Mr. CASGRAIN. No.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS.
The hon. gentleman is not serious.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I am perfectly.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. If the hon. gentleman is serious in saying that, he has not given his attention to that important question.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I have.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Well, the hon. gentleman is not infallible. Now, I say this, that Lord Strathcona, although he is not a member of the Imperial Council, has a vast influence in England.

Mr. LANDERKIN. He is away ahead of the old one.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Of course, I only mention that to illustrate my own opinion. I say again, it will not increase our responsibility in any way, and it will not decrease by one iota our liberty. Now, let us look at the situation. Are we going to take part in Imperial wars and Imperial affairs or not? If we are not going to take part in Imperial wars, I will not insist on the idea. But if the colonies are going to take their share in Imperial wars in future, where is the British citizen understanding his rights, who will say that we should not have a voice when those questions come up? Is not the right of consultation the first right of a British citizen? We have not a word to say at the present time on the causes of the war, we cannot say anything. Suppose we believed that Mr. Chamberlain is wrong, that the present government is wrong, we could not say so; suppose we believed they are right, we could not say so either. I may be mistaken, but my own opinion is that the colonies cannot possibly be asked to take part in Imperial affairs without having a voice in Imperial councils. I do not suppose that this idea will prevail immediately; but I will say this, that those who believe in this idea should not be accused of disloyalty.

Now, Sir, a campaign against the French province of Quebec has been going on in nearly all the Tory papers of the English provinces. If you will go into the library and consult the files of all the Tory papers in the English provinces, I think you will not find three of them in which a strong campaign has not been carried on, and is not now being carried on, against the province of Quebec. That campaign is not new. The Mail and Empire, that is to say a faction of the Conservative party, started that war years ago. The Mail was then the organ of that crusade. Sir John A. Macdonald, who was a broad-minded man, would not stand that, and he established the Empire in opposition to the Mail. When Sir John died, the Empire was removed from the scene and the Mail was put on top. The difference between the present leader of the Conservative party and Sir John Macdonald is that Sir John Macdonald positively declined to countenance such a crusade against the province of Quebec, while the eminent baronet encourages it. That is the whole difference. Sir John had no great reason to encourage a crusade against Quebec because that province was then giving him a solid French vote. Circumstances have changed; the province of Quebec is giving a strong vote to a French Canadian Prime Minister, and French Canadians who were loyal then have become disloyal and thoroughly bad.

Mr. FOSTER. Your assertion goes further than any assertion I have ever heard.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It does not go further than the hon. gentleman is going through his own organizer and his own friends. I have, in my desk, dozens and dozens of quotations from the News and other Tory papers, which are simply saying every day that the French province of Quebec must be subjugated.

Mr. FOSTER. This is not a very good way of coming to the point, making your assertions and saying that months afterwards you will give us the proof. When you have to leave the proof of your assertion until later on, I think that you should leave your assertion until you bring your proof. If the hon. gentleman chooses to make his assertion and his proof coterminous with each other he has time now.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I generally follow the course I intend following. The hon. gentleman makes his speech in the way he likes, and I do mine in the way I like. Now, Sir, I have been accused of creating a political scandal—

Mr. FOSTER. Then, the hon. gentleman does not propose to prove his assertions.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do propose to prove them to the hilt. The hon. gentleman will get more of it than he will like.

Mr. FOSTER. It is a very nice time now.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am not going to weary the House with a seven-hour speech this evening. The record that I will place at the disposal of my hon. friend is ready, and I will take the first chance to make it very complete before this parliament.

Mr. FOSTER. You have a very nice chance just now.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman who wants immediate evidence—

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS.—perhaps will give the House the evidence in support of the accusations that have been made several times in this House against me, that I have prompted the action of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), and the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Monet). They are both in the House this evening, and I give the most flat denial to these statements.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman has done worse than prompt them.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. What did I do ?

Mr. FOSTER. You condoned what they had done and supported them afterwards.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I had no right to hang them, and no great desire either.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman was very discreet.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I will have to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) not to interrupt.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not object to being interrupted. I give a flat denial to these statements. There is not a solitary word of truth in them. The hon. member for Labelle consulted me ; I gave him, as my advice, which he did not follow, not to resign his seat. I told him that he would have just the same right of speaking his mind if he did not resign his seat. But the hon. gentleman, who has strong views of his own, thought that he would be stronger in his position if he had the endorsement of his electors, and he resigned. It was his own undoubted right. Other members of parliament have followed the same course in the past. He resigned, and he came back here. The hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House did not make any opposition to him. They tried it, but they did not find anybody. Our side of the House did not oppose him.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The other side dare not.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville wrote a letter in which he stated his views. I do not see what means I had of preventing him from writing such a letter, but, it appears that my great crime is that I introduced the hon. member for Labelle. I do not regret it. It was an act of courtesy, and in my case, it was an act of friendship which I did with pleasure. I recognize that the hon. gentleman had the right to take the course he has taken ; I recognize that the views which he has propounded are more than respectable views. I am a strong upholder of the authority of parliament, and the hon. gentleman had a perfect right to do what he has done. There is no slavery in his political party, I hope. The right of free thought and free speech is not abolished amongst us. I do not approve of the course that the hon. member for Labelle has taken ; I think he would have achieved his end just the same, but he has thought proper to do otherwise, which was his right. I think that a good many people have lost their heads on this question. What have we seen ? In Montreal, for instance, we have seen an eminent Queen's Counsel reading to His Excellency the Canadian law on the calling out of the militia—telling His Excellency that he had a perfect right to call out the militia of Canada without the consent of his government in this free country. He was a Tory leader, of course, because no Liberal leader would have given such advice as that.

An hon. MEMBER. Name him, name him.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Mr. McMaster.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have seen in several Tory papers that this country was very fortunate in having a Governor General here strong enough to take his ministers by the throat. Is it possible to insult the representative of the Crown in such a way ? Is it possible, that, in this free country, there are public men who would go so far as to advise the representative of Her Majesty to dismiss his ministers ? Still, in the Tory party this doctrine has been circulated and upheld. I protest against this. In the name of everything that stands for liberty and freedom, I assert the right of this country and of this parliament to be a free country and a free parliament. I was reading, a few days ago, from correspondence in the Globe, the following words :

We have other indications that a portion of our people, at least, are drifting dangerously near the whirlpool of political fanaticism, which soon becomes one of the most merciless of tyrannies. The violent abuse heaped in some quarters on French Canadian members of parliament who took a perfectly constitutional objection to sending our troops out of the country without parliamentary sanction was an instance of this tendency, for which the only excuse was the excited state of the public mind over a crisis in our history. But when we hear from our west coast that our foreign settlers are branded as traitors for even so natural an exercise of race sympathy as that of desiring to send aid to the families of the fallen Boers, for whose sorrows the kind heart of our own Queen can spare some sympathy—when we hear approvingly of 'knock-down' arguments, which are usually a confession of bad temper and weakness rather than of strength of rational conviction, we feel that the worst foes of freedom are not infrequently those who 'protest too much' in her favour, and when, even in Ontario, we hear of men whose education and calling should guarantee wiser counsels boasting that 'people sympathizing with the Boers dare not open their mouths in the streets, but have to keep silence,' or even expressing a bloodthirsty desire for the slaughter of those whom we make a point of calling our 'fellow-subjects,' though 'rebels,' one cannot help wondering whether the people who express and applaud such sentiments have quite forgotten the most essential principles of that constitutional liberty which our fathers have bought so dearly, on many a hard fought field. 'Ah, what a pity' writes, in a similar connection, 'Looker-On' in our Tory 'Blackwood,' that patriotism can be so atrociously mouthed and parodied and marketed as it often is.'

Those sentiments, Sir, are worthy sentiments. The question is: Whether we are forgetting our British principles. That is to say, are we forgetting that we are free to speak our own minds.

Sir, some of the Liberal papers have been quoted, and misquoted. I have no desire to quote all the French papers of the province of Quebec which have written on the question, but I hope some one will do it. In point of fact, if you start from Ottawa to the extreme limits of the province of Quebec, you will not find one single paper with the exception of Le Soleil which has not expressed the view that we must not take part in Imperial wars, without expecting opposition, papers of both political parties in the province of Quebec have taken that stand. Whether it is right or wrong, it is the stand that has been taken. Now, Mr. Speaker, the province of Quebec is a loyal province, essentially a loyal province; and no truer words were ever put in His Excellency's speech than these words:

Hostilities having unfortunately broken out during recess between Great Britain and the South African Republic, it appeared to my ministers expedient to anticipate the action of parliament by equipping and forwarding two contingents of volunteers to the seat of war as a practical evidence of the profound devotion and loyalty of the entire people of Canada to the Sovereign and institutions of the British Empire.

I call attention to the words 'as a practical evidence of the profound devotion of the people of Canada to the Sovereign and the institutions of the British Empire.' Although the vast majority of the French Canadians felt and believed that it would have been better to call parliament, they consented, and their representatives in the government consented to the sending of these troops in order to give a practical evidence of our devotion and loyalty to the Sovereign and to the institutions of the British Empire. In a country of different races like this, we cannot always carry our views. It is out of the question. You must give and take. It is only on this very condition that we may hope to establish a nation here. It is not by accusing each other of disloyalty that we will make of Canada a great nation. The French Canadians will not lose patience and will not be driven into disloyalty by the accusations hurled against them. They know too much about past history, and they understand too well the future that they have before them. They will stand by their British rights. They will stand by the constitution that has been established with their consent, with their participation and with their approval. Canada is our home. It is the home of French Canadians perhaps more than the home of our English friends. When an Englishman starts for England, he says: I am going home, but when a French Canadian like myself starts for France, I do not say I am going home; I say: I am going to France; because France is not my home; Canada is my home. Many of our English friends when they have gained large fortunes settle in England and become practically Englishmen. They live in England; they like to live in England, but the greatest ambition of a French Canadian who has emigrated to another land is to come and live and die on this Canadian soil of ours.

The eminent leader of the opposition thought fit to say that I opposed very strenuously the sending of troops, but that when I saw that my portfolio was in danger, I surrendered my views in order to keep my position. Mr. Speaker, that is not accurate. I like political life; I do enjoy a political fight, but in my present state of mind and of health, the Prime Minister would have no trouble at all in getting rid of me; not the slightest trouble. But, Sir, I would not go back upon my colleagues in this crisis.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, not by any means. I would rather give up my own personal views for the sake of keeping my country in peace and harmony, and for the purpose of preventing the possibility of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House raising a crusade against my race. A man is not a very big thing after all. My services could be dispensed with. I could be replaced. There are in the Liberal party many men who would fill my position better than I. But, Sir, I say it again, I have not the slightest temptation to create embarrassment and trouble in the midst of this important crisis. I am sure that my course has not been detrimental to the public interest. The office which I hold—and in saying this I shall be borne out by those who have preceded me in it—is not always a sinecure. I do not know many men who have gained peace, pleasure and fortune in this position. I see on the opposition benches men who have spent twenty or twenty-five years in public life. Let them tell me how they stand to-day. Let them tell me if they are much better off than they were twenty-five years ago. I know of only one man who is perhaps better off, and that is the eminent baronet who leads the opposition.

One last word. The hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. McInerney) thought proper to give some friendly advice to the French Canadian race. I thank him for his good offices; but at the same time I beg him to believe that we can take care of ourselves pretty well. When I see an Englishman loyal to England, I quite understand that; when I meet a French Canadian loyal to England, I quite understand that ; we have our liberties and we enjoy our liberties ; but when I hear an Irishman assert himself as more loyal than the Queen, I say there is something very wrong in his heart.

Mr. BEATTIE. You see one right here now.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Stand up ; let us have a look at you.

Mr. CASGRAIN. What about the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to detain the House any longer, and I thank it for the kind consideration with which it has listened to me.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). Mr. Speaker, I believe you will admit with me that we have listened to a most extraordinary speech ; we have been the witnesses of a most extraordinary spectacle—a minister of the Crown (Mr. Tarte) who has been obliged for an hour and a half or two hours to excuse the position he has taken against his colleagues. I want to say immediately that if I am rising to follow the hon. gentleman, I do not want the House or anybody to be under the impression that I make it my special duty to answer him. It just happens so. I intended to answer the speech made by the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) this afternoon, but lost my opportunity. To show that I have nothing personal against the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), the hon. gentleman commenced his speech by saying that the Conservative party, or gentlemen on this side of the House, were sorry that his death had not happened so as to keep him out of parliament. He said he was our only programme, and he thought that if he had not come here we would be at a loss. Let me tell the hon. gentleman, for his family first of all, for himself secondarily, and for his friends afterwards, and particularly for every Conservative in the Dominion of Canada, we pray that he may not die now. He has not done his work yet ; he must do it to the end, and the party with which he is associated must feel its effects before he is called on to go and enjoy that place which he spoke of a few moments ago. The hon. gentleman has been accused by the honoured chief of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), and afterwards by my hon. friend on my right (Mr. Foster), of many things which I thought he would have been happy to answer to ; but he has not done so. He has promised to do so on another occasion. But he has denied a great many of the things which he has said at public meetings or which he has published in his newspaper. We are accustomed to that. The hon. gentleman can say anything or write anything, and if it does not do, he can say afterwards that he did not say so or did not write so ; and if we try to force him, he says he signs all his articles. We all know that he has signed some of his articles, but a great many of them have never been signed ; and it is no answer in such a serious discussion as we are having on this occasion, for the hon. gentleman to say that he is not responsible for articles that are not signed with his name. But, Sir, this is not new. It is impossible—and I call on his colleagues to say whether I am speaking the truth or not—to catch the hon. gentleman. It is impossible to put your hand upon him ; he is too quick for his colleagues or anybody else ; he is away a long time before the others are struck with the consequences of his acts, and nobody knows that better than the gentlemen who sit with him around the Council board. He has told us that he is not the proprietor of La Patrie of Montreal, but that his sons are ; and he says he hopes they will be successful in the line of business which they have chosen. He says he thinks there is a chip of the old block in them. If there is, it is not a good omen, for every newspaper the hon. gentleman has edited in the last thirty years has gone to ruin, and I hope these young men will not suffer the same fate. The hon. gentleman has killed not only the papers with which he has been connected, but the political friends he has had, and he is doing that today on a mighty scale. I heard my hon. friend say, 'I am a French Canadian.' He has said so in his papers and in public meetings, and he repeated the same thing here. If I wanted to read from newspapers, I would read from the Le Soleil of Quebec, which criticised the hon. gentleman for uttering such words. What is the use of a man saying, I am a French Canadian, I am an Irish Canadian, I am an English Canadian, or I am a Scotch Canadian ? It is by the use of such expressions that you prevent the unification of this country. Why not call ourselves all Canadians ? We have a great example in this respect in the people of the republic to the south. How is it they have come to be as they are ? They include people from every nation in the world ; but they all call themselves simply Americans, and they have made a great republic. We should do the same thing here, and if we did we would avoid many evils, instead of following the example of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. The hon. gentleman referred to the time when he was in Paris and had a meeting with Mr. Delcassé, the French Minister of Foreign Affairs, and to the most extraordinary answer which that gentleman gave him. Mr. Delcassé said to him, 'No, no, you had better stay as you are.' Is it possible that the hon. gentleman was trying to make some arrangement with Mr. Delcassé to transfer the province of Quebec to the French nation ? We would infer that from his answer, for Mr. Delcassé said, 'No, no, remain as you are.' The hon. gentleman's speech was extraordinary in another respect. He has seen fit to answer most of the things he said at the beginning. He read here what was said by a Protestant minister in some church in Ottawa, and which was republished in La Patrie, following its policy of publishing everything said in any part of Canada, not against the province of Quebec, not against French Canadians, but in reply to what was published in his own paper in the city of Montreal. What is the sense of publishing those things? Why, we know that in every province in this Dominion there are jingoes, people who lack what I would call the essential quality of patriotism. But what should we do with those? Why, we should purely and simply ignore them as much as possible. We should not reproduce in the province of Quebec what the jingoes of Ontario or any other province are saying, and in the other provinces what the jingoes of Quebec are saying, but purely and simply ignore those people altogether, if we want ever to make a united nation out of this Dominion of ours.

We have, I am happy to say, no fanaticism in the province of Quebec. If there is any fanaticism shown at times, it is shown by men like the hon. gentleman: occupying high positions and writing articles like those which were published in La Patrie at the beginning of October, 1899. As an evidence of what little fanaticism there is in the province of Quebec, I might give an example of what has taken place in my own county. In the town of Beauharnois, where there are not more than 200 English-speaking Protestants, we have had a Protestant mayor, and he would be still in office if he wished to continue holding it. In Valleyfield, a city of 10,000 people, where there are certainly not more than 500 Protestants, for five years they have had an English Protestant mayor; and if you had dared put the question: How is it that you have a Protestant for mayor? our people would have laughed at you, and said: What do we care, so long as he is a good mayor and fills the office well. I say it is a crime for a man occupying the position of the Minister of Public Works to be stirring up those people, and striving to do away with the happy state of things which we now enjoy in that province.

Mr. WALLACE. It is his whole stock in trade.

Mr. BERGERON. Yes, it is the stock in trade of the Minister of Public Works unfortunately. The hon. gentleman—and in a few moments I am going to give, according to my own views, the whole of that case of the Transvaal as it happens to be looked upon in our province—said that there had been twenty-three wars of England since confederation, and that we had never been called upon to take part in any one of them. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that he then happened to be a follower of the late Sir John Macdonald and of Sir Charles Tupper, the present leader of the opposition. The hon. gentleman says that we were not called upon to do anything towards helping the British Empire in those twenty-three wars, and he added that he had been taught in that school. But a few moments later he said that none of those wars had been as disastrous as the present one in the Transvaal. But there is one thing he forgot to say, and that is that we had not until 1897 a Prime Minister who had the honour, which our present Prime Minister enjoyed, of taking part in the great festivities of the Jubilee in London. And when later on, the hon. gentleman spoke of the circular sent round the different colonies by Mr. Chamberlain, let me ask him was that to be wondered at after the speeches delivered by the right hon. Premier and the Premiers of the other colonies at the Jubilee in 1897. That was the first time when a Canadian Prime Minister—and I am not blaming him for that, but am saying, simply, what happened—declared before all the Premiers of the different colonies in the British Empire, at the heart of the British Empire, that whenever anything would happen to that British Empire, that whenever the British flag would be threatened, if they would light the fires on the hills and sound the trumpets, men and money would come from Canada to help that British flag and empire. That brings me to one point, and it is this, that it was a blessing these troubles happened in the Transvaal under the regime of the Liberals in this Dominion. It was a blessing that they have occurred when a Premier from the province of Quebec, a Liberal Premier, had the helm, because if a Conservative had been at the head of public affairs in this country and had found himself in the same position as that in which the right hon. gentleman stood after his declaration at London, the Liberal party in Quebec, which is not as loyal as the Solicitor General says this afternoon it is, would have raised such a row in that province that it might have excited bitter racial feelings which would have lasted for years to come.

Has the hon. gentleman forgotten that the Liberal organ of the city of Quebec, Le Soleil, which was opposed to the sending of the contingent, had issued in 1896 that famous circular, of which the hon. Minister of Public Works must have been well aware, because it was spoken of in my county, calling on the people to vote against old Tupper and in favour of Laurier, if they did not want their sons to be sent to fight in Africa and Asia for the British flag. That circular was issued by Le Soleil, which has done everything in its power to excite racial hostilities and raise racial cries and jealousies in the province of Quebec, because such has been the stock in trade of the Liberal party in that province for years past. They never had any other policy. I heard the hon. member for the division of St. James, Montreal (Mr. Desmarais) denounce in most eloquent terms the purchase of rifles by the late government. He depicted what a terrible thing it was for the late government to have spent $3,000,000—the amount was $1,300,000, but a million or two does not make any difference when on the hustings—in buying rifles. What a calamity it was, he exclaimed, in thrilling tones, for Canada to have spent so much money in buying rifles. And buying them for what purpose? There were ladies at that meeting, and when he told them it was for the purpose of putting those rifles into the hands of their sons and sending them off to Asia and South Africa to shed their blood for the empire, in wars in which they had no interest, those tender-hearted people imagined that they saw their sons leaving and were naturally very much affected. But, he told them, the remedy was in their own hands. If you want, he said, to avoid that calamity, vote for Laurier, a French Canadian Premier and your children will not be sent to Asia or South Africa, but do not vote for Tupper. I am sure that the hon. Minister of Public Works remembered that appeal when he advised the First Minister to study the constitution, as he did in that famous interview given in the Toronto Globe.

I repeat that no Canadian Premier had ever done what was done by the present First Minister during the Jubilee of 1897, and it was no wonder then that we should not have been called on before that year to send any contingent from Canada to take part in any of those twenty-three wars which occurred before that period. The hon. Minister of Public Works admitted himself in the course of his speech that this is a dreadful war. He did not go so far as the First Minister, who said it was a righteous war. The hon. gentleman admitted that it is a bloody war, probably the worst the British Empire has had to face during the present century; and, therefore, it is not to be wondered at that the different colonies, after the promises made at the Jubilee, should be called on to give value to those promises, and do what they then promised. The hon. minister said he was never known to show the white feather. I have heard that before at public meetings, and I have seen it in his paper, and we have heard it two or three times here. He wants people to believe he is brave. I have never looked upon him as a brave, but as a bold man—and there is a great deal of difference between the two. If he were a brave man, he would not be in the position he occupies in relation to two hon. gentlemen who spoke before him. When the vote is taken, we shall see the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Monet) and the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) voting on one side and the hon. Minister of Public Works, voting on the other, yet they have been on the same side in this question. They have studied the same literature. We had all three of them reading out of the same book. Now, it is hard to keep track of the varied utterances of these gentlemen on the platform and in the press, and it is a good thing we have parliament, where these matters can be discussed. For instance La Patrie said on the 11th or 12th of October—in those days there was an article on the subject nearly every day—that there was no offer of a contingent, that volunteers were going to support the British flag, and we could not prevent them. I think the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) said at Sherbrooke, that England had not asked for any men from Canada, and would not dare to do such a thing, but the contingent was a spontaneous offer from Canada. One of these statements must be wrong. Le Soleil, which so strongly denounced the purchase of the rifles, has not had so much to say since these rifles were paid for by the present government, and the government spent $100,000 besides for guns. They denounced these dangers of sending our children to fight in Africa or Asia. But they now turn around and say that, after all, we cannot help it; that the Premier is a French Canadian, and if he had not sent the contingent, the Governor General would have called upon Tupper, a Protestant Premier, to lead the country; and, to have the honour of having a French Canadian Premier, we had better acquiesce and send the contingent. And then, after all, it says, look at the quantities of potatoes we shall sell; look at the quantity of hay we shall sell; look at all the money that will come into Canada to pay for the blood of a few young men, who, if they will sacrifice their lives, cannot be prevented. My right honourable friend when he spoke on a previous occasion, spoke of the reptile press. What did he mean? As I understand it the reptile press, is that which feeds at the trough of the government. The hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville, also said something about that. I wish to congratulate the hon. gentleman on his speech. I may not agree with him, and the House may not share his opinion, but he has spoken out in a manly way. I like a man who says what he feels, and I think that such a man carries more weight with the public and wins more of the public respect than one who expresses one opinion to-day and another to-morrow. We had a case of that in Montreal, a day or two after the government took their position on this question. Gentlemen who thought that La Patrie would lead them straight and carry its point against the government, declared that the government would not send a contingent, that it would not dare to do so, and if it did it would lose their support—and two days afterwards they were signing a paper congratulating the Premier on having sent that contingent. The hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville did nothing of that kind, and deserves to be congratulated. But he spoke of the newspapers that changed their opinion. Now, I find a list in the Auditor General's report, which gives some information with regard to certain newspapers as to the amount received by them from the government for advertising:

Montreal 'Herald'	$15,008
St. John 'Telegraph'	7,005
Moncton 'Transcript'	6,701
Halifax 'Chronicle'	5,373
Halifax 'Recorder'	3,118
Toronto 'Globe'	2,529
St. John 'Globe'	2,237
St. John 'Gazette'	2,205
Quebec 'Telegraph'	2,075
Montreal 'Patrie'	1,678
Regina 'Leader'	1,141
Quebec 'Soleil'	1,032
Hamilton 'Times'	991
Ottawa 'Free Press'	800
Montreal 'Witness'	694
London 'Advertiser'	638

Now, when the right hon. gentleman talks of the reptile press, surely he does not wish to throw odium on the people who support him. But, if there is a reptile press in this country, it seems to me, it must be made up of those newspapers that feed at the government crib. Surely they are not reptile newspapers that express their own opinions and live by their own honesty and industry. The hon. Minister of Public Works mentioned the Montreal Star. That newspaper does not get anything from the government, and its opinion is a perfectly independent opinion. The hon. gentleman made a gratuitous accusation against Mr. Graham that his motives were interested. It will be hard for him to prove such a thing. But the hon. gentleman wants to crawl out from the hole in which he has put himself. Before I leave this subject I wish to say that we have witnessed a sad spectacle—that of General Hutton leaving under a cloud, so to speak. Hon. gentlemen here looked to find what was the cause of the general's departure. Had they consulted La Patrie, of the 6th of October, at which time the Minister of Public Works was still a master of the administration, they would have found this:

The article published in the 'Military Gazette,' which says that the government considers it a criminal act to entrust to Canadian officers the command of a Canadian contingent, is severely condemned in ministerial circles. The government has too much respect for the Canadian Militia to give utterance to such an opinion.

I regret to learn—

'I' regret —that the inspiration of this insulting article is attributed here to Gen. Hutton. I hope he will repudiate it. Gen. Hutton is in the pay of the government of this country. I think if he intends to remain in Canada, he would do well to remember that he is not the master of our destinies. Gen. Hutton wants to go to Africa himself, I am told.

We know now what was done—that the authorities in England were simply called upon to invite General Hutton to go to the Transvaal or somewhere else, and he has gone. Now, the Minister of Public Works made a statement, which I have heard before in this House, and have never heard denied, that in 1885 a demand was made by the home authorities on the Canadian government, through General Laurie, for troops to help the home government in some war in which they were engaged, and that there was no answer. Let me remind the House that in 1885 our troops were kept in Canada for a purpose, they were very much needed, because my right hon. friend was going to give them some hard work in the North-west.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I think I had the help of my hon. friend too.

Mr. BERGERON. But I never threatened to shoot anybody. Now the Minister of Public Works said, after speaking of the Montreal Star and other papers which do not share his opinions, and of course he does not approve of them—he said the government should not yield to popular clamour. Now, where does he find himself? I believe myself that the government should not yield to popular clamour, but the right hon. gentleman said they had yielded to popular clamour. He gave an interview to a paper in which he said that they could not send troops, that they had no right to send troops, that they could not get any money without the authority of parliament. What made the right hon. gentleman go back upon that opinion? That was the time for the Minister of Public Works, if, as he says, he had never shown the white feather, to exert his pressure upon the Premier, and prevent him from yielding to popular clamour. Perhaps the Minister of Public Works would have had to abandon his friends. I do not believe there would have been many Liberals going into mourning in the province of Quebec if the hon. gentleman had abandoned his friends. I think there were two or three ready to jump into his boots the next morning, and would have been happy to agree to anything the government asked of them, and the hon. gentleman knows it. But he preferred to come out to-day in the most extraordinary way and excuse himself. We have a proverb in French which says qui s'excuse s'accuse. That is to say, he who excuses himself condemns himself, and I think the hon. gentleman has been doing that for the last hour and a half. Now, the hon. gentleman said there was no enthusiasm in Quebec. Why does he say that, after the speeches of the Premier having been published through the province of Quebec without a dissenting voice having been raised? Nobody said the right hon. gentleman should not have made the offer to England. When he said that whenever anything happened to the British flag Canada could be relied upon to help her, nobody said anything against that. When there was a motion carried unanimously in this House supporting England against the Transvaal, nobody in Quebec said a word against it. The hon. gentleman wound up his speech by saying that Quebec was loyal. Nobody says the contrary, both sides of the House are in perfect accord in declaring that the province of Quebec and the French Canadians are loyal, so there is no use saying anything more about that. If there is anybody in Quebec who is not loyal, it is the man who edits La Patrie. That is the man who began to scatter among the French Canadians ideas that he should have kept to himself. Le Journal of Montreal is a French paper, and what a row there would have been if the Conservative press or the Conservative members of parliament had raised the cry which has been raised by La Patrie and the Minister of Public Works. But we did nothing of the sort, and there was no occasion to do so. When the hon. gentleman says that there is no enthusiasm in Quebec, I want to give him an example to the contrary. In the month of October, after having gone down into the maritime provinces with my hon. friend on my right (Mr. Foster), and having uttered there my sentiments upon the current events, La Patrie, the organ of the hon. gentleman, challenged me to repeat in Montreal what I had said in the maritime provinces. A large meeting was called in the Monument National by a Conservative club, and I went there and repeated what I had said in New Brunswick; and these people, all French Canadians of Montreal, most of them working men, men who could be easily inflamed by the utterances of La Patrie, when they heard the reasons that were given to them justifying the action of the government in sending troops to the Transvaal to help the mother country, when they were told that these men who were going were all volunteers, and that the government would assist them to go to defend the British flag under which they had been living happily for 150 years, a unanimous cheer went up in that hall from the 2,000 French Canadians present, and there was unanimous approval of the position taken by the government and sanctioned by the Conservative party. But the hon. gentleman, a minister of the Crown, a man called upon to direct public opinion, says that there is no enthusiasm in Quebec! That is his own opinion, an opinion which he has written in his paper, and that is the opinion which he opposed to the opinions of his colleagues. But to-day—I do not know if it is really true that in a few days he is going to leave for Paris—to-day he has crawled out and tried to make the people believe on the eve of his departure that Quebec is loyal; and the only conclusion that can be drawn from his own words is that if there is any disloyal person in Quebec it is himself.

Now, the hon. gentleman said a very indelicate thing on the hustings at St. Vincent de Paul, and committed an indelicate action when he showed to the people a copy of an Order in Council—like what he did here when he made the public judges of the difficulties which have been going on in the Privy Council. I have been here for a good many years, and this is the first time that I have ever heard of what happened in council. When the government come out of the Council Chamber they are as one man. The public should not know what has transpired within the walls of the Red Chamber. The hon. gentleman went to St. Vincent de Paul, and showed a document which he said was an Order in Council containing the words that the action of the government in sending the first contingent should not be a precedent. In Sherbrooke he said that Sir Charles Tupper, the leader of the opposition, was the cause of all the trouble; and he also said what he has just repeated in this House, that the Conservatives were raising the cry that we had a French Canadian Premier. Mr. Speaker, let me tell you that I have been in the maritime provinces, and I have been in Toronto and other places in Ontario, and nowhere did I hear a single word said against the right hon. gentleman because he is a French Canadian. I have heard people opposing his policy, but I never heard one man say that he was opposed to the right hon. gentleman because he is a French Canadian. If the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), who comes from Toronto had taken the position which was first taken by the Premier, he would have been criticised in Ontario and everywhere else. I must say that the position taken by Canada on that occasion was a most humiliating one. I have personally a great deal of esteem for the Premier, but I am sorry to say that after the position he had taken at the jubilee, after the position he had taken in asking parliament to vote unanimously an address of sympathy for the British government, I was sorry to see that, although he was first at the jubilee, he was last in offering the services of Canada to the mother country. The Minister of Public Works says that the leader of the opposition is the real cause of all that has taken place. But is it surprising? I may be mistaken, but it seems to me that the Minister of Public Works has been defending the Boers in this House with the book he had in his hand, saying they were right, saying that he agreed with Mr. Bryce, and Mr. Morley, and two or three other English gentlemen, who do not count for much, because they were overwhelmingly defeated in the English parliament. He forgets that these men he mentions were not members of the British government, they are only members of parliament. The member for Napierville (Mr. Monet) and the member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) can take that position, but no minister of the Crown in England has taken the position that the Minister of Public Works has taken in this House. Now the hon. gentleman has expressed a very extraordinary opinion. I said a few moments ago that we could not put our hands upon the hon. gentleman. He changes his opinions so suddenly that we cannot catch him. In Quebec he was opposed to the sending of a Canadian contingent; in Quebec he thought it was ridiculous to see the Canadian government doing anything of the sort, but when it was proposed he sought to crawl out of the hole in which he had placed himself by saying that he was opposed to doing such a thing without calling parliament together. We afterwards witnessed him passing censure on his colleagues for not calling parliament together before sending the second contingent. Now, he says that he does not want to have anything decided by Great Britain unless we are consulted, and he would like to see the right hon. Prime Minister of this country sitting at the Council Board of England. I do not want to hurt the feelings of the hon. gentleman, but I think this is childish, particularly after what we have heard this afternoon. The hon. Minister of Public Works, who is known all over the world as the master of this administration, left this country, accompanied by Sir Sandford Fleming, and went to England to decide a question that was decided before they went there. It was announced that he was going to settle the Pacific cable question, but everything was settled when he arrived there. Yet, he would like to see the right hon. Prime Minister sitting at the Council Board of Great Britain. Does he think that the right hon. gentleman would rule the whole British Empire by sitting at the Council Board, or that he would, like the hon. Minister of Public Works, rule the Council Board or get out of it? I say once more that the hon. gentleman is purely and simply saying something which is childish. Now, the hon. gentleman says that the English press all over the country is hostile to Quebec. I deny it. It is a sad thing to be obliged to discuss these matters on the floor of parliament. It is true that there are people of narrow ideas in every province, but surely we do not expect these people to rule. We cannot do away with them; we have to allow them to live, but we can ignore them in the English provinces as well as in the French provinces, and if such articles were not published by La Patrie in Montreal in answer to these papers in the English provinces such discussions would not arise. If the hon. Minister of Public Works is sincere in his remarks in wishing that an end should be put to controversies of this nature in this country, let him put a stop to the publication of his own articles in La Patrie, and let him cease from reprinting such articles published in the English press. The hon. gentleman has pursued this course both upon the hustings and in his paper. I do not want to refer to his paper, but I am very much surprised, and I may tell the hon. gentleman why I am surprised. I heard the hon. gentleman not very long ago, use the most eulogistic language in regard to the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper). I know that the hon. Minister of Public Works used to be an admirer of the hon. leader of the opposition, and he has written many eulogistic articles and good articles, too, in regard to him. But look at La Patrie to-day and see how bitterly it attacks the hon. leader of the opposition, a man in his seventy-ninth year, who has been for forty-five years in public life, who has been exposed to the criticisms of his opponents and of the press of this country, yet who is a public man who stands high to-day in the estimation of the people of this country, a man who is respected even by his opponents. I only wish that my hon. friends opposite who are in the government to-day will live to be as old, and that they will enjoy the same degree of popularity and of public respect that the hon. leader of the opposition enjoys to-day in the Dominion of Canada. Now, I may be permitted to read an article published by an independent paper in the province of Quebec, which has been provoked by the articles of La Patrie and by some of the speeches delivered in the House of Commons. It is entitled 'The Loyalty of the French Canadians.' I hope the House will bear with me for a few moments: it is not very long, but I think it is worth being put on Hansard, so that it will be available in future in case that such a discussion arises again. It is from La Presse, and is as follows:—

The Loyalty of the French Canadians.

The loyalty of the French Canadians and Cæsar's wife will soon become synonymous, both must be above reproach. The pages which Conservative leaders and Liberal leaders alike have just added to the columns of 'Hansard,' belong henceforth to history, and our nationality has attained in the great book an unassailable position; and thus, in truth, does the logic of events utilize to good purpose in the interest of truth, the schemes of designing knaves. Supreme efforts were put forth in order to belittle us; and lo! we have gained in stature. The foul charges flung broadcast by the 'News' have simply served to nourish the roots of that precious plant, 'the truth,' and cause it to flourish and bear fruit. Sir Charles Tupper, Sir Richard Cartwright and Hon. G. E. Foster spoke with deep and heartfelt conviction in generous language which we can never forget; and if we dwell specially upon one of them it is not that we set less store upon the declarations of the others; but the venerable Conservative chief has been assailed directly, and made the subject of the vilest insinuations, to which, however, we are indebted for his most eloquent profession of faith. We feel justified in assuring him on behalf of our people that it was not at all needed; but it did not fail to touch them deeply nevertheless.

Sir Charles Tupper has completed forty-five years of active service in political life. Never has the faintest tinge of fanaticism darkened his long and brilliant career. It was left to the infamous 'Free Press,' the unflinching advocate of all the persecutions suffered by the Catholics of Manitoba, to hold up the venerable statesman to the hatred of the French Canadians. The scheme has not succeeded; for the whole world knows the breadth of view, the magnanimity, the unfailing impartiality with which Sir Charles has ever treated the several races in the different medley which constitutes the Dominion of Canada. We have never been able to discern in him a difference of sentiment, a shade of preference, in favour of his own people to the detriment of ours; and so marked has this delicacy ever been in his bearing, that he invariably takes as much pleasure in the society of French Canadians as in that of his own countrymen. We gladly avail ourselves of this opportunity to record these facts.

Sir Charles was justified in alluding to the several periods of his life when his bearing towards our people was most strikingly manifested. He recalled, for instance, the Cartier incident in 1867, when the Queen made Mr. John A. Macdonald a Knight, and Mr. George E. Cartier a simple Companion of the Bath. This unfortunate distinction had too much the appearance of a plot at Rideau Hall. The writer of these lines was beside Mr. Cartier when drafting his protest, in company with Mr. A. T. Galt, Minister of Finance. Some of the documents in this matter are to-day embodied in the blue-books; but the private file, of far greater interest than the part submitted to the public, has remained with the private papers of Sir George. We remember seeing, amongst others, on Sir George's desk, two remarkable letters, one from Mr. Archibald (afterwards Lieutenant Governor of Manitoba, and at the time Secretary of State), and the other from Sir Charles Tupper. The latter showed genuine feeling, emphatically protesting against the injustice committed, and placing the writer's services at Cartier's disposal in securing redress.

It was the expression of the sentiments of a sincere and magnanimous mind. And the event proved that it was not a mere expression of conventional courtesy and superficial proffer of service, for Cartier very soon was made a Baronet. Mr. Tupper, who had refrained from even accepting a portfolio in order to promote the confederation of the provinces, from the very first, by stepping aside in favour of a certain active, turbulent and dangerous element, was for all of us, comparatively unknown as a political man. The high expression of confidence in him, the testimony borne to his true and genuine friendship, in the most earnest conversation which took place between Cartier and Galt, left on our mind an impression which nothing which has since occurred has had the effect of diminishing. It is manifest that if Mr. Tupper had then been acting from interested motives he would have paid court to the Prime Minister, Sir J. A. Macdonald, for he himself was then but a simple member, and without a following in the House.

We are also in a position to bear witness to his sincerity when, in or about the year 1883, Sir John A. Macdonald, on being called to the Privy Council of Great Britain, thought of surrendering the reins of government—we hold it from a colleague of Sir Charles Tupper, who was then Mons. J. A. Chapleau, that at a quasi-official meeting he had just left, Sir Charles had emphatically declared his unwillingness to accept the succession so long as Sir Hector Langevin remained in active political life. 'Sir Hector is my senior in the politics of Canada,' he said, 'and the position belongs to him.'

We shall add a third instance derived from personal recollection, showing the deep interest Sir Charles takes in the French Canadian people. It may be quite positively asserted that the treaty of commerce between Canada and France was simply an act of courtesy towards the French Canadians; for the other provinces and nationalities were quite indifferent about it. Year after year, with unflinching persistence and energy did Sir Charles labour at this work, which failed in 1880 and 1881, and again in 1883. We were then with him in Paris, and perforce are witness of his efforts, for it was our task to translate English into French and French into English, and especially to translate conversations of still greater importance than documents. The difficulties were innumerable for the English Ambassador, Lord Lyons, put every possible obstacle in the way—doing it most diplomatically, of course, while the French government, hampered by the everlasting most-favoured-nation clause did not feel themselves in a position to make the smallest concession to Canada. Sir Charles would then, with a heavy heart, set out once more for London, where, though a Canadian minister, he was acting as High Commissioner, but the following week would see him back again in Paris armed with fresh arguments; if ever tenacity of purpose was entitled to admiration that was surely earned by him in this most desperate struggle, during which he had to cross and recross the channel six times in one month's time. One day, when the prospect was more gloomy than ever before, turning towards us, he exclaimed, 'Tell those gentlemen that what I am asking of them is for Frenchmen like themselves.'

These words, burning as they fell with fervour and enthusiasm, carried the day, and then and there the broad outlines of the treaty were adopted. But, unfortunately, on the very next day, Sir John Macdonald cabled to Sir Charles to return to Canada forthwith. The question of giving the Canadian Pacific Railway Company the government guarantee of thirty million dollars had to be dealt with, for the very existence of that great undertaking was at stake. Governments changed rapidly in France. The opportunity was lost, and it took Sir Charles, who had gone away greatly disappointed and grieved—the further unceasing labour of ten additional years to attain, at last, the end he so ardently and so disinterestedly sought to accomplish. For he it was who in the end brought to a close all the negotiations of 1893-94-95.

Whenever it is asserted in any quarter that Sir Charles Tupper has spoken ill of the French Canadian people it may be taken for granted that the very opposite is the truth.

The discussion in parliament last week was marked by another incident which we also desire to mention. Sir Adolphe Caron availed himself of the opportunity when he was leading the opposition to make in behalf of his Conservative fellow-countrymen, an eloquent and manly profession of sincere and enlightened loyalty. We heartily congratulate him not merely on his personal success, which for a politician is a matter of most legitimate and most enviable satisfaction, but more especially on the genuine applause with which both sides of the House greeted his patriotic address. We owe thanks to Sir Adolphe Caron for having succeeded in getting into 'Hansard' the lengthy and valuable letter of Mr. Begin to Mgr. Bruchesi, on French Canadian loyalty. Hereafter, racial difficulties and national friction may arise in one part or another of our great country, and should it so happen, our children will find in the report of the debates of February, 1900, a store of serviceable arms wherewith to avenge their honour, as we have avenged ours. French Canadian loyalty will never change, so long as it shall be controlled by religion; for the Catholic Church does not vary, where justice and duty are involved.

That it may be shown, once and for all, that the loyalty of the French Canadian clergy is no mere lip loyalty, we here give the prayer read daily by every priest, aloud before the people at the conclusion of Mass; we first give the Latin text :

Oremus.

Quaesumus, omnipotens Deus, ut famula tua, Nostra Regina, quae tua miseratione, suscepit regni gubernacula virtutum etiam omnium percipiat incrementa quibus decenter ornata, et vitiarum monstra devitare et ad te, quivia, veritas et vita es, gratiosa valeat pervenire. Per Christum Dominum Nostrum. Amen.

Let us Pray.

We beseech Thee, Almighty God, that Thy servant, our Queen, who through Thy goodness hath taken charge of this Kingdom, may receive the reward of all the virtues wherewith she is adorned, avoid the foulness of vice, of being loaded with Thy favours, attain unto Thee, who art the way, the truth and the life. Through Christ Our Lord. Amen.

In justice to the leader of the opposition I thought it necessary to place this on Hansard as Sir Charles Tupper's defence against the speeches of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), and his writings in his organ. The latter part of that able article shows that the Catholic clergy of Canada are not only lip loyal as it has been asserted, but that they entertain feelings of profound loyalty to the British Empire.

I now come to deal with the remarks of the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), and with the loyalty of the Liberal party. I do not want to say that all the loyalty in Canada belongs to the Conservative party.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BERGERON. I might say so, but I want to give them the benefit of the doubt, and so I will not place that assertion on record. I might remind the House of the speech of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) and although I do not put my hon. friend from Napierville (Mr. Monet) on the same footing, yet it is also true that he has spoken adversely to the policy of the government on this matter. But, Sir, let me remind the House that for the last twenty years the Liberal party in the province of Quebec have done nothing but to raise race and religious questions in order to retain power. The Minister of Public Works spoke about the school question this afternoon, but we on this side do not want to raise that question before the House. We have had enough of it. We all know the position taken by the Liberal party on that question in the province of Quebec. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) seems to forget some things, but as has been said the whole stock in trade is to use that question whenever he thinks it will help him. Does the minister (Mr. Tarte) know that La Patrie is asking every now and then: Will Mr. Hugh John Macdonald settle the Manitoba school question?

Mr. BERGERON.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Because you said it was not settled.

Mr. BERGERON. La Patrie seems to keep that heading standing in type and they say: Let the people of Quebec ask Hugh John Macdonald to settle the school question. What does the Minister of Public Works think of that, when La Patrie said three years ago that the school question was settled? And what about the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux)? He not only said it was settled, but if he is reported correctly he told the people in the Pelletier Hall at Sherbrooke, that not only was the Manitoba school question settled, but that His Holiness the Pope, had written a letter of congratulation to the Prime Minister for settling it in the manner he had.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Will the hon. gentleman allow me? I shall have to correct him by stating that I never said such a thing. I never bring the name of the Pope into any public discussion.

Mr. CASGRAIN. We will have to get a stenographer next time.

Mr. BERGERON. Of course under the rules of the House I will have to take the answer of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux). When the Conservatives have their meetings alone, as they had in Sherbrooke, we had the press present of both political parties, and the meetings were public. But when the Liberals had their meetings, they did not allow the Conservative press to be present, and as they control the Liberal press, we could not find out what they said, unless we sent some one specially there for that purpose. I had some of my friends attend the meeting which was addressed by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux), because I know that at any meeting where he is uncontrolled he unscrews his tongue and lets it go free.

Now, the hon. gentleman says that he never said so, and according to the rules of the House, I am obliged to accept his denial; but I am very glad that I brought the subject up, because outsiders who listened to the hon. gentleman, will be able to judge for themselves. The hon. Minister of Public Works in his paper, as well as in this House, speaks of the Conservative party as a party of fanatics. Not a day passes without La Patrie bringing out an article on the fanaticism of the Conservative party. It is not for the Minister of Public Works to talk of fanaticism—a man who has been a firebrand all his life, both in our party and out of it. In that party he did the same kind of work he is doing to-day; he contributed largely to the injury of the party, and it was a good thing when he accepted our invitation to pass to the other side. The hon. gentleman is to-day bringing against the Conservative party the same charge that he brought against the Liberal party in the old times.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS.
(Mr. Tarte). May God bless you.

Mr. BERGERON. I am afraid that prayer will not find its way above. The hon. gentleman says that the Conservative party is a party of fanatics. The hon. gentleman must remember what happened in 1896. The hon. gentleman has spoken of Orangemen, and La Patrie writes every other day of the Orangemen of Ontario. This is the way the hon. gentleman brings harmony into this country. Does he not know that the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) declared, when sitting on this side of the House, that there were Orangemen on both sides of politics? There are Liberal Orangemen and Conservative Orangemen. I may say that there are good Orangemen and bad Orangemen. There are some who voted with us in 1896, to give justice to the minority in Manitoba, and there are some who voted against us, and with the Prime Minister and the Minister of Public Works. This is the kind of politics we have to meet in the province of Quebec. When we see a man occupying the position of a minister of the Crown, having recourse to such means to keep his party in power, is it surprising that the Liberal party never had any platform, but have had to throw themselves into the hands of that gentleman, and now find themselves in the position they are in on the eve of being driven out of power by public opinion as soon as a chance is given? The hon. gentleman spoke of the chief of the Opposition being at the head of a powerless minority. The hon. gentleman should know that it was the fear of public opinion which prevented his party going to the country last fall. Everything was prepared, after the $69,000,000 session which we had last year, for an appeal to the country. We could see evidences of it even in the weekly papers of the party, which were clamouring for the expenditure of some of the money we had voted, so as to be prepared for the elections. Why did the government not go to the country? I am not a prophet nor a son of a prophet, but I venture to say that they will not go to the country at the end of this session either. They dare not do it. They will continue to the end of their term. They will then receive due chastisement for the way they obtained office in 1896. The hon. gentleman speaks of fanatics. I could refer to Le Canadien of years ago, and show that all these men whom he accuses to-day of fanaticism were defended and very well defended by him then. I could show you the good words he then said of Sir Mackenzie Bowell and of the present leader of the opposition. The hon. gentleman has seen fit to change his views, but that does not change the facts. The gentlemen who were complimented by him at that time, are the same men, and deserve the very same compliments to-day.

Now, what is the cause of all the trouble we have in this country—of all these newspaper articles and reports of speeches made by one gentleman in one place, and by another in another place? The cause lies in the honesty of the speaker or the writer. If gentlemen would say the same thing in every province of the Dominion, and not have one speech for one province and another for another province, we would not be the witnesses of this state of things. Hon. gentlemen opposite, should follow the example given them by the chief of the Opposition upon that question, which the hon. gentleman has inflamed so much, the school question. The chief of the Opposition has said the very same thing in every province of the Dominion. He went to the city of Winnipeg, and he said there things which the hon. Minister of Public Works would not have dared to say in any part of the country outside of the province of Quebec; and I believe it was because of the bravery and the manliness of the chief of the Opposition in 1896, that he carried the city of Winnipeg for his party.

Now, Sir, the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) this afternoon answered my hon. friend from Kent, N. B., (Mr. McInerney), and I think he simply emphasized what that hon. gentleman said. I am here to say that every word uttered by the hon. member for Kent, was perfectly true—there were two schools in the province of Quebec.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Liberals and Conservatives.

Mr. BERGERON. There was a school of Lafontaine and Baldwin, and the school of Morin and Cartier. My hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) said that Cartier was accused of being an Englishman, because he was the friend of Sir John Macdonald in Ontario, and of Sir Charles Tupper in the maritime provinces. Nothing can be accomplished in this country unless our political parties are composed of people speaking different languages and of different creeds. You cannot have a government composed of people of one race or of one province; such a government would not be a stable government. Now, who were the teachers of the other school in the province of Quebec? Papineau was one.

Mr. LEMIEUX. An honourable man and a great patriot.

Mr. BERGERON. He preached annexation before 1840.

Mr. LEMIEUX. He did not sign the manifesto.

Mr. BERGERON. Who was another? Sir Antoine Dorion.

Mr. LEMIEUX. A great man.

Mr. BERGERON. He did everything he could to prevent the confederation of these provinces. Who was another? Mr. Mercier.

Mr. LEMIEUX. You followed him.

Mr. BERGERON. He went to the United States and preached annexation. These are the fathers of the school followed by my hon. friend from Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux). They were the founders of a disloyal school, and they would have done anything at all to obtain power. That is the reason why they do not retain power long—it is not 'pro bono publico.'

Mr. LEMIEUX. They do not turn their coats.

Mr. BERGERON. I need not speak of the utterance of the right hon. leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) at Boston, when he said he would rather have an American dollar than an English shilling.

Mr. FOSTER. Most any one would.

Mr. BERGERON. But that was not the sense in which he said it. Is it necessary to refer to the position taken by the Liberal party in 1891, to show which school is followed by the hon. gentlemen opposite? Mr. Speaker, I said a few moments ago that it was a good thing that the present government are in power under the circumstances. These men are obliged to do like the hon. member from Gaspé—to stand up against their own will to support the present government.

Mr. LEMIEUX. We do not bolt.

Mr. BERGERON. No, you cannot afford to do it. It takes a very clever man to bolt.

Mr. LEMIEUX. To turn his coat.

Mr. BERGERON. My hon. friends from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) and Napierville and Laprairie (Mr. Monet) may do that because they are strong men, but the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) cannot, because he has to attach himself to the skirts of the hon. Minister of Public Works in order to hold himself in public life.

I repeat it is a good thing that this has happened under this party and government. It will be a lesson for the future. Let us cry a halt to this sort of thing. Hon. gentlemen opposite are in power. They are at the height of their ambition. We on this side are trying to do our duty to the people. Let us put a stop to these old tactics, let us start afresh and be more patriotic than we have been in the past, and I am now speaking for Liberals as well as for Conservatives.

We may talk about independence, but how can we have independence? An hon. gentleman has said that what has happened will be the best that ever could have happened to help our attaining that goal of the ambition of some Canadians, and I say, standing here, that it should be the goal of every nation to attain its majority and independence. But it will be impossible for us ever to attain that goal unless we change our ways. I have more confidence in the English people living on the shores of the Thames than in the Liberal party of this Dominion. I say we must be in greater harmony. We want to obtain not only independence, but peace and happiness in this country. We have the finest country in the world. There is no reason why we should not be the happiest people in the world. And we have been thrown here together, whether French or English speaking, whether we adore the Almighty in one way or another, by Providence, and we are bound to live together and should live together in peace and harmony, and it should be our aim to do our level best, to use the expression of the hon. Minister of Public Works, to achieve that end and to stand by the British flag and empire and by this country, whenever the occasion presents itself, such as the one which presented itself in October last; and when dangers menace the British Empire, we should be prepared to do our part without having all those discussions, such as we have had carried on in the newspapers and on the hustings and in this parliament.

This resolution of the Minister of Finance should have been presented to the House, as he has done it, with a few words, and have been carried unanimously without lengthy debate, to show the British Empire and the people of the motherland that this colony is not only loyal for political purposes, but thoroughly loyal in every core to the British flag and empire.

I am sure that I have occupied the attention of this House too long, and having done so, I shall only say, like the hon. Minister of Public Works, that I shall take another opportunity to continue my remarks.

Mr. W. H. MONTAGUE (Haldimand). As I am only going to ask the attention of the House for a very few moments, Mr.

Speaker, I shall ask your permission to make my remarks to-night, although the hour is somewhat late. The hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) this afternoon, when he was pleased to address the House, gave utterance to the remark that he was sure many of us were sorry to see him here. He even went so far as to say that some members of the opposition almost wished that he were dead. I may say to the hon. gentleman that that is not the sort of party warfare that he will meet with from hon. members on this side; and I think that in the history of Canadian politics it will only be found once that a leading public man looked pleasantly to the helping hand of death to aid his party struggles, and that was a colleague of the hon. gentleman, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright, who, when he went up to Toronto to prove that the Liberal government were an economical administration, and when he was asked what about the Senate, answered to his interrogator: Let Divine Providence take care of the Senate, which it will do soon enough.

We are not sorry, but, on the contrary, are glad to see the hon. Minister of Public Works here. I am sorry, from a Canadian standpoint, that he was here to make the address he did this afternoon. I am sorry that any member of this parliament should have made a speech so full of haltings and excuses, not only for himself, but for a people who, one of his own colleagues declared, were in open rebellion against their properly constituted British authority. I am sorry that any hon. member should have made a speech so full of halting excuses for a people in open rebellion and yet retain his place as a member of Her Majesty's government, and as one of the advisers of His Excellency in this Dominion. I am glad, as a Conservative, that that speech was made, if you can separate the fact of one being a party man and at the same time desiring to see unity and good feeling prevail in every portion of the Dominion. No speech could have been made in this House. I venture to say, that will do more good to the cause of hon. gentlemen on this side, except, perhaps, the speeches of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), and the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Monet), than that which the Minister of Public Works gave us this afternoon. He did not receive his old time cheers when he made that speech. Usually, when the hon. gentleman raises that small fist of his, and with his peculiar pugnacious look turns round to his followers, it is a signal for an outburst of cheering. But I watched in vain to hear that outburst of cheering this afternoon. On the contrary, I saw pretty long faces among hon. gentlemen opposite when the hon. minister took a position decidedly in opposition, I venture to say, to that taken by ninety-five per cent, and perhaps a great deal more than that.

of hon. gentlemen opposite, at least from the province from which I have the honour to come.

I rise, however, for the purpose of saying that I am in very hearty accord with the resolution which has been moved by the hon. Minister of Finance, namely, for the expenditure of this money in connection with the sending of our contingents to South Africa, and I am only sorry, as I am sure every hon. member on this side is, that the money was not voted with absolute unanimity, without a single word of fault-finding, so that the vote would have gone out to the world as expressive of the sentiment of the Canadian people and as typical of Canadian national feeling, solid in its unity in the support of the empire in this hour of her struggle and her trouble.
