Let me say to the right hon. gentleman who leads the government, that as between this side of the House and his, there is very little difference of opinion really in so far as the substance of these resolutions is concerned. Dealing with the broader subject as to how the government has dealt generally with the matter of sending assistance to the mother country, there is a difference of opinion. We regret that Canada was not the very first to send her offer of assistance to the mother country. It was her right to occupy that place. She is the most important colony of the motherland. She has occupied a position in the British eye that no colony has occupied for a number of years past. As my hon. friend from Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) has said, in those celebrated jubilee festivities in which the right hon. gentleman took a leading part, our representatives occupied a most prominent place indeed; instead of seeing Queensland first telegraphing her offers of assistance, instead of seeing Victoria following up with her offers of assistance, instead of seeing New South Wales and even little Hong Kong, telegraphing to the Imperial authorities their offers of assistance. I may say, as a Canadian and a Conservative—and I believe that there is a majority of hon. gentlemen upon the other side of the House who will agree with me—that as Canadians we would have been pleased and happy to have seen Canada heading the list with her offer of patriotic assistance to the motherland, and then let the other colonies follow up in succession, occupying the places they occupy in relative importance, namely, places much inferior to that occupied by the Canadian Dominion. Then, Sir, we regret that Canada's offer was not pressed to pay the whole expenses of this contingent; but we are very glad, and I express my sentiments of approval coming from the province of Ontario, most heartily to the Prime Minister who at least in some way offered his assistance for not having left Canada to lag out of the race entirely. If she does not occupy the first place in making her offer, at least Canada has offered assistance to the motherland, and that that offer has been accepted. There is unanimity of opinion practically as between this side and the other, so far as the conduct of the Prime Minister and the majority of his government goes—because we are informed this afternoon by one of his important colleagues that the matter was decided in Council, that a majority went with the Prime Minister or against the Minister of Public Works, and the majority must rule. There seems to exist great division among the members of the right hon. gentleman's own party. There seems to be one division represented by the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) and the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Borden). I read an interview with the hon. member for North Oxford, who is a member of the cabinet without portfolio, and who occupies a very prominent place in the ranks of his party, which expressed the sentiments of the province of Ontario exactly. I have no doubt that other hon. gentlemen also have read that interview. That interview was British and Canadian to the core. It declared that Canada would take a leading place in her assistance to the motherland. I read also a speech of the Minister of Militia and Defence, in which he said that the time had come when Canada must make her decision as to whether in the future she shall stand by and close to the empire in its time of trouble, and, so far as I am concerned personally, said he, I have no hesitation in expressing my opinion about what that judgment and decision should be. Then there was the Prime Minister himself, who represented another school of thought, not aggressive like that represented by the minister without portfolio or the Minister of Militia and Defence, but waiting for the pushing of public opinion before he was willing to express himself and before he was willing to take any steps in regard to this contingent. Then, representing another school of thought, there was the Minister of Public Works, the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Monet), the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), who, outvoted and outfought, expressed still their objections to the course which the government took in regard to sending that contingent. Now, all seemed to regret that political feeling has come into this question at all; but I am here to say that political feeling has been imported into this matter by the division among the right hon. gentleman's own party. Had it not been for the action of the Minister of Public Works, had it not been for the speeches of the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville, and the hon. member for Labelle, this motion, I venture to say, would have been passed without any discussion, and we should be in the position of unanimously voting this amount for the assistance of the motherland in her time of trouble. Then, what did we see this afternoon? I appeal to the judgment of the House whether in this debate, or in almost any other debate, a member of the government has risen with such evident political feeling and political hostility as that which actuated the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), who occupies a place, if not in the cabinet, at least in the government. The Solicitor General does not usually show the feeling he showed this afternoon. I am glad to say that I heartily agree with a great deal of his speech, but the first part of his speech was politics pure and simple. He endeavoured to show that the members of the Conservative party have been sowing the seeds of disunion in Canada, the very work in which some gentlemen not far from him, and occupying very responsible positions in this country, have been doing themselves, and which Sir Charles Tupper and his followers have not been doing. And what further did we find this afternoon? The Minister of Public Works, even at this date, after Canada has taken her stand and sent her contingent, when indeed her sons are falling in the fight, rises here and declares that there are two sides to the question of the Boer war—two sides to the question whether the Boers are right or the British are right. I call his attention to the speech of the Solicitor General, who held up before us the argument made after the battle of Majuba Hill. He declared that in every line that agreement looked to the maintenance of the rights and liberties of British subjects in the Transvaal, and looked to the maintenance of British suzerainty over the Transvaal Republic. If that statement of the Solicitor General be true—and I have no doubt it is, for I have read the document myself, the position of Paul Kruger and his forces is one of open, illegal and dishonest rebellion against properly constituted authority; and I say that in matters of that kind there are no two sides, but that the side is right that has the power and is exercising it properly, and the side is wrong that is rebelling against that properly constituted authority, the exercise of which they agreed to after the magnanimous act of England in 1881, in withdrawing her forces when, in a few hours, she could have wiped the Transvaal forces and the Transvaal government out of existence. We find another gentleman discussing this question, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) a supporter of the Minister of Public Works—well, at least a supporter of the government of the right hon. gentleman. I venture to say the hon. member for North Norfolk does not support the government with any more pleasure because of the presence of the Minister of Public Works, especially since he has expressed his opinions on this subject. What do we hear the member for North Norfolk saying? He gave his arguments clearly and forcibly to the House. He never made a better speech in the House; and we on this side were glad to hear it instead of the speech of the sixty-million market to which we listened to so often in the days between 1887 and 1896. What did the hon. member for North Norfolk say? He said this: Talk about the rights of British subjects in the Transvaal, there are 70,000 British subjects there, and only 63,000 Boers. Talk about the rights of the British subjects in the city of Johannesburg, where out of 100,000 people, the Boers have allowed only 250 people to vote. He said that when they invited immigration they had a rule that one year's residence would give enfranchisement, but immediately the foreigners or Uitlanders began to come, they changed it to fourteen years. He called the attention of the Minister of Public Works to this fact that whereas the revenue of the whole Transvaal Republic was three-quarters of a million in 1887—and he was speaking by the book—they raised no less than twenty-two million by a tax upon the miners, and by a tax upon the output of the mines owned by the Uitlanders, the total output being only fifty-seven millions, so the tax of these unjust Boers was at the rate of 38 per cent, and not a cent of it was spent for anything save armament and munitions of war. Now, I put these figures again to the Minister of Public Works, and ask him whether there are two sides to the claim of British subjects in the Transvaal, that they were being trodden upon, that their interests were being ruthlessly trodden upon by the government of the Transvaal Republic. I ask him to accept the figures of his own supporter, and I venture to say that if one-tenth, aye, one-hundredth, yes, I will go still further and say one-thousandth of the injustice done to British subjects in the Transvaal by Paul Kruger and his government, were done to the hon. gentleman's compatriots in the province of Quebec, his loyalty would be more shaky even than it is to-night.

Now, Sir, this matter was under discussion last year, and last year the government took a position upon it. What do we find? The resolution has already been presented to the House, and it comes very apropos in the light of what I may term the argument I am making. The Prime Minister proposed a resolution to this House, and what was his opinion as to the conduct of the Transvaal government with regard to the Uitlanders:

Resolved, that this House has learned with still greater regret that the condition of things there existing has resulted in intolerable oppression, and has produced great and dangerous excitement among several classes of Her Majesty's subjects in her South African possessions.

Is 'intolerable oppression' ever right? Are there two sides to intolerable oppression? Then, Sir, either the hon. Minister of Public Works cannot find two sides to this question, or, if he can, then it was a meaningless collection of words which the Prime Minister asked this House to pass, and which it did pass, with the vote of the member for Labelle and the vote of the member for Laprairie last year, and which this House, I am glad to say, passed unanimously. But, Sir, is this the time to inquire whether England is right or whether England is wrong? England is in a struggle now which has proved to be a severe struggle; our duty is to stand by her in that struggle and to utter no word of discouragement. Sir, I like the sound of that old speech of Stephen Decatur uttered years ago at a great public gathering in the United States, when he said: 'In all her dealings with foreign countries may my country be always right; but right or wrong, she is my country still.' We know, Sir, that Britain is right; but right or wrong in this particular struggle, we know that Great Britain is the great civilizing and humanizing force of the century, we know that we are her sons, and we have other work to do than to express doubt and discouragement in this hour of her struggle, of her trouble and of her toil.

Now, Sir, what was the cause of the war? We need not discuss that. I am here, however, to say this, that the real cause of the war—and the hon. gentleman knows it as well as I do, he knows it as well as any other member of this House—the real cause of the war is not a quarrel over who should be enfranchised or who should not be enfranchised, so far as mere value of that franchise is concerned; the real cause of the war is the question whether there should be a British confederacy in South Africa or a Dutch confederacy; and this House and this country has expressed its opinion in no mistakeable terms on that particular question. The Minister of Public Works declared that when he was in England even the colleagues of Mr. Chamberlain had doubts. Well, Sir, I venture to say that the colleagues of Mr. Chamberlain did not express their doubts to the Minister of Public Works. I venture also to say that if they did hold any doubts, those doubts disappeared like dew before the morning sunshine when that ultimatum of Paul Kruger's reached England, demanding that she land not another soldier in South Africa, even for the protection of her own possessions. As that doubt disappeared in Great Britain, so it has disappeared in Canada, if it ever existed. I cannot speak for the province of Quebec, but I can speak for the province of Ontario. I know something of its people, having mingled with them during that time since this subject has been under discussion, and I am able to say that Grit and Tory, Catholic and Protestant, are little less than a solid unit in support of the action of Canada in sending these contingents, and in their sympathy for England in the struggle in which she is engaged.

Now, Sir, the Minister of Public Works sought to make an impression on this House by making a statement which I do not think should be allowed to go out for one moment without an answer, even though it be a feeble one from myself. The hon. gentleman made a statement that a circular was issued by the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and the hon. gentleman wanted it to be understood by this House that an invitation had been sent by the Secretary of State for the Colonies asking the colonies for aid on behalf of the motherland. Sir, the hon. gentleman knows that that is absolutely incorrect. England has not asked for aid from a single one of her colonies, and I think that is the most unfair thing which has been said in this debate, advertising even a shadow of the impression abroad that England was driven to the necessity of calling upon her colonies for assistance in any struggle in which she was engaged. Sir, as the hon. gentleman has read the correspondence, let me also refer to it, as it has been laid upon the Table of this House. What is the first line? A circular from Mr. Chamberlain? No, Sir, but a loyal message from Queensland.

Should hostilities against Transvaal break out, Queensland offers services 250 mounted infantry, with machine guns.

What is the next communication? It is a communication from Victoria:

Offers have been received from volunteers for service in South Africa.

What is the next one?

Legislative council, Lagos, unanimously offers services 300 Hausas for campaign in South Africa.

What is the next one? From New South Wales:

I understand from my Premier that offers to volunteer for service in South Africa, if required, have been received from about 1,860 officers and men of the New South Wales forces.

Mr. CLARKE. What are the dates?

Mr. MONTAGUE. That from Queensland is dated July 11; Victoria offers on July 12, long before hostilities had broken out. The next one, from Lagos, is dated July 18; from New South Wales, July 21; Hong Kong offers on Sept. 21. Even little Hong Kong had sent their anxious request to be permitted to engage in a contest, in which Great Britain might be engaged. Now, after all these, Canada had not sent any public communication, but evidently a private communication had been sent.

Mr. MONET. Was not parliament in session at the time?

Mr. MONTAGUE. That has nothing to do with the point. It is far wide of it, and the minister without portfolio should not have put that suggestion into the mind of the member for Napierville because it has nothing in God's world to do with the argument at all. What I am combatting is the statement, or rather the impression—because the Minister of Public Works dare not make the statement—I am combatting the impression that he sought to leave upon the country that a circular had been sent by the Secretary of State for the Colonies asking for assistance. Now, what do we find? After private individuals from Canada had evidently made offers, then we find a circular sent by the Secretary of State for the Colonies to Lord Minto, on October 3, months after the other offers had been made, no circular having been sent out in the meantime. Mr. Chamberlain, Secretary of State for the Colonies, goes on to say:

Secretary of State for War and Commander-in-Chief desire to express high appreciation of signal exhibition of patriotic spirit of people of Canada shown by offers to serve in South Africa, and to furnish following information to assist in organization of force offered into units suitable for military requirements.

And the same to the other colonies. This is the only circular that was sent out by Mr. Chamberlain. It is a circular of instructions and thanks for offers made by the colonies. God forbid that in this empire we should ever allow the impression to go abroad that was intended to be left by the hon. Minister of Public Works this afternoon, and who really left such an impression that a circular had been sent by Mr. Chamberlain asking for assistance in these times of trouble. What does the hon. Minister of Public Works say? He charges Mr. Chamberlain with issuing this circular in order to get the sympathy of the colonies. Now, he did not leave an impression there; he did not use the innuendo there: he stated it broadly, squarely and emphatically that Mr. Chamberlain had sent this circular to get an expression of sympathy from the colonies. Was ever greater trash talked in the Canadian parliament or any other parliament? What authority had the hon. Minister of Public Works for any such statement? Here is the correspondence; not a word of it bears out any such statement. This is the circular. Does it ask for sympathy? It expresses its thanks and the thanks of the empire for the practical sympathy on the part of the colonies, with the exception of Canada, whose government left it to private individuals to offer their expressions of sympathy and their support. Well, Sir, not only that; I might ask the right hon. Prime Minister: Does he look on this as an invitation? I am sure that the Prime Minister does not. But, we have another word; we are told, Sir, that the Conservative press and the Tory politicians have been saying that the government were taken by the throat by the Governor General. I have not heard it stated; I do not know where the hon. gentleman got it from unless it might have been from a speech made by a very high dignitary at the time of the departure of the first contingent for South Africa, in which that high dignitary used these words:

Canada has freely made her offerings—

Not in response to a circular—

Canada has freely made her offerings of a military contingent to the old country, and in so doing has accepted the difficulties which she knows must follow. The people of Canada have no desire to consider the quibbles of colonial responsibility.

I wonder what that refers to, 'the quibbles of colonial responsibility.' I wonder what these words refer to, coming from this high dignitary.

What they have done is to insist that their loyal offers should be made known, and they heartily rejoiced when they were graciously accepted.

I never said, and the members on this side of the House never said, that the Governor General took the ministry by the throat, but the Governor General made that speech which I have just quoted, in which he said that the people of this country 'have insisted.' If there was no opposition there could be no insistence, and whom could they insist upon except the government? They had insisted that their patriotic offers should be made known, and here, I am sorry to say is the announcement of the chief executive officer of the Dominion of Canada, whose name has been dragged into this debate, not by me, but by one of the advisers of His Excellency, who says that this government had to be insisted upon to forward the patriotic offers of Canada to people on the other side of the water.

I am not here to-night to say one word about the loyalty of the province of Quebec. I have read the speeches made on this side of the House in connection with this subject, I have read the speeches made by the hon. leader of the opposition, the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), and the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), and the others, I have listened to a number of other speeches and I have not heard one word impugning the loyalty of the French Canadian people of the province of Quebec. The whole row and the whole dispute over that loyalty has been between the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Monet), and the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), and these hon. gentlemen, when they talk of their own row, shout to the country: Our loyalty has been aspersed by the Tory press and the country should therefore vote against the Tory party and support the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his colleagues on this question. Instead of charging the people of the province of Quebec with disloyalty, I hope, that, dear as has been the price paid, in addition to uniting the empire closer and closer together, because that undoubtedly will be the result of this great war, knitting the colonies to the motherland, advertising to the world that they who attack Great Britain must attack Greater Britain—I hope that in addition, and it is the hope of every one who is anxious for the prosperity of Canada, it will unite us here all the more solidly and more firmly together, and that hereafter we shall not be Catholic or Protestant, but one people, not French or English, but Canadians all, and British all.

Mr. THOMAS BEATTIE (London). Mr. Speaker, I do not rise at this late hour to make any lengthened remarks, but I could not allow this House to adjourn without resenting the insult thrown out by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) to the Irishmen of Canada. I am an Irishman, and I would not feel myself worthy of the name if I did not rise in my place and resent the insult offered to the Irishmen of Canada by the hon. gentleman. Referring to my hon. friend the member for Kent, N.B., (Mr. McInerney), he said:

When you see an Irishman more loyal than the Queen there is something wrong.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). Hear, hear.

Mr. BEATTIE. I will come to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) after a while. I consider myself as loyal as any man who lives under the British flag, and I do not think that there is anything wrong with me. If there is, I would be obliged to the hon. Minister of Public Works if he would point it out. If it were not for the good fat office that the hon. gentleman has in the government, I doubt very much if we would have heard him speak in this House as he has done to-night. Evidently, for Irishmen to be loyal is a crime in his eyes. I would like to know what right he (Mr. Tarte) has to make that remark. If we are to judge his loyalty by the estimation he puts on the loyalty of the Irish people, I would give very little for his loyalty. Let me now refer for a moment to a certain portion of the speech delivered by the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) for whom, I may say, I have a very high regard. He made a statement in this House and when he made it, he must have known that it was a misstatement. He referred to the Free Press as the Conservative organ in London. Well, Sir, the Free Press is a most respectable organ of public opinion, none more so in the country. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) read two lines of a speech made by Mr. Mark Roberts, a gentleman living in the township of Nissouri, in the county of East Middlesex, and a gentleman whom I know very well. The Solicitor General read the two lines from the speech of Mr. Roberts, and he stated that it was an article written by the editor of the Free Press.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). No.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes, you did.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I said nothing of the sort.

Mr. FOSTER. That is what every one understood you to say.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I said nothing of the sort, and the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster) did not understand it so.

Mr. DAVIN. The whole House understood it in that way. You said it.

Mr. FOSTER. You said it. Apologize now.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Will my hon. friend permit me. As the House thoroughly understood, this was an appeal made by a Master of the Orangemen in the heat of an election.

Mr. BEATTIE. You said it was an article in the Free Press.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It was a Tory appeal made by a Tory Orangeman in a Tory newspaper on the eve of an election.

Mr. BEATTIE. The Tory organ has nothing at all to do with it. It is simply the report of a speech delivered by Mr. Mark Roberts, a gentleman whom I know very well, and any paper might report it as well as the London Free Press.

Mr. FOSTER. It was a bad break for the Solicitor General.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Not at all.

Mr. BEATTIE. I will read a portion of that speech.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Read it all.

Mr. BEATTIE. I will read the portion which you left out and which you should have read:

The most interesting event of the past and present year is the war now going on against the Boers in South Africa. It is scarcely necessary for me to say anything of that matter, as our papers are daily full of it, but there is one point I want you to notice, that is the loyal and patriotic spirit generally shown, more especially by the brave young Canadians who have volunteered and gone into service for their Queen and empire. We earnestly wish them a victorious and speedy return, not before, however, full and free liberty, as enjoyed by all British subjects, is insured to every Uitlander in the dominions now ruled by President Kruger.

Mr. BEATTIE.

Now, these are the few lines which the Solicitor General read, but he should have read the whole speech:

In many ways we have reason to feel ashamed of our Federal government at Ottawa, headed as it is by a French Papist and dominated by another, by name Tarte, both of whom are, I believe, rebels in their hearts,—

Here is the concluding portion of Mr. Roberts's address, which was also not read by the Solicitor General:

—but I am glad to say, however, that I do not believe they represent the feelings of the people, any more than the Fenians in the American cities represent the true feelings of the American people for us Canadians.

If the Solicitor General denies that he attributed that to the editor of the Free Press, I will accept the statement, but I understood him to do so.

Mr. DAVIN. We all understood it that way.

Mr. BEATTIE. I have no hesitation in saying that a more honourable journal, Conservative or Liberal, does not exist in Canada than the London Free Press. I am quite sure that nothing detrimental to any race or religion would be written in it. I may add that I see the name Dawson written across this copy of the paper which the Solicitor General read from. I do not know how it came there, but I presume that Mr. Dawson called his attention to it, and Mr. Dawson is the Liberal organizer which the Solicitor General and Mr. Tarte have in Ontario, and it may, perhaps, be that the remarks of Mr. Roberts were inspired by his brother Orangeman, Mr. Dawson.

Mr. DESMARAIS moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.25 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, February 21, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved that the name of Mr. Puttee be added to the following committees: Railways and Canals, Banking and Commerce, Private Bills and Standing Orders.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR IN MINES.

Mr. McINNES moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 47) respecting labour in mines. He said : The object of this Bill is to secure a greater measure of safety to those engaged in underground coal and metalliferous mines by excluding from this work Chinese and Japanese. Every one who has any knowledge about mining is aware that even under most advantageous conditions, underground mining is always a very dangerous business. In British Columbia it has been found that the dangerous nature of that employment has been increased to an alarming extent by the employment of Chinese and Japanese. This is due to the fact that these people are not sufficiently acquainted with the English language, are not able to receive instructions in that language, are not able to read the warnings and notices posted up from time to time, and have an entirely inadequate knowledge of the nature of gases and explosives, and it is further due to their peculiar superstition with regard to things which they cannot understand and over which they have no control. For these reasons the people of British Columbia years ago came to the conclusion that it would be in the interests of life and property to exclude the employment of Chinese and Japanese underground in coal and metalliferous mines, and accordingly a number of years ago legislation was put on the statutes of British Columbia to that effect. At the time that legislation was passed, its constitutionality was doubted. It was claimed that inasmuch as it specified certain nationalities, it was unconstitutional, because it dealt with the subject of aliens which, under the British North America Act, is under the charge of this parliament. That doubt remained unsettled until last summer when a decision was given by the Privy Council that such legislation was unconstitutional, and inasmuch as the province has not the power to pass it, it is clearly within the jurisdiction of this parliament, and, therefore, I ask leave to introduce this Bill into this House.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—CASUALTIES IN CANADIAN REGIMENT.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). It may not be out of place that we should interrupt at this moment the regular course of business to give a moment's attention to the news from Africa to-day. The news we have received is of a character at once to cheer and sadden our hearts. It is cheering in this respect, that it brings the announcement that our Canadian troops in the field have received their baptism of fire, and have endured the ordeal in a manner creditable to themselves and their country. The telegraphic message gives no details whatever of the engagement, still we know by the number of casualties which have taken place that our men have died at their post and that their courage has been equal to what was expected of them. But this is the saddening part of it. Such is the awful character of war, that its triumphs are always mixed with tears, and however much we can rejoice at the victories achieved by the British arms, victories in which our own fellow-countrymen are taking their part, still the announcement is saddened by the fact that twenty of our countrymen have lost their lives, and sixty-nine are now lying between life and death. The announcement is such as to, if that were possible, still more confirm us in our resolve of doing our full duty in the present emergency. We can do nothing at present to solace those families which are bereaved, but we can assure them—and this I am sure we do with all our hearts—that their loss is not their own exclusively, but is also ours and our country's.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I desire to associate myself in the warmest manner with the extremely appropriate words that have just fallen from the right hon. leader of the House. He has truly said that the triumphs of war can only be achieved in connection with that sadder fate that involves men's lives and carries pain and suffering into the households of a great many of our people. The Canadian contingent, who have realized on the field that which Canada expected from them, who have discharged their duty nobly and faithfully, who have fallen in a cause we believe to be a righteous one, have conferred not only undying fame and honour upon themselves, but that same honour and fame upon our country which sent them there. I am sure that every member of this House will extend his most heartfelt sympathy to the relatives and friends of those who have fallen, and to those, who, still living, are in a situation calling for our sympathy. The joy over the great news that has gladdened every portion of the empire, the news of the success attending British arms in the relief of Kimberley, and the relief of Ladysmith, together with the prospect of more decisive measures, calculated to bring this war to an end at no distant day, will be accompanied with a feeling of the deepest sympathy and commiseration for the friends of those who have fallen and those who have suffered on the field of battle in the glorious struggle they have made on behalf of their country. I would only suggest to my right hon. friend, that a message reflecting the universal sympathy of this House and the people of this country whom we represent, should be sent to Colonel Otter as a solace to the wounded who are now suffering.

The PRIME MINISTER. I shall have much pleasure in preparing a telegram of the tenor suggested, which I shall show to my hon. friend.

GRAIN CARRIED BETWEEN CANADIAN PORTS IN AMERICAN VESSELS.

Mr. BENNETT asked :

Under the permission given by the government of Canada to that end how many bushels of grain, if any, were carried between Canadian ports by American registered vessels during the year 1899? What were the names of the vessels carrying such grain, if any? What were the points between which said vessels sailed, and the number of bushels carried by each of said vessels?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). There were carried between Canadian ports, by American registered vessels, during the year 1899, 708,000 bushels of grain. The names of the vessels carrying such grain, were steamers Niagara, Roman, Yuma, Briton, Arthur Orr, and Elphicke. All the said vessels sailed from Fort William. The Niagara and the Yuma sailed to Midland, the Elphicke to Owen Sound, and the Roman, Briton, and Arthur Orr, to Depot Harbour. The number of bushels of grain carried by each vessel was as follows :

	Bushels.
Niagara	105,000
Yuma	140,000
Elphicke	98,000
Roman	110,000
Briton	110,000
Arthur Orr	145,000
	708,000

FOURTEEN-FOOT NAVIGATION.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

Will the condition of the canals and River St. Lawrence system permit of navigation at the opening of the season by vessels having a draught of fourteen feet? If not, what is the earliest period at which such navigation will be possible, and what is the estimated expenditure necessary to complete the system from present date?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The answer is : Yes.

YUKON TERRITORY ACT—COURT RULES.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax), (by Mr. Taylor) asked :

1. Have the judges (or any three of them) of the Supreme Court of British Columbia made any general rules under the provisions of the 12th section of the Act 62-63 Victoria, chapter 11, 'An Act to amend the Yukon Territory Act'?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

2. Has the legislature of British Columbia passed any Act auxiliary to or in aid of the 7th section of the said Act?

3. If not, is it intended to ask the said legislature to pass any such legislation?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). The Department of Justice has no information as to this subject.

THE MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS AND THE PARIS EXPOSITION OF 1900.

Mr. BELL (Pictou) asked :

Has the Minister of Public Works been appointed to any official position in connection with the Paris Exposition of 1900? If such appointment is not yet made, is it the intention of the government of Canada to make such appointment?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) has not been appointed to any official position in connection with the Paris Exposition of 1900. As to the second portion of the question, my hon. friend (Mr. Bell) will have to wait until the Minister of Agriculture makes announcements of the appointments made.

MR. A. J. FRASER.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

1. Whether Mr. A. J. Fraser has been removed from the Land Office, Regina? 2. What is his new position? 3. Who succeeds him at Regina? 4. What is the reason for the course taken?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows: 1. Yes. 2. Acting agent of Dominion lands, Lethbridge. 3. E. W. Burley. 4. The change was made in conjunction with some others to promote efficiency in the service.

THE MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND THE NEW BRUNSWICK LOCAL ELECTION.

Mr. GANONG (by Mr. Corby) asked :

Did the Minister of Railways write any letters to any person or persons in the polling division of Wilson's Beach, Charlotte County, N.B., prior to the election for members to the legislative assembly of New Brunswick in 1899, intimating or suggesting that a strong support of the government candidates in that election would strengthen his hands in obtaining a grant from the Federal government for repairing the breakwater at Wilson's Beach?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The answer to the questions is : No.

RESIGNATION OF MINISTERS, JANUARY, 1896.

Mr. GEORGE E. CASEY (West Elgin) moved for :

Copies of all letters, papers, telegrams and other communications between the Governor General, the Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell and the Hon. Messrs. Foster, Haggart, Montague and Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, in connection with their resignation as ministers in the month of January, 1896.

He said : The opposition have been studiously, earnestly and eloquently attempting to prove, for some time back, that there is a difference of opinion between members of the present cabinet on important questions of public policy. I do not think they have been able to show that there is any such important differences in the present cabinet. If there has been any trifling variety of opinions shown, it has been in connection with questions of public policy only. Now, the gentlemen who are making these insinuations, are before the people of this country as rival candidates for positions on the Treasury benches. They are asking the House and the people to put them in the places of those who now so worthily occupy those benches.

It is, perhaps, time, since the public memory is very short of matters that have happened in previous sessions, to remind the public of the state of things that existed within the Conservative cabinet when that party last formed a cabinet. It is time to point out that something more than a difference of opinion on public questions existed between those gentlemen, that they differed on such personal grounds as made it really impossible for them to work together with even a semblance of harmony. I do not know exactly the degree of fault to apportion to the members of that cabinet. We did not make the accusation ; the accusations were made mutually among themselves. All that is necessary to say is that if they were the sort of people that they declared each other to be, it was not only impossible for them to work together in harmony at that time, but it would be impossible for them to form a cabinet now that could work together in harmony. More than that, if we are to believe what they said about each other, there are no men amongst them fit to be cabinet ministers, that is, amongst the leading men who were in the cabinet before. We know a few of the things that they said about each other at that time ; we do not know with what degree of justice, with what solidity of backing, they said these things. It is for the object of getting further information on these points that I am asking for the papers called for by this motion. I shall have to remind the House briefly of what passed four years ago last month when the Bowell cabinet was still in power, what mutual recriminations passed, what mutual accusations were made ; and then ask the House to call for such correspondence as it may be possible to get at to see whether these statements were justified by facts.

Let us begin at the beginning of things. In November, 1895, the High Commissioner in London, the present leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), entered into communication with his former Premier (Sir Mackenzie Bowell) and sent him the following telegram :

Confidential. London, Nov. 14, 1895.

Long interview Colonial Minister last night. Imperial government will support fast Atlantic service extent £75,000, vessels similar 'Teutonic,' but will require Canadian government to invite new tenders. Agents General and self meet Colonial Minister Tuesday re cable. Have no doubt government will support proposal and appoint commission at once arrange details pending declaration policy Imperial government. Will advise you result of meeting.

Now we come to the pith of the whole telegram. What has been read hitherto refers to matters that were then in discussion between this government and the Imperial government ; but here is the pith of the whole telegram :

Shall I come out to consult with you about these two matters ? Think could render you material assistance. Do not make contents this message public till further advised.

(Signed) TUPPER.

When dissention subsequently arose in the cabinet and the question was asked Sir Mackenzie Bowell how it came that the High Commissioner obtained leave of absence and came out to Canada, he was generous enough to say that he sent for him to consult with him about the cable and the Fast Atlantic service. Now, Sir, we see where the suggestion of that invitation to come out, arose. The High Commissioner, telegraphing from London to Sir Mackenzie Bowell, suggested to him that he should invite him out to see him about those matters. That was on the 14th of November, and on the 2nd of December, Sir Mackenzie Bowell answered as follows :

(Sir Mackenzie Bowell to Sir Charles Tupper.)
Ottawa, Dec. 2, 1895.

Re Fast Line : Come out to consult. Get all information possible.

The High Commissioner in London suggested to the Premier in Canada that he should come out and advise him about those matters, and the Premier invited him thereupon to come out and consult, and was afterwards generous enough to overlook the fact that this invitation to come out was suggested by the High Commissioner himself and did not originate with Sir Mackenzie Bowell. These telegrams, I may say, were brought down in answer to a return moved for by myself during the first session of 1896.

What followed the arrival of the High Commissioner thus arranged for? He must have left very soon after receiving that telegram in December from the Premier, because he was here, if I mistake not, early in the January following. I do not remember the date of his arrival in Canada, but at all events, by the early days of January we find a very pretty little plot brewing within the ranks of the cabinet itself here in Canada. Whether it had any connection with the advent of the then High Commissioner, is for every one to decide according to his own lights, and according to his own reason. At all events, the High Commissioner was sent for and came out, and the plot in the cabinet thickened. Seven members of the cabinet apparently had put their heads together and had made up their minds what they were going to do, but they said nothing about it until the House met in the first week in January.

The House met on the 2nd of January, and was immediately adjourned for a few days. The address was brought down, stating the policy of the government on the great question then before the country, that of intervention in Manitoba to avert the abolition of separate schools. After the address was presented to the House, after the policy of the government was declared, a leading member of that government, then the Minister of Finance, now the hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster), got up and read a typewritten statement to this House as to the reasons which had induced him and six of his colleagues to resign from the cabinet. Instead of characterizing that step myself, perhaps it will be better just to remind the House what Sir Mackenzie Bowell, the then Premier, said about the matter himself. He set out, in his statement to the Senate on January 9th, with a comparison of our constitution with that of the United States, remarking that we were not hampered by a written constitution as to the methods of procedure. He went on to say:

In this country we are not hampered. We have had an illustration of it since the opening of parliament. We have had a government meet parliament with an avowed policy, and in a few days afterwards a majority of that cabinet retire for reasons which were given to the public in a statement made by my late colleague, the Hon. Mr. Foster, ex-Minister of Finance, speaking as he did for those of his colleagues with whom he was acting. Those reasons had no relation, strange to say, to state policy. They were not reasons which would justify members of the government in retiring from the cabinet unless there was something in the character or reputation of its head which would warrant their leaving and refusing in future to associate with him. Whether such a state of things exists I leave to the judgment, not only of this House, but of the country in which I have lived for the last sixty-two years.

I might say here that I think the opinion of the country since then has been very strongly to the effect that if the government of that day had retained their former head, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, if they had not made the mistake of trading horses while they were crossing the stream, the result of the elections of 1896 would have been somewhat more favourable to the present opposition. I do not believe that the government would have retained power, but I believe that they would have retained the support of a large number of people in the country who were disgusted and alienated by the extraordinary course which was actually pursued. Sir Mackenzie continues:

These gentlemen in their statement make one important admission, which I shall read, because I am desirous of having it placed upon the records of the Senate, though some portions of it reflect upon himself—not upon my moral character, not upon my political character, &c.

Then he goes on to enumerate his services to the party. The substance of what he says is that the objections taken to him were not to the policy of the government, or of a political or moral character, but to his ability to successfully lead the party. He contends that the government could have got along very well if he had been properly supported. He says:

Even in the present trying circumstances I hesitate not to say, and to say it boldly—I would not have stated it had not such reasons been given to the House as the cause which induced these gentlemen to leave the government—that had I had that loyal support which every Premier ought to receive in the arduous duties incident to the governing of a country, such support as was given most loyally to my late chiefs, Sir John Macdonald and Sir John Thompson, we would have been just as successful in carrying on the affairs of the government as my predecessors, though not possessed of their measure of ability or political tact.

Sir Mackenzie continues:

Had not jealousy and the determination to destroy the usefulness of the head of the government been firmly rooted in the breast of those with whom I was associated, I flatter myself that we should have been successful in carrying on the affairs of this country. Now, for the purpose of placing it on record, I shall read what Mr. Foster stated in the House of Commons. He started out with this declaration:

'I may say, in the first place, there is no disagreement between ourselves and the Premier upon any question of public policy, trade or constitutional, with regard to which action has been already taken, or in respect to which an attitude has been assumed by the government under the present Premier. I also beg to say that we retain our firm belief in the principles and policy of the Liberal-Conservative party, with which we are in entire accord, and of which, in common with others, we have been and will remain the exponents, in so far as our ability admits. We have lost none of our confidence in the sound and healthy condition of the Liberal-Conservative party of Canada, or of our belief that it embodies a policy which the majority of the electorate considers essential to the continued welfare and progress of the country, or of our faith that under firm and prudent leadership it will come back triumphant from the polls.'

In that respect, in sentiment and in feeling, I am fully in accord with my late colleague. He states that there has been no difference of opinion between us. That being the case, can any of you conceive why, after the opening of the session, after the speech from the Throne has been given not only to parliament, but to the whole country, you should find seven members of the cabinet sending in their resignations simply because they did not like the gentleman with whom they had been so long associating, some of them for eight or ten years, and whose ability and character they knew just as well as they do to-day. I readily admit that I never assumed to possess that gigantic intellect with which these gentlemen who have retired from the cabinet have been endowed.

I am sure the hon. ex-Minister of Finance will take that remark especially to himself. Possibly the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), who was one of the revolting members of that government, will consider that he was also alluded to. My hon. friend the member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), then the Minister of Agriculture, also, will probably suppose that he was alluded to as one of the possessors of a gigantic intellect. The hon. ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart) may also have been one of those who was alluded to.

Mr. GIBSON. He has a big head.

Mr. CASEY. My hon. friend (Mr. Gibson) says that he has a big head. I need not go around the whole seven; they all doubtless felt flattered by the remark made about them by Sir Mackenzie, their ex-leader and colleague of long standing.

Not at all. All I claim for myself is moral honesty, a firm conviction of what is right, and determination, under all circumstances, whether it accords to the prejudices of one party or another, to endeavour to carry out what I believe to be for the best interests of the country.

He passes then to the main part of the explanation, quoting again from the memorandum of the hon. ex-Minister of Finance:

'Though with many misgivings we agreed to enter the government under Mr. Bowell, in succession to Sir John Thompson,—

The title of the Premier was forgotten apparently for the moment.

—'we have nevertheless unitedly and loyally striven, to the best of our ability, to make it strong and efficient, and it has been with growing regret that we have seen our efforts in a measure of success less than that for which we had hoped and striven for. We are of the opinion that the Liberal-Conservative party ought to be represented by the strongest government possible to be secured from its ranks.'

I suppose these hon. gentlemen meant that the strongest government to be secured would be composed of their seven selves and seven others like unto them that they would select. Continuing:

'That the necessity therefor was never greater than under existing circumstances, and we believe that such a government can be formed without delay.'

They knew just where to put their hands on men like-minded.

'This we have repeatedly urged upon the Premier, with the result that we found ourselves face to face with parliament having a government with its numbers incomplete, and with no assurance that the present Premier could satisfactorily complete it. Under these circumstances, we thought it our duty to retire, and in this manner to pave the way, if possible, for the formation of a government whose Premier could command the confidence of all his colleagues, could satisfy the Liberal-Conservative party that its strongest elements were at its head and impress the country that it had a government which was united and had power to govern.

Well, now, there are some very beautiful points in these remarks of the hon. ex-Minister of Finance. He admitted, in the first place, that the government had not power to govern, that it did not represent the Liberal-Conservative party as it should be represented, that its strongest elements were not at its head, and in order to strengthen the government they proposed first to wreck it by withdrawing the majority of the government therefrom. This business of strengthening the government by first wrecking it leads us to consider what may have been the meaning of the High Commissioner when he telegraphed to Sir Mackenzie Bowell:

I think I can render you material assistance. Perhaps this was the way in which the hon. leader of the opposition intended to render material assistance to Sir Mackenzie Bowell when he suggested that he should come out to this country. At all events he did come out. This scheme, with which one of his family was intimately concerned, was carried out. The government for the time being was wrecked, and Sir Mackenzie Bowell received material assistance by being relegated, practically to private life, although he had rendered faithful service to his country and to his party. The then Finance Minister evidently had the same idea of how to help Sir Mackenzie and how to help the government and the party of which he was a member. His idea of strengthening them was that seven of them should resign and do their best to wreck that Cabinet.

Mr. LANDERKIN. He had the proper idea.

We affirm with the utmost sincerity that the action we have taken has sprung from no feeling of personal dislike or personal ambition, but has been solely dictated by our wish to sink all minor considerations in the presence of our great desire that the best interests of our country should be duly conserved.

Well, Sir, the action of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) was followed by the result he stated he had in view, because the best interests of the country have been duly conserved by the relegation of that hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) and his fellow bolters to the cold shades of opposition. I doubt very much that that was his object at the time, for I think he intended to serve the best interests of Canada by replacing the existing leaders with himself and his immediate associates, who would become the controllers of the destinies of the country and the party.

Without any sarcasm, but looking coolly at this statement do members on either side of this House think that a gentleman who could in cold blood bring down such a carefully prepared statement to this House and announce it as a reasonable explanation of his views and intentions; can we think that a man who is capable of that has a scintilla of political sense in his disposition? I cannot for one. The man who could make such a statement of his own treachery and disloyalty, such a confession of plotting against the leader whom he had undertaken to support; the man who could think that the House could take in earnest that statement as a serious explanation of how the country and party were best to be served, is not only lacking in political honesty—that goes without saying for his own confession is a confirmation of it—but lacking in the sense which would lead him to understand what other people considered to be meant by political honesty. Sir, if he had the power of perceiving what other people would think of such a statement as that, he never would have made it. And, Mr. Speaker, in spite of all his efforts, his long speeches and his short speeches and his clever remarks across the floor, he remains a wreck upon the reef which he himself caused to be placed in the way of the ship of state then controlled by his own party. It is quite impossible that a man who conducted himself thus towards his leader can ever become the leader of other men. It is quite impossible that he can ever become even the trusted lieutenant of any other Prime Minister.

The leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) was, of course, not in the House when this statement was made, and his connection with it can consequently only be inferred. We cannot, of course, deal with inferences in this House, but nevertheless every one will have his own opinion as to what that connection may have been. It is sufficient for him to know that this gentleman, now his lieutenant, in apparent co-operation with a member of the hon. member's (Sir Charles Tupper's) own family, perpetrated this act of party perfidy; and it is for the leader of the opposition to consider how safe his own position is now as the leader of the Conservative party. The late

Mr. CASEY.

Sir John Thompson in a humorous mood at a dinner in Toronto, alluded to the then Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) as 'Cassius.' Sir John Thompson did not give the whole quotation as to 'the lean and hungry Cassius,' but every one is sufficiently familiar with it to fill it in from memory, and to remember how that individual is spoken of in the play and what acts were imputed to him. It is perhaps worth one's while to look it up in Shakspeare and see what a nice character Sir John Thompson gave to his colleague (Mr. Foster) who was sitting beside him. It was no doubt said in joke, and Sir John Thompson only meant to emphasize the difference in personal appearance between himself and his colleague whose food did not apparently do him so much good. But the thought was started in the public mind, and has gained by fructifying, and the public opinion of the ex-Finance Minister can never be disassociated from the character of that not overly fat Cassius whom Shakspeare has immortalized.

But let me return to what Sir Mackenzie Bowell said. Speaking in the Senate he used these words:

What occurred between the writing of that speech, the placing of it in His Excellency's hands, the meeting of parliament, and the delivery of that speech by His Excellency? What, I ask, could possibly have occurred, or what have you been told occurred, during those two or three days to lead them to the conclusion which impelled them to take so important a step as they have done? Had they come to me previously to the meeting of parliament, had they met me in council and said, 'We disagree with the policy which you have laid down'; had they said that there was, in any single particular, a difference of opinion upon the great issues that were agitating the people of the country, and they could not, by any possibility, be a party to it; or had they gone further and said, 'After one year and a quarter's experience of you as head of the government, we have lost confidence in your ability to continue to direct the affairs of the country,' then I could have understood it. Then I could have said, 'Take the reins of government; I will not stand in the way.' And I never shall stand in the way of the future success of that great party to which I have had the honour of belonging from boyhood up, and towards which I have done something for its prosperity and continuance in governing.

Sir Mackenzie Bowell showed the honesty of his intentions in that respect, by finally vacating the Premiership for the gentleman who now holds the proud position of leader of the opposition, and who was Premier of Canada for six weeks or so. It is, you will notice, a matter for doubt as to whether Sir Mackenzie Bowell by resigning, did anything to contribute to the continuance of the Conservative party in power. However that be, it is to the credit of Sir Mackenzie Bowell that he sacrificed himself for what he thought were the best interests of his party. Sir Mackenzie continued to say:

You will note, however, one sentence in this explanation which might leave a false impression upon the minds of the readers in the country. I refer to this paragraph: 'This we have repeatedly urged upon the Premier, with the result that we found ourselves face to face with parliament having a government with its numbers incomplete, and with no assurance that the present Premier could satisfactorily complete it.' He says, 'nevertheless we have unitedly and loyally striven to the best of our ability to make it strong and efficient.' That is referring to the government. I shall not comment upon that statement. I could, however, characterize it in other language than that in which the sentence is couched, and more than that, with no less degree of truth.

I have no doubt that the poor old gentleman could have truthfully characterized that statement in language which would not be considered parliamentary.

Then they state that they waited upon me repeatedly, in order to insist upon the government being strengthened in its personnel. That is quite true, but is there a single word in any of those sentences which would lead you or might lead others, after what has been whispered about the country, to conclude that it was the head of the government they were striking at instead of the other members of the government?

He admits that these conspirators had come to him with the statement that the government ought be reconstructed, but they never dropped him the least hint that they wanted to reconstruct the government by cutting off his head, which was their real intention:

It is true that they waited upon me and pointed out the necessity of strengthening the government, as all governments ought to be strengthened, and according to my own views, I should acquiesce in any proposition of that kind, and there were intimations at those interviews pointing to certain members of the government who, in their opinion, ought to go out.

It would be interesting to know who these were. They seem not only to have quarrelled with their head, but among themselves. They had forgotten that birds in their little nests should agree, and so these little ministerial birds were quarrelling amongst each other, and trying to oust each other from their comfortable nest. In these remarks Sir Mackenzie, I think, intended to make a serious statement; but, whether consciously or unconsciously, he has presented us with one of the finest bits of humour that have ever been got off in the Senate or in this body.

A little further on in his remarks he refers to another trouble that had arisen in his Cabinet. Two of the junior members, hardly yet fledged, had been disagreeing with each other, and certainly doing something other than preening one another's feathers, and keeping each other neat and pretty:

A debate took place in the other Chamber yesterday in reference to an unfortunate disagreement arising from anonymous letters which were received by me charging one of my colleagues with misconduct. It has been so put by some people as to lead to the conclusion that I had something to do with the nefarious transaction. The facts are simply these, and after stating them I shall leave it to the House and the country to judge how far I was justified in the course that I pursued. We were sworn into office, after the death of the Right Hon. Sir John Thompson, on the 21st day of December, 1894, in the city of Montreal. I received an anonymous letter from Montreal, dated 18th December, 1894, just three days before the government had been sworn into office, charging Sir Adolphe Caron with certain dereliction of duty, which if proved to be true would end his political life. That letter was not sent to His Excellency as has been stated in the newspapers, nor were any of them sent to the Governor General. They were sent to me as the head of the government. I at once placed that letter in the hands of Sir Adolphe Caron, as it was my duty to do. He produced affidavits and evidence to show that the charges which had been laid against him were untrue, and to the satisfaction of other parties whose names need not be introduced in a debate of this kind. During the summer, Sir Adolphe informed me that he had some suspicions as to the writer. He said that he had sent the letters to an expert and a detective in New York in order to ascertain whether the anonymous letter bore any of the characteristics of the letters which accompanied them. A report came back which he showed to me. I read it carefully. I confess it was rather an ingenious report, and my remark to Sir Adolphe Caron was this, 'I know very little about expert testimony of this kind, but I do not conceive it possible that a minister of the Crown would write a letter of that kind to another colleague, and I would suggest to you the propriety of disabusing your mind upon a question of that kind.' He asked for the envelope, but I had thrown it into the waste basket and lost it. I suppose most men in my position receive anonymous letters continually, I often receive them, finding fault with my colleagues and giving information. As a rule they go into the waste basket or into the fire. On the 9th November, 1895, I received another letter purporting to come from the same party who had sent the first one. That I handed to Sir Adolphe Caron. Comparing it with the first he said that they were written by the same hand, and again he expressed his opinion as to the writer. I dealt with the matter then as I had done before. I did not consider it of sufficient importance, on my part, to insult a colleague by asking him for an explanation or laying it before him. Indeed I should have very little else to do if I were to continue carrying the tales which are brought to me, either anonymously or otherwise about one colleague or another. The matter remained in the position which I have described until the day of the opening of parliament. After the opening a gentleman belonging to the other House followed me along the corridor to the Senate and asked me about those letters. I gave him no information whatever, but asked him what he knew about them. He then said he knew that certain letters had passed and that Sir Adolphe Caron had accused one of his colleagues of writing them.

Such mutual confidence existed within the limits of that government that Sir Adolphe Caron accused one of his colleagues of having written a slanderous anonymous letter about him. We do not know whether that colleague did so or not ; but the fact that one member of a cabinet made such an accusation against another member of the same cabinet is certainly instructive. Sir Mackenzie goes on to refer to the common talk in the Albany club in Toronto about the affair, and says further :

I said at the same time, in fact on both occasions, and I repeat now, that I could not conceive it possible that any man having the slightest regard for his own reputation, or having regard for the solemn oath which he had taken as a privy councillor, could by any possibility be guilty of writing anonymous letters, and therefore I treated it in the manner that I have indicated to this House until I heard that it had become the common talk of the city of Toronto, and then I deemed it my duty to inform my colleague of what had been said.

Although Sr Mackenzie Bowell did not believe that one of his colleagues was guilty of such a thing, the colleagues believed it of each other, because those of us who sat in this House at that time remember the scimmages that occurred between Sir Adolphe Caron, then Postmaster General, the member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), then Minister of Agriculture, and the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), then Controller of Customs, as to who had written the slanderous letter. Sir Adolphe Caron thought the hon. member for Haldimand was the author of it ; the hon. member for Haldimand insinuated that the hon. member for West York was the author ; and the hon. member for West York, doing credit to the Irish blood which I suppose he possesses, insinuated, or asserted very clearly, I am not sure which, that the hon. member for Haldimand was the guilty party. I remember very well the phrase he used—that the Minister of Agriculture had forged an anonymous letter in his name. To forge a letter in a man's name is bad enough, but to forge an anonymous letter in another man's name is something that very few villains are capable of. Various other matters were discussed, and one of the hon. gentlemen threatened to sue another in the courts, but we have heard no more of that. Either the difficulty was straightened out, or it was given up as a bad job, for fear something too nasty would be brought to light. Considering that the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster), the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart), the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), and the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), who are still sitting in this House, thought all the rest of the cabinet unworthy of being their associates, and that the other part of the cabinet felt about in the same way towards them, there is reason to believe that they must have thought each other a very queer collection of statesmen indeed. Perhaps what the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) once called them across the floor of the House, was not misapplied : ' A cabinet ? Yes, a cabinet, but a cabinet of antiques.' Perhaps they were not all antique ; but they were a little rococo, at all events.

That was the position of things early in the session ; but what followed ? Those gentlemen who left the government stood out for a certain time—nine days ; the exact length of time is not very important ; and then they came back to the same leader they had denounced as incapable, and to colleagues who, they had declared, were incapable of constituting a strong government. They came back to those they had betrayed and insulted ; and why did they come back ? I can only answer in the excellent phrase which my hon. friend from South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) uttered at the time : They came back for seven reasons, and those seven reasons were ' five loaves and two small fishes.' It was one of the cleverest things that hon. gentleman ever said. Which of them got the minnows and which the cake I do not know. That was the sort of happy family that ruled Canada in the last year of Conservative domination. If they were called upon to form a cabinet, I do not think they could form one without calling on the list of those concerned in that little embroglio ; and I think, taking their own statements about each other on that occasion, the country will consider that not one of those seven, at all events, are fit to be taken into a cabinet the members of which could rely upon and be loyal to each other. I therefore move for the papers connected with this interesting and half-forgotten episode.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am not aware that there is any correspondence upon this subject, at any rate, anything at all official, but if there is it will be brought down.

Motion agreed to.

BOARD OF RAILWAY COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. T. O. DAVIS (Saskatchewan) moved :

That this House is of opinion that the public interest demands that the railway companies of Canada should, at the earliest possible moment, be brought under the control of a board of railway commissioners, clothed with full power to enforce the provisions of the Railway Act, and to prescribe and enforce the observance of such regulations as may be necessary in the public interest.

He said : This question was already discussed in this House during the last two sessions. In the first session of 1897, it was brought before the House by the late member for Winnipeg (Mr. Jameson) and then discussed at length ; and during the next session it was again brought up by the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Rutherford) and also discussed at some length. At that time I think the statement was made on behalf of the government that the matter would receive consideration in the near future, and I am happy to say that some mention is made of it in the address.

The question of the appointment of a railway commission is one which largely affects the people, not only of the North-west Territories, but of the whole country from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The railway companies in this country have been given large subsidies in lands and moneys by the late government, and I am sorry to say that the late government did not keep proper control over the freight rates or tolls on these railways. In the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway, I believe that even the appointment of a railway commission would not afford any relief because of the ten per cent clause in the agreement between that company and the government, unless the government does something in the way of buying off the Canadian Pacific Railway in the same manner as they did in connection with the contract for building the Crow's Nest Pass road. But there are other railways in this country. There are the branch lines that have been subsidized by large grants of public lands, and in some cases by cash subsidies from the public treasury, which have no clause of that kind in their charter and are therefore subject to be dealt with by the government. Of course we have the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, which is supposed to deal with matters of that kind when brought to its attention, but it is composed of a very busy body of men, and the business of the country is growing too rapidly for them to deal with that matter in a way satisfactory to the people. New transportation companies are being created from year to year and the trade of the country is growing by leaps and bounds, and it is high time something was done by the government to obtain some proper control over the railway corporations of this country and their freight rates in order to prevent discrimination.

In the North-west Territories we are certainly in a very bad position in that respect. Let me give a few figures of the rates on some of the lines up there, for instance, from Winnipeg to further west in the territories. The freight on coal oil from Petrolia to Winnipeg, a distance of 1,400 miles, is something like 62 cents, and from the city of Winnipeg to the town of Prince Albert, some 600 miles, it is two cents more, or, I think, 66 cents. Now, I consider it is hardly fair that the people of the North-west Territories should have to pay more than double for the hauling of the commodities we have to consume than the people in the eastern parts of the country where the freight rates are regulated by competition. Take the branch lines, the rates on wheat and every other commodity are excessive, and if we are to fill that western country up with population, if we are to build up that country, the government will have to take control of the rates, through a board of railway commissioners, and force the railway companies to treat the people in a proper spirit. Take the rate on wheat from Winnipeg to Port Arthur, a distance of 435 miles in round figures. It is 14 cents per hundred. It used to be 17 cents per hundred until the bargain made by the government with the Canadian Pacific Railway in connection with the Crow's Nest Pass line, under which they got a reduction of three cents per hundred on the wheat going to Port Arthur; and when I tell the House that that three cents reduction alone has been the means of placing close on $1,000,000 of money into the pockets of the farmers of the North-west Territories, I think the House will agree with me that if we had a proper supervision over the railway companies in all parts of this country, a great deal more would go into the pockets of our farmers than does at present. Contrast the 14 cents per hundred rate from Winnipeg to Port Arthur with that charged from Chicago to Buffalo, a thousand miles by water, and then from Buffalo to New York, some 448 miles, we find that the shipper from Chicago to New York has to pay some eight cents over that distance of 1,450 miles as compared with 14 cents charged the shipper from Winnipeg to Port Arthur over a distance of only 435 miles. The House will see at once, therefore, the difficulties under which the people of the North-west are labouring.

I was amused the other day, when the discussion on the transportation problem was before this House, to hear the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) get up and correct the hon. Minister of Public Works with reference to the freight on grain between Buffalo and New York. I think the Minister of Public Works made the statement that the price for hauling grain—I suppose, on the average, because it fluctuates—was six cents. The hon. member for West Toronto got up in his place and said the Minister of Public Works was wrong, that the rate was only 2½ cents. I suppose he meant 2½ cents a bushel, but he did not make it clear whether this was the rate per bushel or the rate per hundred pounds. In the former case it would mean somewhere in the neighbourhood of four cents per hundred pounds. The hon. member, who is a director of the Canadian Pacific Railway, should have considered the meaning of this statement of his, for his company charges the people of Manitoba and the North-west Territories fourteen cents for the service the New York Central performs for four cents—a difference of ten cents per hundred pounds. There could hardly be more striking evidence that the freight rates that the people of the North-west have to pay are excessive.

Look at the bearing of this question on the future of the country. I think it is acknowledged by every person that the future prosperity and greatness of Canada depends on the opening of the great North-west. We have spent a great deal of money in developing that country; but I am sorry to say that, up to the present time, we have not gained the results we should have gained, considering the large expenditure of public money that has been made. What is the reason? In my opinion, the principal reason is to be found in the exorbitant freight rates that the settler has had to pay to the railways of the country. It is a common saying in that country that the farmer is farming on shares with the railway companies. Supposing a farmer had a hundred steers to ship to market, when he got them to the railway station, he would have to divide them, fifty for the railway company and fifty for himself. And then, when he got them to market, he would have to divide them again, and give twenty-five of them to the railway company to pay for bringing back the commodities that he needs in carrying on his operations as a farmer. So, the farmer gets only one-quarter of what he raises. We know that we are in a peculiar position—two thousand miles from the head of navigation at the port of Montreal and three thousand miles from the seaboard; and so we do not expect and cannot expect to get freight rates as low as are given to the people of Ontario. At the same time, we do expect that the government will step in and see that we are not discriminated against by the railway companies. Take, for instance, the question of coal oil. It is stated in the press representing hon. gentlemen opposite that it is because of the Standard Oil Company coming in here and acquiring refineries that the present situation as regards coal oil has arisen; and it is contended that the government should step in and prevent that sort of thing. But that is a peculiar position. If a man owned an oil refinery in Pretrolea, and wished to sell it, and an American corporation offered to buy it, is it reasonable to expect the government to step in and prevent the sale? If any person in Ottawa wanted to sell property and an American corporation were willing to give more for it than any one else, would he not think it a very strange thing for the government to step in and prevent him selling? It seems to me that there is nothing in that argument. The whole question is one of freight rates. With proper freight rates and no discrimination, the coal oil trouble would not exist as it does to-day.

As I said, this question has an intimate bearing on the future of the North-west, and so of the whole country. We have been trying to get immigration, and if we have not been as successful as we should have been, it is because of these excessive freight rates. For if people wish to emigrate from Europe or any other place, they look up this question of freight rates and all others affecting their residence in the country. They find that in Australia and New Zealand the government owns the railroads; they find in the United States there is proper control; while in this country they find there is no government ownership, nor is there any proper government control. They find that the Canadian Pacific Railway is allowed ten per cent on the capital invested—well, I can hardly say the capital invested, for, with the way they have been watering the stock, I do not think we need look for relief through that condition for a long time to come. There is no railroad commission to regulate the rates as there is in other countries that are more progressive than we are. And intending immigrants, finding this, go to some other place. They find that the Argentine Republic and other countries are opening up and coming into competition with us; and the cream of the emigration from England, Ireland, Scotland and elsewhere is going to these countries. Complaint is made sometimes of the class of immigrants we receive, and it is said we are not getting our share of immigrants from the British Isles. One reason why we are not getting as good a class of people as we should is that intelligent people, acquainted with the condition of the country as to railroads, go to some other countries where they are not tied up by monopolies as we are, and so we do not get the class of people into the North-west that we would get if we had proper supervision over the roads.

Not only would the appointment of a railway commission be beneficial in the way of regulating freight rates and preventing discrimination, but it would be advantageous in other ways. We have a network of railways over a large part of the older provinces, and they are increasing in the west; and it is only proper that there should be somebody that would have jurisdiction over them. Suppose, for instance, a poor farmer in the west or in any part of the country has a cow, horse or other animal that gets on the track and is killed. The farmer makes a demand on the railroad corporation, and the railroad corporation will write him a letter—a very nice letter, no doubt. They will sympathize with him; but sympathy will not get him another animal. They will put him off from day to day; and even if he puts the case in the hands of a solicitor they will tell him that they will not pay him at all. An ordinary man cannot afford to go to law with a rich corporation like the Grand Trunk Railway or the Canadian Pacific Railway. If he does, the corporation will carry the case from court to court until the poor man is ruined and cannot go on with it. The result is that he loses his money and does not get paid for his animal. If we had a railroad commission, the farmer could send in his claim to them, for the commission would be supposed to stand between the common people and the railroad corporations. In such a case as I have spoken of, the commission would investigate the claims, and, if they found that the claimant had justice on his side, they would see to it that the railway company would have to pay for the animal. In that case the railroad corporations would not be dealing with the individual but they would be dealing with the state. And so on all along the line. If a railway corporation refused to give proper accommodation to a farmer for crossing the track, there again a railroad commission would step in and see that the farmer or any other person would get relief in that respect. Again, in the building of bridges, the railroad commission would be able to step in again.

I have here, Mr. Speaker, the report of the Railroad Commission of the State of Ohio for 1897, containing a full account of all the transactions of that commission. We find they give all the correspondence between the commissioners and the different railroad corporations that they have had dealings with. We find in this report that they have dealt with a large range of subjects. We find they have settled questions about killing animals on the track, about crossings over the track, about the construction of bridges, about giving increased facilities around stations for the people to handle their stuff. We find they have settled overcharges where some man went into a ticket office and was overcharged for a ticket between two places; he applied to the railroad commission, and that was settled to the satisfaction of the complainant. We find again, where an overcharge has been made on carloads of freight, that the railroad commission stepped in and settled it to the advantage of the party complaining. We find again in other places that they have dealt with the question of elevators and storehouses. That is one of the greatest questions in this country, it was brought up by the hon. member for Eastern Assiniboia last session, and he has it again on the Order paper to-day. We find that this railroad commission in the State of Ohio dealt with this question. We find that in some place where there were not sufficient facilities for shipping grain around certain stations, the residents of that part of the country made a complaint to the railroad commission, who took it up and found out the amount of grain that was to be shipped from there, found out the facilities there were for handling it, and ordered the railroad corporation to give certain lands to parties who wished to build not only elevators but flat warehouses, and to afford conveniences for the people to ship their commodities. We find again that in respect to putting up warehouses for handling other commodities besides grain, putting up cattle yards, giving facilities to cattle shippers, the railroad commission have stepped in and settled all those disputes to the satisfaction of the people.

There was another question that came up in this House last year, and I am sorry to say the Bill dealing with it did not go through the House, that is the question of allowing a railroad corporation, subsidized by public money, to go into any part of the country and to shunt a town already built up by the industry of the people, to put it to one side and build another town of their own. That fact was brought up in this House last year, and I am sorry to say that the Bill affording relief was opposed by the leader of the opposition in this House, or in the committee, and for that reason it did not pass the House. We have suffered in that respect in the North-west Territories, and we know whereof we speak. There was a case occurred in my own town. After the people of this country had subsidized the Regina, Long Lake and Saskatchewan Railway Company to the extent of 6,400 acres of land per mile, and $80,000 a year in cash for twenty years, for running that road, will you believe, Mr. Speaker, that at every town that had been established, built up by the industry and labour of the settlers in that country before the railway came in there, this railroad corporation actually shunted every one of those towns? They came in the first place to the town of Saskatoon, a very thriving little village, they crossed the river, cut it out, and surveyed another town of their own. Again they went down to the town of Duck Lake, another thriving village, where the people had built a mill and several stores; they shunted that town, and surveyed another town of their own. When they came to Prince Albert, the largest town in the district of Saskatchewan, will you believe it, Mr. Speaker, they actually stood outside the town and came in and held, so to speak, a pistol to the heads of the people and said: If you don't give us the half of your property in this town we won't come into it. Here was a corporation that had been given by this country, according to the value that they were selling the lands for, and the cash they had got from the public treasury in one way and another, not less than $20,000 a mile for the construction of a road that did not cost more than $10,000 a mile; they were allowed to come up and hold the pistol to the heads of the people and demand the half of their property before they would agree to build a station, threatening to build another town of their own. That is not a proper thing to be allowed. This railroad commission in Ohio had taken up questions like that and settled them to the satisfaction of the people. I find a case where the railroad commission took a similar question up, a case where the railroad corporation had entered into an agreement with an individual to acquire a certain amount of land. This gentleman who had a farm in the locality where they proposed to put a station, offered to give them five or six acres of very valuable land at the corner of his farm if they would establish their station and keep a station agent in it. They got a deed of the land, registered it, and put a station there, and placed an agent in it, they kept him there for one year, and then they took the station agent away, closed up the station and went off and built another one. This gentleman applied to the railroad commission,—the whole of the correspondence is in this report—and they settled that question to the satisfaction of the complainant who had the grievance. So I claim that if the government were to take this question up now and appoint this railroad commission, it would be one of the best pieces of legislation that could be passed in the House this year.

Now, people talk about the transportation problem, but there is no use talking about the transportation problem until you have some means of regulating the gentlemen who are doing the transporting of our products. Of course there is a provision in the Railway Act, and you will say that the Railway Committee of the Privy Council should deal with them. But we know, as a matter of fact, that the Canadian Pacific Railway in the North-west Territories on one occasion violated the provisions of the Railway Act of this country, when they refused to take, as common carriers, the produce of the farmers and draw it out of the country. They entered into an agreement with the elevator men that they would take no produce from any parties unless it came through their elevators. As common carriers they were bound to take the produce from the farmers or any one else when it was offered to them: but in this case they violated the provisions of that Act. This had been going on for several years until the member for Eastern Assiniboia brought in his Bill to this House for the regulation of the grain trade in the North-west Territories. At that time it was found that they had been thus breaking the provisions of the Act, and of course, as soon as the member for Eastern Assiniboia brought in his Bill, the coon came down, they acknowledged that they had been breaking the law. Now, if we had a proper railroad commission to look after these things it would be impossible for them to break the law in that way. If they are breaking it in one instance, they must be breaking it all over the Dominion of Canada in different ways that have not yet been brought to the attention of the House or of the country.

As I said before, there is no use talking about the transportation problem until something of this kind is done. The transportation problem is a great one. We have heard an hon. gentleman discuss it in this House in a way that I am sure leads one to believe that he had given it a good deal of thought. But at the same time the first thing to do is to have a properly organized railroad commission who will be able to force these railway corporations to live up to the spirit and the letter of the Act, and who will also see that there is no discrimination in freight rates. I myself have had some experience in connection with freight rates. I wrote to the railroad corporation asking them why the rate was higher between my town and the town of Winnipeg than it was between Winnipeg and the east. I pointed out that the distance was only one-half, still they charged me more for bringing stuff 600 miles than they did other people for taking it 1,400 miles. They acknowledged the corn, and they said it was because there was competition and they could not afford to carry it cheaper. That is exactly the reason they charge these high freight rates, it is because they can discriminate as they please, and the people have no way of getting relief except through the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. That is a proper body, no doubt, if they are applied to, to take the question up at the time and to deal with it. Every man in the Dominion of Canada cannot come to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, in order to get them to take up a question of this kind. Now, the next question is, Mr. Speaker, providing that the government did anything in the matter of the appointment of a railway commission, is to consider how many commissioners should be appointed, and the kind of men to be appointed on that commission. In the first place, in order to have an efficient commission, the government of the day would have to be very particular about the selection of the parties to compose this commission, because, if you allowed politics to enter into it—I do not care what government is in power—the commission would be practically useless to all intents and purposes, as far as the public is concerned. The commission should be appointed in such a way that it could not be dismissed without a two-third vote of the House of Commons, or in some way like the Auditor General, so that it would not be under the control of any political party at all. Then if you appointed good men to the commission, and if they were appointed in that way, the people would get great benefit from the work of such a commission. The government would have to be very careful about the kind of men they selected. In the first place it would be necessary that you should have a man who understands all about freight rates and railway management, so that he would be able to go into railway questions and questions of freight rates, either with the managers of railways, or the presidents of railway corporations, so that he would be enabled to hold his own, because the moment a man, not so qualified, undertakes to discuss freight rates with a man in the railway business, with the president of a road or the manager of the freight department, he is certainly working at a disadvantage, as it is almost impossible for any man to understand the mass of figures they will place before him. They will juggle these figures backward and forward and tell you about rates and so on, and you will go out knowing as much about rates as you did when you went in. The government should secure a man who is thoroughly competent to hold his own when confronted by experts, and who would not be hoodwinked or blindfolded by these railway men. Such a man can be secured in this country. I do not think there will be any difficulty; they get them in the United States, in England and in other countries, where they have railway commissions, and I do not see why we cannot get them here. If we want a man of that kind, we must be prepared to pay him, because the services of a man of that kind are valuable. Look at the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway corporation. That corporation pays its president $50,000 a year. I suppose that when the freight rate between Port Arthur and Winnipeg is cut down from 14 cents to 6 cents a hundred, it will probably have to reduce the salary of the president of the road, but in the meantime, he is getting $50,000 a year. I understand that the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company is getting a very large salary, and when you come down to the smaller corporations all over the country, you find that these little tuppenny-ha'penny roads that do not amount to a hill of beans, are actually paying their presidents more than the Prime Minister of this country is getting. If we want a good man, we must be prepared to pay him well. If we had three members of a railway commission getting $10,000 a year each, they would not be getting any too much, because we have to put them in an independent position, so that they will be independent of the public in every way and so that they will be able to see, the same as our judges do, that justice is meted out to all classes of the community. If you get men like that, you cannot get them for less than $10,000 each. Suppose you get your man who understands freight rates, you will have to pay him as much as that. The next thing we have to do is to put a first-class lawyer on the commission. You cannot get the services of a first-class lawyer for anything less than $10,000 a year, because any first-class lawyer in the country, any man who has a reputation, such as the government would be justified in putting on that commission, would certainly be able to make $10,000 a year out of his profession. Therefore, a man of that kind would not go on the commission unless he was getting as much as he was making out of his practice. If we are going to appoint any one at all, we must have a first-class legal man on the commission. Some years ago, in discussing the subject of a commission in this House, an hon. gentleman said that what was wanted was a business man, a lawyer and a man of common sense. He must have assumed that lawyers and business men were not men of common sense, when he made that statement. We want besides a lawyer and a railway man, a man of common sense. We want a first-class business man, and if we are going to get a first-class business man, we must give him first-class pay, because, a business man, such as the government would be justified in appointing on a commission of that kind, could make $10,000 a year out of his business. Take some of the larger firms in Montreal, in Toronto, and in the different large mercantile centres, and there is no doubt that some of the members of these firms are making $10,000 a year. Such a man would not leave a business of that kind to be placed on a commission unless he was going to get just as much as he was getting before. It may look to be quite a proposition to say that if we secure three such men, we must pay them $30,000 a year, but, what is $30,000 a year to the people of this great Dominion? As I pointed out, on the three cents a bushel reduction that the government got out of the Crow's Nest Pass bargain, on the crop of Manitoba and the North-west Territories last year, it amounted to something near $1,000,000 saved to the people of Manitoba and the North-west Territories, because every cent saved on the export of a bushel of wheat goes directly into the pocket of the producer of that bushel of wheat. Every cent that is saved on the transport of any other commodity in this country, goes directly into the pocket of the consumer of that commodity. With five millions of people, what is $30,000 a year to pay a railway commission to control the vast railway and transportation interests in this country of ours? The government, in appointing a railway commission should see that we get the very best men that can be obtained in any portion of this country, even if they cost us $40,000 a year, the money would be well spent, because it would be returned to the people a hundredfold. It would not be well spent for the railway corporations, because a first-class railway commission would see that these corporations did what was right. The hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), in that beautiful language of his, spoke the other day about these millionaires, who are making their money out of this country, and who are living in their palatial residences in New York and other places. They would not be able to keep as large a staff around them if we had a railway commission to see that they did not take any more than their pound of flesh from the people of this country. Mr. Speaker, I have dealt with this question at length : I hope it will bring forth a good discussion from the members of this House, because it is one of the most important questions that we can deal with to-day. The transportation problem is to-day the greatest problem we have to deal with in Canada. The largest fertile portion of our country lies 3,000 miles from the seaboard and 2,000 miles from Montreal, the head of ocean navigation. The great question that the people, not only of the west but of the east, have to deal with, is to solve the problem of how we are to get our products from the far interior to the markets of the world, cheaply and quickly. It is time for us to solve that question. Mr. Speaker. The government has dealt with it in deepening our canals to 14 feet, and they are to spend money at Port Colborne and so on, but there is no use spending $80,000,000 on canals when a great railway corporation is allowed to charge as much for carrying grain 400 miles, as the water transportation companies charge for carrying it 2,000 miles. So long as that state of things exists the people can get no relief. We require to have some control over these railway corporations, and until we have, we will be at their mercy. In the east, water competition to some extent does regulate the freight rate, but in the west we have no great water stretches and the difficulties we labour under are all the greater. It is for that reason that I say that this is the most important question that can occupy the attention of parliament this year. I beg, Mr. Speaker, to move the resolution.

Mr. N. F. DAVIN (West Assiniboia). I want, Mr. Speaker, to call attention to an extraordinary state of things. Here is a most important resolution, and while the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davis) was discussing it, and discussing it at considerable length, the Treasury benches were empty, with the exception of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), and the Minister of Customs was engaged in an interesting conversation with the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood), and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) was in cloudland respecting his future budget. Sixteen ministers of the Crown ! Three more than these gentlemen opposite declared was a monstrous superfluity, and when the most important question that this House can consider was being discussed, during the whole time that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davis) was discussing it—and I must say that his speech showed he had paid some attention to the question—not a minister connected with any department that would have to deal with this matter was in his place. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair), apparently of malice prepense absented himself, and for that there might be several reasons. He might want to show disrespect to the member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis), and what occurred would seem to favour that view, because the moment the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davis) had taken his seat ; as though the secretary had been posted and sentinel stationed to inform him when that desirable event had taken place ; that moment in walked the Minister of Railways, with that solemn and impressive air which characterizes him. The Prime Minister was not in his place, and the Young Napoleon whose henchman—not even second to the member that hails from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Rutherford)—the Young Napoleon, whose henchman the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) is ; the Young Napoleon lay hidden away in the deep recesses of his office or offices in his building. Where was the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) while this question was being discussed ?

Mr. DAVIN. Ah no, not taking a dancing lesson now. My information is that he is long proficient, and that he can give lessons in that interesting science in which he was once a mere pupil and acolyte. I say, Sir, that the hon. member for Saskatchewan has a grievance against the ministry and a special grievance against the Minister of Railways, and the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), because a snub has been placed upon him. The moment he rises up, the Treasury benches pretty well filled become deserted, and for three-quarters of an hour by the clock he dilates upon the necessity of having a railway commission. He brings forward arguments that he deemed worthy of the attention of the Minister of Railways, and the Minister of Railways was conspicuous by his absence, and the Minister of the Interior was conspicuous by his absence, and the chair which is usually attentively occupied by the Prime Minister ; that chair was vacant. There may have been another reason. The Minister of Railways may have thought, and the ministry generally may have thought, that if they behaved in this manner the question would not be discussed ; that it would be treated with the same contempt with which they treated the mover (Mr. Davis) and that thus they would be spared the disagreeable necessity of giving their opinions upon it. Sir, when this question was brought up in the House before, by one of our colleagues (Mr. Jameson) who has passed away, it was quite clear from the manner in which the Minister of Railways discussed it, and from the manner in which the Minister of the Interior treated it, that it was a subject that they considered required very delicate handling from the standpoint of this government. There were influences, shadowy, unseen to the ordinary eye, but real in their effectiveness over these gentlemen the moment they came to deal with the proposal to have a railway commission. Now that a distinguished supporter of the minister has brought this matter before the House, we certainly are entitled to hear from the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) what is the intention of the government. This matter has engaged our attention in this House again and again, and the time has passed to make of this Chamber a mere debating society in regard to a question like this. The gentleman (Mr. Davis) who introduced the motion, concluded as though he did not mean business, for he said: All I want is discussion. In view of the fact that this matter has been already frequently discussed, what is the object of bringing it forward in this way if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davis) does not mean business? Is it to throw dust in the eyes of those persons in the Saskatchewan who are interested in matters of this kind? Sir, I entirely decline to take an interest in a non-committal motion like this. It is introduced merely for the purpose of debating society rhetoric, and that is a thing we should not countenance in this House. But, since the hon. member (Mr. Davis) has brought it before the House, and at such length, we certainly are entitled to the opinion of the Minister of Railways as to the policy of the government on this important question which has agitated the country for so long. We ought to know from him what is his policy—what he intends to do; whether he intends to bring down a Bill to give us a strong railway commission such as will be able to deal with the varied question that arises as between the travelling public and those corporations who have had such extensive franchises granted to them from time to time by this parliament. For myself, I have no doubt whatever that a railway commission, with the condition which I think I was the first to propose in this House, that the persons composing it should be responsible, not to the government of the day, but to the parliament of Canada—should be appointed as judges are appointed, and removable as judges are removable—could not fail to be useful in the premises; and any measure like that coming from the government will have my hearty support. A railway commission appointed by the government of the day would not have my support, because it would only really be a buffer to the action of the minister, and instead of minimizing the abuses and evils that we wish to get rid of, would really aggravate them. I regret that a more definite motion was not brought forward by the hon. member. I regret still more what we witnessed while he brought it before the House; I regret it for the sake of the great constituency the hon. gentleman represents: empty Treasury benches, the ministry paying no attention to him whatever, but showing ostentatious disrespect to himself and his constituency. But as the subject must be familiar to the Minister of Railways, and as one of his supporters has brought the matter to the attention of the House even in his absence, and as he is here now, I suppose we may expect to hear from him what the policy of the government is.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). Mr. Speaker, the transportation problem is today one of the most difficult problems that either the parliament or the people of this country have to solve. There are evils cropping up from time to time, no matter what laws are made or what regulations control the railway companies as common carriers, and these evils call for some methods of adjustment. We have only two means of conveying the products of the people from where they are produced to the markets of the world—the railways and the canals; and the government of the country has seen fit from time to time to expend very large sums of money for the purpose of perfecting these highways of commerce in the interest of the people who use them; yet up to the present they have been unable in my judgment properly to protect the interests of those people. A comparison between the two highways might fairly be made. While we spend large sums of money to build railways, we do it for the purpose of bringing the conveniences of life within the reach of all. For the same reason we spend large sums of money for the improvement of our canals. But when you go that far there is a divergence. In the one case the government uses the money for making a public highway which is open to all on equal terms. Every one can use the canals, which are, comparatively speaking, free for the purpose of transporting the products of the farm, the field, the workshop, the mine or the forest to the markets of the world. But in the other case, when your product is laid down at the railway, you are met with a very exorbitant tax, which is taken off the product for transporting it to the market where it is sold. Now, how much money have we spent for the purpose of providing these conveniences for the people? On the railways of Canada we have spent, up to the end of the financial year 1897, no less than $139,335,405, as subsidies; and yet we have at the same time given over into the hands of soulless corporations the power to control these great highways of commerce, and to tax the people of the country to an extent only limited by the avarice of these corporations themselves. On the other hand, we have expended for the building of our canals $70,750,000. But, as I have said, there is this distinction between the two, that the canals are practically free to every man in the country to use to the fullest extent possible, whereas the railways become the property of soulless corporations to whom we have given power to tax the people to almost any extent they see fit, and they exact from the people who use the railways for the transportation of the products of the country, every dollar which the product will bear, and it goes into the insatiable maw of these corporations. Yet we do not pretend to control them in any way. Is this in the interest of the people of the country, either the producers or the consumers? In my judgment it is not. Although parliament has not yet solved this great problem, it is in my judgment capable of solution, and it is the duty of the government to take it up and grapple with it at the earliest possible moment. It is for that purpose the government is in existence and controlling the various interests of the country. Those who have invested their money in railways have the right to expect that, under proper management, their operations will yield a reasonable interest, upon the actual money they have put into them. Instead, however, of a reasonable interest on the money invested, these parties demand an interest likewise upon the money that the government has put into the construction of these lines. I never could understand why we should allow that to continue. For what purpose were these $139,000,000 given in the way of subsidies? It was for the purpose of cheapening the transportation of the products of the people from one part of the country to another. But I say the railway corporations expect more than they ought to get. Not only do they expect a reasonable interest on every dollar invested by them, but likewise an interest on every dollar of subsidy given by the country. That should not be allowed, and until parliament or some authority in the country deals with that question, the people will never enjoy those advantages which they have a right to expect from the expenditure by the country of this large amount of money given as subsidies for the building of railway lines. No effort has been made to control these companies, and what is the result? We find that in many parts of the country, exorbitant rates are charged. Take my own section of country, where I know what is going on better than I do what is going on elsewhere. We produce a large quantity of good firewood, which has to be sold in the cities. As firewood becomes scarcer and the demand becomes greater, the price goes up in the cities, but just as soon as the price goes up, up goes the railway rates, and the people who get out the firewood derive little or no benefit from the increase in price. The men who derive the benefit are not the men who get out the wood, but the railway companies, who are not willing even to give the producers a share of the enhanced price, but take the full benefit, or almost the full benefit, to themselves.

Mr. SPROULE.

In the section from which I come, we contributed a subsidy of $300,000 towards the building of a railway, and the first condition of the by-law granting that money, was that the railway should charge us not more than a certain tariff, for a certain number of years, but the company devised means to evade that tariff and the contract entered into, and they charge much higher rates than under that agreement they would be entitled to charge. What is the plea they put forth? They plead that the contract, which was for twenty years, has expired by the lapse of time, and that consequently, they are now in a position to charge what freight rates they please, and the result is that every cent of the increased value of that firewood to-day, goes into the insatiable maw of that company, and the poor farmer gets none of the benefit. I only give that as an illustration of what the railway companies do when we make no attempt to control them. What we require is a railway commission or some other authority in the country, which will exercise some control. While I am deeply impressed with the view that a railway commission may not be able to grapple with the difficulties that exist in connection with this transportation problem, still I believe, that the creation of a strong railway commission, acting under the countenance of the government, could not fail to have a beneficial effect. It would have the effect, at any rate, of bringing to light many of the anomalies which are carefully kept in the dark to-day, such as the advantages given by railway corporations to the Standard Oil Company, in the transportation of their oil, as against private corporations, engaged in the same business. It would have the effect of bringing to light the discrimination which is constantly made against the small shipper in favour of the large, against the single individual or private corporation, in favour of the corporations that become a great power in the shape of trusts and monopolies. A commission would bring these things to light to such an extent that at least the attention of the country would be directed towards them and public opinion become so strong that parliament would be compelled to grapple with this problem in the interests of the people. One result would be the devising of some means to determine exactly on what capital the railway corporations have a right to expect a return from the traffic which they carry over their lines. We want that better defined. In my opinion, what we require, is a law which will determine that every dollar that the country puts into these railways, is invested in the interests of the people, and not in the interests of these corporations, and that no railway company shall be allowed to earn interest on the investment of public money, but be compelled to carry traffic at cheaper rates, based on the proportion of public money thus invested.

When the Bill incorporating the Canadian Pacific Railway was before this House, I brought that question to the attention of parliament, but failed to get any response from the government of the day. I failed to obtain from the government of the day any declaration as to the principle on what the calculation of profit to the company should be based. At different times, the same question has been brought up by other hon. members, but up to the present no government has declared upon what basis that calculation should be made; and so far as we know, the railway companies that control transportation to-day, are earning an interest in many cases on the money which this country has put into their construction as well as on the money invested by private individuals. What is the result? The result is that by this expenditure, which was intended solely to be made in the interests of the people, we have created millionaires, we have enabled the men who control these railway corporations to live in palaces in the old country and in Canada, to luxuriate in wealth and splendour, and to grind down the people who are obliged to use these railways for the transportation of their goods. That sort of thing should not be allowed to continue; and although a railway commission could not perhaps control it, at least it would be brought to the attention of the government and the country, and we would then have more intelligent information which we could use in order to induce parliament to take control of this matter, as in my opinion, it should. Now, as I said before, the canals, upon which we have spent so much money are practically free, but the railways are not free. We have discrimination on freight rates, we have exorbitant charges to the injury of the people. We have many such instances as have been cited here of railways charging as much for the transport of freight as it costs to take it by team. The old Hudson's Bay freighters, a few years ago, took goods from Calgary away up to the Red Deer country for ten cents less per hundred pounds less than is charged by the railroads that we subsidized to the tune of thousands. That instance was cited in this House. The charge made by the Hudson's Bay freighters was 65 cents a hundred, while the railway corporations refused to take it for less than 75 cents a hundred, though we had given them large assistance to build that railway. We are told: Oh, that is in a portion of the country where the population is sparse and the freight to be transported is but a small quantity. But we find the same thing in Ontario, where the railways are taxed to their utmost capacity to transport the freight. Now, can we say that we are doing our duty to the country, that we are doing our duty to the people who sent us here, if we allow such a state of things to continue? We want a railway commission or something else to control these rates.

I have thought for some time past that we have reached that stage in the history of this country and of railway building when we should refuse to give subsidies to corporations to build railways. But, if we do give assistance toward the building of railways, every dollar we advance should be paid back to the people with a reasonable interest. In exceptional cases, whose special character has been well established, we might be justified in loaning money to promote railway extension without expecting any return in the shape of interest for a number of years; but we should at least expect the repayment of the principal sum that is advanced. Railway corporations have become very much like those people who go through the country looking for a bonus to settle in this town or in that and establish some enterprise there. Railway construction has produced a body of professionals in this line, who are working the parliament of the country, working political parties, and are bleeding the country to the extent of millions of dollars. They should pay back every dollar of the money that is advanced to them by the country. In addition to that, wherever we give a dollar of assistance to a railway, we should accompany it with a law which gives us control to prevent the company exacting exorbitant rates. The government should be empowered to examine and determine whether the freight rates they charge are exorbitant, and if they find them to be more than is reasonable, more than will pay a reasonable interest on the money invested in the railway, and keep the railway in repair, they should have the right to demand that the freight rates shall be lowered in the interest of the users of the railway. We shall only reach the position we ought to occupy when we see such a provision made. Parliament should not vote another dollar in subsidy or assistance to the construction of railways without having it accompanied with these conditions. We want a railway commission, if for no other reason than to arouse the government and make them alive to the necessities of the situation; the interest of the people and their own duty to exercise power to protect the public interest in this matter. It will at least call public attention to the matter and will assist in educating public sentiment in the country and making it so strong that no government can resist it. It will put the government in the same condition in relation to this matter that the present government was in with regard to sending contingents to South Africa. What did the First Minister say on that subject? He said, in effect: I did not intend, I did not think it was advisable, to send these contingents, but I found that public sentiment was so strong that we were obliged to act; no government could refrain from acting. We want a public sentiment on this subject of railway corporations so strong that if the government refuse to obey they will be relegated to oblivion at the first opportunity the people have of pronouncing upon their conduct. If a railway commission will do this, we should hail the day, and the earlier it comes the better for the people. Even if it will not do this, it may assist in preventing the railway corporations from practising the great injustices that they do on private individuals who must use these lines. It will assist in preventing the railways from favouring such great monopolies and trusts as the Standard Oil Company, the Sugar Trust and other trusts that are bleeding the country of every drop of blood it can spare. It will prevent discrimination between individuals and companies that use these railways. It will arouse attention to these anomalies, anomalies which must cease as soon as they receive the publicity they should receive. For these reasons, I stand to-day where I always stood on this question. I am prepared to support any government which will establish a proper tribunal to deal with this question. I believe that, in the interest of the people, it ought to be done. I believe that any government is doing less than its duty that does not deal with the question. It is said that it is a great problem. It is a great problem, but what is a government for if not to grapple with and solve such problems as this. This is what the government of the people expect of them.

I entertained great hopes of the present Minister of Railways and Canals, who gave us the intimation some years ago—and from year to year he has repeated it—of his intention to deal with this question. I will give him at least the credit of saying, that in my judgment, he has attempted in some ways to control the railways, not to the extent I should like, but at least to some extent. He raised our hopes in this regard when he intimated that the government had these things under consideration and would, in all probability, deal with them at an early day. But the early day has passed, and time is going on, and soon they will be called upon to go to the people again. But they have not yet grappled with this great problem. I will support them or any other who will grapple with it in the interests of the people; I will support the proposal to appoint a railway commission or any other tribunal that will have authority, if not wholly at least partially, to control railway corporations in the thousand and one injustices which they are doing to the people of this country who must use these lines of transportation, these highways of commerce that we have paid so much to bring within the reach of the people for their advantage and for their needs.

Mr. A. CAMPBELL (Kent, O.). I think the House owes its thanks to the hon. member for bringing forward this very important question. He has presented it to the House so fully and so exhaustively that scarcely anything more can be said in favour of it. The points and arguments which he has advanced show that he has given the matter a great deal of attention and a great deal of study, and I doubt if any other member in the House could make such a strong case and present such an array of strong arguments in support of the question he has brought forward so ably, as the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis). I have listened with a great deal of attention to the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule), and I am glad to know that even at this late date he is a convert to this proposal.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. He must remember that I have spoken nearly a dozen times in this House, in the same way, in support of the same principle.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think that last year, and possibly the year before, I heard his melodious voice in support of this question. But you will remember, Mr. Speaker, that although $139,000,000 of the people's money have been given by the Tory government to aid railways in this country, not a solitary word fell from him or from the government that he supported, in favour of this scheme. Why did they not bring it up in days gone by?

Mr. SPROULE. I do not think the hon. gentleman wishes intentionally to misrepresent me, but he certainly cannot know what took place in the House, or he would know that I have spoken of it often, even before he ever sat in this House.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Not until a change of government took place, and suddenly he wakes up to the great importance of the railway commission. He sat here and voted $139,000,000 of the people's money to aid railways all over this country, and he never insisted that the government of the day should control the rates and tariffs on those roads; or if he did, he had very little influence with the government which he supported. I know that the government of the day did not take any of those precautions that are so freely contended for by the present opposition. Suddenly, after a change of government has taken place, they change their tune, after this government has wisely guarded the interests of the people in the subsidies which they have voted to railways by inaugurating a new scheme that was never thought of by the old government. In the subsidies that were voted last year a provision was made that these railways should pay back to the people in the carriage of mails and freight to be sent over the roads, to the extent of every dollar that was given them by way of bonuses. This was a new provision, this was a new contention, this was a new era inaugurated, I am glad to say, by the Liberal government for the first time in the history of Canada. We know that the Minister of Railways and Canals has been looking into this matter, he has promised to give it his best consideration, and I have no doubt that in due course he will bring forward the legislation which I think ought to be granted. It is a matter that cannot be dealt with in a day. For eighteen long years the Conservative party ruled over this country, and during all that time they never gave the matter one bit of attention. This government have only been in power for three years and a half, but they have met and dealt with great and important questions, questions that the old government never had to contend with, questions that demanded the highest statesmanship, questions that deserved the most careful consideration of this parliament, and this government have met and handled these questions in a way that has secured for themselves the commendation of the people of this country, and that has shown the wisdom of the people of this country, when, in 1896, they changed their rulers. I believe that the wise course that they have pursued in relation to those questions shows statesmanship of the very highest order. It is no wonder that some of these questions have been delayed for a little while. It was impossible in that short time to deal with them in a way that their importance deserved. But I have no doubt from the statement of the Minister of Railways and Canals that this question will receive and has already received his earnest consideration.

To my mind there is no question, except perhaps the transportation question, which is so important as that of the railway commission, and these two questions may be considered as twin questions. They both interest the people of this country to a very great extent. I believe that the beneficial effects likely to flow from the establishment of a railway commission have been overestimated in the minds of many people. I do not believe that we may expect to receive the great benefits from a railway commission that some gentlemen think we would receive. I think that some means should be adopted by which rates granted on our various lines of railway should be controlled to a certain extent. But in reading the history of railway commissions in the United States, we find that there are still great grievances there, and many complaints, that the greatest trusts and monopolies to be found in the wide world are flourishing in the United States. Hence, I come to the conclusion that possibly a railway commission would not be a panacea for all the ills we have to bear. But I think the government will in due course look into this matter, and possibly devise some way by which the arbitrary, unjust and unfair rates that are given to Canadians should be terminated. I have had occasion at different times to look into this matter considerably, and consequently I listened with a great deal of attention and pleasure to the arguments that were advanced by the hon. gentleman who moved this resolution. While I know nothing of the unjust discrimination that he spoke of in the North-west, I do know that in the province of Ontario, from which I come, there are great discriminations in the rates of freight charged to the Canadian people. I have in my mind rates of freight from points in Ontario as compared with points in the United States, and it is a lamentable fact, a fact that does not do credit to the people of this country, that they have submitted to such unjust discriminations for so long a time. As many hon. members know, I am engaged in the milling business, and, therefore, know what the rates are on flour from points in Ontario to the maritime provinces. I know that in the city of Toronto, last year, the rates on flour to the city of Montreal for export, a distance of 334 miles, were 14½ cents per hundred pounds. Go five hundred miles farther west to the city of Chicago, and there you find that our Canadian railways are carrying flour for the Americans, right past our own doors, over our own railways, to the city of Montreal, for 15 cents a hundred pounds. In other words, they carry that flour from 500 miles farther west, for half a cent per hundred pounds more than they charge the millers of Ontario. If you go to Guelph or Galt, or Stratford, or Listowel, or to any of these milling points in Ontario, you will find that the millers there are charged half a cent a hundred pounds more to carry their flour from these points to Montreal, for export, than the Americans are from Chicago. If you went to Detroit, 280 miles west of Toronto, last year, you would have found that it was a fact, that the Americans could send their flour from Detroit to Montreal for 11½ cents a hundred, while the millers of Ontario were charged 14½ cents a hundred to send their flour to Montreal for export, thus discriminating against the people of Ontario. Although this rate is given on our produce for export, we have to compete against the wide world. Our flour goes into Newfoundland, or into the old country, on the same terms as the American flour, or that of any other manufacturer in the wide world, and while the discrimination on flour going into the maritime provinces for consumption does not affect us so much because the duty protects us to that extent, when we come to export flour, or apples, or pork, or cheese, or butter, or anything of this kind, we have to compete against the whole world. Therefore, I say that the discrimination that our railways are making against the people of Ontario is injuring very much the interests of the people of Ontario and of the Dominion of Canada. It does seem to me a peculiar state of affairs that when the government are wisely and intelligently developing, by all the means in their power, our foreign trade, by establishing fast steamship lines, by establishing a cold storage system that is the pride and glory of this Dominion, that has brought an enormous amount of wealth to the farmers of this country, that has increased and advanced the price of the produce of the farmers of this country enormously, that while the government are, in all the ways they can, stimulating the prosperity of the Dominion, establishing fast steamship lines to carry this produce to distant lands, establishing this system of cold storage by which it can be placed on the English market in the very best possible condition, that while all this is going on, the railways of this country, which, as my hon. friend said, have received $130,000,000 of the people's money, are thwarting the government, are preventing the results that would flow from the wise policy of the government, and are putting obstructions in the way by which the efforts of the government would be nullified and overruled. Therefore, I say that it becomes a question that demands the serious attention of the House. If we had the same rates of freight from points in Ontario that our American competitors have, it would enormously increase exportation and advance the prosperity of the people of this country, because it is a fact, that every cent by which you reduce the cost of transporting goods from one point to another is added to the price received by the producer. It does not make much difference to the manufacturers what rate of freight they pay, because they are all on the same level, but it does make a difference to the men who raise these commodities that I have named. If the rates on our butter, cheese, pork, apples, bacon, wheat and flour were the same as the rates charged to our American competitors, the consequence would be that the farmers of Ontario would receive that much more for their produce and it would enormously increase and advance the interest of the farmers of Ontario. Therefore, I say that it becomes a matter of importance, and I am glad to know that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) has already given his attention to it. I hope that he will continue to give attention to this subject, and that the matter will not be allowed to rest until some means are devised by which this unjust, this unfair, this unpatriotic course adopted by our railways shall be overcome. I see no reason why such a course should be pursued. You say to the railways: Why do you carry stuff for the Americans at a half a cent a hundred less than what you will carry it from Ontario? The reason is: We must do it; if we did not do it they have lines of steamships running up there, and American roads running in competition with us, and if we did not carry produce at that rate, we simply would not get the business. That is quite true, but it is no reason why they should carry stuff from Chicago for export, for 15 cents a hundred, and charge 15½ cents, from Guelph, Galt, Stratford, and Listowel to Montreal for export. The same rule should be applied to the Canadians at these points, to a certain extent. Probably our railways cannot afford to carry freight from these points at exactly the same rates as they can from Chicago, because trains will go into Chicago, they will get forty or fifty cars of produce, and all they have to do is to hitch on an engine and draw them through, while, in Canada, they have to gather up the produce from different places. Therefore, it costs a little more, but there is no reason why they should charge twice as much from a point in Ontario, as they do for double the distance for our competitors. This action is unfair to Canadians for the reason that if we do anything of an export trade, as I stated before, we must compete against the wide world. It does not matter particularly, so far as the consumption of flour, cheese and butter is in Canada alone, because the duty on these articles coming in, gives us a protection which prevents American produce from coming in. But, we do not want to do a little one-horse business all the time, we are not going to trade jack-knives together with ourselves; we want to grow, to expand, to become a nation and to extend our industries. How are we going to do that? How are we going to compete against men who have their produce carried double the distance at half the rate we must pay? While the government are doing their level best to expand the industries of this country, while it is desirable, from a party standpoint, as well as from a Canadian standpoint, that every means should be adopted by which the development of this country can be encouraged, while we hope that Canada will grow and expand to a greater and greater degree, one of the greatest obstacles in the way that we find is the transportation question. And, while not having an unbounded confidence in a railway commission, I believe that some steps should be adopted, either in the form of control by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, over the rates charged by all railways, or by granting power to the Governor in Council, by which some check may be provided, or some provision made with that end in view; I believe that some provision should be adopted so that the rates charged to Canadians shall be in accordance with the rates charged to foreigners, I think this might be done, especially on those roads that we have granted such liberal bonuses to. The evil is there; it is a crying evil, an evil which makes against the best interests of this country, and surely, Mr. Speaker, the united wisdom of the government of the people of Canada will be sufficient to provide a remedy for it. If proper provisions are taken to insure that the Canadian producer can have his products carried to the seaboard, at all events for the same rate of freight as his American neighbour, it would tend to an enormous development of the industries of this country. We can hardly conceive the enormous resources which we possess. Why should Canadians every year send millions of bushels of wheat across the ocean when that wheat should be manufactured into flour here, and forwarded as a finished product to the consumers? Why should we be sending our raw material, our grain, our barley, our oats and peas away in the raw state, when we could make more money here by sending them out as a finished product? Sir, that is because of this unfair discrimination. I have pointed out the extent of the evil so far as manufactured goods are concerned, but it does not apply to the same extent to the raw material. The discrimination in freight rates against wheat is not nearly so great as it is on manufactured goods. There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that this is a grave question, and the House owes a debt of gratitude to the hon. member (Mr. Davis) who brought it before us. I trust that the result of this discussion will be to so strengthen the hands of the government and of the Minister of Railways, that they will be able to overcome the great difficulties which they have to contend with in this matter.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

Bill (No. 33) respecting the British Columbia Southern Railway Company.—(Mr. Prior.)

Bill (No. 34) respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Macdonell.)

Bill (No. 36) respecting the Arrowhead and Kootenay Railway Company.—(Mr. Morrison.)

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock) moved the adjournment of the House.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, February 22, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 48) respecting the Montreal and Ottawa Railway Company.—(Mr. Monk.)

BINDER TWINE MANUFACTURED AT KINGSTON PENITENTIARY.

Mr. McMULLEN asked :

Whether it is the intention of the government to allow farmers to purchase binder twine, manufactured at the Kingston Penitentiary, at or about cost price? If so, up to what date can purchases be made?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). It is the intention of the government to allow farmers to purchase binder twine manufactured at the Kingston Penitentiary until the 1st of March. I may say that it has been the practice, when the contract season is over, to sell binder twine to farmers or other parties requiring it until a new contract is made.

DORCHESTER PENITENTIARY INVESTIGATION.

Mr. BELL (Pictou) asked :

1. Have any payments been made by the Department of Justice since June 30, 1899, in connection with the Dorchester Penitentiary investigation?

2. If so, what sums have been paid, and to whom?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). All payments which have been made in connection with the Dorchester Penitentiary investigation are included in the accounts of last fiscal year, and are shown in the Auditor General's Report, part I, page 42.

MR. EDGAR CHAPELE.

Mr. DAVIN (by Mr. Taylor) asked :

Whether Mr. Edgar Chapele is employed in the immigration service of the Department of the Interior? Where is he working? Where was he working during the Manitoba provincial elections in November and December, 1899? Was he engaged in electioneering work? Was he arrested for bribery? Did he arrive in Winnipeg with letters from Mr. J. G. Turriff, Dominion Lands Commissioner, instructing him to report to Mr. J. Obed Smith and Mr. McCreary, the Immigration Commissioner? Was he supplied with transportation by McCreary? Is he still in the employ of the Department of the Interior?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Mr. Edgar Chapele is not, and never has been, in the employ of the immigration branch of the Department of the Interior. The government has no knowledge of the matters referred to in the other portions of the question.

STATEMENTS OF MR. COPELAND.

Mr. DAVIN (by Mr. Taylor) asked :

1. Whether the attention of the Minister of the Interior has been called to the following statement, made on November 8, by Arthur Copeland, of Kingston, Ont., and Bennett, Yukon:

'There is no doubt but that there has been, and still is, plenty of truth in the various reports, and an extensive practice of bribery and corruption predominates all through the country. If a man requires any courtesies or assistance at the hands of a government official he has to pay for it before he can get it. They are all looking for what is commonly called 'grafts,' and the applicant has on more than one occasion been politely informed by the one from whom he is seeking assistance, 'I am not here for my health.' The same condition of affairs also applies to the registration of mining claims; you can get justice only by paying for it.'

2. Whether the minister has taken any action in the premises?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. The attention of the Minister of the Interior had not previously been called to the statement quoted in the question. 2. No action has been taken, or is it proposed to take any action upon a statement which contains nothing but a general slander against all public officials in the district.

NEW BRUNSWICK ELECTORAL LISTS.

Mr. DOMVILLE asked :

Has the government received the electoral lists of the province of New Brunswick as revised for the year 1899 last November, and on which the next federal elections will be run? If so, when will they be printed for the use of members and others? If not received, what reasons are assignable?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). 1. The lists received are the following: Carleton, Charlotte, Kent, Northumberland, Restigouche, city of Saint John, county of Saint John, Sunbury and Queen's and Westmoreland. 2. They are being printed. 3. No other reason can be assigned but that they have not yet been forwarded by the proper provincial officers.

THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE AT OTTAWA.

Mr. TAYLOR asked :

Is the Order in Council which was passed February 25, 1892, in reference to the franking privilege at Ottawa, which reads as follows:

Franking Privilege at Ottawa.

Order in Council, February 25, 1892.—By an Order in Council, dated February 25, 1892, the following regulations governing the franking privilege were approved:

Regulations.

1. In each department there may be used one franking stamp, such stamp being a facsimile of the usual signature of the deputy head, and to be kept in the custody of some officer or confidential clerk specially intrusted by the deputy head with that duty, and to be affixed by him upon official correspondence only.

2. When envelopes with a printed official address thereon are used, the name of the deputy head may be printed on such envelopes.

3. In addition to the printed stamp or printed signature as above provided, the head of the department and the private secretary of the head of the department, in the name of his minister, and the deputy head, may frank by a written signature or initials; but no other method of franking except as above enumerated will be permitted.

4. No blank or unaddressed envelope shall in any case be franked.

5. The deputy head of each department shall furnish the Postmaster General with an impression of the facsimile stamp which it is proposed to use in his department.

6. The General Officer Commanding the Militia of Canada, the Adjutant General of Militia, the Auditor General and the Superintendent of Insurance shall, for the purposes of these rules, be respectively considered as deputy heads of departments.

7. All the official correspondence of the several departments, except that of the heads of departments, the deputy heads and the private secretaries of ministers, shall be transmitted in envelopes having printed or written thereon the words 'On Her Majesty's Service'; and no envelope bearing the superscription shall be used for any private correspondence.

8. From and after the 15th day of March, 1892, no private correspondence whatsoever shall be transmitted from any department of the government at Ottawa or elsewhere, or any branch thereof, under frank, nor shall the postage due thereon be charged against the government.

9. All private correspondence addressed to any member of the civil service at Ottawa, or to the care of any civil servant, shall be liable to the same rates of postage as apply to the public generally.

10. Should any letter addressed to any civil servant at Ottawa upon which postage has been paid on delivery prove when open to be on public business, the amount so paid may be refunded on the certificate of the deputy head of the department to which the addressee belongs.

11. Any employee offending against any of these regulations shall be liable to suspension or such other punishment as the Governor General in Council may determine.

Were there large quantities of sealed envelopes sent through the mails during the months of November and December, 1899, addressed to the electors of Ontario, containing the pamphlet entitled 'Political Pointers, No. 1,' and franked by a stamp 'R. J. C., M. T. & C.'? If so, will the Postmaster General explain by what legal authority said letters were carried free of postage?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). Such Order in Council is yet in force. The department has no knowledge of the contents of sealed envelopes passing through the mails, and is, therefore, not in a position to express an opinion as to whether or not such envelopes and contents were or were not properly entitled to pass free. The following is, however, a case of illegal franking: During the general election of 1896 a very large quantity of mail matter, in the interests of the late Conservative government, was sent free from Ottawa, through the mails, to electors of Canada, containing campaign literature in favour of the Conservative party. Such literature was printed on sheets which included other literature devoted to the advocacy of the merits of a certain patent medicine known as 'Kootenay Cure.' This matter was franked by various members of the late Conservative administration. There being nothing in the law to entitle ministers to frank patent medicine advertisements, even when combined with political literature, the granting of free transmission in that case was clearly illegal.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I must raise a question of order. I think it is lowering to the character and the position of this House for ministers of the Crown to adopt a course just adopted by the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), and adopted a few days ago by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). It is, I believe, an established rule of the House that questions should be answered succinctly, that no argument shall be founded upon the question, and for the very obvious reason that there is no means of answering a statement, however erroneous, when the hon. gentlemen choose to violate the rules of the House by making an address in answering a question, as they would not dare to attempt if they did not know that the other members of the House are precluded from replying. I think, Sir, you will have to deal with that question, or we shall become a very disorderly assembly. My right hon. friend is more responsible than any other member of this House for maintaining order and an observance of the rules, and he should be the first to rise when he finds a gross violation of the established rules of debate is made, giving an unfair opportunity to an hon. gentleman to make an ex-parte statement at a time when no reply can be put before the country. I am quite sure that no one will suffer more from such a course, if persisted in, than the government themselves, because it will involve dealing with a number of these questions, and taking up the time of the House in introducing a separate and independent debate in consequence of these violations of the rules. I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, to check the attempt which is now being made by hon. gentlemen opposite, when they are unable to defend themselves in any other way, by making speeches and going into arguments that are entirely beside the question.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). The hon. gentleman was distinctly out of order in these remarks in answer to a question; but as he has alluded to me, I may say that I am disposed on the whole to agree with him that any reference to the practice and the acts of the late government is likely to be distinctly lowering to the dignity of the House.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I have only this remark to make to the hon. gentleman. I will always be willing on my part to maintain the dignity of the House, in the full hope that he will do his part likewise to maintain it on his side of the House. If he has sometimes to complain of the answers given to him, he may remember that these answers are always made to questions which are equally offensive. If the hon. gentleman will see that the rules of the House are properly preserved on his side of the House, we will be only too glad to do our share. As to the question of order, I will be willing to leave it entirely in the hands of the Speaker.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say that so far as this question is concerned—do I understand my right hon. friend to say that there is anything offensive, or any violation of the rules of order in the attention of the House and of the government being drawn to the illegality of a practice in the Post Office Department? I do not think there is any violation of the rules of the House in that.

The PRIME MINISTER. That is not a violation of the rule, nor is the answer. My hon. friend asked what is the legal authority. He knows that legal authority may sometimes be a precedent as well as a statute.

Mr. CASEY. Referring to the question of order—

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. G. E. CASEY (West Elgin). I beg to say a word as one of the very oldest members of the House. It is within the recollection of the older members of the House that the undoubted privilege of a government to give even more information than is asked in a question, has uniformly been exercised by government in this House for the last 27 years. There have been constant instances of a government stating a little more than they were asked, in answering a question put upon the paper. Whether that is strictly and technically correct, I am not prepared to say. I have not consulted the authorities; but the practice has been universal. I do not think the minister who answered this question is departing from Canadian parliamentary usage in giving some unwelcome information in reply to a question that has been asked. If the leader of the opposition wishes to prevent this unpleasant information from being brought out, and he evidently does object to its being brought out, his remedy is easy. Let him prevent his followers from putting on the paper any questions that will bring out that sort of information. I do not think his remedy lies in the point of order.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) The remark made by the Prime Minister is certainly a very extraordinary one. I think he will agree with me that the question which is put here is a very proper one to be asked for information, if it is put in a gentlemanly way, and there is nothing offensive in the manner in which it is couched. Neither can the Premier, although he was very ready to style it offensive, point out one single line or word in that question which is offensive, or which ought to be offensive to any person. If he can do so, I would like to see him do it. Neither myself or any other member of this House would like to see the practice introduced of putting offensive and unnecessary questions on the paper. Now, then, can the Prime Minister point out anything offensive in that question? Is it not the right of any member of this House to ask for the information which is therein asked for? The hon. gentleman has properly enough read the Order in Council, but the Order in Council is one which was passed in my time, in 1892, when I was Minister of Finance. That Order in Council is absolutely prohibitive of the practice which has been introduced this last summer by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, of all people in this world.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. 'Introduced?'

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, introduced. What the hon. gentleman has done is this: He, knowing what he was doing, made a speech during the interval between the sessions of this House when, he, as a minister, had no more right to the franking privilege than had any lay member of this House, outside of departmental and official correspondence simply and solely.

Mr. CASEY. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask my hon. friend—

Mr. CASEY. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. Let the hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster) finish the statement.

Mr. CASEY. My point is—I have a right—

Mr. SPEAKER. I must ask the hon. gentleman to resume his seat for once.

Mr. CASEY. I have a right to raise a point of order. The hon. gentleman is discussing a question—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, chair.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must ask the hon. gentleman to resume his seat.

Mr. FOSTER. I was going on to say, when this unseemly interruption took place, I was going on to challenge the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) to rise in this House and, as master of his own department, answer the question as to whether he as minister, or any of his colleagues as ministers have any rights in franking over and above any lay member of the House outside of the merely departmental and official work of their department. Now, Sir, what does the question contemplate? The question contemplates a breach of law. The allegation, if there is any allegation in the question, is that the law and the plain Order in Council by which every minister is bound, has been flagrantly violated by not one only, but more ministers of the Crown during the interval. It is all very well for the hon. gentleman to get on his dignity and call it impertinence and say that it is offensive, but as long as this House lasts, and as long as this opposition is in it, these pertinent questions will be asked whether they offend his high mightiness or whether they do not. There is an allegation in the question; it is that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, during the interim when parliament was not in session—

Some hon. MEMBERS Order, order.

Mr. FOSTER—made a speech in Toronto.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. FOSTER. This is a matter, Mr. Speaker, which has been brought up; it has been debated by three hon. members on the other side of the House, and I have the right to reply. They were allowed to put their statements, and I claim the right to put mine, that is all, and I have the permission of Mr. Speaker to do it. Now, the allegation is simply this, that in the interim when this parliament was not in session, when the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce had no more rights to the franking privilege for such matter than any private member of this House, made a partisan speech in the city of Toronto. No one would ever think of accusing the hon. gentleman of making anything but a partisan speech. He had that speech published by the hundreds of thousands and scattered broadcast all over the country. I have the envelopes directed from the hon. gentleman's own department, franked by the hon. gentleman's own handwriting, or some one who simulated it, and these pamphlets have been distributed all over the country.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Just as you sent out pamphlets through King's County last election.

Mr. FOSTER. There is another irrepressible, Mr. Speaker, that I must ask you to keep as mild as you can while I make my statement. These have been franked by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce and sent out in sealed envelopes, and if the law had been complied with there would have been to pay four cents of the Queen's postage on each one of these letters. They were sent out without it. The hon. gentleman admitted that probably hundreds of thousands of them had been scattered through the country. How many of them went in this way there is no way of determining; I do not know, but I do say that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has no moral or legal right to take a campaign speech, made when this House is not in session, and distribute it when this House is not in session, and I say that he or the government should pay the bill, pay the postage—

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Order, order.

Mr. FOSTER. Pay the postage, and it should be charged up to him. This is the very thing that this question asks. My hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) who put the question—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. FOSTER. I know, Mr. Speaker, we have a very hard time, but I think that the Speaker, aided by my own efforts, will be able to put this right. My hon. friend the Whip of this side of the House—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend the Whip of this House—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentlemen can show their fair-mindedness and the respect they have for their own Speaker by doing this if they wish.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) should speak to the point of order.

Mr. FOSTER. The Prime Minister shows his respect as well. My hon. friend the Whip of this side of the House has a question on the paper asking the hon. Postmaster General, or the government, if the Order in Council, which he quotes, is still an Order in Council, and then he asks him whether he has any knowledge that:

Large quantities of sealed envelopes were sent through the mails during the months of November and December, 1899, addressed to the electors of Ontario, containing the pamphlet entitled 'Political Pointers, No. 1,' and franked by a stamp 'R. J. C., M. T. & C.' If so, will the Postmaster General explain by what legal authority said letters were carried free of postage.

Is it a proper thing for a member of the House of Commons to know whether the country has been mulcted for a large amount of postage for party purposes in an illegal way and clearly against the Order in Council that the hon. minister has declared is still an Order in Council? Is that a wrong thing for an hon. gentleman to do? It is his right; he demanded an answer; a fair answer should have been given. The point of order is whether it was answered as the hon. minister tries to answer it, fairly or not in doing it as he wished to do it. He then brings in things which have no more bearing on the question than the Crimean war has upon the Transvaal war to-day.

I thank you very kindly, Mr. Speaker, for your fairness in allowing me to put my statement before the House.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think it is necessary to prolong this debate.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Will you allow me, Mr. Speaker, a moment?

Mr. FOSTER. Then, we will have to have a speech in reply from this side of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is all out of order.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I desire to say what my construction is of the question and the answer. I think it will be shown to be a fair answer to the fair intendment of the question. The question indicates the desire to ascertain whether certain envelopes, alleged to have certain contents, were or were not illegally franked. It is impossible to answer that question in reference to these particular envelopes, because, as the question says, they were sealed, and it was impossible, therefore, for the government, or for the officers of the Post Office Department, to know the contents of these. It was not possible, therefore, to answer that question in reference to the hypothetical case set forth in the question. But it was possible to answer—

Mr. FOSTER. Answer it.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. To answer the point of the inquiry, to give a legal opinion, by the illustration of what the hon. gentlemen had done themselves after the dissolution of parliament in 1896.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. How do you know that? They must have been sealed, too.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Owing to receiving some myself during my campaign. I received some campaign literature myself, franked from Ottawa, a very short time before the voting day, some of it franked with the frank of the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), if I remember rightly, and I saw the franks of other ministers on other similar literature received during the campaign. I saw the contents taken out of these envelopes, and these contents I saw, consisted of the campaign sheet which is well known in the political history of Canada, as the 'Kootenay Cure Campaign Sheet.' On one side of it was set forth the merits of that very potent medicine, and on the other the nostrums of the Conservative party, supposed to be for the Canadian public to swallow. That was clearly illegal; I do not know the number, but I was informed that the number franked went up into the hundreds of thousands. I am not defending any illegality on one side or the other, but I was pointing out to the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) that if he could be so virtuously indignant to-day he should remember that he did these things himself. Under the circumstances, then, if I had to give this illustration by referring to the Kootenay Cure, I think the hon. leader of the opposition would have been much wiser if he had been quietly satisfied to accept the medicine very properly administered on this occasion.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Mr. Speaker, I beg to move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. HAGGART. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman had better allow this debate to close.

Mr. HAGGART. In reference to the remarks of the hon. Postmaster General, I just wish to make a few words of explanation.

Mr. SPEAKER. As a matter of fact, I admit that we are all out of order, and I would simply say to the House that when we have reached this stage, perhaps we can confine ourselves to the succinct statement that I understand the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) has to make, and then close the debate.

Mr. HAGGART. It is simply an explanation.

Mr. SPEAKER. The whole thing is out of order.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. Postmaster General, in defence of the conduct of the government, makes reference to the circulation of campaign literature when the last government was in power. He is perfectly right in reference to that distribution. He states that the campaign literature consisted of two things—Tory nostrums in one part, and medical advertisements in the other. If the hon. gentleman will look at the campaign literature published in the United States, he will find that all campaign literature has advertisements in it.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. We do not look to the United States.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman says that we transgressed the law in distributing the literature. We did not transgress the law. The Order in Council of 1892 gave every member of parliament the right to frank during the session, and for fifteen days afterwards. The hon. Postmaster General says that the frank was used at a time when the law did not allow it to be used.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I received campaign literature myself as late, I think, as within a few days of the 23rd of June. If it comes to interpreting the meaning of the frank, it does not cover campaign literature; it only covers official business, if you read the Order in Council. I have not read it carefully.

Mr. HAGGART. Not at all. I do not know when the hon. gentleman received the literature which was sent to him; but the instructions I gave to my staff was that the frank was to be used during the session of parliament, and for fifteen days afterwards.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Mr. Speaker, as I do not want to be out of order, I move the adjournment of the House. My hon. friend from York, N. B., (Mr. Foster) was very indignant about the use of this franking privilege; but let me assure this House—

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Speaker, I believe a point of order was submitted to you, and we want a decision.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member has a right to move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. DOMVILLE. As a member of this House, and the representative of King's County, which my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) represented for a time, I state from my place, that the county of King's was flooded with campaign literature, initialled 'G. E. F., M. F.' Furthermore, the hon. gentleman did me the honour to send copies of his speeches to my residence. I think it comes with ill grace from him to get up and make the speech he made this afternoon.

Mr. TAYLOR. I second the motion of my hon. friend (Mr. Domville) that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SPEAKER. Allow me to put the motion. Mr. Domville moves, seconded by Mr. Taylor, that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR (South Leeds). I will occupy but a moment or two in trying to put the hon. Postmaster General right. I understood him to say, in answering the question that is on the paper in my name, that the government were not in a position to know what those envelopes contained. Then, the hon. Postmaster General must deny the truth of the allegation made by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce here the other day, that large numbers of his speeches had been sent out in envelopes from his department. That information was certainly in the hands of the Postmaster General. Therefore, he should have answered my question properly and respectfully from the knowledge he had. Here is one of the envelopes which were sent out by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It was sealed when I got it, was addressed to myself, was mailed at Ottawa on the 28th day of November, and contained 'Political Pointers No. 1.' The minister did not do as the Order in Council says he has a right to do in the case of an official document—sign his own name, but he had the envelope stamped with a rubber stamp, 'R. J. C., M. T. & C.' I am satisfied that six or seven thousand of these came into my constituency, and from information I have received, I believe that every elector in the province of Ontario received one of them.

Mr. CASEY. It did lots of good.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. Postmaster General has admitted that this was illegal. Then, why should this government be committing illegal acts? He says the Order in Council prevents anything of that kind being done by a minister or anybody else. Then, why did he permit it to be done after having been informed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the envelopes contained those speeches? He tries to make out that the late government established a precedent in 1896. The only excuse this government have for all their wrong-doings is to point to something in the same direction that was done by the late Conservative government; but the fact is, that the late Conservative government did what they had a right to do by law; they franked during the session and for fifteen days afterwards.

Mr. COWAN. They franked after the session of parliament.

Mr. TAYLOR. This was done all through 1899, by the Minister of Agriculture, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and the country has been robbed of thousands of dollars of postage that ought to have been paid by those ministers.

Mr. G. E. CASEY (West Elgin). This motion for the adjournment is of course made for the purpose of enabling us to discuss the burning question that has come up. I regret that for a long time this discussion went along on lines utterly contrary to the rules of this House, and I regret that the uproar which occurred, when I rose to protest against that proceeding, prevented you, Mr. Speaker, from hearing my point of order, which was, that the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) was in the most flagrant manner violating the rules of this House in discussing an answer which had just been given to a question. I rose to point that out, and I regret that you did not hear my protest, or you would have ruled the hon. gentleman out of order, and have ordered him to take his seat. The discussion being now in order, we can do what the hon. member for York broke the rules of the House in the most flagrant manner in order to do, when he availed himself of the tumult raised by his followers to drown the protest which I attempted to make against his disorderly proceeding. Now, Sir, we have the chance to tell him what we think of his conduct. The whip of the party raised the ingenious quibble that the franking of campaign literature done by the late government was done during the session, and that the minister franked it as members. We all know that we were constantly getting matter stamped with the frank of the department, and that clerks were kept in the departments for months after the session closed, to frank it with the stamp of the departments. I myself received many books stamped with the stamp of the departments, long after the House had ceased to sit, and long after the franking privilege had expired. The notable Kootenay Cure circular has been referred to, and it will bear a second reference. I think nothing was more appropriate than sending out to the people of Canada, a circular containing quackery on one side, and quackery on the other side. I do not mean to slander the Kootenay Cure. I have a personal acquaintance with Mr. Kootenay, who was then a member of this House under his other name, and I have a personal acquaintance with the cure, which I believe is a very good medicine. If the electors had all believed the Kootenay Cure side of the circular and rejected the other, it would have been better for their health and their character. It would appear to me that a good number of them bought the Kootenay Cure and rejected the political quackery on the other side of the bill, as was shown by the result of the election. The leader of the opposition has seen fit to stir up a hornet's nest by raising a point of order as to the manner in which this question was answered. As I have said before, the minister (Mr. Mulock) only availed himself of the usual latitude allowed a minister in answering such a question. According to our usage the minister has the right to give information that the asker of the question may not like to have brought out. The leader of the opposition did not like the answer and so with his usual aplomb he has succeeded in having the whole question ventilated to the detriment of his own side of the case. I rose, Mr. Speaker, not so much to go into the question of campaign literature as to invite you to rule now, once and for all, that a discussion as to the nature of an answer to a question is not permissible in the manner in which the leader and sub-leader of the opposition have brought it up to-day; without a motion, and without the least shadow of justification under the rules of the House. I trust, Sir, that such a glaring breach of the ordinary parliamentary rule will not be attempted in the future.

Mr. T. DIXON CRAIG (East Durham). It seems to me that this is a most important discussion, and I trust that when the Speaker's ruling is given it shall be one by which both the government and the opposition will abide. I was rather surprised at the statement made by the leader of the government that some of these questions were offensive, and his argument that if a question was offensive the answer might be made equally offensive, or perhaps defensive. When these gentlemen opposite were on this side of the House it was claimed by them that the putting of questions was an important weapon in the hands of the opposition in attacking the government, and they used that weapon very freely in compelling the government of the day to answer these questions. The present government has frequently shown—and I suppose all governments are alike in that respect—that if they do not wish to answer a question directly, they can answer it in such an indefinite way that the answer is worth nothing to the opposition.

Mr. CASEY. We remember that well.

Mr. CRAIG. Even if the question should be of a party nature, that is no excuse for a member of the government answering it by a speech criticising the conduct of the opposition, and defending the policy of his party.

Mr. COWAN. What about the opposition speeches criticising the government?

Mr. CRAIG. If the question is offensive and out of order, the minister who answers the question should say so, and the Speaker will give his ruling as to that. I maintain that if a question is not directly offensive the member of the government who answers it has no business to import into his answer any extraneous matter. His duty is to answer the question in any way he pleases, but he must not found on the question a speech in defence of his party, nor must he bring in outside matter. There is one feature of this which is humiliating to the House and to the government. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) admitted the other day that hundreds of thousands of copies of this speech were franked and circulated throughout the country without any postage being paid on them. In fact the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) rather gloried in that. That a member of the government should go to Toronto and make a campaign speech in Massey Hall, and afterwards have that speech printed and circulated all over the country without paying one cent postage is a humiliating thing to be acknowledged by the government. I hold, Sir, that it is an infringement of the law, and that the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) is bound to prosecute any one who commits such an offence. In view of the admission made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I hold that the Postmaster General is bound to see that the postal law is carried out. I call on him now to take such measures as will enforce the penalties provided for the violation of that law. It is admitted by the government that the law was broken, and it is the duty of the Postmaster General to see that the law-breakers are punished. In conclusion, Sir, I believe, and I think we all believe, that the dignity of the House would be better conserved by ministers of the Crown not importing outside matter into their answers, and not infringing the rules of the House in this respect.

Mr. PETER MACDONALD (East Huron). Mr. Speaker, I have been quite a number of years in this House and it is refreshing to observe that these hon. gentlemen opposite are having their consciences awakened in regard to this matter. They have to-day shown a virtuous indignation which has never characterized them before. I believe that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Craig) has used the franking privilege just as much as any one else. I can look back to a few years ago when the Conservative Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Montague) spent most of the session of parliament preparing Conservative campaign literature, and such was the abundance of it, that they could not send it all out during the session and so a large quantity was posted months after the session closed. What do these gentlemen opposite mean? If the law is violated in this respect, then they were up to their necks and nearly smothered in violations of the law. Does the hon. gentleman from East Durham (Mr. Craig) know that he has used that privilege as widely as it was possible for him to do in sending campaign documents, and other literature to his constituents.

Mr. CRAIG. I wish to say that I never did so.

Mr. MACDONALD. These gentlemen opposite put questions on the Order paper to try and fish out whether or not we are breaking the law, but they know in their hearts that during the last twenty years they have been in power every man of them violated the law in this respect, if violation it be. They ask these questions for political effect, expecting, of course, that the minister will be so circumscribed in his answer as to be unable to refute these insinuations. Anyway, for eighteen years the members of the opposition who have now suddenly become so virtuous, were doing much worse in this respect than ever a Liberal member dreamt of.

Mr. GEORGE E. FOSTER (York, N.B.). This is a question which I am glad we have an opportunity of discussing, and I do not propose to discuss it in any partisan and heated way.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh no.

Mr. FOSTER. Of course hon. gentlemen opposite can hardly conceive of a person treating a subject in that kind of way, and so they express something very like consternation in these tones we have just heard. The law, I suppose, is the foundation of the Order in Council. I want, however, before I enter the discussion to put one question. Sir Richard Cartwright, if I may refer to him by name, addressed during the recess a party speech, in what was supposed to be the beginning of the campaign, giving in Massey Hall, the government's answer to all charges, and the government's justification of the positions and policy it had taken. That was done after parliament had risen. It was done during the recess. Sir Richard Cartwright took that speech which he had delivered, a campaign speech, made when the House was not in session, and when he had no franking privilege beyond what any other hon. member has whilst the House is not in session at the seat of government. He took that campaign speech, brought it to Ottawa, had hundreds of thousands of it addressed in envelopes, had the envelopes sealed and distributed by the hundreds of thousands through the mails all over the country. These envelopes would have borne, if they had been properly stamped, at least four cents postage each. And no doubt at all, upwards of half a million of those were distributed, and the postage which would have been paid at four cents per letter on the sealed envelopes would have amounted to the sum of $20,000. It makes the case no better or no worse whether the number was 500,000 or 100,000. But I wish to lay stress on the probable quantity which was distributed, in order to show that this is not simply a picayune matter which we are discussing.

I ask you, Sir, if a certain state of things had arisen, what would have been done? I went to Toronto and made a speech in answer to my hon. friend, I tried to make just as good an answer as I could for the Liberal-Conservative party, and I proposed, and the party proposed, that that answer should be distributed as widely as Sir Richard Cartwright's speech. Well, suppose I had gone to the hon. Postmaster General and had said to him: 'Our party is not a rich party, and I want you to send out to the citizens of this country 500,000 of my reply to Sir Richard Cartwright's speech at the public expense, just as you have done with Sir Richard Cartwright's speech. He sent hundreds of thousands of copies of it out to the country at the public expense, and the Liberals and Conservatives of this country alike have had to foot the bill, and I ask you to be just as generous with me, and to send out free through the mails 500,000 copies of my speech, which I delivered in reply to that of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce.' Now, if I had done this, what would have been the reply of the Postmaster General? That puts the matter in a nutshell, both on the point of fairness and legality. I have just as much right to free postage as Sir Richard Cartwright has--no more and no less. As a member he stands no higher than I do in that respect. As a minister, he has no more rights to free franking of such matter than I have as a private member of parliament. That puts the question in a concrete shape. No doubt the hon. Postmaster General would have replied: No, sir, if you want to send out 500,000 copies of your speech, put them into the post office properly stamped, and they will go, or otherwise they will be sent to the dead letter office.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Why did you not do that?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman who has interrupted me does not seem to have grasped the question, but if he will only wait a little he will perhaps see that there is some ground in the matter which he does not see at present.

In 1892 there was passed an Order in Council in order to limit the abuses of the franking system. Up to that time it had come to be the habit in different departments for every civil servant to frank his private correspondence and receive that correspondence free of postage, and I am not saying anything which hon. gentlemen do not know, when I say that a very large proportion of the correspondence of this city went through the mails under the franking privilege one way or the other, so that the revenue of the country was being defrauded. It was in order to do away with that abuse and limit the franking privilege to what was intended by the law to be its limits, that this Order in Council was passed in 1892, and it has been the rule ever since. If it has been violated at any time, one violation is not an excuse for another. The question is now as to whether the present government have violated this law or allowed it to be violated. If they have, then they ought to acknowledge their wrong; and when it is brought to their attention they ought to shut down upon it and inform the House whether or not they are going to favour one party in the country as against the other. These are the regulations, and it will be well for the House to pay a little attention to them:

1. In each department there may be used one franking stamp, such stamp being a facsimile of the usual signature of the deputy head, and to be kept in the custody of some officer or confidential clerk, specially intrusted by the deputy head with that duty, and to be affixed by him upon official correspondence only.

Upon official correspondence only. That is the very basis of the Order in Council because that is the basis of the law, namely, that the deputy minister who holds that frank is to place it upon official correspondence and official correspondence only.

2. When envelopes with a printed official address thereon are used, the name of the deputy head may be printed on such envelopes.

That is apart from the franking privilege, but it was put there as a precaution.

3. In addition to the printed stamp or printed signature, as above provided, the head of the department and the private secretary of the head of the department, in the name of his minister, and the deputy head, may frank by a written signature or initials; but no other method of franking as above enumerated will be permitted.

It was by means of this written signature or these initials that these envelopes were sent, as the envelope I have testified, and only three persons had the power to frank by their written signature or initials, and these were the head of the department, and his private secretary, in the name of his minister, and the deputy head, and no other method of franking was permitted. What is the next provision:

No blank or unaddressed envelope shall in any case be franked.

That is to prevent a minister or some one acting for him, franking a lot of envelopes in blank, and handing them over to somebody to address and put into the mails. I am not going to say that this was done, but I will wager a pretty large sum that these signatures of the minister were attached to the envelopes before the envelopes were addressed. It would be interesting to have the hon. minister's statement upon that point.

The deputy head of each department shall furnish the Postmaster General with an impression of the facsimile stamp which it is proposed to use in his department.

There is where the Postmaster General is put at the head of the business. He requires to have the facsimile of the frank, and he or his officials must make use of that means to see that the mails are not being used against the law and against the Order in Council based upon the law. I have no doubt that the facsimiles were sent to the hon. Postmaster General and are in his possession. If so, he and his officials have been lax if they have allowed these to go through by the hundreds of thousands when they had a means right at hand to prevent them.

6. The General Officer Commanding the Militia of Canada, the Adjutant General of Militia, the Auditor General and the Superintendent of Insurance shall, for the purposes of these rules, be respectively considered as deputy heads of departments.

That enlarges it to that extent alone.

7. All the official correspondence of the several departments, except that of the heads of departments, the deputy heads and the private secretaries of ministers, shall be transmitted in envelopes having printed or written thereon the words 'On Her Majesty's Service'; and no envelope bearing the superscription shall be used for any private correspondence.

That immediately cuts out that which has been distributed. It is not in officially-headed envelopes, and consequently is out of that category.

Now, then—

8. From and after the 15th day of March, 1892, no private correspondence whatsoever shall be transmitted from any department of the government at Ottawa or elsewhere, or any branch thereof, under frank, nor shall the postage due thereon be charged against the government.

9. All private correspondence addressed to any member of the civil service at Ottawa or to the care of any civil servant, shall be liable to the same rates of postage as apply to the public generally.

10. Should any letter addressed to any civil servant at Ottawa upon which postage has been paid on delivery prove when open to be on public business, the amount so paid may be refunded on the certificate of the deputy head of the department to which the addressee belongs.

11. Any employee offending against any of these regulations shall be liable to suspension or such other punishment as the Governor General in Council may determine.

My contention is simply this—that the minister as an individual minister, and with reference to the speeches under consideration has just the same, and no other, franking rights than any one of the 213 members of this House. And what rights have these members? One gentleman rose and said that in King's County campaign literature was sent out marked 'G.E.F.'—my frank. Supposing it was, it does not touch the question—

Mr. DOMVILLE. It was your own speech.

Mr. FOSTER. Quite so, my hon. friend (Mr. Domville) does not see the point yet.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Why did you send it?

Mr. FOSTER. I had a right to send it. The Postmaster General does not see the point either.

Mr. DOMVILLE. It was not your speech made in parliament, but outside of it.

Mr. FOSTER. That remains to be proved. If it was a speech made out of parliament it must not be forgotten that there is one period during which any hon. member can send any mailable matter he likes under the franking privilege given to him under the law, and that is while the House is in session and for certain days before. Now, here is the law:

Letters and other mailable matter—

That is broad enough and includes anything that the post office will carry, no matter what it is—speeches, parcels, or anything within the category of things which can be sent by post.

Letters and other mailable matter addressed to or sent by the Speaker or Clerk of the Senate or of the House of Commons at the seat of government, shall be free of Canada postage, and letters and other mailable matter addressed to or by any member of either House at the seat of government during any session of parliament, or to any of the members at the seat of government as aforesaid, during the ten days next before the meeting of parliament, shall be free of Canada postage.

Now, does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Domville) see why I and every member have a right, under the franking law—you may say that it is too wide or that it is not wide enough, but it is the law—to send out matter under frank during the session? Every member of parliament has a right, while this parliament is in session, to send free any letter or any mailable matter, whatever it may be, if it comes within the category allowed by the Post Office Department.

Mr. DOMVILLE. That was not the statement I made. It was after parliament—that was the statement.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a statement that has not been substantiated. Now, the point is just this—and I do not want to be diverted from it, and I do not think the intelligent members of this House can fail to catch it—Sir Richard Cartwright, if I may be allowed to name him, had a perfect right to make this party speech and to get half a million of them printed, and he had a perfect right, after the House had been called and while it was in session, to send out these half million speeches under his own frank from the seat of government. But he had no right in the world to take a speech delivered outside of parliament—though that makes no matter—and put it in envelopes and distribute it when the House was not in session—he had no more right to do that than has any washerwoman in Ottawa.

Mr. MCGREGOR. You did it.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not do it. My hon. friend (Mr. McGregor) has spoken—let him prove what he has asserted. I have a right, and I exercise it as does every member of the House under the law, while the House is in session, to send out any mailable matter under frank. But, after the House prorogues, I have no right to do it. If I ever did it, I did what I had no right to do.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FOSTER. If I ever did it, I did what I had no right to do. But I have this much to say—that I have never done it so far as I can recollect, and I think my knowledge and recollection are good. I did not do it while I was a member of the government.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Or any of your colleagues?

Mr. FOSTER. I can speak only for myself. I delivered, whilst I was a member of the government, as many extra sessional speeches, I believe, as any other person who was in the government during that time; and never yet did I believe that I had the right to take a speech delivered outside the session of parliament and use the government frank to distribute it when parliament was not in session. That I have not the right to do. I wish the government to take this into consideration. If what I say is right, then wrong has been done in sending out these documents when the House was not in session. If what I say is wrong, let us know what the law is. No matter whom it hits—that makes no difference—let the law be understood.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) made one little mistake. He assumes the Order in Council which he read and commented upon at such length was the basis of legislation on this subject.

Mr. FOSTER. No, if my hon. friend (Sir Louis Davies) will allow me, I do know enough to know that an Order in Council can only be based on the law, and I said that the law was the basis of this Order in Council. I am not one of those who think that you can have a law and destroy it by an Order in Council, as the hon. gentleman did in regard to the coasting laws.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I can accept the hon. gentleman's statement of intention, but I think he was unfortunate in his method of expression. Let us see what this construction of the law amounts to. He quotes the section providing that mailable matter addressed to or by members of parliament may be franked during the session. This, he contended, included far more than letters and printed matter. In days gone by, some hon. gentlemen contended, that their washing was mailable matter. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman would go so far as that. But, whether he does or not, his contention is plain, and he insists upon it with great vigour, that letters and mailable matter embraces all kinds of correspondence and published matter. He will permit no limitation upon his rights, and these rights are given under the words I have quoted. Well, if his construction is correct he must put the same construction on the same words when they are used in reference to the departments. If he will look at the section immediately preceding this he will see that letters or other mailable matter addressed to or sent by any department of the government shall go free. So, we see that the same words are used with reference to the departments during recess as are used with regard to members during the session. So, if all printed matter may be sent or received by a member of parliament during the session, it follows that all similar matters may be sent or received by the department during the recess. So, if you consider the law strictly, as the hon. gentleman has done, the department would be limited only by the taste of the head of the department himself. But, it is perfectly clear, if the hon. gentleman is correct in his construction, that it does not apply to some of the things that have been done; and if the advice of the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) is to be taken, I would suggest to the Postmaster General that when he begins with his prosecution he should begin with the first culprit. Who was the first culprit? My hon. friend from South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) or the Postmaster General in the administration of which he was a member. He allowed to go through the department some 400,000 envelopes during the election campaign of 1896, when the ex-Postmaster General attempted to screen himself by an assumption that there was a provision in the law permitting him fifteen days before parliament met and after it rose, to do this, but there is not such provision.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). He admitted he did it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). There is no such provision in the law whatever. It was just as illegal for the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart) to send out these 400,000 envelopes, fifteen days, or ten days, or two days, after parliament rose, as it was for a minister of the Crown to do it thirty days afterwards. Now, the hon. gentleman confesses his crime. If he is indicted by the Postmaster General, he must plead guilty, and he must get his punishment; and my hon. friend from Durham will be the prosecutor, because he invites the Postmaster General to make the prosecution. It may be right or it may be wrong, but the Order in Council cannot limit the statutory power which is given to a minister under the statute. You may define the manner in which he shall exercise the power, but you cannot limit the statutory power itself. If the construction which my hon. friend puts upon the words 'all letters and other mailable matter' is correct, a minister may, if he choose, legally send out any printed matter he likes under his own frank.

Mr. FOSTER. Read the Order in Council.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am arguing that the hon. gentleman cannot take away a statutory right by an Order in Council, and if his construction of these words is correct, a statutory right is given to the minister, and my hon. friend is perfectly right in sending out these speeches of his. A great many gentlemen think he was not only legally right, but that he exercised remarkably good taste and judgment; the only complaint against him is that he did not send more of these speeches out. Now, the hon. gentleman, even if he would dare to argue that an Order in Council could override the statute, if he reads his Order in Council correctly, will find that there was no attempt made by the Governor in Council to override the statute. A broad distinction is made between departmental matter sent out by the department itself, and matter sent out by the head of the department, or his private secretary. They can put their initials upon it and frank it, and private letters sent by the minister. I suppose, come within the rule. The hon. gentleman attempts to argue that it is illegal matter, if a man writes a letter to his wife, if she is absent from him. I think every minister who has occupied the position, has franked such letters. I never knew of such a construction being placed upon the law, as that a letter written by a minister to his wife, did not come within the franking privilege.

Mr. DOMVILLE. How about another man's wife?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I leave my hon. friend to settle that with the hon. gentlemen opposite. But I want to lay down two propositions: That under the statute, and the construction put upon the statute by the minister, the expression, 'all letters and other mailable matter,' may embrace the matter about which he complains; therefore, this matter was not illegally sent. But when the Order in Council was passed it was not to take away the statutory right, but to define the manner in which that right should be exercised; and it did define it by prescribing that private letters, sent by the minister, not departmental, should be franked by himself, but that official letters should have O. H. M. S. on them, showing that they were official. I think it would be unjust to assume that the Governor in Council intended to pass an Order in Council which would limit and take away the statutory right conferred by section 62.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am satisfied that my hon. friend would make an extremely good counsel for a man in a police court, caught in very unfortunate circumstances. But I do not think he has at all met the statement of my hon. friend, the ex-Minister of Finance, that there has been a plain and clear violation of the law. I draw my hon. friend's attention to these words:

That from and after the 15th day of March, 1892, no private correspondence whatsoever shall be transmitted from any department of the government at Ottawa or elsewhere, or any branch thereof, under frank, nor shall postage due thereon be charged against the government.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I attempted to draw a distinction—perhaps he did not catch it—between private correspondence issuing from the department, and franked with the departmental frank, and correspondence sent by the minister and his private secretary, which is limited and regulated by a different section altogether.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It appears to me the distinction is too fine. It appears to me these words clearly limit the franking privilege to official correspondence exclusively. I draw the attention of the Postmaster General to the very serious position in which this matter stands, because I assume that the Postmaster General intends to discharge his duty impartially, and to maintain and carry out the law of the country governing his department. If that is not his position, then I can only say that he fails altogether to realize what the duties are that fall upon him as a departmental officer. Now, I ask him whether, if he had absolute evidence from the culprit himself, that he had availed himself of an opportunity of taking $8,000 worth of stamps out of the Post Office Department—I want to know whether he will prosecute him or not; I want to know whether, if he had positive evidence out of the mouth of the criminal, that he had defrauded the revenue, that he had got possession illegally, in plain violation of the statutory law of the country, of $8,000 worth of public property, the hon. gentleman would take means to recover that from him, assuming that he was able to do so, and whether he would punish the culprit as the law requires him to do. I do not think there can be any two questions as to his duty under these circumstances. Now, Sir, he has got the culprit before him, he has got the Minister of Trade and Commerce standing up in this House, in his hearing, and saying that he was happy to say that he had sent out hundreds of thousands of that document.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. No, no.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, that is exactly the position, those are his words. I think if he had said half a million, he would have been within the mark. But I am not going to put upon the Postmaster General the onus of charging him with more than he can prove out of the mouth of the criminal himself, namely, that the revenue of this country has been defrauded to that extent, by sending out hundreds of thousands of this document.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I must correct my hon. friend, he must not put words into my mouth that I did not use. I said I was unable to state how many, that I had been informed that a very large number had gone out, not half as many as ought to have gone—but I had been informed that a very large number had gone out, though I was not able to give the figures.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I heard the hon. gentleman's words. If the Postmaster General wants a witness to put on the stand to prove his case, I am at his service. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said:

I am inclined to believe, however, Sir, that though not nearly as many as ought to have been issued have been issued, some hundreds of thousands have been issued.

I am going to give him the benefit of the doubt; I am not going to extend it to half a million as I might, but I will put it at 200,000, because you cannot have hundreds of thousands unless you have 200,000. The revenue of this country was defrauded by $8,000.

Mr. GIBSON. How do you make that out?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. On that 200,000 copies of the hon. gentleman's speech that he sent out on that occasion for campaign purposes. Therefore, I must call upon the hon. Postmaster General, who ought to be no respecter of persons, in the discharge of the high duties of his office, and who should impartially administer justice, whether it fall to the right or the left of him, to accept the admission, putting it at the lowest figure of the hon. gentleman, to call upon the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce to refund to the treasury of this country $8,000. It is only a year's salary of the hon. gentleman, and I am happy to know that he is very well able to discharge the liability. While I am on my feet I want to draw attention for a single moment to this document, because my curiosity is a good deal excited in relation to it. I hold in my hand this pamphlet entitled 'Political Pointers No. 1,' and I want to ask the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, as a personal favour to me, to tell me who the artist is that made that portraiture of him. I want him to tell me who it was that drew this flattering portrait, not of Sir Richard Hyde, but of Sir Richard Jekyll. Here is a gentleman appearing under two different guises. Here we have him the honest, frank, pleasant-looking Sir Richard Jekyll; what would be the attitude if we had him depicted as the criminal stealing into the vaults of the hon. Postmaster General and filching out $8,000? I want to do him justice; I want to have Sir Richard Hyde. Fortunately there is a blank space on the back which has been left for his portrait as Richard Hyde filching $8,000 out of the public treasury of this country. I think we have a right to know who this charming artist is who has given us the illustration that we have. Here is a magnificent head of hair covering the clever, astute head of the hon. gentleman. I, myself, find no fault with the sending out of this publication. I read it with amazement for two reasons.

The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce had been treated by his colleagues and by the right hon. leader of the government as no man, entitled to respect and confidence, ever was treated in this country before, he had been degraded by his own party, by the right hon. Prime Minister when he formed his government, he was given a back seat, a man who stood here proclaiming to the world that he was the great financial life of the Liberal party in this country—that hon. gentleman was tied, manacled, shut up in a cage during the general elections because his party found that they had no chance of obtaining power if he was permitted to get abroad. They tied him up, they gagged him, they bound him and they would not permit him to go out in the general elections. They went about in this country and by the mouths of their ablest supporters gave a solemn pledge right and left to the people that if they obtained power the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce never should be the Minister of Finance of this country. If they had not done so they would never have got power. They did that in self-defence. Yet, in doing that, they inflicted an indignity upon the hon. gentleman such as no man in this House has ever suffered at anybody's hands before. When I heard that he was going to speak at Massey Hall I was very much astonished, because I said: Is it possible that a man degraded and pushed into a back seat, and charged with the administration of a department where there is nothing to do but one little thing, and that he proved himself utterly incapable of doing, can have sufficient magnanimity to go there and support the cause of the men who had degraded him in the estimation of the people of this country? But, when I read his speech I came to a different conclusion. When I read the weak, inane platitudes that the hon. gentleman had talked for an hour and a half or two hours to the people, I said: Well, he has got his revenge at last. When they took Samson and put his eyes out, when they sheared his locks, and when they sent him to go and grind in the mill, he said: I will topple down the whole fabric upon their heads.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) speaking to the question?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am speaking to the motion of adjournment. When you read the masterly exposition and the dissection of that speech by the hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) you could have no doubt as to the malevolent intentions of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. He was merely putting up a man of straw that he knew the hon. ex-Minister of Finance would tear to pieces and scatter to the winds as he did. I am not finding fault with the speech, but I am putting it as a matter of straightforward justice, that in the discharge of the duties of his high office the hon. Postmaster General should call upon the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce to refund to the coffers of this country the $8,000 that, by his own admission—I will not go beyond his own admission—he has filched from the public treasury for party purposes.

Mr. D. C. FRASER (Guysborough). Mr. Speaker, I have only a few words to say on this question, and what I wish to address myself to is the construction of the Act. I think the construction given by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) is the correct one, and if so, it enables us to understand just exactly what the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) did. Now, one of the best ways to construe a statute is to ask: How has it been understood by those that passed it, and how has it been acted upon by those who were first called upon to put it into operation? I would like to have the attention of the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) to this fact. I can understand that there may be a difference of opinion; I can understand how men honestly differ as to whether or not the right claimed by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce is a right to which he is entitled. There is no doubt now, after the admission of the hon. ex-Minister of Railway and Canals (Mr. Haggart) that his construction was that mail matter could be sent out from the department, although the law did not permit it. I know that he shielded himself behind the fifteen days which did not exist, and I know the hon. ex-minister is clever enough to do something else, that he wanted to shield himself behind the construction put upon that statute by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. There may be a difference of opinion about that, but I call the attention of the hon. leader of the opposition to the fact that this was the construction that he believed in, and a much larger one. He was not content with that construction, but he said that it went farther, and I will give him the proof. Speeches delivered by the hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) himself and several other members of the late government in 1896, were sent to Halifax in many large bundles.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. After the session.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Yes, after the session. Thousands and thousands of copies of these were sent out from Halifax bearing the frank of the present leader of the opposition. Was not that monstrous? Why, if the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) was compelled to pay up the postage on all these he would be bankrupt in five minutes. If there has been a violation of the law, I do not object to the prosecutions going on, but the leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) must understand that he is the prime culprit.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Oh, do not stop his speeches; we want them circulated.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). When the leader of the opposition was in Ottawa he so construed the law that from whatever point in Canada he was, he could frank the speeches of members of parliament and circulate them through the mail. I do not say he did it himself, but anyway his frank was on the pamphlets.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Does not the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fraser, Guysborough) draw a distinction between party speeches made during the recess, and that which is really an official document of this House, a Hansard speech?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Not as to a violation of the law.

Mr. FOSTER. You had better read the law.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). As has been said before, the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) could not defend a criminal in the police court if he drew such a distinction as that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Hansard speech is a document of this House and the official report of a speech made in the House.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The Kootenay Cure is not a speech made in the House.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). The leader of the opposition says he can frank the report of a speech made in the House. But how can he say it was the official report of a speech made in the House when it had such head lines as this: 'The wretched condition of the opposition, how they failed,' 'Mr. Laurier has eaten himself,' 'Sir Richard, the tame old man grinding at the mill,' and all that sort of thing. Does the leader of the opposition think that even if a speech were made in the House, and it were got up in such style as that, it is an official document which could be or should be circulated in thousands without postage through the Dominion of Canada?

An hon. MEMBER. It was a budget speech.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I can understand it all. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) fears that there is going to be a prosecution, and he is now getting up his defence. The ministers of the late government, having construed the law in that way, I submit that their construction of the law is entitled to some consideration in this House. If they thought that was the law they were justified in doing what they did; but they are not justified in making such an attack upon the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). If the ministers of the late Conservative government knowingly put a wrong construction on the law, then they are criminals and should be prosecuted.

Mr. LANDERKIN. They are turning Queen's evidence.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I believe that the construction put upon the law by the Minister of Marine (Sir Louis Davies) is the right one, and, at all events, it has in its favour the fact that the Conservative ministers did the same when they were in power. If hon. gentlemen opposite think that this is wrong, and if they want it remedied, then they have not taken the proper method. They should say: Well, we have sinned and you are sinning, and as both parties have sinned, let us both come to the conclusion henceforth not to sin again. That is the only way this thing can be remedied if it is wrong. Even, taking the statement of the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) as correct, the present ministers have not perpetrated anything like the violation of the law that the late ministers did. To my mind the attitude adopted by the leader of the opposition against Sir Richard Cartwright is one of the most laughable things that has ever occurred in this House. There are certain matters which we may not speak freely about, but if the statement of the friends of the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) be true he should be very careful about talking of a man being set aside, and his position being usurped by another. I am not saying that hon. gentlemen opposite when in power did violate the Act, but I do say that it was a very strained construction of the Act for them to make, that from every post office in Nova Scotia, and I believe in New Brunswick too, they could frank this campaign document. I know of one case where a postmaster felt he was doing wrong in allowing the stuff to go without postage, but he happened to be a Liberal, and in such terror was he that he thought it was better for him to recognize the frank of the leader of the government. Sometimes there might be a violation of the law, as in the case mentioned where a member sent home his washing, and, perhaps, there was a violation of the law when a man used his frank to send plugs of tobacco all around the country, but these after all are small matters, and I believe they are not done by any of the members with a desire to steal anything from the treasury. Bearing all the circumstances in mind, and remembering that the present ministers have not dared to use their frank to the same extent as the late ministers, the members of the opposition must be hard up for something to talk about when they delay the business of the House for such a thing as this.

Mr. N. F. DAVIN (West Assiniboia). Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry to hear the speech to which we have just listened, from my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), because if it indicates the kind of justice that he is to dispense in the Yukon, I am afraid that in that prosperous part of Canada, we shall have deadwood justice of a very peculiar type.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). The hon. gentleman is right. If he were arrested in a travelling coach, he would find out.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman is evidently afraid of being arrested in a travelling coach, for when he came up to Regina as the light comedian in heavy disguise of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), having to speak twenty miles from Regina such was the style they put on, that they chartered a special train for him, although we have the best livery stables on the continent, three of them; and the excuse given was a libel on those livery stables, for it was declared that there was not a cart nor a wagon nor a carriage, nor cutter, in the place with springs strong enough to carry him. The argument of the hon. and learned gentleman and judge in embryo, was that the self-confessed criminal should not be punished, because he alleges, though we have no proof of it, that other persons were guilty of a similar breach of the Order in Council.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I did not say so. I started out by arguing that the position taken by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) was correct, and I just mentioned that what was done, was exactly in accordance with the construction put upon the statute by hon. gentlemen opposite, and consequently the Minister of Trade and Commerce was only following in the footsteps of that construction.

Mr. DAVIN. I think the House heard the argument of the hon. and learned gentleman, which in short, was this: That as others had done wrong, the Minister of Trade and Commerce should go free. Now, Mr. Speaker, so far as my knowledge goes of what was done in the past, it was this: The speeches of members of the government and the speeches of members of the opposition were within the legal time posted at the post office here, and they were sent out to be forwarded. Such was the glut of matter, however, that many of them could not be forwarded, but they had been stamped with the stamp of the post office here, before the fifteen days were out, as I found on looking at some of the matter that came to me months afterwards; so that the mail matter came within the law, though it could only pass through the mail long after the House had risen. Now, I will ask the attention of the House for one moment to the regulations of hon. gentlemen opposite. I have here the Official Postal Guide of Canada for 1899, which will throw light on the situation:

Franking and Free Mail Matter.

All letters and other mailable matter posted from the public departments at Ottawa and franked as being of an official character, all correspondence addressed to the ministers in charge of the said departments or to their private secretaries, or to the deputy heads or secretaries of the same, or to any recognized branch or division of a department (see list on next page), or to the officer at the head thereof in his official capacity and under his official title.

All letters and other mailable matter addressed to or sent by the Speaker or Chief Clerk of the Senate or of the House of Commons, to or by the Librarian of Parliament, as well as all mail matter directed to the Senate, to the House of Commons, or to the Library of Parliament, at Ottawa.

Letters and other mail matter sent from Ottawa under the above exemptions will be franked or certified as entitled to pass free in accordance with such regulations as may from time to time be made for the guidance of the public departments and of the local post office on this head.

So that the House will see why the ministerial side have found it necessary to put up a defence. They feel the strong indictment that has been made against the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and their only defence is to misrepresent the regulations and misrepresent the conduct of the opposition. They cannot get an acquittal for the hon. gentleman who sits there as Minister of Trade and Commerce, and who acknowledges that he violated their own regulations, that he violated the law, and that he did it in more than 200,000 cases. The conduct of these gentlemen in this case is an aggravated expression of what has been their consistent inconsistency of conduct since they came into power. Sometimes they have tried to imitate the good deeds and the good policy of the opposition. They have not proposed a single new measure for the welfare of the country. They have not proposed anything off their own bat. Now, when one of their distinguished members has been guilty of a criminal act, they defend themselves laughingly and jeeringly before the country, by asserting that something similar was done by gentlemen on this side of the House. There is not a word of truth in that; and then we have the extraordinary spectacle of my hon. friend from Guysborough, an embryo judge, a man who is at this moment violating the Independence of Parliament Act, with the promise of a judgeship in his pocket—

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. There are no words that I could use in parliament strong enough, but I tell the hon. gentleman that it is not true, and if he comes out I will settle it with him.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I am not sitting with a promise of any kind in my pocket, and if he comes out I will settle it by explaining it to him.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker. I rise to a question of order. The grossest violation of the rules of this House is for an hon. member to threaten personal violence to another. That is what the hon. gentleman has done.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I never did it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman did it in the most distinct terms.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, there will not be any duel, for the hon. gentleman has not denied that he is to be a judge.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). The hon. gentleman said I had the promise of a judgeship in my pocket.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the rules of the House clearly forbid the statement made by the hon. member.

Mr. DAVIN. I withdraw the statement, and I am very glad, for the sake of the judiciary of the Yukon; and I may tell you, Mr. Speaker, that if we had a duel, I would be more chivalrous—

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman had better confine himself to the question. I appeal to the House, that if we purpose to maintain the dignity of this House, hon. members must confine themselves to the question before the Chair.

Mr. DAVIN. I am speaking to the question of adjournment, and with great respect, Mr. Speaker, I will continue my sentence, because it is wholly parliamentary. I was saying that if there was to be a duel between the hon. gentleman and myself, I would act on the hint of Curran, and would have the figure of myself drawn on the figure of my hon. friend, and I would declare that any shot outside of that would not count. You will observe, Mr. Speaker, how entirely generous I am in all my feelings and in my contemplated action in regard to the hon. gentleman. And now, Sir, to come to the serious part—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. You see, Mr. Speaker, you asked me to come to the question, and the moment I come to the question, a henchman of the party, who is used for the purpose of diverting the darts that are hurled across the floor of the House at the government, groans in spirit over the trouble which his party find themselves in. Here is a grave charge, a criminal charge, met by the plea of guilty, accompanied by an appeal for clemency on the ground that the very men who made the law are those who have violated it. Why, Mr. Speaker, that only enhances immeasurably the criminality, and adds to the numberless reasons which exist why the people of this country should not have confidence any longer in this government. The fact that here we have a minister of the Crown rising in his place and pleading guilty to criminal conduct and then laughing at the charge, and that we have further a distinguished and learned member of the party and of the bar rising up to defend him and pleading, as his sole defence, that as others have been guilty of the same offence we should allow the one who admits his guilt to escape, shows in what a predicament these hon. gentlemen find themselves. It was an ad misericordiam appeal which the hon. gentleman made, one which would touch the hearts of a sentimental jury, but I hope that this great consult of the nation is not a mere sentimental jury and will not allow itself to be influenced by such tear-drawing appeals as fell from my hon. friend—appeals which are calculated only to have effect on a soft-hearted jury, especially if they had just lunched and had been well treated. But such appeals should not have any influence on a parliament like this and on the country; and whatever hon. gentlemen opposite may do they may feel assured that this criminal conduct of theirs which has been brought to light to-day will have its influence on the country, because it illustrates, as so much that has occurred of late has illustrated, the utter insincerity, the utter want of dignity, the utter inconsistency and hypocrisy of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. F. McCLURE (Colchester). It has been asserted here to-day that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has been guilty of a criminal offence against the law of the country in the action he has taken. Well, Mr. Speaker, in the month of June, 1896, I received through a post office in Nova Scotia, addressed to myself, an envelope bearing no postage stamp but bearing the frank of the present leader of the opposition. Inside of that envelope there was a number of papers. One of them was a distorted and garbled report of the decision of the Privy Council on the school question, another consisted of extracts from certain Conservative newspapers, with reference to the Tory policy and the Liberal policy at that time. That envelope was franked when parliament was not in session. It came through the post office, franked by the hon. leader of the opposition. I have it still in my possession, and if the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce is to go into the criminal dock, I think that he will have to place the hon. leader of the opposition alongside him. Somebody may have improperly used his frank, but, strange to say, I can find any number of electors of mine throughout the county of Colchester who received envelopes unstamped and franked in the same way.

I am not going to discuss the legal aspect of the question at all, but I say it ill-becomes the hon. leader of the opposition, and it is not becoming to the dignity of this parliament, that a man who himself, at least as far as the prima facie evidence can be accepted has been guilty of the very same act, should stand up here and abuse anybody else of being a criminal for having done the very same thing which he has done himself.

Motion to adjourn lost.

Mr. SPEAKER. With reference to the general question raised let me quote from Sir John Bourinot's book on parliamentary procedure, pages 384 and 385. I will only quote the lines which bear immediately upon the point raised :

The answer to a question should be brief and distinct, and limited to such explanations as are absolutely necessary to make the reply intelligible, but some latitude is allowed to ministers of the Crown, whenever they may find it necessary to extend their remarks with the view of clearly explaining the matter in question.

That leaves the matter, to my mind, in the judgment of the minister who answers the question.

Will the House allow me to say a word further as to the time at which this question was raised. After these discussions are all over, I think you will agree with me when I say that to discharge my duty properly as Speaker and to preserve decorum in our discussions, it will be necessary for me to enforce strictly our rules which limits discussion upon an answer to a question. While the discussion upon the motion to adjourn covered perfectly legitimate ground, I own at once as Speaker, that I was wrong in allowing the previous discussion to take place. But it is so difficult, unless I stop the first speaker who raises the question, to do this, that I would ask the House to sustain me in future in taking that stand, and I ask hon. gentlemen on both sides to recall the rules of the House and thus relieve me of the necessity of drawing their attention to them.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. May I be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to ask you, for the purpose of removing all possible misapprehension, if your ruling then is that it is in the discretion of any minister to say anything he pleases, however irrelevant, in answer to a question.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think that when an hon. gentleman reads my ruling he will find his question answered ; but if I were allowed to express an opinion, not as the Speaker of this House, but as a private individual, I would say that it might be debatable how far a minister had a right to elaborate his position by referring to the practice which had obtained in previous years under the Order in Council, but there he must use his own judgment, and on this I do not enter.

THE CASCA TRADING AND TRANSPORTATION COMPANY.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

Has the Minister of the Interior received a statement of claim against the department, made by the Casca Trading and Transportation Company, for assistance given and goods supplied to miners in distress in the Cassiar and Stikine districts ? If so, is the minister giving the same his consideration and attention ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). I beg to reply : 1. Yes. 2. The minister has given the claim attention and consideration, and has directed Mr. E. F. Stephenson, an officer of the department, to make an investigation and to report thereon.

TIME FOR PRESENTING PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. LANDERKIN moved :

That the time for receiving petitions for private Bills be extended to Friday, the 16th March next, in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders, as contained in their third report.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I do not intend to offer any objection to the motion made by my hon. friend in accordance with the report of the Select Committee on Standing Orders, but I must call attention to this point, and hope I shall have the support of both sides of the House in this—that it is most desirable that we should adhere to the rules, and not extend from time to time, as we have done in the past, the privilege of presenting petitions for private Bills.

Motion agreed to.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—CANADIAN CONTINGENT.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, may I be permitted to ask my right hon. friend a question. I ask it because there are a number of gentlemen who desire the information, and also with the hope of shortening the debate on the resolution of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). I desire to know whether, when we get into committee on the subject, the same latitude in dealing with the matter will be allowed as is usually allowed in similar cases. If this latitude is allowed, I think it will facilitate the passing of the resolution and enable us to get into committee.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am not sure I understand the purport of my hon. friend's (Sir Charles Tupper's) question.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the debate at this stage and in committee is considered one debate, it will lessen very materially the time occupied in passing the resolution, because members to whom it would be a convenience not to be present to-morrow would feel that when the resolutions came up in committee they would still have an opportunity to discuss the matter fully. I think, it is usual in such cases, to allow the freedom of debate I have suggested.

The PRIME MINISTER. I think my hon. friend on reflection, will agree with me that it is far preferable to adhere to the rules of the House. They embody the experience of ages, and, for my part, I think it would be better to adhere to the rules.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I fear that my right hon. friend does not understand the point that I make. What I am asking is not that the rules may be departed from, but that the usual practice of the House, as I understand it to be, should be followed. If it were distinctly understood that when we went into committee the fullest latitude would be allowed, instead of confining members to the particular clause of the resolution which might happen to be under consideration, I think it would materially shorten the debate.

CANADIANS IN BATTLE—LORD ROBERTS'S TELEGRAM.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to make a statement. His Excellency the Governor General has received from Lord Roberts, commander of the forces in South Africa, a telegram, which, by authority of His Excellency, I communicate to the House :

Pzardesberg, Orange Free State,
February 22, 1900.

Canadian regiment has done admirable service since arrival South Africa. I deeply regret heavy loss it suffered during fighting 18th instant, and beg you will assure people how much we all admire conspicuous gallantry displayed by our Canadian comrades on that occasion.

(Signed) ROBERTS.

STRATHCONA HORSE—TELEGRAMS FROM RELATIVES.

Mr. INGRAM. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I have a matter to refer to briefly. This morning the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) received this telegram :

Orillia, Feb. 21, 1900.

Ascertain if my son ——— is in Ottawa with Strathcona Horse. Answer quick.

This is a 'rush' telegram. As the hon. member (Mr. Bennett) had to leave, he turned the telegram over to me to ascertain this information from the officers of the Strathcona Horse at the exhibition grounds. I entrusted a letter to the officers of the Strathcona Horse by messenger. He went out at ten o'clock and after several attempts told me that he had handed the letter to the officers, and, after considerable red tape, and after consulting several of the Strathcona Horse, he returned without the information. While these gentlemen may be very busy preparing to leave for South Africa, it does strike me as important that they should furnish parents of those connected with them, with the information they are asking for. I am unable still to answer this telegram. I have sent to the department for information. I think that something should be done by which telegrams of this kind can be answered as soon as possible.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Ingram) is aware that we have no authority over the officers of the Strathcona regiment. If the hon. gentleman will apply to the Minister of Militia—

Mr. INGRAM. He is not here.

The PRIME MINISTER—or to any other officer of the department, I am sure he will receive an answer.

Mr. INGRAM. I have written the deputy and received this reply :

Dear Sir,—I cannot tell if——is with the Strathcona Horse. The service rolls of this force have not yet been forwarded to this department.

Yours truly,
L. D. PINAULT.

FRENCH EDITION OF THE DEBATES AND OTHER OFFICIAL PAPERS.

Mr. T. C. CASGRAIN (Montmorency). (Translation). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to call the attention of the government and of the House to what I consider as an abuse which has existed for a long time, and which affects the privilege enjoyed by the French-speaking members of this House. I accuse neither the government nor the committee that supervises the translation of the Debates into French ; but it seems to me that the abuse I repeatedly complained of last session should be remedied.

I refer to the delay in the translation not only of the debates of this House, but of all official papers as well. Now, if you refer to Hansard, you will find that the French edition is as far behind as February 9. We have not yet before us the translation of the report of the Auditor General. The same remark applies to the correspondence between the Dominion government and the Imperial authorities, in connection with the sending of the contingents. In short, there is scarcely any official paper printed in French.

It will easily be understood that those among us whose constituents do not read English, absolutely require those translations. The French-speaking voters who do not understand English are entitled to get information about public affairs as soon as the other voters in this country.

I do not blame the government or the committee, but I think that the system which now obtains should be changed, and those who supervise the translation of those papers should take the means of expediting the work, so as to have them before us as soon as possible.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I have but one word of explanation to give to my hon. friend on the matter. The Debates Committee is now considering—so at least I have reason to believe—exactly the question of delay in the translation. There is certainly a grievance, and a very serious grievance. I am glad that the hon. gentleman has called my attention to that point. But he knows that the government have no control over the matter. However, I may tell him that the Hansard Committee and the chief of the translating staff are now having the matter under their special consideration.

PACIFIC CABLE.

Mr. ALEXANDER McNEILL (North Bruce). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to call the attention of the government to a short item in the morning paper of yesterday with reference to the Pacific cable:

London, Feb. 20.—In the House of Commons to-day Sir Edward Albert Sassoon asked a question in regard to the construction of the Pacific cable. He drew attention to the rising price of metal required for the purpose, and also the anxiety that exists in Canada in regard to the project.

Hon. Joseph Chamberlain said that the deliberations of the committee would soon be completed. This committee, he stated, was aware of the state of the market as regarded cable material.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to occupy more than a moment, and I will not make any motion unless you insist upon it. I just wish to say that the gentleman who asked this question, Sir Edward Sassoon, is a very warm friend of the Pacific cable project, and certainly I think that the question and the answer are such as to cause those who are interested in the subject some degree of anxiety. It is quite evident that this question would not have been asked had there not been a fear in the mind of the gentleman putting the question that things are not going just as well as he would like them to go. Now, it is an open secret, I think, that the Eastern Extension Company have for years past been a powerful, persistent and tireless enemy of the Pacific cable undertaking. I think it is very doubtful whether the people of Canada as a whole have any adequate conception of the extent to which that opposition has been carried by that company. The Pacific cable is a great beneficent Imperial undertaking, and I venture to say it would be little short of intolerable that any private company or monopoly should be in a position to interfere with the carrying out of such an undertaking. The Pacific cable is a great link in Imperial unity, and it seems almost inconceivable that at this time of all times, at this moment of all moments, the Eastern Extension Company, or any other private enterprise, should endeavour to interfere with it. As we have just heard a moment ago, Canada is offering up the splendid young lives of her sons on the altar of Imperial unity at this moment; and I venture to say, Sir, that the Dominion will view with indignation any attempt from any quarter to impair the usefulness of the great sacrifice we are making and have made. I would urge the government in the strongest way to press this matter upon the Imperial authorities, and to leave no stone unturned to frustrate the efforts of any corporation or any monopoly that may endeavour to interfere with so great an Imperial project as the Pacific cable.

The PRIME MINISTER. I can only say to my hon. friend that when the papers are brought down, as they will be brought down in a few days, they will include the correspondence exchanged between the Imperial government and the Australian governments, and he will see that, as he suggests, no stone has been left unturned in order to baffle the efforts of the Eastern Extension Company.

Mr. McNEILL. I did not wish to imply at all that the government had been negligent.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS, ARICHAT.

Mr. GILLIES. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to inquire of the government, through the Minister of Finance, within whose knowledge the information will particularly be, as to whether any person has been appointed collector of customs at the port of Arichat, Cape Breton, the position having been rendered vacant some weeks ago by the death of the late incumbent. If the position has not yet been filled, I desire to know what is the cause of the delay, and I want to know when the vacancy will be filled. If it has not been filled, then I desire to know from the government who has been discharging the duties of the office since the vacancy arose?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I think my hon. friend will find that the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) has attended to the matter. But in his absence, I would suggest that due notice be given.

THE TRADE REPORTS.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask my hon. friend the Minister of Finance if he would inquire from his colleagues, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Customs, when the Trade and Navigation Report and the Trade and Commerce Report will be brought down. They are very important reports, as my hon. friend knows, and we are looking for them with great anxiety. I also might ask the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) if he can tell us when the Auditor General's report as regards the Railway Department—the only one remaining to be brought down—will be ready.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I will inquire and let the hon. gentleman know. My impression is that they are ready now.

Mr. WALLACE. I want to call the attention of the proper minister to the necessity of having the Trade and Navigation Returns here. We have now completed nearly eight months of the financial year for which those returns should be made, and as time goes on they are becoming less valuable. If we are to discuss the budget speech and other matters, we must certainly have, not only the reports of those eight months, which the ministers have, but we must have the reports of the year which finished eight months ago.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I entirely agree with my hon. friend that both those documents should be ready. I was told a little while ago that it was a question whether the Auditor General's Report or the Trade and Navigation Returns should first be brought down, and I think the House will agree with me when I said that the Auditor General's Report should have priority, and next to that the Trade and Navigation Report. I was told at the time that one or the other must have precedence, and I am responsible for advising that the Auditor General's Report should be first considered.

GRAIN TRANSPORTATION TO THE SEABOARD.

House resumed consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Bennett :

That in the opinion of this House, it is advisable to take a definite line of action with regard to the question of transportation of the grain and other commodities of the North-west Territories, Manitoba and the United States, with a view of centring the same to the greatest possible extent in Canadian channels.

Mr. J. G. HAGGART (South Lanark). In rising to make a few remarks upon the motion submitted to the House by my hon. friend from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), I wish to compliment him on the clearness of his statement and the amount of industry displayed by him in studying up this question. His object seems to be to obtain a declaration of the policy of the government in reference to the question of transportation, notably from our great lakes to the seaboard. I think that in considering this question the inquiry should be limited to the transportation facilities from the head waters of Lake Superior to the sea-coast. I understand that transportation from the North-west to Lake Superior does not enter into the scope of this inquiry which the House is now engaged in. We all know the excellent navigation of Lake Superior. The first difficulty met with is at Sault Ste. Marie, and that has been overcome by two magnificent structures, one on the American side and one upon our own side. I see by a report to the Minister of Railways and Canals of the officer in charge of that magnificent lock, for the construction of which I take some credit to myself and on account of which I received a good deal of adverse criticism, that the lock is doing splendid work, and the report shows how much superior it is to the American lock, and how much more rapidly boats can be taken through it. The next difficulty in navigation after passing that canal is met with at the point where St. Mary's River empties into the head of Lake Huron, or near the junction between Lake Huron and Lake Michigan. The Americans, by the expenditure of a large amount of money, have diverted a portion of the waters of St. Mary's River through what is called Hayes Island, by which they have shortened navigation, if I remember rightly, by thirteen or fourteen miles. In order that our ship-owners may compete with the Americans, I ask the government to remember that they must have an equal right with the Americans to utilize that channel which is made through Hayes Island. I think that under the treaty of Washington we have a right to do that ; because, according to the principles of international law, when a waterway is diverted through American soil and debouches again into the general channel, we have a right to navigate that channel under the Washington treaty. If we have not that right, we would be obliged to follow the river, which is of a less depth than this channel, because it is silting up, and it would require a large expenditure so to improve the navigation as to enable us to compete with the Americans on the route which they have established from St. Mary's River into Lake Michigan.

Then we come down to Lake Michigan, and the main question is the transporting through our territories of the immense products of the cities bordering on Lake Huron, Lake Superior and Lake Michigan, the facilities for the purpose of transporting the same, and what, particularly, is the policy of the government in reference to the works constructed and to be constructed for the purpose of carrying these products to the seaboard. We had two announcements of policy, one by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), and one by the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell), in reference to this matter. The hon. member of the government from Quebec West argues that the proper way of transporting produce from the lakes to the seaboard is by ships having a draught of water of 14 feet, having steam power, and each having two consorts attached, having a carrying power in all of 8,000 tons. If that is the case, what becomes of the project of the hon. Minister of Public Works, who stated that it was absolutely necessary, in order to utilize the magnificent waterways which we have constructed from Port Colborne down to the seaboard, to deepen the harbour of Port Colborne? The hon. member for Quebec West also stated that a necessity arose for deepening Port Colborne harbour, because, although there was 14 feet of navigation in the Welland Canal, there was only a depth of 12 feet at Port Colborne.

Mr. DOBELL. Mr. Speaker, I said there was a necessity of deepening the entrance to Port Colborne harbour because of the high seas that often roll in. I said that these would make it necessary to deepen it probably to 17 feet. I think I made that quite clear.

Mr. HAGGART. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Dobell) will just look at the report of his speech he will find the accuracy of the statement which I have made, in which he stated that on account of the winds that prevail at particular times at Port Colborne harbour there is no greater depth than 12 feet outside of Port Colborne harbour, which necessitates the deepening of it. However, we all know about that; we know all about the difference in the depth of water at Port Colborne. We know, that, sometimes, when the wind is blowing from the west to the east, the water rises on the gates at Port Colborne to 14 feet, and that when the wind is in the other direction it decreases in depth by three or four feet. I perhaps should have been accurate by looking at the difference in the gauges between the two extremes, but there is a difference between high and low water on the gates going into the Welland Canal of nearly 7 feet. However, the hon. gentleman is perfectly right in his statement that in order to utilize the full depth of the Welland Canal, when at certain times the depth is only 12 feet it will be necessary to have a depth of about 15 feet, because we will need a foot or two more. Here are the words used by the hon. gentleman, and it will show whether I am correct or not:

There is no question that we shall have to spend a large sum of money even to provide for fourteen feet of water at Port Colborne, because I believe that to-day the depth of water there is only about twelve feet.

The depth of water will have to be increased,

ed, to enable us to utilize the Welland Canal to 15 feet, in order to utilize the vessels which the hon. gentleman talks about, so that they may be able to get into the Welland Canal. I think the statement is correct, that if there is only 12 feet of water at the entrance, it will have to be deepened to about 15 feet. The hon. Minister of Public Works proposes an entirely different plan. His plan is to utilize vessels which the hon. member for Quebec West says are going out of date altogether. He says that they are abandoning these large carrying vessels on the upper lakes; he says it is impossible for them to get into the port of Buffalo, that they have to utilize tugs to take them in, that they have to take them in backwards, and that the vessels of the future are the vessels which are proposed by the hon. gentleman. To show that his statement was a correct one, he said that the parties who have entered into a contract to build elevators at Montreal have given orders in Scotland for vessels of the type that the hon. member for Quebec West proposes. Now, the proposal of the hon. Minister of Public Works is to deepen the harbour of Port Colborne so as to utilize the vessels which are at present used in the transport trade between Lake Superior, Chicago and the port of Buffalo, or, in other words, to give accommodation at Port Colborne, such as they have at the port of Buffalo, to have a depth of from 18 to 20 feet at the entrance of the harbour of Port Colborne, to make an expenditure so that this harbour can be utilized in all weathers by vessels of that class entering it. These are the two policies of the government in reference to this matter. This is the policy of the hon. Minister of Public Works as stated last year in this House, so as to bring vessels of large draught which are at present being utilized on the western lakes to Port Colborne, where elevators are to be erected, to facilitate the unloading of these large vessels into lighter crafts of 14 feet draught to take the produce to Montreal. I wish the ministers would agree as to which is the proper policy or as to which is the policy that they intend to adopt, whether they are going to take the policy of the hon. Minister of Public Works, or the policy of the hon. member for Quebec West.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Take both of them.

Mr. HAGGART. These are the two different policies propounded by these two hon. gentlemen. To show that the hon. Minister of Public Works, perhaps, has a greater pull in the cabinet than the hon. minister without portfolio, I notice that in the arrangements made with the Connors Syndicate in Montreal, one of the conditions insisted upon was that before the syndicate were required to bring down to Montreal the promised 25,000,000 bushels of wheat, the government of the country have to complete the harbour of Port Colborne, and have to provide a depth of from 18 to 20 feet.

Mr. CLARKE. Is that one of the conditions of the bargain with the Conners Syndicate?

Mr. HAGGART. That is one of the conditions with the Conners Syndicate. Not only do they give them half the amount, or 80,000 square feet of the three piers, at present being erected in Montreal, but they approved of a contract entered into by the Montreal Harbour Commissioners with the Conners Syndicate, one of the conditions of which is that the Conners Syndicate is not obliged, or the parties composing it are not obliged to bring down 25,000,000 bushels of wheat to Montreal until the Port Colborne harbour is deepened. I will read the clause:

The allottees covenant that in the first season after the depth of water is provided at Port Colborne, such depth to be eighteen or twenty feet on a sufficient area to allow large lake vessels to tranship their cargo, there will be transported to Montreal and handled through the elevators and facilities of the allottees at least twenty-five million bushels of wheat, or the equivalent in weight of other freight, subject to the breakage of canals, act of God and public enemies, and causes beyond the control of the allottees or their successors, and to the extent prevented thereby.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). Does my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) know that there are only about 50,000 cubic yards to be dredged at Port Colborne, in order to give 20 feet of water in a certain area?

Mr. HAGGART. I do not know what the minister knows, but I know the information his department furnished to the House. I know that his department stated that it would cost $5,800,000 to carry out the plan.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The whole plan?

Mr. HAGGART. Yes, the whole plan.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Which is not necessary at all.

Mr. HAGGART. I do not know that.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Well, I do.

Mr. HAGGART. I do not know what the minister thinks is necessary to do, but I know that his department thought it necessary to spend $5,800,000 to carry out the plan.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman is quite inaccurate. There was never anything of the kind. What was done is this: Plans were brought down to the House, which, if carried out in toto, would have cost a large amount of money. But never the department, nor any minister pledged themselves to anything of the kind. There is no use misrepresenting the facts.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) says he was not prepared to carry out in toto the plans made by his department, and that he would only carry them out in part. Let him tell us what part he intends to carry out, and what it would cost? It is pretty sure that Mr. Conners, the head of the syndicate, will take the report of the Department of Public Works on the necessities of Port Colborne, and will not pay any penalties for contravening this contract, unless that report is carried out.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I say no, and I know it.

Mr. HAGGART. We discussed the matter in this House when the minister (Mr. Tarte) was ill. Mr. Mulock, the acting minister, stated that he only asked a certain sum, on account, and that perhaps it would not be necessary to carry out the whole plan. Any one who knows anything about the matter, knows that from a mile from Port Colborne, into Lake Erie, an immense amount of money will have to be expended to carry out the idea of the minister. We would like to have from the minister, a statement as to what the policy of the government is after the canals are completed, and in what manner they intend to utilize them. At present we have one statement from the minister without portfolio (Mr. Dobell), and another from the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), and I am inclined to think that the former (Mr. Dobell) is correct. The system of steam vessel towing two consort, has been in existence for years and has been found to be a bad system, as some times the consorts break away and run ashore. The modern idea is that each vessel shall have steam power within itself, and if the ministers will inquire, they will find that this is the best system of navigation, especially in Lakes Superior, Huron and Michigan. I understand that the Minister of Public Works has advocated the building of three sets of locks on French River, in order to enable boats drawing 18 feet to get into North Bay, from the Upper Lakes. I should like to hear from him (Mr. Tarte) and the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) what sized locks he proposes to build. I have also heard it rumoured that negotiations are pending for the purpose of providing navigation from Lake Nipissing to Montreal. It is stated that the locks are to be of the same size as those in the St. Lawrence, and that the government are negotiating with parties with a view to guaranteeing a certain sum for a number of years, for the purpose of carrying out that undertaking. If that rumour be true, and as the House is now in session, I presume that the government will not do anything without taking parliament into its confidence. I was always in favour of navigation by the Ottawa River to the city of Montreal. I believed, and do believe, that it is the shortest and cheapest route. I believe that a moderate sum of money expended in that direction, or the promise of the government of a moderate expenditure, would receive the hearty support of this House.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). What does the hon. gentleman mean by a moderate sum?

Mr. HAGGART. I cannot tell you. The idea of Sir John Macdonald's government was to do the work themselves, and some contracts were let for the purpose of improving the Chats Canal. The idea of that government was to do the work themselves, and to spread the expenditure over a number of years, to the extent of a million, or a million and a quarter a year, so as to accomplish the work in 12 or 15 years.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). What depth of water for navigation?

Mr. HAGGART. The depth of the water, if I remember rightly, is similar to that of the Carillon, Grenville and Ste. Anne's locks, nine feet; and it is very easy to change the works so as to give a depth of fourteen feet. Of course, the locks would have to be lengthened and broadened. I think the normal depth of water on the mitre sills is eleven or twelve feet. The lock where the principal excavation would have to be made would be at Ste. Anne's, and it was the intention of the government to do that work. The first inquiry into the subject of a Ottawa ship canal was by the Imperial authorities when the Rideau Canal was built. They sent engineers to Lake Nipissing and the Georgian Bay, who reported as to the feasibility of the scheme. There is no doubt as to its feasibility. You have as a summit level Lake Nipissing, one of the finest sheets of water in the west, which would furnish a supply of water far beyond the requirements; and I would urge upon the government that in any arrangements they may enter into looking to the construction of that work, they should insist as a sine qua non that Lake Nipissing shall be the summit level of that canal. The depth of water should be fourteen feet; and though the length of the locks in the Welland and St. Lawrence canals is 270 feet, I would have the locks at least 325 or 340 feet long. That is the only feature which would involve an extra expenditure to afford navigation for a largely increased tonnage. You would then have a system of navigation superior to any other from the great lakes of the west to the seaboard. The Ottawa Canal route is, I think, 580 miles shorter from Chicago to Montreal than the route by the Welland Canal; and nowadays the saving of a cent a bushel on wheat determines the route of transportation.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. A quarter of a cent a bushel will do it.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. HAGGART. Mr. Speaker, before dinner I was discussing that part of the transportation question which relates to the proposed Ottawa Ship Canal. I stated that I was in favour of an expenditure to open up that route. I have always been an advocate of it. As we know, Canada enters as a wedge between Lakes Michigan, Huron and Superior and the ocean, so that the traffic from those lakes to the ocean must pass over Canada or through the St. Lawrence route. Government engineers made an investigation into the subject of an Ottawa Ship Canal as early, I think, as 1826 or 1827. It was before Colonel By's day; but the smaller project of the Rideau Canal was adopted. But if Canada is to remain a nation to the north of the St. Lawrence, one of the primary things to be done for the defence or the protection of this country is the construction of a canal from Montreal via Lake Nipissing to the Georgian Bay. I do not know how far hon. gentlemen opposite are committed to that scheme. All I know is that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), in a speech or an interview, and in the debate which we had the other day in the House, stated that he was in favour of the construction of a deep waterway between the mouth of the French River and Lake Nipissing. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that he expected that could be opened up by the construction of three locks. I have not looked into the details of the scheme lately, but my idea is that it is impossible to do it with less than five locks. However, that is a minor consideration. I have always been an advocate of the scheme and I hope the ministry will see their way to assist it. I am not committed to any method. I am not in favour of its construction by private parties. I am and always have been an advocate of its construction by the government of the country. With regard to the details of the scheme, I will express an opinion when it comes before us.

In reference to the transport question, there is one thing certain, that that question depends entirely upon the port of Montreal. If there are no facilities for carrying grain from that port, it is useless to build any more canals or railways. All the freight that can be handled at the port of Montreal at the present moment is being brought there, and there is no use of increasing the transport facilities to that port unless we increase the facilities of transport from that port to the ocean. Now, what are the facts of the case? Over the Canada Atlantic Railway last year there was carried about 12,000,000 bushels of grain, and it could have carried a great deal more. You can go on the Exchange in Chicago and make arrangements to transport any amount of material from Chicago to Liverpool at certain rates. They do not care whether it is carried via Montreal or Portland or New York. The simple question is whether we can carry at a quarter of a cent cheaper by the St. Lawrence route than to Portland or anywhere else. The Canada Atlantic Railway carried from Chicago to Montreal nearly ten million bushels last year at three and a half cents per bushel. Their freight was only limited by the extent of the facilities for handling it in Montreal. And I have again and again urged upon my colleagues that the real question of transportation in this country is the furnishing of facilities at the ocean termini for handling it and transporting it thence to the places of consumption. The terminus for Canada is the port of Montreal, and there are no facilities in that port for handling over 25,000,000 bushels of grain.

Let us look for a moment at the figures of the trade. About 273,000,000 bushels of grain go to the port of Buffalo each year. What proportion of that grain can we contend for in order to transport it to the other side? You must look at what proportion of that 273,000,000 bushels that go to the port of Buffalo is exported from the seaboard to Great Britain. You will find that only a moiety of that is exported to the other side. If you look at the export from the port of New York, you will find that only 19,000,000 bushels of wheat are sent from New York to all foreign countries, and that includes the amount that reaches New York via the Erie Canal.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). How many bushels?

Mr. HAGGART. About 19,000,000 bushels of wheat.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The New York Central alone, I think, carried over 30,000,000 bushels last year.

Mr. HAGGART. The export from New York to foreign countries of wheat, corn, barley, oats and flour only amounts to $37,800,000 worth. I have not got the number of bushels yet, but I remember well that on looking over the figures, what staggered me was the enormous amount that went to the port of Buffalo, compared with what was shipped from the seaboard to other countries. It shows that the bulk of the immense amount of western grain that has moved from west to east is consumed in the New England states, or New York state, and that only a moiety of it is exported from New York and other Atlantic ports. The inference I draw is this, that of the 273,000,000 bushels which go to Buffalo, I think 75,000,000 bushels would be excessive as an estimate of what is exported to foreign countries, and which would be a subject of legitimate contest between our ports and the American ports. You must not imagine that you can at all enter into competition for the whole of that 273,000,000 bushels. The only quantity for which you can compete is about 75,000,000 bushels of the quantity that enters the port of Buffalo. The hon. Minister of Public Works shakes his head, but if he will look at the figures, if he will look at the exports of New York, which is the traffic that we desire to divert from the western states to Montreal, he will find that it is only the surplus which is exported from New York to foreign countries that we can compete for.

The Minister of Public Works or the hon. minister from Quebec (Mr. Dobell) spoke the other day of the enormous amount of our western grain which enters Buffalo for the purpose of export to foreign countries. Well, the whole amount that entered into Buffalo from Port Arthur and Fort William 4,200,000 bushels.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Where did the balance go?

Mr. HAGGART. By the St. Lawrence route, by our own railways and canals.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. And to Portland, how much?

Mr. HAGGART. The total amount is 42,000,000 bushels.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. To New York?

Mr. HAGGART. No, to Buffalo. I am not talking about New York or Portland, or the amount carried over the Grand Trunk to Portland, or by the Canada Atlantic to Boston, or by the Canadian Pacific Railway to St John. What I am talking about is the statement of the Minister of Public Works that the great majority of the grain shipped from Fort William and Port Arthur went to Buffalo. Only 4,200,000 bushels went to Buffalo. Now, how can they compete with the Canada Atlantic carrying from Chicago to Montreal? How can they compete by the Erie Canal route if we can carry that grain at 3½ cents per bushel or very little more from Chicago to Montreal? The rate of freight regulates this traffic. The carrying trade of this country is dependent entirely upon the facilities in the port of Montreal for receiving and handling it. The railways of this country, the Canada Atlantic Railway, the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the Grand Trunk Railway, can go on to the Board of Trade in Chicago and contend for freights to any of the sea-boards within their control, and as I have said, one-sixteenth of a cent per bushel would bring it our way. But they are compelled to pass by Montreal and go to Portland and Boston because the facilities in Montreal are not sufficient.

The proposed plan of the hon. Minister of Public Works for the erection of works in that harbour will not offer the facilities to which that port is entitled. The hon. minister ought to have stuck to his first proposition, which I fully endorse, that of forming a basin or port somewhere in the eastern portion of the harbour for the purpose of erecting warehouses and other facilities to accommodate the freight, so that the railways might go alongside of these warehouses and discharge their freight into them. This it is impossible to get by the plan he now proposes.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The Canadian Pacific Railway, which is one of the great factors in the port of Montreal, has agreed to the new plans that we are carrying out now.

Mr. HAGGART. I beg the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Tarte's) pardon; I am afraid I did not catch the effect of his remarks.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I was saying the Canadian Pacific Railway, which, as my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) knows, is located in the eastern portion of the harbour, so far as freight purposes are concerned, have agreed to the plans, the beginning of which I am starting now.

Mr. HAGGART. We have not heard of them.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I think I may say that these inland basins that my hon. friend is talking about, would undoubtedly offer very fine facilities indeed.

Mr. HAGGART. There is no doubt about it. What is necessary is to have the facilities in Montreal. There is no trouble in getting grain to the port—no trouble in getting all that can be carried from the port. The hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) says that there is a differential of about 3 per cent against the St. Lawrence route. Surely he must be mistaken. On an £80,000 vessel, that would be £2,400, or about $12,000. That would be equivalent to cutting down the life of the vessel to two or two and a half years. The hon. gentleman must be mistaken; the differential rate against the St. Lawrence route cannot be more than one per cent.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is on the hull. You mean the annual insurance.

Mr. HAGGART. No, on the voyage. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Dobell) stated that on a single voyage he had to pay 3 per cent differential, against what it would have been in Portland, or Boston.

Mr. HAGGART.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. He has told me the same thing.

Mr. ELLIS. That is after September.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Dobell) should know something about it.

Mr. HAGGART. It is certainly a mistake. Putting it into figures, what would be the result? Why, as I say, if it were possible to navigate the St. Lawrence year in and year out, it would amount only to a life of two and a half years on a vessel. The differential cannot be more than one per cent, and even that is an extraordinary differential rate. From my information, the difference of carrying the grain, including the insurance from Montreal to Liverpool, against New York and Boston, is only one cent per bushel, and I contend you can deliver the grain at Montreal for nearly one cent a bushel cheaper than it can be delivered for in Boston or New York. The fact that any grain at all is shipped from the western states to Liverpool via Montreal, shows that the transport is at least as cheap by that route. I have now before me the statement of receipts and shipments of grain from Fort William, of the crop of 1899, September 6th to December 5th, the close of navigation. The receipts were 8,727,892 bushels, and the shipments 9,185,944 bushels—excess of shipments over receipts 456,000 bushels. Shipments to Buffalo and other American ports, only 2,606,667. This shows conclusively that the preferred route for our own grain, is the Canadian route.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). That is not Sir Wm. Van Horne's story.

Mr. HAGGART. I never had the pleasure of hearing Sir Wm. Van Horne on the subject, nor would it alter my opinion as to the correctness of an argument, whether Sir Wm. Van Horne agreed with me as to the terminal facilities in Montreal, or not. I am arguing the question entirely upon its merits. I suppose the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) is in favour of having Quebec as the ocean terminus.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The only natural terminus, as you will see by-and-by.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman is correct. There is no reason why Quebec should not be the natural terminus. It was the terminus, and would have remained so, and would have received the shipments of grain of this country, and all the export business, had it not been for—what shall I call it?—the crassness of the people of Quebec. They had the trade in their hands, and when they had it in their own hands, they had not the mercantile enterprise among them to keep it.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Not with all the public money spent on the ship channel.

Mr. HAGGART. There is no place that has fed more at the government crib than this same city of Quebec. In Montreal, all the expenditure for harbour developments and to make the port what it is, the great port of the Dominion, was made by the people of Montreal.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. And the interest is paid by them—every cent of it.

Mr. HAGGART. I am glad that the Minister of Public Works agrees with me, even though he has to differ with the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick). We will allow them to settle these little differences. What this resolution proposes is that we should have a statement of the policy of the government on this subject. We have had two statements, one by the minister from Quebec, without portfolio (Mr. Dobell), and another from the Minister of Public Works, and I hope we are to have another, and, I venture to say, a more sensible one from the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair). I hope that, as my successor in that office, he will form an opinion coincident with mine as to the proper means to be adopted for the navigation of the St. Lawrence. As I explained, my idea was, a single vessel propelled in the best possible manner, with quadruple expansion engines, using the smallest quantity of coal and carrying the smallest crew, consistent with good work, to carry its own freight, having no consorts. These vessels should go through to points on the great lakes and ply eastward to Montreal. I came to the conclusion that it was impossible, in view of the intricacies of the channel, especially at Lake St. Louis, to use to advantage any vessels but those having steam power. I thought and ventured to suggest to the Minister of Railways and Canals, that there was not much necessity for building the locks at Cardinal or Rapide Plat; that for the purpose of the barges now using them, the locks were ample, and that these vessels would be able to make the westward trip when we had built a lock immediately below the Galops, to enter into the channel. We could then utilize the channel with vessels drawing fourteen feet of water, vessels 270 feet long, the breadth of the locks, and having a tonnage of nearly 2,000 tons. The tugs were out of existence, and we did not build canals for the purpose of accommodating them at all. We built the canals, and enlarged them on an entirely different system. The system I proposed is the right one, it is more in accordance with the opinions of the member for West Quebec (Mr. Dobell) than with the opinions of the Minister of Public Works.

The Minister of Railways and Canals stated to-day, that navigation would be open next spring. Does he mean to say that he will be able to use the Cardinal Canal?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). They can go down the rapids.

Mr. HAGGART. The minister, then, has come to the opinion that I did, and which I stated last session, that there was no necessity for building these locks whatever. How can you utilize them if your canal is not built? You can go down but you cannot come up. The minister knows that the current on that particular section of the river is only about five or six miles per hour, and most of these vessels that I am talking about will have a propelling power equal to 12 miles per hour. They can go up that very easily, and they will never utilize the locks in the world except the one that is built at the foot of the Galops Canal. I built that for the purpose of escaping the Galops rapids, and getting into the river and going down to Montreal. If you had the requisite power to come back, you do not need to go into those canals at all. However, I suppose that is one of the things which are done and for which there is no remedy. I do not blame the minister, he took the advice of the engineers of his department, and I suppose he was perfectly right. But I have an opinion of my own in reference to that, and I venture to say that unless those particular vessels that I have described are used, the 14-foot navigation from Lake Ontario to Montreal will be entirely useless. If you want to enter into competition with the Erie Canal you must adopt the modern system. The modern system is to double your propelling power with the smallest possible consumption of coal, the vessel itself having the least possible number of hands, no yards, no rigging, nor anything else in the nature of an incumbrance. Then you can compete with the railways, then you can compete with the Erie Canal in carrying trade to the port of New York. But even then look what the canals have to compete with, look at what your Ottawa Ship Canal has to compete with. It will have to compete with lines of vessels from Chicago and Duluth, to Midland and to Parry Sound, which carried grain, as I stated, all last season, for three and a half cents from the city of Chicago to Montreal. I am one of those who are firmly of the opinion that all the facilities which have been offered for transportation from the east to the sea will be utilized in the near future.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. How much did you say the rate was?

Mr. HAGGART. Three and a half cents. Yesterday I asked Mr. Chamberlin, of the Canada Atlantic Railway, what was the rate he received last year for carrying grain from the city of Chicago to the city of Montreal, and he said that the average rate they received last year was three and a half cents a bushel. But he added that fortunately rates were higher this year, they were up to five cents a bushel.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They would certainly go behind on such a rate.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). Did Mr. Chamberlin tell you they had made any money out of three and a half cents?

Mr. HAGGART. I did not say anything about that.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Because I know something about that.

Mr. HAGGART. I know what they are getting this year, it is about five cents a bushel, or about one cent less than the hon. gentleman stated the rate was from Buffalo to New York. I am sure he made a mistake, because he knows the rate he stated then was more than double the railroad rate or the canal rate. If he will look into the matter he will find that two and a half cents a bushel is not large.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I believe I was within the mark in saying that the average rate on the New York Central from Buffalo to New York the year before last was about four cents.

Mr. HAGGART. Even that is in excess of the rate stated.

Mr. POUPORE. By rail.

Mr. HAGGART. Even that is two cents less than the hon. gentleman stated was the rate the other day.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. From Chicago to New York.

Mr. HAGGART. The highest rate this season, a season in which the rates are pretty high all over, is about seven and one-eighth per cent from Chicago to New York.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I was right then. I said between seven and eight cents.

Mr. OSLER. You said from Buffalo to New York.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, I knew better than that.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman may have intended to convey a different impression, but the impression he did convey was that it was six cents a bushel. However, that does not matter. There are three important lines of communication with the west: There is the canal route by way of the Welland Canal; there is the route by Owen Sound which the Canadian Pacific Railway have and are utilizing for the purpose of carrying their western trade to the city of Montreal; and there is one by Midland which the Grand Trunk Railway have. Then there is the Parry Sound route of the Canada Atlantic Railway, and there is this Ottawa Canal scheme which I see is advocated by the Minister of Public Works. There is the double line of railway with low gradients from Collingwood to Toronto for the purpose of enabling the Grand Trunk Railway to compete on equal terms with the others.

In reference to the navigation of the upper lakes, I listened to the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) when he warned the government of the efforts that were being made to divert part of the waters of Lake Michigan into another channel. It is an old principle of law that all riparian proprietors on a stream have a right to the free use of the water from its source and of its free flow to the ocean. Canada, of course, has a right to see that no diversion is made of the water from its natural channel without her consent. That matter was fully considered a while ago. The amount of water which the hon. gentleman states is diverted by the Chicago Drainage Canal is certainly enormous. We inquired into that subject fully. The American government have inquired into that subject, and there are more large cities in the United States that would feel the effect of the decreasing of the volume of the water than there are in Canada. There is Erie, Buffalo, Cleveland, Milwaukee and a dozen more cities which would be affected by the decrease of the water. There was an inquiry made by the United States engineering department in reference to that matter. It struck me at the time that there was a very simple remedy, and I have no doubt that the remedy is a very simple one. We need not be alarmed at all about it, we have the right to the user of the water, the right to the flow of the water to the upper lakes down past our country, because, I suppose, international law would be interpreted the same as a property right. But, there is a simple remedy as to the regulation of the amount of water which may be diverted from the western lakes through the Chicago Drainage Canal to the Ohio River. It could be counterbalanced by erecting, where the water of the lakes makes its exit into the rivers, an obstruction which would be equal to the amount of water taken out of the lakes. I have always contended that we should put up an embankment in the river for the purpose of keeping the normal height of the different lakes, Lake Superior, Lake Michigan and Lake Huron. I contend that it would be a very easy thing to do, that there might be gates erected upon this embankment, which, when the water was high, would allow the flowing of it off, and so keep the water of the different lakes at a normal level for the working of the canals under a perfect and economical system.

Mr. McMULLEN. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) will allow me; he will admit that there is a certain fall out of Lake Huron into Lake Erie at the St. Clair Flats. He admitted that when he made the statement he has made in regard to erecting an obstruction there to keep the levels of the lakes at a certain point. Out of Lake Michigan the water runs through the Straits of Mackinaw into Lake Huron. The construction of the Chicago Canal will not affect Lake Erie owing to the fact that the fall out of Lake Huron into Lake Erie will always maintain the level of Lake Erie, but the fall out of Lake Michigan through the Straits of Mackinaw will be diminished by the amount of water that is taken away by the Chicago Drainage Canal, and that will affect Lake Huron.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) is mistaken. There is no difference of level between Lake Michigan and Lake Huron. Where Lake Huron has its exit into the river through which it flows into Lake Erie, it is very easy to place an obstruction in that river which would counterbalance, or keep the waters in Lake Huron and Lake Michigan up to the normal level, notwithstanding the flow from Lake Michigan into the other lake. The amount of water coming into Lake Erie would also be decreased. That can be remedied by placing an obstruction in the Niagara River, and if the hon. gentleman has kept posted, as no doubt he has, on current events, he will have seen that it is recommended by the engineering department of the United States that such an obstruction shall be placed there, and he will also have noticed that there has been a protest from the people of Buffalo and other inhabitants of that section of the country against the placing of an obstruction in that particular part of the river, because they contend that it would detract from the beauties of Niagara Falls. We can also, in Lake Erie, as there will be a lesser flow into it, obviate the lessening of the water by placing obstructions near the head of the Galops Rapids which would counterbalance the decrease of the water level. There is no engineering difficulty about it at all. The taking away of the waters of Lake Michigan to the Ohio River can be counteracted by the means that I have suggested. Then, I was arguing in reference to the style of transportation that ought to be used. I contend that the single boat is the proper and the only one with suitable facilities for propelling it from the upper lakes to Montreal. When you get to Montreal, then commences the main difficulty. I contend that the provisions made by the hon. Minister of Public Works, while progressive, are entirely short of the requirements of the port of Montreal. I can assure the hon. gentleman that he will have my support, and I am sure the support of this side of the House in making proper provisions for the development of the port of Montreal. Port Colborne is a secondary consideration. As the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Reid) asks: What is the advantage suppose you had elevators there, and suppose you had a depth of 20 feet of water? If you want to tranship the grain that comes to that section of the country, what is the difference in going 20 miles further to the port of Buffalo. It is true that a sentimental consideration comes in as to whether we might not have a port of our own. Our own vessels can carry the produce from Port Arthur to Buffalo, they can go and load into the elevators at Buffalo and the produce can be taken down by our system of canals. For the purpose of carrying out the proposition of the hon. member for Quebec West, it will be necessary to provide a sufficient depth of water at the entrance of Port Colborne harbour for the purpose of utilizing vessels drawing 14 feet of water; it will be necessary to deepen the entrance to 15 or 16 feet.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) knows, if he permits me, that at this very moment, there are between 18 and 20 feet of water at the entrance of the canal, not over any large area, but at the entrance itself. There are only a few spots where there are about 16 or 17 feet. There are over 18 feet at the entrance, and even 20 feet. I have the plans here, and I will be glad to send them across to my hon. friend when he is through.

Mr. HAGGART. I have taken the statement of one of the hon. gentleman's colleagues, the hon. member for Quebec West, in which he stated that the depth is only 12 feet.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. He has not been out there, and I have been often.

Mr. HAGGART. My argument is founded on the statement of the hon. gentleman's colleague, who represents Quebec West, in which he states that there are only 12 feet of navigation at that particular port. I think that the navigation ought to be improved, and that the entrance to the harbour ought to be deepened to the extent that we can utilize it in connection with the Welland Canal. I am with him in reference to that, but I thought the hon. gentleman was speaking by the book. I heard him correcting the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) the other day when he stated that navigation would be opened from Kingston to Montreal by the spring. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals interjected: 'Except the Cardinal Canal.' 'No,' said the hon. member for Quebec West, 'I have been to see your department and I find that you are not informed upon the subject; navigation, even at Cardinal, will be opened by the spring.'

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The canal at Cardinal will not be completed.

Mr. HAGGART. I know that. When the minister (Mr. Blair) answered this afternoon that there would be fourteen feet navigation from Kingston to Montreal open in the spring, he knew very well that it was his intention not to use the Cardinal Canal, but to utilize the rapids.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) need not be surprised at that, because I stated at a very early period of last session that it was not expected that the Cardinal Canal would be completed this year, but that we had arranged with the contractor to furnish at their own cost the necessary tugs for carrying vessels up the rapids on their return.

Mr. HAGGART. It was a condition in the contract that the contractors should have the canal finished and open for navigation last spring and the minister was insisting on it, and the contractors compromised with the minister by offering to tow up any vessels that require to go up there. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) told us long ago that he would have that canal open this summer and not next spring. The Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) went from one end of the country to the other telling the people that on account of the energy displayed by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) and through his cancelling contracts, he was able to have the canal system completed a couple of years before the dilatory Conservative government would have had it completed.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Just about ten years.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman knows that that statement is entirely incorrect. The only contracts he has cancelled were those of Goodwin and Archibald Stewart on the Soulanges Canal, and if he had left the work with those parties they could have completed it in at least as good time as those to whom he gave the contracts. It is easy enough for the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) to make a lip statement in this House that he will have the canals completed ten years sooner than would the Conservatives, but he has not a tittle of evidence in support of that. I suppose he played upon his colleagues and upon the Postmaster General in particular in making that statement.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I would like the hon. gentleman

Mr. HAGGART.

(Mr. Haggart) to tell the House in what time would the Soulanges Canal have been completed at the rate at which the work on section 12 was prosecuted between 1893 and 1896?

Mr. HAGGART. With the material on hand and the facilities which the contractor had, he would have it finished in less time than the contractors to which the hon. gentleman gave it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I would ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) whether from the year 1893 to 1896 inclusive, there was one dollar's worth of work done or one blow struck on section 12 of the Soulanges Canal.

Mr. HAGGART. If I understand it aright, section 12 was all earthwork, and there was a little rock to be erected in the centre of it, and the work could be done by any contractor in four or five months. There was complaint made by the officer in charge that Mr. Goodwin had done the easiest portion of the work and did not do the most difficult part. I may have mistaken which of the sections No. 12 is. Is it Mr. Goodwin's or Mr. Stewart's?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Mr. Goodwin's, I think.

Mr. HAGGART. Goodwin had a section at the upper end and another section at the lower end. On one of these sections, the engineer alleged that he did the easiest part of the work and left undone the building of the lock in the centre and did not provide the stone. That was a comparatively small section of the work. The upper portion I think he did not put a pick in, if that is No. 12. You could enter into a contract with another contractor to do that work in three or four months. The statement I make now is: That with the exception of Mr. Goodwin, whose contract I intended to cancel myself as he refused to proceed; the other contractors would have done the work just as quickly as any contractors the hon. gentleman could secure. The statement put in the mouth of the Postmaster General that the Conservative government lagged in the construction of that work, is totally unfounded. What has the minister (Mr. Blair) to say in reference to the Sheik's Island portion of the Cornwall Canal? It was I who inaugurated that work, and I am proud of it. Does not every man connected with the transportation trade from Kingston to Montreal approve of that scheme, notwithstanding that the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) when in opposition took it upon himself to make a motion condemning that project?

That is one of the things which were placarded from one end of the country to the other in 1896, as the infamous Sheik's Island Dam. I will ask the Minister of Railways, now that the work is completed, whether it is not a work in the interest of Canada, and one of the best improvements made along the line of the canal. We have, as I have stated, two or three lines of communication. The Midland Railway, that is part of the Grand Trunk, carries twelve or thirteen million bushels of grain to Montreal, and the Canada Atlantic Railway carries nearly twenty million bushels. Our facilities for carrying from the west are perfect. These are of no advantage to any section of the Dominion except the ports on the seaboard and the mercantile marine of the country. The through transportation is not of any benefit to the people of the country. On the contrary, it is a disadvantage to the majority, because it brings the products of the west, especially agricultural products, into competition with the products of our own people. The question of transportation from the west to the east has been solved : we can carry grain cheaper than any other country in the world, and we do it. We can land agricultural products from Western Ontario into the city of London cheaper than the people of Wales or the people of Scotland.

The hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) stated further his plan for the navigation of the St. Lawrence in all seasons of the year. The one thing necessary to the accomplishment of that plan was the building of a bridge at Quebec. He says a channel is always open from Quebec to the ocean, and there is no reason why we should not take advantage of that fact. I suppose this is a scheme sequent to the celebrated bottle-neck steamers. He says there is no doubt about it—all you have to do is to build an ice bridge at Quebec, and the building of the bridge would facilitate the formation of an ice bridge at Quebec. I must say I have a feeling in favour of the old city of Quebec as the terminal point of the Dominion. My early recollections are all in that direction. In my early days, I used to go down there, and I thought Quebec was the centre of the universe. I am sorry to see its decay, but I think it is the natural head of navigation of the St. Lawrence, and I hope to see it some day retrieve its commercial importance ; I think it ought to do so. There is no reason in the world, when those steamers are built which my hon. friend from Quebec West speaks of, why Quebec should not be the terminus. If the people of Quebec had a little more enterprise, and would depend a little less on the amount of money they can induce the government to expend for the purpose of building up that port, Quebec might, as it will some day, retrieve its commercial importance. I must say that the scheme of the hon. member for utilizing the harbour of Quebec is a magnificent scheme. Long ago it was stated that there were only three or four months of navigation in the St. Lawrence in the year. That was afterwards extended to six months, and now the hon. gentleman says there is no trouble whatever in having navigation all the year round. By all means let us give him a chance ; let us have that bridge at Quebec erected, although there are 400 or 500 feet between the piers. I cannot possibly understand how that will facilitate the formation of an ice bridge, although I suppose the hon. gentleman has thought it out.

Another thing the hon. gentleman dilated upon was the great advantage to the country there would be in the making of the extensive improvements proposed in the city of St. John. We are going to make St. John a terminus of the Intercolonial Railway for the freight from the west. I could never understand it. I know the Minister of Railways intends to expend a couple of millions of dollars for that purpose. I never could get it into my head where he was to get the freight from. What railway was going to hand him over the necessary freight for the purpose of filling up that elevator which he is going to build on the north shore of the harbour ? Even if he could get it, how is he going to enter into competition with the Canadian Pacific Railway which has a direct line to the port of St. John ? It is a most useless expenditure, and by a party which rung the changes against the late government for the expenditure on the Harris expropriation for which they said there was no necessity. But now they propose to go further and to expend a couple of millions of dollars on as useless an expenditure as was ever made in the country. There are curious stories going about that expenditure. It is said that the government paid $120,000 for the wharf, which had been offered again and again for about $25,000 three or four months previous. I may be mistaken, but that is the statement made to me, and I would be very sorry to repeat it in the House unless I believed it. I understand that the property passed into the hands of a syndicate, of which Mr. Pugsley, of St. John, is one of the members. The government decided to expropriate the wharf, and paid, I understand, $120,000 for it. The party contending against the excessive price to be paid against it was, I understand, a son of the Minister of Railways and Canals.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I did not understand that.

Mr. HAGGART. I understood so, but I will correct the statement at once if I am wrong, for I would be sorry to make a statement which is not correct.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to say that his statement, from beginning to end, with regard to the property known as the long wharf, is inaccurate. Such statements have been made in this House before. They were made,

I think by the hon. gentleman himself last year, and were then disproved, and are not one wit more accurate to-day than they were then.

Mr. HAGGART. What part is inaccurate?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The whole statement, but especially that in which he associates my son's name with the transaction. He had nothing whatever to do with it, so far as I have any knowledge.

Mr. HAGGART. I am very glad to have that statement corrected, because I thought it was a most extraordinary thing. As I was informed, a property only worth $25,000, the government purchased for $100,000. But as to the principal statement we have the estimates of the Railway Department last year showing what they intend to expend on it. Am I wrong when I say that the amount is $1,500,000?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Just as far astray as you can possibly be.

Mr. HAGGART. What is the amount?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman can find it out.

Mr. HAGGART. I am taking the estimate of the hon. gentleman's department last year of the amount that was to be expended on this work. I am adding the amount for the purpose of expropriation, and my calculation was that the total amount necessary to be expended for carrying out the plans which the hon. gentleman proposed was in the neighbourhood of $2,000,000. That is for the purpose of erecting an elevator, for the expropriation of land, for the deepening of the harbour by dredges, for piles, and the other improvements. I may be mistaken, but I firmly believe that what I say is correct; and I say that it is about as useless an expenditure as was ever made in this country. There is no necessity for it whatever. You cannot carry one bushel of grain profitably or anything like profitable, and land it in your elevator at the city of Montreal, and compete successfully with the Canadian Pacific Railway elevator in the port of St. John.

The hon. gentleman has got an expenditure for the purpose of transportation in order to carry out the idea that we ought to have a winter port, which the whole of the people of this country are in favour of. They are all in favour of having our exports done from our own towns and cities, but the hon. gentleman is asking for an enormous expenditure for which there is no justification.

I perhaps have been dealing with a subject which would be more properly dealt with on another occasion, but I wish to correct, as quickly as possible, the statement, especially of the hon. Postmaster General with reference to the management of my department, and also the statement of the hon. Minister of Railways, that this government in going on with the completion of our waterways with lightning speed, and that they would not have been completed in anything like the same time by the late government. Sir, if there is any prestige due for the completion of these canals, it is the late government that is entitled to it. It is to a Conservative government that the whole conception is due. It was opposed again and again by Mr. Mackenzie's party, and his only justification for completing the contracts on the Welland Canal, when his government was in power, was that the immense expenditure had been entered into by the government which preceded them, and he therefore felt justified in completing the work. Anything for the advantage of the country, anything for the development of this country, I am proud to say, was due to the initiation of a Conservative government. The building of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the building of our waterways, which, I believe, will develop the country to an enormous extent, was due to the Conservative policy. I do not say that in a few years we will realize any amount directly from the building of the Ottawa Ship Canal, but my belief is that through the development of the water powers along that canal, the whole country will be benefited. The whole of the manufactures of this country will be driven by it, our cities will be lighted by it, and through the present means of transmitting electricity from one city to another, I believe that not only will all the cities of this country be lighted by it, but that all our railways, those in Ontario, at any rate, will be driven by these water powers. And I think that the day will come when some economical way will be devised of using that power for the purposes of heat, and that the whole country will be heated by it. I believe that Providence has given us in this country, in the shape of our immense waterways from one end of the country to the other, a counterpoise for the advantages which our neighbours to the south possess in the shape of coal, and that we will enjoy a more economical and better system for everything, even smelting materials, than by using coal. I am in favour of the development of the country to the fullest extent, and I would say to the hon. Minister of Public Works, who, I know, to a certain extent any way, is with me in this direction, that the key of the whole situation is in the building up of proper facilities at the different ports of the Dominion which are contact with the ocean. Even though he is wrong in some respects, he ought to have his full way, and give us a chance to enjoy facilities for transporting our products in the cheapest manner possible to the seaboard, and thence to the places of consumption. To that extent I am heartily in agreement with him, but I am afraid I have trespassed upon your time, Sir, to a greater extent than I intended, and thanking you and the House for your kind consideration and attentive hearing, I will resume my seat.

Mr. W. J. POUPORE (Pontiac). The motion which has been introduced, Mr. Speaker, by the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) has given rise to a very important debate in this House, a debate upon a subject in which I think the future of Canada is very largely involved. The substance of the motion is simply asking the government to arrive at some fixed policy or plan whereby the transportation question of Canada could be dealt with in the most satisfactory manner. This, I am sure, Sir, you will agree with me is a very grave question, not only to Canada, but to the rest of the world, namely, the ascertaining of the best means of bringing about a solution of the transportation question by reducing to the minimum figure the cost of transportation from the points of production to the places of consumption. I was very much pleased to hear the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) the other day, in his speech on this question, announce at the outset that in order to facilitate the utilization of our canals, upon which we have spent some $80,000,000, to the fullest extent, it was necessary to make certain improvements at our terminal points. This is, without a single doubt, the correct idea, as applied to Montreal, as well as to Port Colborne. My own opinion, and I profess to have some little practical idea of the question, is simply this. My own opinion is, that the port of Montreal is the first place that should be improved, not Port Colborne, or any other. The port of Montreal should be improved to afford facilities for handling the traffic which is already taken there by our railways and canals. Better facilities should be provided for loading steamers, which now go to the port of Montreal. I must say that I consider certain improvements at Port Colborne necessary, but the crucial point is the improvement of the facilities at Montreal. It is very easy to arrive at that conclusion. Why, we cannot accommodate the vessels that now go to Montreal. I know whereof I speak. In connection with my business as a contractor, I have to send tugs and barges to Montreal for supplies, such as coal, cement, and so on; and I have had them held there for three or four days at a loss of $100 a day, simply because of the congested condition of the port of Montreal. You need no better evidence than that small fact—small as compared with the great traffic of Montreal—of the congested condition of that harbour and the necessity for providing means to accommodate the traffic that goes there now. I believe, with the Minister of Public Works, when he says it is necessary to make improvements at Port Colborne. What is the object of those improvements? To enable the great lake carriers to bring their cargoes there, and either to transport them to other bottoms, or bring them through to Montreal. I have formed my opinions as to the best method of using our waterways, after reading and hearing the opinions of very great authorities on transportation questions, notably the ideas given by Mr. Thompson, two years ago on the question of the Georgian Bay Canal. It is well worth the while of any public man in Canada, to read that evidence. Mr. Thompson is regarded, by the people of the United States, as one of the best living authorities on the waterways question on this continent. Mr. Thompson points out that the cheapest method to handle the trade where we are dealing with canals, is to construct large tug boats, each tug boat to have two consorts. These three vessels together, will carry as many bushels as the great lake-going vessels of the west. The hon. member for South Grenville (Mr. Reid) who has a knowledge of the transport question, in discussing this matter with me, agrees with me, in this theory. It is better to carry the same cargo in three bottoms, including a powerful tug. You can land the cargo in Montreal, with vessels drawing fourteen feet of water, while, if you bring it in large lake vessels to Port Colborne, you have to change bottoms there, which means another handling of the grain, and so additional expenses is incurred.

It is well known to hon. members of this House, that, in the past, Canada has not been taking her fair share of the western traffic. And, why is it? Is it because we have not spent sufficient money on our railways, or on the St. Lawrence canals? No. One of the reasons is, that our facilities for accommodating traffic in Montreal have been so imperfect. In contradistinction to that, we find that the people of Buffalo in the last few years have spent millions of dollars to extend their harbours and their wharfs and to construct elevators for the accommodation of the great grain traffic. Consequently when shippers wish to have prompt delivery, they say: Why go to Montreal where we may have to wait a week before we can get the barges unloaded and put into the elevator; go to Buffalo, which costs a little more, it is true, but we can get our grain through promptly, and landed in Europe perhaps ten days sooner than by Montreal. Buffalo, having the accommodation I spoke of, took the whole of the traffic of the west. I do not think that it is an exaggeration to say that Buffalo took it all. I have the figures for 1898 here, and they show that Canada, with all her facilities—boasted fac-lities, if you like—after all the money expended on railways and on our canals, only got 7 per cent of the whole western traffic, 93 per cent going by way of Buffalo. And of this western traffic, a large percentage was raised in Canada—crops that should have found export through our Canadian seaports. By reason of the facilities offered by Buffalo, even traffic originating in Canada, was diverted to Buffalo, and sent out by American seaports, to expand their seaports and to cripple ours. This is a brief expression of my views, backed up, of course, by some very practical men who have discussed this question. I think the history of our country for the last ten years proves conclusively, the truth of what I have said. Mr. Speaker, we must be convinced that the position is that we have not proper accommodation for the traffic of the west, and consequently the traffic goes elsewhere.

There is one way in which we can get what belongs to Canada for Canadian seaports. To the Divine Being we owe this means; it is to Providence we should be thankful for having provided it. I refer to the Ottawa River as a waterway from the great lakes to the ocean. It is not the first time you have heard my views on this question in this House, but I think it is an opportune moment for me to say to my colleagues in this House, that the time has arrived when we should assist nature to shorten the way from the western lakes to Liverpool, the point of consumption. The means are placed within our reach. We are not asking the government of Canada to go into the coffers of the country and spend money to construct this waterway. These are the means that have been employed in the past, to provide the subsidies granted to the different railway companies. The enlargement of the St. Lawrence canals has been done year after year, out of the coffers of the government; the taxes collected from the people going to the construction of the works on the St. Lawrence Canal and to subsidizing our railways. We do not come here and ask the House for anything similar to that. We come here saying to the parliament of Canada: We have got the men who have got the money to construct this waterway, and shorten the distance between Liverpool and Chicago by 1,000 miles over any other route that you can find in the United States—certainly 500 or 600 miles shorter than by any other Canadian route between these two points. And if that be a fact, and every one admits it to be so, is it not our duty to assist in opening up a natural waterway which will shorten the distance and attract to Canadian seaports the grain which arises in Canada at all events, and much of the grain that arises in the United States and goes by Buffalo? I ask you if it is not our duty as Canadians to take advantage of this route as we find it? It is not a matter of sentiment, it is not a matter new to the people of Canada; it has been before the Canadian public for the last forty or fifty years. But as I remarked to this House on a former occasion, the engagements of the government year after year were such that they were unable to take it up as a government work. Two or three years ago, when the present government were approached with the view of getting a subsidy to aid in opening up this canal, the reply which was then received by a large deputation was that Canada could not at the present time disburse so large a sum of money as was necessary to go on with this work. It became necessary then to adopt other means. Mr. Stewart, who had the project in hand, went to Europe and came in contact with men of financial standing; and the upshot of it all is that now, at this very moment, we have in the city of Ottawa capitalists from Europe who can put their fingers upon twenty or thirty million dollars, if need be, for the construction of this canal; and all that we ask of the government of Canada is to show to the world their own faith in this great project which is going to do more to develop this Canada of ours than any other scheme which has ever been brought before the Canadian public. That is the exact position of the waterway known as the Ottawa River waterway, or the Georgian Bay Canal. We are asking that the government should merely assist the company to the extent of guaranteeing interest upon its bonds.

Mr. SPROULE. How many millions?

Mr. POUPORE. I am glad you asked the question. You remember what the demand was last session. I am not in a position just now to make any statement about it, because the gentlemen who propose to undertake the work themselves are here now, and they are in communication with the government, and I do not know exactly what conditions they propose. But I am just alluding to the matter en passant as relating to the general question of transportation. Mind you, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish it to be supposed that I am opposed to other routes? I am in favour of all Canadian routes. I am in favour of the St. Lawrence route, I am in favour of the Trent Valley route, I am in favour of all the routes that we have in Canada to-day, and as many more as we can get, because we will want them all if we are going to take the western traffic to our Canadian seaports. It is not with any desire of offering rivalry to any existing route that I have in the past advocated this canal scheme, nor is it my desire, either now nor in anything I have said in the past, to throw any discredit upon any route which exists in Canada to-day. I am one of those who take an optimistic view. I think we want every route we have got; we want the St. Lawrence River route and all the enlargements that are put upon it; we want the Ottawa River route with all the improvements we can put upon that; and even then we will not be able to accommodate the traffic that is sure to arise in the great region lying west of the lakes. These things must be evident to men who have studied the question. The great difficulty that I find where any objection is offered to the Ottawa River Canal, is because gentlemen have not taken the trouble to study the question, they did not feel they had time to do it. But if they were living in the Ottawa valley as I have been since I was born, if they were representing a constituency as I do now in the Ottawa valley, which from time immemorial has contributed largely to the revenues of this country, provincial and federal, they would look upon this question differently. When we remember that we have not received one dollar in return for all we have contributed, we ask ourselves: Why should we pay our taxes for the enlargement of the St. Lawrence Canal? Why should we be called upon to pay our money to help build railways that run along the St. Lawrence River? Why should we be asked to do it? We have a right to say: Help us now. We have helped you first, you have got all you wanted, now give us a hand and open up a new waterway in the Ottawa valley. Is that an unreasonable request to make? Is it not the most reasonable thing to expect? When Canada has expended so much money in the past, and has now completed one of the finest waterways on the continent of America, is it not proper and just that we should expect that this short waterway to the great lakes should be opened up so as to shorten the distance between the producing point and the consuming point by 1,000 miles? All that can be done without imposing one single cent of taxes upon the ratepayers of Canada, not one single cent until the whole canal shall have been completed, and then the government is asked to pay interest upon the bonds for a period of twenty years. There is the proposition which we have been making to the government of Canada, and which I do hope will receive the kind consideration of the government before many moons have passed. Those are the opinions which I wished to express in regard to the Georgian Bay Canal.

I would like now to refer to a remark made by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler), when speaking the other evening upon the same question. The deduction I drew from his remarks was, that canals, after all, did not amount to a great deal, that railways carry the great bulk of the traffic at the present time. If that hon. gentleman were in the House I would like to ask him this question: Are we not trying to solve the question of cheap transportation? The ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart) stated a little while ago that he was told by Mr. Chamberlain, of the Parry Sound Railway, that they handled wheat from Chicago to Montreal last year for 3½ cents a bushel. No living man in Canada can be made to believe that the men who handled that wheat for three and a half cents a bushel made any money out of it, but I think they lost money. Now, the cost of transporting a bushel of grain from Chicago to Montreal must be in the vicinity of five cents a bushel. If you shorten up the distance, as we propose by water, you are going to save a difference of two cents per bushel at the very least, you are going to handle grain from Chicago to Montreal at about one-half its present cost, say five cents. I may give you the figures on another occasion, but it will take too long to give them to-night—I can show you that the grain can be handled from Chicago to Montreal by water for two and a half cents a bushel, and put aboard steamers in Montreal. I see the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) shakes his head; perhaps he thinks that incredible.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). A bushel of grain can be taken from Port Colborne to Montreal for about two or two and a half cents. I quite grant that.

Mr. POUPORE. My statement is—of course there is a great deal of prediction about it, but I can show figures that will satisfy any practical man who understands the transportation question—

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. At what rate.

Mr. POUPORE. I can show accurately by evidence that you can save at least one cent per bushel over the cheapest rates that have ever been obtained via New York. In New York, we find that some grain has been handled between Chicago and New York for three and a half cents per bushel via the Erie Canal.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. From Buffalo to New York, not from Chicago.

Mr. POUPORE. Yes, from Buffalo to New York. From Chicago to New York I think it costs somewhere about five and a half or six cents per bushel.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Via the Erie Canal.

Mr. POUPORE. It depends entirely on circumstances. In recent years you could get freights from one to one and a half cents a bushel less, but this year freights are a good deal higher.

Mr. WALLACE. Did I understand the hon. gentleman (Mr. Poupore) to say that the distance from Chicago to Montreal is 2,600 miles?

Mr. POUPORE. The distance between Chicago and Montreal via the Ottawa River route is 980 miles. The figures in the report made by the Senate Committee in 1898 show that via the St. Lawrence route, the distance between Chicago and Montreal is 1,348 miles, and via the Ottawa River 980 miles. I must beg my hon. friend's pardon for saying that the distance via the St. Lawrence route was 2,600 miles. I did not just understand his question and I thought he referred to something else. It is very strange, Mr. Speaker, with the advantages that we enjoy already for handling the trade of the west, which are the same that we have had for some years past, that we find the people of New York have become very much excited over something. We have found that by reference to several of their newspapers for the last year, and quite recently they appear to be thinking that they had better be getting a move on in regard to their waterways, otherwise, they will wake up shortly and find that the traffic which now goes to Buffalo will be going down by the northern waterway, via the Ottawa and the St. Lawrence Rivers. To prove this I do not think that I have to go very far. Here is a dispatch bearing upon the subject :

Erie Canal Improvement.

New York, Feb. 14.—Canal legislation was the principal topic of discussion at the monthly meeting of the directors and members of the board of trade and transportation held to-day. C. Waldo Smith, chairman of the canal committee, presented a report endorsing the proposed Erie Canal improvements outlined in the report of the commission. Congressman George B. McClellan's Bill to sell the canal to the general government was condemned.

Here is another report which I think is very significant and should have some weight with our Canadian public men. It is headed 'Need Larger Canal,' and is as follows :

Albany, N.Y., Jan. 25.—The representatives of the committee appointed by the legislature to consider the causes of the decline of commerce at the port of New York, and the condition and prospect of the New York State canals, were presented to the legislature to-day by Governor Roosevelt, accompanied by a lengthy message, reviewing the reports, and recommending action on them.

The commerce committee gives as the main cause of the decline in the commerce of the port of New York discrimination by the railroads against the port in the interest of competing ports. The commission shows that this discrimination is made so as to overcome the advantage which New York would have under natural conditions as the cheapest route to the foreign markets for the products of the west and comments with this special severity upon the New York railroads, which have received benefits from the state, and yet participated in the discrimination, to the serious injury of New York. Regarding this discrimination the commission makes no recommendation as to legislative action, seeking simply through its report to give widespread publicity to the facts, holding that evil can be remedied by improving the canals, canal terminals, &c.

Mr. POUPORE.

Taking up the report of the canal commission, the Governor points out that the committee is agreed that, in the first place, the canals cannot be abandoned; that, in the second place, a ship canal ought not to be built by the state; and that, in the third place, the present canal must be enlarged. Continuing, the Governor says:—

Now, they go farther. This is what Governor Roosevelt says :

'Neither New York nor New York State can afford to rest supine while their eager business rivals strive every nerve to snatch away the commerce which has been so large a part of their life-blood. New York is the only state through which, because of its topography, it is possible to transport freight by water from the the great basin of the Mississippi to the Atlantic. The Dominion of Canada on the north—

Mark you, Mr. Speaker—

—has similar advantages, and how well the Canadians have availed themselves of them the final opening of their great canal system last fall conclusively proves. If we do not improve our own canals, we shall have nothing wherewith to meet the advantages conferred upon Canadian commerce by her canals on the north, while we deprive ourselves of a great aid in the struggle with our business rivals in our own country, leaving ourselves at the mercy of a combination made by railroads for the benefit of our localities.'

The Governor strongly recommends the plan proposed by the committee for a larger canal, capable of carrying boats of a thousand tons capacity, to build which would involve an expenditure of $60,000,000, and says : 'There is every reason after the most patient investigation, to believe that the large canal will result in a transportation cost across the State of New York as low as that on the St. Lawrence canals, and far less than any rate that is possible by railroads at any time within the immediate future, if ever, the difference in favour of the canals over the railroads being more than three-fold, that is, the freight rate on the canals being less than a third than that by railroad.'

There is evidence to show the error of the argument of my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Osler) who made the general statement that now canals were going out of use and that the traffic of the west could be handled with so much cheapness, that the railways carried the great bulk of the freight. This applies entirely to freight that cannot be accommodated by water transport. Wherever you have facilities for water carriage of freight, you find that the freight will follow the cheaper course, and as Governor Roosevelt has pointed out, freight can be carried by water at one-fourth the cost that it can be carried by rail. The great question before us at the present moment is the development of our waterways. I do not know the extent of the improvements necessary at Port Colborne, but I do know that very great improvements are necessary in the matter of enlarging the accommodation at the port at Montreal. A good deal of money has been expended there year by year for the past few years, but it has not been sufficient to enable that port to keep pace with the growing trade. To show the utter inadequacy of the port of Montreal, I may mention that Mr. Smith, the general freight manager of the Ottawa and Parry Sound Railway, told me that on one occasion last year, they had boats and barges lying around the port of Montreal for a whole week, and were unable to get their grain into an elevator.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There were hundreds of boats in the same condition.

Mr. POUPORE. The attention of the government should be immediately directed to extending the facilities at Montreal, so as to prevent the recurrence of such a state of things as that. I find that the Prescott elevator was in the same position. The conclusion is forced upon us that the facilities at the port of Montreal are not sufficient to accommodate one-quarter of the trade that could be done there.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Hear, hear.

Mr. POUPORE. We should extend the wharfs at Montreal, erect elevators and deepen the water in the harbour, so as to afford the best possible accommodation for steamers that seek that port. I do not wish to conclude, Sir, without making some allusion to the port of Quebec. I quite endorse the statement made by the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) as to that port. Nature has given us a harbour there, capable of accommodating the largest steamers that float, and there is ample room to erect as many elevators as the trade will demand. The larger class of vessels will naturally come to Quebec, rather than to Montreal. There is a good deal of force in the statement made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Dobell) that the rates of insurance to Montreal are excessive, and particularly so after the month of September.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The rates are the same for Quebec as for Montreal.

Mr. POUPORE. That seems very peculiar.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Well, they are about the same thing.

Mr. POUPORE. I was under the impression that steamers continuing to Montreal would have to pay more insurance.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There have been a great many more accidents below the city of Quebec than between Quebec and Montreal.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick) Oh.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The figures are there. Two and two make four; they cannot make five.

Mr. POUPORE. I do not suppose that the minister (Mr. Tarte) disputes my statement that the port of Quebec will accommodate the largest vessels afloat.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is a magnificent port.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Quebec is a port for steamers, and Montreal for barges.

Mr. POUPORE. I cannot consent to that assertion.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Montreal is a great national harbour and Quebec is a great port indeed.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. A greater one than Montreal.

Mr. POUPORE. I trust that my hon. friends who represent western constituencies will be generous in their aid to the development of all Canadian avenues of trade. I shall support, so far as it lies in my power, any project which will bring the traffic of the west to our Canadian seaports, whether Montreal, Quebec, St. John or Halifax. As a Canadian, I shall give my support to any well devised scheme either of railway or canal extension, which will tend to develop these ports. I ask my hon. friends from all over the Dominion to look at this question from a national standpoint, and to join with us in increasing our present facilities. For my part, Sir, I shall support any scheme calculated to bring the trade from our great western country to Montreal and other Canadian ports.

Mr. PETER MACDONALD (Huron). Mr. Speaker, I look upon the transportation question as one of the most important which we can be called upon to discuss in this House. I trust, Sir, that it will not be regarded as a party question, nor even as a local question. We have a great many routes in this country, along which will go a larger or smaller proportion of the trade, no matter what the government may do to put our waterways in proper condition. I shall not speak in favour of any particular route, but I shall speak in favour of the policy the government has been laying down with regard to the improving of what are called our waterways. Every man who has made a study of the transportation question knows that these waterways always have a strong and powerful influence in reducing railway rates, and the more efficient these waterways, the greater will be the influence they exert in that direction. The hon. member from Toronto (Mr. Osler) told us the other night that only 4 or 5 per cent of the trade going to New York was carried on the Erie Canal, and he therefore concluded that it had little effect in modifying railway rates. The opinion of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Osler) in that respect is entirely different from the opinion of those who have given this question the greatest consideration. It is quite plain that if there is an alternative water route for freight, it will limit to a very large extent the high rates charged by the railways, and in my opinion the development of our water routes must result in such a healthy competition as will control the railways to some extent. That is a matter we cannot overlook in considering the transportation question. We in Canada have been doing a considerable amount to develop our transportation facilities, but our trade is increasing by leaps and bounds and we have not been going fast enough to accommodate it. If we measure the trade of Lake Superior by the amount of traffic that passes through the Sault Canal, it will give us an idea of the trade that is converging to that one lake alone. In 1887, the number of vessels that passed through that canal was 9,000; their average tonnage was 600 tons each; the tonnage of the freight they carried was 5,495,000, having a value of $79,000,000. That was a very large trade; but let us look at what it amounted to ten years afterwards. In 1897, the last year for which the figures are at my disposal, the number of vessels passing through the Sault Canal had increased to 18,000, the average tonnage of the vessels had increased to 1,000 tons each, and the tonnage of the freight increased to 18,900,000 tons, having a value of $218,500,000.

I give you these figures to show you the importance of making provision to handle a portion of that trade, by means of our waterways and our railways. Have we been making that provision as rapidly as the trade has been increasing? I think not. Therefore, we have to bestir ourselves, if we expect to handle our share of that trade, and put our transportation routes into first-class order. It is said by some that the railways could carry a greater part of the trade, as they do in all countries which have railways; but, as I said before, the waterways will so control the rates upon the railways, as to insure to the producers a large reduction in the cost of transportation. I understand that is the object we have in view. If we cannot increase the price of the products of the farmers, the miners, the millers, the lumbermen, and all other producers, we can seek to have them brought to the markets of the world, as cheaply as possible, and in that way put money into the pockets of the hard working people of this country.

Therefore, speaking as a representative of a farming community, I feel specially in favour of the expenditure of large sums of money, if necessary, to put our transportation routes into proper shape. There are no railways in the world that carry wheat cheaper than the railways running from Chicago to New York. The reason of that is, that there is no waterway in the world that carries wheat cheaper than the waterway from Chicago to New York. For the same reason the improvements that have been made on the railways from Chicago to New York during the last twenty years have been greater than the improvements that have been made in the same time on any other railways on the continent of America. They were forced to make these improvements. They were forced to increase the size of their cars, to straighten their curves, and to increase the power of their locomotives, in order to compete with the waterways running almost parallel with them. Therefore, if we have a low rate between these two points, on the railways, it is due to the competition of the waterways.

We sometimes hear it said—I have heard it in this House—that the little Erie Canal, only six or seven feet deep, only capable of floating a cargo of 200 tons, with boats moving at the rate of two miles an hour, drawn by mules or horses, taking about twelve days to go from Buffalo to New York, and twelve days to return, and only making one trip a month, cannot have such an effect on the railway rates as is alleged. I want to give the testimony of men who are known all over the country, and who have given the transportation question thorough consideration, both as respects railways and waterways. I want first to show you that we have a better waterway than any other country in the world. When I say that, I say it advisedly, for I have looked up the history of waterways, both in the old country and in the new. We have a waterway which extends from the Atlantic 2,700 miles into the very centre of our continent, and which gathers up from all sides, the trade which the energy and industry of our people are producing. When we consider that our canals are much deeper and the open waterway much greater in proportion to the mileage between Chicago and Montreal, than between Chicago and New York, we shall see the advantage which our waterway must possess. There are 1,419 miles between Chicago and New York, and only 1,261 miles between Chicago and Montreal, a difference of 158 miles in favour of our waterway. From Chicago to New York, they have 350 miles of canal, while from Chicago to Montreal, we have only 70 miles of canal. In other words, they have one mile of canal for every 4 miles of open water, whereas we have only one mile of canal for every 17½ miles of open water. So that you see the great advantage we have in this respect. As the result of observations extending over 25 or 30 years, we find that the Welland Canal is open on the average, 19 days longer than the Erie Canal, so that it will control the rates that much longer. Even the Lachine Canal, is five or six days later in closing in the fall of the year, than the Erie Canal; and a few days' competition of the canals in the fall of the year, has a tremendous influence on the railways in the way of preventing them pooling their rates, as they do during the period of closed navigation. The total earnings of all the railways in the United States, in 1891, averaged 941 cents per ton mile, whereas, the earnings of all the railways in the United States running parallel with waterways only averaged 692 cents per ton mile, or over 25 per cent lower than the average earnings of all the railways of the United States. The earnings of the Chicago and Northwestern Railway, and the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway, which were beyond the influence of waterways, averaged 1.03 cents and 1.06 cents per ton mile, respectively, or over 50 per cent higher than the average of all the railways in the United States. I give you these figures to show the wide and permanent influence the waterway has upon the railway rates. Let me give you the opinion of a very eminent man on this question, which will answer the objection that my hon. friend from Toronto made, namely, that the waterways only carry a very small percentage of the freight, and therefore, have no influence on the railway rates at all. Mr. Emery R. Johnson, Doctor of Philosophy, and instructor in political and social science of Hartford, in a brochure written on the water routes, and railway tariffs, says:

The waterway, however, can regulate rates by carrying only a fraction as much as the competing railway, and it by no means proves the inability of waterway to fix rates to show that the volume of freight passing over the railroads is several times that on the competing routes of navigation. The rates charged by the water sets a limit beyond which the railway cannot go without surrendering its traffic to the waterway.

You can see, Mr. Speaker, the soundness of that argument by a simple illustration. Supposing that two stages are running, one a first class and another a fourth class, between two points. A passenger wishing to go from one point to the other will go first to the first class stage, and supposing he were told that the fare was $4, he would then go to the fourth class stage and find out that the fare was $2. He would then say to the first-class stage owner: If you do not come down in your price, I will simply take the other stage, and in this way he would compel the first-class stage owner to come down in his price, no matter how inferior the other stage might be. In like manner the shipper will say to the railways: If you take my freight to the city of Montreal for a certain price I will give you the preference, because yours is probably a more direct and rapid route, and I will have reason to pay you a little more; but if you will not take my freight at a reduced price, there is a water route which will take it much cheaper.

There is another factor which we must bear in mind, when comparing the influence of waterways upon railways. It is estimated by Mr. Thomson, of Duluth, a large exporter, that when it costs $1 to carry a ton a certain distance by water, it will cost $10 to carry that ton the same distance by rail. I thought that a little too high and investigated the question more fully, and I found in a speech delivered by one of the delegates at the Deep Waterway Convention in 1895, that he put the proportion as one to eight. Where it costs $1 to carry a ton a certain distance by water, it would cost $8 to carry it that distance by rail. I was under the impression that also was a little too high, and examined several blue books, and finally came across a blue book entitled 'American Shipping,' and I found that the experience of the United States, taking three years, and comparing the cost of transport by water and rail, was that it was in the proportion of one to four. Where it cost $1 to carry a ton a certain distance by water, it cost $4 to carry it by rail. That is a very strong argument in favour of establishing a first-class water route, because even if it be longer, we can carry freight four times the same distance for the same price as by rail, and therefore the argument of distance is not always a convincing argument.

Again, we are told by some parties that a mixed route is the best, that is, partly by water and partly by rail. Well, that has not been the experience of shippers and others who have given their consideration to this question. Let me show you how the Erie Canal controls the rates from Buffalo to New York. The figures show the wisdom of the present government in seeking to establish an all-water route. Here are the rates charged in 1891. I do not give you those figures as being the ones charged today, but simply to show you the relation between the two systems. From Buffalo to New York the rates charged in 1891 were as follows:

	Per Bushel.
	Cts.
In May	2.51
In June	2.53
In July	2.68
In August	3.94
In September	4.19
In October	4.44
In November	4.13

Those were the charges by the Erie Canal during the season of 1891. Immediately after the closing of navigation and previous to its opening in the spring, the railway freight in that year was 7.8 cents per bushel. The average charge during the season of navigation by the boats was 3.49, and the average charge during the close season by the railways was 7·8 cents per bushel, which shows the influence of the canal upon the railways.

The MINISTER OF MARINE. Does that include terminal charges ?

Mr. MACDONALD (East Huron). No, that is the freight. During the open season, the influence of the canal forced the railways to bring down their rates from 7·8 cents to the following :

	Per Bushel.
	Cts.
June, July and August.....	4
September	4½
October	5

From Buffalo to New York, and when the navigation closed, the railways went back to the full rate of 7·8 cents. Does not that show plainly the tremendous influence that a little canal has upon the railway rates, over three cents a bushel ? And if that little canal were removed by any means, the railways would have the power of charging that 7·8 cents during the whole year ; and, in deed, Sir, after the close of navigation in this country this year, it is evident to all that the railways put up their rates to a very considerable extent.

I want to give you another fact in connection with those I have already mentioned. The Board of Trade of the city of Buffalo, composed of men who are largely interested in the shipment of wheat, when the ordinary period of closing the canals during the year was reached, petitioned the Minister of Public Works of the State of New York to keep the canal open five days longer, and he did so, and the rates continued during these five days as they were before, but immediately afterwards the railway companies put up their rates again.

There are some other facts that I wish to give upon the authority of other people. You can understand, Sir, that the business in which I am engaged does not enable me to obtain any personal experience on this question, and therefore I am forced to seek out men who are known as deeply interested in the transportation business and give them as authority on the question we are now discussing. Mr. Albert Fink shows the economic value of deep waterways and the great lakes. He has been frequently spoken of as one of the best authorities on the subject in the United States. He was commissioner of the Trunk Line Pool, therefore he knows all about the railway. Mr. Fink says :

The Erie Canal and lakes exercise their influence over the southern country until it reaches a line where low ocean rates from New York to the gulf states—Mobile, New Orleans, Galveston—exercise their influence upon the rates to the interior adjacent points so that it may be said the all-rail rates are kept in check by water transportation.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

With reference to the Erie Canal, Mr. Win-dom says :

The wide sweep of competitive influence exerted by the Erie Canal is not generally understood or appreciated. You would doubtless be surprised, Mr. President, if I told you that the little ditch which runs through your state holds in check and regulates nearly every leading railroad east of the Mississippi River, and that it exerts a marked influence upon the cost of transportation over all parts of the country, and yet such is the fact.

I want to give you the opinion of a still better authority of the regulating power of waterways. You remember that in 1884, the United States people were exercised very largely over this particular question, and the Senate, a committee of which came to be known as the Collum Committee, because Senator Collum was chairman. When they had assembled, they formulated several questions which they wished to place before men who understood the transportation question. They sent out this question to ninety-three persons :

In making provision for securing cheap transportation is it, or is it not, important that the government should develop and maintain a system of water routes ?

The answers to the questions, the evidence before the committee embody the views of ninety men, most of whom were eminent in railway and transportation circles. Seventy-three out of the ninety gave it as their opinion that a national system of water communication is the most certain and effective method of regulating railway rates and securing to the people the advantages of cheap transportation. That they put in their report, in which I find the following :

The evidence before the committee accords with the experience of all nations in recognizing the water routes as the most efficient cheapeners and regulators of railway charges.

Their influence is not confined within the limits of the territory immediately accessible to water communication, but extends further, and controls railroad rates in such remote and interior points as have competing lines reaching means of transport by water.

Competition between railways sooner or later leads to combination or consolidation, but neither can prevail to secure unreasonable rates in the face of direct competition with free natural or artificial water routes.

The conclusion of the commission, therefore, that natural or artificial channels of communication by water, when favourably located—

Bear in mind 'favourably located.' I have shown that ours is favourably located.

--adequately improved--

I have not shown that most of them are adequately improved.

—and properly maintained, afford the cheapest method of long distance transportation now known, and that these must conduce to exercise in the future as they have invariably exercised in the past—

Now, note.

--an absolutely controlling and beneficially regulating influence upon the charges made upon any and all means of transit.

These facts show conclusively that it would be a wise policy on the part of the Dominion parliament to spend large sums of money to put ours in the most efficient and proper condition. The question arises, is our waterway in that condition? It is far from it. We need our canals fourteen feet deep and with the necessary locks between them. We need terminal facilities and intermediate facilities which will meet the necessities of the traffic carried by our lakes and canals. We have our canals finished, we have our lakes, the finest in the world. Have we facilities in Montreal to handle the trade we are getting? I think I shall be able to show by the figures I shall give. Have we facilities in Port Colborne to handle the traffic that we are going to get there? We have no protecting pier to protect the ships when they come into the harbour; we have no wharfs, docks or other facilities. And would you, in the face of these conditions, expect to get the trade which now goes to Buffalo? Let us be reasonable. But if we do expect to get it, is it not wise on the part of the government to put their hands in the public exchequer and spend a million or five million dollars if it is necessary. We have spent about $80,000,000 on our canals, and our canals are not worth one-half the amount they would be if we had proper terminal facilities. If we do not put these carrying facilities in perfect order, we might as well quit, we might as well take down our sign and try to do something else. It is said that all this costs money. Every good thing costs money. I have discussed this matter before the farmers, and I have pointed out that, if there is anything coming to them of an advantageous character, it must come through the improvement of our facilities to handle their products, and that it would be better for them to spend the necessary sums than to find this competition too much for us. Now, the port of Buffalo has no less than twenty-one elevators, with a capacity of 20,000,000 bushels. They will elevate the wheat for the small sum of one-eighth cent per bushel; they elevate wheat at the rate of 1,100 bushels a minute.

I will tell you later how rapidly they elevate wheat in the city of Montreal. Only two years ago they loaded the steamship Superior City, in Chicago, with 266,500 bushels of wheat in the short space of seven hours, or over 38,000 bushels every hour. Now, that was facility. People exporting their wheat knew they could have it handled with rapidity, and the consequence was that a great deal goes there. But they do better than that in Duluth. They loaded a ship there last year with 185,000 bushels in three hours, and another with 195,000 bushels in 153 minutes, or over 1,200 bushels per minute.

That is the kind of work that we want. We want to handle our freight rapidly, and when we handle it rapidly we handle it cheaply. You will find that freight goes in the line of cheapness, other things being at all equal. Even the shadow of a cent in favour of one route over another will send the trade that way, providing other things are equal.

Now, I want to show you that we are not prepared to meet the trade that we now have in the city of Montreal. Take, for instance, the way we handle cattle in the city of Montreal. Cattle are taken down there, say, on the Canadian Pacific Railway. They land down at Hochelaga, they are fed and watered, and are cared for all right enough. Then, after that is over they are run up opposite the ship that is waiting for them. The railway does not run along the edge of the dock, but about 150 yards back. The cattle are rushed down steep gangways from the doors of the cars to the wharfs. Then they are urged across the wharfs and then through the sheds and finally up steep gangways on to the ship. The result to the cattle is that they are excited, heated and bruised, and in this condition they commence the voyage. Cattle exporters say that they lose from $2 to $5 in value on every animal on account of the way in which they are handled. Now, take $3 as the average, as they export about 100,000 cattle, there is a loss of $300,000, the interest on 10 millions of money. It would have paid us to borrow ten millions if necessary, and to expend that on shipping facilities, and the interest would be saved in the export of cattle alone. What is the consequence? A large number of our cattle go to Boston. How do they do there? They run the cars with the cattle right down to the middle of the shed, right on the very edge of the dock. Then they land them, not on steep gangways, but on level gangways from the door of the car on to the ship, and they go on in perfect condition. The result is that Boston is the greatest cattle shipping port in America, and more than one-third of all the cattle going to England goes from the port of Boston; and our trade goes to Boston instead of remaining in the city of Montreal as it should remain.

Then take the way they handle lumber. There are no piling docks in the port of Montreal at all, and when a ship is expected to land to-morrow, or the day after, the agent of the shipping company sends away up the line that the ship is coming in. The barges come down the river loaded with lumber, and when the barges get there in many cases the ship is delayed one day, two days, three days, and because there is no piling place, the barge has to lie there holding its lumber. Then when the ship goes they charge the ship owner $10 a day for demurrage, and this in the end all comes out of the lumber, it finds its way back finally to the producer of the lumber. In my opinion there should be large piling docks at Montreal, so that when barges come down they could unload and go back again.

Now, there are some other points that I want to bring before you even more astonishing. I want to deal pretty closely with Montreal, because I think it should be considered by the government as a national harbour. I think that would be better policy even than the Comers Syndicate. I think the government should take it over and make improvements upon it upon some national plan; and if they could not carry out that plan in one or two years, let them proceed in such a manner that in the end the scheme would be completed.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS.
We are beginning now.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I may state here that the government has never spent a dollar on the port of Montreal. Not many people know that. It is true the government loaned about three million dollars to the Harbour Commissioners, for which the Commissioners pay interest at 3 per cent, and they collect that 3 per cent, and all the other expenses of the port from the shippers. The charges for elevating grain in the port of Montreal are so much higher than the charges in Boston, New York and other places, that the result is that our trade is diverted, as I said before, along the cheaper lines. The Canadian Pacific Railway two years ago had 26 cars loaded with lumber on the sidings in Montreal, without having a ship to place that lumber upon. Those 26 cars were held there for several days before the ship arrived, and they charged demurrage of $2 a car per day; or in other words $52 a day was charged on account of there being no piling place so as to allow the cars to unload and return to other work. Then again we have not sufficient warehouses there. When a ship comes in from foreign countries it wants to unload, but there are no warehouses, or not sufficiently large to contain the merchandise they have on board. A large portion of the merchandise sometimes has to be piled upon the wharfs outside, and it has been known that a large proportion of those goods have been destroyed by wet weather. True, they cover the goods in many cases with tarpaulins, but still tinware, and wire, and cement, and such articles as those have been known to be destroyed to a large extent. The result is that parties who used to import from the old country these particular articles by way of Montreal, have ceased to do so; and by that means we are losing the trade that we should command.

There is another point. Let me give you a few figures here which I have gone to considerable trouble to verify. In the season of 1897, on October 10, there were 447 cars tied up in the port of Montreal for want of accommodation to unload. On November 2, 1897, there were 437 cars tied up that had no accommodation; on November 9, there were 451 cars; on November 10, there were 438 cars that could not be unloaded on account of want of accommodation; on November 15, there were 427 cars, or an average in those two months of 461 cars standing loaded on the sidings all the way from the port of Montreal up as far as Point St. Charles, and even farther than that, standing there for days without accommodation to take off their loads. If they were charged demurrage it would be $2 a day, or about $1,000 a day of a waste on account of want of accommodation for this trade that was going to Montreal. Let me give you another point. Taking the coal season through—

Mr. REID. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Has he any idea how many barges or vessels were lying at the same time in Montreal waiting for ocean vessels, besides the cars that were waiting? I would ask the hon. gentleman if he has the number of cars. I know, for a fact, that at the same time there were a great many barges laden with grain from Kingston and Prescott and vessels direct.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I have not the number of vessels or barges, but there was a large number of barges and vessels. Some wheat goes down in the barges, and I am sorry to say they were in the same position as the cars bringing wheat and other produce from the west.

Mr. REID. The result was that these vessels were delayed at Prescott and Kingston because the barges could not be returned to get the grain.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). There were cars at every siding, at St. Charles, Prescott, Brockville and elsewhere, because there was no room on the sidings at Montreal to hold the cars, because the sidings there were filled with cars waiting for accommodation. During the season of 1898, cars were tied up to the following extent:

Month.	Cars.
May 17	331
May 18	349
May 30	358
June 14	385
June 15	223

Or an average during these months of 315 cars tied up during these months. In May and June of 1898, note this, the Grand Trunk had more than 1,000 cars upon the tracks waiting accommodation, and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, during that time, had over 500 cars. The statement I have given you, Mr. Speaker, was of the number of cars loaded with merchandise waiting for accommodation. Here is a statement of the number of cars loaded with wheat waiting to have their wheat elevated in the elevators so that they might go back again :

Month.	Cars.
May 12, 1898	439
May 18	314
May 30	532
June 15	446
*June 17	181
June 17	427

||At elevators.

Filled to their utmost capacity waiting to have accommodation at the elevators. Surely if the people of this country, from the far west to the far east, understood this condition they would be willing to put their hands in their pockets and to pay a sufficient sum to put the port of Montreal in proper shape. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works stated that he was sorry that the Grand Trunk were trying to build up Portland. The Grand Trunk are simply doing what he and I would. When they cannot get accommodation at Montreal they will certainly run through to Portland. Two years ago, the Grand Trunk Railway asked the Hamburg-American Steamboat Company to send a large steamer into Portland so that they might ship grain upon her. At first the company did not wish to send a large steamer into so small a port, but, finally, they were persuaded to send the steamer Alesia into Portland. The steamer Alesia came into that small port, unloaded her large cargo and loaded 335,000 bushels of wheat and ten carloads of merchandise, and from the hour she came in to the hour she went out there was an interval of only three days. Need you wonder that the Grand Trunk would seek the place where they can handle their grain with despatch? I have given you the time that it took to load vessels at Duluth, Chicago and Portland. The best work they ever did in the port of Montreal was to load the Montcalm with 100,000 bushels of wheat in twenty-six hours.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS.
With floating elevators.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). With the same kind of elevators that they had twenty-five years ago, enabling them to load at the rate of 4,000 bushels an hour, and I have shown that they can load at the rate of 1,200 bushels a minute in other places. Do we suppose that we can compete at the port of Montreal with other ports when our equipment is of such a character? Let us see what the Grand Trunk say? They say: We have to go to Portland with our flour because we cannot handle it at the port of Montreal, and the reason is this. They say that their railway line is several hundred yards back from the docks, that they have to employ cartage to load their flour, and that it costs them from $2 to $5 a car to get it on the steamboat, whereas, when they run down to the city of Portland the cars run right along the edge of the dock, and the flour is put into the vessel without cartage at all. Need you wonder that business men look to their own interests rather than to the interest of the country, and that they leave Montreal to build up business in a foreign country? I am astonished that the late government did not look into this matter. Our friends are looking into it, they are seeking to improve these conditions as rapidly as they can, and I am perfectly satisfied that the hon. gentleman who is at the head of the Public Works Department and the government who stand behind him will spend millions, shall I say?—yes, if it is necessary, upon the port of Montreal for the purpose of putting it in a proper state. Then, instead of 273,000,000 bushels going via Buffalo, we will have large ships coming down, turing into the port of Port Colborne, and then coming down through the lakes and canals and being unloaded with dispatch and energy at the port of Montreal, handling the produce in the way in which it should be handled. They seem to be different from us on the other side of the line. The federal government of the United States regard New York largely as a federal port, because at this port, the trade of the west converges, and they have given towards the construction of that port over $9,000,000. The federal government of the United States regard Boston as a federal port, and they have contributed towards its construction over $2,600,000. They regard Galveston in the south as a federal port, and they have assisted that port to the extent of $4,368,000. They regard Mobile, Savannah, and other ports as federal ports, and they have subsidized them very largely in order to help them to establish proper ports to handle the business that comes to them. The House must remember that even in Liverpool, in the old country, they have spent nearly a million a year for one hundred years in the improvement of their port. What is the result? Liverpool, one hundred years ago, had a tonnage of 450,000 tons of trade in her port, and to-day she has over 11,000,000 tons of trade, largely owing to the proper equipment of this great harbour. I might point out what they are doing in Manchester, and a hundred and one other places where large sums of money are being spent. If we are wise, and I think we are, I think the policy foreshadowed by the government is the proper policy for us to pursue, to spend $5,000,000, if necessary, in the port of Montreal, yes, $10,000,000, if necessary, to put it in a proper condition, so that we can handle the trade, so that shippers will know that we can handle it as cheaply as in New York, and if we provide elevators with which to handle wheat expeditiously we can compete, and more than compete with any other route in the world.

There is one thing more that I wish to say and then I will be done. I want to urge upon the government that they should pay particular attention to this route first, and if they have money, as I suppose they have—and I know the country is willing to spend it in such a good purpose—all the upper ports should be put in good order at once.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). They should be deepened to 18 or 20 feet. I believe that the upper ports should be deeper than the ports on Lake Ontario, because steamers of the larger class ply upon the upper lakes and cannot come to the lower lakes on account of our canals. Therefore, all the ports, Owen Sound, Collingwood, Meaford, Midland, Parry Sound, and we must not forget Goderich.

Mr. McCARTHY. And Collingwood.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I said Collingwood, I would not forget that. All these ports should be deepened. Then there is the French River project if we have the money.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). As to the building of the Georgian Bay Canal that is a matter for the future. A great deal can be said in its favour, but the amount of money required for the project is almost beyond our grasp at the present time. Whatever the future may bring, we should now put our existing waterways in the best possible state of efficiency. That being done we can rest assured that we can more than compete with any foreign country. Our own ships, our own railways, our own men will be employed, and the country will prosper. When I go before the farmers and tell them that we may spend six or seven millions for this purpose, they recognize that it is in their interests that we should do so; and they say: We have no objection to the expenditure so long as it is for fruitful public works from which the whole country would derive benefit. Therefore, the government need not be afraid of spending money to put our waterways in a proper condition.

Mr. SPROULE moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies) moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. What business will be taken up to-morrow?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We will resume the debate on the motion with reference to the expenses of the contingents.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.10 p.m.

PRAYERS.

THE DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT.

Mr. PUTTEE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 49) to amend the Dominion Elections Act. He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this Bill is to amend the Dominion Elections Act in several particulars. In the first place, it seeks to amend that clause of the Act specifying the time at which the poll shall be opened and closed on election day. At the present time the law provides that the poll shall be opened at nine o'clock in the forenoon and closed at five o'clock in the afternoon. It does not state by whose clock it should be done. It is left to the returning officers, and sometimes the returning officers construe the Act as providing for the application of solar time, with the result that we have some polls opened at twenty-eight minutes past nine in the morning and closed at twenty-eight minutes past five o'clock in the afternoon, or other fractions of the hour. The amendment seeks to insert the words 'standard time' in the Act so as to do away with the present absurdity. The Bill further seeks to extend the time that the poll shall remain opened until eight o'clock in the evening in electoral districts, being part of, or containing any city of upwards of 10,000 inhabitants. This is a very important matter, and it is absolutely necessary in order to secure a full expression of the popular will that the poll shall be opened until eight o'clock in the evening. It is still unfortunately true that a great many of our working people have to work ten hours a day, which means that they are twelve hours away from their homes, from half-past six in the morning until half-past six in the evening. As the whole aim of our Election Act is to get the opinion of the people, I believe that this amendment will increase the opportunity and insure the recording of popular opinion. The Bill further seeks to abolish the present ballot, known as the Durocher ballot, as it is contained in the Act here. In this connection, I wish to refute some statements which have been made by a certain portion of the press reflecting on the intelligence of the electorate of Winnipeg because, in the recent election in that city, as many as 900 ballots were improperly marked.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to suggest to the hon. member (Mr. Puttee) that it might be well if he would come down a little further, as he is not very distinctly heard here.

Mr. PUTTEE. If these newspapers had taken the trouble to ascertain the facts and reasons for these improperly marked ballots, I think they would not have offered this gratuitous insult to the citizens of Winnipeg. The ballot, as provided for in the Act, is an imperfect one, and it must be remembered that in the provincial elections six weeks previously, a simple ballot was used. In the Dominion election, when the people entered the polling booth, they were confronted with a strange ballot, with a counterfoil on one side, and what looked like a counterfoil on the other, and not being used to this particular form of ballot, to make sure that their intention in voting would not be misunderstood, they put the cross near the name of the candidate that they desired to vote for, a very sensible thing, too, I believe. The amendment is to abolish this ballot paper, and to replace it by a simple ballot with no vertical lines marking off the voting space. I admit that the ballot paper which is proposed has one defect; it is not fire-proof. The ballot paper, as it is now provided for in the law, is a very defective thing. These black grounds are what printers call blocks, and these blocks are not supplied by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and have to be obtained by returning officers in the different constituencies, and exact copies are not often obtained. There are no instructions given to the printer in regard to the copying of the matter, and the names of candidates can be put far to the left, leaving a large white space in front of the disc. I understand that it is good policy to adopt a good ballot and educate the people up to it. But we should adopt a good ballot first. I do not think there is any reason why we should try to educate the people up to such a ballot as the one which is now provided for in the Act. The Bill further proposes to abolish that clause of the statute which makes it necessary for a deposit of $200 to be made by candidates on nomination day.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PACIFIC CABLE—INQUIRY FOR PAPERS.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the government if the papers in connection with the Pacific cable, which the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) said would soon be ready for presentation to the House, have been copied and are ready to be presented, or, if not, when they will probably be ready?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I could not give a precise answer to the hon. member (Mr. Casey), but these papers are being copied. Probably they will be here at the next sitting.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—INSURANCE OF CANADIAN CONTINGENTS.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to draw the attention of the House for a moment to a subject which is now of very considerable importance. The Ottawa Free Press of yesterday, in its editorial column, says:

No more opportune moment than the present can arise for the consideration of the very important question of the insurance to be placed on the lives and limbs of the Canadians now in Africa and proceeding there. Much has been said of the wonderful scheme of Sir Charles Tupper's 'friend,' and some have ventured the opinion that the proposition was only part of an advertising dodge, on a par with the stolen jewels of the actress, and kindred sensations. But the public knows nothing of the conditions connected with the arrangement, assuming it to be bona fide.

I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, that the Free Press does not pay a compliment to its own journalistic enterprise and intelligence when it makes a statement of that kind. They ought to know, if they do not, that there was published a correspondence between myself and the right hon. the Prime Minister, dated Montreal, October 23, 1899, and which correspondence was as follows:

Montreal, October 23, 1899.

Dear Sir Wilfrid Laurier:--

Not having received any intimation of intended acceptance of the offer to insure the lives and limbs of the Canadian contingent, as per my letter of the 14th inst., delivered to you, and seeing by the press to-day that the government is not disposed to incur the risk, on the ground that it has no parliamentary vote for the purpose, I beg to advise you that I have personally arranged on behalf of a friend, for the insurance up to the limit of one million dollars, being an insurance of one thousand dollars on each man, of all ranks, in case of being killed in battle, or having lost both feet, or both hands, or both eyes, and five hundred dollars for the loss of one hand, or one foot, or one eye.

I am told many of the men are not in circumstances to effect this insurance themselves, while many leave behind relatives to some extent dependent upon them.

The insurance is with the Ocean Accident and Guarantee Company, of London, Eng., whose capital is $10,500,000.

As the time is very short before the date fixed for embarkation of the troops, I have to ask the government to furnish immediately to the company the names and home addresses of the officers and men of which the contingent is composed, that they may be recorded in the company's books.

All arrangements are completed as per inclosed certificate from the company.

Yours faithfully,

CHARLES TUPPER.

That inclosed certificate is the certificate that was published on the 23rd of October, and is as follows :

Montreal, October 23, 1899.

To the officers and men of the Canadian contingent for the Transvaal:

As a result of negotiations for some time pending with this company, we have this day concluded an arrangement with Sir Charles Tupper, Bart., whereby he effects insurance to a limit of one million dollars upon the men of all ranks in the Canadian contingent going to Africa. To each officer and to each man, or to their heirs, the sum of one thousand dollars is to be paid by this company upon receiving satisfactory proof of death while engaged with the enemy in Africa, or death within thirty days of engagement, or for loss of both feet, or both hands, or both eyes. In case of loss of one hand, or one foot, or one eye, five hundred dollars will be paid.

It is desired, as far as practicable, before embarkation, that the names and home addresses of the officers and men be forwarded to the office of this company, 185 St. James Street, Montreal, by letter or wire, that they may be recorded in the company's books.

The Ocean Accident and Guarantee Corporation, Limited.

ROLLAND, LYMAN & BURNETT,
General Managers.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that this official communication which was made by the representatives of the Ocean Accident and Insurance Company to all the members of the contingent, is the best evidence that the transaction was a bona fide transaction and I entertain no doubt that to the heirs of the twenty unfortunate Canadian soldiers who fell in battle, the $1,000 each will be promptly paid, and the other portions of the contract will be faithfully carried out with those who are wounded. For fear that some delay might be occasioned by the absence of the right hon. the Prime Minister, I sent a copy of my letter to the Minister of Militia, and I believe he promptly furnished the company with the names of the volunteers, and the company communicated this formal statement to every member of the contingent as to the fact of that insurance having been effected.

Mr. INGRAM. That would not include those who died of natural causes?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, this is an accident insurance company, and not a life insurance company.

DEPARTMENTAL REPORTS.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to ask when the report of the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Trade and Navigation Returns will be brought down? They are important and we are waiting for them.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I quite recognize that. My department has forwarded the reports to the printer, quite a considerable time ago, and I have been worrying him to get them out. I hope in a few days to be able to lay them on the Table.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) is not able to do that in that time, would he get the Minister of Public Works at it.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I think the Secretary of State has more to do with it than the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, nothing is too good for Tarte.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. My hon. friend (Mr. Tarte) is not here to answer for himself; he generally is very well able to do that.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). A similar inquiry was made about the railway portion of the Auditor General's report.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—THE CANADIAN CONTINGENTS.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding: 'That the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider certain proposed resolutions to provide for the payment of the expenditure incurred, or to be incurred, in sending contingents of Canadian volunteers to South Africa.'

Mr. O. DESMARAIS (St. James, Montreal). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, as owing to my imperfect knowledge of the English language, I am precluded from expressing my views with sufficient correctness—in the language of the majority of this House, I abstain, as a rule, from taking part in the debates, considering also that I have frequent opportunities of communicating my views, on public questions to my constituents and my fellow-countrymen of the province of Quebec. But upon certain important occasions, like this, I think it proper, at the risk of taxing the forbearance of the hon. members of this House who do not understand French, to exercise my right of using my mother tongue, chiefly when speaking on so important a matter as the one now under consideration. A few months ago when the storm which had long been brewing, burst forth over our heads, I happened, at that time, to be represented as a very dangerous man, and they even went to the length of threatening to expel me from the British possessions. I think it now my duty to give those hon. gentlemen who do not reside in the province of Quebec, and are not well informed as to what transpires in that province, a few words of explanation.

For some time past, rumours of war had been floating in the air, in connection with the differences then pending between Great Britain and the Transvaal Republic; but nobody thought that there was any serious danger threatening, and no one fancied that a mere handful of farmers would dare take up arms and face the British lion on the battle-field. However, from some British colonies there came offers of assistance to the motherland, in the event of war breaking out. Such offers were, no doubt, a praiseworthy expression of the feelings of those colonies towards the mother country; still nobody at the time thought that there was any necessity for making such offers, which were merely looked upon as an expression of sympathy.

But all of a sudden certain newspapers in the country, and chiefly the Montreal Star, started a movement in favour of sending a contingent of Canadian volunteers to the Transvaal, in order to take part in the impending war.

When the Montreal Star started that agitation, matters had not yet assumed the threatening character they took later on. On the 3rd October, the Star published despatches from London, upbraiding the British government for their inaction.

Now, Sir, if the Imperial authorities whose duty it was to look after the interests of the empire, thought it proper at that time to remain inactive, no wonder that our cabinet ministers who had nothing to do with British interests, did not think it their duty to take action in the matter.

From the way the question was treated by the Star, many came to the conclusion that that agitation was merely a political move, and not at all the outcome of such a respectable feeling as was later on given expression to. Many thought that by so doing, the Star was making political capital, and that it was improving the occasion, by appealing to popular prejudices, in order to embarrass the government, and create an impression in the country against the people in the province of Quebec who have French blood in their veins.

As all the hon. gentlemen know, Mr. Chamberlain, the Secretary for the Colonies, declared that in the event of things coming to the worst, and if they had to resort to the arbitrament of war, in order to settle the differences between Great Britain and the Transvaal Republic, it would take only 40,000 men and a campaign of a few weeks' duration to bring the war to a successful conclusion.

One need not go back to the lessons of history to learn that whenever Great Britain was engaged in a little war, she never asked the assistance of her colonies to maintain the supremacy of the British flag. Great Britain, Sir, ever felt equal to any emergency, and was ever fully able to fight, unaided, and with glory to herself, her own battles.

As I said, we were then under the impression that it was only a political move. People might be led into believing that an attempt was being made to drag us into Imperial federation. There was certainly room for a difference of opinion as to the opportunity of such a measure, and as to whether it was fair to bring about that contemplated change in our constitution without our being consulted on the matter. Apart from the merits of the question, I say that our right to take advantage of the privileges and liberties guaranteed to us by the constitution cannot be called in question. For my part, for over twenty-six years that I have taken part in political struggles, I never hesitated to express my views above board, irrespective of consequences. Previously, again and again I had opposed Imperial federation, a scheme for which the Conservative party is responsible, as it was that party which first took action upon it. That such is the case, I have shown from the writings and speeches of the Conservative leaders. And I then thought it my duty—and I have not changed my opinion on that point—to oppose such a policy as, in my opinion, would be inimical to the best interests of the country.

But, will say the hon. gentlemen: 'This is not a movement intended to foster Imperial federation or to bring about, in a more or less remote future, such a political evolution. I dream of other destinies for my country. I cherish the hope that sooner or later, it will be given to Canada to take rank in the concert of nations. Never, in the past, did I hold the view, nor do I believe now, that our manifest destiny is to be engulfed in Imperial federation such as understood nowadays.

At that time, the war did not seem to be such as to call for outside assistance. The province of Quebec and every voter in the country, were perfectly right in not allowing themselves to be carried away in that direction.

President Kruger's ultimatum appeared on October 10, in the Montreal press. It occurred to no one, at that time, to institute a comparison between the belligerent nations as to their respective forces.

On October 11, in the division which I have the honour of representing here, a political meeting was held, under the auspices of a club, in which several politicians were invited to participate. I availed myself of the opportunity to expose my views on the campaign started by the Montreal Star, and on the attempts made to carry us away into a movement which I disapproved of. The speech which I delivered at that meeting, was not correctly reported. I said

I was opposed to Canada being compelled to participate in the wars of the empire, such as interpreted at the time.

In order well to understand the purport of my speech, it is necessary to refer to what transpired previously and to what transpired later on.

I was reported to have said that 'the Laurier government would be called to a very strict account by the electorate, should they approve of such a scheme as the sending of a Canadian contingent to the Transvaal, and that, for my part, I would rise in my place, in the House of Commons, in my quality of representative of the St. James division, in order to denounce such a policy, were it proposed to parliament to pass and sanction the same.'

Here is, in a nutshell, what I said: that I was opposed to Imperial federation, and that, were the sending of a contingent of our Canadian militia to be construed into an advocacy of that scheme, I would oppose it; and further, if such a policy were adopted as an evidence of our desire to draw closer the ties between the colonies and the mother country, from a political and constitutional standpoint I would also oppose it. I also declared that, should a proposition involving the endorsement of such a policy, be brought down in parliament, I would rise in my seat and vote against it.

I have not changed my mind, and, should it be clearly stated here that the sending of the contingents is tantamount to an expression of opinion in favour of a political transformation, resulting in Imperial federation, I say without hesitation that, in spite of all the admiration and respect I entertain for the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches, I would vote against the proposition now before the House.

But, owing to circumstances which I shall refer to later on, I have to consider the question from another standpoint, and therein my views coincide with those of some other hon. gentlemen on this side of the House and of some journalists.

Before I give my authorities to show that those views are shared in by a number of men belonging to both political parties throughout the province of Quebec, I may say at once that our opponents have ever tried, whenever they had to deal with the statements either of Liberals or of French Canadians, to deny them the right of having an opinion on the matter and giving expression to the same. As a matter of fact, a certain class of leading politicians in this country never miss an opportunity of denouncing as disloyal those who give expression to such views.

That was exactly what happened under the circumstances I refer to. The very next day after I had made the statement in question before my constituents, the Star published an article wherein my name was coupled with that of the Hon. Mr. Tarte, who, they said, had expressed similar views in opposition to the contemplated expedition; and here is what it said:

They should be bundled out of any British possession.

And again:

Those two gentlemen plainly say that they do not want to be British citizens.

Such was the construction put upon the statement I had made.

So, Sir, because I had happened to say that I was opposed to Imperial federation, and that, if that scheme were carried out, I should feel it my duty to condemn it, I was to be expelled from Canada!

Now, subsequent events showed that had those gentlemen resorted to such extreme measures against me, they would have been constrained to use the same severity towards several friends of mine in the province of Quebec, who repeatedly made similar statements, as I will show later on.

But why, I ask, these repeated appeals to our loyalty? Wherefore should we ever be looked upon as men anxious to act illegally and against the constitution? Is there anything in the history of this country that warrants such a claim under the circumstances?

If you refer to the records of the past, Sir, you will find out in what position we are placed and that nothing can be changed in it. Facts are stubborn, they say, and they do not warrant the charges levelled at us.

Need I recall here, Sir, the fact that the first inhabitants of this country were children of old Armorica, of old France, who came over here, to settle and develop this continent. After long-protracted struggles on various battle-fields, they at last succumbed, and the flag adorned with the fleur-de-lis, which had been planted alongside the cross on the heights of Stadacona as a first token of civilization in the wilds of Canada was hauled down to be replaced by the Union Jack, and had to disappear from those vast regions, still moist with the blood of so many martyrs and heroes, that France had sent over here. I do not wish to enter into details, but to draw attention to certain facts and certain acts which may explain the position we occupy in Canada. After the conquest, a large number of the leading men in the colony went back to France. A treaty was entered into between Great Britain and France. Some people are of opinion that this treaty amounts to little or nothing, but all the same, it was passed. The Frenchmen in Canada were guaranteed the free exercise of certain rights and of the French language, and they were allowed to preserve their laws and customs. Under that treaty, they were allowed to remain French, while being British subjects.

As I just said, a large majority of the leading Frenchmen of the colony chose to go back to France. There was left but a small group of Frenchmen who retired on their farms and became tillers of the soil. They have ever remained loyal to the British Crown. Those Frenchmen, as British subjects, always respected their new allegiance.

But, Sir, scarcely had the French flag been hauled down from the heights of Quebec, and scarcely had the ship which carried away the leaders of the colony disappeared below the horizon, when a revolution broke out among the British colonists of the neighbouring country. Had the French inhabitants of Quebec been treated with justice at least, from the outset, under British rule in Canada? I say no, Sir; and still, let us see how they acted under the circumstances.

The British inhabitants of the American colonies rose up in arms, as I said, against British rule and appealed to the French in Canada. The latter, who had perhaps still preserved, hidden from the view of the conquerors, the French flag adorned with fleur-de-lis, were asked by the British colonists to assist in shaking off the yoke of England. The French Canadians turned a deaf ear to those appeals. They had sworn fidelity to England, and they refused to shake off their allegiance. Their loyalty was put to the test on various battle-fields, and they ever stood by the flag of Great Britain.

A few years later, political organization was given to Canada and the British statesmen, who were then at the head of affairs, thought it proper to divide the province into two distinct sections. And why so? Was it with a view to drowning opposition to the British rule on the part of the French colonists? No, Sir. The celebrated Pitt, when introducing in the British Parliament the Bill respecting the new constitution, said:

Dividing the province, he considered to be the most likely means to effect this purpose, since by so doing, the French subjects would be sensible that the British government had no intention of forcing the English laws upon them, and therefore, they would with more facility, look at the operation and effect of these laws, compared with the operation and effect of their own, and probably in time adopt them from conviction. Experience would teach them that the English laws were the best; and he admitted that the Canadians ought to be governed to their satisfaction.

On the other hand, another great British statesman, Fox, said:

By dividing the province into two parts, he conceived the existing causes of controversy would be removed; and, as far as circumstances would admit, the inhabitants would have all the benefits of the British constitution. In the Lower Canada, as the residents would be chiefly Canadians, their assembly, &c., would be adapted to their habits and prejudices. The Upper Canada being almost entirely peopled by emigrants from Great Britain or from America, the Protestant religion would be the establishment and they would have the benefit of the English tenure law.

Thus it was that the British government sanctioned the treaty passed between France and Great Britain, under the shape of a constitution granted to Canada. British statesmen, like Pitt and Fox, as well as all those politicians who know how to soar above prejudices, have ever endeavoured to turn to the best account those constitutional provisions.

When they gave them that constitution, the British authorities told them implicitly: 'We give you such a position as will enable you to preserve everything that you hold dear and sacred, and you shall form a separate nationality, while remaining British subjects.'

This goes to show how truly great and broad-minded were the statesmen, who, constitutionally made Great Britain what she is to-day, an empire we are proud to belong to; an empire, I say, composed of men of different races who know how to respect the British flag, and why? Because the British flag symbolizes the principles and traditions of all the races that live within the empire. Such was the principle consecrated by these men; but from the very outset, some men who were displeased with the fact that Great Britain had granted liberties to a group of Frenchmen, sought to nullify the good results that were anticipated from that policy. I do not wish to go beyond certain bounds, but the records show that repeated attempts were then made to prevent the French colonists, who had become British subjects, benefiting fully from that constitution.

Later on, another change took place. It was proposed to unite the two provinces. But there had been critical times before that, and an event of some magnitude had transpired. I may be told that the French colonists rebelled against Great Britain. It would not be fair to say that they were rebels. It may rather be asserted that British subjects, exasperated by the tyranny which some men wanted to impose upon them, asked for the redress of their grievances, and went perhaps a little too far in that direction; but do you pretend to say that the men of 1837, who protested against the acts of those who then misgoverned the country, wished to shake off British connection and were disloyal to Great Britain, in the true acceptation of the word? I say no. It was against the petty tyrants who represented the metropolis in the country that these men rose up in arms, and not against the British flag. Now, Sir, were the French Canadians alone to rebel? Who was the commanding officer at St. Denis? The hon. gentlemen know that it was Nelson.

The PRIME MINISTER. (Translation.)
Hear, hear.

Mr. DESMARAIS. (Translation.) And who was the commanding officer at St. Charles? Sir, I know well those two historic battle fields, as I had the honour to represent in the Quebec legislature down to 1892 the county wherein they are inclosed. The people of those two parishes are all French Canadians; and yet, those who led them against the British troops were Englishmen.

In Upper Canada it was an Englishman, William Lyon Mackenzie, who led the movement, just as Nelson and Brown were the leaders of the movement in Lower Canada. And when peace had been restored, Great Britain recognized the fact that these people had real grievances. Although some of our fellow-countrymen died on a political scaffold, and although others were sent into exile, the British government granted self-government and a constitution to our country.

Some people object that by the very fact that the French Canadians are true to their national traditions, they are disloyal to England. Allow me, Sir, to draw your attention to the conclusion of Lord Durham's report. He says:

Indeed, throughout the whole of the North American provinces there prevails among the British population an affection for the mother country, and a preference for its institutions, which a wise and firm policy, on the part of the Imperial government, may make the foundation of a safe, honourable and enduring connection. But even this feeling may be impaired, and I must warn those in whose hands the disposal of their destinies rests, that a blind reliance on the all-enduring loyalty of our countrymen may be carried too far.

At that time, a distinction was sought to be created between the people of French origin and those of English blood, and some people were of the opinion that the latter ought to be dealt with in a generous and broad spirit, because, as was said, 'it would be a mistake to place a blind reliance on the all-enduring loyalty of these men.'

Through the new constitution which was then given to Canada, the two provinces were reunited. But the wrangles between the different elements went on as previously, and it was deemed wise, in order to obviate those difficulties, to create a new political régime. Then it was that the confederation of the British North American provinces was decided upon. Under the new régime, the differences and the troubles which had brought public affairs to a deadlock, would be obviated, while the province of Quebec, where the French Canadians were in an overwhelming majority, was greatly to benefit by the new constitution.

One need only refer to the debates on confederation to satisfy himself that such was the case. The French Canadians were invited to vote in favour of the new constitution on the ground that the province of Quebec would have the right of framing its own laws. They were told that they would have a French Canadian lieutenant-governor and that, owing to the great privileges secured under the new régime, their dearest institutions would be respected, as it was out of the question to do away with the French Canadians, as a race and as a separate nationality in that great confederation of the British North American provinces. From a careful perusal of the debates on confederation, such is the spirit by which the framers of the constitution seem to have been actuated. Such was the standpoint from which the statesmen who were then at the head of affairs, debated the question; and, in order to emphasize that point, I need only refer to one of the speeches then delivered by one of the most gifted speakers who were ever heard in Canada, the Hon. D'Arcy McGee.

At page 140 of the Debates, reference is made to the position of the different races in Canada; but he first states, page 130, that England had warned us, by several matters of fact, that the colonies had entered upon a new era of existence, and that we should provide for our own defence.

But let us hear what that great orator says about the attachment of our fellow-countrymen to our traditions:

In the eyes of the law, we admit no disparity between natives and immigrants in this country; but it is to be considered that, where men are born in the presence of the graves of their fathers, for even a few generations, the influence of that fact is great in enhancing their attachment to that soil. I admit, for my part, as an immigrant, of no divided allegiance to Canada and her interests; but it would be untrue and paltry to deny a divided affection between the old country and the new. Kept within just bounds, such an affection is reasonable, is right, and creditable to those who cherish it.

And referring further to the Canadians, he said:

'They can nearly all, of every origin, use that proud phrase when they look daily from their doors: "This is my own, my native land."'

For us, Canada is the land of our birth; it is our fatherland; but I quite readily understand that those who come from the old countries of Europe do not share in that feeling. The Britisher who comes over here enjoys in their fulness the rights pertaining to British subjects, but as Mr. McGee said, his affection is divided between the old country and the new. As for us, Canadians, it is quite different. After several generations here, where is our fatherland? We are sometimes upbraided with our attachment to our traditions, and with our worship of the past. But, for us, is not Canada our fatherland? Is France our mother country? No, she is the country we never forget, the home of our ancestors, and we would be renegade were we to blot out from our hearts those recollections. Is it to be inferred therefrom that we wish to become again French subjects, from a political and constitutional standpoint? Certainly not.

We do not aspire after such a position, however honourable it may be. We wish to remain British subjects. We are happy for the present ; but all we ask is to be allowed to cherish the hope that, some day, our country may take rank among the other nations of the world. We were born here in the presence of the graves of our fathers, and our most earnest wish is that when we join the great majority, we may be laid to rest by the side of our ancestors. Are they who come from the old countries of Europe in a similar position ? I say no.

Being given the particular position we occupy here, can it be said that we are disloyal ? Why, Sir, is not the first requirement of loyalty to aspire after the grandeur and prosperity of this country of ours, and can anything more be required of us ?

The other day, the hon. leader of this House was denounced here for having stated at Sherbrooke that he had been actuated by two different feelings in sending the contingent to South Africa. The right hon. gentleman stated that our fellow-countrymen of British birth had asked for the sending of a contingent, because their brothers were shedding their blood on the battlefields of South Africa ; while the French Canadians did so, through gratitude. I heard the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) denouncing such utterances. Perhaps the hon. gentleman does not understand such lofty sentiments ; but I think, for my part, that gratitude, a still nobler feeling than any appeal to the voice of blood ; for, while the latter sentiment is grounded upon nature itself, gratitude springs from the promptings of the human heart. That is a lofty feeling, but, unfortunately, it is little understood by those demagogues who are trying to make political capital out of it.

Under confederation, the provinces are, so to say, independent ; but, I ask, have all the pledges given to the people been redeemed ? Men of British descent have joined hands with men of French origin, and they have spared no efforts to develop the resources of the country. They have no doubt succeeded, so far as circumstances allowed them to do so. But, at any rate, nobody can deny that the efforts of our public men have been successful, in spite of all the obstacles they have had to contend with.

Now, Sir, before going any further, there is one point I wish to touch upon. Prior to confederation, there was a movement that originated in the disaffection which prevailed in the country, the same as that which existed in 1791.

There were some people who denounced at that time the British government and wished to sever the colonial tie. Who were they ? Were the promoters of that agitation men with French blood in their veins ? No, Sir, they were not French Canadian.

Who were they who signed the annexationist manifesto of 1849 ?

In passing, allow me to point out that, for the most part, the gentlemen who signed that manifesto had not, later on, to suffer too severely from their disloyal conduct towards the mother country, as a number of them received from the British Crown most flattering testimonials.

There are to be found among those who signed that manifesto the names of men in high repute in the eyes of the hon. gentlemen opposite. I find on that list the names of John Rose, John Monk, a name which I think is not altogether unknown to the member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). I find there the name of J. J. C. Abbott, who was the leader of the hon. gentlemen now at the head of Her Majesty's loyal opposition. Later on, he was made a baronet of the empire whose allegiance he had tried to shake off, when signing the manifesto in question.

Another name to be found there is that of Sir A. T. Galt, who filled afterwards the office of High Commissioner of Canada in London, who ran his race in a most honourable way and won the respect of all. There was also Mr. James Ferrier, one of the leaders of the Conservative party, a man who has occupied a high position. I see also the name of Joseph Coursol, who sat for a number of years on the opposite side in this House. There was also Mr. N. Bétournay, a former partner of Sir George Etienne Cartier, and who was appointed by the latter to the bench in Manitoba. I find also the name of Charles Doherty, who became one of the judges of the land. Then comes an English Liberal, Edward Goff Penny, the father of my hon. friend from the St. Lawrence division of Montreal. William McDougall, and Molson are also among the signers of that manifesto, not to mention a number of other less important individuals.

Those gentlemen, I say, signed the manifesto of 1849, and yet these disloyal men were not expelled from the country, while I was threatened with such a fate. Our opponents take precious good care not to mention the names of these men, who were once the recognized leaders of the Conservative party.

Prior to confederation, what took place in Montreal ? When parliament was sitting in that city, British citizens were seen rising up in rebellion, and why ? Because intelligent, broad-minded men had proposed to indemnify the victims of the rebellion of 1837, those rebels carried things to the length of outraging the representative of Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen in the person of Lord Elgin, the governor of the province, who was even rotten-egged by that crowd of rebels. They were seen publicly urging the populace to burn down the parliament buildings. Who were the men who thus outraged and challenged the authority of Our Gracious Sovereign? Why, Sir, I see among them the names of one John A. Macdonald, who was subsequently known as Sir John A. Macdonald.

Was not such a movement an act of disloyalty, an act of rebellion against the British Crown? Did the hon. gentlemen opposite ever openly denounce such sanglant outrages to the British Crown? No, Sir, and yet such conduct on the part of Sir John A. Macdonald was no bar, later on, to his preferment to the highest honours in the gift of the Crown, as, later on, he was made prime minister and the revered leader of the Conservative party, while his Sovereign bestowed on him very high titles.

It will thus be seen, Sir, that deeds of disloyalty are no bar to honours. Shall it then be said that we are the only ones who are to be denied the right of voicing our feelings—I do not mean disloyal feelings—but giving expression to the hope we cherish of other destinies for this beloved country of ours?

To come back to confederation, without wishing to enter into any tedious details, what did they tell the people, to induce them to accept and vote for confederation? They told the people that the time had come for us to bind together the different provinces, to centralize the scattered elements of our population, if we wished to form a great nation, an independent country. Such is the burden of all the speeches recorded in the debates on confederation. When the Militia Bill was brought down, it was stated that Great Britain had intimated her intention to withdraw her troops from Canada, and that we should prepare to protect our own country. After the Confederation Act was passed, they brought down the Militia Bill. And wherefore did that Bill provide for the organization of a Canadian militia? Why, just to protect our own territory.

It was said :

Loyal subjects have a right to expect as full a measure of protection as possible, when they have to defend their country.

And throughout that speech of Sir George E. Cartier there is not a single line which hints at Canada ever having, in the future, to take part in the wars of the empire; quite the contrary. Let us hear what Sir George E. Cartier said in the same speech :

Some hon. gentleman had stated that the best fortifications Her Majesty could have for the defence of this Dominion, were to be found in the loyalty and in the hearts of its inhabitants. He admitted this furnished a most essential defence, but they were not sufficient. The Imperial government had always declared that the whole resources of the empire were pledged to the defence of Canada, but that, at the same time, Canada must do something for herself.

Mr. DESMARAIS.

Nothing else was provided for in that Bill. It only aimed at the defence of the Dominion. Again and again in this House have the statements made by Sir John A. Macdonald and by Sir George Etienne Cartier on the matter been referred to; and reference was also made to the utterance of the present leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) on the same subject. Thus it happens that we have grown familiar with the idea that Canada could depend upon Great Britain assisting her in the defence of our territory, provided we co-operated with the mother country in that direction.

Now, Sir, did we, Canadians, faithfully discharge our duty? I need not go very far out of the way to find an answer to that question. It will suffice to draw the attention of the House to the speech made by the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), in which he referred to what Canada had done to co-operate in the defence of the Dominion and the empire. And, a few days ago, the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) stated, I think, that Canada had honourably discharged her duty in that regard. Here is what he said, as reported in Hansard:

That was the argument used in this House when we were asked to support these projects. Take, for instance, the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway. When the people of Canada were asked to tax themselves to an enormous extent for this work, what was the principal argument used to induce them to do so? Sir, the argument used was, that the Canadian Pacific Railway was a great continental route which would bridge the distance from one ocean to the other, and would enable English troops to go from Halifax to Vancouver in eight days. Then, we have in the Pacific cable another Imperial project which has been taken in hand by the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. Not a protest came from the Liberal benches when the Pacific cable resolutions were submitted, and that is an Imperial work. Then, again, we have the establishment, or rather what was to be the establishment of a fast line of steamers, for which this House voted an annual subsidy of $750,000, and we were told that we should tax ourselves for this because it would lessen the distance between the mother country and Canada, and would make stronger the ties which unite us.

So, we have here the statement of the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) that what we have done, so far, in the interests of the empire, ought not to be construed into an adhesion to Imperial federation. It was to protest against this last statement that I rose in my seat. We are ready to assist in the defence of the British Empire and to do everything in our power to further that object, provided the Dominion's interests are involved. And here let me appeal to the testimony of the hon. leader of the opposition himself, who declared that Canada could not reasonably be expected to do more than she had done in the interest of the empire, through the development of our own resources.

Let us now hear what the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) has to say about Imperialism. The following is an extract from his speech, as it appeared in the Montreal paper, Le Journal:

That word 'Imperialism' is raised as a bug-bear in some parts of this country. Does the word imply that we will have to keep up a standing army? Does the word imply that we will have to take part in every war into which England is drawn either against the dark tribes of Africa or the yellow races of Asia? Does it imply that we must assume all these obligations and duties and have no right of control? Sir, I do not look upon it in that light, nor do I think that any man in this country who reflects will look upon it in that light either. That is not the true meaning of Imperialism as I understand it to-day. Sir, if Imperialism means that in a crisis like the present, we are called upon to defend the prestige, the influence, the integrity of the empire, surely we are all willing and ready to do our duty as British subjects, and surely nobody will be found so attached to abstract principles, so near-sighted or so weak, as to stand aloof. Surely no one will be so blind to the teachings of our own history as to refuse to do his share in this truly patriotic work. Mr. Speaker, to take the opposite view would be to array ourselves against the teachings of the history of Canada.

There is another matter I referred to at the outset, and which I think it proper to dwell upon again. We were told that we were traitors and disloyal. They have tried to mislead the public opinion in the country by saying that it was the Liberals and their organs in the province of Quebec who were bent upon raising race and creed prejudices. The French Canadians are being denounced and outraged in their feelings by the Ontario press and by many a Conservative organ. These appeals to prejudices are now the order of the day. The leader of the opposition, by way of exculpating himself, says that never in the course of his political career a single word had escaped his lips calculated to wound the feelings of his fellow-countrymen. But it is from his staff that such attacks come. Why, Sir, the other day, we were informed by a despatch that General French had reached Kimberley. Upon that occasion did any one hear Lord Roberts say: 'You know, I wash my hands of the whole affair.' No, Sir, in spite of his denials, the hon. leader of the opposition is responsible for those denunciations coming from men who sit by his side in this House. In his quality of leader of his party, he is responsible for the misconduct of his political organs.

I was very much surprised at the allusions made by some hon. gentlemen. I have already called the attention of the hon. leader of the opposition to the contradictions that crop out in his husting speeches. But, for the present, I wish to confine myself to the changes of opinion of one of the lieutenants of the hon. gentleman.

The hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) in his speech, the other day, made a personal allusion to the right hon. leader of the House. He referred to the musket of the Prime Minister. And, when I heard him, I could not help exclaiming: How is it possible for a man like him to have so short a memory as to come here and try to rouse national and race prejudices, when his own record supplies so many opportunities of putting him to the blush. Let me then, Sir, say a word about the regrettable circumstances in connection with the Riel affair.

The hon. leader of the opposition has again and again referred to the matter. One day, on the Montreal Champ de Mars, 50,000 people had gathered, during that regrettable period, to hear the speakers who were to address the crowd anxious to hear what they had to say about the events that had just transpired. Among the speakers of the day, were to be found men who have since risen to eminence in the councils of the Conservative party. Mr. J. D. Rolland and Mr. Jeannotte presided over the meeting. Later on, the former gentleman was appointed by the Conservatives to the Quebec Legislative Council, while the other gentleman, Mr. Jeannotte, was chosen by the same party as their candidate for federal honours in the county of L'Assomption. I find in the report of that meeting letters of excuse from men who did not hesitate to voice their feelings, as follows:

We have invoked the recommendation of the jury to mercy, as part and parcel of the verdict, which our rulers should have given effect to. We have also looked upon General Middleton's invitation to the rebel chieftain and his counsel to surrender, as a pledge that he would be humanely treated. We have finally protested against capital punishment being inflicted for political offences as it is at variance with modern legislation as enforced by all civilized nations.

For these several grounds in which we all coincide, we are now able to meet upon common grounds, and to denounce with a common voice an act of wanton cruelty which our federal representatives are in honour bound to stigmatize, by turning out Sir John Macdonald's cabinet, and which will be avenged at the hands of the people at the next general elections.

Let us then, like our ancestors, discard all party ties and party differences, and let us beware of misrepresenting and perverting the meaning of so patriotic a demonstration, by making it subservient to the more or less paltry purposes of a political party, whether old or new.

Who were the gentlemen who signed that letter? That letter, Sir, was signed by no less a personage than Mr. D. Girouard, one of the leading lights of the Conservative party at that time. Now, the gentleman who was guilty of such a flagrant act of treason, at least from the present standpoint of the hon. gentlemen opposite, that gentleman, I say, was later on called to the bench, as a member of the highest tribunal of this country.

Among the signers of that letter was also to be found the name of the Hon. L. Beaubien, who was most outspoken in his denunciation of the government, on that day. That gentleman is one of the directors of Le Journal, the mouthpiece of the leader of the opposition in his new political campaign, and a French copy of the Montreal Star as it is called in the city of Montreal. That gentleman, later on, occupied a most honourable position, having been given a portfolio in the provincial cabinet. But there was another gentleman, the Hon. Alphonse Desjardins, the very same gentleman who said that Sir John A. Macdonald had entered political life under the glimmer of the fire that had destroyed the parliament buildings, and had ended it behind the Regina scaffold. Such were very emphatical expressions for a public man to use. Yet this man became, later on, a member of the short-lived administration formed by the present leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), and in which he held the portfolio of Minister of Militia.

I also see the name of the Hon. Senator Trudel, besides many others I could mention, in the same category. But I now come to the gentleman who engages my attention for the present. Here is the speech of a man by the name of J. G. H. Bergeron. Let us hear what that gentleman who now denounces in this House those who appeal to national feeling, said at that meeting :

Why do we hear to-day such formal protests rising from every part of the country ?

Why does the same feeling of indignation rise from every part of the Dominion, without any watchword having been given ?

The reason is that Canadians know how to impose silence to their political feelings, and to let their hearts and their generosity speak out.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). (Translation.) Hear ! hear !

Mr. DESMARAIS (Translation.) Alas ! that ardour very soon died away, and that generosity was also very short-lived. He goes on :

The sixty thousand Frenchmen, abandoned by Louis XV. on the shores of the St. Lawrence, had lost everything, except honour.

And that proverbial generosity which prompted them to shed their blood under the walls of Quebec in 1775 for the British flag, and that unalterable loyalty which led them to a victorious death on the banks of the Chateauguay River in 1812, those sublime qualities which we have inherited from France

—the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) never went so far in that direction, and yet he was denounced as disloyal.

. which we have inherited from France have just been heated to a glow by the unjustifiable act recently perpetrated by the Dominion government.

And that government was that of Sir John A. Macdonald. Further on, he adds :

Mr. DESMARAIS.

The Minister of Justice called out the militia. Two regiments from the province of Quebec, composed of French-speaking soldiers, the 65th and the 9th nobly responded to the call of the government and bravely hastened to the defence of the country.

And still further on :

Our regiments, the departure of which we all approved of

Now, hear this ironical outburst :

O ! loyalty ! were ordered to go back to their homes. The return trip was a triumphal march ; everywhere they were acclaimed, for everybody knew that they had well discharged their duty, and had they met Louis Riel on their way, he would have had a very short trial—for was he not a rebel ! But he was under the protection of the British flag.

Then he goes on voicing his feelings :

Forming a new party is altogether out of the question ; let us not diminish the movement we have started ; let us be great as the cause which we upheld ; let us walk hand in hand, side by side and leave it to God to give us men able to preside over our political destinies.

How could he utter such a blasphemy ! He is the very leader he speaks of !

Let our political men, irrespective of parties, lay aside their personal ambition.

That is, no doubt, what he is doing now :

but let them never forget one thing, that they must be Canadians first !

Such were the feelings expressed at that time by Mr. J. G. H. Bergeron. And I think he is the same gentleman who now denounces the leader of the government and who pretends that we are disloyal to the British Crown, when we express the hope that, in a more or less remote future our country will take rank in the concert of nations.

I forgot, a little while ago, when speaking of the position taken by the Hon. Mr. Desjardins, to bring to the attention of the House the remark made by that gentleman, in connection with another Conservative leader. When referring to the three French-speaking ministers, Mr. Desjardins had mentioned the names of Sir Hector Langevin and of the Hon. Mr. Chapleau. As to the other minister, said he, it is better that his name should not be mentioned here. And that other gentleman, I think, went on sitting on the Treasury benches, and he is still one of the leading members of the opposition. His name is Sir Adolphe Caron, member for Three Rivers.

These are the men who now talk of loyalty to the British Crown !

I said, a little while ago, that our ultra-loyal opponents were blaming us for saying that, as regards the sending of those contingents to South Africa, in defence of the British flag, our English fellow-countrymen were actuated by the voice of blood, while we, French Canadians, were obeying a proper feeling of gratitude.

The very gentleman who now brings up that charge against us, did he not, upon one occasion, make on the floor of this House a far more reprehensible statement? Let us refer to the debates on the Home Rule question, and what do we find? At the very moment when Mr. Gladstone, the great English Liberal leader, seemed disposed to grant to Ireland a certain amount of freedom, who was the man who rose from his seat in this House to protest against that policy? That man was the hon. member for West York (Mr. Clarke Wallace). Here is the statement made by the hon. gentleman:

We find to-day in the old country that brethren, the descendants of the heroes of two hundred years ago, are perhaps facing difficulties of a similar character to those which their ancestors had to face in 1688—that the men of 1893 are threatened with a rule which is antagonistic to freedom there, to the liberty which they have always enjoyed as citizens of the British Empire. What is proposed is not only to shake off their allegiance to Great Britain—the bonds of love that bind them to the empire—but to put them forsooth, under an alien and hostile government.

The man—who thus protested on the floor of this House against the political action of the British government, was a sworn member of the cabinet.

They are trying to take the loyal men with them; but our friends over there say they will never submit. Britain may cast them out, but if she does so, she has no right to say what may be their future allegiance. Our friends of Ulster are preparing and have asserted their unalterable determination never to submit to that Home Rule which Mr. Gladstone and his government have laid out for them.

What do you think, Sir, of such a loyalty?

I am sure that in their efforts they shall have the sympathy of the Orangemen of Canada—more than sympathy; they shall have our active aid, if that active aid is necessary. We should not be worthy descendants of the heroes of two hundred years ago—we would not be worthy of our ancestors of old, if we failed in our duty in that respect.

So thus spoke the hon. member for West York, no doubt in a moment of weakness for, several years after those events had transpired, we heard him giving expression to emphatic protestations of loyalty to the mother country.

Should the men who are scandalized at our language and are shocked at our attitude, take the trouble to look for information, they would find out that even in Great Britain they go much further in that direction than we do. There are also in this country public men of importance who have not hesitated to express their views. Let me quote here, from a Toronto magazine, the words of a man who enjoys universal respect, the Hon. Mr. Longley, Attorney General of Nova Scotia:

In the future, in proportion as this matter of the destinies of Canada becomes more and more pressing and urgent, I shall give a respectful attention to all those who have arguments to urge. I shall not be afraid to open my eyes to daylight, no matter where it comes from. I shall listen to all those who will proclaim themselves in favour of political union with the United States, and I shall attach to it as much importance as to what will be represented to me by the Imperialists. I positively and most emphatically maintain that every citizen of Canada, whether in the service of the Crown or not, has a right to defend in a public assembly, by honest arguments, the cause of union with the United States, just as much as any other citizen has a right to advocate the cause of Imperial federation or that of independence. In Canada, there is no servant of the Crown, from the Prime Minister down to the most modest employee, that can be prevented by his oath of office, no matter in what public meeting, from making known to his fellow-citizens, whenever it becomes necessary to do so, the best course to pursue in order to decide on the destinies of the country.

On January 23, 1893, Mr. Edgar, member for West Ontario, in a letter to his constituents, concluded as follows:—

A word as to our national future. Apart from economical and material consideration, there is in the hearts of all native-born Canadians, a dream that we shall one day take rank among the nations. I consider that the work which must be done for that purpose constitutes the duty and privilege of Canadian public men. All English patriots, all American patriots will respect us more, if we take that position, than if we persisted in allowing ourselves to be engulfed either in Imperial federation or in a federal union with the United States. I am of opinion that before many years have elapsed, we shall have our independence. That independence will not be born in the hatred of Great Britain, neither will it be baptized in the blood of our brethren, &c., &c.

Sir, Mr. Edgar was your predecessor in the chair you now occupy, and the death of Sir James Edgar was a national loss.

Such was the language of an Englishman enjoying the respect of all his fellow-countrymen, and yet never was he accused of disloyalty, or threatened to be driven out of the country. Moreover, pamphlets have been published by political men who then acted on the suggestions of the leader of the Conservative party.

The Hon. Mr. Cauchon wrote in a pamphlet, published in 1865, and here is what he says:

All the nations of the world naturally aspire to great destinies and to an important position in the human family, because, in addition to the legitimate feeling of pride which actuates them in seeking to reach the highest rank, they know that there is more chance of their being respected, favoured and prosperous, in proportion to the power they wield.

At the present moment this law has become an axiom of political economy as well as the profession of faith of all the statesmen of Great Britain who continually warn us to prepare ourselves, by a strong political and military organization, for the emancipation which is at hand.

We are certainly happy colonists—free as the fish that swim in the ocean or the birds that fly through space, and this because we are under the protection of the British flag; and still we ask, Englishmen, Scotchmen, Irishmen, Canadians, all—are you not desirous, if you can, of becoming a great nationality? The only obstacle to the success of their aspirations can be found in our local difficulties, in the fear of losing, by any change of system, those privileges which are very dear to us, and which we would not sacrifice even to greatness, power, glory or the title of nationality.

Here the writer wanted to show that everything was tending towards preparing the mind of the people for the independence of Canada, in a more or less remote future. That pamphlet was published in 1865, by Mr. Cauchon, on the suggestion of Mr. Cartier, his colleague. Later on, Colonel Prince, member for Essex, presented a petition which, he said, was signed by a large number of respectable Canadians, begging the House to present an address to Her Majesty asking that Canada be relieved of its dependency and be allowed to become a sovereign state. Among the members who voted in favour of that petition, are to be found the names of Messrs. Malcolm Cameron, Benjamin Holmes, Jacob Dewitt, John McConnell, member for Stanstead; J. S. Sanborn, member for Sherbrooke, who, later on, ascended the bench. Those men, who signed a petition to the Queen in favour of the independence of Canada, were never looked upon as disloyal. Why, Sir, those very sentiments were being encouraged by British statesmen themselves. Let me quote the words of Lord John Russell, in his work 'Recollections and Suggestions,' page 200:

It is hardly necessary to say, that when the majority in any of our dependencies, declare by their representatives that they wish to separate from us, no attempt should be made to retain them. The faults committed by George Grenville, Charles Townshend and Lord North can never be repeated.

Are not these words an encouragement to the aspirations I have just mentioned?

The historian, Mr. Dent, in his work, 'The Last Forty Years or Canada since the Union of 1841,' after having stated that confederation had given liberty to impulses which have rapidly developed themselves into aspirations after a national existence, adds that a little party sprung into being, having for its object the fostering of a Canadian national spirit. We advocated the consideration of Canadian interests in preference to all others, and adopted the significant motto of 'Canada First.' Here is what that writer says:

The seed, however, had been sown, and a national spirit has ever since been abroad in the land, more especially among the young men; the generations to whose hands the future destinies of Canada must inevitably be committed. Upon one subject all thinking men are agreed; the relations at present existing between Canada and Great Britain are not destined to be permanent. Some modification in those relations is inevitable. Many years may possibly elapse ere it shall become necessary to take the question into practical consideration, but that such a time will come is no longer disputable. . . . The idea of independence, on the other hand, appears to have taken a tolerably firm hold of the mind of young Canada.

In 1870, the Young Conservative Club of Montreal, proposed a resolution in favour of the independence of Canada.

The mover of that resolution was Mr. F. E. Villeneuve, a son of the Hon. Senator Villeneuve, and now a member for the legislature of the North-west Territories. It cannot be said that this act of disloyalty on his part was detrimental to him.

Whereas the members of the House of Commons of Canada have recently passed an address to Her Majesty the Queen, voicing the feelings of the people of Canada in favour of the colonial tie and deprecating for the future any attempt at the severance of British connection.

Be it resolved that the members of this Conservative Club consider that the said address is ill-timed and that it is calculated to be most detrimental to us, by placing Great Britain under the impression that we are ready to take up all her quarrels.

That, while professing the greatest admiration for British institutions, the members of this club earnestly wish to see Canada becoming independent and taking rank among the nations of the world, free from all trammels and ready to fulfil the brilliant destiny which Providence has in store for her.

As will be seen, there were twenty-five disloyal young men in that Conservative club. I do not know whether the hon. member for Beauharnois was among them.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON. (Translation.) What year was that in?

Mr. O. DESMARAIS. (Translation.) In 1890. It is not so very far back. I remember that at that time the hon. gentleman was serving under another leader; and to do him justice, I must say that he did not frequent Conservative clubs. I remember very well that in those days we used to make stump-speeches together, going from husting to husting, throughout the province of Quebec, expressing the same disloyal feelings against the Conservative party. But later on, the hon. member changed his mind, and after the general elections were over, he had quite forgotten his most solemn protestations and he had become a most loyal subject, not of the Queen, but of the Conservative leaders.

I now approach the consideration of the immediate subject of the debate, and I wish to show that I have been denounced before the House and the country, along with my friends, for having said exactly what the Conservatives have all the time being saying here and outside of this House. I often heard it said that La Patrie was the only journal which made it its stock-in-trade to stir up race prejudices, and I tried to find out where I had seen the same views and feelings expressed. I also heard the hon. leader of the opposition extolling the merits of the newspaper I am about to quote from ; he even referred to the loyalty of La Presse. I am quite ready to accept that statement and to believe in the loyalty of that paper. The hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), the other day, quoted from that journal an article in which his leader was praised. I am also going to put on record an article which under the heading : 'The French Canadians and the Transvaal' appeared in La Presse in its issue of the 14th October, and this, for the information of the hon. gentlemen, in order that they may see how unfair are those men who accuse us of disloyalty for giving utterance to feelings exactly similar to what is published by them in the columns of their newspapers.

Up to this morning, that is to say, previous to the action taken by the government, the Transvaal war would have left us quite indifferent. But now that the most serious differences have been settled, we may try to find out where we stand on the question. It was only under the reign of wireless telegraphy that Canada could find herself involved in a political crisis, which is raging in the Transvaal at a distance of 7,000 miles, and which is to be unravelled there ; and had the original suggestion, of sending, at the expense of the country, a Canadian regiment, been carried out, it would have been all over with our peaceful state of security, as the flag under whose protection we live is that of an empire upon which the sun never sets. Once you admitted that principle, all you had to do was to remain, day and night, under arms.

The French Canadian element was certainly opposed to the policy of sending a contingent at our own expense, and therein they did not show any disloyalty. It was, on the contrary, our duty to take such a stand.

In this new departure from our settled policy, and which involves us in all the wars of the empire, we may possibly go beyond the rules of moderation and prudence. As for us, French Canadians, we are in a better position than our fellow-countrymen to weigh the consequences of a movement which was threatening to carry our people beyond all reasonable control.

No more direct attack could be levelled at the very feeling which is being appealed to by those who reproach the French Canadian element with being disloyal. That article was published in La Presse, the very organ which threatens to expel me from the country, for having made a similar statement. Let me say, in passing, that the editor of La Presse is Mr. Arthur Dansereau, a journalist of high standing, and a Conservative, who takes his password from the leader of the opposition.

Were Great Britain in danger, it would be quite a different thing—

It was on the 14th October that this article was published :

—and we should not hesitate to go to her assistance ; but every one will agree with us that the proportions of the present war are being grossly exaggerated. Never did Great Britain, in her might, expect that under circumstances which are far from being extraordinary, that a small colony like Canada, without any martial record, should bring her help of no small importance. We have no arms, no guns, no cavalry, and, owing to our lack of military experience, no warriors of standing. True, we have inherited from our fathers pluck, valour and endurance ; but where, I ask, even with all possible good will, could we have learnt how to handle those arms ? Had one of our regiments been sent to the Cape, they would, no doubt, have done duty at St. Helena—

Now, you have here, Sir, a sample of Conservative loyalty !

In the following lines near the very same ideas, which I expressed publicly, though less forcibly, and which were referred to by the hon. leader of the opposition :

—as during the Crimean war, our 100th regiment remained at Gibraltar.

Such critical remarks cannot be disagreeable to our embryo army, which according to the 'Military Gazette' is in possession of all the elements of military merit and science, as also of an undeniable physical and moral strength.

So, greater emphasis was given to the argument that the sending of our contingents ought to be looked upon less in the light of an efficacious help than as a palpable evidence of our loyalty to England and of our love for the mother country. That was a noble and respectable feeling, and one which could hardly evoke any controversy. But if we call it in question, now that everything is settled, it is not because we feel any sympathy for the Boers, an ignorant, a fanatical people, hostile to the Roman Catholic religion, and whose obliteration from the map would not in the least retard the progress of human events. But should we feel justifiable in imposing upon Great Britain the burden of such a proof ? Did she ever call in question our feelings ? And why should we make such a profession of loyalty, when everybody knows that we are loyal to the core ? The fact of sending our troops to the Transvaal could at the best only be looked upon as a pleonasm, or a redundancy proscribed in the conduct of intelligent men as well as by the rules of grammar. Should our readers wonder why we give expression here to such views, it is that there is quite a difference in the standpoint of the French Canadians and of their English-speaking fellow-countrymen.

As for us, French Canadians, we belong to but one country, namely, Canada. As stated very forcibly by an Indian chief : 'Do you want us to remove from this country the bones of our ancestors ?' This is the land of our birth, of our hopes, a happy land where we hope, we will breathe our last. For us, Canada is the whole world. But an Englishman has two countries : Canada and the old country. Their relatives are over there, across the sea ; and their family ties, the recollections of childhood, the appeals of the same blood, the noble pride of their race, everything in short, tends to identify them with the struggles of the mother country. An Englishman becomes a colonist of his own free will, and because he wishes to quit the old country ; previously, he was by right of birth, a son of the British realm, whereas, we, Canadians, are merely colonists.

We appeal here to the conscience of our fellow-countrymen belonging to other races: does a Britisher look upon a colonial Englishman as his equal? Not in the least. Our English-speaking neighbours are also affected here to a certain extent, by such a distinction. The colonies are but an incident in the British Empire, which in every case, frames its policy and acts upon it, without consulting us. Never will it enter the mind of a British cabinet to ask our opinion in regard to British interests or the exercise of British rights; and we have no consulting voice in the Imperial parliament so as to be able to advise or restrict that body.

Now, if we place the question upon another ground, that of feeling, let me ask whether there can be any feeling between a metropolis and its colonies? At the time of the Fenian raid, did Great Britain ever make the romantic attempt of sending troops or money to Canada? No, we had to foot the whole bill. Notwithstanding that the raid was organized upon the United States territory, Great Britain never asked the American government, who, under international laws, were responsible through their dereliction of duty, for those troubles, to indemnify us.

Now, let the hon. gentleman hear how the writer of these lines handles England without gloves:

But when the secessionists raided the St. Alban's bank, Great Britain took precious good care to apply the principle of responsibility and to compel us to reimburse out of our own public treasury, the money stolen by the raiders. Great Britain was never actuated by feeling when they allowed the State of Maine to aggrandize itself at the expense of New Brunswick and of the province of Quebec; or when she allowed the United States to take away from us the states of Illinois, Dakota, Washington, Oregon and the Straits of Fuca.

The editor of La Presse goes on in the same strain, and makes further remarks which I would not hesitate to endorse:

The 'Witness' tells us that the French Canadians ought to feel grateful to England for the protection she has afforded us in connection with the Alaska boundary question. What does the 'Witness' know about it? The American newspapers have again and again stated that Great Britain would be quite willing to give up our claims, were it not for our persistent obstinacy; and yet, not a single word of protest has come from the other side of the ocean. Why, as a matter of fact, the Hon. Mr. Davies has returned from London empty-handed. What does a year of delay signify to us? Are we going, in the meanwhile, to spend a single cent upon a territory that is likely to be taken away from us next year?

We wish it to be well understood that we are not blaming Great Britain. We do not complain about those things any more than about the withdrawal of British troops, years ago, from Quebec, Montreal, Kingston and Toronto. Great Britain deemed it proper to consult her own feelings and interests in those matters, and it is no concern of ours. But I say that it was from the mother country herself that we learned the lesson of not introducing feeling in political matters.

In this case, an expression of sympathy on the part of Canada would have involved our sending one of two regiments at our own expense, that is to say, an expenditure of one or two million dollars in round numbers. Now, if an expression of sympathy amounts to an expenditure of money, we should appropriate those moneys to some useful purpose. We could have told the mother country: 'You have an immense territory to protect; now, we are going to do our share, at home. You wish to remain mistress of the seas; very well, we shall go to the expense of fitting out a warship, where we shall give our sailors proper training, just as we have been turning out of our military college efficient engineers, sappers and officers. And, if need be, we shall make additional expenditure on that college, so as to enable us to send you more men like Girouard. We shall keep up the nucleus of a permanent army, in order to have good officers, men fit to command, whenever Canada is invaded.'

That is, in our opinion, lofty, real and rational feeling.

But for Canada to go and scatter millions of dollars over the seven thousand miles which divide us from Africa, would, to our mind, have been an egregious mistake. Those millions would have been wasted; while sowing them throughout our territory would have been productive of merit, good services, genuine affection towards England, excellent men and heroes.

Fortunately, the British government came to the rescue, and with that practical spirit which is so characteristic of all their dealings, they obviated the difficulty. As to coming here and recruiting men, that is quite a different thing. We have been asked to send volunteers at the expense of the British government, and every one is free to go. Under the circumstances, the French Canadians, very likely, shall not be the last to enroll; but, at any rate, it is upon Great Britain that devolves the whole responsibility. This cannot be drawn into a precedent. We have, it is true, to provide supplies and defray the expenses of transport to Africa for 1,000 men, during twenty-five days; but that is, at the utmost, an insignificant sum of one hundred thousand dollars.

These lines were published on October 14 just as the government had declared that they had decided to equip a contingent to go to South Africa.

Did it ever enter your mind, Sir, that since October 14, such an article had been penned, going much farther than any Liberal had dared to go in that direction? And yet the hon. leader of the opposition was loud in his praises of this newspaper. But the article I have just quoted is no solitary example, for the columns of La Presse were filled with similar articles. It even reproduced, with evident glee, leaders from Le Monde Canadien, a paper which holds still more extreme views on the matter. Let me quote an article that appeared in the columns of that journal on October 30, under the heading 'Trend of Opinion':

Public opinion is ostensibly taking a threefold trend around this vexed question of the future: the participation of Canada in the wars of the British Empire.

Some are of opinion that henceforth, without any more ado than if the question was to send a body of policemen against a band of roving Indians, the government of Canada, in virtue of a mere Order in Council, should place our militia at the disposal of the Imperial authorities, to go and battle against no matter what enemy, no matter why, no matter in which hemisphere of the world, without any further consideration or representation in the councils of the empire.

Further down, referring to what the editor considers as the general trend of public opinion, which coincides with his own views, he says :

This Transvaal war should be treated as all the other wars of the empire in which Canada is not directly concerned.

We are a colony and we intend to remain so, just in order not to have to shoulder all the charges of a permanent army and experience all the horrors of war. So long as we shall remain a self-governing colony, recognized as such by the metropolis, we ought to confine ourselves to the necessary expenditure for the defence and protection of Canada. Such is the position we occupy under the constitution of the country, pursuant to the custom and practice that have prevailed ever since the conquest of Canada by British arms. But we may be told that it is only fair and proper that we should contribute to the wars of the empire which protects us and of which we are part and parcel. Let it be so, if you will, but then, let us first determine the respective position of the interested parties. Let us contribute to all the charges, but at the same time let us also share in all the advantages arising from the international treaties, and the customs arrangements between the colonies as well as with the metropolis.

Now, this is an occasion for making well defined negotiations and treaties. So long as nothing shall have been settled and determined without any ambiguity, let us strictly adhere to the 'status quo,' a position which, in our quality of good Britishers speaking French, we prefer, for our part, with all the guarantees it implies, to the smiling prospects of an Imperial grandeur, the splendour of which we can perceive only through a distant vista and under a very clouded sky.

Who was it penned those lines that appeared in Le Monde Canadien? Why, Sir, it was the Hon. Mr. Nantel, formerly Minister of Public Works for the province of Quebec, a former colleague of the Hon. Mr. Taillon, the same man who was given a portfolio in the short-lived cabinet of the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper).

Allow me, Sir, to quote another article from La Presse, under the heading 'A British Reverse.' After referring to the reverses experienced by the British, the article goes on :

If those who have foolishly railed at Canadian loyalty had happened to find themselves on Tuesday among our most important groups, they would have noticed the same anxious look, the same painful anguish of heart as among themselves.

At that moment there was no longer any haggling spirit about the assistance to give the mother country, or whether we should send one or two regiments. There had come quite a change in the view points of those who, in anticipation and under the presumption of the most absolute security for British arms believed they could, a week ago, consider, debate, and oppose, in their quality of politicians, a position which had suddenly been sprung upon the country, without any notice, without any previous consideration, without any provision for the least safeguard, but who, all the same did not wish to object to the actual and practical fact of sending a Canadian contingent.

You will see, Sir, from the above, that this paper has gone through an evolution, while we, Liberals, are being denied the right to do the same.

If England were in danger, we ought to contribute, willingly and with alacrity, to the defence of the mother country and do our own share. Such ever was and such will ever be the feeling the French Canadian people, in every crisis of danger. Never shall we stop to discuss things, in case of emergency. Grave and right-thinking men would say : 'The case admits of no delay ; there is no longer any question as to the merits of the war, and as to whether this is a precedent or not. There is nothing left us but a duty to fulfil ; let us fulfil it.'

In its issue of November 18, La Presse reproduced an article from the Toronto Evening News, containing an attack against the French Canadians, and it entered a very emphatic protest against it ; while, in the very same issue, it gave the hospitality of its columns to an article from the pen of Mr. Stead, the editor of the Review of Reviews, and apparently endorsed it.

After quoting the speech delivered by Mr. John Morley at Manchester, La Presse adds :

We shall make no further comment, but only let us not forget that Imperialism is one and indivisible and that the coercive measures which were found good in London cannot for ever remain bad in Canada.

Then it goes on giving opinions to show the injustice of the war.

In its issue of October 24, La Presse gave the opinion of Sir Edgar Clark, a Tory, who said, in parliament, that the present war was a crime against the constitution.

In its issue of October 16, we find an article from the Mail and Empire on a commercial union, or a customs union, with the United States, as in Wiman's time :

So much the worse for British connection.

What kind of loyalty is this, I ask, Sir, when a paper goes to the length of advocating the severing of the colonial tie?

In its issue of the 17th October, La Presse quoted from the Toronto Evening News in which had appeared the text of a resolution passed by the Ancient Order of Hibernians, protesting against the sending of a Canadian contingent to Africa, deprecated the denunciations made against the French Canadians, and it added that, in the face of such charges, one would feel tempted to be disloyal.

On the 16th December, La Presse published a very able article on the loyalty of the French Canadians, protesting against these fanatics who make it their business to attack our nationality. In this article, which covers three or four columns of that issue, the writer claims our right to the respect of the other races. I shall not recall that article, merely wishing to draw the attention of the House to it.

There are other papers still more Conservative than La Presse is. Let me quote from Le Courrier du Canada. The son-in-law of Sir Hector Langevin, the Hon. Mr. Chapais, a legislative councillor, and formerly a minister in the provincial cabinet, is the chief editor of that paper.

In its issue of the 18th October, there appeared an article which ran as follows:—

On the other hand, we despise, as they deserve it those insultors from Ontario who think they are justifiable in slandering the province of Quebec, because all the French Canadians have not yet left for South Africa.

Reference is here made to Girouard and others who are making ready to go to Africa, and the writer proceeds as follows:—

We merely wish to tell those fanatical slanderers who are a perfect nuisance in this country, that if French Canadian loyalty and devotion had nothing else than that stinking press to feed upon, it would not last very long.

In its issue of the 20th October, there appeared in the same paper a letter from the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) making public his resignation and explaining the reasons for it. The writer praises and congratulates the hon. gentleman. After stating that he had condemned the attitude taken by my hon. friend upon the school question, the writer adds:

But that cannot prevent us from paying a well deserved tribute to his firmness, his courage, his pluck, and the sincerity of his convictions, as well as to cogency of his arguments.

On the 23rd October appeared what follows:

A number of enlightened and patriotic men are now anxiously inquiring where is going to lead us that policy of participating in the wars of Great Britain, a policy inaugurated by the Laurier government and supported by public men belonging to both political parties. Men who are at the same time good Canadians and loyal British subjects are anxious to know what will be the solution of the problem now under consideration. Are we drifting towards Imperial federation, a policy proposed in years gone by, by our most eminent leaders? Are we on the threshold of a new era, when the Canadian constitution will be put to a severe test? People put all those questions and feel rightly anxious about them.

It is the Courrier du Canada, a Conservative paper that puts all those questions.

In its issue of the 7th November, the same paper says:

We hear from various sources that Sir Wilfrid Laurier has offered the British government to send a second contingent of Canadian soldiers, to go and fight in South Africa. Verily, we feel inclined to inquire whether the Prime Minister is still in his sober senses.

In another article published on the 9th November, in which the writer tries to show that the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) has always advocated Imperial federation, and in which he explains and denounces as well the position which it would create for us, he says:

Now, we ask, what influence could a handful of our representatives wield in that immense assembly? How could they prevent a war decided upon by the rest of Europe? They would be nullified, drowned and perhaps carried away by one of those impetuous currents which under certain circumstances are formed in those great deliberative bodies. And Canada would have to contribute money and pay the tribute of blood, no matter what the feelings and wishes of the people were. But what matters it? Should we not be represented? There is the whole burden of the question. We should have to pay against our grain, we should have to fight in spite of ourselves, but we would enjoy a right to representation in the Imperial government. Then would Mr. Tarte feel happy. To be absorbed, to be controlled, to be coerced, to be driven in spite of oneself towards the unknown, that is all right, provided we are represented.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS.
(Translation.) Oh! loyalty!

Mr. DESMARAIS. (Translation.) Yes. Truly could we say with the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron): Oh! loyalty!

What is the feeling that prompts those attacks? On the other hand, it is sought to create the impression that the hon. leader of the House and the hon. Minister of Public Works are trying to bring about Imperial federation; and while in the province of Quebec, newspapers like the Courrier stir up public opinion against the Dominion government by asserting that they are embarking in Imperial federation, they say in the English provinces that the cabinet was too slow in acting and was not British enough. It is by such tactics that they deceive the people.

On November 10, another article was published to show that the Liberal party as well as Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. Tarte were advocates of Imperial federation.

In its issue of November 15, the Courrier denounces the Prime Minister for having offered to send a contingent.

On November 18, appeared another elaborate article to the same effect.

In its issue of November 17, the Courrier reproduces a statement from the Hon. Edward Clarke, denouncing the war, and it adds that he gives the lie to the Prime Minister; and all this, of course, with a view to making political capital against the government in the province of Quebec.

On November 22, another article appeared, showing that the Roman Catholic religion was free and flourishing in the Transvaal.

On November 29, an elaborate article appeared on Imperial federation, to show that the Liberals were in favour of that political departure, and that the Conservatives were opposed to it.

Well, for our part, we take exception to such utterances.

Here the writer assumes that the country is opposed to Imperialism; and in order to show that, he quotes from a speech delivered by the hon. leader of the opposition, an extract of which has already been reproduced in this House. Then, he gives extracts from a speech of the right hon. Prime Minister and from another speech delivered by Sir Hector Langevin, at Joliette, in 1888, in which the latter stated that he was opposed to Imperial federation, and he concludes his article with the following statement:

The position with regard to that question of Imperial federation is a very simple one: Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. Tarte are advocates of that scheme, Sir Charles Tupper and his party are opposed to it.

We deemed it desirable well to define the position in order to prevent public opinion from being led astray.

It is necessary that the electorate should exactly know what are the principles and the responsibility of each party.

The hon. gentlemen who have heard or read the statement made by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Clarke Wallace) on the very next day after the leader of the opposition had spoken here, were no doubt satisfied that there was no common ideas on the matter, and that he had not consulted with his leader before making his speech.

Let us now hear the Hon. Mr. Foster, as reported in Hansard:

These are wonderful times in which we live. The chains are being forged to-day on the anvil beneath the swift moving hammers of history, which shall unite for ever within their bonds every dependency of Great Britain indissolubly and so long as British colonization exists.

And he goes on in the same tune.

The Courrier du Canada says that Sir Charles Tupper and the Conservative party are opposed to Imperial federation; but that the guilty parties are Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Hon. Mr. Tarte.

In its issue of December 18, appears another article to the same effect. The writer repeats that Sir Charles Tupper is opposed to Imperial federation.

On December 19, the Courrier states that it was Sir Wilfrid Laurier who made the offer of a second contingent.

The Star having published a cablegram stating that the sending of the contingents was but the prelude to a change in the constitution of the empire, the Courrier du Canada, after having quoted a protest from Mr. Reeves, agent of New Zealand, warns us against the policy inaugurated at Toronto, and adds:

This is a most sensible expression of opinion and one calculated to create a very favourable impression and the greatest satisfaction in the British colonies whose inhabitants wish to preserve in all their integrity the constitutional liberties which they now enjoy.

On December 21, the most important of all those articles appeared under the heading: 'About the War,' and the writer, after referring to the exasperating nature of the discussion carried on between French and English papers, goes on to say:

This arises, no doubt, from certain misunderstandings which all right-thinking men on both sides should endeavour to dissipate. There are, in our opinion, actual questions, connected with history, diplomacy or politics, about which writers may honestly agree to disagree, without its being necessary for them to seize each other by the throat.

We are of opinion that such questions as the opportunity, the necessity or the justification of the Transvaal war come under that head. It seems to us that a British subject may honestly believe that it was unwise to embark in that dangerous affair, that the reasons invoked were not sufficiently strong to justify such a bloody conflict, without being disloyal and a bad citizen.

Such is the statement made by the Hon. Mr. Chapais:

One may passionately love one's country and yet because he loves it, regret that it should engage in such a risky affair. Such is evidently the opinion of men like Sir William Harcourt, John Morley, Edward Clarke, Herbert Spencer, Edward Blake and so many others who are neither traitors nor guilty of felony

No better, no more forcible defence could one wish for than this able article from an opposition organ.

Here, as in England, as in France and in every other country in the world, such an opinion could not without injustice be treated as a symptom of treason. On the contrary, it is the indication of a sincere loyalty on the part of a man to deplore the errors which he thinks are being made and who feels anxious about the results.

We have had, through ages, two mother countries, France and England. France has remained the land of our ancestors, the land of our traditions and of our dearest recollections. England is the mother country which presides over our manhood, watches over the progress of our destiny and claims our political loyalty. Whatever may be our sympathy for France—and it is too natural a sympathy for any one to wonder at it, since it is the voice of blood which speaks—it cannot go beyond the limit of a feeling and could never interfere with the fulfilment of any of the duties involved by our new allegiance. The ties which bind us to England, though of a different class, are just as strong and just as difficult to sever. Our loyalty is not an empty word; it is not rhetorical rubbish for the use of short-winded speakers, or one of those common-place topics taught by rhetoric. Our loyalty is grounded upon the protection received from Great Britain, upon the expansion of Canada which she has favoured, and upon a combination of powerful, lofty and patriotic considerations.

I think, Sir, that all the hon. gentlemen who understand French will endorse those views. For my part, I may say that I coincide in those views, and if to entertain those views is to be disloyal, why, then, I am disloyal. Order me to be shot or expelled: I would rather submit to that fate, than dissemble sentiments which are mine.

Let us now turn our attention to the newspaper Le Journal, a French copy of the Star. The sessional correspondent of Le Journal, who was formerly an hon. member of this House, was present with us at that grand 'Champ de Mars' meeting, and he then spoke just like my hon. friend from Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron). Let me quote from an article that appeared in the Journal on December 21 last, under the heading: 'Imperial Federation.' The writer quotes from Sir Charles Tupper's speech to show that he is opposed to Imperial federation, and after saying that Sir Wilfrid Laurier is in favour of it, he points out the drawbacks of the scheme, laughs at the whole thing and exclaims:

We denounce here the man who for the sake of the vain glory of representing us on the floor of the Imperial parliament, would wantonly jeopardize a position acquired at the cost of great sacrifices and render useless our past struggles.

The man whom Le Journal attacks in that way, is the leader of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who, it says, is an Imperialist, ready to hand us over to Imperial federation. Let us proceed:

Before he can succeed, he will have to lift up the slabs of the sepulchre, to tear away from their graves our illustrious dead; he will have to scatter to the winds of ingratitude and oblivion the dust of Viger, Bédard, Papineau, Lafontaine, Taché, Cartier, &c.

And then? Well, after that, there will be enough living left to avenge the dead and chastise the man who will have betrayed their memory and injured their work.

On December 22, Le Journal declines to give its opinion as to the merits of the war; it reproduces in its columns an article from La Presse, under the heading: 'Honest explanations,' about loyalty and endorses it.

And on the 19th of this month, the same paper tries to show that Sir Wilfrid Laurier is in favour of Imperial federation, and speaks as follows:

At last the hour has come when Mr. Laurier proceeding gradually has reached the heights of his new patriotism, in inducing our Canadian volunteers to go and fight for Great Britain, whenever England shall require it.

Therefore, Messrs. Tarte and Laurier are in favour of Imperial federation.

But one thing we know, and it is that his utopia has no chance of succeeding in Canada. Great Britain herself would probably not give her consent to such a scheme. Suicide—as Mr. Laurier used to say at the time when he was a democrat to the hilt—would perhaps kill the mother and her offspring.

At all events, we have nothing to gain by the change. Our interests would certainly not always be identical with those of the other colonies, and from such divergency of interests would arise conflicts which would soon degenerate into discord. But we would have our say on all the great questions, as say the advocates of Imperial federation. How many representatives should we have?

It is not always the number that decides a question, says Mr. Tarte. Nowadays, however, numerical strength is a great factor. Let us not incur the risk of a political evolution which might increase our responsibility and our duties.

But, Mr. Speaker, things are going from bad to worse, as you will see. There is another small public sheet, which is not yet very well known, and is published in a manufacturing centre. I said that it was not yet very well known, but I may add that it will have a great record, as it is supposed to reflect the views of an illustrious personage who has become a leader in his party, and who is now the successor of Cartier in the province of Quebec.

Valleyfield, as many important cities which contend for the honour of having been the birthplace of great geniuses whom humanity takes pride in, has witnessed the birth of a newspaper called Salaberry. Is it to recall the famous Chateauguay battle, in which three hundred French Canadians defeated seven thousand American soldiers, that this journal has assumed the name of the victorious general? I do not know. Le Salaberry is to be the organ of the new leader upon whose shoulders has fallen Cartier's mantle.

There is a letter from a correspondent here, who takes his information from the most authorized sources, and who says:

'It was not Minto'—a rather disrespectful way of speaking of the representative of the British Crown in Canada—'but Laurier himself who has offered a contingent to the War Office.'

Now, how dare they tell us that the hon. leader of the opposition does not try to raise prejudices against the Prime Minister? Le Salaberry speaks of the sending of the second contingent as follows:

Sir Wilfrid pretended to be more loyal than Victoria.

That is the way they speak of our august Sovereign; a rather disrespectful way.

Referring to the correspondence in connection with the contingents, the writer says:

It is said in that correspondence that the Canadian volunteers are not desirable on a battle-field, where they would rather be a nuisance. In the face of such a refusal, no wonder that Sir Wilfrid should have told us so positively, on the 4th October that Canada would not send any soldiers.

The organ of the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) says:

The government has been very unlucky in the choice of the commanding officer of the Canadian contingent. Do people know that Colonel Otter is the choice of the government?

Now let us see what kind of loyalty to the country those people make profession of. Here is what this journal says :

The records will tell us. Colonel Otter was the commanding officer of the 'Queen's Own,' of Toronto, and of the 'Sharpshooters' of Ottawa, during the North-west campaign of 1885.

Further down, it adds :

Mr. Tarte has stated that it was the war office which made the offer to pay our soldiers. That is not very notable, in as much as our volunteers are of no use whatever to England, except as food for the guns.

So, the hon. member for Beauharnois who did not hesitate to offer five thousand, nay more, ten thousand men, thinks that our soldiers are of no use whatever to England.

In the issue of November 28, of the same paper, I find extracts from a speech of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron) in which he says that the right hon. Prime Minister has rendered considerable service to the Canadian people having secured for our nation an honourable place in the councils of the empire.

The hon. gentleman after bestowing praise upon the Prime Minister in his Toronto speech, should not allow his organ to insult him, in as much as that paper sings the hon. gentleman's own praise at least once a week.

Here are two short extracts in which the writer shows very little sympathy for the mother country :

In the Crimea, in 1854, at the post of honour, and of danger, one was sure to meet a Frenchman, but never any of those British 'business men.'

Further on, here is what I find :

No! the Britisher who is the incarnation in this world of the goddess Discord of antiquity; the Britisher who, for the last hundred years has made it a business to urge on nations to slaughter each other on the battlefields, while taking precious good care not to appear in the front rank; the Britisher, I say, did not know what he was doing, a few months ago, when forcing the Transvaal to undertake the present war.

Such is the organ of Cartier's successor, who, the other day, in this House was so loud-mouthed in his professions of loyalty.

An hon. MEMBER. (Translation.) Is that all?

Mr. DESMARAIS. (Translation.) The end is not yet; I have a few more issues of that paper. This is not an old newspaper; but with brave hearts, courage and youth walk hand in hand.

On December 21, the Salaberry published what follows:—

The war waged between the British colossus and the Boer pigmy so far reminds us of the fight of Goliath with David. Great Britain, according to the despatches from her generals themselves, experiences nothing but reverses. Those repeated reverses are so persistent that it is an open question whether Bismarck's prophecy is not near being fulfilled, that South Africa would be the grave of British glory.

Not a word of sympathy from this newspaper, with the British flag in such a distress!

Oh! loyalty! where art thou?

In another issue, I find the following:—

The 'Monde Canadien' and 'La Vérité' have assumed towards Mr. L. O. David a similar attitude to that I took, after the publication of the famous letter to 'La Presse.' They both agree with me that Mr. David has made a blunder. There is this difference between their comments and mine: in their opinion, Mr. David, after abdicating his former professions of patriotism, is guilty of treason when he suggests to his fellow-countrymen to side with England against the Boers. It is an anti-patriotic work to stand by England under the circumstances.

In the issue of the Salaberry from which I have taken the above extract, the organ of the new Conservative leader—or assistant leader—devotes two columns of its space to the reproduction of a portion of the speech delivered by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron) at Toronto. Much good is said of that speech, and here is what I find in the Salaberry :

As to Great Britain, they say that in her struggle against the Boers, she has justice on her side. We are too far from the scene of the war and from the causes which brought it about, to give an opinion as to the merits or demerits of this war. For my part, it is enough to know that our mother country is in danger to conclude that it is the duty of her sons to hasten to assist her.

As will be seen, the hon. gentleman hesitates a little and his loyalty does not warrant him stating that England has right and justice on her side.

If it be proper for a man of such unquestioned loyalty to show a little hesitation, it seems to me that any other man less gifted, is free to say as much. I could quote many other articles from the Salaberry, all of the same tenor.

But I now turn my attention to another Conservative paper, the mouth-piece of another influential politician. That paper is edited in the city of Three Rivers, and is called Le Trifluvien. I shall not quote here all the articles which have appeared in that paper with regard to the question under consideration; let it suffice for my purpose to quote the most recent article. The writer of that article had no doubt, previous to writing it, read the speech of the hon. leader of the opposition as well as that delivered by the hon. member for Beauharnois at Toronto.

In its issue of February 13, the Trifluvien published an article, under the heading, 'Beware.'

We have had the honour of being consulted as to the attitude to be taken by the French Canadian Conservatives with regard to the policy of sending contingents of Canadian volunteers to South Africa. Here is our answer: for our part, the question is a very simple one. The war is unjust on the side of England. We were in no way obliged to take part in it. To contribute, of our own free will, to the perpetration of an injustice, is to be accessory to the same. In conscience, we cannot give our consent to that. We, therefore, decline to affirm by our vote and the war itself and Canada's active and free participation in the war, and all the expenditure involved by the active part taken by us in the war. It is as clear, as peremptory as an axiom.

But we are told that if England is defeated, we shall find ourselves at the mercy of the United States, and that we, French Canadians in particular, should have everything to lose by the change of yoke. Here is our answer to that objection: we cannot help it; a war, which is unjust at the outset, cannot become a just war by reason of the reverses experienced by the party who has perpetrated the injustice; that party is always free to put a stop to the war as far as he is concerned, on condition of paying an indemnity for the damages resulting from his unjust action; besides, a nation can never grow and prosper, when benefiting by an injustice.

Further, in our opinion, Providence has not abdicated its control over the progress of events having an influence over the fate of nations; and there is nothing to warrant the belief that Providence to-day is taking less interest in those events than it did yesterday. We do not think it our business, short-sighted as we are, to substitute our views to the far-reaching views of divine wisdom; and, if Providence has decreed that French Canada should lend to her destiny, independently from that of the neighbouring republic, Providence will so direct things as to prevent our being engulfed by the Yankee Moloch.

Paul Kruger said the very same thing, when expressing his confidence in God.

Now, if we were to inquire into the designs of Providence in relation to this small French Canadian people, we might say that, in the light of past events, if Canada does not prevaricate, she is predestined, we believe, to preserve her own identity, a life of her own, and to play a part of her own on this continent of America, and from that standpoint, we have good reasons to ponder over the consequences of the attitude we would take in endorsing what has been done.

What is the meaning attached to the movement which is impelling the British colonies to act jointly and severally with England? We need not go very far back into the past to find out the reason. Was it not Mr. Chamberlain who, last week, was applauded to the echo and carried the day for the Imperial government in sounding this note: that the recent manifestations of the colonies were an immense step taken towards the establishment of an Imperial confederation which would blend the whole Anglo-Saxon race into a solid body, connected together by common interests, common aspirations, common duties and common advantages?

Now, from the standpoint of our own future, as a distinct race which has withstood every attempt at assimilating it and which is doing its best every day to resist such attempts, is there not in that fact a threatening peril? He would be short-sighted, indeed, the man who would not bow to evidence in that respect. At all events, the British statesman who has availed himself of his tenure of office to prepare that evolution and to make it fruitful, the 'deus ex machinâ' who has brought out of their obscurity the dreams of the most ardent imperialists, has taken good care to dissipate all doubts in that respect. Nothing but a blind policy could cause us to remain indifferent to the results of the plot that has been concocted with a view to do away with our influence.

Under such circumstances, for every French Canadian who has at heart the future of his nationality, there is no longer any room for doubt as to his duty. He has no option, because there is no alternative. His own interest and the interest of those who are dear to him require that he should vote against everything that has been done to embark Canada in a war that can only affect us through its consequences, in its correlation with schemes which tend to nullify three centuries of toll, of sacrifices and of struggles.

The writer says that he had an interview with a Conservative member, who promised him to vote here against the expenditure in connection with the contingents sent to South Africa. As there are only two members from that district here, the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron), and the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Marcotte), I have no doubt that either of the two gentlemen will tell us which of them is opposed to that expenditure.

I think I have quoted at sufficient length, Sir, to show that it is not only among Liberals that are to be found feelings of disloyalty. I could quote from other papers, such as Le Pionnier, of Sherbrooke; L'Evenement; La Défense, Chicoutimi; La Semaine Religieuse and tutti quanti. Among the Liberal newspapers, La Patrie is the only paper which has opposed that Imperialist movement. I need not mention Le Soleil, for it is an ultra-loyalist paper.

Now, one word about my attitude on this question. At the outset, when this movement was started, I publicly stated that I did not mean to endorse it, no matter who was the initiator of it, though even it came from the respected leader of my party. There are certain things from which I would not recoil, the moment I thought it my duty to do so. But, as was stated in La Presse, we ought to offer our assistance to the mother country without haggling, but what I was disposed to denounce as an Imperialist movement, I still denounce. But, when we are asked to do the thing, out of the fulness of our heart, out of gratitude for the favours conferred upon us by England, and as a token of our feelings towards the mother country, I would be very ungrateful, indeed, should I turn a deaf ear to such an invitation. What they would impose upon us for political purposes, I decline to accede to; but what I am asked to do, out of gratitude, I very willingly acquiesce in. The moment England wants our assistance, we cannot refuse our co-operation.

However, it is open to doubt whether England needs our assistance. I think that, even if we had not sent any volunteers, England would have easily managed, without such help, to extricate herself, as she generally does and as she will still do in the future. I cannot be led into believing that Great Britain, after having defeated the great warrior before whom the whole of Europe trembled, Napoleon Bonaparte, she will be afraid to face on the battlefield an army of peasants.

If, under the circumstances, I think it proper to refuse my assent to the resolution under consideration, from the standpoint I have taken at the outset, it is because, as stated by the hon. member from Montmorancy (Mr. Casgrain) this movement does not pave the way towards Imperialism, as would have it Le Courrier du Canada, La Presse, and so many other papers, and I thus feel reassured about the future of my country.

I could quote many other articles showing how unfair are the charges brought against us. After all we have heard here and after reading all the articles which have been communicated to us, one is at loss to know where this absurd and ridiculous onslaught will stop.

In this connection, allow me to communicate to the House, through you, Mr. Speaker, a thought that struck me. Last night, when I was wending my way towards the Parliament Buildings, I happened to cast a glance at the tower where the British flag had been flying half-mast since the reception of the sad news which has thrown into mourning many a family, members of which have shed their blood and fallen on the battlefields of South Africa. I noticed that the flag had been rent asunder during the violent storm then raging, and it occurred to me that perhaps somebody would think that we from the province of Quebec were responsible for the flag being torn to rags. It is absurd, you will tell me, Sir, to entertain such a notion; but it is no more absurd than the unjust accusations thrown to our face, and those articles reflecting on our loyalty.

Yes, we are loyal, but we are also British subjects, and whoever says a British subject says a free man, having the right to discuss questions of public policy and concerning the future of the country. For my part, I affirm here my loyalty, my allegiance to the British Crown, to the gracious Queen whom I respect and admire. I am a subject of the empire, a British subject, and for twenty years, I have been a member of the Canadian militia.

A few years ago, being then an officer in the militia, there occurred a circumstance I wish to refer to. In 1885, the commanding officer Campbell called a meeting at the city hall at St. Hyacinthe, of all the officers of his battalion, in order to make sure whether they were willing to enter the active service, in consideration of the circumstances that were then transpiring. For my part, although I had denounced the course pursued by the Dominion government, who had provoked the troubles of which Canada was the scene, and though I sympathized with the cause of those I would have to oppose, because I thought they had been unjustly dealt with, I declared that I was ready to go and to fulfil my duty, were I called upon by the authorities to do so.

There is another charge made against us in connection with our old mother country, France. They call us disloyal, because we still love our old mother country. We are as loyal as the respected leader of the House. We are more loyal than Sir John A. Macdonald, when he set fire to the Parliament Buildings in Montreal, and when he insulted the representative of Her Majesty. We are more loyal than those who signed the annexation manifesto of 1849. We are as loyal as the men who, in 1885, denounced the Prime Minister, because of the trouble that had taken place.

We have a right to express our opinion, without being accused, on that account, of disloyalty to the British Crown. We are ready, and we will ever be ready to take part in the defence of the country when required to do so, and to make the necessary sacrifices for the maintenance of our constitutional rights. So long as the French Canadians will remain British subjects, they will not hesitate to do their duty for the defence of the country.

Nay, more, Sir, if it ever happened that France—God forbid!—if France, I say, ever attempted to invade her ancient colony, Canada, and tried to haul down the flag which protects us, let me tell you, Sir, that I would be ready, I and my sons, with closed eyes and heavy hearts, to defend the British flag.

Such is the loyalty of the French Canadians, Sir, and it is as good as that of others. But, on the other hand, when they pretend to deny us the right of discussing here the questions that are debated in the British parliament, and this because we are of French origin, I say it is time to make a halt. Standing here, on the floor of this House, as a free man, I claim my right, and to those who threaten and accuse us, I say: You threaten to reconquer the province of Quebec and to destroy the French race; but what your fathers were unable to do, when we were only sixty thousand inhabitants, do you think you will achieve, now that we are two million of people?

To-day, the great mass of our English speaking fellow-countrymen are intelligent and generous. With the men who gave us the constitution which governs us; with the men who have been the friends and upholders of freedom on every point of the globe, with these men, I say, we agree perfectly; and whenever they hold out their hand to us, in the interest of our common country, Canada, we shall not ask them what language they speak, or before which altars they kneel down to render homage to the Divinity. We shall merely tell them : Let us go hand in hand, shoulder to shoulder, and with stout hearts strive to reach the bright future which is in store for our country. The day will come, I hope, when my sons at least—if I have departed this life—will be numbered among the citizens of a free, prosperous country, taking rank among the nations, but also in friendly alliance with Great Britain, whose generosity will have contributed to the achievement of that great work.

It being six o'clock the Speaker left the chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. FREDERICK D. MONK (Jacques Cartier). Mr. Speaker, I confess to you that I feel at some disadvantage in rising to speak after the hon. member for St. James Division, Montreal (Mr. Desmarais). That hon. gentleman is a very eloquent man. I have heard him on many occasions. He is known in the province of Quebec as a natural-born orator, and I do not think I can pay him any more sincere compliment than in saying that while he spoke it was a matter of regret to me that so many of the hon. members of this House were not in a position to admire his magnificent diction and the skilful way in which he wields the language which is the language of the majority of the people in our province. But, Sir, I am bound to say that I do not think that upon this occasion the hon. gentleman has done quite justice to himself, and I will tell you why. There was all over this House an anxious expectation as to what attitude the hon. member would take upon that most important question which underlies the resolutions now under discussion; and why did that anxiety exist? Well, Sir, for those who are acquainted with the political career of the hon. member for St. James Division, it did seem difficult for him to side with the government upon the subject-matter of these resolutions. In 1885, conspicuous among those who in the province of Quebec raised a most powerful cry against the action which this government thought fit to take at that time for the maintenance of order in the North-west, was that hon. gentleman; and that agitation was carried to such an extent that one of the hon. gentlemen who sit here to-day on the Treasury benches, the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière), who at that time with universal approbation and consent was the leader of his party in the province of Quebec, and others, if I mistake not, saw fit to secede from these gentlemen, feeling that they had carried altogether beyond legitimate bounds and limits their attitude in regard to the maintenance of law and order and the supremacy of the flag in this country. But, Sir, that is not all. In 1890, during the severe campaign which preceded the call of this government to power, that hon. gentleman took up a still stronger position before his own province. Those who took part in that electoral campaign, without exception, surely will bear me out when I say that upon every hustings upon which that hon. gentleman appeared—and he appeared upon many, for his eloquence is well known in our province—he condemned in unmitigated terms the action of the late government in purchasing rifles. He charged the present hon. leader of the opposition with the intention of supporting the British government in the defence of its rights outside of Canada, and he made it a ground of appeal to the electorate of the province of Quebec in every place that they were called upon to choose between supporting a man who did not intend to aid England in any way, who, on the contrary, was determined to maintain an attitude of absolute neutrality in this country, and the man who was then the leader of the government, now the leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), who, according to him, was disposed to take up the attitude which the present government has taken up to-day, and which that hon. gentleman was called upon to pronounce himself upon. Why, Sir, these facts are most familiar. There was a story current at that time which will bear repetition and I believe it is true; if it is not, it is, as the Italians say, well found. That story is that on one occasion when my hon. friend from Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) met the hon. member for St. James Division in a great political gathering, foreseeing as every one could foresee, what denunciations he would launch into, my hon. friend from Beauharnois, during the temporary absence of the hon. member, said to the people: 'You are going to hear a very eloquent man in a few moments, a man who is a natural-born orator; but you must remember that he is afflicted at times with a painful mania—the rifle fever. He will say to you that the government is purchasing rifles for the troops, and that Sir Charles Tupper has come from England with the intention of arming those troops and sending your children to South Africa or to Venezuela to be sacrificed in the defence of the British flag.' Having said these words, my hon. friend from Beauharnois sat down. At that moment the hon. member for St. James Division came on the hustings, not having heard these observations of my hon. friend, and he said: 'There is one paramount question in this campaign; it is the question of rifles.' There was a ripple of laughter in the crowd which the hon. gentleman did not understand, and he went on to say: 'The question is one that concerns your very lives; the question is whether you are going to sacrifice your children on the altar of British devotion, or whether you will keep them at home;' and then the laughter became so great that the hon. gentleman had to launch out upon another subject. Later still, at the beginning of these very troubles, the hon. member for St. James Division had occasion to express his opinion, and he then indicated that he had not altered his opinion, and that it was always the same. In the beginning of October last, after the right hon. gentleman who leads this House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) had given his interview to the Globe, there was a meeting in Montreal, and we all heard through the press what the outcome of that meeting was. The hon. member for St. James Division was there, and he declared in his own eloquent way that he would never approve of a government which took upon itself to furnish aid to Great Britain in the impending war, and that he would not hesitate to condemn a government that took such a step. Well, Sir, under these circumstances this House can readily imagine that we were anxious to know what the opinion of that hon. gentleman was if he had changed it, and, for reasons which I will indicate in a moment, they were anxious to ascertain what his attitude was upon this most important subject. I said a moment ago that the hon. gentleman had not done justice to himself. We expected an expression of opinion; we had none. I watched the hon. gentleman for nearly three hours during which he took up the time of this House in reading extracts from newspapers, some of which, published in my own province, I never heard of before. He took up the time of the House reading extracts from these papers, endeavouring to prove that there were people, according to his own saying, as disloyal as himself. Let me say immediately, that I have heard no one lay the charge of disloyalty against the hon. gentleman in this House, and I lay none. I will refer to that in a moment, and this House will see for what reason, and in what sense we have the right to an expression of opinion from that hon. gentleman. But we have had none. He could, in language more eloquent than could have been used by any other man in this House, have defined his position in the course of the long address he made, but not one word did he utter, which could enlighten us on this point up to five minutes to six o'clock, and then, for the space of perhaps two short minutes, we had a brief, I should say, a vague reference to the subject-matter of these resolutions. And what did the hon. gentleman say? I speak subject to correction, but his attitude, his very words, conveyed this idea. If Great Britain needs our assistance, and asks for our assistance, I am not disposed to refuse it. I am satisfied with our present position in this country, and, as a matter of gratitude, I am not disposed to refuse that assistance, but I do not believe that she does need it. I place myself in the judgment of this House, and I ask hon. members, who are familiar with the French language, and who listened to the speech of the hon. gentleman, if they are in a position to say to-day, after having heard him for three hours, what is his attitude with regard to these resolutions. I defy any one of the members to do so. If we take his words, if we take the comments he made, it is impossible to arrive at any other conclusion than that he avoided the question. Well, in this attitude, I believe the hon. gentleman has followed the example of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte). He has taken exactly the course of the hon. minister, and no other. We did, Sir, place the hon. Minister of Public Works in this position, as I venture to say he would have placed any hon. gentleman sitting on the Treasury benches, under similar circumstances. We took up the newspaper, which is the recognized organ of the hon. Minister of Public Works—not a paper published in the rural districts, not a paper having no political colour, but the accredited, the recognized organ of the hon. minister, and, acting upon the constitutional principles which obtain in this country, we called upon him, as in like case we would have called upon any other minister of the other side, to explain and define his position. I am not going to take up the time of this House in quoting from La Patrie newspaper. I read it daily, I looked over its files last night, and any hon. member who wishes to ascertain exactly the tone of that paper, can find the file here in the library, and look over its numbers, from the first of October, down to the present day, and what will he find? He will find that at no time has that organ approved of the present action of the government. In the beginning, he will find that it scouted the idea that troops should be sent to South Africa. Afterwards, when the troops were sent, he will find that it took up the attitude that the sending of the troops constituted no precedent, but was due to pressure brought upon the government by the Conservative party. All sorts of excuses were invented for the action of the government. He will find that the attitude taken by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), and the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Monet), was commended and approved. Let any one follow that paper, from the very institution of these difficulties, down to the present day, and I say that no fair-minded man can come to any other conclusion but that its attitude was directly hostile to the government. Under those circumstances, surely we were entitled to know what the views of the hon. minister, who really is responsible for the publication of that paper, who is identified with it in a manner he cannot escape—we are entitled to know what his views are. There is no question of loyalty here. We would have addressed the same question to the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) had he been connected with a newspaper in his own province published in that way, which took up the same position. We would have put the same query to the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), if his own organ, in his own province—and I believe he has one—had taken up that attitude. Well, what did we hear from the Minister of Public Works? I say that it is impossible to read his speech, to weigh his words, without coming to the conclusion, that he occupies, for a motive, which I will indicate later, a position upon this question hostile to the government. It is impossible to come to any other conclusion. He was opposed to the sending of the contingents. The war, he said, is an unjust war, because it is a war of conquest, and the action of the government is one which I cannot approve; parliament was not convened as it should have been. He takes this position, that parliament was not convened as it should have been, and he goes so far as to come down to this Chamber, and tell us what was the position of the Governor General's advisers on this question. His very words are that he was beaten in the council by a majority, but that, for reasons which I find totally inadequate, he did not deem it proper to take up the only logical position which, under our constitution, a minister can take up, and that is to resign.

The hon. Minister of Public Works has told us repeatedly that he is anxious for the maintenance of the constitution. I appeal to you, Sir, if the position which he has taken on this question, is not a position entirely repugnant to the spirit of the constitution. I would ask you if it does not bring us back to the days previous to responsible government in England, previous to 1780, when we had the spectacle of ministers coming down to parliament, and there discussing and fighting against one another, there being divided, yet still being able to retain their positions. In other words, he brought us back to the time when responsible government did not exist. His attitude, his conduct, is entirely opposed to the principles of responsible government.

And what is the object of it? I shall await with anxiety what other members of the Liberal party, who represent the province of Quebec in this House, will say, because, so far as they have gone, we have had no approval of the course of the government from these gentlemen, and what I do say is this, as my hon. friend from Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), has said, there is unfortunately in the province of Quebec, a mode of warfare which has most disastrous results and which will go to any lengths in order to obtain a purely temporary advantage. The scheme, if I mistake not, of these gentlemen is to go before the country, after this parliament is closed, and appeal to the people for the maintenance of this government, on the ground that some members of it were opposed to the sending of the troops, and to the attitude which the country has taken upon this question; and we, who sit on this side from the province of Quebec, will be pointed to with scorn, because we came to the conclusion, after weighing every circumstance, and every possible reason connected with the action the government has taken in this matter, that the attitude adopted by the government, in so far as the sending of the contingents is concerned, was a proper one. We will be told that we are the upholders of the men who have attacked the province of Quebec, who have forced the French people into the attitude this government has taken, and we will be subjected to every imaginable kind of abuse, because we have thought fit to take the only logical and patriotic attitude which we could adopt. We have a foreshadowing of that attitude by their treatment of the speech of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) at the present moment. Referring to his speech, they say: That is the language of the Minister of Public Works in which he has denounced this war, in which he has taken the position that the action of the government was illegal and wrong, because parliament was not convoked, and we are told that his language is that of a patriot. We are told in addition that the Minister of Public Works has made a vigorous attack against—whom, Mr. Speaker? Against the fanatics, that is to say ourselves, who are making a campaign against the province of Quebec. Now, Sir, that is the course which these gentlemen intend to pursue, and for my own part I am anxious that we should hear from themselves in no uncertain language what their attitude is upon this question. We do not regret that they should take the position that the province of Quebec is attacked. The province of Quebec, as the Minister of Public Works has said, is well able to take care of itself. But we want to know what they think of these resolutions, and we will know it before this session closes. For my own part, I am not in public life for my own advancement or advantage; but I am anxious before I leave it to see that system of warfare cease. I believe that it works to the detriment of our province; I believe that it has the result of disaffecting a population inclined to be most loyal, inclined to be most fair. I believe that the way of carrying on party warfare in the province of Quebec has a disastrous effect upon the population. We have a fine population in that province, a population who—I am speaking more particularly of the French Canadians—form an invaluable element in this empire. They are only too anxious to bear the responsibilities which a participation in that empire entails. They are a people with great military traditions. Long before they settled in this country most of them were soldiers, and on every battlefield of Europe they distinguished themselves. Their early settlement in this country was accompanied by circumstances calculated to develop their courage ; and after the great struggle which placed a new flag above their heads, they have shown themselves in every circumstance loyal and devoted to the British Crown, and they are anxious to remain so. I venture to say that there are very few French members who sit in this House whose relatives have not at some time had occasion to prove that devotion. Well, under these circumstances is it not time that this system of playing upon the sentiments of the people for party purposes, should be done away with, and that we should learn to discuss and to examine political questions upon their true merits. For my part, I am willing to go down to my county where the majority are French speaking, and am willing to trust myself to their judgment respecting the attitude we have thought fit to take up on this side of the House in regard to this question. I am prepared to go down before the people of my county and take the position that it would have been disastrous for us, when every other part of the empire saw fit to take part in this struggle, it would have placed us in a most humiliating position, if we had not done so ourselves. I am prepared to put that fairly before them. I am prepared to go before the people of my county and expose to them what would have been our position if we had failed to take that share in the defence of the empire which every other colony has seen fit to take.

Mr. ETHIER. The hon. member may go before his electors, but it is doubtful if he comes back again.

Mr. MONK. I am prepared to take chances with my hon. friend as to coming back. I do not think that when this question is put fairly before the electors of the province of Quebec they will view it in any other light than we do ; and if the hon. gentlemen who sit opposite will treat that question before the electors of that province as fairly as it should be treated, I venture to say that the province of Quebec will speak with a voice as clear as any other in this Dominion.

I do not wish to take up the time of this House at any greater length. I have in these remarks stated my attitude on this important question. The question has been raised of the extent to which we ought to contribute to the maintenance of our troops while they are in South Africa. For my own part, I never entertained much doubt upon that subject, because the moment you adopt the principle that we were right in sending our troops, there it becomes almost a necessity that we should treat those who are there to uphold the honour of this country, in such a manner as they deserve to be treated. I must confess to you, Sir, that the day before yesterday when, on leaving my room, I saw the flag at half-mast upon this building, and heard the news that so many of our fellow-countrymen had fallen in defence of that flag in South Africa, I must confess to you that any hesitation I may have had promptly disappeared. I think it is time for us fully to realize what our position is in this great empire, and having realized that position to assume all the responsibilities which it involves. I am not disposed to find fault with the government upon the question of expense, and am prepared to support the government in treating generously the relatives of those who have fallen with their face to the foe in upholding the honour of our flag.

Mr. J. A. C. ETHIER (Two Mountains). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I wish I had the eloquence and the acquirements of the hon. member for Jacques-Cartier (Mr. Monk), so as to be able to deal with this question as eloquently as he has dealt with it, but still, I think it my duty, owing to the importance of the matter, and because my name has incidentally been mixed in the debate, to take part in the discussion and to freely make known my views upon the situation in which we have been placed by the war in which England is engaged, and of which Canada is now feeling the consequences. I wish I could speak English fluently, so as to be understood by all my English-speaking colleagues in this House. But not only am I deprived of that advantage, but I must confess that I am unable to treat my subject in French in the same felicitous way as my hon. friend who spoke before me has dealt with it.

I do not think I am called upon to refute the arguments adduced by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, or to follow the hon. member for Montreal (Mr. Desmarais) through the lengthy dissertation which we have all listened to with such pleasure. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier told us that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Desmarais) had devoted three hours to read extracts from newspapers without proving anything. Now, I appeal to the hon. gentlemen who have heard that speech, whether the hon. member for St. James Division did not, throughout his brilliant dissertation use most cogent argument, and whether he has not drawn from his propositions most logical conclusions. He has substantiated all the charges brought by him against the hon. gentlemen opposite with whom the hon. member for Jacques Cartier sides. He has shown that the cry of disloyalty raised against the government and against the French Canadian Liberal party was altogether unjustifiable.

Since October last, the word loyalty has undergone many changes and has been the subject of many definitions more or less loyal, for as stated the other day by the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) 'loyalty is a cheap commodity.'

Owing to the attitude taken by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), and by the hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville (Mr. Monet), owing also to the statement made by the hon. member for the St. James Division (Mr. Desmarais), protesting in the name of the constitution which, they say is violated by the government participating in the wars of the empire with foreign nations, and by the appropriation of public moneys to that effect without the previous sanction of parliament, the reptile Tory press, for the five last months, has kept hurling insults at the whole French Canadian people of the Dominion, and against the French Liberals of the province of Quebec in particular.

And why so? Because they do not hold the same views on that question. In the course of this debate, we have heard regrettable utterances fall from the hon. gentlemen opposite, though not from the leader of the opposition himself. In the course of the four last months inflammatory articles have been scattered broadcast from one end of the Dominion to the other, in connection with this vexed question. It is all very well for the leader of the opposition to come down here and declare before parliament that no man living had throughout his whole public career set his face more determinedly than he had against anything that would cause race or religious rancour in this Canada of ours. In order to show how groundless that pretension is, it will suffice to refer to his famous Winnipeg speech, which was so well commented upon by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), in a speech that will go down to posterity, as a masterly refutation of the allegation made by the hon. leader of the opposition.

If it is impossible to find in the speeches of the hon. gentleman a single word, as he says, that can be construed into an appeal to race and creed prejudices, the same cannot be said of his followers and of his political organs. And, as we all know, under the constitution, the hon. gentleman is to be held responsible for the conduct of his partisans and of the press under his control.

What did we see, these five last months, Sir? Who was it that started that campaign of hatred and prejudices against the French Canadians and the Catholics of the province of Quebec? Was it the English or the French Liberal press in the Dominion? No, Sir, it was the Tory press of Ontario. Allow me to quote a few extracts which will open the eyes of our fellow countrymen of the province of Quebec. Let us hear what Mr. Mark Roberts, the president of an Orange lodge in the county of Middlesex, said in a speech recently delivered, about French domination in Canada.

From several points of view, we have reason to be ashamed of our federal government at
Mr. ETHIER.

Ottawa, led as it is, by a French papist and controlled by another papist by name Tarte, both, I am sure, being rebels at heart. However, the presence at Ottawa of Mr. Clarke Wallace brings us some relief. We feel more secure when we know that so vigilant a sentinel is on guard.

Did the hon. leader of the opposition ever condemn that slanderous statement? No, Sir, he did not. Well, then, let him shoulder the responsibility for it.

But in order to form a right estimate of the party led by the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) something more is required than the solitary utterances of the president of an Orange lodge. Let us then hear what the Mail and Empire has to say, and I invite the hon. gentlemen opposite to register here their protest against the stand taken by that journal, on the question under consideration.

Much has been said lately about the attitude of Quebec. Quebec, like Ireland, has two distinct peoples; in Quebec, as in Ireland, the educated and intelligent people are loyal and British to the core, while in both places the ignorant sections, under the control of the priests, are malcontents and enemies of the empire.

It is by such slanders that newspapers stir up ill-feeling among the various elements of our population, and the hon. leader of the opposition may claim a large share of responsibility if he permits to go unanswered such vile slanders as those published by his organ, the Mail and Empire. Let those slanderers substantiate their statements, if they can.

In that article, reference is made to the stand taken by the clergy of the province of Quebec, but not a word is said about the attitude of some Anglican and Presbyterian ministers, and of all those fanatical Tories who, from their pulpits, throw insult to the face of their Catholic fellow-countrymen, without even taking the trouble of looking for information about them. Those are the allies of the Conservative party in the province of Quebec. Do you require further evidence? I have some at hand; the Rev. L. B. Lanceley, in a speech delivered at Kingston, spoke as follows:

Sir Charles Tupper and Sir Wilfrid Laurier have given evidence of their loyalty to the country and to the empire; but, as to Israel Tarte, I think it is high time to bring him to his senses, and that, first, because of his ill-treatment of the Anticosti Protestant settlers.

I think parliament and the country have shown that they were satisfied with the explanations given by the hon. Minister of Public Works and with the action taken in connection therewith.

Secondly, because of the speech recently delivered by him at a banquet, when he cried out that he was French first and British next. Thirdly, on account of his refusal to allow the British flag to be hoisted on the public buildings at Ottawa at the time of the departure of the volunteers. These acts and those speeches are, to my mind, unworthy of a Crown minister, and warrant the people of Canada in asking for his resignation.

The statement in connection with the hoisting of the flag on the public buildings is a pure invention, as formally shown by the hon. Minister of Public Works.

I have given but a few samples of the statements which appear in the columns of Tory newspapers, and then they dare come and tell us by way of apology, that they disclaim any intention of raising race and creed prejudices in the country! But, Sir, those people, as a matter of fact, make it their business to sow strife and dissension: that is their only stock in trade.

There is another reverend minister, Mr. Steacy, who declared at an Orange meeting in this city that Mr. Tarte, the hon. Minister of Public Works, should be burnt in effigy. Did that appeal find an echo in the hearts of the people of a certain city in Ontario, known as ultra-loyalists? That is more than I can say. At all events, the jingoes did not fail to burn in effigy one of the Crown ministers. That is the way the Tories understand loyalty, I suppose.

The Toronto Evening News is a Tory organ, which certainly does not sympathize with the French Canadians or with Catholics. Will any hon. gentleman pretend to say that the News never appeals to race and creed prejudices and that the leader of the opposition has nothing to do with that paper?

The following article, taken from its issue of October 30, 1899, shows how far a Tory organ can go in that direction:—

We can tell Honourable Mr. Tarte and his French compatriots that the people of this province are thinking hard just now. They are opening their eyes to the true character of their French neighbours, and they are forming convictions that will have their fruition sooner or later in depriving the French Canadians of the special privileges that were granted to them by the Treaty of Paris.

Unless the British Canadians of this province are cravens, they will not tolerate a condition of subjection to the French Canadians, and if through the ballot boxes there is no redress, they will find other means of emancipating themselves from the dominance of an inferior people that peculiar circumstances have placed in authority in the Dominion.

That is quite an insignificant warning in itself, but, all the same, it throws some light on certain facts which should claim our attention. The News is the mouthpiece of the Tory party, which controlled the affairs of the country, for 18 years, from confederation. To-day there are two million French Canadians, out of a population of five millions.

Now, the warning of the News amounts to say this to the two million French Canadians: 'Beware! If you dare to claim the rights and privileges guaranteed by the constitution, we, people of the News, the organ of the leader of the opposition, will bring you to your senses!'

There they are, those jingoes of Ontario, who, in their candour, cry out: 'If we cannot succeed, through the ballot and the law in turning the government out, we will rise up in arms against it.' And, it would not be the first time, as remarked by the hon. member for St. James Division (Mr. Desmarais). After having rotten-egged Lord Elgin in 1848, I should not be surprised if, in order to gratify their anger, after being defeated at the polls, they drove out of the vice-regal residence the representative of Her Majesty!

After the Mail and Empire and the News, let us hear what the Toronto Evening News said in its issue of the 18th October last.

I am sorry that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) has just left his seat, and that he did not hear this article read. I may tell my hon. friends opposite that no other paper, either French or English, that I know of, has been more aggressive than the Toronto Evening News. Among all the papers in the province of Quebec, La Patrie is the only one which has succeeded in rousing the ire of the Tories; but La Patrie, throughout that crusade against the French always opposed that campaign and never took the offensive. Here is the article that appeared in the Toronto Evening News of the 18th October. The article was contributed by a correspondent who signed W. A. H.:

I have read, with much interest, your editorials on the feelings expressed by the French Canadians against the sending of troops to serve in South Africa. Would you allow me to ask you whether it was not high time to teach those people a lesson? If they are able to command in Quebec, they have not yet the control of Canada.

Yes, Sir, so long as French blood will flow in our veins, we shall command in Quebec, while remaining loyal to the British Crown. I hear the sardonic laugh of the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Marcotte). If the hon. gentleman wishes to speak, I shall sit down and wait until he has delivered himself of his well-rounded periods.

Mr. F. A. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) I should not, for all the world, lose a single word of the interesting speech of my hon. friend.

Mr. J. A. C. ETHIER. (Translation.) I thank the hon. gentleman for his compliment.

Mr. N. F. DAVIN. (Translation.) Yes, yes. Hear, hear.

Mr. J. A. C. ETHIER. (Translation.) I think I hear the clarion voice of the bard of Reigna. If the illustrious Béranger of the west would only keep silent, he might perhaps hear something new.

I have had the bad luck of living and doing business in their midst for five or six years past. I may say, without any exaggeration, that, with a very few exceptions, they are as loyal to Great Britain and the empire as the Boers themselves are at present. That is to say, if they were to-day the Boers and we were the Uitlanders, we should receive at their hands—if we were stupid enough to put up with it—a much worse treatment than is actually given the Uitlanders in Africa.

A French Canadian is French, in all the acceptation of the word.

On holidays and at their large meetings they hoist no other flag than the French flag, and they sing only French songs.

Do not the English, the Irish, the Scots, on their holidays, hoist the flags which they hold dear? According to the Toronto Evening News, a French Canadian, on St. John the Baptist's day, should be denied the right to wear the maple leaf, which is dear to him as an emblem of his race.

And those holidays are none else than the feasts of the saints of France.

All the French Canadians are politicians. They have a great many political clubs, several of which are hot-beds of sedition and treason.

The French of Quebec are no friends of mine. They are no more honourable in politics than they are in business.

Therefore, it is high time to intimate to them, once for all, that we are Britishers, living in a British country.

Never more shall we allow a Frenchman to rule the country.

British institutions for Englishmen.

Let us intimate to the men who were taught such hard lessons at Trafalgar, Waterloo and on the Plains of Abraham, that we can give them a new lesson, if they think they have not got enough.

Let them remember that Britons shall never be slaves.

Here is another article published by the Toronto Evening News:

With characteristic hypocrisy, the 'Globe' charges those who have been objecting to French domination in the Dominion cabinet, with raising the religious cry. In the course of a two-column article yesterday, it connected the religion with the nationality of the French Canadian in every instance for the purpose of setting Roman Catholics against Protestants in this question.

The 'Globe' is the first newspaper to give a religious aspect to the matter.

No person in Ontario will object to the religion of the French Canadian. His religion is something between himself and his Maker, and he has as much right to worship at a Roman Catholic altar as the Protestant has to bow at a Protestant altar.

But we submit that a French Canadian has no right to preach the doctrine of French nationality while he is a subject of Her Majesty and finding a place in one of her colonies.

Objection to French domination is absolutely devoid of any religious feature. It is purely a question of nationality and language, and the 'Globe' is acting the part of a firebrand by interjecting the religious idea.

There is a spirit of tolerance throughout the province of Ontario that would destroy any public man or any journal—as they ought to be destroyed—if they attacked any portion of the community because of their religious views. But that spirit of toleration with the religion of the French Canadian is a very different thing to the feeling that exists with regard to the conduct of the French members of the government on the question of rendering substantial assistance to Britain in her present conflict.

The 'Globe' stands convicted of bringing into the matter, for party purposes, the religion of those who are opposing Ontario and Imperial interests on purely national grounds.

Pshaw! Let these gentlemen, the Tories, speak English as much as they please, but, as for us, in the province of Quebec, we shall continue to claim our right of speaking French, not only in our province, but throughout the Dominion.

In its issue of the 16th October the Toronto Evening News published what follows:

Deep-rooted in the heart of French Canadians is the hope that at some future day Canada will become separated from the mother country, and that they must so govern themselves as to be in a position to profit by the anticipated disruption of the empire and erect a French state on the banks of the St. Lawrence.

True, the politicians of the lower province do not voice this fond desire very loudly when they think that the echo may reach the ears of real Canadians, but the yearning is all the stronger because policy causes it to smoulder.

Among themselves the representative habitants speak plainly.

The further away he is from the Ottawa River the more anti-British does the French Canadian become, forgetting that in these days of the telegraph and newspaper, which, despite his eighteenth century cast of thought, are known in his territory, his veriest whisper of treason to Canada is wafted across the continent.

The hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Marcotte) laughs; does he endorse those statements of the political organ of his leader?

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) I don't think there is any room for laughing.

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) Then, you had better cry.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) It is sad enough to make one cry.

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) I shall not undertake to read every article published by those fanatical papers against the French Canadians; but if the House will bear with me, I shall give here the statement made by one of the enemies of our race during the memorable campaign directed against the French, within the last few months. Here is what the Rev. Mr. Gorman said at Ottawa, in October last:

Those Frenchmen who control our country to-day, whose opinions are blazed abroad, are not our representatives. We repudiate them, and the sooner England knows it the better. The question of French Roman Catholic supremacy was settled once and for all time upon the Plains of Abraham, and let them never forget it.

Such are the feelings of those Protestant ministers who turn their pulpits into rostrums, thereby to promote the interests of politicians who want to seize the reins of power, after having been hurled from it by an indignant people.

Let us compare the attitude of those Protestant ministers with that adopted by the Catholic clergy throughout the province of Quebec, and it will easily be seen on which side are to be found moderation and fair play. I appeal to the hon. member for Champlain, whether he does not share in my views in that respect.

I think, Sir, I have shown beyond the shadow of a doubt the existence of a crusade throughout the country against everything that is French and Catholic, and that our opponents never miss an opportunity of insulting our loyalty.

I shall refrain from quoting any more articles, as my hon. friend (Mr. Desmarais) has made an exhaustive review of the newspapers; but let me mention to the hon. gentlemen opposite the Toronto News, the Hamilton Spectator, the Mail and Empire, the Star, the Winnipeg Telegram, the Toronto Telegram. All those newspapers state that the French Canadian Liberals, are disloyal to the British Crown. Let me put to the hon. gentlemen opposite who accuse us of being disloyal, a question: would they dare to qualify as disloyal the 113 members of the House of Commons in England who, at the last session, voted against a proposition asking parliament to authorize the government to declare war against the Transvaal? Would they dare to accuse of disloyalty all those who voted against the Salisbury government? No, sir, they dare not do so; that is a kind of accusation they resort to only against the French Canadians. This double-dealing is nothing new for the hon. gentlemen; we have already heard of it, about the Manitoba school question. In 1896, they had one voice for Winnipeg and another voice for the province of Quebec; they had one programme for the province of Ontario, another programme for the maritime provinces, and still a third one for Quebec.

Are the hon. gentlemen ready to qualify as disloyal Sir Edward Clarke? Are they ready to accuse of disloyalty Mr. Stead and Mr. Morley, mentioned here, this afternoon, by my hon. friend who has just taken his seat? Would they dare to apply that qualification to Michael Davitt, who, at the last session, resigned his seat, like the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), because he did not approve of the Transvaal war? No, Sir, they would not do it; as I said, they resort to that kind of accusation only against the French Canadians.

Are they disloyal, those papers like the Daily Sentinel, the Woodstock Review, which say that Canada has nothing to do with the Transvaal war?

Is the Tory party ready to apply that qualification to Canon Scott Holland, who, in the course of a sermon which he preached in St. Paul's Cathedral, in London, in November last, compared England to Nebuchadnezzar who, through his immense pride, lost his reason.

Are the hon. gentlemen opposite ready to brand as disloyal, pastor Kennedy, of the diocese of Carlisle, who refused to offer the prayers ordered by his bishop for the triumph of British arms, saying that the war England was waging against the Transvaal was Chamberlain's and Cecil Rhodes's war?

An hon. MEMBER. (Translation.) Who is Cecil Rhodes?

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) You know him better than I do. No, Sir, they dare not do it; for all those people are Tories; therefore they are loyalists. Are they disloyal, those French Tories, like the Hon. Mr. Nantel, formerly a minister in the provincial cabinet, and the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Chauvin), who declared in their speeches and their writings that one could be loyal, without being an imperialist? No, Sir, but here again, I say, they have a double policy, one for Quebec and another for Ontario; and by such double-dealing, they they hope to snatch power from the hands of their opponents.

Sir, I have taken the liberty of quoting a few articles which the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Marcotte) might read with profit to himself, instead of laughing at my remarks, as he had done from the beginning. For his own information, let me read a few extracts from editorials published by his organ, Le Trifluvien. Let us hear what the Conservative organ of the city of Three Rivers has to say on the matter:

If, in order to be a Conservative, one must endorse the policy of sending a contingent to South Africa and look upon this policy as a precedent; if, again, in order to be a Conservative, one must approve the position taken by Lord Minto, well—we are not Conservatives.

The hon. member for Champlain, I presume, shares in those views. I may notice here, in passing, that the Trifluvien is more civil than the organ of the hon. member for Beauharnois towards the representative of Her Majesty, and that the editor calls His Lordship not Minto, but Lord Minto.

We do not want Canada to take part in the wars of the empire, except for the defence of our own country. We are still more strongly opposed to Canada participating in unjust wars, like the present war.

We want no imperialism here, because it would nullify the constitution of 1867, which we French Canadians have accepted of our own free will. We are opposed to imperialism, because, for us, French Canadians, it involves the ruin of our fair share of influence in this country, which were opened to civilization by our fathers.

We deprecate any departure from the constitution in behalf of imperialism. We do not want for Governor General a man who arbitrarily sets himself above his advisers and controls their policy. We do not want for a Governor a man who assumes the responsibility of undertaking, in the name of a fictitious right, what the Queen herself could not do in England.

Again, we say that if it is necessary, in order to be a Conservative, to endorse such departure from our settled policy, and such encroachments upon our rights and privileges, we declare that we are no longer Conservative.

I would like to know what the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Marcotte) and what the hon. member for Three Rivers and St. Maurice (Sir Adolphe Caron) think of that editorial? The hon. gentlemen, no doubt, will avail themselves of the opportunity for denouncing such an article. If they endorse it, they can no longer remain in the ranks of the Conservative party. If they disapprove of it and disclaim any responsibility for the same, they will not fail, I suppose, to say so.

My hon. friend from Montreal (Mr. Desmarais) has quoted from Le Monde Canadien, the organ of the Hon. Mr. Nantel, but he has not, as you see, exhausted the subject. Mr. Nantel did not scruple to oppose Imperialism, the policy of his leader, in the various editorials which he has published in his paper, and for the information of the Tory party I shall read a few more extracts from that paper.

In its issue of October 18, Le Monde Canadien, referring to the course pursued by his leader in the different provinces, says :

On the other hand, Sir Charles Tupper, who has been in power for over twenty years, and who has never spent a cent nor sent a single soldier to assist the mother country, has just come back from England full of martial spirit.

Is Mr. Nantel to be accused of disloyalty for stating openly his views, which are at variance with those of his leader and his party? It is rank disloyalty; it is sheer treason in the opinion of the hon. gentlemen opposite.

The eloquence of Mr. Chamberlain, the arguments of the great financiers of London have satisfied him of the necessity for Canada taking an active part in all the wars of the empire; he is now stumping the country in every direction—he is now in the North-west, no doubt trying to convert the Doukhobors.

What is Mr. Nantel going to think of the statements made on the floor of the House by the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain), by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Clarke Wallace)? What he is going to think of the statements made in Toronto by the hon. member for Beauharnois, that if Great Britain wished to have 5,000 men, she could have them, that Canada was ready to send them to her help? What is Mr. Nantel going to think of the utterances of General Dalby, of the Star? Are those gentlemen going to recruit soldiers in Manitoba?

Mr. ETHIER.

The writer goes on :

Let us add that those patriots do not scruple to say that the school question is dead and buried. It is apparently with such bait that the Conservative party is going to return to power.

He is shocked beyond measure at the very idea that the government did not defray the whole expenditure of the contingents; and he denounces their action as a crime. We have seen him in our province, accompanied by several French Canadians, more or less conscious of their acts, who pitied the sad condition of the Uitlanders, who were forced to pay a royalty of from two to two and a half per cent on their mining output, while our fellow-countrymen in the Yukon pay ten per cent. They pitied, I say, those poor Uitlanders, being forced to contribute to the support of the Dutch schools in the Transvaal, while, in our own country, the French-speaking Catholics of Winnipeg are being taxed for the support of English Protestant schools; they pitied again the Uitlanders, who were denied representation in proportion to the taxes paid by them, while Hugh John Macdonald is framing a Bill to deprive of their franchise all those who cannot read the Manitoba Act in English.

As will be seen, the Conservative leader of the province of Manitoba is given here a good slap in the face. Let the hon. gentlemen who understand French realize the full purport of Mr. Nantel's article. As to the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney) who is now listening to my remarks, I invite him to read the translation of the article I have just given to the House.

I am sorry that the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) and the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) did not hear that article read; for, they would have been edified as to the opinion Mr. Nantel entertains of their capacity and merits, seeing he describes them as being more or less conscious of their acts.

It is the Hon. Mr. Nantel who thus lectures his party.

Let us proceed with our review of those who, in the eyes of the Tory party, are disloyal. Let us take, for instance, the opinion of the Rev. Mr. Grant. According to those good Tories, that gentleman should be branded as a traitor and a disloyal man, if we may judge from his remarks concerning the position taken by the Hon. Mr. Tarte, Minister of Public Works, when the order in council in connection with the sending of the contingent to South Africa was passed.

As the hon. gentlemen are aware, the hon. Minister of Public Works with his wonted energy insisted on a rider being added to the order in council, namely, that this should not be drawn into a precedent. What does Principal Grant say, among other things?

Mr. Tarte will no doubt agree that this is a case of an exceptional character. It seems to me he admits it, because what he asked was that the action taken by the government should not create a precedent. That point having been granted, he has thus obtained all that was essential and I think that all those who take an interest in the parliamentary system ought to be grateful to him for it.

Had the Minister of Public Works anticipated what the future might have in store for us, because of the position taken by the government in connection with that disastrous war? To prove it, I would have to quote the editorial that appeared in La Presse, in its issue of the 14th October last, which was read, this afternoon, by the hon. member for St. James Division, Montreal, (Mr. Desmarais) and which is credited to Mr. Dansereau, the 'alter ego' of the old Conservative ministers.

The French Canadians, Sir, are as loyal as the hon. member for West York (Mr. Clarke Wallace), or the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney), and the French Liberals are as loyal as the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) and the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Casgrain). I have noticed, Sir, during this debate, that our English fellow-countrymen do not know the French Canadians as they should know them, and I take note of the words of the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney), who, in his reply to the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) said this: 'I did not know much of the history of French Canada.' Here is an admission. Let him then read it, that history of French Canada, from the treaty of Paris down to our own times and he will find at each page the sanction of the rights and privileges of the French race, on this American continent.

The hon. member for St. James Division, Montreal (Mr. Desmarais), when referring to the loyalty of the French Canadians, made a brief review of what the French Canadians have done for the British Crown, since the cession of Canada, after the battle on the Plains of Abraham. Let all fanatics, represented by the Orange lodge of the Middlesex County, I referred to a little while ago, answer this question: in 1775, on what side were the loyalists to be found and on what side the traitors?

In those eventful times, when they had just passed under British rule, the French Canadians enlisted in the British army, in order to repel the attack of two American generals, Arnold and Montgomery. Never did the French Canadians prove false to their new allegiance and nobody has a right to tax them of disloyalty.

In 1775, on which side were the traitors? Who were they who enlisted under the British flag, to repel Arnold and Montgomery? Why, Sir, they were French Canadians from Lower Canada, and yet, at that time, they had not received at the hands of the British government such treatment as was guaranteed by the treaty of Paris. What promises, what offers were made to them? Let me quote here from the proclamation addressed in 1775 to the French Canadians by General Washington. I shall give that extract at full length, because it is a page of our history which it is desirable the Tories should know, so as to be satisfied of the loyalty of the French Canadians under those circumstances.

Above all we rejoice that our enemies have been deceived with regard to you. They have persuaded themselves, they have even dared to say, that the Canadians were not capable of distinguishing between the blessings of liberty and the wretchedness of slavery; that gratifying the vanity of a little circle of nobility would blind the people of Canada. By such artifices they hoped to bend you to their views. We look forward with pleasure to that day, not far remote, when the inhabitants of America shall have one sentiment and the full enjoyment of the blessings of a free government.

Incited by these motives and encouraged by the advice of many friends of liberty among you, the grand American Congress have sent an army into your province, under the command of General Schuyler not to plunder but to protect you; to animate and bring into action those sentiments of freedom you have disclosed, and which the tools of despotism would extinguish through the whole creation. To co-operate with this design and to frustrate those cruel and perfidious schemes, which would deluge our frontiers with the blood of women and children. I have detached Colonel Arnold into your country, with a part of the army under my command. I have enjoined it upon him, and I am certain that he will consider himself, and act as in the country of his patrons and best friends. Necessaries and accommodation of every kind, which you may furnish, he will thankfully receive and render the full value. I invite you therefore as friends and brethren, to provide him such supplies as your country affords; and I pledge myself, not only for your safety and security, but for an ample compensation. Let no man desert his habitation; let no one flee as before an enemy. The cause of America and of liberty, is the cause of every virtuous American citizen; whatever may be his religion or descent, the United Colonies know no distinction but such as slavery, corruption and arbitrary dominion may create. Come then, ye generous citizens, range yourselves under the standard of general liberty against which all the force and artifices of tyranny will never be able to prevail.

Such were, Sir, the generous offers made to the French Canadians, who had just passed under British rule, and who, after fourteen years of suffering, had certainly a right to claim the benefit of the guarantees secured to them by the Treaty of Paris. What did they do, those men who are now charged with disloyalty? Did they accept the offers made to them? No; they remained faithful to the British Crown at a moment when, by becoming transfuges and passing over to the enemy, they might have annihilated British power on the American continent.

Not satisfied with having tempted the French Canadians by means of alluring promises, the Americans resorted to still more powerful means, when appealing to feelings which were still very deep-rooted in the hearts of our ancestors. In 1778, Count D'Estaing crossed over from France to America, along with M. LaFayette, in order to help the cause of the independence of the United States. He issued a proclamation which must have deeply touched the heart of the French Canadians, thereby placing in still greater peril their allegiance to the British flag. I shall give here that proclamation, so that it may be on record in Hansard for the information of those who tax us with disloyalty to the mother country :

I need not ask the companions in arms of the Marquis of Lévis, the men who have shared in his glory, who have admired his genius, his military tact, who have loved him for his cordialness and his sincerity,—the distinguishing features of our nobility—if there are any other names, among other peoples, by the side of which they would prefer to have their own names appear.

Count D'Estaing, in those lines, touched the sensitive spot, as, being himself a Frenchman, he could appeal to the racial feeling when writing the Canadians to shake off the British yoke and renounce their allegiance to the British Crown, in order, later on, to draw them into the neighbouring republic. As will be seen by what I have just read, the Canadians proved very loyal, when declining to listen to a man who was appealing in such terms to a feeling so deeply rooted in their hearts.

Could the Canadians, who saw the brave Marquis de Montcalm fall for their defence, become the enemies of his descendants, fight against their old leaders, and take up arms against their relatives? The mere mention of these names would disarm them! I need not bring to the attention of the clergy that, for the success of their evangelical work, they will require a special protection of divine Providence, so that example may not impair faith nor temporal interests control everything else; and in order that the good treatment accorded them by their new sovereigns may not grow weaker, in proportion as their masters will have less to fear; that it is necessary for religion, that those who preach it should form a body in the State, and that no body of men would enjoy more consideration and respect and more power for doing good than that of the priests of Canada, taking part in the government of the country, because their honourable conduct has entitled them to public confidence. I need not remind the people of Canada, and all my fellow-countrymen in general, that a vast monarchy having the same religion, the same manners, the same language, and where are found relatives, old friends and brothers, is an inexhaustible source of trade and of wealth more easily acquired through a reunion with powerful neighbours, offering more security than by joining with foreigners of another hemisphere where everything is dissimilar and who, sooner or later, turning jealous and despotic sovereigns, will treat them as a conquered people and worse, no doubt, than their former fellow-countrymen did who had caused them to be defeated. I need not remind a whole people—for, a whole people, when they acquire the right of thinking and of acting, know their interests—that, to be allied to the

Mr. ETHIER.

United States, would secure their happiness; but I shall declare, as, in fact I formally declare in the name of His Majesty Louis the XVIth, who has authorized me to do so, that all his old subjects in North America who will no longer recognize the supremacy of Great Britain, may rely upon his help and protection.

Thus it was that American citizens of British descent and disloyal to the British Crown, tried to allure the French Canadians, who were loyal to the new régime they had accepted. Those were the promises made to them. Did they hearken to the voice of the tempter? No, Sir; they defended, against Arnold and Schuyler, the British patrimony on American soil.

Now, could the loyalty of the French Canadians in 1812 be called in question? History does not revoke in doubt the bravery and the devotion of three hundred French Canadians who, under the command of DeSalaberry, defeated seven thousand Americans, formerly British subjects.

In 1866, as in 1870, at the time of the Fenian raid, did not the French Canadians, just like Canadians of British descent, declare themselves ready to take up arms for the defence of the British territory?

And, to-day, who are they who leave relatives, friends and country to go and fight for the honour of the British flag on African soil? We see French Canadians, like Pelletier, Fiset, Larue and many others, who perhaps at this hour have sealed with their blood that loyalty which narrow-minded and fanatical people now deny us even on the floor of parliament.

Let it be known, once for all, that the French Canadians are loyal. We are loyal to the British Crown, but we also pretend to have the enjoyment of the rights and privileges secured to us as British subjects.

Now, to come back to the merit of the question. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) told us that the hon. member for St. James Division, Montreal (Mr. Desmarais) had taken up the time of the House in reading extracts from newspapers, without coming to any conclusion. Although I consider that my hon. friend is free from reproach in that respect, as I do not wish to incur the same censure, I shall clearly define the position I mean to take upon the resolutions now under consideration.

At the risk of being qualified as disloyal, I hesitate not to say that the British North America Act contains no provision warranting Canada to take part in the wars of the empire, or giving the government power to dispose of public moneys without the consent of parliament, except in case of urgency, and that case is provided for by the Audit Act. I do not think the government had power to contribute to the expenses of the present war. In my opinion, there was no more reason to take part in the war now waged in South Africa, than there was to participate in the thirty-two wars which Great Britain has been engaged in during the reign of Queen Victoria.

The government of the day, who always had my support, thought it their duty to take part in the war waged by Great Britain against the Transvaal Republic, by sending two Canadian contingents, under the order in council, in date of October 14 last, and that as a token of gratitude towards the mother country.

The order in council also provides that the action taken by the government cannot be construed as a precedent for future action. It is also stated therein that the government will only pay for the arming, the equipment and the transportation of the volunteers, the pay of the men and the other expenses being provided for by the Imperial government.

I agree with the hon. member for St. James Division, Montreal (Mr. Desmarais) that if I was satisfied that the action taken by the government was a first step towards Imperial federation, I should be the first to protest against such a dangerous policy. I am free to say here, however, that judging from the experience of the past, I am not alarmed at all about the future as regards this question. The order in council provides as follows:—

The Prime Minister, in view of the well known desire of a great many Canadians who are ready to take service under such conditions, is of opinion that the moderate expenditure which would thus be involved for the equipment and transportation of such volunteers, may readily be undertaken by the government of Canada without summoning parliament, especially as such an expenditure, under such circumstances cannot be regarded as a departure from the well known principles of constitutional government and colonial practice, nor construed as a precedent for future action.

The Prime Minister during the debate on the address repeated that pledge and reaffirmed the principle laid down in the order in council of October 14 :

But, I will go further, and I will say that not only from the British constitutional point of view it is not to be construed as a precedent, but that even from the colonial point of view it is not to be construed as a precedent. If the result of our action were to be, that in any war of Great Britain, we were to be constrained to take a part, as upon this precedent, I would strongly object. What we have done we have done, as I said at Sherbrooke, in the plenitude, in the majesty of our colonial, legislative independence. I claim for Canada this, that, in future, Canada shall be at liberty to act or not act, to interfere or not interfere, to do just as she pleases, and that she shall reserve to herself the right to judge whether or not there is cause for her to act. In the words of Rudyard Kipling, I repeat :

Daughter am I in my mother's house,
But mistress in my own ;
The gates are mine to open,
The gates are mine to close.

As I said, opposed as I am, on principle, to any such Imperialist move as that involved in the sending of the Canadian contingent to South Africa, and although I deprecate any participation by Canada in the wars of the empire, yet I place the utmost reliance upon the pledge given by the Prime Minister, and, I hope, the order in council will not be a dead letter in the future.

Having to choose between the policy of the government of the day and that propounded by the hon. leader of the opposition, and which he would undoubtedly carry out were he to seize the reins of power again, I do not hesitate to give the preference to the policy now under consideration, and let me tell you why: if, on the one hand, the present government went too far in that direction, it is clear, on the other hand, from the statements of the hon. leader of the opposition, so full of jingoism, that he would go much farther and that he would give us a military government. Let us choose the least of the two evils.

From the very beginning of this debate, I expected the hon. leader of the opposition would propose his Woodbridge resolutions. But I was doomed to disappointment; for the hon. gentleman, far from playing the braggard, told us, in the course of a very tame speech, that he simply blamed the government for their hesitancy in the sending of the first contingent, and for not doing more than they had done.

Since when has the hon. leader of the opposition become an Imperialist? Here, again, I find the same double-dealing. As the member for St. James Division (Mr. Desmarais) very properly remarked this afternoon, the leader of the opposition is an Imperialist in Ontario and a jingo in the province of Quebec. Has he turned his back on his past record to such a point that he no longer remembers what he said in 1866, in the course of his controversy with Joseph Howe. Here is what he said :

It is a monstrous absurdity to want Canada to participate in the wars of the empire in every quarter of the globe, and Canadians can be held to nothing more than the defence of the portion of the empire they inhabit.

The hon. gentleman had not yet become an Imperialist at that time. He was then working in favour of the scheme of confederation, and was seconded by such distinguished men as John A. Macdonald and George Etienne Cartier. Let us hear the statement made by Sir G. E. Cartier on April 20, 1866, at the Fishmongers' banquet in London, where he was then as a delegate of the Canadian parliament :

We desire the adoption of that scheme, in order not only to increase our prosperity and our strength, but also in order the better to be able to participate in the defence of the British Empire. We understand very well that in case of invasion, we could not resist the enemy without the assistance of the British armies ; but with the union of all the provinces, we promise to take part in the defence of our country to the best of our ability. Therefore when we speak of a confederation of the British North American colonies, we do not mean to speak of a system calculated to loosen the ties which bind those colonies to the mother country, but a system calculated to develop, for the advantage of all, the trade of British America.

As you see, there is no mention made here of a military system for the unification of Canada and Great Britain.

I still hear the sardonic laugh of the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Marcotte).

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) I may tell the hon. gentleman that I shall laugh whenever there will be cause for it.

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) I suppose the hon. gentleman is liable to such fits of laughter.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) Yes, when I hear funny things said.

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) On March 31, 1868, speaking during the debate on the Militia Bill, Mr. J. S. Macdonald made a statement, which I am going to give to the House. As will easily be seen, he had not the least intention of having Canada participate in the wars of the empire. Referring to the Militia Bill of 1862, which had brought about the defeat of his cabinet, he said :

The failure of the Bill of 1862 clearly showed that any coercive Militia Bill is repugnant to the people of Canada. I think that, in the absence of danger, the present measure or any other measure which might be brought down, will remain a dead letter for the great majority of our militiamen.

But let a danger arise, and then all Canadians will fly to arms, for the defence of their homes and their country.

Now, what is the argument brought forward in order to justify the position taken by the Conservative leaders on this question? They now pretend that the framers of the constitution had in view the creation of a military system enabling us to participate in the wars of the empire. Let us hear what Mr. Nantel has to say in this respect. After referring to the enactments of the constitution of 1867, and opposing them to the statements of the hon. leader of the opposition and of his followers in the province of Quebec, he says :

We perfectly realize the import of the statement we make, and that it will be evoked against us by some men whose judgment is blinded by their hostility ; but we should really be ashamed of ourselves, were we to refrain voicing here the feeling of a mass of our fellow-countrymen, who, when accepting the constitution of 1867, and when acquiescing in it with all the strength of their patriotism, never suspected they were going to be engulfed in an Imperialism where they could not make their voice heard, while they know that under the present régime, they may have their say in the creation, the maintenance and the government of the country.

That is, Sir, what I had to say on this vexed question which is now agitating the minds of the people.

The order in council enacts that the policy of sending the Canadian contingents is not to be construed as a precedent and that the government is to pay for the arming, equipment and transportation of those contingents to South Africa. The right hon. Prime Minister has stated, in his speech, during the debate on the address, that if the result of the government action were to be, that in any war of Great Britain, we were to be constrained to take a part, as upon this precedent, he would strongly object, and that, in the future, Canada shall be at liberty to act or not to act, to interfere or not to interfere, to do just as she pleases.

I place the utmost reliance upon the statement of the Prime Minister, irrespective of any party ties or bias.

I take no stock in the ultra-loyalist statements of the hon. gentlemen opposite, nor in the janus-faced policy they are propounding to the country in that respect.

A British subject, I am ready to endorse the government's policy in that respect, provided it be not drawn into a precedent.

The Canadian militia was organized and has been maintained so far with a view to the defence of Canada, in case of invasion, and not to co-operate in the wars of Great Britain.

One word more as to the financial aspect of the question. We have to pay $2,000,000 to defray the expenditure in connection with the contingents sent to South Africa. Now, that sum of money might have been applied to the development of the country, to public works of great urgency, and our opponents will not fail to cast the thing in our teeth. But when I hear the hon. gentlemen opposite denouncing the government upon the hustings in the country because of the expenditure of millions of dollars for public improvements, while on the other hand, they say that we should send 5,000 men to South Africa to fight for Great Britain, and moreover that we should defray the whole expenditure in connection with that contingent, then it is, Sir, that we have good ground to doubt their sincerity. Have the hon. gentlemen even a faint idea of the enormous expenditure involved in such a proposition?

Let me confine myself, for the moment, to the additional pay of 25 cents a day for our soldiers by the resolutions now under consideration. If you take the 2,000 men we have sent to Africa, that gives $500 a day, or $15,000 a month, or $180,000 a year. As you see, that is a liberal expenditure.

The hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) was greatly scandalized last year, when the government brought down estimates for sixty million dollars; but, for the last few months, he has been stumping the country with the hon. leader of the opposition and the hon. member for West York (Mr. N. C. Wallace), telling the electorate that he was ready to send 5,000 men to Africa to assist Great Britain in her war with the Transvaal.

When it comes to throwing dust into the eyes of the people, and making jingoist speeches, the hon. gentlemen are quite bold. Audaces fortuna juvat. They might, however, be disappointed in that respect.

I hope, Sir, that Imperialism, which is threatening us, will be checked, and that steps will be taken to choke it in the embryo. In conclusion, let me express the hope that as the union of England, Scotland and Ireland has ever been fruitful in glory and power for the United Kingdom, so, from the union the people of this Dominion, irrespective of races and religious creeds, will spring a strong and mighty nation, a free and independent people, on this American continent.

Mr. F. A. MARCOTTE (Champlain). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to follow the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat, through the luxuriant path he has followed; nor do I wish to reply to his statements—I was almost going to say his challenge, so provoking were some of the remarks addressed by him to most straightforward men who belong to a nationality different from ours.

Newspapers, it is true, have been quoted here whose statements are to be regretted by us and by our English-speaking colleagues as well; but, on the other hand, some of our own newspapers have also published opinions that many of us would not like to endorse. The reason why some of those papers should not be judged quite as severely as others should, when they publish exaggerated statements, is that they have not had the advantage of being made sufficiently acquainted with the character of the races which they disparage. As to members of this House, it is altogether a different thing, and the hon. member for Two Mountains (Mr. Ethier), in his speech of to-night, has uttered words which, as a friend, and if he wishes to be more in keeping with prudence, I would advise him to expunge from Hansard.

Mr. J. A. C. ETHIER (Two Mountains). (Translation.) I am not in the habit of making corrections to my speeches.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) There is another piece of advice I would like to give the hon. gentleman. 'Forewarned, forearmed,' as the saying goes; and I think my hon. friend is entitled to this piece of advice:

Let him, in the future, avoid being so nervous, as one of my friends here suggests, especially from the beginning to the end of his speech.

Professors of eloquence—though I do not pretend to give myself as an example, for I am far from being a model on that point—tell us that, when speaking in public, one should now raise his voice, now lower it, but that in those parts of his speech which are most pathetic, he should raise the tone of his voice. To-day, my hon. friend has been pathetic all through his oration—I say pathetic, not to use the word 'pathos.'

As to the position of affairs, I think it is one full of responsibility for us. This delicate situation has been created by outside circumstances. I mean the deplorable war which has broken out between Great Britain and the Transvaal Republic.

As to the causes of the war, I need certainly not refer to them, as the subject has been so thoroughly threshed out on the floor of this House. I may say, however, that, in my opinion, the hon. gentlemen who have ventilated their views on the question—although there were great differences of opinion—have all spoken with sincerity and conviction.

As to the merits of the war, some were of opinion that England was engaged in a just war, while others held that it was an unjust war.

There is, however, one noticeable fact that has struck me and which, I think it proper to draw the attention of the House to. It is the freedom of speech and criticism with which the question has been debated on the floor of both Houses of the English parliament, a fact, Sir, that comes in singular contrast with the restrictions and reticence which we have had perforce to bring into debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS. (Translation.) Hear, hear.

Mr. F. A. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) In England, prominent political men, who fully realized their responsibilities, have been heard to say on the floor of parliament that the war between Great Britain and the Transvaal Republic was an unjust war. Now, since we enjoy here the same constitution and the same parliamentary privileges, I think we ought to be allowed to speak freely our minds and to ventilate our views in parliament, how divergent soever these views may be, on the important issue now under consideration. There is another noticeable fact that crops out of this debate: and it is this, that the question of French Canadian loyalty has been threshed out here and ventilated ad nauseam. I need not then refer to it at all, except to say this: that French Canadian loyalty needs no further evidence; that it has been fully proved and substantiated in the past, and that to the malignant strictures and reflections of a certain press, we can oppose, as a bulwark, the names of a host of fellow-countrymen of ours who have fallen on the battle-fields, for the maintenance of the British flag in this country. But, on the other hand, in a country like this, composed as it is of various races and creeds, peace and harmony can only be secured by maintaining in all its integrity the constitution which governs us. Whenever the constitution is infringed upon, and when the solemn treaties agreed to by our statesmen and sanctioned by the people are thrown to the winds, protestations cannot fail to make themselves heard, and friction or ill-feeling must necessarily arise, such as have already been experienced by certain elements in the country. Ill-feeling still exists in the country in connection with that vexed school question, the French Canadians being the only class of people who have been deprived and are still being deprived of the free exercise of their educational rights, and that, I regret to say, in defiance of a most solemn pact and most solemn pledges given them at the entrance of Manitoba into confederation. That ill-feeling still exists; from one end of the country to the other, a cry has arisen and is still being kept up that an injustice was perpetrated, that the law is being violated, and such a cry, such ill-feeling and friction, I say, cannot but be most detrimental to the country and to the union which ought to exist between free and independent men living under the same flag.

What did we see in the past, Sir? When our responsible ministers undertook to give important contracts without the consent and sanction of parliament, as in the case of the Yukon and the Drummond contracts. My hon. friends on this side of the House stood up on the floor of the House to vindicate the independence and the rights of parliament. We then said—and we say so again—that the prerogatives of parliament had been ignored; that popular representation had become an empty word, that the only business of parliament was for members to come down here and register the contracts passed and signed by the ministers. Now, we are exactly in the same position. The Chambers have not been consulted, before saddling the country with an expenditure of $2,000,000. Under the constitution and the pact in force at the entrance of the provinces into confederation we were never to be called upon to take part in the wars of the empire.

The question is, now: Whether are we drifting? Has parliament become a mere registering machine without any right to make its voice heard? Has the constitution been amended? Indeed, it looks very much like it, Sir. We no longer live here under a constitutional monarchy, where the people's representatives have a consultative voice in the giving of contracts, and in the most important matters. No, we have not a single word to say. What we have now is government by a few people; we have an oligarchy, the worst form of government; and as I said, our only business here now is to register the decrees of the cabinet. Under some pretense or other, the ministers know how to prevail upon their friends in this House to approve and ratify what they have done. Now, Sir, against such an infringement upon the rights of prerogatives of parliament, I enter here my protest, in the name of the constitution and on behalf of my electors. I ever was and I am still in favour of maintaining the constitution in its entirety.

But, Sir, under these perplexing circumstances, and in the delicate position we are in, what is to be done, when our poor soldiers fall on those distant battle-fields, for the defence of the British flag? We are British subjects and we are indebted to Great Britain for the protection she grants us, for the privileges we enjoy, for the right of making ourselves heard here in the French language; now, I ask, what is to be done, in face of this vote of $2,000,000, a large portion of which will go to the wife and children of the warriors who are fighting and spilling their blood for the empire under the burning sun of Africa? What is to be done, I repeat, when some tell us that the war is unjust, while others, like Cardinal Vaughan tells us that the war is just and when our clergy are offering up prayers for the success of British arms? What we have to do, Sir, is to uphold the constitution and to stick to the letter of the pact of 1867. Such is the dilemma in which we find ourselves placed. Under such circumstances, although I enter my protest, and fully understand the step taken towards Imperialism, a policy which I oppose, I say that I cannot decline voting these two million dollars, to our poor Canadian boys, who are falling, victims to their bravery and heroism on the battle-fields of Africa. Perhaps, at this moment, they are fighting and turning their looks towards Canada, towards their families and towards this parliament, where we are sitting under the protection of the British flag. How could we decline voting that money which will go to the support of the families of our soldiers, and towards the education of their sons? No, I do not think there is a man in this House and in the country who does not realize that, under the circumstances, we are all bound to vote in favour of the Fielding motion.

I believe that when I shall tell my constituents that, while entering my protest and insisting upon the maintenance of the constitution, I did vote in favour of the Fielding motion, they will approve of my vote.

Mr. FLINT moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT—OFFER TO GARRISON HALIFAX.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. McNEILL. Before the House adjourns, I wish to ask the right hon. First Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) whether he has received an answer from the Imperial government with regard to the offer to garrison Halifax?

The PRIME MINISTER. No.

ASH WEDNESDAY ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the House adjourns. I desire to ask a question: Is it the intention of the government to adjourn over Wednesday next?

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes, because it is a legal holiday. I will give notice accordingly.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, February 26, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

OFFICIAL DEBATES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. CHAMPAGNE moved:

That the first report of the Select Standing Committee appointed to supervise the official report of the debates of this House during the present session, be now concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT.

Mr. FLINT introduced Bill (No. 50) to amend the Canada Temperance Act. He said: Mr. Speaker, this Bill is almost a copy of the Bill introduced by me last session dealing with punishments for violations of the Act, and also dealing with the subject of search warrants. The details will be explained in committee. They are all purely technical, and it is the belief of those who favour the Bill, that it will make the Act more efficient.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

REPORT.

Report of the Department of Inland Revenue for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899.—(Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière.)

ADMINISTRATION OF THE YUKON TERRITORY.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to draw the attention of the House to a matter which we may consider to be of very grave importance, and to put myself in order, I propose to conclude with a motion. I should not have brought this subject up at the present moment had I not learned from the press that the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) is about to visit England, and that he is to leave to-morrow morning. I presume that statement is authentic. I saw it stated in the papers that he would leave to-morrow morning for Winnipeg. I wished very much that the hon. gentleman should be in the House when I dealt with the subject that I propose to draw to his attention, and I regret that I had not the opportunity of giving him longer notice than I have in regard to it now. I may say that it is the present position of matters in the Yukon, and as I consider that it has assumed a very grave and important character, I should fail in my duty if I did not place before the notice of the House some of the reasons which, I think, have led to the present disastrous condition of things, and of the prospects in that place and the means by which they may be improved. We have had, from a very high authority—I mean Mr. Ogilvie—the statement made, after years of careful examination and consideration of that country, that the prospect of the Canadian Yukon developing into an enormous gold-producing country was almost limitless and unbounded. We had that statement made after years of examination by a gentleman who was very well qualified to speak upon that subject, and, I believe, that the people of Canada accepted his report as one that was entitled to very great confidence and accepted his statements as likely to be realized. Now, I need not tell the House that I have differed in toto cœlo with the hon. Minister of the Interior as to the administration of that country and, as it is a matter of national importance, I want, before he leaves the House, as he has been giving the subject his attention, to draw the attention of the House to the grounds on which the Department of the Interior should reconsider its whole policy in reference to the administration of the Yukon. Perhaps I am not able to judge impartially, but if I wished to exploit the Yukon for my own purposes, if I were the Minister of the Interior, and for the purposes and in the interest of the party to which I belonged, I would have adopted exactly the policy the hon. Minister of the Interior adopted, and has pursued since he took charge of that department. I take exception altogether to the regulations in almost every particular. The first fatal mistake, in my judgment, was made in reference to the royalty, and I brought that to the attention of the hon. Minister of the Interior and of this House in the strongest and most emphatic manner. I protested against it from the first hour that this extraordinary and unheard of policy was adopted. I say unheard of; I do not believe that in this world such a policy was ever adopted before or since as the imposition of a charge of 10 per cent on the gross output. Of course, I know that some slight amelioration was made in reference to the amount subjected to royalty, and I believe, that the amount was increased to $5,000. But I say that it is a fact that in almost all gold mining countries in the world no such mining policy has ever been adopted and that the tendency everywhere has been entirely the reverse, and this very fact, I think, is sufficient reason why grave consideration should be given to this subject. The policy of the imposition of 10 per cent royalty on the output of gold in the Yukon was, in the first place, calculated to lead to smuggling. There is no material in the world in regard to which the inducement is so large and which is so easily smuggled as gold, because you can get in a very small compass a very large amount of value, and it is extremely difficult for parties to detect it. The fact that this unexampled royalty was imposed was, in the first place, calculated to injure the Canadian Yukon in every possible way, first, because there is no such royalty known or recognized in the adjoining territory of Alaska in the United States of America. In the second place, in British Columbia there is no such royalty recognized, and in Nova Scotia, where I believe the royalty has been higher than in any other part of the country, it is, I think, only 2½ per cent. This Yukon royalty is unexampled. It is a royalty calculated to lead to smuggling with the incidental result of minifying the amount of gold produced in that territory. If hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of gold are smuggled out, it greatly injures the character of the Canadian Yukon, because the country does not get credit for the product, and it is upon the volume of your gold product that you must hope to keep up the interest of the miners all over the world in that territory. So far as I am aware, capitalists everywhere regard this royalty as an act of extortion, and that is a very grave matter for the consideration of the government. While ten per cent royalty may be paid by persons who have been enabled to get bonanzas, in the shape of gold-bearing limits of enormous wealth and value, yet the fact remains that the prospectors—the men upon whom every gold mining region has to depend for its extension and development—must be discouraged by such a royalty. They would feel that it is in vain for them to spend all their means in exploring for a discovery, which if of only ordinary value, would be worthless to them, because the royalty would deprive them of any profit in it. After spending $20,000 or $30,000, it might turn out that the royalty would deprive them of any value whatever in their discovery, and consequently prospectors are debarred from undertaking the exploration. You have the great army of prospectors upon whose energy and activity the progress of the country depends, you have them discouraged; you have the country deprived of the full credit of its gold production, and you have a wet blanket thrown over the gold mining industries of the Yukon. Those who have taken the trouble to read Major Walsh's report, will find that after he had been for some time administrator of the Yukon, he put on record, in the strongest terms, his utter hostility to the ten per cent royalty. He has, in fact, pointed out that the officials acting under him, were absolutely obliged to ignore the law, in consequence of the severity of the royalty. And, Sir, one of the worst things that can happen in any country is, that the conditions and regulations and laws are such as to render it absolutely necessary that they should be violated. I do not intend to-day to speak as to the character of the Yukon officials appointed by this government, but I must say, that you must have men of the highest standing, character and integrity, men who have some character to lose, before you can hope, that in administering such a law, which presents such enormous temptation to fraud and bribery, they will administer it effectively and honestly. I may say, Sir, that this government, in their appointment of these officials, have not studied the interests of Canada, nor of the territory most intimately concerned. Mr. Ogilvie, who was a long time in that territory, and who has more knowledge of gold mining there than any other official, also stated clearly and emphatically, that he believed Canada would obtain a larger amount of revenue from a 3 per cent royalty, than from a 10 per cent royalty. Why is it, that after the evidence of Mr. Walsh and of Mr. Ogilvie, and of all others to whom the Minister of the Interior ought to look for advice; why is it, that their opinion has been ignored, and that a policy has been pursued which has led to the result I anticipated, viz.: That the population is being driven out of the richest gold country in the world, and that instead of our seeing year by year, the Yukon grow in population and wealth, we have the startling fact, that a population of 30,000 has been reduced to a little over 4,000 at the present moment, and that when the spring opens, it is expected that a much greater exodus will take place. A private company has spent a very large sum of money for the purpose of affording easier access to that country by the construction of the White Pass Railway. We all know that the difficulties of reaching the Yukon have been greatly lessened by the construction of that railway, and by the larger number of boats which are plying on the lakes, between the railway terminus and Dawson. In view of the fact that people are able to reach Dawson now, without a tenth part of the expense or personal inconvenience which they were forced to experience a short time ago, we might reasonably hope for a steadily increase of population, rather than a startling decrease. We have the fact apparent to every one, that the Yukon territory is, to say the least of it, at a standstill. I may further refer to the opinion of another gentleman, who is, I believe, recognized on both sides of the House, as a man of authority and intelligence. I speak of Mr. Coste, who was sent up there by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte). I find this reference to him made in a newspaper, a very warm supporter of this government, published in London, namely the Canadian Gazette. Under the heading of 'The Klondike,' that paper says:

Mr. Louis Coste, formerly chief engineer of the Public Works Department, who has lately returned from Dawson, has been visiting Ottawa and has conferred with Sir Wilfrid Laurier with reference to the Yukon royalty. Mr. Coste is said to be of opinion that the development of the Yukon country is being hindered by the enforcement of the 10 per cent royalty. The tax, he says, does not merely affect the output of gold, but has a far-reaching influence on every class of business in the country, and means an addition of 10 per cent to the cost of living and supplies of all kinds. In the early part of the year Dawson had a population of 16,000, but when Mr. Coste left there six weeks ago (this was published on December 7) the population had dropped to 4,800.

And we have from the Minister of the Interior himself the statement that that population is some 500 less, according to the last account he had received, than it was when Mr. Coste made that statement. I give that to the House as a reason why I think the government should most seriously consider this question of royalty. I know that it is preventing capital, especially from Great Britain, being sent into the country, because the mere mention of the 10 per cent royalty, so unlike anything found in any other country, has at once a completely deterrent effect, and parties will not invest their money in what is under ordinary circumstances business of the most speculative character, gold mining, when they find that after sending their prospectors in, the government wish to take all the profit that can be made by what would be a fairly successful undertaking under an ordinary and reasonable royalty, and leave absolutely nothing for those who are engaged. I can quite understand that a few parties who have got hold of bonanzas and eldorados will be perfectly satisfied with the 10 per cent royalty; but even in that case we have had the statement made to this House in the most authentic manner that the law was violated in regard to the payment of the royalty by the most successful of those engaged in gold mining in that country; and if the law has been violated by them, what must we expect? Mr. Walsh has told us that he found it absolutely impossible to carry on the law, and that great latitude and license was exercised by himself and the inspectors under him in administering it.

I will not detain the House any longer with that feature of the case; but I was surprised to hear the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), in answer to a question, say that he had not learned that the mining regulations were giving dissatisfaction, but that, on the contrary, as far as he was aware, they were giving great satisfaction. But, what did surprise me was a statement made by the hon. Solicitor General that the government had no information—I think he said official information—as to the necessity of appointing a judge. In order not to do the hon. gentleman any injustice, as he is not here, I will read what he said. He was asked the following question:

1. Has the government any information as to the condition of the docket of the court of Mr. Justice Dugas, in the Yukon district?

(a) If so, what was the condition when the vacation of two months was taken in June last?

(b) Is there difficulty of obtaining a hearing of civil cases in this district, owing to the congestion of court work? If so, how long has such a state of things existed?

(c) Was an additional judge not appointed since the provision therefor at the last session of parliament? If not, why not?

(d) Is it proposed to appoint another judge for this court?

There were some further questions on the same subject, which it is not necessary for me to repeat. The answer of the hon. Solicitor General was:

The answer to subsections (a) and (b) is: the government have no official information on the subject. The answer to subsection (c) is: an additional judge was not appointed. The answer to subsection (d) is: that the government has no official information on this subject. The answer to subsection (e) is the same. The answer to subsection (f) is: the government has no official advice that the population of Dawson City is decreasing rapidly.

It is a curious statement for the Solicitor General to make that the government have no information as to so important a matter as the administration of justice, in face of the fact that the Department of Justice came to this House last session, if I remember rightly, and got parliament to vote the money for an additional judge in that country. It is an abuse of the term, when we ask for information, for the government to shield themselves under the term official.

The PRIME MINISTER. What is the date?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am reading from page 619 of Hansard of this session; the date is February 19. It was on the same day that the Minister of the Interior, the colleague of the hon. Solicitor General, said that the last estimate which the government had of the population of Dawson City was 4,445. This estimate was made up about two months ago, and I do not hesitate to say that an estimate made up to-day would show a loss of the 445, and that as soon as spring opens there will be a loss of more than half of the remaining population. These facts, if anything could do it, should bring the government to the conclusion that it is absolutely necessary that this matter should not rest in the hands of a gentleman who has set his face like a flint against accepting any advice either from gentlemen on this side of the House or from the press or from his own officers or from anybody, and who is maintaining, for purposes which I cannot understand, this administration which is recognized everywhere as striking at the very foundation of our hopes and prospects in the Yukon. I may say that if the hon. Solicitor General has no information in reference to the very important matters referred to in the question, I have some:

In June last the court work was in a moderately fair shape, although the docket was showing signs of being overcrowded. Notwithstanding this a two months' vacation was taken, and when court opened in September there was a large list of civil cases which had been set down for trial. Besides this there were a number of criminal cases, and what with chamber motions and criminal cases, when the court adjourned at Christmas there had actually been only ten days occupied in civil trials. A good many of the cases on the list had been wiped off by the process of settlement as the only attainable end of a hopeless litigation—

Simply because people could not do that which every free man in the country has a right to do under the institutions of the country, have his claim tried in a court of law; and the government recognized this so fully that they themselves proposed to appoint one or more additional judges and took a vote for that purpose last session.

—but in spite of this the list has increased until there are now over one hundred cases already set down for trial, and if there was any prospect of a case ever being heard this number would be largely increased. It is an impossibility to collect an account, and litigants, merchants and lawyers are suffering accordingly.

Can you destroy a community, can you put a check on the business of any country more completely than by making it impossible to collect an account by process of law?

The judge has fixed the first twenty-five days of the month for sittings, reserving the last week for recess during which, in theory, he has to prepare judgment and be ready for the next sittings, but as a matter of fact, judgments are often a month in arrears.

Again, in the matter of Christmas vacation, the ordinance fixes it as running until January 4. The judge added on a week, and is now out of town on the creeks and will not return until the 10th.

This was written on the 6th January.

I do not wish you to take these remarks as being personally directed to the judge. He, however, is absolutely unsuited by training for conducting business under our Judicature Act. He does not understand the interlocutory motions or practice of any kind, and many other matters of importance. I put down his present apathetic attitude as being due to the hopelessness of ever being able to carry on the work before him. A year ago he advised the authorities—

I call the attention of my right hon. friend the First Minister to that, as it is a very grave statement.

—that another, and perhaps two more, judges were needed, and you will remember that the salary of a judge was placed in the Estimates, but no appointment has been made, and it is now almost too late, as the damage has been done and litigation ruined.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The ruination of litigation is not always particularly damaging to the public.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. When merchants and business men find that they are in a community where there is no law that can be put in force, owing to the want of judicial action, for the recovery of their debts and other rights, when they find that they cannot collect their debts, they will cease to do business, and I say therefore that the ruin of litigation in that sense means the forcing of business men to take their capital and their energies elsewhere and seek a place where they can have their just claims protected by a force of law.

The PRIME MINISTER. And litigation profitable.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And litigation profitable, says the hon. gentleman. That is a taint that attaches to the hon. gentleman's profession, but wherever business and enterprise flourish, litigation will always be found profitable, and the fact that even lawyers are to share in the general prosperity ought not to be a reason for depriving honest, enterprising, intelligent men of the means of enforcing their rights and of engaging in commercial undertakings under the protection given them by the law.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Did the hon. gentleman state who is the author of this information?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not, and I do not propose to do so.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not ask him to do so, if he has any objection, but merely put the question.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not propose to give my authority, I am stating things that must be either true or false, and it is the business of the government to know. The government took a vote of this House last session for the purpose of providing an additional judge, at the earnest entreaty of Judge Dugas, who said it was impossible for him to get through the business. The government had the salary voted, but for some reason not explained—whether it was because the hon. gentleman who is to get that position has not yet done sufficient missionary work in the country to entitle him to the appointment, I will not undertake to say—but from whatever course, that additional judge has not been appointed; and I say it is a scandal, when a judge in a position to offer an opinion advises the government that he is incapable of doing the legal business the country requires to be done, and when the government took from this House the power to appoint and pay another judge, they have not yet seen fit to appoint one, simply for the purpose of keeping a little longer in this House the gentlemen that they intend to appoint. Whether that or any other reason is the cause of their neglect to discharge this, which is one of the highest duties of the government, I say it is simply a scandal. My informant continues:

I understand that an assistant of the Gold Commissioner is coming in. This was a most urgent necessity a year ago, but now mining litigation is about over.

A year ago an assistant gold commissioner was required to do the business. Judge Senkler was overworked and unable, with all his energy and ability, to overtake the work, and an assistant gold commissioner was asked for. Such an assistant was not then appointed, and now there is no necessity for one, as the men who were carrying on gold mining have been driven out of the country, the gold mining population has dwindled down from 30,000 to under 5,000, and mining business is at a standstill, notwithstanding all the facilities furnished by the White Pass Railway and the various navigation companies operating in connection with it for bringing people into and out of that country; and notwithstanding the great facility furnished at great cost by the construction of a telegraph line into Dawson. Notwithstanding all these advantages, owing to the mismanagement of the government, owing to this 10 per cent royalty, owing to these regulations that are calculated to discourage enterprise, the development of that district has practically ceased. Where is there any country in the world that has adopted this policy of imposing a 10 per cent royalty? There may be some, but I am not aware of any in which the government steps in and says to the prospector, who, after having gone there with his own money, after encountering great toil and hardship, and after having left everything like comfort behind him, has succeeded in finding a good mine,—where is the country in the world in which the government declares that it will take the benefit of that man's labour by taking the adjoining location and locking it up and dealing with it in such a way as may be very satisfactory to its friends, but very ill-calculated to inspire confidence in the public. My informant further says:

They have abolished relocations and withdrawn all lands from exploration, so that the new assistant will have a sinecure. Nine months ago Senkler was nearly worked to death, and it was only his constitution which pulled him through.

The government were made aware of that, but they failed to provide the assistance required.

Postal matters this year are in a wonderfully good shape compared with last year, which only shows how easy it is to do the job if they try. As to mining matters, the whole country is withdrawn from prospecting by the action of the government in abolishing relocation, and by the new regulations the Minister of the Interior decides who will get a claim and how it will be disposed of.

I want to ask the government if they think that is calculated to induce people to take their capital into that country for the purpose of gold mining. Let a man have a claim as good as he likes, he has to go before the gold commissioner, and the final decision is left with the Minister of the Interior, so that all the regulations are of a character that will enable that hon. gentleman to deal with claims in a way which will best suit him and his friends.

The hydraulic regulations are an outrage. Under them the country will be parcelled out for the favourites of the minister. If you read the regulations you will find that the method of acquiring a lease is very poorly laid out.

What do you think of regulations that are of a character that will enable any minister—I care not who he may be—to parcel out among his favourites the valuable gold mining claims to be found in that country?

If you read the regulations, you will find that the method of acquiring a lease is very poorly laid out; and one might almost say intentionally so, as it is all left in the hands of the government. I would refer you to the opening words of section 13 of the hydraulic regulations: 'When it is decided.' Who decides? On what material does he decide? For whose benefit does he decide? The papers showing applications for hydraulic leases would form interesting reading. The effect of the government's action is to drive all the miners from the country—

It has driven out 20,000 of those who entered into that country for the purpose of developing the mines, according to the Minister of the Interior's own statement.

The effect of the government's action is to drive all the miners from the country. Our population is decreasing daily, and, when the water is open in the spring, will be decimated. No inducements are held out to the average prospector, and he, of course, will not stay.

The royalty you know all about, and I see by the papers that Louis Coste has been voicing the general sentiment of the local miners.

There will be some enormous fortunes made in some of these hydraulic locations, while in others it is ridiculous to regard them as being capable of being worked by hydraulic methods, as there is no water available. What will be done, no doubt, is to work many of the locations by the ordinary methods, as many of them are on absolutely unprospected creeks, which may later develop and be as rich as any in the country.

Sulphur Creek is an example of how a creek may have a bad name one year and all of a sudden come to the front. If the hydraulic regulations had been in force one year ago, Sulphur Creek would have been taken up under them, as it was almost abandoned. This year they have found they were looking for pay on the wrong limit. It has been located, and gold is now found on every claim for a long distance. This will be the experience of some of the hydraulic favourites.

To show how absolutely negligent and dilatory the government is in regard to matters here, we have a Registrar of Land Titles under the Torrens system, and you will find that on August 26, 1897, an Order in Council fixing his fees was passed, but up to this time I do not believe there is a bit of patented land in the territory, so what good is a registry office? The application for a Crown grant of the townsite was made a year or more ago, and the government had an officer in here during last summer, professedly for the purpose of clearing up titles; but no Crown grant has yet been issued. I myself am living on a piece of land bought from the government direct, not of the Harper-Ladue townsite. No patent has ever been issued for my lot, though the government had been paid in full for it before I bought it fifteen months ago. As to the financial condition, I can say very little, except that there must have been an enormous waste of money. The accommodation in the gold commissioner's office and court house is miserable. Plans for a new court house and new gold commissioner's office were drawn last year, but it seems to take a couple of years after the plans are drawn before any building can be put up.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). May I ask what the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper), is quoting from?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. From a letter of a gentleman who is well known to me as a man of high character and standing and authority.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Another anonymous correspondent.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Well, I have given the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, as I have gone on, a great deal besides anonymous correspondence. I have given him the consensus of opinion from all directions, and if he wants unanswerable and overwhelming evidence, I have put that before him, in the fact, that the population, that was 30,000, and ought to have been 40,000 or 50,000, has gone down to below 5,000. I think that ought to satisfy him that there is something besides anonymous correspondence in this matter. This letter concludes:

If things go on as they are at the present time, we will not need any new buildings, for there will be no business to be done in them.

This letter is from a gentleman who has gone into that country, and who is deeply interested in its progress and prosperity, and who would not, I am perfectly satisfied, say a word for any partisan purpose whatever. But let me quote to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, a statement from the organ, as I understand it to be, of the Minister of the Interior—the present newspaper organ of the minister in Dawson City. This newspaper has shown evidence of the strongest desire, to say everything possible in favour of the government. This is from the Yukon Sun and Klondike Pioneer:

We do not say to the people of Canada that there are no wrongs to be righted in Yukon—

They have been combatting various char- made against the government, with all the ability they could. But they are compelled to say this:

We do not say to the people of Canada that there are no wrongs to be righted in Yukon. There are many changes and improvements to be made. The royalty must be decreased, security of title must be more definitely provided for, the government must not hold back so much of the country from location or relocation, although it is entitled to some share of the land. The government should open up the mining districts more rapidly. Changes, too, must be made to improve both placer, hydraulic and quartz mining regulations.

This, from a paper anxious to give its hearty support to the government, ought, I think, to obtain some little consideration from the House.

Now, I do not intend to occupy the attention of the House longer. I am very sorry that I was obliged to bring this matter up at this time. It was only because of the fact that we were informed that the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), was to leave to-morrow, that I brought the subject up to-day. A large number of addresses for papers on this subject have been placed on the Order paper; and it was important, in my opinion, that before the question of the Yukon was taken up, we should have these papers, and all the information before us, in order to be able to deal generally with the question. But, I did not want my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to be obliged to tell me, or any other hon. gentleman who feels a keen interest in this question, that the discussion of the subject would have to lie over, owing to the absence of the Minister of the Interior. I want to draw his attention to a few of these salient points that I thought required immediate consideration. If the Yukon is not to become a desert, it seems to me that this matter should be brought before the attention of the House, before the departure of the Minister of the Interior might prevent us from learning from him what is to be done. A year ago, my right hon. friend will remember, I pressed upon his attention, and the attention of the House, a resolution which was before us, for the appointment of a royal commission, to inquire into the administration—or I should rather say, the mal-administration—of the Yukon, he was able to get a portion, a very considerable portion, of his supporters, to vote down that proposition, I ventured to tell him that he would not always be able to pack the jury, that the time was not distant, when we would stand in the presence of the masters of this administration, and this parliament—the people of Canada; and I looked forward to that time for support, for the position I took in regard to the management of the Department of the Interior, which was then challenged. A proper investigation was formally refused by my right hon. friend, but I ventured to tell him that we should soon have to appeal to a higher authority, than even this House, and that the government could not rely, with the same confidence upon that authority, as they could upon their supporters here with judgeships and postmasterships and other offices in their hands, to distribute among their followers, with the power to send, as they have done, a large number of members out of this House, after those members have given reluctant support for a time to the retirement of lucrative positions. Well, we have had a little investigation of that kind since I had the pleasure of making those observations to my right hon. friend, and what is the result? The result is that the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) has had to appeal to the whole province on that subject. When this government staked their existence upon carrying the province of Manitoba, they sent the Minister of the Interior, the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), and the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) and other gentlemen into the province of Manitoba to canvass that province from end to end, and to hold meetings throughout the whole province. Well, Sir, I had the pleasure of making a little visit to that province also, and shortly after my advent, the writs were issued for the provincial elections, issued at so short a time that they could not even afford to give three days additional time to notify Dauphin and Gimli. They could not notify the whole electorate of the province, so eager were they to shut down discussion. After the province had been properly prepared by a campaign led by the two ministers of the Crown, and another gentleman whose platform ability, I believe, is regarded by the government as being very valuable, the writs were issued, and with what result? Why, Sir, the organ of the Minister of the Interior, a paper that he has acquired and is known as his organ in the city of Winnipeg, a paper under the management of a gentleman whom he imported for the purpose of editing it in accordance with his own views, put this issue broadly to the people of the province: Every vote polled against Greenway is a vote polled for Sir Charles Tupper. That was the issue put distinctly by the Minister of the Interior, and he got his answer. On that issue he and his organ conducted the battle. I may say that neither the Hon. Hugh John Macdonald nor myself controverted the statement which from day to day and from week to week was made by the Manitoba Free Press, that the question was between Greenway and Tupper, and that every vote polled against Greenway was a vote in favour of Tupper. I say we did not challenge that issue, but we allowed it to go, and with what result? From the day that the writ was issued, the Minister of the Interior devoted all his time and talents to his own constituency of Brandon, and with what result? Remember that he had enormous advantages. It was known that no man, whatever his position, might not reach any office however unsuited he was, provided that he would support the Minister of the Interior, that he could send him up to the Yukon the next day where he could make a fortune within the next few months; and with all this power of the Minister of the Interior, with all the patronage of this government at his back, with all the patronage of the local government at his back, the hon. gentleman fought his battle, and he fought it as Cronje is fighting his, as a battle for his life; he fought it feeling and knowing that the struggle was whether he should live or die politically. And after fighting the battle in that way, what was the result? In a constituency that four years ago elected nine members for the local House of Manitoba, every one of them opposed to the Conservative party, the hon. gentleman was beaten in six of them, and the majority rolled up against him was over a thousand. I say to my right hon. friend that if anything could open his eyes—and they seemed to be hermetically sealed a year ago—if any thing can open his eyes to the fact that his confidence has been misplaced and that the Minister of the Interior, instead of being a tower of strength to his government—and I have no doubt that in some ways he has been most valuable in so far as obtaining resources were concerned—but I say if anything could open his eyes to the fact that the Minister of the Interior, instead of being a tower of strength to him and his government is a source of weakness, it must be the voice of the province of Manitoba given in the clearest and most emphatic terms where the hon. gentleman is best known, showing that the people of that province do not believe in him or in his administration of the Yukon.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I feel it my duty to thank the hon. gentleman who leads the opposition for having brought this question before the House while I was able to be present and make a few remarks in reply to what he has thought fit to say. It is a matter of regret to me that I am obliged to leave the House and to leave the performance of my sessional and departmental duties for a time; therefore, it is a matter of gratification to me that he has seen fit to bring this subject up to-day while I am in a position to reply to him. I do not think that the hon. gentleman has added to the probability of a judicial discussion of the question of the royalty in the Yukon, which he apparently has in his mind, by making a violent partisan statement in regard to the result of the recent Manitoba elections. Mr. Speaker, political parties will always differ in discussing the results of an election; but I did not think that even my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, with his exuberant imagination, would suggest that the recent election in the province of Manitoba was decided upon the question of what the royalty in the Yukon should be; so the concluding remarks of the hon. gentleman do not appear to my mind to bear very logically upon the question which he has brought to the attention of the House. If accuracy were any consideration with the hon. gentleman, I might say to him that he has somewhat lost track of the majority which was recorded for the Conservative candidates in my constituency. The hon. gentleman thinks that figures make a great deal of difference when discussing royalty; they sometimes make a difference, too, when discussing majorities. The actual majority which was recorded for the Conservative candidates in the electoral district of Brandon, which I have the honour to represent, was 160 or 166, I am not sure which. The hon. gentleman is accustomed to deal in round and large numbers, and consequently it is no doubt more natural for him to say an even thousand when speaking of majorities. But we will pass that by. I do not propose to discuss with the hon. gentleman the question of whether the electors in my county have or have not lost confidence in me; but I will simply say to the hon. gentleman that when the time comes, if Providence should spare my life till then, we will have an opportunity of deciding that point, and the hon. gentleman will find me there prepared to do any amount of fighting that may be necessary.

There are a few questions in reference to which I desire to say a word or two for the purpose of clearing up some misconceptions which might arise from the speech of the hon. gentleman. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that the practice of reading letters from gentlemen in the Yukon who may be dissatisfied because they have not done as well as they thought they were going to do when they went out there, or from lawyers who perhaps have not as many clients as they would like to have, or who are not doing as profitable a business as they would like to do, is not the best way of getting exact and accurate information before the House of Commons in regard to affairs in that country; and their statements must be received with a good degree of caution. For instance, the hon. gentleman read a letter which contained a number of statements, one of which was the extraordinary statement that the government had withdrawn the whole country from prospecting. Now, I have to say that the mining regulations cannot be altered, under the present state of affairs, without my signature, and I give a flat denial to that statement. I say that the government has not withdrawn any portion of the country from prospecting; and the statement which the hon. gentleman has read from a letter is simply a statement that has no foundation whatever in fact. Then the hon. gentleman's correspondent goes on to say that by the system of preventing relocation we have destroyed the interest of the miner in the country. If hon. gentlemen in this House, and gentlemen in the Yukon, too, would understand that, when, after a good deal of careful consideration and deliberation, a change is made in the mining regulations, while there may be a difference of opinion in regard to the policy that we adopt, there is a reason for the change, possibly they would not criticise quite so wildly. One of the main difficulties in the Yukon, and one which gave rise to the largest amount of litigation, was in regard to the subject of the relocation of claims; and let me commend the hon. gentleman's attention to this particular point, that the regulation which abolished relocation is a change which is going to abolish four-fifths of the litigation, and therefore it is not popular with the legal profession, of which profession, I suppose, the hon. gentleman's correspondent is a member. The change which abolishes relocation was made for this reason: The mining law of the Western States, upon which the mining regulations were originally founded, provided for what is called, in common parlance, jumping claims. When a man who held an entry for a claim failed to perform the duties which the regulations required him to perform, failed to do his work, another party came in and, in the language of the mining country, jumped his claim, or in other words, complied with the mining regulations, and relocated the claim. If the original locator had not complied with the regulations, and if it was shown that the original locator had not complied with them the second man was entitled to locate the claim. This regulation allowed every person in the country who was not a miner, who was not a prospector, who was not even a mining man, and who stood around, to take advantage of other people's mistakes, and he was enabled, through inadvertencies on the part of other persons, to locate or jump claims. I lived in the province of Manitoba where there was a similar system in the early days of jumping homesteads, and the state of affairs got so bad, that, practically, vigilance committees had to be organized against men known as claim jumpers. Such men took advantage of the inadvertence of other people, and would, upon occasions, make affidavits, which would not stand the test of examination and put honest people to an enormous amount of expense and trouble. The representations made to me by a large number of people coming from the Yukon, intelligent men, of all classes, were unanimously to the effect that this system of claim jumping, which placed a premium upon one man taking advantage of another for the purpose of getting the claim which the other had honestly prospected and wished to acquire, was a bad system. Therefore, we made a provision, after the most careful consideration, abolishing relocation. What did we do? We provided that when a man did not comply with the regulations, his claim should be subject to cancellation, but, we further provided that it should come back to the Crown, and that it should not go to the person who made the application for cancellation, so that there was no inducement whatever for one man to jump the claim of another. When we determined upon this system we, at the same time, provided, that, when claims were cancelled for non-performance of the conditions, they should be put up and sold by auction by the gold commissioner. The House will see, from the explanation I have given, that instead of this change in the regulations being a change for the purpose of doing anybody any harm, it was a change for the purpose of doing away with a fruitful source of litigation and getting the business of that country into a more satisfactory shape. But, of course, it is not popular with the members of the legal profession. I have the honour to be a member of that profession myself, and I have no doubt that if I were practicing law in Dawson City, a change of this kind, which would destroy half the litigation going on at present and the prospect of much arising in future, would certainly not be popular with me from a professional standpoint. My hon. friend dilates at some length, in comment upon the words of his correspondent, that all these claims are in the hands of the Minister of the Interior to be parcelled out amongst his friends. One would expect that an hon. gentleman of the experience of the hon. leader of the opposition would refrain from making statements of that kind. We have in this government a number of hon. gentlemen of fairly good ordinary common sense and some experience, the right hon. Prime Minister and the hon. gentlemen who sit alongside of him, not saying anything at all about myself. These hon. gentlemen are all acquainted with the method in which the business respecting these claims is being conducted, and is there any member of this House, outside of the hon. leader of the opposition, who imagines that this government would give into the hands of any minister the power to parcel out among his friends mining claims in the Yukon by the hundred or the thousand? The matter is so absolutely ridiculous and absurd that I am surprised that the hon. leader of the opposition would commit himself to a discussion of the question upon that basis. We have adopted the policy which the hon. gentleman in the palmy days of his power, never acknowledged, and that is, that public property should be sold to the highest bidder after being exposed to public competition. Mining claims of great value have come into the control of the department of which I have the honour to be the head. Efforts have been made, I have the greatest freedom in saying, by a very great number of people, to get these claims, and to obtain entries for them without being exposed to public competition. These efforts have not been confined to Liberals; even gentlemen of the Conservative persuasion have understood the desirability of acquiring valuable mining claims without having to compete for them before the public. But, up to this moment, these claims have all been disposed of in the way I have spoken of. All the claims which have come into the hands of the Crown have been exposed to public competition, and wherever they have been disposed of they have been disposed of to the highest bidder. These claims that the hon. gentleman speaks of have been placed in the hands of the gold commissioner at Dawson City, and only a short time ago general instructions were forwarded to the gold commissioner, or the commissioner of the district—I am not sure through which channel they went—that all claims falling into the hands of the government, all reserved claims, claims which had come in by cancellation and which otherwise would be relocated, and all fractional claims which come into the hands of the government owing to the operation of the surveyor in defining the limits of claims, shall be disposed of by public competition, and, as I said before, sold at auction at Dawson City after due and proper advertisement. That is, therefore, the answer which I make to the hon. leader of the opposition when he makes the statement that these claims are to be parcelled out to the friends of the Minister of the Interior. I say that these claims are to be sold by public auction, and that they are to be sold for the benefit of the public exchequer to the highest bidder. When I make that broad and general statement, it occurs to me that perhaps there may arise in the minds of some persons, one or two transactions which took place in connection with claims which were awarded to persons who had lost property through the default, or through the action of some official of the government. There have been occasions in which officials of the government have made mistakes and persons have lost their claims through the mistake of the agents or some of the officers, and upon the recommendation of Mr. Ogilvie, the commissioner, in one or two cases they have been permitted to acquire other government claims, presumably of about the same value in lieu of the ones they had lost. That has been done regularly through the commissioner of the district, and upon his recommendation in one or two cases. I am not familiar at all with the persons in whose cases it has been done, but it has been done upon the recommendation of Mr. Ogilvie, upon the ground that the person so losing his claim was entitled to some compensation.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman be kind enough to explain to the House the method in which the substituting of one claim for another, on account of a supposed mistake, could be done or is done?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The cases which I remember at the present time were two or three cases in which the officers had issued a certificate of record to two different parties, and when the decision

finally had to be given in regard to the claim, only one person, of course, could get the claim. I do not remember the names of the parties, but I recollect that in one case, the commissioner of the district reported that the person who was deprived of his claim was entitled to make an entry because he had refrained from going on to make any further entry on the same creek, believing as he did that he had already a claim on that creek. He had refrained from going to another place to make his entry, and the commissioner thought he was fairly entitled to get one of the claims or the fraction of a claim.

Mr. FOSTER. If that was done in one case, is that the rule?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. These are the particulars of the case which I have now in my mind.

Mr. FOSTER. Very well; then I suppose the rule of the government is: That wherever such a mistake can be proved to have occurred, and the person loses what he fancied he had gained, that the government is prepared to give him another claim in its place?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I am not prepared to accept the wording of the position as my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) puts it, because he clothes it with an idea in his mind which I am not sure I appreciate, but I am quite sure that I understand what I say myself. What I say is, that in certain cases persons had lost claims through the malfeasance or mistake of an officer of the government, and after consideration of all the circumstances of the case, where it appeared that the loss was wholly due to the action of an official of the government and there appeared from the facts and circumstances of the case to be a legitimate ground for compensation; that, then, we exercised the privilege which we had of giving the person an entry for another claim. I cannot put it any more generally than that. Each case, as every one will at once appreciate, must to some extent depend upon the consideration of the particular facts in that case.

I have gone, Mr. Speaker, somewhat fully into the question of these regulations, to show that the person who has written the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) and given him the information, apparently does not understand at all what he is talking about. He apparently has no grasp of the subject he is discussing, or otherwise he would know what the position was with regard to this question of relocation. He perfectly understands, however, that the abolition of relocation as it was understood before, is going to do away with a large amount of litigation. I may say upon that point, that it has been the aim of statesmen and jurists for centuries, to get the business of the country carried on with as small an amount of litigation as possible, and I can hardly believe that the abolition of a large amount of litigation is a matter upon which the charge should be made against me, that this territory is not being properly administered.

I have a word or two to say with regard to the charge of my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper), that the miners of that country have been driven out. I say emphatically that so far as my information goes, the miners of that country have not been driven out at all, and the persons who are going out are not as a rule miners. The hon. gentleman must know from the information which he has—and, indeed, every person must know who has paid anything like as much attention to the affairs of that country as he has—that a very large portion of the population of the city of Dawson was not composed of men who were engaged in any business which could be called permanent. There were hundreds, yes, thousands of people there, who had no regular means of livelihood, who were waiting for something to turn up, who were there for the purpose of getting claims in some way other than by legitimate prospecting or mining. In addition to these there was a large number of persons who always flock into new mining places, or where there is mining excitement in any particular locality. There were large numbers of persons of that description there, and the most natural thing in the world was that such a population should melt away as soon as the country got down to a legitimate basis and business went on in a regular way. The state of affairs which existed in Dawson a year and a half ago, when enormous prices were paid for everything, when nobody stopped to ask whether the price of a thing was $5 or $10; that sort of thing could not go on. The population which was living out of transactions which arose in that way were bound to go sooner or later, and could not hold on for any considerable length of time. Now, a gold excitement starts at Cape Nome, just down the river from Dawson, and a most natural thing was that a large number of people should go from Dawson City to Cape Nome. Nothing in the world could have stopped them. If there had been no royalty, if there had been no reserved claims, if there had been none of the things which the hon. gentleman complains of, the rush would take place exactly the same as now. So far as the allegation is concerned, that the miners of the country are being driven out, the hon. gentleman will admit, that the fact that the population of Dawson City has decreased to 4,480 is no proof that the miners are being driven out, because the miners are not working in Dawson City at all, and they do not form part of its population. My information, gathered from a fairly reliable source—although, at this moment, I am not able to recollect whether I have any official report to that effect or not—my information is that the gold output of the Yukon during the coming season will be equal to, or larger than it was during last season. I think that will be substantiated by the best information that can be got on the subject. If the output this coming season is as great as it was during last season, then I think that, all things considered, we may come to the conclusion that affairs there are going on fairly well. I suppose there was produced last year from that district, something in the neighbourhood of $15,000,000 worth of gold, and I am inclined to think that the general opinion of the people of Canada will be, that if that district is producing gold at the rate of $15,000,000 a year in the first two or three years of its existence, and before the less costly operation of mining property by improved scientific methods and machinery, then, I think the general opinion will be, that matters are going on fast enough, and that we have no ground to find fault.

We have had from the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) several incorrect statements before he came to the actual question which he sought to have discussed, namely, the question as to the amount of the royalty. I am quite prepared to say to the hon. gentleman—and I would have said it without using preliminary remarks if he had confined himself to the question he rose to discuss—that the amount of the royalty, and the question how the royalty should be collected, is a matter for very grave and serious consideration on the part of the government at the present time. We quite admit that. We did not imagine, when we imposed the royalty of 10 per cent on the gross output, that that was a policy which should for ever remain exactly the same. We were dealing with a country under new conditions, a country in regard to which there were large expenses of administration, and we had to decide on a policy quickly, and carry it out firmly. The hon. gentleman says that I set my face like flint against suggestions from anybody. The hon. gentleman is quite incorrect in that. Of course, the minister is open to the charge that he is setting his face against any advice so long as no change is being made; but the hon. gentleman is quite aware that having inaugurated that policy, we could not throw out suggestions at every stage of the game that there was a possibility or a prospect of it being changed; and we simply adhered to our policy, getting all the information we could, and full well knowing that the whole subject at an early date would have to be taken into consideration. I am bound to say that I doubt very much if up to the present time the imposition of the royalty has had any special effect on the operation of the mining claims owned by individuals. When I say this, I say it in the light of information that comes to me as I sit in my office and almost every day see somebody who comes from Dawson City in regard to matters of business, and hear what he has to say about the general conditions of affairs there. I do not think the imposition of the royalty has had much effect on the operation of the mining claims owned by individuals; but I have no doubt that a considerable number of enterprises, which might perhaps have been floated in the English money market if the royalty had not been imposed, have been, to some extent, burked or prevented by the fact that the royalty existed. There is no doubt that a large number of gentlemen who have attempted to float these enterprises in a speculative way and make money out of them, have been prevented from so doing by the imposition of the royalty. I do not wish to be understood as speaking in a condemnatory way of the gentlemen who have done this. I do not at all blame gentlemen who have got mining locations for endeavouring to float them on the English money market, provided they do not misrepresent the facts. No doubt this is the way capital will be introduced into the Yukon country. But it is not an unmixed evil that these mining enterprises have not all been suddenly floated on the English money market; and I venture to say that if some of the enterprises which have been floated had not been floated, it would have been much better for the credit of Canada and the Yukon country. It is not an unmixed evil that to some extent the floating of companies to operate in the Yukon has been suspended, and that the opportunity has been given to acquire very much greater information than it was possible to give to the public at the time efforts were first made to float these companies. I do not know that it is necessary for me to discuss the matter further. I presume that my hon. friend, although he diverged largely before he took his seat, intended in the first place, in bringing the matter to the attention of the House, to secure from the government some statement of what their position on this question was. The position of the government, I may say, is that they quite recognize that the question of royalty and the mode of collecting it is a matter which requires consideration, and which may require at an early date a readjustment or a change. That is all I can say at the present time, and I do not know that anything can be added which would throw further light on the question.

Mr. GEO. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to take up much of the time of the House; but two or three things which have been referred to have struck me as profitable to have a little more talk about. With regard to the evident desire of the minister to prejudice the case which has been brought before the House by the leader of the opposition in the interest of peaceable possession and non-litigation, I do not think that it comes very fairly from him. It was rather amusing to me to see the Prime Minister and his right-hand supporter (Sir Louis Davies) seeming to be very glad and joyful that the lawyers were not having as good a time out there as they might otherwise have. I do not know why they should be the first to exhibit an inbred suspicion that the lawyer's occupation is not the best one in the world, and that it would be well for the lawyers to be curbed in any new and rising part of the country. An attempt has also been made to rather break the force of the assertions that have been read as information because they were not signed by the writer's name. Now, I do not think that ought to be pushed too far, and I think it can easily be pushed too far. You can take the assertion for what it is worth, whether the name is there or not. I myself have had some opportunities during the last year of conversing with people who have come from Dawson, and who were going back there, and the gentlemen with whom I talked invariably believed that the arbitrary way, and the insecurity which resulted from the arbitrary way, in which claims were granted, or rather claims temporarily held, are such that it is absolutely foolish for any man who retains any interests in that country, or wishes to acquire any, to allow his name to be used at all, no matter what he may see going on before his eyes, which merits criticism and certainly earns his disapprobation. I have one case in mind, and I am open to the reproach conveyed in the 'hear, hear,' of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) when the name of the informant cannot be given. He is a gentleman whom I know well, whom I would trust if I would trust any gentleman in this House, who is a keen man of business, and who has been in the Yukon territory for some fifteen months. I had the benefit of some hours' conversation with that gentleman, and the first thing he said to me when he sat down to talk with me was that he would only talk freely on the understanding that the conversation was to be perfectly in confidence as to who my informant was. I might use whatever of the information I thought it wise to use, but he said it would absolutely ruin the work of his company and his own prospects in that country if it were known that he had made these assertions. He told me one other thing: 'If I had no interests in that country, and were free in that respect, I would like nothing better than to be brought before an impartial commission, and tell the plain story of my experience, and of what I know has taken place and is now taking place there.' I do not think that I ought to say to myself, I will not believe that gentleman because he will not let me use his name. I think that his reason is perfectly sufficient for wishing his name to be kept secret, and if that is the case with him, it is the case with others, and one which fairly commends itself to the minds of business men who listen to me.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Will the hon. gentleman allow me to interrupt? He speaks of his informant as telling something that is happening in the country now which, to his mind, is objectionable. What is happening that is objectionable?

Mr. FOSTER. I will partly answer that question as I go on. I gave two reasons why this gentleman absolutely refused to say anything unless his name were kept secret. In the first place, because so much of what a man tries to get, or so much of what he actually holds by a temporary title—if we may speak of it as such—is at the mercy of the arbitrary decision of a mere official, that it is very hard work for that man, if he be proceeded against, by the official in power, to obtain any claim at all in that county. We have only just to go over the different conditions, arbitrary in themselves, and which are left to the decision of the official himself, to realize this. We have only to go over those different conditions to see by what a slender thread the man who has, or is looking for a claim can hold it for his own working. But when we go to British Columbia, the case is different. If a prospector finds a prospect, which he thinks is good, his first endeavour is to determine whether that piece of land has been staked out or not. If he finds that it has not, he stakes out his claim; and once he has staked it out, that is a very good warrant that, if it has not been previously staked out and recorded, that claim may become his, if he fulfils the conditions. The conditions are laid down in the law, and they are plain and easy and simple. He has to keep his miner's certificate, he has to record his claim, he has to pay a fee for the recording, and he has to do so much work each year or up to a certain amount. Once he has fulfilled these conditions, there is no power on earth, so far as a minister or a government is concerned, that can keep him from obtaining a Crown grant, and absolutely owning it himself. But that is not the case by any means in the Yukon. My hon. friend says that it is a very great evil that there should be a jumping of a claim or a relocation. That may be, and is, to a certain extent, an evil, but I will challenge my hon. friend to take the Kootenay through and through, and he will be astonished at the very small number of claims that have ever been jumped in the whole of that district. They are an infinitesimal proportion. Why? For two reasons. In the first place, the claim jumper is not looked upon with any great respect by his fellow miners, and it is consequently a perilous piece of business. Not only does public sentiment frown upon it, but something a little more individual makes it very unhealthy to the one who ventures on it. There is the broad fact, which cannot be got over, that in British Columbia, the number of claims that are jumped is infinitesimal, compared with those which are ultimately obtained by the prospectors. The prospectors have a fair chance, one with another, and need not seek favours, or resort to kissing or fawning or using influence. The broad lands of the country are open to him, and if no other man goes in before him, he has a prior right. If any other man claims a prior right, if the two claims clash, there is an inexpensive way of determining between them, namely, to go before the commissioner, and then the man whose claim is just, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred—and probably in the hundred—gets his just claim. There is no necessity to go to this minister or that government, but you have only to comply with the legal regulations; and if you do that, you get your property, and when you get your Crown grant, it is yours.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Will the hon. gentleman allow me to put him a question? He implies that there is a great distinction between the laws and regulations enforced in British Columbia, and those enforced in the Yukon. Will he state what is the distinction?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think it is necessary to take up time a single moment in doing so. The hon. gentleman did not know much, apparently, about the Stikine-Teslin route, when he brought down his railway legislation, but surely, he has not lived from that time to this, without having made himself acquainted with the different kind of mining regulations in British Columbia and the very different regulations in the Yukon. I do not propose to go into that question at present, but propose to discuss, later on, when that subject is before the House. What I am trying to point out is the very different security which a mining man has in British Columbia, compared with what he has in the Yukon, as regards the title and the permanence of the title by which he holds his claim.

It was in order to prevent this jumping business taking place, that my hon. friend made a change. If the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals had listened to my hon. friend, he would have soon noticed one very great difference between the Yukon regulations and administration and those of British Columbia. You do not require, under the British Columbia regulations, to go to Victoria, and interview a minister and say to him: Mr. Minister, I thought I had a very good and nice claim up there in East Kootenay, but some mistake was made by one of your officials, and I now find that I have not got that mine which was worth $1,000,000. I want you, therefore, to give me a claim in place of that which I did not get through such mistake. Is that the case in British Columbia? It is not, and it ought not to exist in any mining regulations anywhere. I do not believe that such a regulation can be honestly administered, and I do not believe that the hon. minister himself, can say that this procedure is the general rule; but if it is not that only makes it all the worse, because it is then applied in some special circumstances, for the benefit of some ministerial favourites. So that is one great difference between the regulations and administration in the two places.

The minister said that this matter was administered on the principle of equity and that it prevented claim jumping, and that litigation was less on that account, that in fact, three-quarters of the litigation was done away with. Well, I will take the history of litigation, with reference to the jumping of claims in British Columbia, and let any man study it, practically or theoretically, and he will find that the amount of litigation there, arising out of disputed claims, has been almost infinitesimal. What is the case in the Yukon? A man finds that for some reason or other, his claim has lapsed. It may be on account of the 72-hours limit. I do not think my hon. friend will find that in the British Columbia laws. He will find numerous limitations in the Yukon, which do not exist in British Columbia. For some reason or other, a prospector has lost his claim, my hon. friend would not let any one jump it, and it comes into the hands of the government. He has not said, and I do not know if the regulations go that far, that if a man has made his stakes and his claim has lapsed, out of no fault of his own, or some trivial fault, he himself having been the primary locator and prospector, having gone to all the trouble to getting it so far along—my hon. friend has not stated that they have some fair and honest machinery by which the man who prospected that claim can get the benefit of his previous labour by getting another chance at that or getting it given to him. That would be some ground for the government keeping others off it and keeping it for the worthy prospector whose title may have lapsed through some fault which was venial, in which there was no dishonesty, or who, owing to some temporary stress of circumstances, could not carry out his operation and prove his title. But what happens? I asked how the hon. gentleman carried that out, and this he did not explain. I say it never could be carried out. How are you going to make it possible for the cabinet or the minister here, or even the gold commissioner in the Yukon, when Tom, Dick, Harry and a hundred others, come and say: We have lost a valuable claim through some fault of your clerk; we believe our claim was worth a quarter of a million, and we want you to give us one to compensate us for our loss—to give us other claims. What proof have you of the value of the lost claim? It may be valuable only in the claimant's imagination; it may have been only a prospect at the best. But you are going to take one of the government claims which may have been more or less thoroughly prospected, which may not have been proven, which has the advantage, in many cases, of being one that is reserved by the government on a creek or bench where other claims have been taken up and proved. By what process are you going to give to this man, compensation for the mistake of your officials by giving him a claim that is left on the benches or on the river beds? It is not possible to do it except by favour, by influence. And that opens up a vista that I hope will be speedily closed in the administration of the gold mines of this country. It is a power that ought not to exist in the hands of the minister or government or gold commissioner. If a man has lost his claim by mistake of the minister, say there are two men who are equal on the claim, there is a better way—divide it between them; let each take his share. That would be even-handed justice, because the same value would be in each. But to say that for the mistake of an official by which a prospective claim has lapsed, you will give another claim that you yourself have in possession, is to attempt a thing which cannot be done on any principle of justice. When I put the case, the minister did not give a satisfactory answer, and he could not have given an answer without showing that it was a matter of favour of the minister or the gold commissioner.

Now, hon. gentlemen opposite do not want anonymous information. But I will tell you plainly what charges were made by the men with whom I have talked. One of the charges was that it was possible—and that it was actually done over and over again—that your official inside sold information to the man outside, and that the man outside profited by the information he got, and so secured claims which made or helped to make a fortune. Another thing was that the officials when they got knowledge, by a prospector coming in and giving them descriptions of property, that they wished to take up they would say that they could not attend to the matter at the time, and tell the prospector to come back later. But between the time when he gave partial information and the time when he returned, the claim had vanished, and he was told that others were ahead of him. That also took place. There is a great deal of room for harm in the hands of the surveyor.

There is a great deal may go wrong through dishonest officials. And if I am not altogether astray, the Minister of the Interior has had some correspondence, in which these matters have been brought to his attention, but he has done nothing. Now, shall I go further? I dislike to, but I will. There is a method of getting hold of claims in that country which is the most disreputable that could exist, but it was openly, constantly, persistently carried on.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). What method does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) refer to?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) knows if he has talked with any man who has gone into the Yukon. The charges were made in this House and have been canvassed here. These methods did exist, these methods, my informant tells me, exist at the present time. When last session we were talking about Mr. Ogilvie, I had heard nothing but what was good of him, so far as honest conduct was concerned. I took leave to say that I did not think he was the man to carry on judicial inquiries, but no more. But from the information I have had since from gentlemen who have been there, I am bound to say here that I do not believe that affairs in that respect are any better now than they were before, or, if they are, they are very little better. Now, there are other things we have seen in the administration of that country. What would you think, Sir, if you were in that country engaged in getting claims for yourself and your company, and an official were to say to you: Before you get this through council, I must have my fee of so much—a monstrous fee, an unearned fee, a fee which was nothing else but a bribe—and he would hold out to you the threat that unless you paid that you would find it very difficult to get it through the council and get your claims recognized. That that does take place, I am told; that it does take place I verily believe.

Mr. COWAN. Name a case.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend (Mr. Cowan) has been asleep for a long time, and now that he is awake he at once calls upon me to name a case. These hon. gentlemen do not want anonymous information. The right hon. gentleman who leads the government flouts the idea of anonymous information. And it is a most difficult thing to use this information that I have and not be able to give the authority. But there stands a lion in the way, and I leave every man to judge whether it is not a sufficient reason for withholding names. These gentlemen do not like anonymous information. There was a way by which they could have got information by first hand. They were asked to appoint a judicial committee to go into that country and take evidence and sift the matter to the bottom. And they refused to do it. When they refused to do that, it seems to me, they effectually closed their own mouths against crying out about the kind of information that we did give them. In his place in this House, a member of the House and a former member of a government, detailed charges lengthily and many of them.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. CASEY. Yes, he did that—eight hours.

Mr. FOSTER. And many of his charges were very explicit, and if he had gone into the whole of the information that he had, he would have spoken sixteen hours instead of eight. The information, if it was at his hand, would have given him any excuse for the length of time in the charges.

Mr. CASEY. Let us be thankful.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, indeed. No man has any claim to be more thankful than the Minister of the Interior that these charges were not given before a commission to have them thoroughly investigated. What has happened from the very first? Everything has gone wrong in that country, in the way of government initiative. These gentlemen began wrong in every respect. They began wrong when they endeavoured to force that railway in the manner they did over a route which, commercially, had not one merit to recommend it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). It had the leader of the opposition to recommend it very strongly.

Mr. FOSTER. I think I remember hearing the leader of the opposition in a speech delivered in this House, yes, in several speeches delivered in this House, most effectually condemning that business, and most effectually puzzling the know-nothing minister.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. And his company did not pay any dividend because that road was not built.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not going into what companies pay dividends or do not pay dividends. But if my hon. friend's company did not pay a dividend because that road was not built, then it is a standing proof of the public spirit of my hon. friend who opposed the project. The best public officer these gentlemen had, who went up there himself, condemned the road; and now it is like pulling teeth to get that report from the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) in whose coat tails or pigeon-holes somewhere, I believe, that report remains up to the present time.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). There is no report of the kind.

Mr. FOSTER. Very well, then, we have at least a well expressed opinion of Mr. Coste himself with regard to it, and that will do just as well as a report.

Mr. BELCOURT. May I ask the hon. gentleman when Mr. Coste expressed an opinion on the road, and what was the opinion?

Mr. FOSTER. Well, now, if I have to be sponsor for all these hon. gentlemen who do not stay in their places in this House—

Mr. BELCOURT. I may inform the hon. gentleman that Mr. Coste never expressed any opinion or made any report.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman may not have read the report; but Mr. Coste, I think, certainly expressed an opinion.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. He never made any report of the kind.

Mr. FOSTER. I think he expressed an opinion over and over again.

Mr. CASEY. Anonymously, perhaps.

Mr. FOSTER. I think there are gentlemen in this House who know well the opinion he did express; and I think we had it pretty well stated in this House last year that such a report was made by Mr. Coste.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, every report that has been made by Mr. Coste has been brought down.

Mr. FOSTER. We will take an opportunity of looking into this matter and finding out how it stands. My impression is that there was a report, or it was intimated to me that there was. It may not have been official. Maybe there is an unofficial report in the Public Works Department.

Mr. BERGERON. There is a strong report against that road.

Mr. FOSTER. However, that seems to be a disputed point. I rather think from the way the Minister of Public Works looks, that there was something in it after all. That was the first mistake, and it would have been a very costly mistake to this country if it had not been burked by this parliament, and consequently they were prevented from carrying it out. I think it is well known to-day by all business men, that if that road had been built under the conditions proposed and as it was proposed to be built, it would not at this hour have been worth anything more than simply to do the little local business it might have done in part of the year. But to make a through route in competition with the routes which are at present open, every business man who knows anything of the costs and facilities for handling freights and passengers knows that it would have been a total failure, commercially speaking. The next mistake was made in that great expense of a million or a million and a half dollars for taking a portion of the militia of Canada into that country, where they never were needed, where they have never been used. Most of them have been brought out at an equal expense to that incurred in taking them in; and the immense monument that has been built to them in the shape of the Selkirk barracks will remain for many years to come as a monument of an expenditure entirely unnecessary, and one which is now almost entirely unuseable. That was the second mistake in the manner of their administration of that country.

Now, I believe that these gentlemen knew that they made a mistake with reference to the royalty. My hon. friend says that the royalty has done a good deal of good. What good? It has kept the people from exploiting their own properties. Is that a good thing?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I did not say that; the hon. gentleman knows better.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, it amounts to about the same thing. If men go into mining they go in for one purpose alone, to get hold of lands that have value in them and to get the value out of those lands. It is just as legitimate mining to endeavour to get value out of mines by companies as it is by individual effort; and surely we ought not to have laws on the statute-book which would discourage gentlemen from going into that country with capital or without capital, and participating in finding valuable mineral claims, and then, being unable to work them themselves, to sell them or get them taken up by a company which will aggregate the capital and then work them. That is a legitimate thing, a thing to be encouraged. The fact is that your royalty has not discouraged company floating, it encourages company floating, but of a different kind. Therefore, the royalty itself has not had a deterrent influence in the good sense that my hon. friend claimed; but, on the other hand, it has discouraged such effort to a very great extent in that country because of its manifest injustice. The fact that it is so may be very well proved by the historical method; for you do not find any other country in the world, most of them more experienced in mining than our own, which has adopted such regulations as this, and which is now carrying them out.

Now, my hon. friend says that they are doing another thing, the feasibility or the practicability of which, in a good sense, I take leave to question. He says they are retaining these claims. But before going any further, let me ask the hon. gentleman a question. Are there not orders in council in existence which give to the minister himself individually the right of disposing of fractions and of claims that fall in?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The orders say it shall be disposed of as the Minister of the Interior may direct.

Mr. FOSTER. And if they are disposed of as the Minister of the Interior may direct, he may direct entirely outside of any advice of the government. They are not disposed of as the Governor in Council may direct. They are put into the hand of the minister, who disposes of them as he himself individually wishes or wills to dispose of them. Now, I say that if I were a minister having to do with these lands, I would not accept a responsibility of that kind under any consideration; I would have it shared by every member of the cabinet to which I belonged, or I would not use the right at all. I am not saying anything against the character of any minister, but neither do I think that there ought to be any large disposition of gold mines, of untold value in money, because, where the incentives are tremendous and where the temptations are prodigious, I say that a man had better keep himself clear of responsibility in reference to dealing with these in the large. It had better be by the Governor in Council and not by an individual minister. But, he says that when these fall in there is one way that we will dispose of them; we will dispose of them by public auction, and they will be auctioned off at Dawson City. Who gets a chance of buying any claims that are auctioned off at Dawson City? It may be a most difficult thing to know just how to dispose of gold mining claims when once you have got them, and there comes in a strong basis for the reasoning, from a great many points of view, that it is better for the government to allow these lands to go into the hands of prospectors and buyers and get its revenue, then, at first hand, instead of trying to heap up and accumulate gold claims and sell them to the highest bidder, or to deal with them according to the whim of the minister, or in any other manner which you can devise to sell them. It is a most difficult thing, but, there is a difficulty in putting them up to auction. Take a lot of claims that have fallen in, advertise them for three months, and then put them up in Dawson City for sale. Who knows anything about it in New Brunswick, or in Nova Scotia, or in any part of the country? The very man who goes up one of these creeks, and by careful prospecting stakes his claim, and after getting hold of his claim brings it up to the point of being valuable, has no chance of reaping any of the reward of his labours by taking, under any conditions whatever the claims which he himself, by his individual effort, has made valuable, but, they are put up at auction and they are sold to the highest bidder, and no man but a man of large capital, or a company with large aggregate capital, can get hold of them. But, what is worse still is this: Being so far away from every other part of the country, the information and knowledge of these lands being at first hand with the officials and friends of the officials, there is a very great temptation, and a very great liability to these claims being improperly disposed of, in this light on account of men getting the information who are in a position to profit by it, being on the ground.

Mr. CAMPBELL. How would you dispose of them?

Mr. FOSTER. That is a difficult problem as to how I would dispose of them. I have thought a great deal over the question as to what plan could be adopted for disposing of them. For instance, the man who spends years and imperils his life finding out a new creek, who gets his one claim, who finds out its value, and who must afterwards get hold of the companion claims, as it is necessary that he shall have two or three claims, may not have money enough to buy these claims in open competition when they are put up to auction, and a great amount of hardship might be inflicted upon a man under these circumstances. It is a difficult thing to tell how best to do it, and I do not know but that I would have to come to the conclusion, that, in the ultimate, it will be found that the best way is to leave the gold lands to the prospectors, and let the government take its revenues by licenses, or taxes of some kind, and not heap up lands and then try to find some method of selling them afterwards.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Would the hon. gentleman give away the lands?

Mr. FOSTER. Give away the lands? The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) is averse to giving away gold lands. The hon. gentleman brought a Bill down here which gave away millions of acres of picked gold claims for 150 miles of tramway. The hon. Minister of the Interior, speaking last year, admitted that he had no possible way by which he could hold a sufficient headship and power over the collection of the royalty, no way that he had to check it, but that it all, in the ultimate, depended on the honesty of his collector, and the honesty of the man who is working the claim. He was not able to check it. He says that $15,000,000 of gold was taken out of the Yukon last year. Can he show $1,500,000 of accrued royalty? He should show us that amount if he has collected the royalty, and if he has not collected the royalty, there is evidence that it is an absolutely impossible thing to collect the full tale of the royalty which ought to come to the government. Is there not another way by which this can be accomplished, and a way which is adopted by almost every mining country in the world, by collecting a license fee from companies, and if you like, a royalty on the output to a certain extent, without taking shares of the areas of this country and then being obliged to find some method of selling them. I have spoken longer than I expected to upon this subject. But, it is an interesting subject; it is a question that ought to be well threshed out before we leave these halls for the country ought to know what is the best method and, if it be possible, entirely beyond party feeling being brought into the matter. Now, it is a great pity that a royal commission was not granted, or that a royal commission should not now be granted, in order to take up every one of these matters to set them at rest, because they will never be set at rest until some authoritative source of inquiry is instituted by which the government can obtain all the information.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Mr. Speaker, speaking for myself, I do not know that I would have any very serious ground of complaint against these hon. gentlemen opposite for the reason that they have not furnished the House with the names of their informants, or of the persons supplying the information which they have furnished this afternoon. I think it is fairly a matter in their own discretion, as to whether they should furnish these names or not. It might very much add to the value of the statements which are made and communicated to the House in that manner if the names were furnished. On the other hand, perhaps, it might very much detract from their value. At all events, I do not complain of them in that regard. If they were making formal complaints against the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), or the government, of misconduct in connection with the administration of the Yukon district and desired that an investigation should be held, they would then take the responsibility upon themselves, I presume, of formulating these charges, and they would commit their own credit and their own reputation to the value, the correctness and the accuracy of the charges made. That, I think, would cover all the ground. Therefore, I have no fault to find, I say, speaking personally, with these hon. gentlemen because the names they have withheld, have not been furnished. But, Sir, I do complain, and I think the House may reasonably complain of the conduct of hon. gentlemen in making complaints which are wanting in directness and fairness, which are largely insinuations against public officials, and which do not commit themselves to any positive, direct, clear, or explicit charge. The hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House (Mr. Foster) has been a long time in this parliament; he has been for many years a member of the government; he knows the difficulties which surround the administration in watching closely and following the conduct of the thousands of officials through whom the government is acting in the various portions of this great country, and he knows that these difficulties, which even surround us here, at Ottawa, are immensely exaggerated when you are dealing with officials who are operating thousands of miles away from the centre of administration. Yet, these hon. gentlemen seek to send abroad through the country general reflections or insinuations upon the conduct of these officials in order to make a case against the government. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) places any reliance in the representations which have been made to him during these three hours' confidential intercourse with this person of repute, and standing, to whom he has referred; if he has confidence in these statements; if he believes a portion of them, even let alone the whole; why does not the hon. gentleman make his charge against the official in question. I do not claim that he ought to give the name of his informant, but I do say that if he places any credence at all in the information which has reached him through this channel, it is the simplest thing in the world for the hon. gentleman to state definitely, what these wrong acts consist of, what official he charges, and, let the government take means to have the charges investigated and to have the person punished, if found guilty. Surely the government cannot be supposed to have any interest in shielding officials who are misconducting themselves in this regard. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) can suggest no reason why there is not the same anxiety on the part of the minister, or on the part of the government, to punish misconduct in officials, as there is on his part. We have no other desire than that the affairs of the country shall be well administered, and that those in whom we place confidence, shall conduct themselves as becomes them in an office of that character. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) does not do that. His object is not to have inquiry, his object is not to have these complaints probed, but his object is, by making loose and general insinuations, to try to create an impression in the country, that something is rotten; and that the head of the department, or the government generally, are hiding officials from exposure. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), will fail, and must fail in that object, unless he comes forward and makes his charges and proves them. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) apparently rose to unburden himself of the complaints that have been made to him by this informant, and he based his conclusion chiefly on the statement: That the mining regulations in British Columbia were entirely different from the mining regulations of the Yukon. He concluded that, as because of this difference, the persons who sought mining rights in the Yukon, were not able to secure any degree of permanency of title in these rights, and that they were in the hands of these officials to such an extent that even if they did get their titles, they had no certainty that they would be allowed to hold them. With a desire to get information, which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) was apparently in possession of, I rose innocently enough to ask him: What was the difference between the mining laws of British Columbia, and the mining laws of the Yukon, under which latter, he alleged these irregularities had occurred. But, Mr. Speaker, what was the course of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster)? The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), could not afford to be courteous; he could not afford to be polite, he had to be impertinent, and I judge it must have been simply for the reason—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I must rise to a point of order. That word 'impertinent' was ruled out of order last session, and I presume we must have continuity of ruling in this House.

Mr. SPEAKER. A word that was unparliamentary last year will, I presume, remain unparliamentary this year.

Mr. FOSTER. Allow me to state my point of order. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) did not say that one of my arguments was an impertinent argument, but he directly addressed me, and said: that I, as a member of the House was impertinent. In all earnestness I ask the Speaker's ruling on that, because I might be tempted, under provocation to use bad words too.

Mr. SPEAKER. As applied to an individual member of the House, the word is unparliamentary.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Mr. Speaker, I always bow with very great deference to the decision of the Chair. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) was manifestly unable to answer the question which I put to him. If he had been able to support his argument, he would have answered. I do not wonder he was unable to answer the question, for the very simple reason that there is no substantial and material difference between the mining laws and regulations in force in the Yukon, and the mining laws and regulations in force in British Columbia. I defy the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), or any of those associated with him, to point out any substantial distinction which would give colour to his assertion, that the mining laws of the Yukon brought about this state of affairs complained of, when the mining laws of British Columbia would not bring it about. There is no doubt a difference in one particular, but only in one, which is, at the present moment to my mind, and this distinction is doubtless unknown to the hon. gentleman. In the province of British Columbia, after a number of years have elapsed, after the regulations have been carefully observed, after the lessee has for a term of years held his permit, after he has paid the annual amount required by law as a holder of the permit, after he has done each year regularly, the labour required from him, or paid a money contribution in lieu thereof; then the mining laws of British Columbia, enable him to acquire a fixed and permanent title as to the future, by a grant from the Crown. While that is not the case in the Yukon, in all other particulars the mining laws of the two are practically and substantially identical. I hold, Sir, that under the laws and regulations in force in the Yukon, no more doubt or difficulty can arise with regard to the title of the lessee, than under the British Columbia mining laws. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) has said in proof of something—in proof of what, I found it difficult to gather—that there are not as many claim jumpers in the province of British Columbia, as there are in the Yukon, and he holds that this alleged allegation is evidence against the regulation which allows claims to be cancelled and relocations to take place. Well, Sir, there is a very reasonable explanation of why there is not claim jumping to the same extent in British Columbia, as there has been in the Yukon. There are different circumstances existing there in the Yukon which made it necessary that the minister should adopt a change in the regulations in this respect, as compared with the regulations in British Columbia. The difference in circumstances arises from the fact, that in the province of British Columbia, there is a more settled order of things prevailing now. It is many years since mining prospecting came to be an established order of things in British Columbia, while in the Yukon district, these matters are all quite new. It is only within the last two or three years that the mining business of the Yukon has attracted notice, and that people in any large numbers have gone in there; and the class of people who have gone in are more lawless and unscrupulous and are likely to do there what the more permanent and steadier mining people in the province of British Columbia are not likely to do, and which the people would not tolerate. So that it appears to me that a system which might be tolerated or fairly approved in the province of British Columbia, ought not to be permitted in the Yukon district under the conditions that exist there. When my hon. friend proceeded to argue this question, I was rather surprised to learn from him that there was a material difference in these regulations in the Yukon district which justified his condemnation, and the difference consisted in this: Taking the fact which the Minister of the Interior himself had pointed out in the course of his remarks, that in the Yukon district when a man lost a claim by reason of oversight or inadvertence on his own part, or by reason of some error on the part of an official, he was recognized as having a right to compensation of some description from the government or the department; whereas in the province of British Columbia he was not so recognized, and, therefore, none of all the embarrassing questions which arise when you are settling how or to what extent or under what conditions compensation should be granted, would arise; and he said that it was a serious blot on the Interior Department that such claims should be settled. It struck me that instead of this being a ground of complaint against the regulations, it is strong evidence why they should be commended, because in the province of British Columbia a person who thinks he has resorted to every means to entitle him to a permit, and to have his claim regularly registered and secured to him, and who afterwards finds, through no act or neglect on his own part, but through the oversight of an official, that he has lost his claim, has no compensation and no remedy at all. Is it not extraordinary that such a condition of things as that should be regarded by the hon. gentleman as preferable to the condition which, under the regulations of my hon. friend, a person would be entitled under similar circumstances to consideration or compensation from the government. I can very well imagine that if it had suited the hon. gentleman's purpose, and the facts had been the other way, and he had wanted to make a case against the justice, equity and fairness of the regulations as they are administered by my hon. friend, he would have appealed very strongly and confidently to this House, and would have said: Look at the outrageous character of these regulations of the Minister of the Interior. Here is a man who, through no fault of his own, has been deprived of his property, and he is to be told that he has to go without any compensation, even though his claim may be regarded as worth a quarter of a million dollars. The hon. gentleman would have appealed with some force to reason if he had taken up the other side of the case; but I think that even the hon. gentleman himself must recognize the extreme weakness of the position he was taking when he is making as a ground of complaint against these regulations that which would strike an ordinary person as being one of their chief merits. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) tells us that he was informed that persons who were filling responsible positions in the Yukon had actually sold information to a person on the outside, who had taken advantage of that information, and had actually profited by it. If the hon. gentleman has a case of that kind, well authenticated and with any bottom to it, why does he not bring it to the attention of the Minister of the Interior? The Minister of the Interior will be as ready as the hon. gentleman, and much readier, I believe, for the credit of his own department, and the administration, to pursue such a case to the very end, in order to find out whether there is any warrant for the statement, and whether any officer had violated his trust or not. But the hon. gentleman says: 'No, I will not give you the information, or tell you the particulars, or give you the name of my informant.' If everybody would proceed on the lines which the hon. gentleman marked out for himself, the discovery of official wrong-doing would be practically impossible, and you could never secure an investigation in the conduct of an official by the head of a department. It is only when cases of this character, if they occur, are brought to the notice of the head of the department that he is enabled to proceed, purify his department and expel the offending official if he is found guilty.

But, passing over the conduct of the ex-Minister of Finance in this regard, I want to know what has that to do with the question of the propriety or the efficiency of these regulations? You cannot prescribe a regulation which will enforce integrity among all officials in the employ of the government. Regulations will not do it. It has no concern at all with the regulations which my hon. friend has attacked. My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior was attacked because of these regulations, and acts of misconduct on the part of officials are cited as supporting the charge that these regulations ought to be modified, altered or revised. The hon. gentleman goes on to say there is in actual operation among the officials in the Yukon district a disreputable method of getting titles or getting control of lands. He said this with an air of great solemnity, as if the moment he uttered it he would startle the whole House. But the hon. gentleman stopped there. He would not tell us in what this disreputable process consisted. He did not hint in what direction we should look for this disreputable conduct or for the officials guilty of it; but he carefully concealed the facts—why? There are only two reasons that occur to my mind why—either that he had not any facts of any value to stand on, or that he preferred that this kind of conduct (whatever it was) should go on in order that it might bring discredit to the government, and he feared that the Minister of the Interior, if put on the track, would institute an investigation which would bring to justice those officials, if guilty. Whenever the hon. gentleman addresses the House or speaks from a public platform, he generally indulges in a sort of moral homily upon integrity and virtue, putting himself forward as the quintessence of all that is virtuous. I take it that the hon. gentleman is bound, having the belief which he has expressed and the information which he says he possesses, to let the government know in what these things consist, so that we may ferret out the facts, get at the bottom of these charges and find out who these people are in order that, if their guilt is proved, they be punished.

The hon. gentleman proposes a very curious and extraordinary method. When by my hon. friend who sits beside me he was asked: What would you do in a case of the kind mentioned by the hon. Minister of the Interior, namely, the case of a man who had staked out the ground and applied to the proper officer to have his claim registered and done everything necessary to secure his right, but who found out subsequently that through some oversight or omission or neglect or even wrong-doing on the part of that officer, the claim which he had staked out, and for the registration of which he had applied, had been given to another? What was the hon. gentleman's reply? Surely it was that of a Daniel come to judgment? Surely it was the essence of all wisdom. He said: I would suggest that the property should be divided in two, and one-half given to each. Did you ever hear of anything so childish or absurd from a gentleman who has filled most responsible positions in the government of the country, and who, no doubt, aspires to fill a still higher position in the future, if the opportunity should come to him? Split the land in two. It is not a question whether this land belongs to the man to whom it was given or the man who took the necessary steps to entitle him to it, but a question of compromise between the two. We will, he says, cut the land in two. We will do, as Solomon did when the famous question of maternity was brought before him, we will cut the babe in two and give the half to the one claimant and the other half to the other, and hereby do justice as between the two parties—a very satisfactory and sound conclusion no doubt, and one certain to be eminently satisfactory to both the claimants.

I will just make one further reference before I resume my seat. We have had a good many suggestions thrown out from time to time with regard to the jealousy or rivalry that exists between the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) and the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), but I do not think we have ever had any more conclusive evidence of the actual existence of such a feeling than has been afforded us this afternoon. What have we heard from the ex-Minister of Finance? He wandered away from the question of the Yukon regulations, from the question of the royalty, he got away from the subject which the hon. leader of the opposition had introduced as matter for debate, and he drifted off to the Teslin-Stikine Railway, and what did he tell us? He said there was not a sane business man in the country to-day who would countenance or approve the idea of building a railway from Teslin Lake to Stikine, and he made the statement with all the authority of an ex-Minister of Finance, with his hon. leader sitting beside him, in the face of and with the full knowledge of the fact that even before that route was proposed to parliament, the hon. leader of the opposition had himself been one of its most strenuous and hearty supporters. So anxious was that gentleman to turn public opinion in a direction favourable to that route, that he rushed into newspaper print, before parliament met—at all events before the policy of the government was known or had been announced—and declared his entire absolute confidence in the wisdom of selecting this route over all others. But that is not all. It might be thought that the hon. gentleman had forgotten that the leader of the opposition was representing his party when he expressed himself so unqualifiably in approval of that route, but there was one circumstance he did not forget, one that could not have slipped his memory, and that was that nearly at the close of last session, the hon. gentleman rose, and, speaking with the authority of the leader of his party and having the ex-Minister of Finance beside him, declared to this parliament his conviction that it was in the best interests of Canada that this government should ask parliament for a sufficient appropriation to enable it to go on and construct a line of railway connecting British Columbia and the Yukon country. And by what route? Why, Sir, by the Teslin-Stikine route, and he appealed to my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to accept his assistance and assured him of the unqualified and hearty support of the Conservative party, if the government would ask parliament for a grant sufficient to enable it to construct that railway.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The hon. gentleman must pardon me. It is true that the railway this government was so advised to take authority to build was not limited to points between the Stikine River and Teslin Lake, but was to be continued further to the south until it struck a proper Canadian harbour.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. But that does not alter the case. The Teslin-Stikine route was part of that line, and if it is to be condemned in the unqualified and unmeasured language in which the ex-Minister of Finance has condemned it, it is equally worthy of condemnation whether as part of a line to a port on the coast or as a line between these two points. You would not object to building a line from a suitable harbour on the British coast in British Columbia up to the Stikine, and then stop, but would continue it up to the Teslin Lake, and such was the route approved by the leader of the opposition. Let me add that the hon. leader of the opposition, when he made the statement he did last session, when he rushed into the newspaper press and expressed his unqualified approval of that route, knew that the government contemplated building an extension of that Teslin-Stikine route—not immediately, but as soon as the first section was completed and as soon as the company could carry it forward with the assistance of the government—south to a harbour on the British Columbia coast, so that the very scheme which the hon. gentleman urged on the government last session, with all the weight and the authority of the opposition behind him, including the ex-Minister of Finance, embraced this line of railway which the ex-Minister of Finance now so recklessly and rashly—as even I think his friends now acknowledge—condemns the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) in such unqualified terms for having recommended to parliament.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. N. F. DAVIN (West Assiniboia). I shall deal very briefly with this question. There are one or two points that require to be cleared up. The statement was made by the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) that the province of Manitoba was carried, not on provincial issues only, but also on Dominion issues, and especially in connection with the Yukon; and he referred to the fact that the Winnipeg Free Press had stated that every vote cast against Greenway would be cast for Tupper, and that the contest was allowed by the Hon. Hugh John Macdonald to go on that issue without controverting the correctness of the statement. Well, Sir, I took a hand in that contest myself, and I know that Dominion politics had as much to do at least with the result as local politics had, and that this government felt that Manitoba was a vital battle ground to them, was proved by the fact that they sent in two ministers and a distinguished supporter, and then that during the whole of the contest the Minister of the Interior devoted himself to his own constituency. The leader of the opposition stated that the minister was beaten by over a thousand in that constituency. The Minister of the Interior attempted to controvert that, but what are the facts? When the contest commenced the whole of that section of the country, every one of the nine constituencies, was with the Greenway government; at the close, in the Minister of the Interior's own constituency, six of these local constituencies had gone against the government, and against the Minister of the Interior, a man holding so important a portfolio in this government. In fact the leader of the opposition understated what a blow this was to the government, to the Minister of the Interior, and what an indication it is of the revulsion of feeling that has taken place within a few years. I have here before me the local constituencies that are within the bounds of the Dominion constituency represented here by the Minister of the Interior: Virden, Lansdowne, Avondale, Souris, Deloraine, North Brandon, Brandon City, South Brandon, and Turtle Mountain. At the previous local election a Liberal carried Virden by 125 majority; Lansdowne by 239 majority; Avondale by 208; Souris in 1896, Liberal, by acclamation; Deloraine by 9 majority; North Brandon, Liberal, by 244 majority; Brandon City by 99 majority; South Brandon by 344; Turtle Mountain by 23. Well, Sir, at the last election a Conservative carried Virden by 35, or a turnover of 160. Lansdowne was only carried by a Liberal supporter of Mr. Greenway by 46, or a loss of 193; Avondale was carried by a Conservative with 77 majority, showing a turnover of 285. Souris was carried by Mr. Thompson, by a majority of 8, or a turnover of 352. Deloraine was carried by a Liberal by 88, showing a turnover of 74. North Brandon was carried by 17, whereas the Minister of the Interior had carried it by 244, and his successor by 138, showing a turnover of 121. Brandon City was one of the great triumphs of that contest. Everything was thrown there. Money was poured into the city—where it came from one knows not. The way money was poured into that city throws an instructive light upon what the leader of the opposition said here to-day, that the Minister of the Interior had been very useful to the government by opening for them the sluices of unmeasured resources. Nevertheless, we carried that city against all these odds by a majority of 8. As there was 99 of a majority to overcome, that showed 107 of a turnover. South Brandon went Liberal by 67, whereas at the previous election it gave 344 majority for the Liberal candidate, showing a turnover of 277. Turtle Mountain gave 192 of a majority as against 23 of a Liberal majority on a previous election, showing a turnover of 215. If you add these majorities together you will find that in the constituency of the Minister of the Interior, within the short period of four years, there was a turnover of close on 1,900 votes. No wonder that the hon. gentleman feels discouraged. It is no wonder that he has seemed this session much depressed, and that the gay, and festive, and confident air that characterized him in other sessions has entirely departed.

Now, I have in my hand a letter written by a Manitoba Liberal to that great Liberal organ the Witness of Montreal. He tells the Witness, in renewing his subscription to that paper, that he thought he would write a few lines concerning the recent election. He says he has been a reader of that paper for 50 years, for 25 years in his father's house, and 25 years in his own; and he goes on to describe what a staunch, true, solid, loyal, zealous Liberal he is. He then discusses the causes of the fall of the Liberal government, and in the fourth paragraph of his letter they are all summed up in that one word, Sifton. He concludes the letter in this way:

I have been an ardent supporter of the Liberal party for over thirty years, and I hope to continue so, as I believe the Liberal policy, even with its defects, is preferable to Conservative rule. But I say candidly, Sir Wilfrid Laurier has to change his advisers in this province if he wishes to carry it at the coming Dominion elections. The recent appointments to the Senate would lead us to believe that he does not yet grasp the situation. The appointment of defeated politicians to fill the vacancies in the Senate is not in accordance with the views of the Liberal party. The late Minister of Public Works was not a success in provincial politics, and was badly defeated at the last election, and should have been relegated to private life instead of being promoted to the Senate.

He signs it, 'Manitoban.' He does not give his name, but the paper, I suppose, has it. He is a strong Liberal, and apparently an independent man. The Witness leads a third of the letter, showing the importance they attach to the writer of the communication. Well, Sir, that man although he is unwilling to give his name—we sometimes meet with such men—nevertheless the paper to which he has sent this communication, I suppose, will stand sponsor for his position as a Liberal, that should lead hon. gentlemen opposite to attach some weight to what he says. The Conservative victory in Manitoba was the Hougoumont of the Waterloo that is at hand, and whenever the opportunity occurs that we can go before the people the result will be all over this country commensurate with the hopes that have been built on what took place in Manitoba. Now, I want to say one word in regard to the state of judicial business in the Yukon. We were given to understand last year, when the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) asked for $4,000 for a judge, that it was a pressing necessity that an associate was needed for Judge Dugas in order to meet the demands of litigants in the Yukon, and in order that Judge Dugas should be, in other ways, assisted by a man instructed in the common law. We voted $4,000 on that assurance, and, nevertheless, look at the time which has elapsed. Nearly twelve months have elapsed since we voted that $4,000. Why has the judge not been sent up? Is it that there is no lawyer in the Liberal ranks learned in the law, who is not weighty in legal knowledge, of a character to be sent up to the Yukon? What is the reason of the delay? Can it be, in the face of the professions made by leading Liberals in the past, can it be, as was hinted by the hon. leader of the opposition to-day, that the reason is that the government intend to appoint a member of this House, or have practically appointed him already, and that the man who is yet to administer justice on the bench in the Yukon is now sitting in this House? Can that be, Sir? Well, Mr. Speaker, if it be, it adds to the scandal of the delay, and after what was read here to-day, can it be doubted for one instant that the legal business of the Yukon and of Dawson City has got into the confusion that was described by the hon. leader of the opposition? In regard to the charges made against the administration of the Yukon, what is the answer? The answer made to-day to the hon. leader of the opposition and to the hon. ex-Minister of Finance is the old answer: Your charges are indefinite, and you do not give names. Well, the answer to that is that those who give us information tie our hands. If the government had given the royal commission that was asked for, that was asked for properly, and asked for under conditions that it made it almost imperative that the government should have granted it, because the man who asked for it took his public life in his hands, they would have had the names. If you had given that royal commission subpoenas could have been sent to all these gentlemen who gave information on confidential conditions, they could have been brought before a judicial commission and you would have had their charges substantiated. But I do not think that was what was desired. It does not seem to have been desired. I think the hon. Minister of the Interior feared that something more would come out even than the heavy charges that were laid at his door, when the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) moved his celebrated motion. Since that, what has occurred? I want to give the House some idea of the way things are going on in the Yukon. An ordinance has been passed giving monopoly in supplying the people up there with water. Through the Yukon Council, which is the immediate government of the Yukon, but which is controlled from here, this government have given men a monopoly in the handling of water in the Yukon. Let me read to the House the following:—

The favoured company is to filter and boil water, and is to dispose of it at a price that must not be higher than 10 cents a gallon, and for two years 'no person other than the company shall sell in Dawson water purified by the process of filtering and boiling.' 'Any person so selling shall for each offence be subject to a fine of $50 and costs, to be recovered by summary process before a justice of the peace.'

It would be quite right to give a charter to a company for the purification of water in the Yukon, but you have no right to give any company, by law, a monopoly, under a charter. The hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) read for me what has been said, within a few days back by Mr. Arthur Copland, who has just come from Bennett in the Yukon :

There is no doubt but that there has been, and still is, plenty of truth in the various reports, and an extensive practice of bribery and corruption predominates all through the country. If a man requires any courtesies or assistance at the hands of a government official he has to pay for it before he can get it. They are all looking for what is commonly called 'grafts,' and the applicant has on more than one occasion been politely informed by the one from whom he is seeking assistance, 'I am not here for my health.' The same condition of affairs also applies to the registration of mining claims; you can get justice only by paying for it.

Well, this man gives his name. We have his name with the charge, and if we had a proper tribunal we could have had persons making charges come before it and have their charges examined and sifted. I have a charge here made by no less a person than Mr. Eugene Coste, son of the chief engineer of that day. This was made after parliament rose, on September 29th.

Mr. BERGERON. A brother.

Mr. DAVIN. A brother, is it? Well, he is described here as the son. He says :

There are grave grounds for complaint against officials.

There is another reason why it is difficult for us to give names. The moment a man tabulated charges against the Department of the Interior, the hon. minister shut his mouth by giving him a position. Take the case of Mr. Miller, the editor of the Pembroke Observer, who sent to his own paper elaborate charges against the department and concluded as follows :—

For myself, I did not believe the government knew anything of the dirt here, even if it really existed as charged, though many good friends have indignantly declared to me that it is their business to know. Since I have reached Dawson, I have almost been forced to a like conclusion, and have no hesitation in declaring that if they do not take strong and speedy steps to end the orgie that is in progress here, they will not only have become partners in the dirt themselves, but shall have permitted the continuance of a system which must result in very great financial and moral injury to the Dominion. I have been here now for two weeks, and have been noting and inquiring on every hand, and though I cannot yet give you facts and figures, I have seen enough to convince myself that it is worse even than the mind of an honest man can conceive. That the mining laws are being set aside on a colossal scale is beyond all question, and that barefaced bribery is the rule of the day is equally certain. But why go on. I have already told you it was high time to draw this letter to a close.

Mr. DAVIN.

This man had hardly touched Ontario when the hon. Minister of the Interior picked him up, gave him a position and silenced him. What would be the result if we gave the names?

Mr. BERGERON. He would buy them off.

Mr. DAVIN. Buy them off. Now, Mr. Speaker, in the course of the discussion Mr. Coste's name has been introduced, and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) has declared that Mr. Coste has made no report whatever on his trip to the Yukon; which is a very curious statement for the minister to make.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The minister (Mr. Tarte) did not say that Mr. Coste had made no report on this trip. He said, Mr. Coste had made no report on the Stikine-Teslin Railway.

Mr. BERGERON. Well, he has made one.

Mr. DAVIN. That is where I took the point, and the minister (Mr. Tarte) must bring down the report. Now, Sir, I have in my hand the report of Louis Coste, the chief engineer, addressed to the Hon. J. Israel Tarte, Minister of Public Works, dated Ottawa, February 10, and here are the subjects on which the report is given: Stikine River, Teslin Lake, Teslin River, Lewes River, Yukon River. You see, Mr. Speaker, how correct these ministers are and how well they know their business, and I suppose the answer of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) and the answer of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) that there was no report on the Stikine River or Teslin Lake, is about as true to fact as—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am sure the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) does not want to misrepresent me. I said that the Minister of Public Works stated this afternoon that there was no report from Louis Coste on the Stikine and Teslin Railway.

Mr. BERGERON. There is a report.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The minister (Mr. Tarte) said there were several reports, but none on the railway.

Mr. BERGERON. There is a report on the railway, but it is not down.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. He denied that.

Mr. BERGERON. I know he denied it, but there is a report and it will have to come down. Mr. Coste will make another one if not.

Mr. DAVIN. This is what Mr. Coste says about the Teslin Lake :

Teslin Lake is about sixty-five miles long, and is navigable for vessels of light draught (not more than 3 ft. 8 in.). The first ten miles are more like a river than a lake and have two narrows in which only four feet of water are available towards the end of the season of navigation, viz., October 15.

I happen to know, and others know it as well as I do, that Mr. Coste has presented a report to the Department of Public Works, strongly condemning the Teslin Lake route. Now, Sir, as the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) has come, I will repeat in a sentence what I said before he came in. Before he entered the Chamber I declared that Manitoba was carried at least as much on Dominion issues as on provincial issues; that the minister (Mr. Sifton) was beaten by close on 2,000 votes of a turnover in his own constituency, as compared with the vote that was cast in the previous local election, and I further declared, that it was the name 'Sifton' that told hardest against Mr. Greenway. In fact, one of the ways that Mr. Greenway was killed was on the Menzientian process. You know what Mezentius, the tyrant, used to do when he wanted to kill a man; he bound him with untieable cords to a corpse, and in that dreadful company left him to die. So Greenway was bound up with the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), who effectually killed him. I may say here that the thing that went hardest in the North-west against the Minister of the Interior—went as hard almost as his tergiversation and back-sliding and treason on the subject of the tariff—was his conduct in regard to the Yukon. Here are a number of charges that to this day remain unanswered:

That the Hon. Clifford Sifton, Minister of the Interior, has been guilty of scandalous neglect, delay and mismanagement in the administration of his department in the Yukon district.

That the commissions issued to Major Walsh were made without authority and were consequently void.

That H. H. Norwood and J. B. McGregor, the one an uncertified master of a whaler or small sailing vessel, the other a livery stable keeper, were appointed 'inspectors,' their duties to consist chiefly of inspecting mining locations and reporting thereon to the gold commissioners with a view of specially supervising the collection of dues and the settlement of conflicting claims; and that both were incompetent for the discharge of these duties.

That the government, on the recommendation of Mr. Sifton, appointed certain officials who were incapable and corrupt to positions requiring experience, technical knowledge and integrity of character.

That Mr. Sifton has been guilty of favouritism and partiality in the administration of the laws and regulations of the Yukon.

That according to official returns the following parties obtained leases of gold placer mining or gold dredging areas in the Yukon district.

Here follows a list of names:

That Mr. Sifton gave Mr. Philp a permit or authority signed by him, contrary to law, which was offered for sale by Philp for a large sum of money.

That Mr. Sifton gave his express sanction and approval to Mr. Wade, being financially interested in Dominion lands or mining claims in the Yukon, and that Mr. Wade was so interested, contrary to law.

That unsanitary conditions have unnecessarily prevailed in the district. That in Dawson, a city of 25,000 estimated population, on April 1, 1899, not a single road, bridge or drain or anything that might be termed a public work, existed; neither pavement, roadway, drain or ditch, neither water supply or lighting; that the disposal of refuse was left entirely to individual responsibility, and that this condition of affairs resulted in an epidemic of typhoid fever.

That official favouritism and partiality has been shown and extended to the representatives of the North American Trading Company of Chicago and Seattle.

That application to the minister and political influence became necessary to secure respect for legal permits, and that a Liberal lawyer was enabled to charge a large sum to secure the good offices of the minister.

That the regulations were not regularly enforced, but certain of them (as, for instance, those relating to royalties) were allowed by Major Walsh to be violated and claims 500 feet in length were allowed by him to be staked in lieu of the 250 feet prescribed by the regulations.

That the Crown prosecutor, Mr. F. C. Wade, declined to act in the enforcement of the laws, ordinances and regulations of the North-west Territories.

That Mr. Wade actively practiced his profession while holding his official position and appeared before the court, the gold commissioner, and other officials as the paid advocate of private parties.

That the gold commissioner's legal adviser accepted fees from persons contesting claims before the commissioner. That the acting Dominion lands agent, registrar, clerk of court and Crown prosecutor, accepted fees for procuring and promising to procure titles to lands and claims.

That an officer of the government was guilty of blackmailing persons engaged in the sale of spirituous liquors and keeping gambling saloons.

That Mr. Wade, while registrar of lands, clerk of court and Crown attorney, was financially interested in the disposal of the water front lands.

That officials have accepted gifts, &c., as compensation for procuring information from public records, &c., and for assistance in procuring claims; and for favouring certain individuals.

That officials have been guilty of fraud and breaches of trust affecting the public.

That the 'side door' system prevailed at the post office.

That a system of bribery was rendered necessary to get officials to perform their duties.

That the blackmailing of persons applying for claims has prevailed.

That unfair and fraudulent use has been made by officials of knowledge acquired in the discharge of their duties.

We have in some of these, the very same charges that are made to this hour by persons returning from the Yukon, as I showed by reading what was stated by Mr. Cope-land. We have a long list of charges to this hour uninvestigated. I repeat that nothing did the Minister of the Interior more harm than the fact that he refused inquiry, and I am very sorry that he is now going away—I am sorry for the cause—but it would have been very convenient if he could have arranged to stop here this session; but apparently this session will have to go by, and these charges still remain uninvestigated. What will the people think? What does any honest man who has nothing to fear do when charges are made against him, but say, 'Inquire into my conduct, formulate your charges.' That would be the language of a minister who had nothing to fear; whereas, although the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) came forward in this House and pledged his reputation and position that he would substantiate the charges if he got a judicial commission, the minister glides off from the demand for an investigation by saying that ministers must not be brought before judges in that way. Mr. Speaker, I have listened to-day to the defence made by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair), and I must say that when I consider his experience and his adroitness in stating a case or making a defence, looking back to that defence and pondering over it, it seems to me that it was the strongest possible condemnation of the government of which he is a member; because, if excuses of that sort can be made at this time of day in regard to the administration of the Yukon, in the face of these charges still uninvestigated and complaints still rife, this government stands condemned in respect to that great department of the administration of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. D. C. FRASER (Guysborough). Mr. Speaker, we have had addresses from the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) and from the hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), and these are all the contribution we have had to the subject before the House. What, after all, is that subject? If I might be allowed to suggest, I think that when a motion is made to adjourn the House under cover of which certain statements are made, the business of this House should not be kept back by permitting members to wander all over the Dominion upon every conceivable question except the one which is the occasion of the motion.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Pure obstruction.

Mr. FOSTER. You are very grateful for it.

Mr. FRASER. What did the hon. leader of the opposition say? His point was this, and he wished to bring it before the minister before he left, that the royalty in the Yukon was too large, and the proof of that was that as a result there were fewer people in the Yukon to-day than there were last year, and they were leaving by thousands. That is the whole question. I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, and this House, what have the Manitoba elections, the Teslin Lake Railway, the position in which Mr. Sifton stands in relation to the people of Manitoba and the people of the North-west, and ten thousand other nonsensical questions which have been brought forward, to do with that single question? I think it was perfectly legitimate for the leader of the opposition to bring up the only question relating to the Yukon that he thought ought to be raised in parliament this winter before the minister left. Let us confine ourselves to that, and that alone. I regret that both the leader of the opposition and the ex-Minister of Finance should, in making their statements, refer to letters, the authors of which they were either ashamed of or the statements in which they felt were not correct, and therefore they gave no names. Now, I might produce a number of letters from the Yukon. I went to the Yukon last summer, and stayed there two or three weeks; and I may say here that however humble a member of parliament is who goes to that country, the fact is noised abroad, and it is considered that his acquaintance might be made so that matters relating to the country might be brought before him. I am bound to say that during the three weeks that I was in Dawson and up and down the creeks, only three parties spoke to me who had any grievances, and these three parties made no complaint against the government or the honesty of the officials. Their cases were similar to those spoken of by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), namely, that when they made applications for claims, and the surveys were made, it was discovered that others had come in and taken part of the area which they thought they were entitled to, and they thought that in equity they had a claim. When I returned I spoke to the Minister of the Interior about the matter, and I found that the gold commissioner had previously communicated with the minister in regard to these cases, and had recommended them to his consideration. I think it was exceedingly ungenerous in the ex-Minister of Finance to refer, as he did, to the gold commissioner. Of all the disreputable things that I know of, it is insinuating that a man is dishonest, and giving no authority. The ex-Minister of Finance, if I understood him correctly, said that last year he thought Mr. Ogilvie was honest; now he does not. Well, you may prove a man honest or dishonest, but I submit that you ought to have evidence, and the evidence ought to be produced; the style of the man who gives the evidence ought to be apparent, and he should not be ashamed when he takes his oath to give his name, so that you may catch him if he happens to make a statement that is not correct. I venture to say that there is not a man in the Yukon territory who will give his name to the ex-Minister of Finance to be published, who will join him in the statement that Mr. Ogilvie is not an honest man. There may be a question among those engaged in mining out there as to whether Mr. Ogilvie is as able a man as ought to be there. I have heard men say that; and although perhaps, it may be said, he is not the ablest man that could be sent to that country, yet as to his honesty, nobody ever thought of hinting that the man who walked over the richest territory of Canada, and did not own an inch of it, as he might have done, is a man to be spoken of as dishonest. As to letters, I wish to read two. In the case of one, I will not give the name of the writer.

Mr. DAVIN.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. FRASER. I would not do it in the first instance, only I have such an excellent example in the leader of the opposition and the ex-Minister of Finance. The letter expresses an opinion on what was done last winter. It says:

The conduct of Sir Charles and his son, aided by those who assisted them, has been the only setback this country has so far received. The effect was not as bad as anticipated by them. Still, there were political friends here who used their untruthful statements in order to decry the country. The Yankees who were kept in order by the police, and were prevented from running the Yukon, also took sides with the enemies of law and order as led by Sir Charles.

No one hears anything now from the few here who were in sympathy with these attacks.

Men of all opinions and from all lands here hold the crew who started the crusade in contempt.

Mr. MILLS. When was that letter written?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). On the 10th January last. Mark it down, so that you will not forget it.

The country is all right, and no amount of effort on the part of the antiquated baronet can injure us. Those who know the facts boldly assert that Sir H. Tupper knew the charges were false, but he hoped he could injure Mr. Sifton, and gain a party advantage.

I might as well found the charge, based on that letter, that Sir Charles H. Tupper did not believe what he said, and have as good authority, as the leader of the opposition had for basing his charges. I propose to give another authority, which I will name, and only gave this one I did not name in order to follow the illustrious example set me, as I always like to learn from those who are older and more experienced than I.

The hon. leader of the opposition, has told us that the royalty is too high. On that point there may be a difference of opinion, but he followed that up, by saying that the people were leaving Dawson City in thousands, and that the country next summer would be almost depopulated. Well, the hon. gentleman ought to know that never, except after the washup, is there more than 4,000 or 5,000 people there. It is not a mining town, you have to go ten miles before you reach the first mine, and in the mining season everybody is up in the creeks, so that Dawson City is merely a rendezvous for them after the wash-up.

Mr. BERGERON. That is why you went out there. It is a place of rendezvous.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I can understand how disappointed the hon. gentleman must feel at not being there when he is informed that it is such a place.

Mr. BERGERON. That is too thin; I did not go there.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Certainly, and that is why you are now sorry. I am going to read an extract from a letter which I received from a gentleman in Dawson City, who has done more for the Yukon than any man in it, who last year paid one-seventh of the total royalty, whose word is taken everywhere, and who knows more about the country than any man in the Yukon. By the way, I may say that this gentleman, whose name I will give, thinks the royalty is too high, but we can understand why a man who pays $100,000 in royalty would like to get that royalty reduced. This is an extract from a letter written by Mr. Alex. Macdonald, the Klondike king, and dated the 29th January last, still later than the other. I am sorry that the hon. leader of the opposition is not here to hear it, so that he would understand that the whole fabric on which he makes his case has no foundation. This is what Mr. Macdonald says:

Prospects all over the country are good for at least as big a clean-up this year as last.

Could there be as big a clean-up if the people were leaving? Here is the chief miner of the Klondike, a man who owns more property out there than any man in that country, who has done more to develop that country than any other, and he is not complaining that the people are running away, he is not trying to give that country a black eye, but is willing to tell the truth about it. I did not write to him to inquire what the prospects were for this year. I made his acquaintance out there, and he being a fellow-countryman of mine wrote me a letter and gave me this information without any inquiries on my part. I submit that his statement ought to be an answer to all the vapourings of men who never were there and know very little about it.

Do hon. gentlemen opposite think they are going to help themselves or the country by attempting to show that people are leaving that district, and that it is a difficult one to live in? Does any one believe that a country where men have made $50,000, $100,000, $300,000, aye, as high as $1,000,000, in mining, is going to be depopulated, because of the 10 per cent royalty? A curious thing about it all is that there were hundreds of men in Dawson City and the creeks who never heard a word about any difficulty in Dawson, or the whole of the Yukon, until they read the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite. That there have been things done there which have not been done in older countries, I will admit. When one goes there, one sees exactly how matters stood. Here was a gold commissioner, with only two clerks, who had to live in a small log building, and here was the richest mining district in the world, thrown open, into which thousands of people were rushing. About the door of that building, would be 200 or 300 at a time clamouring for admittance. And, here were this gold commissioner, and his clerks, without a map of the country, who did not know one part of it from another, who had not a single paper, by which they could rectify any application. One man puts in his application, and describes its area as beginning at a certain point and coming round in one direction. Another comes in and describes his particular claim on the opposite side. What can the gold commissioner do? He can only do the best he can. He cannot refer to a single map or anything else, to know where he is, but has to take the application, and put it on record without a single means of rectifying it. Would it then be a matter for surprise that claims would sometimes clash, and that the commissioner, overworked, and with hundreds clamouring about him, would make an occasional mistake. There is not a member of this House who does not sometimes make mistakes in his own office. I know that for myself, when the letters I have dictated are brought to me, after having been written by my typewriter, I will sometimes, when I have a dozen or two to post, put the letter intended for one person into the envelope addressed to another. Would it be surprising, therefore, that mistakes should occur in the commissioner's office. Hon. members can scarcely appreciate the difficulties, but I am bound to make this statement, that, so far as deliberate dishonesty is concerned, or any attempt to do any man out of his rights, there is no such instance on record. Why, if the ex-Minister of Finance would speak to the Americans, what would he find? He would find one class clamouring loudly against the royalty because they want to take all the money out of the country, and another class—and a very large majority of those who own mines in that country are Yankees—telling him that whatever may be the difficulties in that country, it is the best mining camp they ever saw. Why? Because there is more order and security there, and all that makes for good citizenship, than could be found

even in New York, or any other of the great cities of the United States. I have seen other mining camps, and I am bound to say that I never saw anything at all to compare with this one. Men went there in the rush to break the law, to hold up the town as they call it—Montana plugs and bandits thinking they were going to do as they liked with their revolvers and Winchesters. But they discovered that the policeman would come up, tap them on the shoulder and say: If you are found with arms here, you will be arrested. And the effect of this is that law and order are better upheld in Dawson City to-day than they are in the very large majority even of the very small towns in Canada. Was not that a great deal? And, as to what we hear about the Yukon, I am bound to say, in all honesty, that I did not hear it in the Yukon, and I conversed with miners and others while there.

But it is well that we have the question up. As I say, the whole question, after all, is the royalty; and that is a question that may well be inquired into, to see, whether we should not get as much by a smaller royalty and have better results so far as the industry of the country is concerned. While I am speaking, let me say that there are two or three things that we want in that country. Much is being done, but there are some things still to be done. We want more money expended in making roads up the creeks, and expenditures on roads and railways are matters that the government may well undertake. But there is a greater want in that country than that, and I wish to call the attention of the government to it. These creeks come from a very high dome, and run in various directions. They are, I believe, the richest creeks in the world. I am not a miner, but if I were allowed to judge from what I saw and heard there, I must believe that our grandchildren will be working in the Yukon country the various minerals that are there in great profusion. The great desideratum there is water. They must have water. You may say that that is a small matter, but to the miners it is a most important matter that water should be obtained and on a large scale; and, if the government expect to get large royalty year after year, they should seriously consider what assistance they can give to a scheme which would put it in the power of every miner working his individual claim to get, at the cheapest rate possible, all the water he requires, without forming a company. I believe fully in what the Minister of the Interior said. I would like to see capital go into that country, but it is important to have as many men mining there on their own account as possible; it will be destructive of the interest of the Dominion to have that country all taken by large corporations that would hold the mining rights and work them, and thus prevent the ordinary miner from getting a place. The water, of course, must be taken in from quite a long distance, but there are rivers there that can be utilized, and so utilized as to serve all the creeks. I would like to give one illustration of what there is there. Going up Bonanza Creek, about half way up, I met a man on a little stream. There were eight or ten claims that had never been worked. The man was a tramp, he did not own any of it; but there he was, rocking away. It was about two o'clock in the afternoon. I asked him how many pans he had rocked and he said about one hundred and fifty or two hundred. I knew that that was about half a day's work. I said: What have you got? How much have you got? With the western emphasis, which admits of no good Saxon word being used except as with cursory remark, he said: Very little. I thought perhaps he meant $1 or $1.50. I asked him again how much, and his reply was: Only seven or eight dollars. He was on a creek three-quarters of a mile wide, on which you have to go down 30 feet to strike bed rock. And I looked up at Gold Hill with the general rising three hundred, four hundred, five hundred feet up the mountain side as rich mines as there are in the world. And I thought, if we can get water to treat all that gravel in which the gold was dispersed in various degrees of richness, I think that country will be good for us and our children and our grandchildren to work. That country is all right. As I say, the royalty should be considered where there is a contention that too much is being paid. As to the people going out of that territory, it is not correct, and this statement made by Mr. Macdonald shows that the country is not being depopulated, but that it is being worked to better advantage than last year.

Before I sit down, I wish to make a personal reference. I hate to be obliged to descend to a personal explanation; but, after the hint thrown out as to myself by the leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) and afterwards hinted at by a less responsible party, I must, in justice to myself, say one word. I wish to state that I have had no offer made me, nor do I expect an offer to be made me to go to the Yukon; and, if an offer were made, I would not go. It is quite easy for hon. gentlemen opposite to think that they are smart when they hint that a member of this House does not understand his position and has no respect for his honour. When I make up my mind to accept any position, I shall immediately leave this House; for I trust I have a due sense of the dignity and honour that should characterize an hon. member of this House. I have no doubt that the country that knows me so well is very anxious that I should hold a very high and distinguished position. I have no doubt that should the occasion come that the government, while sorry to lose me, would be only too glad to see that I got my just deserts. But I have no such intention. I take a little pride in the fact that I have done my share towards ridding this country of the incubus of a Conservative government. In doing that, I only did my duty, as every true and enlightened Canadian should do. I think, perhaps, my work is not yet done. There are some wretched animalculæ in that party that have not yet been destroyed. We are not yet rid of all who make that party not all it should be. But when I make up my mind to take that rest, which should follow a manly, dignified course in the service of my country, I shall not consult the wishes of my opponents, but I shall consult my own dignity and the honour that should characterize every man who represents a constituency in this free country.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON (Three Rivers). Unfortunately for me, I was absent when this debate began. Consequently, I shall not go into this question except to point out certain matters which, I believe, are detrimental to the interests of Canada. In England and in Canada I have met men who have been trying to develop the gold fields of the Yukon, and among them I have heard a universal expression of opinion that the 10 per cent royalty was detrimental to the best interests of the country. I am prepared to admit one thing—that in the opening up of the Yukon country and making it safe for those who desired to go there, under circumstances which had been by no means expected, Canada and the government of Canada were assuming a great responsibility and undertaking a very great expense. But there is wisdom sometimes in considering whether the interests of the country will be better served by imposing a very large royalty as the government is now doing, or by waiting and allowing future generations gradually to pay the debt which will be incurred by the country in developing that region. Now, I believe, and I am convinced, that the interests of Canada are not properly served by an imposition of 10 per cent royalty. To-day we hear of people leaving that country and going in to another country under a different flag, under different regulations, and I believe that the great reason why they are leaving our gold fields for others is the imposition of this royalty of 10 per cent. My hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) has spoken of Alex. Macdonald and Mr. Ferguson, who floated a very large company in London, and who floated it so successfully that I think it will contribute more probably than any company which has been floated in London to the credit and the prosperity of Canada. But, Sir, the first objection they met with among the investors in London was the exorbitant royalty imposed by the government of Canada; and I believe as a Canadian wishing to see the great resources of that almost unknown country better known and developed to the fullest possible extent, that it is the first duty of the government to change the regulations which have been imposed upon miners, upon the men who have been the pioneers of that country, and to relieve them of the charge now imposed upon them. You will see no other country in the world where mining has been successful and has contributed to the prosperity of that country, where a similar duty is placed upon the product of the mines. Take the gold fields of Australia, take the gold fields of South Africa, take any country where gold mining is an industry which has paid the people who have invested their money in it, and you will not find a single country where a royalty of 10 per cent has been imposed. I will tell you more than that. I believe that the 10 per cent royalty is the reason why our output of gold in the Yukon is not known at the present time. There is more gold taken out of that country without paying any royalty at all, than that which does pay royalty. That country is the hot-bed of all the schemes that human ingenuity can devise to take gold out of the country without paying royalty. I read the other day in a newspaper that a man had died, and it was discovered that the inventive genius of the miners had put all the gold they possibly could into his coffin and into his boots, in the hope of escaping the duty imposed by the regulations of the Minister of the Interior.

Now, this is a question which does not affect parties in Canada, it is a question which affects the development of one of the greatest and richest gifts with which Providence has blessed Canada, and we should stand shoulder to shoulder to devise the most favourable regulations. If the government find that 10 per cent is an exorbitant royalty in the interest of the country, let the government come down and reduce it to 2½ per cent. I have heard an opinion expressed which I will just lay before the House, without at all giving it my own sanction: I was told by a man who had been into that country, and who had been into every other gold country from Australia to South Africa, that if the government imposed a duty of 2½ per cent upon the product of the mines in that country, and a duty of 5 or 6 or 10 per cent upon all the gold exported from Canada, and if the government were to establish a mint at Dawson, or Victoria, or Vancouver, or any other place, and to send the minted gold to England, or anywhere else, the government would get better results in the way of revenue than it is getting at present from a 10 per cent royalty. Mr. Speaker, we do not want simply to have untold wealth lie buried in those extreme northern regions, but we desire to develop that wealth so that it may be applied to the building up of Canada. Sir, this is a matter concerning which I have very strong opinions, because I believe that the present regulations will have the effect of retarding the development of that country for years and years. And, Sir, it is a question that can be solved by the practical minds of practical men. And if these men, who have studied the conditions of that country, have arrived at a conclusion that it becomes necessary to reduce that royalty, I think it would be well to pay some attention to their opinions. I do not speak as an expert: I do not pretend to be an expert, but I am voicing the opinions of other men that I have met in London, in Ottawa and in Montreal, who have come from that district, and I have never heard a dissenting voice upon the question that the imposition of the 10 per cent royalty is absolutely killing the results that might be expected from the operation of the great mines in that country. I wish merely to express my views, and I feel strongly upon that point because I have discussed it with men completely outside of politics, men who take no interest in our party fights, men who have been living in that country, and who have all agreed upon this one point that the 10 per cent royalty is absolutely killing the result of the enterprise of the men who have gone into that district. Of course, I understand, that, in opening up a new country of that kind, the government might have imagined that it was necessary to impose a large royalty for the purpose of paying the expenses of the administration but, I do not agree with that at all, and for this reason: I consider that a broad-minded, liberal administration such as a Liberal government should be, would consider, that, in developing these mines, we are developing them, not for ourselves alone, but for the generations which are going to follow us, and I hold that the present generation should not bear the expense of paying for the whole of the results which will be beneficial to those who will follow us. Of course, as I have stated before, I was not present when the discussion commenced, but I also believe, that, in connection with the development of that country, the regulations which were laid down by the Department of the Interior were not those that were attractive to the outsiders who were called upon to come in and help to build up that country. I would like to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of the Interior, who is going away very shortly, as I understand—and I have no doubt that he will be just as useful on the other side of the water as he has been on this side, when it comes to developing the country—to this fact, that all the practical men who are called upon to express an opinion, not only Americans who are not living under our flag, but Canadians who have made money out of that country, who say that they made money in the country before the regulations of the hon. Minister of the Interior were imposed upon them, declare that the effect of the new regulations has been absolutely detrimental to the further development of the country. I have spoken these few words for the purpose of drawing attention to the conditions in the Yukon. I look upon the future of the mines of Canada as being one of the greatest benefits that Canada can reap from the advantages that have been handed down to us by Providence, and I think that the fact of not knowing how to handle these great advantages is one of the gravest charges that can be laid at the door of any government whatever side of politics it belongs to, because, if proper regulations are adopted they will make our mining regulations attractive to miners, whereas, if the regulations are not what they should be they will prevent miners from coming into Canada, and they will go elsewhere. They will go to Australia where the regulations are very much more liberal, or they will go to South Africa, when the war is over, and I hope it will be over very shortly in so far as the fighting is concerned, and be over in a way that England's rule will be beneficial to the men who are taking part in the war under the worst possible idea of what they were fighting England for.

Mr. T. B. FLINT (Yarmouth). Mr. Speaker, there are two phases of this question which have been brought before the House during this session and last session of parliament which ought to be distinguished one from the other. One is that phase which treats of the regulations of the Yukon, their propriety and the manner in which they may be worked, the improvements that may be suggested in them, and the other phase deals with the assumption of wrong-doing by the local administrators of the law and regulations of the territory. There has been the positive insinuation, almost from the first, from the other side of the House, from the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) and others that a state of things exists in that territory in regard to the administration of the regulations which, if true, would not only have subject the officers of the government in that district, but would indirectly subject the ministers of the government, if they could be proved to be aware of this alleged maladministration, to the censure of this House. Never have hon. gentlemen, upon that phase of the subject alone, challenged this House to appoint, over the heads of the government, or even with the assistance of the government an investigation into these alleged abuses. The evidence given to the government and the House, has been complained of, very properly, by almost every speaker who has attempted to defend the government, as being inadequate to be considered as even prima facie evidence of the offences charged. We have pleaded in the House and in the press for the names of those who make charges of these gross abuses of trust, and pressed for the names of the officials who are charged with criminal malfeasance in office, yet, neither the names of the accusers nor the names of the officials accused are given to this House, or to the country. We are asked to be content with mere anonymous accusations by correspondence and by word of mouth. I think this is not treating the government or the subject with due consideration. I merely rose, upon this phase of the subject, to make this remark. But, I call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to the fact that not one of the hon. gentlemen who have made these charges, or of those who have anonymously placed charges in their hands, have stated this fact to the House or to the country, and that is, that they have ever made application to the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) himself, as the officer charged with the direct administration of the affairs of the Yukon, or to any other prominent member of the administration, upon these points. They tell us the reason is that such a state of absolute tyranny exists in the Yukon in regard to the administration of the mining regulations that these men, the representatives of gigantic companies, of England and of Canada, are so terrorized by their position in the Yukon, that they do not dare to make these charges either in the House, or to the responsible minister of the government. I trust that these hon. gentlemen will excuse me if I say that I do not believe they can find ten men in Canada who would believe that if such charges should exist in the minds of responsible men, of men responsible for enormous sums of capital, they would be afraid to make their complaints before a responsible minister of the Crown. We know the character of the leading Englishmen who are engaged in any sort of enterprises in any portion of the world, in Australia, South Africa, British Columbia and the Yukon, and they are not, I venture to submit to this House, a class of men who tremble in their shoes under administrators in office or before petty officials of the class of those in these regions or territories. They are, on the contrary, a class of men who by nature and by education and by the responsibilities thrown upon them in consequence of the vast financial interests they represent, who would not be afraid to lay their case before the Prime Minister of Canada or any minister of the government. If those who have made the charges against the unnamed officials; if they could have said: We have gone to the Premier, or to the Minister of Marine, or to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, men of high position and of great experience, and we have asked them to take steps to investigate these charges but they refused; then I would say that something like a prima facie case would have been made out demanding the attention of this parliament. Not one of these informants, not one of the hon. gentlemen opposite has attempted to make an assertion of this kind. I do not think that half a dozen men in Canada believe that abuses of such a flagrant character can exist and that none of these men representing millions of capital would have the courage to lay the charges before some minister who could take the responsibility of making the inquiry. Sir, we are justified in considering the charges as being made purely for political and party purposes and we are justified in believing that there is not behind them that substantial evidence which hon. gentlemen opposite pretend. I think, Sir, I fairly represent the sentiment of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House when I say that they are anxious to hear all that can be said in the way of fair and reasonable criticism on the laws and mining regulations of the Yukon. For my part, I have listened carefully to all that hon. gentlemen opposite have said on this subject, and I admit that I am rather impressed with the statement that possibly the royalty may be too high considering the present conditions and the possible development of the Yukon. Yet, apart from this, the answer to the other charges made has been complete and satisfactory, that in other respects the Yukon laws and regulations are fair and equitable, and well calculated to assist in the development of that country. If, in future, charges of such scandalous wrong-doing are to be brought against officials who occupy respectable positions, I trust, Sir, that the accusers will have the courage to give their names and to bring the charges forward in something like proper form. The majority of these public servants in the Yukon have, I believe, been taken from the political ranks of hon. gentlemen opposite. They are men of high standing in their profession; they have been selected from the public service on account of their good character, and I do say it is beneath the dignity of hon. members of this House, and it is grossly unfair towards men who have a character to sustain, that anonymous charges should be made against them en masse, without a scintilla of evidence to support them. I have every confidence in the Minister of the Interior, and in those by whose advice he is guided. I believe they are as sincerely anxious that the Yukon should be made to prosper, and that the laws should be well administered there, as I am that the majority of gentlemen on the other side of the House are likewise anxious. I believe that if this discussion were based upon a sincere desire for the betterment of the Yukon and the best interests of Canada as a whole, the partisan character of the discussion would cease, and it would be conducted more on the line adopted by the hon. gentleman (Sir Adolphe Caron) who has preceded me. There is ample room for consultation and advice in the administration of a country so distant from the seat of government, and in which the conditions are entirely novel. I am sure, Sir, that this parliament, as well as the department directly charged with the management of affairs there, will be always anxious and willing to receive well intentioned advice upon any of these points. It is not to be supposed that off-hand, and out of his own imagination, or from short conversations with those who passed through the country, a person could formulate a new system of rules and regulations, as well as can those who have for months and years given their sole and undivided attention to the administration of the law and the formulating of such improvements as are from time to time deemed necessary. I believe that to a very large extent the financial interests of Canada and the improvement of our trade are bound up in the development of the Yukon. There are vast sums yet to be paid into the Dominion Treasury by way of returns from the great natural wealth of that country, and there are vast expenditures yet to be made in opening up railways, in developing water power, and in assisting miners and others to utilize to the fullest extent the bountiful resources which Providence has placed under our control there. I trust that Parliament and the government will be actuated, not by a mere desire for partisan advantage, but with the desire to promote the best interests of the Yukon, and indirectly the best interests of the whole of Canada.

Mr. GEORGE R. MAXWELL (Burrard). Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words on this question, I, having like my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) taken a trip to Dawson last summer. I may say for the encouragement of hon. gentlemen that one cannot imagine a more pleasant and agreeable trip to any part of Canada than is a journey to the Yukon at the present time. When in Dawson I had the privilege of meeting with a great many people who had, as they thought, grievances with regard to certain questions that have been mentioned in the House to-day. I think it was a very fair matter for the leader of the opposition to bring before this House, but I am sorry that when he brought the question of the royalty to our attention, he imported so many extraneous matters into the discussion as to be prejudicial rather than beneficial to the object he professed to serve. It is to be regretted that anonymous letters should form such a conspicuous part in the deliberations of this House. I believe there should be such a sense of honour on both sides of the House as to make it certain that this indirect and insidious way of assailing the character and reputation of hon. members, should not receive that encouragement which it has received in the past. The anonymous man may be a good man or he may be a bad man; he may be a man of reputation or of no reputation; but that we do not know because the name is hidden from us. I suspect, however, that the author of the letter read here this afternoon may, perhaps, be a legal partner of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), who is known on the coast as a very strong Conservative in his political leanings. If that is the gentleman who wrote this letter, it shows considerable forbearance on the part of this government that that gentleman should do a great deal of the legal work of the government in Dawson City at the present time. I wish, Mr. Speaker, to refer to a few points mentioned in that letter which I know are not true. That is to say, the construction which he puts upon these things are not true to fact. In the first place, he makes complaint about the buildings which have been undertaken by the Dominion government in Dawson City. He says it has taken them two years to get these buildings in shape, to have them in readiness for the officials. When I was in Dawson in September last, the plans for these buildings were not ready, and I know they were just completed when the frost came; so that it was next to impossible for the government, no matter how willing they might be, to proceed with the buildings. But as soon as spring comes, we know that everything is in readiness, and these buildings—the post office, the custom house and other buildings—will be built as rapidly as possible. The government which built the telegraph line from Bennett to Dawson, and from Tagish to Atlin, in one season, with remarkable rapidity and success, will not be slow, when the opportunity is presented, to have all their works in the Yukon carried to completion, with the same despatch.

Again, it was mentioned as an argument against the royalty that the population of Dawson was growing less. Now, people who have been in Dawson know, that only a small portion of the people of the Yukon reside there. There are numberless houses or huts or cabins dotting the hill, and a stranger might have the impression on seeing Dawson for the first time, that it had a population of 10,000; but the fact is that nearly all these cabins are empty, the men being on the different creeks, and only returning to their cabins after the washup. At this season of the year, very few are inhabited for this reason. New methods of thawing out are in vogue. The old method is being superceded by the adoption of steam thawing, so that men will be able to work in the mines winter and summer. I believe that the output this year, will be as large, if not a great deal larger, than that of last year.

Now, those who know miners, know that they are a very unsettled and transitory class. I was in Dawson when the tidings came of the discovery of a very valuable country at Cape Nome, and I saw quite an exodus of men, who intended to go to that point; but they were men who had no particular calling in Dawson, or on the creeks. They were men, who had no claims, but were perhaps working for wages. A miner of that description is carried by reports hither and thither, always imagining that he is going where he will be better off. I venture to say, that not a single man has left Dawson or the Yukon, who has any claim in it, and I have not the slightest doubt that if the men who have left, had remained where they were, they would have been a great deal better off.

I am in thorough sympathy with the action of the Minister of the Interior, in destroying that portion of the regulations in regard to the re-location of claims. I make no charge against the lawyers of Dawson City. Some of them are very respectable and honourable gentlemen. But any one who has been there and has come in contact with the miners and their disputes in regard to claims, know that lawyers enter into partnership with these men, and in taking up a case, they make the stipulation that they have an interest in the claim. In this way they are all the time encouraging litigation, and I have not the slightest doubt, that a great many men have been robbed of their rightful dues on account of the legal acumen and the perseverance of many of these legal gentlemen. Therefore, I rejoice in the action of the Minister of the Interior, in absolutely blotting out this state of things, and making it possible for honest men in that country to free themselves as much as possible from the clutches of these hon. gentlemen.

I might say in passing, that I think the Minister of the Interior, is perfectly right, when disputes take place between men in regard to the ownership of a claim, in holding that he has a right to compensate men who have been bereft of what they consider their property, by giving them a quid pro quo. A great deal of reference has been made by the ex-Minister of Finance to British Columbia; and, as I come from that province, I probably know as much of the way in which things are managed there as that hon. gentleman. We have had the Atlin country opened up a little later than the Yukon, and I know that the provincial ministers started out with the intention of showing the Dominion government how to open up a new country, so that there would be no troubles, and everything would go along with the greatest possible despatch. We were told that country would be settled without any reflections being cast upon the integrity of the officials, or the way in which the government carried out the regulations. But, we have had a state of affairs in Atlin eclipsing the state of affairs of Dawson. A man of integrity, a man who knew his business as gold commissioner in different parts of the province, a skilled man, was sent to Atlin; and yet with regard to the distribution of claims, we have had as much dissatisfaction in that part of the province as we have had in the Yukon. When I was in Atlin I saw one claim on which there had been put eighteen stakes by different men; When you talk about the history of officials, you will have to take into consideration also the honesty of the miner, because if there is one thing more than another impressed on the mind of the stranger going to Dawson, it is the great wrong that has been done, not by officials, but by the men themselves, in trying to rob each other in connection with the location of claims. What had the British Columbia government to do? They sent a judge from Victoria to Atlin City, and he sat there two or three months, trying to unravel the web or skein and set matters right. Well, he gave one claim to a particular man, there were ninety-nine persons dissatisfied to the one who was satisfied with the action of the government. Where there is an honest difference, and a man is deprived of his claim, I think it is only fair and just that there should be some method of compensating him.

I want to say a word about the royalty itself. While in Dawson, I met with men from South Africa, men representing British capitalists, Canadians from Dominion Creek, Eldorado, Hunker, and all over, and I made it my business, as far as I could, to obtain the views of these different men in regard to this question. I supported the royalty as it now stands for this reason, that as the country was a new country, and immense expenditures would have to be made on roads, on the improvement of the Yukon River, and in other ways, the government would require all the money they could possibly get hold of, in order to make these improvements, not so much for the benefit of eastern or western Canada, but for the benefit of the miners in that particular region. A good deal of money has been expended and wisely expended, and I think that as much as has been taken out of that country has been spent in it. I think, however, that we might now make a change which would be in the interests of that country, by the reduction of the royalty. I may say in passing that the men out there are not agreed themselves as to what reductions should be made. Mr. Wills, of the Bank of Commerce, one of the leading citizens of Dawson, thinks that the royalty should be put on a net basis, a great many others think it should be reduced one-half, and others that it should be still further reduced, so that there is a great deal of difference of opinion on that point. But I think that if you consider the government tax, the expenses that men are put to in the way of obtaining supplies, the royalty, the many other expenses of opening up the mines, such as the cost of labour, we will find that these men are very heavily taxed on what they take out, not only for the enrichment of themselves, but of the people at large, and I think it would be a very wise move on the part of the government to take off at least some of the royalty, and thus give a great impetus to the development of that country than can be given by maintaining the royalty as it is. I might say, with regard to representation, that one of the leading officials told me there were three strong reasons why this system of representation should be done away with. A man may get sick and have to be replaced. The man whom he puts in his place to do the necessary work may enter into a collusion with somebody else to do the owner out of his claim. The owner has no check over these men, but has to trust them to do the necessary work, and should they not do that work, he loses his claim besides the money he has paid to his representative. I think that that ought to be done away with altogether, and that instead a miner should be obliged to pay a certain sum per year, or for a number of years, that will entitle him to the possession of his claim without his having to depend upon others.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Without being obliged to do any development work?

Mr. MAXWELL. Yes, of course, the development work by those employed is, in many cases, practically a farce.

With regard to the officials, I found that the leading men of Dawson are strong admirers of the late administrator, Major Walsh. I found that the leading men of Dawson have no sympathy with the views expressed by the editor of the Nugget and by that American, whom the opposition took so fondly into their arms, Mr. Dunlevy. These men never represented the views of the best people of Dawson. I found still further that there was not one complaint against a single official in Dawson last year, and that the people had perfect confidence in them, feeling assured that they were doing their work honestly and fairly for the benefit of all. With regard to Mr. Ogilvie, I wish to reiterate the views which I expressed last session. After having been with him for a considerable time in Dawson, I can say from personal knowledge that not one respectable man in Dawson to-day will say that Mr. Ogilvie is dishonest. He may have his weaknesses, he may not be as strong as some would like him to be, he is not as partisan, I know, as a great many would like, but I believe that every honest man in Dawson to-day is convinced that Mr. Ogilvie is doing everything he can in an honest way for the development of Dawson City and the Yukon country. Then, with regard to the insinuation made by the ex-Minister of Finance concerning Mr. Senkler, the gold commissioner, there is not one dissentient voice in Dawson to-day in his regard.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman understood me to make any allusion to Mr. Senkler, let me say that I did not do so, and that if I said anything about the gold commissioner I did not refer to Mr. Senkler but to Mr. Ogilvie. With reference to Mr. Senkler, I have not heard a word to his discredit.

Mr. MAXWELL. I am glad to stand corrected, but am very sorry that the hon. gentleman should have said anything impugning the honesty of Mr. Ogilvie.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not wish to be held responsible for any other words with reference to Mr. Ogilvie than those I used.

Mr. MAXWELL. Certainly not. But I regret that any word should be spoken in this House to the detriment of the personal character and reputation of Mr. Ogilvie as an honest man in his administration.

The Yukon country is going ahead all right, but with reference to the royalty let me say that while undoubtedly there are rich claims in that country which can pay the 10 per cent easily without being hampered in their operation, the majority of claims to-day are not so rich as those on the Bonanza and Dominion creeks, and I believe that the 10 per cent royalty is retarding the development of claims that are not so rich, and that if it were reduced, a great deal more developments might be done because there would be then a greater incentive to miners to go in and develop those districts.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

WINNIPEG BY-ELECTIONS—REMUNERATION OF DEPUTY RETURNING OFFICERS.

Mr. PUTTEE asked :

Was an Order in Council issued for the sufficient remuneration of deputy returning officers and others acting at the recent by-election in Winnipeg, as provided for in section 123 of the Dominion Elections Act? If not, when will such order issue?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Section 123 of the Dominion Elections Act provides that in the electoral districts of Gaspé and Chicoutimi and Saguenay, in the province of Quebec, and Algoma, in the province of Ontario, which are very large electoral districts with sparse populations, and in similar districts in the provinces of British Columbia and Manitoba, the government may provide for increased remuneration for deputy returning officers. We do not see that the same reasons exist in Winnipeg, which is a city constituency. Therefore, the government does not propose to pass an order in council to give an extra rate of remuneration to the deputy returning officers.

THE ROYAL RESERVE.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON asked :

Has the Prime Minister seen the announcement of Her Majesty requesting all officers and non-commissioned officers and men who have previously served Her Majesty to join the colours, forming a royalty reserve, as several officers and men are in Canada anxious to show their devotion to the sovereign? Whether the government are going to take any steps to send those who would be willing to join?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The government have had no official information upon this subject, but I understand that General Lord William Seymour, commander of the forces, is attending to such matters. If the Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden) were here, he might give a little more information to my hon. friend.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Would the right hon. gentleman then allow this to stand?

The PRIME MINISTER. We have no official information, so I do not think there is more to be said than I have already stated.

I.C.R.—RIVIERE DU LOUP STATION HOUSE.

Mr. GAUVREAU (by Mr. Britton) asked :

Whether the Minister of Railways is aware that the station-house of the Intercolonial Railway at Rivière du Loup is in a deplorable condition; that it is too small for the traffic and business transacted therein and the numbers of travellers using it, and entirely unsuited to the requirements of the officials compelled to remain there?

If so, is it the intention of the government, or of the Minister of Railways, to build a new station-house, or to so increase the dimensions and accommodation facilities of the present building as to meet the requirements of business of the travelling public, of the officials of the railway and of the transit traffic with the Temiscouata Railway?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The minister is aware that the station house of the Intercolonial Railway at Riviere du Loup is requiring some repairs, and that it is not suitable for the traffic during the summer or tourist season. With a view to improving the facilities and making changes in the plan of the building to better adapt it to the traffic, plans are being prepared, and as soon as the working season opens, it is proposed to proceed with the work of improvement.

EDMONTON, YUKON AND PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

Has any contract been entered into by the government with the Edmonton, Yukon and Pacific Railroad Company for constructing the whole or any part of the railway, for fifty miles of which a subsidy was granted last year? Has the company to which this subsidy was granted, sold out its franchise to Messrs. Mann & McKenzie, or to any other party?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The government has not entered into a contract with the Edmonton, Yukon and Pacific Railway Company for constructing the whole or any part of the railway under the Subsidy Act of last year, nor is the government aware that the company have sold out their franchise to Messrs. McKenzie and Mann or any other party.

COST OF THE SOULANGES CANAL.

Mr. BERGERON (by Mr. Taylor) asked :

1. How much money has already been spent on the construction of the Soulanges Canal?
2. What is the amount of claims not yet settled and paid?
3. What is the amount of claims still in litigation or before the tribunals?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The amount of expenditure on construction of the Soulanges Canal, up to 24th February, 1900, is $5,489,230.57. The amount of claims not yet settled or paid according to the records of the department, is $608,331.53. The amount of claims still in litigation or before tribunals, is $466,533.60.

Mr. GAUVREAU.

BINDER TWINE, KINGSTON PENITENTIARY.

Mr. TAYLOR asked :

Did the government advertise in the newspapers that farmers could purchase binder twine at the Kingston Penitentiary until March 1? If so, in what papers and at what date was such advertisement inserted?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). 1. Yes. 2. The advertisement was inserted in the following newspapers: The Globe, Toronto; The Times, Hamilton; The Advertiser, London; The Free Press, Ottawa; The Whig, Kingston; The Witness, Montreal; La Patrie, Montreal; The Herald, Montreal; Le Soleil, Quebec; The Chronicle, Halifax; The Acadian Recorder, Halifax; The Globe, St. John, N.B.; The Telegraph, St. John, N.B.; The Transcript, Moncton; The Patriot, Charlottetown; The Free Press, Winnipeg; The Tribune, Winnipeg; The Leader, Regina; The Record, London; The Freeman, Kingston; Hardware and Metal, Toronto; The Examiner, Peterborough; The Beacon, Stratford; United Canada, Ottawa; Le Temps, Ottawa; The Farmers Advocate, London; The North-west Farmer, Winnipeg; The Times, Orillia; The Guide, Port Hope; The Star, Toronto; Battleford Herald, N.W.T.; Advocate, Prince Albert; Journal, Emerson, Man.; The Sun, Brandon, Man.; The Liberal, Portage la Prairie, Man.; The Banner, Chatham, Ont.; The Advertiser, Owen Sound; Danebrog, Ottawa; Journal of Agriculture, Quebec; The Tribune, Deseronto. This advertisement was issued on the 19th of January, 1900. The time for receiving orders from farmers has been extended until the 20th of March.

PRICES OF BINDER TWINE.

Mr. TAYLOR asked :

Has the government sent out a schedule of prices at which binder twine will be sold at the Kingston Penitentiary up to March 1, 1900, as follows:—

Binder Twine—Schedule of Prices.

Quantities.	Manila.	Mixed.	New Zealand.
	cts.	cts.	cts.
In lots of 50 tons and upwards....	12½	8½	8½
In carload lots (less than 50 tons).	13	10	9
In lots of one ton up to a carload..	13½	10½	9½
In lots of less than one ton.....	14	11	10

Terms, in all cases, cash on delivery.

If not, at what price will it be sold in above quantities up to March 1?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Yes. The prices were as quoted in the question with the exception of 'mixed' in fifty ton lots and upwards, for which the price was 9½ cents instead of 8½ cents.

ESTABLISHMENT OF A CANADIAN MINT.

On the notice of motion :

That in the opinion of this House it is desirable and expedient that the government should, at the earliest possible date, establish a mint in Canada for the purpose of coining all the gold, silver and copper currency necessary to meet the commercial requirements of the country.—(Mr. McInnes.)

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The hon. gentleman (Mr. McInnes) is not here, but I will give notice that when his motion is next called, I will ask my hon. friend to proceed with it, or let it drop.

DUTIES UPON TOBACCO.

Upon the notice of motion :

Resolved, that in the opinion of this House the present high duties upon tobacco should be reduced.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I will agree to the motion standing, but the next time it is called, I will ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gillies) to proceed with it, or let it drop.

Mr. GILLIES. I was ready to proceed with it at all times, but I let it stand at the request of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House.

The PRIME MINISTER. Well, we are ready.

ADJOURNMENT—UNOPPOSED MOTIONS.

The PRIME MINISTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. BERGERON. Mr. Speaker, there are some motions here, and I do not see why they have not been taken up, although we have made a bargain that we should take the unopposed motions. I have one here which only requires an answer, and I am very sorry that we are not going through the list again. There is a motion which I put on the Order paper at the request of one of the hon. ministers. It was a question, in fact, it might have been answered, but I was requested by that hon. gentlemen to make a motion of it. I was ready to make the motion, but the right hon. gentleman asked that it should stand. I will make it now.

The PRIME MINISTER. Perhaps we will have to make some answer to the hon. gentleman's motion, so that there are two sides to this question.

INQUIRY FOR REPORTS.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask when we are going to have the Trade and Commerce report, and the Trade and Navigation returns ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). I was asking the Printing Bureau about them, and I think I will be able to lay the Trade and Navigation returns on the Table to-morrow. The Trade and Commerce report will be down very soon after it.

Mr. FOSTER. It is reported amongst some members of the reptile press, that the hon. Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) is going to make his budget speech the last of this week.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). No date has yet been fixed for the budget; in fact, hon. gentlemen opposite have been manifesting such a disposition to get on with the real business, that we have not felt it necessary to do so before this.

Mr. FOSTER. The opposition has been very charitable knowing the state in which the government is.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, I have had a motion on the paper since February 14, in respect to the investigation which was partially held last session into the conduct of the returning officer and deputy returning officers at the election for the West Riding of Huron, and at the election for the town of Brockville. There was a very great willingness expressed last year; the investigation was partially proceeded with, and at the instance of the hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, a number of witnesses who were here, were sent away.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Order, order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman may ask a question, but no discussion can take place now.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. There is no discussion.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) is referring to the proceedings of the committee.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am referring to the report which is on the Table of the House, and which has been received.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman is referring to the proceedings of the committee.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am quite in order. I am referring to the proceedings of the committee as reported to this House.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) cannot discuss the question, unless there is a motion.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am referring to the fact that this motion has been on the Order paper for a long time, that it has stood over, at the instance of the government, and I would suggest to the right hon. Prime Minister that if the same desire animates him which animated him last year, this motion should have precedence in some way. We were reproached because it was not brought up sooner last year. We have given the very earliest possible notice this year, and notwithstanding that, this was objected to as a matter of privilege, and has been objected to from time to time since, on the ground that gentlemen on the other side of the House want to discuss something in connection with it. The report of the committee itself states that the investigation is incomplete, and that I should think, would be ample justification for dealing with it as an unopposed motion. I bring this matter to the attention of the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) in order that he may give it consideration.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am sure the hon. gentleman from Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) would not feel at all satisfied, if his motion were to be passed over for that of my hon. friend (Mr. Borden, Halifax.)

Mr. BERGERON. I do not want to say a word on my motion.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, February 27, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—SURRENDER OF GENERAL CRONJE.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I have the authority of His Excellency the Governor General to state that he has received the following despatch from Sir Alfred Milner, Governor of Cape Colony:

Cape Town, Feb. 27, 1900.—Cronje surrendered at daylight. Congratulate you on noble share taken by troops from your colony.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved :

That from this day to the end of the session, Government Orders shall have precedence on Thursdays, immediately after questions to be put by members.

He said : I may state that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is prepared at this moment to lay the Estimates on the Table of the House, and I trust my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) will agree to this motion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not see any objection to that.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). There is one word I would like to say on this motion. I have had a motion on the Order paper for some time with regard to continuing the inquiry into the conduct of certain officers of this House at the West Huron and Brockville elections. The motion came up last year, as a matter of privilege, and was not opposed. This year I tried on my first appearance in the House to have it dealt with in the same way, but at the instance of the government, as I understand, it was not dealt with in the same way. When the motion came up last night, and I was prepared to move it as an unopposed motion, the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) asked that the motion should stand, for the reason, I suppose, that some one desires to debate it. What there is to debate about it I cannot see, because the report of the committee speaks for itself and says, that the investigation is incomplete. Before the right hon. gentleman proceeds to take Thursday for government business, he should, I think, make some provision for having such an important matter which is so near to the privileges and rights and best interests of this House, advanced as rapidly as possible. Otherwise the motion may remain on the Order paper for a great length of time, and it may eventually become an adjourned debate and not be reached before the end of the session. I think this an opportune time to bring this matter again to the attention of the Prime Minister, and to ask him what his intention is with regard to it?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). Before my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) speaks on the subject, I wish to press upon him the extreme importance of this question. It is a question in which every member of this House, and in which the people of the country, are intensely interested. It is charged that most disgraceful conduct has taken place on the part of officials connected with the elections in Brockville and West Huron, and in view of what has been proven to have taken place in other elections in the province of Ontario, this becomes a matter of the very gravest importance.

I do not wish to refer to the proceedings of the committee ; but the impression has gone abroad, and is very widespread throughout this country that, to use the mildest term, the government did not in any way facilitate the proceedings of the Committee on Privileges and Elections on that most important question during last session. Anything more calculated to ruin and destroy the influence of this government cannot go abroad than the impression that they stand behind the committee, and are determined to obstruct its proceedings, instead of being disposed to give their heartiest and most thorough support to every step which may be taken for the purpose of destroying the disreputable and illegal means of depriving the people of this country of their honest franchise. That is the question now before the House and the country, and I have heard with great regret the suggestion, that the Chair should be invoked to prevent this motion passing promptly, so that the committee might be enabled at once to deal with that subject. The government have a very decided majority on the Committee on Privileges and Elections: they have the control of that committee largely in their own hands; and I desire in the strongest possible manner to impress upon the government, the absolute necessity of giving every possible assistance to have a prompt, full, free and fair investigation of one of the gravest questions which this House has ever had before it, and one which is receiving the attention of intelligent and fair-minded men all over the country. For a government to interpose any obstruction in the way of bringing to justice men, if such there are, who have been guilty of adopting means to deprive the electorate of the opportunity of giving their fair and dispassionate verdict, is fraught with consequences so grave that I hope my right hon. friend will at once agree to allow this motion to pass, and the Committee on Privileges and Elections to be charged as promptly as possible with the investigation of that matter; and not only that, but that the members of the government, who are members of that committee, will feel it a duty as incumbent upon them, as upon any other members of this House, to facilitate by every possible means a complete and thorough investigation, which shall remove the impression, if it be a false one, that most unjustifiable measures have been adopted by government officials in connection with these elections, and, that no such thing shall be permitted by any party to take place in this country.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House, is that Government Orders shall have precedence on Thursdays. This motion at this stage of the session is so natural, that my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) has at once assented to it. I do not see the connection between this motion and the matter that has been brought before the House by my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Borden); and he will himself be satisfied that there is no connection between the two, when he reflects that his motion cannot come up on Thursday. It can only come up on Monday or on Wednesday, before six o'clock, which is the time devoted to notices of motion. Thursday is devoted to Public Bills and Orders, and the Order paper is full of them; so that his motion cannot come up on that day. I am astonished at the remarks of my hon. friend from Halifax, and at the remarks of the hon. leader of the opposition, which I may be pardoned for saying are absolutely uncalled for. My hon. friend has no reason for saying that the government showed any disinclination to have his charges investigated. As soon as the committee was asked for, it was granted, and permission was also granted to the committee to sit during the sittings of the House. But often the committee sat without a sufficient number of members to make a quorum, only two or three members being present. There was no inclination on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite to attend the committee. Nor has my hon. friend from Halifax shown any anxiety this session to go on with this question. Two weeks of the session elapsed before my hon. friend moved in the matter.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That is not quite correct. I brought it up as a matter of privilege on Tuesday, the 13th.

The PRIME MINISTER. The motion was made on the 19th of February, and notice was given on the 17th or the 18th. Therefore, I am quite within the truth in saying that two weeks elapsed before my hon. friend showed any inclination to go on with the matter.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The Prime Minister is not correctly informed. The motion stood on the Order paper of the 14th, and two days before that I sought to bring it up as a matter of privilege.

The PRIME MINISTER. On the hon. gentleman's own showing, it was two weeks within two days after the opening of the session before he moved; and I must say that I did not see any particular anxiety to proceed with that motion yesterday, when the whole day was taken up with the discussion of a stale question. If the Order paper had been proceeded with as usual, we would, no doubt, have reached the motion of my hon. friend. My hon. friend is anxious to bring up this question; but my hon. friend is not the only person who is anxious. There are other members equally anxious to bring up questions, and my experience is that it is far preferable to adhere strictly to the rules of the House. Whenever we depart from the rules of the House, we are sure to land in trouble; whereas, if those rules, which embody the experience of ages in parliamentary matters, are adhered to, no injustice can be done to any one.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). I cannot understand in what sense the hon. member holds that there is no connection between the motion of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), and this question. The connection is simply this, that the government propose to take away one of the days belonging to private members, and this is one of the motions in the hands of private members.

Mr. CASEY. It cannot come on Thursday.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman cannot know very much about parliamentary procedure, or he would know that although notices of motion come on Monday, they can as well come on Thursday, if the other business is first disposed of; and up to the present time the government has had no business to go on with. If the motion of the Prime Minister is carried, and another day is taken from private members, and he persists in adhering strictly to the rules, we shall have less opportunity to go on with this motion, and get the papers before the committee. I have been in this House a considerable time, and I have yet to learn that it has not been the custom very frequently to depart from the well-established rules of the House, when exigencies or circumstances justify it; and in this case. I think they do. In this case we think it does. There is nothing more important to parliament or the people than purity of elections. The allegations set up in connection with these cases were that the elections in question were saturated with fraud, and all the information we have obtained up to the present justifies that conclusion; and it is for the purpose of concluding that investigation, part of which is reported to the House, that this motion is made, which the government are opposing on a mere technicality. Last session we declared that this House would avail itself at the earliest opportunity to go on and complete the inquiry; and as soon as my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Borden) came here he made the usual motion to have the inquiry gone on with, believing that no one would object to it. But, strange to say, a supporter of the government was put up to object to it.

The PRIME MINISTER. Who is he?

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. member for North Wellington.

Mr. McMULLEN. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to say that his statement is absolutely unfounded? I was not spoken to by any minister of the Crown or any other member of this House, either on the one side or the other. I took the action I did simply because I want to see the business of the House conducted according to rules.

Mr. SPROULE. I considered myself justified in saying that the hon. gentleman was put up to make the objection he did, because no member of this House ever showed more righteous indignation against anything that savoured of corruption in elections than did the hon. gentleman when he sat on this side, and no one was more ready to demand investigation at the earliest opportunity. I, therefore, could not deem it possible that, of his own motion, he would have risen to try and burk the inquiry into this most important case. And I think that his own constituents will view with alarm his conduct as a complete departure from the hon. gentleman's past record on such questions as this.

A month of the session has now passed. Last session the committee held over 25 meetings, sitting day and night, and examined a great number of witnesses, and only succeeded in going through a portion of one constituency, examining into what took place at each polling station, with several others yet to be investigated, before the work is concluded in the first constituency. If we are prevented from getting these papers referred back to the committee for another month, the result will be that we will not be able this session to get through the inquiry. If we had the papers before the committee now, it would take that committee, with all the time at its disposal, every day from now to the end of the session to complete the investigation and report so as to enable us to consider the report before adjournment. Is it any wonder, then, that we should be anxious to get these papers before the committee again without delay? And we are warranted in adversely criticising the right hon. First Minister when he insists on enforcing the strict rules of the House and thus keep back this motion for several weeks yet. This course of procedure will not be viewed with favour by the country. During all this delay members may be sitting here, who are not entitled to their seats, who have obtained their election through the operations of a gang that would be a discredit to any country. The Committee on Privileges and Elections is the only body that can deal with this matter, and we are prevented going on before that committee by the action of the government in refusing to allow this motion to pass. This is a motion which any one would have thought the government would have allowed to pass without requiring any notice of it at all. The government are aware of the evidence that was brought out before the committee last year, and I am confident that equally damaging evidence will be brought out this session, as soon as we are allowed to bring before the committee witnesses in connection with the West Huron and Brockville elections, which have not yet been inquired into. The country will view with alarm the conduct of the government in preventing our passing that motion and bringing that information before the committee, so as to expose and by that means put an end to the system of bribery and corruption which has been rampant during the past few years, in the province of Ontario at least.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I would call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that the terms in which this matter has been referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for investigation does not and cannot—no matter what the findings of that committee may be—in any way affect the sitting of any hon. member in this House. This House has not yet gone so far as to usurp the functions which have been by law vested in our judges to try election petitions. It went so far last year as to refer the conduct of certain officials in certain elections to the inquiry of the Committee on Privileges and Elections; but whether those officials were strictly regular or not in the performance of their duties cannot affect the sitting of any hon. member in this House, so that the simulated indignation of my hon. friend is entirely wide of the mark.

Mr. SPROULE. Would the hon. gentleman allow me? If it were clearly laid before that committee that certain members were sitting in this House by virtue of a system of corruption, does the hon. minister not think that such hon. gentlemen would be bound in honour to follow the usual course under such circumstances, and resign their seats.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I should rather prefer, before giving judgment, to wait until I hear the evidence. I am not going to prejudge the case. If I am to act as a member of that committee, I should prefer to wait for the evidence before giving judgment.

I must frankly confess that I am some what appalled at the future which, according to my hon. friend, lies before that committee. We spent between $10,000 and $20,000 last year and examined nearly 100 witnesses, and if the hon. gentleman is correct—and I presume he is junior counsel for the prosecution, as he is sitting next to the hon. member for Halifax—we were to sit every morning and afternoon as we did last year for the rest of the session, supposing the session reaches the normal length of four months, we will even then not be able to complete the inquiry, although we may have examined many hundreds of witnesses. That is an appalling future. It means an expenditure of an enormous sum of money without the hope of reaching a conclusion even then.

But I did not rise to discuss the matter except for the purpose of entering my most earnest and energetic protest against the statement of the hon. leader of the opposition that in the conduct of that inquiry members of the government threw obstruction in its way.

Mr. SPROULE.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I beg to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the statement is without a shadow of foundation. I have sat on many election committees during the last eighteen years in this House, and I have never been on a committee where such facilities were afforded by the government for the inquiry as in this case. Why, if the government had had the slightest desire, they could have stopped the inquiry at any time. The Conservative members of the committee got tired of it; they did not attend, and no quorum could be had. If it had not been for our consenting to the committee going on with two or three present, it could not have gone on. Day after day witnesses were examined with three or four members present. Then, members of the government had to give up their work, and even leave the House when matters here demanded their attention and go and sit in that committee day after day, morning and afternoon. The hon. gentleman said that he had strong evidence to bring out to show wrong-doing. And so the committee went on. The quorum was reduced, and even then the committee was allowed to sit assuming that there was a quorum present, when, as a matter of fact, there was not. The treasury was placed at their disposal, and every member of the committee was allowed, practically, to bring forward as a witness whomever he pleased. I rise not to claim credit for anything the government did, but to enter my emphatic and determined protest against the statement that there was any disposition shown by the government to throw the slightest obstacle in the way of the fullest investigation into the matter. In my opinion the government deserves credit and should receive credit from the hon. gentlemen opposite for the manner in which they acted from beginning to end of this inquiry. But no matter what we do to facilitate inquiry, instead of getting thanks, we get abuse for it.

Mr. G. E. CASEY (West Elgin). The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) makes a great point of the possibility that if Thursday were not taken by the government we might reach the motion on that day. The hon. gentleman is quite an old member of this House, and I sat here a good many years before he came in; and neither of us, I venture to say has ever, at this period of the session, seen the list of public Bills and orders exhausted on Thursday, or any possibility of getting at a notice of motion on that day. As a matter of practical fact, not of theoretical possibility, the chances of getting this motion brought forward are not in the slightest degree affected by taking Thursday. But the hon. gentleman goes further, as his leader did, and urges us to break the rule, to take this motion out of its order and move it without notice, at a time when notices of motion are not allowed to come up, all on the plea of facilitating inquiry. And when we do not agree to it, hon. gentlemen opposite declare that we are trying to burk inquiry. I think that the House and the country are getting tired of this pinchbeck, German-silver imitation of a desire for political purity on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Talk about burking inquiry: There was a time when charges were made concerning an election in which the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir A. Caron), then representing a different constituency, was interested. These charges were brought before the House in a form calculated, in the opinion of those who presented them, to elicit the truth. But they were mangled and mutilated by hon. gentlemen then sitting on the Treasury benches, and these charges had to go to committee in such a shape that the truth could not be elicited by the inquiry. The hon. member for East Grey, who talks now about burking inquiry, sat here and voted in favour of that mutilation, voted to prevent inquiry. Was that example followed in this case? Did not the House jump at the opportunity to investigate these charges? I say the House went, if anything, too far in the latitude they allowed the Privileges and Elections Committee to take; they permitted a liberty they should not have permitted, with the law and with the courts of the country—and with the treasury, as an hon. member near me suggests. Why were not petitions entered in the regular way? The courts were open to these hon. gentlemen; but, not having entered these petitions, hon. gentlemen opposite thought they could gain a little popularity by going on a fishing excursion. In the first place, six weeks of the valuable time of the country was occupied by a debate on the address, and other matters were gone on with before the inquiry was brought on. Toward the latter part of the session this move for an inquiry was made; and then hon. gentlemen opposite kept the House sitting six weeks after the real business of the House was concluded, or might have been concluded. In order that this fishing inquiry might go on. It was evident they did not know what they intended to prove; they had not any trustworthy information as to what they could prove; but they went on in the hope that they could prove something. And, while they were fishing upstairs in the committee room, their colleagues here were talking against time in the most open and acknowledged way, keeping the House in session merely in order that the committee might continue to fish. But they had very poor luck. They were great fishermen; but there were no fish for them to catch, evidently, for they did not catch any.

The hon. member for East Grey says that the evidence taken went to show the existence of widespread corruption. I say the evidence taken did not go to show anything of the kind, but that the result of this long inquiry was only to convince the public at large that there was nothing to be inquired into. There appeared at one time to have been a discovery about ballots—I am not going into details; we remember what that was—but, on further inquiry, that was found to be a mare's nest. There were other sub-inquiries started that resulted in nothing. They must have been very tired fishing, but the government did right in allowing them even to sit without a quorum. That was breaking the rules of the House, but it was right enough, seeing the committee wanted it. The government gave them rope enough, and, while they did not exactly hang themselves, they went on and proved that there was nothing in the whole business. Now, in addition to wasting six weeks of the time of the committee, the whole House were kept here in order that the committee might sit. And, at the end of it all, what do we find? Do we find the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), this session anxious to get this matter before the House? By no means. He is a young member of the House, it is true; but he must have found out in the few sessions he has been here, that, in the early days of the session the Notice paper soon gets full of notices. But instead of putting on his notice—which is simple and could be prepared without loss of time,—in the first days of the session—he leaves it over for a fortnight, and allows the paper to get full of notices of motion, and then he puts it on. Then hon. gentlemen opposite ask us to break the rules of the House in order to rectify this blunder of the attorney for the prosecution. I say we should be demeaning ourselves if we agreed to it. We could not do it without the consent of every member of this House; and I say we should not do it, even if we could.

My impression of the whole matter is that the House stultified itself last year by allowing a fishing expedition of this kind. If there was not enough evidence to justify putting up a deposit and entering a petition, we should not risk going into the matter. When the statute puts the authority to inquire into electoral corruption into the hands of the courts, we are going beyond our constitutional authority if we go into such matters, returning officers and deputy returning officers, have done anything illegal. That far, perhaps, we might have been justified in going. But this committee did not confine itself entirely to that question. Latitude was allowed that, I think, should not have been allowed. I venture to think that the House went rather too far in interfering with the action of the courts in this matter. But so far as the present motion is concerned, it certainly has no bearing whatever on the question of when this inquiry was to go before that committee.

At the same time, I would say a word to the right hon. the Premier on behalf of those who have business on the paper that might come up on Thursdays. I do not remember whether the hon. member for Grey has a Bill there or not; he generally has, and I have one there, and other members have public Bills that we consider of importance and that we would like to get advanced a stage. I would suggest that possibly the coming Thursday of this week might be expected from the motion, for the reason that we do not sit to-morrow evening (Ash Wednesday) when such Bills would naturally come on; and I would urge upon the Premier, as a matter of expediting the business before the House, that seeing we have lost all Wednesday, we might have Tuesday of this week for the purpose of giving a lot of these Bills a stage that would enable them to go before the committees, and so get them off the Order paper. It has unfortunately happened that on several Wednesday evenings already the House has not sat, and on Thursdays other discussions have sprung up which have prevented these Bills getting a stage. I would urge these considerations on the Premier.

Mr. N. C. WALLACE (West York). I think the government's defence for the course that they propose to take is a very weak one. The Committee on Privileges and Elections was appointed on Friday, the 9th of February, the House did not sit again until Monday, the 12th, and on Tuesday, the 13th, the member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) gave notice to the government and to the House that he would bring up this question on the next day. The next day objection was made by a gentleman who solemnly assures this House that he was not inspired by the government to rise and make that objection. Well, if he were not inspired by the government, if this idea of burking the inquiry, stultifying the investigation, and closing up wrong-doing, emanated from the breast of the member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) himself, then I say so much the worse for the member for North Wellington. I know that the member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) made a statement that the member for North Wellington was put up to do that job. He stated the reasons why he thought the hon. member was put up: because we know that on many occasions the member for North Wellington has done exactly the kind of work that the government would desire to have done. Now, with reference to the statement of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies). He says the ministers had to leave the House many times to attend this committee when the House was sitting. Why, Mr. Speaker, it was a matter of public notoriety that when that committee was not sitting you could scarcely ever find a minister in his seat except the Premier himself. They have absented themselves conspicuously, and more particularly when matters affecting their departments were likely to come up for consideration. With reference to his statement that the government reduced the quorum on that committee—it was not the members of the committee who reduced the quorum. The member for Halifax asked that the quorum be reduced, and it was reduced, and the object was to permit the investigation to go on when there was not a quorum present. But does not every member of this House know that in the Committee of Railways and Canals that has occurred hundreds of times?

Mr. CASEY.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). No, no.

Mr. WALLACE. I have been present scores of times when the committee was sitting when there was no quorum.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not think it.

Mr. WALLACE. So there was no concession granted in that regard at all. The supporters of the government refused point-blank to reduce the quorum.

Now, with regard to another important matter. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries says he wants to hear the evidence. Well, Sir, if the Minister of Marine and Fisheries wants to hear the evidence, something has happened since last session, because during last session, if there were two flagrant sinners in this respect in blocking and burking the investigation, in preventing the facts from coming before that committee, those two members were the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the member for Kingston (Mr. Britton). These two gentlemen attempted at every stage to lengthen out the investigation, to prevent the true facts of the case from being disclosed; and as we know, witnesses were held here day after day when all that was really wanted of them was an examination not lasting more than five minutes, at a cost to the country, as the minister tells us, of from $10,000 to $20,000. What do they care for $20,000 when the object was to screen wrong-doers, to hide the evidence of the grossest bribery, stealing and everything in the calendar except arson? In Toronto they have a more ready way of adjusting these matters, they simply put the ballot boxes in the fire, and as the ballots were not fireproof, they went up in smoke. Now, these gentlemen do not need to expect that they are going to prevent an investigation. We will have that investigation, we will compel them to permit that investigation to go on; and if they attempt the tactics which they carried out last year, and in which the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the member for Kingston were the two most conspicuous sinners, if I may apply that mild term to them, they will not be permitted to do so again, because public attention will be called to them, and those gentlemen who snapped their fingers last year at public opinion will be compelled this year to bow down before public opinion. They know that they are nearer a general election by one year, and they know that the elections that have been held have shown that they are not so sure of their position in the future as they were last year. Now, Sir, with reference to the hon. First Minister himself.

Mr. WOOD. Why did you not take this case to the courts where these hon. gentlemen could not interfere with you?

Mr. WALLACE. This case was taken to the highest court in the Dominion of Canada, and we will see, Mr. Speaker, that the parliament of Canada will not burk, and will not get out of this question. I was going to refer to the course of the First Minister himself. The member for Halifax was willing that that motion of his should go through yesterday without any remarks from him. It had been exhaustively discussed before in the House. The First Minister made his speech upon it and it was referred to the committee. The committee reported that their investigations were incomplete, and, therefore, this parliament was in duty bound to furnish every facility for continuing that investigation. But what occurred? The right hon. First Minister said 'stand.' What for? That was his statement yesterday. Did he want to make a speech on it, or did he want to obstruct the passage of this motion before the House?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The hon. gentleman has no right to refer to a past debate.

Mr. WALLACE. I think I have a perfect right to call attention to this fact, since the matter has been brought up, and to say that the First Minister himself asked that the matter stand. What for? Now, Sir, we must have an answer in this House. The investigation started in the midst of the trial. We are to-day in the middle of the trial, because we have not yet reached one-quarter of the iniquities. I presume we are on the way to unearthing rascalities in connection with the election in West Huron and Brockville, and instead of offering every facility and giving every opportunity for the investigation to proceed, the right hon. Prime Minister said 'stand,' when the introducer of the motion had nothing to say, or waived any right that he might have to speaking, and simply let it go without remark. He was permitted to have this matter brought up in that way. Every step that has been taken from the time the committee was granted, both in the committee and in this House, has given evidence, as we see to-day, that the government are determined to prevent the investigation. If they are, we will let the country know the attitude and position of the government of the day; I see the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) before me, with a severe, a righteous and a virtuous look upon his face, which, I am sure, does not emanate from his heart, and which, as an hon. gentleman has just remarked, would astonish his family. It would astonish anybody who knew him. These hon. gentlemen are attempting, and successfully attempting, to prevent an investigation being held into these matters. If there is any one subject that this country is determined shall be investigated, the truth of which shall be found out, it is the question of who the parties were who stole ballot papers, who the parties were who took out ballots that had been marked by men, and substituted marked ballots for the other candidate, who were the men who manipulated these matters, and more important that all, not the Cap. Sullivan's, Tim Murphy's and other men of that class, but—

Mr. SPEAKER. Perhaps the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace), will confine himself to the subject.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am referring to the historical aspect of the case. I say, that, in the investigation, we not only want to ascertain if there were any guilty parties who did these acts, but we want to know who prompted them, who furnished the enormous sinews of war that would be required from the beneficiaries of these illegal acts, and we are going to continue the investigation until we trace it up to the highest sources. We know those who have been guilty in Dominion and local elections; we know the men; we know that there are ministers implicated, we know that all these things must come out, that they will come out, and that any attempt on the part of the right hon. Prime Minister, of the hon. member for North Wellington, and of any other hon. member opposite, to prevent this investigation going forward, will be a lamentable failure, because we are bound to have an investigation.

Mr. McMULLEN. Mr. Speaker, I want to speak to the question before the House.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman has spoken already.

Mr. McMULLEN. I merely put a question. I simply wish to refer to what the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) said. In the first place, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), I am sure, is one of the ablest lawyers in this House. I quite agree with that statement made by the hon. member for West York. He certainly knows the rules of this House, and he must certainly have known that when he took the course he did, in order to bring this matter before the House, he was taking a course that was not in accordance with the rules of the House.

Mr. McNEILL. I rise to a question of order. I want to know if this is a personal explanation.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. member for Halifax fully expected that he would be called to order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I propose to allow the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) to go on, simply because this is, as we have done a dozen times before. If you allow one hon. member to exceed the limits of the debate it introduces an entirely new discussion. The hon. gentleman has a right to defend himself under the circumstances.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Speaker, when shall we get back to parliamentary practice? Now is the time to go back to the parliamentary practice which is observed in every other House of Commons regulated by the rules which control us.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have a perfect right to reply to the charges made against me. The hon. member for West York made a personal reference to me, and I think I am entitled, under the privileges of this, to reply to these statements.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point in order. Is the ruling, such as you state it, to be the practice of this House that, when an hon. gentleman has spoken, when any hon. gentleman has replied to him, and he considers that something has been said against him, he can rise and make another speech?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). He has not spoken.

Mr. SPEAKER. Technically, I want to correct the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster). The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) gave place to the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) to make a statement. The hon. member for East Grey referred to a matter, and the hon. member for North Wellington undertook to correct him. Beyond that, he was not allowed to make any further statement.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) has not spoken?

Mr. McMULLEN.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Certainly not.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. member for East Grey charged me with having done a certain thing at the instigation of the ministers, and challenged me to say it was correct or not. I merely replied, saying that he was incorrect in that statement. I shall now go on. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) is unquestionably a man of high standing in his profession, and he must have known when he introduced the question that he did in this House, for the purpose of getting that committee, that he was taking an irregular proceeding, and a proceeding that would not be tolerated if any hon. member objected to it. I objected to it; I knew that it was out of order, and I come to the conclusion now that he was intentionally out of order. I believe that hon. gentlemen opposite do not want the matter to go before the committee, but they want to have an opportunity in this House of getting up a grievance and trying to load upon the government the responsibility of trying to burk the investigation. It looks quite like it. Another thing is, that hon. gentlemen opposite appear to be loaded up with the idea that every hon. gentleman on this side of the House and the government are all in collusion to do corrupt and wrong things. They are measuring the present government's corn in their own bushel. They followed the system so long, that, now they have got into opposition, they think that in every little thing that comes up the government are following in the very same lines that they adopted when they sat on this side of the House. They did that in connection with the investigation that took place in regard to the Drummond County Railway.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order, order.

Mr. McMULLEN. First they thought there was corruption, and afterwards they admitted there was none. In connection with West Huron, there was a very extended investigation last year. A great many persons were subpoenaed; they came to the House, sat in rows on the chairs along the corridor, like so many pigeons on a fence rail, waiting to be shot, or called in. These people were eventually taken in, examined, and after an exhaustive investigation, there was not a single thing or item proved wrong on the part of any deputy returning officer in West Huron.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. McMULLEN. No; on the part of any deputy returning officer there was no wrong proved at all. The investigation got so stale, that in the end, as has already been stated, a quorum could not be got together to attend it while it was proceeding. On several occasions I was present when only three or four members of the committee attended, and the fact was that they found they had nothing to prove, and so it virtually frittered out. I am not one to stand in the way of an investigation, which would be calculated to secure to a man his rights as a member of this House or which would tend to show that another man held his seat wrongly. I believe we should have purity of elections and that men sitting in this House should be returned honestly, but it is amusing to see how virtuous hon. gentlemen opposite have become recently, when we remember that when the Liberals were in opposition, and when we pointed out that the ballot boxes were manipulated in a scandalous way, these gentlemen simply sneered and laughed at us. Take the case of Mr. Baird. My hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace), appears to forget that Mr. Baird came to this House from King's County, N.B., representing a minority of the electors—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. McMULLEN. There was also the McGillivray case, but it appears to be out of order to refer to these cases in this debate. I have no objection that every opportunity should be given to my hon. friend (Mr. Borden), to hold a decent investigation, but the kind of investigation that was held last year was neither creditable to the House nor to the government that permitted it to go so far. Whenever a member of this House makes a distinct statement that a certain individual is guilty of wrong-doing in the discharge of his duty, and when the time for filing a protest has gone past, I am prepared to admit that it might be well to investigate that. But I do not think it is proper to hold such an inquiry as that of West Huron last year when witness after witness by the dozens were called up and had nothing to prove. I am prepared to express that opinion before my constituents and before the House and to contend that it is not the intention of parliament that an unlimited investigation of that kind should be gone into in the case of every constituency. If every member of this House is liable to have his seat challenged in that way, then we had better go back to the old system of hearing election trials before a committee of the House. If such a state of affairs is to exist there is no use any longer of dividing the work between the judges and the House of Commons. The courts have been given charge of these matters, and to the credit of the courts be it said they have discharged their duties well in this regard. So far as wrong-doing is concerned, we could trace a good deal of that to hon. gentlemen opposite and some of it to the constituency of West York. I believe there is a memorable hall in the constituency of the hon.

gentleman (Mr. Wallace) where a great many met night after night for the purpose of concocting schemes and debauching the constituencies and doing what was wrong. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) will reflect he will know that his constituency was not free from that.

Mr. WALLACE. Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) say where this hall is?

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) is posted on that himself.

Mr. WALLACE. This is the first I ever heard of it, and I would like to get some information about it.

Mr. McMULLEN. Ask for an investigation.

Mr. WALLACE. I want to know now where is that hall and who are the persons who met in it?

Mr. McMULLEN. By-and-by we will investigate it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no; take it back.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am sorry I interrupted my hon. friend—

Mr. WALLACE. I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker, and my point of order is, that the hon. member for North Wellington has stated that there is a hall in my constituency where a lot of wrong-doing was concocted—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). That is not a point of order.

Mr. WALLACE. The Minister of Marine (Sir Louis Davies) had better wait till I get through before he interrupts. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) has said that I was cognizant of these facts. It is the first time I ever heard of any wrong-doing. I do not know what hall he referred to, I do not know what parties he referred to, but when he makes the statement that I was connected in any way near or remote with such doings, he says what is absolutely false and untrue.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Order.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, absolutely untrue.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) used another word.

Mr. WALLACE. I say it is untrue, and if it were parliamentary I would like to say it was false. I cannot find a word too strong to characterize such a statement.

Mr. McMULLEN. I wish to state, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order:

Mr. SPEAKER. To my mind there is no point of order. The whole matter is outside the discussion now before the House. The hon. member (Mr. Wallace) has denied the statement of the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) point-blank and he says there is no foundation for the statement. It seems to me that both hon. gentlemen are in an even position.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If a member makes a statement attacking the character of another member upon a question of fact, and the other member rises in his place and says the statement has no foundation in fact; it is, I think, the practice of this House that the member making the statement should accept the denial. That has been the usual ruling in this House, and the hon. member who made the statement should withdraw it.

Mr. SPEAKER. If we were going back to the beginning of this debate I would, I think, have to exact a withdrawal from the hon. member (Mr. Sproule) with regard to his statement that the hon. member (Mr. McMullen) was put up to do a certain thing.

Mr. SPROULE. And if you ruled, Mr. Speaker, that I had not the right to make that statement I would withdraw it.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON (Three Rivers). I would not have spoken in this debate were it not for a remark made by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) which was personal to myself. A lamer defence of the action of the government than that made by the hon. member (Mr. Casey), I cannot well understand. I feel myself rather at a disadvantage in discussing the case to which he referred, because it was your lamented predecessor, Sir, who attacked me on that occasion and brought charges against me in this House. Sir James Edgar not only moved for a fishing investigation, but he attempted to get that fishing investigation to cover the long period from 1873, when I first entered the House, until 1894, when the charge was made. What was the course of the government at that time? Sir John Thompson, one of the luminaries of the bar, without favour, or without any desire to sacrifice his position as a great lawyer to any party, stated: 'What you have to do is to make a charge, and we shall be prepared to take it up and investigate it'; and the motion was made by my hon. friend and late leader, Sir Mackenzie Bowell. He said: 'Reduce your charges to a period of time that can be investigated, and whether they are against a member of the cabinet or a private member supporting the Conservative government, they shall be investigated.' What more does my hon. friend demand to-day? I am not prepared to say, until the investigation is entered into, whether he is right in his surmises or wrong; but it is the duty of the government to settle the question by granting an investigation within limits which every member of parliament has a right to expect. What was the course followed in the investigation in my case? The charges were limited to a reasonable period of time, and a royal commission was appointed to investigate them, consisting of three judges whose names stand higher in the province of Quebec than those of any other judges on the Bench. I went before these judges, and the witnesses were brought before them, and the report of that commission was carried in the House of Commons by the largest majority that has ever been recorded in the parliament of Canada. But to-day we find this government shirking investigation. Are they afraid of having it? The lame defence of the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) places the government in the most awkward position possible. His defence is simply that we have lost a lot of time on this discussion, and that we should not lose any more time. But is Canada to be debarred from ascertaining whether the members who represent public opinion in this House have been elected without the devices which we know prevailed in the province of Ontario during the late elections? I think the government are placed in a position that is fatal to our parliamentary system. If they do not wish to have the investigation, let them say so, and let parliament decide; but let them not fall back upon the lame defence of the hon. member for West Elgin, and try to get out of it by a subterfuge which the public of Canada will not accept, but must condemn. Sir James Edgar when called upon to produce his witnesses to prove his charges against me failed to attend the request of the committee.

Mr. ALEX. McNEILL (North Bruce). Mr. Speaker, the statement made by my right hon. friend the First Minister in reference of this matter is one which I think on the face of it will be borne out by all the members of this House, especially those who have had any considerable experience of the House. I am sure we all of us feel that it is very important indeed that there should be as little infringement as possible upon those rules which have been found by a long experience to be in the interest of the proper conduct of our parliamentary business. But, Sir, there are exceptions to every rule, and the question is whether such a condition of things exists in reference to the matter now under discussion as to make it advisable to depart from the usual practice. Now, I venture to say that if ever there was a case in which it would be desirable to infringe on the ordinary proceedings of this House, this is that case, because this is a matter which deals with the very foundations on which this House exists. It is a matter which goes to the very root of our representation. It is a question which, if it is not properly dealt with, must end in the destruction of representative institutions in Canada. If ever there was an occasion, I say, when the ordinary rules should be departed from, this is the occasion: and more, Sir, I venture to say that the people of this country will say that this is the occasion. I venture to say that the people of this country will say that they are not going to be deprived of their franchise by this government or by any other government. That is the question. Now, I am not going to bandy words as to whether this party was wrong or that party was wrong. We know that we have a condition of things existing in Canada to-day which is a disgrace to the country. Such a condition of things has been exposed as makes every man who is not a violent partisan on one side or the other blush for the name of Canada; and the question we have to decide here to-day is whether some technical rule, which we admit to be under ordinary conditions a wise rule, shall be applied so as to prevent the redress of the grievances of which the people are complaining. That is the question. What does it matter in this regard whether there has on some former occasion been guilt on this side of the House or not? If there has been guilt on this side of the House, that is all the more reason why we should have this investigation, and why this thing should be put down with a strong hand. The more widely this corruption has spread, the deeper it has entered into the vitals of our political life, the more reason there is that we should put an end to it. I am astonished to find hon. gentlemen opposite dealing with the question in the manner in which they have. My hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Casey), to use a colloquial expression, let the cat out of the bag. He said we had gone too far last session. It was found, when the investigation was entered upon, that it was going a great deal too far for some people on that side of the House. The right hon. gentleman, when the matter was first brought before the attention of parliament, admitted frankly that such a prima facie case was made out as to render the investigation demanded absolutely necessary. What, then, is the good of harking back about courts of law. That was considered last session, and it was then determined that an investigation was absolutely necessary. I would ask, such being the case, why are we not allowed to go on with it? I would ask the right hon. gentleman whether he cannot agree to the statement I have made that this is a case in which the ordinary rules of procedure ought to be set aside, and whether we ought not to make a special rule, if desirable, for the express purposes of dealing with this case?

Such a condition of things has never existed in the history of Canada before as exists here to-day; and I am not careful to say whether anything of the kind has been done on this side or not. If it has, all the worse for Canada and all the more necessary that we should have this investigation, and all the less excuse for my right hon. friend to throw any obstacle whatever in the way of reaching an investigation as quickly as possible.

The PRIME MINISTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. McNEILL. My right hon. friend says 'hear, hear,' and I would ask him to explain. I understood him to say, in the most express manner, that he would not allow the ordinary rules of the House in any way to be infringed in order that we might reach this investigation without delay.

The PRIME MINISTER. That is not putting an obstacle.

Mr. McNEILL. I consider it is. But if my right hon. friend chooses to split hairs, and say it is not putting an obstacle, then it is leaving an obstacle which he will not allow us to remove. Whether he is putting an obstacle or leaving an obstacle in the way, which he has the power to remove, amounts practically to the same thing. I say that he ought not to leave any obstacle, which he has the power to remove, in the way of this investigation.

Mr. B. M. BRITTON (Kingston). I do not intend to discuss the question involved in the motion, notice of which is on the paper, and would not have said a word about it were it not for the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House. That hon. gentleman surely cannot remember what appears in Hansard, as the statement of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), when he introduced his motion last session calling for a committee, and he must equally have forgotten the provisions of the Election Act, or he would know that there is not a single point raised in the presentation of this matter to the House that could not to-day be as well investigated by the courts as ever. In my opinion the question which the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) put to the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) is entirely in point, namely, why this matter might not be referred to the courts for investigation. And the question might also be asked: Why do hon. gentlemen opposite not now go to the courts to investigate every charge they make in reference to this matter?

I wish to refer briefly to what the hon. member for West York was pleased to say with reference to myself. He characterized me as one of those who tried to obstruct the action of the committee. Sir, nothing of the kind was done. The questions asked in that committee were, in my opinion, very proper ones, and no lawyer, I venture to say, even on the other side, unless he wanted to make political capital, would have objected either to the mode of examination or to anything else that took place in the endeavour to elicit the truth from the witnesses before the committee.

Mr. WALLACE. Did not the hon. member for Halifax object to the waste of time of the committee in asking questions not relevant?

Mr. BRITTON. I dare say he did, but lawyers differ as to what questions are relevant, and the hon. gentleman who asked the questions objected to, I suppose, had as good a right to think them relevant as the hon. member for Halifax had to think the contrary.

One cannot help thinking, in listening to what has been said in this House, and considering the ostentatious manner in which this matter is brought forward from time to time, that hon. gentlemen opposite are actuated by something else than a simple desire to get at the facts and punish the guilty. Their conduct is simply part of a plan carried out from the beginning, namely, throw as much dirt as you can, spread it all over the country as fast and hard as you can, and some will be sure to stick. As an illustration of this, let me quote an article from the Montreal Witness, dated 29th April last, commenting on what was printed in the Toronto Telegram concerning what was alleged to have taken place in Brockville. This article is headed 'Dishonest Journalism':

It is perhaps worth while demonstrating for once in a way the deliberate falsehood which characterizes reports of election incidents on to the political organs. At the recent Brockville election an elector was given a duly initialled ballot-paper, in the presence of the agents or scrutineers of the political parties, who are present to watch the proceedings on behalf of the candidates of their own party. The elector seems to have had a bogus ballot-paper in his possession, with forged initials, which he attempted to deposit instead of the true ballot. The returning officer detected the forgery, and the elector slipped out of the polling booth. Now, here is the account telegraphed to the Conservative organs of this incident:

'During the afternoon a Conservative scrutineer in No. 3 subdivision, West ward, detected a Liberal named Gordam Empey, presenting a bogus ballot. The attention of the returning officer being called to the matter, he made a scrutiny of the ballot, and was forced to admit that the initials on the back were not his.'

It will be seen that the allegation here is that the Conservative scrutineer detected the false ballot, and had to compel the Liberal returning officer to do his duty. The deliberate falsity of the impression thus given is clearly shown by the testimony sworn to when the case came before the courts yesterday. Here is the returning officer's evidence as to what took place:

'When Empey presented himself to vote, I gave him a ballot, and wrote the initials on the counterfoil and ballot with an indelible pencil. Empey returned from the compartment and handed me a paper which was folded. When I took the paper from him I looked to see if my initials were on it, and the number of the counterfoil. I first discovered the number was not on the counterfoil. I looked at the ballot to see if my initials were there, and saw they were on the right-hand corner of the ballot, not in the place where I had been initialling other ballots. They were very small, and done with a common black lead pencil, not with an indelible one. My initials were made in capitals. These initials were on the ballot given to me, but were not written by me. I did not authorize the initials to be put there. I then spoke to the accused and said, 'These are not my initials, made by me, and I don't think it's the paper I gave you.' He said it was. At that moment the two agents drew near me. They wanted to see the initials they had heard spoken of by me. They saw them. They spoke to each other, and said they thought the initials shown were not my initials. At that moment Empey left the voting booth. I objected to the paper he gave me, and did not put it in the ballot-box.'

That is the account given by the deputy returning officer and it is evidently a true account, and the account in the Toronto Telegram, as I said before, was repeated by the Conservative newspapers. Now, what followed? This man was arrested, and he was tried at the assizes in Brockville by a jury. I am told that there were seven Conservatives on that jury. I do not know how that is, but I know, as a matter of fact, that there were Conservatives as well as Reformers on the jury. The man was tried before one of the judges of the High Court of Justice; and the result was that the ballot which was said to be a bogus ballot was found to be a true ballot, and the man was acquitted. Further than that, there was a recount in this election. At the recount, the judge said that if that ballot had been put in the box, he would have counted it; but because it was not put into the box by the deputy returning officer, it was not where the judge in the recount could count it. So, the vote was not counted for either party. And that is one of these very questions that has come up in this House. This is a trial that took place where cross-examination by counsel of the witnesses was possible—and it resulted in the man's acquittal and the establishment of the fact that the ballot alleged to be a forged ballot was a true one, though it was thought to have differed in some respects from the others. What were the charges in this case? First, that he had forged a ballot paper; second, that he had counterfeited a ballot paper; third, that he had attempted to put a forged ballot paper in the box, and fourth, that he had fraudulently attempted to take a ballot paper out of the booth. A true bill was found by the grand jury, and, with all the formalities of the trial, with the opportunity for counsel to cross-examine witnesses, the man was acquitted. I suppose the same questions were asked at the trial as were asked in committee rooms. The hon. member for Halifax, if he had been present and if it had suited his purpose, would have said we were stifling inquiry; the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Powell) would have said that the examiner had not any brains, and the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) would have said with quite an air of resignation, 'Why don't you ask the witness what he had to suffer?' And it would have gone out that we were obstructing justice by our manner of examining witnesses—for I have heard somewhat similar proceedings in committee in matters of that kind.

I am not arguing in the merits of these matters, but what I am arguing is that an attempt is being made to make political capital out of this instead of going to the courts where the matter could still be investigated.

Another case arose. A man named Wendling was charged with offering a man a forged ballot. He was brought before the police court; and I may say, and I think it is of importance in connection with this matter, that these were not cases in which the trial was left to take care of itself. I understand that Mr. S. Barker is now the Conservative organizer for the province of Ontario, that he is the gentleman in league with the new lights who are now the leaders of the Conservative party; that he, with Mr. Dalby and the present leader of the opposition, are preparing for the next election campaign. Mr. Barker was present in Brockville and took part in the proceedings. He was there a long time and did all that a man could do in looking up the evidence that could be brought up in regard to the Brockville election, and if there was any evidence that would go to show fraud, it is pretty certain that he would have found it. He has the means at his disposal, for he is a rich man, and has a rich party at his back; moreover, he is an able lawyer of long standing, and he had come down for the purpose of attending to this business. Mr. Wendling, against whom the charge was made, has the misfortune, in some respects, to be a man of considerable wealth—

Mr. SPROULE. I rise to a point of order. I desire to inquire whether it is in order for the hon. gentleman (Mr. Britton) to discuss a case which is referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections and which should be examined there, in anticipation of the action of that committee.

Mr. BRITTON. I am not discussing the question that is to be referred, but I am discussing the question whether this is, as declared by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) a great constitutional question and if rights are denied parties here, the privileges of the House are infringed, the right is denied also and the constitution is violated.

Mr. SPROULE. I may be right or I may be wrong, but having raised the question of order and stated the case, I think I am entitled to a decision as to whether the point is well taken or otherwise.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Did not the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) discuss it likewise?

Mr. SPROULE. I did not discuss it.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think there is anything in the question of order the hon. member (Mr. Sproule) has raised. I think hon. gentlemen may criticise the judgment of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Britton) who introduced these matters by way of illustration; but the whole afternoon we have been travelling all over this field to my mind, entirely outside of the question really before the House.

Mr. BRITTON. I will cut the matter short. I have only a few words further to say with regard to Mr. Wendling. I am showing that hon. gentlemen opposite do not take this matter before the courts, and am endeavouring to show that no harm could be done even if there happens to be a little delay, nine months after the event, in waiting for this motion to come up in its regular order. Mr. Wendling was charged, as I say, with issuing false ballots to other parties. He was brought before the police court and committed for trial. He gave bail. Before the case came up, a woman, apparently put up for the purpose, came and demanded $500 from him, saying that if it was not paid, certain parties would appear against him. He refused to pay such a sum, or any sum. A trap was laid for this woman so that she made her statement in the hearing of persons who, as those who have read the papers know, are men of character in Brockville, men who would not state anything but the absolute truth. In the presence of these persons she made the demand for $500 in order that a person who was to appear as a witness might not appear. Mr. Wendling refused to give the money, or, as he said, refused to be blackmailed. The woman was charged with attempting to levy blackmail. She was tried and was acquitted by the judge, not on the ground that there were any facts in dispute, as the charge was clearly proved, but because, as Wendling had been charged before the demand of money was made upon him appearing the charge was not within the wording of the section of the code applicable to the case. So she was discharged. The case against Wendling was adjourned from time to time, no evidence was given against him, and he was discharged. I have the judgment of the judge who disposed of the matter, and also the charge; and this whole thing leads to the conclusion, from what has taken place to-day and other days in connection with it, that hon. genlemen, as Mr. Chamberlain said in the British House of Commons in reference to the investigation of the Jameson raid in South Africa, want not so much an investigation as an execution against the government, trying to make political capital in a matter of this kind.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—MESSAGES FROM HER MAJESTY AND FROM GENERAL ROBERTS.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I do not rise to speak in the debate which is now going on, but to say that I have just received from His Excellency two messages which I have his authority to convey to the House :

(Mr. Chamberlain to Lord Minto.)

London, Feb. 27, 1900.

Her Majesty the Queen desires you to express to people of Dominion her admiration of gallant conduct of her Canadian troops in late engagement and her sorrow at loss of so many brave men.

(Sd.) CHAMBERLAIN.

(Lord Roberts to the Governor General.)

Paardeberg, Feb. 27, 1900.

In the very successful attack made by the Royal Canadian Regiment on the enemy's trenches this morning the following casualties occurred: Killed—Page, Withy, Ormand, Johnston, Scott, Withers, Riggs, Quinn. Wounded—Major Pelletier (slightly), Hughes, Harrison, Sutherland, McDonald, Pepitate, Proulx, Roy, Theriault, Bagot, Sievert, Mathison, Holland, Hulme, Croft, Thomas, Living, McConnell, Brady, Harris, Sprague, Pelky, Coombs, Durant, Lovitt, Simpson, Bradshaw, Donohue, Vickers, Holland, Wasdill.

(Sd.) ROBERTS.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, I may be allowed to read the despatch which was also read to-day in the House of Commons in England. It is part of the despatch addressed by Lord Roberts to the War Office :

At 3 a.m. to-day a most dashing advance was made by the Canadian Regiment and some Engineers, supported by the First Gordon Highlanders and Second Shropshires, resulting in our gaining a point some 600 yards nearer the enemy and within about eighty yards of his trenches, where our men entrenched themselves and maintained their positions till morning—a gallant deed, worthy of our colonial comrades, and which I am glad to say was attended by comparatively slight loss.

This apparently clinched matters, for at daylight to-day a letter signed by Gen. Cronje, in which he stated that he surrendered unconditionally, was brought to our outposts under a flag of truce.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. J. G. HAGGART (South Lanark). This, perhaps, is one of the most interesting subjects that the House can discuss, inasmuch as it affects the independence and honour of the House. I understand by your ruling, Mr. Speaker, that when anything

affecting the independence or honour of the House has been made a matter of inquiry at a previous session, the only way it can be taken up again in the succeeding session is by a motion, and that motion has to take the ordinary course on the Order paper. My hon. friend who introduced the motion this session said that he did not wish to discuss it, that he was perfectly willing to have it pass without entering into any controversy upon it; and, as I understand, the right hon. gentleman, the leader of the government, then took the opportunity of opposing the motion, and prevented it from passing. Although we have to agree with your ruling on that particular question, still I feel that on an occasion of this kind, when evidence of the most infamous character has already been adduced in an inquiry before a committee of this House, the government ought to have assisted in every possible manner towards securing a continuance of that inquiry, instead of taking advantage of the forms of the House to prevent it. The question was a purely formal one, one to send this matter before a committee of the House, and the right hon. gentleman took the objection, which he had a right to do, and delayed it for a time. For what purpose? Is it not evident by the statement of the member for Kingston and the statement of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), that they are harking back on their policy of last session, when we agreed unanimously in this House that this was a matter that required the fullest inquiry? Now the member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) and the member for Kingston, and other gentlemen opposite, say that this matter had better be left to the courts to decide. That was not the policy of the House, that was not what they promised to the country, that was not the reason of the inquiry last session. Now a new course of action is laid before us. After the binding of this committee, having discovered that these officers who had charge of the ballots there had defrauded the electors of their franchise, that they had returned a person who is not entitled to a seat in this House, now the Minister of Marine and Fisheries says the government did not intend to inquire into that matter at all, they had not to go any further than an inquiry as to the conduct of the officers, and there should be nothing done in reference to the party returned to this House who had not received the support of the electorate. He says that we should follow the law as it has been laid down by the member for West Elgin and others, namely, that the courts have jurisdiction upon the matter. It is no such thing. We have merely delegated to the courts for our convenience, the trial of these cases; we have never divested ourselves of the authority and power that lie in this parliament to try these cases by a committee. The right hon. leader of the government, in one of his campaign addresses delivered somewhere in Ontario, stated that inquiries had been made, and no facts had been brought out discreditable to the sitting member, or to the officers concerned in holding the election, that no wrong had been proved. Who told the right hon. gentleman that? Did he read the evidence before the committee that was appointed to inquire into that matter, and which inquiry was delayed in every possible manner? Honest farmers from the country came before the committee who had no object but to tell the truth, and the simple question asked them: How did you mark your ballot? would be the subject of cross-examination by the hour by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the member for Kingston and others. Then, one of the reasons given to the House why this committee should be delayed, was that the expense had run up to between $10,000 and $20,000 in a case which could be as easily disposed of by the courts. The right hon. leader of the government need not expect to delay or to squelch an inquiry by this committee. Every member of the House must know that we have already proved sufficiently to show that in West Huron frauds of the most diabolical and infamous character were perpetrated upon the electorate. We intend to continue that inquiry, and to make an inquiry into Brockville.

An hon. MEMBER. How are you going to do it?

Mr. HAGGART. We are going to do it by the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries says: Oh, there was no inquiry, no interest taken in the committee by the members of the opposition. There was as much interest taken in that committee as in any other committee of the House. Is it necessary that every member of the committee, or a majority of them, should be there when evidence is being taken? One or two members of the committee are chosen to take the evidence for the purpose of getting at the full facts. The evidence is printed, and every member of the committee has the privilege of reading over the evidence that was given before the committee. I will state that the committee was just as well attended as any other Committee of Privileges and Elections for the purpose of entering into an inquiry has ever been. I am sorry to hear that the manner of proceeding in this House is one entirely different from what I thought was the correct manner of proceeding.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). How often did the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) attend the committee?

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman was there nearly every day it sat. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) asks the question, how often I was there. He puts me in mind of the gentleman who stated that he never saw the other in church for the simple reason that he never was there himself. I do not remember ever having met the hon. gentleman there.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). For the same reason.

Mr. HAGGART. I was at church the whole time; I was attending the meetings of the committee. However, this is too important a question to be burked in any such manner as that. I entirely differ from the lines laid down by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. If the evidence shows that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Holmes), who is sitting here, presumably with the franchise of the electorate in West Huron, is not entitled to be here, it is the duty of this House, and it is in the full power of this House to turn that hon. gentleman out.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I will do the hon. gentleman justice to say that he did not attend the proceedings of the committee very often, and I am therefore not very much surprised to find that he is so grievously in error. He attended one of the meetings, at any rate, when the question came up as to whether witnesses should be examined or not in respect to the way they voted. It was absolutely clear that if we were affecting the seat of a member, the law prohibited these witnesses from being so examined, and it was because it was determined by the committee that no conclusion they reached could affect the seat of the member that it was agreed to by the committee that these gentlemen could be asked for whom they had voted. That course could only be adopted on the ground that the findings of the committee could not affect the seat of the member. Now, having proceeded to examine witnesses in that way the hon. gentleman says that they intend to affect the seat of the member.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) has made a speech, and he has made statements which are entirely wrong. The hon. gentleman states that on a few occasions I was there. I made the statement that I attended the majority of the meetings. I was there at the time this debate took place. I took exception to the statement of the hon. gentleman—if we can discuss a matter that took place in the committee; I suppose we can, as the report came down. I took exception as to his law. I made the statement that this House did not divest itself of authority to deal with these subjects, that it had only delegated it, and that the committee in making the inquiry did not limit itself. As to the statement of facts and the law by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, I held an entirely different opinion. The hon. gentleman will remember that he said that my statement of law was not much different from his own, and we were perfectly agreed upon it. That statement was this, and it is a view which is held in this House by every lawyer of prominence who has spoken upon the subject here, that there was a simple delegation of the matter to the courts for our convenience, that the power was in our hands, and that when we exercised the power of inquiry last session, we never divested ourselves of our power. What a farce it would be if it were found that the hon. member for West Huron is sitting here in the face of proved statements about which there can be no controversy or doubt, that ballots were illegally cast for him, and that this House can take no action in the matter, that the party who is sitting there shall occupy his seat until the end of parliament, although it has been proved in the highest court in the land that he is not entitled to his seat.

Mr. FIRMAN McCLURE (Colchester). Mr. Speaker, I am anxious that there should be no further delay in this matter. It is to be regretted that, at one time in the history of this controversy, hon. gentlemen opposite were not so anxious to avoid delay. The election into which the inquiry was made was held on the 21st of February, 1899. These hon. gentlemen had in their possession, on the 30th of March, 1899, all the evidence which they ever presented to the committee. They had the affidavits upon which they based their inquiry on the 30th of March, 1899. It was not until the month of July that they brought forward this matter for examination. Was there any delay there? They had an opportunity to bring it up before the time of appearing before the courts had passed. They knew it could not afterwards be opened up before the courts where there could be a fair and honest inquiry. They then brought it before the committee, and what was the course of these hon. gentlemen? As one member of that committee, I do not propose to pass judgment upon what the result of the inquiry may be, but, I do take issue with the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart), and I say that no hon. member, sitting as a judge in that committee, will undertake to say that upon the evidence presented was any official there convicted of any wrong act. What the inquiry may eventually show I cannot say, but I do say that there was not one particle of evidence presented there to cast the slightest suspicion upon anybody, but there was—

Mr. MILLS. Oh, oh.

Mr. McCLURE. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) wait until I am done? There was not one particle of evidence presented before that committee which cast suspicion on anybody, but the course that was adopted there was in violation of the clearest principles of law. The hon. gentlemen were permitted to examine witness after witness as to how he voted, and they went into matters that if they had gone before any court in the country they never could have inquired into. It is very plain why they allowed the law courts to go by, why they did not bring this matter before one of the courts of the country; it is because they knew that the evidence which they had to present was such as no judicial court in the country would ever look at. But, by the leniency of the committee they were allowed to inquire into matters that no law court would have permitted them to inquire into. They claim that suspicion is cast upon somebody. Upon whom is it cast? I am not prepared to say that it is cast any more upon the Liberal party than upon the Conservative party, but I have no hesitation in saying that any gentleman who will thoroughly examine that evidence cannot come to any other conclusion than that, although there was crookedness and wrong-doing, there is not the slightest evidence fixing it upon any official or any particular person. So, I wish that these hon. gentlemen had been a little more prompt in bringing this matter before the proper tribunal and not have taken it before a committee, they would exercise a more judicial spirit, and not seek to make political capital by talking about an unfinished case, that they would not base arguments upon evidence which is only taken through the too great leniency of the committee, because, if that committee committed any fault it was not in burking the inquiry, but in permitting the inquiry to be conducted upon lines that allowed anything and everything could be inquired into in that way.

Mr. GEO. V. McINERNEY (Kent, N.B.) Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to discuss the merits or demerits of the West Huron case, or the investigation that took place during last session before the Privileges and Elections Committee, but, I think there is a point of considerable importance that has arisen incidentally in this debate which should be disposed of. The hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart) questioned the authority of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) after the hon. minister had stated, in the speech he made this afternoon, that this House and the Privileges and Elections Committee had divested themselves of all their ancient rights and privileges, that they had handed them over to the courts, by the Controverted Elections Act, and the right to try election petitions. Now, Sir, I contend, and I think I can contend with some degree of success—notwithstanding the fact that the Minister of Marine (Sir Louis Davies) once in the committee challenged the opinion of the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart) because the latter hon. gentleman was not a lawyer—I hold that the hon. member (Mr. Haggart) is correct in the contention he makes, and that the Minister of Marine (Sir Louis Davies), who is a lawyer, is wrong.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McINERNEY. And if I wanted any authority for that, I can quote a gentleman by the name of 'Davies' who sat in this House in the year 1887, representing the county of Queen's, P.E.I.

Mr. FOSTER. Surely that is not Sir Louis.

Mr. McINERNEY. I think that same gentleman named 'Davies' is synonymous with a gentleman who now holds the portfolio of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies).

Mr. BERGERON. Send out and bring him in.

Mr. McINERNEY. Here is what this gentleman named 'Louis H. Davies' said in this House in 1887: (Hansard, p. 678.)

Sir, I contend, as a matter of law, that the rights which this House can exercise respecting the election of members have not been in any degree minimized by the passage of the Controverted Elections Act. I state that as a clear principle of constitutional law, and I think I have the authority not only of the leader of the Opposition, but of the leader of the government, for that position—that the same rights which this House retained to itself when in former days it relegated the trial of election petitions to the election committees of the House, these same rights the House continues to retain, after it has relegated the trial of election petitions to the judges of the land.

And at the same page of the Official Debates of 1887 (p. 678) the same gentleman repeated that contention, when he said:

That is a position of law that the Minister of Justice cannot controvert. If we had power before the Controverted Elections Act was passed, to consider and determine on cases of this kind, we have that power now, because we did not by that Act divest ourselves of any powers we had previously.

Yet, here we have the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) to-day coolly and deliberately getting up in this House, and making the contention, that this case should have gone to the election courts and should not have gone to the Committee on Privileges and Elections at all. We have him seconded in that position, by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton), and as against that we have a layman on this side of the House (Mr. Haggart) who has truly stated the right and the legal position on that question.

Mr. BRITTON. May I ask you a question?

Mr. McINERNEY. Certainly.

Mr. BRITTON. Does the hon. gentleman think, as a lawyer, that under this reference to the Privileges and Elections Committee, that the seat of the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Holmes) could be touched?

Mr. McINERNEY. Beyond the question of a doubt it could. And I could read page after page of opinions from Sir John Thompson, from the Hon. David Mills, now Minister of Justice, from Sir Charles H. Tupper, from Mr. Lister, from gentlemen sitting on both sides of the House; to the effect that this House could certainly dismiss any member. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis) took the same ground at the time, and he was right.

Mr. FOSTER. What case were they discussing?

Mr. McINERNEY. They were discussing the Baird case. Sir, the hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House were right in stating that this House has a perfect right to say who shall sit here and who shall not. This House has a perfect right to declare to-morrow any member of the House disqualified to sit, if the House sees fit, and there is no court in this land to which an appeal can be taken from that decision. That, Sir, is my humble opinion. That is an opinion gained from having read the opinions of the gentlemen whom I have mentioned; opinions expressed over and over again in the celebrated Queen's County debate in 1887.

The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), who is a busy man, no doubt, threw a slur across the floor, at the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart), and asked him, did he attend the committee meetings often last year? The hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) was too modest in his reply. I take up the report of that committee and I find that the hon. member (Mr. Haggart) was only absent from two of its sittings.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McINERNEY. And I find further, that the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) was only present at two or three of the sittings of that committee. I admit that the Minister of Railways and Canals is a very busy man, and I admit that he may have had other duties to perform, but at the same time, many others of us had other duties to perform. Be that as it may, I am here as a member of this committee, to state distinctly, that we had to wait for hours at a time for the presence of a minister of the Crown. We would get there at ten in the morning, and be there until eleven o'clock and half-past eleven, waiting for the presence of a minister. That, Sir, was the experience of the members of the committee representing both sides of the House.

Mr. H. A. POWELL (Westmorland). Mr. Speaker, I took some interest in the proceedings before the committee last session, and having heard some statements made here to-day, that are rather startling—and, which if not inconsistent with fact, are at least, very inconsistent with my recollection—I feel I should address myself to the consideration of this question for a few moments. In the first place, the question has arisen, just with what logical connection I do not know, of the attendance upon the committee on elections last session. Unfortunately the attendance upon the committee was not as large as it should have been. And, especially, it was not as large on the part of gentlemen who constitutionally are charged with the good government of this country, as it should have been. As the hon. gentleman from Kent (Mr. McInerney) has said, day after day, we attended that committee, and were prevented from going on frequently for hours, by the mere fact that there was not a member of the cabinet present to supervise the proceedings. I have a very distinct recollection that on one occasion, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) objected to going on, because the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) was not present, and that fact will be within the recollection of every member of the committee who was in attendance at that sitting. Now, Sir, it has been advanced by some gentlemen on this side of the House and controverted by some gentlemen on the other side, that the percentage of the quorum of that committee in attendance was on the average quite as large as the percentage in attendance on the Railway Committee, for instance. That may, or may not, be so, but I call to the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals, and of the House, to the rule of the House, it is necessary in the case of an ordinary standing committee to have a majority present to constitute a quorum. That was not modified by any resolution of the House last session, in the case of the standing Committee of Privileges and Elections. That committee consisted of forty-five members, and it was necessary to have a quorum, that twenty-three members should be present. In the case of the Committee on Railways and Canals, by a special provision of this House, when the committee was formed, it was enacted that twenty-five members out of the 176 forming the committee, should constitute a quorum. I have taken the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and I have looked at the attendance at every meeting, and I find that with the exception of the last meeting, when nothing virtually was done, that there was a larger percentage of the committee present than there had been on many occasions in the case of the Railway Committee, even if there was a quorum of the Railway Committee—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Powell) knows that formally a quorum is reported as being present, but I am sure his sense of fairness will compel him to say that as a matter of fact, there were only two or three members of the committee present during most of the time the witnesses were being examined at the latter part of the inquiry.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Although they appear on the face of it as being present, they were not really present, and we agreed to go on without them.

Mr. POWELL. The report of the committee is here, and it will speak for itself. Those present, and consequently those absent are noted here; the one by expression, the other by omission. If the hon. gentleman will look at the records of the nineteen sessions of that committee, he will see every member that was present, and he consequently will know every gentleman that was absent. That is a sufficient answer to his statement. I do not think that any official stenographer can be charged with wilfully misrepresenting the facts. It has also been said by gentlemen on the other side, that last year's was a fishing inquiry. Well, Sir, I am astonished to hear such a statement made by any gentleman on the other side of the House. So far from its being a fishing inquiry, I may say that I never knew a case in my twenty-one years practice at the bar, where the bill of particulars was as clear and the evidence relied on, was so fully set forth before the prosecution commenced as in this case. Why, Sir, we were tied down in that committee to every statement of fact that the hon. gentleman from Halifax made on the floor of this House. And what statement did he make? He produced solemn declarations of forty-three gentlemen, and never in a single case did we travel outside of the record. That covered the subject-matter of the investigation, and we confined ourselves to it. I shall not go into the question of the conclusiveness of the evidence, because I am a member of the committee, and the proper time, I trust, will come for the consideration of that at a later stage. The position is this. This House, by a solemn resolution, has committed itself to the policy of investigating the Brockville election. There is no doubt about that. The hon. leader of the government took a certain course, for what purpose I do not know ; I am bound to assume that his purpose was patriotic and honourable. Last session he took the stand on the floor of this House that he would aid all endeavours of the hon. member for Halifax to bring the matter before the committee and have the charges investigated. He went further. The question was introduced at the time in precisely the same manner in which the hon. member for Halifax undertook to introduce it the other day, and he allowed the matter to be referred to the committee. He did not then take the objection that it was contrary to the rules of the House. The prosecution of the charges was ostensibly favoured by the leader of the government. Why he has adopted a different policy on this occasion I do not know. The prosecution has not been entered upon, so far as the Brockville case is concerned. Inferences may be drawn ; but I have no facts on which to base inferences apart from the course pursued. The hon. gentleman may explain his inconsistency, I cannot. We have the contention advanced by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton), and other hon. gentlemen opposite, that as a matter of legislative policy it is improper for this House to take upon itself the investigation and adjudication of any matter which has by the laws of the country been assigned to the courts for investigation and adjudication. Now, Sir, the hon. member for Kingston is a good lawyer. I never said before the committee, as he suggests I did, that hon. gentlemen had no brains. In charging me with having made that statement the hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken. I did not say that he had no brains. On the contrary, I said he is a gentleman of weighty brain. But I will call the hon. gentleman's attention to this fact, that in the reign of Queen Anne, the sale of public offices was made punishable by statute of the realm of Great Britain. That law was continued and forms part and parcel of our common law ; and when my hon. friend for Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane) was hounded before this House a few years ago by hon. gentlemen opposite on the charge of having endeavoured to sell offices in his constituency, was there a word uttered by any of those gentlemen suggesting that it was unconstitutional for the House to investigate the charge, and that it should be investigated before the courts ? Again, in the case of Mr. Baird, the member for Queen's County, N.B., which was brought before the House, what is the course of the gentlemen whose successors now occupy the Treasury benches ? Why, Sir, they took an entirely different course from that they follow now. The late member for the city of St. John, Mr. Weldon moved that the returning officer of Queen's County be brought before the Bar of this House to answer for the irregularities which had taken place in the election. He was brought before the Bar of this House, interrogated, and subjected to a strict cross-examination. Did the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite say that that case should be relegated to the courts of the country, and inquired into there, or that this parliament had divested itself of its inherent jurisdiction over such a matter ? No. They introduced a resolution, based on the examination of Mr. Dunn, the returning officer, to seat Mr. King, now Senator King, in place of Mr. Baird. What did the government of that day do ? Sir John Thompson did not use his majority to vote down the resolution ; but he moved as an amendment that the whole matter be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that course was adopted consonant with the unanimous view of both sides of the House. While opinions differed as to the policy of the House seating and unseating members, there was a perfect consensus of opinion on the part of all gentlemen of parliamentary experience that the proper course to pursue was to refer the matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for investigation, that the country might have the full facts, although this House disapproved of exercising its power to instal one man in the place of the other.

So far as the delay on the present occasion is concerned, the government, whose duty it was to strike the standing committees of this House, did not strike them until the 9th day of February. There was no committee to refer this matter to previously. That day was a Friday. The first day afterwards the House sat was Monday. My hon. friend from Halifax moved in this matter on Tuesday, the 13th, when he gave notice of his motion, and on the 14th he brought his motion forward. He was met by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) with a technical objection, which, if raised at all, should have been raised in the first instance last year. It was not raised until this occasion, and it was no doubt raised by an understanding with the government, if not by their direction. If my hon. friend for North Wellington had not raised that objection, my hon. friend from Halifax would have had this matter before the House on the very first day on which, according to parliamentary procedure, it could have been brought before the House after the committee was struck to which alone it could be referred. Rightly or wrongly, it was burked by a technicality. Then the notice was put upon the Motion paper, and the matter came up last night. What was the course of hon. gentlemen opposite then ? What was the course of their leader, for whom they are responsible ? Did he say, I am anxious to expedite this matter, I am anxious to have my party cleansed, I am anxious to have parliament and public life purified, I am anxious the people should have the facts, I am anxious to have that which is at the very basis of the constitution respected in every constituency? No; he set himself to burk the inquiry by raising the objection that he wished to discuss the motion. What did he wish to discuss it for? What was a debate to be invoked for? A debate to be justifiable would simply have as its object the convincing of the House that the resolution was an undesirable one and should not pass; and, therefore, when my hon. friend from Halifax proposed to allow the motion to go without discussion, so that the matter should go before the Committee on Privileges and Elections without delay, the leader of the House rose and said virtually: 'This is a matter which we propose to debate. This motion should not pass. There is a serious phase of this question to which I call the attention of the hon. gentleman. If there are infringements of men's political and constitutional rights that are not protected by the laws of this country, when those sacred rights are disregarded, and are sought to be taken away by fraud, then I say that the matter is carried into a region outside of law, to a region of outlawry. Then it comes the inalienable right, I could almost say, the duty, of every man who values properly his rights and privileges to assert them by any means in his power—to protect himself against fraud by force. I would have, I confess, a great deal of sympathy for the right hon. gentleman in the stand he took when he declared on the floor of this House that had he been on the banks of the Saskatchewan he would have shouldered his musket in defence of the half-breeds if he believed their constitutional rights were violated, that the fundamental rights of the half-breeds in that section were denied by the government whose duty it was to protect them. If their rights were persistently ignored, and they were subjected to tyranny—without hope of remedy under the law—it would have been the duty of every man who had the proper sense of manhood in his breast to rise and aid with his musket right in its struggle with fraud and wrong.

I have no hesitation, as a member of the committee, in saying that the election in West Huron was stolen from the man who won it. I have no hesitation in saying that the majority of voters who polled their votes according to law did not say their representative was Mr. Holmes, who now sits here, but Mr. McLean, who remains at home, elected by the people but defeated by theft and fraud. If the information I have is correct—and I believe it is—the gentleman who was elected by the votes cast in the constituency of Brockville was ex-Speaker White. The hon. gentleman who sits for that constituency in this House occupies a seat procured, I did not mean by bribery and corrupt influences, but by theft. If the man who received the majority of votes deposited with the polling officers were sitting here, that gentleman would be the late Speaker of this parliament. Therefore, I say it behooves the hon. gentleman who leads this House, and whose heart I know beats in sympathy with constitutional right, to forward by every means in his power the investigation which will guarantee to the people that while they may sell their votes, which I think to a considerable extent is their own business, the honest voters of this country shall not have them stolen from them, and when they elect a man by their votes, that man should be the one who gets the seat in this House. But if that does not prevail and if outlawry has to be resorted to, to conquer outlawry, the man who uses force against fraud is perfectly justifiable in so doing, and that will be done no doubt in this country if these frauds are continued much longer. I have known of frauds being prevented simply by letting the people know that if these frauds were resorted to they would be met, if necessary, by force and the people's constitutional rights fully protected, if not by the government and laws of the country, at least by the muscle and brawny arms of outraged electors. There is no reason that can be urged why this investigation should not go on, and go on at once. This House has put itself on record, the right hon. First Minister is committed to it. What has taken place since the day last session when, with the true patriotic glow, he declared it his duty to grant this investigation? Nothing, Sir, but damaging disclosures—disclosures acknowledged on the other side as shocking the conscience of the country. In one case in West Huron twenty-four honest voters, who supposed that their ballots had been placed in the box for the candidate of their choice, were robbed of their ballots by the very returning officer who had sworn to protect them. That has been disclosed and a great deal more. Is it feared that in the case of Brockville, there will be a repetition of these disclosures or a bringing to light of worse and more extensive evils? The prevention of these disclosures is the only excuse that reasonably can be conjured up by my imagination for the course pursued by the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (East Simcoe). When a year ago the right hon. Premier announced in his place that there would be the fullest, frankest, and fairest investigation into this matter, the country took the right hon. gentleman at his word and gave him the credit of believing that he was quite willing a thorough investigation should be had. But since then many things have happened throughout Ontario and other parts of the Dominion which have rather changed the opinion of the right hon. gentleman and those behind him. They have been through Manitoba, and the slap they got in the face there they cannot easily forget. Then the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), smarting under the notice to quit given him by his own province, does not wish to hear anything more, and as for the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), the defeat he met in Carleton County, N.B., is such, that he was thrown into a state of coma from which he is not easily awakened. Worse than that. Worse than the handwriting on the wall shown these hon. gentlemen is the disgraceful state of affairs in Ontario and the scandals in West Huron and Brockville, which show that the same scoundrels were at work there.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). You would not be here if scoundrels had not been the means of getting you elected.

Mr. BENNETT. Does the hon. Minister of Railways mean to insinuate that the seat I occupy was corruptly obtained? Let me tell him that his own Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) with a gang of pluggers was in my riding working to defeat me. Let me tell him that I have not taken the protection of these walls to make that charge against his hon. colleague, but I made the same charge against him—and I regret he is not now present—namely, that with one of the biggest pluggers in Ontario he invaded East Simcoe, and that with that same plugger, the hon. Postmaster General of this administration was endeavouring to steal away from me the seat I honestly obtained.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must call the hon. gentleman to order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Withdraw.

Mr. SPEAKER. The matter the hon. gentleman refers to is beside the question under discussion.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals insinuated that I would not be here but for corrupt means.

Mr. SPEAKER. That is no justification for your attacking the hon. Postmaster General.

Mr. BENNETT. Well, if I cannot attack the Postmaster General and make that charge here I shall withdraw it, but I will do this. On every occasion when I again meet him outside, I will repeat the charge. In the Globe of the 14th February last, the charge that I made at the West Huron and Goderich nominations can be found in black and white, and the hon. gentleman and the man connected with him never dared to bring me into court.

The right hon. First Minister last year courted an investigation, and the investigation went on merrily for the first few days. The hon. Ministers of Railways and Canals and Marine and Fisheries were there, but I say to the credit of the Minister of Railways and Canals that he got so ashamed of the whole scheme after the first few days that he quit the committee altogether. I give him credit for that. But when the question was discussed here about the disclosures in the committee, complaints were made of the non-attendance of ministers, as the result of which the business of the committee had from time to time to be postponed.

I do not believe that the hon. member for North Wellington was inspired to make the objection he did. I believe the hon. member for North Wellington is afraid to have the matter go any further, because he knows something of what went on in West Huron. I saw him standing in the town of Goderich on that occasion in the same hotel with Cap Sullivan and the rest of them; and this Cap Sullivan, a man the criminal law has been reaching out after—

Mr. McMULLEN. Allow me to inform the hon. gentleman, and to state positively to this House, that I do not know such a person as Capt. Sullivan.

Mr. BENNETT. Well, if the hon. member for North Wellington does not know Cap Sullivan let me tell him this, and I will repeat the charge that I made here last year, that there are ministers that do know him, and he was closeted last year in one of the anterooms near the reading-room with one of them.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must call the hon. gentleman to order. He is going outside the subject of discussion.

Mr. BENNETT. I am simply endeavouring to deal with the parties who are mixed up with this matter, and who are, according to the evidence connected with it, and one of the leading spirits in the whole matter was this same Cap Sullivan. Now, Sir, at the outset it is plainly and broadly intimated that there is to be no investigation. The member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) at once insinuates and states boldly that it is an outrage to have an inquiry. Coming from the member for West Elgin, that is only natural. The member for West Elgin disdains the action of the government; he looks with thorough contempt upon their action in having an investigation at all. Doesn't he come from West Elgin, where they have had similar difficulties? Why, if the member for West Elgin, or rather those who have control of the election matters there, had had their way there would never have been a ballot to investigate; they would have been burned, the same as the West Elgin ballots were in the local election. The member for North Wellington spurns Cap Sullivan and those people. I can tell him some relatives of his own that are always to be found in these nefarious contests. I can tell the member for North Wellington that in the late contest in West Elgin a ballot box there was kept away for two or three days, and it was thought that Mr. McDiarmid's election would be defeated, the first man from Toronto to arrive on the scene and interesting himself in the matter was a nephew of the member for North Wellington.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. I must ask the hon. gentleman to confine his remarks to the question before the House. I think these personal matters are entirely below the standing of this House. It is very plain that if we wish to keep the standard of our debates in any reasonable position, we must avoid these personal references.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think, Mr. Speaker, you have lost sight of the fact that this discussion would not have occurred at all if the proper course of having this motion passed last night when it was brought up, had been followed.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the leader of the opposition has no right to say that we departed from the regular order last evening.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker, you are entirely mistaken. When the Chair very properly called attention to the fact that this discussion had taken an irrelevant channel, I called the attention of the Chair to the fact, as I had a right to do, that this discussion would not have occurred at all had not the right hon. Premier of this House obstructed—

The PRIME MINISTER. Order.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Had he allowed that motion to pass, the matter would have been dealt with in the ordinary way.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman has no right to use the word 'obstructed,' as applied to the action of the Prime Minister last evening.

The PRIME MINISTER. I beg permission to make a statement. I said at the outset of this debate that by far the best way was to adhere strictly to the rules of the House, otherwise we would be landed in difficulties. Last night, through courtesy, I allowed the Clerk to run through the Order paper in order to have these motions dealt with which called for the introduction of papers; that was allowed in courtesy to hon. gentlemen on the other side, and now it is made a point against me. It is another evidence of the way that hon. gentlemen opposite abuse the privileges which they receive from the government.

Mr. BENNETT. I bow to your ruling, Sir, but I ask you to bear this in mind.

Mr. BENNETT.

The hon. member for Kingston, as I understood him, resisted an inquiry into the Brockville case, and in support of his position he produced certain evidence which had been taken in the courts; and in view of evidence I submit, that when I am asking here for an investigation, I am within my rights in discussing men who have been proved in the courts guilty of the most heinous offences in these elections. That is a strong reason why there should be an inquiry of a most thorough and searching kind. Now, referring to the Brockville case, the hon. member for Kingston went into the evidence and, I presume, Mr. Speaker, as you permitted him to do so, I am within my rights if I refer to the Brockville case also. The member for Kingston knows that before no committee is there a scintilla of evidence yet as to the Brockville case. And the member for Kingston, who shows that he is conversant with this case, must know that since the Brockville election half a dozen blackguards who lived in that riding, and were connected with the election, have left the country and have not dared to come back to the town of Brockville, they are to-day outlaws; they are either unable or afraid to come back to Brockville for fear of the criminal law. I do not know whether the member for Kingston knows that or not.

Mr. BRITTON. No, I do not.

Mr. BENNETT. Then I can assure the hon. member that such is the case; and when that is the case it is an additional strong reason why there ought to be an inquiry into both these matters. Now, what is the position of the Premier on these cases? He knows well that throughout Ontario there is to-day a great demand for a searching inquiry into these matters. He knows that in the province of Ontario in the local elections the greatest distrust has been engendered with the respectable part of the community, not only by reason of the actions that have been going on, but by reason of the fact that the criminal law of Ontario has been paralyzed, that the strong arm of the Attorney General has gone up behind the offenders and prevented an inquiry into the crimes of the County Attorney's, who stood up and aided and abetted the defiance of the law and prevented the exposure of the crimes in those ridings. The Premier must know that, because it is no idle report, that in the city of Toronto Mr. Hardy was driven out of his position by reason of the fact that his footsteps were dogged day and night by these blackguards threatening exposures. When Mr. Hardy, the late Premier, was driven out of his position by reason of the fact that his footsteps were dogged day and night by these blackguards, threatening exposure, unless he came to their terms. Is it to be wondered at, in view of the disgraceful disclosures made last year, which will be followed by worse disclosures made in the Brockville case if it is gone into, that the Premier and those behind him ask that the matter be delayed? The chief offender in this matter has been the Premier. I heard him with my own ears, ask that this motion should not pass on that day, but that it should be allowed to stand. It was not a motion for comment, except for the purpose of delaying and defeating it, and yet the Premier asked that it should stand. If hon. gentlemen opposite wish to show the people of Ontario, if they show the people of the whole Dominion that they are anxious to have a fair and honest investigation, this side of the House will take them at their word, and will let that investigation proceed. What is to be said of the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Holmes)? Has he no rights in the premises? Standing here with positive proof sworn to, that stolen ballots aided in giving him his seat, surely hon. gentlemen, if they had any respect for the hon. member for West Huron, would insist that a full and fair inquiry be made. And when that inquiry is made in this and in the Brockville case, the outrages committed in West Egin will fade into insignificance by contrast.

Motion (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY— THE ESTIMATES.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. Speaker read the Message, as follows:

Minto.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, Estimates of sums required for the service of the Dominion for the year ending June 30, 1900, and in accordance with the provisions of 'The British North America Act, 1867,' the Governor General recommends these Estimates to the House of Commons.

Government House,

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—THE CANADIAN CONTINGENTS.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding: That the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider certain proposed resolutions to provide for the payment of the expenditure incurred, or to be incurred, in sending contingents of Canadian volunteers to South Africa.

Mr. T. B. FLINT (Yarmouth). Mr. Speaker, I am extremely fortunate in resuming the discussion of this important resolution when Canada, when the mother country, when the world, is ringing with the deeds of British soldiers under British generals, and particularly when our own hearts are stirred with the praises honestly earned by our own brave Canadian lads. Sir, what a contrast there is between this moment in the history of this unfortunate struggle, and the day on which these resolutions were placed upon the Order paper of this House. Until a few days ago the British army was held near the banks of the Modder River, by a victorious force of the enemy. The city of Kimberley was besieged by another force hostile and threatening to overcome the small and determined garrison within its walls, and suffering and disease were rife amongst Englishmen and women in that beleaguered city. The garrison farther north was in dire straits also, and farther east the almost apparently doomed city of Ladysmith contained a British army which seemed almost hopeless of relief. To-day, what a brilliant contrast? Although, possibly, it may be only the beginning of a long and tedious struggle, or it may be the signal for the end, yet, at any rate the hours seem brighter. One of the largest forces of the hostile troops have been captured; their brave general is now in the hands of the British where he will receive every consideration which his position, his able management of the campaign, and his personal courage entitle him to. His army is broken, his ammunition and food are destroyed, and his forces are in the hands of the victorious British general. On the other theatre of war farther north, Kimberley has been relieved, trains are regularly supplying the formerly beleaguered garrison with food. Farther north, Colonel Baden-Powell is daily and hourly driving the enemy farther away, and we are in hourly expectation of realizing that General Buller, with his brave men, who have suffered and fought and certainly deserve all our gratitude and praise, will have relieved the beleaguered force of General White at Ladysmith. And so, the discussion is resumed upon the large part that Canada is to play in this grand drama at the close of the nineteenth century. It almost seems as if, during the last two or three months, the British Empire has been passing through the very valley of the shadow of death. Surrounded on all sides by hostile powers, at any rate by hostile populations, with scarcely apparently any exception, with perhaps that of Italy, and some of the smaller European nations, without friends amongst the great nations of the earth, she had gone forth, 7,000 miles, to fight a most terrible series of conflicts in a country abounding with difficulties, with an enemy brave to the verge of desperation, armed and equipped with all that modern science and ingenuity can furnish an ample supply of fighting men, directed, we have reason to believe, by the most skilled military genius from the continent of Europe. With that true steadfastness of purpose, with that calm determination which has ever been characteristic of the British Empire, they have pressed forward in the face of disaster, in the face of difficulty, in the face of danger, and we have never had any doubt, at any rate, we have not now the least shadow of doubt that the result will be a great triumph for British arms, and more important than that, it will be a great and signal triumph for the principles of justice, liberty, equality and honesty in the administration of affairs for which we believe the British Empire, at any rate, during the last century, has stood the principal representative in this world. I remember an audience being once almost shocked, by the opening sentence of a lecture delivered by the distinguished American orator, Wendell Phillips, on the French Revolution. He began in a calm and unimpassioned way with the statement that probably the French Revolution was the greatest blessing which was ever conferred upon mankind. To a certain extent he did afterwards modify this idea by admitting all the temporary evils and ills which occurred during the course of that revolution. I think we can almost adopt his language and say, that although we are suffering keenly by the loss of the dear friends of some of us that although we are suffering keenly by the disasters which occurred to the British arms, yet, making allowance for all these necessary evils of war, I think those who have studied this question carefully and thoroughly from the British standpoint will be inclined to say, that notwithstanding the suffering which may have been occasioned here and there and which always accompanies war, the struggle in the Transvaal may almost be considered as a blessing. I believe it is not only a righteous war, but that it was an inevitable war, that the British government had no other course open to itself than to undertake the struggle which has fallen to its lot. It is no use to trace the history of the events which led up to this unfortunate contest. They reach far back into the past; their ramifications are many, and all their indices pointed to conflict of this kind, owing to the character of the people of the Transvaal, to their determined and stubborn character, which, certainly in many respects, is most admirable, owing to the belief that they inherited from their childhood as to their being a sort of select and special people under the care of Divine Providence, owing to their thorough antagonism to all that is comprised in modern civilization, owing to their determined effort to keep themselves aloof not only from English civilization, but from all civilization whatsoever. When the fact was apparent that the country which they had selected for themselves was enormously rich in minerals, particularly in gold and diamonds, it became evident that this great conflict of civilization with barbarism, this great conflict of liberty with tyranny, must, in the near future, be fought out, and it passed from the menace of war and negotiation to the actual conflict of arms. If, notwithstanding the loss and expense and suffering that have been occasioned to Great Britain, the lesson will have been learned that she must always stand the advocate and friend of liberty, with her armour by her side thoroughly prepared for all the eventualities of war, then, the lesson will be a most valuable one indeed. If we look over the world, with the exception of one or two nations, not the most powerful in military affairs, not the most prosperous nations in the world, we find that she has very few friends amongst the great civilized powers of the world. Why this is so baffles our comprehension. Why a nation which has ever been for self-abnegation, why a nation which has had so much territory almost forced upon her, against her will, why a power which has stood for the open door in trade and commerce, which has ever stood for freedom, and for liberty in government and administration in her own colonies and territories, wherever they are scattered throughout the world, which has ever stood for the principles of civilization, which is the representative of all these amongst the nations of the world, should be so hated and despised by all these nations, it is difficult to understand. Probably there are reasons which an Englishman cannot understand, but so it is. We feel that as to our mother country and ourselves we are inextricably tied together in the future, and we must rely upon no help from foreign powers but upon our good right arms and upon the justice of our cause.

There is ample evidence now that the statesmen at the head of affairs in the mother country who are responsible for entering into this conflict and for carrying it on were unfortunately unprepared for the serious issue which was brought about. We all know how for months and months, and almost for years previous to the 9th of October last, it was apparent to many that actual war must be the result of the diplomatic complications which then presented themselves. Yet in face of this, and with that calm assurance which so frequently characterizes the mother country, they assumed that they were equal to any emergency which might arise. We remember how the British nation rushed into the Crimean War, unprepared in men and material and arrangements of all kinds. We remember how, that after the discipline of these weary winter months, and these desperate conflicts in the Crimea, towards the end of the war, Great Britain appeared about to be getting ready for a long and doubtful struggle. So in the case of the Indian Mutiny. Although the signs were filling the heavens that a terrible mutiny was about to break out, we remember the calm confidence of the generals and officers of the British troops in India; we remember their confidence that nothing would occur and that if anything serious did occur, they could easily quell it with the forces at their disposal. We all recollect how terribly they were undeceived, and what a series of awful battles were necessary in order to re-establish British supremacy and British prestige throughout the Indian Empire. And so, Sir, the statesmen of Great Britain allowed themselves to drift into the Transvaal war without appreciating the dangers and difficulties with which they were confronted. Even so astute and so able and so thoughtful a man as Cecil Rhodes is reported to have stated: that the armed strength of the Boers was the greatest unpricked bubble in the world. This was his opinion, even within a few weeks of the desperate conflicts which were forced upon his fellow-countrymen. Lord Wolseley not many weeks before the actual outbreak of hostilities, spoke of the reports of Sir Wm. Butler who had been commander of the forces in South Africa for many years, and said that they were grossly exaggerated as to the strength of the Boers. I remember, within a few weeks of the war, reading of some eminent English officer arriving in London from South Africa; Sir Somebody with a string of titles after his name, signifying he had received awards from his sovereign for bravery; I wish his name would be embalmed in history, I have forgotten it; I remember that he who had been many years in high office in South Africa, gave a long interview which was published in the press of both continents, and in the course of that interview he stated that 20,000 English soldiers would drive the Boers like sheep back to Pretoria inside of thirty days. If men like these, experienced in South Africa, underestimated the difficulties which were to be met with, and if their calm assurance of British ability and British preparedness was so great, how can we blame those officials who resided permanently in England for being deceived. It all goes to show what is perhaps one of the failures of our British character, a failure which we have often lamented, and which we are always willing to acknowledge, namely our proneness to underrate those who are opposed to us, and our disposition to put off to another day the necessary preparations for meeting the enemy. We all know that these imperfections are always redeemed. We all know that the stern lecture of necessity, the stern discipline of defeat and loss, rehabilitates and strengthens our character, and enables us after these disasters to recover the ground which we have lost.

If this war will have taught Britishers the world over that they are not to look for sympathy or aid from any foreign power; if it teaches them that they must rely upon themselves and upon their colonies for whatever of military or naval forces they may require; if it teaches them always to be prepared and adequately prepared for any foe that may undertake to limit the liberty and the freedom of the British people, then the lesson will not have been in vain. Sir, we come to the discussion of this question at none too early a period. The government of the day have been severely blamed by the leaders of the Conservative party for their alleged inaction in regard to the part Canada was to play in this great drama of war. I have listened carefully to some hon. gentlemen opposite who stated their objections to the course of the government. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Clarke), and others, all united in condemning the government of Canada for not having been first in the field to offer aid to the mother country in the crisis which confronted her. Differing from them as I do upon this fundamental question, I may venture to say that in the opinion of many, the attitude of the government was dignified, was worthy of Canadian statesmen, and was entirely in harmony with the importance and gravity of the occasion. In order that Canada might be first in the field we must bear in mind that offers of help should have come from Canada as far back as the middle of July of last year, long before any one would believe that war was at all likely to arise out of the South African complication. I would put it to the intelligence and to the spirit of fairness of any hon. gentleman, if an offer of that kind at that time would not have been improper, undignified, and entirely uncalled for. There was no occasion whatever for a country occupying the position that Canada does in the British Empire, rushing fiercely and thoughtlessly into a war with which directly she had nothing whatever to do. The only possible motive by which this government should have been actuated, the only feeling by which the vast bulk of the people of Canada are actuated in this war, is, not so much that their assistance would be of such prime importance to Great Britain, but that it should be taken as a sign to the world at large that this great colony sympathized with the mother country, and was willing to assist her at any time that assistance was needed. I believe that ninety-nine hundredths of the people of this country are quite prepared, if the destinies of the British Empire require it, to vote the last man and the last dollar for that purpose. At the outset of the war no one believed that our assistance was at all vital; but it was a response to the yelpings and the barkings of the populations of foreign countries, who were denouncing England, and endeavouring to impress on the governments of their own countries, the desirability of intervening. Then the signal was flashed from Canada through the proper authorities, that our sympathies were with the mother country, and if necessary our material aid also. We are all, I believe, without distinction of party, intensely proud of the noble part that has been played by our young men on the veldt and among the hills and mountains of South Africa. The discipline they have suffered, and the lesson they have learned, will return to us a thousand-fold in confidence in ourselves and in determination that we shall endeavour to be worthy of the men who have so gallantly stood up for the flag. In view of the sacrifices and sufferings of our young men there, we ought to manage so that we can look them in the face when they return; and I think we cannot do so if, while they are suffering and laying down their lives for their country, under the blazing sun of Africa, we are here bickering, clamouring and denouncing each other as traitors to the British flag. I think the disposition to make political capital out of these occurrences is not in its essence loyalty, and is not treating our suffering sons and brothers worthily. Why is it that hon. gentlemen upon the opposite side of the House and the press which represents their views, bring this charge of disloyalty against a certain section or certain individuals of the people of Canada? The very fact that this charge is made and insisted upon and amplified and illustrated, proves conclusively, that they believe in the loyalty of ninety-nine hundredths—nay, nine hundred and ninety-nine thousandths of our people; and it is only an effort to enhance their own loyalty in the minds of the loyal people of this country. If there were disloyalty in Canada, it would certainly be the duty of any one who discovered it, to point it out; but what are the facts which have been offered to us in proof that this spirit exists? The evidences are of the most paltry character. We cannot expect that every citizen of a free country can view matters of this kind in precisely the same light. There are many of our most able and intellectual men and women who think the war was unjustifiable. There are many who agree with some British statesmen that the war was unjust and unrighteous. Shall they not have the right to express their opinion freely and fully, and is there any disloyalty in their doing so? If Canada is to participate either to a small or to a great extent in the wars of the empire, certainly Canadians must have the right to discuss the merits of these wars? No one will contend that we are bound by any feeling of loyalty to the mother country to participate in an unjust war, a war of conquest or spoliation, a war that does not in any way affect British or Canadian interests. No one will contend that we ought to offer our treasure or our sons to support an unjust war. The question of the justice or injustice of a war must be a subject for open and fair discussion. Otherwise, when the wave of loyalty rises high, we shall find ourselves dragooned and precipitated almost unknowingly into transactions which the wisest and best could not advocate. Granted, then, that we should not be called on to assist in any unjust cause, and that the question of the justice or injustice of the cause is an essential part of our participation in these conflicts, then I contend that there is no disloyalty in any person arguing that the war is unjust or improper and that we should not enter into it. One of our hon. friends, in opposition to the action of the government, took the ground that the government should not have expended any money or have made any offer of material assistance to the mother country, without calling parliament and obtaining its sanction. No one has questioned the propriety of the stand he took, as a constitutional question. We contended, however, that under the circumstances, the consent—nay, the overwhelming wish—of the country was so plain and manifest that the strict letter of the constitution could be dispensed with. But ought we not to a certain extent to be grateful to those who, when we are headstrong, enthusiastic, excited—I am speaking more particularly of those who have been brought up, so to speak, in a British atmosphere—call attention to the provisions of the constitution which have been gained by so much care and suffering and bloodshed in the past? The men who call attention to these are not enemies of the country; they are not traitors in any respect whatever. They are the truest friends of sound constitutional procedure and of the British government and British ideas. Another hon. gentleman who thought the government were precipitate, had ideas of his own, which were certainly open to discussion, as to the future destiny of Canada. He held, that the destiny of Canada was not to be bound up any more intimately with the affairs of the British Empire, particularly in matters of war and matters pertaining to the dealings of the empire with outside powers, but that our true interest lay in looking towards an independent future of our own. This is an attitude which many of the most loyal and devoted Canadians have held for many years. It is certainly not unattractive. It is not without grand vistas to think that Canada should at some future time be a nation in the world, with its own foreign representatives, no longer a dependency, but an ally, of the mother country, standing side by side with her, equal in majesty and sovereignty. Whatever be our notion as to the present propriety of such an advocacy, no one can deny that the ideal is grand and the conception magnificent, and it does not involve any disloyalty or treason to the British Empire. But, Sir, differing from these gentlemen, I think that this was not the proper time to enumerate or formulate those ideas. But I can thoroughly understand that one who does take advantage of this opportunity to call attention to the future destiny of Canada is doing a service to his country for which we ought to be grateful.

Is the course we are taking to be confined to a mere participation of Canada in the South African war? The passage of the resolution to which I am now addressing myself is a turning point in Canadian and British history and deserves to be treated with calm consideration and its causes and consequences looked fairly in the face. Are we in any danger, Sir, of taking to a certain extent a similar position to that which the governing classes in the mother country have taken, namely, of entering suddenly and unpreparedly upon a new course and a new policy fraught with vast consequences, perhaps undreamed of by the wisest of us. And should we not, when we face a contingency of this kind, look upon it as a question of large policy and look to the future, not in the attitude of enthusiastic children, jumping into some unknown fairyland, but of statesmen working out the future destinies of a great country and a great and prosperous people. The question then arises: Is the Dominion of Canada, from this time forward, to take part in all the wars in which the British Empire may necessarily be engaged? If so, to what extent is she to participate in these conflicts? And if she is to participate in them what provisions are we making for giving the empire our military and financial assistance? All these questions deserve an answer, and those who call attention to the difficulties of the case and the magnitude and importance of the issue, are not doing a disservice but a great service to the people of this country and the empire at large. I think that it is the duty of responsible statesmen on both sides to get together, or at any rate to formulate their views upon the vast and far-reaching issues which may arise from the action Canada has taken and arrange for some programme which all the people of all political parties in this country can support. In the first place if we are to participate in British wars, we must adjust our revenue, our military administration, and our internal administration to the new conditions, for if we allow ourselves to be swamped by the wave of patriotic enthusiasm, which is so easily aroused, into a course of this kind, without due and careful provision as to the future, we may find ourselves in difficulties which we did not foresee.

During the course of this debate we had a speech from the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), to whom it is always interesting to listen, who, although he may be unfair and savage at times, yet displays a certain picturesqueness which is not uninteresting. He certainly is very reckless, but this very recklessness itself has a certain charm which perhaps otherwise the hon. gentleman would lack. The hon. gentleman said that all this talk about the necessity of calling parliament was moonshine, that the Militia Act gave ample power and authority to the government to call out all the forces of Canada and put them into the field, and that it was utter nonsense, from a constitutional and legal standpoint, to invoke a supposed constitution in opposition to this Act. Of course, my hon. friend is not a lawyer, and like those who are not lawyers can take liberties with statutes and the constitution which men of the legal profession do not feel prepared to take, because they do not enjoy the advantage which my hon. friend enjoys of replying, when brought to task, for their errors and inconsistencies, that they are not constitutional lawyers, and leave that to their legal friends. I was somewhat amused by the attitude of the hon. member for West York—an attitude which no doubt would appeal to many people throughout Canada as not unreasonable—because he left parliament out of sight altogether. It would appear prima facie, from the Militia Act, that the government has the power the hon. gentleman claims they have, and that it was under no necessity to call parliament together to supply the funds for fitting out any contingent for service abroad, and, therefore, the hon. gentleman quoted with great unction certain clauses in this Act. He quoted the clause which provides that the officer commanding any military district or division or any active corps of militia may, in any emergency, such as war, invasion, or insurrection, call out the militia under his command. He also quoted the clause which gives Her Majesty power in certain circumstances to call out the militia, supply them with arms, and put them in the field. But I would call his attention to the fact that every statute provides that various officers of the government may do various things. For instance, the power is given the Minister of Public Works to build public works in numerous places. The power is given the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to establish lighthouses and carry on all the business of his department. And so with other officers. The statutes give them ample power to do all these things, but they cannot do any of them unless parliament votes the money. And there is not one line of the constitution or of any statute which dispenses with the power of parliament over the purse. I need hardly call the attention of hon. members, not only to the fundamental law or constitutional idea of the power of parliament, but to the statute known as the Audit Act, which is appealed to every session of this House as the only authority the government or any officer of the government, has for drawing money from the public exchequer. The only authority under which the government could draw any money to meet the necessary expenses in anticipation of this vote is the Audit Act, and not any provisions of the Militia Act or any other. This I contend wholly disposes of the contention of the hon. member for West York or those who think with him that the Militia Act gives power to the government to draw one cent from the treasury, although it gives the government power to call out the militia in certain eventualities.

Mr. SPROULE. If the hon. gentleman's reasoning is correct, then the government had no authority to do what they did.

Mr. FLINT. Certainly not. The only authority they had was the presumed consent of the people and their assumption that parliament would indemnify them.

Mr. SPROULE. Why did they not assume that earlier?

Mr. FLINT. I shall not dwell upon the other point on which considerable stress is laid by a few of my hon. friends opposite, because it has ceased to be of any practical importance. I refer to the point as to whether Canada ought to have offered to pay all the expenses of the contingents throughout the war or to have accepted the status as laid down by the mother country. That point, although it was deemed by our hon. friends opposite a good ground of cleavage to take with the administration, has practically passed out of the political arena.

We have heard during this discussion too much about French Canadian sentiment and French Canadian attitude with regard to the action taken by the administration. I think that every hon. gentleman who understands clearly the situation must appreciate the situation which our French Canadian representatives occupy in this very delicate matter. It would be perfectly absurd to expect that those whose nationality, whose literary history, identifies them with French history can feel exactly the same in a matter of this kind as their English, Scotch, and Irish fellow-citizens. Their point of view is different; and, while there is no question, and I believe there is, at this moment, no pretense of question, as to their thorough and hearty loyalty to British institutions and the British flag, yet we cannot expect that they will feel the same thrill of anxiety, the same thrill of enthusiasm, over a foreign war in which our mother country is engaged as do we of British nationality. And, though, a minority among the English population, their teachers have educated them—and not only their educators in Canada, but those in old France from the time of Montesquieu down—to believe in the beauty and strength of the British constitution. There is a large school in France of the ablest and best thought which pins its faith to the essential principles of the British constitution. Our French fellow-citizens have been trained in these doctrines; and, if when we are carried away with enthusiasm, they check us and recall us to the principles of that constitution which we are only too anxious to cling to, I think we should feel proud of and satisfied with the attitude they assume. I for one have no word of censure, but, have an entirely opposite feeling in regard to them when they appeal to that constitution which we all so deeply revere and would so greatly admire. But, Sir, if that feeling exists—a natural and laudable feeling—and if that feeling has been incidentally attacked by hon. gentlemen opposite, I would call the attention of those hon. gentlemen to the fact that it is the feeling, at this moment, of gentlemen of both parties among our French Canadian fellow subjects. It has ceased and must cease to be a line of cleavage between the Conservative and Liberal parties in this country, when we find that the Conservative element of French Canada take precisely the same view of this subject as do the Liberal element. I need hardly call attention to the very excellent speech of the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Chauvin) which will be found in Hansard, and which will repay perusal. I do not know the hon. gentleman personally, but I understand that he is a gentleman of high standing in the province of Quebec; and certainly his utterances upon this subject are well worthy of perusal. He takes precisely the same ground as my hon. friend from Laprairie (Mr. Monet), and my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) have taken. But, while there is not one word of censure for the hon. member for Terrebonne, no language of denunciation, insinuation or censure seems to be too strong for my hon. friends from Laprairie and Labelle. If we have learned properly the lesson of the British constitution, we must understand that large room must be allowed for difference of opinion upon constitutional questions and constitutional procedure before the undeserved taunt of treason or disloyalty is hurled across the floor of this House. I cannot conceive a word more distasteful to an hon. member of this House; I cannot conceive of any epithet more painful as applied to a citizen of this country, than that of traitor or disloyal man. We should be cautious before such taunts as this are hurled across the floor of this Chamber or used in the press in regard to any important section of our fellow-citizens. The Liberal party has gone through this conflict before. We know that for many years the stock in trade of hon. gentlemen opposite was the essential disloyalty of the whole Liberal party; and to such an extent had these denunciations gone, with such persistence had they been sustained through the press and public speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite, that the mother country had been imbued with the idea that the great Liberal party was hostile to British institutions and disloyal to the British flag, and was prepared, at any moment, to hand this country over to a foreign power. It was a matter of astonishment to the British people, to find that, when the Liberal party, was entrusted with power, that every element which went to show the most thorough devotion to British interests and British unity and British ideas was present in the Liberal government of Canada. We all remember the wave of enthusiasm created in the mother country by the presence and the eloquence of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Liberal administration. We all recollect the passionate feeling of regard expressed for Canada and Canadians when the tariff of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance was announced to the world. And we have felt that regard to-day, with our hearts beating more rapidly, when we heard the telegram from the mother country of congratulation upon the action of the brave and loyal Canadians who had fallen in South Africa fighting under the British flag. Never in the history of the British Empire did Canada stand so near to the heart of the mother country, so near to the heart of all her fellow colonists throughout the universe, as at this hour. Can it be just or fair that any speaker, for any purpose whatever, should undertake to dim the impression of that loyalty and the impression of that devotion by charges of treason or disloyalty against any hon. gentleman or against any political party within the walls of this House? Sir, unfortunately, there have been those outside of this Chamber who have used language which is scarcely short of criminal in this connection. We have seen quotations from the press and other quotations even from clergymen in the pulpit who have hurled the taunts against members of the administration and large classes of people which only required repetition to show their utter falsity and as well as their utter absurdity. I trust that from the hour when these terrible losses have been announced to us, when the union of hearts between the colonies and the mother country has been cemented by the blood of our loyal sons and brothers, these insinuations will be heard no more. What are the conclusions which I attempt to deduce from the few and imperfect observations I have made? In the first place, I think it is apparent that Canada is thoroughly and heartily interested in the progress of British ideas of government throughout the world, and that it is as students of that progress, and as well-wishers of the continuation and expansion of those principles that we have taken side with the mother country in this war. The Boer republic, whatever may be its good qualities, certainly was intolerant in its treatment, not only of Englishmen, but of all those within their borders who were outside their own narrow creed or their own peculiar race. The Boer has many excellent qualities, but intolerance is unfortunately one of his great characteristics. Although, as a result of error after error, and blunder after blunder, peace was once made with the Boer on the strict understanding that equality of rights should exist between the foreigners and the Dutch men within those republics, yet, inch by inch, they were robbed of those rights and equalities, until at last patience ceased to be a virtue, and diplomatic as well as other pressure was brought to bear upon the Boers in order to compel them to give the rights which they had pledged their word to give. The Boer republic was not a republic except in name. We now know that it was an oligarchy pure and simple, that the average Boer farmer had very little control over the administration of his own affairs; that a narrow, brutal, cruel and corrupt clique at Pretoria governed the affairs of the Transvaal; that the foreigners who had built up the prosperity of that country were, under the name of taxation, most outrageously robbed; and that no fair and honest account was ever given to the people of the Transvaal of the expenditure of the enormous revenues which were wrung out of the people who had conducted its enterprises. Otherwise how could we have seen the expenditure for ammunition and arms, which must at least have cost twenty or thirty million pounds, and which must have been smuggled through the accounts which were submitted from time to time to the assembly of the Boer republic? There can be no doubt in the minds of any fair observer that the intention of the managers of this enormous fund, playing upon the national characteristics and ideas of the Dutch people, combined with their friends in the colonies to the south, was to drive British power from South Africa. I ask any hon. gentleman who is inclined to sympathize with the Boers in this struggle, to contemplate for one moment the condition of things we would have seen in South Africa if their well laid schemes had been successful; and that they might have been successful in case the mother country was involved in war with a first class power, no one can for a moment doubt. Suppose Cape Colony and Natal had been overrun by these warlike people with the machinery they had at their command in national and race feeling, and in the use of spoils they had wrung from the Uitlanders, we would have seen there a tyranny such as the world has not seen since the days before the French revolution; we would have seen all British and all foreigners driven entirely from any participation in the civil administration or in the government of the country; we would have seen in the world a new and powerful nation ready to take the part of Britain's enemies in any complications in which she might have been engaged. That this danger is likely to be removed is owing to the devotion of the British government and the British people and their determination that at all hazards, and no matter at what sacrifice, these pretensions must be overthrown.

The lesson, then, we are to learn from all this is that we should stand under all circumstances by the principles of the British constitution as interpreted in our own country to-day. We should always keep open every avenue of political preferment to all creeds and classes in our Dominion, absolute free speech and free thought should be conceded, and we should be prepared with our means to stand by the British Empire in any war in which she may be engaged which we deem to be honourable and just. In order that we may be able to decide as a nation whether these wars are honourable and just, there should be absolute freedom of thought and speech, and full discussion of all the issues in any conflicts that may arise. It is time that the government of the day, and the opposition of the day, should think out the problem of where we stand. If we are going to adopt this new attitude, and I do not say it is an improper one, we should make provision for the future at home. How do we stand from a military standpoint? I think the country has every reason to be proud and satisfied with the action of our militia department. The utmost bitterness of opposition, the utmost violence of attack, has so far not reached or attempted to reach the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Borden). I think he has received nothing but praise for the smooth and efficient manner in which the department over which he presides has carried out all the details preparatory to the sending of these contingents. Certainly it must be gratifying to hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House that so far as the machinery is concerned, as respects the handling of the men and forwarding them to the point where their services may be required, this machinery has worked smoothly. But I will not anticipate the debate that may take place when the militia estimates come forward. I think, however, it is time to consider in what position we stand as a military power. I would not be just to myself if I did not say that the estimates which this resolution provides for are by no means the full estimates which we may have to vote before this parliament closes, in regard to the South African war. We are asked for two millions now, it is possible we may require two millions more, because whatever may be the issue of the war, I believe that we are going to stand nobly by the men whom we have sent forward, and the families of the men who may suffer by this war. We are to give them heaping and overflowing gratitude for the services that they have rendered to Canada and to the mother country, and we must provide amply for this. I believe our sense of gratitude must lead us to enshrine in some noble monument in this country the memory of our friends who have gone from us and many of whom will never return. I believe there must be no stint in the expression of our gratitude to those who have made this great sacrifice to express the loyalty and devotion of this country to the flag which must float over us if we are to sustain our place among the nations of the earth. I shall vote heartily for these resolutions, and I think the discussion of them, although some unpleasant things may have been said, will do this country a vast amount of good. I think it lifts our minds from many of the small points which engage our attention in political warfare, and lifts us to a higher sphere of thought. It will help us to realize the privileges that we enjoy as part of the British Empire, and confirm in us the determination nobly to support the part which Providence has called upon us to sustain in our relation to that empire.

Mr. A. BRODER (Dundas). As the motion before the House commits this country to a new departure, I do not wish to give a silent vote, particularly as representing a county which, irrespective of class, or creed, or politics, is very enthusiastic as to the duty of the government in doing what they are doing now, and would even support them in going further. I may take this occasion of saying that the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has performed his part well. In the first place he apologized for his leader, he next apologized for the slowness with which the government seized the opportunity which was presented to it of doing its part in this great drama of the British Empire. And, Sir, he has apologized with a good deal of ingenuity for hon. gentlemen on his own side of the House who are at variance with their friends in reference to the subject matter of the question before the House to-night. It occurred to me that these hon. gentlemen who have seen fit to differ from their friends were only following out the lines which had been laid down in years past by their leaders in the province of Quebec, and that they are the consistent ones, instead of the leaders. I wish to say further that while I dissent entirely from the views expressed by the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Monet), and the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), that the hon. member for Labelle went up to the hill a bigger man than he came down the hill, and that in the eye of public opinion he is a much smaller man in the public life of Canada than he ever was before. As for the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville, who says that he is not willing to spend one dollar or to sacrifice one man in the interest of the empire, only for commercial purposes, he stands on a very low ground as a public man in Canada to-night. I make that statement for the reason that Canada is looking to strengthen her commercial ties with every country in the world. So that every country in the world, the most remote island, outside of British rule, is just as dear to his heart as any part of the British Empire if his argument meant anything. It is the business of any business government, particularly of the business government we have before us to-night, to strengthen the commercial ties. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Flint) who has just sat down, took great credit for the position this country now occupies in reference to the British Empire, and some of the reasons which he gave, took away all the credit from his side of the House. In the first place, man after man has got up on that side of the House and charged the Conservative press and party with driving the right hon. leader of the government into the position which he occupies to-night. Then, the Conservative party deserve the credit, not the hon. gentlemen opposite.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. BRODER. We are willing to take all the responsibility. Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House are not willing to take that responsibility, because one gentleman after another has stood up in his place and spoken on this subject, without saying on which side he was. You can read Hansard without finding how they stand on this question. The hon. gentleman also took credit for touching the great English heart when the government brought down their tariff. What did it mean? Did it mean that England was to get a preference? No, Sir, it meant that every country under the sun, which complied with certain conditions, was to have the preference. That is the way that they touched the great English heart. Why, hon. gentlemen were driven into that position to get out of a worse position. They were driven to give England a preference because other countries were forcing them by treaties with England to give them a preference. Hon. gentlemen can turn up the orders in council if they wish, to go over to the Department of the Secretary of State and find them. I want to say further that there is no man who can say that the people as a whole are not loyal in their sentiments. There are hon. gentlemen representing the French Canadian people in this House, and there is no man, irrespective of the country he may have come from, when he recalls the lessons of history, but who should be proud of the position that the French Canadian people took when an effort was made to induce them, shortly after the French flag left our shores, to go over and unite their fortunes with those of the colonies across the line. They remained true and firm to British institutions, and hon. gentlemen opposite had a right to be proud of the position occupied by the French Canadian people. We want to keep the continuity of that history, but if we follow the course pursued by the hon. member for Labelle, or the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville, we will break the continuity of that history, and this House does not want its continuity broken.

Mr. MONET. How about your colleague, the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Chauvin).

Mr. BRODER. I am taking you at your word. The government gave way to public opinion, but they gave way to public opinion after attempting to form public opinion. The statement made on the 3rd of October by the right hon. leader of the government as to the constitutional position he was in and published to the world in the Toronto Globe, was an effort to form public opinion averse to the movement which has taken place. The hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) was trying to form public opinion in the province of Quebec, averse to any movement such as that which has happened. The hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) can put a whole empire on a postage stamp, but he could not raise his voice to keep that map intact. Not one of these hon. gentlemen interfered with the attempt to form public opinion averse to this movement. Instead they were silent. At last it began to dawn upon them that public opinion was against them, that public opinion was rising up in this country, that this country should stand in the position in which other colonies were proposing to stand. This is not a question of participating in England's wars; it is a colonial question, because the supremacy of England in her colonies is in jeopardy, and the colonies stand up and say that they shall be continued under British rule. It is not an English war, it is a colonial war, and every colony in the British Empire is interested in the outcome of the war. The liberty of the subject of the British Empire is the great underlying principle of British rule, and if any British subject in South Africa is deprived of his rights, it is for the colonies throughout the realm to unite and insist that British citizens shall have their rights. I am not here to say that this man or that man is disloyal, but, I cannot understand the position taken by the right hon. Prime Minister, when he says, in Sherbrooke, Englishmen, Irishmen and Scotchmen can be enthusiastic in their loyalty, but that the Frenchman is enthusiastic from a sense of duty. I could understand that if there was a war between France and England, but I cannot understand it, when there is no war between France and England. I think that the right hon. gentleman is not fair to his people when he makes that statement broadcast through the world. He is not fair to the French people of the province of Quebec. I cannot understand why French Canadian loyalty in this case should not be more enthusiastic than that of the Irishman, the Englishman or the Scotchman, because President Kruger would not allow even a Roman Catholic clergyman to perform the last sad rites to the dead belonging to the Roman Catholic Church. They were refused the right to go and bury their dead, because they were Catholics. I cannot understand the Frenchman, or the Roman Catholics not being enthusiastic in reference to the success of England. She is fighting for liberty irrespective of class or creed in South Africa. The hon. Minister of Public Works, I am sorry to say, is not in his seat. If the ministers were soldiers and were out of their trenches as much as they are out of this House, they would be killed. You can scarcely find any minister in his seat. The hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henry Joly de Lotbinière) is not here; the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) is not here; the right hon. leader of the government, is not here, and the minister who looks after the balances in this country, is not here. The gentleman who is supposed to deal out justice in this country, is not here.

Mr. BRODER.

An hon. MEMBER. Where are the Tappers and Fosters?

Mr. BRODER. The hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) is not here. Yet, this is a momentous question. When matters that are stirring the whole British Empire to its centre are being discussed and disposed of in this House, the ministers of the Crown are not here. Well, I am here, and I want to say that the Hon. Mr. Tarte is beginning to talk about the Irishmen of Canada now. He has been talking about the Frenchmen for the last four years. He begins to think that the French string of his political fiddle is about worn out (he is about right), and that the Frenchmen are not going to dance to his music any longer. And now Mr. Tarte wants to take a string off the Irish harp and hitch it on to his political fiddle. Well, Sir, there will be no harmony in that instrument, and I do not think he can get much music out of it. I cannot understand why the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) should make this insulting reference to the Irish people. I am the son of an Irishman, and I am not sorry for it. The minister (Mr. Tarte) was referring to our friend here from Kent (Mr. McInerney) who spoke on the question, and who spoke well, and no doubt the minister was sorry for that. Here is what he (Mr. Tarte) said:

When I see an Englishman loyal to Canada, I quite understand that; when I meet a French Canadian loyal to England, I quite understand that; we have our liberties.

I want to show the logic of his statement, Mr. Speaker, There is mischief underlying the words of the Minister of Public Works, and the import of his statement here, has not, I think, dawned upon every one in this House. He says that the Frenchmen are loyal because they have their liberty. Their liberty, mark you. And he continues:

But when I hear an Irishman assert himself as more loyal than the Queen, I say there is something wrong in his heart.

Why, Mr. Speaker. Has not an Irishman his liberties in this country? Does he mean that an Irishman in Canada has not his liberties? That must be his conclusion.

Mr. POPE. That is what he meant.

Mr. BRODER. I say, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) is endeavouring to make political and party use of the mere fact that an Irish Canadian spoke loyally of the British institutions of his country in this House. Sir, no man can to-day look at the poor Irish Fusiliers depleted in their numbers from 800 to 200, and talk about Irishmen not being loyal. No man can to-day look at the interests of the British Empire, centred on the movements of Lord Roberts and Lord Kitchener, both Irishmen, without realizing that the slur thrown out upon Irishmen by the Minister of Public Works, ought to be resented by every Irishman as well as by every honourable man.

Now, Sir, I want to talk a little more about this question. Mr. Tarte was good enough to say up in Toronto, that when the war became a serious thing he was willing to help the motherland. Let me ask him: When did it cease to be serious? When did it commence to be serious? When the parliament of Great Britain voted £5,000,000 and when the Queen sent 50,000 soldiers to South Africa (as many British soldiers as there were in the field at the battle of Waterloo) were they only doing it hippantly and for fun? Oh, yes, the seriousness of the English people is nothing at all compared with the seriousness of the Minister of Public Works. It occurs to me that if that hon. gentleman's contention meant anything at all, then the more serious the war became, the stronger his contention against sending help would be, because he says that we have no right to participate in the wars of England. His ground was: No sacrifice to be made without representation. Then, Sir, the more serious it was and the more we were called upon to sacrifice, the stronger his objection to help England would be. If he had been logical that would be his contention. But, Sir, he only wished to blind the eyes of the public of this country when he made that statement. Sir, the war was serious from the start, and it was so serious that English statesmen did their best to endeavour to avert the war. I want to say that the language of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) is perhaps more serious in itself than hon. gentlemen think of. I want to say here, that the position we have assumed is more important than perhaps some people realize. The moment we participated in this great achievement it taught the men across the line who have seen fit to talk of us as not being true to England; it taught any nation that thinks Canada is not true to the empire; it taught them that Canada is true to Britain, even to the sacrifice of the lives of her brave sons. Sir, the action we have taken in the South African war will for ever shut the mouths of the men who say that Canada is not loyal to the empire, and that of itself means a great deal in the interests of this country. I have already stated that this is a war of colonial interests, and I say further, that the man who stands up here and says he is not willing to make some sacrifices for the empire, does not appreciate the full meaning of the fact that this week the British parliament voted £145,000,000 for the British navy. What does that mean? Sir, that means safety to the colonies of the empire.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BRODER. Not one dollar of that is needed for the protection of England's shores, so to speak, but it is to show the world that not one foot of British territory under British rule in any part of this wide world, shall be touched by a foreign foe with impunity. Hon. gentlemen opposite have got to grow larger and bigger and wider than mere provincial politics if we are going to govern this country. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) has got to get over the little wall he has built around himself in the province of Quebec. They have got to get bigger men to lead their party, and they have bigger men than he is, and they ought to put them in public life. We are told that now they propose to send Mr. Tarte away, or that he is going away. If you read the Scriptures you will find that in ancient times there used to be cities of refuge and I think the Minister of Public Works is starting for a city of refuge, to wit, Paris. They want to get rid of him and so they send him to the city of refuge. Well, Sir, if we are to send a Frenchman to the Paris exhibition (and no man would be more willing than I to have Canada represented by a Frenchman there) let them send a good one; let them send a representative Frenchman; let them send a Frenchman who will be a credit to his country, and who will represent her as she ought to be represented at the Paris exhibition. That is what I say.

I may say, Sir, that I look upon the seriousness of this war in a graver light than does the Minister of Public Works. There, was England surrounded by hostile Europe. You could look all around the horizon of Europe and there you found pointed on England unfriendly guns, backed up by an unfriendly populace. It was not a war confined to the bounds of South Africa; it was a war necessary for England's supremacy in the future; a war that every Canadian ought to be willing to participate in. The supremacy of England was in the balance, and her supremacy must be maintained. I say here to-night, that England, by showing to the world her capability of dealing with this crisis in the interest of the empire, is fighting the battle of every British subject, no matter in what part of the world you may find him. The government of the day in Canada were out of touch with the spirit of this British Empire, and it is a good thing they were driven into line. It is not unique in one sense that we are doing what we are doing in Canada. Every British colony had offered aid to the mother country before we did. Then, Sir, if we are making a mistake, we are not making that mistake alone, for every other colony is doing what Canada did at the last moment. Canada follows along behind the other colonies—led by its government shall I say; no, but its government driven by public opinion to take action. They had no time to prepare for war, and I will give you some reasons why they had no time. We want to excuse these gentlemen if there is any chance at all. They were getting ready for a war of the ballot, if you please—a great political war; and they got out 'Political Pointers No. 1.' I am going to call it by another name, and I hope the Minister of Trade and Commerce will allow me to be foster father while I christen his child. I am going to call it the apologetic thesis which the hon. gentleman issued in Toronto on the 24th of August, 1899. It was an apology from one end to the other for the doings, or rather the misdoings, of his friends, and it was so different from what the hon. gentleman had been telling the people of this country for twenty years, that in order that the people might not be mistaken as to who made this apology, they put the hon. gentleman's portrait upon it.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). You had better read it and learn something.

Mr. BRODER. There is another minister gone out. They were loading their Long Toms and their big guns with something else. Then, Sir, when we come down a little later, we find the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher)—I do not suppose he is a fighting man, but he was down around Sherbrooke with his little agricultural spade digging trenches. Let us look at him a minute. Here is Caesar's image and superscription on this document, for the Minister of Agriculture franked it. I am showing why these gentlemen did not want war. The title here is 'The Laurier Government and the Conservatives.' This is the kind of material they were shooting at the people down in Quebec. They intended to have a pitched battle some time last January, but public opinion drove them out of their trenches, and the dear knows when they will get back into them. Now, I want to show you the kind of statements these hon. gentlemen will send out when they do not expect to be caught or answered. On the 4th page of this pamphlet, under the head, 'Tory Tariff and Liberal Tariff,' we find it stated that binders under the Tory tariff had to pay 35 per cent and under the Reform tariff 25 per cent. What does the Minister of Customs (Mr. Pater-son) think of that? He was down there endorsing this pamphlet. Does not any hon. gentleman know, who is honest enough to state the fact, that in 1894 the tariff on binders was put at 20 per cent by the Conservative government, and that it is 20 per cent to-day. This is only a sample of what this book contains, and this is the kind of war these hon. gentlemen were proposing to wage in this country. But public opinion, led by the Conservative press, I am glad to say, drove them out of that position in the interests of this country, and every man in this country, no matter what his nationality may be, must admit that Canada would have made the mistake of her history if she had failed to participate with the other colonies in South Africa. And, Sir, it is well that Canada did not make that mistake. No man can look at this great empire, its possibilities, and its potentialities for good in the world, without seeing that Canada must assume her proper place in that great drama which the British Empire is to play in the future; and every man must feel that while England's heart throbs for Canada and for the other colonies which are fighting on her behalf in South Africa, we are cementing the empire with a responsibility that it can never, so long as history lasts, get away from. England must stand by her colonies; that is the policy of the public men of England to-day. A few years ago there were small, narrow English statesmen who took up the role which the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) takes up in the Dominion of Canada, and who were trying to get away from the responsibility of empire; but honest public opinion in England opposed them. England has gone on not only in the interest of the English people, but in the interest of the whole human race; and every Canadian, whether French, English, Scotch or Irish, must feel that Canada, standing where she does to-day, and making sacrifices if need be, is doing a duty which will never be forgotten by the English-speaking people of the world.

Mr. FIRMAN McCLURE (Colchester). Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Broder) opened his remarks by saying that my hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) had begun by apologizing for his leader. I think it is to be regretted that the hon. gentleman or somebody else on the other side of the House has not been found ready to apologize for their leader, because of the position he has taken in reference to this question—not the position he has taken in this House, but the position he took in the country before he came here, and which he did not dare to take before parliament. Then, the hon. gentleman proceeded to say that when my hon. friend from Yarmouth claimed that this government was entitled to credit for the position which Canada occupies in the empire to-day, he should have given the credit to the hon. gentlemen of the opposition. All I can say is this—and I but repeat words that have been repeated to me—that if the hon. gentlemen of the opposition are entitled to credit for the advance which Canada has made in her position in the empire, both as regards her material prosperity and the strengthening of the ties that bind us to the mother country—the progress that has taken place since this government came into power—then I think it will be a long time before the people of Canada can trust hon. gentlemen opposite with power, for they have done a great deal more in their present position than they did during the eighteen years they sat on this side of the House. What is the history of Canada since this government assumed the reins of power? I remember as a school-boy hearing Conservative orators proclaiming everywhere that they and they alone, were true apostles of the imperial spirit in this country—

Mr. PRIOR. So we are.

Mr. McCLURE. That they, and they alone, possess the peculiar kind of loyalty that came down from heaven and inspired men; that they and they alone were entitled to be called patriots, and that all who followed the Liberal party were doing it from base and unpatriotic motives. How often did we hear that in this House; so often did we hear it that even those who followed this Liberal party, sometimes from the constant dinning with which it was clamoured into their ears, began to think that possibly when the Liberal party came into power something terrible would happen to the empire and the loyalty of the people. But what do we find? We find that from the moment the right hon. First Minister assumed office down to the present, there has gone on in this country such a march of progress, not only in prosperity, but in the broadest imperial idea, that such an illusion has been completely dispelled. When, Sir, was Canada treated with such consideration by the Imperial government as she is to-day? When did hon. gentlemen opposite, with their present leader representing them in London, succeed in calling the attention of the empire to this country so thoroughly as our present First Minister did during his few months visit there? Why, if hon. gentlemen opposite are entitled to credit for this, then I say it has been decreed, not that they have the instinct of government, but that in the opposition they are all powerful and have done much.

But I was still more surprised at the next position which the hon. gentleman took. He not only wanted credit for all the progress made, but proceeded to do something which savoured very like what Conservative leaders used to call a 'running down the country.' When the whole empire was ringing with plaudits for the action which Canada has taken, when even Her Majesty telegraphed to us her personal thanks for what Canada has done, when everybody throughout the empire recognizes that Canada has come to the assistance of the empire with her strong arm and powerful, when these plaudits are ringing everywhere, we have a Tory member of parliament forsooth, standing up in his place and telling us that Canada is behind in the procession.

Some hon. MEMBERS. So she was.

Mr. McCLURE. Does the hon. gentleman not know that if the position of Canada is unique in any respect among the colonies of the empire to-day, it is because she has been more unanimous in giving her aid than any colony? Let the hon. gentleman read the parliamentary debates in the Australian colonies, and find by what narrow majorities they succeeded in carrying the vote in those colonies, and then let him listen, when the vote is recorded in this House, and note what a difference there is between the position of Canada in this respect and the Australian colonies. I do not blame these colonies, I do not say they were wrong, but I say that if there is anything unique in the position of Canada, it is that she is more unanimous than any other colony in standing by the mother country in this great contest.

Not to deal any further with the hon. gentleman's remarks, I wish to say that if there is anything calculated to bring us back from the paltry issues that sometimes are introduced into this debate, it is the recent news we have heard with reference to this war, which must impress upon the minds of every member of this parliament that while war may be the arena in which glory is won and the foundations of liberty and reform are laid, it is at the same time the theatre in which saddening dramas that enter into private life are enacted, and, therefore, I think that in view of the recent news, it is, perhaps, becoming to us that we should approach this subject, not as a light trivial matter, but one of the most solemn import to the people of Canada, both in their public and private capacity. I recognize fully, however, that this stage of the discussion no argument is necessary to justify a vote in favour of the resolution before the House, and I also recognize that no argument against that resolution is likely to be listened to very patiently either by this House or the country. I do not propose, therefore, to enter into any lengthy argument upon the question, but simply to state very briefly, not the reasons which may have animated the government in the action they took or the reasons which may have justified that action in their minds, but the reasons why I feel that our vote should be cast on the affirmative side in this debate; and as no two of us can look at any question in exactly the same way, it is more than probable—in fact this debate has affirmed it—that the reasons which would influence some of us are not those which influence others, although we may arrive at the same conclusion. We have been told several times during this debate that it is perfectly absurd to say that the present war is not a justifiable one. On the other hand, we are told that we have nothing to do with the causes which led to this war or the question as to whether it is just or unjust. For my part, I cannot fully agree with either proposition. I believe that it is a just war, but at the same time I cannot see that there is anything treasonable in the opposite view. If the history of the empire teaches us one thing more plainly than another, it is that the very purest patriotism, the patriotism which lives beyond the excitement that evoked it, which lives on the pages of history and in the memory of prosperity, has often been found in the ranks of a much-abused minority who have not hesitated to denounce the public policy of their country as wrong. Every schoolboy in this country is familiar with the words of the eminent English statesman who, standing in the parliament of this country, almost with his expiring breath, exclaimed against the prosecution of the great war in which his country was then engaged with her greatest colony. The words of Chatham on that occasion: You cannot conquer America; and again: I refuse to join in congratulations on misfortune and disgrace; and again when he accused the government of the day of employing the tomahawk and the scalping knife of the savage against their brothers in America—these words are familiar to every schoolboy, yet nobody ever said that Pitt or Chatham was a traitor to his country. In the British parliament to-day there are eminent statesmen of both political parties, men of weight and experience and undoubted ability, who have denounced this war, both as to the matter of its inception and the manner of its conduct, with all the strength of language and vigour or argument, beside which the criticism hurled in this country pales into insignificance. Yet will anybody tell me that they are untrue to their allegiance? If I did not believe that this is a just war in which the country is engaged, if I did not believe, from such an examination of the facts as I have been able to make, that it is not a war for the advancement of civilization and the establishment of liberty and equality, I could not conscientiously vote for this resolution. I may have been mistaken, but it strikes me that any member of parliament who gives a vote in favour of a resolution which he cannot justify in his own conscience, is neither true to himself nor his country. If, therefore, there be men in this country or anywhere in the empire who believe that this is not a just war, who believe that it is not a war for the advancement of civilization, but simply a war of conquest and waged out of mercenary and improper motives, surely it is our duty to respect such men when they give utterance to their sentiments by voice and vote. Above all things let us be careful, as citizens of this country, how we lightly fling the charge of disloyalty in the face and the teeth of any free citizen of this country. If there is anything that will sow the seeds of disloyalty it is an intolerant criticism of honest minorities. I firmly believe there is no disloyalty in the country, and, if there be differences of opinion, surely the less harsh things we say about them, surely the less we accentuate these differences of opinion, the better for Canada and the better for the empire.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not vote for this resolution because I believe that Canada is under any obligation to give this money or to send her soldiers to South Africa. I dissent entirely from the position of those who claim that Canada occupies any craven or ignoble position in the empire. The mother country has done much for Canada, but, in proportion to her resources and her opportunities Canada has done as much to promote the solidarity and maintain the protection of the empire. I agree with the leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) in that. He proclaimed in language more powerful than I can, that we have not been behind in our efforts to promote the unity of the empire and secure its protection; and I repeat that we have done as much to promote the solidarity and maintain the protection of the empire, in proportion to our resources and opportunities, as the mother country has done for Canada. We are not, therefore, seeking by this vote on the sending of our soldiers to pay for past favours or to purchase future gifts. On the other hand, while it is most gratifying to know that at least one good result of this war has been to draw all parts of the empire more closely together—to use the words of another ‘to strengthen those ties which light as air, yet strong as iron bind us to the mother country’—while it has done that, yet not for that reason would I seek to justify this vote. The only reason which, in my opinion, justifies the support of this resolution is that England to-day is engaged, not only in war for the advancement of civilization, but for the establishment of principles that are especially dear to every Canadian citizen. Not because we are under any obligation to do so, not because we would consolidate the empire, desirable as that end might be, but because this is a just war for righteous principle—as a free people, free to give or free to withhold, we voluntarily, gladly and enthusiastically give our men and our money to assist in bringing victory to the banner of our Queen. And surely we may be permitted to hope, that after this war is over sad as some of the results may be, it may bring great blessings in its train; and surely I utter no disloyal sentiment when I say that it is to be hoped that the greatest blessings that follow this war may fall to the lot of the brave, the patriotic—according to their light—but, as we believe, misguided people against whom we are fighting. It should be the wish of Canadian citizens, whatever their origin may be that the history of this Canada may be repeated in South Africa. A great many years ago, the present Prime Minister of this country, speaking in the old city of Quebec, used these words :

When in that last battle, which is recalled by the Wolfe and Montcalm monument, the iron hail was spreading death in the ranks of the French army, where the old heroes, whom victory had so often accompanied, saw at last victory snatched from them, when stretched on the ground with their life-blood fast ebbing away, they saw as the result of their defeat Quebec in the hands of the enemy, and the country for ever lost, no doubt their last thought was of their children whom they were leaving without protection and without defence; no doubt they pictured them as persecuted, enslaved and humiliated, and then it is reasonable to believe they drew their last breath with a cry of despair. But if, on the other hand, heaven had lifted the veil of the future from their dying eyes and enabled them for an instant before these closed for ever to pierce what was hidden from their sight, if they could have seen their children free and happy, marching proudly in all spheres of society, . . . if they could have seen our free institutions, is it not permissible to think that their last breath would have been exhaled in a murmur of gratitude to heaven, and that they would have died consoled.

In happier days, when this war is over, may some premier in South Africa utter such words in the Transvaal. If so, this war will not have been in vain. I agree with what was so well said by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) that this is a proud moment for the Canadian people and the Canadian parliament. No pages in the history of this empire, bright as many of those pages are with deeds of heroism and high renown, will in future shine with greater lustre than those that record that in this year of our Lord 1900, the Canadian people, animated by no racial hate or national animosity, inspired by no fanatical zeal, hoping for no mercenary reward, influenced by no improper motive, voluntarily and freely gave their money and sent their soldiers to Africa to secure to our brethren there the establishment of those principles, those privileges, those rights and liberties which have made Canada to-day the home of a free, a contented, and, I believe, in spite of all that is said to the contrary, a united people.

Mr. RUFUS H. POPE (Compton). Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman (Mr. McClure) who has just taken his seat opened his speech by remarking that we should offer some apology for the action that was taken by Sir Charles Tupper. Whatever Sir Charles Tupper may have done to call for any apology by any hon. gentleman on this side of the House must have been done on some occasion when I was not in the country, and certainly could not have related to this contingent question now before the House ; because, if there is a single individual in public life in Canada who occupies an enviable position on that question, that individual is Sir Charles Tupper. Now, it is not my intention to deal at great length with questions that have been so thoroughly discussed in this House by so many hon. gentlemen ; but there are some matters which have been referred to ; some by one speaker and some by another that I think we should give thought to.

In the first place, the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, as well as many hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, have done their best to prove that Canada was now in a forward position as compared with the other colonies. Sir, that the soldiers whom Canada has placed in the field, when asked to do their duty for Canada and the empire, will place Canada in no second position, no man inside of this House or outside of it can doubt. But whether those soldiers had the opportunity to go forward as soon as we believe they should have gone, is another and entirely different question, and one upon which I cannot agree with hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. Not that I think that it makes very material difference whether this contingent was in South Africa in one week or another in a certain month. But the First Minister who led a government, and who still leads a government, even if he does not lead public opinion, was moved forward, as I believe patriotic men in this country are moved forward, as I felt myself moved forward. But if he really cherished those sentiments that animate loyal and patriotic men, I cannot for the life of me understand how that right hon. gentleman could indifferently sit down and amuse himself by misreading the Militia Act of the Dominion of Canada. Then he goes from this country and takes a pleasure trip to Chicago, he comes back here, and from that time until this he and every other gentleman who has spoken on that side of the House, have to a certain extent, apologized for the position that they took. No greater apology was ever offered than when the First Minister stands up on the hustings, and in this House, and says : Why, Mr. Speaker, I did not know that I should move. How should I, the First Minister of Canada, know that it was my duty to act in a grave and serious question until the public came and whispered in my ear that it was my duty to act or leave the position I was in ? Sir, there is no question in my mind that if the right hon. gentleman had thought for a moment that, no matter what happened to the British Empire, the lower level of political life would have been content with inaction. I may be wrong, but it is my honest opinion that that hon. gentleman would never have sent a contingent from this country. I know it is not good form to cast doubt upon the loyalty of a political party. I understand that, and that is why I am singling out the head of that party. I do not wish to reflect upon the individuals of that party, who sit opposite me, and who are loyal and true in their sentiments. I have already taken occasion, I think, the session before last, to indicate to this House my opinion of the right hon. gentleman, and of his insincerity generally. On that occasion, I pointed out the treatment he had measured out to his followers in this House, who have been faithful to him for 17 or 18 years, how he had awarded them by taking others on to the front benches from the province of Quebec. Now, if we take the history of that right hon. gentleman, if we take his speeches, say, with reference to the rebellion that took place in the North-west, we should find he is unfortunate in all his positions—if he is deeply loyal. He could not move until the people of Canada told him he must move. He says that if he had been in the rebellion in the North-west he would have shouldered his musket. He is then found down in Boston making speeches upon commercial questions of a very doubtful quality as respects loyalty to Canada. Next he is found engaged in a propaganda for commercial union which would do away with the very basis of our position as it now exists. Then coming down to 1899, we find him, at a great crisis of the empire, not knowing whether he should stand still, move forward or go backwards. Sir, if the right hon. gentleman, making history for himself at all these periods of time, was deeply loyal, was a true Canadian, was true to his friends, then I say he has been very unfortunate in the method he has taken to exhibit his loyalty. Sir, it is not necessary for me to say it, but it is a fact, that the people of Canada to-day, from ocean to ocean, throughout every province, are troubled with a doubt; there is a very serious doubt existing in the public mind of Canada, whether that right hon. gentleman is true or not true to Canada.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, no.

Mr. POPE. Perhaps the gallant knight knows his leader better than I do, being more intimately associated with him. I was born in the same province and come from the same section of the province as the right hon. gentleman, and I feel a certain provincial pride in his oratory and in the dignity of the position he occupies, and fills so well, under certain circumstances. Perhaps the right hon. gentleman may know better the state of public opinion than I do, but I believe it is just as I stated it to be a moment ago, the people do not want a man at the head of the government who, in a great Imperial crisis, cannot read the Militia Act of Canada, without putting upon it the interpretation which the right hon. gentleman did put upon it, when he gave that interview to the Globe newspaper. When any one reads that interview in the Globe, and reads the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General at Quebec, he must come to the conclusion that at one time, at least, there was a wide difference of opinion existing between the advised and the adviser, upon this great subject. Sir, has His Excellency the Governor General changed, or has somebody else changed? Who is at fault in gauging the state of public opinion? Why, Sir, he has admitted that he has but to harken to the breeze of public opinion. Now, it has always been my opinion that the First Minister of a country had a solemn duty to perform; even though he had to face public opinion, even though in doing so, he had to resign his position at the head of the government, he must do what he believes to be right and in the interest of the country, instead of waiting for the whisperings of public opinion to prompt him to action.

The seriousness of this war has been commented upon. Now, it is not necessary to go far into that. The hon. member for Dundas (Mr. Broder), who spoke a moment ago, said that the preparations made by England, were a sufficient proof of her sense of the seriousness of this war. But there is another test we may apply. Let me ask this question: Is it true or is it not, that if England wins, as she will win, the battle she is now fighting, if she issues victorious from this contest, as she will issue, will she or will she not, be a greater empire or more powerful than when she entered into this war? If that is true, is not the converse equally true, that if she is vanquished in this war, she will fall back to the standard of a second rate power? In that case, what protection would the colonies have been able to receive from a second rate power? But we know that she will issue from this contest with her power and prestige enormously increased. Therefore, the question is a serious one, and when you view it from an Imperial, world-wide standpoint, there is no hon. gentleman in this House who can say that it was not sufficiently serious to attract the attention of even the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte).

Now, as to the constitutional question of whether the government should or should not have consulted parliament. An hon. gentleman who spoke this evening said undoubtedly the government had acted unconstitutionally, and he went on to argue that point. Well, Sir, he reminded me of the man who was put in jail, and he sent for his counsel and said: My friend, I want you to get me out of here. Well, what is the trouble with you? And he told his case to the counsel. Why, says the counsel, they cannot put you in jail. But they have put me in jail. I tell you, says his counsel, they cannot put you in jail. What is the use of saying that, replies the prisoner, for here I am already in jail. In the same way, what is the use of discussing the constitutional question, whether the government could or could not send a contingent to South Africa without calling parliament together to get its sanction? Sir, I may be a hayseed, this may be fireside law, and it may not come up to the standard of the hon. gentleman who spoke this afternoon, but we may as well deal with the facts as they exist. I say, Sir, that for the defence of this empire, for the defence of this country, this government, or the government that succeeds it, or the government that succeeds that one, can, at all times, depend on the people to support the government who are in power in their expenditures, whether it be one million or five million dollars. I believe that we are marching on in the great Imperial march. It is not only among the colonies that that Imperial position is going forward; it is in the whole empire, and we are living in an imperial age. Look at our friends in the United States of America, the great democracy, the great republic. Are they not becoming imperial, searching among the islands of the sea here and there to extend their power? Look at Germany, look at Russia, which are taking part in this great competition. This is an imperial century that we are about to enter upon, and who would hesitate, whether he be from the province of Quebec, or any other province, whether he be English, Irish, Scotch, or French, to join in this great imperial march? There should be no hesitancy about it if we expect to be in the forefront of the century which is about to open. I will say that of all these pigmies that are found in various parts of the empire, none is more contemptible than the little Englishman, because he confines himself to that little bit of soil in the motherland. I think that he is the most contemptible man that is in existence, and wherever our hon. friends opposite look for him, either in the House of Lords or in the House of Commons, where they are to be found among the lords and commoners of the land, or among the writers of England, in the search for men who will endorse the position that they are taking on the other side of the House, they are looking in a small field, because they will have to support their cause before the electorate of Canada and not before those pigmies who are not the men who are going to make history as history is going to be written in the centuries to come. Hon. gentlemen opposite have juggled with this question in the province of Quebec. I have known the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) for many years most intimately, and it is my opinion that there is no greater sinner politically than this hon. gentleman in dealing with this question. I believe that he should have done better. He was taught in a wider and broader school, and he should have approached this subject upon more generous ground, and should have taken a higher stand than that which he did. However, he thought that common politics should be the standard by which he should measure his position, and having chosen that ground, that hon. gentleman, who might have occupied a higher and more honourable position in the province of Quebec, is bound to dwindle down amongst the little Englishmen or the little Irishmen, who have inherited a long standing grudge against England, and amongst those little pigmies, who are just so many little flies fluttering about and whose influence will never be reflected upon the pages of history. The hon. minister has got three or four hon. gentlemen here into an extremely unenviable position, who have spent their time before the House and the country apologizing for the manner in which they got into that position, and who have been given an example of the absolute consistency of their inconsistency in order that they may record themselves, not against their own party or for another party. These young men will all live to regret it. There is not one of these young men, powerful as the hon. member for Labelle is, powerful as the hon. member for Laprairie is, who will stay the British Empire in its forward march. The progress of the world will continue without them. They are both bright young men, and I hope that they will be converted to a better way and that they will be allowed to remain in public life. I think, perhaps, a rest for their constitution would be a good thing for them for a time, and I have no doubt that the electorate will give them an opportunity of refreshing and reinvigorating their constitutions if it is necessary at the very first opportunity. Then, after they have had that rest and have adopted views on broader lines, we will hear speeches delivered in this House and in different parts of the country from these hon. gentlemen that will be so contradictory of the speeches which they have delivered here, that they will say that these were the playthings of their childhood, and they will ask that we shall not hold them responsible for their dolls and toys. They will say that they were misguided and misled. They will say: We were led into an impossible position before the people of Canada and we wish to apologize. It has been questioned as to whether there are two lines of political thought in the province of Quebec. There is no doubt about it. Every one who studies the political history of the province of Quebec will see written upon its pages two lines of political thought. These hon. gentlemen opposite must take their position and trace it from Dorion, through Mercier down to the present time when they are headed by the hon. Minister of Public Works and the right hon. leader of the government. They must be satisfied with the history they have written. The hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House never obtained the confidence of the people of Quebec except through what is known as national sentiment. Whenever the province of Quebec is willing to give serious consideration to public questions presented before them upon grounds of justice, hon. gentlemen opposite never expect to carry that province. They carried it in the last election, and quite naturally; I do not altogether blame them because they had an opportunity of having a French Canadian Prime Minister, the first opportunity since confederation, and they said: We cannot afford to miss this opportunity. They had a question which they thought was of a serious character to be decided before this parliament and by the government, and they believed that they would rather entrust the decision of this question to one of their own nationality and religion, and to a man actuated by these sentiments which they felt to be so dear to themselves. In their sentiments there is no finer people than the French Canadian people of Quebec. They voted for Sir Wilfrid Laurier as Prime Minister, one of themselves, and they elected Mercier upon national grounds pure and simple. So that when any hon. gentleman stands up and pretends to become indignant that we should say that there are two lines of thought, his protest is not based upon fact, because hon. gentlemen opposite have carried their elections upon national grounds. Mark you, Sir, born and having lived in the province of Quebec as I have done for forty-two years, I know the people of that province well, and if any person undertakes to tell me that there are not two political lines of thought in the province of Quebec, he might as well tell me that black is white. I know it. The hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who created that national sentiment have always worked that oracle with all the strength and ability they possess. They have worked that oracle, and as they have to face Canada from ocean to ocean they have gained the weakness that it gives them; that is, from the Quebec standpoint. I might present an argument if I were to speak at length on the position which they occupy with the English speaking people in all parts of Canada, but it is unnecessary. I have sufficiently shown forth the fact that during all the history of that party power has been obtained and exercised by playing upon the national sentiment in the province of Quebec. Something has been said by hon. gentlemen on the other side of this House as to making politics out of this question. This government have been so infatuated with that belief that they have gone on committing blunder after blunder from the very moment they got into power; and I have not the slightest doubt they will perpetuate these blunders until they are thrown out of power again, which will be at the very first opportunity the people have a chance to get at them.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. POPE. There is no doubt at all about it. Public opinion spoke against you in the Sherbrooke election.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. POPE. I say that, that election on the part of these hon. gentlemen and their leaders and the others who were sent there, was the most vulgarly corrupt election that ever I witnessed in my life.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. POPE. Yes, Sir, they had thousands and thousands of dollars in Sherbrooke and whisky reigned supreme with them. And what about Prince Edward Island. The Minister of Marine (Sir Louis Davies) knows that if he can save his own seat there it is about all he can do. Look at Manitoba. I listened to the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) last night, and he could no more get elected for a Manitoba constituency than he could turn into an angel, and you all know how impossible that would be—he would not make a pretty angel by any means. Afraid of public opinion these gentlemen opposite raise the plea: Oh, do not make politics out of this serious question. That is their cry whenever their shortcomings are being shown up. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) told us not to make politics out of the transportation question, and to-day, when we endeavoured to have investigated flagrant election corruption the friends of the government told us not to make politics out of it. Why, you have only to take any document they ever published, or any act of theirs since 1896, and it is sufficient to cause the electors of Canada to revolt against them. They tell us that they acted promptly in the South African crisis, and that their policy reflected credit on the empire. Well, if that is so, we cannot make political capital out of it, and they need not fear that we will. But, Sir, the truth is that these hon. gentlemen made a mistake in that, and the people of Canada found it out and the people of Canada will punish them. Why, since the first session of this parliament the government and their friends have been apologizing. On all the hustings, and in all their newspapers throughout the Dominion they have been apologizing for the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) having a seat in the cabinet. His party friends come to this House and they apologize for him getting them into trouble. No hon. gentleman on the other side has yet spoken that he did not make an apology, and none of them will speak in future who does not offer one. Sir, we must be in the procession or out of it.

I believe in the unity of the empire, and I believe that the future of Canada lies best under the old British flag. I enjoy as much independence as do my French friends in Quebec, but I do not want to be foolhardy with my independence. Those gentlemen who speak of Canada as an independent nation are sane enough to say that they do not want independence now, but they do not indicate the particular time that they do want it. Let us discuss practical questions in this House. What have we to do now with questions which may be ripe for discussion a century hence? We see all the great nations of the world looking about for power and aggrandisement of territory. We see them dividing China and dividing Africa, and do these gentlemen think that if we were independent to-morrow, without the strong arm of England to protect us, these great military powers of the world would not cast a longing eye on Canada, the richest undeveloped country in the world to-day. Sir, independence is just worth having to the extent that you can protect it, and without England we have insufficient protection for Canadian independence. I do not deny hon. gentlemen the privilege of discussing this question in an academic way, but from a business-political standpoint its discussion is a pure waste of time. Let us discuss live issues, and although I do not care at the present to enter into the commercial aspect of our connection with England, I do say that if we had an arrangement by which a preference would be given to our products in the British market, both Canada and Great Britain would immensely benefit thereby. Canada, in sending her gallant sons to defend the British Empire in South Africa, has demonstrated that the mother country has an arm of strength and support here whenever she needs to use it. The mother country has here a loyal population who are ready and willing to go forth to fight her battles, not only if the government wants them, but whether the government wants them or not. The mother country has here a British population which in intelligence and loyalty cannot be equalled in the world. Only a few days ago the sons of Canada left Halifax for South Africa. There were reports at first a little discouraging as to whether these men would make good soldiers when they landed at the seat of war, but the battle of the other day decided the fact that we can take a young Canadian boy, without previous training in arms, and using his intelligence and his loyalty, make out of him a brave and disciplined soldier. If Great Britain should adopt a commercial policy which will give a larger market to our products, which will give us better prices, which will cause an increased population to flow into the Dominion, then we have given a guarantee to the mother country that from this loyal Canadian people she can call on battalion after battalion prepared to go forth to do battle for Imperial interests.

Mr. F. T. FROST (Leeds and Grenville). Mr. Speaker, representing as I do a constituency historic for its loyalty and devotion to the British Throne and Crown, I desire to say a few words in support of the vote which I intend to give in favour of the resolution of the hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). There have been two things very well established in the debate which we have heard on this question: one is the loyalty of the entire people of Canada irrespective of race or creed; the other is the approbation of Her Majesty the Queen and the empire at large, of the course which the government and people of this country have taken in furnishing contingents for the support of the empire in South Africa. We are told by the speaker who has just taken his seat (Mr. Rufus Pope), that every speaker on this side of the House has apologized for the conduct of the government. I have not heard any apologies from any member on this side of the House yet; and I am very sure that I do not intend on the present occasion to make any apology for the government. The government require no apology. The indignation which we find exhibited so generally on the opposition side of the House originates chiefly from the fact that it is a Liberal government that is in power, and doing what hon. gentlemen opposite have been talking about for the last thirty years and never did. There have been times in the history of this country when a Conservative government might have got up contingents to assist the mother country. The Premier of the country might have gone on, in spite of public opinion, and carried out the policy which my hon. friend from Compton has stated; but we never saw anything of that kind done. It remained for a Liberal government to introduce measures for sending contingents to assist the empire in the great work in which she is now engaged. We have been told that the government has been too slow. Well, all I know about that is this, that the contingents have been got up on time, that they were despatched from Quebec on time, that they reached Cape Town on time, and that they reached the front on time, and have taken part in the great victory achieved there to-day. If such is the case, I would like to know what is the reason for all this carping criticism which we have heard in relation to the action of the government in the matter? What is to be gained by it? Is it not too bad that the good fame of this country should be impaired by these snarling attempts to gain a little political capital? Why should not a more generous view of the whole matter be taken? We live in a free country and under a constitutional government, and on questions of war as well as on questions of peace, free discussion is allowable to any person without his being open to a charge of treason. It is a small, petty and unworthy position for any political party to take. The Throne of Great Britain is founded in the love and the affection of a free people, and on the banks of the Nile and the Ganges as well as on the banks of the St. Lawrence, and wherever the flag of Great Britain floats, there you will find devotion and loyalty to Her Majesty, laws justly administered by British power, property protected, crime punished, and civil and religious liberty and free speech guaranteed. It only remains for a garrulous and disappointed opposition in Canada to impute motives to a portion of our people who have for over two hundred years proved their devotion to Great Britain by many heroic deeds and many a willing sacrifice. I say we have a right to rise superior to this pettiness of thought and action; and in view of what we know to-day of the brave young men who have gone down to their death fighting at the front, who have given their lives a willing sacrifice to the empire, I think it would look more dignified on the part of this parliament, and it would more truly represent the people of this country, if insinuations respecting the loyalty of any portion of our people should cease, and we united here on behalf of Canada as our young men have united in pouring out their blood in defence of the empire, by doing our share of the patriotic work that is necessary to sow in South Africa those sacred principles which are at once the greatness and the glory of British supremacy. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not apologize for my leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I have no apology to make for him. He is able to take care of himself, and I can assure my hon. friend from Compton that long after he and many who hold such opinions as he has expressed to-night have been forgotten, the name of the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier will shine in the annals of this country as that of one of the most devoted, one of the most loyal, and one of the greatest men that Canada has ever produced. No other man has brought about such a unison of the races of this country as has the right hon. leader of this government; and therefore for any one to stand up at this day, after all that Sir Wilfrid Laurier has done in the past three years to bind together this country and to unite the races, to impeach his loyalty and to impeach him, is one of the greatest exhibitions of stupidity, if nothing else, that could probably be seen in any free country. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to occupy any further time. I am not going into the constitutional question or any of the other questions that have been touched upon, and have been so ably expounded by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House since this debate began. I have great pleasure in supporting the resolution which is now before the House, to appropriate $2,000,000 for the expense of the contingents, and I am prepared to go very much further than that, if need be, in order to bring this war to a victorious and successful conclusion.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). Mr. Speaker, if it is agreeable to the government, I would like to move the adjournment of the debate, as there are a number who wish yet to speak on the question, and I think it is quite impossible to finish to-night.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I hope the hon. gentleman will not speak of adjourning the debate at this early hour. The government did hope, after the long debate we have had, that we might dispose of this resolution and go into committee to-night; but if hon. gentlemen opposite are not willing, of course, we cannot do it. If not, I think we should sit to a much later hour. It is only half-past ten now.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I would like to call my hon. friend's attention to this fact, that the government have not been very anxious so far to bring on the work of the session or to have us sit very late. There are several on our side of the House who wish to speak on this question. If the hon. gentleman objects to the adjournment, of course, we shall merely have to keep up the debate; but I think it would help to bring the debate to a conclusion if the hon. gentleman consented to it being adjourned.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No. no. Question.

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to speak very long, but I think it would be more in accord with the feelings of my constituents, if I expressed my views on this question. To begin with, I may say that I am heartily in accord with the proposal of the government to vote this money; I have no objection to it whatever. But I have been somewhat amused as well as surprised at the line of argument taken on that side of the House to justify the course of the government. The hon. gentleman who last addressed the House said that no apologies were offered on that side, and that his party had none to make. Surely he could not have heard what the hon. gentleman who preceded him on that side had said, because that hon. gentleman took up a considerable part of the time he occupied in his remarks, in apologizing for the conduct of the government, in the first place, and for the fact that several members of the government expressed their dissent from the course taken. He forgot that the right hon.

First Minister himself, practically apologized for his delay in taking the action he did. If what he said was not an apology for not having acted earlier, I do not understand what an apology is. I did think, when listening to the hon. gentleman, that he could not have consulted the records which are in our possession. I scarcely think that he could have consulted the correspondence which took place between the right hon. First Minister, and the Colonial Office about sending the troops to South Africa. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, said that the government sent the troops at the right time, and that they arrived at the right time, and that there was no reason to apologize. That may be his opinion, but it is not that of other people in this country, and for this reason. They remember that only a few years ago, when the Jubilee celebration took place in England, the leader of the Canadian government was given a very prominent place in that celebration. He was allotted a place in the foremost ranks of the colonial dependencies. Why was he given that position? Because Canada was regarded as the first colony of the empire and as the one which was doing more than any of the others to cement the ties of affection and loyalty that bind the colonies to the mother country. I have here the speeches made by the right hon. Premier at this celebration in England, and they are altogether different from the action of the leader of the government, when he was given the opportunity of showing by something more than mere words the attachment which he professed existed between Canada and the mother country. He then declared in no uncertain sound what Canada would do if necessary to show her loyalty. He said that if the time should ever come when the British Empire would be menaced or threatened, and it would be necessary for the colonies to act, all that England required to do, was to light the proverbial fires on the hills, and Canada would take her place as the first colony to stand by England in her hour of need. Loyalty then was cheap, it did not cost anything, it cost only mere words, but the time did come when something was required more than mere professions, the time did come when the fires were lit on the hilltops, and what was the result? The right hon. gentleman waited to see what public opinion required, and he spent his time beating about the bush in the endeavour to find excuses why he should not prove by deeds, that loyalty which he declared before the world in London was universal in Canada, and would be shown on the first occasion. When the time did come for action, was he equal to the occasion? No, Sir, loyalty in London was one thing, and in Canada another, and when it required more than mere lip loyalty to show that Canada would maintain the position given her in the jubilee celebration, the right hon. gentleman was found wanting. Although Canada was the first colony in the celebration, she was amongst the last to offer support to England. Which colony was the first? It was Queensland. Twice did Queensland offer assistance to the mother country in her hour of need, before Canada said a word. After Queensland came Victoria with her offer. Then came the federated Malay States, which were considered almost insignificant at the jubilee celebration compared with Canada. Then came the governor of Lagos. The first offer was made on the 11th July, the next on the 12th, the next on the 17th, the next on the 18th, the next on the 21st from the Governor of New South Wales, and again on the 21st of July from the Governor of Lagos. On the 26th July, there came an offer from the Governor of New South Wales, and on the 27th July there came again an offer from Victoria and on the 1st August, Victoria repeated her offer for the third time. Then, with Hong Kong spoke on the 21st December; then Queensland again on the 22nd September; then again Victoria on the 27th September. New Zealand again on the 28th, and on the 29th; and Queensland on the 3rd October. New Zealand again came with her offer of assistance on the 3rd October, and then, at last, on the 3rd October, came the offer from Canada. These little colonies sent in their offers beginning on the 11th July, and Canada, which was given the first place in that colonial celebration, only proffered her aid on the 3rd October, when she was forced to do so through very shame. No one can read the speeches made by the right hon. gentleman at the jubilee, without a feeling of humiliation for his country arising out of the fact that our First Minister, who pronounced these eloquent pæans of loyalty—and no man, in my judgment in Canada, could do so better—was found unequal to the occasion, when the hour for illustrating his professions by deeds arrived. Do we wonder that the people complain, do we wonder that the hon. gentleman and his friends have to spend so much time now in apologizing for their position? What reason did they give for their action when they did act? The Premier said at first: I did not know that we had the legal power to act, and I do not think so yet; and many of his supporters say the same. I asked an hon. gentleman who was apologizing to-night why they did it if they had not the right to do it, and his answer was: Because public opinion drove us to do it. Public opinion should not drive either an individual or a government to do wrong; they should stand up before public opinion when public opinion demands that they do wrong.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). It does not follow that it was wrong, because it was not technically illegal.

Mr. SPROULE. But if the government had not the right to do it legally, why did they do it at all?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Because we relied upon the indemnity of parliament for our action—and we will see if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) will vote against it.

Mr. SPROULE. If the hon. gentleman was so strong in his conviction that parliament would support his action, why did he not act last July as well as last October?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There was no war last July.

Mr. SPROULE. There was no war, but every person saw it coming on. Did not these other colonies offer support, and why should they offer it if there were no anticipation of war? Why did Canada hang back when they were coming forward? Why did the Premier apologize at first and say that he did not intend to spend a dollar of money or send a single man to support the British cause? He changed his views afterwards. What reason did he give? It was that public opinion was different from what he expected, that it became so strong that no government could withstand it. If the Premier were as intelligent a man as he should be to occupy his present position, he would be able to judge public opinion to the extent at least, of knowing that he would be justified by it in assisting the mother country; he would not need to stand back until driven and compelled to do right—though, apparently it was very much against the grain to do it.

The next instance that attracted my attention was the unusual one we had in this House when the hon. Minister of Public Works and one of his friends introduced the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) in this House. This seemed to me one of the strangest spectacles ever seen in parliamentary life. Here was an hon. member of this House who resigned his seat as a protest against the action of the government. He virtually challenged the government to contest public sentiment in a portion of the country. The gauntlet was thrown down to them and they dared not take it up. They were afraid to put up a candidate against him; and, though he resigned as a protest against their action, they allowed him to be re-elected without opposition, and they are willing to take the same man to their bosom and introduced him to this House. He comes back prepared and fortified and strengthened by his re-election to oppose them in this House; and they introduce him as a supporter of their own—for that is the only interpretation that can be put on their conduct. It is one of the strangest anomalies I ever saw. The only excuse is: We are so liberal that we can accept followers who do not agree with us in everything. We do not need to be told that, when we see men in the cabinet disagreeing, members of the cabinet actually writing in newspapers against the policy of their colleagues. When we see this, we are but little surprised when we see them allow their following to exercise the same latitude that is allowed to one of the members of the cabinet. But it is something that was never before seen in this House, and something that the people do not understand.

Now, I have only to add that I believe the government did right in sending a contingent to Africa. I have always endorsed it. But I think they were wrong in holding off so long before they sent the contingent. They showed to the world that they were wanting either in good judgment or in moral courage. If they had had good judgment, they would have foreseen what public opinion would be, and they would have strengthened themselves by taking the course which would have met the approval of the public. Or, if they had sufficient judgment to know what public opinion was, they were wanting in moral courage, they were afraid to act lest they might offend their supporters in the province of Quebec. They could not have held back for fear of offending their supporters in Ontario, Manitoba or the North-west, because no one could misunderstand the feeling of those provinces. So, they were wanting either in good judgment or in moral courage; they can take whichever horn of the dilemma they choose; it is a matter of indifference to me. But, though they sent the contingent, the next thing was, in obedience to the will of the Minister of Public Works, they had to enter into a solemn declaration that this should not be regarded as a precedent to send more men or spend more money to help England in her time of need. When I see that contention put up by some men outside of this House, the question naturally arises in my mind: What are these gentlemen aiming at, and what do they mean to tell the world? They say they are loyal. But even though the result of the war should be to disintegrate the British Empire, they are not prepared to spend a dollar in support of that empire. One hon. gentleman, either the hon. member for Labelle or the hon. member for Laprairie, said: We are loyal to Canada; we will fight for Canada; but we will not fight for the British Empire. How long would Canada stand if the British Empire were not at its back; how long would Canada maintain her position if the result of the war were to overpower the British Empire and endanger its position among the nations of the world? I feel, as the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) said: It is impossible to be loyal to the part if you are not loyal to the whole; in other words, you cannot be loyal to the British Empire by being loyal only to Canada and disloyal to every other portion of the empire. It is not such loyalty that Britain wants when the word goes out that every subject of the Queen is expected to do his duty. That is no less than is expected of British subjects in any part of the world. Our Canadian soldiers have gone to South Africa and have shown their loyalty to the British Empire; they have taken their places among the British troops, and I am pleased to know and am justified in the belief, by the reports that have come not only from General Roberts himself, but from the War Department, and from the Queen, through the Colonial Office, that they have displayed not only equal ability but as much courage and have become as able soldiers as those in the regular army of the mother country. They have done a good work, they have never shown any disposition to do other than exercise the right of every British soldier, to stand up and fight to the last drop of their blood in defence of the British Empire. They have built up for themselves a noble record. I am pleased to know that two of my constituents were in the first fight that took place there, and they acquitted themselves nobly. I am pleased to say a word of praise to those young men who went from Canada from the various parts of the Dominion of Canada to maintain British law and British justice on South African soil. They have been writing a page in British history that will for all time to come redound to their credit and to the credit of Canada. They are writing a very important part of British history to-day, and they are doing it well. I am glad they have succeeded so far in quelling the trouble in that country. I believe they are fighting in a righteous cause. The hon. gentleman from Colchester (Mr. McClure) who spoke a short time ago, said: I believe this is a righteous war, I think the government were justified in sending the contingent to help the empire; but every other member who disagrees with me in that opinion has a perfect right to express it, and I will not quarrel with him, because he has just as good grounds for his belief as I have. Now, Sir, I cannot take the same grounds as the hon. member for Colchester. If I took that position I could hold no belief of my own at all. If I thought the government was right, how could I admit that another man who thinks the government is wrong could have as good grounds for his belief as I have for mine? Therefore, I say there are no grounds for any two opinions on this question. We are fighting for the right. We are fighting not only for the present, but for posterity. We are fighting for the right of British subjects in all parts of the British Dominion to enjoy the same liberty that we enjoy in Canada. As long as we know that any British subject in any part of the world is deprived of the right and freedom which we enjoy, we are bound to come to his assistance and to restore him those rights.

Now, this discussion has lasted some time. I need not remind the government that if this discussion had not lasted until the present time, the House would have had nothing to do, we would have had to adjourn two weeks ago. I do not think that we have a single government Bill on the paper printed yet.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Oh, yes.

Mr. SPROULE. What other measures have we? The government have given us nothing to do, and if this debate had not continued as long as it has we would be dancing attendance on the government every day; we would come here and go through the ordinary routine, and then have to adjourn.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There are lots of government measures.

Mr. SPROULE. Lots of government measures promised.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. On the Order paper, ready to go on with.

Mr. SPROULE. They are on the Order paper, but not ready. The hon. gentlemen know that very well themselves, they have expressed their opinion that way, and if this debate had not gone on until the present time the government would have been obliged to adjourn the House from day to day until they got their business ready. I say that the opposition would be doing less than their duty if they did not express the opinions which they have expressed in this House that the government, although they may be loyal, took a very unfortunate way of showing it; that although they may be desirous of supporting the mother country, it was very late in the day when they decided to do so. When they sent the first contingent they agreed never to send another, but the force of public opinion drove them forward to send the second contingent; and if the exigencies of the situation required it, they would have to send a third, and a fourth, and a fifth, notwithstanding the opposition of the Minister of Public Works. Although the members of the government are not in accord with themselves, no member of the government has had the moral courage or the manliness to resign his seat because he is not in accord with the policy laid down by the Premier. The fruits of office are too sweet, the emoluments of office are too large, to allow them to do it. That is the only conclusion that we can come to. It seems to be much easier for them to swallow their convictions than to resign. I do not think there is any danger of the Mi-ister of Public Works resigning, because he is out of accord with the government, as long as the salary remains as it is. I do not think any member of the government will resign, they are not made that way, they are not a resigning government. But just as public opinion has driven them to send the first and second contingents, contrary to their own views, so they would be ready to swallow their own convictions over and over again in order that they may continue to enjoy the emoluments of office.

Now, Sir, I do not wish to say any more on this question, because I am anxious to vote for the resolution. I am also anxious to see how the supporters of the government will vote, and how they will square themselves with the country for the vote they are going to give. I am anxious to know whether the member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) who was introduced by the Minister of Public Works, will have the hardihood to vote against this resolution according to the protest that he made by resigning when the government proposed to send a contingent. I am anxious to find out whether the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Monet) will do the same, I have no doubt he will, because if there is any man on that side of the House who has been consistent, it is that hon. member. He has had the courage of his convictions right through. I cannot say that of the hon. member for Labelle, who, after saying that he was out of accord with the government, wound up by promising to vote for the resolution. He must have a very elastic kind of a conscience, a very convenient kind of conscience to enable him to speak one way and to vote another. I am anxious to see how some other gentlemen on that side of the House will vote. The country will want to know exactly where they stand. After they have voted the country will be able to judge whether there are just grounds for the contention put forward on this side of the House that the tardy way in which the government acted in this matter justifies the conclusion that their chief motive was not to serve the empire, but to hold on to office.

Mr. C. KLOEPFER (South Wellington). I desire to say only a few words in order to place my views on record regarding the sending of contingents to help the mother country. I may say that I am pleased that Canada has taken this important step in assisting the empire in this hour of trial. I am prepared to vote for the resolution granting two million dollars to pay for the expenses of the two contingents, and I would even be willing to vote for double that amount if necessary. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that in view of all the advantages we have derived from British connection, and from the protection which the empire has thrown around us during the last century, the least we can do is to contribute this military assistance to uphold the honour of the empire in South Africa. I was pleased that this country should show itself faithful to the mother country, in offering these contingents, without being asked, to go to South Africa and fight for the empire. I also desire to state here that I am proud of our boys taking such a leading part in this struggle and in bringing our beloved Canada to a more prominent place in the affairs of the empire than it has hitherto occupied. In conclusion, I wish to say that it is well that we should contribute this $2,000,000 to defray the expenses of our brave boys who have gone to fight for the empire. I just wish to make these few remarks to show where I stand.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Speaker, I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I hope my hon. friend (Sir Adolphe Caron) will not do that. There is no intention on the part of the government to force these resolutions to-night. We will go into committee and make some progress. There will be plenty of opportunities of discussing the question. The House will have the amplest opportunity of discussing the resolutions. I do not propose to ask the committee to report the resolutions to-night. We will make reasonable progress in committee and then take them up again on Thursday, and after discussing them in committee they will have to be reported, and we will have a Bill to bring in based upon them, and there will be plenty of opportunities for hon. gentlemen to express their views at length. I hope my hon. friend will not insist upon moving the adjournment of the debate.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Speaker, the only reason why I moved the adjournment of the debate, and I would like to draw my hon. friend's attention to it, is that the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) asked the right hon. leader of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) whether, in committee, the same freedom would be given to discuss these resolutions as if we were not in committee, and the right hon. leader of the House stated that we would have to fall back upon the rules of the House, and that they would not allow that. Now, I know that some of our friends on this side of the House wish to discuss the resolutions, and as for myself, unfortunately, I have such a cold that it is quite impossible for me to speak to-night.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. My hon. friend has spoken on these resolutions.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I have ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is so long ago; perhaps I am wrong.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I think my hon. friend is mistaken as to the speech I made. I am glad that he remembers that I have spoken, but it was not at all upon the present question. If my hon. friend refers to Hansard I think he will find that I am quite right. I very seldom forget when I have spoken upon any question.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I remember listening with great pleasure to the hon. gentleman.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I should like to call the attention of the hon. gentleman who is leading the House to-night, to the fact that there is really no reason why the debate should not be adjourned. It will be taken up next day; then we can go into committee, and I think it will be more satisfactory.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am sure the hon. gentleman desires to further the progress of the House, and I want to point out that we have now been a great many days upon the resolutions without going into committee. The proposition is not that we should go into committee and force the resolutions through, because, I rather fancy, although I do not know, from a note I received from the right hon. leader of the government, that there is a kind of understanding that we should not go beyond the committee. I would ask the House, not to carry the resolutions, but to go into committee, report progress, go back into committee on Thursday, and then, when the resolutions are reported, the report would have to be received, when the Speaker is in the Chair, and there would be an opportunity of continuing the debate. Then there will be the motion to introduce the Bill upon these resolutions, and there will be a number of opportunities of speaking. There will be one continuous debate on the resolutions and on the Bill. It will be only in the committee that the debate will be limited to the immediate resolution before it. In all other stages there will be plenty of opportunities for hon. gentlemen to speak. I am desirous that we should go into committee so that we will make some reasonable progress.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am quite ready to help the government to advance the work of the session as much as possible, and I believe the government requires some help in that direction. If it is understood that the discussion can go on, I am quite prepared not to interfere at all in preventing the House going into committee.

Mr. W. J. POUPORE (Pontiac). Mr. Speaker, before the debate terminates, I would like to say a word or two upon this important question. I shall not detain the House at any length. What is parliament asked to do by the resolutions before the House? It occurs to me that it is very plain. We are asked to vote $2,000,000 to defray the expenses incurred in sending our contingents to South Africa. What for? To show to Great Britain that we, as a British dependency, feel that we owe to that great nation that respect and support which we have shown by sending our contingents. I regret, myself, from my standpoint in this House, that we should have hesitated so long in voting the money. I think the money should have been voted without very much discussion. Why should we not at once respond? Why should we not at once show that we are all loyal? I think one of the means of showing that would have been to have voted the money without so much discussion. It has been stated in this House by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House that there are existing in the province of Quebec two schools of thought. Whether two schools of thought have existed in the past in the province of Quebec or not can have no effect upon the question of voting $2,000,000 to defray the expenses of our contingents. I do not think that any hon. gentleman who has followed the history of the province of Quebec will deny that two schools of thought exist there. Two schools of thought have existed in Quebec since ever I can remember. I do not think, however, that if any such schools of thought have existed, either one of them has ever expressed any opinion of disloyalty to Great Britain. But I must say that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have expressed themselves with a great deal of indignation because an hon. gentleman on this side of the House, the hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. McInerney), declared that two schools of thought existed in Quebec. I was surprised to hear that indignation coming from the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), because he himself, sat with me in the legislature of the province of Quebec from 1886 to 1890, and he knew himself that the school of thought which carried the province of Quebec in 1886 was the school of thought which pandered to the prejudices of the people of Quebec. That school of thought was led by the late Hon. Mr. Mercier. I do not want to be personal at all, but the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière), who occupies a distinguished place in this House, felt it to be his duty to resign his seat for Lotbinière as a protest against the principles adopted by the late Hon. Mr. Mercier in the province of Quebec. Why should any hon. gentleman opposite express his indignation because an hon. member on this side said, there are two schools of thought in the province of Quebec. I do regret that any opinion has been expressed that in the province of Quebec or elsewhere—I shall not confine myself to the province of Quebec alone, because expressions have been uttered in other portions of the Dominion—which savoured of what some people wish to term disloyalty. I do not wish to be so severe as to call it disloyalty, but it is unfortunate that opinions have been expressed which would have given foundation for the least suspicion that there was any disloyalty to be found in this portion of Her Majesty's Dominion. And, Mr. Speaker; disloyalty for what? Disloyalty to a country that has ever been the protector of Canada. Where is there on the face of the globe, a constitution which confers so many blessings on the people as does ours? What could we have to take its place? I have heard independence, spoken of. Why, Sir, we have more than independence in our present position. We have absolute independence in the government of our own country, and we have the greatest power on earth to support us against foreign foe. No country on earth is so favoured as ours. There is no greater power behind Great Britain herself to protect her, whilst we in Canada have the same constitution, the same freedom, the same right to make our laws, as she has. I represent a county in which there are all the different elements of race and religion, and I am glad to bear testimony in this House to-night, that not a single voice has been raised in that county to utter any sentiment but that of the truest loyalty and that of the greatest devotion to the British Empire. I listened with much pleasure to the speech of the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Clarke) in which he said, that his constituents, one and all, were quite prepared to contribute their portion towards paying all the expenses of the Canadian contingents in South Africa. I want to say, Sir, that a similar feeling exists in the good old county of Pontiac. There is not a single ratepayer in that county, but who would hold up both hands in favour of contributing his quota toward paying all the expenses of the Canadian contingent. Now, a good deal has been said about the delay of the government in taking action, and expressions have been made use of which I think are really deplorable. I do not know that the government should have been so severely censured as they have been, but I think it is unfortunate for the sake of Canada, and its good reputation, that any expression of opinion emanating from any source should have been uttered that would cast the slightest suspicion upon the loyalty of this Canada of ours. I do not wish to take up more time of the House, Mr. Speaker, but I felt it was a duty which I owed to myself as a Canadian, a duty which I owed to the people whom I have the honour to represent, to express their opinion in this House, and to vote not only $2,000,000 as asked by the present resolutions, but to contribute more if necessary to maintain the dignity, and the honour of the British Empire, of which we, as Canadians, are so proud to form an independent part.

Mr. RUSSELL. I think, Mr. Speaker, that it would be timely to adjourn the debate now. It is somewhat unsatisfactory to discuss the general principles of a subject like this after the House has once disposed of the main question, and I therefore beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I shall certainly not oppose any general desire on the part of hon. members to adjourn the debate. I desire to push on the business of the House, but as there seems to be a disposition on both sides to prolong the debate, and as in a few minutes we will have to adjourn on account of the holiday, I will accede to the motion.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11:25 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, March 1, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PRIVATE BILLS—EXTENSION OF TIME.

Mr. LANDERKIN moved :

That the time for presenting private Bills be extended to Thursday, the 29th inst., in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders, as contained in their fourth report.

Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough) moved :

That the Public Accounts of Canada for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and the report of the Auditor General for the same year be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 51) to incorporate the Holiness Movement (or Church) in Canada.—(Mr. Copp.)

Bill (No. 52) to incorporate the Morris and Portage Railway Company.—(Mr. Oliver.)

Bill (No. 53) to confer on the Commissioner of Patents certain powers for the relief of the Orford Copper Company.—(Mr. Hutchison.)

Bill (No. 54) respecting the Ontario Mutual Life Assurance Company, and to change its name to the Mutual Life Assurance Company of Canada.—(Mr. Britton, by Mr. Campbell.)

Bill (No. 55) to incorporate the Canadian Bankers' Association.—(Mr. Britton, by Mr. Campbell.)

WORKING DAY—LENGTH OF.

Mr. BEATTIE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 56) to determine the length of the working day for workmen and labourers. He said: This Bill is very short and no need to explain it before its second reading. It is intended for the benefit of the workmen for whom, while there has been a great deal of class legislation enacted in this House, nothing so far has been done.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT.

Mr. ERB moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 57) further to amend the Dominion Elections Act. He said: Very few words are required to explain this Bill. It deals entirely with the manner or method of marking ballots. Under the present law the voter is required to place a cross on the ballot, and we know that there are so many different ways of forming a cross that it is a very easy matter to make it in such a way that it can be identified by one or the other of the scrutineers. The object of this amendment is to provide a means of marking the cross so that it would be impossible to tell one ballot from another. The only two ways by which a ballot can be identified are in the location of the mark and the form of the mark. This amendment deals with both. As to the form of the mark, it provides that instead of making a cross, the voter shall punch a hole in the ballot with a peculiar punch, somewhat similar to what is now used by street car conductors. As to the location of the mark, the directions are specific. The mark shall be punched in the circular place to the right of and opposite the name of the candidate for whom the elector intends to vote and nowhere else. These, in brief, are the provisions of this amendment.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

GRAIN TRANSPORTATION DURING SEASON OF 1899.

Mr. BENNETT asked :

How many bushels of grain were received per water during the season of 1899 at each of the following points, and the points from which the said cargoes were despatched: Midland, Parry Sound, Owen Sound, Collingwood, Goderich, Sarnia, Kingston, Prescott, Montreal?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). I beg to reply: During the season of 1899, Midland received by water 11,258,144 bushels of grain, despatched from Duluth, Washburn, Chicago, Milwaukee and Fort William. Parry Sound received by water 13,098,398 bushels of grain from Chicago, Duluth and Fort William. Owen Sound received by water 2,674,302 bushels of grain from Fort William, Duluth, Milwaukee and Chicago. Goderich received by water 2,131,555 bushels of grain from Fort William, Duluth and Chicago. Sarnia received by water 3,636,791 bushels of grain from Chicago, Duluth and Fort William. Kingston received by water 4,958,761 bushels of grain from Chicago, Detroit, Duluth, Milwaukee, Superior and Toledo; 4,045,206 bushels from Fort William, and 1,250,633 bushels from other Canadian ports; total, 10,254,600 bushels. Prescott received by water 2,328,332 bushels of grain from Chicago, Duluth, Toledo and Fort William. Montreal received by water 17,162,026 bushels of grain from Coteau, Kingston, Prescott, Ogdensburg, Duluth, Superior and Toledo.

Mr. BENNETT. Did the hon. gentleman give the figures of Collingwood?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No, they are not here. And I do not understand the reason. They may not have been received, but I will hold the answer over until I have complete information, if the hon. gentleman wishes.

Mr. BENNETT. No, that will do, thank you.

MILITARY INSTRUCTION COURSE.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

1. What is the purpose had in view of selecting officers of the Canadian militia to undergo a course of instruction in the duties of general staff at the Military College, Kingston? 2. What is the basis on which the selection is made? 3. What are the names and standing of the officers originally selected for the staff course now going on, and the date of notification? 4. What changes were thereafter made, and for what reasons?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). I beg to reply: 1. For the purpose of promoting higher military education and of preparing officers for positions of command and for staff duties, when required. 2. Suitability for promotion, capacity for staff duties, and the probability of their being required to act on the staff generally, or at the Royal Schools of Instruction, in replacing officers selected for active service. The Queen's Regulations do not admit officers over the age of thirty-five to the staff course in England, 3. Lieut.-Colonels: W. W. White, W. E. Hodgins, A. Roy, G. E. A. Jones, D. McL. Vince, H. McLaren; majors: J. C. Galloway, W. G. Mutton, E. Chinic; captains: A. E. Carpenter, J. J. Sharples, W. S. Smith. They were notified in Orders 20th January, 1900, without the authority of the minister. 4. Of the officers named in paragraph 3, Lieut.-Colonels Vince and White were removed from the list chiefly on account of age and because they had retired from active command. Captain Mutton was struck off the list at his own request. Captain Taylor was added to fill vacancy. Lieut. Webster was put on and retired without instruction or authority from the minister.

YUKON BARRACKS.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

What is the total cost of the military barracks in the Yukon, and (2) for what purpose and to what extent are they now used ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. The following amounts have been paid by the officer commanding in the Yukon to December 31, 1899, presumably for construction of barracks :

Labour.....	$14,296 65
Logs and sawed lumber	35,918 01
Nails, glass, putty, sashes, hinges, &c..	2,737 87
Total	$52,952 53

2. The buildings at Selkirk and Dawson are used as quarters and hospitals for the officers and men stationed at those places.

BLANKETS AND THE CANADIAN CONTINGENTS.

Mr. BERGERON asked :

1. How many blankets have been bought by the Militia Department since July 1, 1899 ?
2. From whom, and at what price ?
3. Were they made in Canada and obtained by tender and contract, or otherwise ?
4. Were any waterproof blankets served out to the contingents ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA (Mr. Borden). 1. 4,400 blankets have been placed under contract since 1st July, 1899; the delivery of these was only commenced recently, and is not yet completed. 2. Contracts were awarded to: W. C. Caldwell, Esq., M.P.P., Lanark, for 2,000 blankets; P. Gar-neau, Son & Co., Quebec, for 2,000 blankets; Westport Woollen Co., Westport, Leeds County, for 400 blankets. The price paid was 40 cents per pound, the blankets to weigh four pounds each. 3. The blankets were made in Canada, and were obtained by tender and contract. 4. Yes, waterproof sheets were issued as follows: 1st contingent, 1,200; 2nd contingent, 1,225.

Mr. BORDEN (King's).

SELECTION OF OFFICERS FOR SOUTH AFRICA.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

What system of selection, if any, has been followed by the Minister of Militia in appointing officers to the special service contingents sent to South Africa? Have military knowledge, efficiency and physical fitness been the only qualifications considered? Has each military district been allowed to send a like proportion of officers and men in comparison with the total strength of the force in said district, and so far as applications for such positions were received ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA (Mr. Borden). 1. The chief object had in view was fitness, and to this end the most careful inquiry was made. 2. No. Character also entered into the consideration. 3. Yes; so far as the different districts were able to supply to the respective contingents the officers and men of the particular arms of the service required.

MEMBERS OF SOUTH AFRICAN CONTINGENTS BY PROVINCES.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

How many officers, non-commissioned officers and men (the same to be given separately) have enlisted in the two special service contingents for South Africa from each province, viz.: Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba and British Columbia, and from the North-west Territories ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA (Mr. Borden). I am only able to give a partial answer. I will give what I have, and the question must stand for the rest of it. As regards the first contingent, the officers and numbers enrolled, by provinces, are as follows :

	Officers.	Other ranks.
Ontario	18	377
Quebec	16	240
New Brunswick	3	106
Nova Scotia	3	131
Manitoba	1	53
British Columbia	2	61
Prince Edward Island	1	30
Total	44	998

All were enrolled as privates, and therefore there are no means of ascertaining who were officers, non-commissioned officers, and men, at the time of enrolment.

MILITIA—AMBULANCE SERVICE.

Mr. ELLIS (by Mr. Domville) asked :

Is it the intention of the government, in any steps which it may take in regard to the re-organization and improvement of the militia system, to strengthen the ambulance service by increasing the number of ambulance corps, or in any other way ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA (Mr. Borden). The regimental establishments for the current fiscal year contain provision for four bearer companies, and four field hospitals, and the organization of these companies is being proceeded with. It is contemplated, further, to ask for the necessary authority to organize additional bearer companies and field hospitals.

YUKON—COST OF TRANSPORT OF TROOPS.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

What has been the total expenditure incurred to date for the transport of Canadian troops into and out from the Yukon, and for their maintenance therein ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA (Mr. Borden). The total expenditure for the Yukon contingent of Canadian troops to date, is $596,941.67. From that deduct amount expended for work and material in construction of barracks, &c., $52,952.53 ; leaving expenditure for transport, pay and maintenance, $543,989.14.

SADDLES FOR MILITIA DEPARTMENT.

Mr. ROCHE asked :

1. How many saddles have been purchased or contracted for by the Militia Department since July 1, 1899 ? 2. From whom were they purchased or contracted for ? 3. Were they, or are they, being made in Canada ? 4. Were they purchased or contracted for by tender ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA (Mr. Borden). The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows : 1. 300. 2. Adams Bros., Toronto. 3. Yes. 4. Yes.

APPLICATIONS FROM QUEBEC TO SERVE IN SOUTH AFRICA.

Mr. DUGAS (by Mr. Taylor) asked :

What are the names of the officers, subaltern officers and others of the province of Quebec, who have made application to the Militia Department, or to the persons authorized to receive such applications, to serve in Africa ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA (Mr. Borden). The question will have to stand. The district officers commanding have been communicated with in order to get complete lists of those who volunteered. But I would suggest that this is a proper question to make the subject of a motion. It is a long return to read to the House, and if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Dugas), would bring it on in the form of a motion for return, I think it would be more convenient.

PARISHES BELOW RIVIERE DU LOUP —MAIL SERVICES.

Mr. GAUVREAU (by Mr. Taylor) asked :

Whether the hon. the Postmaster General is aware: That the mail which leaves Montreal in the evening by the Intercolonial Railway for Quebec and the lower counties, and reaches Lévis in the morning, in place of being kept on board the train which leaves Lévis at 8.35 a.m., is taken across to Quebec and then back again to Lévis, to be put on board the train leaving the latter station at 1.35 p.m.; that the said last-mentioned train goes no further than Rivière du Loup, which it reaches at 7 p.m., when it is not delayed, so that the mail for the parishes and counties below Rivière du Loup is distributed the next morning by a mixed train which is often behind time, that is to say, over twenty-four hours after it leaves Montreal; and that inasmuch as there is no train leaving Montreal on Saturday evening, the Sunday newspapers do not reach Temiscouata and Rimouski until Tuesday morning ?

2. If so, is it the intention of the hon. Postmaster General, in the interest of all the said parishes below Quebec, or at least in so far as regards Temiscouata, to cause the mail from Montreal to be retained and carried on by the 8.35 a.m. train from Lévis, so that it may be distributed the same day in all parts ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). 1. Yes. 2. The department is now arranging to make such changes in the service as will, no doubt, give entire satisfaction to the districts in question.

R. W. MILLER, POSTMASTER OF ACTINOLITE.

Mr. CARSCALLEN asked :

1. Has R. W. Miller, postmaster of Actinolite, been dismissed ? 2. If so, when ? 3. What were the charges, if any, that were preferred against him ? 4. Was an investigation held, and by whom ? 5. Was Mr. Miller given a chance to prove the charges untrue. 6. Who was appointed to the position ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). 1. Mr. R. W. Miller, postmaster of Actinolite, has been removed from the postmastership of that office. 2. The following were the charges against him : (a) Allowing cartoons, ridiculing the Reform party, to be posted on the wickets of the post office. (b) Electioneering and canvassing for the Conservative candidate, and offering to wager $100 that the Reform candidate for the county of Hastings, N. R., during the last Dominion elections, was a P.P.A., for the purpose of influencing Roman Catholic voters against the Reform candidate.

(c) That he, as clerk of the municipality, was responsible for the removal from the voters' lists (1894) of a number of Reformers, who were fully qualified to vote. (d) That as deputy returning officer, he prevented Ernest and Francis Keinstleber, who were accompanied by Dr. Harrison, of Madoc, from entering the polling booth in the village of Actinolite, on the 22nd of December last, whereby these men lost their votes. 4 and 5. An investigation was ordered to be held by Inspector Hawken. That officer, accordingly, proceeded to Actinolite for the purpose of holding such investigation, and reports that Mr. Miller frankly admitted the first charge, but denied all the others; but when the inspector told him that he had interviewed a number of responsible and trustworthy persons, who were quite prepared to make a statement, under oath, that they knew the charges to be true, Mr. Miller had nothing more to say to the inspector, from which it is assumed that he offered no defence, but admitted the accuracy of the charges. 6. The former postmaster, Mr. Roberts, the son of the present postmaster, died on the 3rd February, 1895, and Mr. Miller took charge of the office on the 1st April, 1895, Mrs. Roberts having been in charge from February 3rd to April 1st, 1895.

PAYMENTS TO REGINA LEADER COMPANY, OR TO N. F. DAVIN.

Mr. DAVIS asked :

What was the total amount paid to the Regina 'Leader' Company, or to Nicholas Flood Davin, Esq., between January 1, 1883, and March 15, 1887, out of the public moneys of Canada? What was the total amount paid to the Regina 'Leader' Company, Limited, or to Nicholas Flood Davin, Esq., M.P., between March 15, 1887, and July 1, 1895, out of the public moneys of Canada for printing and advertising?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The total amount paid to the Regina Leader Company, Limited, between the 1st January, 1883 and the 30th June, 1895, for advertising and printing, was $47,852.19. A separation cannot be made in the accounts at March 15th, 1887.

PENSIONS FOR PERMANENT CORPS AND HEADQUARTERS AND DISTRICT STAFF.

Mr. GILMOUR asked :

Has any scheme been prepared by the government for submission to this House at this session of parliament formulating a pension system for officers and men of the Canadian Permanent Corps and of the headquarters and district staff who are not under the civil service list, as indicated by the Minister of Militia in a speech made in the House on May 8 last?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA (Mr. Borden). Such a scheme as was outlined by me is now under consideration.

Mr. MULOCK.

QUESNELLE-DAWSON TELEGRAPH LINE.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

Did Mr. Charleson buy any groceries and provisions in Quebec or Ontario and take or send them on to British Columbia for use of the men employed on the Quesnelle-Dawson telegraph line? If so, what was the value of same? Who did he buy them from? Were tenders called for same?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Prior), refers to the construction of the Bennett-Dawson telegraph line; provisions were purchased in March, 1899, from H. N. Bate & Son, of Ottawa, to the amount of $5,082.41, without tender; in July tenders were called for supplies amounting to about $6,000. Nineteen tenders were received. Kelly, Douglas & Co., of Vancouver, being lowest, got the contract. The provisions arrived too late and were stored. If the hon. gentleman refers to the Bennett-Quesnelle line; no provisions were purchased this year as those supplied by Kelly, Douglas & Co. will be used.

AMOUNTS PAID REGINA LEADER.

Mr. DAVIS asked :

What amount was paid the Regina 'Leader' Company, Limited, or Nicholas Flood Davin, Esq., for advertising mining regulations in the Regina 'Leader' in the year 1884?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. $1,211.75 was paid to the Regina Leader Co. (Ltd.) for advertising mining regulations in the year 1884.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before you pass from that question I would like to draw the attention of the right hon. gentleman leading the House, to its character. I think if that question had been asked by any person from this side of the House attention would have been drawn to it: I refer to putting the name of a member of the House into a question of that kind. I think it is an abuse of the form of putting questions, because the answers in both cases have no reference to Nicholas Flood Davin, Esquire, but to the Regina Leader Co. (Ltd.)

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). My hon. friend forgets that the question refers to the year 1884. At that time Mr. Davin was not a member of this House.

Mr. FOSTER. The previous one refers to 1895, and the one before that when he was a member.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In 1887 he was a member of the House.

SIR ROBERT G. W. HERBERT.

Mr. CASEY asked :

1. Do the government know whether Sir Robert G. W. Herbert in acting Under-Secretary of the Colonial Office ? If so, how long has he so acted ?

2. Do they know whether he has acted in any other official capacity ? If so, what and when ?

3. Do they know whether he is the same Sir R. G. W. Herbert who appears by the 'Directory of Directors' to be a director of the Eastern and Southern Africa Telegraph Company, and Chairman of the Telegraph Construction and Maintenance Company ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The government have no official knowledge upon this question. But I understand that Sir R. G. W. Herbert has been superannuated, but he was recalled a few days ago to take the place of some gentleman who is ill. I am informed that he is the same gentleman who appears as a director of the Eastern and Southern Africa Telegraph Company.

HARBOUR OF VICTORIA, B.C.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

What amounts have been voted by this House for the harbour of Victoria, British Columbia, in the year 1897-8, 1898-9 and 1899-1900, and what amounts of said votes, if any, have been expended up to 31st December, 1899 ? How much has been expended on said harbour, during same period, from the votes for 'Dredging, British Columbia' ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). Parliament having thought that public money could be spent to better advantage elsewhere in British Empire, I have not spent any money in Victoria.

SUBSIDIES TO RAILWAYS IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. DAVIN (by Mr. Taylor) asked :

How many acres of land in the North-west Territories have been given as subsidies to railway corporations whose lines run entirely outside the Territories ? What are the names of such corporations ? How many acres of land in the North-west Territories have been given as subsidies to corporations whose lines run in part through the Territories, in part through other portions of the Dominion ? What are the names of these corporations ?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The information asked for cannot properly be given as an answer to a question. It will be brought down in the form of a return if moved for.

FREE PASSES TO IMMIGRANTS.

Mr. TAYLOR asked :

Has the Department of the Interior, the Minister, or any of its officers, given or promised free passes to any immigrants or intending immigrants, or secured first or second, or superior accommodation of any kind for intending immigrants at steerage rates ? If either or both, what are the names of the persons whose transmigration has been thus arranged ; for and from what part of the world will they come ; are they coming, or have they come ? If such accommodation has been secured for any parties, at what time or times was it secured ?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Free passes have not been given or promised to any immigrants, or intending immigrants, by the Department of the Interior, the minister, or any of the officers of the department, nor has first or second or superior accommodation of any kind been secured for intending immigrants at steerage rates.

BINDER TWINE.

Mr. McMULLEN (by Mr. Gibson) asked :

Have the government decided to extend the time within which farmers will be permitted to purchase binder twine from the Kingston Penitentiary ? If so, to what date has the time been extended ? In what way does the government propose making known to the farmers that the time will be extended ? What are the several brands manufactured, and the price at which the several brands will be sold ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). 1. Yes. 2. The 20th of March. 3. By advertisement in the newspapers. 4. This question was answered on Monday last in reply to an inquiry by Mr. Taylor.

B. H. DODGE.

Mr. MILLS asked :

Is Mr. B. H. Dodge, of Kentville, an officer of Her Majesty's Customs ? Within the last three years has the said Dodge received any pay from the Customs Department of Canada, or money on account of any services ? If so, what was the amount ? What did said Dodge do to entitle him to any money ? Who employed him ? Is said Dodge and Benton H. Dodge, M.L.A. for King's County, Nova Scotia, one and the same individual ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). B. H. Dodge, of Kentville, is not an officer of Her Majesty's Customs. He received $600.04 within the last three years as the usual award on account of a seizure formerly made by him while an officer of Customs. The Department of Customs has no information as to whether the said B. H. Dodge is the same individual as Benton H. Dodge, M.L.A. for King's County, Nova Scotia.

ENVELOPES IN THE DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE.

Mr. TAYLOR asked :

How many envelopes, and of what kind, were supplied to the Department of Trade and Commerce, or to any officer or employee thereof, from August 1, 1899, until January 1, 1900 ?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I think my hon. friend must move for that. I cannot undertake to say how many have been supplied off-hand for all the officers in the department.

MONUMENT TO CANADIAN VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. TAYLOR asked :

Is it the intention of the government to place a sum in the Estimates for the purpose of erecting a monument at the Capital in memory of the Canadian volunteers who have fallen, or may fall, on the field of battle in South Africa in defence of the empire ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I would remind my hon. friend that the war is not yet over, though the successes which have lately attended Her Majesty's arms, particularly the last one, the relief of Ladysmith, will perhaps bring the end within measurable distance. But the government believes that so long as the war lasts all our efforts should be devoted to fighting the battles of the empire, and when the war is over the government will be eager to remember not only the dead but the living as well.

EXPORTS AND IMPORTS.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

What is the value of exports from Canada, distinguishing home from foreign, and of imports for home consumption, for the seven months—July to January, inclusive—for the fiscal years 1898-9, 1899-1900, and the duty collected thereon ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). The exports of Canadian produce from Canada for the seven months, from July to January, of the fiscal year 1898-9, amounted to $91,106,685, and for the same period of the present fiscal year to $103,001,132. The exports of foreign produce for the said seven months of 1898-9, amounted to $15,463,550, and for the said seven months of the current year to $16,829,622. These reports, statistics in both cases, include coin and bullion. The imports for home consumption for the said seven months of 1898-9, amounted to $89,447,131, upon which duty to the amount of $14,408,030 was collected. For the said seven months of 1899-1900, the imports for home consumption amounted to $107,823,088, and the duty paid thereon to $17,076,642.

SERVICES OF MR. A. S. KENDALL.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

1. Was Mr. A. S. Kendall, M.P.P., of Nova Scotia, in the employ of the government when, in the autumn of 1899, he was in Prince Edward Island ?

Mr. TAYLOR.

2. If so, what service did he render, and what amount was paid him for such service ?

3. Is he now in the employ of the government ?

4. What amount, if any, was paid him by the government since June, 1899, to date ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. Yes. 2. In taking the initial steps necessary to bring into effect the establishment of bait freezers by the fishermen along the coast, by calling meetings of fishermen and personally explaining to them the government's policy of aiding in establishing these freezers at various points chosen. No special amount has yet been paid for this service. 3. No, he is not employed during the sittings of the provincial legislature. 4. $200 on account of salary and $200 on account of expenses.

VOTERS' LISTS FOR KING'S, N.B.

Mr. DOMVILLE asked :

As the custodian of the voters' lists for the purposes of provincial elections for the county of King's, New Brunswick, has not complied with the prescriptions of the Act 61 Vic., chap. 14 sec. 10 ('An Act to repeal the Electoral Franchise Act and to further amend the Dominion Elections Act'), which enacts as follows :—

'Within ten days after the final revision of every list of voters for the purpose of provincial elections, it shall be the duty of the custodian thereof to transmit to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, by registered mail, a copy of such list certified under the hand of such custodian, and having every alteration, addition or erasure therein identified by his initials.'

Is it the intention of the government to compel the custodian of such lists to comply with the law at once ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am happy to inform my hon. friend that the lists for King's county have been filed. I was led into error the other day in giving information to the House which I am glad to find now is incorrect. I have just received a letter from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery saying that the lists were filed on the 22nd of December.

PAYMENT OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. WILSON asked :

1. Are postmasters in towns and villages paid by percentage ? If so, what percentage are they paid ?

2. Has there been any addition made to the percentage paid these postmasters since the postage has been reduced from 3 to 2 cents ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). 1. Postmasters in towns and villages are paid by a percentage on their legitimate collections of post office revenue, according to the following scale : On the first $800 of revenue, 40 per cent ; on revenue in excess of $800 but not exceeding $10,000, 25 per cent ; on all revenue over $10,000, 15 per cent. Whenever the revenue of an office reaches $800 an allowance of $40 is paid towards expenses of rent, fuel and light. This allowance is increased by $20 for each additional $400 of revenue up to $2,000 and for each additional $500 of revenue over $2,000. In British Columbia $75 is granted in lieu of $40. In addition, postmasters from whose offices other offices are served and who have to make up mails for such offices, receive a further allowance equal to 10 per cent of the revenue of the offices in question. 2. Postmasters are paid on the basis of the revenue for the fiscal year prior to the reduction of postage, except that in case the revenue of any office has increased since the reduction of postage, then the percentage is upon such increased revenue.

A BREAKWATER AT CHAPEL COVE.

Mr. GILLIES asked :

Is it the intention of the government to provide in the estimates during the present session for the construction of a breakwater at Chapel Cove, West L'Ardoise, County of Richmond, Nova Scotia ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). No positive reply can be made until the supplementary estimates are brought down.

NOVA SCOTIA—REFUND OF SUBSIDIES.

Mr. GILLIES asked :

1. Was a delegation from the local government of Nova Scotia sent to Ottawa during the year 1892, or any other year, to press for a refund of the subsidies paid by the government of Nova Scotia towards the construction of the Western Counties Railway and towards the construction of the railway from New Glasgow to the Straits of Canso ?

2. Who were the members of this delegation ?

3. What amount was claimed by this delegation that should be refunded to the province of Nova Scotia by the Federal government ?

4. Is the refund of this claim now being pressed upon the government of Canada by the government of Nova Scotia ?

5. Do the Government purpose refunding the amount of this claim ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. Delegations have frequently waited upon the Dominion government on behalf of the government of Nova Scotia. I believe one did so in the year 1892, but I am not sure about that, as we have no official record. They certainly have subsequently. 2. Members of the Nova Scotia government constituted the delegations more recently. The Prime Minister, Mr. Murray, and Mr. Pipes have attended, at any rate, in connection with these claims. 3. The claims amount now in the whole to $1,351,033.47. 4. Yes. 5. The government purposes making a reference of a portion of the claim to arbitration.

Mr. GILLIES. What portion ?

THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—INSURANCE OF CANADIAN CONTINGENT.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to take the opportunity of reading to the House for the information of all parties who will be interested, telegrams addressed to myself from the representative of the Ocean Accident and Guarantee Corporation, this morning :

In regard to the insurance of $1,000,000 effected by you on the lives of the members of the Canadian contingent covering death and accident contingencies we have this morning received the cable despatch which follows :

London, March 1, 1900.

To the Canadian Branch Ocean Accident and Guarantee Corporation, Montreal.

The directors authorize you to pay the sum insured in each fatal claim to the Canadian contingent expressing, at the same time, their admiration of the loyal and gallant conduct of the Canadians. This prompt settlement will cover the 28 deaths by $28,000, leaving the wounded to be settled with according to the policy of insurance when the claims are received.

I must express my regret that that $28,000 will be increased by the news we have just received of the unfortunate death of three of the brave volunteers who have succumbed to the injuries received, so that it will be $31,000 that is now in a position to be claimed by the heirs of the parties referred to.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—INQUIRY REGARDING PRESS DESPATCH.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to a very important despatch I would have communicated to the hon. gentleman personally, but for the fact that it has appeared both in Montreal and Toronto and has therefore become public. I have received telegrams, both from Montreal and Toronto, saying that :

A Melbourne despatch states that Chamberlain has cabled to Australian governments asking whether they would be able to send additional troops to South Africa in event of Imperial troops being required elsewhere.

I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if the government has received a similar communication.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The government has received no such communication.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am very glad to hear it, and I am in hopes that the despatch, which has obtained currency both in Montreal and Toronto, is without any foundation.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—GARRISON AT HALIFAX.

Mr. McNEILL. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), whether there has been received any answer of any kind, and if so, what answer, from the Imperial authorities in reference to the offer of this government to garrison Halifax.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am not in a position to give any answer to-day to my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill) to this question.

CANADIAN NAVAL RESERVE—INQUIRY OF MINISTRY.

Mr. BOURASSA. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the government and of the House to a most extraordinary statement that was made in the British House of Commons on Monday last by the First Lord of the Admiralty. It was my intention to have called the attention of the government to this matter on Tuesday last, but, on account of the absence of the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), when the Orders of the Day were called, I waited until to-day. This is what Mr. Goschen said in his speech, in introducing to the House his estimates for the navy:

The Admiralty was considering how it could organize a naval reserve in conjunction with the colonies. He explained that with an adequate organization the government could get a very valuable contingent from Canada and Australia. The negotiations with Canada were very well advanced. Canada had asked that the period of training be reduced, but a final decision on the subject had not been reached.

I think it is most extraordinary that, with a question of such importance, the British House of Commons should be seized with a knowledge of the project mentioned by the First Lord of the Admiralty, and that negotiations should be 'very well advanced' without anybody in the Canadian House of Commons, which has been sitting for a month, being aware of anything going on.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the hon. member (Mr. Bourassa) did not give notice that he intended to bring this subject up, so that I might have been prepared to give him an answer. He will understand that when statements are made on the floor of the House of Commons it would not be proper to make any statement without being prepared to substantiate it. If my hon. friend will move for the papers, I will be glad to give all the information on this subject.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—HOISTING THE FLAG ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) to a telegram from Bathurst, requesting why the flag had not been raised on the government building to celebrate the victories over the enemy in the Transvaal. I suppose that if the flag is ever flown at all it should be on occasions like this,—and I have no doubt it is through the carelessness of the official that it is not. At the same time, I think it would be well to have instructions issued in that connection.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). I issued orders this morning to all the officers, all over Canada, to raise the flag.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to make a remark I hope it will be attended to by the post office at Montreal. I received a telegram Saturday saying that no flag had been hoisted on the post office at Montreal and that it was the subject of very unfavourable comment.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). I may frankly admit to the hon. gentleman that I did not issue orders all over the Dominion until this morning. In former days, not only under this government but before it came into power, the flags were not raised on public buildings unless orders were given. That is the reason why the flag was not raised before.

Mr. BERGERON. Has the Minister of Public Works laid in a large stock of flags, because they will be used up in great numbers just now.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—THE CANADIAN CONTINGENTS.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, for the House to go into Committee of the Whole to consider a certain proposed resolution to provide certain sums for the payment of the contingents of Canadian volunteers in South Africa.

Mr. B. RUSSELL (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope), who last spoke in this debate, made the statement, that no speaker on this side of the House had undertaken to discuss this question without apologizing for the conduct and proceedings of the government, and he predicted that no speaker from this side would, during the future progress of the discussion undertake to present his argument to the House except in the form of an apology. Of course, hon. gentlemen may have different meanings for the words which they use in this House, but if the hon. member (Mr. Pope) simply meant that the members on this side of the House, finding that the conduct and proceedings of the government in connection with this matter have been attacked, have presented arguments in defence of that conduct and in defence of those proceedings, then I am willing to concede that he is correct both in his statement and in his prediction. In that regard, the speeches delivered by members on this side present a marked contrast to many, if not to all, the speeches delivered by hon. gentlemen opposite, because those speeches have been conspicuously lacking in argument. The two hon. gentlemen opposite who spoke on Tuesday evening occupied a great deal of their time in attacks upon the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Monet) and the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa)—I do not know why they did not include in the same category the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Chauvin), who has assumed precisely the same, or substantially the same, position on this question as do the other two hon. members. I again say that the speeches which these two gentlemen (Messrs. Monet and Bourassa) delivered upon this question, were in very marked contrast to the great bulk of the speeches which have been delivered to us upon this subject from the other side of the House. The hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Monet) and the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) certainly presented their arguments to this House in a very luminous way, and the arguments they did present were fair and legitimate arguments. We may agree in their conclusion or we may not, but there is no member in this House who will not do both of those hon. gentlemen the justice to say, that their arguments were presented in temperate language, and in an eloquent and logical manner. Their speeches contrasted more than favourably with the wandering, incoherent and rambling speeches which we had to listen to on Tuesday evening. I do not know what subject would not be relevant to the discussion of this resolution, if the subjects which were lugged into the debate by these two gentlemen were relevant. They discussed the National Policy; they discussed the preferential tariff; they discussed the provincial elections in Manitoba; they discussed the provincial elections in Prince Edward Island, and one of them even ventured to discuss the duty on binder twine.

What logical connection that subject could have with the war in South Africa perhaps the hon. gentleman who made the argument will not now in his cooler moments undertake to establish. I think it would have been more to the purpose if some of those gentlemen opposite, who thought it worth while to pay so much attention to the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Monet) and the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) had undertaken to give the House what would be very interesting, very entertaining and very satisfactory, namely: Some answer to the arguments which those hon. members presented. I may say that for my part, I would be exceedingly sorry to have the blood of the meanest Hottentot on my hands on the strength of any argument advanced by hon. gentlemen opposite, much less on the strength of any arguments that they put forward would I justify a declaration of war against a free and civilized people and the shedding of the blood of thousands of my fellow-beings. The hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Monet) and the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) confined themselves to the question before the House, and they dealt with it, as I have said, in a fair and logical way. Now, Sir, this is a free country. I do not agree in either of the conclusions which these hon. gentlemen presented. I do not agree, first of all, in their opinion with respect to the righteousness of the war in which our mother country is engaged. Neither do I agree with them as to the impropriety of Canada taking part in that war by contributing to the cost of the maintenance of her volunteers. I differ from them entirely on the whole of the programme they have put before the House. But I say again, this is a free parliament. If in the parliament of Great Britain, men like John Morley, Sir William Vernon Harcourt, Sir Edward Clarke, Prof. Bryce, and Leonard Courtney, and if in English journalism men like Mr. Stead and others as celebrated, can express opinions antagonistic to the views of the great majority of the people of England, I do not know why we cannot permit the same freedom of opinion and the same freedom of expression here.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. RUSSELL. Sir, it will be a sorry day for this House when it will not afford a welcome hearing to the expression of views, however unpopular they may be, when presented in temperate language and in a logical way; and 'the decline and fall' of the British Empire will be near at hand if ever there comes a day when the tyranny of public opinion will be so oppressive that there shall not be a receptive and attentive hearing to any views that may be presented by the free representatives of a free people, so long as those views are presented in temperate and respectful language. I have said that I differ entirely from those two hon. members (Messrs. Monet and Bourassa), but I shall proceed to show that they have very good reason for the arguments they presented to this House. Yes, they have even more than a good excuse. Sir, these hon. gentlemen have a very considerable degree of justification for the arguments they presented, and for one of the cardinal and fundamental points of their contention; that is to say, as to the impropriety of this House or of this country taking part—as it is doing, and as it will do—in the war in which the mother country is engaged. I say that these hon. gentlemen (Messrs. Monet and Bourassa) have high warrant for the arguments which they have presented to the House. They could plead a long course of indoctrination by hon. gentlemen, and conspicuous hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. I will name first of all, the leader of the opposition as one of the authorities on which they might ground the doctrines they have presented here. I know that the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) is not now under the impression that such has been his attitude during the greater part of his life. I know that he is hugging to his soul the delusion that he has been all his lifetime of the same opinion on this subject that he now entertains, and I have no desire to remove that delusion from the mind of the hon. gentleman, for I think he has reached that period of life in which it is entirely proper that he should be allowed to entertain on any question relating to his past career, not actually touching the health of his soul, such opinions as will give him the greatest amount of comfort.

But, Sir, there is a duty which one owes to the truth of history, and the truth of history will not permit the hon. gentleman to come forward claiming the credit of always having entertained his present opinions. On the contrary, I must show that, during the greater part of his career, he has entertained opinions diametrically opposite to those which he entertains at this hour, and which I have no doubt he sincerely entertains, as do the great bulk of the people of this country. Many of the hon. members of this House will surely remember being present at a meeting of some kind of an Imperial society, held in an upper chamber, in this very building, only two sessions ago, at which Colonel Denison presided. In the course of his introductory address, that gentleman referred to some opinions that had been expressed by Sir Michael Hicks-Beach in reference to the duties of the Dominion of Canada in the way of assisting to sustain the burden of Imperial defence. It will be remembered by hon. gentlemen, that the hon. leader of the opposition, very vehemently protested against the opinions which Colonel Denison expressed on that occasion, and very vehemently put forward the contention that the Dominion of Canada had been doing, and was doing at that moment, all that was incumbent upon it, in the way of sustaining Imperial burdens and contributing to the army and navy of the empire. Even the very pale and colourless report of the Toronto Mail, makes it abundantly clear that this was the position the hon. gentleman took on that occasion. The hon. gentleman referred to the compact which had been made with the Imperial government by the delegation of Canadian statesmen, who went to England, in the year 1865—a compact 'that if Canada would agree to spend $1,000,000 per annum on her militia, England was prepared, with all the power of her empire, to maintain the interest and the security of Canada on every occasion.' Then he went on to say :

That which was reduced to writing has been done. Canada not only has lived up to the obligations assigned to her but has done vastly more.

That may not be absolutely conclusive as to the fact that the hon. gentleman then entertained the opinion that Canada had done all she could rightfully be called upon to do, and that she was under no duty to do anything more in the way of sustaining Imperial burdens, because it would be open to any one to contend that he possibly had in his mind an arrière pensée. He might still have thought that on some great and exceptional occasion, we might be called upon to do more. But this was only two years ago, and England had had many wars, vastly more serious, than appeared to be the war in South Africa, when this government took action. That this was no new opinion, is evident from a citation I shall make from a paper of the hon. gentleman, shortly before the beginning of his career as a federal politician. I can remember as a boy, reading the very strong language which he used, and I may say that I read with great indignation the language that he used in answer to the proposal of the late Hon. Joseph Howe, who was an Imperialist of Imperialists, and who in his day took strong ground with reference to the duty of the colonies to come to the support of the mother country in every hour of trial, holding that a Canadian was as good as an Englishman, and should not only have the same status, but be subject to the same duties, burdens and obligations as an Englishman; he presented these views with great eloquence and power to the people of England, in the heart of the empire. What was the position taken by the present leader of the opposition, who was then leading the government of Nova Scotia? Referring to the argument of Mr. Howe, that it was the duty of the colonies to stand by the mother country and assume their fair proportion of Imperial burdens, he said ?

Who would be mad enough to withdraw a pound from the treasury of British America or a man from its population to fight beyond the seas with the probability that the first attempt of any power to humiliate England would be to wrest these splendid possessions from her grasp and that all the resources of the colonies would be required to maintain the dignity of the empire, by protecting their own soil from being desecrated by the enemies of England. British colonists recognize the same obligations to contribute both men and money to the defence of that portion of the empire in which they live as the inhabitants of these islands, and in all the colonies enjoying representative institutions they are loyally discharging that duty.

Sir, that was not very much of a duty to undertake after all. I wonder where the British Empire would have been to-day, if no Briton recognized any obligation to contribute men or money to the defence of any portion of the empire, except that in which he lived. Well, Sir, I know that the hon. leader of the opposition has made attempts to show that at other times in his career, he has taken a larger and more generous view of the duty of the people of Canada, than he took of the duties of the people of Nova Scotia, and the colonies generally on the occasion to which I have referred. Speaking at Newcastle-on-Tyne, in November, 1895, before the Geographical Society—I forget whether that of England, or some local society—the hon. gentleman took much stronger, higher, juster and truer ground. Referring to the past action of Canada, he asked if it was not sufficient to prove that she is not insensible to the responsibility that devolved upon her as a component part of this empire, and went on to say that in the future, as in the past, she would be always found ready to discharge her duties to the utmost extent of her ability. Then he went on :

A short time ago, when there were troubles in the east, I was directed to place a regiment of Royal Canadian Infantry at the service of the Imperial government to be maintained by Canada.

Well, Sir, I have no doubt that that statement received a very enthusiastic response from the ingenuous townsmen of Newcastle-on-Tyne when they heard it ; but, unfortunately for us, when the hon. gentleman came to look into the statement a little more closely, he discovered that, speaking from mere recollection of the circumstances, he had mis-stated the only vital point in the statement he was making to these ingenuous listeners. The whole point of his reference to this episode, was his statement that the regiment of Royal Canadian Infantry, which he had been directed to place at the control of the Imperial government, was to be maintained by Canada. But when the hon. gentleman came the other day, in the course of his address in this House, to read the despatch in which the offer was conveyed to the Imperial government, he found that it read as follows :

I would suggest a brigade of three battalions, 500 each from the maritime provinces, old Canada and North-west. Laurie might command brigade and Williams one battalion, Melgund would like to serve as brigade major ; entire cost would fall on Imperial exchequer.

The entire cost, it was said in that despatch, was to fall upon the Imperial exchequer. When that despatch was made public, when that offer was made to the Imperial government, when that pusillanimous proposition was made by which Canada was not willing to pay one brass farthing towards the maintenance of that contingent, I would like to know where were all these flaming patriots of to-day ? Was there no member for Toronto East (Mr. Robertson) at that time living—orator, editor and epigrammatist ? Was there no man living by the name of John Ross Robertson to blast and scathe with the lightning of his epigrammatic wit this pusillanimous proposition ? He would have us now roll up our money into a bundle and fire it at the head of the Colonial Secretary whether he wants it or not ; where was he when this contemptible proposition was made ?

The hon. leader of the opposition told us the other day that he was speaking only from recollection when he made the statement to these honest people of Newcastle-on-Tyne, that these soldiers were to be maintained by Canada. But that was a grave misstatement to make on such an occasion, and besides there is this about the hon. leader of the opposition, that he seldom makes a statement once which he does not make at least more than once again. 'He hath a damnable iteration,' and this very statement which he made so innocently and artlessly to the good people of Newcastle-on-Tyne, was reproduced by the hon. gentleman some months afterwards in a more serious way, as part of the history of the country, in the Canadian Magazine, and the very same language is used there :

A short time ago when there were threatenings in the east I was directed to place a regiment of Royal Canadian infantry at the service of the Imperial government to be maintained by Canada.

There is the same statement repeated in cold print, and going down upon the records of this country, to be used by future historians as the authentic history of this country, and possibly to be entered into the biography of that eminent gentleman when his biography comes to be written, as written it undoubtedly will be one of these days.

But I forget that there was a good excuse given, or rather a good reason, why on this particular occasion the cost of that contingent should be borne by Canada. I was almost forgetting to give the hon. gentleman the benefit of his excuse. What do you suppose it was ? It was that at that time he was contemplating having a rebellion himself in his own country, out there in the North-west. He was going to have a rebellion there, and that rebellion was going to cost $6,000,000, and he would have no money to spare for the maintenance of the contingent which he was offering to the British government, on February 12, 1885. I think it a thousand of pities that the hon. gentleman should have kept that secret locked up in his own breast for six long weeks. Why did he not, on February 12, tell the then leader of his government that he was going to have a rebellion in the North-west? Why did he not tell the Minister of Militia? Why did he allow those gentlemen to remain six long weeks in a fool's paradise, under the impression that the North-west was all right, and that really nothing was the matter? On March 23, you will find that Mr. Blake raised the constitutional point in this House, that it was the duty of the government to have announced that the militia had been called out. Remember this happened on March 23, but on February 12—six weeks earlier—this hon. gentleman knew—and this was why he wanted the whole cost of the Canadian brigade to fall on the Imperial exchequer—that we were going to spend $6,000,000 in quelling a rebellion that was to take place six weeks later. Well, on March 23, Mr. Blake raised the point that the government should have announced the calling out of the militia. What did the late First Minister, Sir John Macdonald, say? He said:

The fact of the matter is that, taking time by the forelock, after having shown not apathy nor neglect, but extraordinary quickness in making all precautionary arrangements, the Minister of Militia sent a telegram on that day (the 23rd March), to ask if there was any want of militia and how many men the militia forces could supply.

Down to March 23, the Minister of Militia did not even know if any militia forces would be required or what militia forces could be supplied. Yet on February 12, the present hon. leader of the opposition knew the whole thing so thoroughly, he had such a prophetic insight into the whole matter, that he was able to foresee that every penny of this money and much more would be required in six weeks.

I do really think that an hon. gentleman who had such prophetic gifts should not on that occasion have concealed them. He should have made use of them for the benefit of this country. Because if he had done so he might have saved enough out of the cost of quelling the rebellion in the North-west to pay for this contingent three times over, and not allowed this country to be exposed to the spectacle of calling on the Imperial exchequer to defray the cost of this contingent which he was so magnanimous in offering.

Mr. RUSSELL.

With reference to the duty of this country to participate in Imperial wars and assist the mother country, the hon. gentleman had other opportunities of expressing his opinion. There was a meeting of the British Empire League on December 3, 1896, at the Guildhall. The Duke of Devonshire was there, and did really this time invite the hon. gentleman to give an expression of his opinion. We have heard of an invitation given by the Duke of Devonshire to a leading colonial statesman on another occasion, to express his views on a great subject of Imperial and colonial concern. This really was an invitation extended in the most pointed way by the Duke of Devonshire to the hon. leader of the opposition, who then was, I think, High Commissioner, to discuss the question of Imperial defence. He was endeavouring, I think, to coax the hon. gentleman into making some statement on his own behalf in respect of the willingness of Canada to do something in the way of helping to sustain the immense weight of Imperial burdens that rested on the shoulders of the old land. But all that he got out of him was this, and it was not very much:

I listened with profound interest to the important statement made by the Duke of Devonshire with reference to the question of defence. I may say, as far as that matter is concerned that there is no portion of this great empire which, in my judgment, has not been engaged steadily doing its utmost for the defence of the empire.

This was the burden of his song at all times, that we were doing our utmost, that we had been doing from year to year, everything that was incumbent upon us in the way of bearing the Imperial burden. He went on to point out—as he did a great many times—the enormous indebtedness which we had incurred in opening up this country. He pointed to the fact that we had built a great interoceanic line of railway from the Atlantic to the Pacific; he pointed to the fact that we had established here a permanent militia force; he pointed to the fact that outside of our permanent force, we had organized a volunteer force of 35,000 militiamen; he pointed to the fact that we had agreed to subsidize a fast line of steamers across the Atlantic, and also that we were ready to take part in the construction of the Pacific cable. And finally he repeated his old hackneyed story that we were ready to shed our last drop of blood for the defence of that part of the empire in which we lived. Beyond that, the hon. gentleman was absolutely unwilling to go. He would not go outside of that, and he did not give any hint or suggestion of any willingness to go one single step beyond the services that I have already mentioned.

Now, on another occasion, two years before this, his statements upon this very issue were the subject of very sharp controversy. The question at issue was whether the Dominion of Canada and the other colonies should do something more than they had done, should do something in addition to what they had been called upon to do in the way of assisting in the defence of the empire at large. Mr. Parkin was present at the meeting and heard the address delivered on that occasion by the hon. leader of the opposition and the reply made to it by Sir John Colomb. If anybody would be able to state the precise point at issue between the leader of the opposition and Sir John Colomb, Mr. Parkin could state it. And he did state it. He said :

The only question that lies between Sir Charles Tupper and Sir John Colomb is whether the time has arrived when it is right and just that we should change from this indirect expenditure by which Canada has enormously strengthened the empire in the past to the time when we shall take on our shoulders a more broad and national burden.

Sir John Colomb thought the time had come when we should take upon ourselves a more broad and national burden ; Sir Charles Tupper thought the time had not come when we were called upon to do one single thing beyond the indirect contributions we had made by the indebtedness we had incurred by our construction of public works, by our offer to subsidize the fast Atlantic service, by our willingness to subsidize the Pacific cable, and by our establishment of a permanent force, a military school and a volunteer militia. He would not go one step beyond that, and his refusal was the subject of a sharp controversy that arose at the meeting of the Royal Colonial Institute on the occasion of the reading of his paper on Canada in its relation to the empire.

I might cite still further, but that I fear I have wearied the House with too much evidence on this subject. But I say that the hon. member for Napierville and Laprairie and the hon. member for Labelle can find a perfect armoury of arguments, a perfect arsenal of weapons, if they but look at the articles the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) published in 1891 and 1892 in the Nineteenth Century.

Now, Sir, let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter. I will not trouble the House to hear these extracts, or to hear further evidence, but I would ask the House simply to listen to the statement of a very high authority, a very competent historian and writer, Mr. Blake Crofton, the librarian of the parliamentary library of the province of Nova Scotia, who has made an acute study of the hon. gentleman's record in respect of these Imperial questions. He has summed up the essence of the whole matter in this way. The work I quote from is published anonymously, but it is an open secret that it is from his facile and cultured pen. Speaking of the present leader of the opposition, he says:

In several speeches and lectures he advertised with much ability, the services of Canada to the empire. He did not content himself, as some other equally sound Canadians and sounder federationists have done, with urging that the expense of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the militia, etc., should be reckoned as assets in determining Canada's contribution, if she should decide on federating with the British islands. He claimed that her contribution was complete. He wished Canada to occupy an anomalous position (half dependent, half equal) in a hybrid federation, with preferential duties, with the right to make commercial treaties, with a maimed kind of representation ; but it must not cost a cent to Canada. He wanted some more 'get' and no more 'give.' His theory of Imperial federation appealed to the cupidity of Canadians, as the reciprocal theory of Howe and Grant and Parkin appealed to their justice and manliness.

This was published in 1896, and is the comment of Mr. Crofton, who had been a member of the Imperial Federation Society, and a pronounced and advanced member, taking the same ground as my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), my distinguished friend, Dr. Weldon, and the same ground as Mr. Parkin and Lt. Col. Denison and perhaps some other Imperial federationists, who thought it was the duty of Canada to contribute something to the support of the army and navy of the mother country. The hon. and distinguished leader of the opposition was diametrically opposed to these gentlemen throughout his whole career as a member of the Imperial Federation Society. He never once admitted the point for which they contended, except perhaps, once, in a most reluctant way, when after he had been drawn into it by Sir John Colomb, he made the equivocal suggestion that all these things that he mentioned were not to be taken as payment in full on the part of Canada, but as evidence of what Canada might still further do. But the concession he then made to Sir John Colomb, if it was a concession, was practically retracted, as Mr. Crofton shows, in other deliverances.

Now, I do not blame the hon. leader of the opposition for holding these views—not at all. They were reasonable views, and views that one might fairly hold. I am not sure that you should expect a practical politician, as he is, to be a pioneer in questions like this. I am not sure but that the persons to look to for inspiration in such matters as these are not the practical public men who are bothered with details of administration and perplexed with all kinds of obstacles, but the men of insight and inspiration, the men who see visions and dream dreams, like my hon. friend from North Bruce, like my learned and distinguished friend, Dr. Weldon, like Mr. Parkin, like, perhaps, Lord Rosebery, 'the practical mystic,' to use his own expression. I do not blame the hon. leader of the opposition for not having the insight to see that this was the duty of Canada and for not proclaiming it on every hustings, so as to educate the public opinion of Canada up to the measure of these great duties. What I do blame him for is attempting to take the credit of that which belongs to other men, in violent antagonism to whom upon this subject he has spent the greater part of his life. And I blame him still further, after having taken this stand for, not only—I will not say stealing—the credit that belongs to other people, but for so representing the facts of this case as to endeavour to deprive his country, in the face of the world, of the credit to which it is entitled for the magnanimity of its action, for the promptitude and heartiness of its response and for the great service it has rendered to the empire in its hour of trial. He has taught all his minions and all his organs to cry that Canada has been a laggard in the race, that Canada is not risking to the measure of her opportunity, or to the measure of her duty.

One hon. gentleman told us the other night that our position in Canada was unique among all the other colonies of the empire. Well, Sir, I agree with my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Bell), who made a most eloquent speech, a powerful speech, the other evening; I agree with him in saying—if he did not say it, it was on his tongue, and he said the equivalent of it—that if Canada's position really was unique it was unique in the unanimity with which it had risen to the occasion. Why, Sir, a very careful and scrupulous writer whose statements I have not had opportunity to verify, tells us that in the colony of Queensland public opinion actually compelled the government to delay action upon this subject until parliament could be consulted; and then when the vote was taken, what do you suppose it was? Absolute unanimity? An overwhelming majority? Nothing of the kind. It was a vote of 37 for to 23 on the other side, against sending any help to the mother country at all. Well, Sir, there were then, according to the leader of the opposition, twenty-three traitors in that legislature, there were twenty-three men who were unwilling to pass that vote against only thirty-seven who were willing. Are we unique, then, when we compare ourselves with Queensland? I venture to say that when this vote is taken we will stand with an immensely larger proportion of the membership of this House voting for the sending of these contingents and for their payment, than voted for the sending and the payment of the colonial forces from Queensland. The colony of New South Wales has been referred to. It happened that there was a company of lancers that were drilling at Aldershot some time during the summer, and they cabled to their own government for permission to volunteer for South Africa; and the permission was refused until the parliament of that colony could be consulted. And then what do you suppose the vote was? Was it anything like unanimity, anything like the unanimity that we expect to have here? Nothing of the sort. It was a vote of 17 for against 10 the other way. Then what about the colony of South Australia? Surely there we shall find absolute unanimity. We find nothing of the sort, however. We find in one Chamber 18 against 9, one out of every three voting against the proposal; whereas, in the other Chamber the vote was carried only by the casting vote of the chairman. Well, Sir, I say again that if these statements are correct—and they are statements of a careful and scrupulous writer, and though I have not had an opportunity to verify them, I believe them to be entirely correct—our position is unique, I admit. I concede to the hon. gentleman who used that expression on the other side of the House, the hon. member for Dundas (Mr. Broder), that we are unique, but we are unique in our unanimity on this subject in this House, and in the unanimity of public opinion throughout the Dominion of Canada.

The hon. gentleman said, and others have said, and it has been said in the Conservative press, that we were occupying a humiliating position in England. Sir, I happen to know that that is absolutely untrue. I have a friend who happened to be in London at the very time when the announcement was made that the second Canadian contingent had been offered. It was during those dark and trying days when we were meeting with one defeat after another, when blow after blow was falling upon the British arms in South Africa. The report had reached London—I know not what the basis of it was—that the forces from one of the colonial contingents, like the children of Ephraim, had turned back in the day of battle, and right upon that rumour came the announcement in one of the great theatres of London of the offer of the second contingent from the Dominion of Canada. The enthusiasm was so great, the feeling was so strong in that assembly, that for the space of fifteen minutes no further business could be done. The whole audience rose applauding, and continued for five, ten, fifteen minutes at a time, applauding the gallantry, applauding the patriotism, applauding the magnanimity and the nobility of the people of Canada for coming to their assistance in that hour of need, instead of turning their backs in the day of adversity.

Now, Sir, I have said that I do not attach any blame to my right hon. friend for the suddenness of his conversion. It was a sudden conversion. He:

Between the saddle and the ground,
Salvation sought, salvation found.

As sudden as that was the conversion, the wholesome, the saving conversion that the leader of the opposition has undergone upon this subject. But I say it is cruel that he should reproach his own political children who have been sucking their political milk from his breast, those whom he has been indoctrinating with these opinions during the whole course of his political career; I say it is cruel, hard, heartless, for him to be reproaching them now, and calling upon his press to reproach them, and calling upon his followers in this House to reproach them, because they cannot, suddenly, in an instant, in the twinkling of an eye, uproot the doctrines that he has been implanting in their breasts during the lifetime of a whole generation. The hon. member was converted by public opinion. He was converted by the public opinion of this country which he did not create, which he was no factor in creating, the creation of which he resisted with all his might, the creation of which would never have taken place if he had had his way, the creation of which would have been absolutely impossible if his views and arguments had prevailed with the people of Canada. I say he did not create that public opinion, he merely announced that public opinion. I stated in some remarks which I addressed to a small meeting in the city of Halifax, that he enjoyed the enviable distinction of being in a position to be the first to announce that public opinion. I am not going to recall what I said. If any of my friends think I took a more charitable view of his proceedings on that occasion than a cold and heartless analysis would absolutely justify, I am so wedded to the charitable opinion that I formed and derive so much comfort from it that I do not propose to listen to any reasoning by which that opinion could be changed. But my point was this, and I think it is a correct one, that the leader of an opposition has a freedom from the trammels of office, and from the burden of executive responsibility, which gives him an opportunity of making such an announcement, that the leader of a government, charged with executive responsibilities, could not make and dare not make, and which there would be no propriety in his making.

The hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope) asked, and some other hon. gentlemen have asked: In view of these statements, what sort of a leader is it that does not lead public opinion? Why, Sir, it was not the duty of a leader of a government to lead public opinion upon a question such as that. The hon. gentleman who asked that question, the hon. gentleman who indulged in that sneer, did not stop to reflect upon the circumstances of the case. Our friends opposite do not stop to think that we were undertaking a two-fold departure in what we did last fall; they do not stop to consider, first of all, that we are making an absolute and complete departure in the policy of the people of this country with reference to our participating in Imperial wars from anything that had ever before been done; and secondly, that we were taking that departure without even the authority of a vote of the House of Commons. They do not stop to consider this, and I ask them now to stop and consider it, and in all fairness, and justice, to remember, that the public opinion of this country was actually calling, and did successfully call, upon the government of this country to reverse our whole public policy and to take an absolutely new departure. The people of this country were actually asking the government to usurp the functions and the prerogatives of parliament; and I say frankly and fearlessly that the government actually did usurp the prerogatives and powers of the parliament of Canada. But not only so, they were asking the government to do more than that, they were asking them, without a vote of the Canadian House of Commons, to undertake an enormous and unheard of expenditure, and it would have been criminal on the part of the leader of any government to have taken such a step, without being absolutely certain that he had, not only a majority, but an overwhelming majority of the members of this House and of the people of this country, behind him, a majority so large, so pronounced, so absolutely certain that it could be called a practical unanimity of the whole people of this country from end to end, every section, every class, every creed and every race.

I have no doubt, Sir, that the House will sustain, and the country will sustain the leader of this government, and this government in taking that step. They will sustain them for two reasons; they will sustain them in the first place, because they believe that the cause in which they have embarked this country, is a righteous cause. I believe that nine out of ten members in this House, if not a larger proportion, will be able to come to the conclusion, that the government embarked the Dominion of Canada in a righteous and just cause, when they sent these contingents to help to fight the battles of Great Britain in South Africa. I believe that some of us who do not think it was a justifiable cause, will, nevertheless, say that when our country was once embarked, and our forces were hard bested, it was the duty of the country, without stopping to inquire who set the house on fire, to do everything that was possible to extinguish the flame and leave the inquiry as to who it was that started them, to be answered at a later stage. I wish to impress upon my hon. friend from Napierville, that the British Empire is engaged in a defensive war, for this is a point which has not been given due force and weight by that hon. gentleman (Mr. Monet), when he undertook to argue the other side of the main question. I am willing to frankly concede to the hon. gentleman that if the mother country were engaged, in South Africa, in a war of aggression, there might be very considerable reason for hesitating before we could undertake to affirm the rectitude of her entering upon such a quarrel. I think there never was a more difficult ethical problem presented to any minister of the Crown than the problem which was presented to the Colonial Secretary, when he had to decide the question whether, before there was any ultimatum from President Kruger—or any such ultimatum was ever dreamed of—whether he, on the strength of any position in which the country was then placed, should involve the empire of Great Britain in war or not, for any cause then manifest in the controversy between the mother country and President Kruger. I know that there were the grievances of the Uitlanders to be redressed. Everybody has heard of them, all through the civilized world. A very active propaganda was set on foot to expound the grievances of those people in the Transvaal. Their grievances were great and serious, but I am not sure that there is any principle of international law; I am rather inclined to think that there is no principle of international law, none as yet generally recognized at all events, which would justify a foreign nation in intervening on behalf of the Uitlanders in connection with the internal affairs of the South African Republic. I think that Mr. Chamberlain and the Premier of Great Britain would have had a very difficult ethical problem to solve, if they had had to come to a conclusion upon anything that had occurred up to the time that President Kruger's ultimatum was delivered, in respect to the grievances of the Uitlanders, that would have justified them, as an independent power, in intervening between the Uitlanders and the government of the South African Republic. But, it was suggested, and is suggested, that it is not a case of one independent sovereignty in its relation with another independent sovereignty, but it is a question of a suzerain power in its relation with a subject power. There, again, however, I think you have a very difficult question to answer. Does the suzerainty exist, or had it been abolished? From my reading of the convention of 1884, I am bound to say that I cannot find, as a mere matter of legal construction, that British suzerainty was ever abolished in the convention of 1881, but eminent British statesmen have said that it was abolished, and that it was the purpose of the negotiations and of the new convention, that the suzerainty should be abolished. But, grant, for the sake of argument, that the suzerainty was not abolished, and that it is still in the convention, I am not sure that there is any living man who really knows what the suzerainty means, what it implies, or what it involves. I am not sure but that the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville conceded too much, when he said that if suzerainty was not abolished, he would be willing to give up his whole case, because I am not sure that suzerainty has anything to do with the relations between Mr. Kruger, as President of the South African Republic, and those who have chosen to make their domicile and be subject to the rule of the South African Republic in respect to their civil rights, as inhabitants of that republic. But it may be further said that outside of all technical pleadings and of all technical questions, as to whether a case for intervention had arisen, or whether suzerainty was abolished, or whether, if it has not been abolished, it involves the right to interpose for the protection of the Uitlanders, outside, I say, of all those considerations, a perfect case for the mother country was made out and can be made out on the ground of the absolute necessity of the protection of its own colonies and possessions in South Africa, against the intended encroachment of the South African Republic. Be it so, and so I do sincerely believe. But, it was difficult to press that ground, because President Kruger, when they charged him with amassing great and menacing armaments, always could point to the spectre of the Jameson Raid, and make it his excuse, and his justification for the enormous armaments that he was accumulating. I believe there is good ground further, for the contention, that there was a conspiracy on foot, and had been one on foot for years, in the South African Republic, not only to secure its own absolute independence, but to acquire the control of South Africa, but here again it was no easy matter to demonstrate the fact of such a conspiracy, or of the complicity of President Kruger, if it was a fact. My own mind is satisfied, in view of all the facts, that this war was inevitable and that even if the war had come without the ultimatum of President Kruger, it would have been a just and righteous war, but I do not see how any statesman in England could fail to be perplexed by the 'obstinate questionings' that must have oppressed him in coming to the conclusion that he had a complete case against the republic on account of anything that had transpired down to the date of the ultimatum. I do not know, if war had been declared in the absence of such an ultimatum, how it would have been demonstrable to the world that Great Britain had lowered it up by absolute acts of aggression. President Kruger. On the other hand, I do not know how any person can be in a position to say, that if President Kruger had not himself struck the first blow, if he had not delivered his insane ultimatum and followed it up by absolute acts of aggression, if he had not himself cried havoc and let slip the dogs of war, I do not know how any man can possibly be in a position to say that negotiations might not have been proceeding at this very hour. But we do know that the British government was negotiating with infinite and inexhaustible patience down to the very hour when that insane ultimatum was delivered, and I do not see how any living man can say that the British government would not still have averted hostilities if that insane ultimatum had not been issued. Now, Sir, that is an absolutely vital point, and it is the point on which the argument of my hon. friend from Laprairie (Mr. Monet) was hopelessly at fault. From the other side of the House the very fair question was put to him by the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig): Who began the war, and my hon. friend (Mr. Monet) could not answer him. He did have to answer that Kruger struck the first blow. Well, if Kruger struck the first blow, the burden is on the hon. member (Mr. Monet) to show that Kruger was not the virtual, as he was actual, aggressor. It is certain that Kruger was the aggressor on the face of things, and it will require a strong case for him to make out that he was not absolutely the aggressor in point of substance, as he was in point of form. I am willing to go a long distance to meet my hon. friend (Mr. Monet). I am willing to say that even although Kruger did actually invade British territory, even although he did actually strike the first blow, he may not have been the aggressor if by our preparations against him, we placed ourselves in a menacing attitude towards him, and in a position where we might strike at him, and where he might fairly presume we had the intention to strike. Sometimes, as we all know, the man who strikes the first blow may do so absolutely in self-defence. But that case cannot be made out here if, as is admittedly the fact, the preparations of the British government were such as were absolutely demanded for the safety of their own territory. I call my hon. friend's attention, therefore, to the fact that on May 25 (six months before Kruger's ultimatum), he will find evidence that the Boer preparations across the border had excited the anxiety and fear of British subjects in the northern corner of Natal. They were nervous at the prospect of war; they wanted to know what the British government were prepared to do for them, and in all that dark and perplexed history of South African affairs the voice of the Imperial authority for once rang clear and true:

You can tell the minister from me that it is out of the question that any invasion of Natal should be tolerated by Her Majesty's government. Such an event is highly improbable, I think; but Natal would be defended with the whole force of the empire, if it occurred, and redress would be exacted for any injury to her.

That is the despatch from Sir Alfred Milner, the High Commissioner, to Mr. Chamberlain. I say, Sir, that from that time forward every step taken by the British government was a step taken absolutely in self-defence. Every step taken after that in the line of military precautions was a step taken for the safety of British colonists and British subjects in Natal. Not only that, but I assert further, that not even sufficient precautions were taken by the British government.

Mr. McNEILL. Hear, hear.

Mr. RUSSELL. Every one now knows that the precautions taken by the British government were not adequate, and every one knows that we suffered defeat after defeat simply because the precautions taken by the British government were not sufficient to meet the emergency. Sir, in the light of all these facts, I assert that the cause of Britain is an absolutely righteous cause, an absolutely just cause, and because of its righteousness, and because of its justice, we are ready to stand by the mother country until the conflict is ended. We have had trials enough, and sorrows enough and difficulties enough, heaven knows, since this cruel conflict has opened, and we have had enemies and prophets of evil, many enough, who rejoiced in our temporary discomfitures and would be glad enough to have rejoiced in our downfall. One of these prophets, with whom the wish was father to the thought, predicted that in South Africa Great Britain was to find the grave of her empire. Sir, that prediction is going to be falsified. We know now for certain, but we felt confident of it all through, that Great Britain is not going to find the grave of her empire in South Africa. Far from it, Sir, she has found in South Africa her glorious rebirth, or at least, the renewal of her youth, for never before in the whole history of our country has there been a more glorious demonstration given to the whole world of its essential unity and its invincible power. The grave of empire! No, far otherwise. As one of our own poets has said:

It is not to be thought of that the flood
Of British freedom, which, to the open sea
Of the world's praise, from dark antiquity
Hath flowed, 'with pomp of waters, unwithstood,'
Roused though it be full often to a mood
Which spurns the check of salutary bands,
That this most famous stream in bogs and sands
Should perish; and to evil and to good
Be lost forever. In our halls is hung
Armory of the invincible Knights of old;
We must be free or die, who speak the tongue
That Shakespeare spake; the faith and morals hold
Which Milton held.—In everything we are sprung
Of earth's first blood, have titles manifold.

Under the colour of these manifold and indefeasible titles, the people of the motherland propose to go forward, and the people of Canada by their side, and along with them the people of all our great self-governing colonies—to go forward through what toils and trials may yet remain, through what difficulties and dangers, through what agony and bloody sweat, forward from victory to victory until the standard of England is planted upon the battlements of Pretoria, the symbol and the guarantee to all nations and kindreds and peoples and tribes in all that great South African continent of British freedom and British justice—freedom and justice, the two noblest words in the English language, the two noblest achievements of British political genius and military valour.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (East Simcoe). Mr. Speaker, the importance of this question must be my excuse for rising to continue the debate, if excuse were needed. As the representative of a constituency which has sent some of her gallant sons to the war in South Africa—one of whom has gloriously yielded up his life's-blood in defence of his country's honour—it is incumbent on me that I should speak in this debate. Throughout this discussion the government have endeavoured to shield themselves from the accusation, which is believed in throughout the whole Dominion, that they did not act with that promptitude which a loyal government of a loyal British colony should display. No complaint has come from this side of the House as to the action of the government in sending these contingents to South Africa, but to the amazement of the people of this Dominion a series of speeches have emanated from the Liberal benches which it is difficult to reconcile with loyalty to the British Crown. We have listened with pleasure to some loyal speeches from hon. gentlemen opposite, but to the consternation of the loyal people of Canada, we have heard emanating from the government benches speeches which did not savour of loyalty, speeches which did not tend to strengthen the bonds which should exist between Canada and the motherland; speeches which must raise in the minds of all the people of this country a doubt, that in this great trial of the empire the government of Canada were heartily willing to stand up for the defence of British institutions. The people of Canada objected to the delay of the government in taking action in this crisis, and I think that whole delay may be fairly charged to the account of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte). I can congratulate the Minister (Mr. Tarte) that when he once puts his hands to the plough he never turns back. From the very birth of this government he has demonstrated that he is bound to have his way in all things. When the allotment of portfolios was being made the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) made a bid for the largest money-spending department, and the Prime Minister was compelled to yield to his demands. And so on many occasions it has been proved and illustrated that if there is one man in the whole cabinet who controls and masters the situation, it is the Minister of Public Works. What ground are the government taking to-day? They are taking the ground that they had a perfect right to send these contingents to Africa, that they are justified in doing so by law and custom, and they hope and trust that their action will be endorsed by Canada and the Canadian parliament. When did this change come about? If there is one man who should be responsible for the action and conduct of the government, it is the man who leads it; and the right hon. the Premier was the first man who stood up in Canada, not in a haphazard manner, but deliberately, and gave it as his opinion that Canada should not enter into this war, and pooh-poohed and made light of the suggestion that the government had the right to interfere on behalf of the empire. There was published in the Military Gazette of Toronto, on the 3rd of October, the following statement:

There appears to be an entirely erroneous view held by many of the people that the militia is purely for defence and cannot be called upon to serve outside of Canada. Clause 76 of the Militia Act empowers Her Majesty to call out the militia, or any part thereof, for active service, either within or without Canada, when it appears advisable to do so by reason of war, invasion or insurrection, or danger of any of them. Provision is made in the Act for placing the militia under the orders of the Commander of Her Majesty's forces in Canada. This would be done in the event of our militia leaving Canada, as they would be serving under the Army Act and Queen's Regulations. Under authority of the Militia Act the whole of the militia of Canada could be called out by the government of Canada and placed under the orders of the Commander of the regular force in Canada and sent by him anywhere. There would be no difficulty in the Canadian government providing money for a force for service in the Transvaal, as a Governor General's warrant could be issued for any amount under our laws as an unforeseen and unprovided for expenditure.

I do not happen to know who the editor of that journal is; but to my mind he gave utterance to what is to-day accepted by this government as sound constitutional law. But instead of his being treated with consideration, the Premier was the first man to disdain and make light of his proposal. On the 4th of October, supposing that there was no widespread feeling throughout Canada in favour of taking part in this war, the Premier was carefully interviewed by the correspondent of the Globe, the great organ of the Liberal party in Canada, and in that interview he said:

There exists a great deal of misconception in the country regarding the powers of the government in the present case. As I understand the Militia Act, and I may say that I have given it some study of late, our volunteers are enrolled to be used in the defence of the Dominion. They are Canadian troops to be used to fight for Canada's defence. Perhaps the most widespread misapprehension is that they cannot be sent out of Canada.

Then, he went on to say :

There is no menace to Canada, and although we may be willing to contribute troops, I do not see how we can do so. Then again, how could we do so without parliament's granting us the money? We simply could not do anything. In other words, we should have to summon parliament.

Then the hon. gentleman went out of his way to abuse the editor of the Military Gazette, by saying this :

The statement in 'The Military Gazette,' published this morning, is a pure invention. Far from possessing any foundation in fact, it is wholly imaginative.

The writer of that article in the Gazette is certainly entitled to an apology from the Premier, who, after stating that the writer did not know what he was talking about, accepted the dictum that gentleman had laid down. What is the cause of this change? The cause is quite plain: the Minister of Public Works, the master of the administration, had shown his hand; he had sulked in his tent; he was not forthcoming in this emergency. He was going through the province of Quebec making most inflammatory and abusive speeches against members of this House, more particularly against the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), and other gentlemen who at all times and in all places dared to take their political lives in their hands—as I fear they have done in some cases in the province of Quebec. These men were being reviled by the hon. gentleman in the province of Quebec, as note the following from his newspaper, La Patrie :

Not one of the speakers who addressed the meeting at St. Liboire had the energy to denounce the dangerous policy adopted by the chief of the Conservative party during the last few weeks, namely, the participation of Canada in the war of the Transvaal, and, consequently, in all others that might break out in Europe or elsewhere. M. Taillon, M. Beaubien and M. Bergeron constitute themselves the lay figures of Toryism and of the Orangeism of Ontario, that is to say, of the most fanatical and baneful influences that exist in this country.

We denounce them in the name of sound public opinion. We ask of our fellow-citizens to brand them as criminal cowards.

The Minister of Public Works in his journal was asserting that any man who should contend that Canada should take part in this Transvaal war should be denounced as a criminal coward. The Minister of Public Works denounces the whole cabinet to-day as criminal cowards because they took the action he denounced, and there is not a member of the cabinet who has the courage to resent the imputation and to challenge the Minister of Public Works that if he does not step out of the cabinet, they will do so. But a change came over the spirit of the dream of the Premier. Meanwhile, what was the Globe newspaper doing? Day in and day out its editorial columns were silent on the subject of the Transvaal war. The Premier had contented himself with the broad statement that it was utterly illegal and indefensible for Canada to interfere in this contest, and the Globe was prepared to accept his law on the question. What followed next? The interview with the Premier was on the 4th of October, and it is intimated to the Globe that a change of face must be shown to the public. The Globe was instructed to take two grounds—first, that it was utterly illegal and indefensible for Canada to interfere in this matter, and, secondly, that consideration and respect to parliament required that parliament should be summoned to consider the matter. Mark, the Premier and the government shifted from their first ground, and took refuge on the second ground that parliament should be called together. So we find the Globe newspaper on the 7th of October advocating that course. This is what it says:

What we have said will, we think, show that the rights of the government to deal with the matter without the consent of parliament is quite doubtful. No doubt the government would have the right to act in case of a great and unforeseen emergency. But in this case the emergency, if it exists, was certainly not unforeseen. . . . We do not lay down the rule that there ought to be more assistance rendered by the colonies even in these cases. But it can at least be reasonably maintained that before such a departure is taken parliament ought to be consulted.

In this way the government shifted their ground, because any man who read the military regulations would have seen that the writer in the Military Gazette was right, and the Premier was wrong. Therefore, when the military regulations were printed and read and discussed throughout the whole country, the weakness of the right hon. gentleman's position became evident, and the tip was given the Liberal press that a new and stronger ground must be taken. So, forsooth, on the 7th of October the Globe came out with the statement that the high court of parliament must be called and consulted before anything could be done. In the meantime the right hon. gentleman had gone on a visit to Chicago, and any one who will read the speeches which he made there will find that he dealt with every subject under the sun except the one in which Canada felt the greatest interest. That subject he studiously avoided, although there were magnificent opportunities afforded him at public banquets to declare before the world the readiness of Canada to stand by the empire, in her hour of need. But the right hon. gentleman was silent.

He indulged in flights of fancy and flowers of rhetoric on other subjects, but had not a word to say on this question; and if the truth could be known, if the right hon. gentleman would tell us how many cipher telegrams passed between his ministers and himself, we would find that during his stay in Chicago he was not reposing on a bed of roses. On his return he had to pass through the great city of Toronto, and there met scores of Liberals, who told him that his government was making a laughing stock of itself. First, by declaring it to be the solemn law of the country that the government could not intervene, and then abandoning that ground and taking the other that parliament must be called together before intervention. Why, we can imagine these gentlemen saying to him, has not the administration time and time again spent money in advance of the authority of parliament? Has not the government passed orders in council innumerable for the expenditure of money? It is high time you should be up and doing; the loyal province of Ontario is a seething mass of discontent against the government because of its inaction. In that great journal of Canada, the Montreal Star, thousands of opinions of the people were being daily published. What was the public opinion expressed in that paper? Day in and day out, the Montreal Star was publishing telegrams and letters from every city and town, village and hamlet, demanding that the government of Canada should respond to the will of the people by coming to the relief of the motherland without delay. What then happened? The right hon. gentleman went to Ottawa, and there he met the master of the administration, who was on top on this occasion, as he always is. There were hurried consultations held in the city of Montreal. Day in and day out the public were anxiously waiting a decision. In Toronto, the armouries were swarming night after night with men waiting and watching to see what this government were going to do—this government which was making itself ridiculous by declaring one day it was feasible to send men and the next day that it had no power to act before parliament voted the money. What happened? The Premier was in Chicago about the 9th of October, and on the 12th of October, the Globe made the announcement that in all probability a contingent would be sent. Why, parliament had not met at all. The law was the same as it was before. But the Premier was wrong, as everybody knew. The editor of the Military Gazette was right, as everybody knew. And everybody knew that parliament had not been summoned and that these hon. gentlemen were changing their front and waiting upon and watching for every shift of the wind. In the meantime, there were two great currents of opinion in the province of Quebec. There was the hon. member for Napierville (Mr. Monet), and there was the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), and I congratulate these gentlemen on the honesty of their opinions, though I am sorry to see the stand they have taken—these gentlemen denounced the government for sending a contingent, yet this government, which to-day poses as the personification of loyalty, dared not cross the river and bring out an opponent against the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), who had denounced them as wrong-doers.

In the government constituency of Napierville, the hon. member for that county (Mr. Monet) went about saying that if a petition were signed by twenty-five of his constituents, he would resign his seat and contest the county against the policy of the government. Yet this strong government was afraid to take up the hon. gentleman's challenge. In the meantime, in Toronto and in every county of Ontario, there were strong demonstrations against the government. Where were the Ontario ministers? They could not be found. Where was the gallant knight, the Minister of Trade and Commerce? Was he standing up and denouncing the Minister of Public Works? Not at all. Where was the Postmaster General, the Minister of Customs, and the other members of the administration? Not one was heard from, but the master of the administration was asserting his power. The Globe announced on the 12th of October that there would be a cabinet council, and it was not until the 14th of October that the order in council was made and the regulation passed that a contingent should go to the front. Why, if this government were of one opinion, if they saw eye to eye on this occasion, where was the necessity of wasting two or three days in the passing of an order in council? The answer is to be found in this fact that the Minister of Public Works was insisting upon the terms of the order and no doubt himself drafted it, and so we find it reported on the 23rd of October in La Patrie:

We declare in the most formal manner that the departure of the volunteers under the present conditions does not establish a precedent. The government of Her Majesty, and we are sure His Excellency the Governor General have neither the desire nor the intention to bind us by devious procedure or by manœuvres plotted in the dark.

Here was the Minister of Public Works insisting on a reservation which is not the reservation of the people of Canada. It is not their wish that this should not be considered as a precedent. The people of Canada are prepared on all future occasions—should such unfortunately arise—to take the same stand again. What was seen afterwards? We saw the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) protesting in this House against this war and against the intervention of Canadian troops in it, and I regret to say that he characterized, with unseemly language, the contest in which England is plunged. This is not a war of spoliation, as he described it; it is not a bloody warfare carried on by the strong against the weak; it is, and it has been an attack made upon Britain and Britain's glory, and Britain's honour. I quite agree with everything said by the hon. member for North Norfolk, when he denounced the gentlemen who had described this war as an uncalled-for proceeding on the part of Great Britain.

What followed? The hon. member for Labelle went to his constituents, and he came back here, to do what? Not to turn somersaults, I hope. Still, he announced that he is ready to do that. He resigns as a protest against this expenditure, and now he announces that he is ready to support it. The hon. member for Napierville (Mr. Monet) is more consistent; he, as I understand him, has announced that he will vote against the appropriations.

Now, if the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) will excuse me, for appropriating one of his expressions, it was a sight to make angels weep and jackasses laugh, to see the hon. member for Labelle, escorted into the House by the hon. Minister of Public Works, a member of this government, whose members see eye to eye, whose hearts beat together in this war. The Minister of Public Works on the floor of this House of Parliament dares—for I say, it was a daring act, and would not be ventured upon by any man but the Minister of Public Works, who feels so strong in his position—to introduce on the floor, a gentleman who resigned his seat as a protest against the action of the government.

The hon. junior member for Halifax has contented himself by doing what? He did not endeavour to deal with the conduct of the government, but he devoted himself to proving that at a time, probably, when most of us were unborn, the leader of the opposition did not see these matters exactly as he sees them to-day. I have no quarrel with that. I heard the explanation of the leader of the opposition in this House, and I heard the statements read; and I say it was the greatest strain upon the English language to attempt to twist and distort the statement made by the leader of the opposition some years ago, to prove that he at any time was found averse to the participation by Canada in any wars in which the mother country might unfortunately take part.

But where does the Premier come in? He says: I was right in my law—for he has not yet retracted, at any rate by his conduct—and actions as we know, speak louder than words. He has not summoned parliament to provide for this expenditure. He has only, according to his own statement, permitted these volunteers to go to South Africa. Surely the brave Canadians who have gone out there and have endured the toils and dangers of war will be thankful to him for permitting them to go. I can tell the right hon. Premier, that I witnessed some of the scenes of enthusiasm and saw the outburst of loyalty in the county of Simcoe; and if he had not permitted the loyal members of the contingent from that county to go, they would have gone without his permission. Has it come to this, that men volunteering their services, their lives for the defence of the empire, are simply to be permitted to go. It should be declared that they go with the full approval, with the heartiest approval of the people of Canada, rather than that a forced and reluctant permission has been drawn from this government.

But the Premier has shifted his ground. After he has admitted his action that his law was bad, and that his action was wrong and parliament should have been called together, he says that the action of the government was dictated by public opinion. I accept that statement in toto, and without qualification. I believe that is the only reason that this government took the action that they did, and not of their own free will and accord. Because, the Minister of Public Works, the master of the administration, denounced my hon. friend from Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), and others who approved of our participation in the war. The government was driven by the Conservative press, and, to a great extent also, by the action of the leader of the opposition. We have heard the romantic details concerning that wonderful telegram. Whether it reached the Premier, or whether it did not, I am not going to consider. But I will say that when this telegram was despatched by the leader of the opposition, saying that the great Conservative party would back up the government in this action, the heart of Canada beat responsive. And, Sir, that was one of the reasons why the government was driven to take the course they did. It stands out clearly in the record, that the government acted reluctantly, and only in obedience to public opinion. The Minister of Public Works, by his denunciations in his newspaper and otherwise, by his actions on the stump in different places in the province of Quebec, by delaying the government's action, and finally by causing to be inserted, as he claimed he had caused to be inserted, this proviso in the order in council, made it certain and plain that he did control, and did direct the action of the administration. And, if the Minister of Public Works is to be blamed in this connection—and I do claim that he is to be blamed—still I am here to say that I honour the Minister of Public Works for not looking back once he had decided upon his course. This is not the first occasion when we have had it shown that the Minister of Public Works was the master of the administration. Two years ago, the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), in the committee announced that the policy of this government was that permission should be given for railways to cross into the boundary country from the United States. But when it came down to this House, the government stood up to back up their policy, and the Minister of Public Works stood up to knock it down. Why did not other ministers resign on that occasion? If not why did not the Minister of Public Works resign? There was no cause for that hon. gentleman to resign, for he had won. So in this contest, there was no reason for that hon. gentleman to resign, because he had won. And I say it would be more honourable to the other members of the cabinet, if they had stuck to their guns and manfully declared: If the Minister of Public Works is to prevail in this matter, we are prepared to go out. But the people know to-day that the Minister of Public Works has had his way. Now, in the course of this debate, we have heard speeches made by hon. gentlemen on the other side, very different from what they declared when they were outside this House. The Minister of Public Works himself, went around like a roaring lion seeking whom he might devour, but he comes back a cooing dove. Not that he need be afraid, for has not the Premier himself said: The day the Minister of Public Works goes out of this cabinet, I go out too. They are the Chang and Eng of Canadian politics. When one dies, the other also expires. The Minister of Public Works knows the strength of his position. But there are other gentlemen who went out and spoke. There was the hon. member for St. James Division of Montreal (Mr. Desmarais). That hon. gentleman spoke in Montreal, and this is what he said:

I do not fear to say that the Laurier government would be seriously blamed by the electorate if it approved such a measure, sending a Canadian contingent to the Transvaal, and I, for one, would rise on the floor of the House as member for St. James Division, if such a proposal was brought before parliament and signify my disapproval.

But read the speech of the hon. gentleman in this House. Did he signify his disapproval? Unlike the hon. member for Napierville and the hon. member for Labelle, he has been whipped into line. It may be owing, because the statement that went forth through the public press last year that the hon. gentleman was to be appointed to a judgeship has a basis of fact. That is rather borne out by the fact that the public press has announced within the past few days that three more judges are to be appointed for the Montreal district. Sir, the fact of the matter is, that the government are playing fast and loose with this question. They have played fast and loose with this question, and the Premier has done so on every occasion that presented itself. When the elections of 1887 were on, what was heard then as the Shibboleth, the war cry of the Liberal party? Whenever a French-speaking people could be found, their cry went forth that the murder of Riel, as it was termed, must be avenged. That was the cry throughout the whole province of Quebec, and the Premier to-day is responsible and has been responsible in the past for those utterances. Well was it said the other day by the hon. member for Kent, N.B., (Mr. McInerney) that there have always been in the province of Quebec two great lines of thought, one led by the Liberal party, which has always taught distaste and distrust for Britain and everything connected with Britain. And, Sir, was not that statement borne out by the hon. member for Napierville (Mr. Monet) the other night, when he chided the Premier for bringing him up to his present state of mind, and then rudely letting him drop at the present juncture?

But this is not at all confined to the province of Quebec. I believe it has been, and it is, rampant there; but wherever in the province of Ontario there is a large French Canadian vote, this has always been the cry of the Liberal party, they have tried to work race and religion for all they are worth. In the constituency which honours me with its confidence, there is a large French-speaking population, numbering probably 3,000 or 4,000 souls in all. They are people who came into that northern part of Ontario some years ago and engaged in lumbering operations. The land was fertile, they were industrious and thrifty; they took up land there, and they live there to-day, and if any hon. gentleman from the province of Quebec will pay that part of the province a visit, he will think he has been transplanted into one of his own Quebec counties. There are men who are intelligent, there are men who are thrifty, there are men who are industrious; and better than that, there are men who have grasped the situation and taken advantage of the opportunities that are afforded them. They have no conflict there with their English-speaking friends. They mix together at the same public schools—at least in most districts they do; their children are taught the English language; and it is their fondest wish to be, as they are, honoured and respected by their English-speaking neighbours. In the municipal contests that take place in those townships the greatest possible deference is accorded to the French Canadian residents in that part of the riding, and they always have a representative placed on the municipal boards; aye, more than that, the township council officers are French Canadians. As I said before, they are deserving of every privilege, they are deserving of every respect that has been given them. Sir, such is the peaceful condition of things in that riding year in and year out, there is the greatest possible degree of interchange of good feeling between the two classes of people. But, Sir, let the signal be placed on the wall that there is going to be a general election, and then what do we find? We find Mr. Charles Marcil, one of the bosom friends of the Premier, we find Mr. Leduc, and scores of others whose names I have forgotten, coming into that township, to do—what? To raise prejudice, to raise passion, to endeavour to breed a feeling that festers and has festered for months after an election. Sir, these are the gentlemen who have always been responsible for attempting to foster the race and religious cries in that riding. So bitter, so violent were the attacks that have been made in that riding, that they have estranged the support of dozens and dozens of honest Liberals who were disgusted with the appeals that were made, because, when there were great questions to be discussed, when questions of trade and commerce came up and other matters of importance, they were disgusted to hear such cries raised by these gentlemen on every occasion that offered itself, and it has recoiled on their own heads. I may here tell the government to-night that if, as I trust, I am the candidate again in that riding, I ask no greater favour from them than to send up the men there that they have sent in the past to raise those questions of race and religion, and revenge.

Sir, how does this government act towards their friends? The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), the man who says the government is wrong but who won't vote against their getting the money, is at once translated to a higher place, the portals of the caucus room are thrown open to him, with open arms he is embraced and is placed in the confidential position of a whip of the government.

Mr. BOURASSA. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I have already denied that statement, which is entirely unfounded in fact. I am not a government whip.

Mr. BENNETT. I accept the hon. gentleman's statement that he is not a government whip, and I will rely on the statement that the government, in order to conciliate this hon. gentleman, have tendered him a position.

Mr. BOURASSA. No. This has also been denied, and I deny it again.

Mr. BENNETT. Well, where is the hon. member for Napierville (Mr. Monet)? Is the caucus closed to him? I have not heard that it is. That is wide open that he may run into it too.

Mr. MONET. This is a family matter with which the hon. gentleman has nothing to do.

Mr. BENNETT. Well, if this is a family matter all I can say is that if there are a few more exhibitions afforded of the differences of opinion that have been manifested in the past few weeks, the whole family will soon be on the street. Why, the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Stenson) stands up and denounces the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) because he has dared to say things that are not complimentary to the people with whom he is allied; and so we find the members of this happy family assailing each other in turn. Now, the reason that I have mentioned the matter is this, that this government are so torn asunder on this matter, they are so shifting their sails to the fleeting winds that they cannot afford to lose a single friend on this question. Doubtless the members for Labelle and Napierville will be provided for, and if the hon. member for St. James, Montreal (Mr. Desmarais), is not translated to the judiciary by that time he will have recanted from his first opinion, and when the election takes place in the province of Quebec, there will be nothing to denounce but the leader of the opposition and the Montreal Star for having started the agitation that drove this government to the action they took. And that will go on in the province of Quebec. True, there will be a hemming and a hawing, there will be an endeavour to excuse and apologize for that same action of the government. But the real question will be—and it is on this question that this government is impaled—that this government is notoriously weak in the eyes of the people. It is to-day asking for aid, and assistance, and succour from every quarter, they are impressing into the fold every man who can assist them, and woe betide the man who denounces a minister. Look at the fate of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson). He denounced the little Napoleon of the west, who, by the way, has gone into exile, and where is the hon. member for Lisgar? He is driven out of the caucus room. Sir, is it not a pitiful situation for a so-called strong government to be in? They are now in such a position that whoever dares to assail the frail character of a minister must be driven out of the gates. On matters of import such as this every member is free to do as he likes in the premises—do whatever he will and say whatever he will; but in the name of all that is good they must try to crawl back into the fold in some way or another. But if a member of the House dares to stand up and say that he thinks that a minister is wrong, there is only one place where he is to be cast, and that is into outer darkness, where the member for Lisgar is now.

Sir, the government are on their trial, not only in the great province of Ontario, but in every province of this Dominion, on their action on this occasion. In every province of this Dominion, whether it be from the far west or the far east, there is unanimity, there is a line of action that all have agreed and decided upon. They are not going to quibble and ask themselves whether this war was right or wrong, they are not going to ask themselves whether the law or custom of the country permitted participation on the part of Canada in this war, but they are going to say spontaneously, and as one man: We believe that when the hour of duty arrives and England calls for assistance, that assistance should be granted to her, and we are prepared to give it. And when the time does come that an appeal to the great electorate has to be made, all the apologizing and shuffling of this government will stand in the light of day, and it must appear that the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues were driven to this policy and that action was taken which was not taken by themselves, which was not of their own choosing, or of their own wish, but that they were driven to this by public opinion. Far be it from me to say that the great Liberal party throughout Ontario and the Dominion are not loyal to the core; I believe they are. But in this matter, as in many others, they have been betrayed by their leaders. There was a time when the cry of commercial union rang from one end of the country to the other. On that occasion thousands of good loyal Liberals withdrew their support and assistance from the Liberal party. And why? Because they saw that if the policy of their leaders was carried out nothing but destruction was in store for Canada's interests. And so to-day, when the appeal is made to the electorate on this question, the people will pronounce, as they pronounced the other day in the province of Manitoba, and as they pronounce on every occasion that is offered to them, that an administration that is led by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), the man who controls and directs and leads every action that it takes, is not worthy of countenance, and that there should be in times of emergency and when grave questions are facing the country and the empire, a government with a leader at its head who will not wait for public opinion, but standing in the van, will lead, leaving to all to follow.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into committee on the resolutions.

(In the Committee.)

It being six o'clock, the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS.

On resolution 1,

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) if these two orders in council have been brought down.

Mr. BENNETT.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). A statement of the Governor General's warrants was brought down giving the sums of money, but I do not think the text of the orders in council was brought down.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish the hon. gentleman would bring that down.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I will text of the orders in council are laid on the Table.

On resolution 2,

Mr. FOSTER. I do not want to go into the particulars in reference to this resolution at this stage, provided we can take them on the Bill itself with the additions that, I believe, the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Borden) is preparing; that is, the estimate in detail of the different items which go to make up the amount. It is quite impossible for us, just by explanation across the Table, to at all make any analysis or criticism of the expenditures which go to make up the total sum, and if, with the understanding that, when we are in committee on the Bill, we can take up the items of expenditure, the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence having provided the members of the House with an estimate of the items, we might discuss them in that way. Of course, that would serve the purpose of parliament just as well, and it would facilitate the matter rather than waiting for it now. I would like to hear the answer of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding).

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Borden) has prepared the information and will be very glad to give any information that may be desired now. There is no desire on our part to shut off any proper inquiry at a later stage either of the resolutions or of the Bill. Since the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence is prepared now with the information, perhaps it would facilitate matters if he would give the information the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) desires.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. Minister of Militia and Defence may give all the information he pleases, but with a mass of information making up about $2,000,000, you will see that it is quite impossible to have any criticism at all. What I think would be better would be to defer that stage of criticism until the second reading of the Bill.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Or when the Bill is in committee.

Mr. FOSTER. Or when the Bill is in committee, and let the hon. minister put on the Table, for the information of members now, or as soon as possible, a printed statement of the items. Whilst we are all in favour of the appropriation, the hon. minister must not think that it is going through parliament just by a general explanation. We must have all the items in detail so that we can have time and be prepared to pass a judgment on every item just the same as if the estimates were passing through the House. The hon. minister will quite see that it will be impossible to make any criticism outside of that. I suppose we might agree to and pass this resolution, as far as this goes, without the proper explanation or debate.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) suggested to the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and myself the propriety of having the statement printed which has been printed. Do I understand from him that he wishes a further detailed statement printed of every item of the expenditure that is incurred the same as the items that appear in the Auditor General's Report?

Mr. FOSTER. I have not seen the statement the minister refers to, nor do I think any member on this side of the House has.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I shall send the hon. gentleman over some copies of it. I understood it had been printed and circulated. I am sorry it has not been.

Mr. FOSTER. This statement will, of course, be satisfactory for the present.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) should have been placed in possession of a copy of the statement before now, and as he will need time to examine it, there will be no objection at the committee stage of the Bill to go into these details.

3. The word 'expenditures' in the foregoing resolutions includes the following:—

(a) All expenses of every kind in connection with the raising, enrolling, arming, equipping, provisioning, despatching and transporting of the said contingents up to the time of their arrival at the place of debarkation in South Africa.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose that does not include payment for the staff of the Militia Department or anything of that kind?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The regular officers of the department performed their duties without extra expense. Possibly in some cases we required extra help, and travelling expenses would be included.

(b) The payment of the officers, non-commissioned officers and men composing the said contingents up to the time of debarkation as aforesaid at the rates authorized by the regulations and orders of the Department of Militia and Defence;

(c) All separation allowances paid to the wives and children of the married non-commissioned officers and men at the rates laid down by the Imperial regulations;

Mr. FOSTER. Are these separation allowances paid by the Imperial authorities?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No, but we are paying the same rate as the Imperial authorities.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They cannot be paid by the Imperial authorities.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. In the Imperial army a certain number of non-commissioned officers and men are allowed to marry, and the separation allowance is paid to their wives and families by a vote of the Imperial parliament. We are paying these allowances ourselves.

Mr. FOSTER. Is there any understanding with the Imperial government that these allowances shall be refunded to us?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. No; the application has not been made.

Mr. FOSTER. The understanding all through this discussion has been that the British government wished to treat our Canadian soldiers as if they were Imperial troops. In that case, of course, the British government would pay this allowance to the wives of married men of the Canadian and Australian contingents, or otherwise they would not be treating the men from the colonies the same as the Imperial troops.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I made inquiries with reference to that at the outset. The question presented itself to me precisely as it does to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster). The answer I received was, that there was no provision made, and I was told that none of the other colonies had raised any question with regard to that. I did not press the matter further.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose it might be reconciled in this way. The only Imperial soldiers placed on that footing are those who have been given permission to marry, and as the Imperial authorities have not, of course, given permission to any of the Canadians or Australians to marry, they will properly not come under that rule.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is the explanation.

Mr. FOSTER. I can quite see how that would be consistent.

Mr. GUILLET. With reference to the $200,000 for rifles and ordnances; as I understand it, these were taken out of stores.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes, we took them out of stores and we are replacing them by purchase from England.

Mr. OLIVER. What is the amount of these separation allowances which are to be paid to the wives and children?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The separation allowance given by the Imperial authorities is as follows: Sergeants, 50 cents for a wife, 5 cents for each son, and 5 cents for each daughter, per day; corporals, 35 cents for a wife, 5 cents for each son, and 5 cents for each daughter; privates, 25 cents for a wife, 5 cents for each son, and 5 cents for each daughter. The numbers are as follows in the first contingent: sergeants, 13 wives, 24 children; corporals, 9 wives, 15 children; privates, 37 wives, 61 children. These draw about $23 per day, at which rate the payments on account of the first contingent will amount to $5,589 to June 30, 1900. The memorandum goes on to say that the returns for the second contingent are not in, and we are not able to say how many married men are in it.

Mr. OLIVER. I would like to say, following the remarks which I made on the resolution, that I for one do not consider that the Imperial rate of pay or allowances is adequate to the circumstances of our soldiers. I do not think 25 cents a day to the wife of a private soldier, circumstanced as the private soldiers are in the first, second or third Canadian contingents, an adequate allowance. The very fact that it is the allowance of the Imperial forces, made in the case of people whose trade or calling is simply soldiering, is an evidence that it is not adequate.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. It applies to the Imperial militia.

Mr. OLIVER. The fact that it applies to the Imperial forces is a sufficient proof that it is not adequate when applied to people in civilian life. As to its being sufficient for the militia forces in the old country, even in that case the circumstances are not the same as in the case of our volunteers in this country, where the cost of living is higher and where wages are higher; and the class of people who have joined the Canadian forces are perhaps on a somewhat different footing from those who compose the ordinary militia forces in the old country. If the people of Canada are deriving a certain amount of credit from the sacrifices made by these men who have gone to Africa, it is as little as the people of Canada can do for themselves to lighten those sacrifices as much as possible, and to judge what are proper allowances, not by the standard which prevails in the mother country, where the conditions are different, but rather by the standard which prevails in this country. This country is getting the benefit, if there is any benefit, and should pay according to that benefit.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I would point out to my hon. friend that in addition to this allowance, the wife of the Canadian soldier is getting the benefit of a fund which is to be set aside, made up of the difference between the Canadian pay and the Imperial pay. After carefully considering the matter, we thought, in view of that fund being set aside for the benefit of the wife and children, or the men if they come back, that this allowance would answer fairly well.

Mr. McNEILL. I must say I entirely agree with the view of my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Oliver). I do think we ought not to make two bites of a cherry in this matter. I think we ought not to save one-half of the pay of our militia by reason of their going to South Africa. If they were serving here instead of in South Africa, we would be paying them 50 cents a day.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We are paying them that.

Mr. McNEILL. No, we are paying half that. The pay of a private militiaman in Canada is 50 cents, whereas if he goes to South Africa, only 25 cents is to be paid to him by Canada, and I am very glad to see that my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is as much shocked at the thought as I am, because he shook his head at the statement.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am not shocked. It was at the first statement you made that I shook my head.

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend said that we were paying them 50 cents. He finds now that we are not paying them 50 cents. I hope that we shall have one member of the government with us, if not more, and that this shall not be made a party question at all. I hope we shall arrange to give our boys who have gone out at the risk of their lives to uphold the honour of Canada and the integrity of the empire, their full Canadian pay, and will not attempt to save 25 cents out of it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. My hon. friend assumes that I was incorrect in my statement across the House; but unless I am altogether wrong, the Minister of Militia explained to us in Council, and we all concurred in it, that Canada is providing for the payment of the full amount to our militia who have gone to South Africa that they would be entitled to receive under our regulations here. They may not get it all paid to them each day in South Africa. There they can only be paid on the same scale as Imperial troops; but the difference is funded for them here, and their wives and families will receive it, or they will receive it if single men, when they come back. In addition to that, they are paid the Queen's regulation fees, if married, for their wives and children; that is, in addition to the pay of regular Canadian troops or the Mounted Police force. I think I am correct in saying that.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. That is right.

Mr. WALLACE. What is Canada paying?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The full pay that is paid to a permanent militiaman or a Mounted Policeman here, and in addition to that the Queen's regulation fees for those who are married.

Mr. McNEILL. I think my hon. friend is mistaken. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence whether we are paying our militiamen who have gone to South Africa, in addition to the pay they are receiving from the Imperial authorities, the full amount of pay they would have if serving in Canada.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. No.

Mr. McNEILL. Precisely. That is what I said. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is wrong, and I am right in my contention.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No.

Mr. McNEILL. The minister says we are not paying the full amount of their Canadian pay.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We are providing for it.

Mr. McNEILL. No, we are not; we are providing for the difference between Imperial pay and Canadian pay. We are providing 25 cents a day for privates. It is well that the House should understand that the Canadian private militiaman is not to have 50 cents a day put to his credit while he is away, but that he is to have 25 cents a day put to his credit while he is away. I ask the Minister of Militia if that is right.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That is what my hon. friend said.

Mr. McNEILL. No, it was the very opposite.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not at all.

Mr. McNEILL. Well, my hon. friend was understood to say it on this side of the House, and I think the country would so understand him. Under the present arrangement the boys who have gone out, are not to receive from Canada the full amount of pay they would have, if they were here. I think they ought to have it, in addition to whatever they may get from the Imperial authorities. We ought not to have any saving in this matter. I do not think that we ought simply to supplement what is given by the Imperial authorities, but that our boys should receive full pay from us, irrespective of what they may get in the Imperial service. That is what I said to begin with, and my hon. friend said I was entirely wrong. I am quite in favour of the position taken by my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Oliver), and I hope the committee will agree that it is the proper one to take.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am afraid that the way my hon. friend has put the case is calculated to leave an erroneous opinion which I am sure he has no desire to do. What we wish to state, and what the Minister of Militia did state, is that our militia, who are going out to South Africa, will receive the full pay that they would if they were serving Her Majesty in Canada. The militiaman will receive, either himself or his family, as may be arranged, the full pay he would receive if he were serving Her Majesty in Canada, and that is larger than the pay in the British service. And, in addition, if he be a married man, his family will get a separation allowance, which they would not receive if he were serving at home.

Mr. McNEILL. I wish to repeat that by means of the pay given by the Imperial authorities, Canada is saving one half of the pay she would give her militiamen if serving her at home. That is an awkward position for us to be in.

Mr. DAVIN. Will the militiaman have, not only the Imperial pay, but the full pay he would have received if on service in this country?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Including the Imperial pay?

Mr. DAVIN. In addition to it.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Not in addition.

Mr. DAVIN. I communicated some months ago with the Minister of Militia, and suggested to him that the mounted policemen should have, while serving in Africa, their full pay, to be given their legal representatives, if they so desired, or kept for them until they returned. And in the meanwhile let the Imperial authorities pay them what they please. The hon. minister whom I found very courteous with regard to this matter, telegraphed back to say that the suggestion was being carefully considered, and I got the impression that he had decided that in the case of the mounted police, this would be done. I would like to know what the position is.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA. With regard to the mounted police, the position adopted is precisely the same as that taken with reference to the militia, except that the mounted police rate is the one that governs. That is to say, you make up to the mounted policemen the difference between the British cavalry pay, and the mounted police pay, just as in the case of the infantry, we make up the difference between the Imperial infantry pay, and the Canadian infantry pay.

Mr. DAVIN. In the case of a mounted policeman, whose pay out here is 75 cents a day, if the Imperial government pays him 40 cents, then you make up the difference, and pay him 35 cents?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA. Exactly.

Mr. DAVIN. I think that is unsatisfactory, from whatever point of view you look at it. It is unsatisfactory from the Imperial point of view. I think we ought to say: We will foot the whole bill for our fellows over there. Look at the way the wholesale men in England are behaving. They are allowing the pay to continue to those of their men who are in the reserve. There are many wholesale houses who allow their men full pay while they are serving in South Africa. Surely Canada ought to be able to do what a private firm can do. The most respectable position for Canada to occupy would be to let the Imperial authorities do what they like, we would give the men their full pay. These are not hired men, but men who volunteered to go. I know of one man, worth certainly $150,000, who is going out as a corporal. I know another, a perfect model of what a man should be physically, and a wealthy man, going out as a constable. They are not Tommy Atkins, but men of a superior kind, and we should not deal with them in this manner, but in a generous way, worthy of Canada. With regard to the mounted police, what should be done, and what I thought the minister agreed to do, would be to allow them their full pay apart altogether from what they get from the Imperial authorities. I felt so convinced that the hon. minister would do this, that I had a cheer given for him at Calgary, at the sending off we gave the Pincher Creek contingent. It was one of the finest patriotic gatherings which could be seen anywhere, and of that contingent, every man was fit for a statue. I told them that the Minister of Militia had agreed to continue the full pay of the policemen, while in South Africa, to their families in this country, or to be kept for them until they came back, and the hon. minister was loudly cheered.

Mr. DAVIN.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). These men have enlisted to serve in the British army, and have deliberately chosen to serve it on Imperial pay, not asking or expecting to be better treated than the Tommy Atkins, to whom they do not pretend to be superior. And I do not believe that they care so much for the pay as these hon. gentlemen pretend. I do not believe that a man worth $150,000, cares very much whether he gets 10 cents a day, more or less. These men are going out there for duty's sake, and as I have explained to the House, the policy adopted in their regard, is that adopted with respect to all the British colonies. All the men who volunteer their services are just British soldiers, serving with the rights and responsibilities of British soldiers, and we know that they have discharged them well. But we thought, after consideration, that a man in the mounted police, for instance, who gave up his position and volunteered to serve at Imperial pay should at least not lose anything, and that when he came back here, after having served through the war, he should be placed in the same position, and lose nothing at all, but get the same amount of money he would have received had he remained in Canada. Therefore, we have provided that the difference between the Imperial pay and the Canadian pay which he would receive here shall be provided for his relatives. As it has been explained, it is not intended to pay them that money, to give it to them from day to day or month to month, for everybody will realize that it would not be conducive to discipline if one man received one rate of pay and another man received another. But this money will be deposited and will be given to them on their return or given to their families. Now, the contention of my hon. friend from Bruce (Mr. McNeill), which is repeated by hon. gentlemen on the other side, is that these men should receive pay and a half, the whole of the Canadian pay and the Imperial pay. This is a novel proposition, and one which, I think, would not commend itself to the judgment of the House. I believe that if the volunteers themselves were consulted upon this subject, they would be quite satisfied with what we have done for them. Take the mounted police. These men have been faithful servants of the country, and have done valuable duty and done it for no very large rate of pay, but pay with which they have been content. We propose that, by the fact that they have gone to serve their country, they should not suffer any loss, but should receive as much as they would have received if they had remained in the country.

Mr. DAVIN. I think it is a very small affair—

The PRIME MINISTER. I think so.

Mr. DAVIN. I think it is a small way of looking at it. And I think that if the Prime Minister would consider it a little further—because I am sure he looks at it sympathetically—he would take the view that these men should have their full pay. Take the ordinary policeman, who receives 75 cents a day, and the non-commissioned officer who receives a certain amount. These men receive that money when they are in the North-west Territories and in their usual line of work. They volunteered to go to South Africa, give their time, to give their valour, to give their lives, if necessary, for the empire. I say that we should not go into this careful balancing of accounts as to whether they would lose anything or not. We should say: You are going to fight for the empire, and you may be away for three months, you may be away for six months. You give your services to the empire—very well, let the empire treat you how it pleases; so far as we are concerned, your place is kept and your pay goes on. That is what the wholesale men do.

Mr. McNEILL. I quite agree with what my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) has said; and I would ask the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to be kind enough not to give us a final answer to-night, but to wait and see if he cannot take a more favourable view of the situation. I think there is a great deal in the example that has been cited of the wholesale dealers in England. I think that if a private firm thinks it right to pay its employees their full amount of wages while they are absent serving in the field and still allow them to have the pay the Imperial authorities give, Canada, as a Dominion, might at least do as much. I think there is a great deal of force in this aspect of the question—that the Imperial soldier of the line, in a sense, goes out as a hired soldier. That is an unfortunate expression to make use of, and I would rather make use of some other term if it had come to my mind. I mean that he serves in this war as a professional. But the Canadian goes out purely as a volunteer. It is quite true, as has been said, that some men who have gone out are wealthy, and it does not matter to them what the rate of pay may be. But there are men who have gone out there to whom and to whose families it does matter very considerably. The mere fact that they volunteered and did not ask what the pay was to be is no reason why we should not give what is suggested, but rather a reason why we should give it to show that we are prepared to appreciate the voluntary sacrifice they have made. I would beg my right hon. friend to take this matter, at all events, into his consideration. I hope it will not be made in any way a party issue; I hope that both sides can agree to give our Canadian militiaman who has gone to South Africa the same pay when he comes back that he would have had if he had not left, and still allow him the pay he gets from the Imperial authorities. Do not let us save anything in this matter. If the volunteer had been serving in Canada he would have got 50 cents. For goodness sake, let us give him that and not save anything by reason of the fact that he has been risking his life fighting for the empire.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. They are getting it.

Mr. McNEILL. Yes, they are getting that amount, but we are saving half. From my point of view—of course I do not wish to say anything offensive to any member of the government—it seems a small thing to try to save half the pay that we would otherwise give to our militiamen simply because they are going out to fight for us in South Africa. Had it not been for the rule laid down by the Imperial authorities in reference to colonial forces, I presume we would be only too glad to give the 50 cents to our colonial volunteers. I understand that some of the Australian colonies are paying their men. I presume in this way—my right hon. friend shakes his head, but I will give the authority on which I make the statement. I read a letter from a Natal volunteer in which he spoke of the pay the men of his force were receiving as being very much larger than that received by the regulars. I presume that that pay is given in the way in which it was suggested we should pay our volunteers, not directly, but they receive the Imperial pay and they receive the other pay besides—that is, they receive the Imperial pay in the field and the other pay goes as the 25 cents is supposed to go to our volunteers. In addition to that, an extract from a letter from one of our Canadian boys was read to me in which he said that two of the Australian colonies are allowing their volunteers as much as five shillings a day, and one is allowing as much as seven shillings and sixpence a day. That is the authority I have for that statement. I presume that that is pay which will be made up to the volunteer in the same way as this government proposes to pay the 25 cents.

Mr. OLIVER. This discussion is entirely aside from the point I raised, which was not as to the pay of the men, but as to the allowance to the wives and the children. I wish to say that it is not, to my mind, so important whether the men are paid high wages or low wages. The important matter is that we have these families with us, and they must be supported by somebody; and if this country does not support them, unless they have private means, they will have to be supported by charity. Now, I, for one, do not want to see the wives or dependents of our soldiers who are fighting our battles in South Africa dependent on charity for support, no matter what high-sounding name it goes by. A fine patriotic fund is being raised, and it is highly creditable to those who have subscribed to it. But, for my part, I do not want to see this country depend for the support of the wives and children of its soldiers upon a patriotic fund. This is a national matter, and not a matter of charity. I think the allowance to the dependents of our soldiers should be adequate according to our scale of living. I notice that the wife of a sergeant is allowed 50 cents a day, while the wife of a private is allowed 25 cents a day. Under the circumstances under which these men volunteered, it is quite as likely that the dependent of the private requires 50 cents a day as much as the dependent of the sergeant. The sergeant's circumstances are not at all parallel to those of the same officer in the British army where the foundation of these allowances is laid. I say that whatever the rule of the British army may be, or whatever the condition upon which these men engaged—for my part I think the government did wrong to engage a married man in any rank below that of an officer—but having engaged him, this country then becomes responsible for the support of his family while he is away, and the credit of this country is involved in seeing that his family is supported at least decently. At 25 cents a day, or $1.75 a week, a woman is expected to support herself and five children on $3.50 a week. Now, if the members of this House who have been talking Imperial patriotism for the last two weeks think that is a manifestation of Imperial patriotism and an adequate manifestation of gratitude to the soldiers in South Africa, I for one do not.

Mr. BEATTIE. I do not wish to discuss this question from a party standpoint. Of course our noble volunteers who have gone to the front in South Africa have gone there of their own free will; but, Mr. Chairman, are we not to take into consideration the noble manner in which they fought, the honour and the glory they have brought to the flag of Canada? I think that their conduct deserves some consideration, and I do not think that there is a member in this House or a man in Canada who would not be perfectly willing to pay the soldier the full pay he would receive in Canada as well as the pay he receives from Great Britain. I quite agree with the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver). I think the wives should be looked after, as he advocates, and I do not think any distinction should be shown between the wife of the sergeant and the wife of the private. I would be sorry to see these women and children left to the charity of their friends in the village or town where they live. I trust the government will reconsider their motion, and pay the volunteers independently of any pay they receive from England. I am quite sure this House will unanimously vote for such a proposition.

Mr. OLIVER.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) made a strong point. There may be some reasons which do not appeal to our minds as to why the separation allowance should be different to the wives of privates, and of corporals, and of sergeants in Great Britain; but I am sincere in saying that I do not see any reason under God's heaven why there should be any difference made with reference to the wives of the men that have gone forth from Canada. Some few have been privileged to become officers, not because they are any better from a social or any other point of view than the men who work in the ranks, many of whom were quite capable of being officers, and would have been officers if more officers had been required. The Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Borden) will bear me out in saying that there are serving to-day as privates, men who are quite as well capable of being officers as any officers that have gone in those contingents, and they are not officers simply because no more officers were needed; but so great was their patriotism, and their desire to serve their country, that they did not stop at the idea as to whether they were to be officers or not, and so they went in the ranks. I think that is a matter which will approve itself to us all. It takes just as much to keep the wife of a private as it does to keep the wife of a corporal or a sergeant. Some of the wives of privates are women with small and helpless children to take care of. It costs them just as much if they were corporals' wives, and in nine cases out of ten they move in just as good a circle of society as do the wives of corporals, or sergeants, or other officers. I speak of this with a little knowledge because I happen to be on the relief committee of the Patriotic Fund. I do not want my hon. friend from Alberta to inculcate the opinion that any wife who is taking the allowance which is made to her out of the Patriotic Fund, which is contributed by the public spirited citizens of Canada, is any more the recipient of charity than if it were voted by this parliament. It is not considered that way; and I am sure my hon. friend would not like the opinion to go abroad that they are taking a charity when they are taking from the fund. It is the country at large making this appropriation voluntarily, not by legal act, and putting it into a fund under the management of a committee. Wherever a case is made out, the wives and children have just as much right to that as they have to the appropriation which is made by this House. But when we come to read over these cases, as we read them over every day, of a woman left in this country and her husband away in South Africa, with anywhere from two to sometimes six or eight children, and without a single one of them earning anything, and all of whom had been dependent on her husband's earnings, her case appeals very strongly ; and the argument of my hon. friend ought to be considered as to whether these living allowances should not be made equal in the first place, and whether they should not be made on a more generous scale. I think that is a matter which may well be considered by the government and for the reasons that I have named. I do not wish to argue the question, but I think there is a good deal of force in these considerations. I would like to see the government rearrange these allowances. I think the minister has simply followed the Imperial scale. Well, we may throw ourselves away from precedent in that respect and do in this case what we think would be fair, and equal, and right. I certainly think if we were making a scale for ourselves we would make it even for every woman, no matter whether she is the wife of a private, or the wife of a sergeant, or the wife of a corporal ; and then let us make it just as much as we can. After all, I am not going to press so strongly with reference to the soldier's pay. No amount of pay that you can give those men is sufficient for their services. They are risking their lives, pouring out their blood, and we are here calmly and quietly, and peaceably, at our homes. But this is a thing which I think might appeal to all of us, and the country will not begrudge it. If you make these few women who are left here whilst their husbands are at war in Africa, if you put them all on a level and make the basis of the separation allowance a good basis, it will only amount to a mere bagatelle. I would strongly urge upon the minister the propriety of revising this scale of allowances. As I said before, I would rather that the whole sum be paid to the soldiers, but that will be as a majority of this House thinks best to do. But I think we will certainly do no more than justice if we make this allowance equal and make the scale higher. It is pretty hard lines. There are living in Ottawa to-day, and in Toronto to-day, women whose bread winner has been taken from them, and they do not know the moment when a bullet will seek his life. They are left here with little children, in rented homes, and it is utterly impossible for them to get along with anything like this living allowance. Even though we doubled it, it would be but a small amount, but it would be somewhat of a recognition, at least, from the government : and when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) foots it all up, he will find that so far as that allowance goes it amounts to only a few thousand dollars in the end.

Mr. TISDALE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to detain the House just for one moment upon the point which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), has just raised and upon the point raised by the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver). I think all of us, who know anything of military regulations, must agree that in so far as allowances to officers, non-commissioned officers and men are concerned, it would hardly do to venture to change the arrangements. The differences in rank and pay that would follow these changes would be rather extraordinary, and, I think, without precedent. Therefore, so far as varying the pay or allowances of officers, non-commissioned officers and men is concerned, I think the government would be quite right in maintaining that which has been the rule in the past, and under all circumstances, in my opinion it is desirable, in order to preserve the efficiency, rank, and military character of any force, that they should be maintained. But, the other question that the hon. member for Alberta raised is a different one. It is one that, I may say, in one sense, while not without precedent, there is no military regulation controlling it, and, therefore, I urge upon the government to make a distinction so that the wives and children of those who are left, without breadwinners for the time being, should receive such consideration, under such circumstances, as the House thinks it wise and fair. I am not going to detain the House by repeating the arguments that have been so well put by the hon. member for Alberta, and by the hon. member for York, N.B., in regard to that. I think they have said all that is pertinent to the question, all that, I am sure, and more than I could have said if I had spoken before they did. I simply rise to express my opinion that the government would do well to try and consider that case, because, as has been so well said, the main and guiding principle, in my mind, is that all these helpless ones are in the same category ; they are all in need of assistance equally, and we are not interfering with any military regulations, which are imperative or desirable. But I wish to say, in fairness to those on the other side of the House, who have to take the responsibility, that we must proceed upon principles in dealing with military questions, because, if we vary them to-day, other circumstances may arise under which we might have to vary them to-morrow, because we do not know under what other circumstances military necessities or requirements might arise. I think the government would do well to take this view of the matter, and I, for one, whatever other hon. gentleman may think of it, will be prepared to support the maintenance of those principles which have so long obtained in the British army, and in the military service of Great Britain, so far as officers, non-commissioned officers and men are concerned. If you commence to make distinctions, because of the social position of the men in the ranks, or the non-commissioned officers or the officers, you begin to shake those principles upon which the splendid record of the British army and the service, whether militia, or regular, has been established. But, for these poor women that are in this shape, whose breadwinners are gone, for one, I strongly desire and wish to impress upon the government the necessity of considering their case; otherwise I would not have trespassed on the time of the House, because nearly everything that is to be said on this question, has been said, and, in most cases, said better than I could say it. I would urge the government to consider that feature, however, because their case stands upon the individual circumstances surrounding it; whereas as I have endeavoured to impress upon the committee, when military matters are dealt with, they must be dealt with upon well established principles. I would therefore recommend that the government give their careful consideration to this subject. I may say that I am heartily in accord with the resolution as it is before the House, and intend to support it, if better cannot be done.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Chairman, I quite agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Tisdale), that, in a case like this, it is desirable to proceed upon principles, but, we do not violate any principle, which is at the basis of military efficiency by taking the cause suggested, even in the special case, by the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver), or the general suggestion that comes from my hon. friend from Bruce (Mr. McNeill). What is the principle we are going on at present? It is that, now, or at any future time, that we may give military aid to the empire, we will pay the difference between the pay that will be given to the militiaman, or a mounted policeman from Canada, and the Imperial pay. But, to use the language of the hon. member for North Bruce, in the case of those men who are fighting our battles, fighting the empire's battles, and adding undying glory to Canada, for the time being, we will save so much. I do not think that is a very noble principle, or a principle that we shall be able to act on ultimately. If there should come the time when we would take into account that we ought to do our share, then, what I think would be best would be to insist upon paying, not merely the difference between Imperial and Canadian pay, but that we should insist upon paying the whole shot. In reference to the suggestion of my hon. friend from Alberta, and his argument and suggestion have my entire endorsement, I want to deal with the social criticism that it has received. My right hon. friend, the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), misunderstood me; he misunderstood the force, or whatever force, I intended it to have, and the argument that was beneath the statement, that a friend of mine who was going out as a corporal, is worth $150,000. What does that mean? In the mounted police we have had this interesting, curious, unique and desirable condition of things, that we have had a private socially on an equality with a commissioned officer, and at the same time, there has been no marring of efficiency. I have been at a ball at Government House, where a private in the police has danced with the wife of the superintendent. The next day, he was just as obedient on parade and just as much of a private in the police force, as if that practical assertion of social equality had not taken place. At balls given at the barracks, you would see what would astonish an Englishman, the wife and daughter of the commander, dancing with constables. The same thing has occurred at Calgary, and for the reason that the corps has been in great part a corps of gentlemen, and social distinctions have never been insisted upon by any officer. I see that my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) does not understand that.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). No; I was not paying attention to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin), for the moment.

Mr. DAVIN. I wish the hon. gentleman would pay attention. It may mar the noble ideas that belong to knighthood. But, it has been the case in the North-west Territories, that there has been this practical assertion of social equality. Mr. Tryon, a member of the elevator firm of Bready, Love and Tryon, a gentleman worth $150,000, came and joined the second contingent and went out as a corporal. The point of mentioning that is, that the kind of argument that might be based upon social inequality does not apply at all to the men who have gone from the west, nor do I think it applies to the men who have gone from Canada in any sense. I know that sitting here in this House at the present minute is a man whose son, as he could not go as an officer, at once resigned his commission in the militia and went out as a private. Suppose he had been a married man you could not assert any social inequality between his wife and the wife of an officer. I hold that in regard to the mounted police especially (indeed, in regard to all who have gone out), that the wording of this resolution respecting the families of the men is open to the criticism that has come from my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver), and I would urge the ministry to reconsider the position, and see if they cannot meet the views that have been expressed from both sides of the House.

Mr. GUILLET. Do these officers of the permanent force who are on the contingent receive full pay during their absence, in addition to the Imperial pay?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. No.

Mr. GUILLET. What are they receiving?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. They are not receiving any pay, but the wives and families of the permanent force are receiving half-pay.

Mr. TISDALE. I do not wish that my remarks should be misunderstood from what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) has said. So far as I am concerned, I would support the government in voting a larger consideration for the forces engaged in South Africa, but at the same time some general principle must be applied. I believe I know something of the volunteer force of Canada. Thirty-four years ago I commanded a company for four months on active service—I happened to be made captain from the choice of my comrades—and in the ranks there was no man but who was the equal of the officers. Except on parade there was no distinction drawn, and in the town where we were stationed, the same social privileges were extended to the men as to the officers. Of course, it is requisite to keep up the military esprit de corps, that the officers should be distinguished from the privates, and no men are more anxious for that than the men who have thrown up their commissions and gone to serve in the ranks. We must remember that it is not the pay by any means that takes our Canadian soldiers to South Africa. While I am desirous of being liberal, we should at the same time be very careful not to let the impression get abroad that these noble, brave and enthusiastic men who have gone to fight for their Queen, are doing so only for pay or remuneration of any kind. Thirty-four years ago we never dreamt that the men from all provinces of this Dominion would volunteer for service to defend the empire thousands of miles from their Canadian homes. I am sure that the volunteers would rather have no pay at all than that any one should think they were fighting for money. If they could only get bread and cheese or enough of any food to sustain them that is all they want, if the necessities of the empire called them to the battlefield and circumstances were such they could not get more. That is the feeling that is abroad in this land and the party or the government that does not recognize it will have to pay the cost. I am sure the government do not wish that those left behind shall be obliged to get along on voluntary contributions. I agree with the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) and I would not subscribe a cent to a patriotic fund if it were looked upon as a charity. It is no charity at all. It is simply the duty of Canadians to make a small sacrifice in lieu of the great sacrifices which our brave volunteers have made in going to the front. I am quite sure that it is the desire of the government to be generous with those whom the members of the contingent left behind, but at the same time we cannot be expected to depart from long-established military rule and precedent.

Mr. BOURASSA. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, I think it behooves us to give due consideration to what our present action may lead us to. It is all very well to allow ourselves to be led away by feeling; but we must beware of not being carried away too far.

An hon. MEMBER. (Translation.) Speak English.

Mr. BOURASSA. I am using the language which I have a right to make use of here. I have often witnessed the destitution and sufferings experienced by families of workingmen, when the head of the family had died, without leaving any insurance, and when the family could not depend upon public charity or upon government assistance. These families are quite as numerous as those referred to by the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster). Take the hardy pioneer who plunges into the primeval forest and enlarges the national domain; he often dies in poverty, after fifteen or twenty years of unceasing toil, leaving behind him a family in want and liable to experience sufferings as cruel as those which the families of our soldiers who have volunteered to go out to Africa, are exposed to that consideration alone is a sufficient check to prevent me from being led away by that feeling by which several of my hon. colleagues are carried away. In the course of my remarks on the Transvaal war, I stated that I would propose, at this stage of our proceedings, to strike out the clause which provides for the payment of the difference between the rates paid to the British soldiers and the rates paid to the Canadian soldiers, while serving here. I do not want to be considered picayune. I have previously, stated the grounds on which I felt justifiable in bringing up this motion. For my part, the question of money in no wise affects my opinion. It has been asserted here that my motion was directed against the families of the soldiers. This is not the case. In proof of this, I may say that I am ready to let pass subsection (C) of clause 3 of the present resolutions fixing the separation allowances to be paid to the widows and children of non-commissioned officers and men. Besides, three-fourths of those soldiers are not married men. They have volunteered to go out to South Africa. As stated by the Prime Minister, the other day, and again this evening, these men have deliberately and of their own free will enlisted to serve in the British army.

Let the Canadian militiaman receive Canadian pay when he is serving in this country, but when he volunteers to take part in the wars of Great Britain, he should be put on a footing of equality with the British soldier.

We have heard, to-night, some hon. gentlemen say that the government should not act so meanly to those men; that they cannot afford to be small in dealing with such a question. I may perhaps be considered as picayune, but, in that case, the British government and the governments of the British colonies are niggardly, since their soldiers only get the pay of a British soldier while serving in the field.

I move that subsection (b) of clause 3 be struck out, in order that it may be well understood that the Canadian soldier who volunteers to serve in the British army, becomes a British soldier and is on the same footing as the latter, being entitled to get no more than the Imperial pay. The same applies to officers.

The Canadian soldier, just as the African, the Hindoo, the Australian, serving in the British army, cannot expect to get more than Imperial pay, because, as the right hon. Prime Minister remarked, he becomes a full British soldier with the full quality of a Tommy Atkins. He suffers no wrong when he is placed on a footing of equality with the British soldier.

There are now about 200,000 soldiers in South Africa, and out of that number, there are about 2,000 Canadians. Why should those Canadians get a better treatment than is accorded the 198,000 soldiers from Great Britain and the colonies?

For my part, this is not a question of money, this is not a question of saving a miserable, paltry sum, and whether you cut down the amount by $500,000 or by $50, it is all the same to me. With me it is a question of principle.

Moreover, as I said upon a previous occasion, I am opposed to militarism, I am opposed to giving too much inducement to our young men to enlist in the army.

One of the reasons given by the government for not calling parliament, was that they were not sending out to South Africa a Canadian regiment, receiving the rate of pay of the Canadian militiaman, but that it was simply a matter of transporting on board our ships soldiers who had volunteered to serve in Africa. The government then declared that there was no necessity for calling parliament in special session, in order to amend the provisions of the Militia Act, as all the government had to do was to transport on board our ships soldiers who had volunteered to serve in the British army. The government then stated that there was no reason for calling parliament in special session, in order to amend the Militia Act, as they were only allowing volunteers to enlist in the British army.

So, my motion aims at assisting the government in carrying out their engagement with the volunteers and making good the statements they have made.

Therefore, I move, seconded by Mr. Monnet:

That subsection (d) of clause 3 be struck out.

Mr. McNEILL. I would like to say just a word, if I may be allowed, of personal explanation. I may say that I am not sorry that my hon. friend beside me has not taken the same view that has been held by several of the speakers on this side of the House, because it goes to show that this is by no means a party question. We are not discussing the matter from a party point of view at all. But I should certainly repudiate, with all the energy I possess, any imputation that I, or any one else who has spoken on this question, imagined that any miserable, paltry sum that we could vote in this House, would compensate the men who have raised the glory of Canada to such a pitch that it is ringing throughout the whole civilized world to-day. I had no such thought. The arguments of my right hon. friend and of my hon. friend beside me, if pressed to their legitimate conclusion, would mean that we should not give anything at all, but simply leave our volunteers to receive the Imperial pay. 'It is not a matter of pay nor a matter of compensation; we cannot compensate these men; they are not considering the compensation they are to receive at all; that is the argument of my hon. friend.' We understand that they are not considering the question of compensation. We do not insult these men by saying that they went out to Africa with any such idea. But we say that this country owes something to itself as well as to the men, and we say that the country should not save a miserable 25 cents by withholding it from the men who are serving it in Africa—25 cents which they would be paid if serving in this country.

Mr. McCARTHY. Are we to recognize this 25 cents a day as a matter of bounty to the brave men who have gone out to fight the battles of the empire? I do not think it should be looked at in that way. If the country chooses to reward the men who, as the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) has said, have raised the glory of Canada throughout the empire to the highest pitch, we may see fit at a later period to do for them what was done for the brave soldiers who went to the defence of Canada in the North-west in 1885. A similar bounty might be given to them after their return. This is not an occasion, I think, when we should discuss the social position of the corporals, sergeants, captains or privates. They are not paid according to their social standing. They should be paid, I submit, according to the military standard applicable to the military positions they occupy. I would go as far as any man in this House to reward the brave Canadians who have gone to fight the battles of the empire on this occasion; but when we are dealing with soldiers, we must deal with them as such. Is it right for us to say that we should pay these men more than we paid the brave men who defended our own country in 1885? We must discuss this question from a business point of view; and whatever we may be prepared to do to show our appreciation of these men hereafter, we should not now deal with them in any other respect than as soldiers of Canada fighting for the empire, and I do not think they would desire to be dealt with in any other way. The discipline of the army and of our volunteer corps must be maintained; and if discipline is to be maintained, it can only be done through the officers and non-commissioned officers who command these men. To put them all on the same basis would not, I submit, be placing the officers with reference to their men in a fair position. As I was not in the House at the beginning of this discussion, I would ask the Minister of Militia how many married men have gone forth on this occasion with families left behind?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Thirteen sergeants, nine corporals and thirty-seven privates in the first contingent. We have not got the figures for the second or the third contingent.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is a comparatively small number. If I remember the regulation, it was that no married men should be accepted on the first contingent, and, therefore, those who went, went contrary to the regulations. If they have left behind people who have to be supported, these people must, of course, receive assistance, because no family of a soldier should be left in want. But are we to deal with the whole contingent upon the same basis, in view of the fact that only a small number have left behind families who require assistance and support? It seems to me, as I said before, that we should look at the matter to a certain extent from a business point of view, not forgetting at the same time to look at it from a national point of view. I do not want to be considered as picayune or as endeavouring to deprive any man or any man's family of proper support; but we have a patriotic fund, and a Soldiers' Wives League, who, I understand, are to the fullest extent looking after all those who have been left behind; this resolution provides that sufficient, at all events, shall be paid to them; and we have been assured by the Premier on more than one occasion that their families shall be looked after. That being so, should we by our action here increase the pay of a soldier beyond what he has hitherto been paid—beyond what was paid to our brave defenders in 1885? We are paying them the regulation pay of the ordinary Canadian soldier. If that is too little, the general Militia Act should be amended, and the pay increased. If it is not too little, it should remain at that figure, which has hitherto been judged to be fair, because we know not the time when our whole militia force might be called out to defend our own country, and then we should be bound by our present action, or else we would be accused of refusing to pay the defenders of our own country as much as we were prepared to pay to those who had gone abroad to fight the battles of the empire.

Mr. GUILLET. If we consider this question from a business standpoint, we ought not to forget that in Africa our soldiers find themselves subjected to enormous expenses in providing themselves with the comforts and conveniences which are absolutely necessary to them, but which Tommy Atkins as an old campaigner has been trained to do without. Such comforts as milk, sugar and many other things can only be got at enormous prices, sometimes five or six or even nine or ten times as much as they would have to pay this country, if called on to do service for Canada. In this way their pay is frittered away, and I know that in many cases they have to spend their own money. Therefore, looking at the question in a business light, I think we should supplement the Imperial pay they are receiving by the whole Canadian pay.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I agree with my hon. friends who hold that the men who left Canada to fight the battles of England in South Africa should be paid just as much as it is possible under the law to pay them; but I do not believe that the men themselves would altogether agree with the discussion that is taking place to-night. The question is not whether we should pay the whole amount that they are entitled to, or whether we should allow England to pay them. The great point for the men is that they went to fight for the principle of liberty and to back England in a war which they considered to be absolutely right and just; and it is not a question at all of money. It seems to me that this discussion will not quite serve the patriotic views of the Canadian people who allowed their sons to go abroad to help to fight the battles of England. When the men come back, I believe we can devise a means of compensation which everybody will agree to. I think it would possibly be better that we should not discuss at this moment whether we are going to pay the whole amount of their pay or not. In any case I feel that Canada is perfectly disposed to help the families of the soldiers who are fighting the battles of the empire in South Africa, but as to whether we should now lay down the rule that our men should be paid so much over and above the Imperial allowance, I do not think that is a subject that ought to be now discussed.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not think I can find it very easy to agree with the proposition laid down by my hon. friend who has just spoken (Sir Adolphe Caron). He seems to think, and the hon. and learned gentleman on the other side (Mr. McCarthy), took the same view, that it would be more dignified if we were to wait until these men came back before doing something for them. This is a patronising sort of tone that I do not think we ought to countenance. I know many of the men who have gone to South Africa, they are my personal friends, and I do not think that any of them would consider that we were doing anything not consistent with the dignity of this House in making a plea for them and their families to be treated as our conception of what justice demands they should. The case cannot be put stronger than it was by my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver), namely, that we should take care that not one of the families of the men gone to Africa should become dependent upon charity or tortured by anxiety. The hon. and learned member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) made what might be called a martinet argument, and I think myself that the argument used by my hon. friend, who was formerly Minister of Militia (Sir Adolphe Caron), might be likewise so described. They are tortured by red tape, they are dominated by militarism and etiquette. Let us be genteel or die; let us have military etiquette or the country will go to the bow-wows. I want this parliament and government to escape a little from that idea. I know very well that notions of rank and etiquette and society are very strong just now on the government benches, but I should like the Prime Minister not to forget the day when he declared that he was a democrat to the hilt, and to let something of the breezy atmosphere of these democratic days sweep the government benches and especially his hon. colleague to his right (Sir Louis Davies). I know that his hon. colleague is greatly overshadowed by the sense of rank, and that dignity has marked him for her own. But, nevertheless, rank and dignity and etiquette and red tape are not everything. Justice is something, honour is something, and the manhood of these men who have represented us in a way that is almost without parallel in the annals of warfare—the courage of these young soldiers who showed such steadiness under fire and whose eagerness to charge had to be repressed by their commanding officer—these demand practical recognition at our hands, and I do not want to see these finicking notions, which have fallen from the ex-Minister of Militia and my hon. and learned friend, have any weight with this government or parliament in preventing our doing what is right. The question we should ask ourselves is: What does justice demand? Let the government deal with these men, not by holding out promises of future concessions, not by vague promises of something that our high mightiness will do for them when they come back, but by declaring at once what we intend doing. Let us treat them as the wholesale men are dealing with their employees. They said: You are doing a gallant thing, leaving comparative ease to face privations and discomforts, the dust and heat, and whistling bullets and shrapnel, and perhaps die for our empire, and we are not going to weigh, as in apothecary scales, the amount we will give you, we are not going to value our goods, and say we are doing this on business principles and above all on genteel grounds.

With regard to the amendment of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), I must say that I was sorry to hear him make the speech he did. I did not believe there was anybody so small in parliament as my hon. friend turns out to be.

Mr. BOURASSA. That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend's argument was this, that if men fight for Canada they should be paid Canadian pay, and if they go out to fight for England they should be paid England's pay.

Mr. BOURASSA. Hear hear.

Mr. DAVIN. I consider that that is a view so small that it is not worth my while discussing it. All I can do is to express my regret that an hon. gentleman who certainly makes superficially on one a pleasant, kindly and genial impression should be so small as to propose such a resolution or make such an argument.

Mr. BOURASSA. It makes me just the size of the British ministers who give the same pay to the British soldiers that I want the Canadians to get.

Mr. TISDALE. I do not think my hon. friend realized what I said or intended to say.

Mr. DAVIN. I did not make any reference to you, but to the ex-Minister of Militia at your side.

Mr. TISDALE. But another hon. gentleman did make reference to me. I believe that after all the wise or unwise action of the government, who were seized with the responsibility, is the only legitimate political matter that the people will consider. If either side of this House attempts to discuss this question from any partisan standpoint and in any partisan spirit, that side will suffer when it goes to the polls. I do think I understand the feeling of the people in my province. But I am learning, as I sit in parliament and come in contact more and more with those who speak a different language from my own, and represent other provinces than my own, the larger views that it is necessary we should entertain if we hope to serve our country and please our constituents. Though a prophet is without honour in his own country, I venture to say that when the general election comes, those gentlemen who have attempted to make political capital out of this matter—whether they be on one side or on the other—will find that the people of this country are well enough informed by the newspapers on these large questions to punish those who have been guilty of such an attempt. I am prepared to vote for a larger consideration to our volunteers who have enlisted, but I want to say that I am quite prepared to support the government in the distance they go. Still, I am not ready to condemn them for not going further. There are difficulties in the way, and the government, controlling ways and means, do not see their way to submit a larger vote. I am prepared to support them, if they will look after the families of these men. For, there is no principle involved there, such as has been referred to. While the men can take care of themselves, these helpless ones cannot do so. Therefore, I am strong in my desire that they should be cared for. That is the position I take, and the position I am prepared to stand or fall by in my own constituency, and in the face of the people of this country.

I am, to a certain extent, disappointed in the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bourassa), who followed me, and whose language, it is one of the regrets of my life I have been to busy to acquire. I would like to acquire it for its own sake, for the many associations it brings, and the many pleasant things which those who have it can say in finer ways than we more rough Anglo-Saxons. I regret to see a man, such as he has the makings of in him, voicing the sentiments he does, and voicing them against his own fellow-countrymen—for I am delighted to understand that in the ranks of those who have gone to South Africa there are some of the gallant French Canadians, who I am sure will show themselves the equals of the best when the time of trial comes. Let me tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bourassa) that I have had my trials in fighting the battles of his people, no longer ago than last general election. It is no easy matter to stand up for a class of people and yet feel and know that they will vote against you. I do not know but that it would be more easy, if I was as young as I once was, to face the difficulties faced by those in South Africa than to stand, as some believes to be, right against the feelings of one's own friends upon these questions that we must be right upon if we are to live in this country, as I believe it is intended we should live. So far, we have made a success of it—the two great races and the two great creeds of this world, the two good races and the two good creeds of this world. I tell the hon. gentleman that I have fought his fight. And as he goes among his French Canadian friends, I do not ask him to lead them aright on this question, because I am satisfied of their loyalty, but I ask him not to try to teach them to misunderstand the feelings of the British Canadians in a crisis like this. I think that would be a mistake on the part of the hon. gentleman. His family has won a distinguished place in Canadian history, and I want him to take a larger view than he now does. I believe that his people take that larger view, or I should not have faith in the future of Canada. If they are not led astray, if he will not lead them astray, I believe that they are sound upon these questions, that they are satisfied with the institutions of Britain which they have adopted, and that they know that they can be as free, as great and as proud as if the result of the old-time contest had been the other way. Suppose he were a soldier and had gone out, as I hope he would if the contest were nearer home. How would he like it if while he was in the field, the members of parliament were cavilling and saying he should not receive more than 25 cents a day because he is fighting for England. He would not be fighting for England. This war is not for England. This war, in my opinion, is to settle the future of the British Empire. Events are hastening on, and this is an epoch-making era in the history of the world. That which underlies this great movement, which has affected the British people throughout the world, is the question whether the empire shall be bound closer and closer, or whether its constituent elements shall drift further apart. And, in spite of men of the hon. gentleman's size, and in spite of the greatest men we have, the forces of the world are making for the union of the empire. This war will have a far-reaching effect upon our history. I am one of those who believe that, in spite of everything intervening, this war means the drawing closer together of the component parts of this great empire, of those throughout the world who enjoy the advantage of British institutions. We are moving on faster than most of us dream of towards Imperial federation. I may not live to see it, but I believe that the youngest men in this House will live to see representation of the colonies in the great Imperial parliament, so that, instead of having the parliament of Great Britain and Ireland, we shall have the great council of the British Empire, and those who sit at Westminster will be the representatives of British nations throughout the world. I may be optimistic in this matter; but, so great is the hope of the future that we cannot afford to be small in dealing with any question involving these considerations. I regret that there should be one man in this parliament, I do not care which province he comes from, who would object to paying our soldiers what they would have received fighting for the direct defence of Canada instead of the indirect defence. So, while I support this resolution, I am not prepared to discuss very much the amount of it. I would have been prepared to support a larger amount, but I will support this heartily if the government will make the provision spoken of for the women and children left behind.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I desire to ask some information with regard to subsection (c) of clause 3. I observe that separation allowances are to be paid to the widows and children of non-commissioned officers and men at the rates laid down by the Imperial regulations. I do not understand the Imperial system in this matter, but I understand that this is something in addition to the pay.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would suggest that as we are to pay our officers, non-commissioned officers and men at the rates prevailing in Canada, and these rates are, so far as the men are concerned, about double the rates paid to the privates of the Imperial force, as I understand—

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Something like that.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What I suggest is, if there is that difference to be made under subsection (b), some similar difference should be made under subsection (c), as the cost of living in this country is higher than in England; and we are to pay our non-commissioned officers and men at Canadian rates and not at English rates. But according to this resolution we are to provide for a separation allowance, not at Canadian rates, but at Imperial rates. I venture to suggest to the minister that some consideration should be given to that matter. I believe that families cannot be supported in Canada for the same sum that they can probably be supported in England; and if we are to make an allowance, it seems to me that which is provided for in subsection (d) is the smallest that could be suggested.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The question put by the hon. member is one which had not escaped my consideration, and I had intended to explain it later on. It is a fact that the Imperial rates of the separation allowance have been increased since this war began in South Africa by nearly 50 per cent; and that as a matter of fact, to-day the separation allowance to wives, at any rate, is about fifty per cent higher than it was a year ago, and the separation allowance to children is about 25 per cent to 30 per cent higher than it was before. That fact was considered; and I felt that in view of the additional amount given to the Canadian soldiers, making their pay equal on the whole to the Canadian pay, and adding to it the separation allowance, that this was a fair solution of the whole question.

Mr. WALLACE. What is the separation allowance in England?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I read it once, but the hon. gentleman, perhaps, was not present. The separation allowance to the wife of a private is 25 cents per day, 5 cents for each son, and 5 cents for each daughter; to the wife of a corporal it is 35 cents, 5 and 5; to the wife of a sergeant it is 50 cents, 5 and 5.

Mr. TISDALE.

Mr. OLIVER. Does that include the 50 per cent additional?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. It does. Now, with reference to the criticisms advanced by the hon. member for York (Mr. Wallace), the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), and others, that there should not be social distinctions between men occupying different positions in our militia or among our soldiers serving in South Africa. Well, these are not social positions, they are military positions which have been established for many years, and which are the fundamental principle, you may say, of the military system of Great Britain, which we have deliberately adopted in this country. Sergeants are not chosen because they are sons of dukes or earls, or because their social position is better than the position of their fellows in the ranks; they are chosen by the commanding officers of companies on account of their fitness for the position; so with the corporals. It was considered proper, and I believe it is proper, that positions of that kind should be recognized. The fact that certain men are better fitted for certain positions of responsibility than other men, should be recognized by giving these men a higher rate of pay. I do not see how we are going to get at it in any other way. My hon. friend might go into any other walk of life, he might go into the civil service of this country, he might come into this very House and say that there are men in this House not as competent, not as well suited for the positions they happen to fill, as some men who may be found outside the House occupying inferior positions.

Mr. McNEILL. If the hon. gentleman is addressing these observations to myself, I may remind him that I avoided referring to that matter at all.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I wish to say in a single word that we have adopted the British system, right or wrong. We are paying our men upon that system. When our men went away we had to proceed upon that system, and the system upon which we proceeded was that which we have adopted in this country, acting under the Queen's Regulations. I adopted this system because I thought it was one which had been proved by the experience of time to be a wise one, and particularly, as I have pointed out, because the separation allowance has been the subject of revision within a few weeks by the Imperial War Office. I believe it has been brought up to a reasonable point, and I therefore adopted it.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know how much justice is founded on those distinctions which prevail in other countries and have been imported into this, or whether the foundations of the militia system would entirely crumble if they were not translated exactly. You may make just as much distinction as you like between a private and a corporal or a sergeant; but the private's wife requires just as much food to keep her as the sergeant's wife, or the corporal's wife. I do not think that the whole system will crumble into ruin if the minister will put them on an equality. I said nothing about the propriety of recognizing distinctions in the different grades of the army amongst the militia. You must have privates, and you must have officers, and they must grade up. But when you come to make an allowance for the woman that is left at home, I do not care whether she is a cook's wife, or a duke's wife, or a millionaire's wife, or whether she is the wife of a private, or a corporal, or a sergeant, I believe that she ought to be treated equally with the others, so far as the separation allowance is required.

Mr. MONET. (Translation). It was not my intention to take part in this debate, but after hearing the reflections cast upon my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), I think it my duty to say a few words. That hon. gentleman, instead of addressing himself to the arguments of the hon. member for Labelle, began and even ended his speech by stating—and this is about the whole burden of his speech—that he did not believe there was anybody so small in parliament as his hon. friend (Mr. Bourassa) turned out to be.

Mr. Chairman, I need not say that I do not think it necessary to protect my hon. friend (Mr. Bourassa) from the aspersions of the hon. member for West Assiniboia, as he is perfectly able to take care of himself. But if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) thinks he has a right to look down upon his colleagues in this House, let me tell him that men are not to be judged by their size and their verbosity. I may further tell him that, if there is a difference in the size of the hon. gentleman, the hon. member for West Assiniboia may possibly be a few inches taller than my hon. friend, but that the difference lies more in the feet than in the head. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin). I hope, understands French enough to catch my meaning.

Now, I have a word to say with regard to an article which appeared in Le Journal this morning. In that article I am referred to, with two hon. colleagues of mine, as having gone back on my opinions. I wish to protest against that statement. In that letter, which is clearly from the pen of the correspondent of Le Journal here, it is said :

The debate on the two million dollars resolutions will probably come to an end on Friday. It will pass without a vote.

Messrs. Bourassa, Monet, Desmarais and Tarte, who have sworn by Heaven that they would cross swords with the government on that question, have sheathed their sword, and, as loyal subjects of Her Majesty, have declared that they approved of any past or future policy of the government. 'E finita la comedia.'

For my part, I wish to protest against that assertion. I have in no way changed my mind on the Transvaal war question and I still hold the same views as when I entered the House, this session. I have not a single word to retract from what I said. I am ready, as I have previously stated, to vote against the general resolutions introduced by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). But it goes without saying that, in order to provoke a vote on any question whatsoever, the opposition must be stronger numerically than we prove to be now, if we may judge from what has transpired during this debate. That is the only reason why I have not asked for a vote.

Nor has the hon. member for Labelle gone back on his opinions, ever since he resigned his seat; he still holds the same views, as shown by the amendment he has just moved.

If I support the amendment, it is not that, in my opinion, it is broad enough to cover the whole ground, upon which I stand on this question, but as I was ready to vote against the general resolutions as a whole, I do not hesitate to vote against a portion of them.

Let the hon. member for West Assiniboia think what he likes about the stature of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) and the smallness or meanness of the seconder of the amendment, that cannot alter matters, and we both remain, my hon. friend (Mr. Bourassa) and I, what we are, satisfied that it is our duty to oppose any measure leading to Imperialism.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I think there is now a very strong consensus of opinion in this committee, and the House, in reference to the separation allowance to the dependents of those who have gone to South Africa. We are told that men are not chosen to be officers, because they are duke's sons or cook's sons, but because of their merits. It seems to me that a very reasonable solution of this question, one which would be a fair one, and which would not cost the country more money than I am sure this parliament is perfectly willing to vote, would be to add a proviso to clause (c), that no separation allowance should be less than the rates allowed to the family of a sergeant. In so doing, I feel that the government would very largely meet the opinion of this House. I trust that this matter will receive further consideration by the government before it reaches its final stage, and I hope that they will see their way clear to making this slight increase. Now, in reference to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), all I have to say about it is, that I hope it will be received by the House with silent contempt—and I say it with no disrespect—and that we will treat it as something unworthy to be proposed by a member of this House. I intend to vote against it, and I hope that every hon. member of this committee will do the same. I take this opportunity, as I did not speak on the resolutions, when they were before the House, of saying that I am heartily in accord with the course that the government have pursued, not only in reference to the sending of the contingents, but the payment of the men, and I trust that very few, if any, I hope none, beyond the mover and seconder, will vote for the amendment.

Mr. McCLEARY. I was not able to follow the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), who has proposed an amendment to the resolutions before you. However, I am satisfied that this hon. gentleman must have been influenced by one of two motives; either he has been influenced by a motive of a pecuniary character, or there must have been a want of sympathy with the resolution in its entirety. I cannot conceive any other position that the hon. gentleman could take. If his motive is a pecuniary and mercenary one, surely he must have a very poor conception of the great resources of this country. If he thinks that this country cannot afford to pay its soldiers, then I am sorry for the constituents that send that hon. gentleman here. If, on the other hand, he lacks that sympathy and patriotism, that, I believe, inspire every true Canadian, then, I am sorry he was introduced to this House by a member of the government. There is no disposition, so far as I am concerned, to quarrel with the government in regard to their proposal, because, if we look at it as a matter of business, as the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) said, we should, there is not so much to quarrel about. By the paper that the hon. Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden), has sent round, it will be seen that the Canadian pay per man is 40 cents per day. Imperial pay is 24 cents a day. The difference would be 16 cents. The government, I understand, propose to add that 16 cents, and make the pay up to 56 cents a day. If, instead of making it 56 cents a day, they added the 40 cents and the 24 cents together and made it 64 cents a day, there would only be a difference of 8 cents a day, so far as the first contingent is concerned. I know it would be more, as far as the mounted police are concerned. But there would only be 8 cents difference per man, and the whole amount, for the first contingent, it would not be more than $20,000. I think this is a small thing for the government to split hairs about. While they have acted generously, there is a larger and higher position that they could take because, having their hands on the pulse of the people, they would feel that they were fully justified in taking a higher and nobler position in this regard. I do not think that the government need the special pleading of the hon. member for North Simcoe to strengthen them in their attitude on this question. He certainly will not add to his popularity in the loyal and patriotic constituency from which he comes, and I am sorry that he has seen fit not to give his influence to those who want to see our volunteers, who have gone out to South Africa dealt with handsomely and well. The question raised by the hon. member for Alberta, is an important one. I am sure there ought not to be any difference in this House in regards to the attitude the government should take in supporting those who are left behind by the brave fellows who have gone out to fight for the interests of the empire. I would be glad if the government would reconsider this matter, and, for the small difference of a few thousand dollars, which it is going to make, come up to the expectations of the people of this country, so that we could give a unanimous vote in this parliament for the extra amount required.

Mr. McNEILL. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to prolong the discussion, but I want to ask the right hon. Prime Minister, if he would adopt the suggestion of my hon. friend who sits beside me. I would not go quite so far as he does. I would not propose that we should allow this matter to stand over until our volunteers come back from South Africa. But, I would suggest that the government let the matter stand over, take it further into consideration and not press these resolutions upon the committee tonight.

Mr. J. E. MARCIL. (Translation). Mr. Chairman, speaking in the name of the important constituency I have the honour of representing here, I think I would be neglecting my duty did I not take the floor to give the House my opinion on the question at issue.

I must say, from the outset, that I shall vote with pleasure for the amendment moved by the hon. member for Labelle. Nay more, I may add that in my opinion, the amendment should have gone further. I do not hesitate to say that the position taken on this question cannot but be detrimental to the country in general, and this, in view of the immigration system which we have adopted. To my mind, this new departure from the old policy cannot but result in checking the influx of immigrants into this country. I think the government should not have taken any part in this South African war. Such is my honest opinion and I think I have a right to express it on the floor of this House.

From what I know of the position taken by the government, at the time of the departure of the contingent for Africa, and also from what I know of the contract passed between the government and those who have volunteered their services, I think the motion of the hon. member for Labelle covers the whole ground.

I think the country should not have paid a cent. However, I think it my duty to support the amendment, seeing that no motion going any further in the same direction has been proposed so far. On the contrary, the number of members in favour of the amendment is so small that I do not think there could be found a single hon. gentleman sharing in my views, except perhaps the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Monet).

Under the circumstances, I need not, I think, expatiate any further on the matter. This question of the South African war has been so thoroughly threshed out on the floor of this House that the electorate, I think, must now be sufficiently enlightened and able to form an opinion on the matter. At any rate, I deemed it my duty to rise from my seat to declare before the country that I approve of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa).

Mr. FOSTER. I would suggest to the minister with reference to section (c) that he would leave out all after the word 'men' in that section. That leaves it entirely open for the government to fix the separation allowance. They may make it the same as the Imperial regulation, or they may increase it if they wish.

The PRIME MINISTER. Carried.

Mr. FOSTER. Then I move that section (c) be amended in that respect.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There is no objection to that.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER. I would not wish a motion such as that moved by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) to come before this House without expressing my strong dissent from it. My view is that these volunteers should receive full Canadian pay in addition to their British pay, which is a diametrically opposite view to that entertained by the hon. member for Labelle. To those who think there is any danger of over-paying our men let me say, that it is just as regular a rule in military life as of civil life that special service requires special pay, and inasmuch as this service in South Africa is special service from every point of view, these men by the right of military law are entitled to special pay. During the North-west rebellion the same class of men as are in the Strathcona Horse and employed in exactly the same work as they are to do in South Africa, received $2.50 a day, and it was not too much. Do not be afraid of overpaying these men; do not be afraid of breaking military traditions by giving them special considerations for the special service they have rendered. It would perhaps be a pity to put the question of military service and the glory of the empire on the basis of a private soldier's pay, or to discuss the question whether a man should get 10 cents a day or 25 cents a day too much. That may be all very nice from our point of view, but how about the point of view of the man who is sacrificing his position, and sacrificing his business prospects for the glory of the empire. Has he to do all and has nobody else to do anything? Are we to do all the hurrahing and he all the fighting? Is he to do all the spending and we to draw all the profit? If there is to be a general glorification, if we the ordinary stay-at-home citizens of Canada are to have our share of the glory of this war; if we are to hoist our flags and hurrah ourselves hoarse over victories, we ought to be willing to do something to indemnify those who are winning the victories. It is not that these men have asked for special pay, but it is that our national credit demands that we should give them special pay, and that we should not ask them to do special work for us unless we are willing to pay them according to the work they are doing. Why, Sir, any man in the Strathcona Horse, if he could get his passage to South Africa and enlist in the local forces there would get $2.50 a day. When we ask these men to make sacrifices for the honour of Canada and the glory of the empire, let us be willing to do our share. If they are willing to do the fighting, let us be willing to do the paying. I make these remarks in order to demonstrate to what extent I dissent from the amendment moved by Mr. Bourassa, and to particularly impress upon the ministers and upon the government that inasmuch as arrangements are being made for dealing with the loss of life, and limbs, and health resulting from this war, consideration shall be given (according to the special circumstances and conditions of our country) to those who have volunteered, and that we shall not be tied down by Imperial regulations. If we do not pay the men their full extra pay, let us take special care that those who require comfort at the hands of the nation shall receive it, and that it shall not be done by us as a charity but as a matter of duty. By taking this precaution, we shall really share in the glory that these men have achieved by the sacrifices that they have made.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Did I understand the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) to say that $2.50 a day was paid these men during the North-west rebellion?

Mr. OLIVER. It was paid to the same class of men as are in the Strathcona Horse, and even to some of these very men. They did special service as scouts and they got special pay for it.

Mr. WALLACE. I am not surprised that the hon. member (Mr. Bourassa) should move such a resolution as this, considering the education and training he has received from the Prime Minister and from the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte). Did not the Prime Minister tell us at Sherbrooke that he had 'permitted' the Canadian volunteers to go to South Africa, thus washing his hands from all responsibility. Think of him giving his gracious permission to these loyal Canadians, who were ready to defend the British flag and the British Empire. Did not the Minister of Public Works say that not a cent would be paid by Canada.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). I never said that, and I never wrote that.

Mr. WALLACE. The newspaper owned by the Minister of Public Works said it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I state that is not true.

Mr. WALLACE. I have the floor just now.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

Mr. WALLACE. The Minister of Public Works says it is not true—

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, I say that.

Mr. WALLACE. I say that the paper belonging to the Minister of Public Works published it, and that it is true.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I again say that it is not true.

Mr. WALLACE. I say it is true, and I repeat it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is not true.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. La Patrie never said that, and the hon. gentleman knows it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

Mr. WALLACE. Take his disloyal utterances back? I have nothing to take back.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have nothing to take back either.

Mr. WALLACE. I am quoting what his disloyal newspaper said, and it appears to tread very much on the toes of the Minister of Public Works.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. La Patrie never said anything of the kind, and the hon. gentleman knows it.

Mr. WALLACE. I say that the position taken by these hon. gentlemen is quite in accordance with the education which they have received from the First Minister and the Minister of Public Works. They would not pay a dollar—that is the amendment—that we are to graciously allow our Canadians to assist in the defence of the empire and of the flag under which we live, and to risk their lives in doing so, and the

Mr. OLIVER.

Canadian people are not to pay them a dollar. That is the motion of the hon. member who has moved the amendment—to strike out the extra pay. I say, Mr. Chairman, that Canada is both able and willing, when she sends her soldiers abroad, to pay every dollar of the cost. Why, Sir, we should be ashamed to have the British government assume any financial responsibility. It is true that they have offered to do so; but because Great Britain has made that proposal is no reason why we should not do our duty to the men we send abroad as representatives of our Canadian people, and I say we are not doing our duty to our country, we are not representing the people of Canada, if we do not pay—I do not care what the pay may be, within reason. I do not care—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. WALLACE. I say that the Canadian parliament ought to pay every dollar of the expense of those men who are sent out. That is, I believe, the sentiment of the Canadian people. There are some, like those I have mentioned, who would not pay a dollar nor send a man, and who have openly proclaimed the fact. But they do not represent Canada. It is true, they are in high places to-day, and I think it is pretty humiliating to think that our Canadian boys have gone out to fight the battles of the empire and risk their lives—loyal men—while disloyal men are at home, ruling and regulating affairs. It looks to me like a position which the people of Canada will not tolerate very long. I repeat, when we ask our volunteers to go out and drill every year, we give them 50 cents a day; and yet when they go thousands of miles away and risk their lives, it is preposterous to say that we are only going to give them half their pay. These men, as the First Minister said, were not thinking of the amount of pay they were to receive. Certainly not. Every one of them was receiving, we will assume, two or three or four or five times as much as was proposed to be given them as soldiers. I saw in Toronto a young man who came from Pittsburg, a Canadian, and he showed me that he had been getting $30 a week on a railroad, and he came back to Canada to volunteer for $3.50 a week. It is true, the men were not considering the pay, but I think Canada is both able and willing to deal generously with our volunteers, of whom every Canadian is so proud to-day. The proposal of the government is to thrust one-half the expenditure upon the British government when we are both able and willing to pay the whole amount ourselves.

Mr. GILLIES. When it was decided that a contingent should be sent by Canada to South Africa, I was one of those who took the ground that Canada should pay every dollar of the expense that was incurred in the transportation, the maintenance and the pay of the contingent, and I came here fully intending to press this view as far as I was able, upon the government; and it was only upon my understanding that the Imperial authorities accepted the offer of Canada to supply this contingent conditional on the men receiving Imperial pay while in the service, that I relaxed my view in favour of the proposition as put before us to-night by the government. For my part, I cannot very well see how we can adopt the suggestion of my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), with whom I very often agree in these matters; for the very moment we adopted such a proposition, we would, in my view, be controverting the idea that was put before us by the Imperial authorities. If we agreed to pay 50 cents a day irrespective of the contribution paid by the Imperial authorities, a controversy would immediately arise as to the difference of pay given to the different colonial forces. Therefore, while we should generously respond to any proposition for paying our forces, I am sorry I cannot agree with the views of my hon. friend in that respect. With regard to the separation allowance, I agree with the views of the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale). The terms of the resolution as submitted by the Minister of Militia are that all separation allowances paid to the wives and children of the married non-commissioned officers and the men should be at the rates laid down by the Imperial regulations, and I do not very well see how he could propose any other scheme. He has followed the regulations of the Imperial authorities in regard to graduation. However, I at once concede that the amount that we are now voting would be entirely inadequate for the support of the wives and children of the men—25 cents per day for a wife and 5 cents for every child under 16 years of age.

I am glad, therefore, to support the amendment proposed by the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), so as to give the government a free hand in increasing this amount. I would, therefore, urge the government to adopt the amount of 50 cents as the minimum allowance for the wife of every non-commissioned officer and man. Such an allowance of 50 cents for a wife and 5 cents per child for four children would only make after all $255.50 per year, less than $5 a week, which would be in all conscience a very small allowance for their support. I rise to press upon the government my desire that they should have a free hand in this direction, and deal as generously as possible in this matter of the separation allowance.

Mr. WALLACE. When speaking a few moments ago, I assumed, from what I understood the minister to have said, that the government were going to have the Canadian volunteers paid at the rate of 50 cents per day—that the British government would pay 24 cents and this government make up the balance. But a statement I have in my hand, and which should have been circulated among members before, shows that the first contingent are to get not 50 cents but 40 cents.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The pay of a permanent corps.

Mr. WALLACE. But the hon. minister said the intention of the government was to supplement the pay which the Canadian volunteers received from the British government, so as to bring it up to the amount paid our volunteers. Now, we find that the Canadian volunteers gets 50 cents a day.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Not the permanent corps.

Mr. WALLACE. The permanent corps gets 40 cents per day. I do not see why the pay of a volunteer should be reduced to the basis of the permanent corps. It makes the case just that much the worse. I had no reason to think that the government were doing otherwise than what the country supposed, namely, giving 50 cents per day, one-half of which would be paid by the British government and the other by this government, but we find that it is 40 cents per day. Eight hundred and eighty-eight privates at 40 cents makes $355.20. The British government pays 24 cents per day and a fraction, amounting to $213.12, making $142.08 to be paid by the people of Canada. That will be very interesting news, indeed. We have heard hon. gentlemen boasting about the progress Canada is making in wealth and affluence in every direction. We have heard of this bounteous booming time, and yet when a great crisis in the affairs of the nation occur, all that Canada can pay is 15½ cents per day to each of her soldiers. That is the proposal made with a great flourish of trumpets. But why should the Canadian volunteer, when putting in his two weeks drill, be paid 50 cents per day and not be paid that amount when undergoing greater risks and doing more arduous duties? Why should he then have his pay reduced to 40 cents per day? Is that due to those baneful influences which we all know have been surrounding and controlling the government, which we know influenced the First Minister in that interview he gave on the 4th October last, when he said the government could not send a man out of the country because it would be against the law, and he had studied the law from top to bottom. Sir, he had not read it at all, because the Militia Act specially provides that in cases of emergency the troops can be sent out of the country. But the right hon. gentleman did not desire to send those troops out, the government had no intention at that period of doing their duty by the Canadian people, and now when forced to adopt the patriotic policy they still fall as far short of their duty as they think they conveniently can. And when they announce that they are going to make up the difference between the Imperial pay and the pay of the Canadian volunteers, we find that they fall short of that announcement by making the pay of the Canadian volunteer only that of the permanent corps. Instead of getting 50 cents per day, the Canadian volunteer is only to get 40 cents per day, and Canada's contribution to his pay is only 15½ cents instead of 25½ cents. Why did not the government announce this before? The Minister of Militia to-night did not announce it to the House. The First Minister did not announce that they were going to reduce the pay of the volunteers from 50 to 40 cents. Their conduct is only on a par with the course taken by them with regard to insuring the lives of the members of the first contingent. It was officially announced through their organ, the Globe, that the government were going to insure the lives of the Canadian contingent. The contingent sailed away with that announcement in their ears, but when they got to South Africa they discovered that the government had not the slightest intention of carrying out their pledge. The baneful influence came in again, and that influence would, if it had the power, prevent a single soldier going out from Canada or a dollar being spent in the defence of the empire—that influence which studies, not the interests of the empire, not our position as an integral important portion of the greatest empire, but whose allegiance apparently is due elsewhere. I say it is an outrage to those men, who are told that they are to get the pay of Canadian volunteers, to find their pay has been cut down 10 cents per day. What for? To enable the Minister of Public Works to go back and tell somebody in the province of Quebec that he had prevented the government from doing this or that which they had pledged themselves to do. Look at that single item, it does not amount to much to these boys who go out. What do they care? But it does amount to something in the eyes of the people of Canada that the Canadian government should act so meanly to those who are risking life and limb for the empire of which we are a part and will remain a part for all time to come.

Mr. McNEILL. I think that the point that has been brought before the committee by my hon. friend who has just taken his seat, is so grave a one that the committee is entitled to know from the minister, whether it is correctly taken or not, whether the statement made by my hon. friend is correct or not.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The pay adopted is the pay of the permanent force and of the North-west Mounted Police.

Mr. McNEILL. How much a day?

Mr. WALLACE.

Mr. WALLACE. How much is the pay of the volunteers?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The pay in the annual camp is 50 cents a day.

Mr. TISDALE. And when they are ordered out for service, I believe the pay is 50 cents a day. If this is not the rate of pay allowed to the volunteers now in South Africa, I can only say that I entirely misunderstood the case when I was making my speech. I am not prepared to support the proposition of 40 cents a day. I understand the hon. minister to say that the pay is 40 cents a day.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The pay of the permanent force is 40 cents a day.

Mr. WALLACE. What is the pay of the volunteers going to South Africa?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I say we adopted the pay of the permanent force.

Mr. TISDALE. Speaking for myself, I can only say that I misunderstood the case. I do not take it that this is a permanent force that we are sending to South Africa. I am satisfied that many of the men would not join any permanent force. It may be my fault that I have made the mistake, but I had not a chance to see these figures until just now. I had no idea, in any case, that it was necessary to see them. No one ever thought of this contingent that is sent out, being a permanent force. Of course, I am satisfied, the hon. minister (Mr. Borden) did not mean to mislead the House and the country. But in the country, we have been discussing this matter. I had a meeting for the presentation of the Fenian medals. Both Conservatives and Reformers were there, and no one dreamed that the pay of these men in South Africa would be less than 50 cents a day—the same as the volunteers get when they are ordered out. It will be a great mistake to pay them at this low rate, and will cause very general dissatisfaction. It will make of no effect, many of the arguments that I advanced a short time ago when I said that we were following the precedents in that respect and the regulations made for the force. Surely it cannot be doubted that these men went out as volunteers. To pay them at the rate of the permanent force, is equivalent to saying that these volunteers who went to South Africa went to join the permanent force, and become regular soldiers.

Mr. WALLACE. They enlisted for six months only.

Mr. TISDALE. And they enlisted as volunteers, not to make arms a profession, but because a crisis had arisen in the affairs of the country. In the remarks I made, I pleaded for unanimity in this matter. But if the government wants unanimity, if they want what will satisfy the reasonable demand of the people, we must have volunteers' pay for these volunteers. I am more than grieved, I am more than disappointed, and I can assure the government that the people of this country, irrespective of politics, will feel as I do. Why, if they are going to put the men on this basis, it would be better to follow the suggestion of the hon. member for Labelle, and pay them and treat them as regular soldiers. There is some principle about that. If we are to be unanimous in support of the government's proposal, it must be on the basis of treating these men as volunteers. I hope the government will reconsider this matter. I am sure that hundreds and thousands of their own supporters feel as I do about it. If I am speaking a little warmly, it is because—I frankly confess—I am a little excited. The matter has been misunderstood—I do not say that it has been misrepresented, but I do say that the misunderstanding has extended from one end of the country to the other. I am desirous that there should be no division in this matter. Now, at the last moment, after a long debate—some of it pretty warm, and some of it, in my opinion, that had better have been left unsaid on both sides—let us have unity in the matter. Let us act as our men have acted, who have gone to South Africa. They did not stop to consider whether they were Liberals or Conservatives, they thought only of responding to the call that had been made for volunteers.

Mr. FOSTER. It seems to me—

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) will allow me—before it goes any further, I desire to explain that on this point, there has been misunderstanding. The estimates prepared by the Militia Department, not yet distributed, had based the calculation on the pay of the permanent force, which it appears, is 40 cents a day. But really that does not carry out the intention of the government. We did understand that it was to be 50 cents a day, but when we discussed the matter, we were under the impression that 50 cents a day was the rate paid to the permanent force. There has clearly been a misunderstanding, but the substance of our intention was that the rate of pay was to be 50 cents a day.

Mr. FOSTER. It was a pretty sharp turn, but you made it.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There was no sharp turn about it.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I was going to suggest that the language of the resolutions was not sufficiently definite and should be amended. The Minister of Finance tells us that the rate of pay will be 50 cents a day. But we find according to subsection (b) :

The payment of the officers, non-commissioned officers and men composing the said contingents . . . at the rate authorized by the regulations and orders of the Department of Militia and Defence.

We had better have some definite statement of the regulations and orders referred to. As the matter stands, the House is without information on that subject. The misunderstanding has arisen, if there is a misunderstanding, by reason of the fact that the language is so extremely vague and because nowhere is there any definite statement. First, you have subsection (b), stating that the rates of pay shall be those authorized by the regulations and orders of the department, which are not stated; and further down you have the rates fixed by reference to subsection (b), leaving it still in the same vague condition. I would suggest that the Minister of Finance should see to it that the subsection is expressed in some more definite way.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If the regulation of the Department of Militia provides 50 cents per day, the subsection will work out—there will be no difficulty.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Where will you find it ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If it does not provide 50 cents a day, it will be made 50 cents a day.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). But the criticism I make is that there is a vague reference to the regulations and orders of the department. Somebody ought to be able to show what those regulations and orders are, which are referred to, so that we could understand what we are doing.

Mr. TISDALE. I think the regulations are of a twofold character, providing 50 cents a day for the volunteers, and 40 cents a day for the permanent force.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). But that is the very difficulty. If they are so ambiguous that is the very thing we want to avoid. We want a reference to some regulation which fixes the rate at 50 cents a day, and not to one so uncertain in its terms.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If the regulation is not 50 cents a day, it must be made 50 cents a day.

Mr. McCARTHY. If the words were inserted, that the scale of pay be that for volunteers in the fall camp, that would fix it beyond dispute. No one, of course, thought that the payment of this contingent was to be on any other basis than what our volunteers get when they are engaged in military duty.

Mr. WALLACE. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has stated that this is to be put specifically at 50 cents a day. I am glad he made that statement, because the Minister of Militia and Defence stated a few minutes before that the arrangement was 40 cents per day. I am glad to notice that the Minister of Militia and Defence has been properly called down by the Minister of Finance.

Amendment (Mr. Bourassa) negatived ; yeas, 76 and nays, 3.

Mr. CLANCY. I have listened throughout this debate with a great deal of interest. I have taken no part in it so far, but I do not propose to sit silent in my seat and let go unchallenged a resolution such as has been proposed here to-night. I can quite understand hon. gentlemen taking a position differing from that of the majority in this House on what they are pleased to call high constitutional grounds. I quite agree that because some hon. gentleman might think proper to take a course at variance with the general trend of public opinion in this country they should not be too harshly dealt with ; but when we find a couple of high-minded gentlemen placing a question upon high constitutional ground, and when we find these same gentlemen subsequently tearing off the mask and basing their action upon the lowest ground they could put it, namely, that of dollars and cents, I say these hon. gentlemen have lost their case, they stand alone in this country. I will not use so strong a term in characterizing their action as I think it deserves. But when an hon. gentleman puts it upon the high ground, and at the last moment he turns round and puts it upon the lowest possible ground, then it is not difficult to understand what his motives are, and what he intends should follow that. There is just as much propriety in the hon. gentlemen declaring that if the Canadian volunteers had gone to fight the battles of the country to the south of us they should be paid American pay rather than Canadian pay. The hon. gentleman has made a sharp distinction between the British Empire and Canada, as much as to say that Canada is not a portion of the British Empire. My surprise is that the government should sit silent and raise no voice of rebuke. I do not know whether these hon. gentlemen are running a small side show under the patronage of the government or not ; but I can tell them that they have given an impression to this country that the loyalty of some gentlemen at least can be overbalanced by just 15½ cents a day to the Canadians who are fighting the battles of the British Empire. If these hon. gentlemen had taken the ground that the government were wrong, that they should not have entered upon this course without the sanction of parliament, then their position would be logical. But they seem to have forgotten that parliament is now in session ; and now when the Canadian parliament proposes to vote a certain sum of money to the Canadian volunteers, these two high-minded gentlemen rise in their places and declare that not one dollar of Canadian money should be paid to the Canadian volunteers above the

Mr. WALLACE.

Imperial pay. I do not propose to make a speech upon this subject, but I feel it my duty to make a protest against so unseemly a proposal being made in the Canadian parliament. It will have one effect alone, and that is to give the impression that there are members in the Canadian parliament who are unwilling that the Canadian volunteers should have one dollar of Canadian money if they can possibly be deprived of it by a vote of this House.

Mr. DAVIN. I remember distinctly having seen in La Patrie what my hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace) has quoted. I sent to the reading room for La Patrie for October, and word has come back that it cannot be found. But I have here Le Temps for October 5. Le Temps is the organ in the capital of the government, and there is an article here headed : Dans une attitude digne ; not using exactly the words quoted by the member for West York, but using language even stronger than that. It ridicules the idea of our sending Canadians to fight the battles of the empire, and declares that we owe England nothing whatever, and it is all apropos of the stand taken by the Prime Minister. If the fine ears of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) will tolerate my defective accent in French, I will read a few sentences :

The leader of the government has contradicted the rumour that had gone abroad, to the effect that the government had formally offered to Great Britain a contingent of volunteers to take part in the war in South Africa.

We sincerely rejoice at this news, as a Liberal and as a Canadian.

Canada has not offered any troops to Great Britain nor has she the intention of so doing. Should Great Britain ask for troops, her request will be duly brought before the Dominion parliament, who will take action upon the matter. Such is the plain statement made by Sir W. Laurier, and we approve of it. Some jingoes, more Imperialists than the Empress of India, are already strongly denouncing the Dominion government for the ridicule brought upon Canada, through their refusing to assist Great Britain in crushing a minuscule nation of Austral Africa. In the ravings of their mind, these people carry things to the length of threatening the government with an adverse verdict from the electorate, as if our fellow-countrymen were burning with the desire of getting their heads smashed in the service of John Bull.

It is not him whom you think of who is open to ridicule.

By having parliament express by a vote their sympathy with the equal-rightists in South Africa, the Liberal government did all they could do, to prove their loyalty to the British Crown.

Why should we send our young men to the Transvaal to be used as targets for the bullets of Boer marksmen, when the country stands in such need of them, for the advancement of the arts of peace ?

Why should we make a demonstration of Imperialism ? The Orders of the Day in parliament are quite a sufficient demonstration. As to the assistance we could give the British army, the latter can perfectly dispense with it, and in that case the latter demonstration of our Imperialism would only turn out to be ridiculous and dangerous. I say it would be ridiculous, because it is useless; and, moreover, it would be dangerous, inasmuch as henceforward nothing could prevent us from taking part in all the wars of England and assisting her in the bad undertakings of the empire, while the empire, on the other hand, has not always backed us in our fair claims, as the Oregon and Maine frontiers question.

The Imperialists seem to labour under the delusion that, in return for the protection Great Britain affords us it is absolutely necessary for us to contribute money and blood for her defence. Let us reflect a little. Let us be positive. We stand with respect to England in the position of an insured who pays yearly insurance premiums to a company which pledges its protection to him for a rainy day. Great Britain affords us cheap protection; and, ever since 1812, she cannot fairly pretend that she has incurred a vast expenditure either in money or men, to protect us. And yet, ever since that time, we have paid her a yearly premium under the shape of considerable commercial benefits of which she has deprived us, by denying us the treaty-making power. In that respect, Great Britain has always given the precedence to her interests over our own interests and it may safely be stated that she has been handsomely rewarded for the protection she has afforded us.

Therefore we owe the British government absolutely nothing. Such is the plain, unvarnished truth. And when the Canadian parliament passed a resolution endorsing the stand taken by the equal-rightists in South Africa, they fully discharged their duty and perhaps more than their duty.

Loyal we are; but dupes we will not be.

That article was published in the organ of the government in Ottawa on October 5. It does not say what the hon. member for York attributed to La Patrie, but it is a reasoned statement why neither a man nor a dollar should be sent.

Mr. FOSTER. There is one line in the resolution that I cannot quite understand. It is:

Such difference not to be paid to such officers, non-commissioned officers and men, while on such service, but the amount which would be payable to each such officer, non-commissioned officer or man to be placed to his credit—

Now, this is the part:

—and to be applied in such manner as the Governor in Council may determine for the benefit of the dependents on him or failing such application to be paid to him or his representatives at the close of his period of service.

Is that not a strange power for the Governor in Council to take. It is the soldier's pay. Surely you should pay it to him instead of keeping it in a fund.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Or pay it to his family.

Mr. FOSTER. No, you are keeping it in a fund, and then make such disposition of it as you see fit.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It will go to his wife or family.

Mr. FOSTER. Just as you see fit. It is an arbitrary course to take.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It is only the power that you say we shall have in regard to the separation allowance because you strike out the scale.

Mr. FOSTER. No, we give power to say how the separation allowance is to be paid, but it is to be paid to the wives and children. Here you state that you are going to pay the money into a fund, and then you say you will pay it just as you please, without an order from the soldier. I think it should be upon the application of the soldier himself.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The soldier is in South Africa and the money may be required for his family and you could not get an order to pay the money. The desire of the government is that the money shall be available for the benefit of the soldier's family.

Mr. FOSTER. Every soldier knows about this, and there would be time to receive an application and to comply with his wishes.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. He could not very well send an order to the government if his family needed the money.

Mr. WALLACE. The government are providing for a family separation allowance.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. This also.

Mr. WALLACE. Are the government when paying the separation allowance to the wife and children of the soldier, going to keep the Canadian portion of his pay in addition, and have it at their discretion to pay it over to his wife or do what they please with it?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If his wife and children needed it, I should certainly advise that the government would apply it for their benefit.

Mr. WALLACE. Would it not be better to make a proper separation allowance without touching the soldier's pay? There are only fifty-nine married men on the first contingent, and in some cases we may assume that their families will need aid. Why not give them a sufficient separation allowance until their husbands come back, and not touch the soldier's pay at all.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. This is not strictly speaking pay, because it forms no part of the amount payable to the soldier under the contract which he made. In view of the fact that the Canadian pay is higher than the Imperial pay, it was thought proper to give the difference and to place it in a fund, and to use it if it should be required for the soldier's family here, and if not, that it should remain in the fund until the soldier returned to Canada.

Mr. TAYLOR. When the first contingent was being formed, the correspondent of the Globe in October last attributed this statement to the Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden):

While the British government would pay the customary shilling a day to our men, the Canadian troops would also be in receipt of 25 cents a day from the government of Canada.

When our soldiers enlisted they thought that the promise of the minister would be carried out in this respect.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. So it is.

Mr. TAYLOR. But why do you not give the soldiers the right to say what they shall do with their pay? Why place it in the hands of the Governor General?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) seems to draw a distinction which we are not willing to draw between the interest of the soldier and the interest of his wife and family. I hardly think that the Canadian soldier will be complimented at the statement that they do not want to give a portion of their pay to their wives and children. I venture to think that the soldiers of Canada will regard the proposition to reserve the money as the best scheme that could be devised.

Mr. McNEILL. But the minister must remember that very few of them have wives and children.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The remarks of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) do not seem to have any relation to this matter at all, except with respect to the fifty-nine men who are married. The 950 who are not married may want to use this money in South Africa, and the argument of the Minister of Finance has not the slightest relation to them at all. I do not suppose that these men would squander their money in South Africa, on the contrary it seems to me a likely thing that they may want this money in South Africa for the purpose of purchasing necessaries for themselves. We read in the daily papers that people throughout Canada are sending money to South Africa in order that the men may purchase necessaries. Why should the government hold the money until the period of service is over, while the men may require the money for necessaries when on duty? Certainly the pay the men are getting is not so excessive that the government should see fit to hoard up any portion of it for them.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. They will be well looked after in South Africa.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The people of this country are so apprehensive that our men will suffer in South Africa that they are sending money to them. A gentleman in Ottawa sent $350 the other day for the benefit of a single company.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It proves the gentleman was generous, but it does not prove that the volunteers were in need.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It proves that the public sentiment of this country, which is probably as capable of judging as the hon. gentleman is, thinks that our men may be in need. I do not suppose that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) thinks that he knows more about this than all the rest of the country combined. People capable of forming an opinion believe that these men do want the money. There is another thing with regard to this that does not appear to me to be quite regular. It says that this fund 'shall be applied in such manner as the Governor in Council shall determine.' It gives the men no opportunity of determining the application of the money. The government would carry out its object better, I think, if some such words as these were inserted: 'In such manner as each man shall determine, and failing such determination, then in such manner as the government shall determine.' Under such a clause as that the man would have the right to determine the application of his own money if he saw fit.

Mr. TISDALE. I would suggest that the government should take power to pay the entire sum to the soldiers if they see fit.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think we have that power.

Mr. TISDALE. No, the money must remain in the fund until the soldier returns, under the resolution as you have it at present.

Mr. GIBSON. I do not want to prolong the discussion; but while the volunteers went out to serve their Queen and country irrespective of the emoluments they were to receive, we find the opposition to-night trying to make out that they are being unfairly treated by the government. If the suggestion of my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Borden) were carried out, instead of the Canadians receiving the regular pay of British soldiers at the same time as the other members of the British force, they would be given their additional pay from this government in the field. Instead of that, the government have wisely, in my judgment, retained the extra money in their hands to be paid to the men after their return, if God spares them to return to their native land, or to their families. Therefore, the government are just as careful of the interests of the married men as the British government. I know as a matter of fact, and I dare say that hon. gentlemen on both sides are aware, that many of the married volunteers now on service in South Africa did not inform the government that they were married for fear that they would not be allowed to go. A great deal has been said by my hon. friend about the large families they left behind. If the hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) will look up the figures, he will find that the families do not average over two children in each.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend is quite out. I know that aid has already been given by the relief committee to those who have left large families.

Mr. GIBSON. I think the information which the government has given is just as reliable as what the hon. gentleman has stated to the House. There are 13 sergeants' wives with 24 children; nine corporals' wives with 15 children, and 37 privates' wives with 61 children; so that I am within the mark in every case. The hon. gentleman may laugh. He is in the habit of laughing at his own jokes, but he is not very happy in the question he has raised to-night, in his attempt to make political capital out of the way the government are treating the volunteers. I am sure that no wiser provision could have been made than the government have made for the volunteers, and for the wives and children of those who have left their families behind.

Mr. WALLACE. There is a wiser and a better provision, I think, than that praised by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson), that is, that these soldiers are not children, and that they are entitled to their pay as soon as they earn it, and the government should pay a separation allowance sufficient to keep those in comfortable circumstances they have left behind. It is stated that there are only 59 families and less than 120 children altogether, so that the pay is a mere bagatelle for Canada. I want to ask the Minister of Militia another question. What pay did he give the first Canadian contingent? I am told that he paid them until they arrived on the shores of South Africa.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes.

Mr. WALLACE. What was the pay—40 or 50 cents a day?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I think it was 40 cents.

Mr. WALLACE. That is rather interesting news. The minister says he thinks it was 40 cents a day. Does he not know?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I have answered the hon. gentleman.

Mr. WALLACE. I think we should have something more definite. I am sure that there is not a citizen of Canada but expected that 50 cents a day, the pay of Canadian volunteers, would be paid to those men. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) had supposed, as he tells us, that the pay of the permanent corps was the same as the pay of the volunteers. I supposed so too. I am sure that the impression has gone abroad. I would like to ask the minister another question. If he paid these volunteers 40 cents a day from the time they were sworn in until they arrived on the coast of Africa, will he now pay them the additional 10 cents?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes.

PRAYERS.

OFFICIAL DEBATES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. CHAMPAGNE presented the second report of the Select Committee appointed to supervise the Official Reports of the Debates, as follows:

The select committee appointed to supervise the official reports of the debates recommend that the resignation of G. A. Geoffrion be accepted and the sum of $350 be paid him for services rendered in the position and that Mr. Gustave Labine be appointed in his place, but that for this session he be paid $650.

Mr. CHAMPAGNE moved :

That the House concur in the second report of the said committee.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 58) to supervise and control the warehousing, inspection and weighing of grain in Manitoba and the North-west Territories.—(Mr. Douglas.)

PRIVILEGE—PARAGRAPH IN OTTAWA CITIZEN.

Mr. DAVIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I rise to a question of privilege. I do not think it necessary that I should do more than call attention to what seems to be a misprint in this morning's Citizen :

Questioned by Mr. Davis (Lib., Saskatchewan), elicited the information that between 1883 and 1887 the Regina 'Leader' obtained $47,850 for government printing, and in 1884, $12,111 for advertising mining regulations.

Well, Sir, I find that the $12,000 is a misprint, and that the amount that was received by that company for advertising mining regulations, is correctly stated in the Hansard. Now, I wish to call attention to the implication that is underneath that most improper question, which certainly, as the leader of the opposition said, should have led to the point of order being raised. It was not a proper question in form. Now, dealing with the implication that somehow or other there may have been favouritism, I want to call attention to what actually is the history of printing in the capital of the North-west Territories. In 1883, a paper was started, called the Leader, when that town was nothing but a tent town; and a plant was put in that could do printing for a large government. In 1883-4, I find on turning to the Auditor General's report, there was $1,386 paid for printing, and $161 for advertising. I find that the number of items that go to make up the $1,386 are items connected with the implementation of government proclamations, the Gazette formes, and numberless details of notices. Then if you take 1885, at page 506, you have $1,738.89 for printing and $369 for advertising. Then you come to 1886, and you have $1,335.48. In 1887, you have $4,318 for printing; in 1888, $4,976 for printing, and $363 for advertising. In that year, I find on inquiry, that the ordinances were consolidated, and a large book of laws printed. In 1889, page E-165, printing and advertising, $5-

Mr. CHAMPAGNE.

689.60; 1890, $5,055; 1891, $6,407. In 1892, I find that the Regina Journal, got for printing, $582. The Leader, got for advertising, $293, and for printing, $4,219. The Regina Standard, which was a paper started independent of the government, but the chief object of which, was to be anti-Davin—the Regina Standard received for advertising $781, and for printing, $555. Now we come to 1893. Remember the implication in that question must mean something like this: That, being a member of parliament, and being one of the principal shareholders of a newspaper, I might have used some influence to get work for that paper; or it may mean that the paper belonged to that class of reptile journals of which we have heard something. All that need be said is that the man who at this minute distributes the patronage of this government in Regina, declared in 1895, after he had purchased this paper that its career had been characterized from first to last by the utmost independence. Now, Sir, look at the facts. In 1893, the Leader received for advertising, $299, and for printing, $1,673. The Standard received for advertising $415, and for printing, $3,371. In 1894, the Regina Leader received for advertising, $173, and for printing, $2,021; the Standard received for advertising, $391, and for printing, $4,982. In 1895, the Regina Leader received for advertising, $598, and for printing, $990. The Standard received for advertising, $36, and for printing, $4,388. Then in the August of 1895, the paper was sold and passed into the hands of the gentleman who owns it at present. At once there is a change. Then you find the Regina Leader gets, in 1896, for advertising, $148, and for printing, $4,258. The Standard, that before was getting the lion's share, received in that year for advertising, only $93, and for printing, $576. Now, there is one thing certain that these figures demonstrate, and it is this, that the Leader, as long as I was connected with it, was a paper that was not held in favour by the governments; and that under the Conservative government in Ottawa, you find a sum for advertising given to a hostile paper, almost double that which was given to the paper that I was supposed to be largely interested in. I think, Sir, that is an entire answer to any implication that could have been behind that most improper question.

COLONIAL TROOPS FOR IMPERIAL PURPOSES.

Mr. BEATTIE. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask the government if they know anything about the matters contained in this despatch which I hold in my hand :

Following the report from Australia that Joseph Chamberlain had asked how many men could be spared from that colony to go to South Africa in case the Imperial troops were needed elsewhere, the 'Times' has a special from Toronto which says that Mr. Chamberlain, some time ago, asked the same question of Canada, and a reply was sent that she could send ten thousand. In addition, Canada would garrison Halifax, Esquimalt, Newfoundland and the British West Indies.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I have already answered the same question put by the leader of the opposition.

THE HALIFAX GARRISON.

Mr. McNEILL. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask my right hon. friend, whether he can give any information to-day, in reply to the question which I asked him yesterday, and concerning which, he said he hoped to be able to give some information.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am happy to inform my hon. friend that our offer has been accepted.

THE REGINA LEADER COMPANY.

Mr. DAVIS. An order was passed on the 12th of February, asking for correspondence in connection with the Regina Leader Company; and I desire to ask the government when that will be brought down?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I cannot give a positive answer to my hon. friend, but I will call the attention of the proper department to it.

PERMANENT FORCE IN THE YUKON.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like, in connection with the statement which the right hon. the Premier has made—which statement, I am sure, will be received with great satisfaction—that the government are prepared to garrison the city of Halifax in order to release the regular force that are there for service elsewhere if necessary, I would like to draw the attention of the Minister of Militia to a point I brought before the House last session. I refer to the sending of a large portion of the permanent force to the Yukon. I took exception to that step at the time, as the House will remember, as a very ill-advised proceeding, in the first place, because the permanent force from the very character of its organization are not in a position to render the service that the mounted policemen can, and more especially—

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I think I must ask my hon. friend, if he is going to make any remarks, to make a motion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If my right hon. friend desires it, I will conclude with a motion; but I do not wish to take up more than a moment of the time of the House with regard to this matter. I speak because the present moment is opportune for drawing attention to the fact that when the force was originally sent—about 200 strong, I think—to the Yukon, there was a population, I believe, of 30,000 to 32,000. We have now learned that a great exodus has taken place and the population is reduced to about 4,500 people, with a prospect of its being further reduced at an early day. We have had information brought before the House that there were—speaking from memory—247 mounted policemen in that country. In connection with the statement made by my right hon. friend of the intention of the government to provide a regiment for the city of Halifax, it would appear to me most desirable that the portion of the permanent force should be withdrawn. It cannot possibly be required there. I will not go into that further than to say that from the first the Yukon has been one of the most orderly places in the Dominion. There has been nothing but what a mere handful of mounted police could have dealt with at any time. Therefore, it appears to me that the idea of not retaining the force there at a time when they may be very useful elsewhere and save a large amount of public money is worthy of the attention of my right hon. friend and the Department of Militia.

The PRIME MINISTER. I may say to my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) that last year we withdrew from the Yukon half the force we had sent there. I think that the country generally, and particularly those who know the condition of things there, approve the sending of the military force to the Yukon. If there was no crime, no disturbances, no offences in the motley population which assembled in the Yukon at the height of the gold excitement, I think it is largely due to the care taken by the government to provide such a police and military force as to check the possibility of any demonstration of that kind. My hon. friend knows what the experience has been in every country where a mining population has assembled. Such a population is not always of the most orderly character, assembling as it does from all parts of the world and under circumstances the most likely to lead to more or less disturbance. We are happy in having had less disturbance perhaps, than has occurred in any other mining country. This was due in part, I believe to the wise precautions taken. My hon. friend says that there is less population there than there was. I am not prepared to admit that there is less population in the Yukon, though there may be less in Dawson. As was explained by my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior

(Mr. Sifton) the other day, the population is now settled, and the men who came looking about not knowing what to do have gone to other places. There is an active working population on all the mining creeks. Whether it would be advisable to withdraw the force at this moment is a question which it would be well to consider; but before we come to a conclusion, I think it would be well to wait until we receive the reports in the spring when the operations of the winter are completed. It is quite possible that we may then follow the hon. gentleman's advice; but at the present time it is not proper to say either yes or no to his suggestion. It is enough to say that it will receive careful consideration.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—THE CANADIAN CONTINGENTS.

Mr. A. McNEILL (North Bruce). Would the right hon. Premier allow me to ask him whether the government have considered whether they will maintain the strength of the contingents in South Africa, by filling up the vacancies that have occurred in the ranks?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). That is a point with regard to which we will have to communicate with the Imperial authorities.

Mr. GEO. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) I would like to ask the Minister of Militia and Defence, before we take up the resolution passed last night, whether he will bring down the orders in council which were passed, I suppose, as to the strength of the contingents, their officers, their pay and so on. That was what I had supposed I was asking for last night; but the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) brought down only the two for the Governor General's warrant. Of course, they gave no information as to the establishment, the officers' pay, &c.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). The general orders have all been published, but I will have a file of them placed on the Table of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. Were there no orders with reference to the establishment?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. There are orders in council, I think, appointing the officers—

Mr. FOSTER. And establishing the rates of pay?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. No, the general orders have the rates of pay.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, if the minister will bring down those orders—

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I will do so.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 59) to provide for the expenses of the Canadian volunteers serving Her Majesty in South Africa.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

REPRESENTATION IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 13) respecting representation in the House of Commons. He said: Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to discuss this measure now at any great length. It has been before the House for a very considerable period of time and was very thoroughly considered last session. It met with an untimely end in the other Chamber, but, I trust that, as it has become better known, it has become better appreciated, and that it comes back not as an acquaintance, but rather as an old friend. It is a measure that is calculated to undo a grave wrong committed against the people by the parliament of 1882, and repeated and extended by the parliament of 1892. The measure is one eminently in the interest of fair-play all round. On former occasions in every case where, in any province, or in the Dominion as a whole, there has been any legislation with the view of altering the limits of ridings, parliament itself has dealt with the question. On this occasion, as last year, the government have adopted a departure, which is the first instance in which any parliament of Canada, or any province of Canada, has voluntarily transferred to a judicial tribunal the delicate subject of redistributing ridings. That feature of this measure, in itself, has, I am sure, commended it to the right-thinking people of this country, and it also commended it to the overwhelming majority of the members of this House last session. It is true that it hardly secured a working majority in the other House, but, a year has rolled by, that House has had a year's opportunity of reconsidering its decision, and further, it has had many changes in its personnel, so that we may reasonably look forward to a wiser and different conclusion if the measure receives that fair consideration at their hands that it is entitled to receive. It is under all circumstances and upon all occasions, a delicate matter. I think, for one House to veto the measures of another, but when it comes to dealing with the representation of this House, then, I think, it is especially a delicate question for that House to deal with, and they assume a grave responsibility if they thwart, by their majority, the will of the people as declared by the House of Commons. Therefore, Sir, I confidently move this Bill on this occasion, believing that it will be appreciated to-day, and that a year's deliberation in that very deliberative body will have brought it to the conclusion that their action last year was unwise and not to be repeated on this occasion.

The Bill proposes to abolish three municipal ridings that have no counterpart in our municipal divisions. It also proposes to confine the constituencies within the limits of counties or cities, and in no case to make up constituencies from fragments of various counties. The recognition of that principle is a safeguard against gerrymandering and interfering with a fair expression of opinion in parliament. As long as it is conceded that parliament may disregard any such checks as municipal boundaries there is no limit to the steps that may be taken in order to secure unfair representation in parliament. You have only to look at a few of the constituencies, the product of these two Redistribution Bills in 1882 and 1892 to be shocked at what was done. Take the constituency of North Brant, extending in an easterly direction from the county of Oxford, going through several counties, the North Riding of Brant, I believe, being brought into contact with no less than seven different constituencies, going into the city of Hamilton, dividing one of the ridings of Wentworth into two parts, separated by two townships, and by the city of Hamilton, so that you cannot pass from one part of the riding of North Wentworth to the other part except by crossing two other constituencies or going out into Lake Ontario to do so. Take the riding of North Ontario, which, at one point, is only four or five miles wide; it passes through a tier of townships until it passes away from the north end of the county of Ontario and reaches the district of Muskoka where it spreads out and includes within its limits a number of townships belonging to the district of Muskoka. Look at the geographical formation of these two ridings and you will find an example of the work of the perpetrators and of the men who permitted those measures to be passed. I think that anybody in this House, or in the Senate, who votes against this measure will adopt all the wrong-doing involved in those two measures of 1882 and 1892. You may go where you like throughout the province of Ontario, and you will find but one opinion as to the justice of this Bill. There is one fixed conclusion in the minds of the people, and it is that these measures were eminently unfair, and that this parliament cannot too soon rise to a proper conception of its duty, repeal these measures and adopt something fairer in their place. Last session hon. gentlemen opposite attacked the clause which proposes to hand this matter over to the judiciary and pretended that the judiciary, to whom it would be referred, would be a partisan body. I do not think that any hon. gentleman to-day will repeat that statement. We stated then, and I may state again to-day, that the men we named then as fit and proper persons with whom to entrust the working out of this Bill will, or men equally worthy of confidence, be named again to-day. It is not in contemplation to change the personnel of the judiciary to whom the matter will be referred. If it receives the sanction of parliament it will be referred to the same gentlemen as those who were named last session. Their connection with it is a guarantee in itself of the fairness of the proposition, and one which, I trust, will commend it successfully to the consideration of this Chamber and to that of the other House. I indulge in the hope that time has produced a change in the minds of hon. gentlemen here and in the other Chamber and that it will not be necessary at such length now, as on a former occasion, to press this Bill upon the favourable attention of parliament. I doubt, Sir, if you can find a provision in it that is not eminently fair and just. It does not propose to rearrange the divisions for the whole province of Ontario, but, rather to deal with the iniquitous provisions that characterized the Bills of 1882 and 1892. On the former occasion, on the pretense of wiping out two constituencies, namely, Niagara and Stormont, and providing four additional seats, there was an entire overturning of the boundaries of the constituencies, including Ontario, westerly until you reached Lake Huron. There was no possible necessity for such changes as were made. They did not produce an equalization of population, they did not bring the constituents closer together, they did not, in any respect facilitate the formation of opinion by those who were to be grouped together into one constituency, but they so disregarded the facilities for interchange of opinion, that there are to-day ridings in the province of Ontario in various parts of which are living residents who would have to travel 100 miles within the boundaries of the constituency in order to meet each other. Take the riding of North Ontario as a sample. We will assume that the people of North Ontario desire to meet in convention for the purpose of expressing their opinions upon a political question; and considering the formation of that ill-shaped constituency, it is impossible for the constituents to select a spot where they could to any appreciable extent gather as representatives from all parts of that riding. That very fact alone ought have been sufficient to have caused men to hesitate, aye, even to refuse to place such an Act upon the statute-book. I point to that as one of the many proofs of the injustice of the measure. Last session I troubled the House with figures which satisfied all reasonable men that that measure, and the measure grafted upon it in 1892, secured a majority which brought the present representative of North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) into this House and kept him here ever since. That hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) I am sure feels a certain amount of regret that he should represent a constituency under such circumstances, and, Sir, taking, as he does on most questions, high, broad and advanced grounds, I look to him on this occasion, and I hope with good reason, to aid me in bringing about a more satisfactory state of affairs in North Bruce. I am sure, Sir, I will not be disappointed.

Mr. SCRIVER. You have great faith in human nature.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) has rendered good service to his country on many occasions. Whenever there is any measure before parliament calculated to raise the dignity of Canada in the minds of the people of the empire, or of foreign nations, there is no gentleman in this House who takes more elevated and advanced ground than does my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill). Let him, therefore, not waste all his good thoughts upon the larger questions, but let him for a moment come down to our own domestic affairs in Canada, and assist us to purify what is impure in our laws.

Mr. McNEILL. Hear, hear.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am glad my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill) echoes that sentiment. I am glad that my appeal to him has not been in vain. It has been argued, Sir, that we should not pass this measure on what is called the eve of a general election. The redistribution takes place once every ten years, and that means that it is estimated that there will be but two general elections upon the constituencies as then redistributed. Therefore, as there has been one general election under the census of 1891, there is yet another general election to be held. It is, therefore, not fair to say that we are having this wrong corrected just for one year. On the contrary, we are seeking to have this wrong remedied for one-half of the full life of the redistribution, after the decennial census. It is no argument, I submit, to say that the life of parliament has nearly run out, and that the time for taking the census is so near at hand that, therefore, this should be postponed until the new census is taken, and until the new parliament is elected. Sir, what should be the aim of this House of Commons, is to have its members elected upon constituencies as they should be, and not as they are. The proper time, therefore, to rearrange the constituencies is before the people have been called upon to exercise their franchise and not afterwards. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I confidently lay this Bill before the House, and I trust that it will have the hearty, I almost hope the unanimous, approval of hon. gentlemen. So endorsed, it will go to the Upper House, and I trust will there receive as favourable treatment as it will here. I have hope that it shall become a tardy measure of justice to the people, so that it may wipe out the stain which at present rests upon the statute-books of Canada.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). I quite concur in the opening remarks of the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), who said that this Bill had been so fully discussed at a recent period in this House that it would seem unnecessary to rediscuss it again. Am I right in assuming that this Bill is precisely the same as the Bill of last session?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Yes.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That being the case, it would be an entire waste of time to spend a single hour discussing this measure under such circumstances. Less than a year ago precisely the same Bill was discussed exhaustively in this House, and the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) admits that nothing new can be said on this subject. In view of this, I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, if you please, to accept the speech which I made on this Bill last session as my speech on the present occasion. The circumstances have only changed in one respect, and that change tells very much against the reintroduction of this measure. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) knows that the main ground of objection to this Bill was that it was introduced at an altogether inopportune time. He knows that under our constitution it is provided that there shall be a redistribution of seats in this House after every decennial census is taken. He knows that a redistribution is then imperative on us. After each census there has been a change of the relative representation of the different provinces in this House, which makes it absolutely imperative to have a Redistribution Bill then. We established last session that this Bill was altogether unnecessary, and we established also that the time was inopportune as the period of the decennial census was so near. The Postmaster General stated to the House that the judges who were instructed to deal with any alteration of boundaries under this Bill, would act upon the census taken in 1891. My hon. friend (Mr. Mulock) will excuse me if I say, that it is simply perfectly absurd to introduce at this time a measure for the redistribution of seats in this House based upon the census of 1891, in view of the fact that the population of the different localities has radically and completely changed since then. The fact that the government admits that the judges will have to be guided by a census which was taken ten years ago, is enough to show that the introduction of such a Bill as this is absurd. Every person must admit that the fundamental basis of our whole system of representation is representation by population. I do not mean to say that there are not other things to be taken in connection with that, but that is the great fundamental basis. And then to say that you will undertake the monstrous absurdity—

Mr. McMULLEN. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What does the hon. gentleman say? What is the matter? Does he think that the term monstrous is too strong to apply to such a palpable absurdity as that? One uses the term monstrous for something very large.

Mr. McMULLEN. The gerrymander was monstrous.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No. I gave the proof the last time, and I will give it to the House again, that there was nothing abnormal or improper in the gerrymander, as the hon. gentleman calls it, of 1882.

Mr. McMULLEN. Oh; shame.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, there are gentlemen in this House who, when they find that they have no ground to stand upon, endeavour by clamour and noise to obstruct and prevent discussion on a question on which they know they have no legitimate argument to sustain them. Therefore, I hail with great satisfaction the admission of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) that he wants to prevent an hon. gentleman stating his views in this House, because if he has an opportunity of stating them all the ground is cut from under the hon. member's feet, and consequently he has no case. But I must not be betrayed into making a speech, which I have no intention of doing on the present occasion. I may say that the main reason why the Senate threw out the Bill sent to them last year was the absurdity of putting before any intelligent body of gentlemen a measure to redistribute the constituencies of Canada upon the census of 1891, when we were just on the eve of taking another census. That position is immensely strengthened now, for another year has rolled by. Why, Sir, in the very speech from the Throne we have a proposal to pass a Bill to provide for the taking of the new census, and my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has provided in the estimates for taking a vote of money for the payment of the cost of taking the census. Could anything be more absurd than to put before this House at this time a Bill for a redistribution, in view of the fact that if it passed, you would have to have another redistribution immediately afterwards? That very fact is a most irresistible reason why the time of this House should not be wasted in reconsidering a measure which the Senate rejected a year ago for a reason which has become much stronger since. My hon. friend the Postmaster General says virtually that the Senate has nothing to do with a redistribution measure that touches the rights of the representatives of the people in this House. I join issue with him there altogether. I say that the Senate is entitled under the constitution of the country to deal with every measure that comes before this House, and there is only one point in which it is restricted by the clear terms of the constitution; that is, it cannot amend a revenue Bill.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I did not say that it had not the right.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If it has the right, it can exercise that right. I say that the reason which the Senate advanced for the rejection of the measure is immensely strengthened to-day, when we are on the very eve of taking the census. We are actually engaged in taking the census when the Bill for the purpose is introduced and the money is voted by the House. I do not hesitate to say, Mr. Speaker, that I do not believe the hon. gentleman is serious. I do not believe that he has the slightest expectation that this House is going, under these circumstances to do anything so palpably absurd as to pass this Bill. I think I know the reason why this Bill is here. The government have summoned parliament, and have no business ready. We have been a month in session, and they have been unable to submit any of their measures for our consideration; and in the absence of anything to do, to avoid adjourning the House from day to day and exhibiting their inability to deal with the public business, they have put up my hon. friend to throw down this old Bill of last session, which was fought out then in the fullest and most thorough manner, and was rejected by the Upper Chamber as altogether inopportune and out of time. I therefore conclude that my hon. friend was quite serious when he said that he did not propose to make any speech or enter into any discussion of the measure, because there is nothing to add to what was said last session. But I may be permitted to remind him that I disposed in a single sentence of the whole ground on which he has based this Bill. He says that the object of the Bill is to right the wrong done by the gerrymander of 1882. I proved to the House that there was no gerrymander.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, and I have only to re-state my argument to show these hon. gentlemen that I did so most thoroughly. I say that a gerrymander act can only be used in one way. The whole significance of the term gerrymander lies in the construction of a Bill that will enable a minority of the electors to elect a majority of representatives. Everybody knows that it is the cutting up and carving of constituencies for that purpose, and if a Bill does not accomplish that it is no gerrymander. Let me give the proof. The Bill of 1882 was proved by the election of 1896 not to be unfair to hon. gentlemen opposite. The official statement of the votes polled, and the parties for whom they were polled, prove that in the province of Ontario the Conservative party polled a large majority of votes over and above the Liberal party.

Mr. McMULLEN. No.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes. As I said before, noise will not, I hope, take the place of argument, in this House. If you bring down the official statement made by the government officers, and now in the possession of the government, you will find the statement I make to be correct. I am speaking from memory, but those who turn up my speech of last year, will find that I gave the figures, which show, I think, that the Conservative party polled many thousands of votes, more in the province of Ontario, than the Liberals did. And yet they elected one more representative than we did. Where then was the gerrymander? It is absolutely impossible to have a gerrymander, when the party that passed the Bill is deprived of its fair proportion of members. We had a large majority of the votes, and yet hon. gentlemen opposite elected one more representative than we did. I shall not waste more time on that question, but would recommend the hon. member for North Wellington to read over my speech again, which he seems to have forgotten.

The hon. Postmaster General, has really given no reason why we should pass this Bill. The position of the judiciary under it is simply a farce. I would remind the hon. gentleman, who seems to doubt the power of the Upper House, to deal with the question of franchise or redistribution, of what took place in England. The Gladstone government passed a Franchise Bill, and the House of Lords refused to deal with that measure unless the government agreed to have the two parties united—the government and the opposition—in determining upon a Redistribution Act, and that Redistribution Act was to be based on certain principles agreed upon by both parties. The Conservatives opposition united with the government, and both agreed upon a Redistribution Act, and by that agreement the redistribution was put substantially into the hands of a commission independent of the government, and it was only by agreeing to do this, that Mr. Gladstone secured the assent of the House of Lords to his Franchise Bill.

The hon. Postmaster General gave, of course, very few reasons why we should pass this Bill. It is quite obvious that he does not dream of its becoming law. He refrained from giving the only reason for introducing this Bill at such an inopportune time—at a time when the government is actually engaged making arrangements for taking the census—and that is the necessity in which the government is placed. Had my hon. friend been candid, he would have stated that in the three or four years this government have been in power, they have lost the confidence of the people and consequently their only hope of re-election, is the passing of a gerrymander Bill that will enable a minority of the electorate to return a majority of representatives. That is the only reason the government could have for the introduction of this Bill.

The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, appears amused at my statement that the government have lost the confidence of the country. But I need not go far to find the proof. That hon. minister supported this gerrymander Bill of last year, introduced by the Postmaster General, in which he cut up and changed the constituencies of Prince Edward Island in such a way as he thought would enable a minority to elect a majority of members. But he did not succeed in getting that passed into law. Now, I regard the local elections in the provinces, under the existing state of things, just as clear an indication of the popular will with regard to this House, as by-elections. And my reason is this: My right hon. friend went out and took the ground that the parties in the local and federal parliaments are one and the same. He went on the hustings, in the last local elections in Ontario, and implored the electors to maintain the Hardy government in power, because that government was his right arm. Well, it has been proved beyond controversy that but for the nefarious use of the infamous machine by the Ontario government, that the Hardy administration would have been crushed and defeated. Nobody knows that better than my right hon. friend, and he knows that from that day to this, the Ontario government, his right arm, is being steadily paralyzed more and more. One seat has been taken away, but what more? The two men that have been unseated by a judge of the highest standing and character, have appealed to the Supreme Court, because they know they have not the slightest chance of carrying the constituencies again, in fact the ground is already crumbling under the feet of my right hon. friend in Ontario, and whenever the electors of that province, get the opportunity, they will sweep the local government out of office just as they will this government.

What happened in Prince Edward Island? What has become of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies)? I see he has disappeared, and I am not surprised, because he knew what was coming. The elections for two members, one of them Attorney General, resulting from the reconstruction of the local government took place the other day in Prince Edward Island. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries went down there, and did an act a little more daring than I think was ever done by any public man in this country on either side of politics. He went into these two local elections, and told the people that the life of this Dominion government was at stake upon these elections.

If these two men are beaten, the Liberal government are beaten, and they have no majority in the House to carry on the government of Prince Edward Island. And what do you think the hon. gentleman did then, Mr. Speaker? Why, so far forgot himself, forgot his position, forgot the respect due to the independent electors of this country, as to tell the electors that if they did not return Liberals, to keep in power the local Liberal government in Prince Edward Island, he could not answer for the money that this House had voted for public works in the island being actually expended. If you want evidence of the position this government are in you could not have stronger evidence than that. What answer did he get? He got the answer that any man will get from free and independent electors when he attempts to use a bludgeon of that kind to drive them to the polls. His candidates were defeated; and he knows right well that if an election took place in the province of Prince Edward Island to-morrow, if he managed to save his own seat, he would come back alone, without a single man from that province to support him.

THE MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. You had better come and face him yourself, then.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is the position of the hon. gentleman, and nobody knows it better than he. Otherwise, do you think he would have ventured upon so daring, so unconstitutional an act as I have spoken of. Why, Sir, it should deprive him of his seat in this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, I say distinctly that if that was done by a candidate, it would disqualify him, even if elected, from sitting in parliament for having used intimidation. And the agent of the candidate—which the hon. gentleman made himself—having done it, I think, if the law were as far-reaching and as stringent as it ought to be, we should lose his presence in this House.

The same may be said of the province of New Brunswick. We were told the other day that by the enormous means that the Minister of Railways and Canals had been able to exercise in the province of New Brunswick, the opposition had been completely paralyzed and destroyed. But what happened the other day? In spite of all that this government and the government of New Brunswick could do, they were defeated by the independent electors of the constituency; and the indications are that the government of New Brunswick will find it difficult to secure support in that province, as will the Liberal government in any other province of this Dominion. I need hardly refer to what occurred in Manitoba. With all that two governments could do, with all the power that two governments, converging their forces on that province, were able to bring to play, they have been defeated in a more overwhelming and ignominious manner than any party in any section of this country. The hon. gentleman is beginning to find that there are two sides to the story of making combinations with local parties, so that defeat of one cannot take place without the defeat of the other. The handwriting is on the wall, and the Postmaster General and his colleagues know it. They have been weighed in the balance and found wanting; hence they stand to-day before the great electors of Canada virtually confessing defeat. They admit that the franchise under which they were returned to power in 1896—a franchise controlled by this House—would not enable them to retain power on another appeal to the people, and they have swept it away. And now they make the further humiliating confession to the people that even with the franchises of the local legislatures adopted for the House of Commons, they will have no hope of getting back here unless they get the assent of parliament to the monstrous proposition—I again use the term, for no words in the English language are too strong to indicate the character of the measure now brought before the House—that 17,000 Liberals shall be given more power than 50,000 Conservatives in the province of Ontario. I will not take up the time further than to refer those gentlemen who regret that I do not go more elaborately into this question to the speech I made last session, to which I adhere in its entirety.

Mr. JAS. McMULLEN (North Wellington). The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) appears to fancy that the government of the day has lost the confidence of the people of this country. My answer is simply this: There have been since 1896, I think, some forty-five by-elections; and how many seats has my hon. friend got out of the forty-five? Just three seats. And he claims this as evidence that the present government had lost the confidence of the country. I cannot but express my amazement at the hon. gentleman standing before this House and declaring that there was not injustice, that there was no wrong in the gerrymander Bill of 1882. In my humble opinion it would require a man with as much brass as there is in any of the statues on Parliament Hill to stand before this House and make a statement of that kind. The people of this country know, and the hon. gentleman himself knows well, that that Bill was introduced into this House for a purpose, and that purpose was to tie the hands of Reformers, and to so distribute the Conservatives in Ontario that they would control an undue number of constituencies. It did have this effect at the time; and the government of which the hon. gentleman was a member held office supported by men who were elected by that gerrymander Act, and who, in all probability, but for it, never would have entered parliament at all. Now, all that the present Bill proposes to do is to go back to the system of county boundaries. Any man who will take the map of Ontario and go carefully over the bounds of the different constituencies must come to the conclusion that no other object could have been in the minds of those who hatched that Bill and passed it through the House than to gerrymander the municipalities into such forms as would give the government of that day an advantage over their opponents. It bears evidence of that intention upon its face. The hon. gentleman says that in the last election in the province of Ontario, the Conservatives polled more votes than the Reformers, and yet the Reformers retained a small majority of representatives. But he does not count fairly the votes cast in constituencies where three candidates ran.

He takes all the votes that were cast in the constituencies, Patron and Independent, and counts them as Conservatives; as long as they were cast in opposition to the nominee of the Reform party he counts them all as Conservatives, and in that way he tries to establish that there was a majority of Conservative votes cast. Now we are ready to-morrow to meet the hon. gentleman on the public platform in the province of Ontario or in the Dominion of Canada, on fair and equal terms. But I have known that hon. gentleman for many years, and I have never known him yet to be ready to fight a fair and honest battle. He is always anxious and ready to take any advantage that he can get over an opponent; he is always anxious and willing to tie a Reformer's hands behind his back and then challenge him to come on to a duel. What kind of manliness is there about that? The gerrymander Act that was put on the statute-book of this Dominion in 1882 is one of the blackest pieces of legislation that was ever enacted by hon. gentlemen opposite. I won't say that it is the blackest spot in the whole history of the Conservative party, because there are many very black spots, but it is one of them. They took advantage of their opponents at that time; and I say to those hon. gentlemen in the House now, who were in the House at that time, that it is certainly no credit to them to have let that Bill pass. It never should have become law. Had I been favoured with a seat in this House at the time that Bill was introduced, I would have talked till my tongue was as thin as a sixpence before I would allow the hon. gentlemen opposite to pass a Bill of that kind, I certainly would. I say that one of the blackest pages in the history of the Dominion of Canada was the passage of that Bill.

Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman says that the government is not ready to go before the country and face the same constituencies that they did before. We want to do the people justice, we want to see that the people's votes, when they are recorded, will tell in the direction in which they are recorded. But in the gerrymander Act now in force no such justice can be obtained. Take my own riding. I have the honour of representing three counties; I am in the county of Wellington, I am in the county of Dufferin, and in the county of Perth. A more barefaced piece of trickery never was attempted on any man than was attempted on me after I was nominated in North Wellington. The sitting member actually took away a township which gave a very small majority of Reformers; and he put into my riding a township that gave 194 Conservative majority for the purpose of beating me. It was done for no other purpose, it was done for the purpose of rounding out the boundaries of the constituency. On its face it bears the proof that the object of taking that small township and putting it into my riding, and taking out another that gave a Reform vote, was to beat me; that was the object for which that constituency was gerrymandered. And yet the leader of the opposition, who is in his 79th year—and I am glad to see that at that age he is as strong and healthy as he is—but I am amazed to realize that he can now get up and defend a barefaced injustice such as that gerrymander Act of 1882. I suppose he has a glimmer of hope that he may come back to power in Canada. Now, let me tell the hon. gentleman that the people of Canada have not forgotten the record of the party that he leads. That record is before them in black and white. They have not forgotten the McGreevy scandals and the other extravagances that were brought home to the Conservative party when he was a member of the cabinet. I would fully expect that if that hon. gentleman came back to power, the first Bill that he would introduce would be a Bill to abolish the ten commandments. Take for instance, the commandment: 'Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour.' Why, Sir, on every platform upon which the hon. gentleman has set his feet, from the prorogation of parliament down to this minute, there is not one commandment that he has not violated. Take also the commandment: 'Thou shalt not steal.'

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I think the decencies of the debate render it absolutely necessary that you should interfere to enforce the rules of this House. The hon. gentleman has called me a liar, in so many words. He says I never go upon a platform without violating that commandment. Now, if that is permitted in this House on one side, I can assure hon. gentlemen on the other side that this House will hear some very unpleasant truths.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think that the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) is rather straining the rules of debate.

Mr. McMULLEN. Well, Mr. Speaker, if you hold that it is against the rules of the House, I am willing to withdraw it; but I am sorry that you did not allow me to go through the entire list because I think I could have proven before I sat down that he had violated every one of them.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I again call the attention of the Chair to the fact that a member of this House, instead of complying with your demand that he should withdraw his statement, has offered an insult to you and to this House as well.

Mr. McMULLEN. I distinctly withdraw the statement, but in doing so I expressed the regret that the rules of this House did not allow me to proceed, because I felt quite sure that I could have proved that he had violated every one of them. That is all I said. Mr. Speaker, I may be allowed—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am perfectly indifferent to anything that that hon. gentleman may say, and I only regret that I am obliged to pay so much attention to it. But I say that this House will become a disgrace to Canada if you permit such disgraceful statements to be made by any hon. gentleman.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think that I need to add anything to my first statement, I think the House understands the position. I hope the hon. gentleman will respect the amenities of debate sufficiently to avoid a repetition of such language.

Mr. McMULLEN. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that there is any man in the House of Commons that has taken greater liberties in discussing public questions than the leader of the opposition.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Speaker, after you had given your ruling the hon. member for North Wellington repeated that if he had been permitted he could prove that the leader of the opposition had violated every one of the ten commandments. I say, Sir, such a disgraceful statement has never been made in this House.

Mr. SPEAKER. I may say that the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) has not taken his objection well on this occasion, for those are not the words that I heard the hon. member for North Wellington use.

Mr. FOSTER. If it is parliamentary, I think it is well that we should understand what is going to be done in this House with the connivance of the members of the government.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. FOSTER. Every one of the members of the government.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. McMULLEN. My hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, enjoys more liberty and privileges in debate in this House than any other hon. member. I do not wish to violate the rules of the House, and if, in anything I have said, I have violated any rule I am quite willing to withdraw it. I would like very well to take my seat for a moment and allow the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) to get up and state to this House what commandment of the ten he has not violated.

Mr. SPEAKER. I cannot allow these statements to be made. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) means to keep within the rules of debate I hope he will do so.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Speaker, I would ask that the words of the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) be taken down.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. McMULLEN. I withdraw everything about the ten commandments.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the words of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) be taken down.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is out of order in making that proposition after the time has passed.

Mr. FOSTER. After you allowed him.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must simply say that while I am willing to tolerate a great deal, I cannot accept statements made in this form. I must ask hon. members to respect themselves, to respect this House, and to conform themselves to the rules of debate.

Mr. FOSTER. If there ever was an hon. member of this House who respects neither this House nor himself it is the hon. member for North Wellington.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. FOSTER. I have been twenty-two years in this House and I have yet to hear an hon. gentleman on either side of the House get up in this House and make such outrageous, blackguard statements as the hon. member for North Wellington.

Mr. HAGGART. This is the only place he dare make them.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. FOSTER. Nobody but a blackguard would do it.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Mr. Speaker, I think these words should be taken down. I am sorry that any hon. gentleman, occupying the position that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) does in this House, should make such statements, and I think that they deserve to be taken down.

Mr. SPEAKER. Now, I think we have an example of the difficulties that arise when hon. members forget their positions in this House.

Mr. TAYLOR. Members of the government forget theirs.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think we had better recall ourselves to the debate, and allow the hon. member for North Wellington to proceed.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Speaker, I will ask you a question before the debate proceeds. On what ground do you refuse my request to have the words of the hon. member (Mr. McMullen) taken down?

Mr. SPEAKER. Because it was not asked at the time, or until subsequent events had transpired.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) had no business to use these words towards me. I am not speaking of the statements he made against the hon. leader of the opposition. I called your attention to his statements in regard to myself immediately.

Mr. SPEAKER. Correctly or incorrectly, that closes the question in reference to this appeal.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I have merely remarked that the words of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) be taken down. I do not want to press these things extremely. I think the hon. gentleman spoke in heat, and I think he should at once arise and withdraw the very improper words that he used.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think that the debate might be allowed to proceed. I fear that in both cases we have exceeded those proprieties that should prevail in this House.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Mr. Speaker, I insist upon my hon. friend withdrawing the words he used. I think, in all conscience, that the hon. member should withdraw the expressions, and that he should be required, by you, Sir, to withdraw the words used. I hope, inadvertently, because, I am sorry that any hon. gentleman, in his position, would use such words in speaking of an hon. member of this House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) ought to have been the first person to rise and call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the outrage that was committed against the proprieties of this House by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). I think he should have risen then and not now come to the rescue and endeavour to protect him from the consequences of a statement that I think he would have found it very difficult to have been able to sustain.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I ask your ruling, Mr. Speaker, on the point. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) must withdraw the words that he used.

Mr. BERGERON. The Chair has already ruled.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Chair has already ruled, and the ruling is that the debate should proceed.

Mr. McNEILL. The Chair has so ruled more than once.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Mr. Speaker, I moved that the words be taken down, but the motion was not put. If necessary I will repeat that motion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. On the contrary, after you had made that motion, Mr. Speaker stated that the debate should be proceeded with.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Mr. Speaker, we must have a ruling, because, if that expression is parliamentary it may be used hereafter by others. An hon. member of this House has made the statement in regard to another hon. member that nobody but a blackguard would use the language that he was using.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Can you controvert that?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I hope the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) will act the part of a gentleman and let me proceed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Do you controvert that?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I wish to know by the Speaker's ruling whether such language is parliamentary or not. If not, I insist that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) who used it, shall withdraw it. If the House can be subjected to insults of that kind with impunity, and if parliamentary rules will not protect it we must resort to means to meet that language.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, if you will allow me I will make my statement. The hon. member for North Wellington went away entirely from the subject in hand and commenced an attack upon my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) here and stated in the House—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Then withdraw the expression.

Mr. FOSTER. May I make my statement without being interrupted?

Mr. SPEAKER. I think this is only prolonging an irritating discussion. The practical question, and I feel that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) will confirm what I say, is, that the language he used was not such as was parliamentary, or as should be repeated by any hon. member in this House.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I bow to that statement which is eminently fair and perfectly just, and here is the statement that I want to make. There is an hon. gentleman on the other side of the House—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is not the question.

Mr. FOSTER. I will make my statement if Mr. Speaker will allow me. There is an hon. gentleman on the other side of the House, the hon. member for North Wellington, who went aside from every ground of fair debate in this House—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. FOSTER.—and not only charged one, but two hon. members of this House with having violated every commandment of the ten. He did not withdraw that charge, and if it is going to be shotgun work from one side it will be shotgun work from the other side.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. member (Mr. Foster) is incorrect in making the statement that the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) did not withdraw that statement.

Mr. WALLACE. Both statements.

Mr. SPEAKER. He withdrew these statements.

Mr. FOSTER. He made it ten times worse.

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes, I admit there is a little ground for that, but, unfortunately he does not stand alone. I think this is one of those cases in which I may fairly ask the House to respect what we all feel is the dignity of the House. We must either agree or not that we will preserve the amenities of debate, and I have simply to ask hon. members to drop this whole matter and respect themselves and respect the House.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Mr. Speaker, do I understand that the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster), has withdrawn the expression that he used?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) has two ears, and he heard what I stated. I stated that, and I will not state it again.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. In that case I will proceed with the motion that his words be taken down.

Mr. McNEILL. I think that is a distinct challenge of your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair.

Mr. SPEAKER. I understand the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) not to undertake to defend these words.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not propose to get up and say so every time, if these gentlemen do not keep their ears open to hear me.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. If you, Mr. Speaker, understood him to withdraw, I accept your statement, of course.

Mr. SPEAKER. That is my view.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Do I understand you to say, Sir, that you understood him to withdraw?

Mr. SPEAKER. That is my view.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Very well, then.

Mr. WALLACE. Do I understand—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order; let us proceed to business. I think I made the statement sufficiently plain for my hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace).

Mr. WALLACE. Has the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) withdrawn the statement he made against me?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Mr. Speaker understood him so.

Mr. McMULLEN. I claim the protection of the Chair; I have the floor.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Sit down.

Mr. McMULLEN. I was discussing the question—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order, please. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) has raised the question, whether the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) withdrew the statement that he made respecting him, namely, that the hon. member (Mr. Wallace) had broken all the commandments. I need not say that if the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) made that statement in the House, it should be withdrawn.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Withdraw.

Mr. McMULLEN. Anything that I have said that is contrary to the rules of the House, I am quite willing to withdraw. Now, Sir, with regard to the question before the House—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; withdraw.

Mr. SPEAKER. My hon. friend (Mr. McMullen) should deal with the specific statement, because if that statement were made in the House it should certainly be withdrawn.

Mr. McMULLEN. I understand that I have withdrawn.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. McMULLEN. Am I to get down on my knees before the hon. member and beg his pardon?

Mr. BERGERON. That is about what you should do.

Mr. McMULLEN. I want to say with regard to the Bill under discussion, that it is a fair and just Bill. It wipes out the unfair and unjust conditions under which the Liberals suffered for eighteen years, and it returns to county boundaries; a principle which bears some semblance to justice. This Redistribution Bill which we hope to repeal was intended to diffuse the Conservative voters throughout the country and to give the Grits. Its object was well carried out. The leader of the opposition tells me that if I want to get a correct idea of his views upon that Bill, I had better read his speech of last year, if I have forgotten it. Well, I am glad to say that I have forgotten a great deal of what the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) said in this House, because if I did not, my memory would be loaded up with a tremendous amount of rubbish. I have forgotten most of what he said on this Bill, but I know he strongly appealed to the Senate last year to throw out this Bill. The Liberals want a fair fight. We do not want to play with loaded dice, but the Conservatives have used loaded dice against us for eighteen years, and it is about time there was an end to that. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) tells us that the Senate is acting within its rights when it throws out a manifestly honest and fair Bill like this. The Senate may have the power to do it, but I deny that it has the right, and there is a good deal of difference between having the power to do a thing and exercising the right to do it. The Crown of England has the power to throw out every Bill we pass in this parliament, but we all know that under our constitution it would be a very injudicious thing to exercise it. This Bill passed the Commons last year by a large majority, and the Senate showed their partisanship by throwing it out. Compare the action of the Senate last year with its action on the Bill of 1882. Although the vicious features of that Bill were exposed in this House, and condemned by the press of this country, in some cases by the Conservative press, yet the Senate of Canada was then so partisan that it ran that Bill through the Senate in about thirty minutes. If the Senate has the same character to-day as it had eighteen years ago, then it is a partisan Chamber, under the thumb of the leader of the opposition. If the Senate of Canada is going to carry out his commands and to act under his nod, it is right that the people of Canada should know it. The hon. gentlemen (Sir Charles Tupper) commends them for what they did last year, and he fancies that by rubbing them down the right way, complimenting them upon their powers and their exalted dignity, he can get the Senate to repeat their conduct this year. The people of Canada have sent to this Chamber a majority of men supporting this government, but the leader of the opposition thinks he will nullify the will of the people by appealing to a partisan Senate. The Bill is going to pass this House—

Mr. SPROULE. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) refers to the Senate as a partisan Senate, and I want to ask you, Mr. Speaker, if that remark is not unduly reflecting on the Senate?

Mr. McMULLEN. That is no point of order, and I shall proceed with my speech.

Mr. SPEAKER. It occurred to me that the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) was sinning more in failing to address the Chair, and in addressing directly the leader of the opposition across the Chamber. On the other hand, I think we have a right to respect the position which the Senate occupies as a recognized branch of this parliament under the constitution of the country.

Mr. McMULLEN. I respect the Senate, Sir.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. McMULLEN. Let hon. gentlemen opposite permit themselves to possess their souls in patience until they hear what I have to say. I respect the Senate in so far as the Senate is entitled to respect. I accord every member of the Senate that respect he is entitled to as a member of the Senate, but I do not admit that the Senate is so far removed above the reach of the elected representatives of the people of Canada in this Chamber, that we dare not mention the name of the Senate here. We have a right to indulge in criticism of the action of the Senate, just the same as they have a right to discuss any Bill that we pass in this House. We do not deny them that right. I contend that the Senate is not removed to a position which takes away from the representatives of the people, the right to discuss their course. I do hope that the Senate, with credit to themselves, and in view of the verdict of the people of Canada, will act more in accord with public sentiment. My hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, has said that the gentlemen occupying the Treasury benches are trembling in their shoes, knowing that their fate is sealed, knowing that when they appeal to the people they will be swept from office. The hon. gentleman feels sure that he is going to be returned. He does not appear to remember that out of forty-five by-elections the opposition only carried three, and the government forty-two. That of itself may be accepted by the Senate, I think, as an indication of the will of the people. If the Senate are going to set themselves up in direct opposition to the expressed will of the people, we want to know it. We are willing that they should take that position, if they wish to do so. They may have the power, but I question their right. We live in a democratic age, when people like to rule themselves and will rule themselves. We live in an age when, if we have a constituted body which openly violates that principle, some means will be found by which the will of the people will prevail. I believe that time is not far distant. I am not threatening the Senate; I only say that in my opinion, they should take cognizance of public opinion, and be guided by it; and the public opinion of this country has in the most unmistakable way, declared that the Bill introduced by the government, is a right one, and should be endorsed. Now, Sir, I plead with my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition. He should endeavour to cultivate a little fairness toward the government in the position he occupies. He should begin to admit that there was a gross injustice done to the Reform party of this country in 1882. If he does not admit that, he certainly looks through a pair of coloured spectacles; for no man who is possessed of a reasonable amount of fairness could think of defending such a measure. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) is prepared to defend it, as well he may. He sits here by virtue of the passage of that gerrymander Act, and he knows it. The same is true of many other members of this House. It may not perhaps, be parliamentary, in the course of this debate, to name these hon. gentlemen, but they are here by virtue of that Act, and they know it, and my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition knows it. He knows perfectly well that if the Bill now before parliament becomes law, it will undoubtedly place a certain number of his supporters in such a position that they will have to fight for their political lives, as they have never had to fight before. The Reform party have had to suffer from this measure for eighteen years; we have had to fight with our hands tied behind our backs, and it is time that we should get relief, and we intend to press for relief. I was amazed to find my esteemed friend, whom I have known for many years, and whose ability I acknowledge, standing up in this House and defending that abominable gerrymander Act of 1882, and refusing to support a Bill that simply goes back to county boundaries and recognizes the limits of municipalities as they existed before. I know that some hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House will be ready to get up and say that the Mowat government gerrymandered.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McMULLEN. I said before, and I say now, that if they did so, they did wrong; but they never departed from county boundaries.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. McMULLEN. My hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson), says 'Oh.' I will answer him, by reaffirming what I said, that they did not depart from county boundaries. They divided municipalities in some cases, but county boundaries they maintained very well. There may have been an exception to that rule.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McMULLEN. My hon. friend will admit that a rule would cease to be a rule, if there was not an exception to it. There may have been an exception; if there was, I do not know where it was; but as a rule the Ontario government maintained county boundaries, and that is what we should do here, instead of playing the political game of euchre, such as was played in 1882. It was a reflection on the Conservative party of this country, and I believe my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, will gain more votes in Ontario by acknowledging the wrong done by that Bill, than he will by going on the public platform and endeavouring to defend it. If he rises like a man and says: 'I confess that the Bill of 1882 was a gross injustice to the Reformers of Ontario, and I am prepared to correct that wrong and return to county boundaries,' I believe my hon. friend would make more friends than he will by attempting to defend one of the most villainous pieces of legislation ever put before this House or any other. I have not lost confidence in the Senate. I believe that after they give the matter full, mature and independent consideration, free from the influence of the hon. leader of the opposition, they will come to the conclusion that while they have the power, they will be exercising a very dangerous right, if for a second time they reject legislation affecting the representation of this House, a matter with which they have no direct connection whatever. We want to cultivate the most kindly and friendly feeling towards the Senate; but I say that their course is such as to cause a deep and serious feeling of bitterness between themselves and this House, for which they must assume the sole responsibility. We have not attempted to treat the Senate in any discourteous manner; we want to maintain a kindly feeling towards them to the end; but we want them to exhibit the same feeling towards us. We want them to realize that we are sent here directly by the votes of the people of this country, that we are responsible to the people, and that we have to return to the people and ask for their endorsement of our actions. They should learn to respect the democratic idea which the people of Canada so much appreciate, and that is that the people must rule, and that any Chamber which endeavours to set at naught the will of the people cannot possibly retain the people's confidence and respect. I hope that this Bill, notwithstanding the address of my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, and the venom with which he resented its second introduction, will receive the serious and prudent consideration of this House and be dealt with in the Senate on its merits and not on partisan grounds. My hon. friend has said that as we will have a census in 1901, that is the proper time to bring in a

Mr. McMULLEN.

Bill of this kind. But, Sir, this Bill is simply for the purpose of directing in what manner the readjustment shall take place after the census. In the meantime, it brings us back to the old county boundaries, and after the census is taken, the readjustment will be made within those boundaries. That is all we want. In some constituencies, I admit, there will be a large number of Conservatives and in others a very large number of Reformers, but you cannot so arrange that in every constituency there will be a fair percentage of each. One constituency may elect a Reformer by 1,700 or 1,800 of a majority, and another a Conservative by a similar majority. But that is a condition of things that cannot be avoided. But the feature of the old Bill that was so vicious was the placing of minor municipalities in such a position that they would be sure to elect a member in sympathy with the government. That is what we object to. I represent one of the worst gerrymandered ridings in the province of Ontario, but my people have a spirit of justice in them, there is not a finer lot of electors in any constituency in Canada—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. McMULLEN. I will match my constituency against any other in the Dominion for honourable, upright electors—men who will do what they believe is just and right; and in 1882 they so resented the gerrymander Act that they rose in their might and elected me in opposition to a prominent member of this House belonging to the opposite side. Why? Because they were hostile to the attempt made to beat me out of a position to which they thought I was fairly entitled. And although my hon. friends opposite fought me bitterly—I do not blame them for that—my people returned me; and if there is one thing I am proud of, it is the fact that in that riding there are men who in past years were in sympathy with hon. gentlemen opposite, but who have continuously supported me since the gerrymander Act of 1882. They resented that Act and came over to our side then and have never gone back since, and never will. I have a constituency 75 miles long and 15 miles wide, but in one place you could put your foot on both sides of it, it is so narrow. The municipalities are linked together, not for the sake of convenience, but for the sake of party advantage.

I could not sit still and listen to the tirade of the hon. leader of the opposition this afternoon. Let me say a word of warning to the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster). His statement with regard to me on the floor of this House is locked up in my memory and he will get the benefit of it some time. The rules of the House will not allow me to give him the benefit now, but let me tell him that some day he will realize that he has made a mistake. I have said all that I want to say on the question, and I hope that the hon. leader of the opposition will treat with courtesy a Bill of such evident fairness as this one.

Mr. N. C. WALLACE (West York). I had not intended addressing the House on this question, because after the speech of the leader of the opposition I considered the whole of the ground was covered. But the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has chosen to make some remarks to this House, and in so doing has just exceeded his ordinary vernacular, and exhibited certain traits of his character more clearly than he has ever done before in this House.

He told us that the constituency of West York would justify this Bill, because I am sitting here by virtue of the gerrymander Act. That statement is on a par with every one the hon. gentleman has made, but I tell him that the constituency of West York has identically the same boundaries to-day that it had the year I was born, which was a good many before 1882, and that its geographical boundaries have never since been changed.

Mr. McMULLEN. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I will offer a word of explanation.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not think I should.

Mr. McMULLEN. I merely wish to say—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. WALLACE. There are many hon. gentlemen opposite to whom I would extend every courtesy and consideration, which one gentleman should to another, but the hon. member for North Wellington is, I think, distinctly out of the pale. I repeat that the statement of the hon. gentleman that I could justify the gerrymander Act because I was one of the beneficiaries is a statement absolutely without foundation. It is untrue in every particular. It is like every statement the hon. gentleman has made to-day, because every other statement he made was quite on a par with that one. I repeat that the boundaries of that constituency have not been disturbed for more than 50 years and are geographically the same to-day as they were at that time, with this exception that when the Liberals were in power, half of Richmond Hill was in East York and half in West York, and the whole was changed to West York by the Liberal administration. Now, Sir, he refers either to the leader of the opposition or to myself as his 'esteemed friend.' I think that for myself, and I am sure for the leader of the opposition, I can repudiate any such assertion or any such familiarity. I do not think that either the leader of the opposition or myself have sunk so low or ever will sink so low as to permit such an expression to be used by the member for North Wellington. Like all other members, no doubt, in going through the world, I have met all sorts and conditions of men; but, Mr. Speaker, I have never in my career met such a low-down blackguard as—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. WALLACE. I repeat it—

Mr. CASEY. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. TAYLOR. He does not mean you.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman from West Elgin (Mr. Casey) is a little premature; I have not finished my sentence. If he will wait until I have finished my sentence he can then rise to his point of order. I can assure the hon. member for West Elgin that I had not him in mind just at the particular moment when he interrupted me, though I shall have a few words to say to him afterwards that will fit his case very well. I may say that, in my travels through the world I never met a low-down blackguard who would use such language as I have listened to to-day.

Mr. CASEY. I think, now, Mr. Speaker, that my point of order comes in.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) should not refer in such a way to any hon. member; and, I would urge him to avoid all personal allusions.

Mr. WALLACE. I am speaking in general terms of people outside of this House; and, I repeat what I say—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, chair.

Mr. CASEY. I rise to a point of order, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) will please sit down. He said that he never heard a low-down blackguard who would use such language as he has heard used to-day. As only the leader of the opposition and the hon. member for North Wellington have spoken, he must refer to the remarks of one or of the other, and in either case, I say, his language is unparliamentary and must be retracted.

Mr. WALLACE. I adhere to the words I used, which were not exactly the words used by the hon. member for West Elgin.

Mr. CASEY. I call for the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. SPEAKER. I may be mistaken, but I think that the sense of the hon. member's (Mr. Wallace's) statement was that he had not met a low-down blackguard who would use the language he had heard here. If I am correct—

Mr. WALLACE. I did not say 'here,' but I said the language I had heard used to-day.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman's statement has no reference to anything that occurred in the Chamber, of course, I cannot rule; but I think I may appeal to the hon. gentleman's sense of propriety and sense of fitness not to make any personal allusions.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

Mr. WALLACE. No.

Mr. CASEY. Well, then, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) can not go on.

Mr. WALLACE. The Speaker's ruling is different from that of the hon. member for West Elgin.

Mr. CASEY. Then, I did not catch the Speaker's ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member (Mr. Wallace) said he did not refer to any language used in this Chamber.

Mr. CASEY. I did not hear the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) say that.

Mr. WALLACE. I know the rules of the House, and the hon. member for West Elgin does not appear to be very familiar with them. I carefully avoid breaking the rules of the House, because I respect those rules. I am only sorry that the hon. member for North Wellington has so openly and flagrantly violated those rules to-day. But, Sir, what can be expected—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order—I must ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) not to make any personal references.

Mr. WALLACE. But, Mr. Speaker, I have to make them. The hon. gentleman has made personal reference to me, and I am replying.

Mr. SPEAKER. He withdrew the statement he made with regard to the hon. gentleman. I think I may ask the hon. member (Mr. Wallace) as I must ask every member, to discuss the question on its merits. I think I may fairly ask the whole House to come back to the question.

Mr. WALLACE. I am going to stick closely to the question. I say the hon. member for North Wellington justifies this gerrymander Bill. He said that it is no wonder that I endorsed a previous measure, because I am here by virtue of a gerrymander. I wish to point out that he did not know what he was talking about. Am I in order now in doing that, Mr. Speaker? I think so. That is all I propose to do. As for any personal reference, Sir, I assure you, I would not touch him with a ten-foot pole. I have no desire to get any closer to him than I am now, and if I could get further away from him in this House it would be a great pleasure to me indeed. Why, it is no wonder the hon. member for North Wellington advocates this Bill. Nor is it any wonder that he is able to point to the fact, that, as he says, forty-five elections have been held since the general election of 1896, and we have only won three of those elections. Well, I suppose about sixteen of those elections were of ministers going back to their constituencies for re-election. In those cases, there is scarcely ever opposition offered. Then we have fifteen members of this House who resigned their positions to accept office, who violated all the principles that they have laid down by solemn resolution, and violated the proposed provisions of the Bill, brought in by the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) that there should be no appointments of members of parliament to office until after a certain term—

Mr. SPEAKER. That is hardly the Redistribution Bill.

Mr. WALLACE. But, Mr. Speaker, no less than four times did the hon. member for North Wellington refer to the fact that forty-five by-elections had been held, repeating his remarks on that subject in order to kill time. Surely, in replying to him, I am quite in order. And, Sir, does not everybody in this country know that the member for North Wellington has been looking for office? First, we know, he was looking to be made a member of the cabinet. But the First Minister and those who have the direction of such affairs knew very well that, while sometimes they made cabinet ministers of pretty queer material, yet, if they brought in the member for North Wellington they would be laughed to scorn. And do we not know that he has been running down the gamut of the offices since—Minister, Lieutenant Governor, Senator, any office at all. He is afraid to go back to North Wellington and meet his constituents again, because he knows that the tide of public opinion is running against the government of the day, and against their supporters, and more particularly is it running against himself; for, if there is one member of the Liberal party to-day who has utterly belied every profession he has made since the first day he came into parliament down to the time when the Liberals came into office, that member is the member for North Wellington. Why, Sir, has he not declaimed on the highways and the byways about the extravagance of the Conservative governments? When they expended thirty-seven million dollars on current expenditure and three or four millions on permanent expenditure, he called that ruinous and frightful extravagance. But what did he do the last session of parliament? He voted for sixty millions where he said forty millions was altogether beyond the means of Canada, altogether unjustifiable. He dare not go back to his constituents and meet them, because his constituents are intelligent men, and they took him for an honest man when they elected him. He protested in every place that he was honest, he held up his hands with holy horror at anything approaching dishonesty. But as soon as the Liberals came into power he became the subservient tool of the government, he has been their defender in parliament and out of parliament. Why, if he had any conscientious convictions, if he believed what he said during all these years, what would have been his course as an honest man? He would have denounced the wrong-doing of his political friends as he denounced what he termed the wrong-doing of his political opponents. So, I say that the member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), looking for position, grovelling in the dirt in order to get an office, no matter what it may be—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. 'Grovelling in the dirt' is too strong language, and should not be permitted. I ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw that phrase.

Mr. WALLACE. Well, Mr. Speaker, if you decide that 'grovelling in the dirt' as applied to the hon. member for North Wellington—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. WALLACE. I am in order. I have no desire to do the slightest thing that is out of order. I have the greatest regard for parliamentary rules and desire to keep within those rules. I shall withdraw that expression and use another, if I can find other words that will express the contempt that I feel—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Order.

Mr. WALLACE. Order? I am quite in order—the contempt, I say, that I feel for a member, for any man who goes about the country declaiming against acts of wrong-doing and then turns around and condones acts ten times as bad when performed by his political friends. That is the case of the hon. member for North Wellington.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman had better confine himself to the question under discussion. These personal matters always lead to trouble.

Mr. WALLACE. Well, Sir, I would not have got on my feet at all had I not intended to refer to personal matters; because the speech of the leader of the opposition was all that was required in the shape of argument concerning the Bill that was introduced by the Postmaster General. Sir, that Bill is lacking in every essential qualification of a proper Redistribution Bill. It is lacking in that one great vital principle that has been, if not the ruling element, at least one of the chief considerations in every Redistribution Bill brought before the parliament of Canada, and that is the principle of representation by population. It totally ignores that principle, it does not recognize it in a single line. But, Sir, that is one of the things that commends it to the member for North Wellington. You remember, Mr. Speaker, in the old days when the Liberal party were going up and down this country and saying that representation by population was the great feature of government that should prevail in this country. It has prevailed, and it is prevailing now. But it will not prevail any longer if this Bill becomes law. The Bill, I say, totally ignores representation by population. Though the Bill of 1882 did not carry out completely the principles of representation by population, almost every change that was made in it tended to extend still further that principle.

Now, Sir, to go back to another statement made by the hon. member for North Wellington, and I have done with him. He says that there have been forty-five by-elections, and that the government have carried all but three of them, which calls attention to the fact that they won the constituency of Brockville. Does any member of this House to-day think those constituencies were fairly won, knowing the facts that have already been disclosed in the county of West Huron, knowing the facts that have been already disclosed in Brockville, and in other counties that have been snatched from the Conservative party, not by honest means, but by performing all known villanies, all the illegal and unlawful acts, stealing ballots, stealing the franchises of men, in fact, committing every crime in the calendar in order to get hold of those constituencies? Then, they have the effrontery to get up in this House and say that public opinion is with them when they know that they have not gained those constituencies by fair and honest means. We are willing to go back to the constituencies that have placed these hon. gentlemen in power on the ministerial benches, we are prepared to go back to-morrow. But the hon. gentlemen are not prepared to go back to the constituencies that sent them here, they are not prepared to go back to-morrow, either. They are between the devil and the deep sea.

An hon. MEMBER. Order.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, I think that is a classical quotation. Now, Mr. Speaker, this is the dilemma the government are in to-day. There is the province of Ontario, where they will have to appeal to the people immediately, but they dare not appeal to the people of that province any more than they dared appeal to the electorate of Manitoba a few months ago. They know that the result would be the same in Ontario as it was in Manitoba, therefore, they do not dare to go to the province of Ontario alone. The game is to combine the provincial election in Ontario with the provincial election in Quebec, along with the Dominion election, all in one. Then, they will go to the people because they dare not trust either one of the elections alone. But no matter how they get up this combination, we can whip them either one by one, or we can defeat them all in a bunch. I say this gerrymander Bill is brought in in order to relieve them of these difficulties, and in order to make the constituencies to their liking. It is not arranged in accordance with any recognized principle that can be justified in this country. But, Sir, they will not succeed. The Senate has done its duty before, and the Senate, I have no doubt, will nobly do its duty again.

Mr. GEO. E. CASEY (West Elgin). Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) who has just taken his seat, has certainly treated us to the sort of speech that we expected from him. He started out by saying that he did not consider that he owed any courtesy to the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), and he certainly did not show any of that quality in the course of his remarks. One does not intend to follow that sort of thing to any great extent, to make too much reference to the language that has fallen from the hon. member for West York. One has a certain amount of scruple about what one touches or handles in any way. One cannot touch pitch without being defiled, and one cannot enter the lists of argument with a certain class of orators without being soiled to some extent. There are one or two things, however, which should be said in justice to the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen), who has been so wantonly assailed. The hon. member (Mr. Wallace), used language which he managed to make parliamentary by saying that he did not refer to anybody in this House, at least, that he had not said it referred to anybody in this House. It is worth while to quote his statement that he never knew a low-down blackguard who had used such language as he had heard used to-day.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the statement was ruled out and withdrawn, and I think it would be wisdom on the part of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey) not to refer to it.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Speaker, I did not understand that it was withdrawn; I understood the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) to say that he did not refer to anybody in this House, and that, therefore, he did not have to withdraw the statement. That I understood to be your ruling; therefore, I think it is a subject of remark by anybody who is answering the hon. gentleman. The only remark I intend to make about it is, that I do not intend to discuss the question of the hon. gentleman's familiarity with persons of the class to which he refers, or to inquire how intimately he knows them, or to point out to the House how fully he has adopted the style of speaking that might be expected from those persons whose style he refers to.

He says that the hon. member for North Wellington has been seeking for this, and seeking for that, and could not get anything. I think that all of us who know the hon. member from North Wellington, will pay no attention whatever to any language of that kind, but it is due to him to state openly here, that such language has no meaning at all, as applied to the hon. member for North Wellington. Said the hon. member for West York, further: They do make cabinet ministers out of very queer material, but they draw the line at the hon. member for North Wellington. Well, Sir, it is not long since, another firm had the business of cabinet making in hand for this country; that eminent firm now sitting on the opposition benches constructed several cabinets, a series of cabinets, generation after generation. They did, certainly, take in some queer material for cabinet ministers, but they drew the line at the hon. member for West York. He got on the doorstep of the cabinet; he sat there, out in the cold, but he never became a cabinet minister, and never would have done so, if the government had remained in power for ten years more. Even those who were so little scrupulous in their choice of material for cabinet building drew the line at the hon. member. We do not wonder why. That is quite sufficient for me to say about that hon. gentleman.

I want to say a few words about this Bill. I have to recur to the point that this is not a Redistribution Bill, in the ordinary sense of the word; it is not a Bill to divide the constituencies of Ontario, fairly as they ought to be divided, according to their present population. It is a Bill to remedy, as far as possible, the mis-distribution that was made in 1882 and 1892, and which this government and party pledged themselves to remedy, as soon as they got into power. They are doing their best to keep that pledge before the next elections. There is no doubt that the great majority of the members of this House will back them up in their effort. If the other House, at the urgent request of hon. gentlemen opposite, proceed to throw this Bill out a second time, the responsibility will be on their shoulders, and not upon the shoulders of the ministers of the Crown, nor of their supporters in this House. If a census had just been taken, we might consider more fully, on what principles a redistribution ought to take place, whether county boundaries should be invariably adhered to, whether the principle of representation by population should be made a leading point in the scheme, or whether we should consider, rather, the natural association of groups of communities of people for municipal and other purposes. I am inclined to think, that the latter is probably the more important consideration of the two, and in seeking to remedy the gross injustices of the present Bill, we are bound to consider that rather, although, not to the exclusion of the principle of securing something like the equal representation of the people according to population. With that in view, we have to look rather to the maintenance of county boundaries than to absolute equality.

But, it has been claimed on behalf of the present scheme of distribution, that the principle of equality of representation was followed. There could not certainly, be any more baseless claim put forth. Let us take the immediate neighbourhood of the riding of the hon. gentleman who spoke before me; let us take the county of York and the immediate vicinity. How was the county of York divided? It was divided into three constituencies, two of which were made, as the authors of the scheme fondly hoped, absolutely safe for the Conservatives, leaving one that could possibly be carried by the Liberals. East York and West York, were intended to be safe Conservative hives; North York, it was thought, might be left as an outlet for some of the Liberals whom it would be inconvenient to include in the other two constituencies. Therefore, instead of making them all approximately equal in population, they put the greater part of the county into East and West York, and added to each of them a large slice of the city of Toronto, making up the population of North York by the addition of districts from Simcoe, with the result that the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Tyrwhitt), is a constituent of the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), the member for North York. As to the equality of population, the figures stood thus at the time the redistribution was passed: East York, 35,000 odd; West York, 41,000, almost exactly; North York, 20,284. In other words, the constituency of this hon. member, who has the audacity, the cheek to stand up in the House this afternoon, and say that he is in favour of representation by population, is twice as large as the constituency of the hon. Postmaster General, and it was made twice as large in order that it might be made a safe seat for himself and men of his type. The adjacent riding of Peel does not show any great signs of a desire on the part of the authors of the gerrymander to secure equality of representation, because Peel has a population of only 15,460, while the adjoining constituency of West York has a population of 41,000. Is it not trying our patience too far, that men who are guilty of continuing an arrangement of that sort should stand up here and pretend that they are in favour of representation according to population?

Let us now consider what happened in the constituencies immediately surrounding that which I have the honour to represent.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Six o'clock.

Mr. CASEY. Let us now consider, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, that it is six o'clock.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 43) respecting the Grand Valley Railway Company, and to change its name to the Port Dover, Brantford, Berlin and Goderich Railway Company.—(Mr. Charlton.)

REPRESENTATION IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. G. E. CASEY (West Elgin). Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair at six o'clock I was referring to the group of counties surrounding my constituency of West Elgin. The constituencies of Bothwell, of Kent, the Middlesexes and the Elgins were all very seriously gerrymandered by the Redistribution Act of 1882. And, Sir, they were gerrymandered in a way that was evidently intended to accomplish what it did accomplish for a number of years, namely, the misrepresentation of the population of those districts in this House. Middlesex, which formerly was divided into three constituencies, was in 1882 divided into four, one of which, to wit: South Middlesex, was made a reservoir for as many of the Liberal electors as could with any show of decency be poured into it. The other Middlesexes were divided up so that it was hoped that they could all be carried by Conservatives, which happened as a matter of fact at every election down to 1896. Bothwell in like manner in 1882, was changed by putting two townships on to West Elgin, which between them gave from four to five hundred of a Liberal majority, and by other changes which I do not propose to detail at this moment; but it was hoped that these changes would make it impossible for the Hon. Mr. Mills ever again to be elected in that constituency. That object was realized apparently at the first election succeeding the gerrymander, when another gentleman was returned, but was afterwards unseated on petition. From that time on Mr. Mills had a very hard fight until 1896, when the gerrymander had its perfect work, and the result was the return to the House of the present

hon. member for that constituency. West Elgin, of course, was made by this change a perfectly safe seat for some Liberal, the lot having happened to fall on me, though it would have been equally safe for any one else who obtained the nomination. Let us look at the population of these different constituencies to see if they were arranged to carry out the principle of representation by population, which it is claimed, is the principle of the existing law. In 1891, Bothwell had a population of 25,600, East Elgin 26,724, West Elgin 23,925, East Middlesex 25,569, and Kent 31,434, a total population in these five constituencies of 133,252, or an average of 26,600. Coming to the other divisions, we find their populations, in 1891, to have been as follows: North Middlesex 19,090, South Middlesex 18,806, and West Middlesex 17,288, an average for these three constituencies of 18,360, or a difference between the average populations of the constituencies in the two groups of 8,000. It cannot be pretended that any desire for equality of representation dictated the fixing of these constituencies in that shape in these three adjoining counties. Now, up to 1896, three of these Middlesexes returned Conservative members, so that in the group of eight there were four Conservatives and four Liberals returned. In 1896 there were five Liberals and three Conservatives returned. Now, let us look at the figures of the votes cast. The total majorities of the five Liberal seats amounted to 2,026, and the majorities for the three Conservative seats amounted to 661, making a Liberal majority of about 1,400 in that group of counties, with only five Reformers returned against three Conservatives. Up to that time, from the time of the gerrymander Act of 1882, they had returned an equal number of Conservatives, although the vote had been about the same as it is now.

My deduction from the figures of this group is that these constituencies were not arranged so as to secure to every voter equal representation in this House. They were not arranged so as to show the real political complexion of the district they were to cover. They were arranged so as to make it convenient and easy to elect Conservatives in a number of them, and, admitting the sad necessity of electing a Liberal here and there, to shove as many Liberals as possible into those constituencies where Liberals would be elected anyhow. This is one of the grievances we complain of. I need not go all over the country. There will be time to do that at a subsequent stage of the Bill. But I will confine my remarks for the present to these two groups to which I have referred—what I may call the peninsular group and the York group. I pointed out before dinner how evidently the York group was gerrymandered for party purposes. I omitted to note one point, that is, the large urban population which was put into both East and West York, for the purpose no doubt of making them secure Conservative seats; for at the time the gerrymander took place the manufacturing districts had a great fear of the party now in power. It has not turned out so deadly to them after all. The urban population of West York by the last census was about 22,000, and that of East York about 17,000.

It is grievances like these which the present Bill is intended to deal with. It is alleged that it is only a partial and incomplete measure; and that must be admitted. It is what the doctors would call a local and palliative measure. It is not intended to cure what may be called the constitutional disease of the whole system, but to palliate and moderate its effects in certain directions where that is possible. Consequently this Bill only touches those constituencies that were gerrymandered for obvious party reasons in 1882 or 1892, and does not apply to the whole country. Another objection raised against the Bill is that this is not the right time to introduce a measure of this kind—that we should wait until after the census is taken. That objection is covered by the same remark, that this is not a general redistribution Act—not such a one as should be introduced after a census; and therefore it is as timely now as it would be at any other time. It is to remedy something that we consider wrong, and it is always time to right a wrong. I think this view of the case will commend itself not only to the majority of this House, of which we are reasonably certain, but also to a majority of the people of the country at large. It is highly probable that there is not as much feeling amongst the people to-day on this subject as there was just after the gerrymander was perpetrated. The worst of outrages ceases to be felt so much after a length of time, the people learn to work together, and to a certain extent the grievance is not as acutely felt as before. But it is there all the same. A grievance which allows a district with a Liberal majority of 1,400 to be saddled with three Conservative members out of eight, is one that is real, and even though it be not so keenly felt now, is none the less unjust and outrageous. It is quite possible also that the passage of the present Act will arouse a certain amount of ill-feeling in some constituencies, that, perhaps, will object to being put back into the form they should have had eight years ago. But, nevertheless, we would have had the satisfaction of knowing that justice was done. In my constituency, for example, there are many who would deeply feel a disruption of the present union between a part of Elgin and a part of Kent. We have got accustomed to work together, and agree most harmoniously, and I am sure that not only myself but those who reside in the part of the constituency where I reside would feel keenly the loss of the western portion of that constituency.

Mr. CLANCY. Would the hon. gentleman feel it keenly?

Mr. CASEY. I have just said that I would; I would feel keenly the loss of these constituents, whom I have found the perfection of what constituents should be. But, nevertheless, I am so fully convinced that this Bill, as a whole, will do justice and right and restore to the people of the districts affected the equal power and privilege they ought to have, that I am prepared to meet that loss and to go back for reelection to a constituency much more difficult than the one I have now the honour to represent. Whether I shall succeed in ever representing it again, under those circumstances, I do not know, but I am willing to take the risk, and support this Bill because it is required by honour and justice and in fulfilment of the pledges we gave our constituents when elected in 1896. For these reasons, I support the Bill, and hope it will go through this House and escape the dangers which hon. gentlemen opposite are trying to prepare for it in the other branch of the legislature.

Mr. J. H. BELL (East Prince, P.E.I.) Mr. Speaker, last session I spoke on this question from the standpoint of the province of Ontario. To-night I propose to confine my remarks to section 5 of the Act respecting representation from Prince Edward Island. We have no reason to complain in that province of having been gerrymandered in 1882, but we do complain of what was done in 1892. In that province we have roughly speaking, an equality of the political parties—one-half Liberals and one-half Conservatives. The political pendulum swings one way at times and another way at other times. We Liberals claim the majority of the votes, but for the purposes of this argument, we will assume an absolute equality exists.

There was a deliberate attempt in 1892 to gerrymander Prince Edward Island by the same party who manipulated Ontario in 1882. Our geographical position was not such as to allow a gerrymander to be perpetrated with the same facilities as in Ontario, but the intention was the same, and we were gerrymandered to the fullest extent possible. The object aimed at was this. Assuming an equality of the votes, the question was in what manner a preponderance of representation could be given the Conservatives. In what way could Prince Edward Island be made to return three members out of five to the House of Commons. That was the problem presented to these gentlemen. How did they attempt to solve it? Simply by creating two Grit hives, one in West Prince and the other in West Queen's. That left what they considered three fairly strong Conservative constituencies. The constituency of West Prince was made up of fifteen townships. These according to geographical position, would number from 1 to 15 consecutively. But they passed over 15 and took 16 into West Prince. Why? Because 15 could be relied on to give, as it always had done, a hundred or more of a majority for the Conservatives. Therefore, 15 must go to East Prince to help make that secure to the Tories. That was not all. A portion of Queen's County was added to East Prince. Lots 20 and 21 lay most contiguous. But these were passed over and lots more remote—lots 29, 30 and 67 were selected. Why? Because more strongly Conservative than 20 and 21. The net result was they formed East Prince into the shape of a huge triangle extending some fifty miles on one side along the Straits of Northumberland and some six or seven miles on the Gulf of St. Lawrence. But they fixed it as they thought and intended into a safe and solid Conservative riding.

This will give an idea of one of the difficulties the Liberals of East Prince had to overcome in electing a supporter of the government to the House of Commons.

This Bill proposes to remedy the wrong and to remedy it in the only way by which it can be done, namely, to revert to county lines that obtained for eighteen years after confederation, and to have two members represent the county of Prince, two the county of Queen's, and one the county of King's. As long as we have only five members, this is the only possible fair arrangement that could be made. In reverting to county boundaries we are not giving Liberals any party advantage. We simply say to Prince County: Elect your two members; and to Queen's County: Elect your two members. We propose a fair field and no favour—a condition of things to which no honourable man will object.

But the gerrymander was not the only wrong perpetrated against us in 1892. At that time our representation in the Commons was, as I submit and will prove, wrongfully reduced from 6 to 5 members. What condition of things faces us in Prince Edward Island to-day? In 1891, on the basis of population, we had not enough by 5,422 to give us 5 members. At that time the unit of representation was 22,900. But as the 5,422 did not amount to half the unit—it did not affect our representation—we were still entitled to 5 members. At the census of 1901, suppose the same condition of things holds in the future that has obtained in the past, we shall be entitled to only four members. In another decade or so we may be entitled to only three, and so it will go on until the representation of the province of Prince Edward Island will be politically reduced to zero. Is that the condition of things that was intended when we entered the union, or was it not intended that the province should have six members for all time, and if her population increased relatively to the other provinces sufficiently to justify an increase of representation, she should have that increase?

This is the question which stares us in the face, and it is a question I shall now attempt to answer. We must bear in mind the distinction between general terms and special terms of union. In 1867 confederation took place between Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick—the charter being the Confederation Act. There is no question about terms on which these provinces united. They are expressed in the British North America Act. If the population, say of the province of New Brunswick becomes less in proportion to the other provinces than it is, the representation must be reduced—because it is so declared in the bond.

Mr. FOSTER. I rise, Mr. Speaker, to ask your ruling on a point of order. The Prime Minister set out the other night with a very good rule that we should be particular about points of order. I notice the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bell) has a notice under date of February 20th:

That in the opinion of this House, under the terms of confederation, Prince Edward Island is now entitled to be represented in the House of Commons of Canada by six members instead of five.

It seems to me that, while this is on the Order paper, the hon. gentleman is precluded from dragging the question in at this time.

Mr. SPEAKER. The only misfortune in raising the question is that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bell) seems to have got through discussing the question.

Mr. FOSTER. I think he has only started. But if the point of order is well taken, it applies whether the hon. gentleman is beginning, is half through, or is near the end of his address.

Mr. SPEAKER. Undoubtedly the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bell, P.E.I.) has no right to discuss a question at this time, of which notice has been given.

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.). I am discussing the question as it is presented in the Bill before the House. I have a right to discuss it as it comes up in the Bill, even though it may be affected by a notice of motion to be discussed later. I do not think I am in any way out of order.

I was proceeding to point out that the four provinces forming the original confederation became united under general terms. But the provinces that came in afterwards came in under special terms—Manitoba, British Columbia and Prince Edward Island. They came in, under a provision in the British North America Act, allowing other provinces to enter—not on the general terms, but on special terms to be set forth in their petition when they sought admission to the union. I can best illustrate my point by first examining the conditions under which British Columbia and Manitoba entered confederation. In the first place, take the province of British Columbia—

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.)

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, did we get your ruling on the point of order I raised?

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes; I think undoubtedly the hon. member (Mr. Bell, P.E.I.) has no right to discuss material that is the subject of a separate notice of motion. I must also say that in listening to the hon. gentleman, it seems to me he is not discussing the redistribution, but the relative merits and representation of the provinces that form confederation. That being so, I am obliged to rule that his remarks are hardly applicable to the Bill now before the House. Unless the House consents to his going on, I shall be obliged to stop the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.). Of course, Mr. Speaker, I submit to your ruling.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. If I might be permitted to refer to the matter, I would point out that this Bill was introduced, as I see by the Order paper, on the 9th of February. The hon. gentleman's (Mr. Bell's, P.E.I.) motion was not put on the Order paper until the 20th of February. It seems to me, therefore, that anything that would be germane to this Bill would take priority, as a matter of right, over a subsequent notice of motion.

Mr. SPEAKER. I might say that, as a matter of fact, I noticed the difficulty when the hon. member (Mr. Bell, P.E.I.) began to discuss the question. But I was unwilling to interfere with a comparatively new member of the House in dealing with a matter of interest to him, unless the question was raised. But, all the same, I feel that as soon as my attention is drawn to it, I have no alternative but to call the hon. member's attention to the fact that it is a violation of the rules of the House to discuss a question covered by another motion which is on the paper.

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.) Unless I am permitted to proceed, I will be precluded from discussing the merits of the Bill now before the House. Section 5 only proposes to give us five members. I claim we are entitled to six. The point is of vital importance to the province I represent. No rule of this House can possibly be construed to choke off the fair and full discussion of a Bill, notwithstanding there should happen to be a dozen notices on the Order paper bearing on the same point. But of course I have to respect the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.). I do not propose to spend any time in discussing the Bill, I am going to treat the House to a very short speech indeed. The leader of the opposition, who voiced the objections of this side of the House to the Bill in question at the last session, a Bill which I believe was exactly the same as the Bill now before the House, went very fully, as I did also, and a number of members on this side of the House, into the demerits of the Bill. and their views, I think, have not undergone any change in the few months that have passed since that time. It is clearly useless, so far as this side of the House is concerned, simply to go through the form of voicing in a contracted or abridged way, or even in an extended way, the arguments which were used last year, and which, so far as the discussion has extended this year, have again been used on this occasion.

The gentlemen on this side of the House are opposed to the Bill from conviction, and are opposed to the Bill on the matter of the Bill itself, and are also opposed to it because of the circumstances under which it is introduced. Without taking the extreme constitutional point, which has much in its favour, that it is not contemplated by the constitution that a redistribution should be made except as based upon changes in the population ascertained by a decennial census, it was not, I believe, the intention of the founders of confederation, that parliament should undertake a redistribution of the seats at any time it chose. If that principle were introduced, contrary to all precedents from confederation up to this time, every victorious party in a parliament would change the basis of representation at any time it wished, before a general election, and the temptation would be strong indeed to pack the jury in this way, and to get advantages for a party by a redistribution made systematically with that view, and largely in its own interests.

But if the Bill of last year, as the leader of the opposition pointed out, was a dangerous Bill, in that respect, and an unnecessary Bill in that respect, the absurdity of its introduction this year is much greater than it was last year, because almost in the very same breath that you propose the passage of this Redistribution Bill, you also propose machinery for taking the census. When the census is taken, as it will be taken in 1901, it does not take many months to get the population upon which legislation of this kind is based. So at the longest scarce two years will pass away, scarcely two years could pass away, before this parliament would be in a position to follow out the precedents from confederation downward, and pass a redistribution upon information it possessed, with reference to changes in population, as established by the census. The absurdity, then, of bringing in this Bill in the very same breath in which you bring in a Bill making provision for the census, and the certainty that changes in the population will render another redistribution necessary when the population is ascertained is an additional reason why this House should not pass this measure at the present time.

The opposition to the Bill is based in the first place upon the character of the Bill itself. Hon. gentlemen start out with very strong and righteous indignation against what they call a gerrymander; and yet there is not one of them in this House who has not, in the province to which he belongs, supported gerrymanders, which in essential points have been entirely indefensible. Whether you take the province of Manitoba, in which were instances which were largely discussed in the campaign, which took place there not many months ago, whether you take the province of Ontario, or go down to Prince Edward Island, you will find in each of these, gross instances of the changes of constituencies, of setting aside or merging portions of constituencies into others, simply and solely for the purpose of making it easier for some hon. gentleman belonging to the party, to be elected. I say in all these three provinces you will find numerous instances of that. What took place in the province of Manitoba? The Hon. Mr. Greenway, just a little while before the last session of the legislature closed, when he knew and felt that in that province, he was going to have a difficult time for re-election in his own constituency, simply went to work and cut off from his own constituency three distinct portions, in which there was a very considerable Conservative majority, and added them to the constituency of a friend of his own, a little to the south of him. In that way, although he brought in no general gerrymander Bill, and left a large number of constituencies entirely outside the basis of uniformity of representation by population, he endeavoured to save, and probably did save, his own election in the district of Mountain. Well, Sir, I do not think that the present Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), had anything to say in reprobation of that glaring gerrymander by Mr. Greenway; but every Manitoba Liberal who supports the party in this Dominion, supported Mr. Greenway in his gerrymander, and supported him in the election which came on, based, so far as he was concerned, upon that gerrymandered district.

The same holds good with reference to the province of Ontario, and the same holds good with reference to the province of Prince Edward Island. In New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, I do not think any distributions have been undertaken of late, at least by the local authorities. Therefore, these gentlemen who proclaim that it is their intense desire to right wrongs with reference to the distribution of seats, which has not been done, as they allege, on the basis of population or county boundaries, every one of them, when they look back, find that they have been supporting, and up to this present, do support still more glaring cases where it has been done in the interest of their own party in the different provinces from which they come. These gentlemen profess a great desire to keep the representation by population, yet the Bill they have brought down to this House offers the most glaring instances where the principle of representation by population is totally ignored, and where the most glaring differences with reference to electoral population in the different constituencies are shown in various parts of the province of Ontario. Then these hon. gentlemen are very strongly in favour, as a theory, of a judicial redistribution, as they call it, and whilst they play to the eye of the public, on the assertion that they are handing it over to the judges, they are making of the judges simply, little more or little less, than mere recording clerks to carry out what they have already arranged and settled as the principles of their redistribution. So that, instead of anything in this case being consistent with the principles which they have professed, as to carrying them out into the legislation that they propose, they are inconsistent in all of them, and are not carrying out any of them in that legislation. Therefore, we are opposed to the legislation itself. As I said before, we are opposed to the manner of its introduction at this particular time; we think it would be far better that it should be left over until it is necessary. We believe that a redistribution should be closely confined, as I believe it was understood at confederation, to the redistribution which becomes necessary after ascertaining at each decennial period that a redistribution is made necessary by the changes in population. Now, we do not propose to take up the time of this House and keep hon. gentlemen opposite from the legislation of the country which is pressing upon them, and which, I believe, they profess to have a great desire to see carried out. We propose, therefore, to take ourselves out of the way, and in order to make our protest and to bring this matter to a speedy and plain decision, as far as we are concerned, I have the honour to move:

That the Bill be not now read a second, but that it be read a second time this day six months.

Mr. FOSTER.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Mr. Speaker, I would not have intervened in this debate were it not for some observations which the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) chose to make this afternoon, having special reference to myself. I do not think the House can congratulate hon. gentlemen upon the tone, or temper in which the discussion of this Bill has been received. I do not think the debate this afternoon was in any way creditable to this House. I regret exceedingly that language has been used which will reflect extreme discredit on the House all through the country, and I the more regret it inasmuch as many of these expressions fell from leading members of the opposition from whom better things might have been expected. I heard with very great pain and regret certain remarks that were made respecting one of the most respected and respectable members of this House. I have had the honour of sitting with that hon. gentleman in this House for about nineteen sessions, and I venture the assertion that there is no hon. member on either side of the House, who, generally, is accepted as a more respectable member of this House, or who conducts himself with greater propriety than does and has done the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). He is an hon. gentleman who deserves a great deal of credit at the hands of hon. members of this House, and I will tell hon. gentlemen opposite, that, neither in this House, nor in the country, will the reflections which they chose to make upon that hon. gentleman meet with approval.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) does not choose to give way, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) cannot interrupt him.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Mr. Speaker, I do not see any reason for any interference at present by the hon. member for North York.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). West York.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. West York. I have to apologize to my hon. friend (Mr. Mulock) for coupling his name with that of the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace). I am voicing the opinion of every hon. gentleman on this side of the House, who has been associated with my hon. friend (Mr. McMullen), a gentleman whom I am proud to call my friend, when I say that his conduct, since he entered this House until today, has been everything that is creditable and deserving. These hon. gentlemen who made such a violent, such a virulent and uncalled for attack upon him have earned very little credit for themselves, and will earn very little credit for themselves, either in this House, or in the country.

There are two objections taken to this Bill by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), who has just sat down, and who has moved the six months' hoist. One was the constitutional objection which, with all his acuteness he did not dare to argue. He referred to the provisions of the British North America Act which provides for a readjustment of the representation of the several provinces at the completion of every decennial census. That is a specific, clear and distinct duty which parliament has to perform, but that clear, constitutional, statutory duty has nothing whatever to do with the readjustment of the boundaries of counties. The latter does not affect the representation of the several provinces, and therefore, I say, it is an argument that I have never heard an hon. gentleman who values his legal or constitutional reputation dare to make, that by the provisions of the Constitutional Act, the hands of this parliament are in any way tied from revising the boundaries of any district within any province of the Dominion. If any hon. gentleman takes up the British North America Act he will see, in section 51, that, on the completion of the census of 1871, and of each subsequent decennial census, the representation of the four provinces is to be readjusted. Quebec is made the pivotal province, and sixty-five members are assigned to it. Around that pivot the representation of the several provinces is to be adjusted dependent on the returns of the census. What has that to do with determining whether one township is to remain in district A, or is to be attached to district B? Nothing in the wide world. The constitutional argument, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) has not dared to make, but which he has ventured to suggest is, in the hope that some hon. member behind him, who cannot vote for his amendment on its merits, will vote for it on the supposition that this legal point has some foundation. The hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) ventured to state this suggestion last year. What legal gentleman dares, on his legal reputation, make such an argument in this House? It is without foundation; it has nothing to do with the Bill. The redistribution of the provincial representation has nothing to do with the boundaries of districts, and this Bill neither alters, nor attempts to alter, in any way or sense, the representation which the several provinces have in this House under the British North America Act. So that, we come down to the merits of the Bill. What are the merits of the Bill?

Mr. CLANCY. None.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. My hon. friend (Mr. Clancy) says none, but he is a very strong party man, and he speaks entirely from the strong party point of view. The merits of the Bill are contained in the principles that the Liberal party have been fighting for for years. The principles are plain and they are that county boundaries should be fixed and established and should control not only the Liberal party but the Conservative party when they come to readjust the boundaries of districts. County boundaries is the cardinal principle of our redistribution, and as that principle was flagrantly violated by the gerrymander of 1882, this Bill has been introduced, in the first place, to remedy the wicked and grievous injustice perpetrated by that measure. In the second place, it has been introduced on those broad constitutional principles which should guide this parliament and future parliaments in rearranging the representation of the constituencies. It may be that when we go into committee hon. gentlemen may be able to argue that, in some particular, injustices have been done, but such particular objections, if they exist, do not affect the principle of the measure. What is the second principle we apply? We say that politics ought not to control, and that matters affecting the representation of the people which are vital principles, ought not to be bandied about to meet party exigencies from time to time. In the first place, we lay down the cardinal principle that county boundaries shall prevail, and, in case where the county is so numerously populated that more than one member should be given to it, we say: Let the judges of the land be brought in to say what the internal divisions of that county shall be. These are the two cardinal principles in this Bill, a Bill which hon. gentlemen opposite call upon this House to vote down. Another Chamber ventured to vote down these principles last year, and if this great Liberal party of Canada finds that it is impossible under the constitution of the country to carry out what they desire, namely, a fair representation of the people in this House, then they will only have to try, in the future, some other mode of obtaining their object.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Hon. gentlemen opposite exclaim 'Oh.' I ask them: What do they suppose the great Liberal party of Canada, representing the vast majority of the people of Canada is going to do under such circumstances?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Are they going for all time to submit to the dictation of a Chamber which does not either directly or indirectly represent the people of Canada? Is the voice of the people of Canada to be forever silenced, by the vote of a Chamber which is utterly irresponsible. We lay down principles which not only can be defended, but which must commend themselves to the good judgment of every member, no matter on which side of the House he sits. And, Sir, if a Bill embodying these just principles is persistently thrown out for party reasons, then some other method must be resorted to for obtaining the rights of the people.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Sir, if the Conservative party with a majority in the other Chamber determine that the intervention of the judges will not be permitted, then this House of Commons will have to take the matter into their own hands and make the division themselves. Perhaps that may better suit hon. gentlemen opposite. That will be for the future to consider, but I do not despair for one that the Upper House after a year's reflection on the arguments advanced, will come to a more just conclusion than it did before. I believe they will come to the conclusion that they are stepping beyond their bounds and interfering in a matter which specially appertains, and solely appertains to the members of this House. I believe that they will reconsider their determination to oppose the two cardinal principles, first of county boundaries, and, second, the intervention of judges to decide how the county boundaries shall be subdivided in cases where it is necessary. I shall say no more, Sir, on the general principles of the Bill, because they are pretty well understood by hon. gentlemen of this House.

The leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) attempted to administer a lecture to me this afternoon. A lecture, forsooth! He lectures every one in the House. One would suppose that he was the supreme ruler and arbiter of the conduct of hon. members in this House; where they should go, where they should speak, on what subjects they should address themselves, and with what propriety they should address themselves to a meeting of electors gathered together for the purpose of returning members to a provincial legislature. Sir, I have, at least, as much right to address the people in Prince Edward Island at a provincial election, as the leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) had to trot away, against the wishes of his party, and to thrust himself into the Manitoba elections. He was not wanted there. It was an open secret that the party did not want him. He went there against their will,

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

and he delivered addresses with the idea of promoting the interests of one party as against the other. I make no apology at all for having gone to Prince Edward Island, to address the electors there. It was in the case of two hardly contested districts where the majorities have always been very close and very narrow. The hon. gentleman's party had the good fortune to carry them this time and he consequently formulated an attack upon me. What did the leader of the opposition say? He said that I had gone into Prince Edward Island and told the electors that if they did not vote for the government I could not answer for the expenditure of public money. He said that I should be impeached for that. Why, the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) does not know what he is talking about. He talks so much that he really does not know what he is saying. I made no such threat as he implies. I told the people of Prince Edward Island, with reference to the construction of a bridge across the Hillsborough River, that it was a work which was being constructed partly by the Dominion government and partly by the local government, under a provincial statute authorizing the provincial legislature to contribute $400,000 or more, and under a Dominion statute authorizing this government to contribute the balance necessary. There had to be an agreement between this parliament and the legislature of Prince Edward Island on that. The Conservative party in Prince Edward Island had put themselves on record in the legislature, that the construction of that bridge was premature, and I simply read that resolution to the electorate, and I said: If you vote in favour of the candidate who supports the party that formulated this resolution, you are postponing the construction of this bridge, perhaps indefinitely. Was not that a proper argument to make? Could any one find objection to that? Sir, my prediction may unfortunately prove true; I hope to heavens it shall not. The hon. gentlemen opposite did elect their men, and if the Conservative party for once in their lives prove true to the principles they enunciated, they will oppose the construction of that bridge, and if they get a majority the bridge will not be built, and where will the people be then? I simply pointed out these facts to the electors, and for doing that the leader of the opposition attempts to administer a lecture to me. He had better reserve his lectures for those who sit around him. He had better keep his advice for those who ask for it. I did not ask for his advice. He talks about Prince Edward Island, and he is good enough to say that, perhaps, there is a possibility of my being returned, but that no one else supporting the Liberal party will be returned from that province. Well, Sir, that is a very old and stale story. I heard in 1882 that I had not a possibility of being elected. Every Tory newspaper in the Dominion proclaimed: There is no possibility of Davies being elected. Well, Sir, I was elected to this House then. In 1887 they said that I was out of the race, that it was a farce to run me; but I came back here with a thousand majority. In 1891, they said: Davies cannot be elected, but that prediction was like the prediction of these hon. gentlemen opposite to-day, supremely silly. Again, in 1896 they said: I could not be returned to this House. They had carved my constituency up; they gerrymandered me after 1891; they thought they had made my defeat sure, but they were nowhere when the people were appealed to. I came back here with a majority of 375 from the west half of the county of Queen's.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. These hon. gentlemen opposite are making the same predictions to-day in the hope that they will deceive some foolish people throughout the country. They are predicting day after day and year after year what they are going to do, but my hon. friend (Mr. McMullen) gave them their answer this afternoon. Forty-five by-elections have taken place since we came into power, and these gentlemen opposite have succeeded in holding three of them. That is the record they have in the past, and in the face of that record, they ask us to assume that they will sweep the country at the coming elections. There is not a vestige of a chance of it, and they know it. They have not the faintest hope of it in their hearts, and they know it. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) knows it well, and I do not think many months have elapsed since, it is currently rumoured, he gave that advice to his leader; and better advice he never gave him.

Mr. FOSTER. It is wonderful what a lot you know.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not intend to take up the time of the House any longer. I rose for the purpose of refuting the absurd calumny which the leader of the opposition uttered in this House to-night, and which I hope he will be ashamed of when he sees the explanation. I rose also to point out to the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), that so far as his constitutional argument is concerned, it has not a thread of foundation in fact. So far as justice and the merits of the Bill before the House are concerned, there is not an honest man in the country but will acknowledge that on the two cardinal principles on which the Bill is based, upon the principles of equity and justice and fair play, this Bill should pass, and upon these principles alone should the representation of the people be fixed.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). I do not intend to take up a great deal of time in discussing this Bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. FOSTER. Go ahead; you have lots of time.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I shall take time to congratulate the hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster) on his courage in moving his amendment, although I cannot congratulate him on the strength of the arguments with which he has supported it. If there was anything unconstitutional in the Bill, then, of course, it should be rejected, but, as the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) has pointed out, when the Bill was under discussion last year, there was no one among all the legal gentlemen opposite who ventured his legal reputation by stating that this parliament was not at perfect liberty and within its perfect right at any time to readjust the representative bounds contained within the province. They were challenged time and again, if there were any who would venture to take that ground, and none of them ventured to take it. That being the case, we have a Bill before us which it is within our competence to pass, and therefore we are to consider whether it is such a Bill as should be passed. Let us look then at the history of this Bill, and the causes which have led the government to bring it in. In 1871, when the decennial census was taken, in regard to the representation in the various provinces the principle of recognizing county boundaries was insisted upon by the then leader of the government, Sir John Macdonald, who pointed out in very clear and strong language the advantages that accrued from maintaining county lines when we were adjusting the districts for representation. When the Conservative party departed from the principle in 1882, they did not attempt to justify the departure except on the ground, as they alleged, of maintaining representation by population. On that occasion the Conservative party cast the consideration of county boundaries to one side altogether, and therefore we justly speak of the Bill they then passed as a gerrymander Bill. In that Bill no principle seemed to be observed except the principle that was worked out by some of those gentlemen in secret, when, taking note of the political complexions of the various localities, they detached townships from counties and united them with other counties in such a way that you have to-day in the province of Ontario more than one constituency constituted of parts of three different counties. You can readily see that if you are at liberty to disregard county boundaries altogether, and select here and there without anything to tie your hands at all, you have an opportunity to gerrymander, if you choose to take that undue advantage. Some hon. gentlemen may say, is there not an opportunity, in dividing a county into two or three ridings, so as to arrange the divisions as to give an undue advantage to the party in power? I admit that there would be a possibility of that, but it would be limited wonderfully as compared with the opportunity afforded where you are at liberty to disregard county boundaries altogether and take portions of different counties to form one electoral district. But there is no possibility of a gerrymander in this Bill as introduced—why? Because the Liberal party, anxious only that the principles of justice should be subserved, that the balances should be held fairly between the two political parties, though having the same right as the Conservatives had to keep the division of the counties within their own hands and make that division in a way to favour themselves, have by this Bill put that power out of their own hands. They provide that a county entitled by its population to one member should have one member; that a county entitled to two members shall have two members; that a county entitled by its population to three members shall have three members; and that the counties shall be divided into two or three ridings respectively, as the case may be. But the government, instead of following the example of hon. gentlemen opposite and keeping the division of the counties in their own hands, select three of the highest judges in the land, and hand over to them absolutely the division of the counties into ridings, giving them no more instructions than this: Where a county is entitled by its population to two members or to three members, divide it into two districts or three districts, as the case may be, being guided alone by its population according to the census of 1891, and the contiguity of the different portions of each riding to each other. The government do not reserve to themselves the right to review the decision that is arrived at by the judges, but they declare by the Bill that the decision of the judges shall be at once proclaimed and become part of the law. That is the Bill, and if it is constitutional, I ask any hon. gentleman on what ground does he urge that it should be thrown out? He says, because you will have a census taken within two or three years, and then, under the constitution there must be a redistribution of seats. Every one knows that that is provided in the constitution, but it is in order to maintain the relative representation of the different provinces in this Chamber. But the right to regulate the bounds of the constituencies within the various provinces between the different censuses, not disturbing the representation of the respective provinces, is perfectly within our competence; and hon. gentlemen opposite are stopped not only because no legal gentleman will venture to say that this is unconstitutional, but by the fact that they themselves have passed Bills of a similar nature at other times than immediately succeeding a census. Then, we are asked, why do you bring this Bill in again this year, in view of the fact that you tried it last year, and it was rejected? Rejected by whom? Not by this House. It was carried by a large majority in this House, which is composed of the elected representatives of the people. I do not say a word, I think it would be undignified to say a word, more than is necessary in condemnation of the action of another branch of this legislature which has powers of its own. The question of representation is one that is pre-eminently within the judgment of the peoples representatives in this Chamber, and their decision we have the right to expect will be respected in the other Chamber. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite how they can consider it consistent with their dignity, as representatives of the people, to view with pleasure, the prospect of this measure being defeated in the Senate—a body not elected by the people, not responsible to the people. They are, in fact, practically making an appeal to this body, not responsible to the people, to override the will of the people, as expressed in this House. In the resolution of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) is embodied this idea: We will not take up time discussing whether this is a proper Bill or not, but let it go to the other Chamber and be killed there. These hon. gentlemen are wise in their generation, and they adopt this policy, because they cannot find anything to say against the measure. Their sole hope lies, not in argument or reason, but in the other Chamber, which they think will repeat what it did last session. In taking this view, they show very little respect for that body. They appear to think that it is impervious to reasoning and to the logic of facts. But is it not possible that the Senate, though it saw fit to defeat the Bill in one session, might, having in the interim had the experience of by-elections, in which the principle of this Bill was endorsed by the people, come to the conclusion that it has the approval of the people and refuse to again act contrary to the popular will. I trust that we are not to suppose, as hon. gentlemen opposite apparently do, that the other Chamber is composed of men who are not amenable to reason and justice. I am not prepared to admit that just yet.

We are asked: Why do you bring forward this Bill again when it was thrown out by the other House? To this I would reply that we do so because we have a direct mandate from the people to introduce a measure such as this, and do our utmost to have it carried into law. When the Liberal party attained power, they did so on a platform, and it is the duty of the government, elected on a platform, to give effect as far as possible to the principles there laid down. One of our planks was the measure we are again submitting to this House, which met with overwhelming acceptance in this Chamber, but was defeated in the other. And that measure we are bound to push to a successful issue. Because it has met one defeat is no reason why the government should not make every effort to have it passed, and if unfortunately the Senate should throw it out again this session, it would be the bounden duty of this government to introduce it again next session.

Hon. gentlemen opposite may perhaps be elected on a certain platform, though I never knew them to have one yet, and when in power violate their pledges and promises, but not so with the Liberal party. We propose to carry out our pledges. One of the planks of our platform was the abolition of the Franchise Act. That touched representation in this House as closely as this measure does, and the other Chamber passed that Bill. They recognized the fact that it stood in a different position to the Yukon Railway Bill, which they threw out on the ground, I believe, that the people had never pronounced upon it. They recognized, however, that the people had pronounced in favour of this measure for the abolition of the franchise. They knew it was one of the planks of the Liberal platform and passed the measure.

But here is another Bill quite on a par with the one I have mentioned, and equally pronounced upon by the people, equally insisted upon by the people, which seeks to apply a remedy to glaring injustice. The government have the right, it is their bounden duty, to press that Bill on the attention of parliament from session to session until it becomes law. Let me point hon. gentlemen opposite to the iniquities of the Election Act of 1882.

Mr. HAGGART. Oh.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No wonder the ex-Minister of Railways groans. When that Bill passed the House, these hon. gentlemen opposite, whose offspring it was, hung their heads for very shame. There were twenty-two amendments moved by the then opposition, each one of which recited a glaring and palpable iniquity. But in dumb silence these hon. gentlemen voted down amendment after amendment. Their only argument was: 'Call in the members,' and they voted each amendment down by 99 to 42. What were the iniquities of that Bill? I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that in that measure of 1882 every principle that should guide parliament in the redistribution of seats was laid aside. Its only object was to cripple one of the great political parties in this country. Its iniquity burns in my mind until this day. We sat here as members of this House, differing politically but meeting each other socially as men of the world, preserving the amenities and the courtesies that should always prevail among gentlemen. But when after weeks of quiet searching and steadily working at the map, the then government announced the measure, its object was at once evident. Although these hon. gentlemen were three to one in the House, yet Liberal after Liberal was steadily aimed at; and a government which had a two-thirds majority in this House strove to politically kill by this measure men they were not able to put to death in any other way.

The Hon. David Mills, who sat to your left, Mr. Speaker, an able and distinguished member of this House, was singled out, and every principle of justice outraged in order to put him to political death. The very county that I represent, which had been formerly Conservative and won over to the Liberals, and was becoming more strongly Liberal, was gerrymandered by having two townships that gave 300 or 400 of a Liberal majority taken from it and thrown into South Oxford which had already 300 of a Liberal majority. Gillies of Bruce—he too was struck at, in violation of the principle laid down of fair representation by population. The ridings of that county were made disproportionate by many thousands for the purpose of putting John Gillies to political death—and he was put to political death, by those means. Member after member on the Liberal side was struck at with a view of putting him out. Speaking here where men ought to be gentlemen and ought to like British fair play, I will tell you what we saw in this House. We saw the hon. member for North Perth, at that time, a friend and fellow-townsmen of the late James Trow, the genial Liberal whip—since gone to his rest—sitting in this House, and, lacking courage to face his own constituents, strengthen himself by throwing a Liberal township out of his own riding into North Oxford, where the Liberals had a thousand majority before. It was not a manly thing to strengthen himself in that way. Still, that might have been pardoned, lacking as it was in manliness. But that same man was a party to arranging that his neighbour in that county, the late James Trow, should be put to death politically, by having a Liberal township, having a majority of two or three hundred taken from his riding and thrown into North Oxford as well. These were the things that aroused indignation. And today we find hon. gentlemen opposite, rising in their places, or at least we found them last year, and arguing that the Bill of 1882 was not an unfair Bill, because of these counties that had been gerrymandered, many of them sent back Liberal representatives. So they did. I came back myself. Why? Not because of any grace of favour on the part of the men who introduced or carried that Bill; I came back because, though they had made the old Liberal riding of South Brant into a Tory riding, there were enough honest Conservatives there to resent such unfair tactics. They said: This is not fair fighting; we will not stand it. And they sent me back with a majority of hundreds. So it was in many other ridings. Gillies fell by the way, but under the indignation aroused by the Bill, some other members came in. But as that indignation wore away and party associations regained their influence, some of those Liberals who were first returned, have been defeated, and the Conservative party has gained the benefit of this gerrymander. That Bill of 1882 took a deep hold upon the people, Liberals and Conservatives alike. There is something in a Canadian that makes him like British fair play. Canadians do not like the idea of tying a man's hands behind his back and then challenging him to fight. They did not view with favour those who were striking at men in this House, and trying to put them to a political death—members as they were of a small minority, comprising only about one-third of the members of the House. From that day down, the Liberal party denounced that Bill. On every platform they denounced it, and pledged themselves, if they attained power, to go as far in the direction of undoing the wicked part of it as they were able to go. The Liberal party endorsed its representatives in that respect, and declared with no uncertain sound, that this was one of the first acts they looked for, should their party gain the majority. When it came to the redistribution of 1892, the Conservative party then in power, did not remedy the injustice, but increased it, in spite of the protest of the Liberals. The denunciations went on up to the time of the great Liberal convention in Ottawa, where the platform of the Liberal party was laid down; and one of the planks in that platform was that this gerrymander Bill of 1882, should be repealed, as far as it was in their power to do it. And because of that, this Bill is before the House now, to be pronounced upon by the people's representatives. If it be defeated this time, instead of it being a reproach that we brought a Bill which was defeated in another Chamber, a second time, I can only say that the people who sent us here will expect that next session the same Bill will be introduced, because it is only right that injustice shall be wiped out, and fair play shall be established. I have pointed out how the Bill of 1882 was framed. You have before you to-day a Bill framed in the spirit in which Liberals frame Bills; not a Bill based upon the determination to make use of a party majority to carve out constituencies for party benefit. There is no member on the other side who can say that Bill is aimed against him or against any one. The government has put it out of its power to do this thing. The division of these counties is left in the hands of three of the highest judges in the land. That is the distinction between the Bill of 1882 and this Bill. And I trust that every gentleman who values his privileges and his rights as a representative of the people of this country, will see that this Bill is judged on its merits. If the Bill be bad, let it be rejected, but if it be right, let it be made the law so far as this Chamber is concerned. And out, I say, upon any elected representative of the people who can view with complacency, much more with delight, the will of the people set aside in a matter which concerns themselves by a body which is not responsible to the people.

Wisely the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), says: We will not take up much time in discussing this Bill; for if the discussion were continued, the iniquity sought to be remedied by this Bill, would be pointed out, as I have pointed them out briefly, and the Bill we now propose, would so appeal to the people, that hon. gentlemen opposite would not dare to face their constituents in the discussion of it. We were told last year that this was a monstrous Bill, and I think we heard the same expression to-day. Sir, I ask hon. gentlemen representing some of the gerrymandered constituencies and famous Bill. I would like some one to go on the platform and to tell the people that the Bill we are now introducing is an infamous Bill. I would like some one to go into the township of Burford or the township of Oakland, in the county of Brant, and tell the people that an infamous measure was introduced in the House, that had for its aim and object only to declare that these people have the right to vote in the county in which they dwell. I would like to know whether the member for Perth will care to go into his riding and say that there was a Bill introduced into the House that sought to give the people dwelling in the county of Perth the right to vote within that county, and that he considered that an infamous measure. Would he dare to do it? No, the men of South Easthope and of North Easthope would resent anything of that kind. If this Bill is an infamous one, these gentlemen will have to show in what respect it is infamous in the presence of the men who, from the time their political liberties were taken from them by that Bill of 1882, have been asking for redress, for justice. These men will have to declare to them why it was they rejected it, and why they went the length even of declaring it an infamous Bill that sought to give the people merely the right to cast their votes within the municipal county in which their whole political interests lie. I will not take up the time of the House further. To say that because that Bill passed by an overwhelming majority in this House and was set aside last session by another Chamber, that therefore, it should not be introduced again, is beside the question. I say we have nothing to do with that; it is even more obligatory upon us to send that Bill there again. I do not wish at all to dictate to these gentlemen of the Senate, but I can imagine a body composed of fair and judicial men recognizing the fact that it is a Bill that retains the essential principle of representation in this House, and recognizing the fact that it was pronounced upon favourably by the people in the election of 1896, when they installed this government in power, that it was presented to them last year endorsed in this House by a large majority, endorsed by the people of the country time and again in the by-elections that have been held; and when it goes to that House again under these circumstances, I would fain believe that there is a majority there who will recognize what is proper under British constitutional government, and who will agree that the will of the people should not be set aside again. But if they should do that again, I contend that the duty of this government and of this House will be at the next session to reintroduce this Bill, and to continue introducing it until right, and justice, and equity prevail in this land, as they ought to do.

Mr. ALEX. McNEILL (North Bruce). I do not intend to prolong the discussion. I may say that we are all delighted to observe the vigour with which the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Paterson) is still able to denounce us. Mr. Speaker, I did not raise a point of order, because we had too much of that this afternoon, but I was reminded very much of a former occasion when my hon. friend opposite was even in better voice perhaps than to-night, and when I did rise to a point of order and asked the Chairman of that day whether it was in order for an hon. member of this House to make quite so much noise. Well, I think those of us who heard the discussion in this House last session, and who heard the hon. gentleman make the speech last session that he has made this session, might say in view of that exhaustive discussion, I think, without very much offence to the hon. gentleman, that after all what he has been saying is 'sound and fury signifying nothing.'

I just wish to say one word with regard to the very grave constitutional question which has been touched upon by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and by my hon. friend who has just resumed his seat. I do not think it would be right for us to allow the violent attacks which have been made on the other Chamber by these gentlemen to pass without one word of comment. Now, the position of affairs is simply this: That these hon. gentlemen opposite who know the constitution under which we live, who know that under that constitution we have a second Chamber, who know that the right and duty of that second Chamber is to revise the legislation of this House, to alter it when it requires alteration, and to reject it when they think it ought to be rejected, who know that the second Chamber has an absolute right to deal with a question such as this, who know that the Lord Chancellor of England, as was pointed out to them last session, a Liberal Lord Chancellor, in a controversy in reference to a matter exactly like this, stated that no member would venture to say that the House of Lords was not absolutely within its right in dealing with such a question as this—I say that these gentlemen knowing all this, threatened the other Chamber, they denounced the other Chamber. What they say practically amounts to this, that if they cannot be allowed to carry out their sweet will in this country they are prepared, if they are able, to tear down the constitution about our ears. That is the position of things, and I for my part do not feel inclined to allow the matter to pass without comment.

Now, so far as their talk about introducing the measure a second time is concerned, what has that got to do with it? They may introduce the measure a second time, a third time, a fourth time, a fifth time, if they like, but that does not add anything to the strength of the measure which they introduced in the first instance. They seem to imagine that there is something in introducing the measure a second time. There is a great deal in introducing it a second time, if it has been introduced a second time with the support of the people at the back of it after the people have been consulted with regard to it. But introducing a measure a second time adds no weight to the measure whatsoever when it has not received the popular sanction. The hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat tells us, that the government are prepared to introduce it next session also. They introduced it last session nearly about the time of taking the census; they introduce it this year still nearer the time of taking the census; and they say that they are prepared to introduce it next year when the census will actually be in course of being taken. While the census is being taken they are prepared to introduce this measure which deals with the condition of things existing at the census of 1891. Now, if it was necessary to introduce the reductio ad absurdum argument, the hon. Minister of Customs has done so. I do not wish to continue the discussion.

Mr. ANDREW SEMPLE (Centre Wellington). Like the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), I promise to be brief. I heartily approve of the measure that has been introduced by the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), the Representation Act, for the purpose of repealing the gerrymander Act of 1882. If the government had not introduced that measure they would have been wanting in their duty to the people. That has been a live question at every election; and just as the Conservatives in western Ontario wished to say as little as possible about this measure, the members of the opposition in this House are following out the same tactics at present. It has been pointed out by the Minister of Customs that Sir John A. Macdonald, when he brought in the redistribution measure of 1871, pointed out that he was desirous of maintaining county boundaries; and he mentioned only two cases in which that principle was departed from, and they turned out not to be a success, according to his statement. He went on to say that when a county had a population sufficient to give it one member it should have one member; where it had a population sufficient for two members, two members should be given; if the population was sufficient for three, three members should be given, while at the same time county boundaries should be the dividing line. The Liberal party desires to follow the same principle still. It is one of the fundamental planks in their platform. They know that an injustice has been done them by the infamous measure known as the gerrymander Act of 1882; and no wonder that my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), when he rises to talk on that question, should go a little further than is prudent. He felt keenly because the people of western Ontario, who have been the victims of the gerrymander, know how it has affected them. Now, Sir, that is not all. There is another question that underlies that, of vital importance. We are told by history that Canada was granted constitutional government between 1840 and 1850. That state of things continued as long as the Senate were elected, but when the Senate were not elected a change took place. One of the greatest orators in the British House of Commons, the late John Bright, pointed out that the people would regret the adoption of the system of appointing senators. There is an issue that the people will have to meet at the next election, and it is as to whether the Dominion of Canada is to be governed by the people, or by an irresponsible body like the Senate. Such action as that taken by the Senate last year was not known or heard of until the present government came into power. We remember very well that when Sir John Thompson introduced and put through the Bill known as the Criminal Code, a very long measure, which took considerable time to consider in this House, which, when it was finished, about the end of the session, was sent to the Senate, and which the other Chamber had time to take it as read, and with due formality it passed at once, and that was considered sufficient. Hon. Conservative members of this House, when they knew what was going on manifested great confidence in the Senate last session. They knew very well that there was a Conservative majority in that Chamber, and it was for that reason they had such great confidence in it, for it is really a Conservative machine. It is only fair to say that there were two Conservative Senators who considered it to be their duty to vote for the measure, after expressing their belief that this House had a perfect right to pass such a measure. It was an act of justice, and no attempt was made to take advantage of the Conservative party when the redistribution was referred to a commission of judges. I believe, Sir, that there will always be a gerrymander unless the duty is imposed upon judges to make the redistribution. Why should hon. gentlemen opposite be afraid of justice? I think when this measure comes to be discussed before the people they will take issue on the question whether this country is to have responsible government or is to be governed by an irresponsible and obsolete body like the present partisan Senate. As I mentioned before, both parties were in favour of the Redistribution Act of 1871, when the measure was passed. Since that time the Patrons of Industry, a large body of celebrated farmers, composed of Conservatives and Liberals alike, have endorsed this measure; the independent Conservatives, led by the late Mr. Dalton McCarthy, favoured the measure, and, I think, as it was passed by nearly two to one in this House last session, it was a very high-handed act for another body to veto that measure when it did not concern them, and when its passage was a simple act of justice.

Mr. DAVID HENDERSON (Halton). Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Semple), who has just resumed his seat will hail with delight the day when the Bill, before the House, becomes law. He knows very well, that, in the arrangement of the county of Wellington, a township adjoining his riding must, of necessity be attached to his riding, which now belongs to South Wellington, a township which, in itself will, at the time, give a Liberal majority of some 300 or 400. It will make the riding a safe seat for the hon. gentleman who has just addressed you.

Mr. McMULLEN. How do you know? How can you tell what the judges will do?

Mr. HENDERSON. I know this for the same reason that the hon. gentleman knows, who so recently addressed us. I had intended rising for a few moments after the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), but, I confess, that, although, I usually am able to contain myself very well,

I felt rather too nervous to get upon my feet. The roaring of the hon. gentleman sent a thrill through me that almost frightened me. I do not know what his object was, whether he thought he was going to force hon. members on this side of the House into submission by frightening them, but, it seemed to me that he had some such idea in his mind. I understand that the hon. Minister of Customs has a special object also in wishing to secure the passage of this Bill. In the Bill it is proposed that the county of Brant, which is a small county of 33,000 population, shall have two representatives; consequently, there will be two very small ridings, and no doubt the hon. Minister of Customs expects that when that change takes place he will be able to stand on the banks of the Grand River, and at a single meeting, address the whole electorate of South Brant. The hon. gentleman is a busy man, this will be of very great advantage indeed to him, and if there is an hon. member in this House who would be able to do that, and I am sure it is the hon. Minister of Customs. Although the constituency is miles square, I think it will come very largely within the compass of the hon. gentleman's voice. But, Sir, I am of the opinion that, the hon. gentleman, even with the magnificent voice which he possesses, will have to shout a great deal louder than he has done to-night before he will convince the honest yeomanry of Brant that they are entitled to a representative for 16,000 people, when, in the county of Simcoe, he is only willing to give one representative for 30,000 people. The hon. gentleman complained that there were ridings made out of three counties or portions of three counties. Well, Sir, if he complains of that he must also complain of what his friends are doing in Ontario. While he reflects upon the Conservative party in this House for making a riding out of three different counties, he, at the same time, must censure Sir Oliver Mowat and those who have been associated with him in the province of Ontario for the last twenty-five years for doing about the same thing. The Minister of Education in the province of Ontario, at the present time, sits for a riding which is made out of parts of three counties in that province, a portion of the county of Lincoln, a portion of the county of Welland and a portion of the county of Haldimand. What is right in one instance should be right in another. The hon. Minister of Customs fully endorses what Sir Oliver Mowat did; he endorses every action, right or wrong, and in the eyes of the hon. minister he was always right. I think there is very little in the argument when he talks about ridings being made out of three counties, when his friends in Ontario, for the last twenty-five years, have been permitting the same thing. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) made the statement that when we departed from county boundaries we violated all the principles of justice between party and party. I confess that I was surprised to hear the hon. gentleman make that statement because, he knows very well that the government of Ontario did exactly what he condemns, that they did make a riding out of parts of two counties. It was on this point that I interrupted him, or was disposed to contradict him, because it is a well known fact, and I will give one instance of it. Take Cardwell in the province of Ontario; that riding was hewn by the government of Sir Oliver Mowat out of two counties, taking a portion of the county of Simcoe and a portion of the county of Peel. I may be answered by saying, that the county of Cardwell had existence since confederation, and that Sir Oliver Mowat did not do that. But I draw the attention of the House to the fact that the riding of Cardwell in the Dominion parliament is not the same riding as the county of Cardwell in the local House.

Mr. CLANCY. It was changed in the local in 1885.

Mr. HENDERSON. As the hon. member (Mr. Clancy) says it was changed in 1885, and it was changed deliberately in violation of the principle that is contended for by hon. gentlemen opposite. I have no sympathy with any such cry as the invasion of county boundaries. I believe it is a higher object for us to endeavour to establish ridings somewhat even in the representation as to numbers, and where the convenience of the people is considered it is much better that we should establish a principle of that kind rather than a hide-bound adherence to county boundaries. The province of Ontario has not thought fit to observe county boundaries. Never since confederation has the Ontario legislature adopted that principle, and even where they did hew out ridings within county boundaries, there was as iniquitous a gerrymander as could be perpetrated. That principle, as I have said, has not been observed by the Ontario legislature, and we know that the legislature stands a great deal nearer to the county councils than does the Dominion parliament. There might be a reason why the provincial legislature should adhere to county boundaries, because they have to deal with county councils and the formation of counties, but they have violated the principle from confederation down to the present time, and in view of this fact there can be very little indeed in the argument that in establishing representation for the Dominion House we should adhere to county boundaries. I have no hesitation in voting for the amendment of the hon. the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), more especially as I do not consider it wise or prudent to interfere at the present time with the existing state of affairs.

Mr. PETER MACDONALD (East Huron). Mr. Speaker, I hope this will be the last time that I shall have the opportunity of giving a kick to the old gerrymander Bill. I have always taken a great deal of pleasure in expressing my indignation at such a law, and I think I have said in the House before, that it is one of the most iniquitous laws ever placed upon the statute-book of Canada. I believe that in 1882 the Conservative party designed it for the purpose of enabling them to carry the elections which immediately followed. In fact, I need not guess at that, for I know that some of the strong supporters of that Bill, openly confessed such was the case. The late Dalton McCarthy, who it was said framed the Bill, stated on the floor of this House that it was the intention of the Conservative party at that time to make political capital out of it. There was no other man in the Conservative party who was more within the confidence of Sir John Macdonald than the late Dalton McCarthy, and there was no Conservative who knew more about the intentions of the party than did that lamented gentleman. In my own hearing in this House he stated, that in forcing such legislation, the Liberal-Conservative party, of which he was a supporter, committed what he believed to be a great blunder, even from a political standpoint. I am certain that I can give you abundance of testimony to prove that the Bill was not framed with the intention of doing justice to the Liberal party, because after the Bill received its first reading here, the different Conservative associations throughout the Dominion were called upon to meet to consider if they would endorse the details of the Bill. The convention from my own county assembled in the town in which I was living, after the Bill reached the committee stage in this House. There assembled from the various parts of the county those who understood the voting capabilities of the different municipalities, and after several hours consideration, the convention determined to change the Bill wholly and entirely from that which was presented to the Committee of the Whole. The first draft of the Bill, divided the county of Huron into South Huron, Centre Huron and North Huron. The county then had a population of about 67,000, which could be divided into three constituencies, giving a little over 22,000 each, the unit of representation. That did not suit the Conservative party of the county of Huron, and the convention appointed a deputation to come to Ottawa for the purpose of assuring Sir John Macdonald that in the interests of the party a change would be necessary to carry two of the three ridings of that county. Although, Sir, we had an aggregate majority of 800 Liberals in the whole county of Huron, still these Conservative party men sought to carry two out of the three ridings by the gerrymander. The very next day after the deputation reached Ottawa, Sir John Macdonald rose in his place in the House and stated that he wished to move that another division of the county of Huron should take place, and I suppose hon. gentlemen will be astonished to learn that the new division created was the same as that determined upon by the Conservative convention held in the town from which I come. You will, of course, understand that this deputation did not come 400 miles to Ottawa for the purpose of giving advice which was not in the interests of the Conservative party. Well, the Bill passed as the Conservative deputation recommended. Instead of retaining the county boundaries of Huron, what did they do? Let me reason it out and show the object they had in view. There were three municipalities taken from the county of Huron, two of which were put in North Middlesex, and one of which was placed in South Perth. In 1878, North Middlesex returned Timothy Coughlin by nine majority, but that was considered as too close, and so they determined to give him more strength for his election in 1882. They took off from the southern portion of the county of Huron, the Township of Stephen and the town of Exeter, which in 1878 gave a Conservative majority of 115, and they placed them in North Middlesex, in order to strengthen Mr. Coughlin. Mr. Coughlin, in 1882, was elected not by nine of a majority, as in 1878, but by 109 majority, the largest portion of that majority having been taken from the county of Huron to strengthen him. Then they put Osborne township into South Perth, and at the same time they took away from Mr. Trow, who then represented South Perth, South Easthope, which in 1878 gave a majority of 193 to Mr. Trow. They placed that 193 Liberal majority in North Oxford, and then, in order to even up things, I suppose, they gave to Mr. Trow the township of Osborne, which in 1878, gave 60 Conservative majority. They took away from Mr. Trow on the one hand, 193 Liberal votes, and they gave him 60 Conservative votes on the other hand. Although Mr. Trow carried that constituency in 1882, there is not one single individual here who will say that it was by reason of the gerrymander he carried it. Sir, as the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) has said, the decent people in that constituency rebelled against such an injustice, and although many of them were Conservatives, they decided to vote for Mr. Trow to vindicate him against such an outrage. Let us look at another case. Mr. Hesson represented North Perth. His majority was getting smaller every time he ran; it was supposed to be in danger. They took North Easthope, which gave a Liberal majority of 309 in 1878, and gave it to North Oxford, and they said to Mr. Hesson, 'Now, you can afford to lose Wallace, which gave you a majority of 60, in 1878, and we will give that to North Wellington, by which we shall be sure to defeat Mr. McMullen, and in return we take from you 309 Liberal votes.' In one place they took 193 Liberal votes from Mr. Trow and gave them to Mr. Thomas Oliver in North Oxford, and they took 309 Liberal votes from Mr. Hesson, and gave them to Mr. Thomas Oliver, who in 1878 carried North Oxford by 803, thus producing in North Oxford a Liberal majority of 1,300 votes, neutralizing and destroying the influence which the Liberal party should have had in that part of the country, in that election. Does any gentleman with one single jot of sense of justice in him say that that was not done with a design? Will a single member get up here and say that was not done for the express purpose of electing the Conservative candidates? They made three divisions in the county of Huron. Instead of having a north, a south, and a centre division, as we expected, they divided the county into a south, an east, and a west division. By the returns of 1878, East Huron, had a Conservative majority of 93. That was considered to be safe. They made the west riding, according to the vote of 1878, to have a Conservative majority of 115, and they hived in South Huron, a majority of over 1,000 Liberal votes. Will any person try to explain this arrangement on any other principle than that they wished to gerrymander the county in such a way as to get their own friends in and our friends out. Is there any other inference that can be drawn by reasonable gentlemen from such cutting and carving? Not at all. In 1882 they did not succeed in carrying the west riding, because again the honest Conservatives in the west riding of Huron maintained that it was not fair warfare, and therefore, they refused to vote for the Liberal Conservative party, and Mr. Cameron was elected by a majority of 26.

In 1872, Sir John Macdonald and his party were strongly opposed to breaking through county lines, and Edward Blake, who spoke on behalf of the Liberal party, and many other Liberals on that occasion took similar ground. Sir John Macdonald presented strong arguments against breaking through county boundaries. In 1882 the Conservative party believed in that principle just as strongly as they did in 1872; but in order to secure the election of members of their own party, they broke through the principle which they had previously advocated. They maintained in 1882, that they had to break through county lines in order to make the populations of the different ridings as nearly as possible equal, claiming that the equalization of the population was more important than the maintenance of the county boundaries? Did they succeed in equalizing the population? I do not think a single member on the other side of the House will say that they did. Let me give you a few examples. We will take a group of fourteen counties in the province of Ontario: East Elgin, North Essex, South Grey, East Grey, Kent, East Middlesex, North Perth, Russell, North Simcoe, East Simcoe, Centre Wellington, South Wellington, North Wellington and West Elgin. These fourteen ridings in 1882 had an aggregate population of 365,825, an average for each member of 26,345, or an excess over the unit of representation of 18 per cent. Now, let us look at another group of fourteen constituencies in the province of Ontario: Brockville, Frontenac, South Grenville, Monck, North Leeds and Grenville, West Peterborough, North Wentworth, South Wentworth, Peel, Lennox, Cardwell, South Lanark, West Hastings, East Hastings. The aggregate population of these fourteen constituencies in 1882, was 218,965, or an average to each representative of 15,625, or 43 per cent below the unit of representation. In other words, each had 10,700 less than the average of the other group. Will any hon. member who is a supporter of that gerrymander, tell us that the object of breaking through the county boundaries was to have an equalization of the county population? The very Bill itself gives the lie to the effort of any hon. member to make that assertion good. One group had 150,000 population more than the other group, yet both groups were represented in this House by an equal number of representatives. Now, there is another point which I wish to make to show you the effect of the gerrymander upon the elections. I went carefully over the returns of the election of 1891, previous to the last redistribution, and I found that the Liberal Conservative party had polled 186,000 votes in the province of Ontario, and the Liberal party 182,000 votes, a difference of only 4,000. You would suppose, under these circumstances, that the two parties would be represented in this House by an almost equal number of representatives, say 45 to 47, for we had 92 members at that time. Was that the case? No; the Liberals, instead of having 45 and 33, and the Conservatives, instead of having 47, had 59. Why should the Liberal Conservatives have 59 members for 186,000 votes, and the Liberals only 33 members for 182,000 votes? In other words, the Liberal Conservatives for every 3,150 votes polled by them, succeeded in sending a member to the House, whereas it required 5,550 Liberal votes to secure the election of a Liberal member. I would ask hon. gentlemen if that does not prove beyond contradiction—and no one, although I have made use of these figures before, has ever attempted to refute them—the unfair character of that measure, and the necessity for its repeal. It has been said by some hon. members that this subject never came before the people, and that consequently the Senate had a right to throw out the Bill. But that is not the case. In the last elections, it was one of the most important questions discussed on the public platform, and we declared over and over again that we would not be worthy of a seat in the House if we did not bring in a measure to repeal this iniquitous gerrymander Act. This question was discussed on every hustings, and Conservative candidates were so struck with the strong feeling of the people against the Act that they dared not defend it before the people. Therefore, we are justified in our belief, that we are expressing the sentiments of the people by the Bill now before the House, and that we are bound to press it on the attention of the Upper House until we compel that House to accomplish the will of the people.

Mr. McINERNEY. I was not moved by the same feelings as the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) expressed, when I had the pleasure of listening to the stentorian tones of the hon. Minister of Customs. The hon. gentleman may deafen me, but I scarcely think he scares me. I would recommend to the hon. minister to read again that admirable advice of Hamlet to the players, in which he says :

O ! it offends me to the soul, to hear a robustious periwig-pated fellow tear a passion to tatters, to very rags, to split the ears of the groundlings.

I think I may be permitted to say that the hon. minister put a good deal more squeal than skill into his argument. I do not wish to say anything offensive to the generous, good-hearted, boisterous Minister of Customs, but I think I am warranted by the tone of his speech to-night in making those few remarks.

Turning to the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) it seems to me he should be the last man to find fault with the leader of the opposition for having criticised him concerning his political meanderings. Why, the hon. minister himself has boasted of his ubiquity. He calls himself the Minister for Everywhere. He came to the county of Kent a few short months ago, to hold a meeting in a little village called Kingston. He came in company with the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, or rather the Minister of Railways and Canals came from the north, and the Minister of Marine from the south ; and when Cleopatra went to meet Antony, she went not in any such splendour as the Minister of Marine did when he went to meet the Minister of Railways—each of them in a palace car going down to the small village of Kingston, over 27 miles of a branch railway, and each of them with a brass band. That is the way the two hon. gentlemen attacked the very humble village of Kingston.

Mr. FOSTER. Two palace cars ?

Mr. McINERNEY. Yes, two brass bands, two palace cars, and two ministers, but only one small meeting. When the Minister of Marine and Fisheries got to the meeting he began his remarks by saying that he might be called the Minister for Everywhere. Why, he said, one day I am in London, the next day in Washington, the following on Lot 7, Prince Edward Island, and here to-night in Kingston. I may be rightly called the Minister for Everywhere. Well, two or three days later the hon. minister's Attorney General was defeated in Prince Edward Island, and also another gentleman nominated by him. And I may be permitted to say that if things go on in the Island, as they have been doing of late, instead of being called the Minister for Everywhere, the hon. gentleman may be soon called the Minister for Nowhere.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

The Minister of Marine invoked two great principles in support of this Bill—representation by population and county boundaries.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did not refer to representation by population at all.

Mr. McINERNEY. I understood the hon. gentleman to have done so.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. McINERNEY. Well, county boundaries and division by judges, were, I think, the two great principles on which the hon. gentleman insisted. They were the corner stones of this great Bill. The Liberal party stand in the white light of a great principle in Ontario and denounce it in the maritime provinces. They shrink into the shadow of the principle when they come into the maritime provinces, as I can prove by the hon. gentleman himself and by other hon. members on that side. They say that they wish to maintain county boundaries, and they do it in Ontario, but what about New Brunswick. They go into the county of the city and county of St. John, represented by Mr. Ellis and Mr. Tucker, and there denounce that principle, because they divide the county of the city and county of St. John into two constituencies, and in that way destroy the very principle they invoke in Ontario. Then in Ontario they say where any county has more than one representative, we will see that it is divided by judges into electoral ridings. That they proclaim as a party principle in Ontario. But when they go into Prince Edward Island, they denounce that principle, because that province is divided into electoral ridings already, and instead of leaving it as it is they say : We will bring the province back to the old plan and have two representatives for Queen's, two for Prince, and one for King's. In that they ignore the principle of representation by population. They will not divide Prince Edward Island according to population, as it is at present.

and denounce the principle of dividing counties having more than one representative into two or more districts.

There has been something said to-night about the constitutionality of this Act. I am not here to make any argument on its constitutionality or unconstitutionality; but I am here to say that it is very inexpedient at this stage to pass such an Act. Whether it can be argued that the constitution allows it or does not, I say it is highly inexpedient and improper.

The hon. Minister of Marine denounced the method of playing shuttle cock and battle dore with this question. But what is his party doing to-day? He says they made a pledge to the people that the moment they got into power they would pass an Act doing away with the iniquitous Redistribution Bill. Why did they not introduce it in 1896? They let 1896 pass, and 1897 pass, and 1898 pass before they introduced this measure; and when they came down as near as they could to the end of their term in 1899, the last session they expected to have in this House before dissolution, they introduced this measure. They introduced it for the purpose of having it defeated, and they introduce it now for the purpose of having it defeated. The hon. gentleman made some veiled threats as to what would happen if a certain other body threw out this Bill. But he failed to declare his threat as he intended to make it when he started. He said the Bill would be introduced again. That is not a very violent threat; I expected to hear a threat of another kind, and a constitutional threat such as this government ought to make, that if the Senate threw out this Bill they will do what they should have done when the Senate threw out the Yukon Bill—appeal to the country. And if the great electorate of this country say that the provinces should be divided in the way these hon. gentlemen propose, they would come back with a mandate from the people which the Senate, I think, would obediently bow to. But what argument have they advanced that was not advanced last year? Do they expect to bulldoze and frighten the Senate of this county? An irresponsible body,' says the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), echoed by the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson). An irresponsible body? Is George T. Fulford an irresponsible man—one of the gentlemen whom they appointed to the Senate the other day? Is Charles Burpee, from the province of New Brunswick, and are these other men whom they have put into the Senate, irresponsible men? Are they in this way to coerce and bulldoze the Senate into passing measures that cannot stand upon their merits to be judged by the laws of reason and justice? If there were a reason for the Senate throwing out the Bill in 1899, there is a stronger reason to-day. In one short year the time will arrive when another census has to be taken. Within ten months from this very moment the taking of the census of 1901 should be started. And shall it be said that a few short months before the census should be taken, the government can force through a measure to redistribute the seats in this fashion, when they would be forced by the constitution, after the census, to redistribute the seats on a constitutional plan? The argument is against them. If the Senate was justified in 1899 in throwing out the measure, it is doubly justified at this late day in throwing it out. I am not here to read the mind of the Senate. It is a reasonable body of men representing great interests in this country, a body created under the constitution to guard the rights and interests of the different provinces from which they come; and the Senate will be recreant to their trust and false to their duty if they allow a measure to be passed which invokes a principle in Ontario and denounces it in New Brunswick. It is plain to any man that the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) was going to carve out a constituency for himself in the county of St. John by this Bill last year, being afraid to face again the electors of Queen's and Sunbury. He thought to split the riding of the city and county of St. John into two parts, leaving to the hon. gentleman who represents the city of St. John a very large constituency, 10,000 electors, and a constituency of about 1,000 electors for the hon. minister himself. That was the object then, and there was no other object that I know of. I have shown that the Liberal party is not consistent in the introduction of this measure. The Minister of Customs. I think it was, said that they were carrying out their pledges, that it was one of the pledges they must carry out, and one of the last they must carry out. 'Consistency thou art a jewel'; but the jewel of consistency does not shine upon the breast of the Liberal administration. This is a needless measure, it is a measure that contradicts itself in its clauses; it invokes one principle in Ontario, another principle in New Brunswick, and another principle in Prince Edward Island. In its working, if it does justice in one part of the Dominion, it must do injustice in another. Why should Prince Edward Island be treated as it is proposed to treat her? I supposed the hon. gentleman from the county of Queen's (Mr. Martin) would stand up and denounce the measure. Does the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries think he is strong enough to carry with him a colleague from the county of Queen's? Does he think he will save the hon. gentleman from Prince, who was elected with a majority of 40 odd, with 176 spoiled ballots in the ballot boxes? Does he think he will have him elected by having tacked on to him the other hon. gentleman from Prince

(Mr. McLennan)? Or has the minister been warned by the shadow that has fallen across his path in the last two elections in Prince Edward, where the railway and bridge were to be built, and where the threat was made that if his candidates were not elected they would lose the subsidies? And more than that, a paper was sent around among the electors and this paper they were asked to sign, declaring they would vote for the government candidate, being told if they did that they would be sure of the subsidies. But his candidates were defeated, and to-day the government of Prince Edward Island stands in this humiliating position—they have no attorney-general in the government and dare not open a constituency in the hope of electing one. Talk about responsible government; talk about being responsible to the people! In Prince Edward Island, where responsible government was established, we have a government carrying on affairs with a man holding a portfolio who was defeated at the hands of the people, but who says he can hold on in spite of the constitution and in spite of the people for ten years longer. There is responsible government for you, written in the way the Minister of Marine and Fisheries writes it. But I am here to say that, unless things turn out vastly different in Prince Edward Island in the future from what they have in the past, the very recent past, the hon. gentleman may not be here at the beginning of the next parliament, even to pass a redistribution Bill which will be constitutional and according to law.

Mr. JOHN McMILLAN (South Huron). I cannot allow this vote to be taken without giving my reason for the vote I am about to give. I live in one of the counties which was gerrymandered. In the riding I represent, one of the most base and spiteful gerrymanders took place that ever was perpetrated. One of the representatives of Huron at that time was a gentleman of very high standing. He had been the representative of that riding for a length of time, and had received the nomination for the succeeding election. I refer to the Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright. They gerrymandered the riding he was expected to run for out of existence altogether, and tried to the utmost of their power to put him to political death.

I say a more base, wilful, shameless gerrymander never took place in Canada. A gross injustice was done to the county of Huron at that time, because there were two municipalities, the town of Exeter and the township of Stephen added to North Middlesex. The county of Middlesex had only 58,000 of a population, the county of Huron had over 66,000 of a population, yet they deducted these municipalities from the county of Huron and gave to Middlesex four representatives and Huron only three. That certainly was not justice. That leaves us now as the member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) said, with the south riding of Huron having a very large majority. I had the honour of complimenting the leader of the government when I first came into the House and thanking him for the gerrymander, as I never would have represented South Huron but for that gerrymander. Let me say that the good Conservatives of the county of Huron to-day resent the iniquity that was perpetrated upon them, and the disgrace that was put upon the Conservative party all over western Ontario. They feel that a gross injustice was done in the county of Huron, and have always felt so. East Huron had a large majority of Conservatives until the present hon. member for that riding carried the county with the assistance of the intelligent and honest Conservatives who sympathized with him. The west riding of Huron was in the same condition. The town of Lucknow was taken entirely from Huron and added to West Bruce that already had a large majority, in order to destroy the chances of the late lamented Malcolm Cameron in the county of Huron; but he carried it again notwithstanding the gerrymander, with the sympathy of the honest Conservatives in the west riding of Huron.

After all that has been said about the gerrymander in the western part of the province of Ontario by the Ontario government, they have never broken into county lines. It is true they broke township lines, but you could not get a better division of the county of Huron into three ridings than was given by the government of the Hon. Oliver Mowat. Whether you take it in area, in population, or in the number of votes, the distribution was an equal one, and that has been shown in every election, although it has been said that they deprived the Conservative party of one representative in the local House. Such is not the case, as I proved in this House upon a previous occasion. I will just say that the people of the county of Huron, and the people of Western Canada are in strong sympathy with this measure. They know that a redistribution Act and the repeal of the Franchise Act were planks in the platform of the Reform party, and the people have endorsed those planks at every election since the gerrymander of 1882. There is not the least doubt in my mind that the government of that day perpetrated that gerrymander in order to maintain themselves in power. I know a gentleman who was one of a delegation that came from the county of Huron to Ottawa, and I heard him state that he, with two others, sat up all night in the town of Goderich with maps and they laid out the gerrymander. They met in the village of Wingham in convention, and there carried the gerrymander, and brought it to Ottawa; and the very gerrymander that those gentlemen drew out in the county of Huron in the interests of the Conservative party, was adopted by Sir John A. Macdonald, and carried by his party. As my hon. friend for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) stated, these facts appeared in the public prints the next day after the delegation had been here. You cannot show anything of that kind having taken place with regard to the local government's in their redistributions. You cannot show that they ever hived the Conservatives to any great extent. But there is not the least doubt from what took place all over the province of Ontario at that time, that it was a scheme got up for the sole purpose of carrying the elections. As has been shown here there were fourteen ridings with an average of only 16,000 to each representative, and there were sixteen other ridings with some 26,000 of a population to the representative, showing that it was not the desire of the government to make an equal distribution of the population or to respect county boundaries. They respected nothing but the interests of the Conservative party at the next election.

Mr. J. V. ELLIS (St. John City). I maintain the same position with regard to this Bill, so far as it applies to the city and county of St. John, that I did when it was before the House last year. It strikes at the constituency which I represent; it takes away from the constituency of St. John a representative, and it divides the city and county of St. John in a manner that is most unfair according to my view of the matter. It is hardly worth while to go over the facts in detail as I did last year; but I may say that it makes one constituency in which 7,000 votes were polled last time, and makes another right alongside of it in which 1,900 votes are polled. The population of the city of St. John is 39,000, the population of the county is 14,000. It seems to me that there is no justification whatever for such a division as that in the city and county of St. John. It is very well to use such phrases as British fair play, and equity, and impartiality, and justice, but those are only catch words when applied to such a condition as will be created by this measure in the city and county of St. John. I find myself placed in a very awkward position, because, generally, I am in sympathy with my party. On this matter I do not know what it is best to do, but at any rate, I will feel bound in the interests of my constituents to vote for the six months' hoist to the Bill.

Amendment (Mr. Foster) negatived.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time (on division).

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, March 5, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

MILITIA ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 60) to amend the Militia Act. He said: The Bill reads as follows:—

Whereas, it is provided by section 37 of the Militia Act that there shall be appointed an officer, who holds the rank of colonel or rank superior thereto, in Her Majesty's regular army, who shall be charged, under the orders of Her Majesty, with the military command and discipline of the militia;

And whereas, it has been contended that such officer was in the discharge of certain of his official duties independent of the Minister of Militia and Defence;

And whereas, such contention is wholly unwarranted, and if acquiesced in would be subversive of the principle of responsible government;

Now, therefore, Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

That such officer is and shall be subject to the authority of the Minister of Militia and Defence in respect of every duty, power, right, privilege or responsibility devolving upon such officer consequent upon his appointment.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

Mr. PRIOR moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 31) to amend the Militia Act. He said: This Bill has reference to the rank of officers in the militia. The present Act does not allow the government to appoint anybody to a higher rank than that of lieutenant-colonel, with the exception of one or two officers on the staff. At the present time we have a gentleman in South Africa, Col. Otter, who has had large experience. He goes there as lieutenant-colonel, and he will meet there officers from Australia with the rank of full colonel. If it is allowable for these colonies to give the rank of colonel, I think it should be allowable for Canadian officers, who are every bit as fit as those from Australia. They also allow the appointment of the rank of full colonel in the English militia volunteers. I can see no reason whatever—and I am sure I shall be backed up by militia officers—why a man should not be allowed to get the full rank of colonel in the Canadian militia as well. The Bill I propose is a very short one. It provides that sections 41, 45 and 47 shall be repealed, and it gives the Governor General in Council power to make district officers commanding full colonels, also those who are of the rank of lieutenant-colonel on the retired list, but the list shall be confined to the number of fifty. Also officers on the active list, exclusive of officers commanding military districts—this may be allowed to the number of twenty-five for the whole of Canada. I do not think that anybody can object to these small numbers. The effect of the Bill will be to give some men who have had large experience and who have put in many years in active command a chance to rise to a rank that is benefiting. The motion is seconded by Mr. Fisdale.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). I may say that in the Militia Department we are preparing a Bill to be submitted to parliament this session which deals with this very question, not precisely in the way described by the Bill as I understand it from the hon. gentleman's explanation. We do not propose any limit, as it seems to me not to be necessary. I agree entirely with the statement the hon. gentleman has made, and expect to introduce on behalf of the government, an amendment to the Act in accordance therewith.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENTS.

Mr. MacLAREN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 62), to amend the Criminal Code, 1892. He said: This is an Act to amend the criminal law in the interest of hotel and boarding-house keepers, in cases where parties having lived at a hotel or boarding houses for a week or two, or a month or two, have unceremoniously gone away without paying their bills, leaving nothing but a trunk behind, and when the proprietor goes to open the trunk he finds it loaded with bricks or something of the kind. There are a great many complaints in my part of the country from boarding house and hotel keepers, who claim that the law as it stands at present, does not protect them from this kind of fraud.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

FRAUDULENT MARKING OF MERCHANDISE.

Mr. RUSSELL moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 63), to amend Chapter 166 of the Acts of 1886. 'An Act respecting the fraudulent marking of merchandise.' He said: This is simply to make more adequate protection than the law now affords for the ownership of trade marks.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

REGULATIONS FOR THE SALE OF FISH.

Mr. GANONG moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 64), to amend the Weights and Measures Act, as respects the sale of fish. He said: This Bill was before the House last year. The object is to make the unit of measurement correspond with the unit of sale. It applies more particularly perhaps, to the county of Charlotte; and on the second reading I will give more particulars with regard to its probable operation in that particular locality.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE MONTREAL RIOTS.

Mr. ALEX. McNEILL (North Bruce). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to draw the attention of the House and the government, to a matter of grave and immediate public concern; and in order that I may be within the rules of the House, I think, perhaps, I had better conclude with a motion. I rise with very great reluctance to refer to this subject. My reference is to the regrettable occurrences which have taken place within the last day or two within the city of Montreal, and which have culminated in a most deplorable and dangerous insult to the national flag. Fortunately, Mr. Speaker, the wise and patriotic efforts of the Mayor of Montreal, of His Grace the Archbishop, of Principal Peterson, of the Dean of Laval, and of other influential men, have secured tranquillity in the meantime; and it is in the hope that measures may be taken which will secure a continuance of that tranquillity, that I rise to address the House. Except for the insult to the national flag, the perpetrators of which will no doubt feel the weight of the strong arm of the law, what has occurred, notwithstanding all that has been said and written about it, is after all very much like what frequently occurs at Cambridge, at Oxford, at Dublin; and what is described by the college boys as a jolly good town and gown row. That is all that has taken place, with the exception of the incident in connection with the national flag, to which I have referred. But unfortunately there are those who will endeavour to describe this in very different terms on the continent of Europe, and who will endeavour to make capital out of it for the Queen's enemies.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. What are you doing now?

Mr. McNEILL. I regret, Mr. Speaker, that an hon. member should be so incapable of appreciating moderate language. I venture to say, notwithstanding the interruption of the hon. gentleman, that it devolves upon all of us to do all that in us lies, to prevent those persons from succeeding in their effort to take advantage of this incident to the prejudice of Her Majesty and to the prejudice of the empire.

To those, Sir, who have taken the trouble to inform themselves in any respect upon the South African question, it is a matter of common notoriety that President Kruger and his government have spent and are spending almost fabulous sums in secret service money. They have an enormous subsidized press all over the world, and in almost every part of the world they have their secret agents. They are in England, and they are undoubtedly here in Canada. There can be no doubt, at least, there is no doubt in my mind, that these cries of 'Fashoda,' which were raised in Montreal the other night, were raised by these emissaries or some of them. I am quite satisfied that these cries do not at all represent the sentiment or feeling of our friends in the province of Quebec, not at all; I am satisfied that they were uttered by the paid emissaries of the Transvaal Republic. Now, as I have said, I think it is our duty to do all that we can to counteract these baneful influences which are being exercised among us at the present time. It seems to me that it is the bounden duty of all of us to counsel moderation and kindness of feeling at the present crisis, and to counsel, especially, also, the observation of that law and order which we, living under British institutions, pride ourselves upon possessing in a more perfect form, and to a fuller extent than any other people in any part of the world. Feeling, as I do, what I have said, most sincerely, I think it is my duty to call the attention of the House and of the government, to an article which has been published in a newspaper in the province of Quebec, within the last day or two, on the 2nd of this month.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Is that the morning Citizen?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. member (Mr. Sutherland) does not appear to be very judicial just now.

Mr. McNEILL. This article is from La Patrie and was published on the 2nd of March. It is an article, I may say, that breathes a spirit the very opposite of that to which I have referred; it is an article which, I believe, has been not a little responsible for many of these regrettable events which have taken place in Montreal, and it is an article which, if it is followed by others of a similar character, is liable to bring about a condition of affairs in Canada which all of us must deplore. Therefore, I think it essential to call the attention of the government and of the House to the article.

The offices of the French newspapers were invaded yesterday by a crowd numbering about 2,000 men of English origin.

Laval University, which was attacked yesterday afternoon, was sacked last night.

That is to say, plundered or pillaged; that is the meaning of the word used.

All this on the part of persons whose programme is evidently that of the Tory newspapers and of the 'Star' in particular.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McNEILL—

For some months past—

I see the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) is cheering vigorously.

For some months past the 'Mail and Empire,' the 'News,' the Hamilton 'Spectator,' and dozens of other Tory journals of lesser importance, have been bellowing against the disloyalty of the French Canadians.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McNEILL—

Some of these newspapers have publicly announced that the hour is not far off when there will be an armed invasion of Quebec.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The News published that.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. Minister of Public Works approves of that statement.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is perfectly true.

Mr. McNEILL—

The scenes of yesterday are the result of these appeals to passion.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McNEILL—

The saying is, 'Forewarned is forearmed.'

This applies to a race, warned as ours has just been, as well as to individuals.

We know now what we may expect.

That is armed invasion.

We cannot too emphatically express our regret on ascertaining that the students of a great English university should have taken part in the aggressive movement directed against us.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McNEILL—

Much must be forgiven to youth—

Mr. CASEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. McNEILL—

—but all the same, it is a grave symptom that, willingly or not, we have diagnosed.

This is a repetition of the events of 1849.

Lord Elgin was all but assassinated in the streets of Montreal because he had consented—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McNEILL—

—because he had consented to render justice to the French Canadians.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McNEILL—

The houses of Mr. Lafontaine and other important citizens were demolished by the English Tories.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McNEILL—

It becomes more and more plain that the Tory spirit of those days still survives in the Tories of to-day.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McNEILL—

We are the great majority in this city of Montreal and in the province of Quebec.

We have but to wish for signal vengeance for these insults of which we are the victims, and it is done.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No; it is not there. Stop that.

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend (Mr. Tarte) tells us that—

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Be careful, my friend.

Mr. McNEILL. We will accept the correction of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works and assume that that is not a correct translation, although my hon. friend (Mr. Bergeron) beside me—

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Here is the French version word for word.

Mr. McNEILL. Will my hon. friend (Mr. Tarte) please hand it over?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I will follow the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill).

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, if you would allow me to make a suggestion, it would be that we would all understand it better if the hon. Minister of Public Works would read and translate.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I will read it by-and-by.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would suggest that unless the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) consents to give place for the reading he be allowed to complete his statement and take each statement in succession.

Mr. McNEILL. Mr. Speaker, I would have been very glad if the hon. Minister of Public Works had been kind enough to correct any misstatement I inadvertently made as I have no desire, in any way, to misrepresent what he has written.

We do not advise any such anti-national policy.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McNEILL—

But we do advise, for instance, the organization of resistance, of vigorous resistance, to such scenes as those of yesterday.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McNEILL—

Our compatriots have the right to compel the respect of their persons and property, using force, if necessary.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McNEILL—

Truly, if this should continue, if we should tolerate the invasion and destruction of our houses and property, this country would soon become uninhabitable.

Is it not a painful spectacle to behold ourselves, so to speak, within two steps of civil war?

Mr. McNEILL.

My hon friend, the member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), is not cheering at the present moment.

We are not the aggressors, but we are strong enough to be afraid of no one.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McNEILL—

We do not hold the majority of the population of Montreal—

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Of the English population of Montreal.

Mr. McNEILL. I am reading what I have here; 'of the English population.' I suppose the word 'population' involves that; I am very glad for the correction.

We do not hold the majority of the English population of Montreal and of the country responsible for the painful scenes that disgraced our streets yesterday.

We have reached a decisive moment. Confederation cannot be maintained if the two races cannot live in harmony, side by side.

Little need be added to what has already taken place to cause the treaty of federation to be torn up without much delay.

In contrast to that article, published at a time of great excitement in the province of Quebec, at a time when, I venture to think, wise, prudent and conciliatory counsels ought to have been inculcated in the columns of a leading journal of this kind, I desire, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, to read extracts from what has been said by His Grace the Archbishop, as I need not take up time by reading it all, and by Principal Peterson, of McGill. The Archbishop said:

He felt sure that the whole matter had arisen from a misunderstanding.

But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) cheered the statement, that the whole matter amounts to this: That we are about to have an armed invasion of the province of Quebec. Said the Archbishop:

He felt sure that the whole matter had arisen from a misunderstanding, that both parties were equally to blame, and that it ought certainly to go no further.

The Archbishop does not counsel an organization for defence and resistance by force.

He pointed out to the students that the disturbance was almost certain to be shouted abroad, that it would almost inevitably be exaggerated and misinterpreted in transmission, and used and ill-used, politically and otherwise, in a manner calculated to do harm out of all proportion to the actual affair. He therefore called upon the young men to cease all further demonstration, quietly go home, take a good dinner, and then resume their studies, which had been interrupted during the last two days.

Principal Peterson said:

It was with difficulty that he found words to express the sorrow he felt that the good relations existing between the two universities should be thus endangered. It was not a time, he said, for internal strife, and he ventured to hope that even still it might be possible for McGill and Laval to unite in a hearty and sympathetic demonstration of the feelings that he felt were hardly less strong in Laval than McGill.

Those are the statements, Mr Speaker, of gentlemen who desire to bring about a condition of good-will and good feeling once more among these students, and, Sir, these statements are in strong contrast to the utterances which I have read from La Patrie, and which are calculated to inflame evil passions and to set one race against the other—if anything that could be written in the English language is so calculated.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). And you are trying to allay it.

Mr. FOSTER. You are very warlike on the other side.

Mr. McNEILL. And now, Mr. Speaker, I do not for my part hesitate to characterize that article in La Patrie as a wicked production.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McNEILL. Yes, a wicked production penned deliberately for an evil purpose. I say, Sir, that such an article written at such a time is little less than criminal. I speak just what I feel in this matter. I say that the publication of such an article at such a time is little less than a crime against this country. I do not know, Sir, whether President Kruger and his government have been as successful in subsidizing a portion of the press of Canada as they have been successful in subsidizing a portion of the press in almost every other country in the world.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not say that they have; I do not know. Still less do I say that this organ of public opinion, La Patrie, is subsidized by President Kruger. But this I do say, without any hesitation or fear of successful contradiction: That for such an article as that, which I have just read, to be circulated at the present moment amongst our French Canadian friends of the province of Quebec, President Kruger and his government would be willing to pay a surprisingly long price. It is calculated admirably—if I can use the word 'admirably' in connection with such an article—it is calculated perfectly to carry out President Kruger's work. It is calculated perfectly to cause dissension and distrust and discord among people of different races and creeds who are living, and who desire to live most happily together. Therefore, I repeat what I said before: That that article is little less than a crime against Canada. I think, Sir, that the country has a right to expect and to ask of the colleagues of the Minister of Public Works—who has been so loudly cheering to-day this article in his organ—this country has a right to expect of his colleagues that they shall bring such pressure to bear upon him as to make a repetition of this offence impossible. If we are to have a pernicious propaganda of this kind continued, it is very difficult for any one to say what the result may be. I had hoped, Mr. Speaker, to be able to read the translation of an article which appeared in La Presse, another French Canadian newspaper, and as La Presse has by far the largest circulation of any French Canadian newspaper in the province of Quebec, it may fairly be considered to represent more correctly than any other newspaper the sentiments and feelings of our French Canadian friends. I deeply regret that I am not in a position to read that article. My hon. friend (Mr. Bergeron) beside me, had hoped to be able to place it in my hands, but unfortunately he has not been able to obtain the translation in time. That article in La Presse is an article breathing a spirit of kindness and a spirit of good-will, which is such a spirit as we all of us ought desire to inculcate at the present time. I am very sorry, Sir, that the fact that I have thought it right to find fault with the La Patrie article which breathes a spirit the very opposite of that, should have caused hon. gentlemen on the other side to suggest that I was actuated by purely party motives in bringing the matter before the House as I have ventured to do.

I beg to move that the House do now adjourn.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I do not blame my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill) for having brought this matter before the House if he so desired, but for my part, I could have wished that he had continued his remarks in the same temper as that in which he commenced them. When he had drawn the attention of the House to this series of deplorable incidents in Montreal, no one could have found fault with my hon. friend if he had continued his remarks in the same calm manner, and for my part I would gladly have welcomed the opportunity thus given the House to, if possible, put an end to this unfortunate condition of things which has been going on for some time past in the country, and of which the events of the last week in Montreal have been the culmination. But, Sir, I believe, that when to-morrow the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) reads his remarks in cold blood, he will have no reason to be proud of himself. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) concluded his remarks with an insinuation, and although he did not dare to make an assertion, he will still have no reason to feel proud of himself that he even insinuated, that the funds of President Kruger were perhaps at the bottom of these troubles. If I were to follow the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) I would say that for my part I believe that if there has been any secret fund behind these unfortunate events which have taken place in Montreal, this fund did not come from President Kruger, but from a nearer source at home. There is, however, one thing for which I might thank the hon. gentleman, and in which I agree with him. One of the most regrettable things about these unfortunate occurrences, is that the impression may go abroad that there is in the city of Montreal, and in Canada, a divided people, when, in reality, there is no division amongst us, and there ought not to be. I am not disposed, for my part, to attach too much importance to what took place in Montreal, regrettable as it is. I agree with my hon. friend, that we should all be indulgent towards boyish pranks. The first incident that took place was committed by the students of McGill University. I am myself a pupil of McGill University, and have a kindly feeling towards it; and when I read the account of the incident, though I regretted it, I said, 'After all, boys will be boys, for ever.' But, Sir, this demonstrates the danger of playing with fire, and the McGill students went very far in that direction; but, nothing further would have been heard of the incident, if the press of Montreal, notably the Star, of the following day, had treated the occurrence as it should have been treated. Instead of that, the Star stated that the English students had given to their French compatriots, a good lesson in loyalty. Well, Sir, we can always forgive boys for this sort of thing, or at least, we shall not feel very hard towards them; but when men who ought to be respectable, instead of putting down, with a firm, but gentle hand, such proceedings, rather characterized them as something to be commended, as a lesson in loyalty, certainly there was occasion to be alarmed. It was not at what the McGill students did that the people of Montreal might feel alarmed, but at the comment of such newspapers as the Star, which rather encouraged such proceedings, instead of assisting to put them down. This is all the more regrettable because the McGill students did the very thing which was to be expected of them under the circumstances: on the following day, when they saw that they had gone too far, they apologized. Principal Peterson went to the Archbishop, who is the principal of Laval University; and, of course, the end was, as has just been stated by my hon. friend, that the whole thing was a misunderstanding; and after all it should not have gone any further. I wish it had stopped there. Unfortunately, there was a demonstration in the evening. The McGill students commenced the demonstration, but, afterwards, as we all know, the Laval students carried the British flag at their head, sang 'God Save the Queen,' and when they reached Victoria Square, where stands the statue of the Queen, they cheered for Her Majesty. They showed their loyalty to the Queen and the country; but some irresponsible parties committed the outrage, because it was nothing else, of tearing down the British flag, and insulting it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Who did it?

The PRIME MINISTER. I do not know who did it; but I appeal to all men in this country, whatever may be their creed, and whatever may be their differences—I appeal to all Canadians to remember that at this moment, if such an insult has been offered to the British flag, there are Canadians of French blood carrying the flag in South Africa, and they were not behind their fellow-countrymen of British origin in doing their best in the last assault which brought about the capitulation of Cronje at Paardeberg. For my part, I shall not regret these incidents, regrettable as they are, if they bring to an end these deplorable incitements to race hatred which have characterized the press of our country, for the last three months. The hon. gentleman referred to an article which was provoked by these occurrences; but I ask the hon. gentleman to read this article from the Ottawa Citizen of this morning, and to tell me what can have caused the penning and publication of such an article. It reads as follows:

Who is to blame?

When some years ago an attempt was made to blow up the monument which certain of the loyal inhabitants of Montreal had caused to be erected to the memory of the hero of Trafalgar, the atrocious act was sought to be excused because it had been done by juveniles. A son of an ex-premier of the province of Quebec was one of those principally concerned in the outrage, and it will be remembered that the father of the youth (the late Hon. Mr. Mercier) went into court with tears in his eyes to plead for his erring son and to enter into bonds for his future good behaviour.

With the recollection of this unpleasant circumstance still before us (for such events are not soon effaced from the memory), we have now to deplore, in connection with all good subjects of the Queen, an act of even greater enormity—committed in the same city and at the hands, again, of French Canadians.

That the national ensign—that glorious Union Jack which stands before all the world for all that is great, noble and free, and under whose folds French Canadians, especially, enjoy a degree of freedom and liberty which would not otherwise be theirs—should have been deliberately torn from its place at the mast-head and trampled under foot by a small army of cheering spectators, constitutes a deed as wanton as it is significant.

It is an act aimed at the honour and dignity of the nation, and which will be felt and deeply resented by every one of the Queen's loyal subjects throughout Her vast empire.

Again, the plea is put forth that this crowning offence was committed by young people; also, that there was provocation. As to the first plea, we have the testimony of eye-witnesses that there were several thousand men present, in addition to the university students, and that these aided and abetted the latter. The other is a paltry excuse, at best, and will not hold water for one minute, for no provocation, however great, would warrant so grave and so base an act.

It is very evident that the feeling of disaffection to England, which politicians of the Mercier, Laurier and Tarte type have served to engender in the province of Quebec, is bearing fruit, with a vengeance.

It is perhaps as well as the rest of the population should know where these people stand, and what reliance can be placed upon them in a time of emergency.

On similar occasions the policy has been to put up with every indignity and say nothing, lest some one's tender feelings should be hurt; but if we may judge public feeling by what it is in Ottawa at the present moment little consideration of this sort will be shown hereafter.

The 'Citizen' will speak its mind on this as on other national issues, without fear, favour or affection.

I ask my hon. friend, how can we build a nation on this continent if such sentiments are to be uttered and perpetuated? How can we build a nation if the follies of a day, and especially those of days gone by, are recalled for ever and for ever? How can we build a nation unless we learn to forgive if not to forget, and I even say forget? I do not speak of myself, but I ask, why bring up the name of Mr. Mercier, who has been in his grave for five long years? Why should we be reminded at this day of the appeal he made for his son, when, as stated in this article, the father went into court with tears in his eyes, to ask for his delinquent son, justice tempered with mercy, and was ready to give bonds for his future good conduct? What are we to gain, if we for ever cultivate this feeling of hatred of one towards another? I have only to say, in conclusion, that I shall not regret the incidents of last week, if we can from this moment bury them for ever, and, instead of looking at the past, strive to be united for the future.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.). I do not know, Mr. Speaker, whether it will be worth the breath it takes to say it in the commencement of the very few remarks I am going to make, but I cannot see that any circumstances have arisen to call for an imputation of motives in this discussion, which, however, has so far gone on this afternoon in, upon the whole, a most temperate and praiseworthy spirit. I am quite certain that my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill), who brought the matter up, did so from no other motives than those which actuate an honest man, a good citizen, and a representative of the people in this parliament. I am sorry indeed that my right hon. friend rather impugned his motives, or if he did not directly impugn them, seemed to be very suspicious and sceptical of its being possible at all for my hon. friend to have undertaken this matter with an honest, manly and patriotic feeling. That he did so I am fully convinced, and I wish to say also that no other feeling animates me in making a very few remarks in answer to my right hon. friend. I echo with every fibre of my heart the wish that from this day forward and for ever in this country of ours there could be an everlasting rest given to these questions of race and creed; and, Sir, if there is anything that I could do to cast those questions into oblivion for ever, I would do it and do it immediately. I am glad to be able to say that, in the main, the spirit in which my right hon. friend replied to my hon. friend from Bruce was in conformity with the opinions and sentiments expressed by my hon. friend. But when the right hon. gentleman, after having called my hon. friend to task for having made, as he said, a vague insinuation, that perhaps Kruger's gold was in Canada, suggested that he did not think it was so much Kruger's gold as perhaps the gold of another party, he sadly marred the lesson he sought to give. I am quite sure that my right hon. friend did not feel, and would not express for a single moment, the opinion that Tory gold or Liberal-Conservative gold, the gold of any Canadian, lay at the bottom of these articles, so far as giving them basis and trend is concerned, and I would not go so far as to say that Kruger's gold lay at all of the bottom of that article of La Patrie, which is so strongly commended, I am sorry to say, by the hon. Minister of Public Works. When the right hon. gentleman read the article in the Citizen and held it forth to this country as a most regrettable utterance, why, in the name of all that is fair, did he not have a single word to say against the article in La Patrie? Let me submit those two articles to this House and the country for a clear, calm judgment as to which was the unfair and incendiary one. Both my hon. friends say that the matter was largely a students' fracas. So it was. Students are different from most other people, in their student frolics and their demonstrations, and wherever you find university towns, you find students' processions and wherever you find students' processions and demonstrations, you find them taking a different form from the demonstrations of any other class, and meeting from all classes of the people with a far different reception than would be given the demonstrations of other classes: A certain amount of latitude is given to the students, and if the McGill students availed themselves of that latitude in a boisterous manner, to a certain extent in a rather demonstrative manner, it was still a students' demonstration, and if the students of Laval, when they turned the hose of cold water on the students of McGill, rather surprised and cooled down the ardour of the McGill men, it was still a student's prank, and if it had been allowed to remain there, nothing more would have been said or thought about it the wide country through. They were simply students' demonstrations. I believe, from the bottom of my heart, that McGill and Laval, taken together, are as good friends to-day as they were before this little fracas took place, and are both loyal and devoted to British connections and the British flag. I will take the disclaimer made by the students of McGill, through their principal, and the disclaimer made by the students of Laval, through their dean, and say that I believe both, and that with regard to the great body of students of both universities, there is no bad blood between them, and they are both honourable students' bodies in the city of Montreal. But what happened? We would not be fair to each other, if we were not frank to each other. Do you know why the article in La Patrie is more thought of than the articles of some other papers, not one title so strong? It is because La Patrie is known to be the organ of the government, and of the party, and collaborated by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte). It is because La Patrie is known, by his own statement, made not more than two weeks ago in this House, to be a paper in which he not only takes a fatherly interest, but a personal interest, going even to the extent, as he said himself, of putting the pan occasionally on the fire, so that he might not forget how to cook the goose. No doubt the goose the hon. gentleman wishes to cook is the Liberal-Conservative goose; but if he puts the pan on the fire many more times, as he has done of late, he may find that he is cooking the wrong goose; the goose of the Liberal Party.

After the first trouble took place between the two university bodies, there was an article by La Patrie, on March 1, which was on the whole a most temperate article. It took none too strong a ground, and did not breath all the spirit of the article of the 2nd of March. Let us take the two and read them together and see the marked change.

On March 1, La Patrie said:

A band of young men, said to be McGill students and whose members were increased by persons of every age, all more or less excited indulged in most extravagant and regrettable demonstrations this morning, under the pretext of celebrating the delivery of Ladysmith.

What did these gentlemen do?

The mob, to the number of a couple of a thousand, gathered in St. James Street in front of the offices of 'La Presse,' 'Le Journal' and 'La Patrie.' The most violent and overheated among them tried to invade the offices of these three newspapers, shouted at the tops of their voices for the British flag, smashed windows and inflicted other damages, &c. The same crowd proceeded to Laval University, where they attempted to force the doors of that institution, and where, finally, they were satisfied to raise a flag on one of the masts in front of the university.

They were not very insistent, you see. Then, it asks the question as to why this attack on a French Canadian newspaper:

We were asked to fly the English flag from our mast this morning. We raised it of our own free will on the occasion of Cronje's surrender, and we love it well enough to unfurl it at suitable times.

Mr. FOSTER.

They are perfectly right in doing that.

Such hostile manifestations as those of to-day may have very serious consequences, and they constitute an absolutely unjustifiable provocation. We are also convinced that large-minded and thoughtful Englishmen will be the first to condemn what was done by this handful of individuals this morning under the influence of an over-excitement which, however, they would have done better to control.

Truly, there should be a way of rejoicing over the magnificent success of the relief of Ladysmith by less aggressive, more just and patriotic demonstrations.

Now, nobody, not even a McGill student, will find fault with that statement from La Patrie. It was a little severe in the castigation it administered, but it administered castigation not a whit more severe than should have been administered, or than would have been well submitted to without doubt. But something took place to change the tone of La Patrie. There is no allusion in this article to the demonstration being a plan of Tory campaign. No political allusion is made in this article at all; it is simply treated as a students' squabble aided by certain persons who attached themselves to the body of students, persons of an irresponsible kind. But, from the first to the last, there is no intimation of it being part of the Tory programme or the result of that programme. Now, what happens in the course of that one night? In the course of that one night somebody cogitates; somebody thinks over the matter; somebody gets instructions, and somebody dips his pen in gall and writes the article of the 2nd of March, an article which is as absolutely indefensible and mischievous as the other was absolutely well conceived and to be approved by every good citizen, no matter what his party or other professions are. But the article of March 2 is very different. Now it is an invasion by a couple thousand men of English origin. Yesterday it was a handful of students at McGill with others. Laval University which was visited and a flag run up on one of the masts at the door; Laval University is now reported as being sacked last night. It was not sacked. A fraternal visit was made by the students of McGill to their brothers of Laval. The students of McGill did not want to be denied a good shake-hands with the students of Laval; and when they could not find them outside, they tried to find them inside. The moment they attempted to find them inside, the students of Laval turned the hose on the others, and the cold water which came upon them in volumes had a considerably modifying effect on the enthusiasm of the crowd. If others were with the students, they were worse than the students probably; and, in answer to the cold douche from the hose, snowballs were thrown at the windows and some of the windows were smashed. That was not irremediable; a few dollars would pay the shot; and the students of McGill would have been glad to make the damage good. But it was far from a sacking of Laval University. Now comes the new idea:

All this on the part of persons whose programme is evidently that of the newspapers, and of the 'Star' particularly.

For some months past the 'Mail and Empire,' the 'News,' the Hamilton 'Spectator,' and dozens of other Tory papers of lesser importance, have been bellowing against the loyalty of the French Canadians.

Not a word of truth in that paragraph, not one word of truth.

Some of these newspapers have publicly announced that the hour is not far off when there will be an armed invasion of Quebec.

Name them?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I shall name them, and I shall read their utterances by-and-by.

Mr. FOSTER. Let my hon. friend (Mr. Tarte) name them.

Mr. McMULLEN. He will.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman who made such a scene in this House the other day is interrupting me in my speech—the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). I wish to call your attention to the fact, Mr. Speaker, because I fear if he goes on a repetition—

Mr. McMULLEN. When there is a black-guard addressing the House such as—

Mr. SPEAKER. Perhaps the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) will allow the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) to proceed.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not understand what my hon. friend (Mr. McMullen) said exactly, but I think I heard a very bad name issue from his mouth.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The same word as you used the other day.

Mr. FOSTER. However, I do not intend to follow this up at this time. Let the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), as in his newspaper he has stated that the Mail and Empire, the News, the Hamilton Spectator, and dozens of other Tory papers of lesser importance, have been asking for an armed invasion of the province of Quebec, if he can, find one single word to that effect. And if he can find one single utterance, let him stand up as an honest man and say whether he is prepared to state in this House and before the country that that is indicative of the policy of the Tory party. Why, my hon. friend can find the most incendiary utterances on either side from some persons. But if a gentleman in this House is going to take any stray utterance on either side as being an indication of the feeling of great parties in this country, how far afield he must go—it is stretching the argument to a perfect absurdity.

The scenes of yesterday—
he says,

—are the result of these appeals to passion.

I want to call his attention to that. Only the day before La Patrie said that these events were the result of a number of students, a handful of individuals, who were trying to celebrate the delivery of Lady-smith. Now it is charged to the result of appeals to passion made by the Tory press. Is there any man in this House who believes that the procession of the McGill students or the counter procession of Laval students had anything to do with party politics? No one would have thought of it except some mischievous person who wishes to read into it something that he feels may be beneficial from a party point of view. He goes on:

The saying is, 'forewarned is forearmed.'

This applies to a race, warned as ours has just been, as well as individuals.

Now, I think I am fair in stating that if there have been any strong words expressed in this House, if there have been any strong statements expressed in the Liberal-Conservative newspapers with reference to the action of persons in the government or supporting the government, it has been a criticism with reference to those particular persons and their particular actions and not a criticism of the actions of a race or the feelings of race. And it does seem to be not a brave thing, but the very opposite of a brave thing, for an individual, when he is criticised for an opinion or an action of his own, to attempt to shelter himself by making it appear that his whole race or his whole religion is being attacked. Surely that is only a fair statement of the case, but this article in La Patrie wants to bring to the assistance of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), to the assistance of the editor of La Patrie, who has made statements that I wish had never been made in this country—wants to bring, if possible, a whole race by making an appeal as if it were the whole race which had been attacked and criticised. Now, surely my right hon. friend will agree with me that we never can push an argument so far as to attempt to implicate a party for the stray assertions of a single member of it, to implicate a race for the action or the policy of a single man who may belong to that race, or belong to that creed. Well, he goes still further. My right hon. friend almost wept when he thought of the indignity, the inhumanity of calling Mr. Mercier from his grave by criticisms of what took place not many years ago with reference to his son. But, La Patrie's article has opened the graves of the men of 1849, laid them wide open, and has sought the occasion of a mere students' jollification and brawl, to open up the sores of a very significant action which took place in 1849. How possibly could any honest, sane man string on to a students' brawl in the city of Montreal the grave questions which led to the occurrences of 1849?

Lord Elgin was all but assassinated in the streets of Montreal because he had consented to render justice to the French Canadians.

And the parallel is drawn that they are being assassinated here in the streets, by what? The machinations, the wiles, the well-laid plans of the Liberal-Conservative or Tory party in this country. How awfully absurd it is! And the strangest thing to my mind is how any man can utter a thing like that and yet stand up amongst reasonable-minded men and hope to get their support. It is really strange how a man will hope to do that sort of thing.

It becomes more and more plain that the Tory spirit of those days still survives in the Tories of to-day.

The students' brawl, the students' processions, the students' little rows amongst themselves, are here translated into a breaking out of the Tory spirit of 1849; and the Tory spirit of 1899, which are equally alike.

We have but to wish for signal vengeance for these insults of which we are the victims.

Now, I will ask the Minister of Public Works if he will be kind enough, as he has the only copy of La Patrie that is in the Chamber, I believe, to give us the translation of that.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman has it now; let him read it.

Mr. FOSTER (reading):

Nous n'aurions qu'à le vouloir pour tirer une vengeance éclatante des insultes dont nous sommes les victimes.

That is stronger than the translation; for what does it say:

All we have to do is to wish to draw a signal vengeance for the insults of which we are the victims.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. But we did not advise it.

Mr. FOSTER. 'Did not advise it.' Will my hon. friend hide himself and his party behind a subterfuge like that? You whisper into the ear of a would-be assassin that to-morrow night, at midnight, at a certain place, would be a good time to do his deed, and then you stand up before honest men and say: I did not advise him to do it.

Mr. FOSTER.

You, standing out as the mentor and leader of public opinion, standing out as the Minister of Public Works, behind that leader of opinion, you offer the awful temptation, the awful incentive: All that needs to be done, as we are in a majority in the city of Montreal, is but to express the wish for signal vengeance, and it will be done. My hon. friend cannot hide himself behind the assertion that he did not wish it in so many plain words. In the French language nothing could be stronger than these words. If that was not what the writer had in view, why pen those words, why precede them by saying to the people: You are in the majority, and then to follow them by saying: All we have to do is to wish vengeance, and it will be done.

We do not advise such an anti-national policy.

And there the hon. gentleman thought to save himself and thus to save his paper. What comes next from a law-abiding citizen, from a man in a British country, from a gentleman who lives in a well-ordered city, where there is a mayor, where there are police, where there is the strong arm of the law, and where any students' brawl, or a greater than a students' brawl can be fully coped with by justice and the machinery of justice in a strong city like Montreal? What does he do? Howls for mob law, just as you would expect in the State of Kentucky. What does he say? Not call upon the police to do their duty, not ask the authorities of Montreal to see that the streets are kept clear, not invoke the power of the militia if it were necessary to see that the peace is maintained—nothing of the kind. But the hon. gentleman and his newspaper attempt to do—what? They attempt to subvert and overwhelm the civil law in the city of Montreal and to ask men, as we have just read in the preceding paragraph, to take the law into their own hands, to use force against force. What is it in French:

Mais nous conseillons, par exemple, l'organisation et la résistance, la résistance vigoureuse à des scènes comme celles d'hier.

But we do advise, for instance, the organization of resistance, of vigorous resistance, to such scenes as those of yesterday.

I have read other French newspapers with which La Patrie wishes to ally itself, but French newspapers of too high a standing and too great a responsibility to ally themselves with La Patrie for these purposes—I have read these newspapers, and any gentleman who has read them cannot but be struck with the spirit of fair-play, and tolerance, and discretion, with which they treat the question. Not so La Patrie. La Patrie says: Organize. And they did organize; and they came up that night, and the newspapers tell us that they were organized. Not the students merely, but thousands of men with all kinds of instruments, whatever they could get, and we know from what took place that revolvers were in the crowd as well. Would it not have been far better if La Patrie and the Minister of Public Works had said: Mr. Mayor, you have police in the city of Montreal; keep the streets clear, keep the crowds moving, and keep damage from being done. That would have been a fair appeal to law and order. But the hon. gentleman was fanning prejudice, he was calling down to perils for what he could get therefrom; and he told them in so many words: Bring your bludgeons, bring your weapons, and organize a defence, and go for those fellows. That is the law-abiding spirit of the Minister of Public Works, who to-day, in this House, has made himself responsible for every sentence which was uttered by La Patrie, and done it in the most violent way by cheering utterances such as were read one after the other. But he goes still further. He wants to have a crisis all by himself, and so he declares that we are within two steps of civil war. Why, it is a wonder that this House does not break out into loud laughter. Within two steps of civil war! Because Laval and McGill have a more or less friendly scrimmage, tear down some newspaper boards, throw some cold water and break some windows while the operation is going on. Within two steps of civil war! Is the mayor of the city of Montreal here this afternoon? If he were, he could not contain himself for laughing, because he knows that the civil authority in Montreal, backed by the English-speaking people, and backed by the French-speaking people of Montreal, is quite sufficient to keep any of these little insignificant brawls from having the first appearance of leading to a civil war. Ah, but the hon. Minister of Public Works and his paper, are not satisfied unless they do something heroic, so, now, as the hon. gentleman held before an admiring audience once, his order in council, in which there was that 'no precedent,' and said: See what I have; now he holds up the treaty of confederation and says—what does he say?

Little need be added to what has already taken place to cause the treaty of confederation to be torn up without much delay.

That is certainly the climax of absurdity. What I protest against is this: I protest, in the first place, against making out of this trivial thing, a matter of national importance. It is not necessary and there is no basis upon which to warrant it. What I protest against, in the name of my party, in the name of fair-play, in this Dominion of Canada, is against that most mischievous attempt to make the Liberal-Conservative party responsible for a students' brawl, and the breaking of some windows, which resulted from it. It is not fair; it is not honest party warfare. It will not appeal to the people of this broad country, and it does not appeal to the hon. gentlemen who sit in this House to-day. There are hot heads in every party, there are enthusiasts in every religious creed, there are warm-blooded people in every race, and if we took the expressions which come now and again from these in a mixed country, and with a mixed people, how would we get along if we treated these as being the expressions of the will of the majority in such cases? Surely, we will not make that mistake. As a contrast to what was written by La Patrie, let me read what La Presse has said. La Presse was assailed on the same day and was one of the three newspaper offices which my hon. friend's paper talks about. What does La Presse suggest? The breaking up of confederation? The introduction of civil war? The repetition of '49? No, what does La Presse say with reference to this incident:

'La Presse' has time and again condoned and made light of the freaks of our students; it makes no exception of those which occurred this morning, notwithstanding that they were played at its own expense. Our paper has not hoisted a flag for several years back, for the simple reason that there is no flagstaff to our building.

How serious La Presse is in this great national crisis! But, it is, I suppose, that La Presse has no conscience or feeling; it does not know that this great crisis is on, that we are within two steps of civil war and that the confederation treaty is about being torn into tatters. Poor La Presse; some one ought to go down and point out the importance of the question.

Had any respectable citizen suggested to us the propriety of hanging out some emblem of rejoicing, at any point whatsoever of our premises, the suggestion would have been most cordially received and carried out by us, for nothing could have been more in accordance with our own sentiments and deep convictions than to manifest every sign of rejoicing for the relief of Ladysmith. We consider General White, who so long held out against overwhelming forces in a weakly fortified town, such as Ladysmith, to be a veritable hero, deserving of universal praise and admiration.

As to the idea of going into ecstasies of rejoicing over the final march, most creditably accomplished, by General Buller, the English nation is too great and too powerful to manifest, even for an instant, so hungry a craving for success. It is too well accustomed to the success of its soldiers for that. It would not take many such sermons on loyalty as that of to-day to make us regret being bound by it. We would have resisted to the death against the horde of lunatics—

A horde of lunatics, La Presse says. It is, according to La Patrie, the whole Tory party; but La Presse says it was a horde of lunatics.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). That may be the same thing.

Mr. FOSTER. 'That may be the same thing,' the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), says. That will depend upon who is doing the translating.

—who dared to issue a brutal word of command. We are as jealous of our liberty—that is to say as 'British' as any other English subject, and we are as much the master in our own home as the 'bulldog' in his yard.

When the excitement was over and the crowd dispersed we did not hesitate for a moment to exercise our free will to reiterate to the public, by an act easily accomplished, the assurance of a loyalty which not one of our English fellow-citizens has ever called in question. To persist through mere obstinacy in refusing to give any outward sign of our inward sympathy would have been equivalent answering one gross act of rudeness by another equally rude. The interest of public order must outweigh resentment for a silly provocation.

Now, if La Patrie had treated the matter in about the same manner as La Presse, we would never have heard anything about confederation being torn in two, about being within a step of civil war; we would not have had all these heroics, and, above all, we would not have had any such silly thing put forth, as that this little disturbance was due to a deep laid plot, all laid out by Tory hands on well ascertained principles. The absurdity which clings to this whole matter ought to be sufficient to make us, and the McGill students, the Laval students, the people of Montreal, and the people of Canada, pass the whole thing over in a right good laugh and think no more about it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). Mr. Speaker, I have no right to attribute motives to hon. gentlemen opposite, but, to any impartial observer, it looks very much as if some of the hon. gentlemen, on the other side of the House, had been animated by the same motives that have animated those who organized the demonstrations in the city of Montreal. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) has asked us not to pay any great attention to what he calls a little frolic between students and students. The facts as they occurred are these: Before 10 o'clock, before business hours, a crowd of about 2,000 men, headed by the McGill students appeared opposite the three French newspapers, La Patrie, Le Journal and La Presse. It is no use saying that the students of McGill were alone. There were about 2,000 of all ages, headed—I say it again—by the students of McGill. They first invaded La Patrie office and they asked the British flag to be raised. The British flag had been raised the day that Commandant Cronje had surrendered, and it was going to be raised again on La Patrie in honour of the relief of Ladysmith. There was within the precincts of La Patrie a judge, who, when he was in politics, I may say, belonged to the Conservative side, and who is a personal friend of mine.

Mr. FOSTER.

He told my sons: 'For the sake of your father, raise the flag immediately, because he will be accused of being a disloyal man if you do not do it at once.' I may say that if I had been there, or if any gentleman on the other side of the House had been there, and had been threatened in such a way, I would not have raised anything and no gentleman opposite would have raised it under such circumstances.

Mr. FOSTER. You would have raised Cain.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I would have been killed outright before giving in under such threats, and I believe my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) would have done the same thing. I would have raised the flag, of course, of my own free will, but not under such threats. However, the flag was raised on La Patrie and the crowd proceeded to Le Journal. They did not make any distinction of party politics; they were going for every French newspaper. The Journal raised its flag. In the meantime La Presse had had time to barricade their doors, and when my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) speaks of these little incidents he does not know the facts. The doors of La Presse were actually broken in and the men of La Presse knocked down several of the invaders with iron bars in resisting the attempt to break into their office. That is just what took place. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) may belittle such an incident; he may, as one of the leaders of the House, encourage future riots by belittling such incidents and saying there is nothing in it. I do not belong to that class of men. The majority of this parliament does not belong to that class of men who will encourage the invasion of private property by anybody. Whether we are English or French, I suppose we have equal claims to the protection of the law. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) has quoted two articles, one from La Presse and one from La Patrie, written after the incidents which I have just referred to. Two hours after the invasion of the French papers the same crowd proceeded to Laval University. Will my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) say that they did right in that and that they were only playing childish pranks? Will he say from his place in parliament that these men, whether they were English or French, were doing right in that? Sir, nobody will say so, and yet my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) encouraged them and tells them there is nothing in it. I say that that crowd in invading private property was committing a crime against civilization and against law. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) is surprised at the article that has been quoted. The article was written under those circumstances. In the evening a crowd of people headed by students from McGill proceeded to Laval University, carrying arms, carrying sticks, carrying iron bars, and frozen potatoes in their pockets. There were bushels of frozen potatoes found on the grounds.

Mr. FOSTER. Were they Conservative potatoes?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). If they were, they were not fit to eat.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I suppose they had been grown in a Conservative garden. As I have said, they proceeded to Laval University and they tried again to break in the doors. There were policemen inside who had made up their minds not to shoot at those who were invading private property, but decided to pour cold water on them. That is a kind of warfare which my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) should appreciate. The policemen on the inside repelled the invasion with cold water, but the policemen on the outside were obliged to use sticks and batons and arms. There were several shots fired through the windows of Laval University. There was not a whole pane of glass in the university the day after. The whole place was sacked, and yet my hon. friend was surprised that La Patrie wrote the article that has been quoted. I am very glad that the hon. gentleman from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) quoted the article, and I stand here to say from my seat in parliament, that there is not a man who has any courage in his heart who would permit the invasion of his property without defending himself. If there is any man who is prepared to stand quietly by with his two arms folded, when his property is being ruined, I am not that man by any means. Well, Sir, it is true that La Patrie has written as follows:

If we wished we could draw a signal vengeance from the insults of which we have been the victims. We do not advise that anti-national policy.

Put the two things together, please.

But we advise the organization of resistance, of a serious resistance, to scenes such as these of yesterday.

Where is the harm in that, Mr. Speaker. Is it not the duty of a newspaper, for instance, to organize resistance to an invasion of its property such as this which took place. So much is that the fact, that La Presse, and Le Journal and La Patrie the day after had armed men in their offices ready to defend their own property. Were they wrong or were they right?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Right.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. La Patrie advises this and I do not dissent in any way from that advice. If the Star newspaper, which is the organizer of this demonstration—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, I say it on my responsibility as a minister of the Crown, that the Star newspaper sent flags to the McGill students—

Mr. DAVIN. May I be permitted to ask—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, the Star sent flags, and it is from Dominion Square, where the Star had paid for dozens and dozens of tar barrels, that the demonstration started to invade Laval University. Let the fact be known, let the truth be known as it is.

Mr. MILLS. Is it a crime to put up the British flag?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; sit down.

Mr. QUINN. Will the minister allow me to ask him a question?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not wish to be interrupted any further while I am making my speech.

Mr. QUINN. I have simply a question to ask.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn) cannot interrupt unless the hon. member who has the floor permits him.

Mr. QUINN. Unless he wishes I shall not ask.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Sit down.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn) raise a point of order?

Mr. QUINN. I wish to ask a question.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. If the hon. gentleman does not raise a point of order, I do not wish to be interrupted.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. member (Mr. Tarte) declines to allow the hon. member to ask a question, there is no alternative.

Mr. QUINN. Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member (Mr. Quinn) has no right to the floor unless he wishes to raise a point of order.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not wish to be interrupted.

Mr. QUINN. I simply wish to ask a question.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member cannot go on unless he is raising a point of order. I must ask him to take his seat.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I was proceeding to say that it was on Dominion Square that the Star organized a demonstration of its own by burning barrels of tar. The Star would give a great deal to see the British flag torn down in the city of Montreal, and I am only sorry that one man has been found foolish enough in that great city to commit such an outrage. Allusion has been made to these articles, and it has been said that Kruger with his treasury has invaded Canada. This insinuation does not deserve an answer at the hands of anybody. I altogether decline to allow public opinion to remain under the impression that there was any difficulty whatever between the students of McGill and the students of Laval. It is not the case. After the unfortunate occurrences in which the McGill students took part, the Laval students met and decided to make a peaceful demonstration. What did they do? They took an English flag and carried it at the head of their procession; they proceeded to the statue of the Queen on Victoria Square and there cheered Her Gracious Majesty. They did not do anything else, and it was in return for that peaceful demonstration that their university was invaded and sacked. The responsibility for that rests on the shoulders of whom it may. The students of Laval have not broken any doors. They have not invaded the property of any private citizens. They have paraded in the streets; they have made a demonstration, as it was their right to do; they have not done anything else. In the evening of Friday, a crowd of people organized and paraded the streets. They went to the Star office. The Star is looked upon by the citizens of Montreal and by many members of this House at the present time as one of the most dangerous enemies of this country. It is disappointed at not having carried the elections in 1896, and God knows that Mr. Hugh Graham was not very far from us a month before the election took place. There are living witnesses who know that he was trembling in the balance, not knowing on which side to throw his influence; but when he saw that the Roman Catholic clergy were trying to coerce the province of Quebec at the request of the leader of the opposition, he thought that we were lost, and went to the other side, and the leader of the opposition promised him the realm of the world. Since then he has found that the province of Quebec is inhabited by disloyal men. Well, Sir, the crowd went to the Star office. Unfortunately, a foolish man took down the British flag. Why did he do so? He should have known that the flag belongs just as much to him as it belongs to any other man. The English flag is my flag as well as the flag of the hon. gentleman opposite; and it is to all who love the English flag that I appeal to-day to help us to put an end to the dangerous agitations which prevail in this country. I am sure, Sir, that the insult was not meant to the British flag; it was meant to the Star. All the same, the outrage has been committed; and in the name of my countrymen, if it is one of them who has done it, I beg most humbly to apologize. As soon as I learned that such an outrage had been committed, I dictated through the telephone on Saturday, the following article, for which I am myself responsible:

Respect to the British Flag.

As much as we deplore the criminal acts committed on Thursday by the students of McGill University and those who accompanied them, as much we protest against the indescribable conduct of those who have gone to the 'Star' offices and have seized upon the British flag to trample it under their feet. For the British flag must be sacred to every citizen of this country, whatever his origin or his religious creed may be. It is the emblem of the Canadian nation, because we form part of the empire, and anybody who stains the British flag renders himself guilty of an attempt against which it is the duty of all good citizens to protest with all the energy of which they are capable. We would have nothing to say against a demonstration made by our countrymen to protest against the outrages of which they were the victims on Thursday. But was it necessary for this protestation to be accompanied by insults to Her Majesty? For an insult to the British flag is an insult to the Queen herself. We are happy to say that the students of Laval University are not at all responsible for this attempt. They carried at the head of their procession the British flag, and in passing Victoria Square they cheered for our gracious Sovereign. Unfortunately, the telegraph has already carried to England and elsewhere the sinister news that they are students of a French university who have trampled upon the British flag. The moral of all this is that it is necessary at once to put an end to any demonstration. The old and ambitious man who leads the opposition and his chief organ, the 'Star,' will bear before history the responsibility of everything that has happened. These are they who have denounced the French Canadians to the hatred of their countrymen of other origins, and have provoked the scenes of vandalism which were perpetrated on Thursday.

Mr. FOSTER. That is your own writing.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, and I am holding myself fully responsible for it. Was I right or was I wrong?

Mr. MONTAGUE. As I understand, the hon. gentleman does not object to the article.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I wish to proceed without being interrupted, if possible.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am not interrupting.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) has a very short memory for history and facts. A few days ago I had the honour to read to the House the following article from a well-known and recognized organ of my hon. friends opposite—the News, of Toronto. The News is the evening edition of the Mail, a paper most widely circulated and well known as one of the accredited organs of the Tory party. What did the News say?

Mr. CLARKE. What is the date?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This article appeared in the month of October:

We can tell Mr. Tarte and his friends and co-adjutors that the people of this province are thinking hard just now. They are opening their eyes to the true character of their French neighbours, and are forming conclusions that will have their fruition sooner or later in depriving French Canadians of the special privileges granted them by the Treaty of Paris.

My hon. friend is pleased with that.

Mr. FOSTER. How do you know?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No one on the other side has ever said a word against it or disclaimed it either in the press or parliament.

Unless the British Canadians of this province are cravens, they will not tolerate a condition of subjection to the French Canadians; and if, through the ballot-box there is no redress, they will find other means of emancipating themselves from the domination of an inferior people that peculiar circumstances have placed in authority in the Dominion.

Mr. CLARKE. Is that—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CLARKE. Read the whole of it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. ex-Minister of Finance has in his own province an organization directed by Mr. Hetherington, who, if I am not mistaken, is the paid organizer of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. FOSTER. Would the hon. gentleman allow me? He knows that I have just spoken and cannot speak again. He knows that I challenged him, when he had the opportunity of replying, to make good his assertion the other day and he refused to do it. Will the hon. gentleman leave that until he and I have an opportunity to fight it out if he dares.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Neither the right fist nor the left fist of the hon. gentleman has ever frightened me.

Mr. FOSTER. Will my hon. friend—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman knows that he has often spoken after me, when I had not the right to reply to him at once.

Mr. FOSTER. You are brave when behind—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman will have more than one opportunity to answer other allegations besides these. The hon. gentleman has never denied and will not, either here or elsewhere, that Mr. Hetherington is the organizer of his party in New Brunswick. It is a well known fact.

Mr. FOSTER. It is not a fact. My hon. friend is very brave when he is up on his kopje. Let him come into the open field.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I did not interrupt my hon. friend when he was speaking. He does not stand fire well.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman to go on with his speech. The ex-Minister of Finance has denied that Mr. Hetherington is the representative of the Conservative party.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. If he denies that Mr. Hetherington has anything to do with the organization of New Brunswick, I will accept his statement. But in the hon. gentleman's county, Queen's county, he is the organizer.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. He cannot deny it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I will proceed with my statement anyhow. Here are affidavits which speak for themselves.

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask my hon. friend one question?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FOSTER. As a courtesy.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FOSTER. Let me put one question.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Not now.

Mr. SPEAKER. Will hon. gentlemen please come to order and allow the hon. minister to proceed.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I think the hon. gentleman is becoming restless. He does not like to hear the truth.

Mr. FOSTER. How long will it be before you go to Paris?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to see that order is maintained. Here is the first affidavit, dated November 11, 1899, given by Mr. Samuel E. Macdonald:

I, Samuel E. Macdonald, of the parish of Brunswick, in the county of Queen's, and province of New Brunswick, farmer, do solemnly declare that at a meeting called by having notices posted in different parts of the county, stating that said meeting was in the interests of the Liberal-Conservative party, and would be addressed by Mr. Tilley, a barrister of St. John; also by Mr. H. B. Hetherington, of Queen's. Another speaker was advertised to speak, but only Hetherington and Tilley appeared; and while the speeches delivered all tended to show that the Liberal party were disloyal as a whole, H. B. Hetherington said that the next election 'would not be run on political lines, but that the question would be between the Roman Catholics and Protestants, and if war was ever declared between France and England, the people here of the lower provinces would have to shoulder their muskets and go up to Quebec to fight the French Canadians before we could help England. And that the Liberal party were giving the Catholics all the offices in the gift of the Crown now, or nearly so, that is to say, out of thirty offices in the city of St. John in the gift of the government, twenty-eight Roman Catholics and two Protestants were appointed. Mr. Hetherington, in condemning the Roman Catholics, said that Police Magistrate Ritchie, of St. John, who is a Roman Catholic, was never known to make an honest decision in court when he had a Protestant to deal with. Both Mr. Tilley and Mr. H. B. Hetherington, while speaking, were advocating the nomination and election of Geo. E. Foster in the constituency of Sunbury and Queen's; and H. B. Hetherington, in closing his speech, produced a pledge calling it the Geo. E. Foster Club, the signers of which were pledged to work for the nomination and election of Geo. E. Foster in the electoral district of Sunbury and Queen's. And I make this solemn declaration, conscientiously believing it to be true and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act of 1893.

SAMUEL E. MACDONALD.

Declared at Brunswick, in the county of Queen's, and province of New Brunswick, the 2nd day of December, A.D. 1899.

Before me,

SILAS S. CLARKE.

And this is another declaration:

I, Frank E. Clark, of the parish of Brunswick, in the county of Queen's, and province of New Brunswick, farmer, do solemnly declare that at a political meeting held in the parish of Brunswick, and in the county of Queen's, on November 11, in the interest of the Liberal-Conservative party, and addressed by Mr. Tilley, of the city of St. John, son of Sir Leonard Tilley, and Horton B. Hetherington, of Queen's County, and while the speeches went to show that the Liberal party were not capable of administering and carrying on the affairs of the Dominion as they should be, they also went to show that the Liberal party were not as loyal as they should be. H. B. Hetherington stated that the next Dominion elections would not be run on political lines altogether, but that the fight would be between the Roman Catholics and the Protestants. He said that some people would say, 'do not raise a religious cry,' but he (Hetherington) thought it was time a religious cry was raised, as the present government were filling up every office of importance with Roman Catholics as far as possible. He also stated that if England and France had ever occasion to go to war with each other, the people of the lower provinces would have to shoulder their muskets and go up to Quebec to fight the French Canadians, as they would not stand by the motherland in time of war with France. Hetherington stated that it was very likely that the Hon. Geo. E. Foster would contest the united counties of Queen's and Sunbury in the interests of the Liberal-Conservative party at the next Dominion election, and before taking his seat he produced and read a pledge to the meeting; he called it the George E. Foster Club. He asked all the electors that were willing to vote, work and do all that was in their power to secure the election of George E. Foster in the united counties of Queen's and Sunbury, to come forward and sign it, and then Hetherington ended one of the wildest and slangiest political harangues ever delivered in the parish of Brunswick. And I make this solemn declaration, conscientiously believing it to be true and knowing that it has the same force and effect as if made under oath, and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act of 1893.

Mr. TARTE.

FRANK E. CLARKE.

And here is another:

I, Amos B. Curry, of the parish of Brunswick, of the county of Queen's, and province of New Brunswick, farmer, do solemnly declare that Horton B. Hetherington, in addressing a political meeting in the parish of Brunswick, county of Queen's, on the evening of November 11, in the interest of the Hon. George E. Foster, stated that at the next Dominion election the issue would not be Liberal or Conservative, free trade or protection, but the fight would be between the Protestants and Roman Catholics; and should ever a war take place between England and France, the people of the lower provinces would have to shoulder their muskets, and go up to Quebec to fight the French Canadians, as the French Canadians were not loyal. Some people say, 'do not raise a religious cry,' but he (Hetherington) thought it was high time that the religious cry was raised, as the Roman Catholics were being appointed to every office of importance. Before the close of the meeting, Mr. Hetherington produced and read a pledge asking the electors to sign, pledging themselves to vote and work for the Hon. George E. Foster, and do all they could to secure the election of the Hon. George E. Foster for the county of Queen's. And I make this solemn declaration, conscientiously believing it to be true, knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act, 1893.

AMOS B. CURRY.

Declared at Brunswick, in the county of Queen's, and the province of New Brunswick, this 1st day of December 1899, before me, Silas T. Clarke, a justice of the peace in and for the county of Queen's.

I heard an hon. gentleman asking: What has this to do with the Montreal incident? It has everything to do with it, Sir. For, from British Columbia to the easternmost parts of Prince Edward Island, nearly every Tory paper is making appeals on the same line. We are not blind—

Mr. FOSTER. Quote them.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS—we can read and write—

Mr. FOSTER. I want the hon. gentleman to give the quotations.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Sit down.

Mr. FOSTER. I want the hon. gentleman to give these quotations.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. FOSTER. I want the quotations.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Let the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) keep the peace, if he can. He is making a very bad exhibition of himself. He is a leader in this parliament. He has already stood stronger speeches than I am making. I am making a very moderate speech; I am reading sworn documents. Let the hon. gentleman swallow them. This has everything to do, as I said, with the Montreal incident. It is a well known fact, for instance, that the hon. member for West York has been all through the country denouncing my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), because there is in Canada an ablegate from Rome. He has done that and more. I know, Sir, that there has been a kind of pass-word sent about, according to the sworn statements that I have read before the House. The flag that hon. gentlemen opposite are raising is the racial flag. They are trying to turn the tables upon us by misquoting articles from the French newspapers. They trust to the fact that the English population do not read French, and they can lie as much as they will. Sir, I quite echo the sentiments that have fallen from the lips of the right hon. the Prime Minister, when he stated that, perhaps, it was not so bad after all, that these disturbances had occurred. We regret them. I am glad to say that all the good citizens of the city of Montreal and the province of Quebec regret them deeply. I was in Montreal yesterday. I met scores of friends of English origin. They all shook me by the hand and they all expressed their deep regret at what the students from McGill University had done. And, Sir, I did not hesitate very long in expressing my deep and sincere regret that there should be a man, whether French or not, who dared to trample upon the British flag. I hope all men without distinction of political party, all men worthy of being British citizens, will in future unite in trying to put an end to that racial cry. As I said elsewhere, my countrymen fully understand that, they cannot go to live outside of Canada, they cannot trek elsewhere. This land is their land as much as it is the land of any one else. They were the first to come here, and they intend to stand by the old land. Sir, it is not true that I have ever raised the racial cry in the country. I say before my countrymen and before this House, that the accusation is an infamous contradiction of my whole career. I may have made mistakes, but I am a Britisher by conviction, and, I may add, by sentiment. My forefathers fought for their liberty against British soldiers; but when the battle was over and when our liberties were granted to us, we forgot everything. We are to-day happy to live side by side with our fellow-countrymen of other origins. I say again that the charge is not true. My hon. friends opposite, have made a dead set against me. The hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) is laughing. Sir, while I was lying on what might have been my death bed on the other side of the ocean, he was weak enough—and he will regret it, I am sure, because he is not so bad at heart—he was weak enough to say that I had fled from this country. And three days ago the Citizen had an article stating that last year I had fled, and that I was prepared to fly again. God knows why I went away from the House last year; all the House knows that if I had delayed a few weeks longer, perhaps I would not be here to-day. Everybody knows that I had a very narrow escape with my life. Yes, Sir, I say that hon. gentlemen opposite have made a dead set against me. It is for that reason that I am in my seat to-day, because I will not go out of parliament, I will not allow hon. gentlemen to lie me out of parliament; they cannot do it. Otherwise, I say again, I would have no desire to remain, my tastes are elsewhere, but I will not allow them to drive me away by lies.

Mr. BENNETT. We want you to stay.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) cheers because I said I would stay here.

Mr. BENNETT. Yes, I am glad you are going to stay.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Well, I am glad to, because I am face to face with those who accuse me, and I am prepared here to defend every action of mine. I am not prepared to stand by everything that Tom, Dick and Harry may write; but articles I write myself, articles to which I put my hand, I will stand by. The hon. member for East Simcoe will perhaps hear from me later on. He likes to see me in the House, and I hope he will like to see me in his own riding.

Mr. BENNETT. Your private secretary was there last election.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I was never there; if I had been there, the hon. gentleman certainly would not be here now. Mr. Speaker, I must apologize for speaking so long. I did not expect to speak at all to-day. Again, Sir, if any more apology is necessary, permit me to apologize for the insult that has been offered to the British flag. Let all the citizens of this country, let our English friends from all the provinces, understand well that we stand shoulder to shoulder with them. We are not obliged to hold all their views, and they are not obliged to hold all our views; but we have all the same obligation, that is, to be true to this Canada of ours, and, I add, without a moment's hesitation, to be true to that great British Empire in which we are all happy to live.

Mr. N. F. DAVIN (West Assiniboia). I do not know whether the hon. gentleman who has taken his seat is more amusing in his paroxysms of loyalty than in his other paroxysms; certainly the exhibition that we have had here is a melancholy epilogue to what was on the whole a desirable prologue. But, there is one thing the hon. gentleman said which I must refer to. The moment the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) rises up, we have the same note sounded that has been sounded in La Patrie. Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has accused my hon. friend, the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), of raising the racial cry, and what does he do? He immediately shows that that is precisely what he has done, is doing, and will do himself. And when challenged by the ex-Minister of Finance to substantiate a statement that he had made on the floor of the House, that racial cries had been raised by Liberal-Conservatives, he reads what I will show to have been untruthful affidavits. The hon. gentleman has left the Chamber. Well, I am not surprised that he runs away, because I do not think that courage was the quality that distinguished the conclusion of the speech of the Minister of Public Works; I think, if it was parliamentary, I might use a positive expression, giving him credit for something the very antithesis of that. Now, here is a portion of a letter from Mr. H. B. Hetherington, respecting these false statements and these false affidavits which have been read by the Minister of Public Works:

In respect to myself, I am so strongly opposed to a religious or race agitation in Canadian politics that I have not failed to denounce that sort of thing in every political address that I have delivered, always being careful to avoid any language that would reflect on any man's religious belief. I have frequently addressed audiences with a fair proportion of Catholics present, and if the government press can find a single Catholic in King's or Sunbury County who will say that I attacked their religion in any way, shape or manner, I will do just what the Kingites have been boasting that they would make me do, retire from the public platform. Moreover, I will deliver my Brunswick address before any Acadian audience, and if they find anything insulting to their race (unless they consider Laurier and Tarte to be the sum total of their race), I will agree to vote for the government at the next election.

I can assure the public that no race or religious agitation is needed in Queen's County, so far as the Liberal-Conservative party is concerned, and the only one that exists is a sickly mental mirage called into existence by government heelers for the purpose of adding fuel to Mr. Tarte's anti-Protestant and anti-British campaign in Quebec, which campaign must be having little effect, else there would be no need of resorting to such desperate expedients as the affidavits of government officials to give it some force and effect. A drowning man grasps at a straw, and a falling government appropriates the methods of the American yellow press to retain power.

I have in my hand, also, the report of the meeting that took place in Queen's County where Mr. Hetherington spoke. I wish the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) would speak in a lower tone, or if he wants to conduct that prayer meeting, in which he is engaged, he would retire, because, every word that he says comes to my ear. I would make the same request of my hon. and learned friend (Mr. Morrison).

Taking up the question of the now famous (or infamous) affidavits, Mr. Hetherington said they were false. He understood that they had been sent to Quebec and were being struck off in thousands for the purpose of making political capital in favour of Mr. Tarte. He thought it was a prudent thing to send them out of the province, for any one in the province who knew the men who made the affidavits, or the magistrate who swore them, would not be impressed by them. They could expect the statements to have a greater value among strangers. What he had really said was that the men who were trying to raise the race and religious cry in the country were supporters of the government; that Mr. Tarte especially was trying to stir up religious and race strife in Quebec for political purposes; and he (Hetherington) had never stated that a man of French descent should not be Prime Minister of Canada.

There is what he said in the hearing of persons most of which would have attended other meetings and all of whom would know what he said and the language he used. I have an affidavit in my hand, signed by eight electors, and it reads as follows:—

We, the undersigned electors of the parish of Brunswick, in the county of Queen's and province of New Brunswick, hereby make oath and say:

1. We were at the organizing meeting addressed by Horton B. Hetherington and L. P. D. Tilley on the evening of the 11th day of November, 1899.

2. To the best of our knowledge and belief, Horton B. Hetherington did not make any attack on the Roman Catholic Church or religion.

3. Horton B. Hetherington did not assail the French race in any way.

4. Horton B. Hetherington did not say that the Liberal-Conservative party intended to contest the next Dominion election on the Catholic and Protestant issue.

5. We are members of the George E. Foster Club, and there is no religious test of any kind in connection with that organization, nor is it carrying on any kind of a religious agitation or anti-Catholic crusade.

That disposes of the affidavits of the hon. Minister of Public Works and of the assertions respecting what took place there. But, what, Sir, is the argument of the hon. Minister of Public Works? He reads, and he does not read ingenuously, from an alleged article in the News, one or two sentences, and when asked by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke), to read the whole article, he does not do so. He reads from that paper, for what purpose? To show that it suggests strife and to condemn it. What is the meaning of that? If an irresponsible writer in the News, in Toronto, is to be condemned, if an unknown writer in the Citizen of to-day is to be condemned, as the right hon. Prime Minister said, what is to be said of La Patrie? What is to be said of the hon. Minister of Public Works? And the curious spectacle that we had before us to-day is this: The right hon. Prime Minister got up and expressed himself in proper terms respecting the deplorable occurrences which took place in the city of Montreal, and then he read, with his usual oratorical emphasis, and attached all the importance he could to it, an article from the Citizen, and he condemned that article in the Citizen, but not one word had he to say of the article in La Patrie, one of the most infamous articles that ever appeared in any newspaper. The moment I mentioned La Patrie the hon. Minister of Public Works left the Chamber. That is an occurrence to which we are accustomed. We are accustomed to hear ministers make speeches, and when we rise to reply they dart out and dart in, and their flying coat-tails are about all that we see. When the hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) was reading this atrocious article in La Patrie, the hon. Minister of Public Works challenged the translation of one sentence, and he said that he would give the translation as it should be translated, but I put it to the House if he ever said a word about that sentence. No, he skipped it, and when I rose to ask him if he would translate that sentence he would not allow me to ask him the question: he shook his head, and then his cowardly followers—however, I suppose though used in a general way, that is not parliamentary, and I will withdraw it—well, his courageous followers cheered him to the echo when he fell back behind the ramparts of parliamentary rules to shield himself from the exposure that he would undoubtedly have received. I know something of French, and I say that the translation, as it was read by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), substantially bears out the language as it appeared. The hon. minister says that he could have vengeance if he liked, and he goes on to counsel them not to take vengeance, but he says: Organize and be prepared, put yourselves in a position to fight, if necessary, but do not do it. Do not nail their ears to the pump. One of the most striking poems which has appeared in any language is that written by Kipling in regard to those writers in any country, who, themselves, not taking the risk of firing a pistol and shedding blood, by reason of their violent writings, counsel the dastardly deed. I say here that if bloodshed had occurred in the city of Montreal, if the streets of Montreal had flowed with blood, one need not have been surprised after that violent, that treasonable article which appeared in La Patrie. What an exhibition we had! While that article, treasonable, disloyal—there is no word strong enough in the English language to characterize the sentiments of the article or the man who wrote it—while that article is being read you have the hon. Minister of Public Works cheering.

Mr. SPROULE. And a lot of his friends, too.

Mr. DAVIN. You have him turning around and telling us: Three or four days afterwards I telegraphed this article and they raised the flag. Such an exhibition of hypocrisy is without parallel. They raised the flag after his language of four days before counselling them to trample it under their feet.

Mr. SPROULE. And which they did, too.

Mr. DAVIN. And which they did too. Now, Mr. Speaker, what is the cause of all this? My hon. friend from Kent, N.B. (Mr. McInerney), referring to the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) said that certain gentlemen should go on a counteracting mission to Quebec in order to undo the preaching of the past. Well, Sir, what is the use of putting on a poor, wretched plaster like that article which the Minister of Public Works read to us with such paroxysms that deceived no one. What is the use of his chanting these loud professions of loyalty on his lips to-day, because he has been ordered to do it? I suppose the pistol was put to his head. I suppose it has been said to him: 'You have nearly ruined us; the shadow of your loyalty is on us; we are not strong enough to get rid of you altogether, but we must send you to a foreign country; before you go do something to try and undo the vile work your violent and disloyal acts have done.' I suppose that was said to him. And, then he writes this hypocritical article, and he dares to quote it in the same Chamber ten minutes after this other traitorous and disloyal article from his newspaper was quoted. I doubt, Sir, if so mean an exhibition has ever occurred in any legislative chamber before. We have the Prime Minister taking part in the debate and reading a lecture to the editor of the Citizen for his comparatively mild article this morning, and there is not one word from the Prime Minister against La Patrie for such an article, which had it been written in any but a British country, the editor would have been brought before the bar of a court of justice and very quickly imprisoned. Not a word from the Prime Minister against this article in La Patrie. Need we be surprised. We must face these things now, and take them as they are. Had we not the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa); had we not the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Monet); pointing down to the Prime Minister, and when they uttered in his hearing language that many persons thought atrocious, saying: There is my Gamaliel, there is my Mentor, there is the man at whose feet I learned these things. Sir, I have the teaching of these gentlemen in 1896, sent all over the province of Quebec. Here is the campaign sheet of the Liberals then:

One of the blunders of old Tupper is Imperial federation, which signifies a more intimate alliance between England and her colonies in general and Canada in particular.

One of the conditions of this alliance will be that in times of war Canada will be called upon to pay its share of the cost in money and in men.

Thus, as England is always at war with somebody, we will have to continually tax ourselves to find money and to draw lots to furnish the men.

In return England will create these droll baronets, knights of this, and commanders of that.

But the people will remain food for the cannon.

Why all these armaments if we are not to have war?

And why fight for England?

Why fight for England? There is the banner cry sent forth with the right hon. gentleman leading throughout Quebec. And, Sir, in view of such teaching as that, need we be surprised if in a moment of excitement the results are—to use the words of the right hon. gentleman—deplorable. But, let us go back further, because now we have to face facts. What is tearing down the British flag; what is dishonouring the British flag; what are they, compared with sending a bullet through it? Did not the right hon. gentlemen say in the Champs de Mars in 1885, that he could go to the North-west, to the banks of the Saskatchewan with a musket on his shoulder? Did not he say that he could go to the Saskatchewan—near to the gentleman who comes from the Saskatchewan now (Mr.

Mr. DAVIN.

Davis) who is his counsellor and friend, and who goes down beside him to take hints from him as to the delightful notices he puts on the Order paper—did not the right hon. the Prime Minister say in 1885, that he could go to the Saskatchewan and shoulder a musket? And for what? To shoot at the British flag. Sir, what is shooting at the British flag with paper pellets of the brain compared with shooting at it with leaden bullets? That is the teaching of the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. Here is what La Patrie said in the earlier part of the South African war, and is not it the same teaching as we hear to-day?

As has been already stated in these columns, the Canadian government has not offered, either directly or indirectly, to send a military contingent to England, but the Colonial Office in London—

We know that is untrue:

—in a despatch received a day or two since suggested to the Canadian government that England would be pleased to see the Canadian subjects of Her Majesty taking part in the expedition to the Transvaal. On the receipt of this, &c.

So that going back to 1885, going to Boston in 1891, coming to 1896 and the campaign sheets I have described; coming right down to the teachings of La Patrie six months ago, to these we can trace what has occurred in Montreal, and over which we have hypocritical and crocodile tears shed to-day. That is the natural fruit of the teaching of these gentlemen opposite. As Kipling said in regard to the dreadful murder in the Phoenix Park:

If black is black, and white is white, and powder speeds the ball, the responsibility of that dastardly deed is at the door of the men who instructed the poor boys, frightened the poor boys, filled them with zeal against England, taught them to defy the flag as if it were a danger to themselves and something they should malign and hate. So shall I say now,

If blood is blood, and death is death, and powder speeds the ball, as surely as the man who wrote that dastardly article in La Patrie and cheered it here to-day; as surely as he wrote that; if disastrous consequences had followed and death ensued; the blood would have been at his door and the responsibility to the widow, or to the bereaved father and mother as the case might be, would have been at his door. Sir, what is the use in this House of doing as gentlemen opposite do? What is the use of getting up, and as the Prime Minister can so well do, making a nice speech now? What is the use of his going over to England to Her Majesty's jubilee, and when there are thousands there to cheer him, telling an English audience—with English flags all around and his hips touching nobles and dukes—telling an English audience: We will give our blood for you; Canada will fight for you; and then, when the hour of danger comes, he hesitates—but worse than his hesitation, when his own colleague uses disloyal language, and the organs of his own party and his own minister and adviser use language of disloyalty, fire-brand language; uttering not one word of reproof as far as we know; not one word of public reproof certainly. When I think of the jubilee and of all the glory, and all the talk, and all the praise, and I look over these four mean years, and at the state of things now, and at that government, why, Sir, all we had was a sounding prologue to sinister acts and shiftless scenes, and an epilogue of dishonour.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. JOHN CHARLTON (North Norfolk). Mr. Speaker, I think that upon cool reflection the great majority of the members of this House who listened to the discussion which took place this afternoon must look back upon that episode with feelings of regret. The effect of that discussion in my opinion will not be a salutary one. The motives that may naturally be attributed to the gentlemen who precipitated that discussion will bear questioning, and the effect upon the country at large will be detrimental rather than otherwise. We are peculiarly situated as a nationality in Canada. We have two races, and their numerical strength is so nearly balanced that it is a disastrous thing to adopt a course that will pit one of these races against the other. We have racial affinities to a certain extent. To a greater extent we have points of racial animosity, and these feelings of racial divergence can be easily played upon, human passions can be easily aroused; and gentlemen who have the respect of their constituents, and are sent here to look after the interests of their constituents and the interests of this country at large, should bear in mind this peculiar condition of affairs that exists in Canada, and should be governed in their conduct by a just appreciation of what the interests of the country demand at their hands. Now, Sir, to me, I confess it with regret—I arrive at the conclusion candidly, coolly and carefully—it seemed evident that the animus of this discussion this afternoon was a purpose to make out of the incidents upon which this discussion arose party capital. That, I believe, was the animus of the gentlemen on the opposite side of this Chamber, who precipitated this discussion. It was, when analysed and when reduced to its first principles, a bald, bare appeal to racial prejudice. Now, I have racial prejudices. I would resist French aggression, if such a thing were to occur. I believe in the English government, in the English empire, in English institutions; I wish and pray for English interests, and I do not believe that a course such as the one adopted this afternoon is calculated to promote these interests. I believe the interests of the English Empire require justice, fair-play, the recognition of the rights of all the subjects of this empire. We have at this very moment, Mr. Speaker, a warning, standing palpably before us, of the danger of exciting racial animosities and of what that may lead to. We surely do not desire in Canada here a repetition of the experience that curses South Africa at the present moment. These gentlemen on the opposite side of this House do not, I am sure, desire a civil war; and yet the course they have taken this afternoon leads directly in the direction of having that calamity befall this country. As to this talk about loyalty, I am tired of that senseless, hollow howl about loyalty. Sir, there is no disloyal element in this country. Canada is loyal from Gaspé to Vancouver, from Halifax to the North Pole. If there is a disloyal element in Canada, it consists of that handful of public men who would sacrifice to party advantage the interests of the country, and would arouse those feelings of animosity and hatred for the sake of arraying section against section and race against race, in order that they might reap some advantage from such a condition of affairs.

Mr. MILLS. You did that before.

Mr. CHARLTON. What is all this trouble about? What circumstance has given rise to this fierce and ill-tempered discussion which has occupied the attention of this House since it met at three o'clock this afternoon? Why, Sir, it has been a circumstance which is a disgrace to the English-speaking portion of the province of Quebec. It has been an assault made by the English students of the greatest university of Canada, associated with other English-speaking people, upon three French newspapers and upon a French university. Suppose, Sir, this condition of affairs had been reversed. Suppose the students of Laval and a mob of Frenchmen had attacked the English newspapers of the city of Montreal and McGill University; what would have been said about that? But it would have been no greater outrage than the one that has been perpetrated. It would not have called for any louder condemnation from the people of this country than the act that has been perpetrated has called for; and we would do well if we satisfied ourselves with lamenting this condition of affairs and seeking to allay the feelings that have been excited by this exhibition of mob violence. These matters, Mr. Speaker, require to be handled with forbearance; and when there are assembled together in the legislative halls of a country representatives from its various constituencies, they may reasonably be supposed to be men of sense, men of discretion, men able to gauge the condition of public affairs, and men with a knowledge of the necessary conditions which should lead them to seek to palliate and smooth over and allay that spirit of violence that must be called into existence by actions such as those committed by the English-speaking students of McGill University, backed up by the English mob who associated with them in their assault on the three French newspapers and on the University of Laval. I speak thus as an Englishman. I say I do not condone this outrage; I condemn it as injuring the harmony, the well-being, the future of this Dominion; and to go on, as was done this afternoon, to add fuel to the flame, to fan the embers, to spread more widely that feeling of hatred and excitement that exists in the country in consequence of what has happened, is an act of criminality. It is an act that ought not to be perpetrated by men who wish for their country's weal in relation to this or any other matter. The dignified, conciliatory spirit of the Premier in this connection commanded my respect and admiration. There was not the slightest evidence of racial feeling or animosity; there was not the slightest evidence of a feeling of hostility. He treated the question with forbearance, dignity and manliness, and exhibited to this House and country the kind of spirit that should actuate public men in dealing with these most lamentable circumstances that formed the subject of our discussion this afternoon.

My hon. friend, the member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster), attempted to be facetious, when he spoke of the friendly visit of McGill to Laval, and informed us that the articles in La Patrie had led to these disturbances. My understanding of the matter was that the articles in La Patrie were the consequence of these disturbances, and I believe I am right, and the attempt of my hon. friend throughout, was plainly to try and implicate the government and a minister of the Crown, in these unfortunate disturbances, and thus create the impression in the public that these disturbances were due in some way to the conduct of the government, and especially the conduct of the Minister of Public Works. My hon. friend revealed very clearly the motive that actuated him. I admit that it is natural, and, within certain limits, perhaps proper for a leading politician to attempt to make political capital, and I sympathize, to a certain extent with any attempt in that line, but that attempt may be carried too far, and in my opinion it was carried too far by the hon. member for York this afternoon. In these troublous times, when the public mind is inflamed and ready to take fire, we should be careful how we handle firebrands, and how far we go in the attempt to make political capital for our party. We should hold the good of the country first, and refrain from taking any action, which our better judgment tells us may be disastrous to the country we all respect and love, and for whose interests we should all labour.

I can see that almost every day there is a disposition to attack the Minister of Public Works, and it is evidently a matter of very secondary importance whether the attack is well founded or not. My hon. friend is a subject of animosity to the opposite side of the House, and, to use a common expression, a dead set is regularly, systematically and persistently made upon him. Now, the gravamen of the article in La Patrie seems to be the advice to resist violence. Violence had been perpetrated, a mob had assailed the office of La Patrie and other French newspaper offices in Montreal and also the Laval University. There was consequently an enflamed and excited state of feeling in that city. It is but natural to suppose, that under these conditions, articles were written for the newspapers, which were more inflammatory than would have been the case if these newspaper editors had had some days to cool down in their feelings.

Mr. MONTAGUE. As the Globe has.

Mr. CHARLTON. Under the circumstances, I do not know that there is very much to condemn in this article advising resistance to violence. It might not be exactly in consonance with the spirit of Holy Writ, which commands us to turn our cheek to the smiter, but it is consonance with the spirit of manhood that a person, who is attacked in his office, or house, or home or castle, should not, if he has the spirit of Briton, sit down tamely and submit to the outrage until he can call the police. He is more likely to take a chair, or a club, or a revolver, or a musket, or a dynamite bomb, or any other weapon of offence or defence to repel the aggressor.

Mr. FOSTER. Were you ever bounced when you were in college?

Mr. CHARLTON. I am not discussing my own career in college at the present moment. As I said a moment ago, some allowance must be made for the enflamed state of feeling that will, under such circumstances, exist in a city like Montreal. And the article to which I refer is quite as temperate as articles would likely have been in the English newspapers, if the case had been reversed, and McGill University had been assailed and the English newspaper offices in Montreal either gutted or attempted to be gutted.

My hon. friend, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), has told us that realizing the condition of affairs and how necessary it was to allay excitement, he telephoned an article to La Patrie, the title of which was 'Respect the Flag.' That was a loyal, a commendable article, but what was the criticism made by my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). Why, he said, it was a petty, paltry, despicable exhibition of hypocrisy.

Mr. DAVIN. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. My hon. friend says hear, hear. No hon. gentleman on this side, it seems, can give utterance to a loyal sentiment, without infringing upon the patent which these hon. gentlemen claim as their exclusive own. They are the simon pure, the unadulterated, the genuine, the only loyalists in the country who, upon the present or any other occasion, would not hesitate to involve us in the flames of a political or any other calamity which they could call down upon the heads of their fellow-citizens, provided that would get them back into office. My hon. friend, the Minister of Public Works, procured my respect by his candid, hearty apology for the insult to the British flag. He did not say who perpetrated that insult, and it would not surprise me very greatly if it were found that somebody who wanted to make trouble, and who was not of the house of Ephraim, had trampled on the flag. However, we do not know. That remains to be ascertained. But my hon. friend apologized for the insult perpetrated against the British nationality; let the one who perpetrated it be who he may. My hon. friend has charity, enough even to apologize for some sinner on the opposite side, if the sinner should happen to be a member of that communion. There is so much said against my hon. friend, the Minister of Public Works, that sometimes I really do not know whether he is a saint or not. But there is one thing I do know, and that is he is brimful of pluck, and I admire him for that. And another thing I was told once by an old farmer—that if on going through an orchard, you find clubs lying on the ground, you will not find them around the sour apple trees; but the tree that you find most clubs under, is a good tree.

Mr. MILLS. That is old.

Mr. CHARLTON. It is an application of an old truth. A truth is not less true because it is old; and there are a great many truths that my hon. friend (Mr. Mills) ought to hear. We find the clubs lying thick around my hon. friend's (Mr. Tarte's) apple tree, leading us to believe that the fruit there is the best. Hon. gentlemen opposite would like to possess themselves of it. If they can get it fairly, I wish them luck in getting it.

I am always amused when I hear the hon. member for West Assiniboia. He reminds me of a remark made by Artemus Ward's organ grinder when he was asked what he had to say about the monkey he carried with his organ. He said that the monkey was 'an amoosin' little cuss.' I hope I have not transgressed the rule of parliamentary debate in saying so.

Mr. DAVIN. Not a bit. I am the monkey, and you are the greater ape.

Mr. CHARLTON. My hon. friend (Mr. Davin) was greatly incensed when he rose to address the House because the Minister of Public Works did not remain. He said the hon. minister did not dare to stand fire when he (Mr. Davin) was directing his broadside. I suppose the Minister of Public Works has occasion to go out once in a while, and he will naturally choose an occasion when there is little of importance going on. If that is his idea he could not have chosen a more appropriate moment than he did. And the hon. member for West Assiniboia told us with gravity that the Minister of Public Works would not answer a question he put and that the minister's cowardly followers backed him up in that refusal. Mr. Speaker, you were a witness of the scene in the House this afternoon. I am sure you were a pained witness. You noticed, I am sure, how the amenities of debate were observed. You saw that it was necessary for a man to assert his right to speak if he had the floor. My hon. friend (Mr. Tarte) would have been interrupted with a thousand questions, and his speech would have been worse than fragmentary, if he had not claimed his right to make his speech and to refuse interruptions, as he did. Under the circumstances, I do not know whether I am entitled to say that it was an act of impertinence on the part of my hon. friend from West Assiniboia; at any rate, the refusal of the hon. Minister of Public Works to answer did not entitle the hon. member for West Assiniboia to complain of it as an outrage upon his rights and to speak of the evident manifestations of disapproval of his attempts to interrupt, as a cowardly action of the followers of the Minister of Public Works. Now, it was represented by the hon. member (Mr. Davin) that the Minister of Public Works had been subjected to a severe course of examination, had been warned that the course he pursued must be apologized for, that he must do something to extricate the party from the unpleasant predicament in which it had been placed by his unseemly and improper conduct. I did not see anything improper in the course the hon. minister had pursued. I do not think he has been brought to book and catechized for his course. I do not think he has done anything that merits the reprobation of the House. And, even so far as the newspaper with which he is reputed to be connected and the article which has been made the subject of such sound and fury by hon. gentlemen opposite, it seems to me that it is an article such as might be expected under the circumstances.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Has the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) read the Globe to-night?

Mr. CHARLTON. I have not seen it. If my hon. friend (Mr. Montague) has read it, I have no doubt that he has found something in it that will do him good.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Globe says that the statements of Mr. Tarte are arrant nonsense.

Mr. CHARLTON. My hon. friend from West Assiniboia took occasion to resurrect an old campaign document of 1896. This whole debate as carried on by hon. gentlemen opposite indicates a preconcerted movement to cast discredit upon the government through an appeal to race prejudice and the raking up of old party issues that have no pertinence to the subject of discussion. The hon. member for West Assiniboia mentioned that this old campaign document of 1896 in Quebec accused Sir Charles Tupper of being guilty of the blunder of advocating Imperial federation. And he brought this up with a great degree of confidence as though by doing so he had fastened upon the Liberal party the proof of his charge of disloyalty. Why, Sir, the question of Imperial federation is an open question; it is a question upon which one can exercise his own opinion without being guilty of disloyal sentiments. It is a difficult and complicated question. There is no difference of feeling in Canada as to the propriety of Imperial unity, of getting together as an empire, of the colonies standing by the motherland—that is accepted by all as a doctrine that should be sworn to by every colony and every party. But the question of Imperial federation involves various features as regards representation, and the method of uniting the colonies with the empire for legislative purposes. This whole question of Imperial federation, which was discussed years ago, is a difficult question and one upon which differences of opinion may exist without the loyalty of the party holding an adverse opinion being at all open to question. The attempt to fasten upon this party the charge of disloyalty because a campaign document of 1896 issued and circulated in Quebec spoke disrespectfully of Sir Charles Tupper and in a sense not of approval of his policy upon Imperial federation has no bearing upon the question of loyalty. It has a bearing on the question of Imperial federation and that alone.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I referred a few moments ago to the fact that we have two races in this country, two races not exactly equal in point of numbers, but nearly enough balanced in that respect to render difficult the management of the affairs of this country if racial feelings are appealed to, or if the proper course is not taken as regards the mutual relations and the mutual interests of the two races. Now, unfortunately, a great mass of the English-speaking people in Canada know very little about the French Canadians of Quebec; and, unfortunately, most of the French-speaking people know very little about the English Canadians of the other provinces. If these two peoples mingled together to a greater extent, if they knew each other better, the greater portion of the prejudices that exist in either case against the other would be removed, and the difficulties that beset the government of this country would, to a large extent, vanish. I saw something of the French race last year when in Quebec for a long time, and I am free to confess that the impression made upon me by what I saw of the characteristics of the French Canadian people was a highly favourable one. I found them, Sir, a kindly race, an orderly people, an industrious people, a temperate people, a law-abiding people. We have there, the material for good citizens—they are good citizens. It is important that the assimilation of the two races should go on, it is important that these races should know each other better, should assimilate more thoroughly; and that desirable end can be obtained, not by pursuing the course that was pursued here this afternoon, not by appeals to prejudice, not by violent language, not by abuse; but it can be secured by a policy of forbearance, of kindness, of mutual appreciation, of mutual respect for the rights of the one to the other. That is the course to pursue to bring about that condition of assimilation that we desire to see existing between the Anglo-Saxon and the French population of Canada.

What, Mr. Speaker, are the French antecedents upon this continent? Is this population in the province of Quebec a population without a history, a population without anything to entitle it to our respect, without anything to entitle it to our recognition? On the contrary, it is a race with a history that entitles it to our admiration. It has a romantic and gallant history that challenges the admiration of every man who will examine into the antecedents of the French people upon the continent of North America before the conquest. They were the pathfinders of empire. LaSalle, Marquette, Tonty, Hennepin, and other explorers passed up the Ottawa River when this whole country was a wilderness. They made their way to Lake Huron, they made their way over all the inland seas of North America, planted their military and trading posts at Mackinac, in Illinois, on the Mississippi, upon the Ohio River, at the junction of the Monongahela, and the Alleghany at Fort Duquesne. They circled the English settlements in the rear by a cordon of military posts. They were thoroughly acquainted with the great resources and the great future of the mighty west. While the English settlers clung to the seaboard and made their way slowly and without enterprise, without daring, into the interior, as their settlement progressed, the French though but a handful, penetrated to the far interior and became familiar with all the great geographical features of the North American continent ages before the conquest by England. When the shock of battle came and the last struggle between these two nations took place—for it seems that Providence had decreed that America was not large enough for an English nation and a French nation—when the shock of battle came they were by no means a despicable foe. They inflicted upon us a disastrous defeat on the Monongahela, and 2,000 British soldiers licked the dust in an ambush where but 500 French and Indians were posted. They defeated us at Ticonderoga, they defeated us at many points, the tide of battle went against us for two or three years. At last it turned in our favour, and the French nationality of North America ceased to exist when the gage of battle was thrown down upon the Plains of Abraham and Wolfe conquered Montcalm. But when the contest was settled, when the empire had passed from the grasp of the French king, and when English arms and English valour had secured for us the possession of the North American continent, we are obliged, when we look back over that field, to confess that our foe was a gallant one, that he was worthy of our respect. Be it remembered that this population of French Canada that gave the British Empire so much trouble in subduing it, at the time of the conquest were found to embrace but 60,000 souls, men, women and children, and this handful of French population had caused all this trouble, had caused us to put forth the utmost resources of the empire to conquer them, as conquer them we did.

Sir, the descendants of that 60,000 people who inhabited Canada at the close of the war between France and England, have feelings, they have a history, they have the natural pride of ancestry. Why should they not? When last year I looked out upon the beautiful surroundings of Quebec, when I realized that that impregnable position was the centre of French authority in America, that these people could look forth upon the mountains and upon the mighty St. Lawrence and realize the romantic character of their achievements in opening up the far west and penetrating to the distant regions with their voyageurs, establishing their trading posts and planting the foundations of what they dreamed would become a mighty empire in the future, embracing the Mississippi valley and the valley of the great lakes—I say, when I looked out upon these mountains, standing upon the plains of Abraham, standing upon the ramparts of the citadel of Quebec, I was impressed with the thought that these people must have a pride in their past, that these people must realize that a great prize had slipped from their grasp, that they must regret this fact, that it was natural that they should; and that the only course to pursue in dealing with this population was a course of justice, was a course of generosity, was a course of recognition of their character, of the nature of their achievements, was, in short, just the course that the English government did pursue, and just the course that my hon. friends on the other side of the House this afternoon did not pursue with them. We should deprecate any exhibition such as that which was made this afternoon in this Canadian House of Commons, purely for the purpose of appealing to racial prejudice, of inflaming animosity, and of seeking thus basely to make political capital.

Now, as I said a moment ago, we should respect these prejudices, we should respect these feelings, we should respect the feelings entertained by the descendants of a gallant race who realize that they were conquered, who realize that they are in a country which is alien to the land of their forefathers; but who, realizing all this, nevertheless are loyal to their obligations to the Crown of England, who recognize the generosity with which they have been treated, and are determined to uphold the institutions under which they live. They are loyal, Sir. I repudiate any idea, any thought, and insinuation, any assertion that the French Canadian population is not loyal to the British Empire and to the British Crown. And if, Mr. Speaker, any influence could have weight in diverting this population from those sentiments of loyalty, and in estranging them from their allegiance to the government under which they live, it is exactly the course of conduct that has been pursued in this House during the discussion of this question, where prejudices have been appealed to, where false constructions have been placed upon the conduct of men, upon the conduct of editors, and where the assailants have failed to recognize the real condition of affairs, or, if they did recognize them, have sought to mislead the public by distorting the facts. As I have said, assimilation is a desirable thing. But how are we to secure it? Are we to secure it by the exercise of force, by resorting to mob violence? Will this course of conduct bring it about? Never, Sir. If we resort to that line of conduct the cleavage that exists will widen, the separation of the two races will increase, and the difficulties of assimilating these two races, instead of being lessened, will be greatly magnified.

Now, with regard to this flag incident, with regard to a mob going down the street and noticing an office or a university where a flag is not flying. Whose business is it whether I hang a flag out on my house or not? Whose business is it whether the authorities of a university see fit to hang up a flag or not? It is an evidence of good feeling, it will secure our approval if the flag is run up. But there may be reasons for not doing it. As La Presse stated, they had not a flag staff; that might be a reason; they might not have a flag, that would be a reason; they might forget it, that would be a reason. But the neglect to run up a flag does not prove disloyalty; and it is an outrageous thing for a crowd to go down the street and assault a man, or assault an institution, or sack a house, because the owners of that institution, or that house does not see fit to hoist a certain colour upon their building. The negation does not prove the absence of all willingness to perform an action; the absence of the flag does not prove the existence of disloyalty, and we have no right to assume that a house, or an institution, or a man is disloyal because he has not hoisted the flag over his premises. It is none of our business whether he hoists the flag or not, and if we want to secure the hoisting of the flag we had better go to him in a friendly way, expostulate with him and say: You had better put up the flag to show how you feel. But, do not go and knock him down with a club because you cannot make him feel any more loyal by so doing.

I had great hopes, some few years ago, that we had arrived at a point where we were going to secure a unification of these two races, or, at least, that we had in operation forces that would lead more rapidly to the consummation of that result than these forces hitherto had been leading in that direction. The circumstance I allude to is this: We had, for the first time, a French Canadian Premier. We know, at least, everybody on this side of the House knew, that that right hon. gentleman was a thoroughly loyal man, that he was an English Liberal, thoroughly conversant with the history of English Liberals, and we believed, and I believe now, that under these circumstances, the bringing of the French Canadian people into more intimate relations with the English-speaking people would be facilitated, and largely facilitated, by the fact that we had, as the Premier of this country, a gentleman of the French Canadian race. I believe it has had a good influence in that direction. I assert, upon this occasion, that it is in this respect a good thing, a desirable thing, for Canada, that the constitution of the cabinet of the Dominion, since last general election, has been of the character that it has. At all events I am sorry to see, and I must deprecate the tendency to render nugatory influences that would naturally result from such a condition of things by the conduct that has been pursued in this House this afternoon.

Mr. CHARLTON.

Sneering allusion was made by the hon. member for West Assinibola (Mr. Davin) to the right hon. Prime Minister because he manifested feelings of loyalty at the jubilee, with the insinuation that when he left the surroundings which had influenced him on that occasion his feelings of loyalty vanished also. This imputing motives and this insinuating that this man and that man is not loyal is poor business, and I think it is about time that this nonsense was ended. Such an apostle of loyalty as the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) the other day, in a spirit of pessimistic alarm, with the fussiness of an old woman, suggested that the authorities of this Dominion, the opposition and the government side, should get together in solemn conclave and devise means for saving this empire from ruin. He went on to give a warning to our French Canadian friends and said that while we, the English-speaking people of Canada, might secure salvation by throwing ourselves upon the mercy of our Anglo-Saxon friends to the south of us, and uniting our fortunes with theirs—I was so paralyzed when I heard that from the hon. gentleman that I could hardly realize that I was in this House—that while we could do that, the French Canadian population of Canada had no such refuge, no such harbour into which they could sail in this hour of dire calamity. From the bottom of his heart he pitied them, and he said: We must do something to avert this calamity and save this empire from dire, condign and irretrievable ruin. I would say: Let us have confidence in our nation, let us have confidence in our authorities, let us have confidence in our people, let us have confidence in each other, let us, on each side of this House, at least, be agreed upon one point, and that is, that we all desire to see the prosperity of Canada and to promote the cause that will lead to that prosperity. I believe that is the cause of the people of both parties in this country, and I believe that hon. gentlemen on the other side of this House, who have made this assault this afternoon, for the purpose of appealing to racial prejudices, will fall short of the realization of their hopes, because I do not believe the common sense of the great Tory party of Canada will bear them out in the attempt they have made to set the two races of this Dominion by the ears. Let us have peace. Mr. Speaker, let us have harmony between these two great divisions of the population of this great Dominion, let us have the assimilation of these people as fast as we can secure it, and let us, at all events, not throw obstacles in the way of that assimilation by the senseless course that has been pursued in the Canadian House of Commons this afternoon. Let us secure the only method of operation that will result in this, and let us put aside from us the only line of conduct that is calculated to defer or obviate the purpose of securing the union, in heart, in sentiment, in affection and in aspiration of the great races that inhabit the Dominion of Canada. The building of a nation is an important matter. We are engaged in that very task to-day. We are building a nation. We have a territory of vast extent, a territory of vast resources, resources the magnitude of which we do not yet fully comprehend, resources the magnitude of which dawn upon us, enlarge upon our vision day by day and year by year; we have a territory that will support, at the least calculation, 75,000,000 people from the products of its own soil. Now, this is the foundation, so far as material resources are concerned of a great empire, and, Sir, it should be the care, the desire and the hope of every public man in this House of Commons, of every public man in the Dominion of Canada, of every citizen in the Dominion of Canada, to promote the interests of this young nation and to secure the laying of the foundation of its future in such a manner that that future will be a great, a glorious and a prosperous one. To war against its interests, to blast its prospects, or to attempt to blast its prospects by the senseless conduct pursued this afternoon, and this kind of thing carried on and persisted in might result in a great conflagration and disaster to this Dominion—to war against the welfare of this young nation, and to attempt to blast its prospects by such a course is a huge crime against the country and a huge crime against the empire. I repeat, that, while I would stand by the empire, while, if aggression were attempted by any race in this Dominion, I would resist it, I call for fair-play, for neighbourly conduct, for respect of each other's rights, for a desire to found this nation broadly and firmly upon principles of justice and truth, on principles of liberty and British fair-play for all classes, French and English alike, and if we take this course, if we are actuated by this desire we will have no more of the scenes that have disgraced this Chamber this afternoon.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier). I wish, Mr. Speaker, to be brief in my remarks, and I must say very frankly, that as a citizen of Montreal, very much interested in the fair name of that city, and in the maintenance of its peace and honour, I do not think that any very great good has been achieved by this debate. I have no doubt, that every one, with the exception of perhaps one or two, who have spoken in this House to-day, have been actuated by proper motives. I must say that the incident which occurred in Montreal, has been enlarged when viewed from afar, and it does not deserve the importance which we have given it here. It is quite true that the trouble arose originally from the freaks of students; and, that it did not develop into more serious proportions is due to the spirit with which both universities met it. Briefly, the facts are these: The students of McGill, started in the morning upon a tramp of exultation to celebrate the victories of the British arms in South Africa. They went down town, and I believe—we did not know it then—they stopped at several places on the way. I shall give the facts to the House as I know them, in order that these facts may be properly understood. On the way down they stopped at different places and insisted that the British flag should be run up. I believe they stopped at the Star office, to which the minister (Mr. Tarte) has alluded, and carried away the bulletin boards, to the annoyance of the proprietors of the Star. Those who are familiar with Montreal, will understand the locality. They then went to the Herald office, and thence to the French newspaper offices, which are grouped together. There is the organ of the Minister of Public Works, and immediately beside it is La Presse and Le Journal, the organs of the French Conservatives, and there they insisted upon the British flag being run up. They then went to Laval University, on St. Denis Street, and there they insisted that the British flag should be hoisted. Now, Sir, I believe, and I understand that it was the intention that the British flag should be put up there, I believe it was put up, when request was made. Anybody who knows Laval University and who knows its history, could have no doubt whatever about its loyalty. To doubt the loyalty of that institution, indicates absolute ignorance on the part of the doubter. Here is an old institution, one of the oldest educational establishments in British North America, incorporated by Royal Charter, a university that has always been noted for its loyalty, and about whose loyalty there can be no doubt. I, Sir, speaking as a professor for many years in that university, called upon to teach over 120 law students every year, the principles of British constitutional law, I have had occasion to observe Laval students at every opportunity, and I venture to say, that a more loyal, and a more orderly set of young men, cannot possibly be found anywhere. Well, Sir, as I understand, the flag was run up, and then the McGill students pursued their course. We learned afterwards that they went to Bishop's College, and to other places, and at Bishop's College, they did what they had done at Laval University.

An hon. MEMBER. And at the Board of Trade.

Mr. MONK. Yes, they also visited the Board of Trade.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS They did not break the doors there.

Mr. MONK. Let me come to what was the cause of the real difficulty. I am loyal, and I am prepared to put up the British flag at every opportunity, when necessary. But, Sir, I am bound to say, that I do not recognize, as a matter of principle, the right of any man, or of any set of men, to force me to put up the British flag or any other flag. In the case of Laval University, the attack was particularly aggravating. For a number of years, we have made extraordinary efforts to establish that institution upon a proper footing in the city of Montreal. We have made extraordinary sacrifices to establish the chairs of teaching there, to provide a library, and to furnish suitable material. In fact, those who are as familiar with the situation of that institution, know what zeal has been devoted in that direction. But, Sir, we have not the ornamentation we have a right to have. It has been said, that La Presse newspaper had no flag staff and no flag, and perhaps we may be in that situation. But the real difficulty occurred in the evening. It was in the evening and every one was quiet, when a crowd of people, I would say a mob—I am reluctant to incorporate in that mob, in any way, the students of McGill University, because I am myself a friend of that institution, a graduate of it, and the faculties of both universities are in continual and necessary communication, and our relations have always been most agreeable. In the evening, I do not know with what sinister motive, but certainly with the most blamable one, a crowd—I believe there were several students of McGill University in that crowd—a crowd, came from another part of the city altogether, and actually besieged Laval University. There is no other expression for it. Those who live in Montreal know the facts. This crowd arrived in front of the building, some four or five thousand strong, and without any provocation whatever, they endeavoured to enter the institution. Here is a building which we have reared at great sacrifices. It contains to us priceless treasures, and the mob actually endeavoured to enter the building, and would have done so, had there not been a certain number of Laval students to take up its defence; a defence which could not have availed against such a crowd without the assistance of the police, who arrived afterwards. But for that, the place would have been broken into, and would have been possibly devastated. There is no use in mincing matters. What was their object in coming there at that time of night, and why was it, when they were asked to retire, they did not do so? The only thing the Laval students did, was to turn the hose on them, whereas, from on the other side, we had every front window in the building broken. Desperate efforts were made by the mob to get in, and what would have happened if that mob—one cannot call it anything else but a mob—had succeeded in entering, I leave it to any fair-minded man in the House to say. It was absolutely necessary for the students of Laval University to act as they did. And every one who comes to Montreal, knows if the police had not been there the place might have been utterly destroyed, as there was great danger of fire.

Well, Sir, the following morning, Principal Peterson and Archbishop Bruchesi, the head men of both universities met, and too much praise cannot be given to Principal Peterson for the action he took in coming down to Laval University, and there explaining that he regretted greatly what had occurred on the previous evening. Nothing more could be asked or expected from Principal Peterson. He declared that he hoped the matter would not go any further, and the rector of Laval appealed to the students. I may tell you, Sir, that there was indignation in all that part of the city of Montreal, that such a thing should have occurred, and so the authorities of Laval appealed to the students, who were very numerous, not to make any manifestation. I was in Quebec at the time, and I must confess to you that I felt absolutely indignant at what had occurred. The Laval students accepted that recommendation, but in the afternoon they marched out, and what did they do? I speak of the Laval students from personal knowledge. They tramped down with the British flag at their head, carrying also the flag of the university; they went through St. James Street as far as Victoria Square, and there saluted the statue of the Queen. They then returned. It was at that moment that the outrage upon the British flag, that most deplorable act, was committed; but, Sir, it was not committed or in any way abetted by a student of Laval University; and I take this opportunity of stating that the insinuation contained in the article of the Ottawa Citizen, which has been quoted here, that these students are to blame for that most infamous action, is itself a slanderous falsehood and nothing else. That was the only thing that occurred as far as the students of Laval are concerned. The assault made on the university on the previous evening was a most serious one, and a number of arrests were made; and I am glad to say—and it was, I believe, commented on by Mr. Weir, the recorder—that among those arrested there were no students of McGill. Under these circumstances the matter seemed to have come to an end, and where I do blame the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) and his organ, is that after Principal Peterson and the authorities of Laval had met and the interview to which I have just referred took place, in the afternoon of the same day, when the tone of the press of Montreal generally was most commendable, La Patrie came out with that article. That is where the evil was. I do not put in question La Patrie's loyalty, but I say that that article showed a great want of judgment. It made out of the incident a most important fact. It stated that confederation was going to be broken asunder. It incited the people, as it invariably does, to defend their rights, declaring that it was time to make a stand—a position entirely unjustifiable under the circumstances. And what do we find here to-day? I have listened to all those who have spoken. I have listened with pleasure to the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). I did not think he entertained the opinions he has expressed with regard to the province of Quebec. But, Sir, most violent language was used by the hon. Minister of Public Works. This surely is not the occasion to discuss the question which he raised this afternoon—to talk to us about the attack made by the English-speaking people upon the French people. Surely the hon. Minister of Public Works, who knows the situation in Montreal, and the efforts being made there to re-establish peace must be persuaded that that speech of his was an unwise one; and I am perfectly certain that the Mayor of Montreal and all the authorities there who are doing their best to re-establish peace, will blame him for his utterances in the House this afternoon. I believe the tone of all the Montreal press during these troubles was excellent, and it is due largely to the attitude of the press that the incident finished as it did. But the Minister of Public Works, knowing what the feeling is among certain sections of the people as to the character of the attack committed by the mob on Friday evening, and holding the official position he does, comes forward and denounces the Star as the instigator of that outrage.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS.
It is true.

Mr. MONK. I say nothing meaner, more unfair, or less justifiable could have been done than that. I venture to say that the Prime Minister does not approve of that method of assuaging the difficulties that have arisen. The hon. Minister of Public Works goes on and quotes an article, in which he throws the whole blame of these difficulties on the Tory party and the aged chief of the Tory party. There is really no sense in that. Everybody knows that this difficulty cannot really be attributed, as a matter of fact, to either party. It was brought about by that descent of the mob on Laval University on Friday evening; and to say in this House that that was due either to Mr. Graham or his paper is altogether unjust and unfair, and calculated to produce great harm in the city of Montreal. Now, Sir, I listened to the closing remarks of the hon. member for North Norfolk in regard to the French race, and I cordially agree with much that he said. Another speaker has said that possibly this incident may be productive of some good. It might have produced incalculable evil if any of these rows had resulted in loss of life or in serious wounding. But it has a lesson for us in this, that I think we must try to understand the French Canadian people. We cannot expect them to think exactly as if they had been born under the shadow of St. Paul's Cathedral. There are many things on which they do not think exactly as the English people. There must be indulgence. They certainly cannot be taught loyalty by such actions as were resorted to on Friday evening.

Mr. BELCOURT. They do not need to be taught it, because they are loyal.

Mr. MONK. They are not an arrogant people, but they are a proud and sensitive people, and rightly so; and to endeavour to attach them to the British Empire and the British flag or to this Dominion by proceedings of that sort is the most egregious mistake and those who resort to such proceedings cannot be too strongly condemned, because they commit most unpatriotic and most un-British acts. For my part, I find that the disposition in Montreal is to act differently towards them. In this evening's Witness, in a report of a memorial service, celebrated in the city of Montreal for some of those who fell victims in the war now going on, the Rev. T. E. Cunningham spoke in this way:

When at last the wires flashed the good tidings that Ladysmith had been relieved, every British heart swelled with joy.

What do we find in our own city? A misunderstanding between the English and French citizens. This must be cleared away; we must not, for a moment, allow indifference to creep up between us. We have to live together under one grand old flag, and why not unite our welfare and rejoice as a unit at our victories. We English should be kind and not boastful; let us live together in harmony and kindness towards one another. Our soldiers, both English and French Canadians, have gone to the front to do their duty, and their career already has been a brilliant one. They are with Roberts and assisted in the capture of Cronje and his men. Well may we say that our boys have wiped out the stain of Majuba Hill; they have shown to the world that they belong to the old stock. They will conquer or die in the attempt.

In other words that our loyalty in the future will be more of the kind which I myself have observed when in England—quiet, sound, deep, grim and severe if you like, but a loyalty which is tolerant to all nationality and all races so long as they claim the protection of the British flag.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle). I quite agree with most of the remarks made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat; at least in the accounts he gave of the incident which we all deplore, I am sure, as much as he does. But in one respect I cannot agree with the hon. gentleman. I admit that he has done justice to the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), but it seems to me that he completely overlooked the manner in which this debate was introduced and the evident intention of the hon. gentleman who started it. I am sure that all members on this side regret, just as much as does the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, the fact that such a debate should have been raised at all. But who began it? Where did the provocation come from? Who began to cast insinuations and give undue importance to this incident at Montreal? Take only the speeches we have heard this afternoon, beginning with that of the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. McNeill) who opened the debate. The loyalty and personal straightforwardness of that hon. gentleman I do not doubt; but unfortunately he has fallen into the delusion that he is the father of the empire; and therefore, when any small incident takes place in Canada or Africa or Asia or any other portion of the empire, it is immediately seized upon by him in all gravity and seriousness, as his own particular personal matter, affecting the destinies of that empire which he considers his own. I quite agree with the hon. member for Jacques Cartier that this incident has been altogether too much commented and enlarged upon, but it is not only La Patrie newspaper that is guilty of giving it undue proportion. What did L'Evenement of Quebec, a French Canadian Conservative newspaper say about it:

The deplorable scenes provoked by the blindest fanaticism, which have just occurred in Montreal, are well calculated to create the impression that we are on the verge of a civil war. They are also of a nature to lead to the belief that we no longer live in a free country.

Le Courier du Canada, another Conservative newspaper of the city of Quebec, gives expression to similar opinions:

The action of the McGill students cannot be too deeply deplored or severely condemned by all good citizens of every race. It is not by these disorderly outrages that the triumph of the British arms should be celebrated, as such scenes are calculated to light the fires of discord and racial hatred in this country.

Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to give events the proportions that suit their own peculiar views. I quite agree with the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, that too much importance altogether has been given to this incident. I do not know if he heard this afternoon the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) trying to minimize the affair as much as he could. Why, he said, there was no mob whatever; it was simply a little clash between the students of McGill and Laval Universities. But the chief organ of the Conservative party in this city, which, I believe, is somewhat connected with the ex-Minister of Finance, did not take his view. How did that paper announce the incident? Did it announce it in the tone in which it was referred to by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), and L'Evenement and Le Courier du Canada? Did it qualify, in the way these other Conservatives did, the conduct of the McGill students:

Patriotic McGill Boys.

Made Managers of Montreal French Newspapers Hoist British Flag.

Montreal, March 1.—The demonstration here today upon the receipt of the news of the relief of Ladysmith eclipsed anything of the kind ever witnessed in this city before. The fun was commenced by several hundred McGill students, who marched through the city, notwithstanding a raging snowstorm. They visited public and other schools, where a holiday was declared, and afterwards seized all the English newspaper bulletins announcing the great event and along with many flags, carried them in triumph through the streets. There was no flag on the city hall, and there the crowd, ever increasing in size, made its way and forcibly flung the colours to the breeze. The French newspaper offices next received attention, they having neglected to display the colours. There was some trouble there, and all the reserves of police in the city were hurried to the scene.

The ex-Minister of Finance spoke this afternoon of the protection of the police and the law, but in Montreal they were not sufficient:

The mob stuck to it, however, and before long flags were flying, much to the delight of thousands who had gathered in St. James Street. All the bulletins of the French newspapers were wrecked. The crowd hooted the police, who were powerless to do anything but drive around in the patrol. Laval University was next visited, and there were fears of a clash, but the French students had no classes, and the McGill men left after decorating the building with British colours.

As the hon. member for Jacques Cartier very properly said, we have no objection to hoisting the British flag and to decorating our buildings, but we do not care to be compelled to decorate them at the dictation of a mob.

The hon. member for Jacques Cartier deprecated the idea of our attributing to Tory newspapers intentions which are not theirs. Well, let me quote for his information the Evening News of Toronto, which I do not think any one will say is a French Liberal newspaper. As the hon. member for Jacques Cartier has said, everything was quiet in Montreal, nobody thought of making any trouble whatever. The French, of course, did not show the same enthusiasm over the relief of Ladysmith as the English, but there was no intention on their part of preventing anybody from celebrating that event, provided he did not interfere with other people. Well, how was the incident that took place announced in the Toronto Evening News? It was announced as follows:

Disloyalty Causes Riot.—French Students in Montreal Tore Down the Flag.

And a little lower down :

English Students Attack Lavai.

Sir, there was no disloyalty in Montreal, as the hon. member for Jacques Cartier knows as well as I do—no more than in any other part of the province of Quebec. The disloyal men are not only the boys who gathered together and forced demonstrations on quiet and decent people, but those who are trying to make political capital for the benefit of hon. gentlemen opposite at the expense of the good feeling that otherwise would exist among all classes of our people. What was the heading of the report published the next day by one of the leading organs of these gentlemen, who say they have such friendly feelings towards the French Canadians of Quebec. I quote from the Toronto News again :

Gross Outrage on our Flag by Frenchmen in Montreal.

The hon. member for Jacques Cartier said he could not tell if it was a French Canadian who had torn down the British flag. The hon. member for North Norfolk could not say so either, neither could the hon. Minister of Public Works; but the Toronto News was better informed, and without any hesitation declares that the British flag in Montreal was torn down by Frenchmen—not even by a Frenchman, but by Frenchmen.

Gross Outrage on Our Flag by Frenchmen in Montreal.

The Union Jack Torn Down, Trampled Under Foot and Burned by Johnny Crapaud.

I would like to know if the loyal party that wishes to unite this country and the empire think they are going to conciliate the two million French Canadians of this country and help them in building up this Canada of ours by calling them 'Johnny Crapauds'? This is a display of the friendly spirit of these gentlemen.

Now, it was not my intention to speak of anything else on this occasion. But, while I am speaking of the Toronto News, I may say that the spirit of that paper towards the French Canadians is not displayed now for the first time. Some two years ago there was a horrible crime committed in Ste. Scholastique, in the county of Two Mountains, P.Q., and as a result a man and a woman were hanged for murder. This was entirely a criminal affair and no question of politics were involved in it. And what did the Hamilton Spectator, which, if I am well informed, is not more French or more Liberal than the Toronto News, say :

Being French, it goes without saying that the woman will not be hanged.

On the 11th March, 1899, in an article referring to the province of Quebec, which is very often present to the minds of these gentlemen, especially since it has become a Liberal province, the Toronto News said :

Sir W. Laurier, in refusing the request of the prohibitionists, is not only arraying himself on the side of the minority, but is assuming that it is all right for the entire Dominion to be governed by the most backward province in the Dominion. It is only one more instance proving that the Dominion of Canada is ruled by the descendants of the conquered Frenchmen who were unwisely conceded lingual and religious privileges at the time of the conquest that should never have been granted.

On November 1st last, the same Tory English organ said :

It appears that in this part of the British Empire a man may be taken to court, tried and convicted, and all the proceedings conducted in a foreign language.

I suppose this comes from the gentlemen who have so much care for the French language.

That may be quite satisfactory to the politicians, and to those who have such abundant faith in the French people—

Evidently these gentlemen have not.

But it does not strike the average citizen of Ontario as being in line of justice to the poor Britisher. As a matter of fact, a Britisher is a foreigner in the province of Quebec—

Does my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) echo these sentiments ?

Mr. MONK. If my hon. friend (Mr. Bourassa) wishes to know my opinion, I would say that I think the less he talks about these things the better.

Mr. BOURASSA. I must say that the interruption is not very much to the point.

—notwithstanding that his forefathers conquered that province a hundred and fifty years ago, and it is British territory to-day.

The next day, in an article headed 'British Sovereign Law,' the Evening News says

It is a pity for the Premier that admiration for 'British sovereign law' does not lead him to seek its introduction in Quebec, where a man may be proceeded against in the civil courts in a foreign language, and in accordance with the French code of the last century, which even in France has been done away with.

On the 27th of November, 1899, speaking on 'French Sentiment' :

To our minds the protests of these journals, and of the most important public men among the French in the Dominion has only one significance, and that is that the French Canadians are unalterably opposed to doing anything that will assist in maintaining and strengthening the British Empire. Their desire is the disintegration of the empire, and the ultimate erection of a French state on the St. Lawrence River.

I know that, as the Minister of Public Works said this afternoon, these articles will not have a great effect upon the great masses in the English provinces. Because, I say here and am ready to say everywhere,

I have more faith in the common sense and breadth of mind of the great majority of the English-speaking population of this Dominion. But, after all, we must admit one fact. It has been stated in this House, but it seems not to be acknowledged yet by several members and it is this: the French Canadian, as a rule, reads and understands English—at least the leading French Canadian does—not only in the cities, but in the towns and villages, and even in the small back parishes, while the great mass of the English-speaking population does not understand French. I do not blame them, but I say simply that it has mischievous possibilities and it may be a part of the crude calculation of mischievous politicians to write articles in the English papers which are read by the English population, while they know that the counterpart of their utterances in the French Canadian press cannot be known, because the French papers are not read by English-speaking Canadians. It is not my intention on this occasion to state that the Conservative party as a rule is trying to make capital out of the race question. I know that my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier is a broad-minded man. I pay him that compliment here, and I have always believed and said that of him. I know that he has around him a certain number not only of French but of English Conservatives who do not like this campaign. But, unfortunately, they are tied to a certain element in that party, who wrecked their own government by treason, and who are of opinion that they can save the party they wrecked by raising the loyalty cry. I know that the best members of the Conservative party do not like it, and we have the proof of it by the mouth of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier. That hon. gentleman tries to reconcile his personal sentiments—with which I am ready to agree, and I think we could meet on every platform and agree so far as those objects are concerned—with the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), and the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster). But you cannot reconcile those sentiments; it is impossible. The honest fraction of the Conservative party cannot remain faithful to the old principles of the Conservative party and defend at the same time the kind of argument that the other portion of the Conservative party have resorted to. Every time that the bad fraction of the party arises in this House or on the public platform, or attempts in the press to raise this cry, they will be met by the true Liberals, French and English, in a proper way. The fair-minded Conservatives must take the consequences of their own position. It may be painful to them, but it is not our fault if they are in bad company. Now, the hon. member for Jacques Cartier told us very properly, that it was not by that kind of argument that loyalty would be taught to the French Canadians of Quebec. I think the intention of the hon. member was right; but I tell him here and now that there is no use whatever in either the Liberal party or the Conservative party trying to teach loyalty to the province of Quebec, for the people there are loyal. Their loyalty may not be the same as that of the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace). They may not understand loyalty in the same way as the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), or the hon. ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster). But I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that, for the benefit of Canada, for the benefit of Great Britain and for the benefit of the empire, it is a very good thing that the French Canadians have not taken their lessons in loyalty from that kind of people.

It is an unfortunate thing, no doubt, that the British flag was assailed in the city of Montreal; but as has been very well said, by most of the members who have spoken in this debate, nobody knows who tore it down; and there is one thing sure, that nobody resented the insult offered to the British flag, more than the French Canadians in the city of Montreal. I admit that they do not raise the British flag so often as some of the Tory loyalists do, and for the very good reason that the latter need that flag to hide their misdeeds. There are many people who are not so sure of their loyalty as they boast, and they have so many ugly things to hide that they need a big stock of flags to hide them.

Mr. Speaker, let me say that we French-Canadians love and respect the British flag, not perhaps for the same reason, not perhaps with the same sentiments, as our English friends do. The British flag does not signify the same thing for us as it does for English speaking Canadians. It is not the flag of the land of our ancestors. But if the Union Jack is not the flag of our motherland it is the flag of the union, of the alliance that has been contracted on this land of Canada, between the French and English-speaking people who desire to live in peace and harmony. We fought against that flag when we owed allegiance to the French flag, and the moment the French flag was driven from this country to old France, it carried away with it a part of our hearts; and a part of our hearts, and not the worst part, is still attached to the old flag that protected this country, when our forefathers came and settled it. But, surely, Sir, I may add, that the feeling of affection, the feeling of love, the fond remembrance of the old French flag does not at all preclude us from entertaining feelings of loyalty, love and respect for the British flag, that took its place. Our hearts are big enough, our minds are broad enough to be equally true to the remembrance of the past and to the duties of the present. For us, the Union Jack is the flag of union in Canada. As long as its meaning is not misunderstood, as long as it is not imposed upon us as a sign of hatred, as a sign of disunion, by the hon. gentlemen opposite, I can give my word for myself, and, humble as I am, I think I can give my word for the whole of my race, that as long as it means what it has meant to all true patriots, of all origins in this country, both before and since confederation, it will be the sign of union for us. But do not make of it a sign of tyranny, do not make of it a sign of disunion. Remember that the French Canadians are a proud people; they are true to their word, they are men of heart and courage, they need not that any hon. gentleman opposite should teach them loyalty, and they will not stand insult.

The ex-Minister of Finance told us that the authorities of Laval University, and the owners of the different French papers, when they were assailed, could have had resource to the law. But suppose the arm of the law was not sufficient? Is it the new Tory doctrine, that when I am assailed in my own house, I have no right to defend myself, that I must wait for the police to come to rescue me? Sir, if a mob comes and sacks my house, the first law of this land, as well as of all other lands, and more especially in a country under British rule—the first law is the law of liberty, of self-defence, of the defence of personal and private property. The people that were assailed in Montreal pursued the proper course, it was their duty as free men, as men respecting themselves, to defend their property. If blood had been shed in the streets of Montreal, the primary fault would have been that of the men who have scattered these sentiments of disunion throughout this country for months back. I do not think that I need say any more. I hope no debate of this kind will ever again take place in this House; but I may say to the hon. gentlemen opposite, that whenever they try to raise a cry like this, whenever they endeavour, for the benefit of their party to make the appeals that they have made to-day, whenever they undertake to publish in their Tory papers in Ontario and elsewhere, the sentiments that they have furtively expressed in this House, but which they will have to disavow in the province of Quebec, they will be met on their own ground. We would be cowards if we did not meet them on their own grounds. I repeat that we are loyal, but we are self-respecting, and we will stand up for what we believe to be true and right.

Mr. N. C. WALLACE (West York). The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), has just stated that it is a very good thing for the French Canadians to have taken their lessons in loyalty from the member for West York (Mr. Wallace). Well, Sir, I think it would have been not injurious to the member for Labelle, if he had taken some lessons in loyalty, either from the member for West York, or from some one else who is truly loyal.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I challenge any hon. gentleman opposite to point to a flaw in my loyalty to my Queen and to my country.

Mr. BELCOURT. What about your Kingston speech?

Mr. WALLACE. My Kingston speech contained exactly the same sentiment word for word as was expressed by the Earl of Salisbury, who was then the Premier of England, as he is to-day. I am not surprised that such an authority should be treated with derision by hon. gentlemen opposite, by those hon. gentlemen whose sympathies on every occasion are against Great Britain, are against the flag under which they live and which affords them protection. Mr. Speaker, recent events have demonstrated the effects of the preaching of these hon. gentlemen. The doctrines they have enunciated, the principles they have preached, the disloyal sentiments they have uttered, have misled people in the city of Montreal. Why, Sir, I listened this afternoon, with amazement to the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). He said that we were bringing this matter up for party purposes. In a speech of some length, every sentence was punctuated with charges that we were trying to make party capital, when he was himself trying to make capital for his party from start to finish of his speech. Why, Sir, don't we know this gentleman? He made a speech the other day in this House, and I will only allude to it to say that it was the first loyal speech in the whole of his political career. Never before had he given utterance to loyal sentiments. Then he turns round to-day and derides the loyalty of those who contend that we should be loyal to our flag and country. He condemns every one who has a good word to say for his country. We remember the letter he wrote many years ago, when he insulted every Canadian volunteer, when he wrote a letter to a Yankee newspaper pointing out that these Canadian volunteers who had turned out at the time of the Fenian raid, who had risked their lives as loyal men to-day are doing, he stigmatized them as an ill-dressed, unkempt body of men, totally lacking in courage, lacking in intelligence, lacking in everything that constitutes a good and loyal citizen. And, Sir, when we heard his eulogy this afternoon of the French Canadian race, did we not remember what he said about his leader. I think the recollection of it is fresh in the minds of many people. Writing a letter to a friend he said :

With a French Canadian leader like Wilfrid Laurier—

He was Mr. Wilfrid Laurier then——and a machine politician like J. D. Edgar, there is not much hope for the Liberal party in Canada.

That was the hon. gentleman's idea of the French Canadians a few years ago. Then he turned around, as he could easily do, and displayed the other side of the shield. As has been stated, he has been a commissioner at Washington since then, but, Mr. Speaker, that does not satisfy him. He sees something else in view. That is a thing of the past ; There is no gratitude for past favours. He is looking for some other favour, because this remarkable speech of this afternoon shows that he is looking for some other position which he very earnestly desires to secure. The hon. member for North Norfolk made a large portion of his speech on the same lines as the hon. Minister of Public Works, and that was in denouncing the McGill students. The McGill students have come in for a lot of denunciation this afternoon. Well, Sir, what were they going to do ? Here are the circumstances : The loyal people of Canada, from ocean to ocean, were celebrating three glorious events of the war in South Africa. First, we had the relief of Kimberley, then we had the capture of Cronje's army, and then the relief of the heroic garrison of Ladysmith. With these three events coming closely one after another the loyal people of Canada went wild, and the McGill students, who were not a bit behind in their loyalty, went out on the streets. The hon. Minister of Public Works says that they went to the three French newspaper offices, purposely omitting to state other places that they visited. Where did they go before they went to the French newspaper offices ? They went to Bishop's College, an English-speaking school, to the Collegiate Institute and to the Star newspaper office before they went to La Patrie. They took the bulletin boards down from the Star, they captured them, they carried them away, they went to the Board of Trade, they captured the Board of Trade, and they made the president, or some of the principal men there, get up on a stand and make speeches. Those that were captured in that way were delighted and they made patriotic speeches. They went to the Stock Exchange, where they did the same thing, after which they went to the City Hall, captured the mayor, put him up on a pedestal, and the mayor made a loyal speech. He proposed cheers for Buller, cheers for General Roberts, cheers for General White, and cheers for the contingents in South Africa. They all gave three cheers for the mayor, and everybody went away pleased. We were told that this was a most dastardly proceeding on the part of the McGill students. What was there dastardly about it ? The students were enthusiastic ; they may have bubbled over a little, but where was the dastardliness of their conduct. It was loyal conduct. Then they went to La Patrie office and put up the Union Jack. Is that a crime in the Dominion of Canada, or in any part of the British dominions ? It apparently was very offensive to those in the Patrie office. They went to Laval University and put up a flag. There was no very serious crime committed. Crowds gathered with them ; other boys joined in with them. It was a general holiday and the people were rejoicing because of the victories achieved by British arms. Well, then, what occurred ? On the next night, in the papers there was a moderate, sensible report of the proceedings, but, La Patrie came out with an article, which, to my mind, was like the injunction of the old priest to his flock when they had captured an informer. Hon. gentlemen know, that, in Ireland, an informer is held in great detestation, and there is no punishment too severe for him. All that the priest said was : Boys, do not nail his ears to the pump. So it was with La Patrie when it published an incitement to the French Canadian race to violence, an incitement to take the law into their own hands. What did they say in that article in La Patrie ? We do advise the organization of vigorous resistance, using force if necessary. Who wrote that ? Was it the hon. Minister of Public Works ? He has been charged with it. He has not denied it. I believe, because he cannot deny it. When it was read this afternoon he cheered it. We had the spectacle this afternoon, that, when that incendiary article was read here, almost every sentence was greeted with uproarious cheering, not only by the hon. Minister of Public Works, but by the great body of members on the ministerial side of the House. That article is characterized in proper terms in the Toronto Globe. What does the Globe say about it ? The Globe, in its issue of to-day, says :

In truth, the French in Canada enjoy exceptional rights and privileges under the confederation compact, and while there is so little disposition anywhere to subject these special privileges to attack, we must dissent from the statement of 'La Patrie' that 'there is very little to add to what has taken place to rend the federal pact asunder, and that without much delay.' To be candid, in this utterance 'La Patrie' descends to hysterical and passionate nonsense.

It is more than hysterical and passionate nonsense. It is treason to the country ; it is treason to confederation. I repeat that article is treason to confederation, treason to our Dominion. It is utterly uncalled for. What are the facts ? It tells the people to take the law into their own hands and to use mob law or violence. But it is said that if you are attacked in your house you are entitled to defend yourself. These were not the circumstances in this case. If you are attacked in your own house you are entitled to defend yourself, but this article was not written for the employees of La Patrie; it was written to incite the mob, to incite people not belonging to La Patrie. You have civic government in Montreal, you have an efficient police force, you have, at the head of that police force, the mayor of the city of Montreal, a political compatriot of hon. gentlemen opposite; one who is, they say, negotiating to be a member of their government; one of their strong supporters in this House of Commons is the mayor of Montreal to-day. They have the control of the local government which is in sympathy with them, and the military forces of Canada are under the control of the Liberal party to-day? The Dominion government, the local government of Quebec, and the municipal machinery of Montreal—the mayor being a Liberal member in this House—are under the control of the Liberal party. Yet, with all this machinery in their hands to maintain peace in the province of Quebec, here is a Minister of the Crown calling upon the people to organize to disregard the law, to disregard the machinery in the hands of the local Liberal government, the Dominion Liberal government, and the Liberal mayor of Montreal, and to take the law into their own hands, to raise a riot, and to do what he apparently desires, and what he says in so many words he desires, viz.: Smash confederation. That is the object of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), that is the course he is taking. What followed: Archbishop Bruchesi and Principal Peterson the head of the two universities came together, and all difficulties were reconciled and everything was quieted down. After La Patrie knew that that was done, out it came with this inflammable article calling on the disturbing element in Montreal to take the law into their own hands, and to organize. This article appeared in La Patrie in the afternoon at four o'clock, and that evening law and order were set at defiance. What occurred then? You do not hear a word of this, Mr. Speaker, from the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) or from the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) who prates from the beginning to the end of his speech about loyalty, and who has not the slightest inkling of what loyalty means.

Mr. PENNY. What night are you referring to now?

Mr. WALLACE. This was on Friday night, and here is what the paper said occurred:

If the afternoon's parade was a quiet and creditable one, and seemed under the influence of moderate and wise heads, nightfall saw another sight.

That demonstration in the afternoon was no doubt by the Laval students.

Mr. PENNY. Was that Friday afternoon?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes.

Mr. PENNY. There was no demonstration on Friday afternoon.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Never mind, it is all the same to him.

Mr. WALLACE. There was a demonstration, because I am reading an account of it, and here is what occurred:

Then people who had been to tea and dinner began to gather there, and mutterings grew to shouts and inflammatory speeches were made from the tops of the huge snow banks on either side of St. Denis Street. The crowd swelled every moment, and by eight o'clock numbered thousands.

There was a demand that something be done, and something was done, of which there had been vague threats heard earlier in the day.

In the mob were many Laval students, but a rougher element seemed now to predominate.

The observation in the thick of the mob throughout the whole eventful night is that the influence of many wearing the colours of Laval seemed used rather to restrain than incite the crowd.

They were evidently doing their best to keep the crowd within proper limits:

Certainly every attempt in the latter part of the night to march towards the west end was frustrated by appeals to the people to stay by Laval and act on the defensive.

At eight o'clock a leader was obtained and he marshalled the mob, carrying tri-colours, and one with a red handkerchief waving on the end of a stick. The men and boys were armed with bludgeons of all kinds, and those who had nothing else had recourse to the ruins of the Theatre Francais, and got pieces of boards and fragments of posts to use as clubs.

Taking up the 'Marseillaise' as a battle-song and with cries of 'avant! avant!' the crowd formed three or four deep, in the middle of the street, and swinging around from St. Denis Street into St. Catherine Street, proceeded west.

At St. Lawrence Street, however, which has been regarded as a sort of dividing line between English and French Montreal, the procession turned down towards Craig Street. They now filled the street from side to side, and while the 'Marseillaise' was the song most tried to sing, other songs and shouts mingled with it till there was a mighty hoarse roar of an excited multitude.

Down the Main they proceeded, up St. Lambert's Hill to St. James Street. There they cheered 'La Patrie,' and halting sang the 'Marseillaise' with a mighty shout.

Then it goes on to say:

Then the crowd surged on, and in a few minutes the advance ones came in sight of the British flag floating from the staff on the roof of St. Lawrence Hall. It was greeted with a howl of derision, but it was too high up to be reached.

On they passed, and the next halt was made in front of the 'Star' temporary business office on St. James Street. The first arrivals threw a few pieces of snow at the windows.

Then it goes on to say :

Arriving at the 'Star' office, the first act of the mob was to tear down all the bulletin boards which were just beneath the flag, and smash them to pieces. This appeased the wrath of the mob for a short time, but in a few minutes their thirst for further deeds began to reappear. Longing eyes were cast on the British flag waving on the top of the 'Star' office, but to climb up the front of a building looked like an impossible accomplishment. So for a while the flag waved gaily to and fro. The frenzy reached its height after a few minutes' contemplation of the situation by the marchers, and one bold, bad man determined to haul that flag down, or die in the attempt. With greater agility than a cat he climbed on ledges, wires and cornices, and reached the roof, amid deafening cheers from the mob below. He immediately rushed for the flag-pole, and hauled down the British flag.

This man, who was recognized by the watchman, threw the flag down among the mob.

Perhaps a British flag has never before been so treated in a British country. The treatment of that flag could not be worse, it could not be more insulting. The irresponsible character of the insulters is the only thing to be advanced in palliation of the offence.

That is not what the Minister of Public Works said. He said that one man went up for the flag and that one man was responsible. It was those whom the member for Labelle, and those other gentlemen had been educating, and it was not confined to one man or to a dozen men. There were thousands. What was done with the flag? Here it is :

The receivers tore this emblem of freedom and fair-play all over the world into shreds, spat and trampled on it, and shouted 'A bas le Union Jack.' This was indignity enough to inflict on this particular flag at this particular time, in their opinion, and when 'the man on the roof' approached the solid earth again he was seized by his enthusiastic confreres and carried along on their shoulders to the tune of 'La Marseilles.'

What occurred after that? Not satisfied with pulling down the flag, not satisfied with trampling it on the snow, not satisfied with tearing it into shreds, they took it down and burned the remnants amidst the cheers of the howling mob. Now, Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that those who have denounced as dastardly the conduct of the McGill students, have utterly failed to recognize the difference between the actions of the McGill students and Laval students if you please, and this mob I am alluding to, on Friday night. The McGill students were guilty of the crime of wanting to put up the British flag, and this howling mob were guilty of the crime in a British country of hauling down the British flag and exposing it to every indignity. They tore it into ribbons, they trampled it under foot. Yet these gentlemen opposite attempt to make a comparison between the doings of the McGill boys, and the doings of this mob instigated as they were by the articles in La Patrie, written as we believe, by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) himself. He tells us that he wrote the article the next day eulogizing the British flag. Does not everybody know that the whole history of his career is a history of hypocrisy—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. WALLACE. Is the word hypocrisy out of order?

Mr. McMULLEN. Not from you.

Mr. WALLACE. I am not taking my authority from the hon. member for North Wellington; I do not recognize his opinion; I am taking my authority from the Speaker of the House of Commons. I say that the whole career of the Minister of Public Works has been one of insincerity and a disregard for actual facts. He tells us, 'I am a loyal man.' We may doubt that if we like. He tells us, 'I am a truthful man.' We have always doubted that, because we know that he made a solemn declaration in the House of Commons on one occasion, and that before a court of justice he swore the very opposite, and when taxed, confronted with the statement he had made in the House of Commons, he said 'Oh, I was not on my oath then.' So I think we may fairly say that he is not a truthful man, though he asserts that he is truthful. Then he says he is an honest man. Well, if his whole career does not give a flat contradiction to that statement, I do not know what the record of a man may do.

Mr. TAYLOR. Read the Globe of a few years ago.

Mr. WALLACE. Read the Globe of a few years ago, and read his confessions in the courts. Read his connection with Mercier, the robber of public money. Read the whole of it. He said to-day that he was courageous. I never heard a courageous man constantly boasting of his courage. I never heard an honest man constantly boasting of his honesty. I never heard a truthful man boasting that he was the only truthful James the world ever produced. And so, when the hon. Minister of Public Works makes these claims, I at once put down the very opposite. He stated in Toronto, for instance, that I made the boast that I was going down with an army to capture the province of Quebec. Of course, he did not repeat that statement in the House, because he dare not do so. I might have asked him where such a statement was made. I do not ask him, because he dare not repeat the statement here. He could not make any statement outside of this House that bears the slightest resemblance to veracity. Now, Mr. Speaker. I say it is most deplorable that the events that occurred last Friday night in the city of Montreal should have occurred anywhere where the British flag floats. There is no portion of the people of this Dominion upon whom the spirit of loyalty is more incumbent than upon the French Canadian race. Why, Sir, there is no conquered race in the history of any country that has received such special privileges, such toleration, and more than toleration, such liberal treatment, as the French Canadian race have received in the Dominion of Canada, both from the British government and from the government of Canada. They know this; they acknowledge it; they see it themselves; and, Sir, that there should be any portion of them misled, and misled by men high in authority, into disloyal courses, is deplorable. Who has led these men to trample on the British flag? Who has encouraged these men to do these things? The Minister of Public Works.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think that is not a fair statement.

Mr. WALLACE. Well, I will put the statement this way, Mr. Speaker. The article in La Patrie, by whomsoever written, was a direct encouragement. All through this war not a particle of sympathy with the British in their fights, in their difficulties, in those disasters that had occurred to the British arms—nothing but jubilation and rejoicing from La Patrie; and when at length success had crowned our arms, when our troops were victorious, throughout this Dominion, not only in Montreal, but in Toronto, in Hamilton, in every city, town, village and hamlet of this country, the spirits of the people boiled over with rejoicings over the glorious success of the British arms, and also over the signal courage which our Canadian soldiers had evinced on the field of battle on more than one occasion. These were the things that stirred the hearts of loyal Canadians; these were the things that made the loyal boys of McGill go out on the streets and throw up their caps, and, we are told, break the law. What are they to do to-morrow if another victory is announced? We are told that they are to stay within doors, that they are not to go out on the streets. If they do, and if they call on other citizens to rejoice with them, these loyal gentlemen say, we will smash confederation. The Globe newspaper ridicules this nonsensical course of the Minister of Public Works. That hon. gentleman has no excusers in the province of Ontario, except the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who can turn a corner about as sharply as any hon. member of the House of Commons I ever knew. I shall only say this in conclusion. There is no one who deplores these incidents more than I do. There is no one who desires to see this Dominion of Canada built up in harmony more than I do. A year and a half ago I had the pleasure of spending some weeks in the city of Quebec. It is a very French city, and I met there French members of the Dominion parliament on both sides of politics; I met those who have been French members in days gone by; I met members of the local legislature; I met many other French people; and I can say that in no place where I have been, in Canada or out of it, was I treated with more kindness, hospitality and friendship than in the city of Quebec. I desire to perpetuate these feelings of friendship and good fellowship; but I say that if they are to be controlled by men of the calibre and kind of the Minister of Public Works, there is disaster before us in this country. If such men are to predominate and have sway in the province of Quebec, there will be disaster. If men of wisdom like the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), who is known and admitted to be a loyal and patriotic citizen of the province of Quebec, and men like the Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière), are to guide the French Canadian people, I am sure the races will not separate, but there will be a period when the different nationalities of this country will join in one harmonious whole. But I have no faith in the future if the Minister of Public Works and those who are with him in this racial conflict continue to dominate the public opinion of the province of Quebec.

Mr. JAMES McMULLEN (North Wellington). Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words upon this unfortunate occurrence, and upon the manner in which this whole afternoon has been taken up and virtually wasted. Permit me in the first place to say that I have been a regular visitor to the province of Quebec for over forty years. I have gone there twice a year on business for over thirty years, and have spent a month each year in the city of Montreal; and in all my business experience, I must say that I never met a kinder, better behaved, more hospitable and dignified people than the French people of the city of Montreal. I hope the ex-Minister of Finance is not leaving the House, because I wish to tell him that I have never seen a smaller exhibition of peanut politics than has been given this afternoon by that hon. gentleman and the ex-Minister of Customs (Mr. Wallace). In the eighteen years I have been a member of this House, I must confess I have never witnessed such a miserable, puerile exhibition as we have had this afternoon. It was evidently instigated by the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster). It was evidently he who put up the hon. gentleman from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) to start the debate.

Mr. PRIOR. That is not so.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. member for North Bruce was courteously and effectively replied to by the right hon. leader of the government, and then the ex-Minister of Finance, in a speech about an hour long, displayed all the littleness of character which so peculiarly characterizes him—trying to make mountains of mole hills, seeking to manufacture a little political capital out of a disturbance in Montreal between two classes of school boys. There is no doubt that the students of McGill acted very imprudently, and the best evidence of the fact that they were the instigators of the whole trouble is that the president of McGill University went and apologized like a man for what the students had done. But for men in this House to resort to the miserable device of bringing up an incident of this kind for the purpose of making political capital out of it, as the ex-Minister of Finance and the ex-Controller of Customs have done, shows a conception of political and party tactics even lower and smaller than any I supposed these hon. gentlemen possessed of. Men like the late Sir John Macdonald, whose memory we all respect, and the late Sir George Cartier, would never have dreamt for a moment of countenancing the course taken by these hon. gentlemen this afternoon. I myself believe—and I will continue to believe it until contradicted by the leader of the opposition himself—that that hon. gentleman purposely kept out of the House this afternoon to avoid having even the appearance of lending his countenance to such miserable small tactics as have been resorted to for the purpose of exploiting an incident we all deplore. I cannot come to any other conclusion, for never before have we witnessed such a humiliating exhibition. I must say that it is greatly to the credit of the government that the opposition should find themselves reduced to resort to such tactics, for if they can find no other way of attacking the government, if they can find no other charge on which to arouse public opinion against the government, and are driven to the necessity of trying to make political capital out of a miserable petty school quarrel in the city of Montreal, then the government must be a very perfect one indeed. If these hon. gentlemen have no better tactics than they have shown this afternoon, if they have no more formidable charges to make against the government, they ought frankly and honestly to confess that there is indeed a government in this country in which really they can find no fault.

I do think that it is high time we should get down to the business of the session and do the country's work. Hon. gentlemen opposite need not imagine that they are going to gain popularity by the course they have taken. The people of this country read the newspapers, and they can see through these small tactics; and let me tell hon. gentlemen opposite that instead of making capital by the never-ending criticisms and abuse which they are heaping on the Minister of Public Works, the people of Ontario are becoming nauseated and are resenting this continual hounding down and abuse of a man who does not deserve it. There is a public reaction of sympathy in favour of this man, who is known to be on the very brink of the grave.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. McMULLEN. He is even to-day in such a condition of health that he is hardly able to bear the responsibilities of the position he fills, and in which he is attacked in the most bitter and persistent, and determined manner. No man in Canada, in my experience, in the last forty years, has been persecuted as the hon. Minister of Public Works has been by hon. gentlemen opposite. They have stopped at nothing, they have laid hold of everything they could use. The Tory press of Canada has from day to day, and week to week attributed utterances to him that he never spoke, and done everything they possibly could to destroy him. Why? Because he was once a Tory, because he once belonged to the party of hon. gentlemen opposite, but saw the error of his ways and joined a better and a purer lot of men. He exposed hon. gentlemen opposite, he brought them into disgrace and contempt for their misdeeds, and they lose no effort to try and crush him in return. But allow me to tell these hon. gentlemen that their efforts will fail. They are making no impression on the people of Ontario. Let me tell the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) that he can preach to his hearts content about the disloyalty of the French people and particularly of the Minister of Public Works, and can vaunt to the skies his own loyalty, nobody takes much stock in what he says. The people see through him. His attacks are as harmless as water on a duck's back.

For my part, I am amazed that the ex-Minister of Finance, a man who has occupied the position of minister of the Crown for many years, should have descended so low. I am surprised that he should not try to rise to the dignity that should characterize a man who fills the position in the public eye that he does. In place of that we have had a continuation of the miserable littleness, the peanut politics adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite for the purpose of trying to make a little capital, taking up the time of the House so that no business can be carried on. I did not expect much better. I must say, from the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace). In fact, I cannot say that I expected very much better from either. When I looked across and saw the hon. member for West Assiniboia

(Mr. Davin) on one side, and the hon. ex-Controller of Customs (Mr. Wallace) on the other, and the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) in the middle, I said to myself: There is a trio who are ready to do anything, ready to say anything, ready to take any course to injure the Minister of Public Works. I hope the hon. minister will be spared to Canada, and I can tell him, though they have tried to belittle him and injure him in the eyes of the people of Ontario, that there is not a man in this House today, save and except the leader of the government, who, coming to Ontario tomorrow, would receive a heartier, more cordial and more united welcome than the Minister of Public Works. The people of Ontario realize that he is an abused man, that he has been pounced upon by men determined to preach him into his grave if possible. And, in that effort, they have descended this afternoon to the lowest step in petty politics in order, if possible, to make some impression. My hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace) has drawn attention to a letter that was printed in Montreal. He should know that it was two days at least after the incident occurred that that letter appeared, not before the trouble arose. Now, I say, were the English-speaking portion of this Dominion only two millions, and the French three millions, and were the English-speaking minority in Quebec treated as the French were treated in Montreal, our people would use even stronger language than was used in the papers, in regard to the necessity of rising to protect ourselves. The ex-Minister of Customs, as a member of the minority would simply overflow with a desire to avenge what he would consider the injustice practiced upon us. I find no fault with that article. Unfortunately, a gross injustice was practiced by the students of McGill College, and I regret exceedingly that anything took place of that kind. But the petty tactics adopted here to try and make a little capital out of that incident will be looked upon by the people of this country as the smallest piece of politics ever resorted to in this country. If hon. gentlemen opposite have any respect for themselves, if they have any respect for this parliament, let them quit this littleness, and let us get to work to deal with the great public questions affecting this country, instead of, as has been done on the other side, attempting to make a mountain out of a mole hill, to make political capital out of a quarrel between two schools. If this goes on, it will soon come to this, that if two bodies of school-boys going in different directions happen to meet and have a snowball fight, the ex-Minister of Finance will bring it up in this House, if he thinks he can make any political capital out of it, and the ex-Minister of Customs, no doubt, will aid him. I feel humiliated, ashamed, to think that this parliament has been used as a field for such tactics as we have seen this afternoon. Let us quit this kind of thing, do the work of the country, or let us quit altogether.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). This House ought to be edified by the exceedingly dignified, courteous, manly and statesmanlike speech we have just listened to from the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). This is one of the occasions in his life of which he may well feel proud. I am sure when he looks over his remarks in Hansard, he will have come to the conclusion that he has either taken too much to eat or too much to drink or else his biliary organs were very much out of condition. He first speaks of the way this subject was introduced by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill). I think I can fairly appeal to this House that the hon. member for North Bruce, in speaking of this regrettable incident, did so in a very moderate, dignified, and conciliatory way. I think I can fairly appeal to the leader of the government whether I am not correct in what I say in regard to that, and whether any hon. gentleman can fairly take exception either to the subject of discussion or to the manner in which he handled that discussion. Notwithstanding that, he has roused the hon. member for North Wellington. That hon. gentleman is evidently in a bilious condition. He has vomited bile for the last half hour to an extent which has almost nauseated every one in the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. I trust the hon. member (Mr. Sproule) will refrain from personal allusion.

Mr. SPROULE. If that is unparliamentary, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw it, because I wish to keep within the rules of parliament. I do not wish to follow the example of the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) who has just taken his seat. That hon. gentleman has left the House, following the example of his friend, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), no doubt remembering the good old rule, that he who fights and runs away may live to fight another day. That is the kind of courtesy extended to hon. members on this side, after they have listened to what I was going to call a diatribe, if that were parliamentary. After finishing their remarks, these hon. gentlemen rise, and whether it is through discourtesy or ignorance, I am not prepared to say, they leave the House. In my opinion, it is designedly done; after they have vomited forth all their bile, they dare not stay and listen to an answer, but leave the House.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Look around you.

Mr. SPROULE. I heard the musical voice of the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin). When we heard this afternoon that article read from La Patrie advising organized resistance, advising practically civil war, advising force against the authority of the Queen, it met with a sympathetic response by the hon. member for South Grey, the member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), and the member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), who appears from time to time in the Queen's uniform. That incendiary article was endorsed by these hon. gentlemen, of all men in this House. It comes with bad grace from men representing constituencies that I know are composed of loyal men, and these hon. gentlemen dare not go back into their own constituencies and express such sentiments as they have done to-night. The hon. member for North Wellington complained of the speech of the member for York (Mr. Wallace), which in my judgment, was very conciliatory. I do not think any one could say he was unreasonable. He tried as far as possible to minimize this unfortunate incident and to throw the broad mantle of charity over both sides. Yet his speech was described as small, petty, miserable, contemptible, and those epitaphs were repeated fifteen or twenty times. But the speech of the Minister of Public Works, was described with fulsome flattery, he endorsed every word of it, and he endorsed the incendiary article in La Patrie. I ask him if he would dare to read a copy of that article in his own constituency and endorse it. Sir, he dare not do it. Yet here he endorses it, condones it, and slobbers him over with slime, as a snake does his victim that he intends to swallow. The conduct of the Minister of Public Works is all right, his article in La Patrie was all right, there was nothing wrong, nothing disloyal in it. But he abuses the students of McGill College for what they did. The others were merely enjoying a little innocent pastime, but the conduct of the McGill students who, in their enthusiasm, displayed their loyalty over the good news from South Africa in the relief of Ladysmith, that was all wrong. But the conduct of the others was all right, even though it included the pulling down of the Union Jack, tearing it to shreds, burning it, spitting upon it—there was nothing wrong in that. The incendiary article that appeared that day and which, in my judgment, went a long ways towards exciting the people to those atrocious deeds, that article was all right. Let us remember that the editorial in La Patrie was written on the very day on which these disloyal acts were committed, and I believe it was that article which led to these incendiary acts, it was the result of reading that very article that appeared in La Patrie, and which was credited to the Minister of Public Works, and which he has not seen fit to deny up to the present time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, these hon. gentlemen appear to regard this as a very insignificant incident. It was not disloyal, the most of them say. Well, I would like to know what they mean by disloyal. If a crowd of people, whether you call them a mob, or a class of respectable citizens, so far forget themselves as to tear down the emblem of the country, to tear down the Union Jack, to tear it into shreds, to trample on it, to spit on it, and to burn the remnants that may be left, that is a kind of disloyalty that is condoned by the member for North Wellington, by the member for South Grey, and by the member for North Oxford. What did General White say, after he had been relieved from the siege of Ladysmith, that had lasted 118 days? He says: 'It hurt me terribly to cut down your rations,' speaking to the people who were in an emaciated condition, half starved, who had been reduced to feeding on horse flesh; but, says General White: 'Thank God, we kept the flag still flying.' But in loyal Montreal, the mob would not keep the flag still flying, and the incendiary article written by the Minister of Public Works was, I believe, largely the cause of the mob tearing it down. Yet these hon. gentlemen from Ontario are ready to condone the act, to say there was no disloyalty in it. Let them ask General White if that is loyalty, let them ask General Roberts if that is loyalty, let them ask any man in the British army, or in any part of the British Empire, if that is loyalty, and I will be much mistaken if they answer in the affirmative, if they would regard such act as a high expression of loyalty.

I say it is unfortunate that the McGill students did what they did, but I do not go so far as to say, with the Premier, that their act will result in forcing us to prevent any more demonstrations. After this we will have no more parades. Does he mean to tell me that the loyal British, in their enthusiasm, cannot go out upon the streets and carry the flag of their country? That they cannot go down to the city hall and ask the mayor to address them, that they cannot go to the Board of Exchange, and ask to be addressed there? Are we, then, to have no more parades, although in every part of the British Empire, loyal men can raise the flag of their country? Yet in Montreal they won't be allowed to do it.

The PRIME MINISTER. I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. SPROULE. I took down the hon. gentleman's words, and I hope I am not misrepresenting him. He said: 'What will it result in? It will be this, that we cannot have any more such demonstrations.'

The PRIME MINISTER. I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. SPROULE. Well, I took it down from his lips, and if I am doing him an injustice, I do not wish to do it. But I took down the same thing from the Minister of Public Works.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, I never said that in my life.

Mr. SPROULE. Well, I only ask both of those gentlemen to look at the Hansard when it comes out, and I will stand by the records. But are we to be told in this House that loyal men of the British Empire cannot enthuse over a great victory by British arms?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Nobody objects to that.

Mr. SPROULE. Will they tell me that is loyalty? We are told the students' mob carried the British flag in front. I will tell you what a reputable gentleman told me, speaking in a hotel the other night. He said that there was a tri-colour carried at the head of the procession, a flag eight or nine feet square; and the Union Jack, about fifteen inches square, was tied to a pole and carried almost at the tail end of the procession. Is that what you expect in a loyal crowd? I do not think so. Is that what the Minister of Public Works endorses? If he does, he would not be likely to endorse it in Ontario, where, I am quite sure, the people would not relish it quite so well as some of his friends do here.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not indulge in breaking the doors of my neighbours.

Mr. SPROULE. I am not talking about breaking doors, I am talking about the spirit of loyalty that was displayed by the crowd who paraded the streets in Montreal with a tri-colour in front of the Union Jack, in one case, and in another case, with the Union Jack below it. I say if you call that loyalty, you give the term a different meaning from what I do. I say as long as the Union Jack is the flag of our country, it should be at the front of any procession. I do not wonder at it. When the hon. Minister of Public Works is going down the St. Lawrence, in the summer, it is the tri-colour that he puts up on the boat.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) has over and over again heard me, in the House, explain that. He has heard me say that the British flag was always given the post of honour whenever I was on board the steamer, but that, on three or four occasions, when I was visiting French people, I hoisted the French flag, but still the British flag was at the post of honour.

Mr. SPROULE. I have heard it repeatedly contradicted, and I have heard the reverse stated.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Well, the reverse is not true.

Mr. SPROULE. I have heard the reverse stated by reputable men.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is not true.

Mr. SPROULE. I am bound to take the hon. gentleman's disclaimer. If he is ashamed of it now and wishes to take it back—

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am not ashamed of it.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think we should accept each other's denials of statements across the floor.

Mr. SPROULE. I said that I accepted it.

Mr. SPEAKER. There are occasions when a subsequent innuendo follows a denial of a statement, which I regret very much.

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Speaker, I am entitled to get through with my sentence before being stopped. I am bound to do that in this House as long as I am a member of it. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) is ashamed of it and takes it back for that reason—

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock), Order, order.

Mr. SPROULE. What does the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) want? Does he not wish to allow an hon. member of this House to speak because he is there? Does he think that all the loyalty is in his own brain? If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) disclaims it because it is untrue, I say all the more honour to him. But the hon. gentleman is obliged to let an hon. member speak as he is entitled to speak in this House. I want the hon. Postmaster General to understand that as long as I am here I will exercise that right notwithstanding that I may incur his bad temper at any stage.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Biliousness seems to be chronic.

Mr. SPROULE. It does on that side of the House especially. Hon. gentlemen opposite said that they had not learned their loyalty from this side of the House. No, if they had there would never have been that spirit of annexation which was displayed during the Mercier regime down there; there would never have been unrestricted reciprocity that Edward Blake said would lead to annexation if it ever prevailed. I say, thank God, that we have never talked such loyalty as that on this side of the House, and it would have been well for hon. gentlemen opposite if they had taken their loyalty from this side of the House. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) amused me when he spoke of the subject of loyalty in this House. I have listened to the hon. gentleman for twenty-one years, and in all that time I have heard him make but one patriotic speech. He has a record, a history, and he might pray that his history should be buried in oblivion, for if there is a man in this House who is vulnerable and who may fairly be called disloyal and a traitor to his country, that man is the hon. member for North Norfolk. His letter that he wrote about the Canadian volunteers, his connection with the Americans over there, the way he has carried on his propaganda with the Americans, and his whole career from first to last, down to the present session, in my judgment, proclaim him to the world as a disloyal man. There is no question about it, nobody thinks otherwise in this country. Those that know the hon. gentleman, who have heard him speak or who have read his speeches, know that and I do not think his speech to-night will raise him in their estimation. I was amused by the fulsome eulogy he expended on the right hon. Prime Minister, after the letter he wrote to his friend, which was read by the hon. member for North York, in which he said that with a French Canadian leader and under the manipulation of such an unscrupulous machine politician as J. D. Edgar, the Liberal party could never have any future.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). I never received any such letter from him.

Mr. SPROULE. I did not say that the hon. gentleman did. The hon. gentleman puts up a man of straw and knocks him down again.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. member (Mr. Sproule) said the hon. member for North York.

Mr. SPROULE. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I referred to the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), a much better man. But to come back to the hon. member for North Norfolk, he wasted a quarter of an hour be-slobbering the right hon. Prime Minister over in a slimy, fulsome eulogy. It reminded me of the conduct of a snake that is going to swallow his victim and which covers him over with slime before he does it. Yet they call that political astuteness. If it is I do not know the meaning of the term. Now, I have only to say in regard to the incident which took place that it is a very regrettable one. I have nothing but praise for Archbishop Bruchesi and Principal Peterson because of the words of wisdom and conciliation they uttered and because, in the high positions which they occupy, they did all they could to relieve the embarrassment of the situation. I am sure that the better element in the city of Montreal do not endorse this attempt which has been made to make differences between races and classes of the people, and that they desire that they have seen such an attempt for the last time. I am quite sure that the people will regret it all over the country, but, I am quite sure as well, that those who read the speech of the hon. Minister of Public Works, the speech of the hon. member for North Norfolk, and the speech of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) will say that they are entirely out of harmony with that spirit of conciliation and kind words that was displayed by those gentlemen in Montreal in endeavouring to quell the trouble down there. Then, the hon. member for North Norfolk undertook to abuse the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), who, I think, introduced the subject in the most dignified, cautious, able and statesmanlike way, and used most conciliatory language. To turn around and abuse him was wrong, because such an attack was not justified by the manner in which he treated the subject this afternoon.

Mr. E. G. PENNY (St. Lawrence, Montreal). Mr. Speaker, I was away this afternoon, and I have not really heard all that has taken place, but I have heard some of the speeches this evening, and I am surprised at the language which has been used, particularly by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. I am going to try and treat this question independently of all party spirit. I come from the city of Montreal. I have been there during the last few days, and I think I know something of what has taken place. There is no doubt that this has been a time of great trial for the city of Montreal. Hon. gentlemen sitting here, on both sides of the House, do not realize how near the citizens of this Dominion have been in conflict one with the other. It is a very serious question, and as I said at the outset, I am going to treat it from a non-party point of view; I am going to say, and I want to say it, here, from my seat in this House, that there has been too much of a political appeal made out of the race question by both sides of politics. I say that advisedly, because, if you take the newspaper writings, not only of the papers of Ontario, but also of the papers of the province of Quebec, you will find that they have been, for the last four months, inciting the people of both nationalities, and working upon their feelings to such an extent, that it almost culminated the other day in riot and bloodshed in Montreal. There is no doubt that every proper thinking Englishman in Montreal admits that the McGill students were wrong in going to the newspaper offices, that they were wrong in going to Laval University, and there is no doubt that the Laval students were wrong to a certain extent. But, Sir, it is wrong to accuse the Laval students of having gone to the Star office and of having pulled down the flag, for so far as I can understand from the reports which I have heard on good authority, there were very few Laval students in the crowd, and it was not the Laval students who were guilty. The act was committed by a mob whose feeling had been worked upon, and the Laval students should not be held responsible.

Mr. SPROULE. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Penny) understood me to say that it was done by the Laval students, I wish to correct him. I did not say so, and I had no ground for saying so. I said it was one of the crowd.

Mr. PENNY. I certainly understood the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) or the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) to say it was a Laval student.

Mr. WALLACE. I made no reference whatever to the Laval students pulling down the flag at the Star office. On the contrary I read a report which said that the Laval students were doing their best to dissuade the others from wrong-doing. I did not even inferentially charge the Laval students from pulling down the flag.

Mr. PENNY. Then I accept the hon. gentleman's statement. Now, when we come to sift this thing to the bottom, we find that most of the McGill students who were parading the streets of Montreal were young men from different parts of the Dominion, most of them from the province of Ontario I am sorry to say, and they were not Montrealers at all. I think it is wrong that these young men, receiving their education in the province of Quebec, should enter into any offensive demonstration, or try to work up any racial feelings. We English and we French people in the province of Quebec if we are left alone, we can get on very well together.

Mr. EDWARDS. Hear, hear.

Mr. PENNY. We have lived together and we are daily getting to know each other better, and we are daily getting to understand each other better, and we are living in peace and harmony. I think I am not wrong in saying that the leader of the opposition tried to make political capital out of this South African business, but whoever tries to make political capital out of racial differences is no friend of Canada. I trust, Sir, that this occurrence will put an end to any such attempts to work on racial feelings in the future. It is a crime for any politician—I do not care whether he is on my side of the House or on the other side—to raise the cry of race and creed in this country. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) told us that he thought it was too bad that people could not rejoice at a national victory. There is no one wishes to prevent any one rejoicing in Montreal, provided they rejoice as they should. I myself rejoiced with my friends in Montreal, in an orderly fashion I hope, but when rejoicing comes to breaking into the offices of private citizens, and into public institutions, then it is time to cry halt. On Saturday evening a gentleman told me that he was sitting in his office on Hospital Street, in Montreal, when those who were rejoicing burst in and ordered him to put up a flag. Now, a private citizen in a private office has not a flag ready at hand at any moment, but these gentlemen abused him because he did not have one to hoist. That is what I call going too far. I again repeat the hope, Sir, that this will be the last attempt to make political capital out of race questions.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. E. F. CLARKE (West Toronto). Mr. Speaker, before the question is put, and the debate closes, I desire to say a few words. The hon. gentleman from St. Lawrence, Montreal, (Mr. Penny), has been more frank than most of those who have spoken on his side of the House, because he has been frank enough to say, that too much political capital has been made by both political parties out of this South African affair, and out of the unfortunate occurrences in Montreal. He acknowledges by that statement, that if the allegations which his friends opposite have made (and which I emphatically deny) are correct, then the same charge can with equal force be levied against his political friends who sit around and beside him. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Penny) seemed to miss altogether the reason why the House has been called upon to discuss the occurrences that took place in Montreal during Thursday and Friday nights. He has referred to these events as if they were merely the ordinary jublations of students, which take place from time to time. He has condemned the action of the McGill students in so far as these actions were not in consonance with the acts of gentlemen, and in so far as they are not in accordance with the acts of gentlemen, and of good breeding, I agree with the condemnation of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Penny). But, he overlooked the fact that those representing the students, at the earliest possible moment made an ample apology to those to whom the students unintentionally offered any insult or did any injury. It was a time of rejoicing, it was a time when the spirits of young men, of students especially, would be worked up to a very high pitch, and if those whom the students visited had been actuated by the same loyal sentiments of patriotism that caused these demonstrations on the part of the students, then they would not have taken such offence as they have taken at the frolics which the students indulged in. So far as I have heard, no person in this debate has charged that the Laval students were the perpetrators of the outrage of hauling down the British flag, tearing it into strips, spitting upon it, and then burning up the remnants. Such a disgraceful, dastardly, and disloyal act, would bring everlasting discredit upon the students of Laval University, or the students of any other teaching institution in the Dominion of Canada, if it could be brought home to them. Now, although my hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace) has not been given a great deal of credit for fairness by hon. gentlemen opposite who have spoken, he was fair enough to read the report which appeared in the Toronto papers with regard to the occurrences, and which report exonerated the students of Laval from the perpetration of that outrage. But, Mr. Speaker, this discussion has not taken place, and these bitter words have not been spoken in this House, because of the action of the McGill students or even of the Laval students. This debate has arisen not even because of the rioting which took place in the city of Montreal, but because of an article which appeared in an influential organ of public opinion, published in the province of Quebec, and which newspaper is believed to be controlled in its editorial utterances very largely by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte).

When the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), who introduced this subject this afternoon—and I am in the judgment of the House in saying that he did so in language which no fair-minded man could take exception to—and when he read that article, instead of hon. gentlemen opposite being ashamed at hearing such an article emanating from such a source, they applauded vigorously some of the most disloyal utterances it contained. I take it that that was the cause of this discussion, and not the occurrences in which the students of McGill and Laval universities were engaged. I say that whoever was guilty of the offence of tearing down the British flag was incited to the act to a very large extent by the article which appeared in La Patrie, and of which complaint was made this afternoon; and not only by that article, but by articles of a similar strain which have appeared time and again in that paper and in many other papers in the province of Quebec during the last three months. If the students of McGill University were worked up to fever heat with enthusiasm over the magnificent victories gained by British arms in South Africa on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday last, they were only giving vent to their pent-up feelings of intense loyalty to the empire, and expressing their contempt for the sentiments which had been given utterance to by La Patrie and other papers in the province of Quebec during the last three months. The Minister of Public Works, when challenged to name some of the representative Tory papers which had incited this bitter controversy, which has gone on during the last three months, named the Toronto News as the chief sinner in this respect. The hon. gentleman did not do himself credit in quoting extracts from the article that appeared in the News, because he only quoted one or two paragraphs of an article which contained twelve or fourteen. If he had desired to be fair to the Toronto News, he would have quoted the refutation which it published in its editorial columns, of the accusation which La Patrie and other papers have made from time to time, that that paper is a Tory organ, owned and controlled and managed by those who own, control and manage the Toronto Mail and Empire. There is no foundation for the statement that the Toronto News is a Tory paper. It is an independent paper, if there is an independent paper published in the Dominion of Canada, and it is acknowledged as such throughout the province of Ontario, where it has probably a larger circulation than any other independent paper. It is not printed on the same paper as the Mail and Empire, it has not the same type, it is not the same shape, it is not printed in the same building, it is not edited by the same men. The two papers are issued practically simultaneously, in offices quite a distance apart, and it is unfair of the Minister of Public Works, in attempting to make political capital against the Conservative party, to rake up and repeat in this House a statement which has been denied by the News as often as it has been made.

Mr. BRITTON. What party does the News support?

Mr. CLARKE. The News supports and has supported individuals who support hon. gentlemen opposite, and it has again and again given splendid advice to those hon. gentlemen.

Mr. BRITTON. It is the most bitter paper against this government in Ontario.

Mr. CLARKE. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon, and I challenge a reference to the columns of the News. I can point again and again to articles eulogizing hon. gentlemen opposite and their confreres in the province of Ontario for their administration of public affairs. Not only did the Minister of Public Works not quote the whole article of the News to which he made reference, but he took precious good care not to quote the article from La Patrie which appeared in the News on the day previous to the day on which the editorial to which it gave rise appeared. Let me read two or three extracts from the article of La Patrie which called forth the article in the News, from which the Minister of Public Works quoted. It was reproduced in the News of October 11 last. It is a long article, and I do not propose to read more than two or three paragraphs:

Violent efforts are being made to induce the government of Canada to send a military contingent to Africa. This attempt is being made by the principal organizers of the Tory party. The Montreal 'Star' has made the most fuss of any of the newspapers about this question. But we must admit that it is closely followed by several of the other important Conservative organs.

We have then the right to conclude that the policy of the Tory party is to adopt as a plank in its platform participation as a power in the European and foreign wars of Great Britain.

The Transvaal Republic is a very small state. If we are not mistaken, the last census taken in 1898 gives the following population:

Whites	245,397
Blacks	622,500
Total	867,897

It is against this insignificant power that mighty England is preparing to fight. No one will pretend, let us hope, that the mother country needs the help of its colonies to vanquish so small an adversary. It is a question, then, not of the Transvaal, but of the adoption of a policy that is entirely new and full of responsibilities—the future participation of Canada in the struggles of Great Britain on the battle-fields of Europe and everywhere else that she engages in conflict.

The last paragraph of the article quoted from La Patrie reads as follows :

What have we to do with African affairs? What interests have we in the Transvaal? Why should we take the money and the blood of our people to spend them in such far-away regions? We leave the question with all who are capable of reflection.

If the hon. Minister of Public Works had been as fair as we might have expected him to be, he would have read that article from La Patrie before he read the reply to that article which appeared in the Toronto News. I have referred to the fact that the News has refuted again and again the assertion made here and elsewhere that it is a Tory paper. With regard to this, the News says :

If the 'News' were not absolutely free of party direction and untrammelled by considerations of party welfare, it could not have been so outspoken on this question. It is because the 'News' is entirely independent of political control that it can express its convictions regardless of the consequences to the political parties.

If, as hon. gentlemen opposite contend, especially as the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) contended not long ago in addressing the House, the Tory party could make no political capital by introducing this subject as it has been introduced this afternoon, and by pursuing the course which it has pursued during the last three months, why does the Minister of Public Works and hon. gentlemen opposite find fault with the News? If it is a Tory organ, it is doing the work in creating a public opinion in favour of the Minister of Public Works, and the Tory party is making no progress by the campaign and the methods it has adopted to promote the interests of that party and secure its return to the Treasury benches. The hon. member for the St. Lawrence Division of Montreal (Mr. Penny), said that this was a campaign inaugurated by the leader of the opposition some three months ago for the purpose of making political capital. I deny that statement most emphatically. How could the leader of the opposition make political capital out of this matter, pray? He stated his position clearly at once. He tendered advice to the right hon. gentleman who leads this House. He invited him to consider the propriety of sending a contingent at once to South Africa to aid the mother country. He pledged his support and the support of his followers in this House to the right hon. gentleman in that course. Surely, in all fairness, the hon. leader of the opposition should be given credit for his frankness, his patriotism, and his straightforward conduct on that occasion. If he had adopted the policy which hon. gentlemen opposite followed on more than one occasion when in opposition, he would have waited until he saw what course the government was going to pursue, and then take the opposite. But in his desire to promote the unity of the empire, in his desire to supplement the resolutions which were carried unanimously in this House last session, he wished to strengthen the hands of the right hon. gentleman and sustain him in giving practical expression to those resolutions. It does not rest with the hon. gentleman opposite to charge the leader of the opposition with any attempt to make party or political capital out of the sending of the contingents, because his record in this matter is above reproach, and because at the beginning of the session he placed himself and his party unreservedly at the disposal of the right hon. leader of the House. No political capital could have been made out of the sending of the Transvaal contingent to the front, if hon. gentlemen opposite had reflected the views, promptly and without quibbling, which prevailed among nine-tenths of our people. The people, from one end of the country to the other, with some few exceptions, desired to give practical expression to their sympathy with the motherland in this crisis, and if the right hon. gentleman and those who sustain him, had listened to the voice of a united people, they would have acted promptly and in doing so they would have been supported by Tories as well as Grits from one end of the country to the other. But it is because they have been apologizing for their actions for the last three months that fault has been found with them. The right hon. gentleman when first approached about this matter, told the public, through the Globe, that the government were powerless because parliament had made no appropriation. But were these gentlemen always such sticklers for the rights of parliament? Have they never resorted to the issuing of Governor General's warrants, in order to raise money without the authority of parliament? The plea of the right hon. gentleman that the government was powerless because parliament had made no appropriation was not accepted by the bulk of the people, and the fact that the government were forced later on to send, first one contingent, and then a second, without the assent of parliament, is the strongest evidence that the people of Canada were practically a unit in compelling the government to take the course they did.

Just one word more, with regard to the expressions of opinion given by the Ontario press during the past three months. So long as there are newspapers in the province of Quebec, especially papers edited and controlled by ministers of the Crown, which contain expressions similar to those quoted this afternoon by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), so long will those Ontario newspapers which hold the same views as the great majority of the people of Ontario, continue to denounce such expressions in just as strong and plain Anglo-Saxon as they can find.

I regret exceedingly that so much time has been taken up this afternoon in this discussion, but I repeat again, that the cause can easily be found, and it rests with hon. gentlemen opposite, on the earliest possible opportunity, to apply the remedy.

Mr. D. C. FRASER (Guysborough). If the end, which I trust all who love their country have in view, will be achieved by this discussion, our time has not been lost, and if hon. gentlemen opposite will understand that what they fondly hoped would prove favourable to them has turned out the very opposite, we shall hear less hereafter of the kind of speeches these hon. gentlemen have been giving us to-day. It might be well for us to understand that the sending of the first and second contingent and all the matters relating thereto, has nothing at all to do with the article that was called in question by the hon. member for North Bruce. But I want to call attention to a fact which strikes me as indicating that just what happened in Montreal, these hon. gentlemen intended should take place, and that consequently they alone are responsible. The best way to know whether or not men are understood, is to observe what those who have listened to them, or read their utterances, understand them to mean. And, what occurred in Montreal, does strike me, as indicating that the articles which appeared in the Conservative press concerning our French Canadian fellow-citizens were rightly interpreted by the students and others who joined them in Montreal in an assault upon French Canadians. What did they do? I suppose a large number of us here have been college students. We have taken our part in all the little fights that students engage in. I remember that in my college days, we had a few of these squabbles when the occasion presented itself, and when we thought our rights were invaded we did not even shrink from attacking the police. But if the McGill students wanted a demonstration that would indicate the feeling of the people over the success of the British arms in South Africa, what would they have done? They would have politely invited their fellow-students—for after all one university is like another—to join them in that demonstration. And I think it will be found, when the inner history of this transaction is known, that certain political agents managed the whole thing.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS.
The Star's agents.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). What happened? These men went first of all, as it happened, because it was on their way, to the La Patrie office, and asked them to put up the British flag, and they did so. But let me say here, that no man has the right to dictate to another how he shall express his loyalty. I have no flag at home, and my loyalty has never been questioned. No man that is truly loyal need indulge in these outward exhibitions, and, in fact these outside displays very often indicate the lack of true loyalty inside. The man who needs a flag to show that he is loyal, will never be found on the field of battle, but will be found under his barn or woodshed when there is any fighting to be done. What did these McGill students do. Not content with visiting La Patrie, they went to the Conservative journals, and what happened there? When they went to the Conservative journals, the people there answered them in language emphatic and profane that they would not do it—and they did not do it. There is nothing about that at all. But I want to show that these men understood exactly what the whole scheme of the Conservative party was; and so strong was that in their minds after the articles they had read and the speeches they had listened to, that they said: We will forget too for the time being that we are Tories and we will go for every French newspaper that we can find. I can understand well, if they felt that the Minister of Public Works and his paper were disloyal, how they would end with him; but that would not do, and that would not suit those who are trying to raise this question in this country. They felt that they must go for the French wherever they found them; they must strike at every paper published in that language; and they felt that in order to show that they were in true sympathy with this crusade they would make no exception. Was not that the best indication of how they understood what hon. gentlemen opposite have been writing in their papers and speaking for the last four months? And was it not true that this propaganda instituted by hon. gentlemen opposite could have only one meaning, and that was that they would go against our fellow-citizens of the province of Quebec? This happened as might have been expected. In 1896, they engaged themselves that they would take under their protection the Catholic people of this country, and would fight a battle to obtain power. But the Catholic electors of Canada were too independent and too intelligent, and they spewed them out of their mouths. And now, they say: As we could not succeed in that way, what are we to do? We will go upon a Protestant crusade against the men who did not stand by us when we undertook their battle. Let me tell hon. gentlemen opposite that, as the result in 1896 was disastrous to them, the result of their present crusade will be more disastrous. No party in Canada can gain power by enlisting the Catholics on their side and no party can gain power by attempting to enlist Protestants on their side. Thank God, this country is bigger than Protestant or Catholic, and the party that only seeks an alliance—

Mr. CLANCY. It would have been a good deal bigger than the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Fraser) speech.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). That, coming from a small man, passes without notice. Physically or intellectually, I would feel humiliated if measured by the same rule. As I was going to say, they will find that, particularly at a time like this, it was in the worst possible taste for the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) to bring up this question. I submit that there are times of occasion for bringing up matters of this kind. But when on the field of battle our forces in South Africa had engaged in a fight in which Canadians, thank God, took the lead, and in which a company of men speaking the French language were mentioned particularly—and many of whom could speak no English—it was exceedingly inopportune for any man claiming to be a Canadian, particularly for any man in this House, to attempt to bring up this question. Had he no respect for the fact that French Canadians and English Canadians had stood shoulder to shoulder together in the field? Surely he could be broad enough to feel that our French Canadian fellow-citizens, side by side with their English-speaking brethren, had showed that we in this part of the empire had as good blood and as good fighting qualities as Britain could show. Surely it would be only generous for a man with noble instincts to forget for the time to attempt to make political capital out of so small a thing as the incident we have been discussing. I did think that the hon. gentleman from North Bruce had a better idea of Canadian citizenship. I did think that he at least, who has always considered himself as everything that was honourable and honest and straightforward, as one who, even in thought, could feel nothing but what was Bayard-like, would have had the generosity, not to say the good sense, not to thrust upon this House to-day a debate of this kind. Cannot we get broader than this? Cannot we rise above this? Cannot we be greater than the pettiness that will not understand the opinions and feelings of others? I am not a Frenchman, I am a Highlander, of Highland descent; and I say that if under the same circumstances, the people from whom I sprung and the language I speak as my mother tongue, were insulted as the race and the tongue of the French Canadians were in Montreal, there would have been much more done to repel it than was done. We must learn to understand this—and he is a wise man, and he is a good man who can appreciate it—if we are to mould together the different classes of our population and bring them into the harmony that will produce the good Canadian stock of the future, made up of all these nationalities. Day by day are we treated to matters of this kind. For the last ten or fifteen years the attempt has been made—not altogether, at times, without fault by the Liberal party—to show that certain people have the Divine right to call themselves the only honest, patriotic citizens in Canada. I am not claiming for myself or the people from whom I come any more loyalty than others. It is sufficient for me to know that we find them taking their place with the others.

I venture to think that if hon. gentlemen opposite had remained silent after the manly utterances of my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), they would have consulted their reputation. He gave to this House an unvarnished description of what occurred. His judgment was correct, I think, so far as the incidents went. Of course, he could not take his seat again without being treated, as the attempt was made to treat these newspapers, had he not attempted to pass censure upon the Minister of Public Works. I am not an apologist for the Minister of Public Works—he needs none. I am not going to say a word in his favour, except this, that after the statement made by the member for Jacques Cartier, I am astonished at the moderation of the Laval students and those who participated in these scenes in Montreal. I would not like to be subjected to the same insults and I am certain I should so far forget myself, if I had to meet such an issue as to act in a different way from that in which our French fellow-citizens acted.

Let us be done with this. If hon. gentlemen opposite are ready to receive instruction at all, they cannot but profit by what has been said in this House, and not only by that but by the humiliating position in which they find themselves now. As it is nearing twelve o'clock, after a day spent in this debate, I am sure we shall not hear the same insults, and I am certain we shall have no repetition of this unseemly scene. I cannot congratulate the hon. member for North Bruce upon his achievements to-day. If he thinks he has gained any political advantage, let him make use of it—I shall say nothing. But sure I am that in the best interests of all men who live in Canada, it has not been a good day on his part. Sure I am that it will take very many more years than he has given to that Imperialism of which he is the distinguished example, to wipe out the impression that his action of to-day has made upon me and, I am sure, upon others. So, often a man after a life of exemplary piety, by one immoral act, spoils the merit and the effect of it all. In like manner the hon. member for North Bruce, by his achievement to-day, has wiped out all the claims he may have had on us for his services in the interest of that mighty imperialism of which he is the foremost champion. Now, if we shall have achieved that much, and for ever have shut up these hon. gentlemen opposite, we shall have rendered a service to this House. I was very much amused at the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule). It was interesting to hear a lecture from a medical gentleman, and the observation of the effect of eating and drinking upon his bilious disposition was to me a matter of very great pleasure. After giving the House a lesson of the evil effect of taking more food than usual or drinking more drink than was customary, he got more bilious than ever the member for North Wellington did. When the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) mildly suggested that he was wrong in his designation of a constituency, he seemed to get into a towering rage, and assured the hon. Postmaster General that he was going to speak. Of course he was going to speak, every one expected that, and it would take more Postmaster General's than ever sat in this House to prevent him from speaking. Now, in the name of all that is good let us drop this kind of talk. Let us remember that only a few days ago the blood of French Canadians as well as English Canadians was shed on the same battlefield in South Africa in defence of the flag. Let the spectacle of that blood lead us to forego our narrowness and our bitterness of party strife. Let us forget the things that are behind, the miserable husks on which we have fed, and look forward to a brighter day when a Canadian nationality shall have been built up with a union of English, Scotch, Irish and French blood, mingled more closely than in the past. To that end let us respect the feelings, even the prejudices, of our fellow citizens. I hope that parliament will never again have such an exhibition as we were treated to to-day by the hon. member for North Bruce, rising in the House and almost shedding tears for what he had to do, and then proceeding to fling into this House a shell that might well have exploded with disastrous consequences to the country. But what did that hon. gentleman care for the consequences? Did he care, does any of his friends care, who was struck? Did he bring up this question in the interest of peace, good-will and righteousness? I say I trust we shall never have such an exhibition again, and I hope the results of this discussion will cause the hon. gentlemen opposite to feel shame for what has occurred this afternoon in this House. They have brought up a discussion that might be fraught with very serious consequences, but for the good feeling and self restraint that have been shown on this side of the House. I hope our hon. friends opposite will seek some other way of bringing themselves before the notice of the country, because I do not think their efforts in this line will meet with the endorsement of the enlightened people of Canada, be they Catholic or Protestant.

Mr. R. HOLMES (West Huron). I do not propose to continue this discussion, which has already gone on too long; I wish merely to refer to a statement that was made a few moments ago, and flatly to contradict it, because I believe it was made for a purpose. In all this discussion I have noticed that anything appearing in the columns of La Patrie has been at once ascribed to the Minister of Public Works, the whole responsibility has been thrown upon his shoulders simply because that paper happens to be published by his son. By the same process of reasoning the Toronto News, which the opposition have for certain reasons repudiated as a Conservative paper to-night, can be proved to be identified with the Toronto Mail. The general manager of the Toronto News is a son of one of the general managers of the Toronto Mail; therefore, by the same process of reasoning exactly as adopted by the opposition, the Toronto Mail must be held responsible for the utterances of the Toronto News. I was amazed to-night to hear the hon. member for Toronto West (Mr. Clarke) get up and intimate that the Toronto News was not a Conservative organ, that it was not controlled by the same men who control the Toronto Mail.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS.
Nobody believed it.

Mr. HOLMES. It is a good job they don't. I think all the newspaper men of Ontario, at any rate, know that the Toronto News, judged by its course, is an ultra-Conservative organ. Not only is it a most pronounced Conservative organ, but it is owned, managed and controlled by the same gentlemen who own, manage and control the Toronto Mail.

Motion (Mr. McNeill) agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.55 p.m.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR (South Leeds). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to inquire from the right hon. the Prime Minister when I may expect the return moved for on the 12th of February, for copies of all correspondence, reports, telegrams or papers respecting the Fox Bay settlers on the Island of Anticosti. My reason for asking this question is that I had a letter this morning from a Methodist minister, referring to the promise of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) to retract as publicly as he made the charge in parliament respecting those settlers; and I am anxious to see the papers before the hon. gentleman leaves the House, as I understand from the press that he is about to do so shortly.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Without making an absolute promise, I may say that I think I will bring down those papers on Monday next.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). I would like to inquire from the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) who, I understand, is taking the place of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), when I may have the return to an address passed by this House on the 26th of February, for a copy of the order in council of the 3rd of August, 1898, appointing Joseph Eno Girouard to the position of registrar of the Yukon Territory. I understand very little work is required to fill this order, and I would ask the hon. gentleman to see that it is brought down as soon as possible.

THE POLITICAL CRISIS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. E. G. PRIOR (Victoria, B.C.) Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to draw the attention of the government to a matter of some importance, and as it may call forth a little discussion in the House, I shall finish with the usual motion. I wish to say a few words, Mr. Speaker, in regard to the most extraordinary political situation that now exists in the province of British Columbia, a state of things that is, to say the least of it, most detrimental in its effects on all kinds of business industries in the country, and also, to my mind, calculated to lower the dignity of the Crown and to kill a great deal of the respect the people now have for constitutional government. I will first read an article that appeared in the Toronto Globe of the 3rd instant, in regard to the prorogation of the legislature in the province of British Columbia:

Victoria, March 1.—A scene unprecedented in the history of the province and in all probability never before seen in a British governing colony, occurred this afternoon, when the members of the legislature deliberately rose and left the House when the Governor came down to prorogue the House. When the House assembled, Mr. Prentice moved that the legislature had no confidence in Mr. Joseph Martin, who has been called in by the Lieutenant-Governor to form a cabinet. This motion passed almost unanimously, two members refusing to vote and two more being absent.

The Governor then entered the Chamber, preceded by his suite of naval and military officers, and took his seat on the Throne. As he did so, the members rose in a body and filed out of the room. For a moment neither the Governor nor the audience understood what was taking place, and it was the galleries which first seemed to grasp the significance of the step. Then they burst into prolonged cheering, mingled with derisive laughter. The Governor turned pale and his hand shook, but he proceeded with the reading, although obliged several times to desist. As he concluded and was leaving the Chamber, some one shouted, 'Three cheers for the Queen,' which were heartily given. As soon as he had retired the members filed back again to the Chamber. Mr. Price Ellison, waving his hat in the air, shouted, 'We are the people,' at which there was tremendous applause.

Mr. Harry Helmcken proposed a long resolution assuring Her Majesty of the continued loyalty, the remainder of the resolution having reference to the victory at Ladysmith. This was passed amidst cheering, and the House broke up with cheers for the Queen and Buller, and singing the National Anthem.

According to that despatch, which I have just read, all the members left the legislature when the Lieutenant-Governor took his seat on the Throne, but, such was not the case exactly because, although they nearly all went, one gentleman held the fort. That gentleman was a gentleman who, I am sorry to say, is better known than he is respected in British Columbia, and I think I am right in saying, in the Dominion of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. PRIOR. I refer to the Hon. Joseph Martin. He is the gentleman, who is, at the present time, the Premier of British Columbia. It must have been most edifying to see the Governor come down in all the pomp of his position, attended by a large staff of military and naval men, to read the speech from the Throne, to see him lift his hat and give his speech to this one solitary individual, on whose shoulders he had seen fit to place the responsibility of the government of British Columbia. I can only say that I am extremely sorry that the gallant gentlemen who came from Her Majesty's ship, were ever invited to attend at such an exhibition. I believe that every right-minded man in Canada will agree with me in saying that it is deeply to be regretted that any such occurrence has taken place. But, it has taken place, and I can only say that I am sure that the loyal and law-abiding members of parliament in British Columbia and the citizens of British Columbia would never have been guilty of putting such a slight on Her Majesty's representative, offering such an insult to the Crown as was offered there, unless they had lost all respect and confidence in the representative thereof, or had, in their own minds anyway, come to the conclusion that the gentleman who occupies that high position is utterly unworthy of the position which he holds. Now, there was no disloyalty in the hearts of those gentlemen, as was shown by their action when they returned to the Chamber, when they passed, as I read, resolutions of loyalty to the Queen and of confidence in the Crown. Well, Sir, two or three days afterwards, when the House again met, we find the Premier, or the gentleman who had been Premier—I suppose he was then—Mr. Semlin, offering the following resolution. I read now from the Victoria Daily Colonist, of February 28th, a statement of what took place on February 27th:

Hon. Mr. Semlin then rose, amidst expectant silence, in which, although he spoke in an unusually low tone, his words were heard in all parts of the Chamber.

'Mr. Speaker,' he said, 'I rise to a question of privilege. On Friday last I moved that this House be adjourned until to-day. This was in order that the government, which had just sustained a defeat in the House by a majority of one, might see if some arrangement could not be come to by which the business of the country might be gone on with. Such an arrangement was come to, as I believed, and I advised His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor to that effect last evening. I informed him that the government had effected an arrangement by which the government was assured of effective control of the House, and was ready to go on with the despatch of business. This forenoon, however, I received a communication from His Honour to the effect that he declined to be further advised by myself and my colleagues, and had already sought, or would forthwith seek, other advisers. In connection with this communication, I should like to have an expression from the House as to whether or not I had properly advised His Honour in reference to the situation, and as to whether this government had effective control of the House. For this purpose I beg to move the following resolution, which is seconded by the hon. the Attorney General:

Mr. PRIOR.

'That this House being fully alive to the great loss, inconvenience and expense to the country of any interruption of the business of this House at the present time, begs to express its regret that His Honour has seen fit to dismiss his advisers, as in the present crisis they have the effective control of the House.'

'I do not know that I need to make any further comment. The facts of the situation are as I have here represented.'

That resolution was put to the House, and although the government had only been defeated by one, it was carried by a majority of seven. I think, perhaps, it would be as well for me to say a few words as to what actions of the Lieutenant-Governor have brought about this state of affairs. There is evidently an impression abroad in British Columbia that the Lieutenant-Governor seems to think it his duty to govern the province, not by the advice of his ministers, his constitutional advisers, but according to the manner he himself thinks best. Last session I called for the correspondence between the Dominion government and the provincial government in regard to the dismissal of the Turner administration by Lieutenant-Governor McInnes, some eighteen months ago. His dismissal of the Turner administration was under extraordinary circumstances. I shall not enter into the matter fully now, but I may say briefly that at the time of the dismissal a general election was going on, and the full returns had not come in. The Turner administration had eighteen supporters, and the opposition had eighteen; but there were pending two elections, the results of which no man could foresee. Of course both parties expected that they would get either one or the two seats. His Honour did not see fit to wait until the returns from these elections were received, but he dismissed the Turner administration, giving, amongst other reasons, that they had lost the confidence of the people although there was not a majority against them in the legislature. His Honour also said that the Turner government had lost the confidence of himself; that some of its members had been guilty of misrepresentation to him about certain matters, and of trying to deceive him in regard to certain warrants. Now, Mr. Speaker, any gentleman who knows Mr. Turner and the gentlemen who composed his government, must know perfectly well that there is no more honourable and honest man to be found in Canada than is Mr. Turner. He and his ministers are perfectly incapable of being guilty of any such crime as was charged against them by the Lieutenant-Governor. His Honour, then, did not see fit to call upon the leader of the opposition, but he called on the Hon. Robert Beaven, a gentleman who at the time had not a seat in the House, a gentleman who in past years had the honour of being Premier of British Columbia, but who in that very election had come out at the bottom of the poll in his election, thus showing that he had not the confidence of a majority of the people even in his own constituency. Mr. Beaven undertook the task of forming a government, but in a day or two he had to go to the Lieutenant-Governor and announce his failure. Lieutenant-Governor McInnes then called upon the leader of the opposition, Mr. Semlin, and that gentleman formed a government, amongst those to whom he offered a portfolio, being Mr. Jos. Martin. Things went on in this way for some months until they got fighting amongst themselves, and the Premier saw fit to call upon Mr. Martin to resign his portfolio. Mr. Martin, I believe, refused to do so, but stated that he would abide by the wishes of the supporters of the government, and a caucus having been called, the press announced that at the caucus it was unanimously decided that the Premier was right and that Mr. Jos. Martin must resign his position in the cabinet for good and sufficient reasons. Ever since that took place, Mr. Martin—and it will not surprise any one who knows the gentleman—has been swearing vengeance against his former colleagues. The other day when the British Columbia government brought down a Redistribution Bill, they were beaten by a vote of nineteen to eighteen; amongst the nineteen, of course, being Mr. Jos. Martin. Now, Mr. Speaker, although the Premier was beaten by one vote on this Bill, he informed the Lieutenant-Governor that he could command a majority in the House, and I have no doubt that had he been left to himself he might have done so. Although several communications and personal interviews took place between the Lieutenant-Governor and his Prime Minister, His Honour saw fit to dismiss the Semlin government, for reasons very similar to those for which he dismissed the Turner government. It was stated in one newspaper that he charged them with fraud, and whether this is so or not, all the papers agree that His Honour said he had lost confidence in his advisers. The Lieutenant-Governor then did not call on any gentleman who was supposed to be leader of the opposition, or any gentleman who had any following in the legislature, but he called on Mr. Jos. Martin to form a cabinet. Mr. Jos. Martin accepted the task, and has now, I believe, formed a portion of his cabinet, two gentlemen having accepted portfolios—one his own brother-in-law. I need not tell the House that Mr. Semlin is a gentleman who has lived in British Columbia for many years, and I have yet to meet the first man to say a word against his honesty and his integrity. He is not perhaps a brilliant man, but he is a straightforward and honest citizen. At all events, Mr. Speaker, the Premiership of British Columbia is at the present time in the hands of a man whom most of us look upon as thoroughly irresponsible. Everything political in that province is now in a perfect state of chaos, and it seems to me that if the right hon. the leader of the Federal government has the power, or if his government has the power to step in and do something in this crisis, it is their duty to do so. I will not say one word in regard to the constitutionality of the acts of the Lieutenant-Governor, because it would be impertinent on my part to do so. I am not qualified to give an opinion on any such subject, but I am glad to say there are gentlemen in this House who are thoroughly well up in constitutional practice, and who I trust will give this House the benefit of their knowledge on this subject. Anyway, I can say, that the present state of affairs in British Columbia is perfectly unbearable, and if it can be stopped it should be stopped. It seems to me that if this condition of things is allowed to go on, it will bring the whole system of constitutional government into disrepute in British Columbia. Even if His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor is strictly within his rights—I assume that he can dismiss his government at any time—still, it must be seen that he has shown very little tact indeed. In conclusion, I trust, Sir, that it will not be long before something is done by whoever has authority to give us good, stable, honest government in British Columbia.

Mr. McINNES. Hear, hear.

Mr. PRIOR. I am glad to hear that loud cheer from the hon. member from Vancouver (Mr. McInnes) applauding that sentiment. However, at the present time, Sir, the state of affairs in British Columbia is injuring that province, and the capital which should flow in to British Columbia from Great Britain and elsewhere, for the development of our mines and other industries, is prevented from being invested for the time being. As I have said, Mr. Speaker, the state of affairs in British Columbia at the present time is unbearable and intolerable.

I beg to move the adjournment of the House.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I must confess to my hon. friend that I do not at all appreciate at this moment the motive which has induced him to bring this matter to the attention of the House or of the government. The question which exists in British Columbia to-day is certainly a very serious one, but my hon. friend knows that it is not an unconstitutional one. It is to-day in the hands of the people of British Columbia.

The Lieutenant-Governor has acted within the precincts of his power. Whether he has acted wisely or not is a question which is submitted, not to this government, not to this parliament, but to the people of British Columbia. The Lieutenant-Governor, in the exercise of his authority, has taken a very serious step, I must admit, and one which I presume he has not taken except after due and serious reflection. He has taken the step of dismissing his responsible advisers, who, it may be claimed in one sense, though they had been defeated on the previous day, had still the confidence of the House; but he has found advisers ready and willing to take the responsibility of his action. Now, it has been determined more than once, and the question is no longer in dispute, that under such circumstances the remedy is in the hands of the people themselves. It is for the people of the province of British Columbia to declare whether they approve or disapprove of the action of the Lieutenant-Governor. I apprehend that under such circumstances as those which exist in British Columbia to-day, it is the duty of the Lieutenant-Governor, at an early date, to dissolve the House, and to summon the electors at the polls and submit to them with as little delay as possible the question which he has himself, by his conduct, placed before them. It is not, in my judgment, within the duty of the Dominion government at this moment to interfere. We may have our views on the action of the Lieutenant-Governor. The hon. gentleman says that he has acted unwisely. At this moment it would not be prudent nor advisable for me even to offer my own personal opinion on the matter; I should not say a single word to prejudice the question. We may have our views, I say, as to the advisability of the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor and as to the method in which he has proceeded; but all this is in the hands of the people of the province. If they approve of the action of the Lieutenant-Governor, in my judgment, that is an end of the question. If they disapprove of it by returning to the House of Assembly a majority opposed to the present government, it is obvious that the Lieutenant-Governor will be found to have taken a very serious step. But until the people have pronounced on the matter, I submit very respectfully to the judgment of the House that it is not for this parliament, and still less for this government, to offer any opinion as to what has taken place in British Columbia. On two previous occasions in this Dominion Lieutenant-Governors have dismissed their advisers—Mr. Letellier, in 1878, and Mr. Angers, in 1891. In the case of Mr. Angers the matter was not at all brought to the attention of this parliament. In the case of Mr. Letellier, the matter was brought to the attention of the federal government of that day, and that government took a certain action which was not, in my opinion, justified by the event. The opinion has prevailed in all these cases that when the province is blessed with representative institutions and has responsible government, the remedy must be held to rest primarily and finally in the hands of the people of the province themselves.

Motion (Mr. Prior) to adjourn, negatived.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—VACANCIES IN CANADIAN REGIMENTS.

Mr. ALEX. McNEILL (North Bruce). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask my right hon. friend a question. I suggested to him the other day the advisability of filling up the vacancies in our Canadian regiments at the front, and I would like to ask him whether the statement which I see in the press this afternoon be correct, that the government have determined to fill up the vacancies if the Imperial authorities are favourable to their doing so.

The PRIME MINISTER. The Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden) is absent to-day, and I would advise my hon. friend to renew his question when he is present.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to call the attention of whoever has charge of the matter to the fact that the Public Accounts Committee has not yet been summoned.

The PRIME MINISTER. I will bring it to the attention of the chairman.

DOMINION LANDS ACT AMENDMENT.

The PRIME MINISTER moved second reading of Bill (No. 18) further to amend the Dominion Lands Act. He said: The main object of this Bill is to provide that the volunteers who are now engaged in South Africa shall not lose any of their rights or privileges in the matter of homestead entry, by the fact of their absence. The Bill is also intended to amend the Act in one or two other particulars. I think we had better go into committee on the Bill, and then I will explain the clauses as we reach them.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee thereon.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

The PRIME MINISTER. This Bill is of a character which I suppose will interest hon. gentlemen from the North-west, and therefore I would specially invite their attention to it. Their experience is valuable in the discussion of such a measure. At present the law provides that a patent for a homestead shall not issue to any person who is not a subject of Her Majesty by birth or naturalization. It is proposed to amend the law by adding this proviso :

Except in the case of the death of a settler, who, although he had completed the conditions of his entry for his homestead, died prior to the issue of the patent therefor, and whose legal representatives are the citizens of a foreign country.

At present a foreigner cannot get his patent for a homestead until he becomes a British subject. That is a very wise provision, but that alien may die before he has acquired citizenship, before he has become naturalized, and yet may have completed all the conditions of his homestead entry. At present his property cannot go to his family or legal representative should they not be British subjects, and the department thought it was only fair and just that his children or representatives, even though they should be foreigners, should get the benefit of this man's labour. It seems hardly equitable that in the case of a man who settled in this country and obtained a homestead and who cultivated and improved and made a home of that property, but who, unfortunately, died before he had time to become a British subject—it seems unfair and harsh that his children should not have the benefit of his labours.

Mr. FOSTER. This is not limited to his children.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). His legal representatives.

Mr. FOSTER. The purpose of the law is evidently that only a citizen, whether he be a native citizen or an alien who has gained citizenship, shall hold a patent for land. It would certainly be only fair that, under the circumstances mentioned by my right hon. friend, this man's representatives, if they intended to become citizens, should not suffer the loss of what he had really earned. But supposing the legal heir is a man who lives in some foreign country, this amendment would allow him to hold that patent, although he would neither be a citizen nor an alien in the process of being naturalized. That goes against the principle of the law.

The PRIME MINISTER. To some extent it does, but at the same time this is a contingency that is likely very seldom to occur. If it were the general rule, I would be of my hon. friend's opinion, but it is an exception, and a rare exception, to the general rule. I submit that when a man has taken up a homestead, and opened up a farm and put buildings on it and otherwise improved it, it is only right that his labour of years should go to his legal representatives, wherever or whoever they may be.

Mr. FOSTER. Supposing he had completed the conditions and obtained his patent, he would then have had the claim for which he was striving, and could leave that property to any person, whether a citizen of this country or not. The amendment does not seem, therefore, unfair.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Suppose the man dies before being naturalized and leaves his patent to his legal representative, living, say, in Germany. That legal representative may continue to live in Germany and hold on to the property until the increase in value will make it worth his while to sell. He could simply hold the property as a speculation and prevent other people working it.

Mr. DAVIS. If an alien has put in a number of years, but dies before taking out his patent, I think it would be a hard thing for this man not to have the right to leave the results of his labour to his family, even if they do not live in this country. The hon. gentleman who preceded me said that the legal representative might live in a foreign country and hold the land here until it increased in value. Well, this is not a case in point at all, because, if the party living abroad had a right to this land, he would certainly have to pay taxes, and as it increases in value he would have to go on paying taxes. That is all that the people in the North-west Territories expect. Any speculator, whether he lives in Germany or anywhere else, if he buys land and holds it year after year, sometimes for fifteen years, his case is different from that of a railroad corporation which does not pay taxes. So far as the clause is concerned, I think it points in the right direction.

Mr. DAVIN. It seems to me that this is a matter not of very much importance. If I thought it were and it would have any extensive effect, I would oppose it, because I think it is a wrong principle. But I do not think it is of very much importance, so I am not going to offer any opposition. Before leaving that clause, I beg leave to move that at the end of the clause, these words be inserted :

Any person entitled under this Act to receive his patent shall receive his patent notwithstanding any bonds for the payment of seed grain indebtedness that he may have entered into.

I move this, seconded by Mr. Clancy. The object of the amendment is to get rid of the grievance, that the seed-grain bonded indebtedness forms at the present time in the North-west. Last session, at the instance of the Minister of the Interior, parliament passed a Bill which sounded to the House and to the country as though that grievance had been got rid of. But when the new law came to be administered, it was construed by the present deputy minister in this way—that where the primary debtor was a man who had received his patent, the bondsmen for such primary debtor are not held under the existing legislation, but if the primary debtor had not got his patent, then the bondsmen are still held. So, if it goes on, a man can delay taking out his patent, and these men who have signed his bonds are still held. The parliament of Canada and the government of Canada having really endorsed the principle that the bondsmen should not be held, I think it is a pity that things should go on as at present. I would call the attention of the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), and the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) to this point. They will find the Act of last year in the statutes of 1899, chapter 18. That law reads as follows, it is an Act of one clause :

The Governor General in Council may discharge from liability persons who are liable to the Crown as sureties upon bonds given to secure repayment for seed grain furnished by the Crown to persons in the North-west Territories, in every case where, upon inquiry, it is shown to the satisfaction of the Minister of the Interior that land owned by or entered as a homestead by the primary debtor is liable and is, in the opinion of the said minister, sufficient security for the sum owed by the primary debtor.

When that Act was passed, every man who was bondsman for a primary debtor in the North-west Territories, thought he was relieved; but it turned out that such was not the case. And so, men who are bondsmen for others, when they apply for their patents, are met by the statement first, that so much is owed by themselves for seed grain, and when they pay that, they are met by the statement: You cannot have your patent, because you are a bondsman for others. There was a great deal of talk about this matter. I wrote to Mr. Smart, the deputy minister, and he wrote a letter to the effect that the primary debtor had not his patent, and, under the circumstances the bondsmen could not be relieved. We may as well put in this clause, and by so doing we get rid of the bonded indebtedness at once, as the people of the North-west Territories and Manitoba thought this parliament intended to do last year by the Act I have read to the House. I hope that my hon. friend (Mr. Sutherland), who has charge of the Department of the Interior, will distinguish his occupancy of that important position by allowing this addition to the nature of the clause, and thus meet the desires of the people of the North-west Territories.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am sorry that I cannot accept the amendment of my hon. friend (Mr. Davin), and I am sure, that on reflection, he will agree with me, that he could not expect his amendment to be taken into consideration at this moment. I may say at once, that I am not sufficiently familiar with the nature of the grievance for which my hon. friend seeks remedy by this amendment, to offer an opinion upon it. I do not say that the remedy proposed by his amendment is wise or unwise; I prefer not to express an opinion upon that. But my hon. friend will agree with me, I am sure, that it is not conducive to good legislation to introduce in a Bill of this character, a provision that is altogether apart from the purpose contemplated by the Bill. The Act as passed last session, may be sufficient, or it may not be sufficient. Let us assume that it is insufficient—and in the view of my hon. friend it has that character—the best way, surely, is to amend the Act which was passed last session, and make it sufficiently comprehensive if it be not so now, rather than introduce an amendment of this kind into a Bill, where it should not come in. I am sorry to say to my hon. friend, that for these reasons I cannot accept his amendment, though, if he brings it as an amendment to the law of last session, the government will be prepared to consider it—I do not say accept it, but consider it.

Mr. DAVIN. The suggestion thrown out by the Prime Minister, puts me in this position—if I bring forward a Bill, amending the Act of last session, he must use his influence that none of his followers shall raise a point of order. It would be out of order on my part, as a private member, as the right hon. gentleman knows, to bring in a Bill dealing with a question like that. But if I understand him to say to me, that if I prepare a Bill and have the first reading moved, then he will consider the question, whether or not the government will take it up.

The PRIME MINISTER. I understand from my hon. friend that he has views which are not shared by the department upon this question. But if he holds views that are shared by the department, and if he is satisfied that the department will supplement the Bill of last session in the way he suggests, the department will see that the proper legislation is introduced, if he does not introduce it himself. If he does introduce legislation, and the department is satisfied that it is in the right direction, and remedies a grievance which, in the opinion of the department, exists, I will see that the government carries out the measure. But at present I understand that my hon. friend is at variance with the department: Mr. Smart and he do not agree as to the interpretation of the statute passed last session. They do not agree at present, but I did not gather from my hon. friend whether, upon the main question, that is upon the necessity of remedying what you may call a grievance, Mr. Smart agreed with him or not. If Mr. Smart agrees with him, and if the views of the department are sound, it would be easy to remedy the discrepancy. But if there is between my hon. friend and the department a difference of opinion which is irreconcilable, the only thing he can do is to try to convince parliament.

Mr. DAVIN. I am not in a position to say that Mr. Smart differs with me as to what would be the right policy. Mr. Smart has to administer the law as he finds it. I am not sure that even the Minister of the Interior differs with me as to what should be enacted. I could not say whether he agrees with me or is opposed to me. When I was pressing certain views before him in regard to seed grain in 1898 and 1899, he was just as non-committal in regard to what he did last year before he did it, or rather up to the time that he came across the floor of the House and kindly told me that he was going to meet my views on the seed grain question. But when the Bill came down I found that it did not meet my views, it only met my views in part. Therefore, I cannot say whether the Minister of the Interior differs from me as to what the policy should be; I cannot say that he has given me any hope that, if he were here, he would enact the two other parts of the policy that I originally placed before him. On the other hand he has not said a word that would indicate that he had put his foot down and would go no further. I have had experiences in the past with Ministers of the Interior, who went a little distance with me, and then went the whole distance. For instance, when Mr. White was Minister of the Interior in 1887, I proposed to deal with the second homestead in a way that I thought proper, and Mr. White told me that he would not consent. But after having heard my argument he told me that he was impressed by it. I asked him then: Why won't you carry it out? He pointed down to a very important figure that was just next to him and said, That was the danger. He said to me: I hope you are not going to oppose my Bill. I said: I would have to do it. Then I said to him: Here, change one figure, give us one year, and he gave one year. It took me four years to get the complete legislation which I thought necessary. So I have no reason to suppose that the Minister of the Interior, having gone so far, if he were here, would not go the full distance. Let me say here that there is no reason why the sub-clause I propose should not come in here. It is just as germane, if my right hon. friend will allow me to say so, to this Act as the amendment that he has proposed. In fact I may state that if I did not regard this amendment which has just passed, as one that would be very trifling in its consequences, I would have opposed it, because it is contrary to the principle of the Act which amends it. But I did not oppose it. However, the right hon. gentleman having gone thus far, am I to understand that, if I bring in a Bill to amend the legislation of last session, he will say to me that he refuses to accept the Bill on its merits and not on the point of order?

The PRIME MINISTER. I would suggest to my hon. friend to discuss the point with the officers of the department. I am sure Mr. Smart will be happy to see him and discuss it with him, and if they come to a conclusion the whole matter can be arranged then.

Amendment (Mr. Davin) negatived.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to draw the attention of the right hon. gentleman to this point. I think it is desirable that the persons who settle upon lands in the North-west should either be British subjects or become British subjects by naturalization; and in fact the whole policy of the Bill points to that conclusion. I agree that it is right and fair to issue a patent to the heirs of a person who has completed the conditions of his entry, with this qualification, that I think the time should be limited within which he may complete his entry and become a British subject. Otherwise you will have this result, that a man who has completed the conditions of his entry has no inducement to become a British subject by naturalization, because if he does not become a British subject by naturalization the property goes to his personal representatives just the same as if he had become a British subject. Now, in order to carry out the idea that I have suggested, we might add after the word 'died' the words 'within three years thereafter and,' or some language of that kind. The man should have an opportunity of becoming a British subject by naturalization, and if he does not do so within the time assigned, then the property shall not pass to his heirs. The object of the amendment I suggest is to offer an inducement to these settlers to become British subjects, because it is the policy of the whole Act that they shall become British subjects. It seems to me such an amendment as I suggest will be more in consonance with the spirit of the Act, than the adoption of the sweeping measure which the right hon. gentleman has proposed.

The PRIME MINISTER. Speaking under correction—because I do not profess to be very familiar with the Act—I think there is already a provision in the Act that the proceedings for completing the entry and obtaining the patent have to be taken within a certain time.

On section 3.

The PRIME MINISTER. The object of this clause is this. At the present time, under subsection 5 of section 44, a settler may obtain advances of money and give a lien upon his homestead, although he has not yet completed his entry and is not yet entitled to obtain the patent. I call attention to the section, which is as follows :—

But if the settler has acquired a right to receive a patent for the land so charged and does not apply for the issue of the same, the holder of such charge may obtain such patent, or certificate for patent, in the name of the person entitled to receive the same, or of his legal representative, and thereafter the said charge shall become a statutory mortgage on such homestead.

It is proposed to amend this section by adding the words :

In which case the patent may issue in the name of the settler, even if he is not a British subject.

The practice as it is followed out is this : A man becomes a settler and he gives a lien for an advance of money on his homestead. But he leaves the country, he disappears, and then his creditor has the right to obtain the patent to be issued in the name of the settler. Then, the creditor, when the patent has been issued in the name of the settler, is entitled to exercise all the privileges that the lien gives him over the homestead. But, it so happens that sometimes a settler, who has not completed his entry, gives a lien for advances of money and then leaves the country. The creditor cannot obtain the issue of the patent to his debtor, and, therefore, the creditor loses his advance, because the debtor has left. Under such circumstances, the object of the amendment is that the patent should issue to the defaulting debtor, or the alien, so that the creditor may have the privilege of exercising all the rights which the lien gives over the homestead.

Mr. FOSTER. I would ask the right hon. gentleman if he has in each case contemplated the performance of the conditions that are necessary to entitle him to a patent ?

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes, the section which it is sought to amend reads as follows :—

But if the settler has acquired a right to receive a patent for the land so charged and does not apply for the issue of the same, the holder of such charge may obtain such patent, or certificate for patent, in the name of the person entitled to receive the same, or of his legal representative, and thereafter the said charge shall become a statutory mortgage on such homestead.

Here is a settler who receives an advance of money, he is a British subject, he leaves the country, he does not pay his debt, he has performed all the conditions ; then, the creditor comes to the agent and obtains the issue of a patent in the name of the debtor who is entitled to it, and the creditor can exercise all his rights. But it turns out that the settler has performed all his duties, but he is not a British subject. He is an alien. The creditor who has made that advance cannot secure the issue of the patent in the name of the debtor because he is an alien. Under such circumstances, we think the patent should issue to the alien so that the creditor can exercise all the rights under it. This is a case that meets the equity of hon. gentlemen opposite, I am sure.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that not a pretty wide open door ? Suppose that you have some of these settlers actually aided very largely by foreign people ; take, for instance, the settlers that have been coming in this last season, who are very largely aided by outside parties ; although I do not know the economy I suppose these outside parties are really holding the prospective lands of these settlers as collateral, or as security for the advances they have made. In that case it may be that it will shortly come to be a wholesale transaction and you may come to have a very large number of persons taking advantage of it. Individually, I do not wish to be too strict, and admit of no exceptions, but it seems to me that this is a door which might be opened very widely indeed, and might practically, in the case of certain classes of settlers, result in the lands being, in the majority, patented to aliens rather than to British subjects.

The PRIME MINISTER. I should not say that. This is a contingency that will arise only in the case of aliens having had an advance of money. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) will agree with me when I say that we cannot discourage aliens under such circumstances from obtaining advances of money. A settler will be in need of money to carry on his improvements, and we should not discourage him. If we are to encourage him efficiently we must provide that the party who has made the advance must be sure of his title. A settler, under such circumstances, has obtained a homestead, he has completed all the conditions, he is entitled to the patent, but, for some reason, he does not take out his patent. Then, the company comes along and asks for the issue of the patent. The patent is issued and the company is entitled to dispose of the property. I do not think that, under such circumstances, it would be fair to prevent settlers from obtaining these advances. You would discourage settlement if you were to do so, and it is only to provide that settlers may be enabled to obtain these advances that this amendment is asked for.

Mr. FOSTER. My right hon. friend is inverting the conditions. Somebody made that law in the first place and laid it down as a meritorious condition of the law that this land should go into the hands of British subjects and not of aliens. If an argument such as this was allowed to have weight at that time, that it would prevent a man coming in as a settler unless he could obtain advances from his friends in Germany, Austria or the United States, and that unless you make it possible for a person to give a lien on his prospective piece of ground, you are going to make it very difficult to get settlers in; that was a strong argument, but it did not have any weight when this law was being made, because the very principle of the law was that we should not have the land held by aliens, but by British subjects. If an alien comes to this country and takes up land, he must perform the conditions and stay there until he gets his land. There must have been some good reason for that provision. You may have a foreign society sending in 6,000 people into one place in the North-west Territories, advancing them a certain amount of money, and under this clause of the Act you might have these aliens, foreigners, outside people virtually in the end, becoming the patentees or getting, as patentees, half or three-quarters, or may be the whole of the land, and there would not be one of them that had become a British subject, and there would not be one that had a lien on the land that would be a British subject. It would be putting the whole matter in an inverted position, and I am very much afraid, when there are aggregate settlements that are being made by different foreign elements, that we will open a door which will practically do away with that substantial provision of the law which, I am certain, had very good reasons for its being placed there. I do not think the argument of my right hon. friend, that in such a case you make it a little difficult for the man who gave the advance to get it paid back to him, ought to have undue weight if it subverts the other principle, and I am afraid it would.

Mr. DAVIN. This is a case which illustrates the undesirability of departing from principle. We have already departed from principle and I have not opposed it because the effects would be so small; but in this case great scandals and great evils might result. It would be an undesirable thing that a great company should be able to give aid to a lot of paupers. The right hon. gentleman knows that it is a rule of logic that the extreme hypothesis tests the proposition. Therefore, take the extreme hypothesis that a rich company sends a horde of paupers to perform certain duties, and these men may be thoroughly nomad in habits and destitute of all the qualifications of good settlers, then this rich company would own the land. You would have the very grievance that one of the clauses in the Liberal programme levied its thunders at, namely, the land not in the hands of settlers. I would suggest to the right hon. gentleman, to drop the amendment.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin), takes a wrong conclusion from the criticism—the legitimate criticism I must say, of the hon. member (Mr. Foster), the law already provides against that.

Mr. DAVIN. I know.

The PRIME MINISTER. If the hon. gentleman knows, then his argument is not relevant. This Bill only applies to a very few cases. It does not apply to a foreigner, but the lien must be registered on the homestead. I believe that under such circumstances the company is bound to dispose of the land in favour of a British subject. The criticism of my hon. friend (Mr. Foster), seems to be legitimate, and I would ask that this section be held for further consideration.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would ask that the Prime Minister shall look to the drafting of this clause. I would suggest that it should read in this way:

The holder of such charge may obtain such patent or certificate of patent in the name of the person entitled to receive the same, or his legal representatives, whether they are British subjects or not, and thereafter the said charge shall become a statutory mortgage on such homestead.

You can tell what it means by that, but it is very awkwardly expressed as it is.

The PRIME MINISTER. We will let it stand.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Very well.

The PRIME MINISTER. I invite the attention of the gentlemen from the North-west to section 2. I am not sufficiently familiar with the Act, to say whether or not it is too broad, and, therefore, I invite discussion upon it. Section 38, of the Dominion Lands Act, was amended in 1897. The original clause provided that no man could complete his homestead entry unless he was a resident upon the homestead itself. But it was found that a young man, the son of a settler, would take a homestead and that it was preferable for him to reside with his parents, instead of residing on the homestead, but that he should continue to perform the duties prescribed by law. The exception was made by the amendment in 1897, that he could reside with his parents. This amendment was in the right direction. It is proposed now to add the following section:

If the settler has his permanent residence upon farming land owned by him in the vicinity of his homestead, the requirements of this Act as to residence may be satisfied by residence upon the said lands.

Suppose a settler takes a homestead and before he has completed his entry, he buys another farm in the neighbourhood, which has a house, and resides on that new farm; the intention of the amendment is to allow him to reside on the neighbouring property, rather than compel him to have a residence on his homestead. I am prepared to receive suggestions from members from the North-west Territories as to that.

Mr. DAVIN. I agree with this amendment. I think it will really liberalize the Act in a direction that is desirable.

The PRIME MINISTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIS. With reference to this clause I would suggest an amendment. If the settler can acquire a homestead by living on some other land he has purchased, he should be prepared to cultivate a little more land, and I would move, seconded by Mr. Oliver, that the following words be added to the amendment offered by the Prime Minister :

Providing he cultivates not less than forty acres.

The PRIME MINISTER. I would ask the hon. gentlemen to discuss this amendment with the officers of the department. In a technical matter of this kind, I would not undertake to adopt such an amendment. The Bill need not go through committee to-day.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The words 'in the vicinity,' are extremely vague.

Mr. DAVIS. In the west 'the vicinity' means in the township.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It would not necessarily have that meaning in law.

The PRIME MINISTER. It is no doubt vague, but the Act has to be construed liberally, and I think we can leave it to the agent, to determine the vicinity.

Mr. DAVIN. Perhaps it would be desirable to have a limit.

The PRIME MINISTER. What do you call a limit ?

Mr. DAVIN. A few miles would be a fair limit.

Section agreed to.

On section 4,

Mr. FOSTER. I do not see why the words, 'South Africa' should be in the clause. That would necessitate particular legislation at any time. I would suggest that it be made to read, 'on active service outside of Canada.'

The PRIME MINISTER. The words 'active service' would be quite sufficient. I move to strike out the words 'South Africa.'

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. INGRAM. The government have recognized that the residence of the gentlemen going to South Africa becomes broken under the Dominion Lands Act, and you are making provision in this Bill that if they hold property they shall not lose it by reason of their absence. Under the election law their residence is broken by their going to South Africa, and there is no provision giving them the right to vote. In order to pave the way to a Bill which I have before the House, I would suggest that this section be amended by inserting in the second line after the word 'it,' the words, 'or in the Election Act or the Franchise Act.' If you do not do that, the men who have gone to South Africa and whose residence is therefore broken, will be deprived of their votes whenever a certain residence is required.

The PRIME MINISTER. The view presented to the House by my hon. friend is a very praiseworthy one. I do not dispute it, but this amendment does not come at the proper moment nor in the proper form. In my opinion, it is not in order, because my hon. friend has before the House a Bill in which the very provision he now proposes is to be found. But, because this is the case, it does not follow that the idea of my hon. friend should be rejected. On the contrary, there is great merit in it, and the Minister of Justice is preparing a Bill in which it will be provided for.

Mr. INGRAM. I am quite willing to withdraw the amendment on that understanding, as I only moved the amendment to pave the way for my Bill.

Mr. BOURASSA. If the words 'South Africa' are struck out, the latter part of the section will be practically the same as the first part. What is the use of keeping in the section the two clauses which are alike unless it is meant to provide for active service anywhere ?

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend will see that there is a difference between the two clauses. The first clause reads as follows :

Notwithstanding anything in the said Act or in any Act amending it, the time during which a settler is absent from his homestead while he is a member of a military force enrolled under the authority of the Minister of Militia.

He may be engaged under the authority of the Minister of Militia without being on active service. The other clause is to cover the case of his being called on for active service, as is the case to-day.

Mr. BOURASSA. I understand that the last part of the section was introduced to cover the special case of our volunteers in South Africa, while the amendment proposed by the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) would make it apply to any active service anywhere.

Mr. DAVIN. So it ought.

Mr. BOURASSA. I cannot agree to that, and I want to enter my protest against it now.

The PRIME MINISTER moved that section 6 be struck out.

Motion agreed to.

Committee rose and reported progress.

REPRESENTATION IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 13), respecting representation in the House of Commons.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. WALLACE. This proposes to violate the whole principle of representation by population. For instance, the city of Toronto has to-day, it is estimated, a population of 225,000, and no doubt it will have much more when the census of 1901 is taken. The city of Toronto will have one member for every 45,000 citizens, but the county of York has one for every 22,000 or 23,000 citizens. Take the county of Brant. Some say its population is 33,000, and others that it is 36,500.

Mr. CLARKE. 33,000.

Mr. WALLACE. Brant with its 33,000, would be entitled to two members of parliament, while 45,000 in Toronto are only entitled to one member. Toronto is a strong Conservative city, and Brant is a strong Liberal county; and therefore, you have not only the principle of representation by population utterly set at defiance, but set at defiance presumably because the city of Toronto commits the crime of being Conservative in its tendencies, while Brant enjoys the merit of being Liberal. That same feature goes through the whole of the Bill, and I can only enter my protest against it. Take the counties of Bruce and Grey and the county of Simcoe, and you will find the same anomalies and the same undesirable state of affairs existing. When the revision comes to take place, the principle of representation should, in the future, even more than in the past, be made the basis. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that the Conservative party when in power did not make it the basis. I think that in that they made a mistake. They could easily have advanced their political fortunes and made a redistribution based on the principle of representation by population. In years gone by that was not of so much importance as to-day, because the cities, and notably the city of Toronto, had members living in them, representing a large number of constituencies outside, and it was said that these men, living in Toronto, were really representatives of it. Whatever force that may have had, and I do not think it should have much, because it could not be contended that because a man lived in Toronto he was refusing to represent the special ideas of his constituency. But we are getting more cosmopolitan in our views, I hope, as the years go on, and recognize that we are not only the members for a constituency looking for favours for that constituency, but members of parliament legislating for a great Dominion, and therefore should not confine our patriotism and ideas to the particular constituency we may represent. This Bill, from one end of it to the other, does not recognize the principle of representation by population at all, and I believe the hon. Postmaster General has said so, and does not desire that it should. From one end of it to the other wherever the principle now prevails, it is destroyed by this Bill. That feature alone should condemn it. We are against the Bill altogether. In the year 1901, twelve months from the first of next month, the census of the whole Dominion will be taken. When that is ascertained, then it will be the duty of the Dominion parliament to pass a Redistribution Act. That Act will be most widespread in its results. We will have Manitoba and the North-west Territories and British Columbia, perhaps doubling their representation in this House. We will have a movement of population in the province of Ontario, of which an account must be taken. And this great centre of population, Toronto, with its 225,000 people to-day and increasing year by year, and these other cities where the people are congregated—we have to take these into consideration, and redistribution on these lines will have to take place. Yet, in the face of this, in the face of the fact that this has all to be done within eighteen or twenty-four months, based upon information that we should begin to gather in a year, it is proposed by this Bill that we shall have a redistribution now, that everything shall be turned upside down for the purpose of one general election; and then when the regular distribution takes place in the following year we shall have a tumbling of the constituencies again. For these reasons, to my mind, the Bill before us is quite unjustifiable. The Bill is unnecessary, it is unfair in its workings, and the fact of passing it now is unfair to the people of Canada, whom it proposes to disfranchise very largely for the purpose of securing political advantage to hon. gentlemen opposite.

On subsection d,

Mr. CLARKE. May I ask if it is intended to make two constituencies of the city of Hamilton?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It is intended to allow Hamilton to adhere to its former practice. Hamilton has always voted as one undivided constituency sending two members. It is intended to adhere as nearly as possible to the existing system.

Mr. CLARKE. Then, that principle is to continue?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. We shall adhere as nearly as possible to the practice that now obtains in the various ridings.

Mr. CLARKE. Will that apply to the constituency of West Toronto, which, for many years, has been one constituency, returning two members? And if not, why not?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The riding of West Toronto has had a varied practice, sometimes one way and sometimes the other.

Mr. CLARKE. Since it was given two members it has had the same practice.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask the Postmaster General on what basis or principle it is that he has a double constituency in one city and single constituency in another city, both in the same province. He speaks of conforming 'as nearly as possible' to the existing state of affairs. What is meant by that?—'as nearly as possible,' measured by party and political considerations, or 'as nearly as possible' on some principle that can be defined and defended?

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon gentleman (Mr. Foster) is virtually condemning himself if he charges the government with inconsistency in keeping double constituencies in some places and single in others. He was a member of the cabinet when the last distribution Bill was passed, forming the constituencies as they are to-day. If hon. gentlemen opposite want an answer they should put the question to themselves. Why did they, in the distribution of 1891, continue the city of Hamilton as a double constituency returning two members, while, in other cases, they made a division? I quite agree with the Postmaster General that it is desirable that where elections can be had in municipalities such as the city of Hamilton, and where no direct demand has been made by the people of the city for the making of the division, the existing practice should be followed. Hamilton has been to some extent at a standstill for some time, but in the city of Toronto great developments have taken place which have affected the constituency of West Toronto. Then, this Bill, of course, will make changes with regard to West York. A portion of the city of Toronto, which is now in West York, will be left in the city of Toronto for electoral purposes under this Bill; and this makes it necessary that a division should be made. Consequently, the government proposes to give the city five members instead of four.

Mr. CLARKE. Well, will there be two two-member constituencies in Toronto?

Mr. MULOCK.

Perhaps the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), can tell us that?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It can hardly be said that West Toronto, or the portion of West York that will now become part of the city of Toronto, has ever been represented otherwise than by a single member. Under this Bill a very considerable population will be transferred from the county of York to the city of Toronto for electoral purposes. The fringe of population that now constitutes part of the riding of East and West York has never been in any constituency represented by two members. On the other hand, the city of Hamilton has, I think, always voted as one municipality. The west riding of the city of Toronto has rarely voted for two members at one riding, for, from confederation for a long period it had but one representative. So, there is no departure from the rule. I do not know how otherwise you could have arranged an additional member for the city, unless we set apart a piece of the city of Toronto and say that this is to be West Toronto and is to return two members. Even if I were to ask my hon. friend (Mr. Clarke) to redistribute the city of Toronto, how could he set apart one portion of the city as West Toronto, a constituency to return two members? Probably if the Bill had been proposed that way we should have been asked to justify such an extraordinary proposition—namely, the cutting off of a piece of the city and calling it West Toronto, and leaving the rest of the city for the judges to divide into three ridings. If we are going to allow the judges to divide the city we must let them divide the whole city.

Mr. CLARKE. Will you allow the judges to determine whether it would be better to have two two-member constituencies in Toronto or not? We are asking the question, what principle the government is applying in this redistribution. For Hansard is full of declarations and statements of hon. gentlemen opposite when previous Redistribution Bills were being considered, as to the vicious principle of having two-member constituencies at all, if it is possible to avoid them. To-day they have charge of a Redistribution Bill, and we find that in some parts of the country they are continuing the two-member constituencies, while in others they are abolishing them. Why do they do that? Why, for instance, do they allow this city to continue to be one constituency and return two members?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I will make a proposition to the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke). Is he prepared to select a portion of West Toronto that will be properly represented by two members, if so the government will be prepared to consider that proposition. We do not want to appear to select such a portion, but prefer to leave it to the judges to determine the whole question.

Mr. CLARKE. There are three cities in the province of Ontario, which, up to the present time have had two-member constituencies in them. It is the intention of the government, under the Bill, to leave two of these cities just as they are. The city of Ottawa is still to continue to be represented by two members elected by the city at large. The same rule will apply to the city of Hamilton. I think it is fair to ask the Postmaster General if that rule is to be applied to the representation of the city of Toronto, and, if not, why not? The Postmaster General knows as well as I do, and any hon. member who knows anything about Toronto, knows that it would be an easy matter to subdivide the city into three constituencies returning five members, two of them two members each and one one member. Might I ask the Postmaster General, that being the effect, why he does not apply some such rule as that to the city of Toronto? Here we are proceeding by making five single constituencies in the city of Toronto, instead of having two two-member constituencies and one one-member constituency. Why are the rule and precedent departed from one in one case, in the case of Toronto, that are adhered to in the cases of Ottawa and Hamilton?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Hamilton is one municipality having but two members. The hon. member probably would be the first to raise an objection if we proposed to cut out a piece of the city of Toronto and say that that portion should be represented by two members. But I have made a very fair proposition to my hon. friend. We are not wedded to this system, we want this measure to meet with public approval; and if he will submit to the government a proposition for giving three members to a portion of the city of Toronto, the west, it will receive careful consideration.

Mr. CLARKE. It would be presumption on my part to make such a proposition to the government. Will the government make a proposition that the judges shall be at liberty to subdivide the city of Toronto if they deem it advisable to do so, so as to continue the representation as at present?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Either the government must have an opinion, or the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman would not be willing, I fancy, to let the government select the portion of West Toronto that would be represented by two members, nor is he willing to give me his approval. Under the circumstances, I have nothing to do but to ask him to accept the proposition of the government. If he has any better proposition, we will be pleased to consider it.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Clarke) asks the Postmaster General a very plain question, namely: Is he prepared to leave it entirely in the hands of the judges, without any instructions, to say whether Toronto shall return five members without a division, or in any other way they please? Here is the hon. gentleman's answer: The government must have one opinion and the member for Toronto another; and he sits down without answering the question. Unless the Postmaster General studiously and purposely desires to avoid the answer, then, I can tell him that he has put himself in a false position.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I think there is a manifest objection to very large constituencies. For example, supposing he advances a proposition that the city of Toronto should be one single constituency and send so many members.

Mr. CLANCY. Nobody has made a proposition of that kind.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Permit me to illustrate the contention. My hon. friend would at once concede that that was an unwise arrangement. I am sure he would. Then, that unwisdom would continue 'pro tanto' to the half of the city. If it is not desirable that a constituency should embrace the whole of a city the size of Toronto, then it is in a degree inadvisable that there should be a constituency representing an unreasonable number of people.

Mr. CLARKE. Why not apply that principle to the representation of Hamilton and Ottawa?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have already informed my hon. friend that in Hamilton we are adhering to the principle of not disturbing existing arrangements more than necessary. Hamilton has had its way, and it is a recognition of local custom to allow Hamilton to vote as it always has voted. In the city of Toronto we have to arrange for another member, and considering the growth of the city and the addition being made to it, it seems but fair that the whole city would be divided into five separate constituencies. But it is not desired to do anything unfair, and I can only repeat that if my hon. friend does not like our proposition, let him put forth a better one.

Mr. SPROULE. He puts forth what he regards as a better one when he proposes to leave it to the judges.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Patterson). There is a difference. Hamilton is an entire municipality returning two members. The city of Toronto, under the Bill, is one municipality, and is being given five members. The hon. gentleman will see that the cases are not parallel. His proposition, I understand, is to take a municipi-pality that is to be represented by five members and divide it into four constituencies.

Mr. CLARKE. No ; I did not say that.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Well, that is the effect. It is to have three portions of Toronto represented by one member each, and another portion of the same city represented by two members, which is an entirely different condition of things to that of the city of Hamilton.

Mr. CLARKE. No, I asked the question, with the greatest possible deference to the Postmaster General, What principle he would apply in the city of Toronto? We have had one constituency in Toronto represented by two members, and we have had the constituency of Hamilton and the constituency of Ottawa represented each by two members. I ask him whether it was the intention, in giving the city of Toronto additional representation, to continue this principle of two-member constituencies. Now, the Minister of Customs can see that that principle can be applied just as easily to the case of Ottawa and Hamilton as it can to Toronto ; and I am asking the Postmaster General to allow the judges to determine whether there shall be three constituencies in Toronto, two of them returning two members each, and one constituency returning one member. Surely that is a simple proposition, and I am asking why, if the government will not consent to that proposition, they still continue in the case of other cities of Ontario entitled to more than one representative—why they still continue these cities as single constituencies ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Does the hon. gentleman propose that it should be left to the judges to determine whether these electoral districts shall be divided, or whether they shall return two or more members each ? If so, that would be a point well worthy of consideration by the government. For instance, if the hon. gentleman thinks that the smaller counties, instead of being divided, should vote for two members, if he thinks that is a better line to proceed upon, why, that could be considered. But as it is contemplated in the Bill, the counties are all divided. The difference between Hamilton and Toronto he will see is this : Hamilton has not been disturbed in its population, there is none being taken from the neighbouring county and attached to it, it is the same municipality it was. But in the case of Toronto a portion of a municipality is to be represented hereafter by a city representative, or a large number of people that previously was not there. That is the reason it was given another member, and that removes it from the same category as Hamilton. But if the hon. gentleman's idea is that it is better to leave the matter to the judges, that in all cases, instead of defining that the counties and cities shall be divided into two or three ridings, it shall be left to the judges to determine whether such division should take place, well, that would be a case for consideration.

Mr. WALLACE. Does the Minister of Customs say that the principle of including a city municipality by itself is a proper one ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes. I think we are following that.

Mr. WALLACE. Why do you not do it, then, in the city of Ottawa ? A portion of the city of Ottawa is in the county of Russell and a portion is in the municipality of Ottawa ; yet his whole argument was that the city of Toronto should be by itself, because it is going to take in parts of East and West York. And when I asked him the question, he said : Yes, that is the proper thing to do. But, in the city of Ottawa it is not the proper thing to do. If it is the proper thing to keep a portion of the city of Ottawa in the county of Russell, New Edinburgh, and the hon. Minister of Customs thinks that it is—

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. We are not dealing with the city of Ottawa.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentlemen are dealing with those parts where they will get a political advantage. That is the game. And they cannot get a political advantage by dealing with the city of Ottawa, so they deal with those places where they can.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) is assuming that. I do not know whether there would be any political advantage to his party or to the other party in touching Ottawa, but, the hon. gentleman knows that there is no attempt made to rearrange all the constituencies. This is repealing the worst features of the gerrymander Act of 1882. I do not know if the hon. gentleman is in a position to say that the city of Ottawa, as now constituted municipally would necessarily return a Conservative, and I am not in a position to say that it would necessarily return a Liberal. It does not always follow that the traditional feelings and sentiments of a constituency will remain the same. We are dealing with the question of the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Clarke), who thinks that he sees that there is a discrepancy in leaving Toronto, which has an additional member, having an additional population added to it in the position in regard to having it divided as we do the counties, and different from that of the city of Ottawa and the city of Hamilton. I think the hon. gentleman can see the distinction that is made. He does not recommend that the city, with five representatives, should have four constituencies, but he asks the question if we would not allow the judges to determine, under this Bill, whether they will divide the various constituencies mentioned there, whether it shall be in their option to divide them if they see fit, or, where you have a county entitled to two representatives, whether it would be in their judgment to say whether they shall give that county two members or shall divide the constituency. That is the question of the hon. gentleman as I understand it.

Mr. CLARKE. I asked the question only in so far as the representation of the city of Toronto was to be concerned. I asked the hon. gentleman if he and his colleagues had considered the propriety, or had determined, whether the city of Toronto should be divided into three, four or five constituencies, whether there would be two two-member constituencies or whether one constituency returning one member, and whether the judges would subdivide the city so as to bring about that result, that is, to have two two-member constituencies and one constituency returning one member. I do not mean to consent at all to the proposition that the city of Toronto is only entitled to five members. There has been added to it, or will be added to it when this Bill becomes law, a large population from the county of York that ought to entitle the city of Toronto to one member, at least, more than it has at present. But, the city of Toronto, has made very substantial increases in its population since the last representation Bill was passed. As the hon. Minister of Customs knows very serious complaint was made by himself and his friends when they occupied seats on this side of the House against the former Redistribution Bills of 1882 and 1892, because they did not deal fairly by the western part of the province of Ontario. The argument was made by hon. gentlemen opposite that a very grave fault rested with the old Bills because the constituencies in the eastern part of the province had larger representation than they were entitled to according to the population. The city of Toronto has increased its population by probably 25,000 or 50,000 inhabitants; that is the city of Toronto as represented, at present, in this House, since the last Redistribution Bill was passed. Hon. gentlemen opposite are not doing the city of Toronto justice when they add population from the county of York and only give the city an additional member. I hope hon. gentlemen will recognize the claims of the city of Toronto to further representation in this House because of the increase that has taken place in its population since the last census and since the last Redistribution Bill was passed. While I am on my feet, I must say that I think a very great injustice is being done to the constituency of Algoma, a constituency of such immense length and breadth, and which has increased so greatly since the last census, in not giving that district increased representation. Instead of the city of Toronto having five representatives, it is entitled to six or seven, and with these portions of West and East York, which are added, it is entitled then to have the same representation as other constituencies in the province of Ontario have in this House, and according to its population it is entitled to at least eight representatives. I think that the city of Toronto is being very unfairly dealt with in so far as the number of its representatives is concerned, as well as being unfairly dealt with in being singled out to have the double member constituency which exists there, wiped out, when the double member constituencies in other cities are allowed to remain.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Mr. Chairman, there is no desire to do an injustice to the city of Toronto. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Clarke) will remember that when the Bill was first introduced last year it was proposed to give Toronto four members. Representations were made, and they prevailed; it was seen, that, with the large additional population in that city, another member should be given.

Mr. CLARKE. But you added to that population entitled to another member.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Clarke) will not say that a great injury has been done to the city of Toronto in view of the fact that it is to have five members. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) puts the population of the city of Toronto within the old limits that formed the city at 225,000. Five members would be one for every 45,000. That is the representation that Toronto has had during the past ten years.

Mr. CLARKE. The population was not as large when the last redistribution was made.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Toronto with 180,000 or 181,000 of a population had four members.

Mr. CLARKE. 140,000.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) is mistaken because that included the population of the two Yorks, and there were, therefore, six representatives.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. 180,000.

Mr. CLARKE. No, that included everything.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I stand corrected that far. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clarke) with a natural pride in his city, is assuming that the population of Toronto will be 225,000. Of course, we do not know that. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) seemed to be very much struck with a particular county when he spoke of the county of Brant. I may speak more particularly of that county, as my fortunes are not connected with it at the present time. The hon. gentleman spoke of it as having 33,000 souls, and he said that the city of Toronto is to get 225,000 souls. We are proceeding in this on the census of 1891, and I remember now that while I professed to stand corrected, and was willing to stand corrected by hon. gentlemen opposite, the figures of 180,000 for the city of Toronto, were as shown by the census of 1891.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. 174,000.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. 174,000, is it? This Bill proceeds on the principle of the population of 1891, although, with the local feeling of pride in the men from our various counties, we would like to have the populations larger. But, the hon. gentleman will admit that his argument is not very fair when he claims 225,000 of a population for the city of Toronto, which, he says, it would amount to now if a census was taken, and says at the same time that the county of Brant has only 33,000 of a population. The county of Brant had nearly 37,000 in 1891. If the hon. gentleman is going to institute comparisons, he must do so fairly, and if he takes the estimated population of Toronto at the same time, then he should take the estimated population of Brant at the same time, which I venture to say has eight or ten thousand added to it, and instead of being 36,000, would be perhaps forty-five thousand, or forty-six thousand, or perhaps more. Toronto with five members and a population of 225,000, shows one member for every 45,000, and under the law passed by the Conservative government, there was therefore, one representative for every forty-five thousand inhabitants.

Mr. CLARKE. The hon. gentleman is, I think, mistaken. If he consults the census of 1891, he will find that the wards comprising the city of Toronto, for representation in the House of Commons, contained a population, if my memory serves me right, of 144,000. The representation, therefore, was one member for 36,000 of the population.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Clarke), makes that statement with more local knowledge than I have, and of course I accept his statement. He says that some portions of the county of York were left out at that time, which were subsequently brought in.

Mr. CLARKE. St. Alban's Ward, for instance, was not included in the population of the city of Toronto, in that census, because it was attached to West York. St. Matthew's Ward, was not included in the city, because it was part of East York, and St. Paul's Ward was identified with East and West York in the census. Its population did not belong, or does not belong, to the city of Toronto, for the purpose of representation in this House. The following wards were included in the city at that time: St. David Ward, St. Lawrence, St. Thomas, St. James, St. John, St. George, St. Andrews, St. Patrick, and St. Stephen's. The population of St. Matthew, St. Paul and St. Alban's Wards, was not included, and that is where the Minister of Customs is mistaken in his figures, as to the population of the city of Toronto for representation in this House. The minister claims, and I hope he is right, that the population of the city of Brantford and of the county of Brant, has substantially increased since the last census. I am guided largely in my estimate of the increase of population of the city of Toronto by the statements made from year to year, in the City Directory, as to the number of householders that directory shows. I think it is a pretty good guide when making a rough calculation as to the increase of population. There is absolutely no certainty as to the population of the city of Toronto until we have the census taken. Neither can we determine correctly what increase has taken place in the city of Brantford, or in the county of Brant. I submit with the greatest possible respect that these are very strong reasons in themselves why the government should not attempt to pass a Redistribution Bill affecting these centres of population throughout Ontario, without having more definite information as to what the population of these various constituencies is. Especially do I contend, that the statements made by the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) are strong reasons why this Redistribution Bill should not be proceeded with. Not the slightest attempt has been made under this Bill to restore county boundaries, about which so much has been said by gentlemen opposite, in the counties of the province of Ontario, lying east of the county of Ontario. The counties east of Ontario County, will still continue to be over-represented in this House, if the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite are to have any weight. If, as is undoubtedly the case, large additions have been made to the population of the cities and towns in Western Ontario, there is all the more reason why, if hon. gentlemen opposite have the opportunity, they should do justice to that portion of the province. I am not prepared to say that they are not disposed to do this justice, but I do say that they cannot do justice to the representation of these centres of population, without ascertaining what the population is. Some of the statements made by the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) are strong arguments why the government should not persist in pushing this Bill, until after the census is taken, especially as it only affects half the province of Ontario. Fifteen months from now, the government will have the first returns from the census and they can then, with the official figures before them, do full justice, if they do so desire, to the constituencies throughout Ontario. I submit that the government should not persist in this Bill unless they are prepared to do justice to constituencies like that of the city of Toronto.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood the Minister of Customs to say that the intention of this Bill was to restore county boundaries, and the outlines of cities, and if that be the case, why was not the same principle applied in this Bill to Toronto, as was applied to Hamilton and Ottawa. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson), seemed to argue in a very lame way, that there were incidental circumstances connected with Toronto that did not appear in the case of the other cities; but the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), caught him in his own trap, by showing that exactly the same conditions did obtain in all. The Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), also told us that the object of the Bill was to restore county boundaries.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. As far as we go.

Mr. SPROULE. Yes, but why did you not go further? What was to prevent you applying the same principle to eastern Ontario as you did to western Ontario. East of the county of Ontario, although the principle of county boundaries is violated in many constituencies, there is no attempt to interfere with the existing state of things. You apply the principle so long as it suits your purposes for political reasons, but where your political chances are against observing the principle, you do not apply it. These gentlemen opposite, are very fond of the principle of county boundaries, when it suits them politically; but if it tells against them, they do not put it into force. They will find it very hard to convince the people of the country that the principle of county boundaries is a correct one, if that is the way they act. If it was right to divide the city of Toronto into five constituencies, why did not you divide the cities of Hamilton and Ottawa into two constituencies each? I know the reason, although hon. gentlemen opposite may not be inclined to admit it. The reason is, that it did not suit the political prospects of the government to do so.

Mr. McMULLEN. I want to draw attention to one point which was referred to by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace). He objected to this Bill because it does not observe the principle of representation by population. If we look at the population of the constituencies in the last election, we shall find that Cardwell had 15,382 with one member, Carleton 16,534 with one member, Cornwall 27,158 with one member, East Durham 15,374 with one member, Frontenac 13,445 with one member, Grenville 12,929 with one member, East Grey 26,225 with one member, Hamilton 47,245 with two members, Kent 31,434 with only one member, North Leeds and Grenville 13,521 with one member, and the south riding of the same county 22,449 with one member. It was not found convenient to make any readjustment there. Lennox had 14,900 with one member, while Lincoln and Niagara had 27,043 with one member. Toronto West had 73,862 with two members, while Toronto East had 43,565 with one member. I simply want to draw attention to these figures to show that the late government did not consider the question of representation by population in 1882 or in 1891. The question of the political aspect of the constituencies was the chief thing they considered, and whenever it was necessary to take a township from one county and put it into another, in the interests of the Conservative party, that was done. They gerrymandered the whole province of Ontario in that way. In 1891 the only change they made was to wipe out one county and add it to two others. The province had been so completely gerrymandered in 1882, that the members opposed any change, and the question of population was left out of sight. East Simcoe had a population of 35,801, while North Simcoe had a population of 28,203.

Mr. CRAIG. What does the hon. gentleman say the population of East Durham was?

Mr. McMULLEN. 15,374.

Mr. CRAIG. That is not correct. I think the hon. gentleman is talking about West Durham.

Mr. McMULLEN. Well, I have the census returns here. The population of the east riding is 17,053, and the west riding 15,374. The figures I have given show distinctly what the intentions of the government of that day were. In the last two adjustments they did not take the question of population into consideration at all—why? Simply because it did not suit them from a party point of view.

It being six o'clock, the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS.

(The House resumed in committee.)

Mr. McMULLEN. In answer to what the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) said before the House rose, I wish to give a few figures. That hon. gentleman claims that the readjustment should be according to population. I wish to show that that principle was grossly violated in the readjustments that took place in 1882 and in 1892. Take, for instance, the county of Cardwell, which, in 1891, had a population of 10,534, while West Hastings had a population of 27,143. There was no change made in either of these ridings in 1891, and why? Simply because the gerrymander of 1882 was so perfect that the Conservative party could not find any way to change it, so far as these counties were concerned, with any benefit to themselves. Representation by population was abandoned—it was not considered. South Middlesex had a population in 1891 of 18,806, while East Middlesex had 25,569. Here were two constituencies lying alongside each other with over 7,000 of a discrepancy, and, after all, there was no attempt made to adjust the population in these two ridings. Again, for the reason of the gerrymander Act of 1882, it could not be improved upon in the interest of the Conservative party. Then, take East Northumberland, with a population of 14,947, by the census of 1891, while North Wellington had 24,956—within a fraction of 25,000—or over 11,000 more than East Northumberland. But they could not make the constituency that I represent any better in their own interest than it was, nor could they improve East Northumberland from their point of view, so they left them both as they were. Then, take the constituency of West York, which my hon. friend (Mr. Wallace) himself represents. In 1881 that constituency had a population of 18,834, while in 1891 it had a population of 41,857. Was there any attempt to readjust this and give representation according to population? No. Why?

Mr. TAYLOR. The people were already very properly represented.

Mr. McMULLEN. The reason was that if the hon. gentleman who holds that seat were left to a riding made up of the west part of the county of York alone, this constituency would spew him out of its mouth at the first opportunity. In order to keep him in, a portion of the city of Toronto, and West Toronto Junction, is kept in as part of his riding, and though the population had increased to 41,857 by the census, no change took place in 1892. And yet the hon. gentleman could get up this afternoon and preach about representation by population as the guiding star in readjusting the constituencies. Now, take East York. In 1881, it had a population of 22,853, and in 1891 a population of 35,148. Was there any attempt to readjust there? None whatever. Why? Because the hon. gentleman who sits in this House to represent that constituency did not want any readjustment. The Bill now before the House will go back to county boundaries.

Mr. McMULLEN.

Mr. SPROULE. It does not go back to county boundaries.

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes, the Bill before the House is for that purpose. Hon. gentlemen opposite claimed the right to take minor municipalities, regardless of county boundaries, and put them where they pleased. Their nominal reason was to produce equality of population in the different constituencies. But their real object in pitchforking these minor municipalities from place to place was to gain party advantage. And now that the government of the day are making an effort to set aside that vicious law, that unjust and scandalously ridiculous Bill of 1882, which was a disgrace to the men who hatched it, and a disgrace to the House that passed it, we are met with the declaration that we are now gerrymandering the country. All we seek is to right the wrong that was done.

On subsection (f).

Mr. CLANCY. I would like to ask the Postmaster General what rule he has laid down in framing this Bill, when he makes two constituencies in the county of Brant having in round numbers about 32,000 of a population, while, in the county of Kent, with a population of about 60,000, there are also only two constituencies? Even were you to have three ridings in Kent, they would have an average population of 19,000 as against an average of 16,000 in Brant. But the hon. gentleman proposes to make two constituencies of about 29,000 each in one municipal county, and in another, to make two ridings of something like 16,000 each. I would like the hon. gentleman to tell the committee how, even in his wildest flights of imagination, he could justify a course of that kind. If his idea is representation by population, this Bill is clearly at variance with that notion. If the convenience of the people is considered, I would like to know the facts upon which he bases his conclusion that this will accomplish that object.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. My hon. friend (Mr. Clancy) rather strained the figures in presenting his question. It would be as well to be as accurate as we can in dealing with the subject. I understand that the population of the county of Brant is 36,445.

Mr. CLANCY. No.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes.

Mr. CLANCY. If my hon. friend (Mr. Mulock) will permit me, we will settle that question right here. He is proposing to revert to county boundaries and to voters' lists prepared in each municipal county. We have the province of Ontario as the guide, and, notwithstanding that the Minister of Customs whispered across to the Postmaster General that the population of Brant was 36,000—

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have the figures here, and my hon. friend (Mr. Clancy) can see for himself.

Mr. CLANCY. I have no doubt that my hon. friend (Mr. Mulock), has the figures and I have no doubt also that the Minister of Customs did whisper the number to him, as I have said. We have the census of 1891 for the two Brants, and what does that give as the voting population. It simply gives for North Brant 11,865, and South Brant 21,323, or 33,217. But my hon. friend wants to pad out with Indians, he wants to count in a class of population that has no more to do with the elections than the stock in his barnyard. These Indians were never counted in the province of Ontario for the purpose of determining the voting population or of shaping the size of each constituency, and this for the obvious reason that they had no vote. It is manifestly dishonest to count these people in. But if the hon. gentleman can gain any consolation by counting in the Indians, and thus making it appear that there is 36,000 of a population in North and South Brant, he is welcome to all the comfort that may give him.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). In discussing this Bill, I suppose it is as well to accept corrections. I am sorry the hon. member for Toronto, is not here now. The population of 180,000 in Toronto, if I am correct, was arrived at in the census of 1891, by adding to that city, the portions of East and West York that belonged to it.

Mr. WALLACE. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. We have under this Bill, five members for a population of 180,000, which is 36,000 per member. The population of Toronto was 144,000, in 1881, the hon. member for West York tells us, with four members.

Mr. WALLACE. I did not give any such figures.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Well, the hon. member for Toronto did, and in that he was correct, I believe, Toronto then, had four members, or one representative for every 36,000, and this Bill provides for a similar proportion. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), in order to make a case—and his case is very weak—simply strikes off 4,000, in order to make the population of Brant 32,000. But this Bill is founded on the census of 1891, which the judges must take cognizance of, and that census shows a population of 36,445 souls in the county of Brant. It does not alter that circumstance at all, for the hon. gentleman to say: I will cut off 4,000, because there are many non-voters there. There are thousands of non-voters in every county, is the hon. gentleman going to count them all out? How many non-voters are there in the county of Kent?

Mr. CLANCY. No Indians.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I am speaking about non-voters, and the hon. gentleman spoke of the Indians, simply as a non-voter. The Indian is a consumer and was considered good enough by the hon. gentleman's government to be given a vote, and did vote, and if the Ontario government were to bring the Indians within municipal institutions, they would again have the right to vote. The hon. gentleman must also remember that the population of the county of Brant is greater than what it was in 1882, when his friends gave that county two members. It had two members long before confederation, and after confederation down to 1882, when its population was smaller than it is at present.

Mr. CLANCY. How does that affect the argument?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Very materially, I think, because the hon. gentleman says we are making no improvement and are not proceeding on fair lines. But even striking off the 4,000, there would be still a larger population represented by the one member, than in many ridings, under the present law.

Mr. CLANCY. That does not affect it.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No, nothing affects the case at all, but I am stating the facts. Why does the hon. gentleman not select the county of Norfolk, which is smaller in population considerably, than Brant, and yet we give two members to Norfolk. Norfolk has barely a few hundred more votes than Wentworth. The hon. gentleman says that the government is seeking by this Bill, political advantage. Well, Wentworth, from confederation down to the present, has invariably returned two Liberal members, and we have every reason to believe that if that county were given two members, it would return two Liberals. But being a few hundred smaller in population than Norfolk, we give it only one member, while we give two to Norfolk, which for years has returned the gallant colonel opposite, and may do so again. If we were seeking political advantage, and were willing to do only one-hundredth part of what hon. gentlemen opposite did, we would give two members to Wentworth, and only one to Norfolk. The hon. gentleman knows that South Norfolk would likely return the gallant colonel opposite, who now represents it, and if we wished to follow the example of hon. gentlemen opposite, and strike at our opponents in this House, we could do it in the case of South Norfolk, without committing anything like the manifest injustice that they committed.

Their pretense about equalizing population is too ridiculous. It is impossible to equalize the population down to a man, or a hundred men. The hon. member for West York sits in this House representing 45,000 people, while the adjoining constituency has only 18,000 of a population. You will have some discrepancies under this Bill, but none such as exists at present. It is possible to do some little gerrymandering within the limits of counties, but impossible to gerrymander to anything like the same extent within county bounds, as these gentlemen were enabled to do when they disregarded county bounds, and went into two or three different counties to pick out townships and place those townships where it best suited their party. And this they did under the hypocritical pretense of equalizing the population. Let me ask this question. When they introduced their Bill the municipal county of Oxford had a population of 49,857. That could have been divided into two ridings just as easily as many other counties were divided with about an equal population. Then there was no necessity of disturbing that, but what did they do? Why, they took two townships out of Oxford, namely, Dereham and Blenheim, with a population of 9,631; and they put Dereham into the riding of North Norfolk because it had a Conservative majority, and they thought it would help to put to political death the member who had represented North Norfolk continuously from 1872 to that time. Blenheim, the other township, with its three or four hundred Liberal majority, they put into North Brant, which they were making a Liberal hive. Now, out of that county which, if it had been divided, would have had made two constituencies with about the proper population, they took 9,631. What else did they do? Having taken 9,631 from a population that was just about entitled to two members, they went into the county of Perth and took North Easthope out of one riding of Perth, and South Easthope out of the other riding, and went into Brant County and took out Burford and Oakland, and they threw all these four townships back into Oxford to bring Oxford's population up. So they took 9,631 souls out and put in 9,639; they made a difference of 8. And hon. gentlemen opposite will sit there and say it is fair. No, they were not all there then, very few members opposite are to blame for that. But can they not see what a hypocritical cry it is to say that they were actuated by a desire to equalize the population, in face of the figures that I have given? Blenheim, with a population of 5,606, was taken out of Oxford and put into Brant County; then Burford and Oakland with a population of 5,797 were taken out of Brant and put into Oxford to equalize the population. Now, what is the necessity for that? I need not tell hon. gentlemen opposite that it was because they had a large Liberal majority. They know that nothing but the most extreme partisan desire on their part to secure a political advantage would ever have led honourable men to commit themselves to such a scheme. Gentlemen opposite think sometimes that I speak a little warmly on this subject. Well, I do speak warmly, because never in all my parliamentary life, have I ever seen so infamous an act. I challenge any one to point out where, in any representative body, such an outrage on justice, on all that is fair and right was ever committed. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite, having a sense of what is right and proper, if they can explain in any other way the action taken at that time. What do I say? They took Blenheim out of Oxford and put it into North Brant, where they were going to make a hive, and which could have carried a Liberal before. But because Blenheim had four or five hundred of a Liberal majority, and a population of 5,606, they put it into Brant; then they took Burford and Oakland, having 5,797, out of Brant and put them into Oxford. There is only 193 difference, and so these counties are broken up in that way.

Middlesex had a population of 64,453; that could easily divide into three ridings, and would give about the proper unit. They did not need to interfere with it at all. But they took the township of Euphemia from Lambton, and South Dorchester was taken from Elgin, and Stephen was taken from Bruce. That is the way they did with a county that, if it had been left alone, within county bounds, would just divide into three ridings, having about the exact unit of population. In 1892, Grimsby, in the county of Lincoln, with a population of 2,705, was transferred to South Wentworth, and the township of Pelham, in the county of Welland, with a population of 2,554, was transferred to Lincoln to replace Grimsby. Walpole is taken out of Haldimand and is replaced by Wamfleet, belonging to Welland. The township of Whitechurch is taken out of North York and is replaced by transferring West Gwillimbury from South Simcoe to it. The township of Wallace is taken out of Perth and replaced by the township of Usborne, taken out of Huron, the only difference in the population of these two townships is that Wallace has 711 more than Usborne. That is all done to equalize population.

Sir, I could run through the whole Bill in that way. It violated every principle of justice, of truth, and of common decency, and that Bill has been upon the statute-book ever since. These gentlemen ask us: Why do you bring this Bill in again today? They say: You introduced it last year and it was thrown out by the other Chamber, and this Bill will meet with a like fate. We do not know whether it will meet with a like fate or not; but the reason we bring it in is because parliamentary institutions and constitutional government, all that is fair and right between political parties, yea, and the interests of the country, were sacrificed by that Bill of 1882. The Liberal party denounced it on every hustings from that time down to this; its abolition was made a plank in the platform of that party ever since. When in 1893 the great Liberal party met in convention in this city they put the repeal of that law as one of the planks in the platform of the party. And, Sir, in obedience to the will of the people, in fulfilment of the pledges that we gave to the people, this Bill is now introduced. If it should be cast out again by the Senate, why, it must be introduced again, and every constitutional means must be used in order to accomplish our pledge to the people, every constitutional means must be resorted to in order to rectify that wrong.

In face of the figures that I have given the hon. gentleman asks: Why should we give two members to the county of Brant that has only 32,000 population? It cuts off 4,000 people that were always recognized as belonging to it; but in 1891, the census referred to in the Bill, it had 36,445 souls. But even taking him on his own ground that there are only 32,000, and that would be a population greater than several members sitting in this House now represent under their Bill passed in 1882. But why do we give it? I have pointed out to you that without straining the representation that is necessary at the present time in this House, we could give to Wentworth two members and each member would represent more people than are represented by several gentlemen sitting in this House today. We could have done that, and in all human probability, from the fact that never from confederation down has Wentworth returned a Conservative to this House.

Mr. SPROULE. You forget Major Carpenter represented it.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes, I stand corrected; Major Carpenter got in by one vote after the gerrymander.

Mr. WILSON. In two parliaments.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. It was after the gerrymander. That was not the county of Wentworth municipally.

Mr. WILSON. Major Carpenter was returned in 1887.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That was after the gerrymander of 1882. It was done for that very purpose. He came in through the gerrymander. I do not want to speak of this infamous Bill of 1882 too warmly, but it is a Bill that we cannot speak of and use mild terms. Wentworth, with Ancaster township in it, sent here year after year honest Joe Rymal, one of the best representatives ever sent here from Wentworth, who was struck at by men who had a majority of three to one. They took the township of Ancaster, with 300 of a Liberal majority, out of his riding, attached it to North Brant, where there were hundreds and hundreds of Liberals, to put good honest Joe Rymal to a political death, and under these infamous circumstances they carried it by one when they had accomplished it. I say that by straining a point we could give two members to that municipal county, and in all probability, judging by its past record, two Liberals would come here. The government have framed this Bill in the interest of right, although, instead of dividing the county of Norfolk, and giving it two members, by which it is possible that a Conservative will be returned in the person of the gallant colonel, and that he will continue to represent that county, we could have given that county one member who would have been a Liberal, and in that way we could have given two members to the county of Wentworth, who would have been, in all probability, two Liberals. That is the principle on which this Bill has been formed and carried out. I have pointed out to hon. gentlemen opposite some of the enormities of the other Bill, some of the injustices that are to be remedied by this Bill, and I have pointed out the fairness of this Bill, which seeks to rectify these iniquities. There is no desire on the part of this government to strike at any hon. gentleman who sits on the other side of the House. They cannot point to a line in this Bill which seeks to strike at any hon. gentleman individually who sits on the other side of the House, as they sought to do in our case. Though we had the same power as they had to sit down and carve these counties as we liked, we say: No; we will declare that in certain counties where there is a population that entitles them to one member, because we are guided by the principle of population, as nearly as you can approach it, although it is difficult to approach the exact unit for each hon. member who sits in this House, where there is a county which has a population that entitles it to two members, or where there is another county with a population that entitles it to three members, then, we declare that these counties that are entitled to two members shall be divided into two, that those which are entitled to three members shall be divided into three, and, while there would be opportunities for gerrymandering to a lesser extent than if we were to disregard county boundaries, we do not seek for that opportunity. We lay down these general lines and say we will take three of the highest judges in the land, we will give this to them to deal with, their only instruction being to be guided by the last decennial census of 1891 and to do what they think is right. We do not retain the power in our own hands of asking them simply to make a report to this House, which we could change, if we so desired, but we give absolute power into the hands of the judges, and when they have finished their work, their decision is proclaimed in the Canada Gazette, and it becomes a part of the law. We hand the whole thing over to them. I am glad to observe that hon. gentlemen opposite are not disposed to oppose this Bill to any great extent. An attempt to oppose this Bill would only expose the iniquities, as I have endeavoured to point them out, of that Act that are sought to be rectified. If it be as hon. gentlemen opposite have ventured to say, that this Bill will be thrown out by another Chamber, I ask them how do they know what another Chamber will do? I am not prepared to say that they will do it again, because they have done it once. When the Franchise Bill went to that Chamber they recognized that it was one of the planks of the Liberal party, which had triumphed at the polls, that this party had a mandate from the people, that that iniquitous Franchise Act was to be repealed. They said that it stood on a different principle and upon a different ground from the Bill in reference to the Yukon Railway, which they threw out because they said that Bill had not been pronounced upon by the people. If the people had pronounced in favour of that Bill, the Bill would have passed, as I understand it, from their line of argument. But the Franchise Bill, they recognized, had been passed upon by the people, and that being the case, it received their assent. Well, here is a Bill that deals entirely with the representation of this House. This Bill was passed upon by the people; we have a mandate from the people, we sent it to them, and they said that the people did not care for this. A whole year has elapsed, and there have been elections after elections, held in different parts of the country, in which the principles of the Liberal party have been appealed to, and in all these cases, in forty-five elections, I think, every one but three, declared in favour of them. This Bill will go to the other Chamber with that endorsement. I am not prepared to say that they have not the power to disallow this Bill, but a Chamber which is supposed to act judicially will be guided by principles of right, and while, then, they might have thought that we had not a mandate from the people in the consideration of this measure, there can be no mistake in the mind of any man now that there is a mandate from the people in favour of this Bill passed by this House.

Mr. PATERSON.

I venture to say that if this Bill should be rejected a second time under the circumstances I have detailed, British statesmen, at any rate, would acknowledge that in their parliamentary experience they had never seen the House of Lords attempt to do anything of the kind. If there had been a case, I venture to say, in the English House of Commons, the reserve power that they have in the constitution would have been brought into effect with the least delay, and they would have created peers enough to see that they passed that Bill. There is no doubt about what would be done in England to-day. But, it is not a question to be discussed, or debated, in this House at all. We are here with our duty to perform, with a mandate from the people, renewed again and again, that we should put this Bill through if it is in our power. The government, aided by those who believe in justice and fair-play in this House, believe that this Bill will pass this Chamber and that it will then go to another Chamber, which will take the responsibility of dealing with it in the way which to them seems just and right. We ask for the consideration of the Bill on its fair merits, and, I may say, that while there are little discrepancies and little differences in populations in one riding or another, these are only such as are incidental to every Bill, and must necessarily be in every Bill. But, there is no discrepancy as to the great central thought and purpose that we have in view as to the evils which we are seeking to remedy, and, in seeking to remedy, in which we simply say that men who were torn from their own constituencies in which their municipal interests lie, where they meet together as jurymen, in judicial matters, in their own county councils, that these men who have a desire to vote with and be recognized as part of their own community for Dominion purposes as well as for local, municipal and judicial purposes, shall be placed in the position in which they have demanded to be placed in a loud voice at the polls, which they have sent us here to secure for them, and which, I believe, this House is prepared to concede as that which is just and fair and right. If there be any objection that is valid we are prepared to consider it. It is true we have not gone over the whole province of Ontario, but we say and we believe that the people of this country will be satisfied if we rectify the grossest and the most glaring of the injustices perpetrated by the gerrymander of 1882. Hon. gentlemen may point to a few instances in Eastern Ontario, with which this Bill does not interfere, but they must remember that if we leave these counties as they are, we do so, not because the Liberal party have reason to believe that it would be against their interest to interfere with these counties. We must remember that the counties untouched by this Bill are the ridings and counties which were carved out by the men who passed the gerrymander Bill of 1882, in order to give them a party advantage. Hon. gentlemen opposite cannot say that in leaving these counties as they are, we are doing something unjust, because we leave them exactly in the position in which hon. gentlemen opposite constituted them in 1882, animated as these gentlemen were then with the spirit of obtaining party advantage. I think I may say without being uncharitable, that these counties, as in the case of the others, were constituted in 1882 so as to do the best party service to the Conservatives. There are many men in this House, now, who were not here in 1882, and they cannot have a proper conception of the iniquities of that Bill and the manner in which it was forced through. I believe there are many honourable and fair-minded men on that side of the House, who, when they know the whole facts of the case, and when they read this present Bill with fairness written in every line of it—the government divesting itself of its power to gerrymander, and leaving it to three of the highest judges of the land absolutely to determine these matters—there are, I say, many fair-minded gentlemen opposite, who, in their hearts, if not by their votes, would support this measure. These constituencies have been shackled for years, the voters have been crying for deliverance, the Liberal party has promised deliverance if it came into power, and that Liberal party recognizing that when a party obtains power it is its duty to carry out its pledges—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. If hon. gentlemen do not know what it is to belong to a party that does recognize it as a binding duty to carry out its pledges as far as it can—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. If hon. gentlemen opposite do not know what it is to belong to such a party, gentlemen on this side of the House do. If unfortunately, in their attempt to carry out their pledges the Liberal party may be balked once, or even twice, then the principle which animates them will sustain them in their endeavour again and again, until they succeed, and until justice and equity and right prevails in this country.

Mr. CLANCY. If one had any doubt before as to whether the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) was right or wrong, that doubt would be dispelled by such a speech as we have just heard from him. Why such profuse professions of honesty from the Minister of Customs, and why such heat over a matter of this kind. Sir, the exaggerated manner and the extravagant language of the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) must convince any sensible man that he cannot be sincere in his statements. Let me call attention to a very novel feature of this exhibition. We have had for the first time in the history of the world a set of martyrs without persecutors, and we have a set of gentlemen opposite who squeal before they are hurt. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) is acting the part of a martyr here, but he has overacted the part to-night, as he always overacts every part he plays in this House. Let me appeal to him and to the Postmaster General as well, to review the facts as they stood before 1882. What was the condition of things in this group of constituencies which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) speaks of, in 1878, before we had what he calls this infamous gerrymander. At the elections in 1878, there were forty-three members representing the same group of counties, and the Liberal party elected twenty-two and the Conservative party elected twenty-one. Now, let me call your attention to what took place after that. Following upon the census of 1881, the Redistribution Act of 1882 was passed, and in consequence of the increase of population in this same group of counties, they got five additional members which gave them forty-eight representatives in place of the forty-three they had in 1878. Let me ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson), who has been talking so loudly to-night, what was the result of the elections in 1882 in these counties, after what he calls the infamous gerrymander, which struck down every Liberal, came into operation. Why, Sir, hon. gentlemen will be surprised to hear that out of the forty-eight members, the Liberals elected thirty-two and the Conservatives only sixteen. I challenge the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), and I challenge the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), to deny that. If they have any explanation to offer for that, I will sit down while they give it to the House. Is it not childish for these hon. gentlemen to rise in this House, and talk about one township being taken out, and another township being put in, and about men being driven from office, when the real facts are such as I have just announced. Why does not the Minister of Customs answer that? Why does he sit there in dumb silence without answering? Sir, if he does not answer he ought to sit dumb for ever in the future.

Mr. COWAN. You would not have had one of the forty-eight if you did not gerrymander it. That is what gave you the sixteen.

Mr. CLANCY. My hon. friend (Mr. Cowan) talks on this occasion, as he usually talks, with a good deal of effrontery, and with little knowledge. What happened when this Redistribution Bill came before the House in 1882? The Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) told us they had twenty-two resolutions, each and every one of them setting out the iniquities of the Bill.

Mr. COWAN. Was that when the Conservatives stole Bothwell?

Mr. CLANCY. I will later on give some information to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cowan). Let me ask the Minister of Customs first, did any one of these twenty-two resolutions propose to abolish the constituency of Bothwell? Not a bit of it. He told me that I sit for a constituency as the result of the gerrymander. But, Sir, the man who sat for my constituency in 1882 was the Hon. David Mills, the present Minister of Justice in the Liberal cabinet, and did he propose any resolution to abolish the riding of Bothwell? No, Sir, he did not. The Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) told us that the present government had now submitted a fair Bill and that they were going to select the highest judges in the land to administer it. I tell the Minister of Customs that he has handcuffed, he has shackled, he has gagged the judges under this Bill, and he tries to shield himself behind the judges. That is a strong statement to make, but I will prove it from the Bill itself. Does the Bill propose that the judges shall have a free hand to equalize the population as best they can? No, the hon. gentleman carves out two little constituencies of 16,000 each for another gentleman and himself in Brant county. They make two constituencies in another county where there are about 60,000 people, and yet the hon. gentleman says the judges will have a free hand to equalize the population and to serve public convenience. In every essential respect the hon. gentleman has tied the hands of the judges. They are not free to deal with population; they must follow the provisions of the Bill; they are entirely hampered, and their hands are tied. Why did the hon. gentleman take in the county of Bruce? County boundaries are not broken there. Is he undoing a wrong? The hon. gentleman has no excuse of that kind. The people of this country see too clearly that the hon. gentleman cannot frame a Bill directing the judges what they are to do, and then tell them that they have a free hand. That is so palpable that no man can be deceived by it. One would imagine that a Bill of this kind would be based on some fair ground of public policy. In the first place, hon. gentlemen have taken an immoral course, politically speaking, in attempting to introduce legislation of this kind. I appeal to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), who is a good lawyer, and I ask him if he believes that it was in the minds of those who framed the Confederation Act that in addition to readjusting the representation after each decennial census, that the counties might also be readjusted without any impropriety whenever it suited the whim of the political party in power to do so. I ask the hon. gentlemen, if that was present in their minds, and if so, why measures were not taken there and then to provide for that? Will the hon. gentleman answer? He will answer when I get through. Now, it does not make any difference whether it is within the powers of this parliament to readjust the seats now or not. If it had the power a thousand times, it is unfair to do it. It sets an example once and for all, that each political party may in turn, whenever it suits its purpose, attempt to undo what it considers the wrongs committed by the party previously in power. Who wants to set an example of that kind? Yet this is the outcome of this Bill. This parliament has the power to disfranchise every man in Canada of fifty or sixty years of age, if it thinks proper to do so, on the ground that it does not consider them any longer fit to vote. We had an example a session or two ago of the power of parliament, when it became a crime for the judges to be old. Hon. gentlemen wanted to get rid of a few county judges to make room for their friends, and what did they propose? They did not propose to impeach them for any act of wrong-doing, but they proposed by a Bill to make it a crime for a judge to grow old. I say that one act is quite as consistent as the other; but both are wrong in principle. It is perfectly idle for any hon. gentleman to declare that the parliament of Canada has a right to deal with this question, and that is a justification for going on. I repeat, no more vicious policy can be laid down. I do not know what the Senate may do; I am not in the secrets of the gentlemen who compose that Chamber; but I can only say that men with less wisdom and standing, having the least notion of fairness, would not listen for a single moment to the proposition to establish such a precedent as this would be for one or other of the great political parties. Now, with regard to this cry about the inequality of population, I will take the standard laid down in the province of Ontario, and compare it with the state of affairs in the Dominion, and see whether the population under the Dominion Act is not, after all, much more fairly equalized than under the Provincial Act. After the hon. Minister of Customs had gone over a long list, he sat down without putting his hand on one case where a Liberal was defeated as a result of the redistribution. I will first take Brant and North Wentworth. In the Dominion one had 23,000 and the other 21,000; in the local, North Brant had 11,865 and South Brant 21,352. In the county of Bruce there are three constituencies for the local and three for the Dominion; the former had 22,800, 22,000 and 19,000, and the latter 20,800, 21,000 and 22,000; they are more near the unit. The Postmaster General laid it down, when introducing the Bill last year, that the unit would be included between 19,000 and 22,000. The county of Elgin for the local was divided into 18,000 and 24,900, and for the Dominion 26,700 and 23,900.

Mr. INGRAM. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, East Elgin was formerly represented by a Conservative; but after the gerrymander of 1882 it was represented by a Liberal at the two succeeding elections.

Mr. CLANCY. The county of Grey was divided into 24,000, 24,300 and 22,800 for the local, and 26,300, 26,200 and 23,600 for the Dominion. The county of Huron had 20,800, 23,300 and 22,500 for the local, and for the Dominion 18,900, 19,000 and 20,000. Lambton had 23,000 and 34,000 for the local, and 24,000 and 23,000 for the Dominion. The county of Lincoln had 25,000 for the local, and 27,000 for the Dominion. The county of Middlesex had 22,000, 18,000 and 19,000 for the local, and 25,000, 19,000 and 17,000 for the Dominion. Norfolk had 15,000 and 14,000 for the local, and 22,000 and 19,000 for the Dominion. Ontario had 20,000 and 25,000 for the local, and 20,000 and 19,000 for the Dominion. Oxford had 27,000 and 22,800 for the local, and 26,000 and 22,000 for the Dominion. Then let us take Perth. One of the Perths has 29,000 and the other 22,000 in the local, and 26,000 and 29,000 in the Dominion. I might go through the whole of those constituencies and show that the inequality of population is infinitely less in the Dominion, under the redistribution of 1882, than under the local Act of 1885. When the hon. gentleman points to the small constituencies, does he not see that he is making an argument against himself? Does he not see that he is showing how utterly impossible it is to equalize the population when you adhere to county boundaries? Whatever the size of the constituency may be, if it is too small for two members and too large for one, how is he going to remedy the difficulty? He cannot. The only way of doing it, is to deal with the constituencies apart from county boundaries, and that can be fairly done without injuring the one party or the other. These hon. gentlemen profess to have introduced this Bill for the purpose of undoing wrong. The wrong done, according to them, was the disturbing of county boundaries, and they wish to restore these boundaries. I would ask the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, what about St. John County and St. John city. I am told that St. John County and city have for many years constituted one county, electing two members.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. St. John's County and city have always returned two members, but they occupy this anomalous position, that the people of the county only vote for one member and the people of the city vote for two.

Mr. CLANCY. But the hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that St. John city and county returns two members, and it does not make any difference whether one votes for two and the other for one. Will he give us next an explanation about Bruce? The county boundaries of Bruce were not disturbed in any sense in 1882 or 1892.

I have only to say, in conclusion, that I hope the people of Canada will never sanction such a measure as this, introduced on the eve of a new census. Why cannot these hon. gentlemen wait another year? Are they afraid of what may take place in the meantime? The directions to the commissioners are as follows:

The letters patent appointing the commissioners shall direct them, in making the divisions, to consider the distribution of population according to the latest census of Canada, the public convenience, and such divisions as appear to them best calculated to do substantial justice.

But by the same Bill they provide that the judges must follow out the lines laid down in the Bill, and then after thus tying the hands of the judges, these hon. gentlemen declare that they are in the hands of the judges and helpless. They take by this very Bill all the power from the judges and lay down an arbitrary course which the judges must pursue, and yet now they seek to shelter themselves behind these men. The dodge is too transparent a one to deceive anybody.

Mr. McMULLEN. In reply to my hon. friend, I wish to say that in 1882 Kent was divided into two constituencies—Kent and Bothwell. Both had about the same population; but, in order to defeat the Hon. David Mills, they took from Bothwell, Howard, Orford, and the village of Ridgetown, which gave a Liberal majority of about 300, and put them into West Elgin, where there was already 600 Liberal majority, and then to make up the population of Bothwell, they took Sombra and Dawn from Lambton, which gave a Conservative majority, and put them into Bothwell, and this was all done to defeat Mr. Mills. My hon. friend occupies a seat by virtue of a gerrymander, and if there is any man in this House who should hesitate to defend the present law, which we are seeking to amend, it is that hon. gentleman. He knows that he sits there by virtue of the gerrymander of 1882. He knows that by means of that Act, he succeeded in robbing the Hon. David Mills of his seat, and in depriving this House of the benefit of the ability and statesmanship of that distinguished leader of the Liberal party, and giving us instead a mere shadowy reflection of a man and a mere voting nonentity. It is not to be surprised that the hon. gentleman should try to defeat the Bill before the House. He feels anxious because he knows as well as the man on the gallows, with the rope around his neck, that his political fate is sealed should this Bill pass. He knows that if we go back to county boundaries, he is certain to be left at home.

Did the hon. gentleman read the clause in the Bill now before the House? What is it?

2. The letters patent appointing the commissioners shall direct them, in making the divisions to consider the distribution of population according to the latest census of Canada, the public convenience, and such divisions as appear to them best calculated to do substantial justice.

'To do substantial justice.' And the hon. gentleman says they will not do it.

Mr. CLANCY. I did not say any such thing.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to know how the judges are shackled by that clause. We simply ask by this Bill to go back to the rule of county boundaries, to undo the villainy done in 1882, and give the judges an opportunity, within the limits of county boundaries, to adjust the constituencies as they think right. My hon. friend (Mr. Clancy), draws attention to the divisions in Ontario. The divisions in Ontario may be unjust; if so, they should point that out on the floor of the legislature, and demand redress and insist upon it. I do not say that the Ontario government are perfect or that they may not have done wrong; but I do say that the place to readjust that is on the floor of the legislature in Toronto. Let the hon. gentleman tell his friends of the opposition in that legislature to assail the government for being unjust, and to claim their rights there. No doubt my hon. friend realizes that by virtue of the abominable Act of 1882, men have won seats in this House, and that if we revert to a just system, the political career of those gentlemen is ended. My hon. friend from East Elgin (Mr. Ingram), has said something with regard to the Act of 1882 returning a Liberal for West Elgin.

Mr. INGRAM. And for East Elgin.

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not remember exactly the circumstances—

Mr. INGRAM. I will jog the hon. gentleman's memory, if he will permit me. Dr. Wilson was the member in 1882, Mr. Thomas Arkell represented the riding in 1878, and he was defeated after the gerrymander of 1882, by Dr. Wilson, who was again elected in 1887, and who considered that he had a strong hive as a result of the gerrymander.

Mr. McMULLEN. No doubt, public indignation was the cause of this Dr. Wilson's election, and when that feeling worked off the electors returned to their old party lines. Now, I contend that it is no wonder that the Reformers get heated and intemperate when this Bill of 1882 is discussed. For the last 18 years we have been under the harrow; we have been suffering from a gerrymander that has cost time, trouble and money. All we ask is justice. We are ready to meet the Conservatives on any platform in any constituency on equal terms; but when we are brought before gerrymandered constituencies, with minor municipalities pitchforked here and there, to suit the exigencies of the moment and the interest of the Tory party, it arouses our indignation. There are but a few gentlemen now sitting on the other side of this House who were guilty of taking part in passing the Act of 1882. I believe there are men on the other side to-night, who would not be guilty of voting for such an Act. I have a better opinion of them than to think they would. And there are men on this side of the House who would scorn to vote for a gerrymander Act in the interests of the Reform party. We do not want any advantage; we want honesty, we want uprightness, we want fair-play, we want justice—and we want nothing else. I am amazed to hear my hon. friend (Mr. Clancy), say that the judges are shackled and will not do what is right. I cannot find any clause in the Bill that will lead any man to the conclusion that the judges have not ample liberty to do as they think best within the limits of county boundaries. I admit that is impossible to divide counties so that there shall be an equal number of Reformers and Conservatives. Some counties will give very large Conservative majorities, and some very large Reform majorities. We expect that. But it is not the object of this Bill to try to diffuse the Reform party through the province, so that they will carry ridings by narrow majorities and give the Tories, so that they must carry by enormous majorities or not at all. The idea of this Bill is to undo the wretched, scandalous Act of 1882, and get back to uprightness and honesty in elections to this House.

Mr. CLANCY. I am going to say a word, as to the reliability of the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen), who has just taken his seat. During the short time I have been a member of this House, I have never known him to be guilty of an act of generosity or courtesy. In his ravings—I say properly, his ravings, because he is constantly talking for victory and not for truth—I have never known him to show to an hon. member on this side the courtesy of listening. There can be no stronger evidence of weakness and consciousness of wrong, than that a man should be unwilling to listen to, or to answer a fair question. I asked 'What about Bothwell?' Did the hon. gentleman speak without knowledge, when he said that I hold that seat by virtue of the Redistribution Act of 1882? If not, he knows that he is guilty of having committed a crime, that no hon. gentleman in this House should commit, and that is an attempt to falsify a case. What is the position of affairs as to Bothwell? From 1867 to 1896, Hon. David Mills polled a majority of votes in every election in the electoral district of Bothwell. His friends may say that in 1882, Mr. Mills was, for a time, out of the House. That is true. Owing to a return that had not been made in one of the polling subdivisions in the township of Camden, he was deprived of his seat.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CLANCY. 'Hear, hear.' says an hon. gentleman. But there were no stolen ballots, there was no burning of ballot boxes, no switching of ballots.

Mr. COWAN. But you gave the returning officer, who stole the seat from Mr. Mills, a gold watch for doing it.

Mr. CLANCY. Why, what was that case? The hon. gentleman (Mr. Cowan), is a lawyer, and let me, as a layman, point out to him something that he ought to know, if he pretends to have followed the history of that case. There was one subdivision that was not counted. There was an appeal made to the county judge to count in that division and he did so. Appeal was taken to the Superior Court, which held that the returning officer was perfectly within the meaning of the law, although he did an injustice to the man who polled the greater number of votes.

Mr. COWAN. Where did the gold watch come in?

Mr. CLANCY. I can tell the hon. gentleman that he is not likely to get a gold watch for having pursued the course that he is pursuing to-day. I say that the Hon. David Mills polled a majority of the votes.

Mr. COWAN. What about the watch?

The CHAIRMAN. Order.

Mr. COWAN. I do not desire to violate any rule of order. I thought the hon. gentleman had started to explain the transaction about the gold watch, and was neglecting to do so. I am simply drawing his attention to it.

Mr. CLANCY. I was not discussing a gold watch. I do not propose to go into the highways and byways to throw mud with the hon. gentleman. If he wants to throw mud I am not going to follow his example, but will leave him in undisputed possession of the field. Now, I repeat that it is absolutely at variance with the truth for any hon. gentleman to say that the Hon. David Mills did not poll a majority of votes in the riding of Bothwell from 1867 down to 1896. In 1891 he had no less a majority than 551. Yet the hon. gentleman declares that I hold a seat by that means. I tell the hon. gentleman that he has made a statement that, if he has any regard for truth, he will withdraw, because it is absolutely destitute of a particle of foundation. I challenge any hon. gentleman to say that an election ever took place, from 1867 down to 1894 inclusive, in which the Hon. David Mills did not poll a majority of votes in that riding. Now, what is the conclusion? Why, it is that the so-called gerrymander did them no injustice at all. The hon. gentleman accused me of saying that the judges would not do right. I did not say any such a thing. I said their hands were shackled. Are the judges free to say how many representatives Kent is to have? Are they free to say that any constituency can be changed otherwise than in the manner prescribed by the provisions of this Bill? Is that not shackling the hands of the judges? Is it not idle to give the judges a commission to register what the hon. gentlemen have laid down in the Bill? I say they have not a free hand, and to hold up a Bill of this kind and to say it is a fair one, is merely to advocate a sham. The government of the day have entrenched themselves behind the Bill, and they want to find shelter behind the judges.

Mr. SEMPLE. I am glad that the government have determined to give the people of this country a chance to have a fair Redistribution Bill. I believe it is within their power to set a precedent for all the other provinces, and at the same time do justice to western Ontario, that was so disgracefully gerrymandered in 1882. The question has been asked: Why does this Bill not extend to eastern Ontario? The reason is that eastern Ontario was not affected by the infamous gerrymander of 1882, and therefore it is unnecessary to make a change there at the present time. The counties to be affected by the present Bill are Brant, Elgin, Kent, Lambton, Norfolk, Ontario, Oxford and Perth, which are to be divided into two ridings each. The counties of Huron, Bruce, Grey, Middlesex, Simcoe, Welland and York are to be divided into three electoral districts, each to return one member. Eight counties are to return sixteen members, and seven counties are to return twenty-one members. I think that the fairest way to redistribute the representation in these counties is to put them into the hands of the judges with instructions to make the ridings as compact as possible and the population as nearly equal as possible in each. Some hon. gentlemen object that it is too near the time of taking another census to bring in a measure of this kind. But if a fair Redistribution Bill is brought in before an election takes place, that is all that is required. The government in bringing forward the proposed measure are doing it at the proper time for all practical purposes.

It has been stated that the county of Brant, for instance, would only furnish about 16,000 population for each representative. Now, I find that Grenville South returns a Conservative member with a population of only 12,929; Carleton, with 16,534, returns one member; Cardwell returns a member with 15,382; Leeds and Grenville have 13,531; Lennox, 14,900; Peel, 15,466; and Peterboro West, 15,808. It is impossible to give each riding exactly the same population, but that is immaterial. All that is wanted is justice, and this Bill is a fair endeavour to obtain justice. When the gerrymander Bill was passed in 1882, we heard a good deal about the Upper House which, we were told, was established to check hasty legislation and to protect minorities. Were they found doing so? I think not. When the Franchise Bill passed it cost this country over a million dollars to operate it during the time it was in force. Did the Upper House do anything to check that hasty legislation? I think not. The Liberal party in western Ontario do not require an unjust measure to enable them to meet their opponents on fair and equal terms. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) said that the fact that the Reform party did better after the gerrymander, was a proof that the gerrymander was not unjust. It is no proof whatever. The fact is the Conservative party had begun to go down grade, they were losing supporters every day. With all the aid this gerrymander gave them they were losing ground. The Reform party now simply wants what is fair, and I am glad to know that the government are endeavouring to have justice done and to bring forward a measure which will be fair to Conservatives and Reformers alike. I believe the judges will act fairly. The government have made no attempt to trammel them in the slightest. They are simply told: Here are the counties with their population. Divide these into ridings as compactly as possible, and make the population in each as equal as possible. That is all that is required of the judges. We have confidence in them, because we know that in the election courts they have acted fairly and given satisfaction to all classes. If the Senate were composed of as good material, and were as independent as the judges, it would be a good thing for the country. But, as events have happened during the last number of years we are justified in concluding that the Patrons of Industry were about right when they put in their platform the plank that the Senate should be abolished.

Mr. McMULLEN. I just want to say a word or two in reply to the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy). The hon. member for Bothwell attempted to leave the impression on the House that Mr. Mills carried that constituency in 1891 by 500 of a majority. Is that not what the hon. gentleman said? The hon. gentleman was not honest enough to tell the House that there were three candidates in the field in that campaign. Did he say that No, that would not suit his purpose. There were two candidates in opposition to Mr. Mills, and that accounts for the fact that he got the majority that was mentioned. The hon. gentleman kept it a secret that while Mr. Mills had a majority in 1891 of 500, and that while, in 1896, he carried it over his head, there were three candidates in the field. He should have told the House that Mr. Mills had two candidates in opposition to him in 1891, and that that was the reason for the result as it occurred.

Mr. BRITTON. Mr. Chairman, as my constituency is not affected in any way by this Bill, I can, perhaps, discuss it. In two or three minutes, without any heat in the matter, as a question of this kind ought to be discussed. There is one thing I have noticed, and it is that at no time, while this question has been under discussion, has any one attempted to justify the Act of 1882 on its merits. From first to last we have heard from hon. gentlemen opposite that it was not such a terrible thing as the Liberals had said, because it did not accomplish the object which the Liberals said it had in view. That is one reason they gave against the arguments of the Liberals, and the other thing, although you could not call it an argument, was, that they pointed to the action of the Ontario legislature in some redistribution Act of theirs, and said that the Ontario gerrymander is so much worse than the one of the House of Commons in Canada that they are not to be compared in the same day. I do not admit that, but it seems to me that neither of these can be, by persons who want to argue the question fairly, considered as an answer to what has been alleged, from 1882 down to the present time, and what has never been answered by hon. gentlemen opposite, that the Act of 1882, and the subsequent Act of 1892, were infamous gerrymander Acts. No one could have heard the statement made by the hon. Minister of Customs, in which he gave specific instances of Liberal townships having been torn away from where they belonged and placed in other ridings where they did not require Liberal votes, but he must have been so impressed that he must at once have admitted that it was an unfair advantage to take of any party, that it was not fair fighting, that it was hitting below the belt, that, as has been said on many occasions, it was playing with loaded dice. These things have not been answered. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) has spoken of the fact that in subsequent election campaigns more Liberals were returned than before, or, that more Liberals were returned than were expected to be returned. Can that fairly be considered to be an answer to the charge? If a man intends to poison, and if the poison does not take effect, is it any answer to the charge to say that the man who intended to poison did not accomplish the object? Is it any answer to say that the object was not accomplished by these things which were done, which are not now justified by any single member of the House? But, we are not left here purely and simply to argue the question of facts, which are not disputed, but, we have it from an hon. gentleman who was long a member of the Conservative party and who, before his lamented death, admitted on many occasions—I do not know whether he did so in this House or not—but, in his public utterances in all parts of the Dominion, he admitted and he repented of it, that he had assisted in the passing of this infamous gerrymander Act. I refer to the late hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), who said that whatever he might have done as a party man, he was sorry to have been guilty of any such thing. So, we have had it admitted by a leading man who was for a long time a member of that party, and nobody has attempted to gainsay it, that this Act was an infamous one. If so, is it wrong on the part of this House to try, even at a late date, but as soon as ever they have the opportunity, to undo the wrong that was then done? It seems to me not. It seems to me only natural that it would be done by the Liberal party when they got into power, and if they cannot accomplish it, more's the pity. If for reasons beyond their control, they are unable to do what they promised to do, and it cannot be accomplished, more's the pity. They have, at all events, attempted to do it. If they are right in undoing this wrong, which is practically admitted has been done, can this be done in any fairer way than by this section of the Bill which is under consideration? There are two tribunals that are able to do the work that is to be done by this Bill. One is ourselves; that is, the House of Commons. We are here to do a certain part of this work. Hon. gentlemen take their part in that. What we do not do ourselves in reference to constituencies we leave to an independent tribunal called commissioners in this Bill, under consideration, and these commissioners are to be judges of the land. Now, the hon. member for Bothwell says that these judges are shackled and hampered. He has no complaint that other work, that is not, by this Bill, committed to these judges, should be committed to them. He has no complaint of that, because the work is only to be done by two sets of parties, one by the legislature, by members of the House of Commons, and the other by these judges. If he were complaining that we do not do more work ourselves, then I could understand that ground of complaint. If the government did not want to be absolutely fair they, perhaps, might meet him and say: We will parcel out these constituencies by parliament. In order to avoid the objection which would be made in this House and by the newspapers and the people outside of it: You have a majority in the House and you can carry this thing simply by the majority that is at the back of the government; and it is not by reason or argument, but simply by the force of the majority that the government have that you are going to divide the constituencies in the country. The government say: No, instead of doing it in that way, we are going to commit to the judges the work that is to be done. So, at the risk of taking up time, I will just read the first part of section 2, which bears upon that:

Where—

Or, in other words, whenever.

—under the foregoing provisions, any county or city is to be divided into more than one electoral district, such division shall be made by a board of commissioners, consisting of at least three persons, being judges of the Supreme Court of Judicature for Ontario, &c.

Then, subsection 2 of section 2, which was read by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), is as follows:—

The letters patent appointing the commissioners shall direct them, in making the divisions, to consider the distribution of population, according to the latest census of Canada, the public convenience, and such divisions as appear to them best calculated to do substantial justice.

Yet, in the face of language like that, as broad as it can be, leaving them an absolute power with the knowledge that they are to acquire, without the aid or assistance, in any way, of the government of the day, or anybody else, to do absolute justice in this matter, hon. gentlemen opposite get up and say that the judges are shackled, that they are not left to do as they might do under other circumstances. In the face of the plain words of the statute, there is nothing in an argument of that kind. It is fair enough to argue that as a matter of expediency, this Bill should not be passed before the decennial census is taken. I have given the reason why the government should pass this Bill now, and that is because it is the first opportunity they have had of redressing a great wrong which has been committed, and a wrong against which the country has pronounced time and time again. The constitutional question has been practically abandoned both here and elsewhere. This is not a question of adjustment or representation as between the different provinces of the Dominion, but it is merely a question of regulating the boundary lines of electoral divisions without changing the adjustment of representation between the provinces so far as this parliament is concerned. The constitutional question has been abandoned by these gentlemen opposite, and their only argument now is to say: You had better leave well enough alone until after the census, when there will be a Bill to deal with the representation and the adjustment of the constituencies. But in the meantime these gentlemen opposite want to profit by the wrong perpetrated in 1882. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not think we should allow that wrong to be persisted in any longer.

On section 2:

Mr. QUINN. Would the minister give a resume of what these different clauses mean, because they are somewhat difficult to understand, as they are set out in the Bill?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). The language of the subsections appears to be extremely simple. They provide that the division of these various counties shall be made by three judges of the Supreme Court in the province of Ontario; that they shall be appointed under a royal commission, that they shall proceed upon certain defined principles to carry out the Act; that they shall have regard to the last census of 1891, and shall have regard to the convenience of the electorate and to what is in their judgment substantial justice. If there is a vacancy by death or otherwise it shall be lawful for the Governor in Council to fill up the vacancy. The verdict of the majority of the three judges shall be the verdict of the commission. I do not know that I can add anything to that.

Mr. QUINN. There does not seem to be any definite method by which the commissioners shall proceed to the distribution of a city. They are not bound to follow the wards, or the electoral subdivisions as they exist now, nor are they given any direction by which they shall decide what would be the population or the geographical limits of what they declare to be the different electoral districts of the city. I think there should be something more in the Bill in order that members of the House at the present time should know exactly what are the limits of the districts they represent, or which they may be called upon to represent hereafter.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). I am afraid that if we have to restrict the judges, we would be charged with having interfered with their perfect freedom of action. We do not desire to interfere with the judges. My hon. friend (Mr. Quinn) does not agree with his colleagues upon that point. We agree with those who say that the judges should have a free hand. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn) desires to restrict the powers of the judges in any respect, the government will give careful consideration to any suggestion he has to make. For our part our policy is to leave the matter in the hands of the judges under the instructions that will form part of their patents under the provisions of this Act, namely, that in making the divisions, they shall, so far as in their power lies, do substantial justice. It does not appear to me necessary to adopt precautions to ensure that the judges shall do substantial justice. It would seem to most men that they are more likely to arrive at what is fair and just, than would perhaps a partisan tribunal such as this House, or any political body.

Mr. QUINN. That is where I join issue with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock). I understand from his explanation that the judges are limited by the commission which they shall receive.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. They are instructed.

Mr. QUINN. And the instructions they receive will be the result of the deliberations of the cabinet.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Oh no.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The cabinet cannot put any limit to their powers.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Would the hon. member (Mr. Quinn) read subsection 2.

Mr. QUINN. I have read it, but I do not see that the geographical limits of the divisions are defined.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The judges do that.

Mr. QUINN. They do it subject to the commission which they receive from the Governor in Council.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Not at all.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). There would be nothing remaining for these judges to do if this parliament should fix the geographical limits.

Mr. QUINN. Of course there would. The judges are to fix the geographical limits according to the commission which they receive.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. According to the instructions in the Act. The commission says nothing except what is in the Act.

Mr. QUINN. I do not see what the instructions are here. It says:

The letters patent appointing the commissioners shall direct them, in making the divisions, to consider the distribution of population according to the latest census of Canada, the public convenience, and such divisions as appear to them best calculated to do substantial justice.

Now, what is substantial justice?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. They are the judges.

Mr. QUINN. Substantial justice to whom?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. To the people of Canada. This is a mandate from parliament to them.

Mr. QUINN. Does the minister say that there shall be no instructions given to the judges as to the geographical limits of these divisions?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. There shall be no instructions whatever given to the judges except what is set forth in the Act. That will be their instructions, and they will be bound to obey the mandate of parliament. The government have no right whatever to incorporate anything in the commission, except what the Act warrants, and it would be an impertinence on the part of any government to attempt to control the judges in trying to obey the instructions of parliament as set out in this Act.

Mr. QUINN. Now, let us take one case. Subsection (e) of section 1, says:

The electoral district of the city of Toronto shall consist of the city of Toronto, and shall be divided into five electoral districts, each of which shall return one member.

These, as I understand, are the only instructions which the judges shall receive, that is, that the city of Toronto shall be divided into five electoral districts, each of which shall be represented by one member; so that in the hands of the judges will be placed the geographical limits of each of these districts without any instructions from the government in their commissions. Do I understand that?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The geographical divisions will not be placed in the hands of the judges. The judges will be able to ascertain the limits of the municipality of the city of Toronto, which they will take judicial notice of. They do not require to be instructed on that point. There are local Acts setting forth the limits of the municipality. They begin with that. They then have the order of this House to divide that municipality into five divisions, each division to be represented separately. They are also instructed to have regard to the last census, and to the public convenience. There cannot be the same public inconvenience, I presume, in the city, that there would be in a rural municipality from a disregard for compactness; but at the same time they would doubtless have regard to the ward system. They might or might not. They would be quite at liberty to disregard it if they thought proper, their sole limit being to do substantial justice. That, they are bound to do, and less than that I am sure my hon. friend would not wish them to do.

Mr. McNEILL. Might I ask, are they to have regard to the balance of parties?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. What is there in this Act to suggest such a thing?

Mr. McNEILL. I want to know whether that is in contemplation at all or not.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. My hon. friend is a lawyer, himself, and he knows full well from the perusal of this Act, that that question need not have been put. He knows perfectly well from what the Act says that the judges cannot take any cognizance of such a thing as that. I am somewhat surprised that my hon. friend would assume that the judges could be induced to have any regard for anything except the mandate of parliament set forth in section 2.

Mr. McNEILL. I may just say to my hon. friend that so far as being a lawyer is concerned, I am sorry I can scarcely plead to that soft impeachment at the present time, whatever I may have been thirty years ago. But what I wanted to have from my hon. friend, was just a little more clear definition of what the scope of these very wide words embodied in the act, 'substantial justice,' might be, and I wanted to know whether there was any intention that these words should cover any regard to the balance of parties.

Mr. QUINN. If my hon. friend will permit me, perhaps he can answer both questions at the same time. As I understand, then, by the Act, the city of Toronto is divided into five electoral divisions. The judges are given the city as it stands, and they are told in their commissions only this, to subdivide the city into five electoral divisions. Am I correct in assuming that they are not to take cognizance of what existed before or what exists to-day as to these electoral divisions, but they are simply to take the city in its concrete form and subdivide that according to their own ideas, considering the distribution of population according to the latest census of Canada, the public convenience, and such divisions as appear to them best calculated to do substantial justice? As I understand the term substantial justice, it is to give to each individual the same voting power. That is to say, the judges are told: 'Here is the city of Toronto; you will subdivide that into five electoral divisions in such a way, having regard to the population of the city, the different interests of the city, the wards, and other limitations, that each individual in the city shall have an equal amount of representation in the parliament of Canada.' Is that what I understand the Act to mean?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I cannot undertake to determine what construction the judges, in their wisdom, might place on the term, substantial justice. But if I were to be arguing a case before the judges, it would perhaps be a fair argument to point out to them that substantial justice would involve as nearly as possible a fair representation of interests, having due regard to population. It will not be possible to have the population of the constituencies absolutely numerically the same. If, for example, they thought it wise to adhere to the ward system, and determined not to split a ward in two, they might do so, if they thought that would do substantial justice. They might think it would be better in the interests of a fair representation to use the ward system. If they did that, there must be more or less inequality in representation. They might think it advisable to try to divide the city in such a way that the different classes would be represented in the same constituency. They might think it wise to adhere, as far as possible, to the existing divisions. These and other considerations it would be for them to give as much weight to, as they saw proper. These would be fair arguments to present to them by those who wished to press upon them that these considerations would be necessary to the doing of substantial justice; but they, in the end, would be the supreme judges of what substantial justice would be. It is a question for the House to say, whether it shall itself do what it considers substantial justice, or leave that to some other tribunal. If hon. gentlemen opposite think it would be better for this House to do substantial justice, I am sure the government will endeavour to meet their wishes, instead of referring it to a judicial tribunal. We have not sought to use that power heretofore. Perhaps, if this House or the other Chamber should determine that this principle of the Bill is not a wise one, we may in the end, be driven as a House to do substantial justice, by defining the limits of the divisions ourselves. For the present we prefer, if possible, to exhaust all efforts in the direction of this Bill, and to mark a new departure as one of the safeguards for the fair representation of the people—a safeguard heretofore without any precedent, but one, I think, which ought to have the hearty endorsement of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. QUINN. My hon. friend the Postmaster General, says that if I thought, for instance, that it was in the best interests of justice that the ward system should be adhered to, I could advocate that before the judges. But I see nothing in the Bill providing for the appearance of anybody before the judges.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. My hon. friend misunderstood me. I was merely putting a hypothetical case. I said, for example, if any one were permitted to appear before the judges, and advanced certain views as to what, in his judgment, would be substantial justice, the judges were free to give what effect they thought proper to his argument. If the judges desire to hear people, I presume they will do so. It will be for them to determine what course they will pursue.

Mr. QUINN. Then the matter of doing substantial justice is left entirely in the hands of the judges. They are to take into consideration the population and whatever else may influence them in accomplishing substantial justice, without interference from the government or other parties.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. There will be no interference from the government. It will be for the judges to decide whether they will invite the public to appear before them or not.

Mr. QUINN. That is perfectly satisfactory, so far as I am concerned. There is only one other question I wish to ask. I do not see anything in the Bill which defines who the judges will be. I presume they will be in the selection of the Governor General in Council.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Last year the names were mentioned, and there is no intention to change the personnel of the court.

Mr. CLARKE. What are the names?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. My recollection is Sir George Burton, Chief Justice of the Court of Appeal; Sir John Boyd, Chancellor of Ontario; Mr. Justice Falconbridge, of the Queen's Bench. Those we propose to submit again.

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend says that there is no intention at all that the judges shall take into consideration the balance of parties, but make such divisions as appear to them best calculated to do substantial justice. Nothing could be more unfortunate than that the judges should in any way be dragged into a position that would lead the public to suppose that they were in any way concerned in the balance of parties; and in view of the declaration of my hon. friend, I would suggest the addition of these words, to make the matter quite clear:

And such divisions as appear to them best calculated to do substantial justice, irrespective of any consideration of the balance as to political parties in the several constituencies.

If these words were introduced, I think they would prove a great relief to the judges themselves, besides carrying out the view which my hon. friend has expressed so distinctly.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have no objection to adding these words, if it is thought necessary to add them. But I should think that the very declaration on behalf of the government, approved of by hon. gentlemen opposite, is in itself sufficient to make it quite clear to the judges that no party considerations are to move them. If on reflection, on the third reading, my hon. friend thinks it worth while to put these words in, I should probably accept his suggestion, but I hardly think they will be found necessary.

Mr. McNEILL. Expressions used on the floor of the House with reference to a Bill are scarcely a guide to the judges in determining the meaning of specific words.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The objection to the hon. gentleman's amendment that presents itself to my mind is this, that when the judges are told to do substantial justice, that ought to exclude every consideration that conflicts with substantial justice.

Mr. McNEILL. It depends entirely upon what substantial justice means. One man may hold it to mean one thing and another another. I think that these words, at all events, can do no harm. Then I am to understand that if I move for their insertion on the third reading, my hon. friend will accept them?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Perhaps I rather too hastily assented to the suggestion of my hon. friend. It did not immediately occur to me that such a clause was quite unnecessary. When the judges are told to do substantial justice, that excludes regard for any other consideration. How could they do substantial justice, if they were to consult the relative strength of the parties in any constituency. In fact, such a clause might be regarded as a reflection on the judges. The only object we have is that the judges shall deal with this subject as judges, in the fullest sense of the term, regardless of all considerations except the providing of the fairest system of representation in accordance with the power vested in them by this Bill.

Mr. McNEILL. I think that the difference between my hon. friend (Mr. Mulock) and myself is, after all, somewhat substantial. I am sorry he has receded at all from the frank position he took a moment ago when he said he would accept these words. These words, I think, could not possibly do any harm. Now, my hon. friend says it is only substantial justice that the judges are expected to do, and that the introduction of these words might seem to be a reflection upon the judges. But my hon. friend will see that it is quite possible that a matter might be referred to the judges as to what would be a fair division, taking into consideration the balance of parties, and, in that case, they would have to do substantial justice having reference to that matter. I do not say it would be a wise thing, I say it would be a very unwise thing to draw the judges into such a consideration; but it is quite evident that such a reference might be made to the judges or to any other court that was appointed.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. How could it be made?

Mr. McNEILL. I do not see that it is necessary to say to my hon. friend how it could be made. I think any one can see that it could be made. If when reference was made, it was with a direction to make a fair division, not only as to the population and geographical distribution of constituencies, but as to the different political views, so that these different views might, as much as possible, have expression in parliament—that is a point that could perfectly well be referred. I do not say it would be an easy thing to determine, but I say it is quite conceivable that such a reference might be made.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) want it?

Mr. McNEILL. What is the good of my hon. friend (Mr. Paterson) saying that? If he wishes me to say nothing more and does not wish me to discuss this matter with the Postmaster General—

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I beg the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill's) pardon. I was not asking for the purpose of interrupting him, but in all seriousness.

Mr. McNEILL. Then, it is evident that the hon. gentleman has not listened to what either the Postmaster General or I have said. In discussing this question, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) said that it could not be intended, while I say that it might be intended and it ought not to be intended, and I have proposed an amendment to prevent the possibility of it. And yet the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) wants to know if I want such a reference made. Of course, I accept his statement, but I am sorry that I have so poorly expressed myself that he did not understand me, and that my hon. friend the Postmaster General has been equally unsuccessful.

Now, I wish once more to ask my hon. friend (Mr. Mulock), in all friendliness and sincerity, to allow these words to be added to the clause. I am sure we have both the same object in view, and I think it is well to make the matter clear.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I would like to say, on the legal point, that the Postmaster General's argument, to my mind, was simply conclusive. Here you have general words directing the judges to do substantial justice. My hon. friend (Mr. McNeill) suggests words limiting the general words. The judgment and discretion of the judges is not to be ample and unlimited, but it is to be limited, and he says: We want to limit you to do justice between the two parties. But there may be large commercial interests, large agricultural interests, large city interests which they must consider as distinct from party interests, and if you are pointing out that they are to consider only the interest between parties—

Mr. McNEILL. That is exactly what they are not to do.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If you point that that is what you have in mind, you necessarily exclude the general interests that they ought to consider. You are trying to put a limitation upon the powers of the judges.

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend (Sir Louis Davies) and I entirely differ. He says I am trying to put a limitation to the scope of the power to the judges which ought not to be placed upon it—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think that would be the effect of your words.

Mr. McNEILL. Then, my hon. friend thinks that this thing which I wish to exclude ought to be included?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think it is included.

Mr. McNEILL. Because he says I am trying to put a limitation upon the discretion of the judges which ought not to be put upon it. Therefore, he says that this limitation should not be placed upon the discretion of the judges, or, in other words, that the judges ought to be allowed to take into consideration the balance of parties in the constituency. I am glad we have elicited so much, because it is an important matter. The hon. gentleman has now taken the ground that the judges ought to be allowed to take into consideration the balance of party. He said in so many words: You endeavour to exclude a matter which I think ought not to be excluded. The very point I take is that it ought to be excluded, that the judges ought not to be allowed to deal with such a matter. If you allow them to deal with such a matter you will—

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. You misunderstand my hon. friend (Sir Louis Davies). What he said was that by naming the exception, you are cutting down the effect of the words 'substantial justice.' That is the point the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) desired to make. I offer a suggestion to my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill): We both have the same objects in view in this measure; and if he will consider the subject before the third reading, I will give him ample time to move an amendment, if he is not satisfied with the measure, and, in the meantime, perhaps, he and I may be able to agree upon a form of words that will meet his views and yet not cut down the full scope of the words 'substantial justice,' which is what we desire should be done by the judges.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

Mr. McNEILL. I am satisfied that the judges themselves would be most anxious that there should be no ambiguity in regard to this matter, and that all questions of party balance should be strictly excluded from the scope of this reference.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. We are at one on that.

Mr. McNEILL. That being so, I venture to say that a limitation of the scope of the general words is exactly what the judges would desire. But there is no use in prolonging the discussion. I think we understand one another, and I hope my hon. friend (Mr. Mulock) will agree to the suggestion I make, on the third reading.

Mr. QUINN. I desire to ask what is the meaning of the words 'latest census of Canada' in the section. Perhaps I can elicit the information best by explaining what I mean by the question I put. I see that the section reads:

The letters patent appointing the commissioners shall direct them, in making the divisions, to consider the distribution of population—

There is no comma there, but I put a comma for the moment.

—according to the latest census of Canada, the public convenience, and such divisions as appear to them best calculated to do substantial justice.

I presume that is the proper reading of the section. But what is the object, in all fairness, in considering the population according to the last census of Canada when that is ten years old? Why not allow the judges a free hand and to distribute these divisions taking into consideration the distribution of population as it exists, and not merely according to the figures of the latest census of Canada? I fancy that Toronto, being a progressive city, would have a civic census taken annually, and in that way a very fair idea of the population could be arrived at. Now, any great injustice that will be done in a distribution of this kind will be in the large cities. Why not, then, take the annual census of these cities and let the judges redistribute these seats according to that census, and not ask them, intelligent men, men of superior standing, to redistribute these cities according to the census that is laid down in the Bill. The thing seems to me to be farcical. If we were drawing up a comic opera or something of that kind, I could understand these words. But, in a serious statute of this parliament, to say that the judges would be bound to consider, not the population of Toronto as it exists to-day, but the population of Toronto as it existed in 1891, is absurd. Now, I anticipate the answer that my hon. friend will give; he will say: We have no guarantee that this redistribution will not take place before the next census. But we have no guarantee, on the other hand, that it will not take place immediately. We have consequently no guarantee that the redistribution of the city of Toronto will not take place according to the census of 1891, instead of the census as it exists to-day. I therefore ask what is the meaning of the words: 'according to the latest census of Canada?'

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The reason moving the government to introduce this measure is that the redistribution Bills of 1882 and 1892 did violence to their sense of justice, and should never have been put upon the statute-book. The Act of 1882 should have been remedied after the census of 1892. If justice had been done to the people of Canada, the Act that we are now trying to pass would have been passed in 1892. On what data would the House then have proceeded? On the census of 1892. This Act should have been on the statute-book now; if it had been passed in 1892 it would continue to be in force until the next census. As the ten years roll on and you draw towards the end of the decennial period, the increase of population my hon. friend refers to has gone on and produced inequalities that call for a redistribution before the next census. I ask my hon. friend therefore to consider, in dealing with this matter, that we are doing what parliament ought to have done after the last census. Of course in a sense, the judges will have regard for what has taken place to some extent in this respect. For instance, in the city of Toronto they will consider, no doubt, the enlarged area. Toronto to-day is different in area from what it was in 1891.

Mr. CLARKE. How?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. There have been extensions to the boundaries.

Mr. CLARKE. No.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Well, there might have been, and I think there have been.

Mr. CLARKE. There has been a great increase in the population of Toronto, but you don't take that into account in this Bill.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The Bill considers the population. It transfers to the city of Toronto a certain population that was represented by the members of East and West York. As this population is for representation purposes transferred to the city, the city is given a new member so that the representation may keep pace with the population. It leaves the number represented by each member about the same.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I have not had an opportunity of saying anything in regard to this measure, and I think it is my duty to express my approval of the action of the government in introducing this Bill in order to remedy the injustice that was done to a large portion of the province of Ontario by the gerrymanders of 1882 and 1891. The county which I represent was one of the points where the Conservative government of that day displayed their ingenuity in hiving the Grits. I have been amused this evening listening to the hair-splitting which has been indulged in by some members on the other side of the House with regard to what the duty of the judges should be under this Act. It is a great pity that some man in the House on the Conservative side, in 1882, was not inspired with the same sense of justice. If they had been as anxious in 1882 to secure justice to the people of Canada and to have an Act passed which would secure that justice, they never would have introduced and passed the Act of 1882, by which they sought to tie the hands of the Liberals in the province of Ontario in a large number of constituencies, in more constituencies than are affected by the present measure. Now, I think that when the Liberal party came into power in 1896 they were pledged up to the hilt to take this matter in hand just as soon as they secured position on the Treasury benches.

When the Act of 1882 was passed the whole section of Ontario which was affected by this Bill was aroused to intense indignation. Not only the Liberals of the sections which were affected were indignant, but a large number of fair-minded Conservatives went over to the Liberal ranks; and that is the reason that the Conservative party did not profit by the measure which they passed in 1882 to the extent that they had anticipated. I know that was the case in the constituency which I represent. When that gerrymander was made in 1882, I was the nominee of the South Riding of Wentworth, having been nominated unanimously by the Liberal convention there in succession to Mr. Rymal, who previously represented that constituency. The Conservatives carved that constituency in such a way as to be almost absolutely certain that they would defeat the Liberals in South Wentworth. I went to sleep in my house in the township of Ancaster, in the constituency of old South Wentworth, that had never for fifty years returned a Conservative to represent them, either in the old parliament of Canada or in the parliament constituted after confederation, and woke up next morning in North Brant. The people were solid for the Liberal party, not by a large majority, because our majorities there used to run from twenty three up to seventy-five or one hundred. It was a fighting constituency, and we had to fight for the triumphs which we always won. In 1882, when Mr. Rymal represented South Wentworth in this House, although Sir John A. Macdonald, the then leader of the House, professed to have a great friendship for him, he deliberately fixed that constituency not knowing at the time that Mr. Rymal was not to be the candidate, in order to defeat the man whom he chose to call his best friend on the Liberal side of the House. In order to do that they took out the Liberal township of Ancaster which gave me a majority of 400 at the first election that I ran there, and they put it into the county of North Brant. They fixed South Wentworth so as to be almost certain that the Liberal candidate would be defeated there. But as I said before, the indignation of the people of South Wentworth was so great that hordes of Conservatives came over to the Liberal party and they returned Mr. Springer as their representative. They returned a Liberal as the representative of South Wentworth in spite of the gerrymander. And this was done in almost all the counties where the gerrymander was passed by the aid of liberal-minded Conservatives. There are liberal-minded men amongst the Conservatives; I have many friends amongst the Conservatives whom I esteem for their honesty in having at that time become so indignant with the action of their party that they refused to aid their party in committing this great injustice upon the people of this country. We succeeded in returning Mr. Springer as our representative, but, when the election was over, after Mr. Springer sat in this House for four years, in the next election, when it was found that the feeling had worn off the minds of the people in regard to the injustice that had been done, they returned Mr. Carpenter as their representative. This was the effect of the gerrymander in South Wentworth, and it is only one of a number of gerrymandered constituencies in the country. The Conservatives did not get the benefit of the gerrymander at the first election which they had been led to expect, but after that first election the indignation wore away. I remember when the gerrymander Act of 1882 was passed, Mr. Rymal, who represented South Wentworth in the House, had a map of the constituency drawn; he held it up in the House and said that it was no harm for any man to get down on his knees and worship it, because it bore the image of nothing in heaven above, or on the earth beneath, or in the waters under the earth, and that is the shape of the constituency that I represent. They were not satisfied with what they did with North Brant in 1882 and they fixed it a little better in 1892. They wiped out North Wentworth altogether as a constituency, they put the Tory townships of Wentworth into South Wentworth in the expectation that they would defeat the hon. Speaker of the House, but the indignation of the people was aroused and South Wentworth, which was to have been a Tory constituency, gave 200 of a majority for

Mr. SOMERVILLE.

Mr. Bain at the last general election after the gerrymander of 1892. My constituency was made up of the township of South Dumfries, in the county of Brant, half of the township of Brantford, in the county of Brant, the township of Blenheim, taken as was described here to-night by the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) from the county of Oxford, and the township of Ancaster taken from South Wentworth. Then in 1892 they took Beverly out of North Wentworth, and renamed the county over again as North Wentworth and Brant, splitting Wentworth and giving the Grits. I may say that I have had the honour of receiving the nomination in my constituency, unanimously, for the last four terms, and that the people there have always looked to the Liberal party to see that this gerrymander, that this great injustice, which was done to the Liberal party in 1882 and 1892 should be redressed as soon as the Liberal party came into power. At every meeting I have ever attended in my constituency since 1882, at each of the four elections that have taken place, one of the principal planks in the platform of the Liberal party has been that as soon as the Liberals came into power the gerrymander would be repealed. I say that the Liberal party would not be true to their pledges to the people if they did not undertake to abolish this gerrymander Act because, since 1882, at every session I have attended in this House, the Liberals have pronounced against the iniquitous injustice which was done to them and to the people of the country by the Conservative government in 1882. As was said here to-night, the Liberal party were pledged up to the hilt, not only by the statements of individual members when they addressed their constituents in reference to this subject, but, the Liberal press all through the province insisted, that, as soon as the Liberals came into power, they should abolish this iniquitous gerrymander Bill which was passed in 1882. At our great Liberal convention, a convention the like of which never was held in the Dominion of Canada—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but, it is a fact, that there never was in the Dominion of Canada such a representative gathering of a party held for the purpose of deciding upon the policy of the party, as that which was held in Ottawa in 1893. At that convention it was decided that this should be one of the principal planks in the platform of the Liberal party, and the Liberal government which we all think has done so much to redeem the pledges that were made to the people—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. This is one of the pledges that we made, and we made other pledges that have already been redeemed and the redeeming of which has been in the interest of the people of the country.

Mr. QUINN. Name, name.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The Franchise Act.

Mr. MILLS. The plebiscite.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. There are plenty of pledges we have redeemed.

Mr. QUINN. Free trade as they have it in England.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. That calls to my mind the fact that the Liberal party never were pledged to free trade. It was just like many cries which had been raised by the Conservative party in this House and through their journals. The Liberal party never were pledged to free trade, and any man who talks that, talks nonsense, because, he knows, if he knows anything, that free trade is an absolute impossibility. We were pledged to reduce the taxation of the country and our government have reduced the taxation. Now, in regard to the gerrymander, as I was going on to say, in 1892 they carved up some of the constituencies. I suppose it is no breach of confidence to mention an incident that occurred on that occasion. I remember coming out of the House the night that the Bill was introduced, and I met Mr. Bowell. He is an old friend of mine; I have known him intimately for forty-five years. He tapped me on the shoulder and said: Somerville, we thought you would not be elected next year, as you only had a thousand of majority and we wanted to make sure that you would come back, so we have given you Beverly township. They wanted to hive the Grits. I say that the Liberal government would not have been worthy of the confidence of the Reformers of the Dominion of Canada if they had not introduced this Bill to do away with the gerrymanders of 1882 and 1892. In redeeming their pledges they have shown their consistency, and I cannot understand for the life of me, how any man, who has a sense of fair-play and of justice, will get up in this House and say that this is not the proper time to make this change and talk of what is fair and honest. An injustice was done in 1882, and the Liberals have never had an opportunity of wiping out that injustice until now. This Bill shows that the government propose to do justice to the people of those constituencies and to the people of the whole Dominion. In doing this justice they are not doing any injustice to the Conservatives. What did the Conservatives do in 1882? I know for a fact that they had knots of wire pullers in almost every county in the province of Ontario making maps to show just how they could fix up constituencies to insure the return of the Tories. I will give the committee an instance of that. In the constituency which was at that time represented by Mr. Bain, the present Speaker of the House, they proposed to make a change. They proposed to take the village of Burlington and the township of Nelson out of Halton and put them into North Wentworth. North Wentworth had always been a fighting constituency. I have been in that constituency nearly all my life. I have taken part in elections there for forty-five years, and I think I know all about elections there. I know that we never could secure a large majority there. It was like South Wentworth; we were always able to win but it was after a hard battle every time. The Conservatives never gave up, but they fought a manly battle, and when they were down they got ready for the next fight and kept getting ready until the next election. They consulted the Conservatives in North Wentworth in regard to the changes which they proposed to introduce, and they sent up to a man who had been the Conservative candidate there and who was to be the Conservative candidate. They asked him to give them his ideas about taking Burlington and Nelson into North Wentworth in order to secure his return. To his credit, be it told, he was honest enough to say: If I cannot win North Wentworth without doing such a mean thing as that, I won't win at all; and he refused to consent to allow the government to take Burlington and Nelson into the riding of North Wentworth. As I said before, there are Conservatives and Conservatives. He was one of the Conservatives I admire. He was a fair-minded, plucky man. He did not want to strike under the belt, as the Conservative gerrymander Act did strike. I shall conclude my remarks, Mr. Chairman, by saying that I entirely endorse the action of the government. This Bill shows the fairness of the Liberal government. The Conservatives, when they passed a Redistribution Bill, consulted their constituents to find out what they could do in order to carve up the constituencies, so that they might get the advantage over the Liberals; but here we have this Liberal government introducing this Bill to do away with a great wrong, and they are so fair and so just that they actually lean over to the other side, by offering to allow the judges to make the division of these constituencies. Do you suppose, Mr. Chairman, that if the Conservatives had to re-gerrymander the constituencies of Ontario, they would attempt to do it in such a just and honest way as is proposed by this Liberal government. Well, if there are the same class of Conservatives in this House to-day as there were in 1882, they would not do it. So, Sir, the Liberal government deserve credit for the fairness which they have displayed in their efforts to do away with the injustice of the gerrymander Acts of 1882 and 1892. If the Senate throws out this Bill this year, which I hope they will not, they will aid in perpetuating this outrage on the electors of Canada. If, on the contrary, the parliament of Canada passes this measure, the people of this country will say that we have wiped out one of the most flagrant disgraces that ever was passed into law in this or any other civilized country in the world.

Mr. QUINN. The committee is delighted to find that our hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Somerville), has found his voice again. There was a rumour some time ago, that the hon. member (Mr. Somerville), was quite dissatisfied that he did not have the honour as a minister of introducing this Bill. I believe he is quite satisfied now, inasmuch as he is promised one of the seats to become vacant in the Senate.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Just allow me, if you please. I do not want anything at the hands of the government, and I would not accept any office they might offer me in any place whatever.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. QUINN. I am very glad to hear he would not accept any office, because a position in the Senate is not considered an office. At any rate the hon. gentleman (Mr. Somerville), has become a decoy or an apologist for a Bill, which I must characterize as an act of political brigandish, as admitted by the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock). The hon. gentleman does not attempt to excuse it in any way. He does not base it on any principle of honour or justice, as regards the subdivision of the city of Toronto, but he says that in 1882 Toronto was subdivided by what he calls a gerrymander Act, and that consequently the members of this House must carry themselves back to 1892, must become Rip Van Winkles for years, and must pass an Act based on a census taken ten years ago. He also asks the judges to become Rip Van Winkles, and he tells them they must close their eyes to the increase in population of such centres as Toronto, and that they must sub-divide the city according to the population at that time. If that is the principle upon which this Act stands, it is the most iniquitous, the most absurd, the most ridiculous, the most farcical proposition that could be put before this House. If that is the best excuse the Postmaster General can give for this Act, then let him rely on the majority behind him, but do not let him plead that there is anything in this Bill except vengeance for an imaginary wrong. The words 'substantial justice' are ridiculous and absurd when incorporated in this

Bill, and placed in conjunction with the idea that to carry it into effect, we must close our eyes to the progress that has been made by the different constituencies of the country, during the last ten years.

Mr. CLARKE. My hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Somerville), has referred rather scathingly to the divisions which were made in the province of Ontario, by what he called the last gerrymander Act. It seems to me that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Somerville), was not quite fair in the statements he made, because he did not give the result of the redistribution of seats in his district as far as population is concerned. Prior to 1892, Wentworth had one representative in this House, and if the hon gentleman looks at the population of that county, and compares it with the population of other counties having one representative also, he will find that the redistribution of both Wentworth and Brant was a necessity. Had he given us the population of the constituencies which were created under the Acts of 1882 and 1892, we would be able to form a better judgment, as to whether these Acts were as unfair as he alleges. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Somerville), tells us that the government would not be doing itself justice if it did not take the earliest opportunity to undo the wrongs which were perpetrated under these two Redistribution Acts; and he expresses his satisfaction with this present Bill, as a measure of justice to the province of Ontario. Now, Sir, one of the principal objections taken to the Acts of 1882 and 1892 was, that they did not give a fair representation to the western part of the province of Ontario, and attention was directed again and again to the fact that the constituencies in eastern Ontario, in proportion to their population, were over represented in this House. Yet, let me call the attention of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Somerville) to the fact, that that inequality, that injustice, if it is an injustice, remains uncorrected in the present Bill. The hon. gentleman expressed his satisfaction with the provisions of this Bill, in that it is righting the wrongs which he claims were done to the province of Ontario. If this Bill is to do justice to the province of Ontario, it certainly should give us representation by population under reasonable conditions, and yet, if this Bill becomes law, the western part of the province of Ontario, will continue to labour under the disabilities which hon. gentlemen opposite asserted it laboured under by the Acts of 1882 and 1892, and that too, notwithstanding the fact that that portion of the province of Ontario, west of the county of Ontario, has largely increased in population since these years. I think that my hon. friend, whom I believe to be thoroughly upright and honourable, should insist that if justice is to be done to the province of Ontario, the western part of the province should receive that measure of justice which they claim it was deprived of under the former Acts. My hon. friend says that we ought to be satisfied because the government have relegated to the judges the arrangement of the constituencies in the various counties. If the government had said that the western part of the province of Ontario, from the county of Ontario westward, shall be entitled under this Bill to a certain number of representatives, and had appointed a commission of judges to apportion that representation, there would be less objection to the Bill than there is at the present time. But the government, in this Bill, first of all, set out the counties, and then they leave to the judges the purely formal business of subdividing those counties into constituencies. The relegation of the subdivision of counties to the judges was not always a plank in the platform of hon. gentlemen opposite. They denounced the suggestion when it was made a few years ago in this House, that judges should subdivide the constituencies; and yet my hon. friend asks us to approve of the measure now before us because the judges are asked to subdivide counties which the government in this Bill have already formed. In 1892, when the last representation Bill was before the House, this question of the appointment of judges to make subdivisions in counties was considered, and the right hon. gentleman who now leads the government expressed his opinion as follows, as reported in Hansard of the 31st of May, 1892:

In some quarters the suggestion has been made that the duty of redistribution should be referred to a commission of judges specially appointed; in other words, that parliament should divest itself of its powers in this most important particular. Sir, I am bound to say at once that this is a proposition which my friends and I would not favour either upon this or any other subject. I am bound to say that we would not entrust to any this duty and privilege which properly belongs to parliament. Moreover, this proposition implies a singular want of confidence in parliamentary institutions. It implies that in a matter of this kind a majority would never be able to rise above the low temptation of strengthening themselves at the expense of their opponents.

If that was the view entertained in 1892 by the right hon. gentleman who leads the government, why should we be asked to compliment and congratulate the government because they have adopted in this Bill the views and principles which he then unhesitatingly condemned? Just one word more, Mr. Speaker. The Liberal party claim that one of the prime conditions in this Bill is that the municipal boundaries of counties shall be restored. Well, admitting that that is a sound principle, may I ask why it has not been applied to all the counties of Ontario? If it is a correct principle to adopt, why should it not be applied to the constituencies in the eastern part of the province? They are left just as they were under the redistribution Acts of 1882 and 1892; and if these Acts were unjust and unfair in that they gave over-representation to the people living in the eastern part of Ontario, why does not the government right the wrong that was done to the western part of the province by those measures? It seems to me that the more we consider the propositions contained in the Bill, the more objectionable they become. Before taking my seat, I might ask the hon. Postmaster General whether he persists in retaining subsection (c) of section 1 of the Bill in its present shape, that is, that the judges shall be compelled to subdivide the city of Toronto into five electoral divisions, or whether he will not allow the judges in their wisdom, if they so determine, to subdivide the city of Toronto so that it shall elect five members by making three electoral divisions, two of which shall return two members and one one member?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The proposition of my hon. friend is rather an involved one, but I will promise that the government will give it careful consideration. I am sure that more than that my hon. friend would not ask.

On section 3.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, before you declare that section carried, I wish to say that I do not intend to make a speech upon it or to go into details. I rise merely to protest against the changes proposed to be made in regard to the province of Quebec. It strikes me that the government ought to be generous enough, considering the great contingent they have from the province of Quebec, not to make changes in those counties which wipe out nearly all the support given to our party in that province.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL moved that section 4 be struck out.

Motion agreed to.

On section 5,

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.) Before that clause is adopted, I wish to make a few remarks. It will be observed that subsection (c) provides that the electoral district of King's shall consist of the county of King's, and shall return one member, while the other two subsections provide that the electoral district of Prince shall consist of the county of Prince, and shall return two members, and that the electoral district of Queen's shall consist of the county of Queen's, and shall return two members. You will observe the anomaly existing here, that the county of King's shall return only one member, while each of the other two counties shall return two members. It was my intention a few minutes ago to move an amendment to subsection (c), to strike out the words 'one member' and substitute the words 'two members.'

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I understand the hon. gentleman has an amendment to propose.

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.) No.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. An argument then. As it is getting late, would it suit my hon. friend if he were to reserve it for the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.) I have no objection, provided I have the same privilege of discussion on the third reading.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. My hon. friend will have the same opportunity except, of course, that we will not be in committee.

Mr. MARTIN. Before this clause is carried, I would like to discuss it, but provided we can discuss it fully on the third reading, I shall reserve my remarks until then.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. You can discuss it fully on the third reading.

Bill reported.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.25 p.m.

THE REGINA LEADER COMPANY.

Mr. DAVIS asked :

Is the government aware that the corporation of the 'Leader' Company of Regina, N.W.T., was constituted as follows:

Incorporation of the 'Leader' Company.—Charter dated March 5, 1887. Capital stock, $20,000, divided into 4,000 share of $5 each. Shareholders incorporated: Nicholas Flood Davin, 2,000 shares, paid $1,000; Daniel Mowat, 1 share, paid $5; Alexander Lawson Lunan, 1 share, paid $2.50; James Henry Benson, 1 share, paid $2.50.

First Directors: Nicholas Flood Davin, Daniel Mowat, Alexander L. Lunan and James Henry Benson.

Chief place of business: Regina, N.W.T.

And if the said Nicholas Flood Davin is one and the same as the present representative of Western Assiniboia?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The government is aware that there appeared in the issue of the 1st of February, 1887, of the Regina Leader newspaper of Regina, North-west Territories, and in other issues thereafter, a notice over the names of Nicholas Flood Davin, Daniel Mowat, Alexander Lawson Lunan and James Henry Benson, to the effect that Nicholas Flood Davin, and the others just named, would apply to the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories to grant a charter to the Leader Company, Limited, the capital stock of such company to be $20,000, in shares of $5 each, and the persons named to be the first or provisional directors; but the government has no information as to SERVICE LIMIT FOR COMMANDING OFFICERS.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

3. What commanding officers of independent squadrons, batteries and companies, who had exceeded the regulation tenure were retained in 1898, and the reasons for retention?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. The regulations in 1898 as regards the service limit of commanding officers of independent squadrons, batteries and companies, were as follows :—

All appointments as commanding officers are for a tenure of five years. Any extension of tenure will be for three years, and will only be granted upon the recommendation of the D. O. C., who should submit his recommendation one month before the expiration of the tenure.

General Order 83 of September, 1898, amended the foregoing regulation by substituting the words 'An extension of the ten-year command may be granted in special cases' for 'any extension of tenure will be for three years.' 2. None, as Major-General Gascoigne was of opinion that it was not in the interest of the service to apply the regulations to commanding officers of independent units until they should be entitled to retire with the rank of lieutenant-colonel. 3. Major Boulanger, commanding 1st Field Battery; Lieut.-Col. Drennan, commanding 5th Field Battery; Lieut.-Col. Dibblee, commanding 10th Field Battery; Lieut.-Col. These extensions were recommended in the interest of the service.

COLLINGWOOD HARBOUR.

Mr. McCARTHY asked :

Is it the intention of the government this year to place a sum in the supplementary estimates for the purpose of deepening the Collingwood Harbour, so as to give a depth of twenty feet of water, in order that vessels of the deepest draught sailing the upper lakes may enter it?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The subject is engaging the best attention of the government.

CUSTOMS COLLECTION AT MOOSEJAW.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

Who has been appointed collector of customs at Moosejaw, port of entry? Is it Mr. J. K.

Stevenson? Who recommended him? Were there other applicants?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). Mr. J. K. Stevenson has been appointed as acting sub-collector of customs at the outport of Moosejaw. He was recommended by parties in whom I have confidence. No other applications were before the department at the time when the appointment was decided upon.

GRAIN DELIVERED AT COLLINGWOOD HARBOUR.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). The hon. gentleman from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) has called my attention to the fact that a point was omitted in reply to his question the other day. With the permission of the House, I will now say that 393,744 bushels of grain were received by water during the season of 1899 at Collingwood from Chicago, Duluth and Fort William.

BALGONIE AND HEDNESFORD MAIL CONTRACT.

Mr. DAVIS asked :

Has any action been taken by the Postmaster General in connection with the transaction referred to in the following extract from the supplementary report of the Postmaster General for 1896?

Balgonie and Hednesford.

This contract was let without tender at $125 per annum, while there was in the department a tender for $90 per annum. The loss resulting amounts to $140 for the contract term.

The agreement by which this service was fixed was made with Mr. Wm. Cockwill from April 1, 1895, the rate being $125 per annum. Shortly after this agreement was entered into, tenders for a contract from July 1, 1895, were invited, due to be opened May 17. The tenders received were not considered, as the contract was given to Mr. Cockwill at the rate he was receiving, viz., $125 per annum.

Tenders received:

H. Edmonds	$ 90 00
J. Putz	94 00
H. Richardson	125 00
W. Cockwill	125 00
A. Meier	175 00

(Correspondence.)

Ottawa, May 18, 1895.

My dear Sir Adolphe,—I have just received the inclosed from a great friend of ours. If you can manage to give Cockwill the carrying of the mail you will do well. I know the lad; he is almost a hero. I have known him bring the mail from Leon Creek in the face of a strong wind and the glass 30 below zero, one of the most extraordinary feats that probably have ever been performed.

Yours truly,
N. F. DAVIN.

The Honourable
Sir A. P. Caron, K.C.M.G., Postmaster General,
Ottawa.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). The contract for this service, which began on the 1st July, 1895, expired on the 30th June, 1899. On the 1st June, 1898, the removal of the post office at Hednesford increased the distance the contractor had to travel from twelve to sixteen miles, and the rate of pay was increased from $125 to $150 a year. Before the contract expired, tenders were invited for a new contract, and the contract was awarded to the lowest tenderer, Mr. Wm. Cockwill, at the rate of his tender, $125 a year. The new contract went into operation on the 1st July, 1899.

MAIL TRANSFER SERVICE AT BROCKVILLE.

Mr. DAVIS asked :

Has the Postmaster General taken any action in connection with the transaction referred to in the following extract from the supplementary report of the Post Office Department for 1896 ?

Mail transfer service at Brockville.

This is a service for transferring the mails between the Grand Trunk and Canadian Pacific Railway trains at Brockville, the mail bags being trucked across the platform between the trains, and has been performed since the 1st of April, 1882, by Mr. James E. Cavanagh, under contract renewed from time to time, the contract price being $370 a year. On the 1st January, 1891, an increase of $36 was provided by a contract of that date, the two services aggregating $406 a year. Whilst these contracts were current, application was made by contractor J. E. Cavanagh to the late government to be appointed transfer agent in respect of the transfer service which he was required to perform under his contract, and in January, 1895, he was appointed such transfer agent at $400 per year.

Mr. J. E. Cavanagh, after his appointment as agent, continued to do the work just as before, drawing pay therefor at the rate of $400 a year as agent. In August of the same year (1895) the contractor, with the consent of the government, was allowed to treat the contracts as still in force and transferred them to one P. G. Cavanagh, a locomotive engineer residing about fifty miles from Brockville, and the government then paid to Mr. P. G. Cavanagh the contract price from the time Mr. J. E. Cavanagh had been appointed agent, and this double arrangement of one man as agent and another as contractor, each being paid to do the same work, continued until the defeat of the late government, the late government paying to J. E. Cavanagh, as agent $400 a year, and to P. G. Cavanagh, as transferee of the contract, $406 a year, though the work throughout the whole time was done by J. E. Cavanagh, so that $806 was being paid for a service originally contracted to be done for $406.

On the 26th October, 1896, the present government cancelled J. E. Cavanagh's appointment as such agent, since which time he has continued to do the service under his contract for $406 a year.
